

66 (I). Transmission of Information under Article 73e of the Charter

The General Assembly, on 9 February 1946, approved a resolution on Non-Self-Governing Peoples. By this resolution the Secretary-General was requested to include in his annual report on the work of the Organization a statement summarizing such information as may have been transmitted to him by Members of the United Nations under Article 73e of the Charter relating to economic, social and educational conditions in the territories for which they are responsible, other than those to which Chapters XII and XIII apply.

The General Assembly notes that information has been transmitted by the Governments of Australia concerning conditions in Papua; France concerning conditions in French West Africa, French Equatorial Africa, French Somaliland, Madagascar and Dependencies, French Establishments in Oceania, Indo-China, French Establishments in India, New Caledonia and Dependencies, Saint-Pierre et Miquelon, Morocco, Tunisia, the New Hebrides under Anglo-French Condominium, Martinique, Guadeloupe and Dependencies, French Guiana, and Reunion (without prejudice to the future status of these territories); New Zealand concerning conditions in the Cook Islands (without prejudice to any interpretation of the expression "Non-Self-Governing Territories" in view of the fact that the Cook Islands are an integral part of New Zealand); the United Kingdom concerning conditions in Barbados, Bermuda, British Guiana, British Honduras,¹ Fiji, Gambia, Gibraltar, Leeward Islands, Mauritius, St. Lucia, and Zanzibar Protectorate; and the United States concerning conditions in Alaska,

66 (I). Transmission des renseignements visés à l'Article 73e de la Charte

L'Assemblée générale a approuvé, le 9 février 1946, une résolution relative aux populations non autonomes. Par cette résolution le Secrétaire général avait été invité à inclure, dans son rapport annuel sur l'activité de l'Organisation, une déclaration résumant les renseignements qui lui auraient été transmis par les Membres des Nations Unies en application de l'Article 73e de la Charte et relatifs aux conditions économiques, sociales et de l'instruction dans les territoires dont ils sont responsables, autres que ceux auxquels s'appliquent les chapitres XII et XIII.

L'Assemblée générale note que des renseignements ont été transmis par les Gouvernements de l'Australie, sur la situation de la Papouasie; de la France, sur la situation de l'Afrique-Occidentale Française, l'Afrique-Equatoriale Française, la Côte Française des Somalis, Madagascar et dépendances, les Etablissements Français de l'Océanie, l'Indochine, les Etablissements Français de l'Inde, la Nouvelle-Calédonie et dépendances, Saint-Pierre et Miquelon, le Maroc, la Tunisie, les Nouvelles-Hébrides sous condominium franco-britannique, la Martinique, la Guadeloupe et dépendances, la Guyane française et la Réunion (sans préjuger le statut futur de ces territoires); de la Nouvelle-Zélande, sur la situation des îles de Cook (sans préjuger l'interprétation du terme "territoire non autonome", attendu que les îles de Cook sont une partie intégrante de la Nouvelle-Zélande); du Royaume-Uni, sur la situation de la Barbade, les Bermudes, la Guyane britannique, le Honduras britannique,¹ les îles Fidji, la Gambie, Gibraltar, les îles Sous-le-Vent, l'île Maurice, Sainte-Lucie et le protectorat de Zanzi-

American Samoa, Guam, Hawaii, Panama Canal Zone,¹ Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

The General Assembly also notes that the following Governments have declared their intention of transmitting information: Belgium on the Belgian Congo; Denmark on Greenland; the Netherlands on the Netherlands Indies, Surinam and Curacao; New Zealand on the Tokelau Islands; and the United Kingdom on Aden (Colony and Protectorate), Bahamas, Basutoland, Bechuanaland Protectorate, British Somaliland Protectorate, Brunei, Cyprus, Dominica, Falkland Islands,² Gold Coast (Colony and Protectorate), Grenada, Hong Kong, Jamaica, Kenya (Colony and Protectorate), Malayan Union, Malta, Nigeria, North Borneo, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, St. Helena and Dependencies, St. Vincent, Sarawak, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Swaziland, Trinidad and Tobago, Uganda Protectorate, and the High Commission Territories of the Western Pacific (Gilbert and Ellice Islands Colony, British Solomon Islands Protectorate, Pitcairn Islands).

The value of the association of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the specialized agencies as a means of attaining the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter has been stressed.

The procedures to be followed by the Organization in connexion with the information transmitted by Members regarding Non-Self-Governing Peoples have been carefully examined.

The General Assembly, therefore,

1. Invites the Members transmitting information to send to the Secretary-General by 30 June of each year the most recent information which is at their disposal;

2. Recommends that the information transmitted in the course of 1947 by Members of the United Nations under Article 73e of the Charter should be summarized, analysed and classified by the Secretary-General and included in his report to the second session of the General Assembly, in order that, in the light of the experience gained, the General Assembly may be able to decide whether any other procedure may be desirable for dealing with such information in future years;

3. Recommends that the Secretary-General communicate to the specialized agencies the information transmitted, with a view to making all relevant data available to their expert and deliberative bodies;

4. Invites the Secretary-General to convene, bar; et des Etats-Unis d'Amérique, sur la situation de l'Alaska, la partie américaine des Samoa, l'île de Guam, les îles Hawai, la Zone du Canal de Panama¹, Porto-Rico et les îles Vierges.

L'Assemblée générale a également pris note que les Gouvernements suivants ont fait connaître leur intention de transmettre des renseignements: la Belgique, sur le Congo belge; le Danemark, sur le Groënland; les Pays-Bas, sur les Indes néerlandaises, Surinam et Curaçao; la Nouvelle-Zélande, sur les îles Tokelau; le Royaume-Uni sur Aden (colonie et protectorat), les îles Bahama, le Basutoland, le protectorat du Betchouanaland, le protectorat de la Somalie anglaise, Brunei, Chypre, Dominique, les îles Falkland², la Côte de l'Or (colonie et protectorat), Grenade, Hong-Kong, la Jamaïque, le Kenya (colonie et protectorat), l'Union Malaise, Malte, le Nigéria, la partie nord de Bornéo, la Rhodésie du Nord, le Nyassaland, Sainte-Hélène et dépendances, Saint-Vincent, Sarawak, les Seychelles, Sierra-Leone, Singapour, le Souaziland, la Trinité et Tobago, le protectorat de l'Ouganda, et les territoires du Pacifique occidental relevant de la Haute Commission (la colonie des îles Gilbert et Ellis, le protectorat des îles Salomon, les îles Pitcairn).

La valeur de la participation des territoires non autonomes à l'activité des institutions spécialisées a été soulignée comme un moyen d'atteindre les buts du Chapitre XI de la Charte.

La procédure à suivre par l'Organisation concernant les renseignements transmis par les Membres au sujet des populations non autonomes, a été examinée avec soin.

L'Assemblée générale, en conséquence,

1. Invite les Etats Membres, qui doivent fournir les renseignements, à mettre le Secrétaire général en possession, pour le 30 juin de chaque année, des renseignements les plus récents dont ils disposent;

2. Recommande que les renseignements transmis au cours de l'année 1947 par des Membres des Nations Unies en application de l'Article 73e de la Charte, soient résumés, analysés et classifiés par le Secrétaire général et inclus dans son rapport à la deuxième session de l'Assemblée générale, afin que, à la lumière de l'expérience ainsi acquise, l'Assemblée générale puisse décider si une autre procédure est désirable à l'avenir pour l'utilisation de ces renseignements;

3. Recommande que le Secrétaire général communique aux institutions spécialisées les renseignements transmis, afin que toutes les données intéressantes puissent être mises à la disposition de leurs groupes d'experts et de leurs organes délibérants;

4. Invite le Secrétaire général à réunir quelques

5. Invite le Secrétaire général à demander à l'Organisation pour l'alimentation et l'agriculture, l'Organisation internationale du Travail, l'Organisation des Nations Unies pour l'éducation, la science et la culture, l'Organisation mondiale de la santé et l'Organisation internationale du commerce, une fois constituées, d'envoyer à titre consultatif des représentants à la réunion du Comité ad hoc;

THE TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION BY MEMBERS
UNDER ARTICLE 73 (e) OF THE CHARTER

Report of the Fourth Committee

Rapporteur: Mr. C. LISICKY (Czechoslovakia)

The above question was referred by the Fourth Committee to its Sub-Committee 2. The report of the Sub-Committee has been distributed to members of the General Assembly in documents A/C.4/68 and A/C.4/68/Corr.1.

The resolution which was adopted by the Fourth Committee (by twenty-three votes to twelve with three abstentions) is not the same as that recommended by the majority of the Sub-Committee (by ten votes to four with five abstentions). The preamble and the first three paragraphs are as recommended by the Sub-Committee; the remaining paragraphs four to six reproduce an amendment by the Delegation of Cuba similar to one moved in the Sub-Committee where it had been rejected by ten votes to eight with one abstention.

The arguments for and against this amendment, which provides for the creation of an ad hoc committee, are stated in the Sub-Committee's report. In addition, it is to be noted that the representative of China, in announcing his intention to vote for the Cuban amendment, asked that the report of the Committee should specifically mention that in the Sub-Committee he had expressed the view that it was the Trusteeship Council which would be the natural and logical authority to receive and examine the information transmitted under Chapter XI and that an amendment which he had moved to this effect had been defeated in Sub-Committee by only ten votes to nine. The Chinese representative maintained his position, but in order to facilitate the proceedings of the Committee he did not move his amendment again.

The Delegation of Cuba amendment replaced in paragraphs 4-6 the following text recommended by the majority of the Sub-Committee:

"4. Recommends that the Secretary-General consult the Specialized Agencies with a view to formulating proposals for consideration by the General Assembly at its Second Session to ensure that the advice, expert knowledge and experience of the Specialized Agencies are used to the best advantage."

A roll call vote was taken in the Fourth Committee on the amendment, which was adopted by twenty-one votes to twelve with four abstentions.

The Fourth Committee therefore recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of the following resolution:

"RESOLUTION ON THE TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION

This resolution as a whole was adopted by the Fourth Committee by twenty-three votes to twelve with three abstentions.

The French representative formally reserved the position of his Government, stating that he could not undertake on behalf of the French Government to send representatives to an ad hoc committee created in contravention of the provisions of Article 73 (e) of the Charter.

The Delegations of Australia, Belgium and the United Kingdom also reserved the position of their Governments.

Should the General Assembly approve the convocation of the ad hoc committee outlined in paragraphs 4 to 6 of the above resolution, the General Assembly should at the present session elect the eight Members to be invited to send representatives to the meeting of the ad hoc committee.

3. Draft reports of the Fourth Committee to the General Assembly concerning matters discussed in Sub-Committee 2 (documents A/C.4/76, A/C.4/77 and A/C.4/78)

The RAPPEUR introduced the draft reports. He asked the Committee whether it wished to make proposals to the General Assembly on the composition of the ad hoc committee provided in the resolution concerning the transmission of information by Members under item e of Article 73 of the Charter.

Mr. NAGGIAR (France) thought that it was premature to discuss this point, since it was not yet certain that the General Assembly would adopt the resolution. The French Government had not yet decided whether it desired to be represented in this ad hoc committee, and the French delegation had reserved its point of view on its establishment.

He asked, moreover, that the Committee take note of the formal reservations made by his and other delegations on the Philippine proposal as adopted by the Committee.

The Committee decided that the reservations expressed by the representatives of France, the United Kingdom and other countries would be included in the report.

The meeting was adjourned at 2.15 p.m.

3. Projet de rapport de la Quatrième Commission à l'Assemblée générale concernant les questions discutées à la Sous-Commission 2 (documents A/C.4/76, A/C.4/77 et A/C.4/78)

Le RAPPEUR présente les projets de rapport. Il demande à la Commission si elle désire faire des propositions à l'Assemblée générale sur la composition d'une commission ad hoc, prévue dans la résolution concernant la transmission d'informations par les Membres, selon le point e de l'Article 73 de la Charte.

M. NAGGIAR (France) estime qu'il est prématuré de discuter cette question, puisqu'il n'est encore sûr que l'Assemblée générale adoptera cette résolution. Le Gouvernement français n'a pas encore décidé s'il désire être représenté à cette commission ad hoc, et la délégation française a même réservé son avis sur l'établissement de cette commission.

En outre, il demande que la Commission prenne note des réserves formelles faites par la délégation française et par d'autres délégations, sur la proposition de la République des Philippines telle qu'elle a été adoptée par la Commission.

La Commission décide que ces réserves formelles faites par les représentants de la France, du Royaume-Uni et d'autres pays seront consignées dans le rapport.

La séance est levée à 14 h. 15.

2. Consideration of the Rapporteur's draft report concerning the transmission of information by Members under Article 73(e) of the Charter (documents A/C.4/77 and A/C.4/77/Corr.1)

Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) reiterated his observations made with reference to document A/C.4/76.

Mr. STEIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) shared the view of the Cuban representative and stated that in the case of each recommendation the vote should be recorded.

Mr. NAGGIAR (France) restated the reservation which the French delegation had made with regard to the establishment of an ad hoc committee. He could not undertake that France would be prepared to send a representative to that committee as she considered its establishment a contravention of the provisions of Article 73(e) of the Charter. He requested that the reservation of his delegation should be included in the Rapporteur's report.

Mr. STEIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that any delegation had the right to make a reservation and that it was entitled to its inclusion in the report.

Mr. ANDREWS (Union of South Africa), noting that the number of members absent had been listed in the Rapporteur's draft report concerning South West Africa, suggested that the same procedure should be followed in the document under consideration.

Mr. STEIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) doubted whether it was necessary to list the number of members absent.

An exchange of views followed in which Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), Mr. PRADENAS (Chile), Mr. NAGGIAR (France), Mr. LIU (China) and Mr. THOMAS (United Kingdom) participated.

The CHAIRMAN stated that a decision on that point would affect the previous report. He put the question to a vote.

Decision: By thirty-seven votes to none with four abstentions it was decided not to mention the number of members absent in the report.

Mr. NAGGIAR (France) wished to insert the clause "without prejudice to the future status of these territories" after the enumeration of the French possessions on page 2.

Mr. MENON (India) questioned the use of the term "establishments", suggesting that it should be replaced by "possessions".

Mr. BENSON (Secretary) explained that the term "establishments" was generally accepted.

2. Examen du projet de rapport du Rapporteur relatif à la transmission des renseignements communiqués par les Membres en application de l'Article 73 e) de la Charte (documents A/C.4/77 et A/C.4/77/Corr.1)

M. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) réitère les observations précédentes concernant le document A/C.4/76.

M. STEIN (Union des Républiques socialistes soviétiques) se rallie à l'opinion exprimée par le représentant de Cuba, et déclare que le vote sur chaque recommandation doit être enregistré séparément.

M. NAGGIAR (France) renouvelle la réserve faite par la délégation française au sujet de l'établissement d'un comité spécial. Il ne peut prendre l'engagement, au nom du Gouvernement français, d'envoyer un représentant à ce comité, son pays considérant la création de celui-ci comme allant à l'encontre des dispositions de l'Article 73 e) de la Charte. Il demande que les réserves faites par sa délégation soient insérées dans le rapport du Rapporteur.

M. STEIN (Union des Républiques socialistes soviétiques) estime que toutes les délégations ont le droit de formuler des réserves et d'en demander l'insertion au rapport.

M. ANDREWS (Union Sud-Africaine) prend note que le nombre des absents a fait l'objet d'une mention dans le projet de rapport du Rapporteur relatif au Sud-Ouest Africain, et propose que l'on suive la même procédure dans le document actuellement à l'examen.

M. STEIN (Union des Républiques socialistes soviétiques) exprime des doutes quant à la nécessité de mentionner le nombre des absents.

Un échange de vues s'ensuit auquel prennent part M. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), M. PRADENAS (Chili), M. NAGGIAR (France) M. LIU (Chine) et M. THOMAS (Royaume-Uni).

Le PRÉSIDENT déclare qu'une décision sur ce point concerne également le rapport précédent et met la question aux voix.

Décision: On décide, par trente-sept voix contre zéro et quatre abstentions, de ne pas mentionner les noms des absents dans le rapport.

M. NAGGIAR (France) désire qu'à la suite de l'énumération des possessions françaises qui figure à la page 2, on insère les termes "sans préjudice du statut futur de ces territoires".

M. MENON (Inde) met en doute l'emploi du terme "établissements" et suggère qu'on le remplace par "possessions".

M. BENSON (Secrétariat) explique que le terme "établissements" est généralement accepté.

Mr. DULLES (United States of America) suggested that reference should be made in the report to the statement of the delegation of Panama concerning the Panama Canal zone. He thought that it could best be done in the form of a footnote.

Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) requested that reference to his statement concerning the territory of Belice should also appear in the report.

The CHAIRMAN suggested that the reference should cover the statements made by the delegations of Guatemala, Mexico and the United Kingdom.

Mr. FERRER VIEYRA (Argentina) wished to make a reservation concerning the Falkland Islands and in particular Malvina.

The CHAIRMAN proposed that the representative of Argentina should consult with the representative of the United Kingdom with the view of preparing a joint statement for inclusion in the report.

Mr. ALFARO (Panama) agreed with the formula suggested by the United States representative for recording the position of the delegation of Panama.

Mr. PEON DEL VALLE (Mexico) thought that in the case of the statements of the delegations of Guatemala and the United Kingdom it would be sufficient if the report referred to the Journal containing the summary record of the meeting at which the statements had been made.

Mr. FERRER VIEYRA (Argentina) and Mr. THOMAS (United Kingdom) submitted the following joint statement:

"In regard to the Falkland Islands, the Argentine delegation, at the twenty-fifth meeting of the Committee, made a reservation to the effect that the Argentine Government did not recognize British sovereignty in the Falkland Islands. The United Kingdom delegation made a parallel reservation, not recognizing Argentine sovereignty in those islands".

Mr. THOMAS (United Kingdom) pointed to the difficulties inherent in the last paragraph of document A/C.4/77. The creation of an ad hoc committee would involve an expenditure. According to rule 112 of the provisional rules of procedure for the General Assembly, no resolution involving expenditure could be passed until the Administrative and Budgetary Committee had expressed its opinion. Rule 82 stipulated that all elections should be taken by secret ballot. Consequently it would be impossible to follow the procedure outlined in the draft report.

Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) believed that the Committee could elect the members of the ad hoc committee and submit their names for the approval of the General Assembly.

M. DULLES (Etats-Unis d'Amérique) propose que mention soit faite au rapport de la déclaration de la délégation du Panama relative à la zone du Canal de Panama. A son avis, il est préférable de placer cette note au bas de la page.

M. MENDOZA (Guatemala) demande que sa déclaration au sujet du territoire de Bélize figure également au rapport.

Le PRÉSIDENT propose de faire état, dans la même note, des déclarations faites par les délégations du Guatemala, du Mexique et du Royaume-Uni.

M. FERRER VIEYRA (Argentine) désire formuler une réserve concernant les îles Falkland, en particulier celle de Malvina.

Le PRÉSIDENT propose que le représentant de l'Argentine se mette en rapport avec le représentant du Royaume-Uni afin de préparer une déclaration conjointe qui sera incluse dans le rapport.

M. ALFARO (Panama) approuve la formule proposée par le représentant des Etats-Unis concernant la position de la délégation du Panama.

M. PEON DEL VALLE (Mexique) estime qu'en ce qui concerne les déclarations faites par les délégations du Guatemala et du Royaume-Uni, il serait suffisant que la rapport porte la référence du Journal contenant le compte rendu de la séance au cours de laquelle ces déclarations ont été faites.

M. FERRER VIEYRA (Argentine) et M. THOMAS (Royaume-Uni) présentent la déclaration conjointe ainsi conçue:

"Relativement aux îles Falkland, la délégation argentine, au cours de la vingt-cinquième séance de la Commission, a formulé la réserve que le Gouvernement argentin ne reconnaissait pas la souveraineté britannique sur les îles Falkland. La délégation du Royaume-Uni a formulé une réserve parallèle, ne reconnaissant pas la souveraineté de l'Argentine sur ces îles.

M. THOMAS (Royaume-Uni) relève les difficultés devant lesquelles on se trouve dans le dernier paragraphe du document A/C.4/77. La création d'un comité spécial ne manquera pas d'occasionner des frais. Conformément à l'article 112 du règlement provisoire de l'Assemblée générale, on ne peut adopter aucune résolution entraînant des frais avant que la Commission administrative et budgétaire ait donné son avis. L'article 82 stipule que l'on procède à toutes les élections par voie de scrutin secret. En conséquence, il serait impossible de suivre la procédure exposée dans le projet de rapport.

M. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) pense que la Commission a le pouvoir d'élire les membres du comité spécial sous réserve de soumettre leurs noms à l'approbation de l'Assemblée générale.

Mr. NAGGIAR (France) thought that it would be difficult to ascertain the number of States to be elected to membership on the ad hoc committee. Moreover, the problem of election was not urgent and therefore could be left open for the time being.

Mr. THOMAS (United Kingdom) associated himself with the views of the French representative. He proposed that the entire last paragraph after the word "abstentions" should be deleted.

Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) disagreed and suggested a modification of the last paragraph to the effect that the number of States should be defined.

Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) and Mr. BAILEY (Australia) associated themselves with the reservations made by the representatives of France and of the United Kingdom.

The RAPPOREUR was of the opinion that the membership of the ad hoc committee should be composed of eight States.

Mr. NAGGIAR (France) opposed the insertion of a definite figure.

Mr. STEIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) favoured that figure. It rested with the Governments concerned to send or not to send their representatives to the ad hoc committee. He proposed that the discussion should be closed.

Decisions: (1) It was decided that the report should be modified to indicate that, if the General Assembly approved the creation of the committee, it should be invited to elect eight Members to send representatives.

(2) The whole of the Rapporteur's draft report on the transmission of information by Members under Article 73(e) of the Charter was adopted as amended.

M. NAGGIAR (France) considère qu'il sera difficile de déterminer le nombre des États susceptibles d'être représentés au comité spécial. Il ajoute que, la question de l'élection n'étant pas urgente, elle peut être mise de côté pour le moment.

M. THOMAS (Royaume-Uni) se rallie à l'opinion du représentant de la France. Il propose la suppression de tout le dernier paragraphe après le mot "abstentions".

M. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) exprime son désaccord et propose de modifier le dernier paragraphe afin d'y déterminer le nombre des États.

M. RYCKMANS (Belgique) et M. BAILEY (Australie) s'associent aux réserves faites par les représentants de la France et du Royaume-Uni.

Le RAPPOREUR est d'avis que le comité spécial soit composé des représentants de huit États.

M. NAGGIAR (France) s'oppose à l'établissement d'un chiffre défini.

M. STEIN (Union des Républiques socialistes soviétiques) se prononce en faveur de ce chiffre. Il appartient aux Gouvernements d'envoyer ou de ne pas envoyer des représentants à ce comité spécial. Il propose la clôture de la discussion.

Décisions: 1) La Commission décide que le rapport sera modifié de façon à indiquer qu'au cas où l'Assemblée générale approuverait la création du comité, elle devra élire huit États Membres qui y seront représentés.

2) Ainsi amendé, l'ensemble du projet de rapport du Rapporteur, relatif à la transmission des renseignements communiqués par les Membres, en application de l'Article 73 e) de la Charte, est adopté.

334 (IV). Territories to which Chapter XI of the Charter applies

The General Assembly,

Having regard to the obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter accepted by the Members which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government,

Having regard to resolution 66 (I)¹⁵ adopted by the General Assembly on 14 December 1946 in which seventy-four territories were enumerated, in accordance with the declarations of the responsible Governments, as falling within the scope of Article 73 e,

Having noted the information supplied by certain Members concerning the constitutional changes which have led to the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e in respect of certain territories which were enumerated in resolution 66 (I),

1. Considers that it is within the responsibility of the General Assembly to express its opinion on the principles which have guided or which may in future guide the Members concerned in enumerating the territories for which the obligation exists to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter;

2. Invites any special committee which the General Assembly may appoint on information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to examine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government.

2 December 1949.*

TWO HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SECOND PLENARY MEETING

Held at Flushing Meadow, New York, on Thursday, 1 December 1949, at 3 p.m.

President: General Carlos P. RÓMULO (Philippines).

also concerned the establishment of a special committee on information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

117. In the course of its 123rd to 127th meetings, the Committee had discussed five other draft resolutions and amendments to them.

118. The draft resolutions were: a proposal by Egypt inviting any special committee appointed by the General Assembly to examine the factors that should be taken into account in deciding to which territories Chapter XI of the Charter applied; a proposal by India, to be substituted for the text proposed by the Special Committee, that a special committee should be established by the General Assembly, under Article 73 e, of the Charter, to study the information received, which resulted in the resolution contained in document A/1159; a joint proposal submitted by Cuba, Ecuador and Guatemala, inviting the Secretary-General to complement the summaries and analyses by periodical publication of data on special aspects of the progress achieved in Non-Self-Governing Territories; a joint proposal by Mexico and the United States of America recommending that the Special Committee should concentrate, without prejudice to the consideration of the other functional fields referred to in Article 73 e of the Charter, on one field each year and in particular, in 1950, on the problem of education; and lastly, a proposal by Australia requesting the Secretary-General to keep the Special Committee informed of the nature of the technical assistance accorded to Non-Self-Governing Territories by specialized international bodies.

119. As a result of the Special Committee's report, the Fourth Committee had dealt with subjects that closely concerned the Non-Self-Governing Territories and their millions of inhabitants and that work had been most valuable.

120. He drew the General Assembly's attention particularly to the draft resolutions on methods for the eradication of illiteracy, international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, technical assistance, and the future of the Special Committee on Information Transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. The last named draft resolution was a result of keen debate as to whether the Committee's mandate as a subsidiary organ of the General Assembly should be for one year or three years or whether the Committee should be established as a permanent subsidiary organ of the General Assembly.

121. Mr. de Marchena also drew the General Assembly's attention to the draft resolution on territories falling under Chapter XI of the Charter, as it incorporated the conclusions of a debate on the General Assembly's competence to decide whether or not a territory came into the category of territories whose peoples had not yet attained a full measure of self-government.

122. Unlike what had happened in the Fourth Committee during previous sessions, at the current session the draft resolutions had been recommended to the General Assembly by a substantial majority, which led one to hope that there was a

Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories: report of the Fourth Committee (A/1159) and report of the Fifth Committee (A/1166)

115. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic), Rapporteur of the Fourth Committee, recalled that the General Assembly had referred to the Fourth Committee the report of the Secretary-General (summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter) and the report of the Special Committee on Information Transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter (A/923).

116. The Committee had devoted several meetings² to the discussion of the six draft resolutions submitted by the Special Committee which had studied the problem throughout 1949. Those draft resolutions concerned the optional transmission of information in accordance with the first part of the standard form relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories; equality of treatment in education, the language of instruction, the suppression of illiteracy, and international co-operation on social, economic and educational problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The draft resolutions well-defined and common determination in regard to the application and implementation of the provisions of Article 73 e and Chapter XI of the Charter.

123. The PRESIDENT referred Members of the General Assembly to the report of the Fifth Committee on the financial implications of draft resolution IX recommended by the Fourth Committee (A/1166).

124. Mr. WINIEWICZ (Poland) said that his delegation had already stressed in the Fourth Committee the need for respecting not only the letter but also the spirit of Chapters XI and XII of the Charter in connexion with Non-Self-Governing Territories. The majority of the Fourth Committee had shared the same view and those who were trying to uphold the tradition of colonial exploitation had remained in the minority.

125. One of the draft resolutions submitted to the General Assembly provided for the re-establishment of a special committee on information, while another dealt with the territories referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter. Those texts represented a step forward in the application of the provisions of the Charter concerning dependent territories. As those provisions were inadequate, much far-sighted statesmanship was required to make them work properly. The draft resolutions therefore could not be accepted as a final clarification of the meaning of the Charter. Poland looked forward to a more precise interpretation which would eventually make it impossible for a colonial Power to nullify the efforts of the United Nations by its failure to co-operate. Poland would collaborate with all who wished to fight against colonialism throughout the world.

126. The special committee to be re-established under the draft resolution would examine and analyse all the available information on the economic, social, cultural and humanitarian living conditions of the dependent peoples. It would also co-ordinate the efforts of nations striving to achieve the ideals set forth in the Charter. With the signature of the Charter the fate of dependent peoples had become the sacred obligation of every Member of the United Nations and had ceased to be a matter for internal legislation by the Governments of colonial Powers.

127. Chapter XI had torn down the veil of secrecy shrouding the fate of over 200 million human beings. The United Nations was responsible before world public opinion for the fate of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and though it was still only a moral responsibility, the United Nations should censure all colonial Powers which neglected the interests of the dependent peoples.

128. The colonial Powers did not properly understand the vast changes in their position since San Francisco. The recent discussions in the Fourth Committee had not been reassuring with regard to the attitude of those Powers. They had again been reluctant to submit the necessary information and some of them had even stated their intention of transmitting no further data regarding some of their colonies. In some instances they had sought to escape behind the idea of sovereignty, in particular when the problem of the European colonies in Latin America had been raised.

129. In the British House of Lords, Lord Listowel had gone even further than the United Kingdom representative in the Fourth Committee and had practically stated that his Government felt that it was entitled to interpret the provisions of the Charter as it wished. That was not an astonishing statement from a colonial Power which refused to fly the United Nations flag in Trust Territories.

130. On 29 November the London Times had stated in a leading article that, if the United Kingdom conformed to the provisions of the Charter and the decisions of the Assembly, it would be placed, with all its experience in colonial administration, in the intolerable position of having to submit to the direction of a purely political body in discharging its responsibilities to the colonial peoples. That article was another indication of the prevalent unco-operative attitude for which the Times suggested certain reasons, for example, the Special Committee might make data, which had been submitted for information only, the basis of resolutions and criticisms affecting many aspects of day to day administration in the colonies.

131. The nations which, in the Assembly, had spoken so frequently of the need to observe the Charter were the first to refuse to comply with its provisions when the fate of dependent peoples was at stake. That clearly showed their lack of sincerity.

132. An analysis of all the available information, insufficient as it was, did not indicate a satisfactory situation in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The data were not reassuring in spite of the fact that they were merely cold figures and statistics. The dependent peoples were still treated merely as labourers engaged in procuring raw materials for the metropolitan Powers; race discrimination prevailed; educational needs were neglected; native culture was suppressed and self-governing institutions were looked upon as dangerous centres of obstructionism; merciless military occupation methods were applied. He quoted the Malayan Peninsula, to which he had already referred in the Fourth Committee, as an example.

133. The human misery which lay behind the information submitted by the colonial Powers emerged with convincing force from other sources. Bloody disturbances had recently taken place in one of the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which the United Nations was responsible. Nigerian labour and political organizations had sunk their differences in an all-party united front and had formed an emergency committee to protest against the shooting of miners who had been fighting for a basic daily wage of approximately 84 cents. Meetings had been held and resolutions passed to indicate, as The New York Times had said, that the people of Nigeria would not tolerate such action. He did not intend to embark upon a detailed discussion of the abuse of native labour by the colonial Powers but he referred to that one instance to show the kind of information which had to be evaluated under Article 73 e and the events which could be prevented if the United Nations focused public attention on some situations in the dependent territories.

134. The interest of the United Nations, however, was not confined to the material well-being of dependent peoples or to their position as an eventual market for consumer goods in order to help the capitalist countries to escape the curse of economic crises. The United Nations was not interested in discovering whether higher wages for the indigenous inhabitants would produce more tin or rubber for the metropolitan Powers. It was rather concerned with the final goal of self-government and independence for dependent peoples, on the basis of the principles of Article 55 of the Charter.

135. Self-government and national independence might be achieved by the application of Article 77 c of the Charter, which provided that dependent territories might be placed voluntarily under the Trusteeship System, or the progress from dependence to independence might develop in some other way; the aim, however, remained the same. In order to assess the true situation in any dependent territory, therefore, it was essential that the relevant data on the development of institutions of self-government should be supplied.

136. Certain colonial Powers had shown an unco-operative attitude in that connexion also. They had contended, and still maintained, that the Administering Powers alone were entitled to determine whether or not a territory was non-self-governing. They had claimed that they were in no way bound by the Charter to submit any information on the development of institutions of self-government among their dependent peoples. It was hardly likely that Malta had become a self-governing territory simply because the United Kingdom had failed to submit any information about it under Article 73 e of the Charter.

137. General Assembly resolution 66 (I), of 14 December 1946, had listed seventy-four territories as falling within the scope of Article 73 e. The General Assembly was the only body which could release a colonial Power from the obligation to send information on the status of the dependent peoples. In order to take any such decision, the Assembly must examine all the relevant facts.

138. The draft resolution under discussion provided that such work should be assigned to the Special Committee. His delegation would therefore support it whole-heartedly. If that draft resolution were adopted, it was to be hoped that the colonial Powers would supply the relevant information, or, if they failed to do so, the General Assembly would stigmatize that failure as it deserved.

139. Political advancement was only one aspect of the economic and social advancement of the indigenous population in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was the road towards independence. Any denial of information on that subject would, at least, imply the denial of their right to self-government and thus be a violation of the Charter. That was the only possible interpretation of the intentions of the authors of the Charter; it could not be perverted by any kind of legal subterfuge.

140. Mr. FARRAG (Egypt) said his delegation would support all the draft resolutions submitted by the Fourth Committee. He would speak only on draft resolution VIII concerning the territories to which Chapter XI of the Charter applied.

141. A number of vital questions affected the work of the United Nations and its relations with Non-Self-Governing Territories which were not within the terms of reference of the Special Committee. One of those questions concerned the application of resolution 222 (III) regarding the cessation of the transmission of information. That resolution had been adopted by the General Assembly in view of the fact that the number of territories in respect of which information was transmitted to the Secretary-General had decreased since 1946. But the United Nations had had no official means of ascertaining whether that decrease had resulted from the attainment of independence or full self-government by the territories concerned, or from other factors.

142. The Special Committee had discussed communications (A/915, A/915/Add. 1) received by the Secretary-General from Administering Powers concerning the cessation of the transmission of information on certain territories. Comments had been made on those communications in the Special Committee, but it had rightly decided that consideration of the issue was not within its particular competence and should be referred to the Fourth Committee. That had been done and the Fourth Committee had approved resolution VIII which was before the General Assembly.

143. That draft resolution completed the procedure laid down in resolution 222 (III). The two Administering Powers concerned had given different reasons for ceasing to transmit information under Article 73 e, but they had concurred in the view that it was exclusively within the competence of the Administering Powers to determine the territories whose peoples had not yet attained full self-government. If accepted, that view would render resolution 222 (III) ineffective and would, in the long run, make Chapter XI a dead letter, no matter how well intentioned the Administering Powers might be.

144. The above view might have been correct before the coming into force of the Charter of the United Nations. In Chapter XI, however, the Charter had created a new principle under which the relationship between Non-Self-Governing Territories and the Administering Powers could not be exclusively a matter for the domestic constitutional laws of the latter. That was quite clear from the text of Article 73 under which the Administering Powers had accepted certain obligations in respect of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, among them the obligation to transmit regularly to the Secretary-General of the United Nations information relating to economic, social and educational conditions in those Territories.

145. Under the League of Nations, the Administering Powers had been under no obligation to transmit such information; but they were obliged to transmit information regularly to the United Nations. If they failed to do so they would be requested by the Organization to observe the obligation.

146. That new principle had been repeatedly recognized and emphasized by the representatives of the Administering Powers in their statements at the first part of the first session of the General Assembly. At that time the ideals which had inspired the creation of the Charter had still been fresh in representatives' minds, and the statements made then had been in conformity with those ideals. It would be useful to recall the fine words of two eminent statesmen, Mr. Dulles and Mr. Creech Jones, who had spoken as representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom at the General Assembly in February 1946.¹ Mr. Dulles had said that his delegation made it clear once and for all that the declaration regarding the Non-Self-Governing Territories was not merely the concern of colonial Powers but also the concern of the United Nations. Mr. Creech Jones had said that he would again like to say—because the United Kingdom was already working on the principles defined in the Charter—that the United Kingdom whole-heartedly rejoiced that at last there was an international colonial convention in Chapter XI which all colonial Powers subscribing to the United Nations would be required to observe.

147. That statement contained two points. First, that there was an international colonial convention in Chapter XI, and secondly, that the colonial Powers subscribing to the United Nations would be required to observe that convention.

148. The answer to the question which authority was responsible for requesting the colonial Powers to observe that international colonial convention was clear: it was the United Nations, and more particularly, the General Assembly.

149. In discharging that responsibility, in 1946 the General Assembly had requested Member States to enumerate the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration. They had listed seventy-four such territories. There were at the moment only sixty-two Non-Self-Governing Territories upon which information was transmitted; information had ceased to be transmitted on twelve Non-Self-Governing Territories. If that cessation had been due to the attainment of self-government, that would be a matter for general rejoicing. When information ceased to be transmitted on one of the Non-Self-Governing Territories already listed, or when no information at all was submitted on some of those Territories, it was the duty of the General Assembly to request the Administering Power concerned to observe the obligation imposed upon it by Article 73 of the Charter.

150. Mr. Bailey, the representative of Australia, had said in the Fourth Committee in 1946² when the same question had been discussed that if no information was submitted for some territory, any Member of the General Assembly would be entitled to call attention to that fact. That was exactly the meaning of draft resolution VIII which was before the General Assembly. Resolution 222 (III) could be considered a first step in the procedure necessary for the implementation of Chapter XI of the Charter. Draft resolution VIII completed that procedure by requesting the Administering Powers to observe the new international colonial convention created in Chapter XI of the Charter.

151. The substance of that draft resolution had been discussed in Sub-Committee 2 of the Fourth Committee in 1946.³ The question had not been pressed to the point of drafting a resolution, because at that time the need for it had not arisen. Since then important events had taken place. The number of Non-Self-Governing Territories had decreased and a theory contrary to the principles of Chapter XI of the Charter had been advanced: that the determination of Non-Self-Governing Territories lay exclusively within the competence of the Administering Powers. A remarkable feature of the discussions in Sub-Committee 2 of the Fourth Committee in 1946 had been participation by the representatives of the Administering Powers in a constructive spirit of international co-operation. Mr. Bailey, whom he had quoted, had represented Australia, which was an Administering Power.

152. The records showed that the representatives of the Administering Powers had not considered that examination of the problem had involved any encroachment upon the sovereign rights of the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration. They had not said one word which might be construed as questioning the competence of the General Assembly and its Committees to deal with the problem. He noted with regret that at the moment a few Administering Powers refused to recognize that the General Assembly was entitled to request Administering Powers to continue to transmit information until the Non-Self-Governing Territory concerned ceased to be non-self-governing.

153. During the discussions in the Fourth Committee on the draft resolution, some representatives of the Administering Powers had said that, if the draft resolution were intended to define the term "Non-Self-Governing Territory", they would not oppose it; but if it were meant to give the General Assembly the right to decide whether a particular territory was or was not non-self-governing, they would oppose it.

154. That stand was clearly self-contradictory. If they accepted the definition, they should accept its logical consequence: namely, that if a particular territory fell within that definition, it was a Non-Self-Governing Territory and therefore the Administering Power responsible for it should not fail to supply the necessary information.

155. It had been argued in the Fourth Committee that the Administering Powers were entitled to cease transmitting information on the ground that Article 73 e contained a reservation to the effect that the transmission of information was subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations might require.

156. It had been said in that connexion that the reasons for the inclusion of that phrase had been made abundantly clear at the San Francisco Conference, which had accepted them.

157. On consulting the records of the San Francisco Conference in that respect, he had failed to find any reference to the reasons which had been said to have been made abundantly clear.

158. As all Members knew, Chapter XI had been drafted by Committee 4 of Commission II of the United Nations Conference on International Organization. The records of that Committee, which appeared on pages 561 to 576 of volume X of the United Nations Conference on International Organization, did not state the reasons for the inclusion of that phrase.

159. The report on that Committee had been submitted to Commission II of the United Nations Conference on International Organization. The record of Commission II regarding Chapter XI which appeared on pages 125 to 154 of Volume VIII also failed to mention the famous reasons. It was, therefore, for the General Assembly to look into the meaning of that phrase.

160. An analysis of the phrase would show that it contained two points: first, there could be limitation of the transmission of information; secondly, the limitation should be imposed because of security and constitutional considerations.

161. As regards the first point, the limitation of the transmission of information did not in any way mean the complete cessation of information. Any limitation of information should be the exception to the rule, which was the transmission of information, and it should be very sparingly applied. If the framers of the Charter had visualized an eventual complete cessation of information by the Administering Powers, they would have indicated such an intention in quite different terms.

162. As regards the second point, the General Assembly had the right to examine the constitutional or security considerations in order to determine whether or not they were well founded. The General Assembly had, in fact, already given its ruling on that point by adopting resolution 222 (III), in which it requested the Administering Powers to inform it of any change in the constitutional position or status of any Non-Self-Governing Territory as the result of which the transmission of information had ceased.

163. It went without saying that the General Assembly did not mean that the information on the changes in the constitutional position or status of the territories concerned would be sent to the archives of the Secretariat where it would rest undisturbed. That information must be examined and commented upon, if necessary.

164. He therefore appealed to the Administering Powers to adopt a liberal attitude in the interpretation of Chapter XI, of which Mr. Stassen had stated in the Committee which had drafted the Charter that it was a living document and must evolve, must change, and must grow into something greater and better.

165. The same idea had been very well expressed in 1946 by the representative of Norway, who had said that he felt that Chapter XI might be developed into a Magna Carta of liberty which would give new faith and hope to millions of people who had made great sacrifices during the war but who were not represented among the United Nations.

166. He hoped that the draft resolution would receive the unanimous support of the General Assembly. He requested that the vote should be taken by roll-call.

167. Mr. DE BRUYNE (Belgium) said that, in order to define his delegation's attitude to draft resolution VI, which the Fourth Committee, quoting Article 73 e of the Charter, had submitted to the Assembly for the purpose of re-establishing the Special Committee, he was obliged to re-state certain legal considerations he had already outlined in the Fourth Committee.

168. Under Article 73 e, the States responsible for the administration of the Non-Self-Governing Territories referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter had undertaken to transmit to the Secretary-General information relating to conditions in those Territories. Sub-paragraph e carefully defined the nature of that information and the subjects with which it had to deal. It referred only to statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social and educational conditions. That was the information which States had undertaken to transmit; their commitment did not, therefore, extend to information of a different nature or information relating to other fields, such as the political field. Furthermore, they had agreed to transmit that information only subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations might require.

169. Consequently the commitment entered into under Article 73 e was limited in scope. More especially, sub-paragraph e granted no power of control, or even verification, to the United Nations or its organs. It merely recognized that the Secretary-General had the power to receive the information transmitted to him, a power which included that of classifying and analysing that information and, in short, of facilitating access thereto by Members of the United Nations.

170. In particular, the States concerned had not agreed to report to the United Nations, to come and justify their actions before it or to render an account of their actions to it. Sub-paragraph e stipulated moreover in express terms that the information was transmitted "for information purposes".

171. That was, moreover, quite understandable. The territories in question formed an integral part of the national soil of the contracting States. In the case of Belgium, for instance, the Congo was under the exclusive sovereignty of the Belgian State. States had subscribed of their own free will to Chapter XI which had been described as a "Declaration" in order to indicate clearly its origin and its very special character. That accounted for the contrast between Chapter XI and Chapters XII and XIII, which concerned territories with an entirely different status.

172. While the Charter regulated the status of the Trust Territories and provided for United Nations participation in their organization and in the supervision of their administration, it contained no such provisions concerning the territories referred to in Chapter XI.

173. It was true that some representatives had invoked Article 10, which provided that the General Assembly could discuss any questions within the scope of the Charter and could make recommendations concerning such questions to the Member States. The purpose of that Article was not, however, to determine the extent of the obligations of those States. The freedom allowed to States under Article 73 e could not be restricted by the Assembly's recommendations. Those recommendations could not impose on the States measures of control or other obligations which they had not accepted. Provided therefore that a State observed the explicit stipulations of Chapter XI, and in particular those of Article 73 e, it must be regarded as keeping its promises, whether or not it complied with the conditions which the Assembly might recommend. The recommendations as such had no binding force. Moreover, the Assembly had no power of decision in the matter. In particular it had no power to make any decision with compulsory effect on the manner in which States must proceed in order to act correctly in accordance with Chapter XI, or on the question whether they had or had not acted correctly.

174. Furthermore, the Assembly was obliged to remain within the scope of the Charter. It was, however, exceeding its constitutional powers if it claimed to be able to call upon States to fulfil obligations which were not covered by the text of the Charter. It was also exceeding its powers when it set up subsidiary organs vested with powers which presupposed the fulfilment of such obligations on the part of the States.

175. It was, however, Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter which especially restricted the powers of the Assembly.

176. That paragraph stated that no provision of the Charter authorized the United Nations to intervene in "matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State" nor required Members to submit such matters to settlement under the Charter.

177. That principle was an interpretation rule which took precedence over all the provisions of the Charter, apart from those related to the application of the measures of coercion provided for in Chapter VII. That rule was, moreover, binding on all the organs of the United Nations, whether principal, secondary or subsidiary, for obviously none of them could have more power than the Organization itself.

178. It was therefore legally impossible to interpret Article 73 e or any other provision of Chapter XI — as permitting intervention in matters which were essentially within a State's domestic jurisdiction. The same limitation affected the interpretation of Article 10.

179. Once the sphere reserved by Article 2, paragraph 7, was in question, the Assembly was powerless to intervene. Consequently, its action, in that case, must be particularly circumspect; it could never go as far as "intervention". Although the Assembly could hold a discussion in which any Member would be entitled to express his opinion, it could not give directives to States, in any form whatsoever.

180. The Charter did not define the meaning to be attached to "matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State". Further, the San Francisco Conference had rejected by a large majority a Belgian amendment which would have conferred on the organs of the United Nations the power to decide without appeal whether a matter was or was not essentially within a State's domestic jurisdiction.

181. He had recapitulated the rules applicable in the matter; draft resolution VI, submitted by the Fourth Committee, did not, however, respect those rules. That draft resolution was intended to re-establish for a long period a body, the Special Committee, the previous activities of which revealed a growing tendency to assume functions with regard to the territories envisaged in Chapter XI similar to those exercised by the Trusteeship Council with regard to the Trust Territories. States were to appear before it to give an account of the way in which they exercised their sovereignty, even in matters which were essentially within their domestic jurisdiction. Moreover, the trend of the Special Committee's activities merely reflected the tendency shown by the Assembly itself. Thus, when the first Special Committee, then modestly entitled the ad hoc Committee, had been established in 1946,¹ the Assembly had limited its powers of recommendation to procedural measures only. The question at issue was what procedure should be followed in transmitting the information under Article 73 e and ensuring the useful co-operation of the specialized agencies. Already in 1947 the General Assembly had issued instructions going further than those of 1946.² It had recommended a standard form to serve Member States as a guide in the preparation of information. That standard form had, moreover, exceeded the obligations assumed by those States as it had included inter alia, a chapter providing for the transmission of data of a definitely political character, a matter which was not covered by Article 73. At the same time the General Assembly had given additional competence to the Special Committee which it had set up, that of making general technical suggestions. Further, it had not, in doing so, excluded questions which were essentially within the jurisdiction of Member States. The General Assembly had confirmed those powers in 1948.³

182. The draft resolution proposed for adoption went even further. Indeed, it contained a general clause under which the Special Committee was henceforward to judge, in the spirit of Article 55 of the Charter, whether or not the action taken by States in the economic, social and educational fields was in conformity with the Assembly's resolutions. It should be added that the Special Committee, which had never been continued for more than one year, was being continued for three years and was thus on the way to becoming a permanent institution.

183. That progressive interference and intervention was apparently not to stop there. The resolution provided in effect that, in 1952, the General Assembly should re-examine the Committee's mandate. That precise stipulation was deliberate. It had given rise to a debate in the Fourth Committee, which had been fully aware of its implications.

184. Belgium was firmly resolved to continue to observe faithfully the provisions of Chapter XI, which it had freely accepted as a sacred trust. It had no intention, however, of going further or of submitting to measures taken or situations created in disregard of the limits of its obligations under the Charter. In particular, the Territory of the Congo was under Belgian sovereignty. Belgium would never consent to its being treated as a Trust Territory. The draft resolution presented by the Fourth Committee represented a new phase of an evolution that was contrary to the Charter.

185. The Belgian delegation would therefore be obliged to vote against the draft resolution and, should the draft resolution be adopted, it would be bound to reserve the full freedom of its Government in regard to the attitude to be taken concerning that measure.

186. The PRESIDENT announced that the list of speakers would be closed at the end of the meeting.

187. Mr. McNEIL (United Kingdom) felt it necessary to explain the attitude of his Government, not only to the particular resolutions before the General Assembly, but also to a tendency which had appeared during the previous years and which had culminated in the discussions in the Fourth Committee in 1949.

188. He was referring to the tendency to extend the scope of Chapter XI, in other words, to read into the Charter obligations and functions which were not in it.

189. It had been largely due to the initiative of his Government that the Declaration on Non-Self-Governing Territories in Chapter XI had come to be written into the Charter. That Declaration affirmed principles which had inspired the colonial policy of the United Kingdom long before the United Nations had come into existence and which the United Kingdom would have continued to apply even if there had been no Charter.

190. The only element in the Declaration which entailed any new practices was the acceptance of a specific and limited obligation to transmit to the Secretary-General certain clearly defined classes of technical information. Although that obligation had not been devised by the United Kingdom his delegation had accepted it because it accorded with the practice of the United Kingdom to make known as widely as possible the work which it was doing in the overseas territories for which it was responsible. Moreover, it seemed to the United Kingdom, as a sponsoring Power of the United Nations, desirable and appropriate that the economic and social data available to the Organization should be as complete and as nearly universal as possible, particularly in view of the high hopes placed by all in the work of the specialized agencies.

191. In good faith, therefore, his delegation had supplied the information required under the Charter, believing that it would be used, as the Charter specified, for information purposes. He doubted whether the good faith in supplying the information had been met by equally good faith on the part of the other signatories of the Charter.

192. When studying the ten resolutions passed by the Committee, it was difficult to recognize in them Article 73 e as it stood in the Charter. He found instead a confirmation of the tendency to which he had just referred, and to which the United Kingdom representatives had drawn attention time and time again in the Special Committee and in the Fourth Committee, namely, the tendency to depart further and further and quite irresponsibly from Chapter XI and to pass General Assembly resolutions on an assumption which was expressly omitted from the Charter.

193. He was referring to the completely invalid assumption that, in subscribing to the Declaration in Chapter XI, Member States responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories had accepted the principle of international supervision over the administration of those Territories. That such a departure from the Charter had been taking place had been admitted by some representatives. They had nevertheless sought to explain or excuse that departure by appeals to the spirit of the Charter, or to the possibility of the growth of conventional interpretation.

194. There had been attempts in other fields to modify the Charter by what Mr. Vyshinsky had once most appropriately called "back-door methods". Attempts to modify the Charter by those "back-door methods" had always been opposed by the United Kingdom delegation, but no delegation had been more determined, and perhaps more correctly determined, in its opposition to that "infiltration" of the Charter than the delegation of the Soviet Union. The most obvious example was the recent one connected with a modification of the practice relating to the admission of new members.

195. The constant insistence of Mr. Vyshinsky, and before him of Mr. Molotov, on the letter of the Charter as applied to the matter to which he had just referred, was an attitude with which Mr. McNeil was completely in accord but it stood out in very sharp contrast to the attitude adopted by representatives of the Soviet Union in the Fourth Committee, who had attempted time and time again, together with representatives of other Member States, by appeals to the spirit of the Charter, to read into Chapter XI obligations and principles which could not be found there. There was no doubt much to be said for an appeal to the spirit of an international convention on points where the terms were not clear, but the majority of those who had appealed to the spirit of the Charter in relation to the subject under discussion were invoking in support of their arguments particular doctrines which had been deliberately excluded from the Charter by majority votes taken in proper and constitutional form at San Francisco.

196. By no stretch of the imagination could the spirit of the Charter be interpreted to cover points which particular delegations would have liked to see inserted in the Charter, but for which, rightly or wrongly, fortunately or unfortunately, they had completely failed to obtain the requisite vote. The procedure for revising the Charter was well known, and his Government subscribed to the Charter as it stood. It had complied and would continue to comply to the best of its ability with its requirements in respect of the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which it was responsible.

197. There were, however, many features in the ten draft resolutions which not only went far beyond any requirement of the Charter but also ran counter to the requirements of the current situation in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which his Government was responsible. There appeared to be a widespread but totally fallacious belief in the United Nations that, unless a Territory was fully self-governing or completely independent its peoples had no share in their government and administration at all and that their affairs were managed on an entirely authoritarian basis by direct control from the metropolitan Power.

198. The representatives of the United Kingdom had repeatedly tried to remove that misapprehension, but apparently they had been unsuccessful; he sometimes thought that the people to whom the information was directed did not want to listen to the clarification.

199. The responsibility for the administration of the Non-Self-Governing Territories with which the United Kingdom was concerned was devolving, to a rapidly increasing extent, on the peoples of the Territories themselves. The most striking, and quite recent, example was the report by the Committee on Constitutional Reform in the Gold Coast, under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Coussey, a distinguished African Judge of the Supreme Court of the Gold Coast. That Committee, which had a membership of thirty-eight, was composed exclusively of Africans. No one who read the report could fail to be impressed by that evidence of the political maturity of those people in the Gold Coast. His Government had accepted the report, subject to certain comments, as providing a workable plan within the framework of which constitutional developments could proceed.

200. Thus, through their own rapidly developing institutions, the colonial peoples to whom he had been referring were continuously finding free expression of their will in relation to the matters which most closely affected them. Those colonies were not independent nations, a subject of delight to lawyers who sometimes abounded in the Fourth Committee, but he assured the Assembly that there was a rapidly growing sense of local pride in, and loyalty to, indigenous institutions and traditions. In the current phase of their political growth, those people themselves were certainly not prepared to tolerate a greater degree of international intervention in their domestic affairs than other countries, which were independent, would be willing to accept. He thought that that had been made strikingly and persuasively clear by his colleague; Mr. Grantley Adams of the Barbados, speaking for the United Kingdom at the previous sessions of the General Assembly. Those who advocated that the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be submitted to that discriminatory treatment were themselves guilty of engendering that very feeling of inferiority which it should be the object of any enlightened colonial policy to remove.

201. Few countries were immune from criticism, and he did not pretend that the United Kingdom was. Many Member States were frequently the object in debates of severe strictures by others in that respect. The Administering Powers, however, were in a rather different category from other sovereign States because of their special responsibilities. That perhaps laid them more open to criticism than others. Certainly, they were criticized in very full measure in the Fourth Committee which had become a byword for irresponsible criticism. In that Committee, his delegation felt that the representatives of some of the States which were not confronted with the difficulties and responsibilities of the Administering Powers allowed themselves, and were permitted at times, to exceed the limits of fair and objective criticism. Such statements, to which his colleagues felt bound to take exception, not infrequently came from the representatives of States which were by no means beyond criticism in the conduct of their own affairs, particularly in cases where they, too, bore responsibility for the progressive development of indigenous peoples, who, in so far as they had not yet achieved maturity, were still undeveloped.

202. Those statements appeared all too often to be inspired by emotion, sometimes by envy, rather than by the dispassionate objectivity which the Administering Powers considered they had a right to expect. As one of the Administering Powers, his country doubted whether those Powers were receiving fair treatment in many matters of concern not merely to them, but also to the peoples whom they administered, and indeed, as was becoming progressively clearer, of great concern to all who were jealous of the reputation and the powers of the United Nations itself. Certainly, much that was said from time to time was not calculated to make it easier for the Administering Powers to discharge their obligations to the people, to themselves or to the United Nations.

203. The United Kingdom, whose experience and record as an architect of institutions of self-government was unrivalled, was not prepared to put back the clock by committing the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories to policies in the formulation of which they had had no say and which the United Kingdom frequently found misguided and sometimes incompetent.

204. Four of the ten draft resolutions, resolutions VI, VII, VIII and X, dealt with the future of the Special Committee and the additional responsibilities which it was proposed to assign to it. In agreeing in 1946, 1947 and again in 1948 to the establishment of that Committee for a further year only, his Government had made it clear that, in its view, the only functions which the Committee could usefully perform, and indeed the only functions which it could perform without conflicting with Chapter XI of the Charter, were procedural functions. His Government had felt that the function of that Committee was and should be to perfect the technique of transmission so as to ensure that the "statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social and educational conditions" in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was canalized to the specialized agencies, where it would be considered by experts in a non-political atmosphere who would also have before them information on similar problems existing in Member States. There was no justification for spotlighting or highlighting conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The problems which existed there could not be considered in isolation; they formed a part of world problems which were to be found in under-developed areas irrespective of how their political status happened to be defined by jurists. The specialized agencies should study those problems on a world, or perhaps on a regional basis, and should submit the results of their findings to the General Assembly in their annual reports. For those reasons, he could not agree that it was either necessary or appropriate to set up a special committee for a three-year period with functions which far exceeded those which had been given even to the 1949 Committee. His delegation would therefore vote against draft resolutions VI, VII and VIII, and would abstain from voting on draft resolution X.

205. His delegation must also vote against draft resolutions II and III because, quite apart from certain technical objections with which members of the Fourth Committee were familiar, those two draft resolutions invited the Administering Authorities to take certain action in respect of their Non-Self-Governing Territories and thus implied the existence of international accountability in respect of the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, for which there was no provision in Chapter XI or any other chapter of the Charter. For those reasons, even though his Government was in fact taking action in accordance with those resolutions, his delegation would nevertheless vote against the two draft resolutions.

206. Draft resolutions IV, V and IX dealt primarily with the role to be played by the specialized agencies and the Secretary-General in dealing with the matters covered by Article 73 e of the Charter. He regarded those resolutions as unnecessary in the sense that, in many cases, the action called for was already being taken and that, where it was not, it would merely involve a duplication of work and proliferation of paper and functions. His delegation's detailed comments on those three resolutions had been made in the Fourth Committee and he did not propose to repeat them, but his delegation, while abstaining in the vote on draft resolution IV, would have to vote against draft resolutions V and IX.

207. In relation to draft resolution I, which was a request to the Administering Authorities to transmit certain additional information in respect of the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which they were responsible, information which they were not required to transmit under the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter, his Government had made itself so clear on the point on so many occasions that it was hardly necessary for him to re-state the position. But, since his Government was not required to transmit that information, and did not propose to do so, his delegation must vote against the draft resolution, as it had done in the case of similar resolutions in the past.

208. In short, for the reasons stated in the plenary meeting and in the Fourth Committee his delegation must vote against all the draft resolutions with the exception of draft resolutions IV and X in respect of which it would abstain from voting. In voting thus, his delegation must fully reserve the position of His Majesty's Government in respect of any matters arising out of those resolutions if they were adopted by the Assembly.

209. He found no pleasure in having to make a statement of that kind. He had to make it because his delegation must be as jealous for the character and reputation of the United Nations as for its own responsibilities, and he was very happy to be joined in that attitude by several distinguished, responsible and modest delegations.

The meeting rose at 6.30 p.m.

TWO HUNDRED AND SIXTY-THIRD PLENARY MEETING

Held at Flushing Meadow, New York, on Friday, 2 December 1949, at 10.45 a.m.

President: General Carlos P. RÓMULO (Philippines).

Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories: report of the Fourth Committee (A/1159) and report of the Fifth Committee (A/1166) (concluded)

1. Mr. GARREAU (France) recalled that in the Fourth Committee¹ the French delegation had abstained from voting on four of the proposed resolutions and had voted against the other six. It had, moreover, entered the most express reservations as to the possible consequences of the adoption of the six draft resolutions concerned. He would like explicitly to repeat those reservations in the General Assembly.

2. He would not resume the discussion that had taken place in the Fourth Committee. All were aware of the French delegation's fundamental objection to that part of the Committee's work. What was proposed was the institution for three years of the Special Committee and the investiture of that Committee with excessive—the French delegation had even said, and he repeated, unconstitutional—powers.

3. The French delegation affirmed, and based its affirmation on the text of the Charter itself and the San Francisco discussions, that an innovation such as a special committee with a tendency to become a permanent body and to be invested with real power of control over territories subject to French sovereignty was in conflict with the intention of the signatories of the Charter, and hence such a committee could only be established by amending the Charter.

4. The Charter was a contract. By definition, that contract could not express anything other than the common will of all the contracting parties. It could hardly be claimed that Chapter XI expressed the common will of the signatories of the Charter—he stressed the word “common”—to place the Non-Self-Governing Territories under international control.

5. Such an assertion was clearly untenable and, therefore, in whatever way it was sought to twist the texts, France adhered to the terms of the contract and denied the Assembly the right to modify it by a simple resolution adopted by a majority vote. His country would also, however, like to emphasize the respect with which it was observing the obligations that were really contained in Chapter XI and the fact that it had never ceased to observe them.

6. Those obligations were of two kinds. One of them was a formal obligation and was binding on France in relation to the United Nations; the other was one of substance and was binding on France in relation to the populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

¹ For the discussion on this subject in the Fourth Committee, see Official Records of the fourth session of the General Assembly, Fourth Committee, 108th to 110th, 113th to 127th and 142nd meetings.

7. In relation to the United Nations, France was bound to supply non-political information on those Territories. It had done so conscientiously and punctually, and its spirit of co-operation with the United Nations had never failed, either in that or in any other field, for three years.

8. In relation to the populations, the obligation, which the Charter justly described as sacred, was binding on the whole French nation which must lead those populations towards progress, and particularly towards political progress. Although it was not answerable to the Assembly on that point, the French delegation was surely entitled to say that French policy was inspired by the principles embodied in Chapter XI of the Charter, and had even perhaps advanced beyond them.

9. The question was thus clear: France had respected, did respect and would always respect the Charter, a fact which signified both a constant resolve for advancement in the French Union and co-operation with the international Organization, under the San Francisco contract. If those terms were being exceeded, and France considered that they were, France would show the same respect towards the United Nations but would not consider itself bound to follow the Organization into a field that was beyond its competence.

10. Those were the reasons that prompted the French delegation to reiterate its most express reservations on all the draft resolutions (A/1159) to be voted on that tended to bring the territories of the French Union under international supervision.

11. Mr. Garreau would refer specifically only to draft resolution VIII, which invited the Special Committee to examine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory was or was not self-governing.

12. The French delegation strongly opposed that resolution, not only because it referred to a special committee which in the French view was unconstitutional, but also because the additional powers with which the said committee would be invested were obviously political. The violation of Article 73 of the Charter was in that instance so flagrant that it could hardly be considered as involuntary. By its use of economic, social and cultural information, the proposed committee would be a veritable control committee of domestic laws and constitutions. It would be able to say whether or not it considered suitable any given provision of the French Constitution concerning States or territories of the French Union.

13. It was obviously no longer the Charter that was involved; it was a new right, foreign to and in conflict with the Charter. The French delegation could not recognize that right, not only because it believed in respect for international contracts, but also because in the Assembly it spoke for a 100 million citizens of the French Union whose political institutions, whether general or individual, were their exclusive preserve and fell within their sovereign competence.

14. Mr. Shiva Rao (India) had intended to confine himself to a very brief statement in connexion with some of the ten draft resolutions before the General Assembly. The exigencies of the debate, however, had placed him immediately after some spokesmen of the Administering Powers whose statements had been sharply, and even extravagantly critical, not only of the resolutions but of the Fourth Committee itself. As spokesman of a delegation which had supported all the resolutions in the Fourth Committee and proposed to do so in the General Assembly, he therefore felt bound to note some of the criticisms which had been voiced.

15. As far as the draft resolutions themselves were concerned, they seemed to have one main purpose. They sought to improve the quality and the scope of the information transmitted by the Administering Powers under Article 73 e of the Charter. They would ensure that the collaboration of the specialized agencies, referred to in paragraph d of that Article, was rendered practical, effective and properly co-ordinated. They emphasized the urgent need for speeding up educational progress in Non-Self-Governing Territories, without any slackening of effort in the fields of social and economic activity. Finally, they attempted to establish machinery under the United Nations for making the whole of Article 73 a provision of increasing reality and significance for the millions of people who lived in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

16. Article 73 laid down certain broad principles which had definitely been accepted by the Administering Powers. True, they were in the form of a declaration, but that declaration was an integral part of the Charter to which all Members of the United Nations were committed. Those principles were, first, the paramount importance of the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the promotion of their well-being to the utmost; secondly, a guarantee of their political, economic, social and educational advancement, their just treatment and their protection against abuse; thirdly, the development of self-government and of free political institutions; and fourthly, the promotion of constructive measures of development, of research and of co-operation with the specialized agencies for the practical achievement of the social, economic and scientific purposes set forth in Article 73.

17. Those principles were comprehensive in scope. There was one other point: information was to be transmitted regularly by the Administering Powers in respect of all territories for which they were responsible, the only exception being territories to which Chapters XII and XIII, relating to Trusteeship, applied. There might be limitation of the information transmitted based on security and constitutional considerations, but even that was only limitation and not complete cessation of information.

18. Draft resolution VIII dealt with the exclusion of a Non-Self-Governing Territory originally listed as such by an Administering Power from the application of Article 73 and had proved to be a controversial one, especially the paragraph which claimed that it was within the responsibility of the General Assembly to express an opinion on the principles which had guided or might in future guide Administering Powers in regard to territories on which information should be transmitted. The number of Non-Self-Governing Territories had diminished in three years from seventy-four to sixty-two, on the ground that the other twelve had risen out of their non-self-governing status within the meaning of Article 73. That, so far as the General Assembly was concerned, was not a negligible matter. As the Indian delegation had observed in the Fourth Committee, the problem was not a simple one capable of an easy solution. The draft resolution invited the Special Committee, on the establishment of which there was a separate resolution, to examine the factors which should be taken into account in reaching such a decision. It was to be a mere examination of the factors and no more, and it therefore seemed to the Indian delegation that a study of that kind was both legitimate and well for the undertaking, in view of the far-reaching consequences of Administering Powers taking unilateral decisions. For that reason, the Indian delegation would support draft resolution VIII.

19. A number of the draft resolutions dealt with various aspects of education and of the development of training facilities in Non-Self-Governing Territories in the economic and social fields. There was the eradication of illiteracy and the promotion of indigenous languages; special emphasis had also been laid on the study of educational problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Indian delegation heartily agreed that it was of vital importance that the educational progress of the indigenous peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories should be stimulated by every possible means, and therefore supported all the resolutions. He would reiterate a note of caution which the Indian delegation had struck in the Fourth Committee: UNESCO should not be asked to undertake too ambitious a programme in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, which it might not be able effectively to carry out at once. Secondly, as indicated in draft resolution V on international collaboration in the economic, social and educational spheres, there were a number of problems in fields other than education—soil erosion, nutrition, migrant labour in Africa, juvenile delinquency, development of social services, housing in the tropics, training of public health personnel and others—which were equally important and urgent. The view had been taken in the Fourth Committee by some delegations that special emphasis on one major problem every year, with education as the first question, would give a more practical turn to the labours of the Special Committee. The Indian delegation concurred in that view, at least as an experiment worth attempting.

20. The Indian delegation could not accept the view which had been put forward that a detailed study and investigation by the specialized agencies of the various problems mentioned would in any way encroach upon the sovereign rights of the Administering Powers. The draft resolution did not contemplate, as had been said, an independent study and investigation of that type by the specialized agencies in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It sought to do nothing of the kind, and it was surprising that that criticism should be levelled against the resolution.

21. As already stated, paragraph d of Article 73 referred to two types of international collaboration for the practical achievement of the economic, social and scientific purposes set forth in the Article. The first was co-operation among the Administering Powers themselves, and the second was co-operation, in the words of the Charter, "when and where appropriate, with specialized international bodies". In other words, the initiative for seeking the assistance and co-operation of the specialized agencies rested at all stages with the Administering Powers themselves. What the General Assembly was trying to do was to make a number of suggestions as to how that second type of collaboration might become increasingly fruitful and positive. Certain problems were mentioned in the draft resolution, though they might not have the same significance or urgency in all Non-Self-Governing Territories. There was no interference there with the sovereign rights of the Administering Powers. The General Assembly, by virtue of its position as the supreme organ of the United Nations, had sought, every year, fresh means of making Article 73 a reality to the people of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Now for the first time the General Assembly had drawn attention to Article 55 on international economic and social co-operation, with its emphasis on universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction.

22. As the Indian delegation had pointed out both in the Special Committee and in the Fourth Committee, it had become a duty, in the face of the increasing evidence of the building up by the Administering Powers of machinery of their own for mutual co-operation outside the United Nations, to stress the need for that other type of international collaboration through the specialized agencies. The General Assembly had the right to say that the principles of Article 73 must govern all international collaboration in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

23. Finally, he referred to the establishment of the Special Committee. Some delegations, including the Indian delegation, had taken the view in the Special Committee that it should be made a permanent body, in fact, a subsidiary organ of the United Nations. In a spirit of compromise, however, they had yielded in the Fourth Committee and had agreed to accept the United States proposal for a three-year term, leaving it to the General Assembly of 1952 to decide whether the Special Committee should continue to exist, and also to decide upon its composition and terms of reference. The Indian delegation saw nothing in that proposal which could fairly be interpreted as an underhand attempt to amend the Charter. The main resolutions on the subject adopted by the General Assembly in previous years had, step by step, improved the technique of dealing with and utilizing the information transmitted by the Administering Powers. Secondly, a standard form had been evolved which was being steadily elaborated in the light of experience. A Special Committee had been appointed, which had demonstrated its practical usefulness during the past two years. For that reason, the Fourth Committee was proposing a number of draft resolutions of the utmost importance to the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. As the standard form was revised and the specialized agencies submitted their annual reports on the results achieved, or on the experiments attempted in different Non-Self-Governing territories, there would be an increase in the volume of work for the Special Committee. By 1952 the General Assembly would be in a position to decide whether to continue the Committee and, if so, under what conditions.

24. In that, the Indian delegation saw no overt or covert assault on the Charter. It was a source of satisfaction and encouragement to those who had been in the Fourth Committee that at least two Administering Powers, the United States and Denmark, did not seem to share the fears and misgivings and had adopted a positive attitude towards many of the resolutions.

25. He felt that greater vitality should be infused into the provisions of the Charter so that the General Assembly could better fulfil its tasks, and that there should be constant endeavour to liberalize the working of the Charter in order that millions of people outside the direct supervision of the United Nations might achieve full self-government in the shortest possible period and qualify for direct membership. Those were the legitimate functions of the General Assembly, which it could not afford to surrender.

26. To go back upon so much that had been accomplished in and through the General Assembly, as some of the Administering Powers seemed to suggest should be done, would have the most serious repercussions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. To their peoples, Chapter XI, interpreted as it had been by the General Assembly in the terms of the resolutions adopted at past sessions, was a symbol of hope for the future. The General Assembly must continue along those lines with the support of the Administering Powers if possible, if it was to enjoy the confidence of those "who are not directly represented here", to quote the words of the first resolution¹ on that vital subject which had been adopted at the first session of the General Assembly.

27. Mr. NORIEGA (Mexico) said the proceedings of the Fourth Committee during the fourth session had been marked by an accentuation of the divergence of views between certain Powers which administered Non-Self-Governing Territories and the majority of the Committee. The Administering Powers had defended the principle of sovereignty and had regarded any criticism or observation as undue intervention.

28. The majority of the Committee felt that the advancement of peoples that had not yet attained self-government should be a matter for international concern and responsibility.

29. It should, however, be acknowledged, that the Administering Powers concerned had never stated that they were opposed to that principle but had maintained that they alone were responsible for applying it. They stigmatized, as sentimental or ignorant, those who tried to point anything out to them in good faith, but it was they who erred by the emotional manner in which they affirmed their authority and by their ignorance of the motives of the majority.

30. For about one hundred years the international community had exercised authority in colonial territories, ever since the Ottoman Empire had begun to crumble, and the partition of Africa had been the subject of a series of international agreements culminating in the Congo Basin Treaty in 1912. It would be remembered, also, that under the Berlin Act in 1885 the colonial Powers had recognized that it was their sacred duty to observe certain humanitarian principles. Those principles had been reiterated in the Treaty of Saint-Germain-en-Laye in 1919.

31. He would not refer to contemporary history, as all knew that the Mandate System, like the Trusteeship System, was based on collective action and international responsibility.

32. But the issue was not Trusteeship, but matters relating to Chapter XI of the Charter. Less than twenty-four hours previously the Assembly had approved a document submitted by the United States and United Kingdom delegations entitled "Essentials of Peace"². Time was too short to allow him to refer to the four points of that document which might apply to colonial policy, nor could he speak of the relation between that policy and the United Nations; presumably representatives had studied the document in question.

33. The various statements made during the debate on that problem had shown clearly that a delicate situation had arisen in connexion with the Trusteeship System and the application of the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter.

34. The Mexican delegation had taken part in the discussions in the Fourth Committee in the best of good faith, and did not think that the resolutions adopted by that Committee violated the Charter, interfered in the domestic jurisdiction or detracted from the sovereignty of the Administering Powers.

35. Although there might be doubts as to the spirit of the Charter, the express terms of Chapter XI constituted a declaration pledging the Administering Powers to definite obligations vis-à-vis the United Nations. But in case there was any doubt as to the functions and powers of the General Assembly and especially of the Fourth Committee, he drew the attention of the General Assembly to the last part of Article 74 which concluded Chapter XI of the Charter.

36. He wondered what the role of the Fourth Committee would be in examining the information submitted if it were not to ensure that the policy of the colonial Powers was being applied in accordance with Article 74 of the Charter.

37. He hoped that the doubts or objections raised by certain Administering Powers regarding the work of the Fourth Committee would not interfere with the normal functioning of that Committee at the next session of the General Assembly.

38. Perhaps it would be best if such Powers applied to the International Court of Justice for a ruling on whether the Fourth Committee and the General Assembly were acting in conformity with the principles of the Charter. Otherwise there would continue to be fruitless discussions which would in no way help to improve the lot of those peoples concerning whom the United Nations was so interested.

39. Mr. FAHY (United States of America) recalled that in the Fourth Committee the United States delegation had voted for each of the draft resolutions before the General Assembly except draft resolution I, which it had voted against and draft resolution VIII, on which it had abstained. He wished to explain the latter abstention.

40. Draft resolution VIII involved certain factors which had led his delegation to believe that it would have been better if the Assembly had not been required to vote on it at the moment. He wondered who was to determine which were the Non-Self-Governing Territories referred to in Chapter XI, what were or should be the responsibilities, if any, of the Special Committee on the issue and what were the Non-Self-Governing Territories referred to in the Charter. There was also the fact that the Special Committee did not have authority to require political information. Because those elements were involved, the United States would have preferred to give the matter further consideration before adopting its ultimate position with respect to draft resolution VIII. His delegation would reserve its position by abstaining from voting on that draft resolution.

41. In all other respects his delegation would maintain the position which it had adopted in the Fourth Committee.

42. Mr. FLETCHER-COOKE (United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland) remarked that the representative of Egypt had said at the 262nd meeting of the General Assembly that a study of the records of the San Francisco Conference, and in particular of the Fourth Committee, Sub-Committee 2, had failed to disclose any evidence in support of the statement made by the United Kingdom representative in the Fourth Committee to the effect that the words in Article 73 e of the Charter "subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations may require" had in fact been inserted into that Article, with the agreement of the Committee on the instance of Lord Cranborne, who had represented the United Kingdom at the time.

43. It was quite true that there was no reference in the records to the reasons for the insertion of those words proposed by Lord Cranborne and accepted by the Fourth Committee. Nevertheless, the fact that they did not appear in the records, which were primarily confined to decisions, did not mean that the reasons had not been carefully explained, and the records of the United Kingdom Government stated quite definitely that the reasons had been given to the Committee and accepted by it.

44. The PRESIDENT put to the vote draft resolution I (A/1159).

The resolution was adopted by 33 votes to 9, with 11 abstentions.

45. The PRESIDENT put to the vote draft resolution II (A/1159).

The resolution was adopted by 44 votes to 1, with 7 abstentions.

46. The PRESIDENT put to the vote draft resolution III (A/1159).

The resolution was adopted by 34 votes to 4, with 13 abstentions.

47. The PRESIDENT put to the vote draft resolution IV (A/1159).

The resolution was adopted by 42 votes to 0, with 10 abstentions.

48. The PRESIDENT put to the vote draft resolution V (A/1159).

The resolution was adopted by 39 votes to 2, with 8 abstentions.

49. The PRESIDENT put to the vote draft resolution VI (A/1159).

The resolution was adopted by 44 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions.

50. The PRESIDENT put to the vote draft resolution VII (A/1159).

The resolution was adopted by 35 votes to 5, with 9 abstentions.

51. The PRESIDENT put to the vote draft resolution VIII (A/1159) adding that a roll-call vote had been requested.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

Mexico, having been drawn by lot by the President, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Thailand, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia.

Against: Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, Luxembourg.

Abstaining: Nicaragua, Peru, United States of America, Bolivia, Chile, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Greece, Honduras, Iceland.

The resolution was adopted by 30 votes to 12, with 10 abstentions.

52. The PRESIDENT put to the vote draft resolution IX (A/1159).

The resolution was adopted by 31 votes to 4, with 16 abstentions.

53. The PRESIDENT put to the vote draft resolution X (A/1159).

The resolution was adopted by 46 votes to 1, with 5 abstentions.

Item 35 of the agenda

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

Report of the Fourth Committee

Rapporteur: Dr. E. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic)

1. This item, comprising the report of the Secretary-General (Summaries and Analyses of Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter) and the report of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter (A/923), was referred to the Fourth Committee by the General Assembly at its 221st meeting on 22 September 1949.

2. After an introductory statement by the Rapporteur of the Special Committee, at the 109th meeting of the Fourth Committee, the general debate began and continued until the 117th meeting.

3. From its 117th to its 122nd meetings, the Committee discussed the six resolutions recommended by the Special Committee (A/923, Annex II).

4. Five additional draft resolutions and a number of amendments were submitted, and these were discussed by the Committee from its 123rd to its 127th meetings. These draft resolutions were of the following nature:

- I. A proposal by Egypt authorizing any Special Committee which the General Assembly might appoint to examine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding the territories to which Chapter XI of the Charter applies.
- II. A proposal by India in substitution for the text proposed by the Special Committee and providing for the establishment of a Special Committee to be elected by the General Assembly.
- III. A joint proposal by Cuba, Ecuador and Guatemala inviting the Secretary-General to complement the summaries and analyses by periodical publication of data on special aspects of the progress achieved in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

/IV. A joint

- IV. A joint proposal by Mexico and the United States of America that the Special Committee should concentrate on one functional field each year, and recommending that the problem of education should be chosen for 1950.
- V. A proposal by Australia requesting the Secretary-General to keep the Special Committee informed of the nature of the technical assistance accorded to Non-Self-Governing Territories by international instrumentalities.

DRAFT RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE TERRITORIES TO WHICH CHAPTER XI APPLIES

63. The representative of Egypt submitted the following draft resolution concerning the territories to which Chapter XI of the Charter applies:

"The General Assembly,

"Having regard to the obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter accepted by the Members which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government,

"Having regard to resolution 66 (I) adopted by the General Assembly on 14 December 1946 in which seventy-four territories were enumerated in accordance with the declarations of the responsible Governments, as falling within the scope of Article 73 e,

" "Having noted the information supplied by certain Members concerning the constitutional changes which have led to the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e in respect of certain territories which were enumerated in resolution 66 (I),

"Considers that the General Assembly has a responsibility to express its opinion on the principles which have guided or which may in future guide the Members concerned in enumerating the territories for which the obligation exists to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter;

"Invites any special committee which the General Assembly may appoint on information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to examine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government."

64. The representative of Egypt accepted a suggestion by the representative of Thailand to substitute in the fourth paragraph the phrase "it is within the responsibility of the General Assembly" for the phrase "the General Assembly has a responsibility".

65. The representative of Uruguay, in an effort to conciliate two points of view advanced during the debate, submitted an amendment to provide that the General Assembly would express its opinion on the meaning of the term "Non-Self-Governing Territory" and that the Special Committee would annually examine the list of territories for which information had been received under Article 73 e. The amendment, however, was rejected by the Committee.

66. The Committee then adopted the Egyptian draft resolution by a roll call vote of 30 to 10, with 7 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, China, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Guatemala, India, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, Netherlands,
New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom.

Abstentions: Argentina, Chile, Denmark, Dominican Republic,
Greece, United States of America, Uruguay.

77. The Fourth Committee therefore recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of the following resolutions:

/RESOLUTION I

RESOLUTION VIII

TERRITORIES TO WHICH CHAPTER XI OF THE CHARTER APPLIES

The General Assembly,

Having regard to the obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter accepted by the Members which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government,

Having regard to resolution 66 (I) adopted by the General Assembly on 14 December 1946 in which seventy-four territories were enumerated, in accordance with the declarations of the responsible Governments, as falling within the scope of Article 73 e,

Having noted the information supplied by certain Members concerning the constitutional changes which have led to the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e in respect of certain territories which were enumerated in resolution 66 (I),

1. Considers that it is within the responsibility of the General Assembly to express its opinion on the principles which have guided or which may in future guide the Members concerned in enumerating the territories for which the obligation exists to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter;

2. Invites any special committee which the General Assembly may appoint on information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to examine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government.

HUNDRED AND NINTH MEETING

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Thursday, 27 October 1949, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: Mr. H. LANNUNG (Denmark).

1. The CHAIRMAN opened the general discussion on the question of information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, and invited the Committee to examine simultaneously the summaries and analyses prepared by the Secretariat and the report of the Special Committee (A/923). The six draft resolutions contained at the end of the report were also open to discussion and amendment by members of the Committee; one amendment (A/C.4/L.2) had already been presented by the Cuban delegation. The six draft resolutions would be discussed and put to the vote separately.

2. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic), Rapporteur of the Special Committee, presented that Committee's report (A/923). The report had been circulated to delegations a month previously; it contained not only the Special Committee's recommendations but also a general outline of the Committee's discussions.

3. The Special Committee, which had met that year, was the third of its kind, each Committee having been set up by virtue of a General Assembly resolution. The last of those Committees had been set up by the General Assembly during its third session, in Paris (resolution 219 (III)). It had met at Lake Success from 25 August to 12

September 1949 and had held twenty meetings. The Committee's task had been greatly facilitated by a series of documents specially prepared for it by the Secretariat. It seemed that the Fourth Committee would like to draw the Trusteeship Council's attention to the desirability of having similar documents available on Trust Territories.

4. The Special Committee's report set forth the various views that had been expressed on the information supplied. It also stated that certain questions which had been raised in the course of discussion had been considered by the Committee itself to be outside its competence. The most important matter was to draw attention to the six draft resolutions approved by the Committee, which it was submitting to the General Assembly. The first draft resolution, on the voluntary transmission of information under part I of the Standard Form, contained a procedural recommendation. The following four resolutions might be described as substantive suggestions on general technical questions, with special emphasis on the activities of the specialized agencies and the part they could play, in collaboration with the Administering Powers, in the development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The last resolution concerned a procedural question but was of great importance in that it proposed the establishment of a special committee for a period of three years.

5. There seemed to be a general tendency to consider that members of the various United Nations bodies fell into two distinct groups where the question of Non-Self-Governing Territories or Trust Territories was concerned: there were, on the one hand, the Administering Powers and, on the other, the rest of the countries. That was not strictly true, as had been proved by the Trusteeship Council's more recent sessions and more particularly by the Special Committee's last session. Although members who were not Administering States were inclined to go further than the latter when it was a question of administrative responsibility, it would be seen that the four draft resolutions on substantive questions had been adopted by a very large majority, which showed that most of the members of the Special Committee were prepared to co-operate, in accordance with the Charter, for the good of the populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The draft resolutions which the Special Committee of the previous year had submitted to the General Assembly had been adopted without any changes of substance. The draft resolutions the current Special Committee was presenting had been drawn up in the same spirit of international co-operation as had been those of the previous year; they therefore deserved careful consideration.

6. The Special Committee had adopted its report by 13 votes to one, with 2 abstentions. The Committee's work had revealed a constant modification of views and represented an interesting phase in the work on Non-Self-Governing Territories.

7. Mr. FARRAG (Egypt) thanked the Secretariat for the excellent work it had accomplished and paid a tribute to Mr. Gerig for the manner in which he had presided over the Special Committee. He noted with satisfaction that the information furnished in 1948 was more instructive than that transmitted the preceding year. He hoped that the quality would improve even more in the year ahead. In that connexion he pointed out that some of the information had been received after the time limit; such delays were liable to place the Special Committee and the Secretariat in a difficult position and to prevent them from giving certain points as thorough an examination as they would wish to. Under the terms of Article 73 e of the Charter, the Administering States were required to furnish information in the economic, social and educational fields only. He was glad, therefore, to note that some of them had voluntarily submitted information of a political nature. He hoped that other Administering Powers might do likewise in the future.

8. The analysis of information on labour (A/920) revealed that the problem of African migrant labour had reached a point where it threatened to disorganize local customary life and to prejudice the perpetuation of the race. The situation concerning employment, as reflected in the information supplied, was characterized by an increased demand for man-power in many territories and by the meeting of that demand in wide areas of Africa by the migrant labour system which deeply affected the economy of the peasant areas (A/920). Migration had been substantial, for example, from territories administered by the United Kingdom, for employment in South African mines (A/920). He was sure that the situation was receiving the attention of the Administering Powers but he felt that drastic measures were necessary. The International Labour Organisation had studied the problem of migrant labour in 1947. He hoped the Secretariat was keeping in touch with that organization and would supply information on the results of the study.

9. He would vote in favour of the six draft resolutions in the report of the Special Committee. The text of those resolutions had been carefully studied and amended, particularly draft resolutions B and C, for which a drafting committee had been set up. The draft resolutions were the happy result of the spirit of co-operation and conciliation shown by the members of the Committee. He recalled that the preceding year some members of the Fourth Committee, moved only by a desire to further the development of the populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in a direct fashion, had blamed the Special Committee for having formulated only procedural recommendations. Nevertheless that was a logical method, for only after having adopted procedural measures could the Committee proceed to deal with substantive matters. Furthermore, it was to be noted that among the draft resolutions submitted by the Special Committee at the end of its last session were four which concerned substantive questions. The sole aim was to further improvement of conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and a sincere implementation of the Committee's recommendations would contribute to the attainment of the objectives stated in Chapter XI of the Charter. He hoped that the Fourth Committee would adopt the draft resolutions by a substantial majority, if not unanimously, and that those representatives who had opposed them in the Special Committee would be able to vote in their favour in the General Assembly.

10. The Special Committee had not considered itself competent to consider certain questions, in particular the question of the cessation of the transmission of information, which was the subject of reports by the Secretary-General (A/915, A/915/Add.1). Those reports set down the reasons given by the United Kingdom and France to justify the fact that they had ceased to transmit information concerning certain territories. The French Government stated that the determination of Non-Self-Governing Territories lay exclusively within the competence of the States responsible for the administration of those territories. That principle might perhaps have been valid before the implementation of the United Nations Charter, but the latter established that the relations between Non-Self-Governing Territories and the Powers administering them, while mainly the concern of the territories and States in question, were also of importance to the international community, as would be seen from Article 73 e of the Charter. The Administering Powers themselves had often stressed that principle in the early days of the Organization, when the Charter was new, but that did not seem to prevent their questioning the validity of the same principle at the present juncture. It could be asked what authority other than the United Nations could see to it that the Administering Powers complied with the terms of Chapter XI of the Charter. In 1946 the General Assembly had requested the Administering Members to draw up a list of Non-Self-Governing Territories on which they should furnish information. The list that had been drawn up included seventy-four territories. The Administering Powers could not therefore cease to transmit information on certain of those territories without violating the Charter, unless, of course, the territories in question had attained self-government.

11. The Administering Members had advanced certain arguments to justify their action. They had claimed that the declarations regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories had been of a unilateral nature. Surely that could not mean that the Administering Powers reserved the right to withdraw at will from the obligations they had assumed. The obligations set forth in Chapter XI could not be considered unilateral; even if they were, they would be enforceable under international law. They could not, however, be interpreted as being unilateral in the light of the debates and consultations, the compromises and various suggestions which had gone into the drafting of the provisions of Chapter XI during its preparation at the San Francisco Conference. The United Kingdom representative himself had stated at the time that that Chapter would constitute an international colonial convention which must be accepted on behalf of peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Administering Powers had further maintained that Chapter XI had been accepted as a moral obligation. There was not a single provision in the Chapter, however, which could be so interpreted; the argument had been advanced for the sole purpose of weakening the binding force of the provisions of the Chapter. The Administering Members had also stated that Chapter XI was of a temporary character, whereas at San Francisco the view had been that it should remain in force so long as there were any Non-Self-Governing Territories. Mr. Stassen, the representative of the United States, had stated at the time that the Chapter was destined to develop and would remain a living entity. The Administering Powers were alleging, furthermore, that the Special Committee and the General Assembly had in fact attempted to amend the provisions of the Charter. That was not true, for the Special Committee had merely carried out a resolution of the General Assembly the aim of which was to ensure the application of the Charter. They had also said that the information spoken of in Article 73 e should be transmitted only as information and could therefore be neither examined nor discussed. It was clear that the authors of the Charter had never contemplated such an interpretation of the provision. During the drafting of Chapter XI, the representative of Australia had stated that the provision represented progress and that it would encourage a healthy spirit of emulation among the Administering States. It would therefore be completely illogical and unfair to receive the information and not examine it. The only restriction in the utilization of the information was that it was not to be used for purposes of political propaganda.

12. Finally, the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter concerning the seventy-four Non-Self-Governing Territories should be continued until such time as the territories became self-governing.

13. It was obvious that the fact of incorporating a Non-Self-Governing Territory into the metropolitan territory did not release the United Nations Member responsible for the administration of that territory from the obligation, under Article 73 e, to transmit information concerning it.

14. The representative of the United Kingdom had stated that it was not possible for his Government to transmit information on Malta, since economic, social and educational conditions were the exclusive concern of the Government of the island. Mr. Farrag did not consider that an adequate reason for ceasing to transmit information. Moreover, General Assembly resolution 222 (III) requested the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories to inform the United Nations of "any change in the constitutional position and status of any such territory". The United Kingdom Government had not complied with that request.

15. Some delegations had maintained that Chapter XI of the Charter concerned only those Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories. There was no basis for such a contention; he was sure the Fourth Committee would confirm that Chapter XI concerned all Members of the United Nations. Indigenous peoples to the number of two hundred million placed their hopes in the Organization and he was convinced that it would not disappoint them. The General Assembly's duty was to ensure that the provisions of the Charter were applied impartially for the benefit of the weakest as well as of the strongest.

16. With regard to the comparisons between the information transmitted under Article 73 e and similar information communicated by independent countries, which the General Assembly, by resolution 218 (III) of 3 November 1948, had asked the Secretary-General to draw up, Mr. Farrag was doubtful about the advantages the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories would derive from such comparisons. Statistics from those territories, unlike data drawn up by independent countries, were usually incomplete and inaccurate. It was therefore impossible to make comparisons of any value.

17. To lessen that difficulty, the Egyptian delegation suggested that the General Assembly should send a visiting mission to both the Non-Self-Governing Territories and some independent States in the same region, in order to make comparisons. Naturally, the prior consent of the independent countries would be necessary, but they would surely be happy to consent to such a visit. An expenditure of several thousand dollars would be entailed, but the plan would appear to be well worth trying.

18. He would welcome other views on the proposal.

19. Mr. RAO (India) associated himself with the Egyptian representative's appreciation of the assistance given by the Secretariat to the Special Committee. Turning to the question of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter, he thought that the report of the Special Committee was very full and called for no detailed observations. He wished, however, to draw the Committee's attention to some specific points.

20. First, there was the question of the cessation of the transmission of information. The Egyptian representative had given a comprehensive account of what had so far transpired in that respect. By its resolution 222 (III), the General Assembly had requested the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories to inform the United Nations of any changes in the constitutional position or status of Non-Self-Governing Territories as a result of which information was no longer transmitted. The Indian delegation had taken the view that that question was outside the competence of the Special Committee, but should be considered by the Fourth Committee.

21. Once a territory had been entered on the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories, it retained that status until it met the necessary conditions for membership of the United Nations.

22. It should be noted that the number of territories on that list decreased from year to year and had come down from seventy-four to sixty-two. The question was of great importance, especially in view of the fact that Governments administering Non-Self-Governing Territories had stated that it was for them alone to determine to which territories Article 73 e applied. If those Governments continued to take unilateral decisions with respect to those territories, it was to be feared that the results would adversely affect the functions of the General Assembly in respect of Chapter XI of the Charter.

23. He suggested that, in order to enable the Fourth Committee to examine the question at its following session, the Secretariat might prepare a working paper for the Special Committee, on the constitutional status of territories on which certain States had ceased to transmit information.

24. He drew the Committee's attention to the discussion which had taken place in the Special Committee regarding whether the Netherlands Government was justified in transmitting information on Indonesia under Article 73 e. The Indian delegation was of the opinion that Indonesia had attained self-government status and that the information transmitted by the Netherlands should not have been included in the summaries and analyses prepared by the Secretary-General. He took the opportunity to express the concern of his delegation that the Round Table Conference at The Hague had thus far reached no conclusions.

25. The Indian representative turned to the question of information voluntarily transmitted, which was dealt with in chapter VII of the Special Committee's report. He noted with satisfaction the liberal attitude of the United States and Denmark in that connexion and also that in 1948 a greater number of Administering Members had on their own initiative transmitted information under the optional part of the Standard Form. That tendency should be encouraged.

26. The Indian delegation wished to draw the Committee's attention to a point which it considered important. The General Assembly had adopted, or had considered adopting, several international conventions. The Third Committee had considered the question of the obligations incumbent upon States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories in that respect. It would seem desirable for the General Assembly to issue a general directive to the States concerned to transmit information regarding the application of those international conventions in the territories under their administration.

27. With respect to international co-operation on economic, social and cultural matters in Non-Self-Governing Territories, Mr. Rao pointed out that Article 73 d of the Charter mentioned two forms of such co-operation: that among the Administering Powers outside the framework of the United Nations, and co-operation with the specialized agencies of the United Nations.

28. The Administering Powers had held conferences at which they had considered certain problems of common interest. They intended to continue such exchanges of views on a permanent and wider scale. That type of co-operation fully conformed with the terms of Article 73 d of the Charter. It seemed, however, that the principal purpose of that co-operation was to obtain benefits for the Administering Powers themselves and any benefit to the populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories was merely a secondary consideration. The introductory paragraph of Article 73, however, laid down the principle that the interests of those populations were paramount. Consequently, it was essential to encourage the other form of co-operation, namely, co-operation with the specialized agencies, in order to safeguard the interests of the indigenous inhabitants.

29. As it had indicated in the draft resolution presented to the Special Committee, which was contained in that Committee's report, the Indian delegation considered that it was most important for the specialized agencies to undertake investigation and research in order to assist the populations of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representatives of specialized agencies should also take a more active part in the work of the Special Committee.

30. With regard to the future of the Special Committee, he recalled that his delegation had pleaded for the establishment of a permanent committee because of the unfortunate consequences which dissolution of the Committee might have on the populations of Non-Self-Governing Territories and because in its view the discussions which had taken place in the Special Committee helped the Administering Members to improve living conditions in the territories for which they were responsible. The Indian delegation had noted with regret that those Members did not concur in that view. The draft resolution adopted by the Special Committee therefore proposed the establishment of a committee for three years.

31. The Indian delegation intended to present amendments to that draft resolution at a later date. It particularly wished that the members of the Special Committee should be elected by the General Assembly and not by the Fourth Committee.

32. Mr. MUGHIR (Syria) pointed out that the first question to be settled in considering the question of Non-Self-Governing Territories was whether the United Nations was competent to express an opinion on the development and disposal of those territories. A superficial interpretation of Chapter XI of the Charter might give the impression that the United Nations should limit its activities to receiving technical information on economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and that it could neither request nor study information on political conditions. Such an interpretation could not be accepted by the present-day international community. The Special Committee was not simply an information agency. The progress and welfare of humanity, respect for human rights, and the attainment of national sovereignty and independence by all peoples, had become questions which affected and interested the international community as a whole.

