I. PROLEGOMENA.

1. I have concurred, with my vote, for the adoption today, 23 July 2018, by the International Court of Justice (ICJ), of the present Order indicating Provisional Measures of Protection in the case of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination [CERD] (Qatar versus United Arab Emirates - UAE). The ICJ has rightly ordered today, with my support, provisional measures of protection, under the CERD Convention. Additionally, as I attribute great importance to some related issues in the cas d'espèce, that in my perception underlie the present decision of the ICJ but are left out of the Court's reasoning, I feel obliged to leave on the records, in the present Separate Opinion, the identification of such issues and the foundations of my own personal position thereon.

2. I do so, under the merciless pressure of time, moved by a sense of duty in the exercise of the international judicial function, even more so as some of the lessons I extract from the matter forming the object of the present decision of the Court are not explicitly dealt with in the Court's reasoning in the present Order. This grows in importance in a case, like the present one (and two other cases before - cf. infra), lodged with the ICJ under a core human rights treaty like the CERD Convention.

3. This being so, I shall develop my reflections, initially, in the following sequence: a) a new era of international adjudication of human rights cases by the ICJ; b) the relevance of the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination; and c) non-discrimination and the prohibition of arbitrariness. I shall then examine the arguments made by the contending Parties in the public hearings before the ICJ, and the written responses they presented to the questions that I have deemed it fit to put to them; following that, I shall provide my general assessment as to the rationale of the local remedies rule in international human rights protection, and as to implications of a continuing situation.

4. Following that, I shall develop my further reflections on the remaining points to consider, namely: a) the correct understanding of compromissory clauses under human rights Conventions; b) vulnerability of segments of the population; c) towards the consolidation of the autonomous legal regime of provisional measures of protection; d) international law and the temporal dimension; and e) provisional measures of protection in continuing situations. Last but not least, in an epilogue, I shall conclude with a recapitulation of the key points of the position I sustain in the present Separate Opinion.

5. To start with, may I recall that, in a relatively brief period of time (2011-2018), the cas d'espèce on Application of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (CERD Convention - Qatar versus UAE) is the third case lodged with the International Court of Justice (ICJ) under the United Nations CERD Convention: the present Order follows chronologically the Court's decisions in the cases of Georgia versus Russian Federation (preliminary objections, 2011)¹ and of Ukraine versus Russian Federation (provisional measures of protection, 2017)².

6. In addition to those three cases under the CERD Convention, there have been other cases brought before the ICJ, and decided by it, along the last eight years, concerning also other human rights treaties. May I recall, in this respect, the case on questions relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (merits, 2012), under the U.N. Convention against Torture. Another example is provided by the case of A.S. Diallo (merits, 2010, and reparations, 2012), in respect of, inter alia, the U.N. Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (cf. infra).

II. A NEW ERA OF INTERNATIONAL ADJUDICATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS CASES BY THE ICJ.

7. To the ICJ's Judgment on the merits (of 30.11.2010) on the case of A.S. Diallo, opposing Guinea to D.R. Congo, I appended a Separate Opinion, wherein, inter alia, I deemed it fit to draw attention to the advent of a new era of international adjudication of human rights cases by the ICJ (paras. 232-245). In particular, - I singled out, - that was the first time in its history that "the World Court has expressly taken into account the contribution of the case-law of two international human rights tribunals, the European and the Inter-American Courts, to the perennial struggle of human beings against arbitrariness". In effect, - I added, - paragraph 65 of its Judgment referred to "the protection of the human person against arbitrary treatment, encompassing the prohibition of arbitrary expulsion³ (para. 237). I then concluded that “(…) It is indeed reassuring that the ICJ has disclosed a new vision of this particular issue, in so far as international human rights tribunals are concerned. This is particularly important at a time when States rely, in their submissions to this Court, on relevant provisions of human rights conventions, as both Guinea and the D.R. Congo have done in the present case, in their arguments centred on the U.N. Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights (in addition to the relevant provision of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, in the framework of the international protection of human rights).

² ICJ's Order of 19.04.2017, to which I appended a Separate Opinion; earlier, to the ICJ's Judgment of 01.04.2011 I appended a Dissenting Opinion.

This is not the only example wherein this has occurred. On 29 May 2009, the ICJ delivered its Order (on provisional measures) in the case concerning Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite, wherein Belgium and Senegal presented their submissions concerning the interpretation and application of the relevant provisions of the 1984 U.N. Convention against Torture. And, very recently, a few days ago, in the public sittings before this Court of 13 to 17 September 2010, Georgia and the Russian Federation submitted their oral arguments in the case concerning the Application of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, another U.N. human rights treaty. It is reassuring that States begin to rely on human rights treaties before this Court, heralding a move towards an era of possible adjudication of human rights cases by the ICJ itself. The international juridical conscience has at last awakened to the fulfillment of this need.

The ICJ, in the exercise of its contentious as well as advisory functions in recent years, has referred either to relevant provisions of a human rights treaty such as the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, or to the work of its supervisory organ, the Human Rights Committee. These antecedents are not to pass unnoticed, in acknowledging the turning-point which has just occurred in the present case of A.S. Diallo: the Court, in the Judgment being delivered today, 30 November 2010, has gone much further, beyond the United Nations system, in acknowledging the contribution of the jurisprudential construction of two other international tribunals, the Inter-American [IACtHR] and the European [ECtHR] Courts of Human Rights. It has also dwelt upon the contribution of an international human rights supervisory organ, the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights. The three regional human rights systems operate within the framework of the universality of human rights. (…)

By cultivating this dialogue, attentive to each other’s work in pursuance of a common mission, contemporary international tribunals will provide avenues not only for States, but also for human beings, everywhere, and in respect of distinct domains of international law, to recover their faith in human justice. They will thus be enlarging and strengthening the aptitude of contemporary international law to resolve disputes occurred not only at inter-State level, but also at intra-State level. And they will thus be striving towards securing to States as well as to human beings what they are after: the realization of justice” (paras. 241-243 and 245).

8. In the light of the aforementioned, and bearing in mind all that has been happening here at the Grande Salle de Justice in the Peace Palace at The Hague in the last nine years, one is to acknowledge that we are already within the new era of international adjudication of human rights cases by the ICJ. The present case of Application of the CERD Convention (Qatar versus UAE) bears witness of that. Having pointed this out, I can now move to the next point to consider in this Separate Opinion, namely, the relevance of the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination.

III. THE RELEVANCE OF THE FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLE OF EQUALITY AND NON-DISCRIMINATION.

9. In the cas d'espèce, Qatar's Request for the Indication of Provisional Measures of Protection (of 11.06.2018) identifies the rights it seeks to protect against discriminatory measures that "violate the customary international law principle of non-discrimination as well as the specific obligations enumerated in CERD [Convention] Articles 2, 4, 5, 6, 7" (p. 8, para. 12)⁴. The principle of equality and non-discrimination lies indeed in the foundations of the protected rights under the CERD Convention. This is a point which should have been attentively addressed by the contending parties in the course of the current proceedings⁵, which were largely consumed by diverting attention to points with no bearing at all on the consideration of provisional measures of protection under a human rights Convention.

10. This being so, I feel obliged to fill the gap, as I nourish the hope that this unfortunate diversion does not happen again in cases of the kind before the ICJ, where the applicable law is a human rights Convention, and not at all diplomatic protection rules. It is the principle of equality and non-discrimination which here calls for attention, there being no place for devising or imagining new "preconditions" for the consideration of provisional measures of protection under a human rights Convention; it makes no sense to intermingle at this stage the consideration of provisional measures with so-called "plausible admissibility" (cf. section VI, infra).