33. Under the terms of Chapter XI of the Charter, Powers which assumed responsibility for administering Non-Self-Governing Territories had solemnly recognized the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of those territories were supreme. They had agreed to observe a number of principles in order to promote political, economic and social progress, as well as educational development, in the territories they administered. The Charter provided that the Administering Powers should transmit to the Secretary-General technical information on economic, social and educational conditions in the territories for which they were responsible. That signified that if the United Nations considered that the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories was satisfactory, it would limit its activities to receiving the information contemplated; if, however, that information revealed that the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories was not what it should be, the United Nations must express its opinion and give the necessary advice.

34. The Syrian delegation was fully aware of the difficulties confronting the Powers administering Non-Self-Governing Territories. Study and criticism of prevailing conditions in those territories did not indicate doubt of the good faith of the Administering Powers. Although Syria had suffered from colonial policy and methods, it would maintain an objective attitude in submitting its comments.

35. The information transmitted to the Secretary-General was insufficient to permit a detailed analysis of the administration and development of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The case of Morocco was a perfect illustration of that point.

36. The information transmitted by France in connexion with Morocco (A/909/Add.1) provided no details about changes which had been made or were contemplated in the political life of that country. On the contrary, the little information supplied revealed that there had been no change in the administration of Morocco since the occupation of the country by French troops and the signing of the Treaty of Fez in 1912. Actually, the primary task of the Resident-General was to supervise the implementation of that treaty. As a result, no efforts had been made to introduce any parliamentary system whatsoever in Morocco. There was no elected legislative assembly. The advisory bodies actually bore no resemblance to a legislative organ; they represented only economic interests and not political interests. The judicial system in Morocco was neither liberal nor suited to current conditions; it could even be assumed that it made corruption and abuse of all kinds possible.

37. As regards individual liberty, the information transmitted indicated that "an arrest may not be made without a warrant duly issued by the competent authority". But what was the competent authority? Morocco had no penal code; reliable sources confirmed that it was possible to be arrested and imprisoned for months on end without trial.

38. Arabic newspapers had to be authorized by an order of the Vizir, while French newspapers were not subject to any control. That explained, no doubt, why there were so few Arabic newspapers, a fact which incidentally was not mentioned in the information transmitted to the Secretary-General.

39. The information indicated that "the establishment of an association is subject, as in France, to the principle of the deposit of its articles in advance". It was good to note that the French authorities applied the same laws in Morocco as in the metropolitan country; if the Moroccan people enjoyed the same freedoms and the same democratic institutions as the French, it was certain that Morocco would soon attain its independence. Before drawing such a conclusion, however, it would be desirable to know whether the law of 1901 concerning freedom of association was applied in the territories under French administration.

40. Mr. LAPIE (France) raised a point of order. He pointed out that the representative of Syria had entered into a political debate, and that was not within the competence of the Committee.

41. Mr. MUGHIR (Syria), continuing, said that in the field of education, it was stated in the report of the French Government that 20 per cent of Moroccan children attended schools. However, an official document entitled Conjoncture économique marocaine de 1947 showed that the number of children between the ages of 5 and 14 was 1,865,645, whereas according to the information transmitted in 1948, the number of children attending schools was 128,107. It was to be noted therefore that one-fourteenth, rather than one-fifth, of the children attended schools. The information transmitted was very incomplete on the question of higher education; in particular, there was no mention of the two Moslem universities. The latter did not seem to be in good standing with the Administering Power, and received no governmental subsidy.

42. The French authorities seemed to be very proud of spreading the use of French as the cultural language in order more quickly to give the Moroccan higher economic and social groups a knowledge of the contemporary world. The French language and French culture were loved and admired throughout the world. Nevertheless, the Arabs of the Middle East, who had occasion to enter into relations with the Moroccans, had felt the tragic consequences of that spread of the French language in Morocco. Moroccans now spoke a mixture of French and Arabic; they could no longer understand the Middle Eastern Arabs, or make themselves understood by them. In losing their own language, they had at the same time lost all links with their culture and their history.

43. The situation in Tunisia was not more bright nor more encouraging. The information transmitted on the subject of economic conditions, in particular, was very incomplete and sometimes difficult to interpret.

44. In both Morocco and Tunisia, the distribution of land seemed to have been carried out in complete disregard of equity, and with no justification whatsoever.

45. Information on labour and employment conditions in respect of both Morocco and Tunisia was inadequate. It conveyed the impression that there was no collective labour conflict, so to speak, in those two countries. It made no reference to the frequent conflicts in the mining industry, and particularly in the iron and phosphate industries. It did not explain how such strikes as those of the dockers, civil servants, and coal workers in Morocco in 1948 had been settled. Many strikers had been imprisoned and some had been struck down by the police.

46. The Syrian representative wished to point out that he had mentioned Morocco and Tunisia by way of examples. It should not be concluded that conditions were better in the other Non-Self-Governing Territories. He added that the sole purpose of his criticism was to help and guide the Administering Powers. The Syrian delegation had no desire to make political propaganda, and had no ulterior motive.

47. The Syrian delegation was fully aware of the fact that some Non-Self-Governing Territories had reached a highly satisfactory stage of development. In that connexion, the Government of the United States must be congratulated on its administration of the territories for which it was responsible.

48. The Syrian delegation wished to record its concern regarding the cessation of transmission of information. Some territories had not been included in the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories although they were not self-governing. That was so, for instance, in the case of Algeria. That Arab country, occupied by France since the middle of the nineteenth century, had no hope of obtaining its freedom and independence. Although 6,247,432 out of a total population of 7,235,684 inhabitants were Arabs, it was claimed that Algeria could not be classed in the category of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The reason, surprisingly enough, was that the country had been annexed to the French Republic.

49. The Syrian delegation opposed the idea that only the Powers concerned had the right to determine which countries were Non-Self-Governing Territories. It reserved the right to speak again on that point during the debate.

50. The CHAIRMAN drew the attention of members of the Committee to the fact that the agenda should be completed before the end of November.

51. Mr. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) asked a question concerning the use of Spanish. The document entitled "Non-Self-Governing Territories — Summaries and analyses of information transmitted to the Secretary-General during 1948" had been published in English and in French but not in Spanish. That was contrary to the provisions of General Assembly resolution 262 (III). In the same connexion, the Cuban delegation would like to know what course the Secretary-General intended to follow regarding the annual supplements mentioned in resolution 218 (III), paragraph 4 (b). Moreover, the Cuban delegation wished to point out that the American Committee on Dependent Territories, established by the Ninth International Conference of American States held at Bogotá, had requested the Secretary-General to forward to that body all documents concerning Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee had received documents in English and French, but not in Spanish.

52. Mr. BENSON (Secretariat) pointed out that the document mentioned by the representative of Cuba was a summary of information transmitted in 1948, that was to say, before the adoption of resolution 262 (III). The question of the publication of that document in Spanish was still being considered by the appropriate section of the Secretariat. Moreover, the question of the form in which the documents mentioned in resolution 218 (III) should be presented had not yet been settled. The Secretariat would greatly appreciate any suggestions on those matters. It was of course regrettable that the Secretariat had been unable to transmit documents in Spanish to the American Committee on Dependent Territories; the situation would be different in the future, owing to the adoption of resolution 262 (III).

The meeting rose at 5.30 p.m.

HUNDRED AND THIRTEENTH MEETING

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Wednesday, 2 November 1949, at 11 a.m.

Chairman: Mr. H. LANNUNG (Denmark).

1. The CHAIRMAN announced that the Committee would continue its discussion of information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

2. Mr. WINIEWICZ (Poland) emphasized that the information transmitted under Article 73 e should not be considered in the light of that Article alone but in relation to Chapter XI of the Charter as a whole. The purpose of that Chapter was to counteract the heritage of colonial imperialism which was based on the principle of inequality between the peoples of the dependent territories and the peoples of the colonial Powers. Although times had changed and the colonial area had decreased, the remnants of that tradition still survived.

3. Article 73, with which Chapter XI of the Charter opened, laid down that the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were paramount, not those of the imperialist nations. Under sub-paragraph a of that Article, Members of the United Nations which had assumed responsibilities for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories undertook to safeguard the culture of the peoples of those Territories. The tendency to supplant that culture by the culture of the colonial Powers, which was still in evidence, was a barrier to the educational, social and, hence, political development of the dependent peoples. Subparagraph b of Article 73 was intended to ensure the eventual attainment of self-government by the dependent peoples; while sub-paragraph c indicated that such action was in the interests of international peace and security, which might be endangered by the oppression of nations, particularly of those ready for self-government or for independent national existence. Sub-paragraph d of the same Article stressed the duty of the colonial Powers to promote constructive measures of development, not in their own selfish interests but in order to promote the general purposes outlined in the Article.

4. It was true that the Charter made no provision for direct enforcement action. The United Nations was, however, in a position to focus public opinion on situations contrary to the Charter, and Article 73 therefore marked an important step in affirming the responsibility of the colonial Powers to the United Nations as a whole.

5. The Polish delegation was well aware of the arguments to which the colonial Powers were resorting in the attempt to evade that responsibility. The New York Times had recently published an article stating that the colonial Powers contended that the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter had overstepped its powers under the United Nations Charter by criticizing, often adversely, their policies toward Native peoples and by recommending changes. Furthermore, the article continued, they stressed that any information they might supply on conditions in their possessions was freely available in published form to anyone wishing to peruse it.

6. The Polish delegation reserved the right to define its attitude towards the Special Committee at a later stage. It felt bound to point out, however, that under Article 73 e of the Charter the colonial Powers were clearly bound to transmit statistical and other information on the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the General Assembly was entitled to acquire the necessary knowledge to evaluate such information in order to ensure the well-being of the dependent peoples and their eventual attainment of self-government.

7. The latter task would have been easier if the summary and analysis of information had not been based on information relating to the specific and restricted subjects of education, labour, social welfare and so on and had included fuller information, in particular on the participation of the indigenous population in local organs of self-government. Before reaching any conclusion, it would be desirable for the Fourth Committee to consider the information submitted in a more general light and in relation to certain tendencies which appeared to differentiate some areas from others. The replies to questions on a variety of subjects provided evidence that sectional or racial interests were impeding the realization of the objectives laid down in Chapter XI of the Charter.

8. The Secretary-General's analysis of information on education (A/919), for example, revealed a considerable discrepancy between the educational facilities provided for European children in Kenya and those made available to African children. The United Kingdom representative in the Special Committee had referred to the considerable contribution made by the European community towards the education of its children. The exploited African population was not, however, in a position to make such a contribution and it was only just to demand that the exploiters should do more for the education of the exploited.

9. Similarly, the Secretary-General's summary of information from Tunisia (A/909/Add.1) indicated an undesirable discrimination in the educational facilities provided for the different races living in that territory. The small proportion of Moslem children attending primary and secondary schools by comparison with French and Jewish children was an obstacle to the development of an educated Moslem population and thus to the attainment of self-government. The situation in regard to education in Morocco was obscure but the facts given in the summary pointed to the existence of similar racial inequalities.

10. In referring to education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, Mr. Winiewicz felt the need to emphasize that their educational systems should be based on the indigenous culture whenever possible. The colonial Powers should always remember that the indigenous culture was in many cases older and richer than their own. The discrimination against indigenous culture was in many cases due to an attempt to prevent the development of cultural trends, which might provide a firm basis for national independence.

11. The Secretary-General's analysis on public health (A/921) showed that the colonial Powers were open to similar criticism in that sphere. In the Belgian Congo, for example, the highest rank of medical officer trained was described as medical assistant and there were few pupils in the two medical schools to which the analysis referred. In the United Kingdom territory of Basutoland, arrangements had been made for a small number of students to obtain medical training in the Union of South Africa, but, in view of the policy followed by that country, it was doubtful whether such arrangements could be expanded. In the opinion of the Polish delegation, training facilities in the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be adequate to meet all requirements for medical personnel.

12. The Secretary-General's analysis of information on labour (A/920) unfortunately gave little information regarding discrepancies in wages or the racial discrimination prevalent in Non-Self-Governing Territories in Africa, nor did it touch on the question of wage rates. Mr. Winiewicz quoted from summaries of information for individual territories to illustrate discrepancies in the wages paid to European workers and those paid to Africans. He pointed out that it was difficult to escape the conclusion that wages were being kept low and discriminatory practices retained in order to prevent the indigenous populations from becoming class-conscious and nationally minded.

13. Although the Secretary-General's analysis gave only passing glimpses of fundamental economic issues, it pointed out that production in many territories had remained stationary or had even declined during the war, a phenomenon not confined to territories directly affected by the war. The analysis of aspects of general economic development (A/AC/28/W.5) described a shortage of skilled labour as one of the factors retarding the industrialization of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Although that shortage could be eliminated by the expansion of education and the payment of higher wages to indigenous workers, such measures would be contrary to the colonial tradition and some areas were even faced with the problem of unemployment.

14. It was clear from table XIII on page 533 of the volume on information from Non-Self-Governing Territories¹ that the trade of those territories was almost exclusively with the metropolitan country. The recent expansion of trade between the dependencies of European Powers and the United States provided a striking exception to that general rule. According to the World Economic Report for 1948,² Africa (excluding Egypt and the Union of South Africa) had imported goods from the United States to the value of 49,700,000 dollars in 1937, a figure which had risen to 257,000,000 dollars in 1948. Exports to the United States in the same period had risen from 64,200,000 dollars to 242,200,000 dollars.

15. Opponents of the colonial system had sometimes been accused of inconsistency in that their criticism of the economic backwardness of the Non-Self-Governing Territories had been combined with an attack on such economic development as had already taken place. Their attitude was not, however, inconsistent, for any economic development which had taken place had been solely in the interests of the colonial powers.

16. The Polish delegation was not deceived by the attempt to present the problem of dependent peoples as if only backward bush-tribes were concerned. Many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were inhabited by peoples with a highly developed culture, who were worthy of immediate admission to the United Nations. Had it not been for the defeat of the Italian colonial empire, the territories of Libya, Italian Somaliland and Eritrea would still be classed as Non-Self-Governing Territories and subject to a colonial Power. There still were dependent territories in Latin America, which were clearly part of national entities enjoying full independence. The same was true of Asia. In the opinion of the Polish delegation, the problem should be studied in relation to each individual territory.

17. In the meantime, a change in the colonial spirit was urgently required, if only because Article 77 c of the Charter made provision for territories to be placed voluntarily under the Trusteeship System and therefore under the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter. The Trusteeship System should not, however, be regarded as the sole channel to self-government and independence, but it was essential to ensure that the disintegration of one colonial Power did not result in the subjugation of dependent peoples by another form of imperialism.

18. It was regrettable that the problem was not properly understood. Malta was a case in point. The United Kingdom had ceased to transmit any further information on that island, on the pretext that it had reached a stage of self-government. Yet, according to an article published in the New Republic on 10 October 1949, the Maltese had delivered an ultimatum to the Colonial Office in which they threatened to hold a referendum to authorize the island's Government to ask assistance from the United States. In exchange for such assistance, the Maltese would offer military bases and, if necessary, offer the whole island to that country as a kind of protectorate. That, said the Polish representative, was not the road to independence.

19. It was for such reasons that the words of Chapter XI of the Charter had become of even greater significance than they had been at San Francisco.

20. Some Member States of the United Nations had repeatedly advocated that international co-operation and assistance should be effected exclusively through the specialized agencies. The question, however, was by no means a technical one. It was fundamentally and inevitably political in character. The General Assembly might invite the specialized agencies to perform specific technical services, but it could not divest itself of the responsibility of ensuring that those services were provided in the interests of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and not in the interests of certain world groups. His delegation wished once again to associate itself with those forces which were defending the interests of dependent peoples.

21. The world was living in a period of revolutionary change. In Asia, the colonial yoke was becoming ever more loose despite the endeavours of the colonial Powers to overcome the currency crisis in their homelands by increasing exports of rubber and tin produced by the dependent peoples. Die-hards hoped to stop the historical process, by force if necessary. A case in point was the prevalent situation in Malaya, where 120,000 British troops were trying to suppress the fight for freedom. Similar situations existed in Indonesia and Viet Nam. Nothing, however, could prevent the ultimate success of the struggle.

22. Some die-hards hoped to keep the Non-Self-Governing Territories for military bases. Lord Tweedsmuir had said in the African Transcripts of May 1946 that, given time and patience, the United Kingdom could build up a first-class African army; that who paid did not matter, but the British War Office must control it. He had further stated that two-thirds of the British Empire lay in the African continent, which was of vital strategic significance.

23. An alleged danger of chaos was invoked as an excuse to keep those colonial bases, but what the die-hards really feared was the danger of losing their economic gains, their invested capital and their strategical advantages.

24. In contrast, the East African Indian National Congress had, in September 1946, passed a resolution stating that the Congress was of the opinion that it was vitally necessary to promote full understanding between African, Arab and Indian communities, and that practical steps should be taken to create an organization to work for their general advancement.

25. The report of the Special Committee (A/923) betrayed the untenable attitude maintained by some members of the Committee. Arguments had been heard to the effect that the function of the Special Committee was limited to procedural matters and that there was nothing in the Charter which demanded an accounting for the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

26. While he did not wish, for the time being, to go into the detailed proposals of the Special Committee, he felt he must stress one point in the light of the information transmitted by the Governments themselves. The current situation would hardly lead to an improvement of social or political conditions. Changes were necessary. It was the duty of the Fourth Committee and the General Assembly to state in emphatic terms that the rapid implementation of Chapter XI of the Charter was a vital element in world peace.

27. His delegation appealed for a sincere understanding that the work of the Fourth Committee concerned living people who had the right to enjoy freedom just as all the other nations had. Their independence should be the ultimate aim.

28. Mr. KHADRA (Saudi Arabia) said that the subject of the dependent territories greatly interested his delegation. In the first place, that interest was a matter of principle. His delegation and, he believed, many others, would like to see the day when all such territories would have attained sovereign independence.

29. The twentieth century had witnessed the spread of a most dynamic force in Asia and Africa that had been let loose in Europe in the two preceding centuries. That force was nationalism. Nothing could restrict or retard the development of national feeling among indigenous populations. Some, through material and scientific advancement, had been able to attain that national consciousness earlier than others, but the difference was only one of time.

30. Many representatives come from Asian or African countries which had until recently been covered by the scope and provisions of Chapter XI. Those countries, which had been fortunate enough to obtain their independence in the preceding few years, hoped that a similar future awaited the remaining dependent areas in Africa and Asia. National movements were, according to reports, developing rapidly and assuming tremendous importance in many African territories, such as the British Gold Coast and Nigeria.

31. In the second place, his delegation was interested because, more than ever before, the community of nations was closely watching the situation of dependent territories. The people of the world could no longer be divided into two categories of governed and governing; they should be considered as belonging to a single category in which all enjoyed equal and similar rights. The attainment of independence would undoubtedly remove the thorny cause of rivalry among imperial powers.

32. The United Nations Charter declared in Chapter XI, Article 73, the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of the territories were paramount, but there appeared to be some confusion as to what should or should not be believed. On the one hand, there were the lofty phrases of the Charter and, on the other, there were the record and deeds of the Administering Powers. There was, however, no cause for despair. The logical course to follow was to increase the efforts for the promotion of the objectives of the Charter.

33. A third reason for the interest of the Saudi Arabian delegation was the fact that at least twenty million out of the two hundred million people that came under the heading of Non-Self-Governing Territories were Arabs. Those Arabs naturally looked for help to those countries of their own faith which were more fortunate. It was the duty of the Arab countries to make their voice heard in the United Nations.

34. One of the reasons given by the imperial Powers for declining to withdraw their forces from those territories was that of strategy and security. If that was to be the criterion then the road to independence would be a long one.

35. Another consideration that weighed heavily with the colonial Powers was that of material interest. He wondered, however, whether the interests of the indigenous populations weighed as heavily in the mind of those Powers. Yet the Charter proclaimed in clear and lucid language that the interests of the indigenous populations were paramount; their welfare could therefore not be sacrificed on the altar of the material welfare of the Administering States.

36. The Fourth Committee was confronted with the problem of the continuation of information. It was certainly cause for regret that whereas in previous years information covering seventy-four territories had been submitted, during the current year the figure had been reduced to sixty-two. If the Administering Members were proud of their achievements, they should be eager to furnish facts and figures thereon, instead of hiding behind the heavy curtain of legal considerations. He considered that Article 73 e of the Charter and General Assembly resolution 9 (I) provided that the Administering Members should supply the Secretariat with such information as it required. Furthermore, General Assembly resolution 218 (III) of 3 November 1948 called even more imperatively for the supply of that information. A refusal to supply information, in his opinion, ran counter to the principle of freedom of information to which all of the Administering Powers were committed. Mr. Khadra failed to understand how their representatives could take one stand in the Third Committee and another in the Fourth Committee.

37. He did not share the view that the categories of territories to be included under the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter should be left to the discretion of the Administering Members. Such a course was arbitrary and lacked any justification. His delegation considered that nothing should impede the flow of information on any territory until that territory had attained the status of independence. He hoped that in future the relevant information would be more comprehensive, detailed and precise.

38. Furthermore, he saw no reason why information should be forwarded on the independent Republic of Indonesia. Its independence had been recognized by numerous Powers, including the Arab States, and therefore there was no justification for continuing the supply of information.

39. With regard to the Special Committee, his delegation would like to see that body operate on a permanent basis. Not only did the Special Committee expedite the work of the Fourth Committee but it collated and co-ordinated the information and submitted the necessary recommendations in the form of resolutions. It was therefore the hope of his delegation that, when the three-year period had expired, the General Assembly would re-establish the Special Committee on a permanent basis.

40. Mr. Khadra would like to make a few comments on the political, social, economic and agricultural conditions in the dependent territories. In the field of education, he regretted that there were still cases of discrimination against the indigenous population and against the culture of the indigenous inhabitants. Such discrimination was obviously contrary to the specific provisions of Article 73 e.

41. Political progress and transfer of authority to the local inhabitants were still extremely slow in many territories. He hoped the situation would be corrected in the future so that the population might be trained in the art of self-rule.

42. Another disturbing feature of the reports was the amount of property held by nationals of the Administering States. Most, if not all, of the investments in the dependent territories were held by foreign companies and trusts, a fact which barred the indigenous inhabitants from sharing in the resources of their own country. He considered that more attention should be paid to such conditions in order to avert the possibility of its reaching dangerous proportions.

43. His delegation desired to see an acceleration in the progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and to that end he welcomed the co-operation extended by the specialized agencies to the Administering Powers. Indeed, he hoped that in the future the specialized agencies would take a more and more active part in surveying the conditions of those areas and submitting their findings to the General Assembly.

44. Similarly, his delegation approved the international co-operation existing between the Administering Powers, provided that the objective of such co-operation was in the interest of the indigenous populations.

45. Although the six draft resolutions adopted by the Special Committee (A/923, annex II) left much to be desired, his delegation would nevertheless support each one of them. He realized the difficulty of achieving a majority vote and, therefore, in order to ensure their acceptance, he would be guided by the spirit of compromise; in that spirit, he would favour their adoption.

46. In conclusion, he declared that nothing would deflect his delegation from its intention of working for the ideals he had mentioned. His delegation would pursue those ideals until the Non-Self-Governing Territories were in a position to join the community of nations on an equal footing with all the other countries.

47. Mr. D'AQUINO (Brazil) said that his country was very proud to belong to the Special Committee, since that organ had the task of seeing that Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter was strictly applied. The Trusteeship System had, as was generally known, set up a régime for supervising the administration of Trust Territories. Chapter XI of the Charter did not affect the sovereign responsibilities of the Powers administering the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It could be said, however, that Chapter XI created a responsibility towards the international community in so far as official facts were supplied to the United Nations for information purposes and that such facts made it possible to discuss the problems to which they referred. He recalled that in 1946, speaking in a plenary meeting of the General Assembly, Mr. Creech Jones had mentioned the valuable contribution made by non-self-governing peoples towards the extermination of nazism and had said: "Accordingly, our task is to help these people achieve their prosperity and social progress, and to realize the fulfilment, as early as possible, of their own responsible self-government. That is the task to which the United Kingdom has applied itself, and that task will be assisted by the machinery and the purposes set out in Chapters XI, XII and XIII of the Charter. Our purpose is to set these peoples on the road which will lead them to the place where they can, as equal partners, play their full part in the larger life of mankind."¹ Two years later, at the African Conference, the same United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies, referring to former British colonial policy in Africa, had admitted that it was a policy fashioned according to the times, conceived in the conditions of laissez-faire, a policy which had very often proved itself neglectful of social duties and often forgetful of human rights; that the system contained anti-economic elements, predatory and exploiting in nature; and that it was speculative and costly to those who had intended to profit by it. On that same occasion, Mr. Creech Jones had said that the United Kingdom attitude had become less vociferous and exuberant than at the beginning of the century and that it was based on a clearer comprehension of the place and needs of peoples in the world and of the imperative importance of building up friendships and of recognizing the true rights of the peoples of other territories. The fundamental basis of the United Kingdom's economic policy had continued to prove sound, but that policy had become flexible and had adapted itself to the conditions of the new situation. Science and economics as well as politics had altered Africa in the course of the preceding fifty years, Mr. Creech Jones had said, and the United Kingdom's concept of politics had changed with it.

48. There was no doubt that in the twentieth century world there was no room for classic colonialism. The responsibilities which the colonial Powers had undertaken under Chapter XI of the Charter could not be separated from those incorporated in Chapters XII and XIII. In that connexion, he recalled that the draft resolution submitted by India in 1947, which invited the colonial Powers to extend the Trusteeship System to other Non-Self-Governing Territories,² had been adopted by the Fourth Committee by 25 votes to 23 with 3 abstentions, and had received 24 votes to 23, with 3 abstentions, in plenary session. The idea behind the Indian resolution was fundamentally the same as that which had inspired Sir Hubert Murray, in 1924, to say that the principles embodied in the mandate system should be extended to the colonies and territories.

49. By Article 73 of the Charter, the colonial Powers had undertaken to promote to the utmost the well-being of the indigenous inhabitants.

50. A study of the summaries prepared by the Secretariat on the basis of information transmitted by the colonial Powers showed that there had been an increase of production and exports during the preceding three years. The territories were better supplied with equipment, although the improvement had been limited by financial dif-facilities, the needs of reconstruction in Europe, the inadequacy of industrial production and the shortage of foreign currencies.

51. The principal exports from the Non-Self-Governing Territories were agricultural products such as groundnuts, palm oil, cocoa, coffee, sugar, rubber, tobacco, tea, sisal, wood, copra, bananas and various fruits. Most of those exports had shown a considerable increase in recent years. The production of minerals in the Non-Self-Governing Territories had also greatly increased, and in many cases formed the greater part of the exports. The economic development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories was taking place more and more rapidly. That development was particularly marked in the territories in Africa, a continent which had so far remained free from the communist agitation which threatened the political structure of a number of territories in Asia. Although industrialization in Africa was at an early stage, it already raised many serious problems in the social and public health fields. The movement of workers to the urban and mining centres, the depopulation of the villages, the long absences of the male inhabitants, venereal diseases and other characteristics of the great centres of population which were the outcome of industrial development, presented great difficulties for the Administering Powers. The shortage of coal, the limited production of electric power, the lack of skilled labour, the waste of unskilled labour, the insufficiency of transport, were all factors which hampered industrialization in Africa.

52. As the representative of an enormous country, two-thirds of which was situated in the tropics, he fully realized the almost insurmountable difficulties in the way of colonization in tropical zones. Brazil was still engaged in colonizing its hinterland. It observed with the greatest interest the efforts which the Administering Powers were making to develop the resources of the African continent.

53. During the general debate on the report of the Trusteeship Council, he had already stated that the United Nations could not agree that plans designed primarily to supply the industries of the metropolitan territory — such as, for example, the Groundnut Scheme in Tanganyika — were likely to contribute to the economic progress of the Trust Territories. The same remark applied to plans for the development of the mineral resources of the colonies. Exports of tin from the Malay States and of managanese from the Gold Coast to the United States were a considerable factor in earning dollars for the United Kingdom. The mineral production of the colonies amounted to one hundred million pounds out of a total of one thousand million — the total mineral production of the Commonwealth — to which the United Kingdom and Canada contributed seven hundred million pounds. In Northern Rhodesia the number of male Africans employed in the mining industry approached the maximum. Nearly two-thirds of the male inhabitants had left the rural areas, where workers were essential to produce the foodstuffs needed by the African population.

54. He thought that the new direction which had been given to agricultural development in Africa would have truly beneficial results for the indigenous populations whose nutritional level was extremely low. He quoted a study published in The Colonial Review, in which Dr.

H. C. Trowell had said, in examining the nutritional problems of the African worker, that Africans still went to work on empty stomachs and that nowhere in the world and at no time in human history had good work been done in that way. Mr. d'Aquino said that an extremely interesting debate on Africa had recently taken place in the House of Commons. The Secretary of State for the Colonies, referring to the African problem, had stated that the United Kingdom was faced with the dilemma of how to increase its economic production in such a way as to enable it to meet the need for a higher standard of living for the people, as well as the additional need for abolishing famine and for providing sufficient food for a growing population. He had expressed the view that the solution lay in attacking the problem from all sides: large-scale production whenever possible and, at the same time, encouragement to the small-scale producer so that he would not only be able to feed himself and maintain his health, but also be able to dispose of a surplus for feeding the population as a whole. In the course of his statement, the Secretary of State for the Colonies had called attention to the fact that, for every pound spent by the British budget for Development and Welfare, at least two other pounds came from the colonial Governments, in the form of new revenue and loans, over and above normal expenditure.

55. The documents submitted by the Secretariat did not give the figures for dollar investments in the colonies. It was well known that the exploitation of bauxite in British Guinea was controlled by American capital, and that there had been large-scale American investment in the exploitation of timber and manganese in West Africa and in other enterprises in Malaya and Southern Rhodesia. The colonial Governments were authorized by the Colonial Loans Act to borrow from the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and the Colonial Development Corporation had already obtained a loan of 10 million dollars. According to the analyses prepared by the Secretariat, the plan for the development of the French territories provided for purchases of machinery and equipment amounting to over 190 million dollars.

56. It should not be overlooked that under the Marshall Plan the United States had furnished the countries of Western Europe with aid amounting to more than 8,000 million dollars. Part of those sums had been used for the development of the colonies. That fact had caused the Brazilian delegation to call the attention of the Second Committee to the danger that certain colonial Powers might transform the plan for technical assistance into an annex to the Marshall Plan.¹

57. Mr. d'Aquino paid a tribute to the United Kingdom for the progress that had been made in setting up constitutions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, particularly in the Western Hemisphere and in Africa. During the debate on the administrative union between Togoland under British administration and the Gold Coast, the United Kingdom representative had announced that the constitutional reform contemplated in the colony would also apply to the Trust Territory. He had added that the Secretary of State for the Colonies had approved the report of the Committee of which Mr. Justice Coussey had been Chairman,¹ and which had been entrusted with the study of the matter. That Committee was composed exclusively of Africans, and the United Kingdom Government deserved congratulations for the happy outcome of that remarkable experiment.

58. In 1948 the French representative on the Fourth Committee had stated that progress had been made in the direction of self-government by the French Non-Self-Governing Territories, and that a supreme council of the French Union would shortly be set up.² In that connexion he pointed out that that council, which would be one of the chief organs of the French Union, had not yet been set up, and that the information transmitted with regard to Morocco and Tunisia, which were among the States which were to be represented on the Council, contained no data on that important question.

59. The United Kingdom had a difficult problem to solve in connexion with the constitutional problems of its dependent territories; Africa, in particular, presented an almost insoluble problem. For instance, the establishment of the Central African federation entailed a series of extremely grave consequences and the wise, firm and courageous attitude of the United Kingdom Government in London in defence of the interests of the indigenous populations had been recognized by a resolution publicly approved by the indigenous inhabitants of Mufulira.

60. The French Union represented in many respects an appreciable advance over the excessive centralization which had characterized the French colonial Empire. Mr. d'Aquino expressed confidence that it would be possible to carry out the plan of political, economic, social and educational development laid down for the ensuing ten years. Nevertheless, the plan, which also provided for an increase in agricultural production, should keep in view the interests of the peoples concerned.

61. He congratulated the Administering Powers for the admirable information which they had transmitted to the Secretary-General in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter.

62. He also paid a tribute to the labours of the officials of the various colonial services, both men and women, who in the face of great risks and inconveniences devoted themselves to the task of raising to the level of civilization peoples many of whom still lived in savagery.

63. He recalled that the Brazilian delegation had voted in favour of General Assembly resolution 222 (III). In that connexion he observed that, according to the London Times, the Government of the Union of South Africa was endeavouring to obtain the incorporation of the British territories of Basutoland and Swaziland and the Bechuanaland Protectorate.

64. In case the United Kingdom consented to that request, the General Assembly would have an opportunity to discuss the question on the basis of resolution 222 (III). The United Kingdom, however, according to The New York Times, while admitting that such incorporation would be logical from a geographic and economic point of view, had stipulated that the inhabitants of the territories, both white and black, should be consulted. Mr. d'Aquino wished to express support of the United Kingdom in its attitude.

65. He pointed out that only the United States and Denmark had furnished the Secretary-General with complete information under the optional part of the Standard Form. It was gratifying that in the current year a greater quantity of information had been submitted spontaneously. The Brazilian delegation considered that that was a tendency that should be encouraged and it had therefore voted in the Special Committee for a draft resolution to that effect submitted by the Indian delegation (A/923, annex II, draft resolution A). The international community should be in a position to follow the progress of the peoples concerned in the political field.

66. The Fourth Committee would be called upon to take a decision as to the future of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. In the opinion of the Brazilian delegation, since the obligations undertaken by the Administering Powers and the obligation for the Secretary-General to prepare summaries and analyses were permanent, there should be a permanent committee to consider those summaries and analyses; the members of that Committee should be appointed by the General Assembly for a three-year period. A draft resolution establishing the Committee on a permanent basis had unfortunately not received a majority of votes in the Special Committee, which had adopted a United States draft resolution (A/923, annex II, draft resolution F) renewing the Committee's term of office for three years. The Brazilian delegation considered that that Committee had been entrusted with a most important task which it had carried out successfully in spite of many difficulties. Great progress had been made since 1945. Little by little the machinery had been set up by which the United Nations could carry out its functions under Chapter XI, which could not be separated from Chapters XII and XIII.

67. The Brazilian delegation supported the various draft resolutions submitted by the Special Committee in its report to the General Assembly. It would vote for the United States resolution renewing the Committee's term of office for three years, unless the Fourth Committee decided that it would be possible to prolong it indefinitely, as proposed by China, Egypt, India and Venezuela, with the support of Brazil.

68. The CHAIRMAN announced that in the absence of any objections, the time-limit for the submission of draft resolutions would be fixed at 11 a.m. on Friday, 4 November.

There being no objections, it was so decided.

The meeting rose at 1.10 p.m.

HUNDRED AND FOURTEENTH MEETING

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Thursday, 3 November 1949, at 11 a.m.

Chairman: Mr. H. LANNUNG (Denmark).

1. Mr. LIU (China) said that the Chinese delegation associated itself with the tribute which had been paid to the Rapporteur of the Special Committee for his report and to the Secretariat for its contribution to the success of that Committee's work.
2. The matter of the status of Non-Self-Governing Territories and of the welfare of their peoples was of great concern to the Chinese delegation. The essence of Chinese political philosophy was that the weak should be sustained against the strong; that had been one of the principles of the party through whose effort the Republic of China had come into being. It was ironical that, despite the unselfish motives of its foreign policy, China had for a century or more been the victim of foreign exploitation, and was still faced with grave dangers to its political independence and territorial integrity.
3. After the vicissitudes through which China had passed, it naturally took a special interest in the well-being of peoples who had not yet attained self-government.
4. With regard to the cessation of information regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Chinese delegation did not share the views of certain Administering Powers that the metropolitan countries were solely competent to decide on the territories in respect of which information should or should not be transmitted to the United Nations. In its opinion, only when a territory had attained self-government could the administering State cease to transmit information in regard to it. Since his delegation believed in the international accountability which was the purport of Chapter XI of the Charter, it would in principle support the draft resolution submitted by the delegation of Egypt (A/C.4/L.37).
5. The Chinese delegation had voted in the Special Committee for the United States draft resolution on the extension of the Committee for a period of three years (A/923, annex II, draft resolution F) only because that draft resolution contained the phrase "without prejudice as to the future". It considered that the Special Committee should be placed on a permanent basis, and regretted that the joint draft resolution of which it had been one of the sponsors had not been adopted by that Committee. It emphatically disagreed with the view that the functions of the Committee should be only of a procedural nature. The mere fact that General Assembly resolution 219 (III) included in the Special Committee's terms of reference the making of substantive recommendations was a refutation of that contention.
6. The conversion of the Special Committee into a permanent body would not only give the administering States the continued benefit of its comments and criticisms, but would also be a source of encouragement to the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.
7. The Indian delegation had proposed a draft resolution (A/C.41/L.39) which went a little further than the United States proposal, and therefore more closely approximated the views of the Chinese delegation. He would therefore, in principle, vote for the Indian draft resolution, unless a majority of the Committee was in favour of the establishment of the Special Committee on a permanent basis, in which case he reserved the right to support a resolution embodying such a proposal.
8. Mr. GALAGAN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that the information transmitted on the Non-Self-Governing Territories under Article 73 e of the Charter was unsatisfactory for a number of reasons.
9. Since Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories had pledged themselves under Article 73 of the Charter to take account of the political aspirations of the peoples of those territories and to assist them in their advance towards self-government, details of political development might have been expected to figure prominently in the information submitted by the Administering Powers. Those Powers were, however, attempting to maintain that Article 73 e of the Charter did not require them to transmit such information, an interpretation which was incorrect and which represented an attempt to prevent the General Assembly from supervising the implementation of the obligations laid down in Article 73 of the Charter. The spirit of that Article undoubtedly imposed an obligation on the Administering Powers to transmit, together with other information, details of the progress made towards self-government in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The information thus received should be examined and studied by the General Assembly with a view to promoting the political advancement of those Territories.
10. The information transmitted on social, economic and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was unsatisfactory on account of its superficial and general character. The information given on the standard of living of the indigenous population was in many cases insufficient to enable the reader to form any impression of living conditions in the Territory concerned.
11. A number of Non-Self-Governing Territories occupied an important place in the strategic plans of the colonial Powers, both as sources of strategic raw materials and as naval and air bases. No reference to the use of Non-Self-Governing Territories for that purpose, which was contrary to Article 73 c of the Charter, was made in the information submitted. In subordinating the economies not only of their own colonies, but of those of other Powers to the interests of aggressive groups planning a new war, the United States and the United Kingdom were contravening the Charter and ignoring the interests of the dependent peoples.
12. It was impossible to concur in unilateral decisions to suspend the transmission of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories. The decision to discontinue the submission of information should only be taken by a special committee on the basis of information submitted by the Administering Powers on the organs of self-government in the Territory concerned and on the participation of the indigenous population in its own administration.

13. Such scanty information as had been submitted provided evidence that the Administering Powers were not complying with the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter and were continuing to follow the old colonial methods of administration.

14. Puerto Rico under United States administration had developed a sugar-cane monoculture, which was detrimental to the interests of the indigenous population. The territory could trade only with the United States and on extremely unfavourable terms. Unemployment and undernourishment were widespread, and the population, once renowned for its physique, had one of the highest mortality rates in the world. The people had no political rights and their representative in the United States Congress was entitled to speak, even on questions directly affecting Puerto Rico, only if the unanimous consent of the House was given. The legislative assembly was not in a position to enact legislation in the real interests of the country, since its bills were subject to the veto of the Governor and, in the final resort, to the veto of the President of the United States. An attempt was being made to destroy the national culture of the country by not permitting the use of Spanish, the national language, as the language of instruction in schools.

15. The position in the Territories administered by the United Kingdom was little better. A Labour member, Mr. Driberg, speaking in the House of Commons on 4 February 1949, had described Jamaica, to which guide books frequently referred as the tropical paradise, as a tropical slum.

16. In the majority of British territories, the year 1948 had been marked by a decrease in wages and an increase in unemployment, on the one hand, and by a sharp rise in the cost of living, on the other. In Borneo, for example, taking 1938 as 100, the cost of living in 1948 was 320. In a number of British territories there was discrimination against the indigenous population in the matter of wages. In Northern Rhodesia, for example, the African worker received 13 to 14 times less than the European worker for the same work. There was also discrimination against the indigenous population in the matter of education. In Kenya, for example, the sum of 171,000 pounds sterling was spent on the education of the relatively small European population and only 157,276 pounds sterling on the education of the African population.

17. Disease resulting from undernourishment was widespread and the mortality rate, particularly infant mortality, was very high. Doctors and hospitals were insufficient and expenditure on public health quite inadequate.

18. Such facts were evidence that the Administering Powers were following a policy which directly contravened Chapter XI of the Charter. In the opinion of the Ukrainian SSR, the General Assembly could not remain a passive spectator, but must draw the attention of the Administering Powers to the fact that the interests of the indigenous population of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were paramount and not their own selfish interests, which had nothing in common with the objectives of the United Nations.

19. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) said that his delegation had maintained throughout a clear and well-defined position in connexion with the colonial problem. Ever since the San Francisco Conference, Guatemala had shown concern for the fate of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and had enthusiastically supported any proposal designed to further the political, social, cultural and educational advancement of the peoples and to abolish colonialism, which it considered to be anachronistic. It was absurd that, in the middle of the twentieth century, there should still be two hundred million human beings in a state of political dependency.

20. In defence of colonialism it had been claimed that the system was the first step towards independence, a kind of school in which backward peoples could learn the art of self-government. Admittedly the colonial empires were far more humane and liberal than in the past, but to represent them as a school for self-government was to draw a false picture. It was a school the pupils of which would never be allowed to graduate; the colonial Powers would always feel that the dependent territories needed their paternal care. There was, however, one unmistakable sign of maturity — armed rebellion which the metropolitan Power was unable to repress.

21. Another reason why he could not accept the theory that colonialism prepared peoples for independence was to be found in the experience of the American continent. Spanish colonialism, though in many ways benevolent and paternal, had done nothing to train the peoples in self-government or to help them to attain independence. Spain had turned a deaf ear to warnings regarding the disintegration of its empire. America had become independent during the nineteenth century, not with the consent of Spain but through its own will to be free; and no one could say that the Republics of Latin America had proved unsuccessful. Those young and vigorous peoples gave to the world an example of solidarity, mutual co-operation and peace. The Pan American Union, originally founded in 1826, was a source of pride to all America.

22. The above references were not irrelevant to the discussions in the Fourth Committee, since they illustrated the fact that political independence was an essential element in the real progress of peoples. At the beginning of the nineteenth century other territories had been as backward as the Spanish colonies; those territories were still not considered by the metropolitan Powers to be ripe for self-government.

23. Economic immaturity was also said to be an obstacle. A colonial economy was, however, the greatest barrier to a people's aspirations towards independence. As long as a people did not break through that barrier, they would never know whether they were able to govern themselves.

24. When the Spanish colonies had freed themselves, no international body had existed to take an interest in their fate, and certain Powers had tried to take advantage of the situation by entering into treaties which placed a heavy burden on the new States. In the contemporary world, there was no reason why two hundred million people, assured of the sympathy and support of the greater part of the nations, should remain in a state of subjection.

25. Guatemala, which still suffered from some of the consequences of colonialism, was deeply concerned with the fate of peoples governed by others, and particularly those American peoples who were subject of distant empires. That concern was shared by all the American Republics. Resolution XXXIII of the Ninth International Conference of American States held at Bogotá in 1948 contained a solemn condemnation of colonialism, and expressed the hope that it would disappear from the American continent. That resolution had been adopted with not one vote against and only three abstentions, and those abstaining did not oppose the principle involved.

26. It had been said at the conference at Bogotá that colonialism was anachronistic and incompatible with the American principles and ideals of freedom, unity and solidarity, and prejudicial to the economy of the continent, and that America would not be entirely free so long as parts of its soil remained in subjection. Attention had been drawn to the fact that the existence of colonies constituted a threat to the security of the continent as had been illustrated by what had happened in Martinique during the Second World War. In 1940 the Convention on the Provisional Administration of European Colonies and Possessions in the Americas had been drawn up at Havana with a view to taking over control of any colonial territory which could be transformed into an enemy base. That Convention was still in force.

27. At Bogotá the American Republics had classified the Non-Self-Governing Territories of America in two categories: colonies and occupied territories. The first category included all the Non-Self-Governing Territories which were administered by a metropolitan Power the rights of which were recognized by international law; the second included territories which were in foreign hands for de facto reasons. Belize — known as British Honduras — and the Islas Malvinas — known as the Falkland Islands — had been classified as occupied territories. With respect to those territories — although the representative of the United Kingdom might say that it was an unfailling ritual in the Fourth Committee — Mr. Mendoza wished to recall that Belize was Guatemalan territory unlawfully occupied by the United Kingdom and that a controversy had existed between Guatemala and the United Kingdom on that subject for more than a hundred years.

28. He did not intend to go into detail concerning the historical and juridical antecedents of that long-standing dispute but he wished to reiterate the Guatemalan position in the matter, and to state that his Government had constantly attempted to reach a just and peaceful solution to the controversy. Hitherto it had not encountered quite the same attitude on the part of the Government in London.

29. The United Kingdom representative might answer that from 1946 onward his Government had shown its willingness to have the International Court of Justice decide the problem and that, if its attitude had not produced any results, that was due to the reluctance of the Guatemalan Government to submit its case to the Court; and he might add furthermore that that attitude was due to the small confidence it had in its own case.

30. The Guatemalan Government deeply appreciated the good intentions of the United Kingdom Government and quite realized the sacrifice it meant for a great Power to submit itself to an international judgment. Nevertheless, he would like to say that the United Kingdom's willingness to have the Court consider the matter extended only to a merely legalistic decision and to the interpretation of a treaty which, owing to the failure of the United Kingdom to comply with an important clause, the Guatemalan Government had been obliged to denounce and to declare void and wholly invalid.

31. Those were some of the reasons for which Guatemala could not accept the judgment of the Court on the conditions which the United Kingdom wished. But, in its turn, the Guatemalan Government had proposed that the Court should be empowered to judge ex aequo et bono taking into consideration all the aspects of the dispute and not the purely juridical aspect alone. The United Kingdom Government had rejected that proposal.

32. Nevertheless, his Government wished to make it clear it had very firm hopes that Guatemala and the United Kingdom would be able to find a formula for a free and just understanding on that important matter, the solution of which was of vital interest to his country.

33. With regard to the Falkland Islands, he would merely say that Guatemala fully supported the claims of Argentina to those islands. The resolution adopted at Bogotá had set up the American Committee on Dependent Territories, the duty of which was to compile information on American Non-Self-Governing Territories, to study the problem and to suggest pacific and practicable solutions. That Committee had worked for five months and had submitted an extensive report which was under consideration by the Governments of the American States.

34. The delegation of Guatemala would favour any proposal designed to improve existing conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and any measure which might contribute to raising their people from their state of subjection to that of free, self-governing citizens, masters of their own destiny.

35. Mr. SHAHBAN (Pakistan) pointed out that, because Article 73 e of the Charter limited the information to be submitted to the Secretary-General to certain specific categories, the United Nations was constantly faced with the question whether the Administering Powers had any obligation to submit information on political development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

36. While a number of States had readily responded to the request for the voluntary submission of such information contained in General Assembly resolution 144 (II), others had continued to argue that their obligation was limited to the terms of Article 73 e.

37. Article 73 read as a whole clearly indicated, however, that the metropolitan Powers had accepted as a sacred trust the obligation to promote the well-being of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and to that end to promote the development of self-government. The delegation of Pakistan therefore hoped that those Members of the United Nations who had hitherto been reluctant to go beyond the obligations imposed by their interpretation of Article 73 e would respond to the request contained in resolution 144 (II). Without their co-operation, the United Nations would lack the necessary knowledge on political progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and would not be in a position to evaluate progress in the economic, social and educational fields.

38. It had repeatedly been stressed that the information required under Article 73 e of the Charter was for information purposes only. The intention clearly was, however, that such information should be studied and examined so that the United Nations could give any help in its power to the metropolitan countries in promoting the advance of the Non-Self-Governing Territories towards independence.

39. The delegation of Pakistan had no wish to suggest that the United Nations should intervene in the internal administration of the Non-Self-Governing Territories or that the information submitted should be used for the purposes of party propaganda. It was, however, undeniably in the interests both of the two hundred million inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and of the Administering Powers that the United Nations should be enabled to assist them to the greatest possible degree. That could only be accomplished if the necessary information was placed at its disposal.

40. The report of the Special Committee (A/923) and the annual report of the Secretary-General¹ showed that in 1947 and 1948 certain Governments had ceased to transmit information on a number of territories on the grounds that the territories concerned were no longer in the Non-Self-Governing category by virtue of alleged constitutional changes.

41. While welcoming any development of self-government, General Assembly resolution 222 (III) of 3 November 1948 requested the Members concerned to communicate to the Secretary-General, within a maximum period of six months, such information as might be appropriate, including the constitution, legislative act or executive order providing for the government of the territory and the constitutional relationship of the territory to the Government of the metropolitan country.

42. It was a matter for regret that that resolution had been treated as a dead letter and that unilateral action had been taken to discontinue the transmission of information in regard to a number of Territories.

43. The United Kingdom representative had asserted that it was for the metropolitan Powers alone to decide on the Territories in respect of which information should be transmitted, and that the question of the constitutional relationship between the metropolitan Power and the Territories under its jurisdiction was a matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Power concerned.

44. The United Kingdom representative had on a previous occasion gone so far as to state that neither the General Assembly nor the International Court of Justice had any voice in the matter. Such an attitude, however, was unlikely to be productive of results. While no one could challenge the exclusive right of the metropolitan countries to administer Non-Self-Governing Territories, the refusal to submit information on the attainment of self-government could only breed suspicion and give rise to unnecessary debate.

45. With regard to the summaries and analyses of information prepared by the Secretary-General², the delegation of Pakistan wished to associate itself with the Indian delegation in advocating the inclusion in future reports of information on the enforcement of labour legislation. It also considered that steps should be taken to increase food production by the use of modern methods and by combating pests. His delegation also wished to associate itself with the representatives of China, Egypt, Venezuela and the Dominican Republic in their suggestions for the improvement of public health and education. He was in general agreement with the draft resolutions proposed by the Special Committee in its report, but reserved the right to express his final comments, if any, when those resolutions came up for detailed consideration.

46. In conclusion, Mr. Shahban expressed the hope that budgetary and political difficulties would not, as in the past, prevent the Special Committee from becoming permanent as an instrument for the implementation of Chapter XI, which was permanent also. It was impossible for members of the Fourth Committee to sift the mass of information received and make suitable recommendations. As the representative of Venezuela had pointed out, the establishment of a Special Committee on a permanent basis was no more a violation of the Charter than the establishment of the Interim Committee. The delegation of Pakistan would, therefore, wholeheartedly support any draft resolution to make the Special Committee permanent, in preference to resolutions which merely extended its life.

47. Mr. MARTIN (United Kingdom) announced that his Government reserved its rights concerning the points raised by the representative of Guatemala on the question of British Honduras and the Falkland Islands.

48. Mr. CARPIO (Philippines) declared that he would like to clarify a few points that had arisen during the discussion.

49. He had read with interest the report of the Special Committee and had listened to the various arguments. There were three different schools of thought on the question of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The first group tended to veer towards radicalism. Bitter criticism had been voiced in the Fourth Committee, the General Assembly and, he believed, in the Special Committee. He personally was opposed to that school of thought which he considered harmful to the aims of the United Nations.

50. The second group, diametrically opposed, tended to be reactionary and had made it a habit to quote the Charter in a manner calculated to further their own interests. According to them the Charter had been drawn up to assist in the perpetuation of colonialism.

51. His delegation preferred to align itself with the third group, which took an objective view of the problem of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In order to have an objective view, it was first advisable to have a clear conception of what were the obligations of the Administering Members under the Charter. The next step was to establish what were the powers of the General Assembly. Lastly, the Committee and the General Assembly should study the means of implementing those powers.

52. Chapter XI of the Charter contained only two short Articles: Articles 73 and 74. The crux of the matter was the interpretation of Article 73. On various occasions the Committee had heard arguments that, under the terms of Article 73, the administering States had no other obligations than those set forth in sub-paragraph e.

53. Mr. Carpio wondered whether that was a realistic or even a correct interpretation. If the only obligations were to supply information on Non-Self-Governing Territories, Chapter XI was worthless. Such an interpretation could never have entered the minds of the great men who had drafted the Charter in San Francisco.

54. A thorough reading of Article 73 would show that there were several obligations in sub-paragraphs a, b and c, as well as in sub-paragraph d.

55. Sub-paragraph e merited separate mention. His delegation considered that the contention that that sub-paragraph laid down the only obligation was wrong. Sub-paragraph e merely referred to the obligation of the Administering Members to supply information on the Territories under their care. The opinion of the majority was therefore that the Article in question implied a number of definite obligations.

56. The problem of establishing the powers of the General Assembly to implement the provisions of Chapter XI still remained. Article 10 of the Charter provided that the General Assembly was competent to discuss any questions or any matters within the scope of the Charter, as provided in Article 12. It was therefore clear that Article 73 was included in that provision. In that respect he considered that Guatemala was justified in discussing the questions of British Honduras and the Falkland Islands. The current debate affected Non-Self-Governing Territories and the two areas mentioned by the Guatemalan representative were certainly covered by that term.

57. Most of the difficulties confronting the Committee and the General Assembly were the result of the absence of any machinery to implement the provisions of Chapter XI.

58. The Administering Powers were internationally accountable, which did not imply that, under the terms of Chapter XI, dependent territories had been placed under the direct control of the United Nations. The concepts of Chapters XI, XII and XIII were, however, so new that they had been dubbed the "International Charter of Colonial Administration".

59. A Special Committee had been established by the General Assembly; that was a step forward. It might be the first part of the necessary machinery for implementing Article 73.

60. The authors of the Charter in San Francisco had been moved by a noble spirit and high ideals, and had desired to convince the world that their primary aims were to bring lasting peace and abolish injustices. Those had been their aims when they had drafted Chapters XI, XII and XIII of the Charter. It was the first time in history that the concept of trusteeship had been recognized.

61. The Administering Authorities had not so far been willing to make the spirit of Article 73 a reality. The problem was, however, a pressing one; there were at the moment over 200 million people living in Non-Self-Governing Territories and of that total only 15 or 16 million came within the purview of the Trusteeship Council. It was for that reason that his delegation attached even more importance to Chapter XI.

62. He was not entirely satisfied with the draft resolutions submitted by the Special Committee; nevertheless, since they constituted a step forward, his delegation would support them while reserving the right to introduce any amendment it considered opportune.

63. Mr. TEDÍN URIBURU (Argentina) thanked the representative of Guatemala for his clear statement on the question of Non-Self-Governing Territories in Latin America, which coincided with the policy of the Argentine Government as outlined in the statement made by the representative of Argentina at the Conference of the American Committee on Dependent Territories held at Havana.

The meeting rose at 1 p.m.

HUNDRED AND FIFTEENTH MEETING

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Thursday, 3 November 1949, at 3.15 p.m.

Chairman: Mr. H. LANNUNG (Denmark).

Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (continued)

1. The CHAIRMAN invited the Committee to continue the general debate on information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.
2. Mr. ZARUBIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that, during the work of the Special Committee, several of its members had drawn attention to the fact that some Governments were not fulfilling the obligations they had assumed under Chapter XI of the Charter in regard to the transmission of information on the Non-Self-Governing Territories they administered. Some Governments, including those of France and the United Kingdom, had decided to discontinue transmitting information for a certain number of territories.

3. The USSR representative had told the Special Committee that such a decision was arbitrary and illegal. He had submitted a proposal to the effect that the transmission of information should be continued until the Special Committee had considered all the data concerning the change of status of the territories in question and until it had submitted a recommendation to the General Assembly that the application of the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter should be suspended for those territories. It was regrettable that the Special Committee had not adopted that proposal.

4. The USSR delegation was of the opinion that the Fourth Committee should consider the question of the cessation of transmission of information and adopt energetic measures to enforce respect for the provisions of the Charter.

5. Mr. Zarubin called the Committee's attention to the fact that the information transmitted by the administering States was clearly inadequate and did not give a true idea of the situation prevailing in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Moreover, that information tended to sow confusion in that it mentioned no specific cases and gave no statistical data. The Administering Powers had transmitted no information on the development of organs of local government, nor had they indicated how the ability of the indigenous populations to govern themselves was being developed. It might be concluded from the information transmitted that the administering Members were not fulfilling their obligations and were not contributing to the political, economic and social advancement of the populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

6. In regard to social conditions, part II, section B, paragraph 5 of the Standard Form required the administering Members to transmit a brief statement of the principal laws and regulations in force for the protection of workers, together with a brief description of measures and institutions for the administration and enforcement of such laws and regulations. The information transmitted did in fact enumerate various laws and regulations, but gave no indication as to what they actually meant. Thus, the legal situation of indigenous workers and that of European workers was never compared, nor were any statistical data on unemployment given.

7. There was a similar lack of details in the information on economic conditions. Information on many points was missing, particularly in regard to the industrial companies which had made investments, the profits those companies were making by shamelessly exploiting the indigenous population, and the latter's participation in the economic life of the territory.

8. The Administering Powers were maintaining their policy of exploitation, without regard to the interests of the populations they administered. Large sections of the African population under British, French and Belgian administration were still living under an out-dated tribal system, which was being preserved in order that the population should make no progress and vegetate in poverty.

9. Those Powers were retarding evolution in the agricultural sphere. The best land was exploited by companies which used it for only the most profitable crops, regardless of the interests of the indigenous population. In Barbados, large sugar-cane plantations covered an area of 77,063 acres, while the indigenous inhabitants had only 17,283 acres. The same situation existed in many Non-Self-Governing Territories. That agricultural policy of the Administering Powers resulted in impoverishing the soil, caused a shortage of foodstuffs and worsened the living conditions of the indigenous inhabitants who were doomed to poverty and hunger.

10. The summary of information transmitted by the Government of Belgium (A/910) gave edifying details on the wage levels of workers in the Belgian Congo. In Leopoldville, an indigenous bricklayer earned 12 to 65 francs per day and a carpenter 23 to 66 francs. As wage levels were lower in the other regions of the Congo, it could be presumed that the average wages of an unskilled indigenous worker did not exceed 12 francs per day. If those wages were compared with the wages of a European worker, it was seen that the European received thirty-two times more than the indigenous worker. Moreover, the European had free housing and transport; he also received free medical care. The same racial discrimination in the matter of wages existed in other Non-Self-Governing Territories. For instance, the inadequacy of wages had been the cause of eighty-seven labour disputes in Kenya. Moreover, unemployment was rife and the indigenous workers benefited from no social security measures.

11. The public health services were also inadequate. For instance, in Madagascar there were only 356 doctors for some 2,146,000 cases of illness, including 314,000 cases of syphilis. The death rate was three times higher in the Non-Self-Governing Territories than in the administering countries. The number of doctors was ridiculously low in relation to the population and the high mortality. The incompleteness of the demographic statistics proved that the administering States paid no attention to the social welfare or public health of the indigenous populations. They were not, therefore, carrying out the obligations they had assumed under Article 73 e of the Charter.

12. In regard to education, the situation was hardly more encouraging. The analysis of the information transmitted showed that large sections of the population were illiterate. For example, in Somaliland, one per cent of the population could read and write, in Uganda 30 per cent, and in the Gold Coast 20 per cent. In Sierra Leone the rate had diminished: in 1946, 30 per cent of the population could read and write, while in 1948 the proportion was only 28 per cent. The USSR representative thought that the criteria used by the Administering Powers in that matter should be checked. They considered that a person could read and write after two years of schooling, but the USSR representative thought that that period was not sufficient. The information transmitted showed that flagrant racial discrimination was practised by the Administering States in the educational system. Much more money was spent on the education of European children than on that of indigenous children. For instance, in Kenya, 0.04 pounds sterling was spent on an indigenous child, while the education of a European child cost 5.80 pounds sterling, 145 times more. In Northern Rhodesia it was 24 times more, and in Nyasaland 80 times more. Those figures, together with the table in document A/919, showed that the credits allocated by the Administering Powers for indigenous education were so small that an educational system could hardly be said to exist. The USSR representative thought that the percentages given should be carefully checked, as they did not seem always to correspond to the facts.

13. In regard to secondary education, the information transmitted showed that the Administering States were making no provision to ensure its development and were thus condemning the population to ignorance in order to deprive it of the possibility of taking an active part in the political, economic and social life of the territory. In Madagascar, for instance, out of a population of 4 million inhabitants, only 2,065 pupils attended secondary schools; in Nigeria, out of a population of 21 million inhabitants, only 8,750 pupils were registered in secondary schools.

14. The USSR representative emphasized that, even on the basis of the inadequate information at the disposal of the Fourth Committee, it could be affirmed that the Administering Powers were practising a policy of discrimination against the indigenous populations, and were not fulfilling their obligations under Article 73 b of the Charter, which required them to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, and to assist in progressive development of their free political institutions. Finally, they were transmitting no information on the extent to which the indigenous populations participated in organs of local government. It was clear from the other information transmitted on economic, social and educational conditions that the Administering Powers were not preparing the indigenous populations for self-government, but were keeping them in a state of savagery and ignorance that would condemn them to a miserable existence.

15. The USSR delegation thought that the Fourth Committee should take energetic steps to enforce respect for the provisions of the Charter by the Administering Powers.

16. In conclusion, Mr. Zarubin said that the USSR would support any proposal to set up a permanent special committee which would contribute to ensuring the application of the provisions of the Charter and, in particular, the provisions of Article 73.

17. Mr. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that his delegation, like the delegations of other Latin-American States that had taken part in the conference held in Havana by the American Committee on Dependent Territories, took a keen interest in the question of information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. At that conference, in which 13 Latin-American States had taken part, the colonial problem had been considered mainly on the basis of the data provided by the Secretary-General of the United Nations, including the summaries and analyses of information transmitted during the year 1948.¹

18. As Mr. Pérez Cisneros had already mentioned, the members of the conference had deplored the fact that there had been no Spanish translation of that document. That was why the delegations of Cuba, Ecuador and Guatemala had stated, in the fourth paragraph of the draft resolution they had submitted (A/C.4/L.40), that the General Assembly should see to it that the summaries and analyses were in future published in the three working languages.

19. Moreover, the delegations of Cuba, Ecuador and Guatemala had noticed that the greater part of the information transmitted omitted essential data which should be taken into account in consideration of the situation prevailing in any given territory. He was referring to information of a geographical and historical nature. It should be recognized that the Standard Form adopted in 1947 had classified such information in the optional category; it was none the less true that it was indispensable, and it should not therefore be optional.

20. The three delegations had raised another question. Mr. Pérez Cisneros thought it unnecessary to remind the members of the Committee that the articles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights applied to all States as well as to Non-Self-Governing Territories, and that many articles dealt with human rights in the economic, social and educational fields, which were precisely the three fields referred to in Article 73 e of the Charter. In the circumstances, it was difficult to see why the information on human rights was also optional. The summaries of material voluntarily transmitted under the optional category of the Standard Form (A/AC.28/W.8) showed, however, that information on human rights had been communicated for only a very small number of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

21. It was in order that general information on geography, history, people and human rights should no longer be classified in the optional category of the Standard Form that the Cuban delegation had submitted an amendment (A/C.4/L.2, paragraph 1) to the draft resolution on the voluntary transmission of information under part I of the Standard Form (A/923, annex II, draft resolution A). In that amendment, the Cuban delegation also expressed the hope that such of the Members as had not done so on their own initiative would voluntarily include in the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter details on the government of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Cuban delegation admitted that the information provided in 1948 was fuller than that of 1947, but thought that in certain respects, including the question of public health in the American Non-Self-Governing Territories, the documentation was too vague. That lack of detail had prevented the American Committee on Dependent Territories from gaining a true idea of the situation. Moreover, the Cuban delegation had been surprised to note that the inhabitants of the Caribbean Islands of French descent received elementary education only in English. Mr. Pérez Cisneros would refer to that question in detail when the draft resolution on the language of instruction (A/923, annex II, draft resolution C) was considered.

22. He then turned to the question of the cessation of the transmission of information. The Cuban delegation wholly shared the Egyptian delegation's opinion; it was difficult to admit the view that the decision as to which territories were not yet completely self-governing was exclusively within the competence of the States that were responsible or assumed responsibility for administering them. The Special Committee had decided by a large majority that it was not competent to take a decision on the matter. It was for the Fourth Committee to take the initiative and submit a draft resolution to the General Assembly. The Egyptian delegation had submitted a draft resolution (A/C.4/L.37) to the Committee which dealt with the question most satisfactorily. The Cuban delegation thought that certain drafting amendments might be made to it, but entirely approved its substance.

23. Mr. Pérez Cisneros then explained why his delegation had submitted an amendment (A/C.4/L.2, paragraph 2) to the draft resolution on equal treatment in matters relating to education (A/923, annex II, draft resolution B). The Powers which administered the Non-Self-Governing Territories had given more or less satisfactory explanations as to their educational policies in the Territories. They should also give more detailed and precise arguments to justify the discrimination practised in that field. It was in order to obtain such precise explanations that the Cuban delegation suggested the addition of a second paragraph, to complete the draft resolution.

24. The draft resolution on the eradication of illiteracy (A/923, annex II, draft resolution D) was also the subject of a Cuban amendment (A/C.4/L.2, paragraph 3). That amendment referred to paragraph 1 of the operative part. It consisted mainly of substituting the word "annually" for the words "in 1950". In fact, although it was essential that the general plans drawn up by the administering Members should be communicated to the General Assembly with the least possible delay, the same was not true of the information which UNESCO was asked to communicate to the administering Members or of the report that UNESCO was to make to the General Assembly on the results of the campaign against illiteracy. UNESCO's action in that field should be continuing, and it was not logical that the terms of the draft resolution should restrict it to the immediate future.

25. The draft resolution on international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/923, annex II, draft resolution E) was the subject of a similar amendment by the Cuban delegation (A/C.4/L.2, paragraph 4). As in the preceding case, it was inadvisable to specify that the specialized agencies should communicate information to the General Assembly in 1950. It seemed better to provide that such information should be communicated annually. Mr. Pérez Cisneros wondered whether the Special Committee had had any particular reason for proposing that information should be communicated only in 1950. If the Fourth Committee was not given some valid justification for such a proposal, the Cuban delegation would maintain its amendment.

26. The Cuban delegation had no amendment to propose to the draft resolution on the establishment of a special committee on information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter (A/923, annex II, draft resolution F). It approved that draft resolution, and would support it. It would, however, have preferred to see the idea of the Special Committee being a permanent organ prevail. The Cuban delegation had been in favour of that idea ever since the United Nations had been set up; it was that delegation which, in 1946, had taken the initiative in the establishment of a body on information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. It was to be hoped that, when the Special Committee's mandate expired in 1952, all delegations would be in agreement to renew it indefinitely.

27. The Cuban delegation was sorry to note that only a few Administering Powers had transmitted information on political conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It would like to pay a tribute to the Powers which transmitted such information voluntarily.

28. The Cuban delegation was one of those which were of the opinion that the colonial system had been dying out since the end of the First World War. That phenomenon was in accordance with the aspirations of the peoples of the world. The American Committee on Dependent Territories had declared itself in favour of doing away with all colonial systems; the community of nations no longer allowed of the existence of metropolitan Powers and colonies absolutely dependent upon them in all respects. It seemed that that idea had been accepted by the Powers administering Non-Self-Governing Territories when they had voted for Chapter XI of the Charter. Those Powers would display generosity and a spirit of co-operation if they agreed voluntarily to transmit information of a political nature.

29. Mr. Pérez Cisneros drew attention to the last paragraph of the draft resolution submitted jointly by the delegations of Cuba, Ecuador and Guatemala (A/C.4/L.40). That paragraph invited the Secretary-General to complete the summaries and analyses, as well as the annual supplements, by the periodical publication of data on special aspects of the progress achieved in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

30. The information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter, whether compulsory or voluntary, was so voluminous and covered such a great field that it would seem to be advisable to issue data on certain subjects in special publications. Such a procedure would enable the Fourth Committee to accomplish its task more rapidly and effectively, for under present conditions it was difficult for it to study and analyse all the information transmitted.

31. Mr. Pérez Cisneros would like to know the Secretariat's opinion on that point. He would like particularly to know whether the Secretariat could give effect to the provisions of the last paragraph of the joint draft resolution without too great material difficulties.

32. Mr. BENSON (Secretariat) remarked first of all that it was difficult for the Secretariat to publish all the information transmitted by the Powers administering Non-Self-Governing Territories in extenso. The resulting document would be so voluminous that it would be impossible for the Special Committee, and even more so for the Fourth Committee, to study it profitably. That was why the Secretary-General published summaries and analyses of the information transmitted and why he would in future publish annual supplements.

33. The Secretariat had already considered the possibility of publishing technical studies relating to different aspects of the progress achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories as separate documents. It had even prepared such a document by way of experiment. That document had not been published because it was only an experiment for the Secretariat's use.

34. Mr. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) was of the opinion that the Secretariat's experimental document might be of interest to the members of the Fourth Committee, in spite of possible defects. He therefore asked whether it would not be possible for the document to be communicated to the members of the Committee. It would allow them to form an idea of the actual value of the proposal made in the last paragraph of the draft resolution submitted by the delegations of Cuba, Ecuador and Guatemala.

35. Mr. BENSON (Secretariat) said that the document would be communicated to all the members of the Fourth Committee for information. He would like, however, to make all possible reservations with regard to its presentation and nature as, he repeated, it had only been prepared as an experiment.

36. Mr. GHORRA (Lebanon) stated that his delegation had always considered the question under discussion objectively and without preconceived ideas. As the representative of the Philippines had pointed out at the previous meeting, three distinct trends of opinion had appeared among the members of the Committee. Some had taken a radical attitude, and others a conservative and reactionary attitude, while still others, among whom was the Lebanese delegation, were of the opinion that, above all, the principles of the Charter must be respected and its provisions applied. He thought the Fourth Committee should not become a forum for propaganda or confine its task merely to criticism or congratulation of the Administering Powers for the work they had done. On the contrary, it should take part in drawing up suitable measures to encourage realization of the objectives laid down in Chapter XI of the Charter and to stimulate collaboration between the Administering Powers and the other Members of the Organization.

37. The Lebanese delegation could not share the point of view of some representatives who interpreted Article 73 of the Charter too restrictively by confining its application in practice to the provision contained in sub-paragraph e, which was really only a fraction of the Article. The result of such an interpretation would be that the information transmitted by the Administering Powers would be put in the archives of the Organization for reference purposes only. If that was to be the case, why transmit that information to the Members of the Organization and convene the Fourth Committee to consider it? He personally did not think that the Secretary-General should be reduced to a mere messenger, that it was enough for representatives to read the documents in question as if they were a newspaper article.

38. The Administering Powers had voluntarily agreed to assume the obligations laid down in Article 73, and in particular had undertaken to recognize the principle of the primacy of the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Fourth Committee's duty was therefore to consider the information transmitted, to criticize it as it deemed fit, and then to say what measures would ensure the application of the provisions of the Charter and respect for the principles therein proclaimed. Thus the prestige of the Organization could be raised, collaboration between the Administering Powers and the other States Members could be encouraged, and the faith of the populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the United Nations could be strengthened.

39. In reading the summaries and analyses prepared by the Secretary-General, he had noted that during recent years the Administering Powers had taken steps to improve the social situation and develop education in many territories. It was clearly difficult to state that that general tendency was the direct result of an effort on the part of the Administering Powers to act in the spirit of the Committee's criticisms and recommendations, but it was certain that the work done by the Organization was a useful stimulant. The General Assembly had gone ahead, and it was to be hoped that the Administering Powers would do the same. The authority of the United Nations should be progressively strengthened and an atmosphere of confidence should be created to promote co-operation between the administering Powers and the Organization.

40. Mr. Ghorra recalled in that connexion that some of the countries administering Non-Self-Governing Territories had deliberately stopped transmitting information on some of the territories, or on some questions concerning them. He hoped that those countries would reconsider their position. It was to be noted also that in many territories questions of social welfare and education were largely dealt with by missions and religious institutions and that Government activity was very limited, although the responsibility for preparing programmes and for taking measures in those fields in fact lay with the Governments.

41. The Lebanese representative also drew attention to the fact that the teaching of vernacular languages was often neglected and relegated to the background. That was hardly justifiable, particularly in the case of such a language as Arabic. Arabic, which was the language of a civilization, was thus given a smaller part than it deserved. Mr. Ghorra was entirely in favour of the teaching of foreign languages in Non-Self-Governing Territories, but not at the expense of the vernacular languages. He also considered that information concerning Indonesia was out of place in documents on Non-Self-Governing Territories. In that connexion, he recalled that Lebanon had been one of the first countries to recognize the independence of the United States of Indonesia, and he hoped that the new State would soon be welcomed as a Member of the United Nations.

42. The Lebanese delegation considered that the Special Committee should be given a permanent status, for the obligations laid down in Article 73 of the Charter were of a lasting character. It would be inclined to vote in favour of any draft resolution along those lines. If no such resolution was submitted, it would vote for the United States draft resolution (A/923, annex II, draft resolution F), which provided for the continuance of the Special Committee's work for a three-year period. It would oppose any resolution providing for less than that.

43. The Lebanese delegation also supported in principle the six draft resolutions annexed to the Special Committee's report, and would comment upon them at the proper time.

44. Mr. ASTAPENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) recalled that under the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter, the States Members of the United Nations which assumed responsibilities for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories were bound to promote the well-being of the inhabitants of those Territories as far as possible. To that end, Article 73 provided that those countries must ensure the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories, develop self-government, taking due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, and assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions. Furthermore, the Administering Powers were bound to report to the United Nations on the measures they took with a view to carrying out their obligations in those fields. Some of the Administering Powers, however, appeared unwilling to recognize that transmission of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories was a binding obligation. The United Kingdom had refused to transmit information on Malta, and France had decided to cease transmitting information on Guadeloupe, Martinique, Guiana, New Caledonia and the French possessions in the Pacific.

45. Those Powers were thus denying the right of the United Nations, and, more particularly, of the Special Committee, to examine the substance of the information transmitted, and they were doing so with the intention of preventing the United Nations from supervising the implementation of the principles and provisions of the Charter. The United Nations obviously could not tolerate such actions, which were both incompatible with the Charter and prejudicial to the interests of the populations concerned. To weaken the authority of the United Nations in respect of Non-Self-Governing Territories could only harm the quality of the information it should receive, and that information was already inadequate and incomplete. In that connexion, Mr. Astapenko stressed the total absence of information on measures taken by the Administering Powers to prepare the inhabitants of the Territories for self-government and on the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in public life. It was impossible to form an accurate picture of the true state of affairs in the Non-Self-Governing Territories because the information transmitted was not sufficiently detailed.

46. It could, however, be easily seen, even from the inadequate and incomplete information available, that the Administering Powers were shamelessly exploiting the Territories for which they were responsible, and were not fulfilling the obligations they had assumed under the Charter, particularly as regards the economic development of the Territories. Thus, the Territories were becoming more and more dependent upon the metropolitan countries, whose policy hindered their own economic development by keeping them in a precarious situation as regards both living conditions and the cultural level of the inhabitants. The USSR representative had cited a number of examples which provided sufficient illustration of that state of affairs.

47. The economy of the Non-Self-Governing Territories was therefore dislocated because they in fact served only to supply raw materials to the metropolitan countries. The position of the indigenous workers was difficult; an indigenous worker in the Belgian Congo received a wage thirty-two times smaller than that of a European worker, and in Northern Rhodesia eleven times smaller. In French Somaliland, dockers and unskilled labourers received a monthly wage equivalent to 16 dollars. It should be added that social security services were non-existent, and that the deadliest diseases raged among the populations of the Territories. In that connexion, Mr. Astapenko stressed that the Administering Powers did not concern themselves with the question of public health; in Aden, for instance, there was one doctor for 350,000 persons.

48. Turning to the question of public education, Mr. Astapenko remarked that large parts of the populations of the Territories were still illiterate. In British Somaliland, one per cent of the population could read and write; in French West Africa, only 5 per cent of the children of school age attended schools, while in Morocco the proportion was 20 per cent. It must therefore be admitted that discrimination was practised in the educational field; in 1947, credits allocated in Kenya for the education of Europeans had been forty times higher than those allocated for the indigenous population. In Uganda, the credits had amounted to one-tenth of one pound sterling per indigenous inhabitant and to several pounds per European inhabitant.

49. It was clear, therefore, that the Administering Powers were not fulfilling the obligations they had assumed, and were not promoting the development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Byelorussian delegation considered that the Administering Powers should transmit full information and, in particular, should not fail to include details on the measures they were undertaking to prepare the populations concerned for self-government and to enable them to participate in the political life of the Territories.

50. The CHAIRMAN stated that, if there was no objection, the representative of France would be permitted to make a statement in the general debate at the following meeting. The same right would be granted to the representative of the United States, who had made a request to that effect.

51. Any delegation could, of course, exercise its right of reply, in accordance with the provisions of the rules of procedure.

52. He proposed that the Committee should begin the consideration of the draft resolutions submitted by the Special Committee.

53. Mr. FARRAG (Egypt) moved the adjournment of the meeting.

It was so decided.

The meeting rose at 5 p.m.

HUNDRED AND SIXTEENTH MEETING

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Friday, 4 November 1949, at 10.45 a.m.

Chairman: Mr. H. LANNUNG (Denmark).

1. Mr. LAPIE (France) wished to clarify the position of the French Government on the question of Non-Self-Governing Territories and the report of the Special Committee (A/923). He recalled that the position of France had been expressed in the Special Committee, where its delegation had voted in favour of all the draft resolutions contained in annex II of the report, with the exception of that which concerned the extension of the life of the Special Committee for another three years.

2. He would divide his statement into two parts: the first part would concern the extension of the life of the Special Committee; the second would refer to the French Government's decision to discontinue the submission of information on certain Non-Self-Governing Territories.

3. Before he dealt with those questions, he would like to answer some of the criticism that had been levelled against France. In his opinion, the criticism had been both scattered and of scant value. Among all the members of the Committee only four delegations had formulated concrete criticism. All the other criticism had been either vague or of a propagandistic nature.

4. He had been glad to note that some of the criticism had been mixed with tributes. That was particularly the case in the statement by the representative of Brazil, who had had the courage to point out both the good and the bad in French administration. While his delegation welcomed such support, he wished to make it clear that France was not seeking praise, but only recognition of the work it had carried out.

5. Criticisms had been levelled against all the Administering Powers. It seemed that, in the opinion of some delegations, notably the USSR, to be an Administering Power was wrong in itself. He wondered whether the USSR administered any territories. If it did, he thought it would be interesting to hear the echo of liberated people instead of the silence of the oppressed.

6. He would like to clarify the statement made by the Brazilian representative to the effect that France had delayed the process of evolution toward independence in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In that connexion he recalled that the French Constitution provided for the creation of the French Union and its Supreme Council, which was in process of organization. Such an undertaking took time and patience, but he was sure that its fruits would be seen in due course. The Supreme Council had been established by a law promulgated in February 1949.

7. Some specific criticism had been heard regarding education in Tunisia. He would like to cite some figures. In 1938 there had been 1,907 primary teachers in Tunisia, and by 1949 the number had increased to 2,749. Of those 2,749 teachers, 1,104 were Tunisians. During that same period the number of professors of secondary education had risen from 356 to 668, of whom 404 were Tunisians. He wondered how anyone could say that there had been no progress in education when the number of teachers and professors had been doubled in the preceding ten years. At the same time he wished to point out that both French and Arabic were used in the schools as languages of instruction.

8. Concerning the criticism of the administration of Morocco, he considered that it had been motivated by propaganda. In fact, the budgetary allocations for education in Morocco constituted 15 per cent of the total budget and had been doubled in the ten years between 1938 and 1949. Another statement had implied that there were only 100,000 children in Moroccan schools, but the true figure was 150,000 in 1947, of whom 110,000 Moslems represented more than ten times the figure for 1920. The number of teachers had been increased in proportion.

9. His delegation regretted the accusation made by the Syrian representative that France had endeavoured to eradicate Moslem culture in Morocco. It was well known that teams of scientists had been sent to Morocco to study and recommend means of preserving and expanding Moslem culture. There was an Institute of Islamic Studies in Morocco which offered courses in a wide variety of subjects in thirteen faculties. In the circumstances, he considered that the Syrian representatives criticism was unjustified.

10. With regard to the reasons that impelled his delegation to vote against the proposal to extend the existence of the Special Committee for another three years, he would like to go back to the origins of the question. By resolution 66 (I) the General Assembly had established the Committee in 1946 under the name of Ad Hoc Committee, for one year only. The following year, by resolution 146 (II), the Committee had been given another year of life and renamed the Special Committee. By resolution 219 (III), adopted in 1948, a similar Special Committee had been established. Currently the proposal had been put forward to extend the existence of the Committee not for one but for three years. That was clearly an attempt to establish a body that would parallel the functions of the Trusteeship Council. His delegation considered that the measure had no basis in the Charter and had therefore refused to approve it.

11. With regard to the statement made at the 114th meeting by the representative of the Philippines, he pointed out that if the intention of those who had drawn up the Charter had been to establish an organ to parallel the Trusteeship Council, he felt sure they would have done so. To say, therefore, that such an intention was implicit in the spirit of the Charter had no foundation in fact. It was true that the question had been raised during the San Francisco Conference, but it had been rejected, and the Charter had been drafted in its present form. France had participated in those discussions and had given its support to the majority, which had decided against such an organ. If the question was studied carefully, it would be found that the proposed Special Committee actually contradicted the provisions of the Charter.

12. It was not suggested that the Special Committee could never be established, but in order to establish it, it would be necessary to amend the Charter. Chapter XVIII provided the machinery for revision; it was therefore a question of setting that machinery in motion if it was so desired.

13. He conceded that the Special Committee might fulfil a useful purpose in matters of procedure. That required careful consideration. Changes should not be made too rapidly. His delegation considered therefore that the life of the Special Committee should be extended for one year instead of three years.

14. The question had been asked why France had ceased to transmit information concerning a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories under its administration. The answer was to be found in the French Constitution and in the formal reservation with regard to constitutional considerations made in Article 73 e of the Charter. While he was prepared to reply to the remarks that had been made, he emphasized that France in no way considered itself as being in the position of a prisoner in the dock. The view of the French delegation was that all the members of the Committee were engaged in a common task, an attempt to ameliorate the lot of a part of the human race.

15. The conception of the French Union was a new one in history; it might appear discouraging at first sight, and some explanation might thus be called for.

16. Mr. Lapie drew attention to the phrase "subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations may require" contained in Article 73 e of the Charter. Under the French Constitution, the former colonial territories and the metropolitan territory were united in the French Union. There was only one constitution relating to metropolitan France, the overseas departments, the overseas territories, the Trust Territories and the Associate States. It could not be said that France was acting contrary to the Charter by availing itself in certain instances of a reservation which was actually contained in the Charter.

17. He quoted a letter addressed to the Secretary-General by the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, dated 29 April 1949 (A/915), which set forth in detail the reasons which had led the French Government to cease to transmit information with regard to a number of territories. The French Union, guided by the same spirit as that which had inspired the Charter, aimed at the emancipation of its peoples. It left a place open for those territories which had attained self-government. It was unnecessary therefore to continue to transmit information under Article 73 e when a particular territory was sufficiently advanced in the process of evolution.

18. France maintained that under its constitution, and in accordance with the reservations provided in the Charter, it was the sole judge of the stage of emancipation reached by the peoples under its administration.

19. In reply to the representative of Guatemala, who had said at the 114th meeting that if the colonial status was compared to a school for self-government, it was a school from which the pupils would never be allowed to graduate, he pointed out that as far as France was concerned, a number of countries which before the war had been classified as colonies had become independent States under agreements concluded with France. With regard to the question as to what criteria would be applied in awarding diplomas of independence, France's reply was that the only possible criterion was that of democracy and civic maturity through education and the experience of political responsibility. France had developed education in the Territories and had established the franchise on a very wide basis, which would be still further extended with the spread of education. The French authorities themselves had been surprised at the rapidity with which the idea of democracy had taken root in Africa. That it had done so was an encouraging sign for the future.

20. The establishment of the French Union had not been a small matter. France remained faithful to the spirit of the Charter. It availed itself of the exceptions provided in Article 73 e, not in order to violate the Charter but in order to implement it, but it wished to do so in its own way. The Charter of the United Nations and the Constitution of the French Union had been signed at the same time, with the same hopes and for the same purposes. The idea of the French Union had been launched at Algiers in the middle of the war, at the same time the idea of the United Nations was growing out of the Atlantic Charter. Both were aimed at the same goal: freedom and a high standard of living for all mankind. France had only one concern — to serve humanity.

21. Mr. FAHY (United States of America) said that the people of Puerto Rico would deeply resent the distorted picture of their country, which the representative of the Ukrainian SSR had given at the 114th meeting. He did not wish to burden the Committee with a recital of the accomplishments of the Puerto Rican people, much less with an account of the assistance given by the United States Government, but felt it necessary to draw attention to a number of facts.

22. On 2 January 1949 the first elected governor of Puerto Rico, Luis Muñoz Marín, who had been born and educated in Puerto Rico, had taken his oath of office. So far as Mr. Fahy was aware, Puerto Rico was the only Non-Self-Governing Territory, which elected its chief executive by universal adult suffrage. The Territory had a bicameral legislature. Twenty per cent of its budget was allocated to education, which was free and compulsory. The Ukrainian representative's assertion that the Puerto Rican Commissioner for Education was appointed by the United States President appeared to be based on the information submitted for the year 1947. It was clear from the information submitted in the following year that the appointment was made by the Governor of Puerto Rico, whose people formulated and executed their own educational policy.

23. Mr. Fahy found it difficult to understand the basis for the Ukrainian representative's allegation that the indigenous culture of Puerto Rico was being destroyed. Spanish was the language of instruction in elementary schools. The Territory had three institutions of higher education, including a university, which had the record enrolment of ten thousand students in the year 1947-1948 and which was making a special effort to train Puerto Rican public servants and thus to accelerate the country's progress towards self-government. The Puerto Rican school of industrial arts offered training to students from the whole Caribbean area.

24. The Ukrainian representative had described Puerto Rico as a single-crop agricultural community dependent on United States markets and subject to United States control. Like the rest of the Caribbean, the economy of Puerto Rico was primarily agricultural. The percentage of the population employed in agriculture had, however, steadily decreased since the turn of the century and, with the establishment of over fifty new industries, was now less than forty per cent. The Ukrainian representative had alleged that Puerto Rico traded only with the United States. In 1948, however, Puerto Rico imported goods from fifty-three countries and exported her own manufactures and agricultural products to thirty-five countries.

25. The Ukrainian representative had referred to the high incidence of tuberculosis in Puerto Rico. While the tuberculosis rate was high, it was important to remember that its treatment in tropical areas presented special problems. The Puerto Rican Health Department had embarked on an island-wide campaign to vaccinate the entire child population against tuberculosis and was thus undertaking one of the first large-scale campaigns against tuberculosis with the use of BCG serum.

26. While he had no intention of referring to the contribution which the United States Government had made to Puerto Rican progress, Mr. Fahy wished to assure the Committee that his Government would continue to give the Puerto Rican people every assistance in its power.

27. Mr. CARPIO (Philippines), speaking in reply to the representative of France, said that in his attempt to give a legal interpretation of Chapter XI of the Charter in his previous speech, he had pointed out, first, that Article 73 imposed a number of obligations on the colonial Powers over and above those contained in sub-paragraph e of that Article, a contention which had not been refuted; secondly, that by virtue of Article 10 of the Charter the General Assembly had the right to discuss and make recommendations on matters connected with Article 73; and thirdly, that, whereas in the case of Chapters XII and XIII of the Charter the necessary machinery for discussion and recommendation was available in the form of the Trusteeship Council, no provision for such machinery had been made in the case of Chapter XI. He had gone on to suggest that the General Assembly should take steps to remedy that omission.

28. The French representative had, however, asserted that such action would be tantamount to an amendment of the Charter and would be contrary to the spirit which had animated its authors. Mr. Carpio felt sure, however, that, as a fellow lawyer, the French representative would agree with his view that where there was a right, there was also a remedy and hence, if the General Assembly enjoyed certain rights under Article 73 of the Charter, it should also have the power to carry them into effect.

29. He wished to put three questions to the French representative. He would like to know, in the first place, whether the French representative admitted the existence of the obligations arising out of Article 73, which, he, Mr. Carpio, had enumerated in his previous speech, or whether he considered that the obligations of the colonial Powers were limited to those contained in sub-paragraph e of that Article. In the second place, he wished to know whether the French representative agreed that, under the provisions of Article 73, read in conjunction with Article 10, the General Assembly and the Fourth Committee were entitled to discuss and make recommendations with a view to ensuring fulfilment of the obligations imposed by the Charter. In the third place, he would like to know whether the French representative denied the need to establish machinery to ensure fulfilment of the obligations contained in Article 73.

30. Mr. MUGHIR (Syria) referred to the French representative's allegation that he had failed to read the French Government's report on education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories administered by France. Not only had he read that report, but had in addition studied a great deal of information from Moroccan and Tunisian sources.

31. The representative of France had spoken of the French contribution to the work of Islamic institutes in Morocco and Tunisia. Those institutes had, however, been in existence long before the French conquest of North Africa. They did not, moreover, receive any financial help from the French authorities.

32. When the French had occupied North Africa, they had found a coherent system of administration, with a temporal and spiritual chief, a fact on which the French writer, Lyautey, had commented. The French representative had not indicated the existence of a legislative assembly in Morocco, based on universal suffrage, nor had he suggested that the establishment of such an assembly was contemplated. There was no separation of executive and juridical power in the territory. Freedom of movement was restricted, as was freedom of association. There was also severe censorship of the Press. In March 1948 the number of banned Arabic publications exceeded 1,200. Moroccans were not permitted to form trade unions. Their property was liable to expropriation for a variety of purposes. The economic situation had deteriorated under French occupation, a fact to which the sharp rise in the budgetary deficit testified. Wages had failed to rise in proportion to the cost of living.

33. Mr. FARRAG (Egypt) said that the arguments advanced by the French representative to justify the French Government's decision to discontinue the transmission of information on a number of territories were not new. The French delegation had put forward similar arguments during the first session of the General Assembly in connexion with an attempt by France to annex the mandated territories of Togoland and the Cameroons. The attempt had fortunately been frustrated and the French representative had ultimately been compelled to admit that no Power had the right to appropriate the Territories placed under its administration after the 1914-1918 war. The limitations imposed by constitutional requirements, to which Article 73 e of the Charter referred, clearly applied to constitutions which had existed before the adoption of the United Nations Charter. The new constitution to which the French representative referred had been adopted in 1946.

34. Mr. ZARUBIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that, in his attempt to refute the facts put forward by a number of representatives, the French representative had levelled the charge of propaganda. It was to such a stratagem that the colonial Powers were wont to resort in order to avoid giving a direct reply to their critics. For its part, the delegation of the USSR had based its observations exclusively on facts contained in the information transmitted to the Secretary-General by the Administering Powers and could not therefore justly be accused of propaganda.

35. The French representative had not attempted to deny the facts quoted in evidence of the lack of political rights in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, of their exploitation and dire poverty. Facts were stubborn and the colonial Powers found it easier to resort to generalities intended to conceal conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories from the public opinion of the world.

36. The French Government had taken a unilateral decision to discontinue the transmission of information on certain territories. There was, however, no doubt that the administering Members were required to continue the submission of information required by Article 73 e of the Charter. It was the duty of the Fourth Committee to ensure that the required information was submitted and to remind the colonial Powers of their obligation to promote the well-being of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

37. Mr. GALAGAN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that, while the representative of the United States had maintained that his description of conditions in Puerto Rico was incorrect, he had not refuted a single fact contained in his speech.

38. The United States representative had not denied that the President of the United States could impose a veto on legislation enacted by the Legislative Assembly of Puerto Rico. Nor had he denied that the Puerto Rican representative in Congress had no right to vote or even to speak, except with the unanimous consent of Congress.

39. The United States representative had attempted to refute the facts, which he, Mr. Galagan, had given in regard to the economic situation of Puerto Rico. The information transmitted under Article 73 e, however, made it plain that Puerto Rico was a mere appendage of the United States, that its resources were being exploited in the interests of the United States, while its inhabitants were living at starvation level. The United States representative had not denied the existence of widespread unemployment or the large increase in Puerto Rican immigration into the United States. Puerto Rican immigrants lived in squalor and his delegation had received letters from some of them who complained of the conditions under which they lived.

40. The Ukrainian representative also referred to a Puerto Rican law regulating child birth and stated that sterilization of mothers was practised.

41. The United States representative had also refuted the charge that his Government was attempting to destroy the culture of Puerto Rico. He had not, however, denied the fact that the President of the United States had recently imposed his veto on a law on the teaching of Spanish in Puerto Rican schools.

42. It was clear that the colonial Powers had no intention of complying with the obligations laid down by Chapter XI of the Charter. The General Assembly should not be diverted by any charges of propaganda from demanding the strict fulfilment of the obligations imposed by that chapter.

The meeting rose at 1.30 p.m.

HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOURTH MEETING

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Monday, 14 November 1949, at 10.45 a.m.

Chairman: Mr. H. LANNUNG (Denmark).

Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (continued)

1. The CHAIRMAN announced that the Committee would consider the draft resolution concerning the territories to which Chapter XI of the Charter applied, submitted by the delegation of Egypt (A/C.4/L.37).
2. Mr. FARRAG (Egypt), while not wishing to review the various stages that had led to the adoption of Chapter XI of the Charter at San Francisco or to interpret its terms, stressed that the draft resolution submitted by his delegation was firmly based on the spirit and the letter of that Chapter.

3. He recalled that at a meeting of the General Assembly in February 1946 the United States representative, Mr. John Foster Dulles, had stated that the declaration on Non-Self-Governing Territories was not merely the concern of the Administering Powers but was also the concern of the United Nations¹. The United Kingdom representative, Mr. Arthur Creech Jones, had added that he rejoiced that there was at last an international colonial convention in Chapter XI which all the Powers subscribing to the United Nations would be required to observe.²

4. In view of those statements, Mr. Farrag considered that it was the duty of the United Nations, and more particularly of the General Assembly, to request the Administering Powers to observe that convention, which, among other things, required the regular submission of information on the territories under their administration.

5. According to resolution 66 (I) adopted by the General Assembly on 14 December 1946, the number of Non-Self-Governing Territories enumerated by the Administering Powers amounted to seventy-four. In 1949 the number of territories for which information had been transmitted had been reduced to sixty-two. He thought that the General Assembly was entitled to know whether the decrease in the number of territories for which information had been transmitted was due to any change in the constitutional position and status of such territories. It was for that purpose that the General Assembly had adopted resolution 222 (III) in 1948. The draft resolution under consideration, in his opinion, completed the procedure initiated by resolution 222 (III) and would enable the General Assembly to discharge its responsibilities in respect to the transmission by the Administering Powers of information under Article 73 e of the Charter.

6. It had been argued that no resolution such as the one submitted by his delegation could be adopted by the General Assembly because it would infringe the sovereign rights of the Administering Powers. The argument, which was not a new one, had been raised before in the Fourth Committee. He recalled that the question had been discussed in detail in 1946 when an attempt had been made to define more precisely the term "Non-Self-Governing Territory". In that connexion, he referred to the summary records of Sub-Committee 2 of the Fourth Committee³ and to document A/C.4/52 which had been submitted to the Fourth Committee in 1946.⁴ The views expressed at that time indicated that the Administering Powers had not raised the question of competence or considered that their sovereign rights had been infringed.

7. With regard to the draft solution submitted by his delegation, Mr. Farrag considered that its contents could not raise any objections. The preamble was based on the Charter and was in conformity with resolution 222 (III). Its operative parts merely reaffirmed certain prerogatives of the General Assembly.

8. As far as the first operative paragraph was concerned, the number of Non-Self-Governing Territories for which the Administering Powers were bound to transmit information had decreased from seventy-four to sixty-two since 1946. His delegation considered that if some of these Territories had attained independence or self-government, that was a reason for great satisfaction. However, as long as there existed any territories which were non-self-governing, the obligations of the Administering Powers remained in force and the General Assembly should ensure that those obligations were observed. It was essential that co-operation should prevail between the Administering Powers and the other Members of the United Nations, and for that reason the draft resolution should be favourably considered. With regard to the second paragraph of the operative part, he considered that the Special Committee was the most appropriate body to examine the factors to be taken into consideration, and to advise the General Assembly thereon.

9. Mr. DUARTE DE ROCHA (Brazil) considered that the principles which had inspired the Egyptian draft resolution were in accordance with the spirit of Chapter XI of the Charter. Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter had been interpreted in so many ways that it had become almost impossible for the United Nations to define exactly the meaning of the term "Non-Self-Governing Territory".

10. The same interpretations had been used when the establishment of the Ad Hoc Committee had been contemplated in 1946. It had been argued that the Charter had not provided for any system to implement the provisions of Chapter XI and that the establishment of the Ad Hoc Committee would infringe the domestic jurisdiction of certain States and constitute an attempt to amend Article 2 of the Charter. Yet in spite of that opposition, the Committee had been established.

11. Experience had shown that the expression "to intervene" as it occurred in Article 2 should not be given a narrow, technical interpretation as far as the responsibilities of the Administering Powers were concerned. In the current case the Committee was dealing with matters which did not fall essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any of the Administering Powers, and there was, therefore, no need to analyse in detail the juridical and political arguments which might be expounded in support of the worthy principles which had inspired the Egyptian draft resolution.

12. His delegation would vote for the adoption of the draft resolution and he hoped that it would receive the support of the Committee. In view of its importance he would request that the voting should be by roll-call.

13. Mr. KHADRA (Saudi Arabia) supported the Egyptian draft resolution because, in the opinion of his delegation, it was conceived in the spirit and letter of the Charter and would promote the paramount interests of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

⁴ Ibid., Fourth Committee, Part I, pages 273-275.

14. In view of the measured tone and conciliatory nature of that resolution he hoped that the Members responsible for Non-Self-Governing Territories would be guided by a genuine spirit of compromise and vote for its adoption.

15. He considered that further acrimonious debate would be avoided by the adoption of the Egyptian draft resolution, which provided the means of finding criteria for deciding when the Administering Powers should cease to transmit information on the territories for which they were responsible. He feared that if the resolution was not adopted, the same recriminations would be heard at the fifth session of the General Assembly and might result in a serious deadlock.

16. It was possible that the Administering Powers had what they considered to be valid reasons for ceasing to transmit information on a number of territories, but it was also possible that the non-administering Powers might refute those reasons. In his opinion, the Egyptian draft resolution presented a good solution to the problem of establishing criteria for determining whether a territory was or was not non-self-governing. Nevertheless, the resolution did not commit the Administering Powers to any further obligations than those they had accepted when they ratified the Charter.

17. He hoped that those delegations which considered that the draft resolution was not sufficiently strong would not harm the interests of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories by failing to support it.

18. Mr. Shiva RAO (India) declared that a number of Members were concerned at the unilateral decision of some of the Administering Powers to discontinue the transmission of information on several Non-Self-Governing Territories enumerated in resolution 66 (I).

19. He wished to draw the attention of the Committee to resolution 222 (III) of the General Assembly which did not go beyond requesting the Administering Powers to explain the reasons that had impelled them to cease transmitting information on those territories. The General Assembly was uncertain whether the decision of the Administering Powers to cease transmitting the information was due to the fact that the Territories had attained a status of independence or self-government, to a simple omission, or to other reasons. The Egyptian draft resolution did not question the soundness or the propriety of the decisions taken by the Administering Powers and was intended to throw some light on the question by going one step further than resolution 222 (III).

20. The first paragraph of the operative part of the draft resolution established clearly that the General Assembly had the responsibility to express its opinion on the obligations of the Administering Powers under Article 73 of the Charter. The second paragraph requested the Special Committee to examine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory was or was not non-self-governing.

21. The Administering Powers themselves did not agree on the criteria that should be employed in deciding whether a territory was or was not non-self-governing. He referred to statements made by the United Kingdom and France contained in document A/915. The Administering Powers agreed, however, that the responsibility for determining when a territory ceased to be non-self-governing rested not with the General Assembly but with the Administering Member concerned. It would be appropriate, therefore, if the Secretariat prepared a working paper on the subject as a guide for the Special Committee in its examination of the factors which should be taken into account.

22. For the reasons stated above, his delegation would vote in favour of the Egyptian draft resolution.

23. Mr. MARTURET (Venezuela) said that his delegation considered the question of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to be of primary importance.

24. He recalled that in 1946 the number of territories for which information had been received totalled seventy-four, but subsequently the Administering Powers had transmitted information on sixty-two Territories only.

25. His delegation considered that in order to know how Chapter XI should be implemented, the General Assembly should determine clearly what constituted a Non-Self-Governing Territory. Experience had shown that the term "non-self-governing" was not sufficiently precise. Its interpretation had given rise to the expression of divergent views which had made difficult the task of the General Assembly in so far as the implementation of Article 73 was concerned. He therefore thought that any effort made by the General Assembly to clarify the situation would be justified. The Egyptian draft resolution, in his opinion, was a step in the right direction since it could serve as a basis for the eventual definition of a Non-Self-Governing Territory.

26. The draft resolution made it clear that the General Assembly had the responsibility to express its opinion on the principles which had guided the Members concerned in enumerating the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which they were bound to transmit information. It was evident that the enunciation of such principles could not be construed as intervention in the domestic jurisdiction of the Administering Powers.

27. While his delegation had stated previously that the Special Committee was not, in its opinion, competent to deal with the question of the transmission of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories, it considered that the General Assembly was fully competent to do so. If a special organ of the United Nations was to judge the type of relationship that should exist between an Administering Power and a Non-Self-Governing Territory, that could be construed as intervention in the domestic affairs of the former. That would not be the case, however, if that special organ limited itself to carrying out certain studies of juridical, political, economic or social kind, to be used in determining whether a territory should or should not be classified as non-self-governing.

28. The Egyptian draft resolution should therefore be acceptable to the majority of the Members and his delegation would vote for its adoption.

29. Mr. FLETCHER-COOKE (United Kingdom) said that, in introducing his draft resolution, the Egyptian representative had stated that the Administering Powers, having signed the Charter, were bound by the provisions of Chapter XI. He would, however, like to point out that those provisions were equally binding for the non-administering Powers. Neither they nor the Administering Powers could either add to or delete from that Chapter except in accordance with the accepted procedure for the amendment of the Charter.

30. Mr. Fletcher-Cooke realized that, in proposing his draft resolution, the Egyptian representative had not only, or even primarily, had in mind the territories for which the United Kingdom was responsible. Since, however, the draft resolution seemed to imply a misunderstanding of the reasons for which the United Kingdom Government had ceased to transmit information on Malta, he felt it might be useful to explain his Government's attitude on that matter.

31. In ceasing to transmit information about Malta, the United Kingdom Government did not claim that the territory had attained a full measure of self-government for the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter. In the evolution of self-government in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, however, there might frequently be a stage, as there was in the case of Malta, when, although a full measure of self-government had not yet been attained, responsibility for economic, social and educational matters, which were the matters mentioned in Article 73 e, no longer rested with the metropolitan Government, but was vested by the Constitution in the Government of the territory. When that stage had been reached, "constitutional considerations" as provided in Article 73 e might preclude the transmission by the metropolitan Government of information on those matters, as being matters with which it was no longer concerned. The words "subject to such limitations as ... constitutional considerations may require" had been inserted in the draft of Article 73 e at San Francisco on the initiative of the United Kingdom representative to meet that very point and had been accepted with the addition of the words "security and", proposed by the representative of the United States. Since, under the 1947 Constitution, Malta was responsible for its own internal administration, including the matters enumerated in Article 73 e, the United Kingdom Government was not concerned with those matters for constitutional reasons and could not therefore supply any information regarding them. There could be no doubt that only the metropolitan Power concerned was in a position to decide the question of security considerations and of its own constitutional relationship with each of the territories for which it was responsible. As the United Kingdom representative had indicated during the discussion of resolution 222 (III) at the third session of the General Assembly, the United Kingdom was prepared to inform the Secretary-General whenever any one of the territories under its administration reached a stage of constitutional development at which the United Kingdom Government was no longer responsible for the matters mentioned in Article 73 e, with the result that it was no longer constitutionally possible to transmit the information required by the Article. It was, however, simply a question of informing the Secretary-General; there was no provision in the Charter which conferred upon the General Assembly the responsibility of determining the effect of the two limitations — security and constitutional — on the obligation of a Member State to transmit information.

32. No useful purpose would therefore be served by a study of what was or was not a territory whose people had not yet attained a full measure of self-government, since that was not necessarily the decisive point. If the Special Committee was charged with such a study, Mr. Fletcher-Cooke would be obliged to reserve his Government's position on the question of its participation.

33. Mr. SHAHBAH (Pakistan) said that the draft resolution submitted by Egypt fully corresponded to his delegation's views and would receive its wholehearted support.

34. His delegation found it difficult to understand how any objection could be raised to the Egyptian proposal, which was entirely in accordance with the provisions of the Charter. Unilateral decisions to discontinue the transmission of information on the ground that territories were no longer in the non-self-governing category could only give rise to misunderstanding and suspicion. If self-government, or even partial self-government, as in the case of Malta, had been attained and the metropolitan Government placed all the facts before the United Nations, that Organization would have no reluctance in reducing the list of territories on which information was required.

35. Mr. GARREAU (France), while appreciating the spirit in which the Egyptian draft resolution had been submitted, felt bound to emphasize that it was first necessary to reach a satisfactory definition of what constituted a Non-Self-Governing Territory under Chapter XI of the Charter. If the Administering Power could decide to transmit information for a territory, it could also decide unilaterally to cease doing so. No decision regarding the definition of the term "Non-Self-Governing Territory" had been taken at San Francisco, an omission to which France had constantly drawn attention in the course of the preceding three years. To adopt the Egyptian draft resolution without first formulating that definition would be to put the cart before the horse.

36. The list of Non-Self-Governing Territories with which the General Assembly was concerned was not exhaustive and did not include all the territories to which the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter might be applied. It was therefore unjust that the Chapter should be held to apply only to those Powers which had loyally complied with its provisions. It applied to all Members of the United Nations.

37. The French delegation had raised objections of principle to the draft resolution submitted by the delegations of Mexico and the United States, that had been adopted at the previous meeting. The same objections applied to the operative part of the Egyptian draft resolution and, while again reserving the French Government's position in regard to the Special Committee itself, which it regarded as unconstitutional, the French delegation would vote against the Egyptian draft resolution.

38. Mr. DE BRUYNE (Belgium) said that, in expressing its views on the Egyptian draft resolution, the Belgian delegation found itself in a privileged position, since Belgium had freely decided that the Belgian Congo was the only Non-Self-Governing Territory over which it exercised sovereign rights and had pledged itself to furnish the information required by Article 73 e of the Charter on that territory. The Belgian delegation considered that all the under-developed peoples of the world were entitled to expect the Members of the United Nations to proclaim their acceptance of a sacred mission with regard to them, similar to that which Belgium had accepted in regard to the Belgian Congo.

39. As the French representative had pointed out, no definition of a non-self-governing people had as yet been formulated. Some non-self-governing peoples lived in territories, some in reservations; the areas which they inhabited were in some cases within or adjacent to the frontier of a State, while in other cases they were separated by the sea.

40. Some of the arguments advanced in that connexion in the course of the previous week were, in the opinion of the Belgian delegation, invalid. From a legal point of view, whether the area inhabited by the non-self-governing peoples was within the frontiers of a State or outside them, the better-developed State had certain rights over that area. The Belgian Congo was a part of Belgian territory and was subject to Belgian laws, just as certain reserves were subject to the sovereignty of other States.

41. The Mexican representative had said, in referring to a statement by the Belgian representative, that his country's policy toward the less-developed peoples was subject to control by public opinion and by parliament. The position was exactly the same in Belgium and the records of parliamentary proceedings provided evidence of the humanitarian concern with which all Belgian political parties followed the evolution of the non-self-governing peoples.

42. The Belgian Congo had been both an independent State and a colony. When an independent State, it had been dependent on a sovereign monarch and administered by a handful of white men; it had had its own flag and a colonial council independent of the Belgian parliament. It had in effect been an authoritarian State. If the Congo had retained its independent status, it would have resembled many States represented in the United Nations. It would have had its own representative, who would have repudiated interference, whether foreign or international, in its domestic affairs. From the point of view of international publicity, the Committee would no doubt agree that the existing régime made better provision for the people of the Congo than the previous one.

43. The Uruguayan representative had stated at an earlier meeting that colonial policy had been subject to the judgment of the conscience of the world since the Conference at San Francisco. While such a situation was not unwelcome to the Belgian delegation, it nevertheless felt that the moral control exercised by public opinion should be supplementary to the legal control exercised by parliamentary institutions.

44. It might be profitable for all nations and for the non-self-governing peoples to have official information on the measures being taken by certain States to protect and develop the languages, for example, of the Indians of Central, South and North America, of the Negritos of the Philippines and so on. It would be useful for all Members of the United Nations to receive statistics on educational advancement and, in particular, on economic and social conditions among the under-developed peoples in all States. The draft resolutions adopted in the course of the preceding few days made it clear that such action in regard to all the information required under Article 73 e of the Charter would promote to the greatest possible degree the well-being of the non-self-governing peoples. The Belgian delegation trusted that, in submitting its draft resolution, the Egyptian delegation had been motivated by a desire to extend the benefits of Chapter XI of the Charter to the greatest possible number of non-self-governing peoples.

45. The Committee should not blind itself to the existence of profound mistrust among its members, mistrust on the part of the non-administering Powers in regard to the "unhappy few" and mistrust on the part of the Administering Powers in regard to a majority which deliberately ignored the constitutional guarantees explicitly provided in Chapter XI of the Charter.

46. As regards the text of the Egyptian draft resolution, the Belgian delegation would have preferred a briefer reference to Article 73, since the existing wording appeared to prejudge the interpretation of that Article. It would have preferred an additional paragraph to the preamble on the following lines: "Considering that resolution 66 (I), in taking note of a situation of fact, cannot interpret Article 73 in a restrictive sense in regard to Members of the United Nations who have or assume the responsibility of administering Non-Self-Governing Territories". The Belgian delegation's principal objections to the draft resolution were, however, concerned with the wording of the last paragraph of the operative part. The phrase "which should be taken into account" in that paragraph was impersonal and it was not clear whether it applied to the General Assembly or to individual States.

47. As it had stated on a number of previous occasions, the Belgian delegation held the view that the General Assembly was not empowered to express a binding opinion on the manner in which the Administering Powers should comply with the provisions of Chapter XI. Hence, even if it reached a definition, by empiric or other methods, of a Non-Self-Governing Territory, it would still have no power to decide on the application of that definition to individual territories. Such decisions were a matter for Member States alone.

48. Such legal arguments would have been sufficient in themselves to justify opposition to the Egyptian proposal. The Belgian delegation, while continuing to reserve its position, particularly in regard to the Special Committee, would abstain from voting on the Egyptian draft resolution because it wished to emphasize the view, shared by the majority of Members, that all the non-self-governing peoples of the world should receive equal and effective guarantees from the United Nations.

49. Mr. NORIEGA (Mexico) disagreed with the contention of the United Kingdom representative that the Egyptian proposal constituted an amendment of the Charter. The value of the Charter rested upon the good will and good faith of all Members of the Organization. According to the French representative, the eight countries which had voluntarily decided to transmit information under Chapter XI were free to cease doing so at any time. Chapter XI, however, was an integral part of the Charter, and created international obligations both for the Administering Members and the non-administering Members. The Egyptian draft resolution should be considered in that light.

50. The United Kingdom representative had stated that as a result of constitutional changes which had taken place in Malta, the United Kingdom Government was no longer concerned with economic, social and educational matters in that territory. He had admitted, however, that Malta was not fully self-governing. That being so, the United Kingdom Government should continue to transmit information with regard to Malta. All that had happened was that there had been a delegation of powers by the United Kingdom Government to the Government of Malta.

51. With reference to the remarks of the French and Belgian representatives, he considered the case of population groups which were under the domination of an alien race to be entirely different from that of Non-Self-Governing Territories. Such population groups, though possibly, for reasons of culture, not incorporated into the life of the community, nevertheless enjoyed the same civic and political rights as the remainder of the population. It was true that there were cases of groups living in conditions of discrimination and segregation; the Mexican delegation would do everything in its power to obtain justice for them.

52. He appealed to the Administering Powers, in a conciliatory spirit, to propose a formula which would be acceptable to them and satisfactory to the General Assembly. He would like to see the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories diminish as a result of the attainment of real self-government. The Mexican delegation would be the first to congratulate the Administering Powers when that took place.

53. Mr. CARPIO (Philippines) observed that the number of Territories on which information was transmitted under Article 73 e had been reduced from seventy-four to sixty-two without much explanation on the part of the Administering Powers, which took the stand that it was for them alone to decide whether or not to continue transmitting information on any of the Non-Self-Governing Territories included in the original list. The draft resolution submitted by the Egyptian delegation challenged the validity of that contention and raised the question whether or not the General Assembly had any say in the matter.

54. It was the view of the Philippine delegation that, once a Non-Self-Governing Territory had been included in the list of those to which Article 73 applied, the Administering Power no longer had the sole responsibility of deciding whether or not to continue transmitting information. In Article 73, the Administering Powers had recognized the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of the territories were paramount and accepted as a sacred trust the obligation to promote their well-being. The primordial concept of the Mandate System had been that of the white man's responsibility towards backward peoples. That concept had been embodied in Article 73, with somewhat different wording. The provisions of Chapter XI applied to some two hundred million people, who had so far had little say in the administration of their own affairs. Nevertheless progress was being made; within a period of three years a number of nations in South East Asia had attained freedom. That was a historical process which nothing could prevent and for that reason it was important that the decision whether or not to transmit information should not be unilateral. The only criterion was a full measure of self-government and until that was achieved the administering Powers had no grounds for saying that they had completed their task under Chapter XI.

55. The Charter outlined the pattern by which the Members of the United Nations might co-operate for the well-being of peoples throughout the world. In many cases machinery had not been established, but the pattern was there and it was the duty of every Member of the United Nations to follow it in order that the Organization might be a living reality, able to cope with the changing requirements of modern times.

56. He realized that, as the Belgian representative had said, there were many difficulties in the way of establishing criteria as to the point at which information should cease to be transmitted, and he acknowledged the vigour of the legal contention advanced by the United Kingdom representative. Nevertheless, until a full measure of self-government had been attained, the obligation of the colonial Powers to transmit information remained intact.

57. The Philippine delegation would therefore vote for the Egyptian draft resolution.

58. Mr. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) remarked that the Egyptian representative had recalled that in 1946 the Cuban delegation had opposed the suggestion that the meaning of the term "Non-Self-Governing Territory" should be defined. Cuba had always wished Article 73 to be interpreted in the broadest possible manner and had been against any premature definition, which might have had a restrictive effect. The Cuban delegation, however, felt that the time had come when a definition should be reached. Article 73 was quite clear; it spoke of "territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government". Until they had attained that full measure of self-government, all the provisions of Article 73 remained in force. Agreement must therefore be reached on the exact meaning of the expression "full measure of self-government". Only in that way could the Administering Powers know what their obligations were with regard to the transmission of information. He could not agree that because a territory had become self-governing in social or educational matters, information should automatically cease to be transmitted.

59. In reply to the French representative, he maintained that once the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories had been established, it became the property of the United Nations and the General Assembly should continue to receive information on all the territories it enumerated. He agreed with the French representative that the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories should be lengthened rather than shortened. No real difference of principle existed between the administering and the non-administering Members, and he believed that most of the former would vote for the draft resolution.

60. It might appear that the Cuban delegation had changed its opinion, but in reality it felt, as it had always done, that Article 73 e should be interpreted as broadly as possible. It would therefore vote for the Egyptian draft resolution.

61. Mr. GARREAU (France) pointed out that no reply had been given to his question, which had also been put by the Belgian representative: the fundamental question of what were non-self-governing peoples.

62. Prince WAN WAITHAYAKON (Thailand) sympathized with the aims of the draft resolution submitted by Egypt.

63. With regard to the final paragraph, the task assigned to the Special Committee would be extremely difficult; nevertheless it should be attempted. He would therefore vote for that paragraph.

64. With reference to the first operative paragraph, it was acceptable in principle. The United Kingdom representative had called attention to the reservation regarding constitutional considerations in Article 73 e; the wording of the paragraph, however, made it clear that the General Assembly could consider the constitutional considerations submitted for ceasing to transmit or for not transmitting information and could express its opinion. He wondered whether it was in order for the first operative paragraph to imply an obligation on the part of the General Assembly, and suggested that it should be altered to read: "Considers that it is within the responsibility of the General Assembly to express its opinion . . ." If that was accepted, he would vote for the draft resolution; if not, he would abstain.

65. Mr. FARRAG (Egypt) accepted the proposal of the representative of Thailand.

66. He moved the adjournment of the meeting.
It was so decided.

The meeting rose at 1.20 p.m.

HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIFTH MEETING

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Wednesday, 16 November 1949, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: Mr. H. LANNUNG (Denmark).

Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (continued)

1. The CHAIRMAN invited the Committee to continue its study of the draft resolution presented by the Egyptian delegation (A/C.4/L.37/Rev.2) concerning territories to which Chapter XI of the Charter applied.

2. Mr. FLETCHER-COOKE (United Kingdom) wished to restate the United Kingdom's position in regard to the draft resolution submitted by the Egyptian delegation.

3. First, he had not said, as the representative of Mexico had claimed at the 124th meeting, that the adoption of the draft resolution in question by the General Assembly would require an amendment of the Charter. He had stated that all Members of the United Nations had subscribed to Chapter XI, that was to say, the Administering Powers had undertaken a specific obligation under Article 73 e while the non-administering Powers had in the same way accepted certain limitations set out in that Article. Furthermore, there was no provision in the Charter which entitled the Assembly to determine the effect of those limitations on the obligation of a Member State to transmit the information required. In fact, Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter seemed specifically to preclude that possibility.

4. Three points had been considered during the discussion. The first related to the definition of the term "Non-Self-Governing Territory"; the second related to the suggestion that the General Assembly had the right to decide whether a particular territory fell within that definition. The United Kingdom delegation thought that the definition of the term "Non-Self-Governing Territory" was sufficiently clear. Although that question had been considered many times since 1946, no new definition had been given. He shared the doubts expressed at the 124th meeting by the representative of Thailand, who did not believe that the Special Committee would succeed in finding a more satisfactory definition. The United Kingdom Government thought that no clearer interpretation was necessary, since it had never disputed the fact that the provisions of Article 73 applied to the forty-three Non-Self-Governing Territories under British administration enumerated in the list drawn up in 1946. If, however, the Committee wished to try to find a better definition, the United Kingdom delegation would not oppose it.

5. If it was the intention that the Special Committee should be asked to define the term "Non-Self-Governing Territory", Mr. Fletcher-Cooke thought that a clearer wording should be found for the last paragraph of the Egyptian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.37/Rev.3). The United Kingdom delegation would not raise any objection in principle to an attempt to define the term "Non-Self-Governing Territory"; if, however, the intention of that paragraph was to request the General Assembly to decide whether particular territories were or were not Non-Self-Governing Territories, the United Kingdom delegation would oppose that, as the General Assembly had no power to take such action. The Administering Powers alone were entitled to determine whether a particular territory was or was not non-self-governing.

6. The third point related to the suggestion that the General Assembly was competent to pronounce itself upon the circumstances contemplated in the phrase contained in Article 73 e, which read "subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations may require." In the opinion of the United Kingdom delegation, the Administering Powers alone were entitled to decide whether constitutional considerations, as in the case of Malta, precluded the transmission of information under Article 73. He pointed out that none of the Committee, with the exception of the representative of Thailand, had defined their attitude on that matter. He repeated that the reasons for the inclusion of that limitation in Article 73 e had been clearly explained by the United Kingdom representative at the San Francisco Conference and had been accepted by the Conference. If, however, the members of the Committee wished to go back upon that point, they should explain their position. He could not agree with the interpretation given by the representative of Thailand at the 124th meeting; he hoped that the latter would find it possible to reconsider his position.

7. The United Kingdom representative again made it clear that the Administering Powers alone could decide on the scope of the limitation proclaimed in Article 73 e, as they alone were in a position to appraise the factors in the situation. The Committee should therefore accept the opinion of the Administering Powers on the question.

8. It was upon that thesis that the United Kingdom delegation based its objection to the Egyptian draft resolution. Its opposition was due in particular to the wording of the first paragraph of the operative part of the draft resolution; the Assembly might be entitled to express its opinion on the term "Non-Self-Governing Territory", but it was not entitled to give an opinion on considerations of a constitutional nature in a particular case. Although the United Kingdom delegation thought that the draft resolution would serve no useful purpose and shared the doubts of the representative of France as to the propriety of entrusting that task to the Special Committee, its opposition to the draft resolution would nevertheless be considerably reduced if the Egyptian delegation consented to delete the end of the first paragraph of the operative part, after the words "express its opinion" and to insert the words "on the meaning of the term 'Non-Self-Governing Territory'". If that suggestion was adopted, the last paragraph would have to be amended in order to make it clear that what was intended was a definition of the term "Non-Self-Governing Territory".

9. Mr. Fletcher-Cooke fully agreed with the Cuban representative's remark at the 124th meeting, that all the provisions of Article 73 e remained in force until a particular Non-Self-Governing Territory became fully self-governing. It was Mr. Fletcher-Cooke's contention that one of the provisions of Article 73 e, namely the constitutional reservation, remained in force and could preclude the transmission of information in a particular case.

10. The United Kingdom Government had not granted a constitution to Malta in order to justify the cessation of the transmission of information, but because it was in accordance with the United Kingdom's policy in that field, and also because it was in accordance with the provisions of Article 73 b of the Charter, according to which the Administering Powers had accepted as a sacred trust the obligation to assist the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the progressive development of their free political institutions. The United Kingdom Government therefore claimed the benefit of the reservation regarding the transmission of information contained in Article 73 e of the Charter.

11. In conclusion, the United Kingdom delegation objected to the draft resolution, not so much because it invited the General Assembly to define the term "Non-Self-Governing Territory", but because it suggested that the General Assembly had a right to decide whether or not the Administering Powers should transmit information concerning a particular territory. That right rested exclusively with the Administering Powers concerned.

12. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) considered that the Egyptian draft resolution was very important. The way in which some delegations were trying to weaken or to deny the obligatory character of the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter caused the Guatemalan delegation some concern. The Administering Powers had undertaken to respect the obligations arising from Article 73 e. It was for that reason that the majority of the Committee had been surprised to note that they were resorting to expedients to evade those obligations. It was not a question of knowing whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory was a colony or a protectorate; the point was whether a territory which was included in the list drawn up in 1946 was still subject to the same régime or whether its people had now attained a full measure of self-government. In the cases where changes had been made, it should be known whether they had been effected after the wishes of the people had been taken into account.

13. The United Nations had accepted a list of seventy-four Non-Self-Governing Territories, and it alone had the power to amend that list by deleting Territories which had become self-governing.

14. The Egyptian draft resolution was a safeguard against any tendency to render the provisions of Chapter XI inoperative. The General Assembly should take urgent measures to oppose any attempt to weaken respect for the provisions of the Charter. For that reason the Guatemalan delegation supported the draft resolution.

15. In conclusion, Mr. Mendoza stated that his delegation had complete confidence in the good faith of the Administering Powers, but he was anxious that the principle of the paramount authority of the United Nations should be safeguarded.

16. Mr. HOOD (Australia) was surprised that the representative of Guatemala had stated that there had been a tendency to render the provisions of Chapter XI inoperative. The discussions in the Fourth Committee and the Special Committee seemed to prove the contrary. The draft resolutions already adopted were based on a wider interpretation of Chapter XI than that current when the Charter had been signed.

17. The Egyptian draft resolution would confront the Special Committee with a difficult task, since the text was not clear. Moreover, the proposals made in it were premature and did not seem to take into account the attitude of the Administering Powers. He would therefore vote against the draft resolution as it stood.

18. As regards the question of the status of Non-Self-Governing Territories, Mr. Hood considered that it was for the Administering Powers alone to decide whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory had attained a full measure of self-government.

19. He would like the Egyptian representative to explain in particular the meaning of the two paragraphs of the operative part of his draft resolution. The provisions of the first operative paragraph were not consistent with those of the second. The United Kingdom representative had drawn the attention of members of the Committee to the ambiguity of the phrase "which should be taken into account in deciding". It should be stated whether the decision would be taken by the General Assembly or by the Administering Powers themselves. Furthermore, Mr. Hood did not understand why in the first operative paragraph "principles" were mentioned, while the second operative paragraph mentioned "factors". It seemed that those two words referred to the same thing, and it was not clear what role would be played by the Special Committee once the General Assembly had given its opinion.

20. Mr. FARRAG (Egypt) recalled that the United Kingdom representative had stated that if the Administering Powers were bound to respect the provisions of Chapter XI, so were the other Powers. Mr. Farrag emphasized in that connexion that no one wished to go beyond the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter, but simply desired that those provisions should be strictly observed.

21. The United Kingdom representative had stated that the limitation required by constitutional considerations applied to the case of Malta. Mr. Farrag thought that it was a question of interpretation. The representatives of Mexico and Thailand had already expressed their opinion on the point. Constitutional considerations could not justify an infringement of the provisions of the Charter, and constitutions must comply with, and not contradict those provisions.

22. The United Kingdom representative thought that the Special Committee would not be able to carry out the task to be entrusted to it, namely, to study "factors which should be taken into account. . .", and that it could not do any better than Sub-Committee 2 in 1946. Mr. Farrag pointed out that the task of Sub-Committee 2 had merely been to draw up the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories; it had not been asked to study the question of the criteria which would now be entrusted to the Special Committee.

23. He saw no ambiguity in his draft resolution, which reproduced in substance an idea put forward in 1946 by the Australian representative.

24. The Egyptian representative regretted that he could not accept the suggestion made by the United Kingdom representative with regard to the first paragraph of the operative part, since such a modification would render the draft ineffective.

25. Mr. MACEachen (Uruguay) proposed, following modification of the first operative paragraph in the manner suggested by the United Kingdom representative and subject to the latter's acceptance of his proposal, that the last part of the fifth paragraph after the words "to examine" should be deleted and replaced by the phrase: "in the light of the opinion expressed in the previous paragraph, the list of territories in connexion with which information has been received under Article 73 e of the Charter; and inform the General Assembly of the result of this study".

26. Mr. GARREAU (France) asked whether the Egyptian representative had thought of bringing his draft resolution into line with the draft resolution adopted by the Committee at its 122nd meeting regarding the establishment of a special committee on information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. The General Assembly in that resolution would invite the special committee to examine the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Egyptian draft resolution, however, would entrust the Special Committee with functions, the carrying out of which would require the Administering Powers to transmit to the Special Committee information of a political nature not envisaged in Article 73 e of the Charter.

27. There was therefore a glaring contradiction between the very precise mandate of the Special Committee and the functions with which the Egyptian draft resolution would entrust it.

28. Mr. KOLENKY (Liberia) noted that the Egyptian draft resolution had been the least criticized of those before the Fourth Committee, a fact which proved that it was in conformity with the Charter and deserved support from the majority of the Committee. The Liberian delegation would vote for the text proposed by Egypt and amended by Thailand at the 124th meeting.

29. Prince WAN WAITHAYAKON (Thailand) regretted that he was unable to change his point of view, as requested by the United Kingdom representative. He was convinced, after a fresh examination of the text of the Charter, that the wording used clearly showed that the General Assembly had the right to determine whether the constitutional considerations which might be invoked by the Administering Powers were or were not well founded.

30. Mr. FLETCHER-COOKE (United Kingdom) upheld his interpretation regarding the reservation in Article 73 e of the Charter.

31. As regards the proposed Uruguayan amendment, Mr. Fletcher-Cooke repeated that in his opinion the Special Committee was not competent to define what was meant by a "Non-Self-Governing Territory". In that connexion he shared the views of the French representative. He was therefore unable to vote for any draft resolution which assumed that the Special Committee had such competence.

32. Moreover, there was a technical difficulty connected with the Uruguayan amendment, in that it was hard to see how the Special Committee could consider the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the light of the General Assembly's opinion, when the latter opinion had not yet been formulated.

33. Nor could the United Kingdom delegation agree to any definition of "Non-Self-Governing Territory" being applied to a specific territory. Such a definition could serve only as an indication for the Administering Powers.

34. Mr. MACEachen (Uruguay) recalled that the United Kingdom representative had been unable to agree that the Special Committee should give a definition applicable to any particular territory. However, according to the first paragraph of the operative part of the Egyptian draft resolution, amended in accordance with the proposal of the Uruguayan representative, the decision as to the meaning of "Non-Self-Governing Territory" should be given by the General Assembly. If the Special Committee, for its part, were to examine the list of territories, not only would it be acting as a subsidiary organ of the General Assembly and within the powers thus conferred upon it, but it would obviously take into account, in making that examination, any opinion that the General Assembly might have expressed on the question. As a subsidiary organ, the Special Committee would have to inform the General Assembly, and therefore public opinion, on the degree to which the principles contained in Chapter XI of the Charter were being implemented and observed.

35. He was anxious to point out that his proposal did not indicate the possible results of the Special Committee's examination, but simply recommended that that Committee should study the question, taking into account the opinion expressed by the General Assembly.

36. Major-General BURNS (Canada) said that the populations of many territories that were not at that time self-governing would finally attain a full measure of self-government and that it was interesting to know exactly at what moment and under what conditions a territory could be declared to be self-governing. Such a decision could not, however, be taken by the Special Committee. There was no reason to think that it could secure better results in that matter than the Fourth Committee. The Special Committee was not the appropriate organ to consider such a question; it had been established to carry out a certain well-defined task and the Canadian delegation had voted for its establishment for that purpose. If the Special Committee was required to undertake an additional task, it might well be hindered in carrying out the work for which it had been specially set up.

37. General Burns pointed out that the report of the Special Committee (A/923) showed that, during its 1949 session, the representatives of Egypt, India, the Dominican Republic, Venezuela and others, had expressed the view that it was not competent to decide whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory had achieved autonomy or independence. He saw no reason why, at the forthcoming session of the Special Committee, any view different from that expressed during the preceding session could be expected. The Egyptian draft resolution had no practical value and he would not vote for it. Furthermore, he did not think that the amendment proposed by the representative of Uruguay either clarified the text or made it more precise.

38. Mr. DE BRUYNE (Belgium) noted that the representatives of Australia and the United Kingdom had, like himself, expressed doubts as to the exact meaning of the second paragraph of the operative part of the Egyptian draft resolution. The representative of Egypt had stated during the meeting that the text of his draft resolution was clear to him. In the opinion of the Belgian representative, however, the meaning of the paragraph in question was becoming more and more ambiguous and he asked whether, in the phrase "the factors which should be taken into account", it was the General Assembly or the Member States which were to take the factors into account.

39. Mr. FARRAG (Egypt) agreed that he had considered the Special Committee as not competent during its 1949 session but, in reply to the representative of Canada, he said that it was precisely in order that the Committee should become competent to consider the question that he had submitted his draft resolution.

40. With regard to the observations made by the Belgian representative, he said that the Fourth Committee had drawn attention in 1946 to the advisability of indicating the criteria for determining what territories came under the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter. Subsequently, Governments had expressed an opinion regarding such criteria, and logically it seemed to be the duty of the Special Committee to consider the question and decide on those criteria.

41. At the request of Mr. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), Mr. BENSON (Secretariat) read out the first and second paragraphs of the operative part of the Egyptian draft resolution, as amended by the representative of Uruguay.

42. Mr. CARPIO (Philippines) pointed out that the opinion had been expressed that it was for the Administering Powers alone to determine what constitutional considerations or security requirements might entitle them to cease to transmit information on any particular Non-Self-Governing Territories. But were the Administering Powers to abuse that prerogative or to decide in an arbitrary fashion to cease to transmit information on certain territories, a line of conduct which might lead to a situation where no information at all would be transmitted on any of the seventy-four territories listed, Mr. Carpio wondered whether the Administering Powers would even then maintain that the United Nations was not entitled to take any action or to carry out any investigation.

43. Mr. FLETCHER-COOKE (United Kingdom) was pleased that the Cuban representative had asked for the new text of the first operative paragraph to be read out. He noted that the suggestion he had previously made had been used in such a way that he could no longer recognize it as his own. He had in fact suggested the deletion of the whole final part of the paragraph following the words "express its opinion" and the insertion of the words "on the meaning of the term 'Non-Self-Governing Territory'". He noted that the idea which had appeared in the original text, namely, the obligation to transmit the information referred to under Article 73 e of the Charter, had been reintroduced. He was unable to accept the new text of the paragraph drafted in that way.

44. In reply to the remarks made by the Philippine representative, Mr. Fletcher-Cooke recalled that the Administering Powers had accepted the obligation to transmit information on the Non-Self-Governing Territories administered by them, subject to certain limitations. The United Kingdom intended to respect that obligation, and he regretted the implication that the Administering Powers might shirk their obligations.

45. Mr. CARPIO (Philippines) was afraid that his question had been misunderstood. He did not mean to imply that the Administering Powers would necessarily decide in an arbitrary way to cease to transmit information by taking advantage of the limitations referred to in Article 73 e; but he pointed out that the Charter itself implicitly foresaw the possibility that Member States might show some evidence of bad faith. He wished to make it clear, however, that he had not intended to allude to any particular State.

46. Mr. MUGHIR (Syria) pointed out that the Egyptian draft resolution raised the question of the competence of the General Assembly to decide whether a territory was independent or not. He considered that sub-paragraph e of Article 73 was not the only sub-paragraph which placed obligations on the Administering Powers. The other parts of that Article also imposed certain obligations, for they were based on the main principles of the Charter. Mr. Mughir thought that the Egyptian draft resolution would greatly facilitate the Special Committee's work. Moreover, the fact that that Committee would have to examine "the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government" would make it possible for the Fourth Committee to avoid being once more in the position of trying to ascertain the reasons for which any particular Administering Power had ceased to transmit information. Mr. Mughir said that his delegation would vote unreservedly in favour of the Egyptian draft resolution.

47. Mr. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) paid a tribute to the contribution made to the Committee's work by the Uruguayan delegation but he regretted that, in that particular case, he was unable to approve the amendment just proposed by that delegation. The first paragraph of the operative part of the Egyptian draft resolution set forth a general principle in recognizing the competence of the General Assembly. The final paragraph was the crux of the problem, for it laid down the procedure which the General Assembly might use in order to give its views concrete form, a procedure which enabled it to refer the matter to a subsidiary organ, which was in conformity with the provisions of Article 22 of the Charter. The amendment submitted by the Uruguayan delegation was, however, not clear in itself and weakened the value of the draft resolution. What it did was to recommend that the Special Committee should study the relevant factors in the light of the opinion formulated by the General Assembly to which reference was made in the first operative paragraph. But no such opinion was formulated in that paragraph, which, in point of fact, merely recognized the General Assembly's right to formulate an opinion. The Special Committee, therefore, would not really have before it the views of the General Assembly.

48. The Uruguayan amendment was not acceptable for still another reason: it referred only to the list of territories on which information had been transmitted, whereas it would, on the contrary, have been interesting to examine the list of territories on which no information had been transmitted.

49. The delegation of Cuba could not therefore support the Uruguayan amendment, but would vote for the original text of the Egyptian draft resolution.

50. Mr. MACEachEN (Uruguay) thought that it might be possible to meet the point raised by the representative of Cuba by adding the words "and therefore decides to express an opinion" after the words "express its opinion" in the first operative paragraph of the draft resolution.

51. He further pointed out that the provisions of the Egyptian draft resolution exceeded the powers of the General Assembly. The delegation of Uruguay considered that the General Assembly could not express an opinion on the principles which guided, or had guided, Administering Powers in listing territories in respect of which they were obliged to transmit information. On the other hand, the General Assembly could define the nature of a Non-Self-Governing Territory without thereby trespassing on the national jurisdiction of certain States. Mr. MacEachen thought that only the General Assembly and the Fourth Committee were competent to put forward opinions based, first, on the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories and, secondly, on the nature of the territories on which the Administering Powers were obliged to transmit information.

52. Mr. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) pointed out that the new change suggested by the representative of Uruguay did not do away with the difficulty to which he had drawn the attention of the meeting. While it was stated that the General Assembly could express its opinion, nothing was said as to the nature of that opinion.

53. Mr. FARRAG (Egypt) regretted that he could not accept the changes proposed by the representative of Uruguay. He thought they greatly weakened the text of his draft resolution and reduced its scope by omitting the Non-Self-Governing Territories about which no information was transmitted.

54. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) considered that it was useless for the meeting to expend its energy in vain conjecture as to the definitions of the term "Non-Self-Governing Territories", which the Charter itself defined clearly and specifically. The real problem was to decide whether a given territory had actually reached a level of autonomy or independence which would permit the responsible Administering Power to cease to transmit information about it. The General Assembly had a list of the territories about which the Administering Powers had agreed to transmit information and it was natural that, when an Administering Power ceased to submit information on any of those territories, the General Assembly should seek to know why.

55. The question became serious when an Administering Power ceased to transmit information on a Non-Self-Governing Territory, although it was obvious that the population of that territory was not as yet in complete charge of its own administration.

56. For those reasons the delegation of Guatemala could not support the Uruguayan amendment, but would vote for the Egyptian draft resolution.

57. Mr. Shiva RAO (India) regretted that the discussion had come to bear mainly on legal subtleties, which tended to obscure the purely human aspect of the question.

58. The draft resolution put forward by the delegation of Egypt aimed simply at stating that "it was within the responsibility of the General Assembly to express its opinion". Such a claim did not seem unreasonable. The General Assembly was the supreme authority on the interpretation of the Charter and its opinion should be received with the consideration it deserved.

59. The General Assembly would then invite the Special Committee to examine the "factors which should be taken into account". So important and delicate a task could only be adequately accomplished with the help of the Secretariat, which should be asked to supply the Special Committee with all the necessary working documents.

60. Undoubtedly, the examination of the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory was or was not self-governing, was within the province of the General Assembly. Such a study seemed essential in view of the fact that the number of Non-Self-Governing Territories had fallen from seventy-four to sixty-two since 1946. Another point which would have to be considered was whether the examination carried out by the General Assembly, or by the Special Committee created for the purpose, would lead to positive conclusions or merely to an expression of opinion.

61. Mr. Rao drew attention to the concluding words of sub-paragraph e of Article 73 of the Charter. They made it perfectly clear that it was the duty of Administering Powers to submit information on all territories other than Trust Territories. The representative of the United Kingdom had instanced the case of Malta, admitting that that territory was not yet wholly self-governing, since the United Kingdom was still responsible for such matters as Maltese diplomatic relations. Malta therefore belonged in the category of territories on which information had to be transmitted in accordance with the provisions of Article 73 of the Charter. If, for constitutional reasons, the Government of the United Kingdom believed that it was not bound to transmit information, it should notify the Special Committee set up by the General Assembly. That Committee would then have to ascertain whether, in fact, the Constitution of Malta was one of the factors of which account had to be taken in order to decide to what extent the population of the island was self-governing and to justify the cessation of the transmission of information. Mr. Rao emphasized that he had cited the example of Malta, but that the situation was identical with regard to all Territories in similar circumstances.

62. He concluded by stating that the draft resolution submitted by Egypt was particularly opportune under existing conditions and that he would vote for it.

63. Mr. NORIEGA (Mexico) observed that legal considerations were not always the deciding factor in settling all questions. In the case under discussion, if interpretation of the Charter was based only on the consideration of purely legal criteria, no concrete solution would be reached, because the interpretations made on such a basis might differ completely. The first prerequisite was the demonstration of good faith and a spirit of collaboration.

64. If the Administering Powers believed that the views of the General Assembly on the definition of the expression "Non-Self-Governing Territories" had merely an academic value, they would be running the risk of thus discrediting the General Assembly and rendering futile and purposeless the work of the Fourth Committee and the General Assembly itself.

65. The definition of the expression "Non-Self-Governing Territory" should not give rise to any great difficulties. After receiving the text of the agreement between the Netherlands and the Republic of Indonesia, it had been possible to conclude immediately that Indonesia had become a sovereign State about which there could be no question of transmitting information under Article 73 of the Charter. On the other hand, when the United Kingdom stated that Malta was not yet entirely administering its own affairs, the logical conclusion appeared to be that it was a Non-Self-Governing Territory about which the Power responsible must transmit information under Article 73 of the Charter. The situation was identical with regard to all territories which, like Malta, had not yet won autonomy or complete independence.

66. He was perfectly well aware that the representative of Uruguay had submitted his amendment in order to mitigate certain difficulties and thus obviate objections from the Administering Powers. He thought, however, that that amendment would not make the draft resolution any more acceptable to them. It therefore appeared more advisable to retain the text of the Egyptian draft resolution, which was clear and exact. If that text was adopted by the General Assembly, the Administering Powers would perhaps later appreciate the fact that the situation had been clearly defined.

67. The Mexican delegation would therefore vote for the current text of the draft resolution submitted by the Egyptian delegation.

68. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote first, the Uruguayan amendment, and secondly, the Egyptian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.37/Rev.3).

The Uruguayan amendment was rejected by 28 votes to 1, with 16 abstentions.

At the request of the Brazilian representative, a vote was taken by roll-call on the Egyptian draft resolution.

In favour: Afghanistan, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, China, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Guatemala, India, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, France, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

Abstaining: Argentina, Chile, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Greece, United States of America, Uruguay.

The Egyptian draft resolution was adopted by 30 votes to 10, with 7 abstentions.

69. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) explained his vote. If the vote had been taken on the draft resolution paragraph by paragraph, he would have voted for most of the paragraphs; since, however, the vote had been taken on the text as a whole, he had been obliged to abstain, because he believed that the Special Committee was not competent to study the question involved. If the General Assembly, which was competent, approved the draft resolution and delegated its powers to a subsidiary organ, the Special Committee, the delegation of the Dominican Republic would then recognize the competence of the latter.

The meeting rose at 6 p.m.

567 (VI). Future procedure for the continuation of the study of factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government

The General Assembly,

Recalling that, in resolution 334 (IV) adopted on 2 December 1949, the General Assembly invited any special committee which might be appointed on information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to examine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government,

Having examined the report on the matter prepared by the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter,²⁶

Having undertaken a revision of the above-mentioned factors,

Considering that the production of a more definitive list of factors involves protracted and complex studies on the basis of more complete information than was available in 1951,

1. Decides to take as a basis the list of factors drawn up at the sixth session of the General Assembly, which list is annexed to the present resolution;

2. Invites the Members of the United Nations to transmit in writing to the Secretary-General, by 1 May 1952, a statement of the views of their governments on the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government;

4. Invites the Ad Hoc Committee to take into account all information available, including that transmitted to the Secretary-General on the reasons which have led certain Administering Members to cease to transmit information on certain of these territories, and to submit a report to the General Assembly at its seventh regular session;

5. Invites the Secretary-General to convene the Ad Hoc Committee in order that it may begin its work one week before the opening of the 1952 session of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.²⁷

ANNEX

INTRODUCTION

1. The territories which are covered by Chapter XI of the Charter are those territories whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government. It may be noted that the expression "self-government" is qualified in the Charter by the words "full measure" in the English text, "complète-ment" in the French text, and "plenitud" in the Spanish text.

2. The task of the General Assembly, at present, is to indicate the factors which should be taken into account in determining whether the result of the advancement of the people of any given territory is such that that territory has reached a stage of self-government where it falls outside the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter.

3. The condition under which the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter cease to apply will be that the inhabitants of the territory have attained, through political advancement, a full measure of self-government. The fulfilment of this condition may be achieved by various means, involving in all cases the expression of the free will of the people. The two principal means are (a) the attainment of independence and (b) the union of the territory on a footing of equal status with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country or its association on the same conditions with the metropolitan or other country or countries. The extent to which the provisions of Article 73 e continue to apply in the case of territories which have become neither independent nor fully integrated within another State but which have already attained a full measure of self-government in their internal affairs is a question which merits further study.

4. The two principal forms of political advancement, mentioned in the above paragraph, call for the consideration of different factors in determining whether a territory has or has not reached a stage of self-government where it falls outside the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter.

5. Accordingly, the General Assembly lists under two separate headings below the factors to be taken into account, stressing that the list cannot be regarded as exhaustive or definitive, and that a single factor or particular combination of factors cannot be regarded as decisive in every case. Whether the peoples of a territory should be regarded as having reached a stage of self-government where there is no longer any obligation to transmit information should be solved in the light of the conditions enumerated under either of the two headings, taking into account the circumstances of each particular case, which will need to be studied separately.

6. Nevertheless, the General Assembly considers that the essential factors to be taken into account in deciding whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory has attained a full measure of self-government are the following:

- (i) Political advancement: Political advancement of the population sufficient to enable them to decide upon the future destiny of the territory with due knowledge;
- (ii) Opinion of the population: The opinion of the population of the Territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.

7. These factors apply both to Non-Self-Governing Territories which have achieved independence and to Non-Self-Governing Territories which have freely united or associated themselves on a footing of equal status with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country or countries. In the latter case, however, the following factors are also essential and should be taken into account:

- (i) Legislative representation: Representation without discrimination in the central legislative organs on the same basis as other inhabitants and regions;
- (ii) Citizenship: Citizenship without discrimination on the same basis as other inhabitants.

I. FACTORS INDICATIVE OF THE ATTAINMENT OF INDEPENDENCE OR OTHER SEPARATE SYSTEM OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

A. GENERAL

1. Political advancement: Political advancement of the population sufficient to enable them to decide upon the future destiny of the territory with due knowledge.

2. Opinion of the population: The opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.

B. INTERNATIONAL STATUS

1. Independence: The attainment of independence by the territory, or complete control over its external relations and internal affairs.

2. Eligibility for membership in international organizations: Eligibility for membership in the United Nations or for membership or associate membership in other international organizations; representation by delegates selected by the territorial government.

3. General international relations: Power to enter into direct relations of every kind with other governments and with international institutions, and to negotiate, sign and ratify international conventions.

3. Economic and social jurisdiction: Complete autonomy in respect of economic and social affairs.

²⁷ The General Assembly decided, by resolution 569 (VI), that the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter should henceforth be known as the "Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories".

II. FACTORS INDICATIVE OF THE FREE ASSOCIATION (WHETHER IN A FEDERAL OR UNITARY RELATIONSHIP) OF A TERRITORY ON EQUAL STATUS WITH OTHER COMPONENT PARTS OF THE METROPOLITAN OR OTHER COUNTRY

A. GENERAL

1. Political advancement: Political advancement of the population sufficient to enable them to decide upon the future destiny of the territory with due knowledge.

2. Opinion of the population: The opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.

5. Constitutional considerations: Association (a) by virtue of the constitution of the metropolitan country or (b) by virtue of a treaty or bilateral agreement affecting the status of the territory, taking into account (i) whether the constitutional guarantees extend equally to the associated territory, (ii) whether there are constitutional fields reserved to the territory, and (iii) whether there is provision for the participation of the territory on a basis of equality in any changes in the constitutional system of the State.

B. STATUS

1. Legislative representation: Representation without discrimination in the central legislative organs on the same basis as other inhabitants and regions.

2. Citizenship: Citizenship without discrimination on the same basis as other inhabitants.

3. Government officials: Appointment or election of officials from the territory on the same basis as those from other parts of the country.

3. Local officials: Appointment or election of officials in the territory on the same basis as those in other parts of the country.

4. Internal legislation: Complete legislative autonomy of the territory, by means of electoral and representative systems, in all matters which in accordance with the normal terms of association are, in the case of non-unitary systems, not reserved to the central government.

President : Mr. Luis PADILLA NERVO (Mexico).

Consideration of the various items on the agenda of the meeting

1. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish) : The Assembly's agenda for this meeting consists of the reports of the Fourth Committee, which has finished its work, and a report of the First Committee. Before we proceed to consider these reports, I ought to consult the Assembly regarding the application of rule 67 of the rules of procedure which reads as follows :

" Discussion of a report of a Main Committee in a plenary meeting of the General Assembly shall take place if at least one-third of the Members present and voting at the plenary meeting consider such a discussion to be necessary. Any proposal to this effect shall not be debated, but shall be immediately put to the vote. "

2. Does any representative wish to propose that there should be a debate on any one of the first seven items on our agenda ?

It was decided not to discuss the first seven items (items 12, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36 and 37).

3. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish) : Naturally the decision just taken does not deprive representatives of the right to explain their votes on each item.

4. Now we come to the eighth item on which the representative of the Union of South Africa has asked for a debate. Accordingly I ask the Assembly to decide by a vote whether the eighth item should be debated.

It was decided to discuss the eighth item (item 38), there being 17 votes in favour, 18 against, with 12 abstentions.

5. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish) : There is another item on our agenda, the ninth, which is the report of the First Committee on measures to combat the threat of a new world war and to strengthen peace and friendship among the nations.

6. Is there a proposal in favour of discussing this item ?

It was decided not to discuss the ninth item (item 67).

100. In regard to this matter, three questions were referred by this Assembly to the Fourth Committee under agenda item 36 : Economic conditions and development in Non-Self-Governing Territories ; Summary and analysis of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter ; and Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

101. So far as the item on economic conditions and development in Non-Self-Governing Territories is concerned, a draft resolution I is now submitted to the Assembly which approves the report of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on this matter, and invites the Secretary-General to communicate this report for further consideration to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories to the Economic and Social Council, the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned. In drafting this resolution the Fourth Committee followed the same procedure as in the fifth session when it dealt with the report on education referred to it by the Special Committee. Taking into account the fact that many economic problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories are similar to those affecting the under-developed areas of the world, the Special Committee referred in its report to the relevant resolutions of the Economic and Social Council dealing with such questions as flow of capital in under-developed areas, land reform, etc.

102. Draft resolution II takes note of the report of the Special Committee covering its 1951 session and approves the arrangements for its work in 1952. After having dealt with educational problems in 1950 and economic development in 1951, the Special Committee will take up questions relating to the social field in 1952.

103. Draft resolution III aims at associating Non-Self-Governing Territories more closely with the work of the Special Committee, and that Committee is invited to examine the possibility of such closer participation.

104. Draft resolution IV deals with future procedure for the continuation of the study of factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government. It decided to take as a basis the list of factors drawn up by the Sub-Committee 9 appointed by the Fourth Committee to study the factors, the list of which is annexed to the resolution. It also invites Members of the United Nations to transmit in writing to the Secretary-General a statement of the views of their governments on that problem, and it appoints an ad hoc committee in order to carry out a further study of the factors. This question, through one of its aspects, is linked with the problem of cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter generally.

105. Draft resolution V, more particularly, deals with the cessation of the transmission of information in respect of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam. It expresses an appreciation to the Government of the Netherlands for communicating full information in compliance with General Assembly resolution 222 (III). Finally, the draft resolution decides to refer the matter to the next session of the General Assembly having regard to the fact that by that time the ad hoc committee on factors will have further clarified the question which it has been asked to study, and that a round table conference of the representatives of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam is to be held in March 1952 to decide upon the new constitutional order.

106. Draft resolution VI suggests that in order to be more conducive to a wide publicity, the title of the Special Committee should, without affecting its terms of reference,

Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories :
(a) economic conditions and development in Non-Self-Governing Territories ; (b) summary and analysis of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter ; (c) information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter : report of the Fourth Committee (A/2057)

99. Mr. LANNUNG (Denmark) (Rapporteur of the Fourth Committee) : I have the honour to submit to the General Assembly the report on information from Non-Self-Governing Territories as unanimously adopted by the Fourth Committee.

be abbreviated to read "Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories". Further, on behalf of the General Assembly, the Committee elected Ecuador and Indonesia as members of the Special Committee in place of Mexico and the Philippines.

107. As I am at this rostrum perhaps the President will allow me, as the representative of DENMARK, to say that I and many of my colleagues in the Fourth Committee consider draft resolution IV concerning factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government is an important question both in the general sense and, more particularly, in the sense of Article 18 of the Charter. We should, therefore, like to suggest that paragraph 2 of Article 18 of the Charter and rule 84 of the rules of procedure should be applied to draft resolution IV concerning factors.

108. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): I call upon the representative of Cuba, on a point of order.

109. Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) (translated from Spanish): I wish only to raise a point regarding the procedure suggested by the representative of Denmark for the vote on draft resolution IV. He asks that it should be considered as an important question and hence subject to special voting rules. But I would respectfully point out that the draft resolution is concerned only with future procedure and not with the substance of the question. Consequently, my delegation does not believe that it would be logical, at the present stage, to raise the question whether the resolution should be regarded as involving an important question. At the present stage it is still merely a matter of the procedure to be adopted in our future work.

110. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): The report of the Fourth Committee [A/2057] contains six draft resolutions recommended for adoption by the General Assembly. We shall vote separately on each draft resolution.

111. I now put to the vote draft resolution I.

Draft resolution I was adopted by 48 votes to 5, with 1 abstention.

112. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): We shall now proceed to the vote on draft resolution II, which was approved by the Fourth Committee without opposition. If there are no objections, I shall consider it adopted.

Draft resolution II was adopted without discussion.

113. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): I put to the vote draft resolution III.

Draft resolution III was adopted by 47 votes to 2, with 7 abstentions.

114. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): We shall vote next on draft resolution IV.

Draft resolution IV was adopted by 46 votes to none, with 7 abstentions.

115. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): We shall now vote on draft resolution V.

116. I call upon the representative of the Netherlands who wishes to explain his vote.

117. Mr. KERNKAMP (Netherlands): We should like to ask for a separate vote on paragraph 3 of this draft resolution, and at the same time I should like to explain my vote on this item. I shall be very brief, because we have already explained the position of my Government with reference to this draft resolution in the Fourth Committee.

118. We do not object to the so-called factors being studied. I mean, of course, factors which have to be taken into account to decide whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have attained a full measure of self-government. We fully approve that such a list of factors should be drawn up, but we can only accept such a list as a guide as, in our view, it only presents indications.

119. We remain convinced that legally it is for the administering Powers to decide on constitutional grounds if a given territory falls, at a certain time, outside the scope of Article 73 e. We feel sure that the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam have already attained a full measure of self-government, and their democratic governments themselves agree. Therefore, we are opposed to mentioning, in paragraph 3 of the draft resolution, the forthcoming round table conference because, important as this round table conference is in itself in respect to the reconstruction of the Netherlands kingdom, in our view this round table conference is irrelevant in view of the self-government that is already existing with respect to the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam.

120. Therefore, we shall vote against paragraph 3 of this draft resolution, and abstain from voting on the draft resolution as a whole.

121. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): The representative of the Netherlands has requested a separate vote on paragraph 3 of the operative part of draft resolution V. I shall put the paragraph to the vote.

Paragraph 3 of the operative part was adopted by 41 votes to 7, with 8 abstentions.

122. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): I shall put draft resolution V as a whole to the vote.

Draft resolution V as a whole was adopted by 47 votes to none, with 9 abstentions.

123. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): Draft resolution VI, which was approved by the Fourth Committee without opposition, proposes to modify the present name of the Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. If there are no objections, I shall consider this draft resolution as adopted.

Draft resolution VI was adopted without discussion.

/9. The following

9. The following texts were submitted on this subject:

- I. A joint draft resolution submitted by Denmark and Pakistan (A/C.4/L.151), the operative part of which would provide that the General Assembly:
 - (1) decides to accept as an interim guide for all useful purposes the Report of the Special Committee; (2) invites Member States of the United Nations to transmit in writing to the Secretary-General, by 1 June 1952, a statement of the views of their Governments on the factors which ought to be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government; (3) requests the Secretary-General, to that end, to transmit a copy of this resolution, together with a copy of part four of the report of the Special Committee to all Member States; (4) invites the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter, at its 1952 session, to consider any statements transmitted in accordance with the present resolution and to review the list produced by it in 1951 in the light of those statements; (5) invites the Special Committee, to this end, to appoint a sub-committee at the beginning of its 1952 session to prepare a report on these matters for submission to the Special Committee.
- II. A draft resolution submitted by Guatemala (A/C.4/L.152) whereby the Fourth Committee would establish a sub-committee to (1) study, and define in a draft resolution, the basic and general factors to be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government; (2) consider the advisability of establishing a committee to (a) study these factors in greater detail; (b) analyse the cases of Territories which in the opinion of certain Administering Powers have attained a full measure of self-government; and (c) recommend suitable resolutions to the General Assembly at its next session.
- III. The representative of Guatemala subsequently revised the previous resolution by providing that the proposed sub-committee would study the problem in the light of the Special Committee's report and the Fourth Committee's discussions and would submit its report to the Fourth Committee at the present session (A/C.4/L.152/Rev.1).

/IV. A draft

- IV. A draft resolution submitted by Venezuela (A/C.4/L.153), the operative part of which provided that the General Assembly should resolve (1) to reaffirm the principles stated in General Assembly resolution 334 (IV) of 2 December 1949 on the competence of the Assembly with regard to the examination of information transmitted in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter by the Powers administering Non-Self-Governing Territories; (2) to appoint a Special Committee consisting of the representatives of _____ to carry out during 1952, a detailed study of (a) the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government; (b) the cases of Territories which have, in the opinion of certain Administering Powers, attained a full measure of self-government; (3) to postpone consideration of chapters XI and XII of part one and the whole of part four of the report of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter until the Special Committee referred to in the present resolution has submitted its report; (4) to instruct the Special Committee appointed under the present resolution to complete its report not later than 15 August 1952.
- V. An amendment proposed by Uruguay (A/C.4/L.154) to add the following sub-paragraph in paragraph 2 of the draft resolution submitted by Venezuela:

"(c) The possibility of setting up a permanent body with instructions to report to the General Assembly and in each case to propose a resolution with respect to the points referred to in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) above."

10. Following consultations between the sponsors of the above-mentioned draft resolutions, the following joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.155) was submitted by Denmark, Guatemala, Pakistan and Venezuela:

"The Fourth Committee

"Resolves to establish a sub-committee consisting of the representatives of _____ to:

"1. Study, in the light of the Special Committee's report and of the discussions in the Fourth Committee, the basic and general factors to be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government;

"2. Consider the advisability of establishing procedures for the further examination of the problem, taking into account the draft resolutions on this subject which have been submitted to the Fourth Committee in documents A/C.4/L.151, A.C.4/L.152, A/C.4/L.152/Rev.1, A/C.4/L.153 and A/C.4/L.154."

12. The Sub-Committee (Sub-Committee 9) elected Mr. Awni Khalidy (Iraq) and Mr. Guy Perez Cisneros (Cuba) as Chairman and Rapporteur respectively. It held eleven meetings and approved a report (A/C.4/L.180 and Corr.2) for submission to the Fourth Committee. The report concluded with a draft resolution providing that the General Assembly should (1) take as a basis the list of factors drawn up by the Sub-Committee; (2) invite Members to transmit their views on the problem of factors by 1 May 1952; (3) appoint an ad hoc committee of eight members to carry out further studies; (4) invite the proposed ad hoc committee to take into account all information available and to submit a report to the seventh regular session of the General Assembly, and (5) invite the Secretary-General to convene the ad hoc committee so that it might begin its work one week before the opening of the 1952 session of the Special Committee.

13. At its 241st meeting, the Committee examined the report of the Sub-Committee. It decided to increase the number of members of the proposed ad hoc committee from eight to ten, the membership to be Australia, Belgium, Burma, Cuba, Denmark, France, Guatemala, Iraq, the United States of America and Venezuela. Subject to this modification, the Committee adopted the draft resolution proposed by the Sub-Committee by a roll-call vote of 39 to none, with 6 abstentions, as follows:

Resolution IV

FUTURE PROCEDURE FOR THE CONTINUATION OF THE STUDY OF FACTORS WHICH SHOULD BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN DECIDING WHETHER A TERRITORY IS OR IS NOT A TERRITORY WHOSE PEOPLE HAVE NOT YET ATTAINED A FULL MEASURE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

The General Assembly,

Recalling that in resolution 334 (IV), adopted on 2 December 1949, the General Assembly invited any special committee which might be appointed on information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to examine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government,

Having examined the report on the matter prepared by the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter,

Having undertaken a revision of these factors,

Considering that the production of a more definitive list of factors involves protracted and complex studies on the basis of more complete information than was available in 1951,

1. Decides to take as a basis the list of factors drawn up at the sixth session of the General Assembly, which list is annexed to the present resolution;
2. Invites the Members of the United Nations to transmit in writing to the Secretary-General, by 1 May 1952, a statement of the views of their Governments on the factors which ought to be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government;
3. Appoints an Ad Hoc Committee of ten members comprising Australia, Belgium, Burma, Cuba, Denmark, France, Guatemala, Iraq, United States of America and Venezuela in order to carry out a further study of the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government;
4. Invites the Ad Hoc Committee to take into account all information available, including that transmitted to the Secretary-General on the reasons which have led certain Administering Members to cease to transmit information on certain of these Territories, and to submit a report to the seventh regular session of the General Assembly;

/5. Invites

5. Invites the Secretary-General to convene the Ad Hoc Committee in order that it may begin its work one week before the opening of the 1952 session of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

ANNEX

FACTORS WHICH SHOULD BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN DECIDING WHETHER A TERRITORY IS OR IS NOT A TERRITORY WHOSE PEOPLE HAVE NOT YET ATTAINED A FULL MEASURE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

Introduction

1. The Territories which are covered by Chapter XI of the Charter are those Territories whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government. It may be noted that the expression "self-government" is qualified in the Charter by the words "full measure" in the English text, "complètement" in the French text, and "plenitud" in the Spanish text.
2. The task of the General Assembly, at present, is to indicate the factors which should be taken into account in determining whether the result of the advancement of the people of any given Territory is such that that Territory has reached a stage of self-government where it falls outside the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter.
3. The condition under which the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter cease to apply will be that the inhabitants of the Territory have attained, through political advancement, a full measure of self-government. The fulfilment of this condition may be achieved by various means, involving in all cases the expression of the free will of the people. The two principal means are (a) the attainment of independence and (b) the union of the Territory on a footing of equal status with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country or its association on the same conditions with the metropolitan or other country or countries. The extent to which the provisions of Article 73 e continue to apply in the case of Territories which have become neither independent nor fully integrated within another State but which have already attained a full measure of self-government in their internal affairs is a question which merits further study.
4. The two principal forms of political advancement, mentioned in the above paragraph, call for the consideration of different factors in determining whether a Territory has or has not reached a stage of self-government where it falls outside the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter.

/5. Accordingly,

5. Accordingly, the General Assembly lists under two separate headings below the factors to be taken into account, stressing that the list cannot be regarded as exhaustive or definitive, and that a single factor or particular combination of factors cannot be regarded as decisive in every case. Whether the peoples of a Territory should be regarded as having reached a stage of self-government where there is no longer any obligation to transmit information should be solved in the light of the conditions enumerated under either of the two headings, taking into account the circumstances of each particular case, which will need to be studied separately.

6. Nevertheless, the General Assembly considers that the essential factors to be taken into account in deciding whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory has attained a full measure of self-government are the following:

(i) Political advancement: Political advancement of the population sufficient to enable them to decide upon the future destiny of the Territory with due knowledge.

(ii) Opinion of the population: The opinion of the population of the Territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.

7. These factors apply both to Non-Self-Governing Territories which have achieved independence and to Non-Self-Governing Territories which have freely united or associated themselves on a footing of equal status with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country or countries. In the latter case, however, the following factors are also essential and should be taken into account:

(i) Legislative representation: Representation without discrimination in the central legislative organs on the same basis as other inhabitants and regions.

(ii) Citizenship: Citizenship without discrimination on the same basis as other inhabitants.

FACTORS WHICH SHOULD BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN DECIDING WHETHER A TERRITORY IS OR IS NOT A
TERRITORY WHOSE PEOPLE HAVE NOT YET ATTAINED
A FULL MEASURE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

4. Ethnic and cultural considerations: Extent to which the population are of different race, language or religion or have a distinct cultural heritage, interests or aspirations, distinguishing them from the peoples of the country with which they freely associate themselves.

5. Constitutional considerations: Association (a) by virtue of the constitution of the metropolitan country or (b) by virtue of a treaty or bilateral agreement affecting the status of the Territory, taking into account (i) whether the constitutional guarantees extend equally to the associated Territory, (ii) whether there are constitutional fields reserved to the Territory, and (iii) whether there is provision for the participation of the Territory on a basis of equality in any changes in the constitutional system of the state.

REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE 9, APPOINTED TO STUDY THE FACTORS WHICH SHOULD BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN DECIDING WHETHER A TERRITORY IS OR IS NOT A TERRITORY WHOSE PEOPLE HAVE NOT YET ATTAINED A FULL MEASURE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT (A/C.4/L.180 and Corr. 2)

49. Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), Rapporteur of Sub-Committee 9, introduced that Sub-Committee's report (A/C.4/L.180 and Corr. 2). He explained that, in accordance with the Sub-Committee's decision, annexes I and II were to be considered as a whole and should be discussed together.

50. He pointed out that the Sub-Committee had adopted paragraph 7 of its report in spite of the Secretariat's statement, based on a General Assembly resolution, that it could not ensure a wide distribution of the summary records of the meetings. The resolution cited applied only to verbatim records and therefore did not affect the Sub-Committee's right, under rule 60 of the General Assembly's rules of procedure, to decide upon the form of its records. Consequently, in his capacity as Rapporteur, he insisted that the Secretariat should distribute a complete set, in triplicate, of the Sub-Committee's records, at least to each member of the Fourth Committee.

51. He paid a tribute to all the members of the Secretariat who had helped the Sub-Committee in its difficult task, and mentioned in particular Mr. Benson, the Director of the Division of Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. He reserved the right to make a longer statement on the substance of the question in his capacity as representative of Cuba at a later stage in the discussion, and for the time being simply stated that, in his view, annexes I and II of the report represented a marked improvement on all the former documents on the question.

52. Mr. KHALIDY (Iraq), speaking as Chairman of Sub-Committee 9, did not think it appropriate to discuss the substance of the question at that stage, since the procedure to be followed for its future study was laid down in the report. The procedure was both complex and new, and the Sub-Committee's work had been very successful.

53. Mr. LANNUNG (Denmark) congratulated the Chairman and the Rapporteur of the Sub-Committee and thanked its members and the Secretariat for their work. In general his delegation accepted the proposals contained in annexes I and II of the Sub-Committee's report. He outlined the various stages in the study of the problem and declared that the report constituted a definite step forward, especially in its systematic grouping of the factors.

54. His delegation attached particular importance to paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 of the introduction to annex II. However, he had always realized that in all probability a further study might show that the list of factors indicative of the free association of a territory on equal status with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country (annex II) should be divided into two parts, separate considerations being given to cases in which a territory became associated with a State of the federal type and to cases in which the union was to be with a State of the unitary type. That distinction had indeed been mentioned in paragraph 12 of the Sub-Committee's report. As an indication of the need for such a sub-division, attention could be drawn to the last factor included in the list mentioned. That factor should be understood as applying only to States of a non-unitary system. The real test, in the case of association with a unitary State, was that the territory should have equality of rights and status with the other component parts of the State to which it was attached.

55. With regard to the future procedure for the study of the problem, his delegation would have preferred to entrust the work to the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter or to some subsidiary organ of that Committee. However, in a spirit of compromise it had been able to accept the solution put forward in paragraphs 3 and 5 of annex I. 56. He proposed that the Committee should adopt the Sub-Committee's recommendations as set forth in annexes I and II of document A/C.4/L.180.

57. Mr. TOBIAS (United States of America) said that the Sub-Committee's report was a helpful step forward in the study of a difficult problem. He had no amendments to suggest and would vote in favour of the proposed draft resolution (annex I). He proposed that the ad hoc committee provided for in paragraph 3 of the draft resolution should be made up of the same countries as the Sub-Committee, namely Australia, Cuba, Denmark, France, Guatemala, Iraq, the United States of America and Venezuela.

58. Mr. MAVROS (Greece) agreed with the Sub-Committee that the list of factors it had prepared was not definitive. The proposed ad hoc committee would first have to consider procedure and decide whether the establishment of a list of factors was really the best way of solving the problem. As the application of any criteria chosen would be a highly political matter, each particular case would inevitably be decided on political grounds not related to the factors. In addition, the Sub-Committee had not considered who should be responsible for deciding in practice whether or not a given factor existed in a particular case.

59. He fully agreed with the authors of the report that a distinction should be drawn between complete self-government and the so-called self-government which was confined to the management of the country's internal affairs.

60. The Committee should avoid any undue optimism about the results of the report. Two vitally important questions must be answered with regard to Non-Self-Governing Territories: at what stage a population which was not self-governing became sufficiently mature to be entitled to self-government; and who was to decide when that stage of maturity had been reached. The administering Powers considered that they alone were entitled to decide that question. They would therefore inevitably introduce, in breach of the spirit and letter of the Charter, political considerations foreign to the interests and aspirations of the peoples of those territories. Such a procedure was quite illogical, because it placed the Non-Self-Governing Territories in a less favourable position than the Trust Territories, whose development towards independence was protected by international guarantees. That paradoxical situation directly threatened the prestige of the United Nations.

61. Mr. RIVAS (Venezuela) considered that the Sub-Committee had done constructive work, owing above all to the competent manner in which the representative of Iraq had conducted its proceedings.

62. He fully agreed with the Greek representative that the United Nations should lay down precise rules in the matter. Each Non-Self-Governing Territory presented different geographical, ethnic, economic and other characteristics. The best method of examining such factors was to analyse the cases where the administering Power had stated that it would cease to communicate the information provided for in Article 73 e of the Charter. No change in the status of a Non-Self-Governing Territory could be valid unless internationally recognized. The General Assembly alone could decide when a Non-Self-Governing Territory had actually attained full self-government. Only the General Assembly could apply the criteria that the Committee was seeking to determine.

63. He hoped the Committee would adopt the draft resolution in annex I of the report. The ad hoc committee was not called upon to consider whether the General Assembly had competence in the matter, for that competence was derived from the Charter.

64. Mr. DE PAIVA LEITE (Brazil) congratulated the Sub-Committee and its Chairman on its excellent work. He appealed to the members of the Committee to refrain from raising again, at that stage, the complex problems involved. The procedure suggested in the draft resolution for a more thorough study of the question was sensible, and he would vote for the report and its annexes.

65. Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) drew the Committee's attention to paragraph 12 of the Sub-Committee's report. The list of factors should be subdivided into three categories according to the status of territories: first, territories enjoying complete independence and sovereignty, with their own representation abroad; secondly, territories members of federations, without diplomatic representation of their own but enjoying broad legislative autonomy enabling them to safeguard their rights and traditional interests; thirdly, territories that had attained the status of full sovereignty through incorporation in the metropolitan country or another country but that had neither their own diplomatic representation nor legislative autonomy. To the last category the United Nations should apply the strictest criteria.

66. It was not sufficient to contrast the concept of self-government with that of non-self-government. As Mr. Georges Scelle, the eminent French jurist, had explained, a territory could easily be financially and administratively autonomous though still a colony in the conventional sense. The terms of Article 73 of the Charter, far from excluding access of Non-Self-Governing Territories to complete independence, seemed on the contrary to presuppose it.

67. Article 73 of the Charter had not required the Administering Members to transmit information regarding the political progress made by the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories; nevertheless, for the United Nations to be able to determine whether a territory had ceased to be non-self-governing, it must be informed of the political progress made by the people.

68. Finally, when a country ceased to transmit information about a territory, the General Assembly had the right and the duty, on behalf of the international community, to consider and decide whether such action was in accordance with established criteria. His delegation could not understand why some countries were reluctant to recognize that right and that duty, of which the Treaty of Versailles had provided a notable historical example in requiring Germany to give up its colonies because of its failure to fulfil its international obligations with regard to them.

69. There was some ambiguity in the wording of the introduction to annex II. His delegation could not agree that social, economic and cultural autonomy should be considered separately from political autonomy; on the achievement of the latter depended all other forms of true autonomy.

70. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) unreservedly supported the views of the Brazilian representative. The report was, in his opinion, acceptable as a compromise solution. It had been of considerable assistance to the Committee's debates, and the Sub-Committee deserved to be congratulated on having established a limited list of factors that could be completed through consultation with governments.

71. His delegation asked, however, that the summary record of the meeting should report its wish that the proposed ad hoc committee should apply itself to formulating a legal definition of self-government on which it could base its work. On that understanding, his delegation approved the draft resolution and proposed that the report should be adopted as speedily as possible, without unnecessarily prolonging the debate.

72. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) explained that the last factor in the list of factors indicative of the free association of a territory on equal status with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country (annex II), which had been included in that list at his request, could only be applied to federations and other forms of association and did not apply to unitary systems.

73. Mr. LANNUNG (Denmark) desired that explanation to appear in the records.

74. Mr. KHALIDY (Iraq), supported by Mr. LANNUNG (Denmark) and Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic), asked the French representative, who intended not to speak until the Committee's following meeting, not to delay the discussion and prevent the Committee from voting before the meeting rose.

75. Mr. DE LACHARRIERE (France) explained that he would refrain from analysing the factors because the proposed ad hoc committee would be required, according to the procedure laid down in the report and approved by the French delegation, to revise the list of the factors in the light of the comments submitted by governments.

76. He reminded the Committee of the reservations France had made (A/C.4/L.180, para. 15) on certain factors involving race and religion and on the identification of self-government with full independence.

77. He replied to the representatives of Greece, Cuba and Venezuela that it rested solely with the administering Power to determine the territories concerning which information should be transmitted under Article 73 e. As for the Greek representative's comparison of the régime of the Trust Territories with that of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the distinction between the two arose from the Charter, which his Government intended to observe. France had agreed to work on the establishment of factors only within the terms of General Assembly resolution 334 (IV), according to which the General Assembly could merely express opinions for the guidance of governments, which alone were competent to take a decision in the matter.

78. Lastly, the question of autonomy should not arise only where a country ceased to transmit information on a territory, but also where a territory had never had any information transmitted about it. Certain governments had under their jurisdiction territories whose inhabitants ought to be protected by Chapter XI of the Charter.

79. Mr. SPITS (Netherlands) explained that he would abstain from voting because the question was so complex that his delegation had always doubted the possibility of drawing up a complete list of factors to cover all cases. Moreover, only the administering Powers were competent to determine the territories to which the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter applied.

80. Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), supported by Mr. TAJIBNAPIS (Indonesia), Mr. KHALIDY (Iraq), Mr. INGLES (Philippines), Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) and Mr. DE PAIVA LEITE (Brazil) observed that the Far East should be represented on the future ad hoc committee, and proposed the candidature of Burma.

81. The CHAIRMAN suggested that, in order to maintain a balance between the administering Powers and the other countries, Burma and Belgium should be appointed members of the ad hoc committee, with Australia, Cuba, Denmark, France, Guatemala, Iraq, the United States of America and Venezuela.

It was so decided.

82. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the draft resolution as a whole (A/C.4/L.180 and Corr. 2, annexes I and II).

83. At the request of Mr. KHALIDY (Iraq), the CHAIRMAN called for a vote by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

Denmark, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour : Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, New Zealand, Pakistan, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Burma, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba.

Abstaining : Netherlands, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia.

The draft resolution as a whole was adopted by 39 votes to none, with 6 abstentions.

84. U HLA MAUNG (Burma) thanked those of his colleagues who had proposed his candidature.

85. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) stated that he had voted for the draft resolution because it was a provisional measure and because his country agreed that the studies for which it provided should be made.

86. He pointed out, however, a serious omission in annex II, which only dealt with territories concerning which the administering Power had ceased to transmit information. Citing General Assembly resolution 334 (IV), he observed that his country, though glad to see a territory removed from the list, would also be glad to see included in it certain territories about which information had unfortunately never been transmitted.

87. Mr. MATHIESON (United Kingdom) stated that he had voted for the draft resolution although his delegation still doubted the advisability of establishing an ad hoc committee.

88. The resolution did not raise the question of competence and he had therefore no reservations to make on that subject.

89. Mr. LANNUNG (Denmark) said that in his opinion the factors established should apply equally to territories on which information had ceased to be transmitted and to territories on which information should begin to be transmitted.

90. In the light of the factors all countries would have to ask themselves whether they ought not to transmit information concerning certain territories for which they had hitherto not sent information.

91. In connexion with resolution 222 (III) of 3 November 1948, his delegation had had the opportunity of associating itself with the view that a State responsible for a territory had the right itself to determine the constitutional status of the territory under its sovereignty. Nothing in Chapter XI could be construed to support a different view.

92. His country would inform the United Nations of any change of status which might occur with regard to the territory for which it was responsible, but in doing so did not consider that any action taken by its constitutional organs should be subject to revision by the United Nations.

93. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) and Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) stressed that the draft resolution in no way prejudged the question of competence, which in their view lay with the General Assembly.

The meeting rose at 7.20 p.m.

I. CONSTITUTION OF THE COMMITTEE

1. By resolution 567 (VI), adopted on 18 January 1952, the General Assembly appointed an Ad Hoc Committee of ten members comprising Australia, Belgium, Burma, Cuba, Denmark, France, Guatemala, Iraq, the United States of America and Venezuela, in order to carry out a further study of the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government.

The Committee met at the Headquarters of the United Nations on 4 September 1952 and held six meetings between 4 and 9 September.

II. OFFICERS

2. The officers of the Committee were the following:

Mr. Awni Khalidy (Iraq), Chairman;

Mr. Benjamin Gerig (United States of America), Vice-Chairman and Rapporteur.

III. INTRODUCTION

3. This is the third occasion within a year on which a committee of the General Assembly has given detailed attention to the problem of factors. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories in 1951 examined the question and approved a report prepared by a sub-committee (A/1836, part four). At the sixth session of the General Assembly, the Fourth Committee, after considering the report, appointed a sub-committee, the report of which formed the basis of resolution 567 (VI). All this previous work has made it possible to clarify a number of the elements in the problem involved, and has been justified by the complexity and importance of the basic issues which have been implicit in many of the discussions on Non-Self-Governing Territories ever since the first meetings of the General Assembly.

4. The present Ad Hoc Committee was instructed to carry out a further study. For the purpose of this study, it had as a basis a list of factors drawn up by the General Assembly at its sixth session, together with the comments which Members of the United Nations had transmitted to the Secretary-General in response to paragraph 2 of resolution 567 (VI). In addition, the Ad Hoc Committee, in accordance with paragraph 4 of the same resolution, was authorized to take account of all information available, including that transmitted to the Secretary-General on the reasons which had led certain Administering Members to cease to transmit information on certain of the Territories previously enumerated as Non-Self-Governing Territories.

IV. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

5. In the course of the discussions in the Committee, certain general considerations were advanced to which reference should be made in order to clarify the nature of the Committee's work.

(A) The Committee was concerned with Non-Self-Governing Territories as covered by Chapter XI of the Charter. This point was made, as follows, on the three previous occasions on which the question has been discussed:

(1) General Assembly resolution 334 (IV) of 2 December 1949 is entitled "Territories to which Chapter XI of the Charter applies"; this resolution refers to the enumeration of Territories in General Assembly resolution 66 (I) and the cessation of information on some of those Territories.

(2) Paragraph 11 of part four of the report (A/1836) approved by the Committee on Information in 1951 states that the Committee is of the opinion that there are numerous elements which should be taken into consideration "in reaching a decision whether a particular territory would come within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter".

(3) Resolution 567 (VI), in paragraph 2 of its annex, states that "the task of the General Assembly, at present, is to indicate the factors which should be taken into account in determining whether the result of the advancement of the people of any given territory is such that that territory has reached a stage of self-government where it falls outside the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter".

The representative of Belgium stated that resolution 334 (IV) applied as well at the beginning as at the cessation of the transmission of information; that those who recognized the competence of the General Assembly to decide that the transmission of information should be continued should also recognize its competence to decide that information should begin to be sent for a territory in respect of which no information had yet been transmitted. The representative of France associated himself with this opinion. The representatives of Guatemala and Venezuela expressed reservations on this point.

(B) The question of what authority has the competence to determine that a territory has reached a stage of self-government where it falls outside the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter was not considered to be within the competence of the Ad Hoc Committee. Various members of the Committee, however, recorded their opinions on this point as matters which they reserved for treatment in the General Assembly.

(C) The Committee was generally agreed that no enumeration of factors can do more than serve as a guide in determining whether a territory is or is not fully self-governing. Each specific case will need to be determined by the particular circumstances of that case. Paragraph 5 of the annex to resolution 567 (VI) underlines this principle by stressing that such a list of factors "cannot be regarded as exhaustive or definitive, and that a single factor or particular combination of factors cannot be regarded as decisive in every case. Whether the peoples of a territory should be regarded as having reached a stage of self-government where there is no longer any obligation to transmit information should be solved in the light of the conditions enumerated under either of the two headings, taking into account the circumstances of each particular case, which will need to be studied separately".

(D) A third general question relates to the extent to which the provisions of Article 73 e continue to apply in the case of territories which have become neither independent nor fully integrated within another State but which have already attained a full measure of self-government in their internal affairs. Paragraph 3 of the annex to resolution 567 (VI) states that this is a question which merits further study. A number of replies received from governments expressed divergent opinions upon this important question of principle. The Government of the Netherlands, considering that as soon as a territory had reached a state of self-government as regards the subjects enumerated in Article 73 e the Administering Member was no longer under an obligation to transmit information, suggested, in the light of this contention, a new set of factors to be taken into account by an Administering Member in deciding whether it should cease to transmit information.

Different opinions were expressed in the Committee as to whether, in the light of its terms of reference, it was competent to consider this question. It was agreed that the matter should be referred to the General Assembly, which might wish to pursue its study. The list of factors as suggested by the Netherlands Government was as follows:

(a) Has the territory a representative parliament and is the composition of such parliament based on the result of elections?

(b) In what way does this parliament co-operate in the exercise of the legislative power with regard to the subjects mentioned in Article 73 e?

(c) To what extent is the Executive bound by the decisions of the parliament with regard to the subjects mentioned in Article 73 e?

(d) Is the intervention of the metropolitan country in the autonomy with regard to the subjects mentioned in Article 73 e limited to those cases which are based upon the constitution voluntarily accepted by the territory?

(e) What matters are excepted from the autonomy with regard to the subjects mentioned in Article 73 e as a result of the fact that they are of common interest to the metropolitan country and the territory concerned? Are they collectively dealt with and what part has the territory in this respect?

(f) Does the territory enjoy financial independence and is the budget controlled by parliament?

(g) In what way are human rights and fundamental freedoms guaranteed?

(E) The Government of Iraq suggested that a new factor should be added to the existing list relating to the question of armed forces. Some members of the Committee expressed the opinion that the details contained in the proposal raised difficult matters which related to questions of security and were beyond the terms of the Committee's work. It was agreed to insert a reference to the broad question of responsibility for national defence in the list of factors and to record in full in the present report the following text submitted by the Government of Iraq:

"(a) Does the territory possess armed forces of its own? If so, who controls those armed forces politically, administratively and financially? Is there a financial contribution made towards the cost of maintenance of its armed forces by a foreign or allied Power? If so, what is the proportion of this contribution to the total allocation in the national budget for the armed forces? Is there a foreign military mission in the territory accredited to the armed forces? If so, in what capacity does this foreign mission function, that is to say, if it is an advisory military mission, to what extent is it in a position to influence both in theory and practice the policy and administration of the armed forces of that territory?

"(b) Are there military, air and naval units belonging to a foreign Power stationed in that territory? If so, was that agreed upon voluntarily with the territory?"

(F) The United Kingdom Government submitted a number of factors which, in its view, would ideally have to be taken into account in deciding whether a territory was or was not a territory whose people enjoyed a full measure of self-government. The Committee included in its list the points from the United Kingdom list concerning political rights of individuals. The opinion was expressed that other factors regarding the position of the executive, the judiciary and internal security would perhaps be too detailed for similar treatment but that they should be recorded in the report. These additional factors were:

Position of the executive

(a) Is the executive branch of government composed of persons who enjoy the support of the people or their elected representatives?

(b) Is the government drawn from the elected representatives of the people, and does the continuance of its existence depend on the continuance of the support of the people? In short, does the withdrawal of the support and consent of the people ensure the fall of the government?

(c) Is the government compelled, at reasonable intervals prescribed by law, to surrender its power and provide the people with a further opportunity of determining the government of the territory?

Judiciary

(a) Are the courts of justice free from political influence, i.e., does the appointment of judges depend upon their political affinities or not?

(b) Are the courts entirely separate from the executive branch of government, i.e., is the position of judges so entrenched that they are not dependent for their office on or affected by the fortune of any political party or any particular government?

Internal security

(a) Are the elected representatives of the people and the courts of justice free from pressure by mob violence, private armies or similar influences?

(b) Is there freedom for the individual from arbitrary arrest? And are there means (such as habeas corpus) of procuring his release from any arbitrary detention?

(c) Are the armed forces of the State, and its police forces, ultimately subject to the will of the representatives of the people?

V. LIST OF PROPOSED FACTORS

6. The list of factors, therefore, which the Ad Hoc Committee submits to the General Assembly which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government, is as follows:

FACTORS INDICATIVE OF THE ATTAINMENT OF INDEPENDENCE OR OF OTHER SEPARATE SYSTEMS OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

First Part

Factors indicative of the attainment of independence

A. International status

1. International responsibility. Full international responsibility of the territory for the acts inherent in the exercise of its external sovereignty and for the corresponding acts in the administration of its internal affairs.

2. Eligibility for membership in the United Nations.

3. General international relations. Power to enter into direct relations of every kind with other governments and with international institutions and to negotiate, sign and ratify international instruments.

4. National defence. Freedom of the territory to enter into arrangements concerning its national defence.

B. Internal self-government

1. Form of government. Complete freedom of the people of the territory to choose the form of government which they desire.

2. Territorial government. Freedom from control or interference by the government of another State in respect of the internal government (legislature, executive, judiciary) and administration of the Territory.

3. Economic, social and cultural jurisdiction. Complete autonomy in respect of economic, social and cultural affairs.

Second Part

Factors indicative of the attainment of other separate systems of self-government

A. General

1. Political advancement. Political advancement of the population sufficient to enable them to decide upon the future destiny of the territory with due knowledge.

2. Opinion of the population. The opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.

3. Voluntary limitation by sovereignty. Degree to which the sovereignty of the territory is limited by its own free will when that territory has attained a separate system of self-government.

B. International status

1. General international relations. Degree or extent to which the territory exercises the power to enter freely into direct relations of every kind with other governments and with international institutions and to negotiate, sign and ratify international instruments freely.

2. Eligibility for membership in the United Nations.

C. Internal self-government

1. Territorial government. Nature and measure of control or interference, if any, by the government of another State in respect of the internal government, for example, in respect of the following:

Legislature: The enactment of laws for the territory by an indigenous body whether fully elected by free and democratic processes or lawfully constituted in a manner receiving the free consent of the population;

Executive: The selection of members of the executive branch of the government by the competent authority in the territory receiving consent of the indigenous population, whether that authority is hereditary or elected, having regard also to the nature and measure of control, if any, by an outside agency on that authority, whether directly or indirectly exercised in the constitution and conduct of the executive branch of the government;

Judiciary: The establishment of courts of law and the selection of judges.

2. Participation of the population. Effective participation of the population in the government of the territory: (a) Is there an adequate and appropriate electoral and representative system? (b) Is this electoral system conducted without direct or indirect interference from a foreign government?¹

3. Economic, social and cultural jurisdiction. Degree of autonomy in respect of economic, social and cultural affairs, as illustrated by the degree of freedom from economic pressure as exercised, for example, by a foreign minority group which, by virtue of the help of a foreign Power, has acquired a privileged economic status prejudicial to the general economic interest of the people of the territory; and by the degree of freedom and lack of discrimination against the indigenous population of the territory in social legislation and social developments.

Factors indicative of the free association of a territory with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country

A. General

1. Political advancement. Political advancement of the population sufficient to enable them to decide upon the future destiny of the territory with due knowledge.

2. Opinion of the population. The opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.

¹ For example, the following questions would be relevant: (i) Has each adult inhabitant equal power (subject to special safeguards for minorities) to determine the character of the government of the territory? (ii) Is this power exercised freely, i.e., is there an absence of undue influence over and coercion of the voter and of the imposition of disabilities on particular political parties? Some tests which can be used in the application of this factor are as follows:

(a) The existence of effective measures to ensure the democratic expression of the will of the people;

(b) The existence of more than one political party in the territory;

(c) The existence of a secret ballot;

(d) The existence of legal prohibitions on the exercise of undemocratic practices in the course of elections;

(e) The existence for the individual elector of a choice between candidates of differing political parties;

(f) The absence of "martial law" and similar measures at election times;

(iii) Is each individual free to express his political opinions, to support or oppose any political party or cause, and to criticize the government of the day?

3. Geographical considerations. Extent to which the relations of the territory with the capital of the central government may be affected by circumstances arising out of their respective geographical positions, such as separation by land, sea or other natural obstacles.

4. Ethnic and cultural considerations. Extent to which the population are of different race, language or religion or have a distinct cultural heritage, interests or aspirations, distinguishing them from the peoples of the country with which they freely associate themselves.

5. Constitutional considerations. Association (a) by virtue of the constitution of the metropolitan country; or (b) by virtue of a treaty or bilateral agreement affecting the status of the territory, taking into account (i) whether the constitutional guarantees extend equally to the associated territory, (ii) whether there are powers in certain matters constitutionally reserved to the territory or to the central authority, and (iii) whether there is provision for the participation of the territory on a basis of equality in any changes in the constitutional system of the State.

B. Status

1. Legislative representation. Representation without discrimination in the central legislative organs on the same basis as other inhabitants and regions.

2. Citizenship. Citizenship without discrimination on the same basis as other inhabitants.

3. Government officials. Eligibility of officials from the territory to all public offices of the central authority, by appointment or election, on the same basis as those from other parts of the country.

C. Internal constitutional conditions

1. Suffrage. Universal and equal suffrage, and free periodic elections, characterized by an absence of undue influence over and coercion of the voter or of the imposition of disabilities on particular political parties.²

2. Local rights and status. In a unitary system equal rights and status for the inhabitants and local bodies of the territory as enjoyed by inhabitants and local bodies of other parts of the country; in a federal system an identical degree of self-government for the inhabitants and local bodies of all parts of the federation.

3. Local officials. Appointment or election of officials in the territory on the same basis as those in other parts of the country.

4. Internal legislation. Local self-government of the same scope and under the same conditions as enjoyed by other parts of the country.

² For example, the following tests would be relevant:

(a) The existence of effective measures to ensure the democratic expression of the will of the people;

(b) The existence of more than one political party in the territory;

(c) The existence of a secret ballot;

(d) The existence of legal prohibitions on the exercise of undemocratic practices in the course of elections;

(e) The existence for the individual elector of a choice between candidates of differing political parties;

(f) The absence of "martial law" and similar measures at election times;

(g) Freedom of each individual to express his political opinions, to support or oppose any political party or cause, and to criticize the government of the day.

648 (VII). Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government

The General Assembly,

Taking into account the obligation to transmit information, accepted in virtue of Article 73 e of the Charter, by the Members which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government,

Taking into account that this obligation remains in force with regard to each Territory until such time as the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter are fulfilled,

Taking into account the statement contained in resolution 222 (III), adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1948, to the effect that it is essential for the United Nations to be informed of any change that may take place in the constitutional status of any Non-Self-Governing Territory, and that, not later than six months after the submission of the aforesaid information, such information as may be required in such cases should be communicated, including information about the constitution, legislative acts or executive orders regarding the government of the Territory as well as about the constitutional relationship of the Territory to the government of the metropolitan country, Having examined the report⁴ of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories).