11. In focusing attention, thus, on the principle of equality and non-discrimination, it should not pass unnoticed, to start with, that the idea of human equality marked presence already in the origins of the law of nations (droit des gens), well before finding expression in the international instruments which conform its corpus juris gentium, as known in our times. The idea of human equality was underlying the original conception of the unity of human kind (present, for example, in the pioneering thinking of Francisco de Vitoria and Bartolomé de Las Casas in the XVIth century).

12. The fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination is nowadays a basic pillar of the U.N. CERD Convention, and of the whole corpus juris of the International Law of Human Rights. The expression of such principle emanated from human conscience, and projected itself in the evolving law of nations from the XVIIth to the XXIst centuries. The principle of equality and non-discrimination has a long history, accompanying the historical formation and evolution of the law of nations itself.

13. By the mid-XXth century, the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights proclaimed that "[a]ll human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood" (Article 1). It added that “[a]ll are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law. All are entitled to equal protection against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination” (Article 7).

⁴ Cf. likewise Qatar's Application Instituting Proceedings (of 11.06.2018) p. 41, para. 58; and cf. p. 50, para. 65.

14. And the 1945 Charter of the United Nations began by asserting the determination of “the peoples of the United Nations” to “reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small” (second preambular paragraph). Nowadays, the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination lies also in the foundations of the Law of the United Nations itself.

15. The gradual consolidation of the mechanisms of international protection of human rights, moreover, has much contributed to a growing awareness of the importance of the prevalence of the basic principle of equality and non-discrimination. Certain expressions were to emerge (e.g., “equality before the law” and “equal protection of the law”), on the basis of human values, and associated to the corresponding obligations of States Parties to human rights treaties.

16. Supervisory organs of such treaties have been giving their constant contribution - of growing importance - to the prohibition of the discrimination de facto or de jure, in their faithful exercise of their functions of protection of the human person⁶. The obligation of non-discrimination as related to the substantive rights protected under those treaties draws attention to the positive obligations of the States Parties to secure the protection of the human beings under their jurisdiction against the discrimination in all ambits of human relations⁷.

17. For its part, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, for example, has in this respect issued General Recommendations orienting its own interpretation of the relevant provisions of the CERD Convention. Among them, there are those which have an incidence in the consideration of the present case of Application of the CERD Convention (Qatar versus UAE), namely: General Recommendation n. 30 (of 19.08.2004), on discrimination against non-citizens; General Recommendation n. 35 (of 26.09.2013), on combatting racist hate speech; General Recommendation n. 25 (of 20.03.2000), on gender-related dimensions of racial discrimination; General Recommendation n. 22 (of 23.08.1996), on Article 5 of the CERD Convention in relation to refugees and displaced persons.

18. The advances in respect of the basic principle of equality and non-discrimination at normative and jurisprudential levels⁸, have not, however, been accompanied by the international legal doctrine, which so far has not dedicated sufficient attention to that fundamental principle; it stands far from guarding proportion to its importance both in theory and practice of Law. This is one of the rare examples of international case-law preceding international legal doctrine, and requiring from it due and greater attention.

⁶ Cf., e.g., A.A. Cançado Trindade, “Address to the U.N. Human Rights Committee on the Occasion of the Commemoration of Its 100th Session”, 29 Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights (2011) pp. 131-137.

⁷ Including at inter-individual level; cf. W. Vandenhoele, Non-Discrimination and Equality in the View of the U.N. Human Rights Treaty Bodies, Antwerpen/Oxford, Intersentia, 2005, pp. 23 and 215.

⁸ To the study of which I have dedicated my extensive book: A.A. Cançado Trindade, El Principio Básico de Igualdad y No-Discriminación: Construcción Jurisprudencial, 1st. ed., Santiago de Chile, Ed. Librotecnia, 2013, pp. 39-748.

19. A significant jurisprudential advance is found in the ground-breaking Advisory Opinion n. 18 (of 17.09.2003) of the IACtHR, on the Juridical Condition and Rights of Undocumented Migrants, upholding the view that the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination had entered the realm of jus cogens, thus enlarging its material content (paras. 97-101 and 110-111)⁹. In the IACtHR's understanding, States cannot discriminate, nor tolerate discriminatory situations to the detriment of those persons; they had a duty to guarantee them the due process of law, irrespective of their migratory status. States can no longer subordinate or condition the observance of the principle of equality before the law and non-discrimination to the objectives of their migratory or other policies.

20. For my part, I focused on this significant jurisprudential advance in my Concurring Opinion appended to the aforementioned Advisory Opinion n. 18 of the IACtHR, wherein I stressed, in support of the Court's position, the relevance of the basic principle of equality and non-discrimination, enlarging the material content of jus cogens, and permeating, - together with other general principles of law, - the whole juridical order itself, conforming its substratum (paras. 44-46, 52-58, 65 and 72)¹⁰. Without such principles, there is ultimately no legal order at all. I developed my whole reasoning in the line of jusnaturalist thinking, - which marked the origins and historical evolution of the law of nations (droit des gens), - in the framework of the civitas maxima gentium and of the universality of the human kind.

21. The path was then paved for jurisprudential developments also in the international adjudication of contentious cases pertaining to the basic principle of equality and non-discrimination¹¹. In effect, this fundamental principle has been addressed - in Judgments on contentious cases as well as in Advisory Opinions - in face of social marginalization (IACtHR, cases of Servellón-García and Others, 2006, and of Indigenous Community Sawhoyamaya, 2006); of prohibition of arbitrariness (ICJ, case of A.S. Diallo, merits, 2010, and reparations, 2012; Advisory Opinion on the Declaration of Independence of Kosovo, 2010; and case concerning the CERD Convention, 2011), as well as in face of procedural equality (IACtHR, case Loayza Tamayo, 1997; and ICJ, Advisory Opinion on Judgment of the ILO Administrative Tribunal on a Complaint against IFAD, 2012).

¹¹ Ever since the IACtHR upheld, in its Advisory Opinion n. 18 (of 17.09.2003), that the fundamental principle of equality and non-discrimination entered into the domain of jus cogens (supra), in the adjudication of successive contentious cases I stressed the need to enlarge further the material content of jus cogens, so as to encompass likewise the right of access to justice, and fulfill the pressing needs of protection of the human person. I did so, inter alia, in my Separate Opinion (dedicated on the right of access to justice lato sensu) in the Court's Judgment (of 31.01.2006) in the case of the Massacre of Pueblo Bello versus Colombia, drawing attention to the utmost importance of the right of access to justice lato sensu, encompassing its full realisation (para. 64). I further stressed, on successive occasions, the special needs of protection of victims in situations of vulnerability; cf. A.A. Cançado Trindade, El Ejercicio de la Función Judicial Internacional - Memorias de la Corte Interamericana de Derechos Humanos, 5th. rev. ed., Belo Horizonte, Edit. Del Rey, 2018, ch. XXIV, pp. 219-226.

IV. NON-DISCRIMINATION AND THE PROHIBITION OF ARBITRARINESS.

22. The protection being sought before the ICJ in the cas d'espèce, under the CERD Convention, is furthermore against arbitrary measures, against arbitrariness. Brief references were made to this in the course of the present oral pleadings before the ICJ¹². This point has not escaped the attention of other international tribunals, under other human rights Conventions: for example, inter alia, in its Judgment (merits, of 03.07.2014) on the case of Georgia versus Russia, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) singled out the duty under the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) “to protect the individual from arbitrariness”, and found that the arrests and detentions that preceded “collective” expulsions (of nationals of the applicant State) amounted to “an administrative practice” in breach of Article 5(1) and (4) of the ECHR (paras. 182 and 186-188).

23. Subsequently, in its Judgment (merits, of 23.08.2016) on the case of J.K. and Others versus Sweden, concerning expulsion of non-citizens (the applicants being Iraqi nationals), the ECtHR held that, if deported, they would face a risk of being subjected to treatment in breach of Article 3 of the ECHR (para. 123) in the destination country. In effect, non-discrimination and the prohibition of arbitrariness are a point which cannot be overlooked, also in a wider framework, in time and space. After all, in the relations between human beings and public power, arbitrariness is an issue which has marked presence everywhere along the history of humankind. It has been a source of concern along the centuries. This is why the tragedies written and performed in ancient Greece remain so contemporary in our days, after so many centuries.

24. Suffice it here to recall, e.g., in Sophocles’s Antigone (441 b.C.), the arbitrariness of the ruler Creon’s decree prohibiting Antigone to bury the corpse of one of her deceased brothers (Polynices), and her determination nevertheless to do so in pursuance of justice; or else further to recall, some years later, e.g., in Euripides’s Suppliant Women (424-419 b.C.), the arbitrariness that led to the grief and lamentation of the women whose deceased children had been separated from them, and their corpses then needed to be buried.

25. Sophocles’s Antigone, in particular, has been rewritten, in successive centuries, by several other authors, bearing in mind their respective contemporary manifestations of arbitrariness. Although the ancient Greeks had eyes mainly for justice rather than law (and only later on, Romans of the ancient Empire began to distinguish between law and justice), there are those who seek to associate the tragedy of Sophocles with the seeds or origins of the distinction between natural law and positive law.

26. In any case, arbitrariness, as history shows, is unfortunately part of human nature, and the discrimination that ensues therefrom is both de facto and de jure. If we look at the world nowadays, marked by a serious crisis of values, we can see, in all continents, the inhumane split of families in frontiers, in particular those of migrants or non-citizens. Positive law alone cannot solve the problems created at times by itself, to the detriment of human beings in situations of vulnerability (cf. infra). Law and justice go together, they are indissociable, in the line of the more lucid jusnaturalist thinking.

27. It is important to keep those ancient Greek tragedies in mind also to face the so-called “globalization”, - a misleading and false neologism en vogue in the XXIst century. Such neologism hides the marginalization and social exclusion of increasingly greater segments of the population (including migrants). Frontiers have been opened to capitals and goods, but are sadly being closed down to human beings (with split of families, and new walls, fences and detention centres, in distinct continents).

28. The material progress of some has been accompanied by the exploitation of many (including undocumented migrants). Some human beings (especially power-holders) have placed most fellow human beings in a scale of priority inferior to that attributed to capitals and goods. Nothing has been learned from sufferings of past generations; hence the need to remain attached to the goal of the realization of justice, bearing in mind that law and justice go indissociably together. The ICJ has a mission to keep on endeavouring to contribute to a humanized law of nations, in the dehumanized world of our days.

29. In my aforementioned Separate Opinion appended to the ICJ's Judgment on the case of A.S. Diallo (merits, of 30.11.2010), - concerning the arbitrary detentions followed by expulsion of a foreigner from his country of residence, - I devoted an entire section (VI) of it to "The Prohibition of Arbitrariness in the International Law of Human Rights" (paras. 107-142), wherein I examined the doctrinal development and the jurisprudential construction on the matter. I pondered, inter alia, that, as human rights treaties "conform a Law of protection (a droit de protection), oriented towards the safeguard of the ostensibly weaker party, the victim, it is not at all surprising that the prohibition of arbitrariness (...) covers arrests and detentions, as well as other acts of the public power, such as expulsions" (para. 109).

30. Such has in fact been the understanding of international tribunals entrusted with the interpretation and application of human rights treaties, - like the ICJ in the present case of the Application of the CERD Convention (Qatar versus UAE). As I pointed out in that Separate Opinion in the case of A.S. Diallo, the case-law of international human rights tribunals is quite clear in this respect. No one can be deprived of liberty in an arbitrary way (cf. e.g., ECtHR, case of Amuur versus France, Judgment of 25.06.1996). No one can be detained or arrested, even when this is considered as "legal", when it is incompatible with the provisions of human rights treaties and carried out with arbitrariness (e.g., IACtHR, case of the "Street Children" - Villagrán Morales and Others versus Guatemala, merits, Judgment of 19.11.1999; cases of Bámaca Velásquez and of Maritza Urrutia versus Guatemala, Judgments of 25.11.2000 and of 27.11.2003, respectively).

31. The prohibition of arbitrariness, - I proceeded, - stands not only in respect of the right to personal liberty, but also in relation to all other rights protected under human rights treaties¹³, so as to secure the prevalence of the rule of law (la prééminence du droit). Epistemologically, this is the correct posture in this respect, given the universally acknowledged interrelatedness and indivisibility of all human rights. Arbitrariness amounts, in effect, to an abus de pouvoir on the part of the State agents. Accordingly, a domestic law or an administrative act, concerning migrants or non-citizens, cannot be applied when incompatible with the provisions of human rights treaties.

32. And in that Separate Opinion, I concluded, on the extent of the prohibition of arbitrariness, that “Human nature being what it is, everyone needs to guard protection against arbitrariness on the part of State authorities. In a wider horizon, human beings need protection ultimately against themselves, in their relations with each other. There is hardly any need to require an express provision to the effect of prohibiting arbitrariness in respect of distinct rights, or else to require the insertion of the adjective ‘arbitrary’ in distinct provisions, in order to enable the exercise of protection against arbitrariness, in any circumstances, under human rights treaties. The letter together with the spirit of those provisions under human rights treaties, converge in pointing to the same direction: the absolute prohibition of arbitrariness, under the International Law of Human Rights as a whole. Underlying this whole matter is the imperative of access to justice lato sensu, the right to the Law (le droit au Droit, el derecho al Derecho), the right to the realization of justice in a democratic society” (para. 142).

V. ARGUMENTS OF THE PARTIES IN THE PUBLIC HEARINGS BEFORE THE COURT.

33. The prohibition of arbitrariness brings to the fore the issue of the vulnerability of those affected by discriminatory measures. Before examining this point (cf. section VII, infra), may I now turn to the arguments of the parties during the oral pleadings which have just taken place before the ICJ. In the course of the public hearings (first round) before the Court, the applicant State presented (on 27.06.2018) its own understanding of the factual context of the cas d’espèce within a temporal dimension.

34. Qatar argued that the “collective expulsion” of Qataris from the UAE as a discriminatory measure was ongoing, affecting continuously some of their rights under the CERD Convention (e.g., with the separation of families and loss of work); this was leading to the prolongation and indefinite duration¹⁴ of harm or damage, in the human tragedy¹⁵ of the numerous and vulnerable victims¹⁶. There was need for urgent regard to human suffering; the continuing vulnerability of segments of the population required urgently, in its view, provisional measures of protection.

35. In the following public hearings before the Court (still first round, on 28.06.2018), the respondent State did not address such issue of a continuing situation raised by Qatar; the UAE focused instead on other aspects, attempting to minimize and dismiss the request for provisional measures of protection¹⁷. It consumed much of the time of those public hearings raising the point (responded by the applicant State - infra), inter alia, of the rule of exhaustion of local remedies¹⁸.

36. In the second and last round of public hearings before the Court (on 29.06.2018) the local remedies rule continued to be addressed, this time by both the applicant State, in response to the argument of the respondent State, and by this latter once again¹⁹. The applicant State, furthermore, consistently reiterated its understanding of a continuing situation of ongoing alleged violations of human rights requiring “humanitarian considerations”²⁰.