Recognizing that, in deciding whether a Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government, an enumeration of factors would be a useful guide both for the General Assembly and for the Administering Member concerned,

Having regard to its resolution 567 (VI) of 18 January 1952,

1. Approves provisionally the annexed list of factors which may serve as a guide, both for the General Assembly and for the Members of the United Nations which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, in deciding whether a Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government;

2. Recognises that each concrete case should be considered and decided in the light of the particular circumstances of that case and taking into account the right of self-determination of peoples;

3. Declares that the factors, while serving as a guide in determining whether the obligations as set forth in Article 73 e of the Charter still exist, should in no way be interpreted as a hindrance to the attainment of a full measure of self-government by the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

4. Further declares that, for a Territory to be deemed self-governing in economic, social or educational affairs it is essential that its people shall have attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter;

5. Recommends that, provisionally, the annexed list of factors should be taken into account in any case which the General Assembly examines resulting from any communication received by the Secretary-General in virtue of General Assembly resolution 222 (III) concerning the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter, or in relation to other questions that may arise concerning the existence of an obligation to transmit information under this Article;

6. Decides to set up a new Ad Hoc Committee of ten Members, consisting of Australia, Belgium, Burma, Cuba, Guatemala, Iraq, Netherlands, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America and Venezuela, with instructions to continue and carry out a more thorough study of the factors which will have to be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government;

7. Invites the said Committee to take into account, inter alia, the list^a of factors prepared in 1952 by the Ad Hoc Committee set up under General Assembly resolution 567 (VI) and the statements transmitted by governments in compliance with the aforementioned resolution and, further, to take into account the following additional elements:

(a) The possibility of defining the concept of a full measure of self-government for the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter;

(b) The features guaranteeing the principle of the self-determination of peoples in relation to Chapter XI of the Charter;

(c) The manifestation of the freely expressed will of the peoples in relation to the determination of their national and international status for the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter;

8. Invites all Members of the United Nations to transmit in writing to the Secretary-General, by 1 May 1953, a statement of the views of their governments on the subjects contained in the terms of reference of the Committee;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to convene the Ad Hoc Committee so that it may begin its work not later than four weeks before the opening of the 1953 session of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

402nd plenary meeting,
10 December 1952.

3. Government officials. Eligibility of officials from the territory to all public offices of the central authority, by appointment or election, on the same basis as those from other parts of the country.

C. Internal constitutional conditions

1. Suffrage. Universal and equal suffrage, and free periodic elections, characterized by an absence of undue influence over and coercion of the voter or of the imposition of disabilities on particular political parties.^b

2. Local rights and status. In a unitary system equal rights and status for the inhabitants and local bodies of the territory as enjoyed by inhabitants and local bodies of other parts of the country; in a federal system an identical degree of self-government for the inhabitants and local bodies of all parts of the federation.

4. Internal legislation. Local self-government of the same scope and under the same conditions as enjoyed by other parts of the country.

^b For example, the following tests would be relevant:

(a) The existence of effective measures to ensure the democratic expression of the will of the people;

(b) The existence of more than one political party in the territory;

(c) The existence of a secret ballot;

(d) The existence of legal prohibitions on the exercise of undemocratic practices in the course of elections;

(e) The existence for the individual elector of a choice between candidates of differing political parties;

(f) The absence of "martial law" and similar measures at election times;

(g) Freedom of each individual to express his political opinions, to support or oppose any political party or cause, and to criticize the government of the day.

8. The PRESIDENT: Does any member propose, under rule 67 of the rules of procedure, that a discussion of the report of the Fourth Committee should take place? As no such proposal has been made, we shall proceed, after the Rapporteur of the Fourth Committee has presented the report, to vote on the draft resolutions contained therein.

9. There will, of course, be an opportunity for delegations to make explanations of vote. I would hope that such explanations of vote might be given either before or, preferably, after the votes are taken on all six drafts, so that there need not be separate explanations of vote on each one. If that course commends itself to the General Assembly, then I think it would be fair not to ask representatives to restrict their explanations of vote in the same way as in the past, when fewer draft resolutions were being considered and fewer votes were being explained. At the same time, I know that the Assembly will agree with me when I express the hope that explanations of vote will not be used to reopen any general discussion.

10. If there is no objection to that suggested procedure, I shall call on the Rapporteur of the Fourth Committee, Mr. Scott, representative of New Zealand, to present the report of that Committee.

11. Mr. SCOTT (New Zealand) (Rapporteur of the Fourth Committee): I have the honour to present to the General Assembly the report of the Fourth Committee on items 33, 34, 35 and 36 of the agenda of the General Assembly. This report, which was adopted in the Fourth Committee without objection, is before you in document A/2296, and the explanations I need furnish are very brief.

12. You will see that the Fourth Committee considered the questions before it relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories during the course of twenty-seven meetings. I venture to mention this figure as an indication of the thorough manner in which these matters were discussed. This may be considered as a reflection of the increased importance which the General Assembly attaches to the consideration of questions arising out of Chapter XI of the Charter.

13. The Fourth Committee submits to the General Assembly six draft resolutions. Draft resolutions I and II arise directly out of the consideration by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories of social conditions in those Territories. Draft resolution III has a close connexion with the same programme of work, since it relates to the use that may be made of the special reports prepared by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on educational, economic and social conditions. Draft resolution IV relates to the renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. Draft resolution V concerns the participation of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. It is probable that certain aspects of these important draft resolutions will engage the particular attention of this plenary meeting, as their significance in the development of the work of the United Nations will be apparent to all delegations.

14. In the last place, delegations will find in draft resolution VI a reflection of the work of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors, which was established by the last session of the General Assembly [resolution 567 (VI)] and of the Fourth Committee's examination of its report. It will be seen that this draft resolution provisionally approves a list of factors to be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not fully self-governing and, at the same time, proposes the creation of a new ad hoc committee to continue the study of this difficult problem. I believe that I am interpreting the views of the Fourth Committee in stating that it was the understanding that this new ad hoc committee would be created for 1953 only and would report to the next session of the General Assembly.

15. These are the six draft resolutions presented for your consideration. With the indications given in the report of the manner in which these drafts were approved in the Fourth Committee and the voting on them, I beg to submit them and the report to the General Assembly.

16. As I am on this rostrum, perhaps the President will allow me, as the representative of NEW ZEALAND, to say that I and many of my colleagues in the Fourth Committee consider draft resolutions IV and V, relating respectively to the renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and to the participation of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, as important questions both in the general sense and more particularly in the sense of Article 18 of the Charter. I would therefore venture to suggest that, as in the past, paragraph 2 of Article 18 of the Charter and rule 84 of the rules of procedure should be applied to draft resolutions IV and V.

17. Mr. LLOYD (United Kingdom): I wish to explain the vote which my delegation will cast on these six draft resolutions submitted with this report.

18. We shall vote for draft resolution I.

19. With regard to draft resolution II, my delegation has moved an amendment [A/L.127] to delete the last six words of paragraph 2 of the operative part, and to insert, between the words "any" and "discriminatory", the word "such". The paragraph as it now stands results from the acceptance of an amendment moved by my delegation in the Fourth Committee. As a result of the acceptance of that amendment by the committee, some delegations found it impossible to vote for the draft resolution as amended because they felt that the insertion of these last six words made the effect of paragraph 2 of the operative part unduly restricted. Since the object of my delegation in moving this amendment was to broaden the application of paragraph 2 of the operative part, we shall be most reluctant to see any votes cast on this draft resolution through a misinterpretation of our intention. So to make it clear that we regard paragraph 2 of the operative part as having the same scope as paragraph 1 of the operative part, my delegation has moved the amendment now before the Assembly. I hope that it will be adopted and that it will enable the widest possible support to be given to the draft resolution for which my delegation intends to vote. Our favourable vote, however, is subject to the reservation which we made in the Fourth Committee, that the immediate application of paragraph 4 of the operative part may, in certain cases, prove impossible for reasons of a purely practical and administrative nature.

20. I now come to draft resolution III. My delegation considers that paragraph 1 of the operative part of this draft resolution urges the administering Powers to supply to the Secretary-General information going far beyond the information of a statistical or technical nature which such members are obliged to transmit under the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter. For this reason, my delegation voted against this paragraph in the Fourth Committee and will do so again if it is the subject of a separate vote here. However, in the information regularly transmitted by Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, ample material is available to those who study it to form a judgment on the degree to which certain general principles enunciated by the General Assembly find expression in our policies and action in the Territories for which we have responsibility. For that reason, my delegation will abstain on draft resolution III as a whole.

21. Draft resolution IV on the renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories causes us greater difficulties. The attitude of Her Majesty's Government towards the existence of a Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories has been stated many times. There is no provision in the Charter for a systematic examination and criticism by a special body of the information transmitted by administering Powers under the terms of Article 73 e of the Charter, and it was clearly not the intention, in our view, of those who drafted Chapter XI that there should be. This is easily seen by contrasting the position of Non-Self-Governing Territories with that of Trust Territories, for which the Charter sets up a Trusteeship Council. Moreover, the information is transmitted, in the words of Article 73 e, "to the Secretary-General for information purposes". But so long as the Committee on Information existed on a temporary basis, the United Kingdom Government, together with other administering Powers, felt able to participate in its work. It did so as a gesture of co-operation with the many Members of the United Nations which expressed an interest in the progress of Non-Self-Governing Territories and wished to have an opportunity of studying, together with the administering Powers, the information submitted by the latter.

22. The United Kingdom Government has, however, at each session of the committee, formally reserved its position in regard to the existence of the committee itself, since it could not even by implication accept the thesis that Members which were administering Powers were accountable to the United Nations for the administration of their Non-Self-Governing Territories. But this reservation did not affect the contribution made by the United Kingdom representatives to the committee, and they have endeavoured to the best of their ability to assist the work of the committee.

23. In so far as the work of the committee is concerned, most non-administering Powers have expressed the view that its studies are of value, but at the present session they have contended that it was not sufficient to have a Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories whose existence was of a temporary nature.

24. It has never been quite clear to us why the status of this committee should affect the quality of its work, and the principles which have hitherto guided the attitude of the United Kingdom towards this committee have not changed. The United Kingdom Government would be prepared, however, to participate, as a gesture of goodwill, in the work of a small committee reconstituted on the same temporary basis as hitherto and for a similar period of three years. At the end of that period the General Assembly will have to take up the question of revising the Charter, and that would seem to us to be the appropriate time for States to raise important questions of principle, such as the functions of the General Assembly in relation to the existing Article 73 e of the Charter. In the meantime, the setting up of a permanent Committee on Information constitutes an attempt to assimilate Non-Self-Governing Territories to Trust Territories, despite the clear distinction between them established by the Charter, and it anticipates any decision which may then be reached.

25. It will be clear from what I have said that our basic objection to the draft resolution is that in effect it establishes this committee on a permanent basis. It seeks to assert an interpretation of Chapter XI of the Charter which my Government cannot accept. It prejudges the result of the discussions which will no doubt take place in three years' time.

26. If the General Assembly insists on asserting a certain point of view and prejudging these discussions, my Government will be in no doubt regarding the action it should take. It will not be able to attend the meetings of this committee. If, however, the draft resolution adopted were to limit the establishment of the committee to a further three-year period only, we should participate as before in the work of this committee. We believe that in these matters, where there is disagreement about the interpretation of the Charter, we should try to bridge our differences in a spirit of co-operation and with a certain amount of give and take. We do not agree that this committee is either necessary or lawfully constituted. But, in a spirit of compromise, we are willing to serve on it for a further three years, as I have stated before. I am, however, authorized by Her Majesty's Government to make it quite clear that if that offer, which we regard as a reasonable offer, made in a spirit of compromise, is rejected, we shall no longer serve on this committee.

27. I now turn to a consideration of draft resolution V, on the participation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee on Information. We do not believe that direct participation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the committee can in fact be of assistance in promoting the progress of those Territories and their peoples towards the goal set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter. We may find it desirable, from time to time, to associate with our delegation, to this and other committees, appropriately qualified representatives from our Non-Self-Governing Territories. We have done this in the past and we shall do so in the future when it seems useful. We wish, however, to remain the sole judges as to the composition of our delegations to international bodies, and we consider further that membership of the committees of the General Assembly must be confined to Members of the United Nations. These committees must remain associations of sovereign and responsible governments. They cannot be converted into tribunals in which States of the United Nations can be confronted with the indigenous inhabitants of these Territories. For this basic reason, we shall feel obliged to vote against draft resolution V.

28. With regard to draft resolution VI, dealing with the question of factors, again my delegation must vote against this draft. The status of the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which Her Majesty's Government has international responsibility cannot be determined by the United Nations. It is determined as a result of constitutional instruments promulgated by Her Majesty's Government. To be frank, we should not find the list of factors annexed to the draft resolution of very much assistance in interpreting those instruments.

29. Furthermore, we cannot endorse the assertion of principle in paragraph 1 of the operative part that the General Assembly can have the function of deciding whether a territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government.

30. As regards paragraph 2 of the operative part, I do not think that the Commission on Human Rights has as yet succeeded in defining satisfactorily, or indeed at all, the right of self-determination of peoples. I think that has been found to be a much more complicated problem of precise definition than many people would otherwise have thought.

31. Nor can we accept the assertion in paragraph 4 of the operative part that self-government in economic, social or educational affairs is inseparable from a full measure of self-government in political affairs as well.

32. For all these reasons, we must continue to vote against this draft resolution. Nevertheless, in the spirit I indicated a moment or two ago, we have agreed to serve as members of the new ad hoc committee to be established under this draft resolution, to review the studies on which it is based. Our participation will be entirely without prejudice to our position on the important matters of principle which I have mentioned as determining our opposition to the draft resolution. We shall hope, by that participation, to make our views prevail upon our colleagues on those questions of principle. But we do feel that it is in accordance with the spirit of compromise to which I have just referred that we should agree to serve on that committee.

33. It is a matter of considerable disappointment to me that my delegation should be unable to vote for so many of the draft resolutions put forward by the Fourth Committee. We had hoped that the Fourth Committee might have begun to adopt a more understanding attitude, as we regard it, to those important considerations arising under Chapter XI of the Charter. Our hopes in that regard have not yet been fulfilled. However, it is one of the consolations of human existence that hope should spring eternal, and I do not despair that we shall gradually achieve a greater degree of co-operation and understanding in the work of this Committee.

34. Mr. PIGNON (France) (translated from French): My delegation has had an opportunity to explain its views to the Fourth Committee on the questions which are the subject of the report and the draft resolutions now before the Assembly. It expressed its opinion clearly and in detail. Today it would like to reaffirm the comments it has already made.

35. Moreover, in view of the gravity of the problems involved, my delegation considers it essential to stress some points to which attention cannot be too emphatically drawn.

36. In the first place, and speaking generally, the French delegation deplores the fact that most of the draft resolutions recommended by the Fourth Committee concerning information from Non-Self-Governing Territories spring from a conception contrary to the letter and the spirit of the Charter. Once again it is obliged to recognize the fact that there is a desire unilaterally to amend the meaning and scope of a treaty which can be amended only in accordance with the legal procedure provided for that purpose. My delegation most solemnly states that the pursuit of such an undertaking is likely to jeopardize that collaboration and co-operation which are the purposes of this Organization. It must point out the dangerous results which the continuance of this procedure might entail in practice.

37. In the light of these considerations, my delegation now wishes to explain its position and its views with regard to some of the draft resolutions contained in the report of the Fourth Committee.

38. In the first place, my delegation will vote for draft resolution II, on racial discrimination, because it represents a people who are passionately opposed to any form of discrimination. Nevertheless, on this occasion it must again make the reservations it made in the Fourth Committee with regard to the necessity of dealing with such a problem on the universal level, and by more appropriate methods than those used by the Fourth Committee.

39. Secondly, my delegation notes that paragraphs 2 and 3 of the operative part of draft resolution V, entitled "Participation of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories", repeat the most controversial ideas on which resolution 566 (VI) of 18 January 1952 on the same subject was based. My delegation considers the more or less disguised creation of the status of associate member of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories unconstitutional. In United Nations organs there cannot be dual representation, of both the administering Power and the Non-Self-Governing Territory. Chapter XI of the Charter and the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7, give responsibility for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories to the administering Power and to it alone, in order to prevent any intervention by the United Nations.

40. Thirdly, my delegation will refrain from again pointing out the gratuitous and contradictory nature of the provisions of draft resolution VI, entitled "Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government". My delegation wishes to emphasize that it cannot recognize the principles embodied in that draft which, among other things, makes the General Assembly competent to decide whether a territory is or is not self-governing.

41. My delegation was able to take part in the study of factors relating to self-government because that study had been undertaken within the terms of reference laid down by General Assembly resolution 334 (IV), under which "it is within the responsibility of the General Assembly to express its opinion on the principles which have guided or which may in future guide the Members concerned in enumerating the territories for which the obligation exists to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter." The French delegation had admitted that the General Assembly was justified in studying, in accordance with the procedure provided, ways of guiding the responsible States by an opinion as to the principles likely to assist them in determining the territories to which Article 73 e of the Charter was applicable, and it was able to participate in the preliminary work carried out in Paris, at the sixth session, and in the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories). However, the General Assembly's competence is limited to the giving of this opinion on the principles which could guide Member States. The French Government has on several occasions officially stated that the determination of the Territories whose populations have not yet attained a full measure of self-government under the terms of the Charter is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the administering States. The competence of the administering Powers in that matter, which is based on the Charter, cannot be affected, diminished or controlled by any decision of the General Assembly. Consequently, my delegation is compelled, for the present and for the future, most expressly to reserve its Government's competence in that matter under the Charter.

42. Fourthly, with regard to draft resolution IV, entitled "Renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories", my delegation must recall that it has always made the most express reservations with regard to the legality of an organ called on to examine information which, under Article 73 e of the Charter, is transmitted to the Secretary-General of the United Nations only for information purposes. Moreover, no provision was made for that organ in the Charter. Likewise, my delegation has always opposed the idea, based on an erroneous interpretation of Chapter XI, that the Organization has a sort of right of supervision over Non-Self-Governing Territories, an idea which is most clearly expressed in the setting up of the Committee on Information. Such an idea is, indeed, in contradiction with the very terms of Chapter XI and with other provisions of the Charter, as well as with the preparatory work of the San Francisco Conference.

43. The fact that in the past my delegation has been able to participate in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories is due to the non-permanent nature of that body. It was a provisional situation, of fixed duration, and my delegation, anxious to conform as fully as possible to the principles of international co-operation set forth in the Charter, did not refuse to undertake a joint examination of general questions concerning Non-Self-Governing Territories, so as to help to make those problems better known. Draft resolution IV, on the other hand, sanctions the illegality to which I have just referred by stating the principle of the permanency of the committee. It officially gives Chapter XI of the Charter a tendentious interpretation and an excessive scope which my delegation cannot accept. It confers on a body, whose usefulness is very doubtful and whose work is carried on in an ever less objective and understanding atmosphere, a character completely incompatible with the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter, the essential aim of which is publicity.

44. That being the case, my delegation must state on behalf of its Government that it will not in any event participate next year in the committee's work if paragraph 1 of the operative part of draft resolution IV is adopted in its present form, that is, if the committee's terms of reference are renewed for an indefinite period.

45. Mr. VAN LANGENHOVE (Belgium) (translated from French): The Belgian delegation considers it necessary to state the basic reasons why it cannot support the draft resolutions on the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

46. The obligations laid down in Article 73 of the Charter are of a general nature. In our opinion they unquestionably apply to all Member States which are responsible for the progress of backward indigenous peoples living within their territories. These obligations are similar to those under Article 23 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, by virtue of which the Member States of the League undertook "to secure just treatment of the Native inhabitants of territories under their control".

47. Within the United Nations are a number of Member States which were Members of the League of Nations. None of those States has ever disputed the fact that that provision applied to indigenous peoples living within its frontiers.

48. Among the States which were formerly Members of the League, however, only seven still recognize that obligation. We have the right to ask the others why they cannot accept today what they accepted for so many years without the slightest protest. We have already put that question, and so far it has remained unanswered. In vain have we pointed out that to restrict the enjoyment of international guarantees to a few indigenous peoples would be an injustice to all the others and that such restrictions would constitute a deplorable set-back to the pursuit of the humanitarian ideal to which this Organization is dedicated.

49. Nor is this the only aspect of the situation which we must consider. Within the League of Nations, the obligations assumed by Belgium towards the populations of its African territories, as distinguished from the mandated territories, were identical with those assumed by all the other Member States, in the Americas and Asia as well as in Africa. In Africa, the obligations were the same in regard to Ethiopia, Liberia or the Union of South Africa as in regard to the Congo, French Equatorial Africa or Uganda. At present Belgium, France and the United Kingdom are alone subject to those obligations. All the other Member States, although their responsibilities are the same as ours, have ceased to recognize the validity of these obligations.

50. At the same time, efforts have been made year in, year out, to extend the scope of these obligations. The fewer States there are which are prepared to submit to these obligations, the easier it is for majorities to vote for resolutions which, without any regard to the sovereignty of other States, tend progressively to transform the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter into a kind of trusteeship régime which the San Francisco Conference had deliberately ruled out and which, so far as Belgium is concerned, in no way corresponds to the commitments subscribed to by Belgium and approved by its Parliament.

51. Although all the Member States responsible for the administration of indigenous populations are faced by similar duties, they have thus been divided into two categories, according to whether they recognize that Article 73 of the Charter applies to them or not. The one group is asked to accept increasingly broad obligations, while the other accepts none at all. Among the latter, this absence of responsibility leads to exaggerations and extravagant demands. As the Belgian Government recently pointed out, we thus reach a situation which is hardly tolerable; and we should be deluding ourselves in thinking that it can last.

52. A stable position will be achieved only if the States having the same responsibilities respect without exception the general obligations corresponding to those responsibilities. On the other hand, it would be ungenerous and unjust to the indigenous peoples not to grant to all of them, as did the Members of the League of Nations, the enjoyment of the general safeguards laid down on their behalf. These are the principles on which the Belgian Government bases its interpretation of Chapter XI and to which it intends to adhere. We cannot support any proposals which ignore those principles.

53. On the basis of these considerations, the Belgian Government will decide whether in future it will participate in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. In any event, it will not take part in that work if this committee becomes a semi-permanent body, in accordance with draft resolution IV submitted to the General Assembly.

54. Mr. LANNUNG (Denmark): I wish to make a few brief remarks with regard to draft resolution IV, concerning the renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. Since the approval by the Fourth Committee of draft resolution IV, it has been generally known—and today has been clearly emphasized—that the United Kingdom, France and Belgium, the three Members of the United Nations which have responsibility for the administration of the greatest number of Non-Self-Governing Territories, feel that they will be unable to participate in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories if it is decided to continue this committee on a permanent or quasi-permanent basis, as recommended by the Fourth Committee.

55. I recall the past history of the matter, when there was a great measure of agreement in the Committee on Information for a renewal of the committee for a further three-year period on the same basis as hitherto, but it was the Fourth Committee which recast paragraph 1 of the operative part of draft resolution IV to the effect that the Committee on Information should be established on a permanent or quasi-permanent basis.

56. However, the adoption today of a proposal for a prolongation for a further three-year period on the same basis as hitherto will serve all practical purposes. As the valuable co-operation of the three administering Powers, which in reality is indispensable, would be ensured by following this road, my delegation and a number of others feel that it is their clear duty so to vote that this compromise—a renewal for a further three-year period—would be effected. This would, of course, be without prejudice to any desire for a further prolongation of the committee at the end of the next three-year period. By continuing the committee in this way, we should make sure that the work of this committee, which so many colleagues consider of great importance, is continued uninterrupted and with the participation of all its members.

57. I shall therefore, with regard to paragraph 1 of the operative part of draft resolution IV, pursuant to rule 89 of the rules of procedure concerning the division of proposals, ask for a separate vote on the last part of paragraph 1, beginning "and at the end of that period".

58. I shall vote against this last part of the paragraph, doing so in a spirit of compromise, conciliation and co-operation and in the hope that this addition to the original paragraph will be rejected. If this addition is left out, the paragraph would accordingly read:

"Decides to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis for a further three-year period";

It will thus be restored to the original form in which the Fourth Committee received it from the Committee on Information, and will ensure the co-operation of all Member States in the work of that committee.

59. If the last part of the paragraph is thus deleted, my delegation will vote for the remaining part of the paragraph and for the draft resolution as a whole, hoping that many fellow representatives will do the same.

60. Mr. RIEMENS (Netherlands): I shall only refer to draft resolution VI on the factors to be applied when deciding when a territory has reached a full measure of self-government. The Netherlands delegation has certain misgivings about the text of that draft resolution as it has been approved in the Fourth Committee, and it therefore earnestly hopes that all other delegations will consider carefully whether this text is acceptable to them in its present form.

61. The attainment of a full measure of self-government is the high aim to which Member States, responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, have pledged themselves under Article 73 of the Charter. Several Member States, including the Netherlands, have achieved very much and have gone very far along this road. In view of the difficult and somewhat hesitant progress of democratic principles in many parts of the world in recent years, my Government, as well as the peoples of the Netherlands, the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, are justified in feeling some legitimate pride in this achievement.

62. The United Nations, we hold, should welcome such a development, which is in clear accordance with the specific terms and the entire spirit of the Charter. Draft resolution VI now before us, however, attaches so many conditions to the consideration of this development, that we are very much afraid that, instead of being an expression of the joy which our Organization should have in cases like ours, it is rather a witness of sorrow.

63. For more than one year the United Nations has been studying the factors determining whether a territory has attained a full measure of self-government. Since the United Nations has set itself the task of forms of independence and self-government, we feel that it is a necessity that such a study should be brought to a more satisfactory conclusion than the one made earlier this year by the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors and now embodied in the draft resolution as an annex. Indeed, it was observed during the debate in the Fourth Committee that these lists were so exhaustive that few, if any, of the sovereign States, Members of the United Nations, would be able to conform with such a trying test of self-government. It is significant that this remark did not come from one of the administering Powers but from one of the non-administering ones.

64. After all, this is small wonder. On the one side we see in the world of today that the idea of absolute and unrestricted sovereignty is an idea of the past, and that at present for nations to survive and prosper it is necessary to co-operate in larger groups, yielding to each other, and to the new communities they form, a not inconsiderable portion of that sovereignty. As against this development, which is undeniable, we see the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors putting up a list of such rigid requirements for the attainment of self-government in various forms, that this list becomes completely unworkable when applied to a great many practical cases. Such a trend, which runs counter to the development of the modern world and perhaps more particularly to that of the most advanced nations, is intransigent and its results are therefore unsatisfactory. Notwithstanding the fact that the draft resolution says the opposite in one of the paragraphs of the operative part, the establishment of such a rigid list of factors might very well endanger the future development towards full self-government. It is very unwise to establish so high a standard that it cannot in practice be reached.

65. The criticism about the list of factors was fairly general in the committee, and the support small and hesitant. Thus the idea that this study should be renewed and broadened has gained ground, and as a matter of fact this idea also finds its expression in the draft resolution now under consideration. A new committee on factors, with a wider mandate than the previous one, would thus be established to reconsider the problems involved in their entirety.

66. This in itself we consider a wise decision. Its logical consequence, however, would have been and should have been to lay aside the work of the previous committee and to see at the next session of the General Assembly whether the new committee has been able to present a more workable and realistic list of factors.

67. It is unfortunate, in the view of our delegation, that this has not been decided by the committee but that, instead, paragraph 1 of the operative part of the resolution accepts the factors listed so far as a guide. This is all the more serious since the committee also decided to propose a new and real power to the General Assembly to be exercised through the application of this unrealistic list of factors. The General Assembly and the administering Power concerned, so the resolution says, are to use this list as a yardstick in deciding whether a territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government. This power of the General Assembly finds no basis whatsoever in the Charter of the United Nations. Even with the best possible will, it cannot be interpreted as written into the text of Article 73, the only relevant article.

68. How is this power, which has no basis, going to be used? Precisely in applying the list of factors which needs revision. This is not only a poor way to express a thought, but it is also a dangerous way to try and implement it. The attitude of a few of the delegations which moved this part of the hybrid draft resolution has given rise to a strong suspicion as to the real objectives they sought to reach.

69. Those objectives were to give a power to the General Assembly which it does not have under the Charter, and since this power had to be given, irrespective of whether or not the yardstick to be applied in using it was a good one or a bad one, the suspicion is that at least a few of the sponsoring delegations had one objective and one only—to make the General Assembly condemn each and every effort which the administering Powers might have made in establishing a form of self-government in formerly Non-Self-Governing Territories which was not either complete independence or else a cession of territory to a non-administering Power. Some delegations have been candid enough to express such thoughts in the debate.

70. This extremist feeling, which is precisely that of the Soviet Union—as long as Non-Self-Governing Territories governed by other Powers than by the Soviet Union itself are under consideration—has been shared, our delegation feels sorry to state, by a few delegations which apparently seem to favour revolutionary movements rather than a balanced evolution towards self-government. To these delegations—fortunately few in number—the present draft resolution would serve as a cloak of their real intentions. To them the present contradictions and obscure parts of the document must be most welcome, since no one will ever be able to say—if this draft resolution is passed and used as a basis for future Assembly decisions—whether it was applied rightly or wrongly.

71. In the light of these observations, and although welcoming the further study of the problem of factors if undertaken in a spirit of realism and compromise, the Netherlands delegation is opposed to the draft resolution as a whole, and more particularly to paragraph 1 of the operative part of that document. We hope that it will fail to obtain the majority required for a decision of this importance, and we would appeal to the President to apply in this vote a two-thirds majority for passage.

72. Mr. FOURIE (Union of South Africa): We have on several occasions stated our understanding of the scope of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter. Consistently with this attitude, we regard paragraph 2 of draft resolution II as falling outside the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter, and our abstention should therefore be regarded as non-participation in the vote.

73. Mr. AVELINO (Brazil) (translated from French): The Brazilian delegation's stand on the question of the renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories is well known. We believe that this committee should become permanent, because, so long as there are Non-Self-Governing Territories, information must be transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter and a special organ of the General Assembly is therefore needed to examine that information.

74. The constitutional objections to making the committee permanent do not appear to us to be valid. Administering Powers have, however, formally stated that they do not intend to take part in the work of the committee if the General Assembly adopts draft resolution IV approved by the Fourth Committee.

75. My delegation has considered this question very carefully. Much as we disapprove of the stand taken by the administering Powers in questions, we must admit that all our work on Non-Self-Governing Territories might come to nothing if we insisted on maintaining our original position.

76. My delegation has therefore reluctantly come to the conclusion that it must reconsider its stand on the last part of paragraph 1 of the operative part of draft resolution IV. We shall abstain from voting on that part of the paragraph which recommends that after three years the committee shall automatically be continued for as long as there exist Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government. We do not wish by our vote to take part in approving a provision that we are convinced would prevent the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories from continuing its useful work on the same basis.

77. Mr. KHALIDY (Iraq): My delegation would like to explain very briefly its vote and its position concerning the draft resolutions now before the General Assembly. We shall vote in favour of all the draft resolutions presented by the Fourth Committee, subject to the two following changes.

78. In the case of draft resolution II, the United Kingdom delegation has moved an amendment which, I am glad to say, we shall be in a position to accept. We find that this amendment to paragraph 2 of the operative part of draft resolution II will improve the text. We find also that this amendment, which relates to the preceding paragraph of the operative part, rests on the two rocks, as it were, of the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. There is therefore no need to go into further details which might complicate the situation and prove to be of a condemnatory nature. I shall explain this word "condemnatory" very briefly presently. Paragraph 2 should relate more closely to paragraph 1, which makes it reasonable to accept the United Kingdom amendment. Left to its own devices, however, paragraph 2 as it stands would be more sweeping and condemnatory.

79. I shall give the Assembly an illustration. There are Moslems, for example, in the Cameroons and in West Africa, territories which are not self-governing. There are also pagans. There is, perhaps, nothing that the pagans would like better than to sweep down from their hills and wipe out the Moslem and Christian religions and their religious establishments. The duty of the administering Powers is to guarantee the freedom of worship of its inhabitants in accordance with the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Therefore they desire to—and I am sure do—preserve that freedom of worship. One can, in a way, call that a discrimination in favour of the Moslem mosques, but it is not the kind of discrimination envisaged by the Charter or the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

80. Relate this illustration to paragraph 2 of the operative part of draft resolution II, the end of which reads: "...with a view to the abolition of any discriminatory provisions or practices of a racial or religious character". In the light of the illustration which I have given, that does not tally exactly with the complete freedom of worship which it is the duty of the administering Powers to guarantee in accordance with all the precepts of the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. We therefore find the United Kingdom amendment to be of such a nature as to improve the text, and we shall be glad to support it.

81. With regard to draft resolution IV, concerning the renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, now that separate votes have been requested on the first and second parts of paragraph 1 of the operative part, we shall vote in favour of the first part. In the case of the second part, however, we have reconsidered the position very carefully and have arrived at the following conclusion.

82. Let me make it very clear at once—especially to our friends inside and outside the Fourth Committee who have co-operated with us in this matter—that there is nothing we should like better than to have the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories established on a permanent basis. And, as an aside to our friends among the administering Powers, I would say that there is very little practical difference between continuing the committee on the present basis and continuing it on a permanent basis. They seem, however, to hold very tenaciously to a point of principle, in which they may be justified.

83. The most important consideration in our minds at the present time in connexion with this matter is that the committee should continue to function and to include among its members the colonial Powers, which I hope very much will continue to afford it their help and co-operation in its work. If that consideration is in danger of being compromised by a position that has already been made clear from this rostrum, we do not think it worth while to insist upon that point—which, as we believe, could be reconsidered and rectified in the future, after one, two or three years.

84. It has been insinuated by several colonial Powers outside the Fourth Committee and before this Assembly that they might reconsider their attitude if the second part of paragraph 1 of the operative part of draft resolution IV were insisted upon. We had hoped that they would reconsider this intention to reconsider their position, and that they would continue to attend the meetings of the committee. The representative of the United Kingdom, however, has just made it clear, in the name of his Government, that his delegation would not be able to attend if the second part of this paragraph were adopted.

85. At times, we must compromise, if it is worth while to do so. In compromising, one must decide which of two courses is preferable, which would in the long run be more useful and more necessary. We think that, at present, the second part of paragraph 1 of draft resolution IV does not have the importance that some might attach to it. At any rate, the matter will be reviewed at the end of three years. Furthermore, I do not for a moment believe that any Member of the United Nations would suggest that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories should be discontinued. I do not think that such a suggestion, even if it were made, could be adopted.

86. My delegation will therefore abstain from the vote on the second part of paragraph 1 of draft resolution IV.

87. Mr. McINNIS (Canada): I wish very briefly to explain the Canadian delegation's attitude towards two draft resolutions about which we are particularly concerned—draft resolution IV, concerning the renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, and draft resolution VI, dealing with factors.

88. My delegation expressed grave doubts as regards draft resolution VI from the very beginning of the consideration of that draft resolution by the Fourth Committee. The declaratory assertions—particularly those contained in the second paragraph of the preamble and paragraph 4 of the operative part—seem to us to be of very doubtful validity. We voted against these and certain other clauses in committee. We abstained from the vote on the draft resolution as a whole, because in its final form it incorporated a whole series of amendments and additions, and we wished to have time to give full consideration to the draft resolution as it emerged from committee.

89. We have now considered the draft resolution most carefully, and we still do not like it. If it remains in its present form, we shall be compelled to vote against it.

90. The position we have just expressed has a direct bearing on the renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. Let me say that, in principle, we favour the committee's renewal. We even accepted the provision therefor in the present draft resolution, in spite of our strong preference for limiting the committee's term of office to a three-year period. We gave fair warning, however, that, if new developments occurred or new factors were introduced, we might be forced to reconsider our decision.

91. It does seem to us that such new elements are implied—if not actually embodied—in draft resolution VI, on factors. The interpretation which its declaratory clauses would place on the obligations to transmit information goes beyond anything which we envisaged when we agreed to the draft resolution renewing the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. Our objections would not be entirely removed even if the draft resolution on factors were rejected in this Assembly. The semi-permanent basis of the committee would leave the way open for a renewal of similar proposals which might radically change the grounds on which we agreed to its continuance. To add to our concern, there has been a tendency in other committees to impose obligations which were not envisaged when the draft resolution renewing the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories was adopted.

92. Hence we are now persuaded that a desirable safeguard against the developments we have described would be the renewal of the Committee on Information for a fixed term, so that its further continuance might be fully considered in the light of later developments. We took our decision on these grounds and before we knew of the administering Powers' final decision not to participate in the committee's work if the committee was continued in the form provided for in the draft resolution. Naturally, however, the announcement of that decision has greatly strengthened our desire for limiting the committee's term to a three-year period.

93. We therefore profoundly hope that draft resolution IV will be revised on the lines suggested by Denmark. If that is not done, we shall be obliged to withhold our support from it.

94. Mr. URQUIA (El Salvador) (translated from Spanish): Paragraph 3 of the report of the Fourth Committee [A/2296] refers to a reservation made by the representative of Guatemala in regard to Belize Territory. On behalf of the delegation of my country and of three other Central American delegations, I take the liberty of making the following statement concerning that reservation. The delegations of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua, considering that the sister republic of Guatemala has during the present session of the General Assembly declared that it reserves its sovereign rights over Belize Territory, and considering that this is a problem which directly affects the geographical unity of Central America, wish to record their support of the reservation made by the Guatemalan delegation.

95. Mr. Shiva RAO (India): I should like briefly to explain the Indian delegation's votes on the various draft resolutions before the General Assembly.

96. In the Fourth Committee, my delegation felt compelled to abstain from the vote on draft resolution II, on racial discrimination in Non-Self-Governing Territories, because it seemed to us that the amendment of paragraph 2 of the operative part greatly restricted the draft resolution's practical usefulness. The amendment now proposed by the United Kingdom delegation restores, in substance, the original meaning of paragraph 2, while linking it up with the previous paragraph. According to the present amendment, all laws, statutes, and ordinances in force in the Non-Self-Governing Territories would be examined by the administering Members from the standpoint of the principles of the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; that examination would not be restricted to provisions or practices of a racial or religious character. My delegation welcomes the United Kingdom amendment and will vote for it.

97. A controversy has now developed in connexion with another draft resolution since its adoption by the Fourth Committee. I refer to draft resolution IV, on the renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. The question is: should the committee be placed on a permanent basis, or should it be renewed only for a three-year period? From many of the statements made today from this rostrum, it is clear that we are in a real difficulty with regard to draft resolution IV. A great many members of the Fourth Committee would, I know, support a proposal for the immediate establishment of the committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on a permanent basis. That committee, as the General Assembly has acknowledged on more than one occasion, has done valuable work since it was established in 1946. It has infused new life into Article 73 of the Charter. Dependent peoples all over the world have come to regard it as their liaison with the United Nations.

98. My delegation has participated in the work of the Committee on Information ever since it was established, and we are convinced that, so long as the administering Members are under an obligation to furnish information, under Article 73 e, to the Secretary-General, a committee of this kind, whatever may be its name, is indispensable to the General Assembly. There are great advantages to everyone concerned—not excluding the administering Members—in a committee of sixteen on which administering and non-administering Powers are represented in equal numbers, studying a mass of information on educational, economic, social, and now, in a number of instances, also political, conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It has evolved its own technique and developed an atmosphere of its own for the objective analysis and study of all this information.

99. The Fourth Committee and the General Assembly rely on the committee for practical guidance in regard to Non-Self-Governing Territories. If this committee were to be dissolved at any time, the Fourth Committee would have to fall back on a sub-committee of its own to discharge the responsibilities that now devolve on the Committee on Information. That task will take much longer to accomplish than four weeks, and the results will be far less satisfactory.

100. Whether the administering Members like it or not, a special committee on information seems to my delegation to be inevitable so long as there are Non-Self-Governing Territories and Article 73 remains in the Charter. My delegation does not accept the view that an amendment of the Charter is necessary to establish the committee on a permanent basis; Article 22 is clear, and I quote:

"The General Assembly may establish such subsidiary organs as it deems necessary for the performance of its functions."

101. There is, in the view of my delegation, an unquestionable case for a permanent Committee on Information. If, recognizing both its usefulness and its inevitability, all the administering Powers had accepted the proposal, there would have been no debate on this draft resolution this morning. Such acceptance would have strengthened the bonds between administering Members and Non-Self-Governing Territories in a way that political domination can never achieve, because it would have ensured the more rapid progress of colonial peoples towards "a full measure of self-government". I have quoted this phrase from Article 73 of the Charter.

102. At least one administering Member, the United States, was willing, at an earlier stage in the Fourth Committee, to commit itself to the existence of the Committee on Information for as long a period as Non-Self-Governing Territories remain under the control of administering Powers unless, after a three-year period, the General Assembly took a contrary decision.

It is unfortunate that such an amendment, sponsored in the Fourth Committee by the United States and Venezuela, was defeated by a very narrow majority. Now the suggestion appears to be to limit the life of the Committee on Information to a further three-year period, but to say nothing more about its future.

103. May I remind the General Assembly that in 1948, in endorsing the view in favour of the extension of the life of the committee by one year, the General Assembly added the words "without prejudice as to the future" [resolution 219 (III)]. Again, in 1949, in renewing its life for a three-year period, the General Assembly laid down, in its resolution, that the 1952 session would take a decision about the future of the committee. It is, of course, true that the General Assembly can at any time take any decision it considers appropriate, whether it has been so authorized or not by a previous session of the General Assembly. But since this session of the General Assembly was requested by resolution 332 (IV), paragraph 6, to "examine in 1952 the question whether the Special Committee should be renewed for a further period, together with the questions of the composition and terms of reference of any such future Special Committee", a simple statement to the effect that the committee will continue for a further three-year period is likely to be misunderstood.

104. My delegation is willing—reluctantly, I must add—to accept any amendment or to propose one itself which specifically refers the decision regarding the committee to the 1955 session of the General Assembly. Strong views have been expressed this morning by some of the administering Members about the committee. My delegation, too, entertains strong views, but in favour of the committee. It seems to my delegation inconceivable that the General Assembly could endorse the position that, in regard to Non-Self-Governing Territories, it will only go thus far and no further. A full measure of self-government for all Non-Self-Governing Territories so that they may become eligible for membership of the United Nations is, in the view of the Indian delegation, the goal visualized in Chapter XI of the Charter.

105. When the United Kingdom representative outlined, in the Fourth Committee, the policy of his Government towards the colonies under United Kingdom administration, my delegation was prompt in acknowledging the progressive spirit underlying many parts of that statement. In that same spirit of candour, I am bound to say today that I listened to the statement of the United Kingdom representative with some disappointment. He made it clear that if draft resolution IV were adopted in the form in which it has come to the General Assembly from the Fourth Committee, the United Kingdom would not be able to participate in the work of the Committee on Information hereafter.

106. Nevertheless, I must add that, strongly as the Indian delegation advocates the establishment of the committee on a permanent basis, we should consider it a set back if the administering Members—even one of them, the United Kingdom—should decide not to participate in its deliberations for any reason. We may not agree with the line of reasoning which has led to such a decision, but, whether we agree or not, the participation of the administering Members is, in the view of the Indian delegation, necessary if the committee is to yield maximum results.

107. Holding that view, my delegation is willing to put off a decision on the question of the committee being made a permanent body, or not, until the 1955 session of the General Assembly. We should, however, like to make that clear in the draft resolution now before the General Assembly, and therefore my delegation is willing to sponsor an amendment, if I may be permitted to invoke rule 79 of the rules of procedure.

108. We would add a new paragraph if the General Assembly should fail to endorse the second part of paragraph 1 of the operative part of draft resolution IV, and that paragraph—in the event of the General Assembly failing to adopt the second part of paragraph 1—would read as follows:

"Decides that, at its regular session in 1955, the General Assembly will examine the question whether the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories should be renewed for a further period, together with the questions of the composition and terms of reference of any such future committee."

That amendment is substantially the same as paragraph 6 of resolution 332 (IV), in which it was decided to renew the life of the committee for a further period.

109. So far as the Indian delegation is concerned, at no stage have we advanced any arguments or pressed any claims which seemed to us to go beyond the Charter. But we have consistently urged the establishment of conventions which would liberalize the work of the Charter. Such conventions, in our opinion, adapt the written word to the spirit of the times and take into account the experience gained in the work of a written constitution. It is precisely on those lines that progress has been made through the Committee on Information in liberalizing the interpretation of the Charter so far as Non-Self-Governing Territories are concerned. And may I say, without being misunderstood, that it would be most unfortunate if any of us were now to turn back on what has so far been achieved by the General Assembly. We can only go forward if this Organization is to retain and to build up the confidence of dependent peoples throughout the world in the principles and purposes of the Charter.

110. Mr. AGUIRRE (Uruguay) (translated from Spanish): With respect to paragraph 1 of draft resolution IV, Uruguay feels that it would be advantageous to the United Nations to prolong the existence of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and to make it a permanent committee, and it expressed this view in the Fourth Committee. It also feels, however, that if the committee is to be effective, the administering Powers should participate in its work.

111. To that end, considering what would be achieved by the first part of the paragraph, and in view of the statements we have just heard from the representatives of the United Kingdom and Belgium, my delegation, in a desire for harmony and the adoption of constructive and effective resolutions, will abstain from voting on the second part as it now stands, although it supports the solution proposed by the representative of India.

112. As regards draft resolution VI which we have before us, my delegation finds itself in a dilemma. On the one hand, it agrees that the purpose of the proposal is a worthy one; on the other hand, it hesitates to accept the method proposed in the text as the most desirable way to achieve that aim. The second paragraph of the preamble and paragraph 4 of the operative part, which are the most important parts of the draft resolution from a legal point of view, decide some extremely difficult questions about which not only has there been great controversy between the parties, but also considerable argument among those who make a study of the law as applied to treaties; in those circles, the matter has been given special attention. If we were discussing this matter now, my delegation would not hesitate to take part in the discussion on the side of the sponsors of the proposal; but we are not here to discuss it but to take a decision on a controversy which we feel has not yet ended.

113. The second paragraph of the preamble refers to the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter, which includes Article 73 e, and the discussion of the purposes of Article 73 e has not yet been ended. Paragraph 4 of the operative part affirms the principle that there can be no form of autonomy without a full measure of self-government. That principle, as we see, is based on a very controversial notion; in addition, it is connected with the concept of full self-government. But in reality there are so many different degrees of self-government that until we have a definition, we cannot know with certainty exactly what a full measure of self-government is.

114. If my delegation is to support this proposal, these defects must be remedied. Unanimous agreement to that end among the States represented here would be impossible to achieve; but we should like to have some firm basis which would ensure that the proposal is legally consistent and that it takes full account of realities within the framework of an authoritative interpretation of the Charter.

115. To press on, as this draft resolution does, unheeding the reservations made on the subject and leaving unsettled the objections, the opposition on grounds of principle and the varying interpretations to which it gives rise will be to nurture the germ of insoluble and interminable disputes which may conspire to prevent compliance with the resolution. My delegation pauses when it considers this resistance and believes that the United Nations has hitherto followed the best possible course in this regard. An attempt has been made to achieve a gradual improvement of the methods of implementing the ambiguous text of Chapter XI of the Charter, by means of various resolutions which the General Assembly has adopted at its first, third, fourth and sixth sessions. The achievements and progress known to you all were brought about in this way; it is by this means, that is, by seeking in the first place to lay firm foundations on which to build, that we shall attain our ideal, however distant it may be.

116. To sum up, therefore, Uruguay will abstain from voting for the draft resolution as a whole. If there is a vote by division, it will abstain on the two paragraphs I have mentioned, which, it considers, are legally of the most importance. It will vote for the other paragraphs, thus voting somewhat differently from the way it voted in committee, because at that time the vote was still to be taken on an amendment which my delegation considered preferable.

117. Mr. PONCE YEPES (Ecuador) (translated from Spanish): In the Fourth Committee, the Ecuadorian delegation supported draft resolution IV as it appears in the report of that Committee (A/2296).

118. After hearing the delegations of the United Kingdom, France and Belgium state here this morning that they would not take part in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories if paragraph 1 of the operative part were adopted in the form proposed by the Fourth Committee, my delegation feels that it should reconsider its attitude in part and abstain on the passage beginning "and at the end of that period", while voting for the first part of the paragraph. It is undeniable that the experience and knowledge of those Powers would be an essential contribution to the Committee on Information, which should not be deprived of their collaboration.

119. Although it does not agree with the attitude of the administering Powers, my delegation has taken this decision for practical reasons, in view of de facto situations which might have considerable influence on the survival of the committee. My delegation's attitude does not mean, of course, that it agrees with the principles or arguments adduced by the administering Powers against the automatic continuation of the committee, which we hope will be made permanent in the not-too-distant future.

120. My delegation considers the amendment just submitted by the Indian delegation eminently conciliatory and useful, and will support it whole-heartedly.

121. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) (translated from Spanish): The delegation of the Dominican Republic wishes briefly to explain its vote on some of the drafts submitted to the Assembly by the Fourth Committee.

122. Our point of view has always been based consistently on two principles: first, a reasonable and proper interpretation of the Charter and of the resolutions of the General Assembly, particularly on this subject, concerning which there are certain linguistic ambiguities in Chapter XI of the Charter; and, secondly, international collaboration and co-operation, to which the Dominican Republic attributes the utmost importance, especially within the sphere of action of the United Nations. That is why we have always been realistic in our entire outlook on the work of the Fourth Committee. But there are certain problems about which we are concerned in many of the draft resolutions submitted to us for consideration, since these drafts have apparently been conceived for the purposes of a single session only, without due consideration having been given to their consequences; thus they give rise to difficulties which have appeared year after year, at every session.

123. We shall vote in the following manner, consistently with our delegation's unvarying attitude. We shall vote for draft resolution II, but we shall support the United Kingdom amendments, since we believe that they improve the text considerably and eliminate some practical difficulties likely to arise when it comes to giving effect to the resolution.

124. With regard to draft resolution IV, on the renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, my delegation has always believed that the committee should one day be placed on a permanent basis. Everything, however, depends on the correct interpretation of Article 73 of the Charter and particularly on the need to clear up the ambiguity which all authorities and jurists have found in the wording of that article. Owing to that uncertainty, my delegation has persisted in believing that the committee should continue to function on the basis of a three-year term, the idea originally proposed by the United States. We were compelled to abstain in the Fourth Committee when the provision for automatic continuation was included in paragraph 1 of the operative part. We shall accordingly vote for the deletion of this automatic factor and then for draft resolution IV.

125. My delegation would like to draw attention to a slight error which it thinks has crept into paragraph 7 of the operative part of draft resolution VI, on factors. It appears in sub-paragraph (a), which refers to "the possibility of defining the concept of self-government for the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter", as one of the factors to be studied by the proposed committee.

126. We believe that the error lies in using the words "concept of self-government" instead of "concept of a full measure of self-government", which is the phrase used in Article 73 of the United Nations Charter. I think that the words "full measure of" have been omitted by error. I should like the General Assembly to consider the matter, and hope that there will be no objection to correcting the text to read: "The possibility of defining the concept of a full measure of self-government for the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter."

127. The Dominican Republic abstained from voting on this draft resolution because it thought that, from the legal point of view, the inclusion of the principle of the indivisibility of self-determination in itself precluded any study of factors. If the General Assembly adopted a declaration of this kind, there would be no need, we feel, for a study on such factors. If paragraph 4 is retained, we shall continue to abstain on the draft resolution.

128. For the same reasons, we also take the position that if the Fourth Committee considered that a more thorough study of factors should be continued, there was no need—and it was premature—to approve a list of factors provisionally. We shall, then, continue to abstain not only if paragraph 1 of the operative part of the draft resolution VI is adopted, but also if paragraph 4 is adopted.

129. Mr. RIVAS (Venezuela) (translated from Spanish): I shall begin by explaining how my delegation will vote on draft resolution IV submitted by the Fourth Committee. My delegation considers that, so long as the Non-Self-Governing Territories described in Chapter XI of the Charter exist, there will be functions for the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to perform, and the permanent nature of those functions is therefore sufficient justification for the establishment of a permanent body. The constructive work done by that committee has, moreover, been recognized year after year by both administering and non-administering Powers. The reason for this achievement is simple. The committee has filled a gap and has done so in the spirit of the Charter and for the benefit of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories. Thanks to the committee, the information transmitted by the administering Powers in fulfilment of the obligations they assumed when they signed the Charter, particularly under Chapter XI, has acquired what I would describe as a dynamic significance, which has benefited the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and has contributed to a better understanding by the outside world of the social, economic and educational work which the administering Powers have been carrying out in the Non-Self-Governing Territories since the Second World War.

130. But despite the committee's successful and beneficial work, the suspicion with which it has always been regarded by some administering Powers, so far from decreasing, appears to be increasing. The real reasons for this suspicion have never been quite clear to my delegation.

131. We have heard the United Kingdom representative announce at the beginning of this meeting that, if the committee is maintained on a permanent basis, his delegation will not only vote against the proposal, but, if the committee is reconstituted, the United Kingdom will refuse to take part in its work. The United Kingdom is the State administering the largest number of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The statement did not surprise my delegation, since it realized from this year's discussions in the Fourth Committee that the United Kingdom would take up, at the least, the attitude which has just been officially stated in categorical terms.

132. In the desire to prevent this move, which must unquestionably be detrimental to the success of the committee's work, my delegation succeeded in persuading the United States representative to join with it in submitting an amendment to the proposal then under discussion, whereby the committee's existence would be automatically extended every three years unless otherwise decided by the General Assembly. That amendment has just been mentioned by the representative of India. Unfortunately, as the representative of India stated, only part of the joint amendment of the United States and Venezuela was adopted. The same conciliatory and practical approach will lead my delegation to abstain on the second part of paragraph 1 of the operative part of draft resolution IV. It will do so in the desire to facilitate a compromise, a compromise relating solely to dates and procedure and not affecting the fundamental issue. That issue is that the committee is envisaged in the Charter, that it is essential for the effective application of Chapter XI, and that it will have functions to perform as long as Non-Self-Governing Territories exist. That is and will continue to be the position for the Government of Venezuela.

133. My delegation was one of the sponsors of draft resolution VI, which was adopted with a few amendments. A number of reservations were expressed in the Fourth Committee concerning the second paragraph of the preamble and paragraph 4 of the operative part, reservations which do not seem entirely valid to my delegation. For some time, now, the United Nations has been playing this game of baseball, as I described the discussion of the factors question in the Fourth Committee, in search of a phrase which would say and yet not say what the Charter said. But in declaring that, for a Territory to be deemed self-governing in economic, social or educational matters, it is essential that its peoples shall have attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter, we are not discovering gunpowder, starting a historical revolution or achieving any awe-inspiring feat. All we are doing is to restate the fundamental basis of the obligations of the administering Powers. Chapter XI of the Charter is quite clear. The administering Powers are required to submit information because the Non-Self-Governing Territories which they administer have not attained a full measure of self-government and, until that stage has been reached, their obligation will continue. This notion is simple, it is merely a repetition of the Charter, but today we seem to be afraid of hearing the Charter quoted.

134. Blatta Ogbazgy DAWIT (Ethiopia): In the course of his explanation of vote, the representative of Belgium made mention of my country and, by way of illustration, attempted to place Ethiopia in a position similar to that of Belgium with respect to its colony in Africa. I should like to call the attention of the representative of Belgium to Ethiopian history and request him to read it before venturing to make such misleading statements. My country does not have any Non-Self-Governing Territories, as Belgium and many other European Powers have.

135. The PRESIDENT: There are no other speakers on my list. We now come to the vote in respect of these six draft resolutions which appear in the report, and in respect of which amendments have been moved.

136. We shall vote first on draft resolution I. A separate vote on paragraph 1 of the operative part has been requested.

Paragraph 1 was adopted by 45 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions.

Draft resolution I was adopted by 45 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions. 643

137. The PRESIDENT: We shall vote now on draft resolution II. An amendment (A/L.127) has been moved by the delegation of the United Kingdom to paragraph 2 of the operative part. That amendment would delete the words "of a racial or religious character" at the end of the paragraph, and would insert the word "such" between the words "any" and "discriminatory".

The amendment was adopted by 37 votes to 6, with 11 abstentions.

Draft resolution II, as amended, was adopted by 51 votes to none, with 1 abstention. 644

138. The PRESIDENT: We now come to draft resolution III. A separate vote has been requested on the third paragraph of the preamble.

The paragraph was adopted by 42 votes to 6, with 9 abstentions.

Draft resolution III was adopted by 47 votes to 2, with 8 abstentions. 645

139. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now consider draft resolution IV. A separate vote has been requested on paragraph 1 of the operative part. Indeed, it has been requested that this paragraph should be divided and a separate vote taken in respect of each part of the paragraph. The delegation of India has moved an amendment to this draft resolution, conditional upon the rejection of the second part of paragraph 1. Therefore, before we consider that amendment, I assume that the General Assembly should vote on this paragraph to see what happens to the second part. If the second part is rejected, I propose to put the Indian amendment to the vote.

140. We shall now vote on the first part of paragraph 1, which reads as follows:

"Decides to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis for a further three-year period..."

The first part of paragraph 1 was adopted by 52 votes to 1, with 5 abstentions.

141. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now vote on the second part of paragraph 1, which reads as follows:

"...and at the end of that period, unless otherwise decided by the General Assembly, to continue the committee automatically thereafter for as long as there exist Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government."

A roll-call vote has been requested.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

Afghanistan, having been drawn by lot by the President, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Indonesia, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Iceland, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Peru, Sweden, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Greece, India, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Liberia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Paraguay, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen.

The second part of paragraph 1 was rejected by 18 votes to 11, with 30 abstentions.

142. The PRESIDENT: That part of paragraph 1 is deleted from the draft resolution. The amendment proposed by the delegation of India would introduce a new paragraph, which reads as follows:

"Decides that, at its regular session in 1955, the General Assembly will examine the question whether the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories should be renewed for a further period, together with the questions of the composition and terms of reference of any such future committee."

143. The General Assembly will now vote on the Indian amendment to draft resolution IV which I have just read.

The amendment was adopted by 43 votes to 3, with 11 abstentions.

Draft resolution IV, as amended, was adopted by 53 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions. 646

144. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now vote on draft resolution V.

Draft resolution V was adopted by 43 votes to 11, with 4 abstentions. 647

145. The PRESIDENT: We come now to draft resolution VI. In respect of this draft resolution, a delegation has moved that it be treated as an important question.

146. Before taking the vote, which will be by roll-call, I wish to call attention to paragraph 6 of this draft resolution, which reads, in part:

"Decides to set up a new Ad Hoc Committee of ten members, consisting of..."

A blank is left for the membership of that committee. I understand that the Fourth Committee has agreed on the ten countries that should be included in the membership of the committee. I think, therefore, that it would be desirable to vote on the draft resolution in the knowledge of the membership of the committee. The ten countries are: Australia, Belgium, Burma, Cuba, Guatemala, Iraq, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela. The vote will therefore be on the draft resolution with the inclusion of the names of those ten countries, which were agreed upon by the Fourth Committee.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

Uruguay, having been drawn by lot by the President, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Liberia, Mexico, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Panama, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Denmark, France, Iceland, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

Abstaining: Uruguay, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Greece, Israel, Paraguay, Peru.

The result of the vote was 36 in favour, 15 against and 7 abstentions.

Draft resolution VI was adopted, having obtained the required two-thirds majority. 648

147. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Guatemala for an explanation of vote.

148. Mr. TORIELLO GARRIDO (Guatemala) (translated from Spanish): I wish to make a short statement, but not in explanation of my vote.

149. The delegation of Guatemala wishes to express its sincere thanks to the delegations of the Central-American republics of El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica for their statement at this plenary meeting expressing their solidarity with the reservation made by Guatemala in the Fourth Committee. That statement in support of the just claims of my country is very significant not only because of the moral and legal support that it represents, but also because it is further evidence of the sincere friendship and brotherhood which unite our republics.

The meeting rose at 1.10 p.m.

FACTORS WHICH SHOULD BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN DECIDING
WHETHER A TERRITORY IS OR IS NOT A TERRITORY WHOSE PEOPLE
HAVE NOT YET ATTAINED A FULL MEASURE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

39. From its 271st to 278th meetings, the Fourth Committee discussed item 36 on the Assembly's agenda; it had before it the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2178).

40. At the 273rd meeting, Burma, Cuba, Egypt, Guatemala, Iraq and Venezuela submitted a joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1) under the terms of which the General Assembly would: (1) approve the annexed list of factors which might serve as a guide, both for the General Assembly and for the Members of the United Nations which have or assume the responsibility for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, in deciding whether a territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government; (2) recognize that each concrete case should be considered and decided in the light of the particular circumstances of that case; (3) declare that the factors, while serving as a guide in determining whether the obligations as set forth in Article 73 e of the Charter still existed, should in no way be interpreted as a hindrance to the attainment of a full measure of self-government by the Non-Self-Governing territories; (4) further declare that for a territory to be deemed self-governing in economic, social or educational affairs, it was essential that its people should have attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter; and (5) recommend that the annexed list of factors should be taken into account in any case which the General Assembly examined resulting from any communication received by the Secretary-General in virtue of General Assembly resolution 222 (III) concerning the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter, or in relation to other questions that might arise concerning the existence of an obligation to transmit information under this Article.

41. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics proposed an amendment (A/C.4/L.233) to the above-mentioned joint draft resolution to add to the third paragraph of the preamble the following words:

"and that, not later than six months after the submission of the aforesaid information, such information as may be required in such cases should be communicated, including information about the constitution, legislative acts or executive orders regarding the government of the territory as well as about constitutional relationship of the territory of the government of the metropolitan country".

42. Poland proposed an amendment (A/C.4/L.235) to add at the end of the second paragraph of the operative part of the joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1) the following phrase: "and taking into account the right of self-determination of peoples".

43. A joint amendment by the Dominican Republic and Peru (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1) to the same joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1) was also introduced. This amendment would (1) delete the second paragraph of the preamble; (2) add as fifth paragraph of the preamble the following: "Having regard to resolution 567 (VI) of the General Assembly"; (3) delete operative paragraph 1 and replace it by the following: "1. Notes with interest the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) contained in document A/2178 and considers that report as a valuable contribution to the exhaustive study of the factors which would make it possible to determine when a territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government"; (4) delete operative paragraphs 2, 3, 4 and 5 and replace them by the following paragraphs: "2. Decides to set up a new ad hoc committee of ten members, consisting of (list of countries), with instructions to continue and carry out a more thorough study of the factors which will have to be taken into account in deciding whether a territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government; 3. Invites the said committee to take into account, inter alia, the list of factors prepared in 1952 (document A/2178) by the Ad Hoc Committee set up under General Assembly resolution 567 (VI) and, further, to take into account the following additional elements: (a) the possibility of defining the concept of self-government for the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter, (b) the features guaranteeing the principle of the self-determination of peoples in relation to Chapter XI of the Charter, (c) the manifestation of the freely expressed will of the peoples in relation to the determination of their national and international status; 4. Requests the Secretary-General to convene the ad hoc committee so that it may begin its work two weeks before the opening of the 1953 session of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories".

44. The Netherlands proposed an amendment (A/C.4/L.236) to insert the following paragraphs after operative paragraph 3 of the joint amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1): "4. Requests the Committee to take into account the statements transmitted by a number of governments in compliance with resolution 567 (VI) of 18 January 1952; 5. Invites all Members of the United Nations to transmit in writing to the Secretary-General, by 1 May 1953, a statement of the views of their governments on the subjects contained in the terms of reference of this committee;" and renumber paragraph 4 as paragraph 6.

45. In an attempt to reconcile the divergent views expressed in the joint draft resolution submitted by Burma, Cuba, Egypt, Guatemala, Iraq and Venezuela (A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1) and in the joint amendment thereto proposed by the Dominican Republic and Peru (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1), Argentina proposed a further amendment (A/C.4/L.237) to the latter joint amendment which would (1) maintain the original paragraphs of the preamble in the joint draft resolution; (2) maintain the original operative paragraph 1 of the joint draft resolution subject to the insertion of the word "provisionally" after the word "Approves"; and (3) add the three operative paragraphs proposed in point 4 of the joint amendment as additional operative paragraphs to the joint draft resolution.

46. At the 278th meeting, the Committee voted on the joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1) sponsored by Burma, Cuba, Egypt, Guatemala, Iraq and Venezuela, paragraph by paragraph, and on the amendments thereto, with the following results:

Draft resolution VI

FACTORS WHICH SHOULD BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN DECIDING WHETHER A TERRITORY IS OR IS NOT A TERRITORY WHOSE PEOPLE HAVE NOT YET ATTAINED A FULL MEASURE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

The General Assembly,

Taking into account the obligation to transmit information, accepted in virtue of Article 73 e of the Charter by the Members which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government,

Taking into account that this obligation remains in force with regard to each Territory until such time as the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter are fulfilled,

Taking into account the statement contained in resolution 222 (III), adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1948, to the effect that it is essential for the United Nations to be informed of any change that may take place in the constitutional status of any Non-Self-Governing Territory, and that, not later than six months after the submission of the aforesaid information, such information as may be required in such cases should be communicated, including information about the constitution, legislative acts or executive orders regarding the government of the territory as well as about the constitutional relationship of the territory to the government of the metropolitan country,

Having examined the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2178),

Recognizing that, in deciding whether a Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government, an enumeration of factors would be a useful guide both for the General Assembly and for the Administering Member concerned,

Having regard to its resolution 567 (VI) of 18 January 1952,

1. Approves provisionally the annexed list of factors which may serve as a guide, both for the General Assembly and for the Members of the United Nations which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, in deciding whether a Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government;

2. Recognizes that each concrete case should be considered and decided in the light of the particular circumstances of that case and taking into account the right of self-determination of peoples;

3. Declares that the factors, while serving as a guide in determining whether the obligations as set forth in Article 73 e of the Charter still exist, should in no way be interpreted as a hindrance to the attainment of a full measure of self-government by the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

4. Further declares that, for a Territory to be deemed self-governing in economic, social or educational affairs, it is essential that its people shall have attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter;

5. Recommends that, provisionally, the annexed list of factors should be taken into account in any case which the General Assembly examines resulting from any communication received by the Secretary-General in virtue of General Assembly resolution 222 (III) concerning the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter, or in relation to other questions that may arise concerning the existence of an obligation to transmit information under this Article;

6. Decides to set up a new Ad Hoc Committee of ten members, consisting of (list of countries), with instructions to continue and carry out a more thorough study of the factors which will have to be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government;

7. Invites the said Committee to take into account, inter alia, the list of factors (A/2178) prepared in 1952 by the Ad Hoc Committee set up under General Assembly resolution 567 (VI) the statements transmitted by governments in compliance with the aforementioned resolution and, further, to take into account the following additional elements:

- (a) The possibility of defining the concept of self-government for the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter;
- (b) The features guaranteeing the principle of the self-determination of peoples in relation to Chapter XI of the Charter;
- (c) The manifestation of the freely expressed will of the peoples in relation to the determination of their national and international status for the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter;

8. Invites all Members of the United Nations to transmit in writing to the Secretary-General, by 1 May 1953, a statement of the views of their governments on the subjects contained in the terms of reference of the Committee;

9. Requests the Secretary-General to convene the Ad Hoc Committee so that it may begin its work not later than four weeks before the opening of the 1953 session of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

ANNEX

FACTORS INDICATIVE OF THE ATTAINMENT OF INDEPENDENCE OR OF OTHER SEPARATE SYSTEMS OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

First Part

Factors indicative of the attainment of independence

A. International status

1. International responsibility. Full international responsibility of the territory for the acts inherent in the exercise of its external sovereignty and for the corresponding acts in the administration of its internal affairs.
2. Eligibility for membership in the United Nations.
3. General international relations. Power to enter into direct relations of every kind with other governments and with international institutions and to negotiate, sign and ratify international instruments.
4. National defence. Freedom of the territory to enter into arrangements concerning its national defence.

B. Internal self-government

1. Form of government. Complete freedom of the people of the territory to choose the form of government which they desire.
2. Territorial government. Freedom from control or interference by the government of another State in respect of the internal government (legislature, executive, judiciary) and administration of the territory.
3. Economic, social and cultural jurisdiction. Complete autonomy in respect of economic, social and cultural affairs.

Second Part

Factors indicative of the attainment of other separate systems of self-government.

A. General

1. Political advancement. Political advancement of the population sufficient to enable them to decide upon the future destiny of the territory with due knowledge.

2. Opinion of the population. The opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.

3. Voluntary limitation by sovereignty. Degree to which the sovereignty of the territory is limited by its own free will when that territory has attained a separate system of self-government.

B. International status

1. General international relations. Degree or extent to which the territory exercises the power to enter freely into direct relations of every kind with other governments and with international institutions and to negotiate, sign and ratify international instruments freely.

2. Eligibility for membership in the United Nations.

C. Internal self-government

1. Territorial government. Nature and measure of control or interference, if any, by the government of another State in respect of the internal government, for example, in respect of the following:

Legislature: The enactment of laws for the territory by an indigenous body whether fully elected by free and democratic processes or lawfully constituted in a manner receiving the free consent of the population;

Executive: The selection of members of the executive branch of the government by the competent authority in the territory receiving consent of the indigenous population, whether that authority is hereditary or elected, having regard also to the nature and measure of control, if any, by an outside agency on that authority, whether directly or indirectly exercised in the constitution and conduct of the executive branch of the government;

Judiciary: The establishment of courts of law and the selection of judges.

2. Participation of the population. Effective participation of the population in the government of the territory: (a) Is there an adequate and appropriate electoral and representative system? (b) Is this electoral system conducted without direct or indirect interference from a foreign government?^{1/}

3. Economic, social and cultural jurisdiction. Degree of autonomy in respect of economic, social and cultural affairs, as illustrated by the degree of freedom from economic pressure as exercised, for example, by a foreign minority group which, by virtue of the help of a foreign Power, has acquired a privileged economic status prejudicial to the general economic interest of the people of the territory; and by the degree of freedom and lack of discrimination against the indigenous population of the territory in social legislation and social developments.

Factors indicative of the free association of a territory with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country

A. General

1. Political advancement. Political advancement of the population

1/ For example, the following questions would be relevant:

- (i) Has each adult inhabitant equal power (subject to special safeguards for minorities) to determine the character of the government of the territory?
- (ii) Is this power exercised freely, i.e., is there an absence of undue influence over and coercion of the voter and of the imposition of disabilities on particular political parties? Some tests which can be used in the application of this factor are as follows:
 - (a) The existence of effective measures to ensure the democratic expression of the will of the people;
 - (b) The existence of more than one political party in the territory;
 - (c) The existence of a secret ballot;
 - (d) The existence of legal prohibitions on the exercise of undemocratic practices in the course of elections;
 - (e) The existence for the individual elector of a choice between candidates of differing political parties;
 - (f) The absence of "martial law" and similar measures at election times;
- (iii) Is each individual free to express his political opinions, to support or oppose any political party or cause, and to criticize the government of the day?

sufficient to enable them to decide upon the future destiny of the territory with due knowledge.

2. Opinion of the population. The opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.

3. Geographical considerations. Extent to which the relations of the territory with the capital of the central government may be affected by circumstances arising out of their respective geographical positions, such as separation by land, sea or other natural obstacles.

4. Ethnic and cultural considerations. Extent to which the population are of different race, language or religion or have a distinct cultural heritage, interests or aspirations, distinguishing them from the peoples of the country with which they freely associate themselves.

5. Constitutional considerations. Association (a) by virtue of the constitution of the metropolitan country; or (b) by virtue of a treaty or bilateral agreement affecting the status of the territory, taking into account (i) whether the constitutional guarantees extend equally to the associated territory, (ii) whether there are powers in certain matters constitutionally reserved to the territory or to the central authority, and (iii) whether there is provision for the participation of the territory on a basis of equality in any changes in the constitutional system of the State.

B. Status

1. Legislative representation. Representation without discrimination in the central legislative organs on the same basis as other inhabitants and regions.

2. Citizenship. Citizenship without discrimination on the same basis as other inhabitants.

3. Government officials. Eligibility of officials from the territory in all public offices of the central authority, by appointment or election, on same basis as those from other parts of the country.

Internal constitutional conditions

1. Suffrage. Universal and equal suffrage, and free periodic elections, characterized by an absence of undue influence over and coercion of the voter

or of the imposition of disabilities on particular political parties.^{2/}

2. Local rights and status. In a unitary system equal rights and status for the inhabitants and local bodies of the territory as enjoyed by inhabitants and local bodies of other parts of the country; in a federal system an identical degree of self-government for the inhabitants and local bodies of all parts of the federation.

3. Local officials. Appointment or election of officials in the territory on the same basis as those in other parts of the country.

4. Internal legislation. Local self-government of the same scope and under the same conditions as enjoyed by other parts of the country.

^{2/} For example, the following tests would be relevant:

- (a) The existence of effective measures to ensure the democratic expression of the will of the people;
- (b) The existence of more than one political party in the territory;
- (c) The existence of a secret ballot;
- (d) The existence of legal prohibitions on the exercise of undemocratic practices in the course of elections;
- (e) The existence for the individual elector of a choice between candidates of differing political parties;
- (f) The absence of "martial law" and similar measures at election times;
- (g) Freedom of each individual to express his political opinions, to support or oppose any political party or cause, and to criticize the government of the day.

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2178)

1. Mr. KHALIDY (Iraq), speaking as Chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors, introduced the Committee's report (A/2178).

2. The question of determining whether a territory had or had not achieved a full measure of self-government was one of the problems posed by the text of the Charter which had in various ways influenced discussions in the Fourth Committee. It had arisen as early as 1946, during the second part of the first session of the General Assembly when, after the consideration of communications from various governments, it had been decided that the best course of action at that time was to incorporate in resolution 66 (I) an enumeration of the territories which had been declared by the Administering Members concerned to fall within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter. In 1949, following the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e in respect of certain territories, the General Assembly adopted resolution 334 (IV) in which it had invited the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to examine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory was or was not a territory whose people had not yet attained a full measure of self-government. That Committee had been able to transmit to the General Assembly a report (A/1836 and Corr.1, part four) containing a list of factors which it had said was not to be regarded as exhaustive. Using that list as a basis for its consideration of the problem, the Fourth Committee had, at the Assembly's sixth session, established a sub-committee, which had studied the question further and submitted two lists:

* Indicates the item number on the agenda of the General Assembly.

one of factors indicative of the attainment of independence or other separate system of self-government, and the other of factors indicative of the free association of a territory on equal status with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country. On the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, the General Assembly in resolution 567 (W), had decided to take those two lists as a basis, and had also decided that since further study based on more complete information was required for a more definitive list, it would invite Member States to transmit their views to the Secretary-General on the basis of the list drawn up at the sixth session. It had also appointed an ad hoc committee of ten members to carry out the further study. That was the Committee whose report was now before the Fourth Committee.

3. The work of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors had been governed by certain general considerations. First, it had been agreed that the Committee was concerned only with Non-Self-Governing Territories as covered by Chapter XI of the Charter. The details of the occasions on which that point had been previously made were to be found in paragraph 5 (A) of document A/2178. Secondly, the Committee had decided that the question of what authority should determine that a territory had reached a stage of self-government where it fell outside the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter was not within its competence. Various members of the Ad Hoc Committee had reserved their right to deal with that question in the General Assembly. Thirdly, it had been agreed to refer to the General Assembly the question of the extent to which Article 73 e continued to apply in the case of territories which had become neither independent nor fully integrated within another State but which had already attained a full measure of self-government in their internal affairs. The Netherlands Government had submitted a list of factors relating to that question, which had been included in the Committee's report.

4. After those jurisdictional questions had been disposed of, the Committee had co-operated in producing a revised list of proposed factors, which were set out in detail in the report. The same two general categories had been maintained, but the first had been divided into two parts: first, factors indicative of the attainment of independence; and secondly, factors indicative of the attainment of other separate systems of self-government. The second major category was still entitled "Factors indicative of the free association of a territory with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country."

5. The Government of Iraq had suggested that a new factor relating to the question of armed forces should be added to the list, but as that raised the difficult questions of security which were beyond the terms of the Committee's work, it had been agreed to include a broad reference to the question of responsibility for national defence, and to record the text submitted by the Government of Iraq in paragraph 5 (E) of the report.

6. The United Kingdom Government had sent the Secretary-General a list of factors which, in its view, would ideally have to be taken into account in deciding whether a territory was or was not a territory whose people enjoyed a full measure of self-government. The Committee had found it possible to include in its list the points concerning the political rights of individuals, while the others, regarding the position of the executive, the judiciary and internal security, had been recorded in the report.

7. The Committee had been able to agree on the individual factors in its list without taking any votes. However, when the report as a whole was adopted, by 7 votes to none with 2 abstentions, some delegations had made formal reservations and it had been agreed that all delegations would be free to re-examine the report in the General Assembly.

8. The most important statement made by the Committee was that no enumeration of factors could do more than serve as a guide in determining whether a territory was or was not fully self-governing. Each specific case would need to be determined by the particular circumstances of that case. Paragraph 5 of the annex to resolution 567 (VI) had underlined that principle by stressing that such a list of factors could not be regarded as exhaustive or definitive.

9. In conclusion, Mr. Khalidy paid a tribute to the spirit of co-operation which had dominated the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors and to the diligence and devotion of its secretariat.

The meeting rose at 4.15 p.m.

1. Mr. FORSYTH (Australia) said the Australian delegation in the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors had reserved its position and had abstained from voting on the Committee's report because it did not approve of the manner in which the Committee had dealt with the question and revised the list of factors. No precise definition had been given of the basic expressions used during the discussion of the problem, and the status of the territories had been regarded as a factor enabling the measure of self-government they had attained to be determined. In his opinion, the two concepts were not of the same kind. The Australian delegation, moreover, had always doubted the practical value of a list of factors. Not only had those who advocated the study of factors failed to justify the need for such study, but the preparation of the list intended for the guidance of the competent authorities had shown in practice that other questions were involved. The difficulties of the task left little hope for its success.

2. The more than seventy Non-Self-Governing Territories in respect of which the Administering Members transmitted information to the General Assembly differed greatly in geographical situation, population and political conditions and it would be unrealistic to think that the pace or the forms of their advance towards self-government could be uniform. Furthermore, the discussions in the General Assembly and the Ad Hoc Committee had shown that, owing to the great variety of their traditions and political philosophies, Member States had had difficulty in reaching agreement on the factors to be formulated. For that reason, Australia had adopted an attitude of reserve; it had seldom taken part in the discussions and had decided not to transmit to the Secretary-General the statement requested in General Assembly resolution 567 (VI).

3. The Australian delegation's chief criticism was that an attempt had been made to establish that the attainment of independence was one of the means by which a territory could achieve self-government. That view, reflected in the annex to the General Assembly's resolution, was based on an unjustified interpretation of the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter. The list of factors appearing in that annex should therefore be studied with the greatest care.

4. In the introduction to the annex, the General Assembly stated, in particular, that the essential factors to be taken into account in deciding whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory had attained a full measure of self-government were the following: political advancement of the population sufficient to enable them to decide upon the future destiny of the territory with due knowledge; the opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desired. With regard to territories which had freely united or associated themselves on a footing of equal status with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country or countries, the following factors, according to the annex, were also essential and should be taken into account: representation in the legislative organs, and citizenship.

5. The whole of the introduction to the annex was very unsatisfactory, and the ideas it contained had made the discussion more confused. In his opinion, an attempt should be made to define the basic terminology. He had made a suggestion to that effect to the Ad Hoc Committee, but the latter had deliberately evaded the question. In any case, the Committee's report (A/2178) did not finally settle the matter, and he still thought that before a list of factors was prepared the exact meaning of the words "a full measure of self-government" should be determined, for that concept was at the very basis of Chapter XI of the Charter. Though he did not wish to make a definite proposal, he suggested that the Committee might, for example, consider that a people had attained a full measure of self-government when the executive power of government was controlled by the will of the community in accordance with the territory's constitution.

6. The most serious mistake that had been made had been to regard independence as a criterion of a full measure of self-government. Thus, paragraph 3 of the introduction to the annex stated that the condition under which the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter ceased to apply would be that the inhabitants of the territory had attained a full measure of self-government, and that that condition could be fulfilled by two principal means, namely, the attainment of independence, or the union of the territory on a footing of equal status with other component parts of the metropolitan or other territory or its association on the same conditions with the metropolitan or other country. In his delegation's opinion, it was wrong to assert that the attainment of independence was a necessary condition of self-government. Actually, the word "independence" did not appear in Chapter XI of the Charter, and the General Assembly was not competent to state that the attainment of independence was the principal means by which a territory could achieve a full measure of self-government. Independence or association with other countries or territories were not characteristics of complete self-government; they were its consequences. If a people had attained a full measure of self-government, it was for that people to determine its own status.

7. Paragraph 3 also contained the following sentence: "The extent to which the provisions of Article 73 e continue to apply in the case of territories which have become neither independent nor fully integrated within another State but which have already attained a full measure of self-government in their internal affairs is a question which merits further study." In his opinion, that statement was mistaken. When a territory had attained a full measure of self-government, it no longer fell under the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter, and there was no longer any reason why its case should continue to be considered. That was a typical example of the confusion created by the text under consideration. The confusion was largely due to the fact that independence and self-government were regarded as complementary concepts.

8. With regard to the factors mentioned in paragraphs 6 and 7 of the introduction to the annex, the first two, namely, political advancement and the opinion of the population, should be studied separately from the other two, for they were of such a general nature that it should not take long to deal with them. The fact that the last two factors mentioned in the introduction—legislative representation and citizenship—were regarded as essential derived from the same mistaken conception underlying the list in question. He would like to make it clear that if his delegation took part in the discussion of those factors, that should not be taken to mean that it approved the basic concept.

9. He recalled that the United Kingdom and Belgian representatives had emphasized that a list of factors should be drawn up in such a way as to be useful not only in appraising the provisions of a constitution, but also in determining how those provisions were applied. Furthermore, as he himself had stated in the Ad Hoc Committee, the word "independence" appeared neither in Chapter XI of the Charter nor in the Committee's terms of reference. The Australian delegation considered that independence was not an essential condition of self-government. It noted, moreover, that its views were shared by the delegations of France and the United Kingdom, which had expressed themselves similarly in the Ad Hoc Committee and in the statements they had transmitted to the Secretary-General (A/AC.58/1/Add.2 and 3). A territory could be independent or associated without being self-governing in the sense of Article 73, and vice versa, so that status could not be regarded as a criterion of self-government.

10. Mr. RIEMENS (Netherlands) was of the opinion that the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (A/2178) dealt with an important and extremely complex problem. As an administering Power, the Government of the Netherlands had always decided for itself whether the territories for which it had responsibility came under Chapter XI of the Charter. When it had seen fit, in respect of any particular territories, to send in the reports referred to in Article 73 e of the Charter, neither the General Assembly nor the subsidiary organs of the United Nations had questioned that decision in any way. Nor had the General Assembly considered whether any Member States other than those which had decided to submit the information provided for in Article 73 e were responsible for territories whose peoples had not yet attained a full measure of self-government. It was for the Members of the United Nations alone to decide in respect of which territories they must submit reports and to determine whether any of the territories which they administered had reached the stage where their populations had attained a full measure of self-government.

11. The report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors had been designed to assist the United Nations in determining the circumstances in which a territory advanced towards self-government until the time came when its population had attained a full measure of self-government. Actually, the Charter made a sharp distinction between self-government and independence; and Chapter XI referred throughout to territories which were non-self-governing as opposed to self-governing. The essential thing was to define the terms "autonomie" and "self-government". The authors of the Charter had obviously had in mind forms of government which were neither self-governing nor independent. The general criteria of independence could not be applied to territories whose peoples had attained a full measure of self-government.

12. There was an important discrepancy between the text of Article 73 b, concerning Non-Self-Governing Territories, and the text of Article 76 b, which related to the International Trusteeship System. The words "or independence" which occurred in the latter were not to be found in the former. Furthermore, Article 73 b stressed the particular circumstances of the various territories and their populations, and their varying stages of advancement.

13. It might be said that the development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories was chiefly apparent from the changes in their constitutions. Constitutional development, however, was one of the most difficult questions to judge for those who were not entirely familiar with the particular situation in each territory. Many local and historical factors had to be taken into account. The legal system, the political aspirations of the population, its level of education, the economic relations of the territory with the metropolitan territory and with other countries all played an important part. Furthermore, it was not enough to study the written text of the constitution, for in many cases constitutional practice differed widely from the written text. His own country was a case in point. If the Fourth Committee wished to determine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether the population of a territory had attained a full measure of self-government, it would have to study all those aspects of the question.

14. The Ad Hoc Committee had not made an adequate study of territories which had become neither independent nor fully integrated within another State, but which had already attained a large measure of self-government in their internal affairs; however, paragraph 3 of the introduction of the annex to General Assembly resolution 567 (VI) had pointed out that that question merited further study. In the second place, the Committee did not appear to have examined the reasons why the administering Powers had ceased to transmit information on certain territories. In the third place, the Committee had not given its opinion on the views transmitted by Member States in compliance with resolution 567 (VI).

15. It would not be impossible to reach a definition of the factors concerned, if a fully competent body devoted all the necessary time to the matter. For the reasons he had previously explained, his delegation was not prepared to submit a draft resolution proposing that a new body should be instructed to continue the work of the Ad Hoc Committee, but if a proposal were submitted to that effect his delegation would support it.

16. He explained once more that in his Government's opinion the administering Powers would continue to have full responsibility for deciding when the population of a territory had attained a full measure of self-government, and when, in consequence, the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter ceased to apply to that territory. When an administering Power had brought a territory to the threshold of self-government, it did not ask the United Nations to shower praises upon it, but neither did it expect an attitude of distrust or censure. Nothing would be more harmful to the prestige of the United Nations than such an attitude.

17. If there were misunderstanding and distrust with regard to the factors determining whether a territory was self-governing, a more exhaustive study of those factors was essential, not only in order to eliminate such misunderstanding, but above all because the United Nations, having begun the study of the problem, was bound in its own interests to continue giving that problem its most careful attention.

18. Mr. HOUARD (Belgium) remarked that his delegation did not intend at that stage to express its views on the merits and the significance of the various factors. The important statements just made by the Australian and Netherlands representatives would undoubtedly help his delegation to determine its attitude on the substance of the problem.

19. The question was an important one; it was by no means limited to the problem of when States should cease to transmit information, for obviously the question of when they should begin to do so was equally important. That was quite clear from paragraph 1 of the operative part of General Assembly resolution 334 (IV). The very title of the Ad Hoc Committee's report showed that the drafters of General Assembly resolution 567 (VI) had kept that idea in mind.

20. Subject to any comments it might wish to make later on the substance of the problem, the Belgian delegation wished to emphasize from the very outset that the list of factors would never serve as anything more than a guide, either for the administering Powers or for the Member States which had not yet replied to the Secretary-General's letter dated 29 June 1946.¹

21. His delegation was convinced that the list of factors would help many Member States to re-examine the position of their non-self-governing peoples, as the Belgian representative had invited them to do at the beginning of the current session.

22. Mr. NAUDY (France) began by praising the care and seriousness with which the Ad Hoc Committee had undertaken its task. His delegation was glad to note that some of the general considerations set forth in the Committee's report placed the studies in their true context. He was referring in particular to Section IV, paragraph 5 (C), which stated that no enumeration of factors could do more than serve as a guide in determining whether a territory was or was not fully self-governing, and that each specific case would need to be determined by the particular circumstances of that case. In addition, the Committee had been quite right to refrain from taking any decision on the questions of competence which might well have given rise to endless controversies.

23. On the other hand, his delegation wondered whether the list of factors recommended by the Ad Hoc Committee really represented any improvement on the list included in the annex to resolution 567 (VI), a list which had already called for reservations.

24. The French Government had submitted its written comments on the old list, which were reproduced in document A/AC.58/1/Add.2, and thought it would be of interest, in view of the discussions which had recently taken place in the Fourth Committee, to quote a general remark which had appeared among those comments. The French Government had pointed out (para. 13) that the study of the factors should provide the necessary basis for a possible extension of the obligations of Article 73 e to those Members which, since the Charter's entry into force, had held that they were not affected by the obligations of Chapter XI in respect of any of the territories dependent on them. In addition, the French Government had stated that it seemed highly desirable that the guarantees contained in Chapter XI should be applied universally, as had undoubtedly been the intention of the drafters of the Charter. In his opinion, any study which did not take that aspect of the problem into account was likely to lead to conclusions which would be both unjust and lacking in scientific objectivity. Similarly, none of the criteria of self-government could be fully acceptable if it were inapplicable to States already regarded as self-governing or independent. Any other solution would imply an intention to discriminate against the Non-Self-Governing Territories to which the Fourth Committee would certainly not wish to be a party.

25. The French Government had attached particular importance to its comments on the geographical considerations and the ethnic and cultural considerations. In spite of its criticisms, however, the Ad Hoc Committee had again included those considerations in the list of factors indicative of the free association of a territory with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country. In that connexion he quoted paragraphs 23 and 24 of document A/AC.58/1/Add.2. The French delegation still considered those comments to be valid, and regretted that the Ad Hoc Committee had not thought fit to take them into account.

26. The new text drafted by the Committee could be criticized for continuing to lay undue stress on the conditions characteristic of an independence which went beyond the self-government in virtue of which a territory came outside the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter. It was quite true that when a territory secured such international independence or such extended separate systems of self-government it ceased to be a Non-Self-Governing Territory. But it could not be said that the acquisition of a status of that kind was a necessary condition of self-government within the meaning of Article 73. On the way towards separate self-government, there was a stage at which a territory might have ceased to be non-self-governing within the meaning of the Charter without having secured complete independence or any other separate system of self-government. It was precisely that stage which the Committee had failed to define. It had not considered itself competent to consider the extent to which the provisions of Article 73 e continued to apply in the case of territories which had become neither independent nor fully integrated within another State but which had already attained a full measure of self-government in their internal affairs. However, paragraph 3 of the introduction of the annex to resolution 567 (VI) stated that that question merited further study. The suggestions made on that point by the Netherlands Government seemed to deserve consideration. On those very important points there was therefore a gap in the work of the Ad Hoc Committee.

27. The insertion of what might be called factual criteria together with the legal criteria in the list of factors only served to create confusion, because the factual criteria dealt with individual cases and some of them could not apply to States already recognized as independent and sovereign.

28. Finally, he was surprised to find that the factors of political advancement and the opinion of the population and its participation in the government had disappeared from the new list of factors indicative of the attainment of independence. He wondered whether the conclusion to be drawn was that, as soon as a community attained independence, there was no longer any need to ensure respect for the opinions and rights of individuals and their participation in the government. Article 73, however, was concerned with protecting the interests, not of a territory considered as an entity, but of a community composed of individuals each of whom had inalienable rights and prerogatives.

29. His delegation reserved the right to make additional comments during the course of the discussion.

30. Mr. DJERDA (Yugoslavia) paid a tribute to the work of the Ad Hoc Committee but, for several reasons, was not completely satisfied with the report.

31. In the first place, the drafters of the report had placed the factor entitled "Political advancement" at the head of the list of factors indicative of the attainment of separate systems of self-government other than independence and also of the list indicative of the free association of a territory with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country. His delegation considered that factor to be totally inapplicable, since none of the peoples which were attempting to realize their national aspirations at the present time could be considered incapable of deciding their own fate for themselves.

32. The most important factor was the opinion of the population freely expressed by democratic processes. Any attempt to limit that right was a denial of the very principles on which the United Nations was based.

33. That factor should be combined with another, which might be called "conditions to be fulfilled in order to ascertain the opinion of the population". All other factors must be regarded as secondary and subordinate. The freely expressed will of the people ascertained in objective conditions was the first, and indeed the only, factor to be taken into consideration for a solution of the problem.

34. The factor entitled "National defence" in the first part of the list was superfluous because it was already covered by implication in the preceding factor, "General international relations". The factors listed under "B. Internal self-government", also in the first part of the list, were irrelevant. Lastly, he did not think that the opinions of various governments reproduced in section IV of the document should be considered as part of the substance of the report.

35. The Yugoslav delegation would continue to participate in the study of the problem but, for the reasons he had just given, it would vote against the Ad Hoc Committee's report.

36. Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), speaking on a procedural question, asked the Secretariat whether it would be possible for the Committee to receive the texts of the draft resolutions it had adopted in the three working languages before it was called upon to examine the Rapporteur's draft reports.

37. Mr. BENSON (Secretariat) said that the Secretariat would in future circulate the texts of the draft resolutions adopted by the Committee in the three working languages well before the Rapporteur submitted his draft reports, in order to enable delegations to check the concordance of the texts.

38. The CHAIRMAN and Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thanked the Secretariat.

The meeting rose at 12.20 p.m.

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2178, A/C.4/L.231) (continued)

1. Mr. RIVAS (Venezuela) said that in the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors, the Venezuelan delegation had sought, as was its practice, to reconcile the views of the administering and non-administering Powers on the international aspect of the problem of Non-Self-Governing Territories, and, at the same time, to reduce to reasonable proportions those differences of opinion which some administering Powers interpreted as an indication that the non-administering Powers were setting themselves up as their judges. The cessation of the transmission of information on certain territories which a majority of Member States did not yet regard as fully self-governing had been one of the main reasons why the Fourth Committee was apparently divided into two camps, each suspicious of the other, and had made it impossible to unite the efforts and experience of both sides in any constructive work.

2. Those countries which regarded certain territories as not fully self-governing felt that they had a basis for their belief in law and in fact. None of their arguments had been inspired by the negative and illegitimate desire to trespass upon national sovereignty. Their only motive had been the necessity of continuing the work begun at San Francisco, which was being threatened by legalistic interpretations of Chapter XI not in accordance with the basic trend that had led to the inclusion in the United Nations Charter of a chapter for which no provision had been made in the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals. Venezuela had been the only country to note the omission. It had objected that the Charter should lay down the principles which would govern the administration of colonies and protectorates, possible changes of sovereignty in such colonies and protectorates, in accordance with their geographical position and the freely expressed will of their inhabitants, and the conditions necessary for their recognition in due course as Member States of the United Nations, with the right to self-government and the other prerogatives inherent in that right.

3. In making that observation, the Venezuelan Government had not been guided merely by humanitarian principles. It had been moved above all by political considerations. International peace and security could not be adequately safeguarded if the problem of the peoples inhabiting territories far removed, both geographically and legally, from their respective metropolitan countries was disregarded. Such territories might well be centres of discontent, even of rebellion and violence. The Venezuelan Government sincerely believed that Chapter XI gave the inhabitants of those territories an assurance that their aspirations could be achieved by peaceful means. It had regarded, and still regarded, the transmission of information referred to in Article 73 e of the Charter as a means whereby the United Nations could show the dependent territories that their political problems were under constant study by the international community. The obligation to submit information, which the administering Powers had accepted, conferred on the Non-Self-Governing Territories a higher political status than that enjoyed by mere dependencies of countries with a higher degree of civilization. In the final analysis, the Non-Self-Governing Territories became dependent upon the international community, which was a step towards their acceptance as embryo subjects of international law.

4. Mr. Rivas quoted a passage from a speech made at San Francisco by Field Marshal Smuts, describing the text that later became Chapter XI of the Charter as one which applied the principle of trusteeship to all dependent territories, whether they were under mandate, taken from defeated countries, or the existing colonies of certain Powers.¹ It subjected States, particularly the colonial Powers which were responsible for colonies, to certain obligations. Thus, the reports of the administering Powers on the Non-Self-Governing Territories were clearly intended to provide the United Nations with information which would enable it to appreciate the rate of progress of the non-self-governing peoples towards self-government and suggest general measures to ensure that such progress should continue in a peaceful atmosphere. The Venezuelan delegation had believed, and continued to believe, that the obligation accepted by the administering Powers was based upon the fact that the Non-Self-Governing Territories did not govern themselves, and that until the basis for that obligation disappeared, that is as long as the Non-Self-Governing Territories did not govern themselves, the obligation of the administering Powers would subsist.

5. The Venezuelan Government considered that in defining the "self-government" referred to in Chapter XI, the essential point was not whether such government was good or bad, but whether it was exercised by the inhabitants of the territory without interference by any other government in whose general policy they did not participate on a footing of absolute equality.

6. It had been argued that the non-administering Powers seemed to advocate the independence of the colonies as a sort of magic panacea for all the ills affecting the world. It had been said that the welfare of their inhabitants was often greater under the trusteeship of a more civilized people than under their own leaders, and that there were colonies where educational, social and economic conditions were better than in many sovereign States. It was also alleged that nothing would be gained by according self-government to a community which was not economically self-sufficient. Those arguments were as old as the colonial system itself. At first sight, they were objective and scientific, but the human spirit had needs not always comprehended by science. The nationals of the metropolitan States might well be asked whether they would be satisfied with social, educational and economic advantages extended to them by some remote authority which governed them, on condition that they remained passive and did not seek to legislate or to administer themselves, or to claim full citizenship.

7. Some administering Powers, adhering rigidly to the letter of Article 73 e, had argued that once territories had obtained self-government in the social, economic and educational spheres, the obligation of the metropolitan country was at an end. However, the great mass of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories would not agree with them. The traditional error of the metropolitan Powers had been to consider separatist movements as the invention of a small group of fanatics, unsupported by their fellow countrymen. However, whenever a metropolitan Power had been forced to withdraw its forces to deal with some crisis elsewhere, the mass of the colonial people had been found willing to follow those fanatics, particularly when they were supported by the political or trade rival of the metropolitan country. Chapter XI was expressly designed to minimize that international threat.