VI. QUESTIONS PUT TO THE PARTIES IN THE PUBLIC HEARINGS BEFORE THE COURT.

1. Questions and Answers.

37. Those arguments advanced by the contending parties led me to address the following questions to both of them, at the end of the public hearings (on 29.06.2018):

“1. Does the local remedies rule have the same rationale in diplomatic protection and in international human rights protection? Does the effectiveness of local remedies have an incidence under the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination and other human rights treaties?”

2. Is it necessary to address the so-called plausibility of rights in face of a continuing situation allegedly affecting the rights protected under a human rights treaty like the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination?

3. What are the implications or effects, if any, of the existence of a continuing situation allegedly affecting rights protected under a human rights Convention, for requests of provisional measures of protection?”²¹.

38. In the course of the following week, the contending parties provided the Court with their respective written answers (of 03.07.2018) to my questions, first, as to the rationale of the local remedies rule in diplomatic protection and in international human rights protection, and then, on the implications of a continuing situation. In respect of the first question, the applicant State, in its detailed written answer, first recalled that international human rights supervisory organs have stressed that the local remedies rule here requires “actual redress” for victims of human rights violations, determining the obligation of States Parties to human rights treaties to provide them with effective remedies²². And it proceeded:

“This added element of ‘actual redress’ finally echoes the differences in the function of the local remedies rule in both systems, illustrated by Judge Cançado Trindade’s seminal 1983 monograph on the subject²³. In diplomatic protection, the local remedies rule ensures that disputes are not elevated onto the international plane before the authorities of the offending State have had an adequate opportunity to address them by their own means. It can thus be said that in diplomatic protection, the local remedies rule operates preemptively.

In international human rights protection, the focus of the rule is different. As explained above, under most major international human rights instruments, States have bound themselves to international obligations to respect and ensure human rights, including by subjecting those obligations to the scrutiny of national tribunals and other State institutions. By asking that such tribunals and other State institutions be resorted to before the violations are entrusted to the international machinery for their implementation, the rule thus operates protectively^{24,25}.

39. And the applicant State added that, under the CERD Convention and all other major human rights treaties, the local remedies rule only applies if remedies are effective, this being in accordance with general international law; the “principle of effectiveness” is here “fully applicable”²⁶. In view of the foregoing, it submitted that “although there is a certain degree of overlap in the rationale of the local remedies rule in the fields of diplomatic protection and international human rights protection, in the latter, the rule is also underscored by an element of ‘actual redress’. Such redress must, furthermore, be effective”²⁷.

40. For its part, the respondent State, in its brief written answer to the first question, also of 03.07.2018, argued that the rule of exhaustion of local remedies has the “same rationale” underlying it in the two contexts of “broadened” diplomatic protection and in international human rights protection²⁸. Yet, it added, under the CERD Convention and other human rights treaties, and under general international law, the effectiveness of local remedies is a component of that rule, which, e.g., determines that such remedies cannot be “unreasonably prolonged”²⁹.

41. As to the second question, the applicant State contended that the purpose of the inquiry on “plausibility” of rights, as found in the Court’s recent case-law, is a “limited one”, not engaging “in any extensive evidentiary inquiry” and not undertaking any “in-depth factual assessment” at the stage of provisional measures; it can only be “a very low threshold”³⁰. It added that such very low threshold applies, whether the Court puts the requisite “in terms of ‘plausibility of rights’ or ‘vulnerability of populations’” to be protected under a human rights treaty like the CERD Convention³¹.

42. The respondent State, for its part, accepted that “violations of human rights” in a “continuing situation” have to be “of concern to the Court”. However, - it added, - the issue would “have to be placed within the vision of the Court”, i.e., in its view, “Only States can be parties before the Court in contentious proceedings and the Court when called upon to adjudicate upon a matter has to do so in the light of the rights and duties of those States that are before the Court seeking a legal determination”³².

43. The respondent State added that, as part of ensuring the balance between, on the one hand, vulnerable individuals and groups, and, on the other hand, the “adjudication between States in the light of their rights and obligations under international law” has made the Court to have “recourse inter alia to the doctrine of plausibility”. This is, in its view, “a necessary hurdle to be surmounted before tackling substantive issues of protection” of the “rights or interests of individuals, groups or States under perceived threat”; in sum, the consideration of the “plausibility of the rights” at issue is “an indispensable preliminary step needed in order to address claimed violations of rights, whatever their origin”³³.

44. As to the third question, the applicant State upheld the view that, when there is a continuing situation alleged affecting rights protected under a human rights Convention, “the requirement of a real and imminent risk is necessarily satisfied”, and “irreparable prejudice is the natural consequence of restrictions on those rights”³⁴. In such circumstances, “any assessment of risk of harm is necessarily met”, and the evidence provided (reports “showing continuing harm throughout the past thirteen months”, as from 05.06.2017) has been, in its view, “more than sufficient” for the Court “to make a finding of urgency”, given the “imminent risk of irreparable harm”³⁵.

45. For its part, the respondent State argued that, even in case of a continuing situation, the ICJ is to exercise its own functions which are “different from those” of international human rights tribunals at regional levels. Provisional measures, it added cannot be indicated if the Court is not persuaded that the rights invoked are “at least plausible”. In its view, “the existence of a continuing situation allegedly affecting rights protected under a human rights treaty does not as such change or modify the conditions required for the indication of provisional measures of protection”³⁶.

46. Still in the same week, the contending parties provided the Court, two days later, with their additional written comments (of 05.07.2018) to each other’s respective answers (cf. supra) to my questions. The applicant State recalled the components of effectiveness of local remedies and redress in the rationale of the local remedies rule under human rights treaties, and welcomed the UAE’s acceptance of it as well as of the Court’s need to be “sensitive and attentive” to a continuing situation in breach of human rights, wherein the harm is “not merely imminent by presently occurring”, requiring attention also to “the vulnerability of the affected individuals”³⁷.

47. The respondent State, for its part, insisted on the requirement of exhaustion of local remedies, and on its position that “doctrine of plausibility” constitutes a “balance” between the claimed violation of rights and the “procedural requirements” to adjudicate inter-State cases³⁸. Besides questioning the evidence produced, it did not accept the “low threshold” advanced by Qatar, asserting that there “has to be a tangible or plausible basis” for the claims at issue. And it concluded that, in its view, there is no “different approach” to the grant of provisional measures of protection in cases under human rights treaties³⁹.

2. General Assessment: Rationale of the Local Remedies Rule in International Human Rights Protection.

48. May I now proceed to my own assessment of the arguments surveyed above, presented by the contending parties in their written responses to my questions (supra). To start with, in my understanding, the raising of the rule of exhaustion of local remedies at this early stage is surprising, besides regrettable, due to the fact that the present proceedings are on a request for provisional measures of protection, not on admissibility. The local remedies rule is a condition of admissibility of international claims; it cannot be invoked as a precondition for the consideration of urgent requests of provisional measures of protection.

49. The incidence of the local remedies rule in human rights protection is certainly distinct from its application in the practice of diplomatic protection of nationals abroad; the rule at issue is far from having the dimensions of an immutable or sacrosanct principle of international law. Moreover, the two domains - human rights protection and diplomatic protection - are also distinct, and there is nothing to hinder the application of that rule with greater or lesser rigour in such different domains.

50. Its rationale is quite distinct in the two contexts. In the domain of the safeguard of the rights of the human person, attention is focused on the need to secure the faithful realization of the object and purpose of human rights treaties, and on the need of effectiveness of local remedies; attention is focused, in sum, on the needs of protection. The rationale of the local remedies rule in the context of diplomatic protection is entirely distinct, focusing on the process of exhaustion of such remedies.

51. Local remedies, in turn, form an integral part of the very system of international human rights protection, the emphasis falling on the element of redress rather than on the process of exhaustion. The local remedies rule bears witness of the interaction between international law and domestic law in the present context of protection⁴⁰. We are here before a droit de protection, with a specificity of its own, fundamentally victim-oriented, concerned with the rights of individual human beings rather than of States. Such rights are accompanied by obligations of States.

52. Generally recognized rules of international law (which the formulation of the local remedies rule in human rights treaties refers to), besides following an evolution of their own in the distinct contexts in which they apply, necessarily undergo, when inserted in human rights treaties, a certain degree of adjustment or adaptation, dictated by the special character of the object and purpose of those treaties and by the widely recognized specificity of the international protection of human rights.

Cançado Trindade, O Esgotamento de Recursos Internos no Direito Internacional, 2nd. ed., Brasília, Edit. University of Brasília, 1997, pp. 1-327; A.A. Cançado Trindade, “Origin and Historical Development of the Rule of Exhaustion of Local Remedies in International Law”, 12 Revue belge de droit international/Belgisch Tijdschrift voor internationale Recht - Bruxelles (1976) pp. 499-527.

53. In the handling of successive cases under the CERD Convention, for example, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD Committee) has deemed it necessary to single out that petitioners are only required to exhaust “remedies that are effective in the circumstances” of the cas d’espèce (cases of M. Lacko versus Slovakia, decision of 09.08.2001, para. 6.2; and of Zentralrat Deutscher Sinti und Roma et al. versus Germany, decision of 22.02.2008, para 7.3).

54. In another case (of D. Durmic versus Serbia and Montenegro), the CERD Committee pointed out that local remedies need not be exhausted if their application “is unreasonably prolonged” (decision of 06.03.2006, para. 6.5). And, in yet another case (of D.R. versus Australia), the CERD Committee considered that none of the proposed local remedies could be effective, and reiterated (decision of 14.08.2009) that “domestic remedies need not be exhausted if they objectively have no prospect of success. This is the case where under applicable domestic law, the claim would inevitably be dismissed, or where established jurisprudence of the highest domestic tribunals would preclude a positive result” (paras. 6.4-6.5).

55. The local remedies rule has a rationale of its own under human rights treaties; this cannot be distorted by the invocation of the handling of inter-State cases in the exercise of diplomatic protection, where the local remedies rule has an entirely distinct rationale. The former stresses redress, the latter outlines exhaustion. One cannot deprive a human rights Convention of its effet utile by using the distinct rationale of the rule in diplomatic protection.

56. Contemporary international tribunals share the common mission of realization of justice. There is here a fundamental unity of conception and mission. International human rights tribunals, created by Conventions at regional levels, operate within the conceptual framework of the universality of human rights. International human rights tribunals have been faithful to the rationale of effectiveness of local remedies and redress⁴¹. There is in this respect a complementarity in outlook between mechanisms of dispute-settlement at U.N. and regional levels, all operating under the conceptualized universality of the rights inherent to the human person.

3. General Assessment: Implications of a Continuing Situation.

57. In my understanding, the attempt to create another precondition for provisional measures, as from the so-called “plausibility” of rights, is regrettable. The test of so-called “plausibility” of rights is, in my perception, an unfortunate invention - a recent one - of the majority of the ICJ. In the present proceedings, the so-called “plausibility” of admissibility⁴² is a new and additional unfortunate attempt, this time by the respondent State, to invent an additional “precondition” for provisional measures of protection. In a continuing situation, the rights requiring protection are clearly known, their being no sense to wonder whether they are “plausible”.

⁴¹ To this effect, cf., for an analysis of the vast case-law of the ECtHR on the matter, e.g., P. van Dijk, F. van Hoof, A. van Rijn and Leo Zwaak, Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 4th. ed., Antwerpen/Oxford, Intersentia, 2006, pp. 125-161 and 560-563; D.J. Harris, M. O’Boyle, E.P. Bates and C.M. Buckley, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 2nd. ed., Oxford, Oxford University Press, 2009, pp. 759-776; as to the case-law of the IACtHR, cf. Cançado Trindade, El Agotamiento de los Recursos Internos en el Sistema Interamericano de Protección de los Derechos Humanos, San José/C.R., IIDH, 1991, pp. 1-60; and as to the case-law of the African Court on Human and Peoples’ Rights (AfCtHPR), cf. ⁴² Cf., on the part of the UAE, ICJ, CR 2018/15, of 29.06.2018, p. 16.

58. In the consideration of the present request for provisional measures of protection in the case of Application of the CERD Convention (Qatar versus UAE), the question of a continuing situation allegedly affecting the rights of vulnerable persons has deserved particular attention, mainly on the part of the applicant State (which dwelt upon it), but also on the part of the respondent State. Yet, the handling of the matter consumed much time in addressing points which have nothing to do with provisional measures of protection, - such as the undue invocation of the rule of exhaustion of local remedies at this stage of provisional measures, as well as the undue attempt to link the so-called “plausibility” of rights to the so-called “plausibility” of admissibility, as presumed interrelated requirements.

59. It appears that each one feels free to interpret so-called “plausibility” of rights in the way one feels like; this may be due to the fact that the Court’s majority itself has not elaborated on what such “plausibility” means. To invoke “plausibility” as a new “precondition”, creating undue difficulties for the granting of provisional measures of protection in relation to a continuing situation, is misleading, it renders a disservice to the realization of justice. I shall develop further reflections on provisional measures of protection in continuing situations subsequently in the present Separate Opinion (cf. section XI, infra).

60. The rights to be protected in the cas d’espèce are clearly those invoked under the CERD Convention (Articles 2, 4, 5, 6 and 7). The so-called “plausibility” of rights is surrounded by uncertainties, which are much increased in trying to add to it the so-called “plausibility” of admissibility, undermining provisional measures of protection as jurisdictional guarantees of a preventive character. It is time to awaken and to concentrate attention on the nature of provisional measures of protection, particularly under human rights treaties, to the benefit of human beings experiencing a continuing situation of vulnerability affecting their rights.

61. In the present case we are not in face of rights of States; the rights under the CERD Convention are rights of individuals (accompanied by obligations of States), irrespective of the matter having been brought to the ICJ by a State Party to the Convention. In doing so, the State Party exercises a collective guarantee under the CERD Convention, making use of its compromissory clause in Article 22, which is not amenable to interpretation raising “preconditions”. The compromissory clause in Article 22 is to be interpreted bearing in mind the object and purpose of the CERD Convention.

VII. THE CORRECT UNDERSTANDING OF COMPROMISSORY CLAUSES UNDER HUMAN RIGHTS CONVENTIONS.

62. I have dwelt upon this particular point in depth in my lengthy Dissenting Opinion in the earlier case on Application of the CERD Convention (Georgia versus Russian Federation, Judgment of 01.04.2011), where the Court upheld the second preliminary objection and found itself without jurisdiction to examine the case. In my Dissenting Opinion (paras. 1-214), I warned at first that the punctum pruriens iudicii was the proper understanding of the compromissory clause (Article 22) of the CERD Convention, for which it is necessary to be attentive to the nature and substance of a human rights treaty like the CERD Convention.

63. Regrettably, in that Judgment of 2011, the Court’s majority set a very high threshold (as to the requirement of prior negotiations) for the exercise of jurisdiction on the basis of that human rights treaty, the CERD Convention, losing sight of the nature of this important U.N. human rights treaty, endowed with universality. It advanced the view that Article 22 of the CERD Convention establishes “preconditions” to be fulfilled by a State Party before it may have recourse to this Court, thus rendering access to the ICJ particularly difficult. I added, in my Dissenting Opinion, that this was not in accordance with the Court's (PCIJ and ICJ) own earlier jurisprudence constante, which had never ascribed to that factual element the character of a "precondition" that would have to be fully satisfied, for the exercise of its jurisdiction⁴³.