8. It was inevitable that the administering Powers' interpretation of their obligations under Chapter XI should disturb those countries which had themselves been colonies. Presumably, the educated members of the indigenous peoples were also disturbed and an easy prey for penetration by subversive organizations.

9. The list of factors under consideration was a series of ideas on self-government on which there had been no major disagreement. Some factors were obvious. No country which did not fully exercise the attributes of external and internal sovereignty could be called independent. Moreover, in other separate forms of self-government, limited sovereignty could not be regarded as fulfilling the needs of the inhabitants unless the consent of those inhabitants was manifest. It could not be considered that a territory participated in the direction of national affairs on a footing of absolute equality with other regions of the State in which it was incorporated if persons born in that territory were not, by that fact alone, citizens of the State, or if they did not participate, on a footing of complete equality, in legislative and executive matters. Again, it was extremely difficult to measure such equal status. It would be difficult for a territory geographically far removed from the metropolitan country to feel itself to be on an equal footing when the government tended to give preference to the interests of the metropolitan territory. The geographical factor was therefore very important. The racial factor was again of considerable importance. If the separation between conqueror and conquered was maintained for centuries, the original population of the territory would have great difficulty in ceasing to regard the dominant white race as aliens.

10. In its general comments on the question of factors (A/AC.58/1/Add.3), the Netherlands Government had said that a metropolitan country could not report on economic, social and educational conditions in territories which had attained self-government in those fields. However, all the administering Powers had only recently asserted in concert that the international representation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories was exercised by the metropolitan government and by the metropolitan government only. That was all the more reason why they should assume full international responsibility for what took place in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

11. In internal affairs, the inhabitants of certain Non-Self-Governing Territories might be allowed to manage their own budget, organize their own schools and regulate their trade-union activities. However, as long as they did not exercise political sovereignty as independent States or integral parts of another State, on a footing of complete equality with the other component parts of that State, it was obvious that the degree of self-government which they were accorded would always be dependent upon the goodwill of the metropolitan country. The bases of such self-government were precarious, moreover, because they did not derive from the full recognition of the Non-Self-Governing Territory as an agent absolutely equal, for the purpose of contractual law, to the metropolitan country. Such partial self-government was only one stage on the road towards the goal of Chapter XI. Until that goal had been reached, it was clear that the administering Power's obligations under Chapter XI subsisted, since their cause still remained. Paragraph 3 of the operative part of the draft resolution on the participation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee on Information, adopted by the Fourth Committee at its 270th meeting, might provide some solution of the problem of how the administering Powers were to report on progress in such partially self-governing territories. The administering Powers had voted against paragraph 3, yet the continued study which it recommended might find a formula which would solve the general problem raised by the Government of the Netherlands.

12. The list of factors could not of course be interpreted as in any way hindering the administering Powers from helping the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, in successive stages, towards full self-government. Nor could it be represented as a series of stages which the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories must pass through before being regarded as self-governing. On the contrary: if the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories freely expressed the desire to be self-governing, the United Nations would have no other course than to urge the administering Powers to allow those peoples to exercise sovereignty.

13. The factor relating to political advancement could also be considered from a similar standpoint. On that point, the Venezuelan delegation shared the doubts expressed by the French representative in the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors. In certain cases, it would be difficult to apply that factor, because it would be necessary to agree beforehand on the body which was to judge the preparedness of the inhabitants of a territory to assume certain responsibilities. Presumably, if the people of a territory chose independence, they would have to be regarded as sufficiently prepared to take that step. The degree of political advancement of a population would, however, have to be carefully determined, if they appeared to agree to voluntary limitations on the exercise of full self-government. In a situation of that kind, the best thing to do would be to invite the population to choose between full self-government and the partial self-government they enjoyed, and, at the same time, see that the supporters of full self-government had ample opportunity of expressing their views unhindered.

14. The delegations of Burma, Cuba, Egypt, Guatemala, Iraq and Venezuela had joined in submitting the draft resolution in document A/C.4/L.231. All those countries, save Egypt, had been members of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors, and the Egyptian delegation had been the original proponent of the idea that the United Nations should study the question of factors. The views of the Venezuelan Government coincided in general with the draft resolution. Moreover, the constructive and conciliatory tone of the draft resolution coincided with the approach of the Venezuelan delegation in exploring those points on which it differed from certain administering Powers with regard to the interpretation of certain principles.

If the administering Powers studied the draft resolution without prejudice, they would at least recognize its good faith and sincerity. That in itself would be a beginning in dispelling the mistrust which seemed to divide the Fourth Committee into two opposing parties, each seeking the discomfiture of the other.

15. Mr. McINNIS (Canada) would like to study the full implications of the joint draft resolution further. At first sight, however, he was obliged to note with regret and disappointment that it seemed unacceptable. It eliminated many of the wide qualifications which gave the list of factors contained in the Ad Hoc Committee's report its tentative nature. The draft resolution was much more mandatory and paid only brief lip-service to the need for taking into account the varying conditions in the different colonies.

16. The Venezuelan representative's statement had underlined the idea expressed in the second paragraph of the preamble to the joint draft resolution. Mr. McInnis doubted the validity of that idea: not only had the various categories of information to be transmitted under Article 73 e been carefully restricted, but even those restricted categories were subject to the limitations of security and constitutional considerations. Furthermore, the Non-Self-Governing Territories would obviously advance towards self-government by stages, and it was highly probable that at a given moment they would reach a stage at which the administering Power no longer exercised effective practical control over the social, economic and educational matters on which information was to be submitted. Consequently, the administering Power's obligation to submit such information would then be at an end. That did not, however, imply the end of its obligation, under Chapter XI, to promote a full measure of self-government in the territory concerned.

17. Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that his delegation was satisfied with the joint draft resolution contained in document A/C.4/L.231, which embodied, among other ideas, those which the Minister of State of the Republic of Cuba had expressed in his statement before the 379th plenary meeting of the General Assembly. That representative had said then that Cuba would continue to uphold the view that it was essential that the international community should weigh carefully and determine the constitutional considerations upon which any Administering Member might base a decision to cease transmitting information under Chapter XI of the Charter. It would always be the view of the Cuban Government that there could not be economic, social or educational self-government in the absence of political self-government.

18. In co-sponsoring the draft resolution, the Cuban delegation had done its utmost to exclude academic or doctrinal considerations and to remain within the limits of the practical problem which had been occupying the General Assembly's attention in the matter. It considered that the problem was summed up in the replies to two plain questions: first, when did an Administering Member become free of its obligation under Article 73 e to transmit information concerning a given territory; secondly, when did the United Nations become free of its obligation under Article 73 e to receive information concerning a given territory? Those two questions should be borne in mind. The previous year many delegations had feared that the examination of the subject might lead the Committee into a merely academic debate.

19. In the view of the Cuban delegation there was a duality of competence. He recalled certain passages from a communication transmitted by the Government of Cuba, at the Secretary-General's request, in connexion with the problem of factors (A/AC.58/1/Add.1), declaring that the progress achieved in relation to Chapter XI would in practice be fruitless if the continuous fulfilment of the only concrete obligation contracted by the administering Powers under Article 73 e depended exclusively upon their unilateral judgment. The obligations under Chapter XI were as binding as those under the other chapters of the Charter and could not be annulled without prior agreement between the parties except in the circumstances in which, under the very provisions of the Article, they might be suspended. The only grounds for such action were security or constitutional considerations, but even in those cases, and especially in the latter, it was unlikely that the Charter authorized unilateral action by the administering Power concerned. It was true that cases might arise in which the limitations of security would have to be determined by the administering Power alone, since a public examination of the reasons might itself endanger security, but to admit that unilateral action could be taken on a constitutional issue would be to imperil the principles recognized today by positive international law. It was essential that the United Nations should be kept informed of any change in the constitutional status of any of the Non-Self-Governing Territories as a result of which the responsible governments no longer felt obliged to transmit information.

20. Thus, the international community must weigh carefully the constitutional factors on the basis of which the administering Power had taken the decision to cease to transmit information. Such intervention would not constitute an infringement of Article 2, paragraph 7, as a decision of that nature towards the fulfilment of the Charter's purposes by the international community could not be said to be a matter of domestic jurisdiction. Problems connected with the colonial system could come under international law; many administering Powers had recognized that fact by signing the Treaty of Versailles, Article 119 et seq of which required Germany to renounce its colonies, such action being based on the manner in which those colonies had been administered. Those articles could not be explained except by the admission, in sound legal logic, that colonizing governments could not arbitrarily dispose of the peoples or of the territory or of the powers which they exercised.

21. The draft resolution before the Committee touched on the problem of competence with the utmost discretion. The greatest care had been taken in drawing it up because the sponsors wished the text to be as conciliatory as possible.

² Subsequently circulated as document A/C.4/219.

22. Paragraph 4 of the draft resolution dealt with the problem of the indivisibility of the concept of self-government. It appeared necessary to submit to the General Assembly for its final approval the patent truth that there could not be economic, social or educational self-government without political self-government. If that fact were recognized, much fruitless debate might be avoided. To accept the concept of indivisibility would be to invalidate absolutely the argument that the transmission of information could cease because a territory had achieved self-government in the economic, social or educational fields. Partial self-government in certain respects would be illusory unless there was at the same time political self-government within the meaning of the Charter, in other words "a full measure of self-government." Before the transmission of information on a territory could cease, the United Nations should be furnished with supplementary information regarding the degree of political advancement reached by the territory.

23. In order to be free of its obligation to receive information under Article 73 e, the international community must be in a position to affirm that the political situation in the territory concerned was such as to permit and create economic, social and educational autonomy.

24. There was a further point: the draft resolution clearly stated that the list of factors was recommended merely as a guide. No rigid criterion could be devised for determining whether a territory was self-governing or not, and to attempt to do so would merely create doctrinal difficulties. The Cuban delegation therefore whole-heartedly endorsed paragraph 2 of the operative part of the draft resolution, which stated that each case should be decided in the light of its particular circumstances. Over and above the list of factors there would always be the over-riding consideration—the desire of the people for freedom.

25. He would not for the time being propose any additions or amendments to the list of factors, which appeared to him comprehensive, well-considered and likely to serve as a general guide. On the other hand, he would not oppose any suggestions for improvement. He therefore reserved his position with regard to the list.

26. He appealed to the members of the Committee to remember that the problem of ceasing the transmission of information was essentially a political rather than a legal one, since each case must be considered separately.

Requests for oral hearings

27. The CHAIRMAN announced that a request for an oral hearing had been received from the Bloc Démocratique Camerounais.² If there were no objections, it would be circulated as an official document.

It was so decided.

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2178, A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1) (continued)

[Item 36]*

1. Mr. EL-PHARAONY (Egypt) recalled that the study of the question of factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory had or had not attained a full measure of self-government had originated from a proposal (A/C.4/L.37) made by the Egyptian delegation in 1949. That proposal had been prompted by the great concern with which the Egyptian delegation, among others, had viewed the fact that in 1948 the number of territories on which information was transmitted had dropped to sixty-three, whereas in 1946, according to the terms of General Assembly resolution 66 (I), the number of such territories had been seventy-four. For that reason the General Assembly had adopted resolution 222 (III), which, while welcoming any development of self-government, considered that it was essential for the United Nations to be informed of any change in the constitutional position and status of any Non-Self-Governing Territory as a result of which the responsible government concerned thought it unnecessary to transmit information in respect of that territory under Article 73 e of the Charter. Accordingly, the Members concerned had been requested in any such case to communicate to the Secretary-General appropriate information, including the constitution, legislative act or executive order providing for the government of the territory and the constitutional relationship of the territory to the government of the metropolitan country. It had become clear thereafter that certain criteria had to be taken into consideration in dealing with such situations, and resolution 334 (IV) had called for a study of the factors which should be taken into consideration in deciding whether a territory had or had not attained a full measure of self-government.

2. The report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (A/2178) was now before the Committee. Previous speakers had dealt in some detail with the various factors listed in the report, some emphasizing particular factors which they felt should be considered essential or decisive while others had dwelt on the report's various shortcomings. At the 273rd meeting, the Venezuelan representative had outlined the elements of the problem and had given a comprehensive analysis of the various factors and the framework within which they should be considered, and the value to be attributed to them. The Egyptian delegation endorsed his views whole-heartedly. It considered that the list of factors should not give rise to much disagreement, so long as it was clearly stated in the report that they could serve only as a guide in determining whether a territory was or was not self-governing, and that no single factor or combination of factors could be regarded as decisive in all cases, each case needing to be examined in the light of its particular circumstances. It was on that understanding that the draft resolution in document A/C.4/L.231, which the Egyptian delegation had joined in sponsoring, proposed that the list of factors should be approved as it appeared in the report of the Ad Hoc Committee. The Egyptian delegation was in complete agreement with the views in that regard expressed by the Cuban representative at the 273rd meeting.

3. The Egyptian delegation considered that there was one element of the utmost importance which should be decisive in all cases: the opinion of the people concerned. That was particularly true in cases of association. The natural, logical, and expected process of development was for a people placed under the domination of another to seek freedom from that domination and to proceed gradually to a full measure of self-government and, ultimately, to independence. It was the exception for people to achieve a full measure of self-government or independence through association or assimilation with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country, especially when that people was of different race, language or religion, or had a distinct cultural heritage, interests or aspirations, which distinguished them from the people of the country with which they were associated. The terms "association" or "assimilation", no less than "incorporation" or "annexation", suggested a certain element of pressure, an act of authority on the part of the administering Power. That would not, of course, always be the case. However, as a general rule, the goal to be attained was independence, and other forms of self-government through assimilation or association should be covered by every possible guarantee. That was why the sponsors of the draft resolution were anxious that in the case of the assimilation of a territory, there should be assurances of the unqualified, freely expressed and unrestricted will of the people. In all such cases, the United Nations must be satisfied beyond all doubt that the will of the people had been expressed freely either by means of a plebiscite under its auspices or by some other appropriate democratic procedure.

4. The study of the factors involved in the attainment of full self-government should now be followed by an examination of the principles governing the use of those factors as a guide to action by the administering Powers and by the General Assembly. Under General Assembly resolution 66 (I), the Non-Self-Governing Territories had been enumerated on the proposal of the Administering Members concerned. The Administering Members should now be prepared to take into account any list of factors drawn up by the General Assembly when they themselves were examining the question of whether a territory had become fully self-governing. The Fourth Committee should also agree that it would take the same factors into account when it had to consider any particular case of the cessation of information. If the General Assembly made those two points clear, it would help to define the principles involved and the methods to be followed.

5. Mr. Shiva RAO (India) said that apart from its merits or demerits, the joint draft resolution before the Committee was useful in that it focused the Committee's attention on the practical aspects of the problem of factors.

6. At its first session in 1946, the General Assembly had adopted resolution 9 (I) expressing the United Nations' keen awareness of the problems and political aspirations of the peoples who had not yet attained a full measure of self-government and who were not directly represented in the Organization. The resolution went on to emphasize that the obligations accepted under Chapter XI of the Charter by all Members of the United Nations were in no way contingent upon the conclusion of trusteeship agreements or upon the bringing into being of the Trusteeship Council, and were in fact already in force. The operative part of the resolution requested the Secretary-General to include in his annual report an analysis and summary of such information as had been transmitted to him by Members of the United Nations under Article 73 e.

7. From the outset, the General Assembly had shown much practical interest in making use of the information supplied by the Administering Members. It had discovered that no list of Non-Self-Governing Territories could be prepared by the Secretary-General because of the difficulty of defining the scope of the phrase "a full measure of self-government". It had, therefore, merely noted that information would be supplied by the Administering Members in respect of the territories mentioned in General Assembly resolution 66 (I). That resolution had not said that the list contained in it was complete; but the General Assembly had not challenged its contents and had accepted it as a working basis. In 1947 and 1948, some Administering Members had failed to transmit information in regard to certain territories without furnishing any explanation for the omission. The General Assembly had thereupon passed the significant resolution 222 (III), which had confirmed the interest of the General Assembly in the development of self-government in Non-Self-Governing Territories, and had established the validity of the contention that the General Assembly had the right to receive political and constitutional information, at least in the last stages. Lastly, the General Assembly had passed resolution 448 (V) on the development of self-government in Non-Self-Governing Territories. That resolution had linked resolution 222 (III) with the attainment of self-government by Indonesia. The preamble and the operative parts of the resolution were equally significant.

8. He did not underrate the need for a comprehensive approach which did not neglect or overlook any aspect of the problem. However, it was necessary at the same time to bear in mind the scheme of things visualized in Chapter XI and developed in practice by General Assembly resolutions over a period of six years. The objective of Chapter XI was "a full measure of self-government". Because the General Assembly had been unable to find a satisfactory definition in 1946, it had accepted from the Administering Members a unilaterally prepared list of Non-Self-Governing Territories, in order that the terms of Article 73 might be promptly fulfilled. In 1947 and 1948 that list had begun to shrink, and the General Assembly had immediately taken note of the omissions and asked for details. Resolution 222 (III) proved that the General Assembly's interest and jurisdiction were not circumscribed by a literal interpretation of Article 73 e. The territories listed in resolution 66 (I) were those territories whose peoples had not yet attained a full measure of self-government. He quoted a passage from the records of the San Francisco Conference to the effect that the word "yet" was held to apply to any degree of self-government short of full self-government, and until that had been attained, the responsibility of the Administering Member subsisted.

9. There were only two ways in which a Non-Self-Governing Territory could be removed from the list: one was by the attainment of a full measure of self-government, as in the case of the erstwhile Non-Self-Governing Territory of Indonesia, now a Member of the United Nations; and the second was by the transfer of the Non-Self-Governing Territory to the Trusteeship System. The General Assembly at no stage lost sight of a Non-Self-Governing Territory; it retained active interest in it under either Chapter XI or Chapters XII and XIII, or through its admission to full membership of the United Nations.

10. The Indian delegation found nothing to criticize in the terms of the draft resolution. It could not understand the objections raised by the Canadian representative at the 273rd meeting to the second paragraph of the preamble. It seemed obvious that the obligations of an administering Power remained in force in regard to each territory until the objectives of Chapter XI were fulfilled. As it stood, the draft resolution seemed to be an unexceptionable statement of existing facts and of the legitimate aims of the General Assembly, leading up to a suggestion of the right approach in future in all cases of Non-Self-Governing Territories regarding which Administering Members had ceased to transmit information.

11. The Indian delegation also regarded the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors as a practical and valuable contribution to the study of a difficult problem.

12. Mr. NAUDY (France) said that the French delegation's first impression of the joint draft resolution had been that it was one of those ambitious proposals which, while claiming to interpret the provisions of the Charter, in fact violated them. It was not the first example of the light-hearted treatment of complicated and far-reaching questions in the Fourth Committee. The draft resolution also took for granted the solution of the difficulties pointed out by many previous speakers in noting the shortcomings of the Ad Hoc Committee's work.

13. The second paragraph of the preamble to the joint draft resolution declared that the obligation to transmit information remained in force with regard to each territory until the objectives of Chapter XI were fulfilled. As the Canadian representative had pointed out, that statement of principle was absolutely unwarranted. There were degrees and stages in the development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories towards self-government. The obligation laid down in paragraph e of Article 73, with its reservations and limitations, was the only formal undertaking which accompanied the general undertakings in Chapter XI, and it ceased when it no longer applied, that was to say, when the Non-Self-Governing Territories obtained self-government in the fields mentioned in Article 73 e. The Administering Members could not have greater obligations imposed on them than they had assumed. The transmission of information must cease when there had been sufficient development to free the administering Powers from the special obligation to transmit information; in other words, when the territory in question had reached a stage of development which, although not one of self-government, was certainly not that of a Non-Self-Governing Territory to which the provisions of Article 73 e applied. The Ad Hoc Committee on Factors had not studied such border-line cases or defined the criteria to be applied to them. The French delegation considered, therefore, that the problem still existed, and it could not support a proposal which merely assumed it to have been settled. Paragraph 4 of the operative part of the draft resolution was based on a similar principle, also taken for granted, which the Cuban representative had termed the indivisibility of the concept of self-government. The French delegation objected to that on the same grounds as it objected to the second paragraph of the preamble.

14. The fifth paragraph of the preamble and paragraphs 1 and 5 of the operative part assumed that the General Assembly was competent to decide whether a territory had or had not attained a full measure of self-government or to study questions arising from the cessation of the transmission of information or the obligation to transmit information. Previous resolutions adopted by the General Assembly, in particular resolution 334 (IV), had not attributed such competence to the General Assembly but had left the decision, implicitly at least, to the administering Powers. The provisions of the draft resolution tended to establish a degree of United Nations control over the Non-Self-Governing Territories which was contrary to the spirit and the letter of Chapter XI and also to the principles of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter. The administration of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the steps taken to ensure their political development came within the competence of the administering Powers, whose parliaments were the final authority in such matters. Any United Nations intervention in that sphere would constitute interference in matters within the domestic jurisdiction of the Powers concerned and would involve a dangerous and quite inadmissible duality of responsibility.

15. The French Government had made a formal reservation in that regard at the San Francisco Conference.¹ It had pointed out each year, in communicating information to the Secretary-General in accordance with Article 73 e, that the determination of territories whose populations were not yet completely self-governing came within the exclusive competence of the administering Powers. The matters of principle so light-heartedly approached in the joint draft resolution were of fundamental importance and the French delegation formally reiterated its reservations. It would oppose the joint draft resolution if it remained unchanged.

16. Mr. WINIEWICZ (Poland) said that there could be no practical answer to the problem of factors without a proper approach to two preliminary but essential considerations. First, what authority was competent to determine that a territory had reached the stage of self-government envisaged by Article 73 as a whole? He stressed the words "as a whole" because of the obstinate attempt on the part of the colonial Powers to restrict the problem of Non-Self-Governing Territories exclusively to paragraph e of that Article. Secondly, what did the Charter mean by the phrase "a full measure of self-government"?

17. During the seven years of the United Nations' existence the colonial Powers had decided by a unilateral decision to withhold information on thirteen Non-Self-Governing Territories and had merely informed the Secretary-General of that fact. The General Assembly had never been given any valid explanation for the cessation of information. The colonial Powers continued to treat the Non-Self-Governing Territories as their exclusive domain. Their attitude in that connexion was a further infringement of the provisions of the Charter.

18. The obligation to transmit information undertaken by the colonial Powers was a binding agreement, and the international responsibility assumed by those Powers could be disposed of only by an international decision of the General Assembly itself. Before any Administering Member could be released from its duty to submit information under Article 73 e, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories must consider all the data concerning the changes in the status of the territory concerned and submit a recommendation on the cessation of information to the General Assembly, with whom the final decision lay.

19. The Non-Self-Governing Territories were not merely provinces within the sovereign power of the metropolitan country, and they were outside the scope of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter. Chapter XI had been written in order to establish a special relationship between the dependent territories and the United Nations. The present and future of the dependent peoples was not the sole responsibility of the administering Powers; it was a major concern of all Member States.

20. It was instructive, in connexion with the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors, to study the reasons given by the administering Powers for the unilateral cessation of information from certain Non-Self-Governing Territories. There were two types of explanation. The first hypocritically based the cessation of information on economic, social and educational conditions on the assertion that self-government had been established in those fields and that it was hard to see how a government could continue to be under an obligation in respect of matters for which it was no longer responsible. That argument had been reiterated by the French Government in its observations on particular factors (A/AC.58/4). It was a complete distortion of Chapter XI. Article 73 clearly stated that Non-Self-Governing Territories were those colonies whose peoples had not yet attained a full measure of self-government. The Administering Members were therefore under an obligation to transmit information until a full measure of self-government had been achieved, and alleged self-government in economic, social or educational fields did not relieve them of the duties imposed by Chapter XI or excuse the cessation of information.

21. The second excuse conceived in order to by-pass the Charter was the idea of the association of the Non-Self-Governing Territory—absorption might be a better word—with the metropolitan country, through some constitutional process. That had already occurred on several occasions and it was probable that the same device would be employed in the future, to the detriment of the dependent peoples. Whether the national identity of the indigenous inhabitants was extirpated by obviously brutal or superficially constitutional methods, such an association bore no relation whatsoever to the establishment of the full measure of self-government envisaged by the Charter and should be resisted with the whole force of the authority of the United Nations.

22. It must be emphasized that paragraph e was only one part of Article 73. In the preamble and in paragraphs a, b, c and d of Article 73 the Administering Members had undertaken to ensure, respect and promote the political advancement and aspirations of the dependent peoples, as well as their economic, social and educational needs. The entire phrasing of Article 73 left no doubt that by "a full measure of self-government" the Charter meant political independence. General Assembly resolution 66 (I) and the other texts cited by the Indian representative all led to the same conclusion.

23. Of the Non-Self-Governing Territories on which information was no longer transmitted, only one, Indonesia, was an independent Member of the United Nations. The others had been withdrawn from any international system of responsibility and were presumably at the sole mercy of the selfish interests of the metropolitan Powers. That development had never been envisaged by the Charter or by the many subsequent resolutions on Non-Self-Governing Territories.

24. Before any dependent territory could undertake full responsibility for its independent future, it must be freed from the dominating influence and pressure of the colonial Power. Paragraph A, 4, in the list of factors indicative of the attainment of independence, given in the Committee's report, mentioned "freedom of the territory to enter into arrangements concerning its national defence". Military bases had been established in many Non-Self-Governing Territories by the colonial Powers and as long as those bases existed, no dependent people could take its future into its own hands with full freedom of action.

25. Another factor supposedly indicative of the attainment of independence was "complete autonomy in respect of economic . . . affairs". It was well known that all the Non-Self-Governing Territories were under the full economic domination of the metropolitan countries. Full economic independence could be established only if the foreign interests were deprived of their holdings. As long as they retained economic control of the Non-Self-Governing Territories there could be no freedom of action for the dependent peoples.

26. The list of factors indicative of the attainment of other separate systems of self-government referred to the "freely expressed" opinion of the population and "informed and democratic processes" for ascertaining the "status or change in status which they desired". Even in those colonial territories where the political maturity of the indigenous population had already achieved a very high level, there was nothing but a mockery of democratic processes. In the few cases where they did exist, the so-called legislative organs were only too often composed of nominated officials, the majority of whom were settlers from the metropolitan country who had nothing in common with the indigenous population. The latter longed for freedom and independence; the former were doing their best to prolong the colonial domination.

27. Paragraph A, 3, of that same list spoke of "voluntary limitation by sovereignty". Both that paragraph and paragraph C, 1, might make it appear that of their "own free will" the people of a territory might choose colonial vassalage. Acceptance of such a notion would make it possible to apply the label "self-governing" to territories on which puppet legislatures and executive councils had been imposed. The reference in paragraph C, 1, to legislatures "lawfully constituted in a manner receiving the free consent of the population" rather than to elected legislatures could imply that the members of a legislature nominated by a colonial Power were acting with the free consent of the population. Such a meaning should be categorically rejected, since its adoption would signify United Nations agreement to the existing undemocratic system of colonial rule through nominated legislatures.

28. Adoption of the list of factors indicative of the free association of a territory with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country as binding definitions would make it possible to sanction disguised colonial subjugation as practised by the French through the French Union, attempted by the United States through the "Commonwealth" of Puerto Rico, or applied by the United Kingdom through its colonial system. If, for example, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland were federated with Southern Rhodesia, as proposed, the entire federation would presumably become "self-governing" and the United Kingdom Government would no longer feel called upon to submit reports on Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.

29. The factors submitted by the Ad Hoc Committee contained a significantly large number of phrases about "voluntary" limitation of sovereignty and "free" association with the metropolitan country or other colonies. Only after the colonial yoke had disappeared could the free will of the dependent peoples be fully expressed. The Ad Hoc Committee's report did not make that point clear.

30. The Ad Hoc Committee had completely failed to reappraise the essential question of the right to national self-determination, which was clearly defined in Article 1, paragraph 2, of the Charter as one of the main purposes of the United Nations. At a given historical moment, that right could be exercised by any one of the dependent peoples. They would not consult a dictionary to discover whether they satisfied all the definitions of a free nation; they would simply ask for the recognition of their right of self-determination, and their struggle for full independence rather than any mechanical classification would decide the issue.

31. His delegation was not in favour of rigid formulae to be applied to all the Non-Self-Governing Territories in all circumstances. If the General Assembly was not realistic, the cessation of information without the corresponding attainment of self-government or independence might reduce to zero the number of Non-Self-Governing Territories discussed annually by the United Nations.

32. The Ad Hoc Committee itself had recognized the limitations of its work in paragraph 5 (C) of its report, when it had stated that the "circumstances of each particular case" would have to be "studied separately". Harmful generalizations should be avoided and the General Assembly should analyse every case on its merits, without referring solely to factors in order to ascertain whether the territory concerned had attained a "full measure of self-government", in the terms of the Charter. The main principle was the right of national self-determination, and everything must be done to avoid weakening or distorting that right and to remove the obstacles by which the administering Powers tried to postpone the invoking of that right by the dependent peoples. The Polish delegation had some reservations with regard to the basic concept of the Ad Hoc Committee's report, which could be in some situations inconsistent with the right of self-determination.

33. Mr. GERIG (United States of America) said that the United States delegation would support the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors. That report gave evidence of a close and careful study of its complex subject, and the matter had now been brought to a stage where the General Assembly might well adopt the report as representing the best consensus of opinion which could for the time being be achieved. It could of course be improved, and the United States delegation was prepared to consider any proposal to that end.

34. In supporting the report, the United States delegation did so on the understanding which the Committee itself had arrived at, namely, that no enumeration of factors could do more than serve as a guide in determining whether a territory was or was not self-governing. It also agreed with the Committee's view that each specific case would need to be determined by the circumstances of that case, while a single factor or combination of factors could not be regarded as decisive in every case. The Committee was to be commended for having avoided the adoption of over-simple conclusions which could not be helpful in seeking a standard by which to judge whether self-government had been attained.

35. The factors themselves fell into three categories: first, those which were indicative of the attainment of independence; secondly, those which were indicative of the attainment of some other separate system of self-government; and thirdly, those which were indicative of the free association of a territory with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country. The factors listed in each category were relevant in varying degrees, but there were additional points which might well merit inclusion. However, the United States delegation would not suggest any new factors, partly because there might be some danger of laying down so many that the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories themselves might misunderstand the significance of the list and be somewhat discouraged by the belief that they had to qualify on too many points in order to attain the desired goal of self-government. Indeed, in examining the list of factors, the United States delegation had wondered whether some independent governments of States Members of the United Nations, could in fact qualify for self-government.

36. The United States delegation also commended the Ad Hoc Committee for having clearly indicated the difference between independence and self-government: while independent entities were self-governing, not all self-governing entities were independent.

37. The report also recognized clearly that the Non-Self-Governing Territories were not all moving, and might not all wish to move, in the same direction. While some were progressing towards independence, others were clearly moving towards free association with the metropolitan or other State or group of States.

38. With regard to the six-Power draft resolution (A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1), the United States delegation was indebted to the Venezuelan and Cuban representatives for their clear explanation at the 273rd meeting of the postulates underlying it. From the terms of the draft resolution and the explanations of its sponsors, it was clear that it was based on two fundamental theories, both of which the United States Government, under its Constitution, must reject. The first was that autonomy was indivisible and that the administering Power would therefore be required to transmit information under Article 73 e until a territory was self-governing not only in economic, social and educational but also in political matters. The second was that authority and responsibility for deciding when a territory had become self-governing and need no longer be reported on rested not with the administering Power alone, but jointly with the General Assembly and the administering Power concerned.

39. On the first point, the United States delegation believed that the people and government of a territory and the people and government of a metropolitan country could, if they wished, freely choose the nature of their mutual relationship, and that in such a freely chosen arrangement they could decide that certain matters, such as economic, social and educational matters, should henceforth be the exclusive concern of the territorial government, and certain others, political matters such as the conduct of foreign affairs and defence, should be the responsibility of the metropolitan government. Under such an arrangement, if the territorial government did not wish to submit reports on its economic and social affairs to the metropolitan government or did not wish them to be transmitted to the United Nations, it would not only be contrary to the agreement if it were compelled to do so, but would in fact be depriving the territory of much of its newly acquired self-government. It was hardly believable that that was the intention of the Cuban representative or of the other sponsors of the draft resolution, but if it was, the United States Government was unwilling to be a party to any action limiting the attainment of self-government and could not support a resolution based on such a premise.

40. On the second point, the United States delegation held that each administering Power was entitled to determine the constitutional position and status of territories under its sovereignty. The decision to cease reporting under Article 73 e on specific territories rested solely with the administering Power concerned. That was not meant to imply that the General Assembly had no part to perform. On the contrary, it could make a useful contribution by trying to determine the proper interpretation of such expressions as "Non-Self-Governing Territories" and "territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government". Since such expressions appeared in the Charter, their definition should be a collective rather than a unilateral matter, and the General Assembly should have authority to discuss and attempt to define those expressions and to recommend to the Administering Members in general the consideration of any definition which it might adopt. The General Assembly might further express its opinion in general terms on the principles which had guided or might guide Administering Members in deciding on which of their territories they would transmit information; but any resolution regarding the decision of an Administering Member to cease the transmission of information should not imply that that decision required the General Assembly's approval or disapproval. If the people of a territory freely chose to become a component part of another State and the Government of that State, through its constitutional processes, adopted the necessary legislation to make such union possible, that legislation could not be made subject to further review and possible revision by the General Assembly, for the General Assembly did not enter into the legislative processes by which governments, under their constitutions, carried out the duties entrusted to them. No Member of the United Nations recognized that the Fourth Committee or the General Assembly as a whole was competent to enter into the inner legislative processes of Member States. The United Nations was not a world government. The United States had not abrogated its right to determine when a territory had advanced so far that it was qualified for statehood, nor could it yield that right to the Fourth Committee, since it was a constitutional question on which the Government could not surrender its sovereignty and right of decision.

41. For those reasons, the United States Government would be unable to vote for the six-Power draft resolution. It would be more prudent simply to adopt the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors, which the United States would support.

42. Mr. C. LIU (China) said that, bearing in mind the objectives of Chapter XI, he considered that the joint draft resolution was a good one and that it correctly expressed the evolutionary interpretation that the General Assembly had placed on Chapter XI in the various resolutions to which previous speakers had referred.

43. Nevertheless, paragraph 3 of the operative part of the draft resolution was somewhat obscure. He could not conceive that the factors could be interpreted as "a hindrance to the attainment of a full measure of self-government". That could only be hindered by the actions of the indigenous population, the administering Power or other interested parties. He would like some explanation of that paragraph.

44. Paragraph 2 was virtually a repetition of the second sentence of paragraph 5 (C) of the Ad Hoc Committee's report and, as such, should logically be combined with the last paragraph of the preamble; those two paragraphs were two facets of a single idea and should not be separated.

45. The relation between the terms "self-governing" and "self-government" in paragraph 4 was rather confusing. The Cuban representative had pointed out that paragraph 4 was intended to stress the indivisibility of all aspects of self-government. That idea might be more clearly expressed if the words "in the political field" were added after the word "self-government".

46. He would not insist on the amendments he had suggested and would in any case vote in favour of the joint draft resolution.

47. Sir Alan BURNS (United Kingdom) said that his delegation had never felt that the question of factors had any great relevance to the principles and purposes of Chapter XI, and had therefore taken no prominent part in the debate on the subject. Nevertheless, in response to General Assembly resolution 567 (VI), it had submitted its considered views to the Ad Hoc Committee. It was regrettable that the United Kingdom memorandum (A/AC.58/1/Add.3), with other closely argued memoranda submitted by various Members of the United Nations, had not apparently received the thorough attention they deserved from the Ad Hoc Committee, whose report would have been of much greater value had those memoranda been annexed in full for the consideration of the Fourth Committee. It was quite evident from some of the statements made in the Fourth Committee that the views expressed in the memoranda had not been fully taken into account.

48. Turning to the draft resolution, he pointed out that the obligation to transmit information referred to in the first two paragraphs of the preamble was subject to such limitations as security and constitutional considerations might require. Subject to those limitations, his delegation would agree that the obligation to transmit information remained in force with regard to each territory until the obligations of Chapter XI had been attained in relation to that territory.

49. The wording of the final paragraph of the preamble glossed over some of the complexities of interpreting the Charter. The problem in relation to Chapter XI was to decide whether a territory was or was not a territory whose peoples—that was the operative word—had not yet attained a full measure of self-government. Some confusion was evident in the Ad Hoc Committee's report: some of the items referred to the features which would be exhibited by a fully self-governing territory, and some to the features which would be exhibited by a fully self-governing people. It would have been prudent for the Ad Hoc Committee to define the words "territory" and "people". Definitions, however, had apparently been shirked by the Committee.

50. The same confusion between "a territory" and the "peoples" of that territory was apparent in paragraph 1 of the draft resolution. The General Assembly, if indeed it ever had to consider the question at all, was presumably interested in the existence of people who did not enjoy a full measure of self-government. That question affected not only the cessation of information but also the recognition of obligations on the part of other States which had not hitherto regarded themselves as having any commitments under Chapter XI.

51. The United Kingdom would have little difficulty in deciding whether any of its territories had or had not attained a full measure of self-government and his Government had no need to approve the list of factors in question. For example, if the United Kingdom decided to accord the peoples of a Non-Self-Governing Territory for which it was responsible a full measure of self-government, an order-in-council could be promulgated precisely to that effect. Such an instrument would be internationally valid in removing the territory in question from the category of territories to which Chapter XI applied. It was quite possible that the political advancement of the population would not be sufficient to enable them to decide the future destiny of the territory with due knowledge, and they might not have had an opportunity to express their opinion, by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desired. Nevertheless, their status would be effectively established in international law by the instrument to which he had referred. Under his country's constitutional practices, therefore, the list of factors would have little real relevance to the basic issue of the status of the territory, either in international law or in relation to Chapter XI.

52. Paragraph 2 of the draft resolution was wise and in accord with his Government's invariable practice. He welcomed paragraph 3, since it would help to dissipate the growing feeling in the Non-Self-Governing Territories that the United Nations would hesitate to recognize the political advancement of such a territory unless sixty nations could be convinced, through the application of a series of almost incomprehensible criteria, that a level of development had been reached far surpassing that to be found in the majority of Member States.

53. He did not understand the phrase "its people shall have attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter" in paragraph 4. The Ad Hoc Committee's report contained no definition of "a full measure of self-government". His Government would deem a country self-governing in economic, social or educational affairs when its legislature and executive took independent decisions on those matters. He had no doubt that the sponsors of the joint draft resolution would be able to suggest a definition.

54. He endorsed the last clause of paragraph 5, which clearly recognized the need to admit that there were more than eight Members of the United Nations on whom the obligation to transmit information might well devolve.

55. His delegation felt unable to vote in favour of the draft resolution or to approve the Ad Hoc Committee's report. Much remained to be done before the question could be considered as even provisionally elucidated. Many doubts had been expressed regarding the real value of the existing list of factors and many new elements had been brought into the discussion. The thoughtful memoranda submitted by several Governments had been examined in a most cursory way, and virtually all the essential terms remained undefined. He therefore suggested that it might be wise for the Committee to invite the Secretary-General to prepare a further comprehensive study on the subject in the light of all the elements to which he had referred and to submit it to the eighth session of the General Assembly. In the past the General Assembly had appeared to attach great importance to the study of factors, which it was now dismissing in a most light-hearted way.

56. He would not obstruct any attempt to remove a somewhat unreal problem from the agenda by means of the joint draft resolution. Before any vote was taken, however, he fully reserved his Government's position in relation to any claims which might be deemed to be put forward on behalf of the General Assembly in the draft resolution, and in the event of its adoption and a subsequent urging of any claims, his delegation would be obliged to draw attention to that express reservation.

57. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) said that his delegation had always supported the idea that the General Assembly was competent to decide when a territory was or was not self-governing and, consequently, whether or not information should continue to be transmitted in respect of that territory. Chapter XI was a declaration by the administering Powers, but it was also a treaty between those Powers and the international community represented by the United Nations. In conformity with Article 10 of the Charter, the General Assembly was certainly competent to discuss Chapter XI and to interpret the obligations of the administering Powers thereunder. His delegation had therefore supported the setting up of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors and had co-operated in its work. It was convinced, as the Dominican representative had stated in the General Assembly at the 396th plenary meeting, that the principle of self-determination was a sacred principle and an integral part of international law, unreservedly recognized in the United Nations Charter.

58. Although his delegation had always maintained that it was very difficult to determine absolute criteria of self-government, it had nevertheless replied to the Secretary-General's request for comments on the proposed list of factors. Only about a third of the Member States, however, had felt able to submit such comments; several States had reserved their opinion until they had seen the Ad Hoc Committee's report and several States still reserved their opinion. It was obvious that many Member States still retained considerable doubts regarding the proposed list of factors and it therefore seemed highly questionable whether the General Assembly should adopt that list as a conclusive study at the present juncture.

59. He agreed with those representatives who had referred to the political aspects of the question. Nevertheless, it had always been presented to the Committee as a legal problem, and it must be solved by legal formulae derived from international public law. The constitutional provisions governing the relations between a metropolitan country and the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which it was responsible obviously involved far-reaching legal problems. That was why, at the sixth session (216th meeting), his delegation had suggested that the study of factors should be entrusted to the International Law Commission. It still held that view. The Ad Hoc Committee's report should be submitted to a technical body for further analysis and in order to bring its terminology more into line with the legal requirements of the problem. Such a step was particularly necessary in the case at issue, since the list of factors would be a document of decisive importance when any revision of the Charter was undertaken. He would therefore support any suggestion for further study, particularly by the International Law Commission, and reserved his right to submit a draft resolution to that effect.

60. The Ad Hoc Committee's report was guilty of one major omission: it contained no definition of self-government. His delegation had stated at the 216th meeting of the Fourth Committee that prior to any determination of factors, the principle of self-government from the standpoint of international law must be defined as it derived from the application of constitutional law to international public law. The ambiguity of Chapter XI, especially Article 73 b, in that respect had been repeatedly emphasized by such commentators on the Charter as Hans Kelsen and Lauterpacht. In the French and Roman legal codes, the definition of any crime, for example, always specified the elements of the crime itself. In the same way, any definition of self-government must specify the elements of self-government, that was to say, the factors. There seemed to be a tendency in the Fourth Committee to claim that the General Assembly should first establish the factors and then, at a later stage, define self-government. There seemed to be no reason why those processes should not be undertaken simultaneously; indeed that might be preferable. His delegation had previously suggested that self-government might be defined as the fact of a people or group making its institutions completely independent of the metropolitan country to which it had been legally and politically linked. It was a prerequisite of any definition of self-government that it should embody the principle of self-determination.

61. Both the Ad Hoc Committee's report and paragraph 2 of the draft resolution recognized that no enumeration of factors could do more than serve as a guide. Since, therefore, many other formulae might solve the ambiguities of Chapter XI, his delegation would adopt an intermediate position with regard to the draft resolution.

62. The preamble to the draft resolution was acceptable, since it merely listed the consequences of earlier General Assembly resolutions. The opening statement in paragraph 1 was correctly formulated, but, as he had stated, it would be premature to approve the list of factors as a final study. It should be given further consideration by a re-established Ad Hoc Committee or by the International Law Commission. The very vague phrasing in paragraph 2 detracted from the merits of the draft resolution as a whole. Paragraph 4 was apparently a formal declaration by the General Assembly enunciating a formal principle with regard to self-government, namely, that there could be no economic, social and educational self-government without political self-government. That was acceptable as a principle, but in practice it would, if approved, render the entire list of individual factors unnecessary. If the General Assembly wished to make such a declaration, it might do so in a separate resolution. He was not at all sure, however, that such a declaration would not violate Chapter XI of the Charter. As stated in paragraph 4, the idea introduced a fundamental, new element with the gravest legal and political implications. In his opinion, it would be premature at the present juncture for the General Assembly to adopt what was, in essence, a revision of Chapter XI, and he would therefore be unable to vote for paragraph 4.

63. To sum up, his delegation was not against the draft resolution, but felt that it was premature. It would therefore abstain in the vote on the resolution as a whole, but might request a separate vote on certain paragraphs and would vote against those paragraphs.

64. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) wished to remind the Committee of some points that had apparently been overlooked by other speakers. The question before the Committee was not the determination of the conditions under which the cessation of the transmission of information could be allowed; it was merely the determination of the territories in regard to which information should be supplied. Texts to be submitted to the General Assembly must be precise. The question was, therefore, which were the territories whose populations had not yet attained a full measure of self-government.

65. Secondly, every State had sovereign discretion to decide what territories under its administration came within the scope of Chapter XI. It decided in regard to which territories information should be supplied and in regard to which territories circumstances were such that information need no longer be transmitted.

66. The Belgian delegation had grave doubts as to the value of the list of factors drafted by the Ad Hoc Committee. That list seemed to have been drawn up in a somewhat random fashion: certain suggestions had been put before the Committee, others had been added, some had been dropped, other retained. He was sure that no member of the Committee could feel that the problem had been thoroughly sifted. The Committee had not performed what should have been its primary task, namely, giving a definition of what self-government in fact was.

67. His delegation was not, however, taking a stand with reference to the list of factors. All of them were worthy of consideration, though neither any one of them singly nor all of them together could offer an automatic criterion for determining whether a territory did or did not come within the scope of Article 73 e.

68. Nevertheless, the list of factors did confirm the Belgian delegation's opinion that there were many peoples to which the criteria applied and on which information was not transmitted. There were two alternatives: either the criteria were valid, in which case information must be transmitted with regard to all the territories to which they applied; or else they applied to certain territories in regard to which the administering Power concerned or, as some held, the General Assembly, considered that there was no need to transmit information, in which case they were not valid.

69. He would give some examples of territories to which, in the opinion of his delegation, the factors undoubtedly applied. The factors indicative of the attainment of self-government included the opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desired; the extent to which the relations of the territory with the capital of the central government might be affected by circumstances arising out of their respective geographical positions, such as separation by land, sea or other natural obstacles; and the extent to which the population were of different race, language or religion or had a distinct cultural heritage, interests or aspirations, distinguishing them from the peoples of the country with which they freely associated themselves.

70. In that connexion he referred to the report of the first session of the Committee of Experts on Indigenous Labour of the International Labour Organisation, held at La Paz in 1951, which described the conditions under which the Indian population lived in Brazil. According to that report there were three categories of Indians: the first living in the same communities as civilized people, the second consisting of tribes which maintained peaceful relations with the civilized people but inhabited remote territories near the sources of the rivers, and the third composed of completely savage tribes which lived in isolation in inaccessible territories and offered armed resistance to any attempt by civilized people to make contact with them.

71. In Venezuela, a report published by the Government for the year 1949-1950 stated that attempts were being made to incorporate the Indians of the upper reaches of the Orinoco into civilized life by teaching them religion, Spanish, agriculture and trade and instructing them in hygiene and public health. In a report for 1950-1951 it was stated that the Government, desirous of improving the conditions of the Native populations in distant and inaccessible parts of the country, had entrusted Catholic missions with the task of winning the Indians over to civilization, and that notwithstanding the difficulties the missionaries were making progress.

72. According to a Venezuelan law of 1882, the special system under which the Native communities were administered by the Federal Government would continue until it should be appropriate to raise them to a different status. The legislation which applied to those communities was therefore different from that which applied to the majority of the inhabitants of Venezuela. A law of 1915 had established a number of missions for the purpose of introducing the uncivilized groups which still survived in various areas of the republic to urban life and of settling the more uninhabited parts of Venezuela. The missions were granted authority to maintain order among the Indians and to call on the Federal Government to intervene when important measures were required. Indians who were willing to renounce their nomadic existence would be taught in educational centres how and where to settle permanently. The decision where they should settle would be taken by the head of the mission.

73. He assured the Committee that in speaking of countries within whose boundaries non-assimilated inhabitants dwelt he intended no criticism. Belgium was not ashamed of having semi-civilized peoples under its sovereignty and could sympathize with other countries that faced the same problems. The administering countries were not responsible for the problems, but only for the way in which they endeavoured to solve those problems.

74. In December 1951 a report from the Commissioner of Scheduled Castes and Tribes of the Government of India dealt with the demand for independence of the Naga tribe—a situation of which the Members of the United Nations were aware, since they had received a petition on the subject from that tribe dated November 1949. The Naga people claimed that they had never lost their independence and that they were determined to maintain it. The Naga had recently carried out a raid, and Mr. Nehru, the Prime Minister, had said in Parliament that the territories in question were not administered by the Indian Government or any other government; they were completely unadministered and left to their own resources except when trouble occurred.

75. Mr. Ryckmans could see no good reason why information could not be submitted on all the peoples to which he had referred. The factors in the Committee's list applied to them quite as much as to the peoples in the Non-Self-Governing Territories concerning which information was transmitted in accordance with Article 73 e.

76. He had already mentioned at the 259th meeting the example of Liberia. He did not wish to imply that the Liberian officials were less competent or less devoted to the interests of the population than the French officials of the Ivory Coast, but there appeared to be no good reason why Liberia should not supply information on the peoples inhabiting the adjacent frontier area.

77. Another instance was the Somali nation, which was divided into several parts. Information was supplied annually to the United Nations concerning Somaliland under British administration, Somaliland under French administration and Somaliland under Italian administration. The Somali whose territory had been conquered by the Ethiopians, however, were presumably not self-governing, and therefore information should be submitted concerning them. It was difficult to see why Ethiopia should be less bound by that obligation than the United Kingdom, France or Italy.

78. According to a book, Government and Nationalism in Southeast Asia, published in New York in 1942 by the Institute of Pacific relations, in various parts of the Philippines there were backward tribes living in the mountains and the bush. So far they had been left alone by the Spanish-speaking settlers owing to their fighting prowess and the fact that their territory had no resources which would repay the cost of military operations. The book stated that the tribesmen disliked the Philippine officials and that the latter regarded them as barbarians. While on the subject of the Philippines, he pointed out that the Moros did not have officials elected in the same circumstances as prevailed in other parts of the country. The factors suggested by the Ad Hoc Committee applied to their territory and to that of the other tribes in the Philippines.

79. Another case in point was that of the Dyaks in Borneo, on whom the Netherlands Government had supplied information in 1947, 1948 and 1949. According to that information some of the tribes in that part of Borneo were completely isolated and very backward and primitive, and some of them still engaged in head-hunting. It could not be claimed that those peoples enjoyed full self-government under the terms of the Charter.

80. No doubt it would be objected that the Charter did not speak of populations but of ~~territories~~ ^{territories}; he had shown, however, that many such populations inhabited territories which were distinct and clearly defined and yet did not enjoy self-government. There were other territories which were separated by sea from the country which administered them. The peoples of the Andaman and Nicobar Islands, for instance, did not enjoy full self-government, and Easter Island was under Chilean sovereignty, yet India and Chile did not submit information concerning them.

81. It had been contended that the Belgian thesis was contrary to the sovereignty of States and would universalize colonialism. The word "colony" did not however appear in Chapter XI nor in Article 23 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, under which the Members of the League had undertaken to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants of territories under their control. No distinction had been made in that connexion between so-called metropolitan countries and colonial territories.

82. The principle of domestic jurisdiction had also been invoked. He could not see what that had to do with territories which were not within the boundaries of the metropolitan country.

83. Most of the States that objected to the Belgian delegation's thesis had been Members of the League of Nations, and they did not explain why the obligation imposed by Article 23 of the Covenant, which had been admissible twenty-five years previously, was inadmissible today. The argument that Article 73 applied to territories and not to peoples was a mere legal quibble. The territories were important because they were inhabited by human beings. Belgian public opinion would be unable to believe in the sincerity of those who engaged in such sophistries and at the same time expressed pious sentiments about the welfare of the non-self-governing peoples and appealed to the spirit of the Charter, the spirit of international co-operation, and so forth. Belgium would never admit that Chapter XI applied only to the populations of territories in regard to which information had been freely supplied by only eight States. Those eight States had in reality shown a greater spirit of international co-operation than all the rest of the Member States. At least half the Member States of the United Nations contained populations in regard to which information ought to be supplied under Chapter XI, and the refusal to do so resulted in discrimination against the eight Powers in question, the so-called colonial Powers, which in the long run would seriously affect the functioning of the Organization.

84. Mr. CALERO RODRIGUES (Brazil) said that the subject of the Belgian representative's remarks was irrelevant to the question before the Committee. It was true that three were Indians in Brazil. The Brazilian Government co-operated with international institutions, both inter-American organizations and such organizations as the ILO and UNESCO, in matters concerning their interests, but it held that problems concerning them were not the concern of the Fourth Committee. If the question was raised again, he would be compelled to raise a point of order. The Brazilian delegation had no objection to discussing the ethnic, social and cultural problems of the indigenous peoples, but it considered that they were out of place in the Fourth Committee.

85. Mr. RIVAS (Venezuela) said that the history of the question was well known to the Belgian delegation. The population of the territories or provinces of Venezuela inhabited by backward peoples was not large enough to justify the election of a senator. That however was a very different matter from a territory, within the meaning of the Charter. Non-Self-Governing Territories like the Belgian Congo had never been a legitimate part of the territory of the metropolitan country; they were provisionally under the authority of the metropolitan Powers until they became self-governing. The areas of Venezuela that had been referred to had been part of Venezuelan territory since the country had achieved self-government.

86. The CHAIRMAN said that it had been clear from the outset of his statement that the Belgian representative had gone deeply into certain questions affecting a number of sovereign States, most of which were represented in the Fourth Committee. Representatives of those States would wish to comment on those matters, and would undoubtedly do so with their usual knowledge and ability. He might have interrupted the Belgian representative in order to ask him to be more brief, and not to reopen an argument which he had already advanced in connexion with the first item of the agenda, since that would in no way help the Committee in its consideration of the item now before it. He had refrained from doing so because he felt that the Belgian representative should be given every opportunity, as would other representatives, to express his views, because he had wished to extend him every courtesy, and because he had not wished to appear to show prejudice in favour of the countries to which the Belgian representative had referred in his statement. In any event, however, representatives had the right to raise points of order and could do so at any time.

The meeting rose at 6.30 p.m.

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2178, A/C.4/L.231, A/C.4/L.233, A/C.4/L.234) (continued)

1. Mr. YURANS (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) recalled that Chapter XI of the Charter imposed certain obligations upon Powers administering Non-Self-Governing Territories. General Assembly resolution 66 (I) gave a list of such territories. Under the Charter, the colonial Powers were required to transmit information to enable the United Nations to determine whether they were fulfilling the obligations they had undertaken.

2. Some of the administering Powers had arbitrarily decided to cease transmitting information on a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories, such as Guadeloupe, New Caledonia, the Panama Canal Zone, Malta and the Netherlands Antilles, because they were afraid to reveal the situation in those territories to world public opinion. That was how the question of factors had arisen.

3. The list of factors in the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (A/2178) marked a step forward, but could not be considered final or complete. When the General Assembly adopted a list of criteria, the way in which it would collect the necessary data to ensure that the people of a given territory had attained a full measure of self-government would still have to be determined.

4. The Soviet Union did not think that any administering Power could cease to provide information concerning any Non-Self-Governing Territory until the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories had studied all the information concerning the status of that territory and had advised the General Assembly that the territory no longer fell within the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter. The colonial Powers could cease transmitting information only when the Non-Self-Governing Territories had become independent, sovereign States whose people exercised all powers: legislative, executive and judicial.

5. The Soviet Union would vote for the joint draft resolution before the Committee (A/C.4/L.231) but would submit an amendment (A/C.4/L.233) to the effect that the following text should be added to the third paragraph of the preamble:

"... and that, not later than six months after the submission of the aforesaid information, such information as may be required in such cases should be communicated, including information about the constitution, legislative acts or executive orders regarding the government of the territory as well as about the constitutional relationship of the territory to the Government of the metropolitan country".

6. Mr. RIFAI (Syria) felt that the question studied by the Ad Hoc Committee was a delicate and complicated one, and the Committee's report could be considered only as a useful guide. As the United States representative had said at the 274th meeting, in seeking to draw up a list that was too comprehensive there would be the danger of coming to the conclusion that no people qualified for self-government. The Syrian delegation did not think that any new study was needed; it would vote for the joint draft resolution.

7. The statements that the representatives of some of the administering Powers had made during the discussion were disconcerting. According to them, the administering Powers alone were qualified to decide whether a particular territory was or was not self-governing, and the Charter imposed no restriction on their sovereignty in that respect. The Syrian Government took the view that it was not for the administering Powers alone to decide whether a given territory had reached the stage of self-government, not because it wished to hamper the development of such territories towards independence, but in order to ensure that such independence was real. To his mind the words "independence" and "self-government" were synonymous. Any attempt to draw a fine distinction between independence and self-government would be contrary to the aims of the Charter. The only purpose of such an unwarranted distinction was to enable the colonial Powers to claim that a territory could be considered as self-governing as soon as it enjoyed a certain degree of autonomy in social, economic and educational matters. Such a concept, in combination with the theory of the exclusive competence of the administering Powers, would destroy all hope for the emancipation of the colonial peoples and would completely nullify Chapter XI of the Charter. If that interpretation were adopted, it would soon be seen that all Non-Self-Governing Territories no longer fell within the purview of the United Nations. For example, Morocco could suddenly reach so-called self-government merely by forming a part of the French Union.

8. The obligations under Chapter XI of the Charter were binding on all Members of the United Nations. Administering Powers could not take unilateral decisions concerning the future of Non-Self-Governing Territories. As the representative of India had said, the status of Non-Self-Governing Territories could be altered in two ways only: they could be given a full measure of self-government as in the case of Indonesia, or they could be transferred to the United Nations Trusteeship System. The United Nations, in deciding on any change in the status of a Non-Self-Governing Territory, would have to take into consideration the freely expressed will of its population.

9. Syria felt that unless the serious gap between the opposing views of the Members of the United Nations on that question was narrowed, the International Court of Justice would have to be asked for an advisory opinion.

10. Mr. ABOU KHADRA (Saudi Arabia) thought that the complex nature of the problem was apparent from the report of the Ad Hoc Committee. It was heartening to note that its members had been able to agree on the two principles set out in paragraph 5 (c) of the report.

11. The Saudi Arabian delegation believed that the General Assembly was competent to decide whether a country had become self-governing and the administering Power could cease to transmit information concerning it. If there were any doubts on that point, it might be advisable to request an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice or to refer the question to the Sixth Committee.

12. It would be dangerous to give the political system of a territory too much weight in determining its progress towards self-government. Political conditions and traditions varied greatly in different territories, and the factors set out in the Committee's report could not be rigidly applied in the various areas falling within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter.

13. Saudi Arabia thought that the list of factors in the report of the Ad Hoc Committee was concise and adequate. As to the factors concerning independence, particular attention should be given to the degree to which an indigenous population was conscious of its political, economic and social unity. That factor was also very important with regard to the association of a territory with the metropolitan or some other country, because it provided the basis for judging whether the people had been completely free in deciding in favour of such association.

14. With reference to the remarks made by the United States representative at the previous meeting, he would say that while a territory might indeed wish freely to associate itself with the metropolitan country or another State, such cases would always be very exceptional. It would be very dangerous to make that a principle applicable to all territories. Non-Self-Governing Territories should, as a general rule, either become independent and be admitted to the United Nations or be placed under the International Trusteeship System.

15. It was unfortunate that several colonial Powers had, in the case of some territories, ceased transmitting information under Article 73 e of the Charter.

16. The joint draft resolution requested the General Assembly to approve the report of the Ad Hoc Committee. The Saudi Arabian delegation regarded the report as satisfactory even though parts of it had given rise to varying interpretations. It would therefore vote for the draft resolution.

17. Mr. LANNUNG (Denmark) considered that the list of factors contained in the annex to General Assembly resolution 567 (VI) was an acceptable basis for discussion. The Ad Hoc Committee's report did not call for any special remarks by the Danish Government.

18. He had noted with satisfaction that the Ad Hoc Committee had preserved the fundamental distinction between factors indicative of the attainment of independence or of other separate systems of self-government and factors indicative of the free association of a territory with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country. In the latter case, it might perhaps be well to classify the factors further so that they would apply, on the one hand, to a territory attached to a State of the federal type and, on the other, to a territory attached to a State of the unitary type. It was, however, of secondary importance whether that subdivision was made or not. The principal matter was that general agreement existed that the population of a territory which by its own free will, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, associated itself with the metropolitan or another country, certainly would obtain a full measure of self-government. A territory attached to a State of the unitary type should enjoy the same status as the other component parts of that State; the degree of local self-government would not in that case be an all-important factor, because it would depend upon how far the government of that State had been centralized. It should be remembered that where the population of a territory was very small and hardly large enough to enable it to become an independent State, attachment to another State was the only practical way in which the people of that territory could be completely self-governing in accordance with their freely expressed wishes.

19. He would mention the wishes and attitude of the population of Greenland as that had an important bearing on the attitude of his delegation to the factors. The Government of Denmark recalled in that regard that during the past summer, the National Council of Greenland had considered the question of that territory's future status. Mr. Augot Lynge, a member of that Council, had said that Greenland wished to be associated with an integrated Denmark. On Mr. Lynge's motion, the National Council, which consisted of representatives elected by the people of Greenland under a system of universal and equal suffrage, had unanimously adopted a resolution providing that the new Constitution of Denmark should make Greenland an amt, that is, a county or province of Denmark and that Greenland should send representatives to the Danish Parliament. The Danish Government and Parliament intended, with the agreement of all political parties, to amend the Danish Constitution so as to comply with the aspirations of the people of Greenland. That might take some time as the rules laid down for an amendment involved a complex procedure.

20. The fundamental factor should be the freely expressed will of the people. If the people of a territory and the administering Power both thought that that people had attained a full measure of self-government as provided in Chapter XI of the Charter, the United Nations obviously should not place any obstacle in their way.

21. The Danish delegation believed, moreover, that the factors set out in the Ad Hoc Committee's report should be used to determine not only whether a Power might cease to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter, but also whether some Powers should begin to send such information on certain territories under their administration.

22. Denmark had already stated, when General Assembly resolution 218 (III) had been adopted, that a State responsible for a territory was entitled to determine the constitutional status of the territories placed under its sovereignty. Denmark would inform the United Nations of any change in the status of Greenland, but in doing so did not regard any action taken in the matter by its constitutional organs as subject to revision by the United Nations. Denmark's attitude towards the joint draft resolution would be determined by those considerations.

23. Mr. PONCE YEPEZ (Ecuador) said that the obligation of the administering Powers to transmit information on conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories arose from a multilateral agreement concluded by those Powers with the other signatories of the Charter. Therefore, the administering Powers could not cease to transmit such information unless conditions in the territories had undergone drastic change. That was why it was important to determine what factors must be taken into account in deciding whether the peoples of a territory had attained a full measure of self-government. The report of the Ad Hoc Committee was a valuable study on that especially complex problem. No factor could be considered decisive and the specific conditions in each territory had to be borne in mind.

24. A general criterion which would take account of the principle that self-government was indivisible would be invaluable. In that connexion he recalled that at the sixth session, 242nd meeting, of the Committee, the representative of an administering Power had stated that economic autonomy was impossible without political autonomy and that autonomy was one and indivisible. The joint draft resolution, and particularly paragraph 4 of its operative part, marked definite progress in that respect.

25. With reference to the interpretation given by one of the administering Powers to the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter, he stated that Article 73 e referred exclusively to Non-Self-Governing Territories and in no case to peoples constituting an essential element of the population of independent and fully sovereign States. Any contrary interpretation would be a flagrant violation of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter and a threat to the very integrity of modern States.

26. Mr. COOPER (Liberia) recalled the statement of the Belgian representative at the 259th meeting to the effect that Liberia had been a colony. He would like to ask the Belgian representative whether his own country had never been subjected to the oppression of a foreign Power. As a result of violations committed by certain colonial Powers, Liberia had had to proclaim its independence scarcely twenty years after it had been set up as a colony, on the friendly advice of the United States. Liberia had been founded by Negroes forced from their homes by certain colonial Powers and later returned to their fatherland through the generosity of powerful friends. The Constitution of Liberia expressly stated that only Negroes or people of Negro descent could become citizens of Liberia and own real estate in that country. Some representatives might feel that that was a discriminatory measure, but it was partly on account of that provision that Liberia had preserved its independence. If, as the Belgian representative had said, the inhabitants of Liberia spoke an alien tongue, the fault lay with the colonial Powers which had uprooted them from their country.

27. Again at the 274th meeting, the Belgian representative had argued that Liberia should transmit information on certain indigenous tribes. He had emphasized that the Charter did not mention the word "colony", but it was clear that the term "Non-Self-Governing Territory" which appeared in the Charter was synonymous with colony, as shown by the reports of the colonial Powers themselves to the General Assembly. It was absurd to claim that the words "Non-Self-Governing Territory" might also extend to sovereign States. To avoid any such interpretation the authors of the Charter had explicitly prohibited the United Nations from intervening in matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of a State. If the principle stated by the Belgian representative were applied to States such as the United Kingdom, the United States, the Soviet Union or Belgium itself, the absurdity of his argument would immediately become manifest.

28. The Ad Hoc Committee had been set up because certain administering Powers had ceased to transmit information on several territories under their administration on the grounds that the latter had attained a certain measure of self-government. Even if a list of factors could be drawn up as a basis for determining whether the people of a territory had attained a full measure of self-government, the basic question would be: Who was authorized to apply those standards to a given territory? Some representatives felt that it was the right of the General Assembly; on the other hand, the administering Powers said they had exclusive authority in that respect; finally, the indigenous peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories could also claim that they were directly affected and that Chapter XI had been drafted specifically for them. So long as that question had not been settled, any resolution which might be adopted could be applied only with the consent of the administering Powers and the purpose of establishing an Ad Hoc Committee would be defeated. The authors of the joint draft resolution were perfectly aware of that contingency. Liberia felt that no concrete result could be achieved by adopting the draft resolution. The administering Powers would in any case remain free to apply whatever yardsticks they chose to each territory.

29. It had often been asked what precisely was self-government. In that connexion, the representative of Liberia recalled paragraphs b and e out of Article 73 of the Charter and showed that they led to the conclusion that the question of whether the people of a territory had attained a full measure of self-government depended on political, social, economic and cultural factors, or on a combination of all those factors. From paragraph 4 of the operative part of the joint draft resolution, it would appear that a territory could not be considered as self-governing until it had attained a certain measure of political, economic and social development. Although it was certainly not the intention of the authors, adoption of the draft resolution might result in retarding the advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories towards self-government and independence. Liberia therefore considered it more advisable to adopt a resolution which would simply approve the report of the Ad Hoc Committee pending a decision by the General Assembly specifying what organs were competent to decide whether a territory was or was not ready for self-government.

30. If the authors of the joint draft resolution should press for a vote on their text as it stood, the Liberian delegation would vote for it, but it considered that there was little chance for it to speed the progress of indigenous peoples towards self-government and independence.

31. Mr. NAJAR (Israel) observed that the joint draft resolution did not give many details with respect to the factors dealt with in the report; on the other hand, it dealt directly with various problems on which the Ad Hoc Committee had made no specific decision. The debate had shown that the draft resolution raised the following problems: Who had the right to determine whether a territory was or was not a territory whose people had not yet attained a full measure of self-government? Who had the right to decide that a territory had ceased to be a Non-Self-Governing Territory and had attained a full measure of self-government? What was the precise definition of the term "self-government" used in Chapter XI of the Charter? Did such self-government differ from "independence" as referred to in Chapter XII of the Charter and, if so, how? Could the transmission of information provided for in Article 73 e cease before a territory had become a country whose people had attained a full measure of self-government? Who could decide that information might cease to be transmitted? Finally, who could determine the validity of a political agreement between an administering Power and a territory which it used to administer but which, it contended, had become self-governing?

32. All of those questions involved the scope of the powers of the General Assembly and came within the framework of the transmission of information and its free discussion by the Fourth Committee. On each of them, the views of the eight administering Powers differed entirely from the views expressed in the joint draft resolution. The administering Powers based their understanding of their obligations on Articles 73 and 76 of the Charter and on Article 2, paragraph 7. Basic constitutional problems therefore arose both from the point of view of international as well as national law.

33. The real solution of the difficulties before the Committee did not lie in the adoption of a resolution laying down principles of major importance by a majority which would not include a single administering Power. The confusion of mind which had arisen was shown by the fact that two delegations which had supported the draft resolution had at the same time referred to the possible necessity of requesting an advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice. The Committee was confronted, on the one hand, by an accumulation of legal arguments and on the other, by a more and more profound analysis of the concepts of self-government and independence, and no one knew whether that analysis would serve or harm the very right of peoples to self-determination which it was desired to encourage.

34. By adopting the course suggested in paragraph 2 of the operative part of the joint draft resolution and considering each territory in the light of its particular circumstances, the Committee would avert a legal dispute which it could not settle and much more substantial progress would be made. The Israel delegation suggested that the solution of the problem should be sought in conciliation or in renewed consultations, because it did not believe that adoption of a resolution which would not be given effect could serve the cause of the United Nations and of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

35. The report of the Ad Hoc Committee certainly showed that an effort had been made, but the question was whether that effort had been necessary. The title given to the list of factors showed that the Committee considered the ultimate objective of Chapter XI of the Charter to be complete political independence, which could assume various forms of separate autonomy or association freely entered into by the peoples of the territories concerned. Such a clear view did not call for a lengthy and laborious enumeration of factors and would not, moreover, solve the Committee's difficulties. The real problem, which remained intact, was to reach a constructive modus vivendi with the administering Powers respecting the scope of the relevant provisions of the Charter.

36. Mr. TAJIBNAPIS (Indonesia) recalled that at the previous meeting the Belgian representative had asked why some States which did not administer territories had not sent information to the Secretary-General regarding the backward groups of their population. The reply to the question was very simple. Article 73 did not apply to metropolitan territories. That interpretation was founded not only on the preparatory work done at San Francisco, but also on Article 74 of the Charter.

37. He quoted from the verbatim minutes of the eleventh meeting of Committee II/4 at the San Francisco Conference,¹ to show that there had been no intention of extending to metropolitan territories the provisions regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories. While acknowledging that the question could not be settled by a chairman's ruling, the Chairman of Committee II/4 had been of the opinion that the provisions in question clearly did not apply to metropolitan territories. So had the Greek and the United Kingdom representatives. He did not doubt that the present Government of the United Kingdom interpreted the provision of Article 73 of the Charter in the same way.

38. He wondered why the Belgian representative had not also asked the United States and Canada the same questions he had put to Indonesia. Why had he addressed those questions only to States of Asia, Latin America or the Middle East? Mr. Tajibnapis requested the Chairman to state that the Belgian representative had not been speaking to the point when he alluded, during the previous meeting, to the situation in certain sovereign States.

39. The CHAIRMAN referred the Indonesian representative to the statement he had made on the matter at the close of the preceding meeting.

40. Mr. Shiva RAO (India) explained that he had not risen to a point of order at the previous meeting when the Belgian representative had spoken of matters which were entirely within the domestic jurisdiction of Members of the United Nations, as he had not wished to give the impression that India had anything to hide. He wished, however, to emphasize that the Belgian representative had clearly not been speaking to the point.

41. Without wishing to do the same himself, he felt bound to reply to the remarks of the Belgian representative concerning the Naga tribe, in north-eastern India, and the Andaman and Nicobar Islands. As the Indian delegation had already stated in the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Indian Government was making considerable efforts to promote the advancement of all those backward tribes and castes, particularly the Nagas. He quoted from a speech made by the Prime Minister of India at Shillong, the capital of Assam, on 19 October 1952, from which it could be seen that the tribes were progressing, while keeping to their own culture and traditions, and that the population enjoyed a considerable degree of self-government. India had been paying particular attention to the advancement of the Andaman and Nicobar Islands, the economic potential of which was considerable, but which had been used only as penal settlements up to the time when India had gained its independence. The islands constituted a state of the Union of India.

42. The Belgian representative had consistently maintained that the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories was a matter coming exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the administering Powers. That view was not shared by all, however, and he recalled the Swedish Foreign Minister's statement before the Ad Hoc Political Committee on 12 November 1952,² which showed that the question of the relations between Member States and Non-Self-Governing Territories was of an international nature and no longer fell exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the administering Powers.

43. He had listened with much interest to the observations of the Israel representative. He agreed that in the present circumstances it was idle to seek a purely theoretical interpretation of certain provisions, and it would be preferable to aim at an agreement with the administering Powers under which, while continuing to exercise their authority over the Non-Self-Governing Territories, they would allow non-administering States to exert an influence on the administration of those territories. The Indian delegation had ceaselessly advocated the conclusion of special agreements, and he quoted the example of the agreement which had led to the retention of the Indian Republic within the British Commonwealth. There must be no shrinking from new formulas.

44. Mr. INGLES (Philippines) recalled that his delegation had already had occasion to present its views during the 1951 session of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter and during the sixth session of the General Assembly. Furthermore, the Philippine Government had drawn up the written observations contained in documents A/AC.58/1 and A/AC.58/1/Add.4. In the latter document, the Philippine Government, taking as a basis the preparatory work done at San Francisco, refuted the Belgian Government's argument that Chapter XI of the Charter applied to less-developed minority groups living within the metropolitan territory of a Member State. The Philippine delegation had referred to the minutes of the eleventh meeting of Committee II/4 of the San Francisco Conference to prove that Chapter XI applied only to Non-Self-Governing Territories. He wished, however, to reply to the Belgian representative's remark that the allegedly savage tribes of the Island of Luzon were more backward than the inhabitants of the Congo. In actual fact, those tribes had possessed a civilization of their own long before the creation of the Belgian State. Their method of rice cultivation in terraces built on mountainsides, rising sheer from valley to summit were still marvels of engineering skill.

45. Whether pagans, Christians or Mohammedans, the Filipinos constituted a single race, and they had had an opportunity to demonstrate their solidarity during the past world war. Under the Constitution of 1935, all Philippine citizens, without any distinction, enjoyed the same rights. In particular, no distinction was made between Christians and non-Christians. A Moro from the Island of Mindanao had in fact been elected to the Senate, the members of which were chosen by universal suffrage by the entire country. The non-Christians elected their own representatives to the Lower House of Congress, and their own provincial and municipal officials, the same as in other parts of the country. If the inhabitants of the Congo enjoyed the same basic rights as the Philippine non-Christians, they would indeed be close to the full measure of self-government mentioned in Chapter XI of the Charter.

46. If the Philippines were obliged by an international convention to supply information concerning its internal situation, it would discharge its obligations willingly and, in particular, would not hesitate to provide information on its political progress, as it was proud of what it had achieved in that field.

47. Turning to the substance of the question, he wished to reply to certain remarks made by the Australian and United Kingdom representatives, who had considered that it was important to define first the terms "territories", "peoples" and "self-government". During the general debate, the Philippine Government had shown that Chapter XI applied only to dependent peoples living in dependent territories.

48. The Australian representative had emphasized at the 272nd meeting that the word "independence" did not appear in Chapter XI of the Charter. He quoted from a statement made by the Australian representative at the San Francisco Conference, according to which the provisions concerning Non-Self-Governing Territories did not exclude the possibility that those territories might finally achieve independence which was in fact the highest and best form of self-government. He also quoted a statement made at that time by the United Kingdom representative, who had been of the opinion that the expression "self-government" did not exclude independence.

49. The United States representative had stated, at the eleventh meeting of Committee II/4 of the San Francisco Conference, that four important parts of the Charter had a bearing on Non-Self-Governing Territories, namely the Preamble, which set forth the fundamental principles of the United Nations; Chapter I, which enumerated the general purposes and principles of the United Nations; Chapter XI, which contained a declaration of general policy regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories; and, lastly, Chapter XII, which dealt with the International Trusteeship System. The United States representative had added that it was in the light of those principles that the peoples should progress towards full self-government, which would at last put them upon a footing of sovereign equality with the other nations. It was evident, therefore, that for the administering Powers themselves, the expression "self-government" included the idea of independence. Consequently, the administering Powers could not now claim that the word "independence" had no place among the factors to be taken into account because it had not been explicitly mentioned in Chapter XI.

50. Mr. Inglés also pointed out that Article 73 of the Charter mentioned peoples that had not yet attained a full measure of self-government. It could be immediately deduced from Article 73 that only the independence of the Non-Self-Governing Territories could relieve the administering Powers of their obligations under Chapter XI. Indeed, the New Zealand representative had stated, at the third meeting of Commission II at the San Francisco Conference, on 20 June 1945,³ that for the Dominions of the British Commonwealth the words "self-government" and "independence" were synonymous.

51. In order to settle the question who was competent to decide whether Chapter XI no longer applied to a particular territory, it should first be ascertained exactly what obligations were imposed by Chapter XI. Those obligations emerged clearly from Article 73. At the 274th meeting the French representative had stated that only paragraph e of that Article imposed obligations upon the administering Powers. In that connexion, he emphasized that, in Article 73 of the Charter, the administering Powers had accepted as a sacred trust the obligation to promote the well-being of the peoples that had not yet attained a full measure of self-government. There was a similarity between the obligations imposed by Chapter XI of the Charter and Article 22 of the League of Nations Covenant, except that the enforcement machinery provided in Article 22 of the Covenant corresponded more closely to the provisions of Chapters XII and XIII of the Charter and the Trusteeship Agreements than to the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter. But the obligations of the "sacred trust" conferred upon the Non-Self-Governing Territories to which Chapter XI applied, as in the case of mandated territories, a special international status which could not be modified unilaterally by the administering Power without the consent of the United Nations. That had been made clear in the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice with respect to the international status of South West Africa.⁴

52. To be sure, Chapter XI of the Charter, as the administering Powers had said, constituted a unilateral declaration on their part. But, though such had been the case at the time when it had been made, that declaration, by being embodied in the Charter, thenceforth acquired mandatory force. It was therefore the right and duty of all signatories to the Charter to see that the obligations imposed by Chapter XI were fulfilled.

53. It was true that the Governments of France, New Zealand and the United States had made reservations when transmitting information on the Non-Self-Governing Territories which they administered: they had stated that they were transmitting the information without prejudice to whatever definition the term "self-governing territory" might later be given. By so doing, they had not denied the General Assembly's competence, but on the contrary had indicated that they expected a definition from the General Assembly.

54. With regard to the list of factors submitted for the Committee's examination, he must repeat the views expressed by his Government in its statement (A/AC.58/1/Add.4) to the Secretary-General under General Assembly resolution 567 (VI). His Government believed that once the admission was made that there could be a full measure of self-government without independence, the door was thrown wide open to the classification of all conceivable gradations of self-government and the arbitrary selection of certain grades as constituting a full measure of self-government; in other words, it would be possible at any time to "freeze" a territory somewhere on the road before attaining its ultimate goal. In the minds of the framers of the Charter, there were only two possibilities of there being a full measure of self-government without an actual proclamation of independence. They were dominion status in the British Commonwealth and membership of the United Nations, both of which, however, were hardly distinguishable from independence.

55. His delegation therefore could not agree unqualifiedly with the principle of the association of a territory on a footing of equality with other parts of the metropolitan or other country. It believed that union or association could only be the result ultimately of independence or of the free will of the people expressed in a plebiscite in which independence was presented as an alternative to association. His delegation accepted the first part of the list of factors indicative of the attainment of independence, but it could accept the second part only on the understanding that independence, or conditions of absolute freedom of action, were a prerequisite for association with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country. With those reservations, his delegation supported the draft resolution under consideration, which embodied ideas previously expressed by his own delegation.

56. Mr. SALAZAR (Peru) recalled that three different theses had been advanced in the course of the discussion: the delegations of the people's democracies held that the essential factor was the right of peoples to self-determination; the administering Powers claimed that it was for them alone to take a decision; the delegations of the third group thought that a set of principles and standards making it possible to decide whether a territory had attained self-government should be drawn up. He thought the first two theses did not take a sufficient number of elements into account. The first did not take sufficient account of the degree of economic, political and social evolution of the territories concerned, and the second was biased. Moreover, the Ad Hoc Committee's list had certain defects; in particular, it did not give a satisfactory definition of the idea of independence. He believed it would be sufficient to study the definitions given by experts on the subject, and to choose the one which appeared most complete, or to draw up a new definition embodying the essential elements of the definitions studied.

57. The list prepared by the Ad Hoc Committee was the result of a praiseworthy effort, but the Committee had not had the time necessary to solve that very complex problem. The list was incomplete and should be improved, but it was nonetheless useful as preparatory work. The time element should not intervene in a question of such exceptional interest. For that reason the delegations of Peru and the Dominican Republic were jointly submitting a series of amendments (A/C.4/L.234) to the draft resolution under consideration, which recommended, inter alia, that a new committee should be requested to continue the study of factors in order to draw up a list that would be acceptable both to the administering Powers and to the majority of other governments.

58. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) noted that under point 1 of the joint amendment by the Dominican Republic and Peru the second paragraph of the preamble of the draft resolution would be deleted. That paragraph followed from the fundamental principle on which Chapter XI of the Charter was based and its contents were implicit in the first paragraph of the preamble of the draft resolution. Point 2 of the amendment referred to General Assembly resolution 567 (VI) and formed a necessary link between the preamble and the operative part. Since various delegations had objected to the adoption by the Fourth Committee of the list drawn up by the Ad Hoc Committee, his delegation and that of Peru had thought it would be preferable merely to note the list. That was the aim of point 3 of the joint amendment. With regard to point 4, he drew the Committee's attention to the proposed sub-paragraph 3 (b). The elements specified in that sub-paragraph were directly related to the factor defined in paragraph 2 under heading A of the second part of the list, namely the opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes. It appeared essential to study the elements which would guarantee such freedom of expression. He added that the authors of the amendments would welcome any useful suggestions which members of the Committee might make.

59. Mr. EGUIZABAL (El Salvador) said that, in his delegation's opinion, Non-Self-Governing Territories were essentially in a state of transition. All those territories were destined to change their status rapidly, taking into account of course their individual position. Besides, the position of those territories no longer came exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of metropolitan States; it raised questions which concerned the community of nations. Chapter XI of the Charter contained contractual provisions of a multilateral nature which represented a guarantee given by the United Nations to the populations of Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was as a result of the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter that the United Nations was kept informed of the evolution of those territories.

60. His Government would always support measures intended to ensure the political, economic and administrative emancipation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It had already frequently adopted that attitude in the past, for example at the Ninth International Conference of American States held at Bogota in 1948, and at the preliminary meeting of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of the Central American States held at San Salvador in 1951, where it had declared itself in favour of the elimination of colonialism in America. That liberation might be brought about by recognition of the sovereignty and independence of peoples or at least by the granting of a full measure of self-government, which in practice was equivalent to independence. Such self-government should be granted to the peoples themselves and not to local governments set up to serve the interests of the metropolitan Power. In the latter case, self-government would be merely a façade to conceal the continuation of a colonial system.

61. A full measure of self-government meant essentially political self-government, which would logically involve economic, social, administrative and cultural self-government. It was inadmissible that administering Powers should, in the case of a specific territory, consider themselves freed from the obligation contained in Article 73 e of the Charter under the pretext that, in their opinion, the government of that territory had a certain measure of self-government in the social, economic and educational fields.

62. Unlike some representatives, he thought the absence of a definition was not an insurmountable obstacle. On the contrary, a definition would have certain disadvantages; however perfect it might be, it could never be absolutely foolproof and it would merely establish restrictions and create problems of interpretation. There were concepts which were immanent in the very consciousness of men and peoples. The best way of defining them was to put them into practice and make them come alive. The concept of self-government sprang from the feelings of freedom and independence which, like the sense of justice, were attributes of the human soul.

63. His delegation could not agree that the administering Power should have the exclusive power of deciding whether a territory had attained self-government. There was no doubt that the decision in that field was the prerogative of the international community; in spite of the efforts of El Salvador and Guatemala, the General Assembly had avoided studying that aspect of the question, although it was a fundamental problem which concerned not only the basic principles of international law but also the very life of millions of human beings.

64. His delegation was satisfied with the list of factors in the Ad Hoc Committee's report. It was the result of painstaking study, for which the Committee should be thanked. He would, however, have preferred the factors to be classified in three groups: factors indicative of the attainment of independence, factors indicative of the free association of a territory with the metropolitan or another country, and factors indicative of the union of a territory as an integral part of the metropolitan or another country. That classification had been proposed by El Salvador and Guatemala in the joint statement they had submitted to the Secretary-General (A/AC.58/1/Add.3). It would make it possible to apply criteria which would be less susceptible to differing interpretations.

65. The two Governments had also stated that they considered it essential to grant non-self-governing peoples the right to modify by their own will, freely and democratically expressed, the status and ties binding them to the former metropolitan Power or any other country. They had also considered it essential to provide expressly, in accordance with international law, that no metropolitan government might decide to change the political status of a Non-Self-Governing Territory which was the subject of a claim on the part of another State or the cause of a dispute with another State, until the situation forming the subject of dispute had been settled.

66. His delegation would gladly support the joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.231) for the majority of the latter's provisions were in accordance with the position it had always maintained.

Programme of work

67. The CHAIRMAN recalled that the Committee had before it a request for a hearing by the Bloc Démocratique Camerounais (A/C.4/219). He proposed that the item should be placed on the agenda of a subsequent meeting.

It was so decided.

68. Mr. TAJIBNAPIS (Indonesia) recalled that under General Assembly resolution 568 (VI), the Committee should study the question of the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter, as regards the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam. As that should not be done until the report of the Ad Hoc Committee had been adopted, he proposed that the Committee should discuss item 6 of its agenda, the report of the Trusteeship Council, before item 5.

It was so decided.

The meeting rose at 1.55 p.m.

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2178, A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1, A/C.4/L.233, A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1, A/C.4/L.235) (continued)	179

Chairman: Mr. Rodolfo MUNOZ (Argentina).

Request for an oral hearing

1. The CHAIRMAN announced that a request for an oral hearing had been received from the Union des Chefs du Nord-Togo and the Parti Togolais du Progrès.¹ In the absence of any objection, it would be circulated to the members of the Committee.

2. Mr. RIEMENS (Netherlands) said that the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (A/2178) appeared in a different light if it was to be not merely a study, but a guide for future decisions of the General Assembly. That, however, was one of the main points of the joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1) before the Committee.

3. It might be well, as the United Kingdom representative, Sir Alan Burns, had said, to consider how the draft resolution, if adopted, would affect a specific case—for example a large island, surrounded by a number of smaller islands, situated somewhere in an ocean. He would assume that those hypothetical islands, which he would christen the Alan Burns Islands, had been settled as long as three centuries earlier, and that they were inhabited by Scottish, Irish, Scandinavian and African stock, as well as a number of Hindus, some Chinese and some Syrians. The people had enjoyed a measure of self-government for over a century, democratic institutions had spread to all layers of the population and a general franchise had been established some years previously. Let it be supposed that the United Kingdom had decided after careful consideration to grant a full measure of self-government to the Alan Burns Islands. That decision had been taken after full consultation with the inhabitants through the established mechanism of their Legislative Assembly and their Executive Council and had been greeted with great enthusiasm by both bodies, because it meant that henceforth they would enjoy complete self-government in all internal matters. The Order-in-Council had been signed.

4. Now, if the draft resolution before the Committee had been adopted, the administering Power would have to use the list of factors as a guide. It would naturally consult the Executive Council of the islands, as the highest body representing the interests of the inhabitants, and the Council would turn to the list of factors.

5. That list would undoubtedly strike them as strange, for the Ad Hoc Committee had drawn up a list of factors for independence together with, as an exception to the case of independence, a list of factors for "other separate systems of self-government". However, the Executive Councillors would eventually master the list. They would ignore the factors indicative of the attainment of independence, since for so small an area to be independent would be completely unworkable, but they would find that the second part of the list applied at least partially to their case. It was the only part of the list that could possibly apply to them, because they had no desire to become an administrative part of the United Kingdom, which would mean giving up much of the local self-government they had so long enjoyed.

6. The first three factors would cause no difficulty. With regard to the factors determining international status, however, the Councillors would undoubtedly be greatly surprised to find that eligibility for membership of the United Nations was one of them. The imaginary islands he was describing would certainly be unable to afford either to contribute to the United Nations or to pay for representatives to attend its sessions. Furthermore, a number of sovereign States had been for some time waiting in vain for admission and not a single Non-Self-Governing Territory was among its Members.

7. The conclusion to which the consideration of that hypothetical case led was, therefore, that the list of factors was completely unworkable in the case of a large number of territories which were still not self-governing but which might receive a full measure of self-government in the near future.

8. The representative of India had asserted that only two possible ways were open to such territories if they wished to be no longer non-self-governing: either they would have to become independent, or the administering Power responsible would have to transform them into Trust Territories. The representative of the Soviet Union appeared to hold the same view. He appealed to the members of the Committee to take reality into account. It would be a strange reward for the inhabitants of a territory which was already well advanced on the road towards full self-government to be changed into a territory with a less advanced political status, under the dual tutelage of the administering Power and the Trusteeship Council. It was difficult to see why members who were of that opinion needed any list of factors, since the outcome of their consideration was a foregone conclusion. Moreover, the right of the inhabitants to decide upon their own fate was meaningless if in fact they could merely choose between independence and the status of a Trust Territory when they wished for neither.

9. At the 273rd meeting the representatives of Venezuela and Cuba had made statements containing much with which he whole-heartedly agreed, although certain points required elucidation. While agreeing that there could be no real self-government in economic, social and educational matters without self-government in political matters, he would prefer to change the emphasis and to stress that when genuine self-government existed in those two fields it could only be because a large measure of self-government in political matters had already been granted; in other words, political self-government was a prerequisite. Self-government could not be granted in certain fields and not in others. To what extent it existed was another matter and depended on the definition given to the term "a full measure of self-government"—a definition which so far had not been reached.

10. In the case of a territory which had been granted self-government, whose government had acquired political autonomy and full responsibility for all internal matters, including economic, social and educational conditions, the obligation of the administering Power to report on those matters must end because the objective of Article 73 as a whole would no longer be served by the transmission of such reports; indeed there would be no one to transmit them. The administering Power would no longer have the responsibility nor the necessary knowledge and would have to ask the territorial government to make the report, and it was unlikely that a territorial government which had just acquired self-government would be eager to report to the United Nations on its economic, social and educational policies and submit to an investigation of them. To impose the tutelage of the United Nations in such circumstances would be a travesty of the intentions of Article 73 and would be tantamount to the creation of a new kind of colonialism. Certain representatives appeared to regret that there were fewer Non-Self-Governing Territories in 1952 than there had been in 1946. It would seem that they were over-eager to continue control where it was no longer needed.

11. The Venezuelan representative held the view that since the territory which had obtained self-government was represented abroad by the administering Power, the latter was responsible for all its acts and could continue to report on its economic, social and educational conditions. That seemed too sweeping a statement; to represent a territory abroad implied responsibility for its external relations only.

12. The same representative had also maintained that the voluntary grant of self-government could not relieve the administering Power of its obligation to report because that freedom might be withdrawn later. That, however, seemed most unlikely except in the most unusual circumstances. Even if that were to happen, the position under Article 73 would simply be that the duty of reporting would be revived.

13. The objective of Article 73 was to promote the well-being of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, one of the means to that end being the reports called for by paragraph e. There was no point in continuing to send them once they ceased to serve the objective.

14. With reference to the joint draft resolution, he had no comments to make on the first paragraph of the preamble. He felt, however, that the second paragraph was somewhat misleading, since on the one hand it referred to the objectives of Chapter XI as a whole and on the other qualified the obligation under Article 73 e by taking it out of its context and placing it on the same footing as the general obligation under the whole Chapter. As he had already said, the obligation to report was a means to an end which became useless when the territory in question had become self-governing in the matters covered by the reports. He would therefore be unable to accept the paragraph as it stood.

15. With regard to paragraph 1 of the operative part, he asked the sponsors whether the list of factors was to be considered as exhaustive or as an enumeration to which more factors would be added as need arose. He could not admit that the list was exhaustive; for instance, the so-called third case of self-government to which his delegation had frequently called attention and which a resolution (567 (VI)) of the sixth session of the General Assembly had said merited further study had found no place in the list.²

16. The Netherlands delegation's main point, however, was that to place a new and heavy responsibility on the General Assembly at the precise moment when a substantial measure of self-government was being granted to a territory would mean that the General Assembly would be given the right to intervene when there was the least reason for it, i.e., when an essential part of the objective of Chapter XI had been realized.

17. He had no objection to paragraph 2 of the operative part of the draft resolution, provided it was the administering Power in conjunction with the government of the territory, and not the General Assembly, which took the final decision on self-government. He reserved the position of his Government in that connexion.

18. His comments on paragraph 4 were similar to those he had made on the second paragraph of the preamble. Until the General Assembly had been able to define self-government, the paragraph appeared to be meaningless and therefore to serve no useful purpose. Since the General Assembly had been unable to define clearly the concept of self-government, it should obviously be left to the administering Power, in conjunction with the government of the territory, to judge the situation and to make its decisions as to when the stage of a full measure of self-government had been reached.

19. He asked the sponsors what was the meaning of the last clause of paragraph 5. He wondered whether the "other questions" referred to territories which fell within the scope of Chapter XI but on which no reports had hitherto been transmitted, or to the obligations of a more general nature to which allusion had frequently been made by the Belgian and other representatives.

20. He would be compelled to vote against the draft resolution as it stood. He considered the amendment to the joint draft resolution submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1) to be a marked improvement and to strike a happy medium between the divergent views expressed during the debate.

21. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) said that it had been suggested that an attempt was being made to impose new obligations on the Administering Members in connexion with the question of factors. What was being sought in fact was to find a formula which would contribute to the solution of the problem.

22. The need to draw up a list of factors arose from the fact that in the past few years the number of Non-Self-Governing Territories had been diminishing at a speed which threatened to make Chapter XI obsolete. That reduction in number would have been welcome if it had been due to the granting of self-government to the territories in question, but that had not been the case. The reason in most cases had been the unilateral adoption by the administering Power concerned of the thesis of the divisibility of self-government, permitting self-government in the economic, social and educational fields, which would place the territories outside the scope of Article 73, without political self-government. Obviously the majority of the members of the Committee did not accept that thesis, because the Charter required self-government to be complete in all spheres and because there could not be self-government in those three spheres without political self-government, which was the most important.

23. It had also been argued that independence was not the objective of Chapter XI of the Charter. That contention was apparently based on the fact that Chapter XI did not contain the word "independence". Nevertheless, despite the efforts of the administering Powers at San Francisco to have the word omitted, the whole Chapter was instinct with the idea of independence.

24. When a people had to choose between two evils, they naturally chose the lesser, but that did not mean that their choice reflected their real aspirations. In order to ascertain the real wishes of a people, it was necessary to give them the alternative of real and complete independence or, as a second choice, annexation or incorporation in the metropolitan country. If they then chose the latter, it would be clear that the choice represented their real desires.

25. Another thesis which had been maintained and which his delegation could not accept was that it was for the administering Power alone to decide whether a territory was or was not self-governing. A contractual clause could not be subject to the unilateral decision of one of the parties, and Article 73 was a contractual clause.

26. The list of factors was undoubtedly open to improvement, but it did contain much that was useful. Objections had been raised to the inclusion of the geographical factor. His delegation attached great importance to that factor because it not only determined the relations between a Non-Self-Governing Territory and the metropolitan country, but it should also be viewed in the light of the security and overall interests of the region to which the territory belonged. During the last war the American States had been greatly concerned about the possible effect on the European colonies and possessions in America of military operations in Europe. That was why they had signed the Convention on the Provisional Administration of European Colonies and Possessions in the Americas, under which, in view of the difficult situation of the administering Powers, they had agreed to assume responsibility for the administration of any territory which might become a threat to the peace and security of America owing to enemy occupation of the metropolitan country, or for any other reason. That convention was still in force.

27. The representative of El Salvador had referred to another important point—the principle that no administering Power could unilaterally change the status of a territory which was the subject of a claim by another State until a settlement had been reached.

28. With reference to the document submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr. 1), he could not agree that a proposal to the effect that almost the entire text should be deleted and a new text substituted for it could be called an amendment, and he reserved the right to raise that issue when the vote was taken. He would be prepared to accept paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of the operative part as proposed in that document if they were to be additions to and not substitutions for the existing paragraphs. The word "temporarily" should be added to paragraphs 1 and 5 in connexion with the application of the list of factors and without prejudice to its further study.