64. It was necessary, - I proceeded, - to turn attention to the sufferings and needs of protection of the affected segments of the population; yet, the Court's majority pursued unfortunately an essentially inter-State, and mostly bilateral, outlook, on the basis of allegedly unfulfilled "preconditions" of its own construction; instead of setting up a higher standard of protection, under the CERD Convention, of individuals in a continuing situation of great vulnerability, it applied, contrariwise, a higher standard of State consent for the exercise of its jurisdiction.

65. One cannot erect, in pursuance of a strictly textual or grammatical reasoning relating to the compromissory clause (Article 22) of the CERD Convention, a mandatory "precondition" for the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction (such as that of prior negotiations), as this amounts to erecting a groundless and most regrettable obstacle to justice. This "precondition", - I proceeded, - finds no support in the Court's own earlier jurisprudence constante, nor in the legislative history of the CERD Convention.

66. I then pointed out, in my aforementioned Dissenting Opinion, that, already at the time that the CERD Convention was being elaborated there were those who supported the compulsory settlement of disputes by the Court. Underlying the general rule of treaty interpretation is the principle ut res magis valeat quam pereat (the so-called effet utile), of much importance in respect of human rights treaties, amongst which the CERD Convention. This latter is a pioneering human rights Convention, endowed with universality, occupying a prominent place in the Law of the United Nations itself. It cannot be a hostage of State consent or discretion (as in the entirely distinct domain of diplomatic protection), in its interpretation and application.

67. Before moving to the next point, may I here add that all obligations under the CERD Convention (including those of providing redress by means of effective local remedies, and of dispute-settlement in inter-State cases thereunder) have a rationale of their own, proper of human rights treaties. There was awareness of that since the time of the travaux préparatoires of the CERD Convention⁴⁴, so as to secure its effectiveness, and safeguard it from attempts at conceptual deconstruction (such as the devising of additional so-called "preconditions")⁴⁵.

⁴³ Both the PCIJ and the ICJ have been quite clear in holding that an attempt of negotiation is sufficient, there being no mandatory "precondition" at all of resolatory negotiations for either of them to exercise jurisdiction in a case they had been seized of.

⁴⁴ Cf., on this particular point, e.g., N. Lerner, The U.N. Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (reprint revised), Leiden, Brill/Nijhoff, 2014, pp. 81 and 98; A.A. Cançado Trindade, "Exhaustion of Local Remedies under the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination", 22 German Yearbook of International Law/Jahrbuch für internationales Recht - Kiel (1979) pp. 374-383;

VIII. VULNERABILITY OF SEGMENTS OF THE POPULATION.

68. In the present Order that the ICJ has just adopted today, in the case of Application of the CERD Convention (Qatar versus UAE), the Court has correctly granted provisional measures of protection under the CERD Convention, to ensure that families including a Qatari, separated by the measures adopted by the UAE on 05.06.2017, are reunited; that Qatari students, affected by the same measures, complete their education in the UAE, or, if they wish, obtain their educational records to continue their studies elsewhere; and that Qataris, affected by the same measures, have access to national tribunals in the UAE. The CERD Convention itself determines that States Parties are to assure to everyone within their jurisdiction “effective protection and remedies” before national tribunals against any acts of discrimination (Article 6). The provisional measures, as requested in the cas d’espèce, become necessary for the protection of persons in a situation of vulnerability.

69. I have already addressed the principle of non-discrimination and the prohibition of arbitrariness (section III, supra), and my reflections thereon lead me to the next related point to be here considered. Cases as the present one of Application of the CERD Convention (Qatar versus UAE), like the aforementioned previous cases before the ICJ also under the CERD Convention (as well as under other human rights treaties), disclose the centrality of the position of the human person in the overcoming of the inter-State paradigm in contemporary international law. The request of provisional measures of protection is here intended to put an end to the alleged vulnerability of the affected persons (potential victims).

70. Human beings in vulnerability are the ultimate beneficiaries of compliance with the ordered provisional measures of protection. However vulnerable, they are subjects of international law. We are here before the new paradigm of the humanized international law, the new jus gentium of our times, sensitive and attentive to the needs of protection of the human person in any circumstances of vulnerability. This is a point which I have been making in successive Individual Opinions in previous decisions of the ICJ; I feel it sufficient only to refer to them now, with no need to extend further thereon in the present Separate Opinion.

71. To summarize it, in my previous Separate Opinion appended to the ICJ’s recent Order (of 19.04.2017) on provisional measures of protection - also under the CERD Convention - in the case of Ukraine versus Russian Federation, I pondered:

“As I have been sustaining along the years, time and time again, provisional measures of protection have an autonomous legal regime of their own. This being so, it is clear to me that human vulnerability is a test even more compelling than ‘plausibility’ of rights for the indication or ordering of provisional measures of protection. In so acknowledging and sustaining, one is contributing to the ongoing historical process of humanization of contemporary international law” (para. 44).

72. Anticipatory in nature, provisional measures of protection are intended to prevent and avoid irreparable harm in situations of gravity (probability of irreparable harm) and urgency. The extreme vulnerability of the affected persons is an aggravating circumstance, rendering such provisional measures imperative. These latter, in my perception, are not “mesures conservatoires” (as in traditional, old-fashioned and unsatisfactory language), as they do require change, as in the cas d’espèce, so as to put an end to a continuing situation (cf. infra) affecting the rights of persons in utter vulnerability, if not defencelessness.

73. For years I have been sustaining that provisional measures of protection, needed by human beings (under human rights treaties, like the CERD Convention in the cas d'espèce), may become even more than precautionary, being in effect tutelary, particularly for vulnerable persons (potential victims), and directly related to realization of justice itself. Obligations emanating from such ordered measures are not necessarily the same as those ensuing from a Judgment as to the merits (and reparations), they may be entirely distinct (cf. infra). Particularly attentive to human beings in situations of vulnerability, provisional measures of protection, endowed with a tutelary character, appear as true jurisdictional guarantees with a preventive dimension.

IX. TOWARDS THE CONSOLIDATION OF THE AUTONOMOUS LEGAL REGIME OF PROVISIONAL MEASURES OF PROTECTION.

74. This is one of the aspects, and a significant one, of what I have been calling, - in several (more than twenty) of my Individual Opinions, successively within two international jurisdictions, in the period 2000-2018⁴⁶, - the needed conformation of the *autonomous legal regime of provisional measures of protection*⁴⁷. As I pointed out in my Dissenting Opinion in an ICJ's Order (of 16.07.2013), - at an early stage of the handling of two merged cases opposing two Central American States, - even

“the notion of victim (or of potential victim⁴⁸), or injured party, can (...) emerge also in the context proper to provisional measures of protection, parallel to the merits (and reparations) of the cas d'espèce”⁴⁹ (para. 75).

75. I am confident that we are at last moving towards the consolidation of the autonomous legal regime of provisional measures of protection, thus enhancing the preventive dimension of international law. After all, contemporary international tribunals have an important contribution to give to the avoidance or prevention of irreparable harm in situations of urgency, to the ultimate benefit of human beings, and to secure due compliance with the ordered provisional measures of protection⁵⁰.

76. The component elements of this autonomous legal regime are: the rights to be protected; the corresponding obligations; the prompt determination of responsibility (in case of non-compliance), with its legal consequences, encompassing the duty of reparation for damages. Rights and obligations concerning provisional measures of protection are not the same as those pertaining to the merits of the cases, and the configuration of responsibility with all its legal consequences is prompt, without waiting for the decision on the merits. The notion of victim (or potential victim) itself – may I stress this point - marks presence already at this stage, irrespective of the decision as to the merits (cf. supra).