29. Mr. FORSYTH (Australia) wished to make two points in reply to the Philippine representative's reference, at the 275th meeting, to Australia's stand at the San Francisco Conference. First, Australia had certainly accepted at that time, and still accepted, the principle of trusteeship—that promoting the advancement of the dependent peoples was an obligation and a sacred trust. That general principle applied to all dependent territories, but the Charter had drawn a very clear distinction between Trust Territories and Non-Self-Governing Territories in respect of the methods and procedures to be followed in achieving the objectives. Secondly, the Australian proposals at San Francisco³ for supervision by an expert body and for a colonial conference to decide which territories should come within the scope of the Trusteeship System had been rejected; they were therefore irrelevant to the current discussion in the Fourth Committee. The Charter had been adopted in its existing form and Australia had loyally fulfilled its obligations thereunder.

30. In connexion with the words "Members which have or assume responsibility for the administration of territories whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government" in the first paragraph of the preamble to the joint draft resolution, he had noted the Belgian representative's suggestion that the obligation to transmit information had not been fulfilled by all the Members of the United Nations who had accepted it in signing the Charter.

31. He fully agreed with the Canadian representative's statement at the 273rd meeting concerning the second paragraph of the preamble: the obligation, under Article 73 e, to report on social, economic and educational matters might well expire before the attainment of full self-government. He also agreed with the United States representative that self-government was not indivisible and, in that connexion, he cited the example of the state of Victoria, in Australia, which had full sovereignty in certain fields, such as education, while such matters as defence and foreign affairs remained within the competence of the Federal Government.

32. In the nineteenth century, Australia and New Zealand, while not regarded as Non-Self-Governing Territories, had enjoyed self-government in all matters except defence and foreign policy; in due course they had attained self-government in those matters too. Western Samoa seemed to be following the same line of evolution. It was noticeable that some members of the Committee who were willing to take an evolutionary view of the United Nations, and particularly of Chapter XI, would not accept the possibility of evolutionary processes in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

33. The discussions in the Committee revealed a number of similar contradictions. Those supporting an evolutionary interpretation of the Charter stressed the need for being guided by the spirit rather than the letter. Nevertheless, when the Belgian representative, in the same spirit, suggested that the provisions of Article 73 e should be extended to all peoples who were not fully self-governing, they drew back and said that he was out of order.

34. Many difficulties would be avoided if the Committee adhered to the strict text of Chapter XI, which recognized three groups of rights: first, the rights of the dependent peoples; secondly, the rights and responsibilities of the Administering Members; and thirdly, the right of the United Nations to be informed of economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The refusal on the part of many members of the Committee to keep to the strict interpretation of those rights appeared to be based, first, on lack of confidence in the good faith of the administering Powers. Those delegations were not satisfied with the fact that the administering Powers had fulfilled their obligation to transmit information, but apparently wished to impose Fourth Committee control over the fulfilment of the objectives of Chapter XI. He emphatically rejected that attitude and recalled the United States representative's counsel in the Ad Hoc Political Committee on the advisability of avoiding actions which were likely to fail and of leaving the fulfilment of declared objectives to the conscience of the countries concerned and the force of world public opinion.

35. Secondly, some representatives seemed to feel that the United Nations was a world government and should assume the government of all the dependent territories. The United Nations, however, was not a world government; it was not authorized by the Charter to govern dependent territories and would not be capable of so doing. Any "imperialistic" attempt by the Fourth Committee to wrest control of the dependent territories from the administering Powers recognized by the Charter would result not in independence, but in government by the United Nations and in utter chaos. No large international committee was competent to assume the responsibilities which the majority of representatives apparently wished the Fourth Committee to assume. The peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, particularly those familiar with the discussions in the Fourth Committee, would certainly not envisage such a development with confidence and it would deprive them of the guidance and assistance regarded as essential by the Charter.

36. Thirdly, there was a tendency to say that all the dependent peoples should be given independence at once. The advocates of that line of thought seemed unaware that it was contradictory to their argument in favour of United Nations responsibility. Trusteeship had been mentioned as an alternative to independence, but it would be subject to that same defect of unwieldiness as direct international control, not to mention the fact that the Fourth Committee had frequently demonstrated its lack of confidence in the Trusteeship Council and the Trusteeship System. It was not correct to say that independence or trusteeship were the only alternatives, since, by recognizing, in Article 77, paragraph 1 c, that certain territories might be voluntarily placed under the Trusteeship System "by States responsible for their administration," the Charter explicitly recognized another form of administration, namely control by the administering Powers. There was, in fact, yet another alternative, free association in larger areas of self-government.

37. The third paragraph of the preamble of the draft resolution could be extended into a demand for complete information on political development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, although that was categorically excluded by Article 73 e. In that connexion, he recalled the Danish representative's statement at the 275th meeting that, although his Government would furnish information regarding any change of status in the territories for which Denmark was responsible, it did not consider that its actions in that respect were subject to review or revision by the United Nations.

38. The words "having examined" in the fourth paragraph of the preamble were not strictly true, since there had been scarcely any detailed discussion of the Ad Hoc Committee's report.

39. The present list of factors in his view could not be described as "a useful guide", as was suggested in the fifth paragraph of the preamble, since none of the essential terms had been defined. The words "for the General Assembly and for the Administering Member concerned" raised the whole question of competence, which should be debated in full and on a general basis before any decision was taken. If the General Assembly was competent to decide when information should cease to be transmitted, it was, logically, competent to decide when such information should begin to be transmitted and, to that end, to examine the constitutional and factual situation in every Member State. It would be premature to take any decision on competence at that juncture.

40. Paragraph 1 of the operative part also raised the question of competence and was unacceptable for that reason. Furthermore, Mr. Forsyth felt that he had already made it quite clear that in his opinion the existing list of factors would prove a very uncertain guide through the legal and political difficulties which the General Assembly would have to negotiate in deciding whether a territory had or had not attained a full measure of self-government.

41. He had no great objection to paragraph 2, although it seemed somewhat platitudinous.

42. He objected to the implication in paragraph 3 that the administering Powers might use the list of factors to prevent the evolution of the Non-Self-Governing Territories towards self-government. The administering Powers were bound by the obligations of Chapter XI and were working for its fulfilment. He wondered why the word "progressive" had been deleted (A/C.4/L.231/Corr.1) from the phrase "the progressive attainment of a full measure of self-government" in the original text of paragraph 3, when the idea of progressive development was expressed throughout Article 73.

43. His views on paragraph 4 were similar to those that he had already stated in connexion with the second paragraph of the preamble. It was entirely appropriate and in accordance with Article 73 that a stage of development might be reached at which it would be proper for the administering Power to cease reporting on matters for which the territorial government had assumed complete responsibility. That stage might be reached before the territory attained full self-government in all fields. The General Assembly should not at that stage request reports from the territorial government, conceivably against its wishes; such an action would be a complete denial of self-government.

44. Lastly, in connexion with paragraph 5, he had considerable doubts regarding the propriety of recommending that the General Assembly should adopt the list of factors as it stood.

45. The amendments submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru had much to recommend them. If they were acceptable to the majority, he might be able to support them, though he pointed out that the words "additional elements" raised some extremely complex questions not all of which were necessarily within the scope of the study envisaged.

46. In conclusion, he fully reserved his Government's position with regard to the six-Power draft resolution, should it be adopted.

47. Mr. RIVAS (Venezuela) said that the sponsors of the draft resolution had noted with pleasure the objective and constructive tone of the criticism directed against it by certain of the administering Powers and the other delegations which had expressed reservations in its regard. The various reservations and amendments that had been made seemed to call for some further explanation of the scope of the draft resolution.

48. The representative of the Dominican Republic had dwelt upon the need to define self-government. It was of course true that self-government, like aggression, needed a definition. However, both were extremely difficult to define in a constantly changing situation. The problem was political rather than academic and it would be unwise of the United Nations to engage in prolonged theoretical debate while the practical difficulty went unresolved. It was well-known that the threat in Asia and Africa was growing; the disappointment of the inhabitants of certain Non-Self-Governing Territories might well be used as a weapon against the Western Powers. The security of the West was a matter of concern to Venezuela, which would prefer that the military forces of those Powers did not waste their energies on police duties. Chapter XI of the Charter was intended precisely to prevent the Non-Self-Governing Territories from becoming a threat to international peace and security. The faith of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the United Nations must be maintained and strengthened, and all Venezuela desired in that connexion was that the Non-Self-Governing Territories should not lose confidence in their administrators.

49. The peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories needed an assurance that the United Nations could not accept, as self-governing, territories which were not so in all fields—economic, social, educational and political. The representatives of Peru and the Dominican Republic believed that that was impossible without a scientific definition of self-government. However, aggression had not yet been officially defined by the United Nations and yet in June 1950 and January 1951 the acts committed by the authorities of North Korea and the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China had been officially dubbed aggression. The United Nations had not been able to wait for a scientifically perfect definition of aggression. The position in the colonies was not, of course, as serious as in Korea. However, it was significant that matters which in normal times would have been discussed in the Fourth Committee had now passed to the First Committee. The Fourth Committee dealt with political matters which did not yet constitute emergencies. All General Assembly committees were political in their structure and in their aims, but what differentiated the First Committee from the rest was the degree of urgency of the problems entrusted to it. The task of the First Committee was to deal with crises, while that of the rest was to prevent them from arising. That was the aim of the joint six-Power draft resolution.

50. The Israel representative had objected that the conclusion in paragraph 4 of the operative part of the draft resolution was premature. However, the actions taken by the administering Powers on the basis of a unilateral and restricted interpretation of the concept of "a full measure of self-government" as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter was much more premature. It would have been wise for them to wait until a series of factors had been agreed upon, or a satisfactory interpretation of the phrase evolved.

51. The conclusions in paragraph 4 of the draft resolution were not exclusive to its six sponsors. The Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter had agreed at its 1951 session that there were only three systems whereby a Non-Self-Governing Territory could attain a full measure of self-government. Sub-Committee 9 set up by the Fourth Committee during the sixth session of the General Assembly had reached the same conclusion, and the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors had put forward those same three systems—independence, other separate systems of self-government and the free association of a territory with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country—as points on which the administering and non-administering Powers were agreed. The only advance made since 1951 had been on minor points of detail. That did not mean that the Venezuelan delegation opposed continued study as recommended in the joint amendment of Peru and the Dominican Republic, but the settlement of concrete problems must not be allowed to wait upon the conclusions of abstract argument. A committee might well be appointed to make a scientific and political study of the problem of self-government. The Ad Hoc Committee on Factors might be prolonged in order to study the scope of the factors relating to geographical and racial considerations or the factors relating to voluntary limitations of sovereignty. At the same time, however, the United Nations must act.

52. The Venezuelan delegation could not understand the doubts of the delegations of Israel, Peru and the Dominican Republic regarding the power of the General Assembly to establish a criterion. The Israel representative had said that such a criterion would be useless unless it was accepted by the administering Powers. However, the case was different from the dispute over extending the life of the Committee on Information. That had been a question of machinery in which the participation of the administering Powers was essential. The draft resolution on factors, on the other hand, was a functional expression of United Nations opinion. The General Assembly expressed its opinion through the affirmative vote of two-thirds of its Members present and voting. The opinion on the commission of aggression by North Korea and the People's Republic of China had not been unanimous, yet it was, legally and politically, the opinion of the United Nations on events in Korea.

53. The expression of the General Assembly's views on the question of factors would not open new fields for Chapter XI of the Charter. The administering Powers were not being asked to undertake more than they had agreed to at the outset. The aim was that the administering Powers should reflect and halt the negative course which they had adopted. By approving the resolution, the General Assembly would merely say that, in its opinion, economic, social and educational self-government in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was not enough to release the administering Powers from the obligations they had contracted under Chapter XI. A clear expression of that view would show the administering Powers that the United Nations did not accept semi-self-government as exempting them from their obligations under Chapter XI, and would always leave the international validity of their decision to suspend information open to question. It was unlikely that States such as the administering Powers, which believed in international law and promoted its development, would wish to oppose the views of the entire international community.

54. Moreover, if the United Nations were denied the right to examine decisions to cease the transmission of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories, that would be tantamount to allowing only one of the parties to an agreement to interpret it. United Nations examination of the problem did not mean that it was claiming the right to review national legislation. It could not advise the people of a Non-Self-Governing Territory that they were not bound by certain metropolitan laws because in the eyes of the United Nations those laws were not just. That would be a flagrant violation of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter. However, when such laws or administrative provisions entered the international sphere, as in the case of the recognition of the attainment of self-government, then the United Nations was entitled to study the documents on which the request for such recognition was based. That was the sense in which the last paragraph of the preamble of the draft resolution and paragraph 1 of its operative part should be read and interpreted. The Venezuelan delegation could not accept the amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru which sought to delete that point from paragraph 1 of the operative part.

55. The United States representative had suggested the possibility that Non-Self-Governing Territories which had been granted self-government in economic, social and educational matters might not wish the administering Powers to submit information on those matters to the United Nations. Paragraph 2 of the operative part of the draft resolution, which recognized that each case should be considered and decided in the light of its own circumstances, would deal with any such situation. Moreover, a progressive administering Power might use such a refusal by a Non-Self-Governing Territory to transmit information through it as an occasion for seeking direct representation of such a territory in the Committee on Information.

56. Paragraph 3 of the operative part made it clear that neither the list of factors nor the resolution should be regarded as criticizing any advances in self-government or imposing conditions on the Non-Self-Governing Territories. On the contrary, it was the administering Powers which must fulfil those conditions if they wished the international community to recognize that their work was finished and that a dependent territory had become fully self-governing.

57. The draft resolution approved the list of factors as a guide and not as an exhaustive list of requirements. The list was not complete, and some of the factors which were included would not apply in every situation. If the word "Approves" gave rise to doubts, it might be replaced by the phrase "Notes with interest" as proposed by Peru and the Dominican Republic in their amendment.

58. The Indonesian representative had objected to the last phrase of paragraph 5 of the operative part: "or in relation to other questions that may arise concerning the existence of an obligation to transmit information under this article". The phrase was somewhat vague, and the Venezuelan delegation would not oppose the Indonesian suggestion that it should be deleted. The deletion might also give satisfaction to the Australian delegation.

59. The USSR delegation wished to make an addition to the third paragraph of the preamble (A/C.4/L.233). However, one of the chief aims of the sponsors of the draft resolution had been to guard against any appearance of exercising pressure on the administering Powers, and since the USSR amendment introduced a time-limit and required information about constitutions, legislative acts and executive orders, the Venezuelan delegation felt that it would be unwise to add it to the six-Power draft. If the Soviet Union delegation insisted on a vote on its amendment, the Venezuelan delegation would be compelled to abstain. Similar reasons would compel it to abstain from voting on the Polish amendment to paragraph 2 of the operative part (A/C.4/L.235).

60. The draft resolution was not directed against the administering Powers but against the growing danger that the natural impatience of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to administer their own affairs might be turned into a threat to international peace and security. Such administering Powers as Denmark, the United States, France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom had not, in reserving their positions, assumed any intention to discredit them on the part of the sponsors of the draft resolution. That was at least a beginning at understanding. The Venezuelan delegation was sure that countries which were fundamentally friendly and allied on the world political front could differ in their views and yet continue to co-operate. It was the honest belief of the six sponsoring Powers, and more than thirty-five countries represented in the Fourth Committee, that no matter how praiseworthy the intentions of the administering Powers in so doing, the cessation of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories which had not yet attained political self-government would not promote the security of those territories, nor that of the administering Power concerned or of the rest of the world.

61. Mr. LESCURE (Argentina) congratulated the Ad Hoc Committee on its work and its very useful report. He associated himself with the statements of the representatives of Venezuela, Cuba, Egypt and India, among others.

62. He interpreted paragraph A, 4, in the first part of the list of factors to refer exclusively to the freedom of a territory to participate in its own national defence and not to refer to the retention of military bases, which might imply a diminution of sovereignty.

63. He agreed with the Ad Hoc Committee's statement, in paragraph 5 (C) of its report, that no enumeration of factors could do more than serve as a guide and that each specific case must be determined by the particular circumstances of that case.

64. Some representatives had suggested that the term "self-government" should be defined before trying to determine its constituent elements. Quite apart from the fact that such a procedure seemed the reverse of logical, any definition of that type was extremely dangerous by its very nature. A rigid definition could not possibly cover every conceivable case and might therefore give rise to serious complications. Indeed, the only point on which there seemed to be unanimity in the Committee was that the list of factors could serve only as a guide and should not be considered exhaustive.

65. The texts of Article 73 b and Article 76 b of the Charter had been compared. In his opinion the difference between the phrases "to develop self-government" and "to promote . . . their progressive development towards self-government or independence" was due solely to the fact that Chapter XI referred to Non-Self-Governing Territories, whereas Article 76 was in Chapter XII, which referred to the International Trusteeship System. The inclusion of the word "independence" in Article 76 b did not imply that the authors of the Charter had wished to make any substantive difference between the two categories of territories; if anything, it tended to broaden the scope of the Charter in respect of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The problem had been extensively discussed at San Francisco, where there had been general agreement that self-government was the ultimate goal. Some representatives had wished to include independence as an alternative objective in Chapter XI of the Charter, but that idea had been rejected on the formal understanding that self-government in no way excluded the possibility of independence.

66. The final objective of self-government had been reaffirmed in the inter-American system on numerous occasions. Resolution XXXIII on colonies and occupied territories in America, adopted at the Ninth International Conference of American States, stated that the historical process of the emancipation of America would not be completed so long as there existed on the American continent peoples and regions subject to a colonial régime, or territories occupied by non-American countries.⁴ That concept could be extended to all parts of the world inhabited by indigenous peoples who still required the protection of the United Nations in their struggle towards self-government. The Argentine Government wished to emphasize that no metropolitan government was entitled to change the political status of a Non-Self-Governing Territory which was the subject of dispute with another State.

67. He urged the representatives of the Dominican Republic and Peru to agree that their amendments should be accepted as an addition to, rather than a substitution for, the relevant paragraphs of the joint draft resolution. It would be useful to continue the study of the question of factors.

68. In conclusion, he announced that his delegation's vote would be determined by the considerations he had just outlined, and he reserved his delegation's right to explain its vote if necessary.

69. Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that the Cuban delegation had great difficulty in understanding the objection that by adopting the draft resolution before the Committee, the General Assembly would be conflicting with the domestic legislation of sovereign States. The sponsors of the draft resolution had been particularly careful to see that there was nothing in the proposal contrary or foreign to the letter and spirit of the Charter. The Charter could not conflict with domestic law because it had itself been ratified by national parliaments, which had contracted definite obligations to the international community by their acceptance of it. There could be no unilateral termination of an obligation of the kind assumed by the administering Powers in Chapter XI of the Charter, and it was clear that there must be agreement on the cessation of information from the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

70. Cuba had argued on several occasions that Article 73 e of the Charter was a contract between the administering Powers and the United Nations. In support of that thesis, he quoted a passage from a speech made by the Uruguayan representative at the 216th meeting of the Fourth Committee, stating that the General Assembly must represent the United Nations and that it was inadmissible that one of the parties involved should decide unilaterally whether or not a territory had attained independence or self-government. Mr. Perez Cisneros had said that it was for the United Nations also to examine the whole situation in each territory and decide whether or not its people had attained a full measure of self-government. A number of factors had been indicated which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory was or was not self-governing, but it should also be decided what organ would take the decision on behalf of the United Nations in each case. He had been convinced that that organ could only be the General Assembly. It was inadmissible that one of the parties concerned should unilaterally decide whether or not a given territory had attained complete self-government.

71. The Cuban delegation also had some difficulty in understanding why opponents of the draft resolution claimed that the General Assembly's role should be limited to defining complete self-government, when they realized and agreed that no single factor or combination of factors could be applicable in every case. Paragraph 2 of the operative part of the draft made it clear that each case must be considered in the light of its particular circumstances. As each case was to be decided on its own merits, there should be no difficulty in approving the list of factors as a guide.

72. In connexion with the Cuban thesis regarding the indivisibility of self-government, the Israel representative had said that the administering Powers were unanimous in rejecting it. However, that argument had first been used by an administering Power, and the Netherlands representative had just confirmed what his delegation had said on that topic at the sixth session. At the 242nd meeting of the Fourth Committee, the Netherlands representative had said that he did not believe that economic self-government was possible without political self-government; self-government was one and indivisible.

73. The various elements of self-government were inextricably interconnected, as was proved by the fact that one great State had struggled for its independence on the maxim "No taxation without representation". That showed how closely related economic conditions were to political structure. Self-government was not the average of a number of factors but a total factor with a political basis; a full measure of self-government meant self-government in all fields at the same time.

74. In connexion with the Australian representative's reference to state self-government under a system of federation, he pointed out that in such cases federal intervention in certain matters was defined constitutionally and the constitution of a federal government was a law that had been approved by the component parts of the federation on an equal footing. Subsequently, all the states of the federation were represented in the federal government, and therefore any intervention by the federal government could not really be considered as intervention from outside which had not been freely accepted beforehand.

75. Several representatives had taken exception to the Cuban statement that the question was political rather than legal. It was true that the problem of defining factors was a legal problem that must be approached in a legal spirit. But that was not the real problem which had to be solved. The real problem was that of the cessation of information on definite territories. To judge whether or not they had reached self-government—which was a political status—could only be a political problem. As proof that the application of factors did not always produce clear results, Mr. Perez Cisneros said that, in the course of history, there had been cases of countries considered as completely sovereign, and therefore granted membership in the international community, which nevertheless by their very constitution might have suffered from a certain type of external intervention, at least in certain cases and for a certain time. But the political factor of their sovereignty having been recognized by the international community remained.

76. The CHAIRMAN suggested that in view of the lateness of the hour Mr. Perez Cisneros might prefer to postpone the remainder of his remarks if the Committee were to agree to hold another meeting that afternoon.

The Committee decided by 20 votes to 12 to hold its 277th meeting that afternoon at 3 p.m.

77. Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) agreed to continue his remarks at the afternoon meeting.

The meeting rose at 1.10 p.m.

1. Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), resuming the statement he had started at the 276th meeting, said that if the term "a full measure of self-government" was to be defined without taking into consideration either the political circumstances that might surround each case or the intentions of the signatories of the Charter, it could only be regarded as the equivalent of the term "independence". The non-administering Powers had not adopted an intransigent attitude on the matter, for they realized that any attempt to give the term too exclusive a meaning would lead to great difficulties. On the contrary, they were endeavouring to keep the practical aspect of the question in view. In its report (A/2178), the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors, supported by those of its members who were not representatives of administering Powers, had proposed various elements as a basis for interpreting the term "a full measure of self-government" to mean either independence, or other separate systems of self-government, or the free association of the territory with the metropolitan or other country.

2. The solution of the problem before the United Nations lay in the answers to the following two questions: when was an administering Power released from the obligation it had assumed under Article 73 e as regards a particular territory, and when was it no longer necessary for the United Nations to receive information under that paragraph concerning a territory upon which it had been receiving information? The answers depended upon two factors, one of which was academic—the interpretation to be given to the term "self-government"—and the other, practical—the need for the United Nations and the administering Powers to decide by mutual agreement that information need no longer be provided concerning a given territory since that territory had attained self-government.

3. The academic factor could not be defined absolutely and it was clear from paragraph 5 of the introduction to the annex of resolution 567 (VI) that the General Assembly had recognized that fact. It was very difficult to lay down a rule whose application would prove automatically whether a territory had or had not attained self-government. Although it would be useful for the United Nations to formulate guiding principles for that purpose, such principles alone would not suffice to settle the question with regard to a specific territory, for the development of Non-Self-Governing Territories proceeded in such a great variety of ways.

4. It was clear that the Cuban delegation would like to see a progressive decrease in the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories, but it considered it imperative that the General Assembly should consider in each case that the reasons for such action were adequate. He was confident that when specific cases arose, the majority of the General Assembly and the administering Powers could find no difficulty in coming to an agreement. It was in that spirit that paragraph 3 of the operative part of the joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1) had been drafted. Everyone was aware that there were very few territories, and indeed very few sovereign States, whose real status would be in keeping with all the factors listed. Hence, the administering Powers should not consider that all the factors must be applicable to the territories concerned, as in that case they would never consider that such territories had attained self-government.

5. Replying to the Netherlands representative, who had pointed out that the first paragraph of the preamble of the draft resolution referred to Article 73 e only while the second paragraph referred to Chapter XI, he said that the limitations mentioned in Article 73 e were satisfactory as long as the information requested continued to be transmitted, but that in order to warrant the cessation of the transmission of such information the territory must no longer be non-self-governing but must be self-governing. It would then be necessary to consider whether all the objectives of Chapter XI, including the political objectives, had been attained. Clearly, Article 73 e could not contradict a Chapter of the Charter of which it was a part, and the various parts of the Charter must be interpreted in the light of the whole text. The term "self-government" should therefore be avoided since it might lead to misunderstanding. The words of the Charter, "a full measure of self-government", should be used. Many famous writers, for example Professor Georges Scelle, had compared the term "self-government" with "colonial status", and in referring to colonies which were and would remain colonies in the classical meaning of that term, had said that they might have a "decentralized status or one of self-government".¹ That was surely not the meaning of "self-government" as used in the Charter.

6. With regard to the joint amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1), he wondered whether the representatives of those two countries would agree that the new paragraphs they proposed should be added to the draft resolution instead of replacing certain paragraphs. It would be better to present a single text.

7. Replying to the Australian representative who had observed that the word "progressive" was not used in paragraph 3 of the operative part of the joint draft resolution to qualify the expression "a full measure of self-government", he pointed out that the Charter sometimes used that word, but only in cases where Chapter XI still applied to territories. Those territories must have attained a full measure of self-government in order not to come under the provisions of that Chapter, as was envisaged in the draft resolution. It was therefore logical for the word "progressive" not to be used in the text.

8. The Cuban delegation hoped that the Committee would be able to reach an agreement that would not be the result of compromise, but a recognition in all good faith of the actual situation that had to be provided for. Such an agreement would be an important factor in the cause of peace.

9. Mr. WINIEWICZ (Poland) said that in his delegation's opinion the draft resolution, while not perfect, would prove quite useful in a number of ways. It reiterated the obligations the administering Powers had contracted, which were of great importance for the future of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, particularly the obligation under Article 73 e to transmit information until such time as the territories in question had attained self-government. The Polish delegation had already spoken on those lines (264th meeting) during the general debate on the renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. It considered that the draft resolution corresponded with its own attitude in that respect and it appreciated the spirit in which it had been submitted.

General Assembly resolution 222 (III), which stressed that it was essential that the United Nations should be informed of any change that might take place in the constitutional status of any Non-Self-Governing Territory, was duly taken into account in the preamble. Most of the delegations were convinced that such information must be made available so that it could be seen whether a territory was advancing towards independence or whether its development was being retarded in the interests of the administering Power.

10. The Polish delegation strongly supported the USSR amendment (A/C.4/L.233) to the third paragraph of the preamble of the draft resolution, which would make the original text clearer and more explicit. Moreover, the amendment would make it possible to obtain more explicit information concerning the constitutional bonds uniting a territory to the metropolitan country and to prevent the integration of the territory into the metropolitan country, a matter which had always been the subject of some concern to the Polish delegation; it would prevent the United Nations being presented with a fait accompli. As far as the list of factors was concerned—and he had made certain reservations on that subject (274th meeting)—he noted that the draft resolution regarded it simply as a guide for the use of the General Assembly and the administering Powers.

11. Paragraph 3 of the operative part of the draft resolution contained a most important provision, to the effect that the factors should in no way be interpreted as a hindrance to the attainment of a full measure of self-government by the Non-Self-Governing Territories. That provision corresponded to the point of view of the Polish delegation, which considered that the problem must be approached in a realistic manner.

12. He could not accept the joint amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru, for it would rob the draft resolution of elements which the Polish delegation considered very important.

13. The Polish delegation was submitting an amendment (A/C.4/L.235) to paragraph 2 of the operative part of the draft resolution, to the effect that the words "and taking into account the right of self-determination of peoples" would be added at the end of that paragraph. That right was expressed in Article 1, paragraph 2 of the Charter and it seemed only right to mention it in the draft resolution.

14. In conclusion, Mr. Winiewicz stated that his delegation was prepared, in principle, to vote in favour of the joint draft resolution.

15. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) felt that certain misunderstandings to which his statement of the 274th meeting had given rise should be cleared up. He did not consider that he had strayed from the subject under discussion in any way. He had confined himself to an analysis of the proposed factors, declaring that Belgium was willing to accept them en bloc, since they were all, to a greater or lesser degree, worthy of consideration. He had, however, drawn the Committee's attention—and he had every right to do so—to the consequences which the application of certain of the factors might have. The Charter did not speak of "peoples" but of "territories whose peoples..." What was it that made any given area a territory in the meaning of Article 73 e of the Charter? The factors referred to territories separated from the central government by natural geographical obstacles. He had quoted the example of peoples living in areas that were officially regarded as inaccessible to civilized people. Some members considered that before a territory could be said to be separated from the centre of government there must be a stretch of water between the two. He had put forward the case of an island. Why should he not have the right to speak of such specific cases?

16. One of the proposed factors was the political advancement of the inhabitants and their participation in the national life of the territory. He had been perfectly justified in citing the case of savage people who were recognized as such in official documents. All he had done had been to apply the proposed factors to practical cases and to draw attention to the inevitable consequences of certain criteria. If the Committee adopted those criteria, it would of necessity have to consider that any territories to which those criteria applied came under Article 73 e of the Charter.

17. Some representatives had claimed that he had brought the national territory of sovereign States into the question and that a point of order would therefore have been justified. Belgium was a sovereign State like all the other Member States. It had examined the question whether the terms of the Charter applied to the territories under its sovereignty; it had decided that they applied to the Belgian Congo, and it had not felt that to be an infringement of Belgian sovereignty or a slight to national dignity. It was simply asking that other sovereign States should similarly examine their own case. The Indonesian and Philippine representatives had admittedly declared that the records of the work done at San Francisco showed that Chapter XI of the Charter did not concern people living within the national frontiers, but he would point out that the idea was not enshrined in the Charter. The Indonesian representative had refuted the very thing he had been trying to prove when he had recalled that the Chairman of Committee II/4, upon being asked to decide the question, had refused to do so, declaring that it was too important a matter to be the subject of a ruling by the Chair.

18. Others had drawn attention to the word "metropolitan" used in Article 74 of the Charter in order to draw the conclusion that Chapter XI applied only to territories other than metropolitan territories. Now, what was to be understood by "metropolitan territory"? It was the governing territory as compared to the dependent territory, hence there could be no metropolitan territories when there were no colonial territories. Only eight members of the Fourth Committee had metropolitan territories; those were the administering Powers which, by supplying information under Article 73, recognized that their national territory consisted of a metropolitan territory and dependent territories. If there were any others, they had not fulfilled their obligations, for they had not supplied any information concerning their dependencies. Yet it was the very States which used those arguments to evade their obligations that accused the administering Powers of indulging in legal quibbles.

19. The attempt to deprive him of his right of free discussion was the more arbitrary and audacious in that it came from delegations which claimed that the General Assembly was competent to decide whether or not a territory was self-governing. Considering that a delegation had the right to ask that the question whether or not Surinam came under Article 73 of the Charter should be included in the agenda of the General Assembly, what right had any member to try to prevent the Belgian delegation from asking in its turn for a study of the question whether Ethiopian Somaliland was in the same position?

20. Some representatives had blamed him for speaking of territories placed under the sovereignty of their governments and had taken his words as accusations. He had not intended to attack or to accuse any one. He had simply said that, in the eyes of his Government, the proposed criteria appeared to be applicable to territories other than those concerning which the administering Powers transmitted information.

21. He was proud of being an old colonial official; he was aware of the derogatory meaning attached to the word, but he considered it an honour to have devoted his career to the sacred trust his country had accepted. Among the great colonial officials whose names should be mentioned were Lyautey, who had never thought of victory without thinking of the peace that would follow it; Lugard, father of Nigeria, and founder of what later became a nation; General Rondon, who had never agreed to a battle against the indigenous inhabitants. Mr. Ryckmans would never think of attacking General Rondon's achievement—the service for the protection of Indians in Brazil—from which he could still learn a great deal. He had already said how much colonial officials appreciated the Indian Government's efforts to redeem the disinherited castes. Like the administering Powers in Black Africa, it had to struggle against poverty, ignorance, the caste system and the age-old prejudices of the higher castes. In the desire to hasten the reform, it took measures which might be unpopular and accorded privileges to those who formerly had been the victims of the privileges of others. He did not pass judgment on those measures, but when the Prime Minister of India had proposed a policy of integrated autonomy to the Nagas, saying that isolationism would be disastrous in the modern world, his language had been almost the same as that of the French representative. Without wanting to criticize that policy, Mr. Ryckmans thought that he was entitled to say that, in the light of the factors worked out by the Ad Hoc Committee, the question of the self-government of the Nagas should be given serious consideration.

22. He had not reproached Liberia for being a former colony. He had simply said that the founders of Liberia had acquired rights to the Benin coast in the same way as the founders of Netherlands, Danish, United Kingdom or French settlements. The Negroes from America, in penetrating the hinterland, had used the same methods as the English or French in the neighbouring territories. He had not blamed the founders of Liberia for having a language, culture and religion different from that of the indigenous inhabitants of the country they occupied, but the difference was as great as that between the French and the indigenous inhabitants of the Gold Coast. Nor had he questioned Liberia's sovereignty over its entire territory—over the tribes in the interior and the civilized countries on the coast.

23. Indonesia had accused him of choosing his examples from among the small countries. He had given typical examples, and could have cited still others. The statement of the Belgian Government (A/AC.58/1) had indicated the regions inhabited by the Eskimos in Canada, the Indians in Canada and the United States, and the Negroes in South Africa as some of the territories which, in its view, should be studied. The Belgian delegation had never claimed that all those populations came under Article 73 e of the Charter. It had merely said that their position might well be examined and had listed the cases in which examination was most likely to give positive results.

24. The Indian representative had said that the Belgian delegation had made itself the most stubborn champion of the theory of exclusive domestic jurisdiction in colonial matters. Against that reactionary theory he had held up the increasingly liberal interpretation of the Charter, and had recalled the Swedish representative's words that while in principle the Non-Self-Governing Territories came under the jurisdiction of sovereign States, it should be recognized that the fate of those territories had to a certain extent become a matter of international concern.

25. The Belgian delegation noted that for a number of years the majority of the General Assembly, by a one-sided interpretation of the Charter, had been trying to extend the scope of the international protection granted by that instrument to certain populations, while at the same time denying, by an equally one-sided interpretation, many other populations of the protection which the former had been enjoying for a quarter of a century. The Indian representative had also said that the international community took an increasing interest in the fate of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The opposite was true, as the debates in the Fourth Committee had shown in a striking manner. When he had invited the representatives of States responsible for the administration of certain indigenous populations to consider whether those populations did not come within the purview of Chapter XI of the Charter, a number of them had protested on the grounds that he had encroached on the prerogatives of their sovereign governments.

26. From 1929 to 1934 the League of Nations had discussed at length the question of the treatment by a certain sovereign State of its indigenous inhabitants. No one at the time, not even the State concerned, had thought of questioning the right of the accuser or the right of the Council of the League of Nations to take action. That State was now a Member of the United Nations; it had not submitted information, and its representative was among those who had protested against the Belgian delegation's statements. In the circumstances, it was impossible to say that the international community was taking an increasing interest in Non-Self-Governing Territories or to accuse Belgium of being reactionary. Belgium deplored the fact that Chapter XI should express less concern than Article 23 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. That Article had been clear and had invited all Members to undertake to secure just treatment of all the populations of all territories. Belgium and seven other nations had recognized that Chapter XI related to the territories they administered. The other countries had taken advantage of the ambiguity of Article 73 e to evade responsibility, which they could not have done if Article 23 of the Covenant of the League of Nations were still in force. They had based themselves on a restrictive interpretation of Article 73. Those countries invoked the principle of national sovereignty for themselves and rejected it for others. Belgium accepted the principle of the overriding interests of the indigenous inhabitants if it was applied to all indigenous inhabitants; it could not accept discrimination. He had already cited the example of New Zealand which applied the principle to the indigenous inhabitants of its own national territory, in the Cook and Tokelau Islands, without considering its sovereignty thereby diminished. All that Belgium asked was that some other States should do likewise.

27. Mr. AMDE MIKAEL (Ethiopia), in reply to the Belgian representative, recalled that the Somali territories had been part of Ethiopia for many centuries. It was only at the end of the nineteenth century that those territories had been temporarily seized from Ethiopia by European imperialists. It was therefore impossible to compare those territories with the African colonies of the European countries.

28. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) said that if the amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru was to be combined with the joint draft resolution, the second paragraph of the preamble would have to be deleted, as it was already implied in the first paragraph; also, paragraph 5 of the operative part of the joint draft resolution would have to be modified so as to be brought into line with paragraph 1 of the operative part of the amendment. Paragraph 4 of the operative part of the joint draft resolution could not be retained as it contained a statement on the substance of the problem, which was incompatible with an invitation to continue the study of the factors. The paragraph might possibly be adopted as a separate proposal.

29. Mr. KHATTAK (Pakistan) thought that the list drawn up by the Ad Hoc Committee (A/2178) was a useful guide, it being understood that the case of each territory had to be examined in the light of its particular circumstances.

30. The Committee's debates had brought out two different conceptions of the Charter, one static and the other dynamic. According to the former, the Charter was a rigid document. According to the latter, it must develop with the changes in the international situation, and was a starting point rather than the ultimate goal. It was worth noting, however, that the administering Powers which took a rigid view in the Fourth Committee, became idealists in the Political Committee.

31. The administering Powers refused to recognize that the United Nations had any say on the future of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, which they regarded as a purely domestic matter. Pakistan felt, on the contrary, that the United Nations had an abiding interest in the welfare and future of Non-Self-Governing Territories. In order to ascertain whether a territory had reached full self-government, it was not sufficient to examine constitutional texts. The sincerity of the administering Powers' intentions must be established, and that was a question which could not be settled by any list of factors.

32. It was because the case of colonies administered by people of a totally different language, culture and religion was distinct from that of metropolitan regions that the authors of the Charter had devoted a separate chapter to the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The United Nations could release an administering Power from the obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e only after it became convinced that the territory in question was ready for membership of the United Nations, and admission to membership should precede cessation of reports to the United Nations.

33. He would vote in favour of the joint draft resolution.

34. Mr. LOPEZ VILLAMIL (Honduras) noted that Chapter XI of the Charter was part of positive international law and the administering Powers had assumed certain specific legal obligations under Article 73.

35. Some administering Powers seemed to forget the exact scope of Chapter XI, even as the representative of Belgium seemed to forget that his country had once been a Spanish colony. The sole purpose of his irrelevant references to matters concerning sovereign States was to divert the Committee's attention from the point at issue. True, there were, in some countries of Latin America, populations with a lower degree of civilization, but they lived on the territory of sovereign States and enjoyed equal rights with the other inhabitants of those countries. He recalled that in Latin America many persons were proud of having Indian blood in their veins, and racial discrimination was unknown there.

36. If the Committee were to adopt the point of view of the administering Powers, which claimed to be the sole judges of when they would cease to transmit information on a territory, it would be sanctioning colonialism. Even if the United Nations did not exist, the march of history and the enslaved peoples' struggle for liberation and independence could not be stopped.

37. It should be remembered that even after its liberation from the Spanish yoke, Central America had remained the object of the imperialist greed of some European Powers. Thus the United Kingdom had illegally seized the territory of Belize (British Honduras), which it still occupied.

38. He briefly reviewed the history of the Trusteeship System which had followed the mandates system of the League of Nations, and showed that Article 73 constituted a phenomenological rather than ontological norm and that sub-paragraph b of that Article imposed certain political obligations on the administering Powers.

39. The Honduras delegation would vote for the joint draft resolution, which it considered very moderate. The principle of the right of peoples to self-determination was of capital importance and it included also the right of independent peoples to dispose freely of their natural resources.

40. The text submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru was more in the nature of a separate draft resolution than an amendment. He was ready to agree to the deletion of the second paragraph of the preamble to the joint draft resolution, but saw no reason for changing paragraph 1 of the operative part. He would accept paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 proposed by the Dominican Republic and Peru as an addition to, but not as a substitution for, the joint draft resolution.

41. U THANT (Burma) said he had not been convinced by the Belgian representative's arguments, which had no bearing whatever on the question under discussion. He recognized that his country, like most others, was faced with minority problems. Nevertheless the overwhelming majority of Karens co-operated fully with the Burmese Government in its efforts to strengthen the recently won independence of Burma. The Belgian representative's remarks concerning an entirely independent country were totally irrelevant.

42. He accepted the amendment proposed by the Dominican Republic and Peru to the preamble to the joint draft resolution, but he could not agree to the proposed amendment to paragraph 1 of the operative part, as the list of factors drawn up by the Ad Hoc Committee would serve as a useful guide in determining whether a territory had become completely self-governing. It would in any case be impossible to compile a list including all the factors involved.

43. Burma could accept operative paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 as proposed by the Dominican Republic and Peru only if, instead of replacing the corresponding paragraphs of the joint draft resolution, they were added to the latter. In that case, the texts of paragraphs 1 and 4 of the operative part of the draft resolution should be brought into harmony with the paragraphs of the amendment.

44. Finally, Burma would vote for the USSR amendment, which would strengthen the original text; and for the Polish amendment, which was useful in that it drew attention to the principle of the right of peoples to self-determination.

45. Mr. AGUIRRE (Uruguay) paid a tribute to the generous sentiments which had prompted the authors of the joint draft resolution. While entirely sharing the point of view of the authors of the draft with regard to the objectives to be attained, the Uruguayan delegation considered, however, that the draft resolution went too far because it regarded as settled certain problems in respect of which there were fundamental divergencies of view.

46. Thus the second paragraph of the preamble mentioned the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter, though those objectives were variously interpreted not only by the parties concerned, but also by experts on international law. It would be unwise to interpret the provisions of Chapter XI in any particular way before the United Nations itself had reached a definite decision on the matter. If the work done was to be of any use, it must be based on a solid legal foundation.

47. Paragraph 4 of the operative part contained the same mistake, since it referred to a full measure of self-government, although that expression had not had any definite interpretation attached to it by the United Nations.

48. The delegation of Uruguay could therefore give its support to the joint draft resolution if the two paragraphs it had criticized were deleted. Furthermore, the amendments submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru should be incorporated in the joint draft.

49. Mr. ULLRICH (Czechoslovakia) said the administering Powers were attempting to attach to Article 73 of the Charter a meaning similar to that of Articles 22 and 23 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. In particular, they claimed that they themselves were alone competent to decide whether a territory had attained a full measure of self-government. Furthermore, they were putting that theory into practice, and, contrary to the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter, discontinuing the transmission of information in respect of certain territories.

50. The attitude of the administering Powers in claiming sole responsibility for the Non-Self-Governing Territories was contrary not only to international law but also to the provisions of the Charter itself. Chapter XI set forth principles and imposed obligations which had the force of law for all Members of the United Nations. It was therefore both the right and the duty of the non-administering Members to see that the provisions of Chapter XI were respected.

51. Chapter XI did not merely set forth the principles according to which the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be administered, and the objectives to be attained. Article 73 e also imposed upon the administering Powers definite obligations. Obviously, the rights and obligations under Chapter XI were binding only until a Non-Self-Governing Territory had attained a full measure of self-government. It followed that, sooner or later, the United Nations would have to decide whether a particular territory had attained a full measure of self-government. It was on that principle that General Assembly resolutions 222 (III) and 567 (VI) were based. It also followed that the decision as to whether a territory came under Article 73 of the Charter should be made not by the administering Powers alone but also by the other Members of the United Nations. Only the General Assembly was competent to say when the transmission of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories should begin and when it should end. The General Assembly could agree that the transmission of information should be discontinued only if it was convinced that the territory concerned had attained independence, in other words, if the population of the territory had complete control of the legislative, executive and judicial powers.

52. It was in the light of those considerations that it was necessary to consider the question of the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory was, or was not, a territory whose people had not yet attained a full measure of self-government. As at present drafted, however, the proposed criteria would allow the administering Powers to discontinue the transmission of information in respect of certain territories on the grounds that those territories had attained self-government in practice.

53. In spite of its omissions, the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors represented a step forward, but the Committee's work would be in vain if the General Assembly did not have the necessary data, particularly the information which the administering Powers were bound to transmit under General Assembly resolution 222 (III).

54. For the reasons it had just stated, the Czechoslovak delegation would vote for all draft resolutions and amendments which protested against the arbitrary discontinuance of the transmission of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories and were designed to promote the achievement of the objectives of the Charter.

55. Mr. ARAOZ (Bolivia) said he did not wish to repeat the arguments already advanced by a large number of delegations.

56. He expressed his satisfaction with the work done by the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors and emphasized that, when a decision had to be taken as to whether or not a territory had attained a full measure of self-government, a list of factors could, in the opinion of the Committee itself, be valuable only as a guide. Obviously, the principles could be finally established only in the light of experience. Quite properly, therefore, paragraph 2 of the operative part of the joint draft resolution recognized that each concrete case should be considered and decided in the light of the particular circumstances of that case. It was no use attempting to define immediately the expression "a full measure of self-government"; and it was better to take certain essential factors as a starting point, to acquire practical experience and then finally to prepare definitions based on the information thus gained.

57. He was also of the opinion that no distinction could be established between the attainment by a territory of a full measure of self-government or independence and the attainment by a territory of self-government in economic, social and educational matters. Some countries, such as Bolivia, had attained political independence before attaining self-government in economic matters.

58. The delegation of Bolivia supported the joint draft resolution as well as the amendments submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru. It considered, however, that instead of being substituted for certain parts of the joint draft, those amendments should be added to it.

59. Mr. CALERO RODRIGUES (Brazil) considered that the statements made by the Belgian representative at the 274th meeting and at the present meeting revealed a mistaken conception of the principal purpose of Article 73 of the Charter, and particularly of paragraph b of that Article. The Belgian representative had attempted to establish a parallel between the obligations of sovereign States towards the less-developed sections of their populations and the obligations of the colonial Powers towards the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Hence it would appear that the Belgian Government assumed no political obligation with regard to the future of the Belgian Congo. The Fourth Committee should take note of that negative attitude.

60. Furthermore, the representative of Belgium had spoken of General Rondon. Mr. Calero Rodrigues did not think, however, that General Rondon, an eminent Brazilian of Indian descent, would like to see himself compared with certain outstanding colonialists.

61. The Brazilian delegation was in favour of the joint draft resolution, which approached the problem correctly. While approving the list of factors, the draft resolution said it might serve as a guide but that each concrete case should be considered and decided with reference to the particular circumstances of that case.

As several speakers had said, no list of factors would ever be enough to solve the problem, although the Ad Hoc Committee has done some very useful work. The factors must not, therefore, be considered absolutely valid.

62. The delegation of Brazil shared the opinion expressed by the United Kingdom representative (274th meeting) with regard to the usefulness of paragraph 3 of the operative part of the joint draft; the factors were safeguards and must never become a hindrance to the attainment by the Non-Self-Governing Territories of a full measure of self-government. As the representative of China had said, however, the drafting of the paragraph could be improved.

63. Like other delegations, the Brazilian delegation was of the opinion that objections could hardly be raised to the second paragraph of the preamble and paragraph 4 of the operative part, which were mere truisms. Paragraph 4 of the operative part might even seem unnecessary, for economic self-government, educational self-government, social self-government were meaningless expressions; self-government could obviously mean only a people's right to manage its own affairs.

64. While recognizing that a Non-Self-Governing Territory might decide to associate itself with the State by which it had formerly been administered, the Brazilian delegation could not agree that administering Powers should be able to free themselves from their obligations under Article 73 e by the mere assertion that they had transferred to a non-self-governing people entire responsibility in economic, social and educational matters. The Charter made no provision for any kind of limited self-government.

65. He also shared the opinion expressed by the representative of Cuba with regard to the indivisibility of self-government. He could not accept the French representative's contention that there were territories which, while not entirely self-governing, were no longer non-self-governing. That idea had no legal basis. Under the provisions of Chapter XI, a full measure of self-government must be attained before the transmission of information provided for in Article 73 e of the Charter came to an end.

66. Mr. FOURIE (Union of South Africa) said that his delegation could not accept the second paragraph of the preamble or paragraph 4 of the operative part of the joint draft resolution because they referred ambiguously to Chapter XI.

67. There were two distinct aspects of Chapter XI of the Charter. On the one hand, it contained a unilateral declaration on the part of the administering Powers, which extended to political matters; on the other hand, it imposed certain obligations, which, however, were confined to the transmission of the information provided for in Article 73 e. For the purpose of Chapter XI, it would therefore be wrong to equate the idea of self-government of a people with that of the independence of a territory either as a separate international entity or in association with other entities, and consequently to suggest that self-government was not self-government within Article 73 e unless it involved independence.

68. He would like to recall that it was the administering Powers themselves who had unilaterally decided on which territories they would transmit information. It was therefore logical to conclude that they alone also had competence to decide whether any of those territories had attained self-government in the various branches of activity enumerated in Article 73 e.

69. The delegation of the Union of South Africa was of the opinion that it would at present be premature to approve the list of factors that had been prepared, as advocated in paragraph 1 of the operative part of the joint draft resolution. Furthermore, paragraph 5 of the operative part would have the effect of imposing on the administering Powers obligations which they had not assumed when they signed the Charter and of assigning to the General Assembly functions which, under the Charter, it did not possess.

70. Lastly, with regard to the amendments submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru, he supported the idea of further study. He was not sure, however, as to the meaning and scope of sub-paragraph 3 (b) of the operative part which the Dominican Republic and Peru proposed should be substituted for the operative part of the joint draft.

71. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) asked the Netherlands delegation, in connexion with the amendment (A/C.4/L.236) it had submitted, whether it would agree to incorporate the new paragraph 4 it proposed in paragraph 3 of the operative part as proposed by the Dominican Republic and Peru. The new paragraph 5 proposed by the Netherlands would come after the paragraph 4 proposed by the Dominican Republic and Peru.

72. Mr. RIEMENS (Netherlands) accepted the proposal of the representative of the Dominican Republic.

73. Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said he could not accept the proposals made by the delegations of the Dominican Republic and Peru, particularly with regard to the deletion of the second paragraph of the preamble and paragraph 4 of the operative part. The Cuban delegation would, however, vote for those proposals if they were added to the joint draft resolution.

74. Mr. LESCURE (Argentina) proposed the addition to the joint draft resolution of the paragraphs the Dominican Republic and Peru had proposed as a substitute text for the operative part of the draft. He would submit an amendment in writing to that effect.

The meeting rose at 6.20 p.m.

Chairman: Mr. Rodolfo MUNOZ (Argentina).

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2178, A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1, A/C.4/L.233, A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1, A/C.4/L.235, A/C.4/L.236, A/C.4/L.237, A/C.4/L.238, A/C.4/L.239) (continued)

1. Mr. COCK (Colombia) said that his country regarded the principle of self-determination as one of the most sacred rights. Each State was entitled to govern itself as it saw fit. It was a norm of international law that the will of the people was the only factor which should be taken into account. Nevertheless, certain territories were obviously not in a position to exercise their right of self-determination and had therefore been granted a special international status under Chapter XI of the Charter.

2. A number of brilliant arguments had been advanced for and against the list of factors contained in the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (A/2178). Any enumeration was, by its very nature, restrictive and, if the factors in the proposed list were regarded as exhaustive, paragraph 5 of the operative part of the joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1) would impose a binding obligation on the General Assembly. It would be a great mistake to exclude altogether the possibility of other additional factors and, indeed, such a step would seem to contradict the reservation in paragraph 2 of the draft resolution. A restrictive list could only lead to confusion under Article 73 e, particularly since it was clear from paragraph 4 of the draft resolution—which should be deleted—that the concept of self-government had not been defined precisely enough.

* Indicates the item number on the agenda of the General Assembly.

3. His delegation would be prepared to accept the proposed list of factors as a guide which would not impose binding obligations on the General Assembly. No formal resolution was necessary. He could see no objection, however, to noting the list of factors and undertaking a further study, although care should be taken not to make the list even more restrictive than it was. He would therefore vote in favour of the amendments submitted by the delegations of the Dominican Republic and Peru (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1) with the exception of the proposed new paragraph 2.

4. The Polish amendment (A/C.4/L.235) and the USSR amendment (A/C.4/L.233) did not substantially change the contents of the original draft resolution so his comments on it applied equally to them.

5. The Netherlands delegation was to be congratulated on its constructive amendment (A/C.4/L.236), but his delegation regretted that it did not feel that it would be opportune to vote in favour of that amendment. The unforeseen must always be borne in mind in international politics.

6. Nor would his delegation be able to vote for the amalgamated text of the original draft resolution and the amendments submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru suggested in the Argentine amendments (A/C.4/L.237 and A/C.4/L.238).

7. Mr. MIKAoui (Lebanon) said that his delegation's views had been clearly explained by the sponsors of the joint draft resolution. He would vote in favour of that draft resolution and the Argentine amendments, with the exception of the proposed deletion of the second paragraph of the preamble.

8. His delegation was prepared to vote in favour of the Polish amendment, because it had always upheld the principle of self-determination. It would also vote in favour of the USSR amendment, as a formula which had already been adopted by the United Nations. He was also speaking on behalf of the Iraqi delegation.

9. Mr. PONCE YEPEZ (Ecuador) proposed that the words "for the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter" (A/C.4/L.239) should be added at the end of sub-paragraph (c) of the new paragraph 3 of the operative part as proposed by the amendment of the Dominican Republic and Peru (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1, para. 4). He requested that that paragraph should be put to the vote in parts.

10. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) supported the request in regard to the vote on paragraph 3, but neither his delegation nor the Peruvian delegation could accept the Ecuadorean amendment to their amendment.

11. Both delegations however were prepared to accept the inclusion in their amendment of the two Netherlands sub-amendments.

12. The CHAIRMAN announced that he would put the joint draft resolution to the vote paragraph by paragraph and that the various amendments would be put to the vote in connexion with the paragraphs to which they applied.

13. He put to the vote the first paragraph of the preamble to the joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1).

14. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) requested a roll-call vote.

30. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) explained that he had voted against paragraph 3 because his delegation maintained its original proposal in the joint amendment (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1) to delete paragraphs 2, 3, 4 and 5 of the operative part of the draft resolution.

31. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 4 of the operative part of the joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1).

33. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) said that he had voted against paragraph 4 of the operative part for the same reason that he had voted against paragraph 3, and also because of his delegation's views regarding the need to define the term "self-government".

34. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 5 of the operative part of the joint draft resolution (A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1), with the insertion of the word "provisionally" as proposed by the Argentine delegation in document A/C.4/L.238 and accepted by the six Powers sponsoring the joint draft resolution.

37. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of the new paragraph 3 of the operative part proposed in the joint Dominican-Peruvian amendment (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1, para. 4), with the addition of the new paragraph 4 proposed by the Netherlands in document A/C.4/L.236, the combined text to read as follows:

"Invites the said Committee to take into account inter alia the list of factors (A/2178) prepared in 1952 by the Ad Hoc Committee set up under General Assembly resolution 567 (VI); the statements transmitted by governments in compliance with the aforementioned resolution; and, further, to take into account the following additional elements:"

That text was adopted by 33 votes to none, with 20 abstentions, and became the first part of paragraph 7 of the operative part of the draft resolution.

38. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote sub-paragraph 3 (a) of the operative part as proposed in the amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1, para. 4).

The sub-paragraph was adopted by 20 votes to 17, with 4 abstentions, and became sub-paragraph 7 (a) of the operative part of the draft resolution.

39. Mr. DJERDA (Yugoslavia) requested a roll-call vote on sub-paragraph 3 (b) of the operative part as proposed in the amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

The Netherlands, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Pakistan, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico.

The sub-paragraph was adopted by 39 votes to 4, with 12 abstentions and became sub-paragraph 7 (b) of the operative part of the draft resolution.

40. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Ecuadorean amendment (A/C.4/L.239) to sub-paragraph 3 (c) of the operative part as proposed in the amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1, para. 4).

The amendment was adopted by 14 votes to none, with 35 abstentions.

Sub-paragraph 3 (c) as amended, was adopted by 39 votes to 1, with 14 abstentions, and became sub-paragraph 7 (c) of the operative part of the draft resolution.

Paragraph 3 of the operative part as proposed in the amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1, para. 4) was adopted as a whole, as amended by 42 votes to none, with 12 abstentions, and became paragraph 7 of the operative part of the draft resolution.

Paragraph 5 of the operative part as proposed in the amendment submitted by the Netherlands (A/C.4/L.236) was adopted by 25 votes to none, with 27 abstentions, and became paragraph 8 of the operative part of the draft resolution.

41. Mr. KHALIDY (Iraq) suggested that the words "two weeks" in paragraph 4 of the operative part as proposed in the amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru (A/C.4/L.234 and Corr.1, para. 4) should be changed to "not later than four weeks" in order to give the ad hoc committee time to carry out the proposed study.

42. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) and Mr. SALAZAR (Peru) agreed to that proposal.

The paragraph, as amended, was adopted by 39 votes to none, with 13 abstentions, and became paragraph 9 of the operative part of the draft resolution.

43. Mr. GERIG (United States of America) suggested that before the vote was taken on the draft resolution as a whole the Secretary-General should be asked for an estimate of the expenditure involved.

44. Mr. FOURIE (Union of South Africa) pointed out that according to rule 152 of the rules of procedure an estimate was required before a resolution involving expenditure was adopted by the General Assembly in plenary session.

45. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) said that the French text of rule 152 made it quite clear that no committee could adopt a resolution involving expenditure without first having an estimate.

46. The CHAIRMAN thought that that point should have been raised at an earlier stage of the debate.

47. Mr. KHALIDY (Iraq) observed that in fact there were no financial implications. The only expenditure caused by the previous Ad Hoc Committee on Factors had been a small sum for printing, which was not usually taken into consideration by the General Assembly.

A vote was taken by roll-call on the draft resolution (A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1) as a whole, as amended.

Panama, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan.

Against: Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Colombia, Denmark, France, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand.

Abstaining: Peru, Uruguay, Canada, Dominican Republic, Greece, Israel, Nicaragua, Norway.

The draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 34 votes to 12, with 8 abstentions.

48. Mrs. SKOTTSBERG-AHMAN (Sweden) wished to explain her delegation's reasons for voting against the draft resolution.

49. That negative vote should not be construed as an objection in principle to the attempt to formulate a list of factors. The Swedish delegation had supported the decision to appoint the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors at the sixth session of the General Assembly, on the understanding, as expressly stated in the annex to the Assembly resolution, that the General Assembly could only indicate those factors. That was still more clearly stated in the report of the Ad Hoc Committee, which said that no enumeration of factors could do more than serve as a guide in determining whether a territory was or was not fully self-governing.

50. The draft resolution contained in document A/C.4/L.231 and Corr.1 recognized that principle in parts of the preamble, in operative paragraph 1 and in operative paragraph 2, but the Swedish delegation felt that it was contradicted in operative paragraph 4. If a territory was to be regarded as self-governing in economic, social and educational matters only when it had attained self-government in the political field also, no room was left for the consideration of particular circumstances in each case. Such a general declaration of principle went beyond the stated purpose of merely indicating guiding factors and in fact ran counter to it.

51. The Swedish delegation would have welcomed the joint amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru as a substitute for the original six-Power draft. It had not, however, been satisfied by the incorporation of parts of the amendment in the original draft and had therefore been unable to vote for the final text, especially in view of the fact that paragraph 4 had been retained.

52. Mr. PEON DEL VALLE (Mexico) had voted in favour of the proposal submitted by the Dominican Republic and Peru, though subject to the reservation that the committee's terms of reference should include the duty of reporting to the eighth session of the General Assembly. If that was not the intention, he would have to reserve his delegation's position in the plenary session.

53. Mr. GERIG (United States of America) had voted against the draft resolution for reasons similar to those expressed by the Swedish representative. The resolution appeared to postulate, first, the indivisibility of autonomy and, secondly, the General Assembly's competence to decide on the status attained by a territory, both disputed theories which the United States delegation was unable to accept. Such theories might have been made the subject of study by a committee such as that which had been set up.

54. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) said he had abstained from voting on the draft resolution as a whole for the reasons he had given during the general debate. The inclusion of certain points from the Dominican-Peruvian proposal had not enabled him to vote for the whole because the second paragraph of the preamble and paragraph 4 of the operative part had been retained.

55. Mr. NAJAR (Israel) had been unable to vote for the draft resolution as a whole because he felt that it treated as settled issues questions on which further consultation would have been advisable. He felt that the empirical nature of the Committee's work should be stressed and the door left open for a further endeavour to settle the questions of principle involved.

56. Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) raised the question of the list of countries to be chosen as members of the ad hoc committee.

57. The CHAIRMAN had assumed that the Committee would return to that question after the draft resolution had been before the General Assembly. There was, however, nothing to prevent representatives from making nominations before then if they wished to do so.

The meeting rose at 2.30 p.m.

I. CONSTITUTION OF THE Ad Hoc COMMITTEE

1. By resolution 648 (VII) adopted on 10 December 1952, the General Assembly appointed an Ad Hoc Committee of ten members comprising Australia, Belgium, Burma, Cuba, Guatemala, Iraq, Netherlands, United Kingdom, United States of America and Venezuela, in order to continue and carry out a more thorough study of the factors which will have to be taken into account in deciding whether a territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government. The Committee was invited to take into account the list of factors prepared in 1952 by the Ad Hoc Committee set up under General Assembly resolution 567 (VI) and the statements transmitted by governments in compliance with the aforementioned resolution. The Committee was also invited to take into account certain additional elements (see section 10 below).

2. By resolution 650 (VII) adopted on 20 December 1952, the Ad Hoc Committee was invited to examine carefully, in the light of resolution 648 (VII), the documents submitted by the Netherlands Government relating to the cessation of information in respect of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam.

3. The Ad Hoc Committee met at the Headquarters of the United Nations on 21 July 1953 and held eight meetings between that date and 30 July 1953.

II. OFFICERS

4. The officers of the Committee were the following:
Chairman: Mr. Awni Khalidy (Iraq)

Vice-Chairman and Rapporteur: Mr. Benjamin Gerig (United States of America)

¹ Items 33 and 34 (a) respectively of the provincial agenda of the eighth session (A/2416).

III. DEVELOPMENT OF THE STUDY OF FACTORS

5. By resolution 334 (IV) adopted on 2 December 1949, the General Assembly had invited the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories "to examine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government".

6. In 1951 the Committee on Information prepared a report which was submitted to the General Assembly at its sixth session.² At that session, the Fourth Committee appointed a sub-committee (Sub-Committee 9) to undertake a further examination of the question; on the report of that Sub-Committee it adopted a resolution which was approved by the General Assembly as resolution 567 (VI).

7. By resolution 567 (VI) the General Assembly decided to take as a basis the list of factors which had been drawn up at the sixth session and to appoint an ad hoc committee to carry out a further study of the factors taking into account the information available. This information included the views which the Members were invited to transmit by the resolution itself, and earlier information transmitted to the Secretary-General on the reasons which had led certain of the Administering Members to cease to transmit information on certain of the territories previously enumerated as Non-Self-Governing Territories.

8. The 1952 Ad Hoc Committee reported to the General Assembly at its seventh session.³ After the report had been examined by the Fourth Committee, the General Assembly adopted resolution 648 (VII) approving provisionally the list of factors as established in 1952 but appointing the present Ad Hoc Committee with the terms of reference set forth in paragraph 1 above.

9. The foregoing history shows the degree of attention which has been paid to the problem in recent years, and is an indication of the complexities involved. From the beginning, it was agreed that no list of factors could serve as more than a guide in determining whether any particular territory has attained a full measure of self-government. Moreover, as stated in resolution 648 (VII), each concrete case should be considered and decided in the light of the particular circumstances of that case. Taking these circumstances into consideration, it may be thought that, while a further refining and clarification of the list of factors would still be possible, a stage may have been reached in the studies of the subject which makes unnecessary any immediate action, since the present list is sufficient to serve as a guide in the sense indicated in resolution 648 (VII), permitting the full consideration of each concrete case.

10. The representative of Iraq suggested that the General Assembly should refer the list of factors and the question of the interpretation and development of those factors in the light of changing circumstances, to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories as one of its regular charges and responsibilities. This suggestion was supported by the representatives of Burma, Cuba, Guatemala and Venezuela. The representative of Belgium opposed the suggestion. He considered that even if the Committee on Information could be regarded as constitutionally justified, it had no competence in political matters since these matters were not covered by Article 73 e of the Charter.

IV. ADDITIONAL ELEMENTS RELATING TO SELF-GOVERNMENT AND SELF-DETERMINATION

11. By paragraph 7 of General Assembly resolution 648 (VII), the Ad Hoc Committee was invited "to take into account, inter alia, the list of factors prepared in 1952 by the Ad Hoc Committee set up under General Assembly resolution 567 (VI) and the statements transmitted by governments in compliance with the aforementioned resolution and, further, to take into account the following additional elements:

(a) The possibility of defining the concept of a full measure of self-government for the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter;

(b) The features guaranteeing the principle of the self-determination of peoples in relation to Chapter XI of the Charter;

(c) The manifestation of the freely expressed will of the peoples in relation to the determination of their national and international status for the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter."

In connexion with point (a), the Ad Hoc Committee agreed that it was not possible to find a satisfactory definition of the concept of a full measure of self-government for the purposes of Chapter XI of the Charter. Even if the concept of self-government could be satisfactorily defined, such a definition would be insufficient unless completed by the definition of "a full measure" of self-government within the framework of Chapter XI.

12. On the other hand, it was agreed that there were a number of features which were helpful in indicating whether a full measure of self-government had been achieved in any particular case. Many of these features were indicated in the list of factors. Others were suggested in the replies of the governments.

13. Thus, the absence of a satisfactory definition was not a serious disadvantage, since in the examination of any particular case the concept would emerge in its practical application to the facts of that case.

14. Points (b) and (c) were examined together, in view of their close inter-connexion.

15. In relation to these two points, the Ad Hoc Committee noted that, in virtue of General Assembly resolution 637 C (VII), a study of ways and means of ensuring international respect for the right of peoples to self-determination is being continued through the Economic and Social Council and the Commission on Human Rights. For its part, the Committee considered that among the features guaranteeing the principle of the self-determination of peoples in relation to Chapter XI of the Charter might be found the following:

A. The political advancement of the population sufficient to enable them to decide the future destiny of the territory by means of democratic processes.

B. The functioning of a representative system of government, with periodic elections in which the peoples fully participate, or other democratic processes by which the peoples can exercise their free will.

C. The enjoyment of individual rights, including:

(a) Freedom of the individual and his ability to participate and to have a voice in his government,

(b) Guarantee of basic rights, e.g., freedom of speech, Press, assembly, religion and the right to a fair trial,

(c) Universal adult suffrage, based on adequate educational opportunities,

(d) Freedom of the individual to join political parties and of all the parties to participate freely in the political life of the territory.

D. The absence of any pressure or coercion on the population so that they may be in a position freely to express their views as to the national or international status which they may desire (attainment of independence, attainment of other systems of self-government in continuing association, or free association as an integral part of the metropolitan or other country).

E. Assurance that the views of the population will be respected.

16. With reference to point E above, the representative of the United States of America said that, because the paragraph seemed to require a metropolitan or other State to give assurances in advance that effect would be given to the wishes of a territory which may adopt for statehood or for another form of integration, the United States delegation must completely reserve its position since the action to be taken would be a matter requiring the consent of both parties.

17. Reservations were also made by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom.

18. The representative of Australia said he would abstain on any proposal in this connexion because the question of self-determination had no direct relevance to Chapter XI of the Charter; the representative of Belgium agreed that the phase of development involved was outside the scope of Chapter XI and therefore outside the competence of the Committee.

19. The representative of the United Kingdom felt obliged to reserve the position of his delegation in relation to point E since he interpreted it as an assertion that whenever a people had declared its will its desires must be met. He indicated that any given Non-Self-Governing Territory might well be inhabited by several "peoples" whose freely expressed wishes might be in conflict, and recognition of their several wishes without qualification might simply lead to anarchy and chaos. There was always in such discussions the overwhelming difficulty that no acceptable definition of the word "people" had ever been reached in connexion with the principle of self-determination. His delegation had always regarded this principle as a useful guide to political action, in conjunction with other useful principles such as the need for cohesion and stability in the world, the need to provide for tolerable living standards and the need for the recognition of mutual interests in relations between peoples. While due respect should be accorded to the principle of self-determination, this principle could not be followed blindly with disregard to the equal validity of other principles.

20. The representative of the Netherlands associated himself with the reservations of the other representatives.

21. The representative of Guatemala proposed the addition of a new point F to the above list to read as follows: "Freedom of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories, which have freely limited their sovereignty in favour of the metropolitan or other country, to change their status by democratic processes". The representatives of Cuba, Iraq and Venezuela associated themselves with this text, the representative of Venezuela stating that the whole list should be regarded as an enumeration of features which should not be applied rigidly or inflexibly. A suggestion by the representative of the United States of America that this formulation could be improved by making it subject to existing agreements was not acceptable to the representative of Guatemala, who felt that this would nullify the entire concept.

22. The original text proposed by the representative of Guatemala being retained, reservations were expressed by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Burma, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

23. The representatives of Australia and the Netherlands considered the proposal unacceptable in its present form.

24. The representative of Belgium repeated that this point lay outside the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter and was beyond the competence of the Ad Hoc Committee.

25. The representative of Burma said that the final decision as to their future international status should be taken by the people themselves. Once the people, taking all factors and circumstances into consideration, freely elected association with the metropolitan or other country, then secession should be subject to the terms of any agreement entered into at that particular point. His position was based on the assumption that the decision of association had been arrived at freely, as expressed in the paragraph E which he had proposed.

26. The representative of the United Kingdom recorded the opposition of his delegation to point F since he considered that it related to situations arising in a territory after it had passed beyond the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter and was, therefore, outside the terms of reference of the Ad Hoc Committee. Furthermore, such a provision would encourage the unilateral repudiation of agreements, to which his delegation was opposed.

27. The representative of the United States of America agreed with certain of the above reservations and could not consider that an unqualified unilateral right of secession or the unilateral altering of agreements was a sound principle.

28. Finally the representative of Guatemala considered it essential to establish that no metropolitan government might change the political status of a Non-Self-Governing Territory which was the subject of claim or litigation on the part of another State until such claim or litigation had been duly settled.

29. The representative of the United Kingdom observed that he failed to see the relevance of this contention to the list of factors or to any item on the agenda of the Ad Hoc Committee. Any disputes as to sovereignty could be adjudicated by the appropriate international body. In the meantime, it was surely the duty of the de facto Administering Authority to promote to the utmost the realization of the objectives of Chapter XI, since in the event of a change of sovereignty the new sovereign would fall heir to all the obligations of the old one under this Chapter of the Charter.

V. EXAMINATION OF THE LIST OF FACTORS

30. The list of factors provisionally approved by the General Assembly in 1952 was considered by the Ad Hoc Committee and approved, subject to the following changes.

31. The 1952 list was divided into two parts, and the second part into two sections. The first part consisted of factors indicative of the attainment of independence. The second part consisted, first, of factors indicative of the attainment of other separate systems of self-government and, secondly, of factors indicative of the free association of a territory with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country. After various opinions had been expressed on other possible ways of dividing the list, it was agreed that no fundamental change was necessary, but it was suggested by the United Kingdom representative that the division should be into three separate parts concerning (I) Independence; (II) Self-government in continuing association under treaty or constitutional instruments with a metropolitan country; and (III) Self-government as a component part of a federal or unitary State.

32. The first part, concerning factors indicative of the attainment of independence, was approved without change.

33. The representative of the United Kingdom proposed that the title of the second part should read: "Factors indicative of other systems of self-government in continuing association with the metropolitan country." The representative of Guatemala made a reservation that cases might conceivably arise when the association would not be with the original metropolitan country. The representative of Venezuela proposed that the title should therefore be broadened by the addition of the words "or in other forms", which was accepted by the Committee.

34. Factor A.3 of the second part relates to the voluntary limitation of sovereignty. The representative of Guatemala pointed out that his Government and that of El Salvador had proposed the elimination of this factor. He expressed doubt whether any territory could voluntarily surrender any sovereignty that it did not possess. After other members had held that the factor might be of practical value in certain cases, a phrase was added, on the proposal of the representative of Venezuela, with an amendment proposed by the representative of Cuba, to read "degree of evidence that the attribute or attributes of sovereignty which are not exercised individually will be collectively exercised by the larger entity thus associated".

35. The representative of the Netherlands suggested the inclusion of an additional paragraph after factor B.1 in order to provide for the complimentary case of the obligations of the metropolitan country. After a brief discussion, the Committee agreed to add the following:

"Degree or extent to which the metropolitan country is bound, through constitutional provisions or legislative means, by the freely expressed wishes of the territory in negotiating, signing and ratifying international conventions which may influence conditions in the territory."

36. The representative of the Netherlands, who had requested the deletion of factor B.2—Eligibility for membership in the United Nations—from the second part, withdrew his proposal on the ground that the new title of the second part now made possible the retention of such a factor.

37. On the proposal of the United Kingdom representative, it was agreed that the title of the third part should read: "Factors indicative of the free association of a territory with the metropolitan or other country as an integral part of that country".

38. The representative of Guatemala felt that this title, like that of the second part, was too restrictive and implied the concept of continuous associations and did not, therefore, make provision for any other forms.

39. No change was made in the third part, on which the opinion was expressed that it had been carefully studied and was the most satisfactory of the three parts.

40. The Belgian representative made the following reservations concerning the question of factors:

(a) Chapter XI of the Charter appeared to apply to all "Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government". It was couched in general terms and provided no exceptions. The benefit of the international obligations assumed by States under Chapter XI was not therefore restricted to the peoples of colonies and protectorates.

(b) It was the prerogative of States, and of them alone, to decide with legal effect, each for itself, whether the territories for which they were responsible came, did not come, or no longer came, within the scope of Chapter XI. That was their right under international law and they had not ceded it to any organ of the United Nations. In particular, the General Assembly could not force any definition upon them. Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter was quite categorical: nothing contained in the Charter authorized the United Nations to intervene in matters which were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State. The Assembly would therefore be exceeding its powers if it passed judgment in any capacity or in any way on the status of a specific State or territory.

(c) The Assembly could, however, give its general opinion on the factors which might, in its opinion, serve as a guide to States. They were no more than opinions, however, and were not binding on States.

(d) If the factors drawn up by the General Assembly were considered fit to serve as a guide in determining whether a territory was self-governing, they were, conversely, fit to serve as a guide in determining whether a territory was not self-governing and was hence a subject for the guarantees of Chapter XI. No State which recognized those factors as valid for determining the status of other States could dispute their validity for determining its own status under Chapter XI.

(e) The Belgian delegation had taken no part in the efforts that had led to the study of factors and it was not satisfied with the results. Its attitude concerning the list of factors that had been drawn up was one of abstention. In spite of some vagueness and inaccuracy, however, the studies that had been made had brought to light sufficient evidence to show that there were many peoples in the world who were not yet self-governing and that there were, therefore, many States with obligations under Chapter XI. Henceforth, therefore, it would be useless to endeavour to impose the idea that the only States having obligations under Chapter XI were the eight Member States which had recognized those obligations and, in particular, the obligation to furnish information in accordance with Article 73 e.

VI. LIST OF FACTORS APPROVED BY THE Ad Hoc COMMITTEE

41. The following is the list of factors approved by the Ad Hoc Committee.

2. Opinion of the population. The opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.

3. Voluntary limitation of sovereignty. Degree to which the sovereignty of the territory is limited by its own free will when that territory has attained a separate system of self-government. Degree of evidence that the attribute or attributes of sovereignty which are not individually exercised will be collectively exercised by the larger entity thus associated.

B. International status

1. General international relations. Degree or extent to which the territory exercises the power to enter freely into direct relations of every kind with other governments and with international institutions and to negotiate, sign and ratify international instruments freely. 2. Eligibility for membership in the United Nations.

C. Internal self-government

1. Territorial government. Nature and measure of control or interference, if any, by the government of another State in respect of the internal government, for example, in respect of the following:

Legislature: The enactment of laws for the territory by an indigenous body whether fully elected by free and democratic processes or lawfully constituted in a manner receiving the free consent of the population;

Executive: The selection of members of the executive branch of the government by the competent authority in the territory receiving consent of the indigenous population, whether that authority is hereditary or elected, having regard also to the nature and measure

⁴For example, the following questions would be relevant:

(i) Has each adult inhabitant equal power (subject to special safeguards for minorities) to determine the character of the government of the territory? (ii) Is this power exercised freely, i.e., is there an absence of undue influence over and coercion of the voter and of the imposition of disabilities on particular political parties? Some tests which can be used in the application of this factor are as follows:

(a) The existence of effective measures to ensure the democratic expression of the will of the people;

(b) The existence of more than one political party in the territory;

(c) The existence of a secret ballot;

(d) The existence of legal prohibitions on the exercise of undemocratic practices in the course of elections;

(e) The existence for the individual elector of a choice between candidates of differing political parties;

(f) The absence of "martial law" and similar measures at election times.

(iii) Is each individual free to express his political opinions, to support or oppose any political party or cause, and to criticize the government of the day?

of control, if any, by an outside agency on that authority, whether directly or indirectly exercised in the constitution and conduct of the executive branch of the government;

Judiciary: The establishment of courts of law and the selection of judges.

2. Participation of the population. Effective participation of the population in the government of the territory: (a) Is there an adequate and appropriate electoral and representative system? (b) Is this electoral system conducted without direct or indirect interference from a foreign government?⁴

3. Economic, social and cultural jurisdiction. Degree of autonomy in respect of economic, social and cultural affairs, as illustrated by the degree of freedom from economic pressure as exercised, for example, by a foreign minority group which, by virtue of the help of a foreign Power, has acquired a privileged economic status prejudicial to the general economic interest of the people of the territory; and by the degree of freedom and lack of discrimination against the indigenous population of the territory in social legislation and social developments.

Third Part

FACTORS INDICATIVE OF THE FREE ASSOCIATION OF A TERRITORY WITH THE METROPOLITAN OR OTHER COUNTRY AS AN INTEGRAL PART OF THAT COUNTRY

A. General

1. Political advancement. Political advancement of the population sufficient to enable them to decide upon the future destiny of the territory with due knowledge.

2. Opinion of the population. The opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.

3. Geographical considerations. Extent to which the relations of the territory with the capital of the central government may be affected by circumstances arising out of their respective geographical positions, such as separation by land, sea or other natural obstacles.

4. Ethnic and cultural considerations. Extent to which the population are of different race, language or religion or have a distinct cultural heritage, interests or aspirations, distinguishing them from the peoples of the country with which they freely associate themselves.

5. Constitutional considerations. Association (a) by virtue of the constitution of the metropolitan country; or (b) by virtue of a treaty or bilateral agreement affecting the status of the territory, taking into account (i) whether the constitutional guarantees extend equally to the associated territory, (ii) whether there are powers in certain matters constitutionally reserved to the territory or to the central authority, and (iii) whether there is provision for the participation of the territory on a basis of equality in any changes in the constitutional system of the State.

B. Status

1. Legislative representation. Representation without discrimination in the central legislative organs on the same basis as other inhabitants and regions.

2. Citizenship. Citizenship without discrimination on the same basis as other inhabitants.

2. Local rights and status. In a unitary system equal rights and status for the inhabitants and local bodies of the territory as enjoyed by inhabitants and local bodies of other parts of the country; in a federal system an identical degree of self-government for the inhabitants and local bodies of all parts of the federation.

3. Local officials. Appointment or election of officials in the territory on the same basis as those in other parts of the country.

4. Internal legislation. Local self-government of the same scope and under the same conditions as enjoyed by other parts of the country.

VII. CESSATION OF THE TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION ON THE NETHERLANDS ANTILLES AND SURINAM

42. By resolution 650 (VII) of 20 December 1952, the General Assembly decided that the Ad Hoc Committee should examine carefully the documents submitted by the Netherlands Government relating to the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam in the light of the resolution on factors and should report to the General Assembly at its eighth session.

43. The principal document submitted by the Netherlands Government was in the form of a communication dated 31 August 1951, completed by a communication of 30 November 1951 (A/C.4/200). The document contained an explanatory note by the Netherlands Government and constitutional texts comprising articles of the Constitution of the Netherlands (1948), the Interim Order of Government for the Netherlands Antilles (1950) and the Constitution of the Netherlands Antilles (1950). The texts were transmitted in English and, in addition, the full Dutch texts of the legal regulations of both the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam were annexed.

44. When the Ad Hoc Committee met, a further communication was brought before it in the form of a letter to the Secretary-General dated 23 July 1953 from

⁵ For example, the following tests would be relevant:

- (a) The existence of effective measures to ensure the democratic expression of the will of the people;
- (b) The existence of more than one political party in the territory;
- (c) The existence of a secret ballot;
- (d) The existence of legal prohibitions on the exercise of undemocratic practices in the course of elections;
- (e) The existence for the individual elector of a choice between candidates of differing political parties;
- (f) The absence of "martial law" and similar measures at election times;
- (g) Freedom of each individual to express his political opinions, to support or oppose any political party or cause, and to criticize the government of the day.

the Permanent Representative of the Netherlands to the United Nations (A/AC.67/3).

45. In this last communication the Netherlands Government stated that according to Article 73 e, the obligation to transmit information was subject to such limitation as security or constitutional considerations might require. The Netherlands Government based its decision to discontinue the transmission of information in 1951 on this limitation. After the enactment of the Interim Orders of Government which accorded a new status to Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, there were constitutional objections to continuing the transmission of information. The Netherlands Government further expressed doubt whether the examination of the discontinuance of the transmission of information in the case of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam would be facilitated by applying the resolution on factors as a yardstick. According to the Netherlands Government, "the point is: has a territory attained such a measure of self-government that it is fully responsible for the three fields mentioned in Article 73 e, viz., the economic, social and educational conditions"?

46. The representative of the Netherlands presented this communication to the Committee, and said that the Netherlands Government was confronted with the impossibility of transmitting information by the fact that the Governments of the territories themselves had opposed such transmission. He invited the Committee, and the Committee agreed, to hear on the subject Mr. Pos and Mr. Debrot, General Representatives to the Netherlands Government in The Hague for Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles respectively, empowered by their respective Governments to act as members of the Netherlands delegation.

47. The representatives of Australia, Belgium, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, though not all for the same reasons, agreed with the Netherlands delegation that information on Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, hitherto supplied in accordance with Article 73 e, might now cease.

48. The representatives of Burma, Cuba, Guatemala and Iraq did not consider that the reasons advanced by the Netherlands delegation were sufficient to justify the cessation of information because they were not in conformity with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 648 (VII). The representative of Venezuela maintained that, although the Ad Hoc Committee was competent by virtue of its terms of reference to deal with the matter, nevertheless, for practical reasons, it would be better to refer the problem directly to the General Assembly.

49. The views expressed by representatives are given in the summary records of the sixth and seventh meetings of the Ad Hoc Committee (A/AC.67/SR.6 and 7), to which the attention of the General Assembly is drawn.

50. In view of the wide divergencies which prevailed in the Ad Hoc Committee, it was decided that this matter should be referred to the General Assembly without recommendation.

742 (VIII). Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government

The General Assembly,

Bearing in mind the principles embodied in the Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories and the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter,

Recalling the provisions of resolutions 567 (VI) and 648 (VII), adopted by the General Assembly on 18 January and 10 December 1952 respectively, indicating the value of establishing a list of factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a

Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government,

Having regard to the competence of the General Assembly to consider the principles that should guide the United Nations and the Member States in the implementation of obligations arising from Chapter XI of the Charter and to make recommendations in connexion with them,

Having examined the report ¹ of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) set up by resolution 648 (VII),

1. Takes note of the conclusions of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories);

2. Approves the list of factors as adopted by the Fourth Committee;

3. Recommends that the annexed list of factors should be used by the General Assembly and the Administering Members as a guide in determining whether any Territory, due to changes in its constitutional status, is or is no longer within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter, in order that, in view of the documentation provided under resolution 222 (III) of 3 November 1948, a decision may be taken by the General Assembly on the continuation or cessation of the transmission of information required by Chapter XI of the Charter;

4. Reasserts that each concrete case should be considered and decided upon in the light of the particular circumstances of that case and taking into account the right of self-determination of peoples;

5. Considers that the validity of any form of association between a Non-Self-Governing Territory and a metropolitan or any other country essentially depends on the freely expressed will of the people at the time of the taking of the decision;

6. Considers that the manner in which Territories referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter can become fully self-governing is primarily through the attainment of independence, although it is recognized that self-government can also be achieved by association with another State or group of States if this is done freely and on the basis of absolute equality;

7. Reaffirms that the factors, while serving as a guide in determining whether the obligations as set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter shall exist, should in no way be interpreted as a hindrance to the attainment of a full measure of self-government by a Non-Self-Governing Territory;

8. Further reaffirms that, for a Territory to be deemed self-governing in economic, social or educational affairs, it is essential that its people shall have attained a full measure of self-government;

9. Instructs the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to study any documentation transmitted hereafter under resolution 222 (III) in the light of the list of factors approved by the present resolution, and other relevant considerations which may arise from each concrete case of cessation of information;

10. Recommends that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories take the initiative of proposing modifications at any time to improve the list of factors, as may seem necessary in the light of circumstances.

459th plenary meeting,
27 November 1953.

1. Territorial government. Nature and measure of control or interference, if any, by the government of another State in respect of the internal government, for example, in respect of the following:

Legislature: The enactment of laws for the Territory by an indigenous body whether fully elected by free and democratic processes or lawfully constituted in a manner receiving the free consent of the population;

Executive: The selection of members of the executive branch of the government by the competent authority in the Territory receiving consent of the indigenous population, whether that authority is hereditary or elected, having regard also to the nature and measure of control, if any, by an outside agency on that authority, whether directly or indirectly exercised in the constitution and conduct of the executive branch of the government;

Judiciary: The establishment of courts of law and the selection of judges.

2. Participation of the population. Effective participation of the population in the government of the Territory: (a) Is there an adequate and appropriate electoral and representative system? (b) Is this electoral system conducted without direct or indirect interference from a foreign government?^a

3. Economic, social and cultural jurisdiction. Degree of autonomy in respect of economic, social and cultural affairs, as illustrated by the degree of freedom from economic pressure as exercised, for example, by a foreign minority group which, by virtue of the help of a foreign Power, has acquired a privileged economic status prejudicial to the general economic interest of the people of the Territory; and by the degree of freedom and lack of discrimination against the indigenous population of the Territory in social legislation and social developments.

Third part

A. General

1. Opinion of the population. The opinion of the population of the Territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.

2. Freedom of choice. The freedom of the population of a Non-Self-Governing Territory which has associated itself with the metropolitan country as an integral part of that country or in any other form to modify this status through the expression of their will by democratic means.

3. Geographical considerations. Extent to which the relations of the Territory with the capital of the central government may be affected by circumstances arising out of their respective geographical positions, such as separation by land, sea or other natural obstacles. The right of the metropolitan country or the Territory to change the political status of that Territory in the light of the consideration whether that Territory is or is not subject to any claim or litigation on the part of another State.

4. Ethnic and cultural considerations. Extent to which the population are of different race, language or religion or have a distinct cultural heritage, interests or aspirations, distinguishing them from the peoples of the country with which they freely associate themselves.

5. Political advancement. Political advancement of the population sufficient to enable them to decide upon the future destiny of the Territory with due knowledge.

6. Constitutional considerations. Association by virtue of a treaty or bilateral agreement affecting the status of the Territory, taking into account (i) whether the constitutional guarantees extend equally to the associated Territory, (ii) whether there are powers in certain matters constitutionally reserved to the Territory or to the central authority, and (iii) whether there is provision for the participation of the Territory on a basis of equality in any changes in the constitutional system of the State.

B. Status

1. Legislative representation. Representation without discrimination in the central legislative organs on the same basis as other inhabitants and regions.

2. Participation of the population. Effective participation of the population in the government of the Territory: (a) Is there an adequate and appropriate electoral and representative system? (b) Is this electoral system conducted without direct or indirect interference from a foreign government?^a

3. Citizenship. Citizenship without discrimination on the same basis as other inhabitants.

4. Government officials. Eligibility of officials from the Territory to all public offices of the central authority, by appointment or election, on the same basis as those from other parts of the country.

C. Internal constitutional conditions

1. Suffrage. Universal and equal suffrage, and free periodic elections, characterized by an absence of undue influence over and coercion of the voter or of the imposition of disabilities on particular political parties.^b

2. Local rights and status. In a unitary system equal rights and status for the inhabitants and local bodies of the Territory as enjoyed by inhabitants and local bodies of other parts of the country; in a federal system an identical degree of self-government for the inhabitants and local bodies of all parts of the federation.

3. Local officials. Appointment or election of officials in the Territory on the same basis as those in other parts of the country.

4. Internal legislation. Local self-government of the same scope and under the same conditions as enjoyed by other parts of the country.

5. Economic, social and cultural jurisdiction. Degree of autonomy in respect of economic, social and cultural affairs, as illustrated by the degree of freedom from economic pressure as exercised, for example, by a foreign minority group which, by virtue of the help of a foreign Power, has acquired a privileged economic status prejudicial to the general economic interest of the people of the Territory; and by the degree of freedom and lack of discrimination against the indigenous population of the Territory in social legislation and social developments.

^a For example, the following questions would be relevant:

(i) Has each adult inhabitant equal power (subject to special safeguards for minorities) to determine the character of the government of the Territory?

(ii) Is this power exercised freely, i.e., is there an absence of undue influence over and coercion of the voter and of the imposition of disabilities on particular political parties?

Some tests which can be used in the application of this factor are as follows:

(a) The existence of effective measures to ensure the democratic expression of the will of the people;

(b) The existence of more than one political party in the Territory;

(c) The existence of a secret ballot;

(d) The existence of legal prohibitions on the exercise of undemocratic practices in the course of elections;

(e) The existence for the individual elector of a choice between candidates of differing political parties;

(f) The absence of "martial law" and similar measures at election times;

(iii) Is each individual free to express his political opinions, to support or oppose any political party or cause, and to criticize the government of the day?

^b For example, the following tests would be relevant:

(a) The existence of effective measures to ensure the democratic expression of the will of the people;

(b) The existence of more than one political party in the Territory;

(c) The existence of a secret ballot;

(d) The existence of legal prohibitions on the exercise of undemocratic practices in the course of elections;

(e) The existence for the individual elector of a choice between candidates of differing political parties;

(f) The absence of "martial law" and similar measures at election times;

(g) Freedom of each individual to express his political opinions, to support or oppose any political party or cause, and to criticize the government of the day.

Report of the Fourth Committee (A/2556 and Corr.1):

(a) information on educational conditions;
(b) information on other conditions; (c) transmission of information; (d) participation of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories

[Agenda item 33]

Cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter: (a) Netherlands Antilles and Surinam; (b) Puerto Rico

[Agenda item 34]

1. Mr. RIFAI (Syria), Rapporteur of the Fourth Committee: On behalf of the Fourth Committee, I have the honour to present to the General Assembly the Committee's report [A/2556 and Corr.1] on items 32, 33 and 34 of the agenda of the General Assembly. The agenda items relate to information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government, and the examination of the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter in respect of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, and in respect of Puerto Rico.

2. The Fourth Committee spent thirty-seven meetings in examining these questions. I mention this figure as an indication both of the attention paid by the Fourth Committee to the problems before it and as a possible indication of the growing importance of these questions in the international community.

3. The SECRETARY-GENERAL: In draft resolution V, concerning the employment of international staff from Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories, it is stated that the Secretary-General has already taken note of the wishes expressed in the Fourth Committee. The draft resolution recommends that the Secretary-General consider the desirability of continuing and increasing the recruitment of suitably qualified inhabitants of the Territories in the United Nations Secretariat.

4. I should like to state on this occasion that the most satisfactory way of meeting the wishes expressed in the draft resolution would be, in the first instance, to provide arrangements for training courses and training service. The possibility of such arrangements will be studied and the results reported to the General Assembly for consideration in its Fifth Committee as the body competent in questions of personnel policy.

5. The PRESIDENT: Before putting to the vote the draft resolutions proposed by the Fourth Committee, I shall call on those members who desire to explain their votes. I believe the proceedings would be expedited if members were able to include in a single intervention the explanations of their votes which they desire to make on any of the draft resolutions now before the General Assembly.

6. Mr. ESPINOSA Y PRIETO (Mexico) (translated from Spanish): I would ask representatives to take a look at Article 18 of the Charter. My delegation is of the opinion, which it will support with documents, that the vote on any question connected with Chapter XI of the Charter, whatever its importance, requires at present only a simple majority, and that the two-thirds majority required for other important questions can not apply to that chapter so long as the Assembly has not created a new category to that end.

7. Among the draft resolutions which will come up for discussion today is one on the subject of factors, which some delegations seem to consider as requiring a two-thirds majority vote in view of the importance of the subject. I should like to say first of all that nothing which the Mexican delegation may say here should be interpreted as detracting in any way from the importance of the question. My delegation proceeds on the assumption that any matter with which the Assembly deals is important and worthy of respect. With regard to the draft resolution on factors, the importance attributed by my delegation to that question is shown by the fact that we were among the sponsors of the principal amendments to the draft.

8. We are only proposing to demonstrate here that under our present rules of procedure it is clear and beyond doubt that questions relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories, whatever the importance of the individual case under consideration, should be decided by a simple majority vote and not by a two-thirds majority. We are stating this view out of loyalty to the United Nations and in a spirit of disinterested co-operation, because it is clear that a uniform rule on the subject will be favourable to some of the draft resolutions we sponsor but not to others. Today we are making use of the same right which other delegations possess to express opinions contrary to ours. We shall expound what we believe and give the sound arguments that militate in our favour. It goes without saying that if the majority of the General Assembly expresses itself in favour of another principle, the Mexican delegation will, as always, respect its decision.

9. Article 18, paragraph 2, reads:

"Decisions of the General Assembly on important questions shall be made by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting . . ."

The reference here to "important questions" has aroused in many minds a doubt as to whether it applies generally, or merely to the categories which the article proceeds to enumerate and any further categories for the subsequent determination of which provision is made in the same clause. As this confusion is due merely to a drafting defect in the Charter, and as many find it difficult to believe that so solemn an instrument can contain any such glaring omission, it is logical that I should have recourse to the support of an authority who must obviously be uppermost in the minds of all who are in any way connected with the United Nations. Hans Kelsen, in his well-known work, The Law of the United Nations, pages 180 and 181, writes as follows:

"As to the voting procedure . . . the Charter distinguishes between 'important questions' and 'other questions'. . . . This is not a very fortunate terminology. If the General Assembly is dealing with a question at all, this question can hardly be considered as unimportant. The intention was to differentiate decisions which require a two-thirds majority and decisions which require only a simple majority. . . ."

It must not be thought that that distinguished writer is our only authority. After tracing the matter to its source, and to the real authority by which all Members of the United Nations should be guided—the records of the San Francisco Conference—we shall refer to other authorities on the same subject.

10. It is easy to imagine the confusion that the Charter would have caused had it spoken of "important questions" without any qualification, in cases where the Assembly had to consider questions which some delegations regarded as "important" and others as "less important". There would then have been no point in enumerating the questions to which the two-thirds majority rule applied, still less in leaving the door open for the determination of new categories of such questions. The confusion begins to disappear when we read in Article 18, paragraph 3, of the Charter that:

"Decisions on other questions, including the determination of additional categories of questions to be decided by a two-thirds majority, shall be made by a majority of the members present and voting."

Here, as you see, the term "important questions" is dropped in favour of the correct terminology, "questions to be decided by a two-thirds majority". It is this part of Article 18, the origins of which we propose to trace right back to the San Francisco Conference, which establishes beyond any possibility of doubt that the founders of the United Nations had in mind "categories of questions to be decided by a two-thirds majority", i.e. those which, by their importance, gave rise to prolonged and special discussion; that of the expulsion of Members is a case in point.

11. As an illustration of this, it may be observed, for example, that several of the questions enumerated in paragraph 2 of Article 18, such as recommendations with respect to the maintenance of peace and security, questions relating to the operation of the trusteeship system, and budgetary questions, cannot be regarded as being questions in themselves, but as categories or classes of questions, which include a multiple of different topics.

12. A first argument which will help to throw light on this point is the following. The Charter states in so many words that "questions relating to the operation of the trusteeship system" shall be decided by a two-thirds majority. Hitherto we have passed about fifty resolutions in this category, all of course by a two-thirds majority. As I have already stated, the Mexican delegation is not casting doubt on the importance of any of the questions we have under consideration. But no one here present can fail to wonder whether all these fifty resolutions relating to trusteeship can be regarded as important. That is to say, will anyone assert that any of them is more "important" than other resolutions, obviously of outstanding importance, which were adopted by a simple majority because they referred to questions not included in the categories appearing in Article 18? I will take at random resolution 651 (VII), under which the General Assembly, without mentioning a single reason, decided to postpone consideration of the question of South West Africa until the eighth session. All of you know very well that that resolution was adopted because the session was drawing to a close and there was no time to study the question. There was nothing else to be done. Let us take another example, also chosen at random, resolution 654 (VII), which again has no preamble and in which the General Assembly takes note of report of the Trusteeship Council and recommends that the Council, in its future deliberations, should take into account the comments and suggestions made in the course of the discussion of the Council's report at the Assembly's seventh session. The Mexican delegation does not underestimate the importance of either of those resolutions. But a good majority of those here present will agree that the two decisions I have mentioned, which were adopted by a two-thirds majority, were less important than many very weighty resolutions adopted by a simple majority.

13. Let us now look at the reverse side of the medal. Is there anyone here who would deny that a special session of the General Assembly can only be convoked to deal with a matter of particular importance? Yet a decision so serious, so costly and so important as that of convoking a special session of this august body is taken, not by a two-thirds majority, but by a simple majority, since Article 20 of the Charter, at which I would ask representatives to look, says so explicitly. The importance of the question is self-evident. And yet it is decided by a simple majority.

14. There is one very impressive example which we may consider in order to settle this point. We have been looking at Article 18 of the Charter. Who among us, considering the gravity of our debates on important questions, would feel moved to deny that the "determination of additional categories of questions to be decided by a two-thirds majority" is an especially difficult and serious question, and manifestly of outstanding importance? Consider it for yourselves: under Article 18, paragraph 3, this basic question, which many consider tantamount to a revision of the Charter, is decided by a simple majority of members present and voting, because the Charter says so. A question which gave rise to most complicated and animated debates at San Francisco on account of its obvious importance, and which in my own view is a far bigger matter than the list of factors, is decided by a simple majority. Yet that simple majority is insufficient to recommend that the flag of the United Nations should be hoisted over the Trust Territories. A simple majority is not entitled to express even its most trivial thought with regard to trusteeship questions or to the budget.

15. There can therefore be no doubt that until the General Assembly has determined additional categories, there is nothing in the Charter automatically authorizing decisions on other questions by a two-thirds majority. If, as some representatives will certainly wish to remind me, the Assembly has sometimes agreed to a two-thirds vote on questions to which that system of voting does not apply, the reason must be sought not in Article 18 but in Article 10 of the Charter, which authorizes the Assembly, generally speaking, to do as it likes.

16. The only fair and legal procedure to my mind, in cases such as that before us, is for the Assembly to determine whether or not the question to be decided comes within the categories already specified in Article 18. Goodrich and Hambro¹ refer in that connexion to a basic resolution concerning South Africa, which, after being discussed in its context and despite its manifest importance, was voted upon by a simple majority because it did not fall into any of the categories specified.

17. The matter to which Article 18, paragraph 3, of the Charter expressly refers is the determination of additional categories. If any delegation wished to propose that the questions mentioned in Chapter XI should be decided by a two-thirds majority, it would in fact be proposing the determination of a new category. The determination of a new category of questions to be decided by a two-thirds majority vote would undoubtedly be a subject for discussion by this Assembly. But that question is not on our agenda, and if anyone wishes to propose it, he will assuredly have to wait until the next session or, if he attaches sufficient importance to it, he can try, by using the machinery provided by the rules of procedure, to have the matter accepted for discussion at the present session.

18. As we have seen, Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter specifies the category of "questions relating to the operation of the trusteeship system", but does not include in the list questions relating to the Non-Self-Governing Territories. That is to say, questions relating to Chapters XII and XIII of the Charter are expressly included. I thus have a reason for stating that those relating to Chapter XI are expressly excluded.

19. My delegation is not among those responsible for the negotiations, during the last period of the San Francisco Conference, which led to the division into two parts of the chapter dealing with Non-Self-Governing Territories and Trust Territories. Most of those present know that these two subjects, that is to say, all matters relating to non-autonomous peoples, were dealt with at San Francisco by the same commission, Commission II, and by the same committee, Committee 4, in the form of paragraphs A and B of a single draft entitled the Conference "International Trusteeship System". Many of you will remember with pain how that courageous attempt to open up a new era in colonial affairs was finally frustrated. When Commission II held its third meeting, on 20 June 1945, Chapter XI had already been severed from Chapters XII and XIII; Chapter XI had been bereft of most of its force and the influences working against the clear and precise obligations established in Chapters XII and XIII in respect of the administration of Trust Territories had succeeded in raising the barrier of the two-thirds majority vote.

20. Let me remind you first of all of the manner in which the system of categories of questions to be decided by a two-thirds majority vote was introduced. At its first meeting, on 30 May 1945, Commission II heard the Rapporteur say, in explanation of a report from Committee 1; in the following words: "The Committee recommends that the following important questions should be decided in the Assembly by a two-thirds majority. . . ."; there followed a list of six categories of questions, all of which were approved. The Conference had been sitting for two months, but those questions did not include either those relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories or those concerned with trusteeship. I would refer in passing to the precise interpretation given by those who were drafting the Charter to the term "important questions", that is to say, categories expressly specified in the Charter.

21. It was only after the disjunction of the Non-Self-Governing Territories from the Trusteeship System proper that Committee 4 submitted the proposal on voting procedure to Committee 1. The Secretary of Committee 1 entered it in the records of the fifteenth meeting in the following words: "The question relating to the operations of the Trusteeship System can be added as one of the important questions requiring a two-thirds vote of the General Assembly for decision".² Thereupon the Chairman of the Committee addressed the representatives as follows: "The question is to add to the list of important questions in the Charter the question regarding the operations of the Trusteeship System."³ The proposal was approved unanimously. The unity of the single chapter on which the Conference had been working until that point was broken.

² See United Nations Conference on International Organization, Commission II, Committee 1, 18 June 1945, vol. 60.

Its two parts, which went under the cognate titles "General Policy" and "International Trusteeship System" received the totally unrelated titles they now bear in the Charter, and care was taken—quite correctly—to draft Article 18 in such a manner as to leave no doubt that the category of questions to be decided by a two-thirds majority applied only to the Trusteeship System.

22. Some of you will doubtless wish to refer to two important resolutions on Non-Self-Governing Territories, resolution 567 (VI) of 18 January 1952 and resolution 648 (VII) of 10 December 1952, for which it was suggested that a two-thirds majority vote should be required. In the case of the first, Denmark asked for a two-thirds majority vote and Cuba objected. In the second case, the President pointed out that one delegation had requested a two-thirds majority vote, and there is no record of any objection.

23. The PRESIDENT: I am sorry, but the speaker has already exceeded the time-limit by many minutes.

24. Mr. ESPINOSA Y PRIETO (Mexico) (translated from Spanish): It goes without saying that in those cases, or, indeed, in any other, the legality of such a procedure is open to doubt, as it is clear that there are no provisions authorizing the Chair to make such a decision ex officio.

25. The Mexican delegation, like many others, does not consider it right that certain limitations which apply typically to trusteeship affairs should be applied to Chapter XI of the Charter, without any of the benefits contained in Chapters XII and XIII. We have tried constantly to reconcile our point of view with that of the administering Powers, but have invariably come up against this difficulty. When the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors were set up, we were conscious of the persistent shadows of the Trusteeship Council, for the membership of those committees never differed from that of the Fourth Committee, or of the Assembly. That is to say that in moments of crisis we saw our majority melt away and found ourselves discussing fundamental questions on a footing of equality with the administering Powers, although the latter are in a definite, though important, minority. When democratic procedures are applied, it is the majority which logically decides joint action.

26. The procedure to which I have just referred provoked a crisis during the present session, when it was suggested that a sub-committee should be established which would once again reflect the type of membership of the Trusteeship Council. The proposal met with vigorous resistance and the representative responsible for it quickly deleted that part of it, and in its revised form it was on the point of adoption.

27. I have another page of arguments on this point which I shall not read since, as the President has already pointed out, I have exceeded my time. I will make these arguments available to . . .

28. The PRESIDENT: I regret that I cannot allow the representative of Mexico to continue because there are many other speakers. I think that the point has been well made and understood by the Assembly. If the representative of Mexico would like to finish, I shall allow him only one minute more.

29. Mr. ESPINOSA Y PRIETO (Mexico) (translated from Spanish): The case of factors, which we are considering, is typical of this anomaly. Because the majority had given up its rights, we have been considering the question fruitlessly for several years. I am far from discounting its importance. The points suggested to us are not properly speaking factors, but simple lists of considerations providing a framework for debate, in which each can freely express his views and vote accordingly. The examination of any of these factors at random reveals that none of them establishes the degree to which we can, by studying them, determine a territory's independence. I can tell you in all sincerity that if this Assembly today rejects the draft resolution before it, the loss will not be irreparable. There is already a list in resolution 648 (VII), but, above all, there is the fact that at this session we have voted on questions of self-government in three cases, and no one has needed any guidance. It would indeed be inconceivable that we, the representatives of independent countries assembled here, jealous as we are of our own rights, should be unable to define a full measure of self-government.

30. I have now made clear our legitimate purposes and the spirit in which we are putting forward these considerations. In conclusion, we request that any questions relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories may always be decided by a simple majority.

31. The PRESIDENT: I should suggest to representatives that interventions be kept as brief as possible.

32. Mr. LANNUNG (Denmark): I shall try to economize our time. The Danish delegation would, contrary to the views expressed by the representative of Mexico, wish the President to confirm that the question dealt with in draft resolution I, "Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government", is an important question both in the general sense and, more particularly, as defined in Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter and rule 84 of the rules of procedure. Otherwise, these stipulations are really devoid of any meaning.

33. The President will recall that in 1951, and again in 1952, it was suggested that this was an important question and would require a two-thirds majority, and that the General Assembly voted on it with this understanding. The draft resolution now before us purports to lay down certain criteria to be taken into account in determining the field of application of Chapter XI of the Charter. In the view of my delegation, this is clearly an important issue, and I would ask the President to confirm the view taken by her predecessors and accepted by the Assembly that this is so. The views of the authors quoted by the representative of Mexico were already known when the Assembly took an opposite stand on previous occasions. The Assembly will surely wish to act with consistency.

34. The PRESIDENT: In order to expedite the work today, I should like to summarize the situation, as pointed out by the two representatives who have spoken. The representatives of Mexico and Denmark have raised the question of the majority required for the adoption of the draft resolution which is about to be voted upon.

35. According to the record, the Assembly has never been called upon specifically to decide this question, although it did give its tacit assent to a ruling that a two-thirds majority was required on this subject. I believe, therefore, that inasmuch as the question has been raised in this manner, the best course to follow would be for the Assembly itself to express its opinion.

36. I shall therefore put the motion of the representative of Mexico to the vote. The motion is to the effect that the draft resolution may be carried by a simple majority.

The motion was adopted by 30 votes to 26.

37. Mr. LAWRENCE (Liberia): I am intervening to explain briefly the reason why my delegation will vote in favour of draft resolution VII of the Fourth Committee, originally submitted by seven Latin American Powers, taking note of the opinion of the United States as to the cessation of the transmission of information on Puerto Rico under Article 73 e of the Charter and releasing it from further responsibility to submit information on Puerto Rico.

38. In previous statements, my delegation has stated in a categorical manner its interpretation of the phrase "a full measure of self-government" as it appears in Chapter XI of the Charter. One of the reasons for this intervention is to reaffirm our views on this interpretation and to state emphatically that our vote in this particular instance should not be construed as a renunciation in the slightest degree of this point of view.

39. I do not believe any representative will maintain that Puerto Rico is independent or that it has attained a full measure of self-government, as my delegation has time and again defined the term, but we have been informed by the representative of the United States that the new constitution, which has brought about the present status of Puerto Rico, was freely adopted by more than 80 per cent of the Puerto Rican people in a referendum; and this statement has remained unchallenged in a manner which might have justified a different consideration. The Committee's refusal to grant the oral hearings requested by the Puerto Rican parties, who wanted to appear before it to present what might have been a different point of view about the people and conditions in Puerto Rico, leaves us with nothing other than the statement of the representative of the United States upon which to base our consideration. The point in the United States statement which appealed to my delegation was the assertion that the present form of government in Puerto Rico was the result of the free and untrammelled choice of the people of Puerto Rico taken in popular elections. In these circumstances, we do not feel that any attempt should be made to go behind the statement of the United States delegation, and full faith and credit should be accorded to what it has submitted, in recognition of the principle of mutual respect and consideration.

40. With regard to draft resolution VII, the provisions of paragraph 9 do not close the door to eventual full independence for the Territory whenever the peoples of both countries desire it. As any change in the status of Puerto Rico will require the agreement of both parties, it might be felt that Puerto Rico will be forever bound to the United States in its present limited partnership. This is indeed a possibility, but the traditional generosity and freedom-loving spirit of the people of the United States, which impelled them spontaneously to grant freedom and independence, to the peoples of the Philippines and Cuba, and which today has made Puerto Rico among the most advanced of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, will, we believe, in due course bring to the people of Puerto Rico a full measure of self-government as we have always defined it in these halls.

41. The history of the people of the United States in colonial affairs supports this liberal view. At the end of the great war of 1914, while its allies were busily engaged in dividing and apportioning the loot of their conquests without reference to the local inhabitants, the United States consistently refused to have any part in this traffic. When the Second World War came to a close, the United States, though in a position to add great land areas to its domain, steadfastly declined to swerve from its traditional opposition to the colonial traffic and remained aloof from it. Trusteeship over Libya was even offered it, but it refused this responsibility and instead lent its aid to the establishment of what is today a free and independent Libya.

42. We do not know of another Power which can boast of a similar record. It is therefore in the light of these achievements, and in the firm conviction that the traditional spirit of freedom and the acknowledgment of the right of peoples to self-determination, which we believe pervades the hearts and minds of the people of the United States, will prevail, that my delegation will feel justified in voting in favour of draft resolution VII.

43. Indeed, the examples which the United States has set in the colonial field should inspire those Powers which are today engaged in throttling, dispossessing and oppressing the peoples of Africa and Asia with a new sense of value and with the realization that the apothegm of the "fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man", to which they have paid such fervent lip service whenever their imperialistic aims may thus be enhanced, will one day come to pass.

44. Mr. VAN LANGENHOVE (Belgium) (translated from French): The Belgian delegation wishes to state the main reasons why it will vote against draft resolution I on the factors to be taken into account in determining whether a territory is or is not self-governing.

45. In the first place, the draft resolution is designed to confer upon the Assembly powers which are not conferred upon it by the Charter and to deprive Member States of a sovereignty they have not relinquished. Such a resolution, if adopted despite the justified opposition of all the States it affects, would remain a dead letter; its only result would be to lessen the prestige of the United Nations.

46. Secondly, the draft resolution is designed to sanction a restrictive interpretation of the Charter which the Belgian delegation has constantly resisted, namely, the interpretation favoured by the States which wish to limit the benefit of the provisions of Chapter XI, concerning the Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the indigenous peoples of colonies and protectorates.

47. In contrast to this restrictive interpretation, the Belgian delegation favours a broad interpretation extending the benefit of those provisions to all non-self-governing indigenous peoples, regardless of the territory they inhabit. The Belgian delegation bases this broad interpretation on three fundamental arguments.

48. First of all, a textual argument: the words "colonies and protectorates" do not appear in the Charter, which refers to the territories concerned as "territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government". Obviously, the peoples of the colonies and protectorates are not the only ones which have not yet attained a full measure of self-government. The point has, of course, been made that Article 74 of the Charter implies that the provisions in question do not apply to the peoples of the metropolitan areas, but those who imagine that they can legitimately infer that those clauses are thereby limited to the peoples of colonies and protectorates have failed to pay due attention to the actual terms of the Charter. The only definition of the territories covered by Chapter XI appears in Article 73, and not in Article 74. Article 74 is limited to a reference in that connexion to Article 73. It is therefore a glaring error of logic to look for that definition in Article 74 and to attempt to base it on so arbitrary an interpretation of the term "metropolitan areas" that it is made to include, against all rhyme and reason, islands situated at more than 600 miles from the mainland of the State to which they belong and inhabited by a primitive and almost unknown people.

49. Our second argument is factual. To claim that the colonies and protectorates are the only territories whose peoples are not yet fully self-governing is tantamount to claiming that the indigenous primitive or semi-primitive peoples of America, Asia or Malaya are already fully self-governing within the meaning of the Charter. In fact, they are so backward that, where they do not altogether escape the administration of the State to which they belong, they are placed under a special legal or administrative constitutional system, just like the peoples of colonies. Furthermore, they are totally different, not only by reason of their primitive character but also race, language, and culture, from the peoples from whom the government administering the State emanates. These peoples, who may be counted in their millions, are almost completely isolated from the centres of government. They are generally separated from them by vast stretches of almost impenetrable jungle. They are often practically the sole inhabitants of vast territories where the general legal code does not apply. True, they are an integral part of the State on whose territory they dwell, but the same holds good of, for instance, the peoples of the Congo, the Belgian Congo being also an integral part of the Belgian State.

50. Our third argument is a moral one. Several Members of the United Nations which were previously Members of the League of Nations undertook in Article 23 of the Covenant to "secure just treatment of the native inhabitants of territories under their control". That undertaking, couched in terms almost identical with those contained in the Covenant, reappears in Chapter XI of the Charter. No one ever claimed at the League that that undertaking was limited to the peoples of colonies and protectorates or disputed the view that it covered all indigenous populations. It was cited at the League in circumstances which prove that it was an effective safeguard for those peoples. Nobody will assert that those indigenous peoples have since progressed so far that the international community need no longer concern itself with them. On the contrary, the committee of experts set up by the United Nations to study the problem of slavery recently carried out an investigation which shows that they are often grossly maltreated. Under Article 23 of the Covenant, the indigenous peoples were entitled to a measure of protection which is called in question today. Thus, their situation, far from having improved, has worsened. It is therefore an elementary humanitarian duty to restore to the indigenous peoples the safeguards of which millions of them have been deprived and to which they are entitled under the very terms of the Charter, instead of permitting the continuance of a state of affairs which, were it to persist, would represent a deplorable retrogression in international law. The Belgian delegation urges all those who have the interests of other peoples at heart to co-operate in this task.

51. Let me now briefly explain our vote on draft resolution VII concerning the cessation of the transmission of the information prescribed in Article 73 e of the Charter in the case of Puerto Rico. The Belgian delegation unhesitatingly subscribes to the views expressed in that draft resolution on the measure of self-government attained by the people of the free, associated State of Puerto Rico. It considers, therefore, that the decision of the United States Government to cease transmitting such information is fully justified. We cannot, however, vote in favour of the draft resolution, because we do not recognize the competence of the Assembly to pass judgment or to take a decision in this matter.

52. The Belgian delegation is actuated by the same fundamental reasoning in its attitude to draft resolution VI, concerning the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam.

53. Mr. CAÑAS (Costa Rica) (translated from Spanish): My delegation is going to explain its vote on draft resolution VII, relating to Puerto Rico, which is now before the General Assembly.

54. When we spoke of Puerto Rico in my country, fifteen years ago, we thought of it as a captive and subjugated sister country which desired a future of improvement and progress and we, as nationals of an independent country, awaited the time when we should be able to welcome Puerto Rico to our family of American nations.

55. When we speak of Puerto Rico today in my country, we think of it as an island where progress is in full swing, where freedom is fully enjoyed by all, and where a painstaking group of honest and very conscientious men work ceaselessly to give their country an efficient government with far-reaching powers, an island to which students from my country already go to seek knowledge and from which they return with what they sought.

56. The General Assembly is being requested officially to recognize that Puerto Rico today has the status of a free associated State, which its inhabitants accepted by a free plebiscite, and is not the colonial territory it was before, but one which possesses not only an independent government but a good government.

57. A few weeks ago, my country flew the Puerto Rican flag in honour of the visit of its Governor. For us, whose country is situated in the same geographical area as that island, whose destiny does not lie in our hands but in the hands of the men who live and work on it, Puerto Rico is a beautiful and true example of a stable and democratic government, and of a people which fully enjoys fundamental freedoms and even those which are not fundamental, if such there be. Puerto Rico is a stimulus to those of us who live in the Caribbean region. The Caribbean, America, and the whole world need the example of stable and democratic governments which look to the future, with bold economic and social ideals and bold programmes of social, educational and human improvement, like the programmes which the present government of Puerto Rico, of its own accord and without any foreign assistance, is today carrying out to the admiration of those who are interested in such matters.

58. If, as events have proved, Puerto Rico has ceased to be a colony, and if the Puerto Rican people has chosen by means of completely free plebiscites and elections—no one disputes the freedom or honesty with which they were conducted—to take the road it wished to take, is the United Nations General Assembly going to tell the Puerto Ricans that this road which they have chosen of their own free will is not the road we feel to be that of self-determination? Are we going to tell them that proper government for them is not the one they have freely chosen, within the framework of one of the most modern of constitutions, but another one, chosen by us? Such an attitude would be contrary both to logic and to realities.

59. My delegation cannot understand how, once a people has its own government, the General Assembly of the United Nations can tell that people that in its opinion it is still a colonial people. We cannot understand how, once the United States has ceased to be the administering Power in Puerto Rico, the Assembly of the United Nations can tell the United States that it is wrong and that it must continue to act as the administering Power in Puerto Rico, although neither it nor Puerto Rico so wishes.

60. The opinion seems to be held in certain circles that the fate of that country, which for us is a sister country, depends on what is decided here. Such an opinion is illusory. A colleague of mine stated, when the matter was being discussed in the Fourth Committee, that Puerto Rico did not need our vote in order to achieve independence because Puerto Rico was independent, with or without that vote. He added, putting it more graphically, that it was not the accolade which made a knight, but that the accolade was required simply in order that a man might be recognized as a knight.

61. Much has been said in books and by writers about Latin America being an area of revolutions and dictatorships. But we have here a country which is not such an area, and which comes to us, not because it has ceased to be such an area, but in order that we may proclaim to the four corners of the earth that it is not such an area. My delegation wishes to appeal to the delegations of the other Latin-American countries to support the draft resolution before us, as an accolade which kindred peoples give to this people which is entirely free and unshackled, this fine democracy which expresses the ideal which the constitution of our regional organization so eloquently describes.

62. What more are we going to ask? That the Puerto Ricans should change their mind and take the road towards independence which the countries here represented point out to them? The Governor of Puerto Rico, when he recently visited my country, stated in brusque terms: "The Puerto Ricans enjoy the type of independence which they desire and not the type which others wish to impose on them."

63. This General Assembly is fully competent to decide what it has been asked to decide. There is no need to demonstrate that competence explicitly, since it is tacitly recognized by the fact that the item is on our agenda, and that no one has so far objected to it. This is why my delegation does not attach paramount importance to paragraph 6 of the draft resolution, since it merely reiterates what we all admit in fact.

64. But the presence of this paragraph has caused some delegations to consider the draft resolution as inadmissible. Consequently, if the draft is voted upon paragraph by paragraph, my delegation will vote against paragraph 6 in the hope that it will be deleted and that the draft resolution as a whole will then receive the largest possible number of votes. But I ask the other delegations to support the draft even though the paragraph in question remains in it, to the end that the United Nations may fully recognize the autonomy and self-government now enjoyed by the island of Puerto Rico.

65. Mr. LODGE (United States of America): The United States is proud of its new relationship with Puerto Rico and of the joint contribution to political progress which our two peoples have made. While, of course, I strongly favour the new status of Puerto Rico as a self-governing commonwealth associated with the United States, I am not here to review the facts which my colleagues, Mrs. Bolton and Mr. Fernoz, have already explained fully to the Fourth Committee. My purpose in asking to speak now is to bring to the General Assembly the following important message from the President of the United States.

66. I am authorized to say on behalf of the President that if, at any time, the Legislative Assembly of Puerto Rico adopts a resolution in favour of more complete or even absolute independence, he will immediately thereafter recommend to Congress that such independence be granted. The President also wishes me to say that, in this event, he would welcome Puerto Rico's adherence to the Treaty of Rio de Janeiro and the United Nations Charter.

67. The President's statement is an expression of the traditional interest which the United States has always had in encouraging and promoting political freedom for all peoples in all parts of the world whenever conditions are such that their freedom will not be jeopardized by internal or external pressures.

68. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) (translated from Spanish): My delegation is much gratified by the statement which the United States representative has just made. It fully confirms what my delegation had the honour to state in the Fourth Committee; we then expressed our certainty that when the people of Puerto Rico said to the United States: "We have been friends and associates, now we wish to be only friends", the United States Government, in keeping with its glorious tradition, would concede the complete independence requested by that people.

69. With regard to the draft resolutions before us, my delegation does not propose to reiterate its views on the question of factors. We stated those views in the Fourth Committee; we derive them from the authors of the Charter, and they show that the argument frequently advanced by the Belgian delegation in the General Assembly is completely at variance with the legitimate interpretation which the actual authors of the Charter placed on Chapter XI, namely, that Chapter XI applies only to the peoples of territories which have not yet achieved a full measure of self-government, and not to more or less backward peoples living within the national frontiers of independent territories.

70. I wish to refer in particular to draft resolution VII which the Fourth Committee has submitted to the General Assembly and which concerns Puerto Rico. My delegation has repeatedly expressed the view that Puerto Rican people, by its own abilities and thanks to the good will of the United States Government, has already attained a very considerable measure of self-government. My delegation, which represents a country allied by ties of kinship to Puerto Rico, has for centuries followed the Puerto Rican people's struggle for freedom and enthusiastically applauds its progress towards self-government. In doing so, we heartily congratulate both this sister nation and the United States Government, which has made such progress possible.

71. However, we are not called upon to decide whether the status which has been granted to the Puerto Rican people is good or bad, or whether or not it helps that people to realize fully its national aspirations. It is not for us to grant or to deny liberty to the Puerto Rican people. Our task is a different one; it is simply to determine whether or not the degree of self-government which the Puerto Rican people has reached corresponds to what the United Nations Charter calls "a full measure of self-government".

72. With this thought in mind, and from this point of view alone, my delegation is fully convinced that the present government of Puerto Rico is, in practice, subject to such limitations and depends so much on the United States that the country cannot be regarded as having reached the full measure of self-government which the United Nations requires. For this reason, my delegation will again oppose the draft resolution approved by the Fourth Committee, whilst at the same time expressing the sincere hope that the noble Puerto Rican people will every day advance a step further towards a full measure of self-government and will be able of its own free will to achieve its aspirations in their entirety. What are those aspirations? That is the affair of the Puerto Ricans, and theirs alone. By their own free will they must decide what those aspirations are, what it is the people want. And whether that is full independence, or a more or less close association with the United States, or the arrangement which they have at present, my delegation, my people and my government, will applaud their choice whole-heartedly.

73. The PRESIDENT: In connexion with the votes which are about to be taken on each draft resolution, opportunity will be afforded for explanations of vote either before or after each vote. The General Assembly will now vote on the draft resolutions submitted by the Fourth Committee [A/2556 and Corr.1].

Draft resolution I, including the annex, was adopted by 32 votes to 19, with 6 abstentions. 742

Draft resolution II was adopted unanimously. 743

Draft resolution III was adopted by 43 votes to 8, with 7 abstentions. 744

Draft resolution IV was adopted by 48 votes to none, with 8 abstentions. 745

Draft resolution V was adopted by 39 votes to 15, with 6 abstentions. 746

74. Mr. MUNRO (New Zealand): I am aware that the General Assembly has just voted on draft resolution I, dealing with factors, and that it voted a short while ago on the question of the majority necessary for the adoption of these draft resolutions. But I am now approaching another matter. Before the President invites the General Assembly to vote upon draft resolutions VI and VII, I request her to regard them both as raising important questions and, as such, subject to the application of rule 84 of the rules of procedure. These draft resolutions relate to the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter with respect to the Non-Self-Governing Territories of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, and with respect to Puerto Rico. Decisions have already been taken by the Governments of the Netherlands and the United States respectively to send no further information in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter to the Secretary-General upon the Territories.

75. May I state very briefly why my delegation regards the draft resolutions as important questions. Article 73 e of the Charter imposes an obligation on Member States which have or which assume responsibilities for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories to transmit regularly to the Secretary-General information of a statistical nature on these Territories. The decisions of the General Assembly in relation to a determination by the administering States to cease transmitting information, I submit, may intimately concern the obligations of those Member States. The decisions of the General Assembly on these two matters are, furthermore, of supreme importance to the inhabitants of the Territories concerned. They will be watching what we do here today with the greatest interest, for our decisions may have an important bearing on their political future.

76. Finally, these decisions of the General Assembly involve, to some extent, a judgment upon the actions of the two Member States, a judgment which surely should not be lightly passed. I trust that the members of the Assembly will give these draft resolutions the careful consideration they deserve. If the President should feel obliged to put my request to the vote, I would urge its support upon all representatives who have the welfare and progress of the dependent territories seriously at heart, and I would submit to them, with great respect, that if these questions are not important, then the word has ceased to have importance.

77. The PRESIDENT: I regret that I cannot put the proposal of the representative of New Zealand to the vote because the Mexican proposal was intended to cover draft resolutions VI and VII as well as draft resolution I, and the decision of the Assembly which has already been taken applies to all three draft resolutions.

78. Mr. MUNRO (New Zealand): As the President will appreciate, I would be the last to wish to dispute one of her rulings. All that I wish to say—and I do not know how many of my fellow representatives here agree with me—is that, as I understand the matter—I may be mistaken—the vote of the Assembly was in respect of draft resolution I, dealing with factors, and that she has allowed representatives to speak on all the draft resolutions by way of explanation of vote. But I had not understood that the vote of the Assembly was one which affected the particular draft resolutions which I have now mentioned.

79. The PRESIDENT: The speech of the Mexican representative covered the entire field. As such, I feel that he intended equally to deal with draft resolutions VI and VII, as well as with draft resolution I. I should like the representative to confirm or to deny that.

80. Sir Percy SPENDER (Australia): I would suggest that this matter ought to be left to the Assembly to decide. It is not my purpose here to contest the understanding of the President of the issue which was placed before us by the representative of Mexico. All I can say is that I am not the only representative in the room who thought otherwise. Had it been so, I certainly would have asked leave to express my views upon the matters which were involved.

81. Since there seems to have been a substantial degree of misunderstanding, I am sure that the President will agree that the Assembly ought to decide whether it intends that the two-thirds majority or the simple majority rule should apply to these two draft resolutions. I can assure the President, without any pretence at all, that I had no idea, when the motion of the representative of Mexico was put to this Assembly, that it applied to draft resolutions VI and VII.

82. Sir Gladwyn JEBB (United Kingdom): Before we take a decision on this extremely important point, I think that we ought to have a little more discussion as to where we are going. I do not really believe that these things can be decided by a sort of snap vote. We ought to have a little more discussion. This, I suggest, is very important. I do not see why representatives should be denied the right to express their views. Therefore, in two minutes, I should like to explain why I, too, in common with the representative of Australia, thought that what was put to the vote when the representative of Mexico had finished speaking was not that all matters arising out of Chapter XI should require a simple majority vote, but rather that the one item relating to factors should require that majority.

83. If, as I understand it, it is now a question of our having to decide that all matters pertaining to Chapter XI should automatically require only a simple majority then, more especially in view of the narrow majority by which the decision on factors was adopted, I think that this Assembly ought to be allowed to have some debate on the matter. It is an important matter and nothing less.

84. In my view, it is a strange theory that is being put to us by the representative of Mexico. It has now been defined what he meant. He said that all matters deriving from Chapter XI should be decided by a simple majority. Now, what does the Charter say? Under Article 18, the Charter lays down that important matters should be decided by a two-thirds majority. It states:

"Decisions of the General Assembly on important questions shall be made by a two-thirds majority. . ."

All important matters should therefore be decided by a two-thirds majority. And it even gives a list of certain items which are regarded as important by definition in the Charter itself. It then goes on to say—and here, I admit, there may be a certain ambiguity in the Charter:

"Decisions on other questions, including the determination of additional categories of questions to be decided by a two-thirds majority, shall be made by a majority of the members present and voting."

85. In a sense, the question is: does the word "important" mean "important" or does it not? Obviously, from an ordinary reading of the Charter, since it is said specifically that important matters must be decided by a two-thirds majority, the word "other" can only relate to unimportant questions. And incidentally, as we know, among the matters which are specifically stated to be important in the Charter there is the matter of the operation of the Trusteeship System. Now, if the operation of the trusteeship system is laid down in the Charter itself as important, so that resolutions in regard to it require a two-thirds majority, in the light of common reason are not matters relating to Chapter XI, by analogy, equally important? Why should matters relating to Chapter XI be regarded as unimportant and matters relating to the Trusteeship System be regarded as important? There is no logic there of any kind.

86. In my humble opinion, and in the opinion of my delegation, the Mexican argument really amounts to, and must be deemed to amount to, saying that matters relating to Chapter XI of the Charter are unimportant matters. However, that was not the view expressed by the representative of Mexico. He did not say that at all. He said that they were highly important, that all these matters were of the first importance. Therefore there is clearly an inherent contradiction in what the representative of Mexico said. First of all, he said that they were highly important matters. Then he said that decisions by the General Assembly on important questions had no relation to this case. How does he explain that? On the face of it, it seems to me that this is an impossible decision for the Assembly to have taken, even in regard to the question of factors. If it is going to be extended to the whole matter of Chapter XI, it is really rather grave.

87. Of course, I know that under the terms of paragraph 3 of Article 18 it is in fact possible—and it has just been demonstrated that it is possible—for the General Assembly to decide, in its wisdom, by a simple majority that any matter, no matter how important, is not really important but only one of the "other" questions under the Charter. Nothing can prevent it from so deciding. In fact, it showed its wisdom only a little while ago. Therefore nobody can prevent the General Assembly from acting in this way if a simple majority so desires it to act. However, as we see it, with great deference to everybody who shares a different view, this is really an irresponsible act on the part of this great body.

88. More especially was it regrettable, in our view, since, instead of deciding under paragraph 3 of Article 18, as it is empowered to do, that an additional category of questions should be decided by a two-thirds majority, the General Assembly was asked, in the contrary sense, to decide—and is now asked, as I understand it, to decide—that an additional category—in this case of questions relating to Chapter XI—should be decided by a simple majority, which is absolutely the reverse of what the Charter evidently intended.

89. Finally, may I just say that, after all, the presumptive reason why the authors of the Charter provided that some matters specifically, and others because they are important, should be decided by a two-thirds majority, was because they felt, and I think rightly, that a resolution passed by a two-thirds majority, while it could not be binding, as we all know, would at least exercise some moral authority over all Members. It is for those, I suggest, who supported—and who now support—the motion before us to say whether it was their conscious wish, and is their conscious wish, to detract from the moral authority of any resolution relating to Chapter XI which may be passed in the future by the General Assembly. If that is what they want us to do, then let us do it.

90. Mrs. BOLTON (United States of America): I, too, thought that we had voted only in connexion with the draft resolution on factors. I wonder whether, in order to help us all—including the United States delegation—to get out of this confusion, which seems to be general, the President would be good enough to have the stenographic record of her remarks, when she put the matter to vote, read to us? We would greatly appreciate this.

91. The PRESIDENT: I intervened a moment ago to interpret the speech of the representative of Mexico. Since then he has confirmed that my interpretation was correct. However, in view of the situation that has now developed, I am quite prepared to ask the General Assembly whether it wishes the decision taken a while ago to be interpreted as including draft resolutions VI and VII.

92. Sir Percy SPENDER (Australia) (from the floor): The correct way in which it should be put is whether the Assembly does or does not apply the two-thirds rule, and not the way in which the President suggested it should be put.

93. The PRESIDENT: I do not see how I can bring that up at this moment. The decision already taken, was in connexion with a simple majority, and that is what we are dealing with at the moment.

94. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) (translated from Spanish): My delegation has no objection to the Assembly being consulted in this matter; we wish, however, to call the attention of the members to the rules of procedure. In the first place, we have an Assembly decision adopted by 30 votes to 26. To change this decision, a two-thirds majority is required. In the second place, the President has already given a ruling as regards the interpretation of this matter, and a two-thirds majority is also required in order to change the President's ruling.

95. The PRESIDENT: It was not a ruling, it was only an interpretation.

96. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) (translated from Spanish): I thank you for correcting me.

97. Mr. MUNRO (New Zealand): I think I can safely say that the President knows that neither my delegation nor I would pay any disrespect to one of her rulings, and we all know here that it is possible for misapprehensions to arise in respect of a vote.

98. I am most reluctant that there should be a change in the Assembly which would reverse one of the President's findings—one of her rulings—and, indeed, with great respect to the President, I am reluctant that the matter should be approached in the way she suggests. If I may say so, I think it would be fitting to the dignity of the high office which she holds and the responsibilities of this Assembly, if she would agree that, on a matter where there has been misunderstanding, we can vote as the representatives of sovereign States on this most important question as to whether the two-thirds rule is applicable or not.

99. Mr. KYROU (Greece): As I understand the whole situation, the President has not given any ruling; she only interpreted the motion of the representative of Mexico. I think we could go on with this discussion for hours. That is why, in the circumstances, I feel that what the President has just suggested is the only solution. She interpreted the motion of the representative of Mexico as applying to the seven draft resolutions, and this interpretation was confirmed by the Mexican representative himself, so I think the only way out of this difficulty would be to ask whether the Assembly shares this interpretation.

100. Sir Percy SPENDER (Australia) (from the floor): Putting it more specifically, the question should be put to the Assembly as to whether it was or was not an important question within the meaning of Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter.

101. The PRESIDENT: I would like to draw to the attention of the representatives who have been pressing this point that a vote has been taken already. Therefore the only way in which this matter can be clarified is the way I have just put it to the house. I do not see, after the vote has been taken and the mover of the proposal himself intended it to apply in the way in which it was interpreted by the Chair, that we can suddenly turn round at this stage. Maybe this would be possible after some clarification.

102. Sir Gladwyn JEBB (United Kingdom): I wish to speak on a point of clarification. I must say that I do not find the situation very clear. I thought that the President put the original vote on the Mexican proposal—perhaps I am wrong—in relation simply to the draft resolution on factors. If I had thought that the question was going to be put on the whole issue of Chapter XII, which I understand has now been suggested, then I certainly would have asked for, and I hope the President would have granted me, my right to speak.

103. What exactly is the situation now? Do I understand that the President holds that the vote we took on the Mexican proposal did relate to all matters coming up under Chapter XI, whatever they might be, or only to the seven draft resolutions? That again is obscure, at any rate in my mind. Our decision and our attitude must be governed by exactly what did happen when the question was put. Therefore, may I join with the representative of the United States in asking that the stenographic record of what happened when the President actually put the question should be read out. Then we would all know where we were and what it was to be presumed that we were voting on.

104. The PRESIDENT: I think that probably what happened was that a number of the representatives were not listening very closely to the statement of the representative of Mexico. My interpretation was based solely on the words stated by him; I have not put any words into his mouth. The statement made by him conveyed to the Chair the fact that it was intended to cover draft resolutions VI and VII as well as draft resolution I.

105. Mr. VYSHINSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (translated from Russian): The USSR delegation invariably observes the rules governing the activities of the General Assembly and the United Nations as a whole most attentively and meticulously.

106. I should make it clear on behalf of my delegation that I too understood that, as the President has explained, the vote we took on the question a certain representative raised earlier, before we proceeded to vote on these seven draft resolutions, was a vote on all the draft resolutions. This I understood not only from the way the question was put, but from the actual substance of the drafts. The content of none of those seven draft resolutions—as I see the matter, and to the best of my knowledge and belief—is such as to warrant its classification among the important questions, such as those relating to trusteeship, referred to in Article 18 of the Charter and rule 84 of the rules of procedure.

107. The United Kingdom representative quoted the Charter to show that it provides that questions relating to the operation of the Trusteeship System are among the important questions which require a two-thirds majority. Permit me to point out, however, that the draft resolution we are now speaking of, draft resolution VI, is in no way concerned with questions relating to the operation of the Trusteeship System. If you would care to run through the draft resolution now, paragraph by paragraph, you will see that it contains precisely nothing about the operation of the Trusteeship System.

108. That, of course, is no accident. Turning to the rules of procedure, which reproduce the corresponding text of Article 18 of the Charter, we see that they refer not to trusteeship questions in general but to questions relating to the operation of the Trusteeship System. The only place in draft resolution VI where there is any kind of reference to trusteeship is in the last paragraph, which requests the Government of the Netherlands to transmit regularly to the Secretary-General the information specified in Article 73 e of the Charter. But that is not a question relating to the operation of the Trusteeship System. It is simply a request to the Netherlands Government to perform the obligations already incumbent on it. The paragraph goes on: "in regard to the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam such time as the General Assembly takes a decision that the transmission of information in regard to those Territories should be discontinued". So it was obvious to me, and I am sure that it was clear to many other delegations as well, that this is not by any means a question relating to the Trusteeship System, upon which a decision has to be taken by a two-thirds majority, but a question of continuing to transmit information. Now, transmitting information and the Trusteeship System are not the same thing. Questions relating to the Trusteeship System mean any changes that may be required for the operation of that system. I see nothing of that nature here. Naturally, therefore, I assumed that this required a simple majority.

109. I should like to draw attention to the fact that we have reached draft resolution VI. That means that we have already voted on five draft resolutions without anybody bringing up the question of whether it was necessary to have a two-thirds majority. We voted on draft resolutions I, II, III, IV and V by a simple majority; but when we came to draft resolution VI, we were all of a sudden confronted with the suggestion that this part particular draft was sufficiently important to require a majority of two-thirds. I consider that this draft resolution does not differ, as regards importance, from the preceding ones, any more than from draft resolution VII. Consequently I consider that of course we must vote on this draft by a simple majority, and that the decision taken was in order.

110. If the President puts to the meeting the question whether or not the decision we took concerning a simple majority was in order, then of course, the Guatemalan representative is right to insist on the application of rule 82 of the rules of procedure, which provides for a two-thirds majority. Should it be deemed necessary to vote again on the President's decision—a decision which in my opinion was perfectly in order—it would mean reconsidering a General Assembly decision on the matter. In that case a vote under rule 82 would be unavoidable, which means that this decision that has already been taken can only be altered or departed from if the alteration is decided on by a two-thirds majority at the present session of the Assembly.

111. Mr. MENON (India): It is not clear to my delegation on what item this debate is now being conducted. If it is on a point of order, I understand that there may be two speakers in favour and two speakers against. However, since the precedent has been set up for having a general debate on this matter, I should like to submit that, in the view of my delegation, a proposal was submitted by the representative of Mexico and was opposed by the representative of Denmark. The President's interpretation, or rather, the President's ruling, since there is no provision for an interpretation, was given when she was asked that the motion should cover all seven draft resolutions. The only possible procedure, therefore, is either to challenge the ruling or to submit it voluntarily to challenge. I do not see how we can have another vote on this matter unless the ruling that has been given by the Chair is challenged and a new decision taken.

112. I should like also to point out that, since dealing with draft resolution I, we have already dealt with others on education, self-government and matters of that character, and surely it is only just at this point that the objection has been raised in this manner. I do not think that it would be proper for me to go into the merits of Article 18 of the Charter, but it may be stated that that article refers specifically to matters which must be submitted to the two-thirds rule. And when, in any law, there is a specific mention, then not only the implication but the meaning and the intent of such a clause is that in all other matters that specification shall not apply.

113. For these reasons I submit that we should proceed with this matter in accordance with the ruling already given by the President.

114. Mr. PIGNON (France) (translated from French): After the explanations given by some of the previous speakers, it seems to me obvious that the circumstances in which we voted were confused. Did we even vote on a motion? It would appear that what we actually voted on was a speech, which of course contained certain conclusions, but also certain arguments or illustrations which seem to have been mistaken for conclusions in the legal sense of the term.

115. On what was the President's interpretation based? On a confirmation by the representative of Mexico. But that confirmation was retrospective; it was an afterthought, since it was given after the vote had taken place. It seems to me, therefore, that its value is at best purely relative.

116. In the circumstances, I should like to propose a solution, subject to the Mexican representative's consent. Since the President's ruling was, so to speak, based on his decision, he would be doing us a great service if he would agree, for the sake of clarity and the good understanding that should prevail in the Assembly, that his motion—if I may thus describe what was in fact a speech—was concerned only with the factors of self-government, and if he would permit us to take another vote now.

117. The PRESIDENT: This is developing into a debate. Representative after representative has conveyed the impression to me—and I am becoming a little confused about my own impressions—that there is a confusion. What I am trying to do is to dispel the confusion, and for that reason I had reworded the motion I wanted to put to the vote. I shall now call upon the representative of Australia, who has indicated his desire to address the Assembly on this point, but I do beg that since we are trying to clear up something that is confused we should not add to the confusion.

118. Sir Percy SPENDER (Australia): I shall obey the President's injunction as best I can, and shall seek not to add to the confusion, but I think that the matter is a very simple one.

119. In the first place, may I suggest that a speech does not make a motion. A speech ranges over many fields. The only question is what was the point, the issue or the question before the Assembly. I have taken the trouble to inquire what the question was. There were a number of items on the agenda this afternoon. The item which was voted on was the item concerning factors relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories. No one disputes that. In the course of his speech the representative of Mexico referred to a number of other matters, as one normally does when one makes a point. But the only question is what was the nature of the motion which he intended to put before this Assembly. In truth, no motion was put before the Assembly, but the President interpreted what the representative of Mexico had in mind, and the only question, as I understand it, which was put before the Assembly was on the first item. In putting it to the vote the President said: "The motion is to the effect that the draft resolution"—"draft resolution" in the singular—"may be carried by a simple majority."

120. The representative of the United States asked that the stenographic record should be read. I can only say for myself that I was listening to the debate, as I believe most people were, and that I understood precisely, I think, what was the question put. May I suggest that the stenographic record should be read and that, in any event, no question of technicalities should stand in the way of this Assembly deciding for itself this very important question of whether, under Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter, this is or is not an important question.

121. The PRESIDENT: For the very reason raised by the representative of Australia—namely, because I want the Assembly to have the fullest opportunity of deciding as it wishes in the knowledge of what it decided earlier—I have tried to reword the motion. As I said earlier, I am only trying to clarify the understanding that existed at the time of the first vote, and it is by no means clear that everyone's understanding was the same. Therefore I should like to suggest that we take the matter up in the form of ascertaining whether it is the wish of the Assembly to interpret the decision taken on voting procedure as applying only to draft resolution I.

122. Accordingly, I shall put to the vote the proposal that the decision taken on voting procedure shall apply only to resolution I. A vote by roll-call has been requested.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

The United States of America, having been drawn by lot by the President, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Iceland, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland

Against: Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Abstaining: Chile, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua.

The proposal was rejected by 34 votes to 21, with 4 abstentions.

123. The PRESIDENT: It is necessary now to take a decision on draft resolutions VI and VII, and I should therefore like to put to the vote a motion providing that a simple majority is required to carry draft resolutions VI and VII.

124. Mr. ESPINOSA Y PRIETO (Mexico) (translated from Spanish): I promise to be exceedingly brief. I wish to point out that in the whole of my speech I made it abundantly clear that the Mexican Government requested that voting on any matter concerned with Chapter XI should be by simple majority and not by a two-thirds majority. That was clearly stated throughout my speech. Although unfortunate circumstances prevented me from concluding my statement, it will be easy to verify from the verbatim record that I finished with the words:

"We request that any questions relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories may always be decided by a simple majority".

125. My delegation thinks that the President's ruling on this matter should be upheld. We regard the vote which we have just taken as upholding the correct interpretation placed by the President on my words; we therefore think it inappropriate in the circumstances to take a further vote. Naturally my delegation will, as always, act in accordance with the President's ruling.

126. Mr. MATES (Yugoslavia): I agree that it is regrettable that, instead of continuing to take the vote on the draft resolutions, a kind of semi-procedural discussion has developed. I would not have wished to participate in this discussion if again an interpretation of the Charter had not been put forward which, in my opinion, is completely erroneous, and it is because of this misinterpretation, I think, that most of the difficulties in this debate have arisen.

127. It has been stated here by the representative of the United Kingdom and other representatives that Article 18 of the Charter specifies that on some important questions a vote should be taken by a two-thirds majority, and that the Assembly can decide on other important questions which should also be voted on by a two-thirds majority. First of all, I think it is a very difficult matter to vote on whether a question is important or not; it might have different importance in the minds of various delegations, and it might be extremely difficult to agree on a common denominator in all cases. However, I think that all this argument, which has even gone so far that a vote has been asked on whether the question involved in such and such a draft resolution is important or not, is completely without any point. Article 18 of the Charter states that on important questions the vote will be by a two-thirds majority, and then it gives an exhaustive enumeration of those questions which are important, and paragraph 3 of Article 18 states that the decisions on other questions shall be by a simple majority, including a decision as to whether some additional categories of questions are to be decided by a two-thirds majority.

128. The English text of the Charter may have misled the representative of the United Kingdom, because paragraph 2 of Article 18 says: "These questions shall include"—and then comes an enumeration. But I should like to pay tribute once again to the French language from this rostrum. The French text of the Charter is an official text—and if, in a legal document which is valid in two or more languages, one leaves open a doubt and another is precise, then the interpretation has to be taken from the more precise text. This is a legal concept which I suppose nobody in this Assembly will contest. What is written in the French version of Article 18 of the Charter? I shall quote the French text:

"Les décisions de l'Assemblée générale sur les questions importantes sont prises à la majorité des deux tiers des membres présents et votants."

That is the law. Now comes the definition: "Sont considérées comme questions importantes", and then there is an enumeration of the important questions.

129. If there is any meaning in these words, it is that decisions of the General Assembly on important questions shall be by a two-thirds vote, and then these important questions are enumerated. "Sont considérées" is a definition of the term "important questions" which is used in the first sentence of Article 18, paragraph 2. "Sont considérées comme questions importantes", and then all the questions considered important are enumerated. Nothing concerning Chapter XI of the Charter is in this enumeration. Besides, paragraph 3 states:

"Les décisions sur d'autres questions, y compris la détermination de nouvelles catégories de questions à trancher à la majorité des deux tiers, sont prises à la majorité des membres présents et votants."

That means that unless a question comes within one of the categories enumerated in Article 18, paragraph

2, a vote has to be taken by a simple majority. There can be no doubt about it, and all procedural wrangling about it is completely outside the field of the Charter.

130. As I said, I asked to speak because I think that a much more serious question is involved than a vote on one or two draft resolutions. It is a question of the Charter. I wanted to clarify this point and particularly to point out again that I should consider any vote to consider a question to be important or not as being contrary to the Charter, because the Charter does not require us to pronounce on the importance of questions, but gives a technical term to important questions and gives a definition and enumeration of these categories and says:

"Decisions on other questions, including the determination of additional categories of questions to be decided by a two-thirds majority. . . ."

That means that the Assembly can exceptionally determine to vote on other categories by a two-thirds majority without pronouncing on whether they are important or not.

131. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) (translated from French): The Mexican representative has just explained to us very clearly that the purpose of his motion was to decide that the draft resolutions before us today and, generally speaking, the draft resolutions concerning Chapter XI of the Charter, should be subject to the simple majority rule.

132. I do not think this motion should have been put to the vote, since all questions submitted to the General Assembly, except important questions, are subject to simple majority decisions, and the important questions are those mentioned in Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter and those which the General Assembly may decide, by a simple majority vote, to classify among the important questions.

133. The question today is not whether the Assembly wishes decisions to be taken by a simple majority—which is the rule—but whether it is prepared to decide that the two questions now before it should be governed by the two-thirds majority rule. These two questions are as follows. First, is the cessation of the transmission of information on the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam justified? Secondly, is the United States decision concerning Puerto Rico justified?

134. If the Chair considers it necessary, I would propose that there be put to the vote a motion that the General Assembly decides that these two problems are important.

135. The PRESIDENT: We shall now proceed to vote on the question of whether draft resolutions VI and VII may be carried by a simple majority.

136. I call upon the representative of Guatemala on a point of order.

137. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) (translated from Spanish): I am sorry, Madam President, but I do not quite understand what we are doing. I am under the impression that we are going to vote for the third time to the effect that we do not wish these draft resolutions to be subject to a two-thirds majority vote. The first time was when the President put to the vote the motion of the Mexican representative, the second time was the vote which has just taken place. If I understood the Spanish interpretation correctly, the President put the following to the vote:

does the General Assembly wish that the decision by simple majority should apply only to draft resolution I? The Assembly's reply was a categorical negative. What does that mean? It means that the Assembly wishes the decision on the seven draft resolutions to be taken by a simple majority. Why should we vote again on the question whether the decision on the last two draft resolutions should be taken by a simple majority or by a two-thirds majority?

138. I think that the appropriate procedure is to vote forthwith on draft resolutions VI and VII, and that the decision on those drafts should be taken, in accordance with what the Assembly has already decided, by a simple majority.

139. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) (translated from French): The President proposes to put to the vote the question whether the draft resolutions before us may be adopted by a simple majority. That is tantamount to asking the General Assembly whether the Charter may be complied with. The Charter states that all questions are to be voted by a simple majority, with the exception of important questions such as the questions classified as important in Article 18, paragraph 2, of the Charter as well as the questions which the General Assembly itself decides are important. That is how this term has been constantly interpreted since the United Nations was first set up.

140. I say again, I do not believe it is possible to put to the vote the question whether the Charter should be complied with. All questions submitted to the General Assembly are settled by a simple majority, unless, by a decision taken by a simple majority, the General Assembly decides that a particular question is an important one.

141. In order to put an end to the present confused situation, I shall move—and if the Chair considers it necessary I shall submit it as a formal motion—that the General Assembly considers that the two draft resolutions which are to be put to the vote are important questions.

142. Mr. VYSHINSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (translated from Russian): If I understood correctly, the question now is whether we should decide on draft resolutions VI and VII by a simple or by a two-thirds majority. In that case I should like to know what we voted on a moment ago. What was our last vote about?

143. The way I saw it was this—and the whole thing is very clear and simple: the Mexican representative proposed that the vote on all the draft resolutions should be by a simple majority. Draft resolution I was voted on by a simple majority; draft resolutions II, III, IV and V were voted on by a simple majority. When we came to draft resolution VI the question arose whether or not the Mexican representative's proposal also applied to draft resolutions VI and VII, that is, to all the draft resolutions—so that they would all be decided on by a simple majority—or whether he had only meant draft resolution I.

144. The President then declared that the Mexican representative's proposal applied to all the draft resolutions. But since it was difficult for the President to impose her opinion to that effect, she put it to the Assembly, after first asking the opinion of the Mexican representative. The Mexican representative confirmed the fact that his proposal had applied to all the draft resolutions. The question was put to the vote, and it was decided by 34 votes in favour to 21 against, apparently, that the proposal applied to the seven draft resolutions, which meant that all the draft resolutions had to be decided on by a simple majority.

145. The President is now putting the question whether or not the decision on draft resolution VI should be taken by a simple or by a two-thirds majority. But that has been decided already. I entirely agree with the Guatemalan representative that it has been decided. And if it has been decided, why should we decide it again? The President feels a certain diffidence. I understand her scrupulous attitude; she wants to be absolutely objective, and she is right. But we must not be sacrificed to such excessive scrupulousness. We must not be made victims and go on indefinitely speaking and voting on the same question. I believe that we should be guided by the decision taken.

146. To conclude: if the President, or anyone else wants to have another vote on this question, it will mean reconsidering a decision already taken. The decision taken was to vote on all the draft resolutions, including draft resolutions VI and VII, by a simple majority. If the matter is to be reconsidered, rule 82 of the rules of procedure will have to be applied. Rule 82 allows it to be done. But I strongly protest against that rule being invoked, because the vote that has just been taken has confirmed that all the draft resolutions, draft resolution I to draft resolution VII inclusive, must be decided by a simple majority. I therefore beg the President to put these draft resolutions to the vote.

147. Mrs. BOLTON (United States of America): I support the proposal of the representative of Belgium. In particular, the draft resolution concerning Puerto Rico, which directly concerns the United States and the Government and people of Puerto Rico, is to my delegation the most important item in the report of the Fourth Committee. Moreover, this draft resolution directly involves the discharge and the fulfilment of an obligation specifically set forth in an article of the Charter, namely, Article 73. My Government has made every effort possible to discharge this obligation in good faith, and in fact has done more than the letter of the Charter requires. My delegation feels that this question is an important matter within the meaning of Article 18 of the Charter, and therefore definitely requires a two-thirds majority. I hope most earnestly that the President will put the Belgian proposal to the vote.

148. The PRESIDENT: Much as I appreciate the efforts of various representatives to try to clear up this situation, and particularly the effort of the representative of Belgium, I regret that it is not possible for me to do anything at this stage. We have just voted on the interpretation of the motion on voting procedure, and the General Assembly has indicated that it did not intend to limit the application of that motion to resolution I. Now draft resolutions VI and VII remain, and we have to vote on them. I think that point is quite clear, and the only thing we can now do is to go ahead and vote on those two draft resolutions. The decision which the General Assembly has just adopted applies both to draft resolution VI and to draft resolution VII. We shall vote on those two draft resolutions separately.

149. I shall put to the vote first draft resolution VI. A separate vote on both paragraph 3 and paragraph 6 of that draft resolution has been requested.

The preamble and paragraphs 1 and 2 were adopted by 30 votes to none, with 15 abstentions.

Paragraph 3 was adopted by 33 votes to 5, with 13 abstentions.

Paragraphs 4 and 5 were adopted by 39 votes to 2, with 15 abstentions.

Paragraph 6 was adopted by 35 votes to 13, with 2 abstentions.

The draft resolution as a whole was adopted by 33 votes to 13, with 8 abstentions. 149

150. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will vote next on draft resolution VII.

151. Mr. LANNUNG (Denmark): I have two requests in connexion with draft resolution VII. First, I should like a separate vote, by roll-call, to be taken on the last paragraph of the preamble, and, secondly, I request that a vote by roll-call should be taken on draft resolution VII as a whole.

152. The PRESIDENT: Before putting draft resolution VII to the vote, I shall call upon the representative of the Netherlands for an explanation of his delegation's vote on draft resolution VI.

153. Mr. SPITS (Netherlands): When the question of the cessation of the transmission of information on the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam was debated in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly, the Netherlands delegation informed the Committee that, under the terms of the interim orders of government which at present embody the constitutions of the two Territories concerned, the parliaments of those Territories—freely elected on a basis of general, direct and secret suffrage—have full power to legislate with respect to economic, social and educational affairs, without any interference from the Netherlands Government. The transmission of information on any of these subjects by the Netherlands Government, and the assumption of responsibility which the transmission of information entails, would therefore be an infringement of the autonomy of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles and contrary to the constitutional provisions of the two Territories concerned, as well as to the Constitution of the Netherlands.

154. Since Article 73 e of the Charter states that the obligation to transmit information to the Secretary-General is "subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations may require", the Netherlands Government believed that that article fully authorized the cessation of the transmission of information, in the circumstances which I have just described. This view was supported by representatives of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, who declared that their governments and parliaments considered that the transmission of information by the Netherlands Government was incompatible with the implementation and development of the autonomy already established in their countries, and felt that, from a constitutional point of view, they could not be expected to transmit that information to the Netherlands Government for communication to the United Nations under Article 73 e of the Charter.

155. Nevertheless, the Fourth Committee adopted draft resolution VI containing an amendment by the Soviet Union, by which the Netherlands Government was requested "to transmit regularly to the Secretary-General the information specified in Article 73 e of the Charter in regard to the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam until such time as the General Assembly takes a decision that the transmission of information in regard to those Territories should be discontinued."

156. Now that that draft resolution, including operative paragraph 6, which has just been quoted, has been adopted by the General Assembly, I shall not dwell on the question whether it is within the competence of the General Assembly to decide when the transmission of information on a Non-Self-Governing Territory may cease, a competence which the Netherlands Government emphatically denies. I wish only to express the regret of my delegation that the aforesaid paragraph 6 should have been included in this resolution and to state that, whatever the opinion of the majority of the members of the General Assembly may be on this question, the Netherlands Government cannot possibly act in a way which would be contrary to its own laws and Constitution; nor is it prepared to take steps which would be at variance with the opinion and the wishes of the governments and parliaments of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, whose interests are at stake in this controversy.

157. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now vote on the first five paragraphs of the preamble of draft resolution VII.

The paragraphs were adopted by 39 votes to none, with 17 abstentions.

158. The PRESIDENT: We shall now vote on the sixth: paragraph of the preamble. A roll-call vote has been requested.

A vote was taken by roll call.

The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, having been drawn by lot by the President, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Burma, Byelorussian SSR, Chile, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian SSR.

Against: United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, France, Iceland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Sweden, Turkey, Union of South Africa.

Abstaining: Brazil, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Honduras, Israel, Nicaragua, Peru.

The paragraph was adopted by 34 votes to 19, with 7 abstentions.

159. The PRESIDENT: We shall now vote on the whole of the operative part of the draft resolution.

The operative part of the draft resolution was adopted by 26 votes to 11, with 19 abstentions.

160. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now vote on draft resolution VII as a whole. A roll-call vote has been requested.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

The Union of South Africa, having been drawn by lot by the President, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: United States of America, Uruguay, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, Iran, Israel, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Thailand, Turkey.

Against: Union of South Africa, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Australia, Belgium, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Mexico, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic.

Abstaining: United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Venezuela, Yemen, Afghanistan, Argentina, Denmark, Egypt, France, Iceland, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria.

The draft resolution as a whole was adopted by 26 votes to 16, with 18 abstentions. 248

161. Sir Percy SPENDER (Australia): My delegation was compelled to vote against the draft resolution concerning the cessation of the transmission of information on Puerto Rico. My delegation has consistently held the view that the General Assembly is not competent to decide when a territory has reached such a stage of development that information on economic, social and educational advancement, under Article 73 e of the Charter, should cease. The competence to decide such a question rests, in the view of my delegation, solely with the administering Power concerned, in this case the United States of America.

162. We recognize that Puerto Rico has, under the wise and benevolent guidance of the United States, reached a stage when it is no longer necessary, or indeed possible, for the United States to submit information. This has been decided by the United States and the General Assembly is not, under the Charter, called upon to express any conclusion on the question. My delegation has taken precisely the same attitude, firmly based on the principle I have enunciated, in respect of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam. No other attitude, we think, could be, on our interpretation of the Charter, possible or justified.

163. The resolution which has just been voted upon asserts the competence of the General Assembly to decide on this issue, and, though its conclusion accords with the decision of the United States Government, it conflicts, in our view, with the clear principle which I have stated. My vote, therefore, should not be interpreted in any way as denying the indisputable fact that it is no longer necessary for the United States to continue the transmission of information on Puerto Rico, but as a protest against what we regard as an unwarranted assumption of competence on the part of the Assembly to decide on this issue.

164. Mrs. BOLTON (United States of America): The United States delegation voted for resolutions II, IV and VII. We regret that we were unable to support resolutions I, III, V and VI.

165. With particular regard to the resolution on Puerto Rico, I should like to say that the United States voted in favour of resolution VII because it expresses the agreement of the General Assembly with the conclusion reached by my Government that Puerto Rico has ceased to be a Non-Self-Governing Territory within the meaning of Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter. In a matter of this sort, the role of the General Assembly is limited by the Charter provisions to discussion, expression of views and recommendations. The decision as to whether a territory has ceased to be non-self-governing is one which in the last analysis can only be made by the administering Power.

166. In the case of Puerto Rico, the General Assembly has discussed the status of that territory and in the resolution just voted has expressed its view that Puerto Rico is no longer a Non-Self-Governing Territory under the terms of Article 73 e of the Charter. Whatever the language of the resolution, the General Assembly cannot and does not decide on the status of a territory with reference to the provisions of Article 73. Any participation by the Assembly in such a decision is of course limited to discussion, expression of views and recommendation. In the light of this understanding of the matter, my delegation voted for the resolution which we have just adopted.

167. Finally, I wish to pay a tribute to that outstanding Puerto Rican statesman, Governor Luis Muñoz Marín. Under his leadership, the highly cultured people of Puerto Rico are making a splendid contribution to democracy and freedom. In the future, as in the past, his administration will continue to protect the legitimate rights of minority parties and the cherished freedoms guaranteed in the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. In defence of these ideals, Puerto Rican soldiers fought for the United Nations in Korea, and we can be confident that the great objectives of the United Nations will nowhere find more devoted support than in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

168. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) (translated from Spanish): The delegation of the Dominican Republic was pleased to be able to reaffirm the vote it cast in the Fourth Committee in favour of the draft resolution concerning the cessation of information on Puerto Rico. The attitude of my delegation, adopted on the official instructions of the Dominican Government, is that, as a result of its constitutional status and its recent transformation into a free State associated with the United States, Puerto Rico has attained self-government, and that therefore the submission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter is no longer required of the late administering Power, the United States.

169. Moreover, the decisive factor for us has been the principle of the self-determination of peoples, in which, as expressed through various electoral processes, we found an overriding argument in confirmation of Puerto Rico's status in international law within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter; another such argument was derived from the internal development of its constitutional institutions.

170. My delegation cannot conceal the feelings aroused in us by the official declaration made this afternoon by Mr. Lodge on behalf of President Eisenhower. His words lend a brilliant lustre to the resolution which the Assembly has just adopted, while at the same time doing honour to the United States, and confirming our belief that the fate of Puerto Rico is closely linked with our own, with that of our America and with that of the United Nations; today more than ever the Puerto Rican people can count on the enthusiastic and fraternal support of the whole community of nations.

171. Mrs. MENON (India): We listened with great interest to the announcement made by the representative of the United States Government on behalf of the President of the United States. On behalf of my delegation I should like to give this assurance to the representative of the United States. When the Puerto Ricans become completely free, India will be the first country to congratulate the United States Government on the fulfilment of this noble task, thus setting an example to the other administering Members of the United Nations. In the meantime, my delegation was compelled to vote against draft resolution VII, the resolution on the cessation of information on Puerto Rico by the United States Government, because it felt that the General Assembly had not considered the question in a proper manner.

172. When the matter was raised in the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, my delegation voted in favour of a final decision being taken by the General Assembly. It does so for two reasons: first, because it is the opinion of my delegation that the General Assembly is alone competent to take such a decision on an important question and, secondly, because my delegation believed that a fuller examination of the subject would be possible in the Fourth Committee. The Secretary-General had, meanwhile, received many communications from leading political parties and representatives of those groups, asking for oral hearings before the Committee took its decision. My delegation, along with others voted in favour of granting those petitions, but the suggestion was not adopted. When that happened, my delegation moved an amendment to the draft resolution, requesting the appointment of an ad hoc committee which would study the question, examine the petitions for oral hearings, grant oral hearings and present a report to the Committee next year. Of course, that would have meant a delay of one year. It is not much when we consider that the future and welfare of over 2 million people in Puerto Rico depended on our decision.

173. My delegation has always accorded its full measure of appreciation to the United States Government for the loyalty, sincerity and devotion with which it has always fulfilled its obligations under the Charter, and for the general principles which motivate its present position with regard to Puerto Rico. But this sincere appreciation should not blind us to the fact that the question of the future of a people, not only civilized but the proud possessors of a rich cultural heritage, deserves our careful study. No excuse can justify any haste in this matter, for any step we might take will have far-reaching effects not only on the future of Puerto Rico and its 2 million people, but on the other nearly 18 million people bravely fighting helplessly for their rights against racial discrimination, economic exploitation and political domination. These people look to the United Nations with hope, and our actions should help justify that hope.

174. It is in this wider context that my delegation voted against the resolution. It has been claimed that Puerto Rico has reached a full measure of self-government as envisaged in Chapter XI of the Charter, and that therefore the United States Government should not be called upon to fulfil its obligations under Article 73 e. We have no doubt that constitutional changes have taken place in Puerto Rico, and Puerto Ricans have agreed to a compact with the United States. We have studied the relevant documents with great care. Two things have emerged from that study.

175. The first is that the degree of self-government enjoyed by Puerto Rico under the new constitutional arrangement does not keep it outside the scope of Article 73 e. The second is that, while we do not deny Puerto Rico the right to enter into any kind of arrangement with the United States or any other country, we hold that this can be done validly only after two conditions have been met: when Puerto Rico is fully independent of external pressures at the time of executing such a compact; and when the democratic processes claimed, such as referendum or plebiscite, are conducted in an atmosphere of complete democratic freedom. My delegation is not satisfied that these things have been done in the manner envisaged in the United Nations Charter.

176. It is also the view of my delegation that the administering Member may not abandon its sacred trust or the General Assembly its responsibility without adequate and mature consideration. The protection guaranteed under Chapter XI is deemed necessary for the development of dependent peoples in Non-Self-Governing Territories towards a full measure of self-government. The General Assembly cannot barter away that protection, it cannot ignore that guarantee on the recommendation of the administering Members alone. Nor should we, the non-administering Members of the United Nations here, deal with such questions in a hasty or lighthearted manner. It is well to remember that the paramount consideration is the welfare of the peoples of the dependent territories.

177. To sum up, my delegation is not convinced that Puerto Rico, under its present association with the United States, has become a self-governing territory. In our opinion, there can be no free, just or valid compact, association or agreement between two countries or territories except on a basis of equality. We believe that independence should precede any voluntary association, and the link of an equal and voluntary union between peoples forged out of a genuine desire for co-operation is not incompatible with independence, whereas an association of States under any form in which the inequality of status is not redeemed, would only camouflage the relics of a colonial past. This would be contrary to the Charter, which aims not at the creation or perpetuation of colonialism in some form or other, but its total and complete elimination from the political system and thought of the new world. Therefore my delegation was compelled to vote against a resolution which did not take into account the desire of the Puerto Ricans for international guarantees during the period of its tutelage and the fulfilment of their just aspirations for freedom.

The meeting rose at 6.30 p.m.

FACTORS WHICH SHOULD BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN DECIDING
WHETHER A TERRITORY IS OR IS NOT A TERRITORY WHOSE PEOPLE
HAVE NOT YET ATTAINED A FULL MEASURE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

2. The Fourth Committee decided to deal first with item 33, and discussed it from its 322nd to 331st meetings. The Committee had before it the report of the 1953 Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2428), containing a list of factors indicative of the attainment of a full measure of self-government by Non-Self-Governing Territories.

3. At the 325th meeting, Brazil submitted a draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272), according to which the General Assembly would: (1) take note of the conclusions of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee; (2) approve the list of factors contained in that report; (3) recommend that the annexed list of factors should be taken by the Administering Members and the General Assembly as a guide and applied in the light of all relevant circumstances pertinent to each particular situation, in determining whether any Territory, due to changes in its constitutional status, is or is no longer within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter, in order that, in view of the documentation provided under resolution 222 (III), a decision might be taken on the continuation or cessation of the transmission of information required by Chapter XI of the Charter; (4) recommend that in the study of each case paramount consideration should be given to the evidence which might indicate that the people concerned had exercised its rights to self-determination; (5) reaffirm that the factors, while serving as a guide in determining whether the obligations as set forth in Article 73 e of the Charter shall exist, should in no way be interpreted as a hindrance to the attainment of a full measure of self-government by a Non-Self-Governing Territory; (6) further reaffirm that, for a Territory to be deemed self-governing in economic, social or educational affairs it was essential that its people should have attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter; (7) further instruct the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to study any documentation transmitted hereafter under resolution 222 (III) adopted on 3 November 1948, in the light of the list of factors approved by the present resolution, among other relevant considerations which might arise from each concrete case of cessation of information, when the Committee discharged the responsibilities entrusted to it by paragraph 1 of resolution 334 (IV) adopted on 2 December 1949, and paragraph 2 of resolution 448 (V) adopted on 12 December 1950; and (8) recommend that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories should take the initiative of proposing to the General Assembly revisions and interpretations of, or additions to, the list of factors whenever, due to difficulties of application or the arising of new circumstances, the Committee found it so advisable.

4. Joint amendments to this draft resolution were proposed by Bolivia, Egypt, Guatemala, Indonesia, Iraq, Mexico, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Venezuela, Yemen and Yugoslavia (A/C.4/L.273). These amendments would: (1) insert after the second paragraph of the preamble as a new paragraph the following text: "Having regard to the competence of the General Assembly to consider the principles that should guide the United Nations and the Member States in the implementation of obligations arising from Chapter XI of the Charter and to make recommendations in connexion with them"; (2) delete the fourth paragraph of the preamble of the draft resolution; (3) replace paragraph 2 of the operative part by the following text: "Approves the list of factors which is attached to this resolution as a part thereof"; (4) amend the first sentence of paragraph 3 of the operative part to read as follows: "Recommends that the annexed list of factors should be used by the General Assembly and the Administering Members as a guide ... etc."; delete from the same paragraph the sentence: "... and applied in the light of all relevant circumstances pertinent to each particular situation..."; and insert in the same paragraph, between the words "may be taken" and "on the continuation", the words "by the General Assembly"; (5) replace paragraph 4 of the operative part by the following text: "Reasserts that each concrete case should be considered and decided upon in the light of the particular circumstances of that case and taking into account the right of self-determination of peoples"; (6) insert after paragraph 4, the following texts as paragraphs 5 and 6: "5. Considers that the validity of any form of association between a Non-Self-Governing Territory and a metropolitan or any other country essentially depends on the freely expressed will of the people at the time of the taking of this decision; 6. Considers that the manner in which territories referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter can become fully self-governing is through the attainment of independence, although it is recognized that self-government can also be achieved by association with another State or group of States if this is done freely and on the basis of absolute equality"; (7) renumber paragraph 5 of the operative part as paragraph 7, replacing the words "in Article 73 e" by the words "in Chapter XI"; (8) delete at the end of paragraph 6 of the draft resolution, which should now become paragraph 8, the words "as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter"; (9) delete in paragraph 7 of the draft resolution, which should now become paragraph 9, the word "further", and delete the rest of the paragraph following the words "of cessation of information"; (10) replace the last paragraph of the draft resolution by the following text: "Recommends that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories take the initiative of proposing modifications at any time to improve the list of factors, as may seem necessary in the light of circumstances".

5. Amendments (A/C.4/L.274) to the list of factors approved by the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2428) were proposed by the same eleven sponsors of the above joint amendments. The amendments were as follows:

First part (Factors indicative of the attainment of independence) - Replace factor A.4 by the following: "National defence. Sovereign right to provide for its national defence".

Second part - (1) Replace the present heading by the following: "Factors indicative of the attainment of other separate systems of self-government"; (2) change factor A.1 to become factor A.6; (3) change factor A.2 to become factor A.1; (4) insert the following text to become factor A.2: "Freedom of choice. Freedom of choosing on the basis of the right of self-determination of peoples between several possibilities, including independence"; (5) replace the present wording of factor A.3 by the following: "Voluntary limitation of sovereignty. Degree of evidence that the attribute or attributes of sovereignty which are not individually exercised will be collectively exercised by the larger entity thus associated and the freedom of the population of a Territory which has associated itself with the metropolitan country to modify at any time this status through the expression of their will by democratic means"; (6) insert as a new factor A.4 the following text: "Geographical considerations. Extent to which the relations of the Non-Self-Governing Territory with the capital of the metropolitan government may be affected by circumstances arising out of their respective geographical positions, such as separation by land, sea or other natural obstacles; and extent to which the interests of boundary States may be affected, bearing in mind the general principle of good-neighbourliness referred to in Article 74 of the Charter"; (7) insert as a new factor A.5 the following text: "Ethnic and cultural considerations. Extent to which the populations are of different race, language or religion or have a distinct cultural heritage, interests or aspirations, distinguishing them from the peoples of the country with which they freely associate themselves"; (8) insert as a new factor B.2 the following text: "Change of political status. The right of the metropolitan country or the Territory to change the political status of that Territory in the light of the consideration whether that Territory is or is not subject to any claim or litigation on the part of another State"; (9) change existing factor B.2 to become B.3.

Third part (Factors indicative of the free association of a Territory with the metropolitan or other country as an integral part of that country) - (1) Insert between the words "Territory" and "with" in the heading of this part the following words: "on equal basis"; (2) add at the end of the heading the following: "or in any other form"; (3) change factor A.1 to become factor A.5; (4) change factor A.2 to become factor A.1; (5) insert as factor A.2 the following text: "The freedom of the population of a Non-Self-Governing Territory which has associated itself with the metropolitan country as an integral part of that country or in any other form to modify this status through the expression of their will by democratic means"; (6) add the following text to the existing factor A.3: "The right of the metropolitan country or the Territory to change the political status of that Territory in the light of the consideration whether that Territory is or is not subject to any claim or litigation on the part of another State"; (7) delete in factor A.5, now becoming A.6, the following sentence: "... (a) by virtue of the constitution of the metropolitan country, or (b)"; (8) insert as factor B.2 the text of factor C.2 from the second part of the list of factors. Factors B.2 and 3 to become 3 and 4; (9) insert as factor C.5 the text of factor C.3 from the second part of the list of factors.

6. The Chairman suggested to the Fourth Committee for its consideration that it should vote on the basis of the Brazilian draft resolution and the amendments thereto. Consequently, on reaching operative paragraph 2 of the draft resolution which proposed to approve the list of factors contained in the report of the Ad Hoc Committee, the amendment approving an "annexed list" would be considered and, if adopted, would lead to the immediate consideration of the list of factors and of the amendments thereto.

7. At its 329th meeting, however, following an oral proposal by the representative of Guatemala, the Committee decided, by 26 votes to 22, with 4 abstentions, to vote on the list of factors approved by the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (A/2428) and the amendments thereto proposed by Bolivia, Egypt, Guatemala, Indonesia, Iraq, Mexico, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Venezuela, Yemen and Yugoslavia (A/C.4/L.274), as set out in paragraph 5 above.

10. At its 330th meeting, the Committee voted on the draft resolution submitted by Brazil (A/C.4/L.272), paragraph by paragraph, and on the amendments thereto (A/C.4/L.273, L.275, L.277).

11. In a statement made before the vote was taken, the representative of Brazil announced that, in view of the adoption at the 329th meeting of an amended list of factors, his delegation had considered withdrawing its draft resolution. In order, however, not to complicate the work of the Committee, it had been decided to maintain the draft resolution since, in the event that its operative paragraph 2 were adopted, that would have the effect of annulling the amended list of factors. He wished to place on record that Brazil's action was designed to facilitate the work of the Committee and that his delegation reserved its position in subsequent discussion of this subject in the General Assembly.

12. The result of the voting on the preamble of the draft resolution was as follows:

The first and second paragraphs were adopted unanimously.

The proposed amendment to insert a new third paragraph as set out in document A/C.4/L.273 was adopted by a roll-call vote of 37 to 11, with 2 abstentions, as follows:

In favour:

The original third paragraph, which thus becomes the fourth paragraph, was adopted unanimously.

As a result of the vote recorded later on operative paragraph 2, the original fourth paragraph of the preamble was deleted.

13. The result of the voting on the operative part of the draft resolution was as follows:

Paragraph 1 was adopted unanimously.

Paragraph 2. At the request of the representative of Haiti, the proposed amendment set out in document A/C.4/L.273, was voted on in two parts.

The first part, reading "Approves the list of factors which is attached to this resolution", was rejected by 24 votes to 20, with 3 abstentions. As a result, the second part, reading "as a part thereof", became meaningless and was not voted upon. India submitted an amendment (A/C.4/L.277) to the draft resolution to replace the words "contained in that report" by the words "as adopted by the Fourth Committee". The Committee decided, by 25 votes to 19, with 4 abstentions, to vote on this amendment, which was adopted by a roll-call vote of 30 to 18, with 4 abstentions. The proposed amendment to delete the words "and applied in the light of all relevant circumstances pertinent to each particular situation" was adopted by 26 votes to 18, with 6 abstentions. The Philippines proposed two amendments (A/C.4/L.275): the first was to insert the words "in appropriate consultations" between the words "as a guide" and "and applied", and the second was to replace the words "a decision may be taken" by the words "agreement may be reached". Paragraph 6. At the request of the representative of Poland, the proposed amendment to insert as paragraph 6 a new text as set out in document A/C.4/L.273 was voted on in two parts. The first part, reading "Considers that the manner in which territories referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter can become fully self-governing is primarily through the attainment of independence", was adopted by a roll-call vote of 35 to 13, with 4 abstentions. The result of the voting was as follows:

The paragraph, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 28 votes to 21, with 2 abstentions. An amendment (A/C.4/L.276) proposed by the United States of America to insert between the original paragraphs 7 and 8, a new paragraph, reading: "Requests the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to study the views expressed by the Members of the General Assembly at its eighth session as recorded in the appropriate summary records in connexion with any consideration by the Committee of a further revision of the list of factors", was withdrawn.

Paragraph 10. The proposed amendment to replace the original paragraph 8 with a new text as set out in document A/C.4/L.273, to become paragraph 10, was adopted by 33 votes to 13, with 4 abstentions.

RESOLUTION I

FACTORS WHICH SHOULD BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN DECIDING WHETHER A TERRITORY IS OR IS NOT A
TERRITORY WHOSE PEOPLE HAVE NOT YET ATTAINED
A FULL MEASURE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

The General Assembly,

Bearing in mind the principles embodied in the Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories and the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter,

Recalling the provisions of resolutions 567 (VI) and 648 (VII), adopted by the General Assembly on 18 January and 10 December 1952 respectively, indicating the value of establishing a list of factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government,

Having regard to the competence of the General Assembly to consider the principles that should guide the United Nations and the Member States in the implementation of obligations arising from Chapter XI of the Charter and to make recommendations in connexion with them,

Having examined the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) set up by resolution 648 (VII) (A/2428),

1. Takes note of the conclusions of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories);
2. Approves the list of factors as adopted by the Fourth Committee;
3. Recommends that the annexed list of factors should be used by the General Assembly and the Administering Members as a guide in determining whether any Territory, due to changes in its constitutional status, is or is no longer within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter, in order that, in view of the documentation provided under resolution 222 (III) of 3 November 1948, a decision may be taken by the General Assembly on the continuation or cessation of the transmission of information required by Chapter XI of the Charter;

4. Reasserts that each concrete case should be considered and decided upon in the light of the particular circumstances of that case and taking into account the right of self-determination of peoples;

5. Considers that the validity of any form of association between a Non-Self-Governing Territory and a metropolitan or any other country essentially depends on the freely expressed will of the people at the time of the taking of the decision;

6. Considers that the manner in which Territories referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter can become fully self-governing is primarily through the attainment of independence, although it is recognized that self-government can also be achieved by association with another State or group of States if this is done freely and on the basis of absolute equality;

7. Reaffirms that the factors, while serving as a guide in determining whether the obligations as set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter shall exist, should in no way be interpreted as a hindrance to the attainment of a full measure of self-government by a Non-Self-Governing Territory;

8. Further reaffirms that, for a Territory to be deemed self-governing in economic, social or educational affairs it is essential that its people shall have attained a full measure of self-government;

9. Instructs the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to study any documentation transmitted hereafter under resolution 222 (III) in the light of the list of factors approved by the present resolution, among other relevant considerations which may arise from each concrete case of cessation of information;

10. Recommends that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories take the initiative of proposing modifications at any time to improve the list of factors, as may seem necessary in the light of circumstances.

Second Part

FACTORS INDICATIVE OF THE ATTAINMENT OF OTHER SEPARATE SYSTEMS OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

A. General

1. Opinion of the population. The opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.
2. Freedom of choice. Freedom of choosing on the basis of the right of self-determination of peoples between several possibilities, including independence.
3. Voluntary limitation of sovereignty. Degree of evidence that the attribute or attributes of sovereignty which are not individually exercised will be collectively exercised by the larger entity thus associated and the freedom of the population of a territory which has associated itself with the metropolitan country to modify at any time this status through the expression of their will by democratic means.
4. Geographical considerations. Extent to which the relations of the Non-Self-Governing Territory with the capital of the metropolitan government may be affected by circumstances arising out of their respective geographical positions, such as separation by land, sea or other natural obstacles; and extent to which the interests of boundary States may be affected, bearing in mind the general principle of good-neighbourliness referred to in Article 74 of the Charter.
5. Ethnic and cultural considerations. Extent to which the populations are of different race, language or religion or have a distinct cultural heritage, interests or aspirations, distinguishing them from the peoples of the country with which they freely associate themselves.
6. Political advancement. Political advancement of the population sufficient to enable them to decide upon the future destiny of the territory with due knowledge.

B. International status

1. General international relations. Degree or extent to which the territory exercises the power to enter freely into direct relations of every kind with other governments and with international institutions and to negotiate, sign and ratify international instruments freely. Degree or extent to which the metropolitan country is bound, through constitutional provisions or legislative means, by the freely expressed wishes of the territory in negotiating, signing and ratifying international conventions which may influence conditions in the territory.

2. Change of political status. The right of the metropolitan country or the territory to change the political status of that territory in the light of the consideration whether that territory is or is not subject to any claim or litigation on the part of another State.

3. Eligibility for membership in the United Nations.

C. Internal self-government

1. Territorial government. Nature and measure of control or interference, if any, by the government of another State in respect of the internal government, for example, in respect of the following:

Legislature: The enactment of laws for the territory by an indigenous body whether fully elected by free and democratic processes or lawfully constituted in a manner receiving the free consent of the population;

Executive: The selection of members of the executive branch of the government by the competent authority in the territory receiving consent of the indigenous population, whether that authority is hereditary or elected, having regard also to the nature and measure of control, if any, by an outside agency on that authority, whether directly or indirectly exercised in the constitution and conduct of the executive branch of the government;

Judiciary: The establishment of courts of law and the selection of judges.

2. Participation of the population. Effective participation of the population in the government of the territory: (a) Is there an adequate and appropriate electoral and representative system? (b) Is this electoral system conducted without direct or indirect interference from a foreign government? 1/

1/ For example, the following questions would be relevant: (i) Has each adult inhabitant equal power (subject to special safeguards for minorities) to determine the character of the government of the territory? (ii) Is this power exercised freely, i.e. is there an absence of undue influence over and coercion of the voter and of the imposition of disabilities on particular political parties? Some tests which can be used in the application of this factor are as follows:

- (a) The existence of effective measures to ensure the democratic expression of the will of the people;
 - (b) The existence of more than one political party in the territory;
 - (c) The existence of a secret ballot;
 - (d) The existence of legal prohibitions on the exercise of undemocratic practices in the course of elections;
 - (e) The existence for the individual elector of a choice between candidates of differing political parties;
 - (f) The absence of "martial law" and similar measures at election times.
- (iii) Is each individual free to express his political opinions, to support or oppose any political party or cause, and to criticize the government of the day?

3. Economic, social and cultural jurisdiction. Degree of autonomy in respect of economic, social and cultural affairs, as illustrated by the degree of freedom from economic pressure as exercised, for example, by a foreign minority group which, by virtue of the help of a foreign Power, has acquired a privileged economic status prejudicial to the general economic interest of the people of the territory; and by the degree of freedom and lack of discrimination against the indigenous population of the territory in social legislation and social developments.

Third Part

A. General

1. Opinion of the population. The opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.

2. Freedom of choice. The freedom of the population of a Non-Self-Governing Territory which has associated itself with the metropolitan country as an integral part of that country or in any other form to modify this status through the expression of their will by democratic means.

3. Geographical considerations. Extent to which the relations of the territory with the capital of the central government may be affected by circumstances arising out of their respective geographical positions, such as separation by land, sea or other natural obstacles. The right of the metropolitan country or the Territory to change the political status of that Territory in the light of the consideration whether that Territory is or is not subject to any claim or litigation on the part of another State.

4. Ethnic and cultural considerations. Extent to which the population are of different race, language or religion or have a distinct cultural heritage, interests or aspirations, distinguishing them from the peoples of the country with which they freely associate themselves.

5. Political advancement. Political advancement of the population sufficient to enable them to decide upon the future destiny of the territory with due knowledge.

6. Constitutional considerations. Association by virtue of a treaty or bilateral agreement affecting the status of the territory, taking into account

(i) whether the constitutional guarantees extend equally to the associated territory; (ii) whether there are powers in certain matters constitutionally reserved to the territory or to the central authority; and (iii) whether there is provision for the participation of the territory on a basis of equality in any changes in the constitutional system of the State.

B. Status

1. Legislative representation. Representation without discrimination in the central legislative organs on the same basis as other inhabitants and regions.

2. Participation of the population. Effective participation of the population in the government of the territory: (a) Is there an adequate and appropriate electoral and representative system? (b) Is this electoral system conducted without direct or indirect interference from a foreign government? 2/

3. Citizenship. Citizenship without discrimination on the same basis as other inhabitants.

4. Government officials. Eligibility of officials from the territory to all public offices of the central authority, by appointment or election, on the same basis as those from other parts of the country.

C. Internal constitutional conditions

1. Suffrage. Universal and equal suffrage, and free periodic elections, characterized by an absence of undue influence over and coercion of the voter or of the imposition of disabilities on particular political parties. 3/

2/ See previous footnote 1.

3/ For example, the following tests would be relevant:

- (a) The existence of effective measures to ensure the democratic expression of the will of the people;
- (b) The existence of more than one political party in the territory;
- (c) The existence of a secret ballot;
- (d) The existence of legal prohibitions on the exercise of undemocratic practices in the course of elections;
- (e) The existence for the individual elector of a choice between candidates of differing political parties;
- (f) The absence of "martial law" and similar measures at election times;
- (g) Freedom of each individual to express his political opinions, to support or oppose any political party or cause, and to criticize the government of the day.

2. Local rights and status. In a unitary system equal rights and status for the inhabitants and local bodies of the territory as enjoyed by inhabitants and local bodies of other parts of the country; in a federal system an identical degree of self-government for the inhabitants and local bodies of all parts of the federation.
3. Local officials. Appointment or election of officials in the territory on the same basis as those in other parts of the country.
4. Internal legislation. Local self-government of the same scope and under the same conditions as enjoyed by other parts of the country.
5. Economic, social and cultural jurisdiction. Degree of autonomy in respect of economic, social and cultural affairs, as illustrated by the degree of freedom from economic pressure as exercised, for example, by a foreign minority group which, by virtue of the help of a foreign Power, has acquired a privileged economic status prejudicial to the general economic interest of the people of the territory; and by the degree of freedom and lack of discrimination against the indigenous population of the territory in social legislation and social developments.

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (continued)	35

Chairman: Mr. Santiago PEREZ PEREZ (Venezuela).

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/2428) (continued)

[Item 33]*

9. Mrs. MENON (India) pointed out that the problem of factors had been before the General Assembly from its inception. In 1946, the administering Members had undertaken to transmit information to the Secretary-General in respect of seventy-four territories.

* Indicates the item number on the agenda of the General Assembly.

That list, though incomplete, had been accepted without question by the General Assembly (resolution 66 (I)). By 1948, however, information had ceased to be supplied in the case of eleven of those territories. Many members of the General Assembly had felt that it was entitled to be informed of the reasons which led to the cessation of information, and resolution 222 (III) had been adopted. The study of factors sprang from that resolution.

10. The latest report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (A/2428) added very little of substance to the report to the seventh session of the General Assembly (A/2178). Her delegation did not think that any useful purpose would be served by further academic examination of the matter, particularly since there was general agreement that a list of factors such as that studied by the Ad Hoc Committee could serve only as a guide, and that each case would need special study and careful examination.

11. The administering and non-administering members of the Committee were not agreed on the definition of self-government. That, however, must be examined as a separate issue with reference to each case. For the moment, the Committee was concerned only with the Ad Hoc Committee's report, which her delegation would accept as providing adequate guidance for the future consideration of practical problems. Since the basic concepts of national sovereignty and self-government were being constantly modified to meet the growing demands of international co-operation, any factors that might be approved could not be too rigidly enumerated or defined. While self-government could not be measured by the yardstick of factors, because the struggle to be free symbolized the will of the people resisting domination, the list of factors might help the Committee to understand individual situations vitiated by the conflict of interests between the administering Powers and the dependent peoples.

12. It was quite possible that the list of factors might be interpreted or misinterpreted to suit the convenience of various delegations, but any further attempt at definition would be of little help. The Committee should resist any attempt to curtail the right of self-determination and the right to a full measure of self-government envisaged in Chapter XI. It should ensure that the advent of self-government was not delayed by the attempts of the administering Powers to disclaim responsibility while retaining control. It was in that spirit and in full realization of the purposes of Chapter XI that her delegation commended the report of the Ad Hoc Committee.

13. Mr. SPITS (Netherlands) pointed out that paragraph 9 of the Ad Hoc Committee's report showed that, in that Committee's opinion, no further study of the subject was necessary. The factors had been considered successively, in 1951 by the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter, and its Sub-Committee, as well as by the Fourth Committee of the sixth session of the General Assembly and Sub-Committee 9 of the Fourth Committee; in 1952, by an Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) and by the Fourth Committee of the seventh session of the General Assembly; and in 1953 by the Ad Hoc Committee whose report was now under consideration. In the opinion of the Netherlands delegation such prolonged study had been necessary because the General Assembly had been trying to carry out an impossible task. When the last Ad Hoc Committee had tried to define "a full measure of self-government", it had been unable to do so, for the good reason that that concept could not be framed in a definition. Hence any attempt to enunciate principles in that respect was doomed to failure, or at least could produce only incomplete results.

14. In 1931, the United Kingdom Government had applied to the League of Nations to be relieved of the mandate over Iraq. When that request was being examined by the Permanent Mandates Commission, the proposal had been made that general criteria should be established for the purpose of determining whether a mandated territory had developed politically to such an extent that it could be considered as fully self-governing. After thorough consideration, the Mandates Commission had come to the conclusion that it was impossible to establish general rules, since the question whether a territory should be regarded as self-governing was a question not of principle but of fact. That conclusion was equally true today.

15. The Ad Hoc Committee had, however, approved a list of factors and the best the Fourth Committee could do was to consider that list as final. The factors enumerated might serve as a guide for an administering Power which had decided to cease to transmit information in respect of a certain territory in communicating the data called for in General Assembly resolution 222 (III). In many cases they would not be applicable, because the answer to the question whether a territory was or was not self-governing depended not only on the mechanical application of the tests enumerated in the list but also, and to a still greater extent, on political and social conditions within the territory and any ties it might have with another country. Those circumstances determined the territory's status, and only those who were fully acquainted with them—i. e., the governments of the territory itself and of the former administering Power—could decide whether self-government had been achieved.

16. Mr. DJERDJA (Yugoslavia) drew attention to the fact that of the original seventy-four Non-Self-Governing Territories on which information had been submitted, fifteen were no longer under the supervision of the United Nations. In other words, the administering Powers were showing an increasing tendency to by-pass the United Nations in revising the status of various Non-Self-Governing Territories. Such a procedure jeopardized all that the international community had had in mind in adopting Chapter XI of the Charter. Viewed in that light, the question of factors was not an academic question and could not be treated in an academic manner. It was a delicate legal and political question. Much would depend on the Committee's answer to the question whether it was permissible that non-self-governing peoples should be deprived of international protection by unilateral action.

17. He congratulated those concerned with the work of the Ad Hoc Committee on their efforts in preparing the report in its existing form. It contained a number of relatively clear concepts which might provide a solid basis for the further refining and clarification of the list of factors which, in paragraph 9 of the report, the Ad Hoc Committee itself recognized as possible.

18. The list of factors should be drafted in the light of the purposes and principles of the Charter and the duty of the General Assembly in each individual case. Chapter XI had been included to ensure the international protection of non-self-governing peoples and their unhindered advancement towards emancipation.

The fate of those peoples had become so closely linked to the general efforts of the international community to promote progress and world peace that it could no longer be left within the exclusive competence of individual States; it had become a question of international concern. The protection of non-self-governing peoples should cover all the phases of their development until the attainment of the final goal, namely, independence or a full measure of self-government.