77. Provisional measures have, in recent years, been protecting growing numbers of persons in situations of vulnerability, transformed into a true jurisdictional guarantee of preventive character⁵¹. Hence the autonomy of the international responsibility that non-compliance with them promptly generates. A study of the matter encompasses the general principles of law, always of great relevance⁵². Attention is to be focused on the common mission of contemporary international tribunals of realization of justice⁵³ as from an essentially humanist outlook⁵⁴.

X. INTERNATIONAL LAW AND THE TEMPORAL DIMENSION.

78. A consideration of the aforementioned preventive dimension, furthermore, brings to the fore the time factor, and in particular the relationship between international law and the temporal dimension. Such relationship is an ineluctable one, requiring far more attention than the one dispensed to it by international legal doctrine so far. In effect, the temporal dimension underlies the whole domain of international law, being interpreted and applied within time.

⁵⁰ Cf., to this effect, ICJ, (merged) cases of Certain Activities Carried out by Nicaragua in the Border Area (Costa Rica versus Nicaragua) and Construction of a Road in Costa Rica along the San Juan River, Order of 22.11.2013, Separate Opinion of Judge Cañado Trindade, paras. 20-31 and 40. - The right of access to justice, also in the present domain (cf. para. 68, supra), is to be understood lato sensu, encompassing not only the formal access to a competent tribunal, but also the due process of law (equality of arms), and the faithful compliance with the decision; for a general study, cf. 79. It ineluctably encompasses provisional measures of protection. In my Dissenting Opinion appended to the ICJ's Order of 28.05.2009 in the case of the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium versus Senegal), I warned inter alia that “[i]t is imperative to reduce or bridge the décalage between the time of victimized human beings and the time of human justice” (para. 49). Subsequently, I devote the whole of my Separate Opinion (paras. 1-117) appended to the ICJ's Order of 18.07.2011 in the case of the Temple of Préah Vihéar (Cambodia versus Thailand) to distinct aspects of the temporal dimension in international law and its incidence on the granting of provisional measures of protection⁵⁵.

80. After all, it is in the nature of Law to accompany the regulatory function in society undergoing changes, - contrary to what legal positivists assume in their static view of the legal order. The evolution of international law - acknowledged by the ICJ in an obiter dictum of its célèbre Advisory Opinion on Namibia (of 21.06.1971, para. 53) - responds to the changing needs of all subjects of international law (including individuals) and of the international community as a whole.

81. The evolving international law is permeated by a major enigma, which, for its part, also permeates the existence of all subjects of law (including individuals): the passage of time. International law, emerging ultimately from human conscience, - the universal juridical conscience, - also has a protective function endowed with a preventive dimension, as illustrated by the significant expansion of provisional measures of protection in recent years⁵⁶. Keeping the passage of time in mind, it is important to prevent or avoid harm that may occur in the future (hence the acknowledgment of potential or prospective victims), as well as to put an end to continuing situations already affecting individual rights. Past, present and future come and go together.

XI. PROVISIONAL MEASURES OF PROTECTION IN CONTINUING SITUATIONS.

82. In the present case of Application of the CERD Convention (Qatar versus UAE), at this stage of request of provisional measures of protection, there are some other considerations that I deem it fit to present, in this Separate Opinion, with regard to the alleged continuing situation in breach of human rights, in addition to those I have already made (cf. section VI.3, supra). Even if the evidence already presented to the ICJ so far may appear insufficient, there are sources of it that may be regarded relevant to the consideration of such continuing situation at this stage.

83. In this respect, for example, the *Report of the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR - of December 2017)*⁵⁷, - brought to the attention of the ICJ in the present proceedings, - gave an account of a continuing situation (an “ongoing crisis on human rights”, with “continuing implications”, and “cases of temporary or potentially durable separation of families”, among other “long-standing human rights issues”, to the detriment, e.g., of “migrant workers”⁵⁸.

⁵⁵ I pondered inter alia that, when the protection by means of provisional measures is intended to extend to “the spiritual needs of human beings”, bringing to the fore, as in the cas d'espèce, “the safeguard of cultural and spiritual world heritage”, the time dimension is even wider, bringing back “timelessness” (para. 101).

⁵⁶ Cf. A.A. Cançado Trindade, International Law for Humankind - Towards a New Jus Gentium, 2nd. rev. ed., Leiden/The Hague, Nijhoff/The Hague Academy of International Law, 2013, pp. 31-34, 38-47 and 50-51.

⁵⁷ The OHCHR Technical Mission visited Qatar on 17-24.11.2017, where it conducted its research on documents provided by distinct entities, besides interviews with “about 40 individuals” (paras. 4-6).

84. The OHCHR, having decided to monitor in loco the consequences on human rights of the UAE’s decision or announcement of 05.06.2017, reported, one semester later, on the suspension and “considerable restrictions” on freedom of movement “to and from Qatar” (paras. 23 and 26), with “continuing implications to date”; such restrictions disrupted family life, affected the right to education, as Qatari students were prevented from pursuing their studies where they were (paras. 26 and 50). The aforementioned OHCHR Report (of December 2017) referred to “cases of temporary or potentially durable separation of families”, with all their consequences (para. 32).

85. There was also an impact on the right to health, with humanitarian consequences (para. 43), as some people had to travel abroad to receive their medical treatment or to undergo surgery (para. 44). As to the restrictions on freedom of expression, the OHCHR reported that the unilateral measures have been accompanied by a “widespread defamation and hatred campaign against Qatar and Qataris in various media” (paras. 14 and 19). The Report, furthermore, addressed another long-standing human rights issue, affecting the rights of migrant workers and non-citizens (paras. 54-58). The Report at last considered the restrictive unilateral measures as arbitrary (para. 60).

86. Likewise, a Joint Communication from the U.N. Special Procedures Mandate Holders of the U.N. Human Rights Council to the UAE⁵⁹, of 18.08.2017, the Special Rapporteurs warned that the decision announced by the UAE on 05.06.2017 “has threatened the most vulnerable groups, including women, children, persons with disabilities and older persons” (p. 1). It has, furthermore, - it continued, - led to the separation of families, the interruption of studies in schools or universities, and has also affected the right to health (pp. 2-3 and 5), among others. The Special Rapporteurs then drew attention to “the urgency of the matter” and the “extreme gravity” of the situation, and urged that “all necessary interim measures be taken to halt the alleged violations and prevent their reoccurrence” (p. 7).

87. Among other reports referred to in the course of the present proceedings before the ICJ, were those of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) with much experience at international level, such as, inter alia, Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch. In its very recent Report (of 05.06.2018), Amnesty International referred to the situation of continuity harming separated families, and individuals (among whom migrant workers, children and students)⁶⁰. Accordingly, it

⁵⁸ Paragraphs 4(i), 26, 32-33 and 54, respectively. The Report reiteratedly referred to the problem of continuing separations of families (paras. 32-33, 37 and 64). It warned that “measures targeting individuals on the basis of their Qatari nationality or their links with Qatar can be qualified as non-disproportionate and discriminatory” (para. 61). It further warned that such unilateral measures were “premeditated” and “accompanied by a widespread defamation and hatred campaign” (paras. 14-15).

called upon the States concerned⁶¹ to “immediately lift all arbitrary restrictions” imposed on Qatari nationals, and to respect human rights⁶².

88. For its part, Human Rights Watch, in its earlier Report (of 12.07.2017), likewise warned against “human rights violations” in the separation of families, the deprivation of migrant workers, the discrimination against women, the interruption of medical treatment, and the interruption of education⁶³. Both Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International have provided accounts, in their respective reports, of information obtained from interviews with those victimized in loco.

89. In effect, the continuing situation in breach of human rights is a point which has had an incidence in other cases before the ICJ as well, at distinct stages of the proceedings. May I briefly recall here three examples, along the last decade. In the case concerning the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite (Belgium versus Senegal), as the ICJ in its Order of 28.05.2009 decided not to indicate provisional measures, I appended thereto a Dissenting Opinion, wherein - as already pointed out (para. 79, supra) - I drew attention to the décalage to be bridged between the time of human beings and the time of human justice (paras. 35-64).

90. Urgency and probability of irreparable damage, - I proceeded, - were quite clear, in the continuing situation of lack of access to justice of the victims of the Hissène Habré regime (1982-1990) in Chad. This right of access to justice assumed a “paramount importance” (paras. 29 and 74-77), - I added, - in the cas d’espèce, under the U.N. Convention against Torture; furthermore, I dwelt upon the component elements of the autonomous legal regime of provisional measures of protection (paras. 8-14, 26-29 and 65-73). Such measures were necessary for the safeguard of the right to the realization of justice (paras. 78-96 and 101).

91. In the case on Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany versus Italy), as the ICJ, in its Order of 06.07.2010 found the counter-claim of Italy inadmissible, once again I appended thereto a Dissenting Opinion, wherein I examined at depth the notion of “continuing situation” in the factual context of the cas d’espèce, as debated between the contending parties (paras. 55-59 and 92-100). My Dissenting Opinion encompassed the origins of a “continuing situation” in international legal doctrine (paras. 60-64); the configuration of a “continuing situation” in international litigation and case-law (paras. 65-83); the configuration of a “continuing situation” in international legal conceptualization at normative level (paras. 84-91).

92. And, once again, I warned against the pitfalls of State voluntarism (paras. 101-123). Suffice it here only to refer to my lengthy reflections on the notion of “continuing situation” in the case on Jurisdictional Immunities of the State, as I see no need to reiterate them expressis verbis herein. What cannot pass unnoticed is that a continuing situation in breach of human rights has had an incidence at distinct stages of the proceedings before the ICJ: in addition to decisions - as just seen - on provisional measures and counter-claim (supra), it has also been addressed in decision as to the merits.

93. This is illustrated by the aforementioned case of A.S. Diallo (Guinea versus D.R. Congo, merits, Judgment of 30.11.2010). Its factual context disclosed a continuing situation of breaches of Mr. A.S. Diallo’s individual rights in the period extending from 1988 to 1996. The griefs suffered by the victim extended in time (the arrests and detentions of 1988-1989 followed by those of 1995-1996, prior to his expulsion from the country of residence), in breach of the relevant provisions of human rights treaties (the U.N. Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights) as well as Article 36(1)(b) of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations). His griefs were surrounded by arbitrariness on the part of State authorities⁶⁴, and amounted to a wrongful continuing situation, marked by the prolonged lack of access to justice.

XII. EPILOGUE: A RECAPITULATION.

94. This is, as seen, the third case under the CERD Convention in which provisional measures of protection have been rightly ordered by the ICJ, in this new era of its international adjudication of human rights cases. The fact that a case is an inter-State one, characteristic of the contentieux before the ICJ, does not mean that the Court is to reason likewise on a strictly inter-state basis. Not at all. It is the nature of a case that will call for a reasoning, so as to reach a solution. The present case of Application of the CERD Convention (Qatar versus UAE) concerns the rights protected thereunder, which are the rights of human beings, and not rights of States.

95. This has a direct bearing on the consideration of a request for provisional measures of protection under a human rights Convention. Provisional measures, with a preventive dimension, have been undergoing a significant evolution, moving further towards the consolidation of the autonomous legal regime of their own, to the benefit of the titulaires of rights. In another endeavour to keep paving this path, may I, last but not least, proceed to a brief recapitulation of the main points I deemed it fit to make, particularly in respect of such provisional measures, under the CERD Convention, in the course of the present Separate Opinion.

96. Primus: The principle of equality and non-discrimination lies in the foundations of the rights protected under the CERD Convention also by means of provisional measures. The historical formation of the corpus juris of international protection of human rights has much contributed to a growing awareness of the importance of the prevalence of the basic principle of equality and non-discrimination. Secundus: The work of U.N. supervisory organs - among which the CERD Committee - bears witness of such growing awareness.

97. Tertius: It is necessary nowadays that the advances in respect of the basic principle of equality and non-discrimination, at normative and jurisprudential levels, are also accompanied by the international legal doctrine, which so far has not dedicated sufficient attention to that fundamental principle. Quartus: The protection sought under the CERD Convention is also against arbitrariness, as in the cas d'espèce. This point has not escaped the attention of other international tribunals, entrusted with the interpretation and application of distinct human rights Conventions.

98. Quintus: Human rights treaties, - including the CERD Convention, conform a Law of protection (a droit de protection), oriented towards the safeguard of the ostensibly weaker party (the real or potential victim), and the prohibition of arbitrary measures, so as also to secure the prevalence of the rule of law (la prééminence du droit). Sextus: As to the points discussed in the present proceedings of the cas d'espèce, there are two of them that require clarification: the rationale of the local remedies rule in the international protection of human rights, and the implications of a continuing situation affecting or breaching human rights.

99. Septimus: The local remedies rule, as a condition of admissibility of international claims, cannot be invoked as a “precondition” for the consideration of urgent requests of provisional measures of protection. Octavus: The rationale of the local remedies rule in human rights protection is entirely distinct from that of its application in the practice of diplomatic protection of nationals abroad: in human rights protection the rule is focused on effectiveness of local remedies and redress, while in diplomatic protection it is focused on the process of exhaustion of such remedies.

100. Nonus: The CERD Committee itself has underlined the components of effectiveness of local remedies and redress. Human rights protection is victim-oriented, it is a Law of protection of the weaker party (droit de protection), as upheld by international human rights tribunals; discretionary diplomatic protection, for its part, remains State-oriented. Decimus: There is no ground for attempting to add, to the so-called “plausibility” of rights, the so-called “plausibility” of admissibility, as an additional “precondition” for provisional measures of protection.

101. Undecimus: In a continuing situation, the rights requiring protection are clearly known, their being no sense to wonder whether they are “plausible”. Duodecimus: The proper understanding of compromissory clauses under human rights Conventions is necessarily attentive to the nature and substance of those Conventions, as well as to their object and purpose; such clauses cannot be interpreted attempting to find “preconditions”, rendering access to justice under human rights Conventions particularly difficult.

102. Tertius decimus: The aforementioned prohibition of arbitrariness brings to the fore the issue of the vulnerability of those affected by discriminatory measures; requests of provisional measures of protection, in cases like the present, are intended to put an end to a continuing situation of vulnerability of the affected persons (potential victims). Quartus decimus: Human vulnerability is a test more compelling than so-called ‘plausibility’ of rights for the ordering of provisional measures of protection under human rights treaties.

103. Quintus decimus: There has been an advance towards the consolidation of what I have been calling, along the years, the autonomous legal regime of provisional measures of protection. Sextus decimus: Provisional measures of protection have, in recent years, been protecting growing numbers of persons in situations of vulnerability; they have thus been transformed into a true jurisdictional guarantee of preventive character. Septimus decimus: Such preventive character brings to the fore the temporal dimension in the application of the provisional measures of protection, e.g., when they are intended, as in the present case, to put an end to a continuing situation affecting individual rights.

104. Duodevicesimus: In respect of the present case, there have been U.N. reports and other documents giving accounts of a continuing situation affecting human rights under the CERD Convention. Undevicesimus: The continuing situation in breach of human rights is a point which has had an incidence in earlier cases before the ICJ as well, at distinct stages of the proceedings. Vicesimus: The determination and ordering of provisional measures of protection under human rights Conventions can only be properly undertaken from a humanist perspective, necessarily avoiding the pitfalls of an outdated and impertinent State voluntarism.