19. Article 1, paragraph 2, of the Charter contained the essential elements by which the Administering Members and the United Nations must be guided in solving problems concerning Non-Self-Governing Territories, namely, the right of self-determination and the equality of peoples and the link between those considerations and the efforts of the United Nations to consolidate world peace. The right to self-determination was embodied in Chapter XI, in which the Administering Members recognized that the interests of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories were paramount, that it was their duty to promote their political, economic and social progress, to develop self-government and to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples with the ultimate purpose of leading them to full self-government. In accepting those obligations the Administering Members had indicated that they would be guided by them until the final aims of Chapter XI had been fulfilled, and at the first session of the General Assembly they had stated their intention of submitting information on seventy-four territories. Since then, however, certain Administering Members had interpreted the purposes of Chapter XI unilaterally and had ceased to submit information on the pretext that the territory had attained a degree of self-government in certain spheres or had associated itself with the metropolitan country or one of its component parts. The United Nations had therefore been obliged to assume the task of ascertaining whether the degree of self-government was such that the territory no longer came within the purview of Chapter XI and that the mutual rights and obligations assumed under the Charter had ceased to exist. It had been compelled to examine the legality of the Administering Members' actions and to ascertain whether or not they were in harmony with the Charter.

20. It must be admitted that the report before the Committee did not clearly answer the precise questions raised by the actions of the Administering Members. It should be redrafted to make it an adequate instrument for implementing the right of self-determination.

21. Self-determination presupposed that a people should be absolutely free to choose between several possibilities, including independence, and also to revise its sovereign decision at a later date. His delegation would therefore give its full support to the proposal of the Guatemalan representative set forth in paragraph 21 of the Ad Hoc Committee's report. Any misunderstanding regarding its scope should be eliminated in view of the fact that the item on the agenda related to Non-Self-Governing Territories. The clearly and freely expressed will of the inhabitants should head any list of factors and constitute the highest law. Any other factors the Committee deemed it necessary to retain should appear more as conditions and guarantees of the respect for that basic factor than as decisive factors themselves. The recognition of the right of self-determination was the most solid basis for democratic relations, equal co-operation and international peace. Disregard for or violation of that right was the principal cause of the disturbances and dangers by which the world was plagued.

22. The argument that one territory might be inhabited by several peoples, requesting different solutions, could not offset the importance of the factor that the will of the inhabitants should always be respected. That argument, moreover, only strengthened his doubts about the value of the various administering unions, federations and so on, which were being established. They only hampered the just aspirations of the non-self-governing peoples to attain an independent existence by incorporating them in communities whose framework did not promote the realization of their aspirations. The artificial creation of cohesion and stability where there were no natural conditions for it must necessarily lead to instability and conflict.

23. His delegation could not agree that first place should be given to the factor of political advancement. Among the peoples demanding the fulfilment of their national aspirations, there were none whose consciousness, maturity and ability to decide their own fate could be questioned. In any case, who was competent to decide that issue and on the basis of what criteria? The mere fact that a people was stubbornly and with great sacrifices demanding its independence was sufficient proof of its political consciousness and made any legal and technical formulas superfluous.

24. Since the attainment of independence was the only normal outcome for the evolution of Non-Self-Governing Territories, there should be fewer factors in the first part of the list approved by the Ad Hoc Committee (A/2428, section VI). Factor A.1, "International responsibility", included all the other factors in that part and thereby rendered them more or less superfluous. The right of a State to request admission to the United Nations or to enter into international relations and to conclude military agreements were the inalienable attributes of external sovereignty and need not be mentioned separately. So far as the factors concerning internal government were concerned, his delegation did not consider them necessary or even recommendable. It went without saying that an independent State was competent in political, economic, social and cultural affairs. The system of government was the sole concern of the people of each State and any attempt to link the fate of a people to its form of government would constitute a violation of the Charter and of international law.

25. His delegation would find it difficult to accept the attainment of other systems of self-government in continuing association with the metropolitan country or in other forms as the ultimate outcome of political development. Nevertheless, should a people freely elect some form of association, it might be accepted, but only as a stage in their advance towards independence, the attainment of which would be rendered possible by further active assistance and control of the United Nations. In such cases it would be necessary to ensure that certain conditions obtained, inter alia, freedom of choice between several alternative possibilities including independence, the free acceptance of such status by the inhabitants of the Territory—the United Nations must have the opportunity of satisfying itself beforehand that such complete freedom of decision existed—the absence of any outside interference with the conduct of the external and internal affairs of the territory, the free request and granting of international recognition, the establishment of diplomatic and other relations, and the possibility of requesting admission in the United Nations.

26. While the wording of factor A.3 in the second part of the list, "Voluntary limitation of sovereignty" had been somewhat improved by the adoption of the Venezuelan representative's proposal (A/2428, para. 34), that factor should either be omitted, since no case of limitation of sovereignty had yet arisen, or it should be reworded in accordance with the proposal of the Guatemalan representative as set forth in paragraph 21 of the Ad Hoc Committee's report.

27. The incorporation of a Non-Self-Governing Territory into a metropolitan country or any of its component parts was completely unacceptable. It would not be consonant with the Charter, as it would substitute a decentralized provincial or regional local autonomy for full self-government. It would be even less acceptable were it the result of unilateral acts by the metropolitan country rather than the implementation of a sovereign decision and contractual agreement reached after consultation of the people and carried out with the active participation of the United Nations.

28. If the Committee were to set up a sub-committee such as that established at the sixth session, the list of factors could be considerably improved. The sub-committee could single out all the essential factors, word them appropriately and assign the factors to the place they deserved. That work could be completed in a relatively short time and the Committee should be able to apply the final list during the discussion of item 3 of its agenda. His delegation would welcome any initiative to that effect. If the list of factors remained unaltered, his delegation would have to consider carefully whether to vote in favour of it, although it did not deny its value. Further effort should, however, be devoted to the problem in order to reach a comprehensive solution.

29. U ON SEIN (Burma) observed that there were two alternatives before the United Nations in its examination of the somewhat complicated question at issue. The first would be to continue setting up committees to cover the same ground again and again in the hope of eventually producing an entirely satisfactory list of factors. The second would be to recognize honestly, as had already been done by the General Assembly in its resolution 648 (VII), that the list of factors could do no more than serve as a guide and that each case must be considered in the light of the particular circumstances. If the second alternative were chosen the list of factors could be approved during the current session and, despite its imperfections, would serve to assist both the Administering Members and the General Assembly in determining whether any particular territory had attained a full measure of self-government. In the light of that consideration the second alternative appeared preferable; indeed, if it were not adopted, the inference would be that certain delegations were unwilling to allow the General Assembly to establish factors which could serve as a yardstick for the progress of political self-government in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

30. In its reply of 3 July 1952 (A/AC.58/1/Add.3), the Government of the Union of Burma had already brought forward considerations of that nature, and it remained of the opinion that whether a territory had become self-governing as a separate entity or whether it had become associated with a metropolitan country on equal terms were questions of fact which must be determined in the light of the special circumstances of each case.

31. The Government of Burma continued to hold that the power of determining whether a country had become fully self-governing should be vested in the General Assembly. It recognized, however, that that view was opposed by the Administering Members. Furthermore, General Assembly resolution 648 (VII) provisionally approved a list of factors which might serve as a guide both for the General Assembly and the Administering Members, without indicating which should have the final say in the matter. The same course might be followed at the present session in approving a list of factors for general use. Occasions might arise in the future when the General Assembly and an Administering Member might disagree on whether the latter was justified in ceasing to transmit information on a certain territory. In that event all the complicated international issues involved would be examined on the basis of a concrete case. There was no need to press the theoretical question of the pre-eminence of the General Assembly or of the Administering Members until such a concrete case arose.

32. He drew attention to the emphasis placed by the Burmese representative in the Ad Hoc Committee on the need for ensuring that the final decision as to the future international status of a Non-Self-Governing Territory was in fact taken freely by the people of that territory. It must be demonstrated that the people had had complete freedom of choice, and that their decision to choose a status other than complete independence had been taken in the full realization that they could have opted for complete independence had they desired to do so. Otherwise the choice of any international status other than complete independence must remain suspect. Once a people had freely elected association with a metropolitan or other country, secession should be subject to the terms of any agreement reached.

33. The Burmese delegation would view with sympathy any resolution proposed for the purpose of approving the list of factors subject to the consideration that the list should serve as a flexible guide and that each concrete case should be examined in the light of the particular circumstances.

34. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) recalled that the need to draw up a list of factors to be taken into account in determining whether a territory had or had not achieved a full measure of self-government, and above all to ensure that such self-government did exist in practice, had originated in the fact that the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories presented by the Administering Members in 1946 had rapidly diminished as a result of unilateral declarations from the metropolitan countries to the effect that new domestic legislation prevented them from continuing to transmit information on conditions in those territories. Any decrease in the list would have been welcome had it been the result of practical measures granting the dependent territories a full measure of self-government; but in general that did not appear to be the case, and had the procedure been accepted without demur, Chapter XI would soon have lost its raison d'être without the purposes of the United Nations having been realized. It was that circumstance which had made it necessary to draw up a list of factors, not in order to delay the political advancement of non-self-governing peoples, but rather to ensure that the obligations of the Administering Members towards those peoples remained intact until the purposes of the United Nations had been fully realized.

35. The Guatemalan delegation had carefully studied the important report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors. It had ceased to attach major importance to the idea of working out a definition of "a full measure of self-government" for it realized that there would be immense difficulty in reaching any agreement and that the adoption of a probably vague technical definition would, far from advancing the cause of the non-self-governing peoples, only make the situation more complicated. However, the Guatemalan delegation was convinced that so-called self-government in economic, social and educational matters, no matter how complete, could never in itself form a full measure of self-government, which was an essentially political concept. As long as a people did not enjoy full political autonomy, it could not enjoy full self-government in any other field.

36. The Guatemalan delegation had always felt some anxiety with regard to the attainment by a people of a full measure of self-government by association, union or integration with the metropolitan country. It did not consider that a people under a colonial régime which accepted such a status as an improvement over the existing one thereby renounced forever its natural aspiration to complete independence. The Guatemalan delegation therefore insisted that it was essential to guarantee to such peoples that their inalienable right to amend any status of that kind would be respected.

37. Most Members of the United Nations, including some Administering Members, had agreed that matters relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories were questions of international interest. Hence, the restriction in Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter did not apply to them. If existing conditions in those territories were matters of international interest, questions relating to the future destiny of the peoples inhabiting them were also of international interest. Moreover, Chapter XI, like the entire Charter, was a multilateral contract duly signed and ratified by all Member States. It could not be modified by the unilateral action of any of the contracting parties. Thus, the United Nations as a whole was competent to decide whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory had achieved a full measure of self-government.

38. In that connexion, the Guatemalan delegation wished to stress the need to reaffirm the principle that no metropolitan government could, by a unilateral act, change the political status of a Non-Self-Governing Territory which was the subject of claim or litigation on the part of another State, until such claim or litigation had been duly settled. That safeguard was not of course intended to impede or delay the advancement of a territory in such circumstances towards genuine self-government.

39. There were a few points to be noted in connexion with the list of factors approved by the Ad Hoc Committee. The Guatemalan delegation would support its approval by the Committee and the General Assembly, on the understanding that it could be subject to later modifications in the light of experience. The Guatemalan delegation deplored the tendency to denigrate the utility of the list in advance, and was in favour of its recognition as the compulsory basis upon which all specific cases would be considered.

40. The Guatemalan delegation objected to the word "continuing" in the title of the second part of the list, as it prejudiced the inalienable right of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories to modify the system associating them with the metropolitan country, and seemed to imply their renunciation of full self-government. The Guatemalan delegation also objected to the first part of factor A.3 of the second part, "Voluntary limitation of sovereignty", since any limitation of that kind had always been regarded as dangerous and illegal. There was no objection to the second part of the paragraph.

41. The Guatemalan delegation reserved the right to make other comments in due course and possibly to submit formal amendments to the report.

42. Mr. ESPINOSA Y PRIETO (Mexico) regretted that the Ad Hoc Committee had been unable to establish a precise list of factors. No doubt the majority of delegations would have liked other stipulations to be included; for example, in the second and third parts it would have been desirable to include a stipulation that, before entering into such association, territories should pass through a period of complete freedom and sovereignty. That point could however be raised in connexion with the discussion of concrete cases.

43. The list approved by the Ad Hoc Committee could be accepted only as a guide, and each separate case would have to be studied on its merits in relation to the list.

44. The decision whether or not a territory had ceased to be non-self-governing could not be left to the Administering Member concerned; that was a matter that the General Assembly must decide.

45. With reference to factor A.4 of the first part, he maintained that freedom of a territory to enter into arrangements concerning its national defence was not an indication of complete independence and urged that the sentence should be changed to read "to ensure its own national defence".

46. Mr. HURE (France) said that the French delegation had always felt that the study of factors was of genuine theoretical and practical importance. It was of theoretical importance because the term "Non-Self-Governing Territories" used in the Charter had never been defined nor even interpreted; and of practical importance because such a study ought to be of assistance to States which had declared themselves to be responsible for certain territories in deciding when their obligations under Article 73 had ceased, and ought also to furnish the necessary basis for an extension of those obligations to States which had always contended that Chapter XI did not apply to them. Such a study would help to ensure that the application of the principles of the Charter would not be limited to certain countries but would be universal.

47. However, it was clear that in the minds of certain delegations the question was important for quite other reasons. Instead of studying the factors to be taken into account in deciding whether a territory was or was not a territory whose people had not yet attained a full measure of self-government, certain countries preferred to discuss measures which a majority of the Assembly could use to prevent a State which had admitted its obligations towards the peoples under its administration from being able one day to decide that it had fulfilled them and was no longer required to transmit information to the United Nations. Looked at from such a viewpoint, the difficult legal and scientific question became an easy political problem and but one more attempt to violate the provisions of the Charter on the pretext of interpreting it. The implicit aim of resolution 648 (VII) seemed to be gradually to affirm the competence of the Assembly at the expense of the administering States, for it stated that a list of factors would be a useful guide for the Administering Member concerned and for the General Assembly. It might well be asked what legal text justified the General Assembly in assuming such competence. The French Government had repeatedly maintained that the Assembly's functions were purely advisory. The right to determine whether territories were territories whose people had not yet attained a full measure of self-government was the exclusive prerogative of the States which were responsible for administering those territories.

48. Another attempt to infringe the sovereignty of States was to be found in the number of criteria in the report. It was doubtful whether those who had drawn up the list had thought of verifying whether all independent States satisfied those criteria, or had realized that in trying to accumulate obstacles in order to prevent any action by the Administering Members, they were at the same time indefinitely delaying the achievement of self-government or independence by the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The same desire to infringe the sovereignty of States was to be found in the contention that Article 73 should continue to apply to territories which had become completely self-governing in internal matters, and in the emergence of a concept of the indivisibility of self-government, a concept which the French delegation had consistently rejected. Once governmental and administrative competence had been transferred in economic, social and educational matters, which were the matters covered by Article 73 e, it was hard to see how a government could remain responsible for transmitting information to the United Nations on activities over which it had renounced all control. From that point of view, the list of factors quite disregarded the intermediate stage between non-self-government and independence, and thus distorted the very concept it was supposed to clarify.

49. It might well be asked why the expression of the will of peoples which had been mentioned in the first list of factors had suddenly disappeared. It was rather surprising that the achievement of independence should be the occasion for an abridgement of the right of individuals, when certain Powers were so anxious about those rights when it was a case of separate autonomy or association. On the other hand, quite inexplicably, the right of peoples to self-determination had been brought into the discussion. That was a concept which did not appear in Article 73 of the Charter and was quite outside the Committee's jurisdiction.

50. The French delegation had entered reservations on many occasions, not in order to defend the views of an Administering Member, but to urge respect for general principles. One of those principles was respect for contracts and the refusal to be a party to abusive interpretations. Another principle was the universal application of standards. The current discussion was a clear example of discrimination between States which had admitted to being Administering Members and those which, in order to escape their obligations, had made no such admission. The third principle was that the matter was worthy of the most serious and conscientious consideration. In point of fact, the ruling preoccupations were political, and all concern for legal and scientific exactitude had been swept aside in favour of a political debate. The French delegation, therefore, reserved its position, not with regard to the principle of a study of factors but to the spirit in which that study seemed to have been undertaken and the results which it had produced.

51. Mrs. BOLTON (United States of America) said that the United States, which had been a member of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors, would support the list of factors contained in the Committee's report (A/2428). The United States delegation agreed with paragraph 9 of the report that no list of factors could serve as more than a guide, and it also shared the Committee's conclusion that while a further refining of the list would be possible, the present list was sufficient. The Ad Hoc Committee had done useful service and it was not necessary to re-establish it for further study. Its work had succeeded in clarifying thought on the complex and varying elements which constituted a full measure of self-government, and the United States delegation would support the approval of the Ad Hoc Committee's report.

52. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) said that his delegation had approached the study of factors in a thoroughly impartial spirit. In 1946, Belgium had designated the Belgian Congo as a Non-Self-Governing Territory for whose administration it was responsible, and it had regularly supplied information on economic, social and educational conditions there since that time. It had no intention of ceasing to supply such information and its interest in the list of factors was therefore purely academic, for Belgium would not be affected by any decision of the General Assembly regarding it.

53. The Belgian delegation had approached the study of factors in an impartial but not an enthusiastic spirit. It had felt that it would be impossible to draw up a list of factors which would be strict, scientific and automatically applicable. There had been no success yet in formulating a satisfactory definition of a full measure of self-government, and it was unlikely that the Fourth Committee would meet with better results.

54. Turning to the list of factors, he noted that since it could be used to determine that a territory was no longer non-self-governing, it could also determine that a given territory was not yet self-governing. There should be no difference between the principle of ceasing to transmit information and beginning to do so. Unless the list was in fact worthless altogether, it was valid in both cases. Similarly, an authority which was competent to decide when information should cease was, for the same reasons and to the same extent, competent to say when information should begin to be transmitted. The Belgian delegation believed that it was the administering Power alone which was entitled to decide whether to begin, or to stop, or to go on transmitting information. Those delegations which held the opposite view and contended that the General Assembly was competent to decide whether an Administering Member should be required to continue submitting information must abide by the logical conclusion. If the majority of the Committee decided that the General Assembly was competent to determine whether an Administering Member should be compelled to continue to transmit information, it must also admit the right of the Assembly to compel other countries to begin to transmit information on non-self-governing peoples under their administration. The General Assembly's decisions must apply to all Members.

55. The Belgian delegation would abstain from voting on the matter under discussion, but it warned the members of the Committee that it would take steps to ensure that the Assembly acted logically.

[Item 33]*

1. Mr. PACHACHI (Iraq) recalled that since 1949, when the General Assembly had adopted its resolution 334 (IV), the question of factors had been discussed in detail by two ad hoc committees and by the Fourth Committee itself. His delegation had taken an active and, it hoped, a useful part in those discussions, which had led to the preparation of the list contained in the present report (A/2428) of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories).

2. He wished first to comment on some of the views expressed during the debate. Both in their replies to the Secretary-General and in the course of the discussions in the Fourth Committee and in the Ad Hoc Committee, the Administering Members had without exception categorically stated that they alone were competent to decide whether a territory had attained a full measure of self-government. His delegation strongly contested that claim, which was entirely incompatible with the spirit of the Charter and, in particular, with the provisions of Chapter XI, which proclaimed that the obligation to promote the well-being of the Non-Self-Governing Territories was a sacred trust assumed by the international community.

3. If the thesis of the colonial Powers, so dogmatically propounded by the Belgian delegation at the 322nd meeting, must be accepted, Chapter XI would be null and void, since the General Assembly would have to confine itself to confirming the decisions of the Administering Members without so much as discussing them. Chapter XI, however, was more than an assemblage of pious declarations; it was an important stage in man's progress towards one of his primary objectives: freedom for all peoples and all nations. According to the colonial Powers, the United Nations was empowered by Article 73 e to take cognizance only of the economic, social and educational advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Those Powers appeared to forget that Chapter XI, and in particular Article 73 b, also dealt with the political advancement of the territories. Moreover, the General Assembly had declared on several occasions that it had the right to express its opinion on the principles governing the status of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

4. The Committee should also reject outright the Belgian delegation's attempt to apply the provisions of Chapter XI to the inhabitants of certain sovereign States who did not enjoy complete self-government, since that would only complicate the question by introducing extraneous and illegal considerations.

5. With regard to the impossibility of finding a satisfactory definition of the concept of a full measure of self-government, his delegation was prepared to accept the Ad Hoc Committee's conclusions, since each individual case would have to be examined separately; but it remained convinced that the best criterion of complete self-government was total independence, both on the domestic and on the international plane.

6. The list of factors contained in document A/2428 was neither complete nor definitive; it should rather be regarded as a collection of guiding principles which would aid the General Assembly in taking decisions on the cessation of the transmission of information. His delegation accepted the present list of factors, which was only slightly different from the list provisionally adopted by the General Assembly at the preceding session (resolution 648 (VII)). The division of the list into three parts was both logical and practical. He hoped that the Committee would adopt that list, admirably drawn up by the Ad Hoc Committee in its final form, and transmit it to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

7. The differences of opinion which divided the colonial and the non-colonial Powers had been manifested once more in the Committee. The Committee would not, however, permit legal quibbles to divert it from its sacred trust: to help dependent peoples to reach complete self-government by peaceful means.

8. Mr. DOMINGUEZ (Cuba) recalled that his delegation, representing a country which had suffered greatly from colonialism, had constantly endeavoured both in the Ad Hoc Committee and in the Fourth Committee to bring the administering and the non-administering Powers closer together.

9. Although a satisfactory definition of the concept of a full measure of self-government could not be given, he stressed that it could not be claimed that a territory which was self-governing economically and socially but not yet politically had attained a full measure of self-government.

10. Referring to paragraph 15 of document A/2428, he said that the absence of any pressure or coercion on the population of a territory (point D) would not suffice to enable that population to decide the future destiny of the territory (point A) unless the necessary measures were taken to ensure that the views of the population would be respected (point E); point E therefore appeared to be a cardinal point, since it supplemented the provisions of points A and D and made them capable of application. The Cuban delegation failed to understand why some delegations had felt obliged to make reservations with regard to point E.

11. The Cuban delegation had also, the better to defend the interests of populations of Non-Self-Governing Territories which aspired to complete independence, supported in the Ad Hoc Committee the Guatemalan proposal recognizing the freedom of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories which had freely limited their sovereignty in favour of the metropolitan or any other country to change their status by democratic processes (A/2428, para. 21).

12. Contrary to the affirmations of some delegations, the interpretation and application of the obligations assumed by the Administering Members under Chapter XI of the Charter were not within the exclusive jurisdiction of those Powers; in other words, cessation of the transmission of information on any territory required a previous agreement within the international community, which was the United Nations, between the Administering Members and the other Member States. The provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter could not be invoked in the present case, since the fate of a Non-Self-Governing Territory did not depend solely on the country which administered it; colonialism was a doctrine of the past, and modern international law prescribed other principles for the administration of territories which were not yet self-governing. Consequently the United Nations as a whole, and not merely the Administering Members, should be guided by the list of factors in determining whether a territory had attained a full measure of self-government. In its reply to the Secretary-General in pursuance of resolution 567 (VI) (A/AC.58/Add.1), the Cuban Government had already indicated that while cessation of the transmission of information on a Non-Self-Governing Territory could, if necessary in given cases, be decided upon unilaterally by an Administering Member if its security so required, in no case could it be admitted that the transmission of such information should cease as a result of a purely unilateral decision taken for "constitutional considerations".

13. He could not define his delegation's position better than by citing the statement made in the general debate by the Cuban Minister for Foreign Affairs (441st plenary meeting), who had said that, while his country was determined to defend the right of peoples to self-determination, it would exercise great caution in that sphere in order to avoid any basic discord which might weaken the position of the free countries in relation to the totalitarian bloc.

14. The list of factors given in document A/2428 was satisfactory but might well be lengthened. The division into three parts was intelligent. The list was, of course, in no way final or binding, since each case of cessation of the transmission of information would be studied in the light of its particular circumstances. The Cuban delegation would welcome any proposal to supplement and improve the present list.

15. Mr. KUCHKAROV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the question of factors had arisen because of the refusal of certain Administering Members—France, the United Kingdom, the United States and the Netherlands—to continue to furnish the information they were required to transmit under Article 73 e of the Charter with regard to certain Non-Self-Governing Territories. The attitude of those States was contrary to the Charter and amounted to a refusal to carry out the obligations they had assumed under the Charter with regard to Non-Self-Governing Territories. At the fourth and subsequent sessions of the General Assembly many delegations had indicated that the unilateral decision taken by those States could not be accepted.

16. After reviewing the work that had led to the compilation of the list of factors which the General Assembly had examined at its seventh session (A/2178), the USSR representative stated that the list was a step forward towards the goal set by the General Assembly, but was still far from complete and should be improved.

17. The list now submitted to the Fourth Committee by the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors differed little from the one approved by the General Assembly at its seventh session. It contained serious gaps, particularly the lack of a definition of the concept of a full measure of self-government. He could not agree with the Ad Hoc Committee that the lack of a satisfactory definition raised no serious difficulty. Indeed, without a precise definition of a full measure of self-government it was very difficult to prepare a list of factors to determine whether a territory had attained that objective. In the view of the USSR delegation, Non-Self-Governing Territories would attain a full measure of self-government when they became independent sovereign States in which the legislative, executive and judiciary powers were exercised by the indigenous population. Until then the Administering Members were bound to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter. Those were the criteria for determining whether a territory had attained the goal of a full measure of self-government set by the Charter.

18. Examining the list of factors drawn up by the Ad Hoc Committee, he said that the USSR delegation accepted the first part in principle, subject to some clarification and addition. The second and third parts, however, it considered unacceptable, as they did not provide for the accession of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to the status of independent, sovereign States. Thus factor A.3 of the second part dealt with voluntary limitation of sovereignty, whereas it was clear that before speaking of the limitation of sovereignty it was necessary to grant sovereignty and independence to Non-Self-Governing Territories and provide for the right of the indigenous people of those territories to decide for themselves their own destiny. He noted that the second and third parts of the list contained factors which allowed for the control and interference of other States in the internal affairs of the territories.

19. He denied the claim of the Administering Members to exclusive competence in the matter. That attitude was contrary to the Charter and to the General Assembly's resolutions. He hoped that the factors which were being worked out by the General Assembly would constitute an obstacle to arbitrary refusal of the Administering Members to transmit the required information and would contribute to the fulfilment of the provisions of the Charter with regard to the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

20. Mr. TARZI (Afghanistan) recalled that from the outset the United Nations, true to the spirit of the Charter, had been deeply concerned with the future liberation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and with the factors indicating self-government. The question was certainly difficult, and until September 1952 the Afghanistan delegation had doubted whether a fair and sound solution could be achieved, since each Administering Member had taken a different view.

21. Although the 1952 Ad Hoc Committee had studied the list of factors drawn up by the General Assembly in accordance with resolution 567 (VI), it had at first seemed difficult, when the question was studied again at the seventh session, to find a body competent to determine whether the new list of factors was complete. It had then been decided that the list should simply be regarded as a guide to whether a territory had attained full self-government, and should serve no other purpose.

22. The factors that the two ad hoc committees had proposed to the General Assembly were indispensable for the study of social problems in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. If, however, they and the report of the 1953 Ad Hoc Committee were adopted, they might well be deemed contrary to the principle of the right of self-determination of peoples, a right on which the freedom of peoples and nations was essentially based. Though the proposed factors might serve as a guide, the decision whether a territory had attained freedom could not be based on them alone. In deciding that question, the opinion of the people concerned must be asked, and must be expressed under the auspices of the United Nations without interference by foreign interests.

23. Miss ROESAD (Indonesia) said that most representatives seemed to feel that the Fourth Committee could eventually adopt the proposed list of factors. Nevertheless, some delegations felt that the General Assembly was not competent to decide whether a territory was or was not a territory whose people had not yet attained a full measure of self-government. Indeed, the representative of France had stated at the preceding meeting that if the General Assembly decided that it alone was competent to settle that question, no Non-Self-Governing Territory would ever achieve independence. The Indonesian delegation failed to understand the grounds for that opinion. On the contrary, the General Assembly was competent to decide whether Chapter XI of the Charter was applicable to a given territory. There seemed to be no need to repeat the legal arguments on which that opinion was based; the representatives of Guatemala and Mexico had stated them very eloquently at the preceding meeting.

24. Paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 648 (VII) showed that the General Assembly was competent to rule on the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter. In the Indonesian delegation's view, the General Assembly ought to decide whether the cessation of the transmission of information was justified—in other words, whether the population of a Non-Self-Governing Territory was fully in charge of its own administration.

25. The Ad Hoc Committee, which the Indonesian delegation congratulated on its good work, had not seen fit to make, in its report, many changes in the list of factors which the General Assembly had provisionally approved in 1952. The Fourth Committee therefore could recommend that the General Assembly adopt a resolution approving the existing list subject to the considerations contained in resolution 648 (VII), paragraph 2.

26. Furthermore, the principle set forth in paragraph 4 of that resolution should also be reaffirmed, especially as some governments held that the obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e ceased when the questions listed in that article were within a territory's own jurisdiction. There was an urgent need for the General Assembly to take a stand with regard to that contention; indeed, the Netherlands representative had emphasized it particularly in relation to the cessation of the transmission of information regarding the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam.

27. The declaration in resolution 648 (VII) on the whole question of factors should be reaffirmed.

28. The Indonesian delegation would support any proposal which would improve the suggested list of factors, and reserved its position on any future motion made in the Committee on that question.

29. Mr. L. S. BOKHARI (Pakistan) recalled that the Pakistan delegation had stated in the Committee at the seventh session (277th meeting) that the list of factors was a useful guide and that the case of each territory should be examined in the light of the particular circumstances. It had also stated that the United Nations took an abiding interest in the welfare and future of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and that the transmission of information on those territories should not be discontinued without its consent. His delegation's attitude remained unchanged.

30. After a careful examination of the Ad Hoc Committee's report, his delegation agreed with the view expressed by the Indian representative (322nd meeting) that the Committee had not been able to add much to the list of factors approved by the General Assembly in 1952. Although the list could doubtless be improved, it was fairly complete and nothing would be gained by a new study. His delegation was prepared to accept the Ad Hoc Committee's report, reserving the right to speak on any proposal later submitted to the Fourth Committee.

31. Some delegations had made statements on the reduction in the number of territories on which reports were submitted to the United Nations. His delegation had nothing against the reduction, provided that the United Nations was certain that the territories in question had reached a degree of development at which supervision was no longer necessary.

32. Pakistan was impatiently waiting for the day when the General Assembly would no longer have to concern itself with the question because no territories would be administered any longer by a foreign Power. In a sense the Administering Members were on a black list: they had to account to the United Nations for certain of their actions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. They would surely be happy to see their names struck from that list. The Pakistan Government itself would be pleased to see the list grow shorter, but it maintained that the final decision rested with the United Nations, which he asked the Administering Members to trust.

The meeting rose at 4.10 p.m.

[Item 33]*

1. Mr. ABOU-AFIA (Egypt) stressed the importance which the Egyptian delegation attached to Chapter XI of the Charter and recalled the steps it had taken or supported to ensure that the provisions of that Chapter were applied. During the discussion of that question, the representatives of the Administering Members had asserted that the General Assembly was not competent to examine whether a Territory had attained full self-government on the grounds that no text conferred that power upon it. Their point of view had been expressed in the reservations made by the Belgian representative and contained in sub-paragraph (b) of paragraph 40 of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2428), the text of which he quoted. True to the Charter and to its own principles, the Egyptian delegation felt bound to oppose that point of view. Chapter XI set forth contractual obligations to which all Member States had subscribed and which no Member State could evade by a unilateral act or statement. To admit the contrary would enable the Administering Members to waive too easily the provisions of Chapter XI. There was no doubt whatsoever that the meaning of that Chapter was completely divorced from any unilateral interpretation which the Administering Members might give to it.

2. There were no grounds for invoking the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter. Just as in private law contractual obligations were interpreted as a voluntary restriction on individual freedom, so international commitments constituted a voluntary restriction on the sovereignty of States, with reservations of course as to the object of those commitments. As that principle applied to all international commitments it followed that the restrictions contained in Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter were valid only for questions not dealt with in the Charter. That was not the case for Non-Self-Governing Territories since they were dealt with in Chapter XI. The General Assembly therefore had the right and indeed the duty of ensuring that all States which had signed the Charter fulfilled the commitments thereby incurred. In that connexion, the Assembly had taken a series of decisions and had, inter alia, set up the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors, which had worked out a list of factors.

3. The Egyptian delegation thanked the Committee for the work it had accomplished and considered that the list it had drawn up was generally satisfactory. With the addition of several amendments, designed to strengthen the provisions governing the right of peoples to self-determination, that list could be used for practical purposes, without however absolving the Assembly from examining the special circumstances of each particular case. The Egyptian delegation intended to submit a draft resolution amending the list of factors on those lines.

4. Mr. LANNUNG (Denmark) also thanked members of the Ad Hoc Committee and the Secretariat, whose work had clarified the various aspects of the problem and enabled delegations to define their position. The Danish delegation was prepared to approve the report and to accept the list of factors it contained. The classification of those factors into three parts seemed judicious. The work accomplished so far was satisfactory, and consequently there was no need to maintain the Ad Hoc Committee.

5. Among the factors enumerated in the Committee's report there was one of primary importance, namely, the opinion of the population of the territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desired. The factors applied not only to the cessation of the transmission of information but just as well to the commencement of the transmission of information. All Member States should examine their own position in the light of the list of factors and decide whether they should transmit information on territories on which they had not so far submitted a report.

6. As to the question of competence, the position which the Danish delegation had taken up at previous sessions had not changed. It considered that the State responsible for the administration of a territory had the right to determine the constitutional status of the territory placed under its sovereignty. None of the provisions of Chapter XI could be interpreted as modifying that principle in any way whatever. Denmark had always been ready to transmit to the United Nations information concerning not only the economic, social and educational situation in the territory it administered, but also the political situation and the development of the constitutional status in that territory. Nevertheless it had never considered that the United Nations was thereby empowered to review or revise any action which had been taken by the constitutional bodies of Denmark.

7. Recalling the stages in the constitutional evolution of Greenland, he said that, as early as 1951, the Danish delegation had announced in the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter¹ that Greenland wished to be represented directly in the Danish Parliament. In 1952, the National Council of Greenland had unanimously adopted a resolution expressing the desire that Greenland should be associated with Denmark as an integral part of the metropolitan country, with full equality of status with other parts of Denmark and representation in the Danish Parliament. It had also requested that the Danish Constitution should be amended to that effect. The Danish Government and Parliament had recognized those aspirations. The new Danish Constitution, adopted by Parliament and subsequently endorsed by a referendum of the Danish people, contained in its first article a provision to the effect that Greenland had become an integral part of Denmark and thus had acquired equal status with the rest of Denmark. The population of Greenland now enjoyed the same rights as the rest of the Danish population. By virtue of that constitutional change, therefore, Greenland was no longer a Non-Self-Governing Territory under the terms of Chapter XI of the Charter. Thus, in conformity with General Assembly resolution 222 (III), the Danish Government had sent to the Secretary-General a note dated 3 September 1953 in which it informed him of that development and to which was attached an explanatory memorandum, a translation of the Danish Constitution and the records of the meetings in which the National Council of Greenland had considered and then unanimously adopted the changes in question. It was the understanding of the Danish Government that, in conformity with resolution 448 (V), that documentation would be laid before the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories at its next session, but the Danish delegation wished to bring it to the immediate notice of the Fourth Committee.

8. The decision of the Danish Government was in complete conformity with the fundamental factor which he had previously stressed, namely, the freely expressed will and opinion of the population of the territory. It had been welcomed by the people of both Greenland and Denmark, who were convinced that the new order would serve the interests of Greenland best, and the Government and Parliament where Greenlanders were now sitting side by side with their fellow countrymen, would continue to do their utmost to promote the welfare of the Greenlanders.

9. Mr. ABOU KHADRA (Saudi Arabia) said that the Committee had heavy responsibilities which it must strive to fulfil in a spirit of co-operation on the basis of Chapters XI, XII and XIII of the Charter and in pursuance of the aims and principles proclaimed in the Charter. It might carry out its functions by seeking solutions in the Charter itself, but all the members of the Committee must also agree on the interpretation to be given to the Articles on which its work was to be based. Too often there had been a tendency to limit the scope of the Committee's work and even its competence by the use of juridical arguments which departed from the real meaning of the Charter and from any strict interpretation of its provisions. If the purposes specified by the Charter were to be attained, the latter must be interpreted more broadly, and he hoped that the discussion on factors would not lead to serious controversy and that, by showing a spirit of sincere co-operation, the Committee could achieve productive results which would make it possible to bring the views of certain groups closer together.

10. His delegation paid a tribute to the way the Ad Hoc Committee had carried out its duties. Yet, whatever the number of factors included, no list could be considered complete or final. The list must therefore remain under constant study and be resubmitted for revision. Hence the General Assembly should refer to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, in connexion with its normal work and responsibilities, the list of factors, their interpretation and the adjustments to be made in the light of any changes in the situation which might occur. An appropriate draft resolution should be submitted and adopted by the Committee. Moreover, the list of factors could serve only as a guide, a compilation of criteria whereby the stage of development of a given Territory could be ascertained and whereby a decision could be more easily reached on the question whether the Territory had achieved full self-government. In view of the variety of the characteristics of the different dependent territories, those criteria must be applied very flexibly. That point was extremely important.

11. He did not agree with the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors that the definition of the notion of full self-government would necessarily raise serious difficulties. To arrive at such a definition it was enough to appreciate the aspirations of the dependent peoples and to rely on two principles: that of the right of self-determination, set forth in Article 1, paragraph 2, of the Charter, and the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were paramount, as stated in Article 73. It was easy to define the notion of full self-government, the supreme objective laid down in the Charter, by applying those principles: full self-government meant sovereign independence. When the current popular movements for complete independence were considered, there was reason to doubt that the dependent peoples would freely choose any form of self-government which did not imply full and complete sovereignty. It mattered little whether after achieving independence, a Non-Self-Governing Territory decided to enter into an association with the metropolitan or any other country inasmuch as such association was subsequent to independence. Otherwise there would be serious reasons for doubting whether the dependent territory had exercised a free choice.

12. With regard to the elements for determining whether the principle of self-determination was guaranteed, his delegation accepted the list given in section IV of the Ad Hoc Committee's report. It attached particular importance to points D, E and F. If the principle that the interests of the indigenous inhabitants were paramount was to be respected, it was an absolute necessity that the population should be able to express its opinion without any pressure on the part of the administering Powers. Point E (A/2428, para. 15) was an essential supplement to point D, (A/2428, para. 15) because the real aspirations of the peoples concerned could not be determined unless the administering Powers gave the assurance that the views of the inhabitants would be respected. Finally, point F (A/2428, para. 21) was the only factor which could be used in deciding whether a Territory had voluntarily agreed to a limitation of its sovereignty in favour of the metropolitan or any other country. Some areas remained linked to the metropolitan country against the wishes of the inhabitants. The metropolitan countries had always claimed that such association had been effected with the full agreement of the two parties. If such were the case, those countries had no reason to make reservations to point F. If they accepted it, any doubts persisting in certain minds would disappear. The very fact that a Non-Self-Governing Territory was free to change its status by democratic processes, in other words, to withdraw, in a given case, from an association to which it was a party, proved once and for all that the association had not been imposed upon it.

13. He then passed to the list of factors submitted by the Ad Hoc Committee (A/2428, section VI). Factor A.3 of the second part, which actually referred to a limitation of sovereignty and independence, should be omitted. While the right of a country to relinquish a part of its sovereignty in favour of a larger entity was one of the attributes of sovereignty, States which had recently acquired their independence were much too jealous of the latter to enter into an agreement which might limit it. The situation in the Middle East, where the elements of one nation, divided to serve the interests of the colonial Powers, were trying gradually to bring about a closer union, was irrelevant. His delegation unreservedly accepted the other factors, on the understanding that the association to which the latter two parts referred had to be effected in accordance with the real aspirations of the people and without pressure.

14. With regard to the question of competence, the General Assembly should be consulted whenever it was to be determined whether a territory had achieved full self-government, because it had to reach a decision on each case individually. Only when a Territory had reached a stage of independence which qualified it for admission to the United Nations could the transmission of the information specified in the Charter cease.

15. Mr. DOBROSIELSKI (Poland) noted that the purely theoretical analyses, which had been made for several years, had not led to a final and complete list of factors. It was to be feared that no substantial progress could be made if the matter continued to be dealt with in a purely academic manner. It was sufficient proof that the list drawn up by the Ad Hoc Committee hardly differed from that of 1952 (General Assembly resolution 648 (VII), annex). It was only of value as a collection of general indications. It was difficult to accept some of the factors listed in the second and third parts, to which the Guatemalan and USSR representatives had raised objections (322nd and 323rd meetings).

16. It could be concluded from a study of the history of the problem that the Administering Members were trying to keep the subject on the plane of theory and to prevent the General Assembly from taking the necessary action to change the current situation. That situation was the result of the arbitrary refusal of certain Administering Members, the United States, France, the United Kingdom and the Netherlands, to continue to transmit information on the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration, contrary to the obligations which they had assumed under Chapter XI of the Charter. The Administering Members had stopped transmitting information on fifteen of the seventy-four Non-Self-Governing Territories listed in General Assembly resolution 66 (I). The tendency to adopt decisions unilaterally persisted, as proved by the cases of the Netherlands Antilles, Surinam and Puerto Rico. The Administering Members claimed that the Non-Self-

Governing Territories came under their jurisdiction exclusively. The question was international in scope and the United Nations must attach very special importance to the present and future position of the peoples concerned.

17. Hence, without underestimating the importance of a theoretical study of the problem, his delegation considered that practical action should be taken to solve it. It hoped that the General Assembly would very soon compile a list of principles which would make it impossible for the Administering Members to decide unilaterally to stop transmitting information on the territories under their administration. Those Powers were obliged to transmit such information so long as the territories in question were not independent and sovereign States, the inhabitants of which had full executive, legislative and judicial authority. The General Assembly was competent to decide whether a territory had attained full self-government and to rule whether the transmission of information should cease. The Polish delegation would support any positive resolution to settle the matter along those lines.

18. Mr. NAJAR (Israel) said that the Israel delegation had been somewhat concerned to find that the discussion had borne mainly on the question of who should decide whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory had really attained self-government, and when it had become independent. As the question of the cessation of the transmission of information appeared as item 3 on the Committee's agenda, it might have been better if the Committee had paid more attention to factors as such, and less to the use made of the factors, which only led to endless arguments about the interpretation of the Charter. Its time would be better spent if it tried to make some useful contribution to a sane and constructive settlement of the practical political problems facing the United Nations.

19. The Israel delegation did not regard the examination of the factors as absolutely essential since the experience possessed by the sixty Member States practically guaranteed that no aspect of the problems relating to any conceivable type of self-government or independence would be lost sight of when any particular instance was being discussed. The Ad Hoc Committee report under consideration merely strengthened that view. One of that Committee's tasks had been to define the notion of a full measure of self-government for the purposes of Chapter XI. The problem had been to ascertain whether the notion fell somewhat short of independence as referred to in Chapter XII and, if so, to decide whether it meant something more than autonomy in economic, social and educational matters as mentioned in Article 73 e. The Committee had decided that it was impossible to arrive at a definition and that the concept would emerge from the examination of each particular case. It had also been the Committee's task to seek criteria to determine whether the principle of the right of peoples to self-determination was guaranteed so far as that Chapter was concerned. The Committee had not come to any definite conclusion or reached any general agreement. Anyone considering the list of factors would be struck by the fact that it failed to reflect the complexity of the problems raised and the positions of the members of the Ad Hoc Committee.

20. In considering ways and means of ensuring international respect for the right of peoples to self-determination, there was an unfortunate and growing tendency to overlook individual aspects of that right, although they formed the real basis for it. Historically, the right of a people to self-determination rested upon the freedom and equality of men bound together by what had been termed the social contract. Nor should it be forgotten that in President Wilson's Fourteen Points, the principle of nationality and the principles of democracy had been identical.

21. The first part of the list of factors dealt with independence. To judge by the heading of the list as given in paragraph 41 of document A/2428, the second and third parts might have been expected to deal with other separate systems of self-government, whereas they dealt with self-government in continuing association with the metropolitan country and with factors indicative of the free association of a territory with the metropolitan or other country as an integral part of that country.

22. It was useless to embed in an extremely complex report a list of factors which seemed to establish the fact that Non-Self-Governing Territories would some day attain independence but that that independence was likely to assume the most varied forms, according to the freely-expressed wishes of the populations concerned. It might well be, therefore, that a more searching analysis of the concepts of self-government and independence might prove a disservice to the right of peoples to self-determination. The study of factors should accordingly come to an end.

23. The Ad Hoc Committee's work would, however, have helped to narrow the gap between the administering Powers' ideas and those of the non-administering Powers on an important point, since paragraph 13 of the report stated that the concept of self-government would emerge in the examination of a particular case.

24. One example of the endless debates which the Committee would let itself in for if it constantly discussed problems from the theoretical viewpoint would be the discussion of the Belgian thesis that as there was no restrictive definition of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in Chapter XI of the Charter, the Assembly might discover territories undeclared by the States responsible for them. But it was clear from Article 74 that the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter could in no circumstances be applied to a metropolitan territory. Would it be wise to engage in a discussion of the concept of a metropolitan territory?

25. Mr. DORSINVILLE (Haiti) welcomed the historical process by which, within a century and a half, the world had progressed from the slave revolt in Santo Domingo to the meeting of the Fourth Committee in which the representatives of free and independent nations were endeavouring to define the requirements that some sixty territories throughout the world, with more than 200 million inhabitants, must fulfil in order to attain self-government or independence.

26. Despite their good intentions, competence and eagerness to comply with their terms of reference, the various subsidiary bodies set up to study the question of factors had not been able either to define the notion of a full measure of self-government or to draw up a list of factors to everyone's entire satisfaction. Document A/2428 was an intellectual exercise without any practical bearing: while admitting that the list of factors was only indicative, it recognized that only specific cases could be considered. The work had not, however, been useless, for it had made it possible to study all the legal, political, economic and social aspects of vast territories whose future was in doubt. There was great wisdom in the following passage in Mr. Pierre Ryckmans' book, Dominer pour servir: "There is as yet no political problem in the Congo. Now is not the time to solve it, but it is already time to think about it, to provide and prepare for the future . . . When the time comes, people will not wait. If we delay, the crisis will not end in emancipation, but in hatred, revolt and separation" (p. 74).

27. It was precisely in order to avoid outbreaks of hatred that the Haitian delegation had always approved the reports submitted on the question of factors and would vote for the adoption of document A/2428, although it believed that the free expression of the people's wishes should have been the only factor listed. Since the Administering Members had accepted a limitation of their sovereignty, they could not arbitrarily withdraw a territory from the jurisdiction of Article 73. It should be possible to ensure that peoples expressed their opinion with complete freedom if the parties concerned showed goodwill and allowed the United Nations to exercise the requisite supervision.

28. In view of the Administering Members' adamant attitude, his delegation feared that Chapter XI of the Charter might soon become a dead letter. It asked, therefore, that development should go forward in the real interests of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and it would vote for the adoption of the report (A/2428) so that each case might be studied in accordance with agreed and accepted guiding standards, although it did not thereby acknowledge that the factors listed would thenceforth be unalterable.

29. Mr. SHTOKALO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that some Administering Members evaded their commitment under the Charter to transmit information on the territories they administered because they wished to hide the harsh conditions prevailing in them. Many indications showed that those Powers were shamelessly exploiting the people in those territories and that they were merely trying to make the biggest possible profits out of them rather than to ensure their economic, social and educational advancement. It was enough to recall that the petitions and complaints to the United Nations were continually increasing. The working out of factors to determine whether a territory had or had not attained a full measure of self-government should enable the Administering Members to fulfil the commitments imposed on them by the Charter. Factors had been discussed at length without any satisfactory conclusions being reached, and it could be seen that the Ad Hoc Committee had once more failed to comply with its terms of reference. The list of factors it had compiled was incomplete and should be improved. Even worse, the Committee had not even succeeded in working out a definition of the concept of a full measure of self-government. It had claimed that the absence of such a definition was not a serious disadvantage. That conclusion was quite wrong, for it would be impossible to list precisely all the factors to be taken into account in deciding whether a territory had attained complete self-government if no one knew what a full measure of self-government meant.

30. The first part of the list approved by the Ad Hoc Committee might be regarded as acceptable, although it should be improved. But the second and third parts could not be accepted, since they dealt with a territory's association, continuing or otherwise, with the metropolitan country, a limitation of its independence, rather than with attaining a full measure of self-government. The factors in the third part would entitle the Administering Members to cease transmitting information. The Ad Hoc Committee's work had, therefore led to a result that was exactly the opposite of the terms of reference given it by the Assembly. To adopt the last two parts would be to play the game of the colonial Powers, which were trying to assume the exclusive right to settle the future of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Their views had been strikingly illustrated by Belgium's reservations reproduced in the Ad Hoc Committee's report (para. 40).

31. It was to be hoped that the Committee would amend the list of factors so that the Administering Members would be enabled to fulfil their commitments under the Charter.

32. Mr. CAMPOS CATELIN (Argentina) complimented the Ad Hoc Committee on the care with which it had discharged its duties under the chairmanship of Mr. Khalidy.

33. The Argentine delegation unreservedly approved the conclusions set forth in paragraph 9 of document A/2428. The factors enumerated in the present list were merely a guide and in no way final.

34. As the Mexican representative had pointed out (322nd meeting), factor A.4 of the first part of the list of factors was not acceptable. A State could be said to have achieved a full measure of self-government when it was able to take charge of its own national defence, and not merely to participate therein. Moreover, factor A.4 could not apply to the setting-up and use of military bases in a territory. That would imply an infringement of the sovereignty of the country concerned, since national defence was one of its essential attributes.

35. The adjective "continuing" should be omitted from the title of the second part of the list, especially as the association referred to in that part could not be other than what the parties chose to make it; the association should always be to the benefit of the territory voluntarily accepting a limitation of its sovereignty, but such an association might, at a later date, be detrimental to the interests of the territory concerned. Furthermore, the idea of voluntary limitation of sovereignty was highly dangerous and should therefore not appear in the list unless accompanied by the guarantee proposed by the Guatemalan representative, which was set out in paragraph 21 of the report.

36. Some delegations had found it difficult to draft a satisfactory definition of the concept of "people", as the object of the right of self-determination. In that connexion there was a definition by Professor Georges Scelle, in his Précis de droit des gens, which said that a people was a collective entity able to exercise the right of self-determination, an indispensable condition of its existence; a people was the aggregate of the wills of the individuals constituting it; that aggregate of wills implied a unity of purpose founded upon a unity of traditions, upon a common historical and spiritual heritage.

37. With reference to paragraph 40 of the Ad Hoc Committee's report, the Argentine delegation wished again to refute the Belgian representative's thesis. The Administering Members' acceptance of the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter placed under international trusteeship only the peoples referred to in that Chapter, and its provisions applied only to territories which had never been an integral part of a metropolitan State or had never been considered a part thereof. Article 2, paragraph 7, could not be invoked in that connexion because matters of that kind were not within the Administering Members' domestic jurisdiction; that was a position which the Argentine Government had maintained on many occasions. Such matters were connected with the system of international protection of Non-Self-Governing Territories set up by the Charter and freely accepted by the Administering Members. Those Members had assumed an obligation which, in the words of the Charter itself, constituted a "sacred trust" for them. It was for the General Assembly to decide whether a territory had ceased to be non-self-governing or was still non-self-governing within the meaning of Chapter XI.

38. The Argentine delegation wished to repeat that the Government or the metropolitan State had no right to modify the political status of a territory in the event of a dispute or disagreement.

39. Lastly, the Government of the Argentine Republic considered that, as set forth in resolution XXXIII of the Ninth International Conference of American States at Bogotá in 1948, "The historical process of the emancipation of America will not be complete so long as there remain on the continent peoples and regions subject to a colonial régime, or territories occupied by non-American countries".

40. Mr. S. S. LIU (China) felt that the study of factors had been the subject of long and fruitful work, both in the Committee and in various subcommittees. With the compilation of the present list it had reached a stage where, while the list could certainly be perfected and made more precise, no useful purpose would thereby be served for the moment, as paragraph 9 of the Ad Hoc Committee's report pointed out. The present list could serve as a useful guide in determining whether a territory had achieved a full measure of self-government or not. It was clear from the terms of resolution 648 (VII), however, that the decision did not rest exclusively with the Administering Member; it was for the General Assembly to decide in the last resort. That thesis was absolutely in accord with the theory of international responsibility now almost universally admitted.

41. The Chinese delegation would cordially welcome the cessation of the transmission of any information on Non-Self-Governing Territories if such cessation were proof that all Non-Self-Governing Territories, without exception, had achieved independence, thereby attaining the purpose of Chapter XI of the Charter. So long, however, as there were territories not yet enjoying a full measure of self-government, the Administering Members should continue to furnish information. That was the only way the General Assembly could ensure the protection of non-self-governing peoples and safeguard their rights and legitimate interests.

42. The Chinese delegation wished to make three observations on the theory, frequently maintained by certain Administering Members, that the provisions of Chapter XI applied not only to the Non-Self-Governing Territories, but also to certain independent States whose populations, or a part of whose populations, did not as yet enjoy a full measure of self-government. In the first place, the very title of Chapter XI indicated that it referred solely to the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Secondly, the Administering Members, which had accused certain non-administering Members of exceeding the bounds of the provisions of Chapter XI, would be ill-advised to try to extend the application of that Chapter without having any legal justification for so doing. Lastly, extension of the scope of Chapter XI could not in any way release the Administering Members from the obligations they had assumed in respect of Non-Self-Governing Territories to which that Chapter in fact referred.

43. The Chinese delegation was prepared to support any draft resolution based on the conclusions formulated by the Ad Hoc Committee; it reserved the right to speak on that matter later.

44. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) noted with satisfaction that the Ad Hoc Committee's report took into account the various juridical questions which the Dominican delegation had raised since the question of factors had first come under study. That study might make it possible to elaborate principles of international law.

45. Chapter XI of the Charter was of very special importance. On the one hand, it gave the populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories the hope that their aspirations to independence and freedom would one day be realized, and, on the other, it bore witness to the goodwill with which the metropolitan Powers had agreed at San Francisco to assume the sacred trust of promoting the well-being of the populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. His delegation had greatly admired the generosity of the Powers which had subscribed to the obligations set forth in Chapter XI.

46. In view of the great importance of Chapter XI, its real scope should be defined. Since the San Francisco Conference it had given rise to many divergent interpretations. Now that the United Nations was contemplating a revision of the Charter in accordance with Article 109, it would be useful to strengthen Chapter XI by incorporating in it a definition of a full measure of self-government. That was a very arduous task, as those who had taken part in the efforts of the United Nations to define aggression well knew. The difficulty resided to a considerable extent in the fact that there were various ideas of what a definition should be: should it be generic, descriptive, enumerative, or should it combine all three of those features? In the first part of the list of factors, the Ad Hoc Committee had succeeded in giving an enumerative definition of independence, and it should be congratulated on its brilliant achievement.

47. The list of factors would certainly never be final and complete, but it would always be a guide to the study of each specific case in the light of its own peculiar circumstances. The present list seemed to be completely logical; it filled a gap in the interpretation of Chapter XI and enabled General Assembly resolution 222 (III) to be better implemented. The Dominican delegation felt that the Committee could now recommend to the General Assembly that it should stop studying factors because the results obtained were satisfactory enough for the item to be taken off the agenda.

48. The first part of the list of factors included very valuable criteria for determining whether a people had attained independence. With regard to the other two parts, he emphasized that any collective entity should have the right to dissociate its political and parliamentary institutions from those of the metropolitan country to which it was attached by historical links when it expressed a desire to do so. In the case of an association with the metropolitan or other country, the fundamental criterion was the freely expressed opinion of the population of the territory concerned. It was desirable to adopt flexible formulas, in harmony with modern viewpoints on that subject.

49. The Dominican delegation was prepared to support any proposal recommending the use of the present list of factors as a guide in determining whether a territory was or was not fully self-governing, it being clearly understood that the paramount factor should still be the opinion, freely expressed by democratic means, of the populations of the territories concerned.

50. As his list of speakers on the question of factors was exhausted, the CHAIRMAN proposed that further discussion of the item should be deferred until the following meeting and that the Committee should begin its consideration of the question of information from Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter

GENERAL DEBATE

51. Mr. HOPKINSON (United Kingdom) recalled that at the seventh session, he had opened the general discussion in the Fourth Committee (251st meeting) on the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/2219 and Corr.1) with a broad review of the policies and achievements of the United Kingdom Government in the territories it administered. It would have been his wish to participate in the discussion for a longer period during the present year. But as a Minister at the Colonial Office, he had unfortunately a very heavy programme of work, which would make it necessary for him to leave New York very shortly. It was for that reason that he had asked for the floor at the present stage.

52. Section VI of the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/2405) now before the Fourth Committee dealt with educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee's main topic for discussion in 1953. In addition, part two of the document contained a special report by the Committee on education in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

53. He had a personal interest in the problem of education, since he was Chairman of the Advisory Committee established by the Secretary of State for the Colonies to advise him on educational questions. That Committee had originally been established in 1929 to advise the Secretary of State on the formulation of educational policy in the British dependencies. As a result of constitutional and other developments in the colonies, the character of the Advisory Committee's work had changed greatly in recent years. Whereas in the past educational policy had been formulated in London, the considerable development of local initiative in educational matters and the growth of the powers and responsibilities of colonial legislatures had substantially modified the Committee's functions. It was still the case that when the local authorities felt the need for an outside opinion, they referred certain questions to the Secretary of State, who arranged for their consideration by the Advisory Committee. But the Committee could now be regarded much more as a panel of experts ready to offer technical assistance of the highest quality at the request of colonial governments. That change illustrated the new relationship which had come into being between the metropolitan Government and the territories for which it was responsible.

54. His delegation accepted the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories as the expression of a consensus of views for which it had respect, and would transmit it to the authorities of the territories under United Kingdom administration in order that it might be taken into account, as those authorities considered appropriate, in the formulation and execution of their educational policies, in the same way as they would take into account the advisory opinions of the Committee of the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

55. He felt obliged, however, to make one mild criticism, namely that, in his opinion, the report perhaps placed too much emphasis on the rapid extension of primary education. While the defeat of illiteracy was of vital importance, the United Kingdom delegation also felt that a territory must preserve some balance at all stages of its educational development. An effective system of primary education was impossible without a satisfactory system of teacher training. Such a system could not be established without an adequate number of secondary schools from which to recruit student teachers. Quality must not be sacrificed to quantity, since that might seriously jeopardize the development of the territories. Unless stress was laid on quality and on the provision of general, professional and technical education, there was no hope of achieving the objectives set forth in paragraph 12 of the special report on education.

56. The fundamental objective of United Kingdom educational policy was the development of the capacity for responsibility. The objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter could not be met without a constant effort on the part of the Administering Members to thrust more and more responsibility on greater and greater numbers of the inhabitants of the territories. That process of the active devolution of responsibility, of which there were several recent and important examples in the United Kingdom territories, could not, however, be followed blindly. The United Kingdom Government did not, for example, believe that just because there existed in any given territory a handful of brilliant and educated politicians, that territory was necessarily ripe to assume complete responsibility for its own affairs.

57. A stable democracy must be broadly based. There must be enlightened competence at all levels of society, with a flow of educated and disciplined talent to fill the places of the few brilliant individuals to be found in the territories, as in most countries of the world. The United Kingdom Government would regard it as an utter dereliction of its duties if it handed over complete power to the peoples of the territories it administered when those territories had acquired no more than a facade of self-discipline and responsibility. In some cases risks had to be taken, but, if they were taken, an error must readily be recognized when it was seen. If caution was not exercised, there might well be, after half a century of the patient construction of democracy, a relapse into conditions of instability, in which the mass of the people would have very little effective voice in the conduct of their own affairs and would be abandoned to the tyranny and inexperience of a local oligarchy.

58. One of the main reasons why the transition from imperial or colonial rule to independence had been carried out so smoothly in a number of United Kingdom territories was that over a long period of years British administration had evolved a trained and competent civil service and an impartial judiciary.

59. The importance of higher education should not be underestimated in the training of leaders, since such education contributed to the development of a sense of values. In 1952, there had been approximately 3,500 full-time students in the institutions of higher education of the territories administered by the United Kingdom—the three universities of Malta, Hong Kong and Malaya and the university colleges in the West Indies, East Africa, the Gold Coast and Nigeria. The United Kingdom intended to create a university in Central Africa in the near future.

60. No educational system could expand, or even survive, unless it could draw increasing resources from economic prosperity. Since the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories would again be turning its attention to the problems of economic development the following year, it might be appropriate to recall that in the territories for which the United Kingdom was responsible, the central problem was the wise use of the land. In countries with an agrarian economy, the people had the great responsibility and necessity of conserving and developing the resources of their land, particularly as the problem of overpopulation was becoming increasingly acute in many countries. There were reasons for that state of affairs as well as for the fact that, despite the resources of modern agricultural science, the yield of the land had not kept pace with the increase of population. As had been wisely said, "Poor soil makes poor people, and poor people make poor soil worse". Land tenure and agricultural practices must be changed and changed in such a way and at such a pace as not to shatter the fabric of society. Demands were sometimes made in some Eastern and Central African territories for small areas of land farmed efficiently for generations by European communities to be turned over to African tribes. Such a step could at best provide only slight and temporary relief for African congestion. Expropriation of that kind, which would hand over properly farmed land for destruction, would be an act not only of injustice but of folly. The United Kingdom Government was at present examining the most promising ways of making use of the large areas of empty or half-empty land still existing in Africa by placing them under efficient and permanent cultivation.

61. Agriculture should not, however, be the only element in the economic prosperity of the territories. Some element of industrialization was essential to absorb some part at least of the excess population. The production of cheap power was essential in any programme of industrialization. Two great schemes of hydro-electric development in Africa might be mentioned in that connexion: the Volta scheme, in the Gold Coast, which would cost 144 million pounds sterling to construct, 57 million pounds of which would be provided by the United Kingdom Government, 42 million pounds by the Gold Coast Government and the remainder by the Canadian aluminium company which was co-operating in carrying out the project; and the dam under construction at the Owen Falls in Uganda. The latter would not only act as a great stimulus to industrial development in Uganda, but would also play a part in controlling the waters of the Nile. The United Kingdom was working on that scheme in close collaboration with the governments of other interested countries, and with the Egyptian Government in particular.

62. Such developments in the economic field inevitably gave rise to social problems such as housing, the transformation of tribal society, race relationships, etc. The concept of partnership between the different races was a valid one; it alone offered any hope of a world in which racial differences would not be a source of discord but would rather give opportunities for the best in all races to be blended into a strong and harmonious society.

63. Referring to a remark made at the 447th plenary meeting by the representative of the Lebanon, Mr. Hopkinson said he also believed that the conditions of the modern world called for something more than a fragmentation based on the old-fashioned idea of pure nationalism. There could be no doubt that the world was moving towards the creation of larger units and towards the attainment of cohesion and stability through emphasis on the things which bound men together rather than those which separated them. That process was going forward in Europe, and the United Kingdom delegation was convinced that it was an inevitable development in all parts of the world. The United Kingdom attached the greatest importance to the development of international co-operation to ensure the progress of Non-Self-Governing Territories. It would play an energetic part in promoting regional groupings for the solution of common technical problems.

64. The United Kingdom welcomed the interest shown by the specialized agencies of the United Nations in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in connexion with technical assistance. It regarded the promotion of an effective technical assistance programme as one of its cardinal functions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The aid it was already extending to its own territories could stand comparison with that available to any other country in the world. It felt however that there was great value in co-operation with the United Nations and the specialized agencies in that field. Financial reasons alone prevented the British territories from participating more fully in the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance. The requests the United Kingdom had made had exceeded the resources which could be allocated to it. It was well satisfied that the Technical Assistance Administration viewed its requests with sympathy and was equally satisfied with the energy and effectiveness with which it had provided a wide variety of services in the British territories.

65. In conclusion, he would emphasize that the United Kingdom would never subscribe to the view that there must necessarily be two camps in the Fourth Committee, the small camp of the administering Powers, that was to say, of the Powers who, by definition, might be regarded as reactionary and obstructive, and the large camp of the non-administering Powers who, by definition, were considered to have the monopoly of good intentions. The United Kingdom was convinced that their fundamental objectives were the same. It did not believe that problems were always approached without some degree of prejudice and without some degree of ignorance.

66. It was of the utmost importance both for the fruitfulness of the Fourth Committee's work and for the reputation of the United Nations that the Committee's discussions and recommendations should be based on a true assessment of the nature of the problems and on a generous understanding of the difficulties to be faced. For its part, the United Kingdom had consistently done its utmost to send to meetings of such bodies, and notably to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, representatives who could speak with authority and experience on the problems of the territories administered by the United Kingdom. It might be of great assistance if other Member States would make an effort to do likewise.

67. At some stage of the debate which had just opened, the United Kingdom delegation might put forward concrete proposals designed to ensure that the matters dealt with by the Fourth Committee should be examined, not within a preconceived political framework, but as world-wide problems to the solution of which all countries could contribute.

68. It was impossible to deal with the human problems which confronted that Committee wholly in isolation. Many of them were not solely a matter for the Fourth Committee but also came within the terms of reference of other Assembly committees. They could be judged only against the background of the achievements of each country, for after all, it was only the knowledge a country gained in administering itself that taught it to judge the success or failure of others. If, as the drafters of the Charter certainly intended, Member States could work together as one team, if they could discard some of the doubts and suspicions existing on both sides, if they could contribute to the common task the maximum wisdom and technical knowledge which they had gained individually, there was every likelihood that the Fourth Committee's work would go forward harmoniously and rapidly towards the goal which all nations sought to attain—the political economic, social and educational advancement of the peoples of the territories concerned.

69. Mr. CAMPOS CATELIN (Argentina) said he wished, in the name of his Government, to submit a formal reservation to the effect that the transmission by the United Kingdom Government of information on the Islas Malvinas—incorrectly designated as the Falkland Islands in document A/2413—in no way affected Argentine sovereignty over the territory, which had been unlawfully occupied by the United Kingdom by an act of force which the Argentine Republic would never accept. He reaffirmed the inalienable and imprescriptible rights of the Argentine Republic over the Islas Malvinas, South Georgia, the South Sandwich Islands and the Argentine sector of the Antarctic, which were an integral part of Argentine territory. He requested the Secretariat to use the term Islas Malvinas in all documents issued in Spanish.

70. Mr. HOPKINSON (United Kingdom) replied that his Government was sovereign over the territory in question, the population of which was of purely English stock and spoke only English. He affirmed the United Kingdom's sovereign rights over the islands and requested that the correct title of the islands, namely the Falkland Islands, should be used in all documents issued in English.

Records of the Fourth Committee

71. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) wished to protest against the fact that the summary record of the Committee's 321st meeting devoted only twelve lines to the statement made by his delegation, although the complete text of that statement, which had been handed to the précis-writers, amounted to fifty-five lines in Spanish. He asked that his speech should be included in the summary record concerned without mutilation.

72. The manner in which his statement had been summarized was particularly regrettable because it had dealt with a question of great importance—the request for a hearing by the President of the Puerto Rican Independence Party. His delegation had stated in that connexion that the Dominican Republic had always maintained the best possible relations with the Puerto Rican people. He wondered why someone had seen fit to omit that passage and why his statement had been reduced much more drastically than the statements of other delegations.

73. He also felt that the system of preparing summary records was faulty. The speeches of Spanish-speaking delegations were translated into English or French and then retranslated into Spanish, which gave rise to frequent errors and mistranslations in the summaries of speeches made in Spanish. It was also unsatisfactory that corrections to the summary records were accepted by the Secretariat only in English or French and not in Spanish.

74. His delegation requested that its complaint should be included in the summary record, and if no action was taken upon it, would be compelled to ask the Chairman to summon the responsible officials before the Fourth Committee.

75. The CHAIRMAN said he was confident that the Secretariat would take whatever action was necessary to satisfy the delegation of the Dominican Republic.

The meeting rose at 6.15 p.m.

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (continued).....	55

Chairman: Mr. Santiago PEREZ PEREZ (Venezuela).

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2428, A/C.4/L.272) (continued)

[Item 33]*

1. The CHAIRMAN called attention to the draft resolution submitted by the Brazilian delegation on the subject of factors (A/C.4/L.272).
2. Mr. FERREIRA DE SOUZA (Brazil) recalled that the Brazilian delegation had outlined its position on the question of factors at the Committee's seventh session (277th meeting).
3. After careful study of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2428) and after reading the many documents submitted to the Fourth Committee, the Brazilian delegation had considered it unnecessary to speak in the debate on that item of the agenda. It had taken the view that after three years' discussion the members of the Fourth Committee had reached an agreement on premises, on essential points and on preliminary considerations, so that long digressions on the merits, importance and limitations of scope of the list submitted by the Ad Hoc Committee could be avoided. Unfortunately, the Brazilian delegation had found that that was not so. Some speakers at previous meetings had practically reopened the entire question.
4. The Brazilian delegation was none the less more than ever convinced that it was unnecessary to study the bases of the question of factors or to digress into definitions. The criteria already listed satisfactorily met the purposes of the General Assembly in recommending the production of a list of factors which might serve as a guide to the Assembly in deciding whether to terminate the obligations imposed by Chapter XI of the Charter. The Ad Hoc Committee's report showed that the study of those factors had reached a point where no appreciable advance could be made. It was always possible to make improvements to a work of that kind but any changes in the text or in the system would merely reflect personal preferences, and there was consequently a risk of inviting fresh differences of opinion rather than improving the chances of agreement. The Brazilian delegation had therefore been somewhat dismayed by the proposal to set up a third committee to prepare a third edition of the same list, on which fruitless discussions might continue ad infinitum.

5. If that vicious circle was to be broken, care should be taken not to attach undue importance to the list. It should be realized that political circumstances were bound to vary and would always resist the application of rigid methods and set principles. Consequently, the existing list could be considered good or bad only in so far as it fulfilled its purpose of serving as a reference and working document.

6. The main criteria which could be applied in judging the measure of self-government were well known to all. The obligations enumerated in Article 73 of the Charter could cease only when the people of a territory had themselves decided their future in full political freedom. Such a decision freely taken must necessarily bring the people in question to the status either of complete independence and admission into the United Nations or the status of association with a sovereign State. If the conditions of such association left the former dependent territory free to exercise political sovereignty within its own borders, the problem would cease to exist. It was not for the Fourth Committee to decide whether the choice of such association had been a wise one. It could only consider whether self-government in internal political affairs could lead to self-government in administrative, economic and social affairs. As long as a nation had no sovereign and absolute power within its borders, it would be useless to assert that the provisions of paragraph b of Article 73 of the Charter, which was the cornerstone of Chapter XI, had been applied. Such were the real criteria of the autonomy of a territory's population. The indications given by the list of factors were of a subsidiary nature and must never obscure the fundamental considerations.

7. The Brazilian delegation was therefore ready to support any draft resolution which would view the list of factors in that way and which would enable the list to be put to the test.

8. If the members of the Fourth Committee would analyse concrete cases objectively, differences on questions of principle would be greatly reduced and the resulting atmosphere of calm would be conducive to solutions in keeping with the spirit of the Charter and reflecting the aspirations of dependent peoples without prejudicing the just and legitimate interests of the Administering Members.

9. In that spirit the Brazilian delegation was formally submitting draft resolution A/C.4/L.272. Its aim was to reconcile the views expressed by several delegations at recent meetings which were almost identical in several important respects with the views of the Brazilian delegation, particularly with regard to the manner of applying the factors. The draft resolution did not detract in any way from the value which those factors would have when it became necessary to decide the scope of the constitutional changes of which the United Nations was informed by Administering Members in accordance with resolution 222 (III), but it tried to define the spirit in which the newly-established political and juridical criteria should be applied and to stress their relative nature and the importance to be attached, in accordance with the principle stated in resolution 648 (VII), to the particular circumstances of each case.

10. It was true that resolution 648 (VII), in enumerating the basic considerations to be taken into account in the analysis of any situation where a full measure of self-government might be alleged to exist, had referred rather too vaguely to the right of peoples to determine their own future. Moreover, the list of factors had not emphasized sufficiently or exactly enough the importance of that criterion. Consequently, the Brazilian delegation had considered it advisable to give pride of place to a respect for the right of the populations concerned to choose their political status, when considering what evidence was required to support the claim that a full measure of self-government had been reached.

11. He felt sure that many delegations would share his views and would accept the solution proposed in the Brazilian draft. That text repeated paragraphs 3 and 4 of resolution 648 (VII) since it appeared essential to restate the principles contained in that resolution, particularly the principle of the indivisibility of autonomy, which was restated in paragraph 6 of document A/C.4/L.272. That notion was not contested in international or national law, but the Fourth Committee had placed on it certain restrictive interpretations which the Brazilian delegation could not accept. Full political responsibility was the very essence of the concept of self-government as expressed in Article 73 of the Charter. It was true that the idea could have been expressed less vaguely than in resolution 648 (VII), but a new text which in the last instance would merely repeat the same thing might well have given rise to further discussions on the meaning of words, without any practical result.

12. The Brazilian delegation left the revision of the list of factors to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories which, under resolutions 334 (IV) and 448 (V), was the competent body for initial examination of the information required under resolution 222 (III). Naturally, any final decision must be taken by the General Assembly since a delegation of powers enabling the Committee on Information to have the final word in such questions would be contrary to the principle of the stratification of powers, which must be maintained. On the other hand, it was impossible to exaggerate the importance of the functions of the Committee on Information with regard to the preliminary study of any case of the cessation of the transmission of information required under Article 73 of the Charter. The Brazilian delegation was submitting its draft resolution because it was its sincere desire to give that Committee a sound working document.

13. The Brazilian delegation would welcome any amendment designed to give greater force, precision or clarity to its text; but a resolution such as it was proposing would gain nothing by being overburdened with details or subsidiary considerations.

14. Mr. RIFAI (Syria) recalled the earlier discussions on the matter and urged that a list should be drawn up of factors to serve as a guide in determining whether the obligations set forth in Article 73 e of the Charter still applied. Such guiding principles should not, of course, be regarded as immutable criteria. In that connexion his delegation approved paragraph 9 of document A/2428. No matter how varied the circumstances peculiar to the different territories, however, one factor remained constant: the freely-expressed will of the peoples.

15. His delegation had two general observations to make on the proposed list of factors. First, the list, which was satisfactory on the whole, had in it shortcomings and gaps which could be remedied without referring the text to an ad hoc committee. In that respect his delegation agreed with the Guatemalan and Yugoslav delegations that any amendment which would improve the list should be supported. Secondly, no definition could be of permanent value in a world that was rapidly changing. The list would therefore have to be revised as and when circumstances demanded. It could be sent to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, which could be guided by it and could draw attention to such imperfections as came to light in the course of its application.

16. The problem did not lie in the value of the list itself, which everybody agreed was to be considered solely as a guide, but in something more fundamental—the disagreement in the Fourth Committee on the interpretation of the obligations placed on Member States by Chapter XI. There was a fundamental difference of opinion between the Administering Members, on the one hand, which held that under Chapter XI it was their exclusive prerogative to say whether a territory was self-governing or not; and the non-administering Members, on the other, which maintained that under Chapter XI the General Assembly was clearly competent to adjudicate on that point. Syria took the latter view. It was not the exclusive prerogative of the Administering Member to decide whether a territory had or had not attained a full measure of self-government. Were it otherwise, the drafting of the list of factors under discussion would be a sheer waste of time and effort. His delegation did not wish to involve the Committee in a legal discussion, but felt called upon to reassert that the General Assembly could not shirk its collective responsibility towards the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

17. The Belgian representative had stated (322nd meeting) that it would not be logical to apply the list of factors to the cessation of the transmission of information referred to in Article 73 e of the Charter without also applying it to the commencement of the transmission of such information. He could hardly believe that the Belgian representative had thereby meant information on sovereign States, Members of the United Nations, and that he wished to apply the provisions of Chapter XI to such States. That would be stretching logic too far.

18. In the present eventful times, it was tragic to note that many countries still thought fit to prolong the discussion on the peoples' desire for freedom, as though what was only temporary could continue indefinitely. Men must pray God to give them the courage to endure what could not be changed and to change what could, and the wisdom to distinguish between the two.

19. Mr. BENITES VINUEZA (Ecuador) stated that the problem of determining the factors in question was one of the most difficult ever placed before the General Assembly, for on its solution depended the realization of the hopes of millions of human beings living under subservience to foreign governments, although some Administering Members had striven to lead them to independence. Colonialism was an anachronism and the survival of the colonial idea could be only temporary.

20. His delegation reserved the right to submit observations on the draft resolution before the Committee. It would, for the present, confine itself to commenting on the report of the Ad Hoc Committee.

21. To begin with, he desired to congratulate the Committee on the work it had accomplished. The problem of factors comprised two distinct elements: on the one hand, the determination of the factors; on the other, the determination of criteria for their application. In regard to the second element, each specific case should be considered and decided on its own merits, and it went without saying that the list of factors could serve only for general guidance in arriving at a decision.

22. The Ad Hoc Committee had come to the conclusion in its report that it was not possible to find a satisfactory definition of the concept of a full measure of self government. That was a logical conclusion, for the task was an extremely difficult one, consisting first in analysing the features of self-government and then of making a synthesis of them. The Ad Hoc Committee had accomplished the first part of that task, but the list it proposed was not final because it was not complete. The principle of the self-determination of peoples and the principle of self-government were two intimately allied and inseparable concepts. Self-determination presupposed complete freedom. Any pressure would distort the principle of the right of peoples to self-determination. Accordingly, improvements should be made in the list of factors.

23. With regard to the application of the criteria, his delegation had no intention of evading the consideration of that burning problem. On the question which of the two—the Administering Members or the General Assembly—was competent to decide whether a territory had or had not attained a full measure of self-government, he stressed that by signing the Charter the Member States had assumed under Chapter XI, as under the other Chapters, a series of obligations constituting an indivisible whole. From the legal viewpoint, there could be no doubt as to the nature of the obligations under Chapter XI. According to the Administering Members, Chapter XI did not embody legal obligations but was a mere expression of goodwill, a moral declaration, as was clear from the very title of the Chapter: "Declaration regarding non-Self-Governing Territories". The French representative had stated (322nd meeting) that the criteria applied by certain delegations in resolving the question of competence were not legal but political, and he had asked what were the legal arguments it was intended to use in order to interpret Chapter XI as imposing obligations on the Administering Members. The reply was very clear. To begin with, the title of Chapter XI did not in any way change the legal nature of its content. The declaration was not unilateral; it appeared in the Charter, a legal instrument which a number of States had signed and which, for that reason, implied multilateral undertakings. The nature of those undertakings derived from the actual wording of Article 73, which spoke of Member States which had or assumed responsibilities for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The idea of responsibility excluded the possibility of unilateral action on the part of the Administering Members. By signing the Charter, those Powers had agreed to report to the United Nations on their administration of the Non-Self-Governing Territories; they had recognized the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of the territories were paramount. It did not constitute an infringement of their sovereignty to invite them to fulfil their obligations, which would not end until the United Nations and the Administering Member concerned had jointly agreed that the provisions of Chapter XI had ceased to apply to a given Non-Self-Governing Territory. The General Assembly was therefore competent in the matter. Furthermore, delegations should not be reproached for invoking both legal and political criteria at one and the same time because the obligations under the Charter were implemented at one and the same time on the political and legal levels.

24. Mr. LYNKOV (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) thought that if all States had strictly applied both the letter and the spirit of the Charter, and if the Administering Members had respected the provisions of Article 73 in their administration of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the number of such territories would have dwindled daily. His delegation would have been the first to welcome such a development, because it would have been not the result of an arbitrary, unilateral decision unmatched by any de facto change in the condition of a Non-Self-Governing Territory, but evidence of the natural advancement of the peoples to self-government and independence. The Committee's discussions would have become pointless, and it would not have been necessary to draw up the list of factors which the Committee was now considering.

25. Such was not the case, and it was therefore important to draft a list of factors which, if applied, would prevent the Administering Members from arbitrarily ceasing to transmit the information referred to in Article 73. The list drafted by the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors was an advance in the right direction, but it was far from complete and certain improvements should be made. Moreover, some of the Ad Hoc Committee's conclusions were unacceptable. In particular, it should not be impossible to find a satisfactory definition of the concept of a full measure of self-government; the absence of such a definition was a serious shortcoming. The Ad Hoc Committee had not, therefore, fully discharged the duty the General Assembly had assigned to it.

26. His delegation was able to accept the factors enumerated in the first part of the list in principle, but was opposed to the adoption of those included in the second and third parts; those parts gave the Administering Members an opportunity to interpret and apply the factors in such a way as not to guarantee either the right of peoples to self-determination or their attainment of independence.

27. With regard to the question of competence, the problems of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were international problems. The Administering Members could not therefore unilaterally decide that a territory had attained a full measure of self-government, nor could they cease, on their own initiative, to transmit information on the territory. The Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic had made its position clear in a letter to the Secretary-General dated 29 April 1952 (A/AC.58/1/Add.2) that position was similar to that of the Soviet Union. In his delegation's opinion the Administering Members could not stop transmitting information until the Committee on Information from Non-Self-

Governing Territories, after studying developments in the territory concerned, had recommended to the General Assembly that Article 73 should cease to apply and until the territory in question had become a sovereign State in which the indigenous population fully exercised the executive, legislative and judicial power. It was useless for the Administering Members to try to give a restrictive interpretation to Chapter XI by alleging that the United Nations was not competent to adjudicate on the political advancement of a territory because the information referred to in Article 73 e related solely to economic, social and educational conditions. In point of fact, under Article 73 a the Administering Members were required to ensure the political advancement of the indigenous peoples.

28. Like the Polish delegation, his delegation wished the question of factors to proceed from the theoretical level, at which it had remained so far, to the practical level of specific decisions. It therefore considered the Belgian representative's view, as set forth in paragraph 40 (c) of document A/2428, unacceptable. It was convinced that a useful purpose would be served by continuing the work undertaken and clarifying and improving the list approved by the Committee, which had itself recognized that the list was by no means perfect.

29. In conclusion it was to be hoped that the list on which the Committee was working would make it possible to help the populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to attain independence.

30. Mr. ARAOZ (Bolivia) said that the progress made could be seen from the records of the meetings the various organs of the General Assembly had devoted to the question of factors and from the reports and decisions of those organs. It would seem that the international system drawn up for the benefit of Non-Self-Governing Territories might be applied in practice. The future of over 200 million people was bound up with that of the United Nations. Obligations under the Charter could not be nullified by a unilateral decision which certain States had taken solely on the basis of their own interests. The General Assembly was competent in the matter and could lead the dependent peoples toward the objective laid down in the Charter.

31. The list of factors drawn up by the Ad Hoc Committee was not final. In approving it, the Fourth Committee would merely be reaffirming the need for practical use of the criteria contained in the report in order to take a better-founded decision in each case. The list was a guide and each case should be dealt with in the light of its own circumstances, including historical circumstances. The Bolivian delegation would support any proposal to continue United Nations supervision until the objectives laid down in Chapter XI had been achieved and peoples subjected to colonial oppression for centuries had become completely self-governing.

32. Definition of the concept of full self-government was the first stage to be reached. The nations represented in the United Nations were able to maintain their national unity because they enjoyed not only economic and social independence, but also political independence. It was erroneous to allege that the application of economic and social criteria was enough to determine whether a territory was fully self-governing. Political independence was a prerequisite of economic and social independence. The peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories should determine their future for themselves, with the assistance of the Administering Members and the United Nations. The list drawn up by the Ad Hoc Committee contained criteria relating to political conditions which seemed to constitute a definition of the concept of full self-government. Agreement seemed to have been reached on that point.

33. Among the criteria which the Assembly had to apply, there was one to which the Bolivian delegation attached great importance, that of respect for the principle of the right of peoples to self-determination. That right was understood to be the achievement of the aspirations of a large majority and not the prerogative of small minorities representing foreign interests. The criterion relating to universal suffrage therefore seemed to be especially important, since universal suffrage enabled the whole population to express its will freely, without any discrimination whatsoever. In that connexion, universal suffrage must not be restricted by introducing the concept of "educational opportunities" referred to in sub-paragraph (c) of point C in paragraph 15 of the report because that might enable minorities to interfere with the development desired by the population as a whole.

34. The Bolivian delegation was prepared to accept the list of factors drawn up by the Ad Hoc Committee. Nevertheless, it did not consider that the Fourth Committee's task would stop there. The problem was closely connected with that of the cessation of the transmission of information. It was for the General Assembly to decide. He would therefore support the proposal made by the Mexican representative at the 322nd meeting for the requirements of national defence must not lead to measures contrary to the principle of sovereignty.

35. With regard to the title of the second part of the list, the word "continuing", which was used to describe the association of the territory with the metropolitan country, should be deleted. The population should remain free to express, by democratic means and without any pressure, its views on the form of government it wished; that was implied in respect for the right of people to self-determination.

36. Finally, Mr. Araoz said that he would support the Guatemalan representative's suggestion, contained in paragraph 28 of the Ad Hoc Committee's report.

37. The United Nations must be on the watch and must work out the principles which would promote the non-self-governing peoples' attainment of full self-government. Bolivia was the more prepared to help in that work because, in the same spirit, it had undertaken, together with other Latin-American countries, to struggle for as long as was necessary to achieve the independence of the populations of the regions of Latin America which were still occupied by Powers foreign to the Latin-American cultural sphere.

38. The arguments which the Belgian representative had used with such acumen to defend his theory could only add to the complexity of the problem before the Committee, and were legally unfounded. Moreover, there was an obvious contradiction between sub-paragraph (b) and sub-paragraph (e) of paragraph 40 of document A/2428, where the Belgian delegation's thesis was stated. The Bolivian delegation could not admit the principle of applying the provisions of Chapter XI to metropolitan territories because that principle was absolutely incompatible with its own national traditions and with the spirit of the Charter, which made it incumbent on every Member State to respect the great concepts of non-interference in the internal affairs of States, of the right of peoples to self-determination and of freedom. In no case should a sovereign State agree that its metropolitan territory should be subject to the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter. Bolivia, which was pursuing its struggle towards economic independence, would never allow itself to be regarded as a colony or territory.

39. In a spirit of co-operation, the Bolivian delegation was prepared to consider favourably any draft resolution or amendment which would take account of the principles he had stated.

40. Mr. FERNANDEZ (Uruguay) pointed out that the problem the Committee was endeavouring to solve was noteworthy both for its importance and for its complexity. The fate of 200 million people was involved and the United Nations had devoted years of study to the problem without being able to find a solution satisfactory to all.

41. General Assembly resolution 66 (I) listed seventy-four territories with respect to which the Administering Members had undertaken to transmit information. That number had subsequently decreased, but the Administering Members had not seen fit to indicate why the territories concerned no longer came within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter. It was, of course, desirable that the number of Non-Self-Governing Territories should steadily decrease, in so far as the cessation of the transmission of information really meant that those territories had attained independence or self-government and were occupying their rightful place in the community of nations. Nevertheless, it was plainly the duty of the United Nations to ensure that a Non-Self-Governing Territory was not unduly deprived of international protection. Anxiety on that score should not be taken as signifying distrust of the Administering Members, but rather as an expression of the General Assembly's zeal in putting the principles proclaimed in the Charter into practice. It was precisely with a view to helping the General Assembly and the Administering Members to perform their tasks as satisfactorily as possible that a list of factors should be established which could serve as a guide in determining whether a territory had attained self-government.

42. The drawing up of a list of such factors raised two separate problems: the compilation of the list proper and the selection of the authority which was to decide whether a territory was self-governing. The Administering Members claimed that they had exclusive competence in the matter and that they alone could decide whether to continue or to cease transmitting information concerning the territory. It had always been the Uruguayan delegation's view, stated in the Fourth Committee (216th meeting) by Mr. Mattos as early as the sixth session, that the United Nations, and particularly the General Assembly, should examine the situation in a given territory with a view to deciding whether it had attained self-government; it was inadmissible that the Power administering the territory should be able to decide the question unilaterally. By assuming the obligations set out in Chapter XI, the administering Powers had recognized the competence of the international Organization. Moreover, the United Nations had assumed the task of helping the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to attain their freedom by democratic and peaceful means.

43. It was therefore the right and the duty of the United Nations most carefully to examine the constitutional reasons advanced by a Power responsible for the administration of a Non-Self-Governing Territory as grounds for ceasing to transmit information concerning that territory. Chapter XI would become completely meaningless if an Administering Member were able unilaterally to withdraw from the obligation it had assumed.

44. He wished to assert once again that the theory of the universality of Chapter XI had no legal value. Article 74 of the Charter made a very clear distinction between Non-Self-Governing Territories and metropolitan territories. Clearly, therefore, in drafting Article 73, the authors of the Charter had at all times had only the non-metropolitan territories in mind. The theory of universality was unacceptable; it could not be applied in determining either the territories towards which obligations existed under Article 73, or the factors by which the purpose of those obligations could be clearly defined.

45. Referring to the list of factors in document A/2428, he wished to congratulate the Ad Hoc Committee on the care and intelligence with which it had performed its task. As the situation varied considerably from one territory to another, it was impossible to establish criteria which would apply rigidly to all Non-Self-Governing Territories; hence, the list of factors should, as the Ad Hoc Committee stated in paragraphs 9 and 13 of its report, merely serve as a guide permitting consideration of each concrete case in the light of the particular circumstances of that case. While his delegation had no basic objection to the list of factors proper, it was nevertheless prepared to support any proposal aimed at improving the list.

46. He reserved his delegation's right to speak on that subject in the course of the discussion.

47. Mr. CALLE Y CALLE (Peru) supported the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272), the operative part of which, and particularly paragraphs 3, 4 and 6, embodied eminently acceptable principles. A number of considerations should be borne in mind when studying the draft.

48. First, Article 73 of the Charter and the obligations it imposed could not be affected by the adoption of the list of factors. Secondly, the Ad Hoc Committee had studied the possibility of defining the concept of a full measure of self-government and not of defining self-government proper. Thirdly, while each of the factors enumerated in the list represented one aspect of a full measure of self-government, all the factors so listed could not altogether be regarded as constituting a final definition of a full measure of self-government. Fourthly, the fact that the list was in three parts by no means meant that there were three or more systems of self-government; in fact, self-government was indivisible. Fifthly, the list should be entitled: "Factors indicative of the attainment of a full measure of self-government", since there could be no independence, continuing association or free association unless a territory had attained a full measure of self-government. If, on the other hand, it was thought that a full measure of self-government was achieved only with independence, the list should refer to other "degrees" rather than to other "systems", of self-government. Sixthly, the voluntary limitation of sovereignty, as a number of delegations had pointed out, was an attribute of a full measure of self-government and certain systems of association could come about at the very moment when the territory attained self-government.

49. In short, the list before the Committee contained no major improvements as compared with the previous list, given in the annex to resolution 648 (VII). In view of the further fact that the Ad Hoc Committee had failed to establish a definition of the concept of a full measure of self-government, the Peruvian delegation could not give final, but merely provisional, approval to the current list as a body of guiding principles.

50. His delegation reserved the right to speak again later.

51. Mr. L. S. BOKHARI (Pakistan) considered that the discussion had shown that it was pointless at that stage to carry the study of the question of factors any further and that it would be sufficient to amend the existing list if examination of a particular case so required. The Brazilian draft resolution would not appear to be controversial and the Pakistani delegation intended to support it. It was clear from the discussions, both at the current session and at previous sessions, that there was a wide divergence of views between the Administering Members and the other Member States with regard to the interpretation of the Charter. It was time to settle that disagreement, and the Pakistani delegation accordingly called upon the Administering Members to undertake to continue the transmission of information if the United Nations, after examining the relevant documents, decided that a particular territory had not yet attained a full measure of self-government. He appealed to the good will of the Administering Members and assured them that the United Nations was well aware that it was impossible to apply rigid criteria to each individual case. Relations between individuals as well as between communities, especially political relations, were in a constant state of change. The Administering Members could be sure that the United Nations would examine each case with the greatest impartiality. If, however, they were unable, for reasons which the Pakistani delegation failed to see, to act on its proposal and to trust the United Nations, the opposing parties would have to be referred to the highest existing court, the International Court of Justice.

52. The CHAIRMAN said that he proposed to close the list of speakers at the next meeting.

Chairman: Mr. Santiago PEREZ PEREZ (Venezuela).

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2428, A/C.4/L.272, A/C.4/L.273) (continued)

1. The CHAIRMAN invited the Committee to continue the discussion of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2428). A number of amendments to the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272) were proposed by the delegations of Bolivia, Egypt, Guatemala, Indonesia, Iraq, Mexico, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Venezuela, Yemen and Yugoslavia and were set out in document A/C.4/L.273. Delegations wishing to propose further amendments could do so until the close of the following meeting.

2. Ato Katama ABEBE (Ethiopia) considered that all Member States which had subscribed to the Charter had thereby undertaken to co-operate with a view to ensuring that the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories gained the freedom and political independence promised them in Chapter XI. The Administering Members were therefore not competent to take unilateral decisions in the matter. The aspirations of the peoples for complete self-government were still far from satisfied in full; the establishment of the list of factors was one of the stages in the process which was to lead to a full measure of self-government for all the peoples of the world.

3. His delegation regretted that the Ad Hoc Committee had failed to find a satisfactory definition of the concept of a full measure of self-government within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter; it agreed, however, that the absence of such a definition was not a serious disadvantage, since in the examination of any particular case the concept would emerge in its practical application to the facts of that case.

4. As regards the right of peoples to self-determination, point E of paragraph 15 of the Ad Hoc Committee's report was very important since an assurance that the views of the population concerned would be respected could alone guarantee the full exercise of that right.

5. Some Administering Members had declared that they had granted self-government to some of the territories under their control and that they therefore no longer had the responsibility of transmitting the information referred to in Article 73 e of the Charter. In such cases, well-defined criteria were necessary to determine whether or not a territory really had attained a full measure of self-government. It was also essential that the United Nations should have not only the right but the duty to apply those criteria to each individual case and then to reach a decision.

6. His delegation wished, furthermore, to refute the argument that the provisions of Chapter XI could apply to the metropolitan territories of sovereign States.

7. In conclusion, he considered that the existing list of factors constituted a satisfactory body of guiding principles. It would only be necessary to apply those principles to discover whether modifications were necessary. There was therefore no reason why the Committee should not adopt the list without further delay.

8. The Ethiopian delegation would support the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272) or any similar draft resolution.

9. Mr. RIVAS (Venezuela) deplored the fact that two opposing groups, apparently irreconcilable in their views—at any rate on the question of defining the concept of a full measure of self-government and of determining whether it was for the General Assembly to decide that a territory had attained self-government—were engaged in controversy in the Committee, thereby weakening that spirit of unity without which Chapter XI could not have been drafted at the San Francisco Conference. Abandoning the sensible and generous attitude they had adopted during the drafting of the Charter, the administering Powers were endeavouring to introduce a narrow interpretation of the provisions of Chapter XI for which there was no justification either in the letter or in the spirit of that Chapter. It was legitimate, therefore, to conclude that the administering Powers were actuated by motives alien to the Charter and because of them were advancing once again arguments regarded as completely outworn: self-government alone would not ensure the well-being of the peoples of a territory, while independence could be a disaster for countries not yet able to enjoy it. Forgetful of the great danger which had threatened their own independence during the Second World War, those Powers appeared bent on infringing the independence of certain sovereign States which they did not hesitate to place on the same plane as colonies or protectorates. That survival of colonialism was directly contrary to the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter. Moreover, in invoking Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter to deny the United Nations any competence in matters concerning the fate of a Non-Self-Governing Territory, the Administering Members were ignoring the fact that when Chapter XI had been adopted, it had been understood that matters relating to the Non-Self-Governing Territories did not come within the scope of that paragraph.

10. Nothing could demonstrate more clearly the fallacy of the argument that self-government in the economic, social and educational spheres constituted a full measure of self-government within the meaning of Chapter XI than the conclusions reached by the various committees that had studied the question in 1951 and again in 1952 and 1953. Each of those committees, composed of an equal number of administering and non-administering Powers—a fact which set a valuable seal of impartiality on their views—had declared that a territory which enjoyed self-government in all spheres of public life except the political sphere could not belong to any of the three categories into which territories which had attained a full measure of self-government were divided. Moreover, in 1953 the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors had stated, in reply to a question by the Netherlands Government, that there could be no provision for a fourth category of completely self-governing territories to include territories which did not enjoy self-government in the political sphere though enjoying it in economic, social and cultural matters. The reason for that was clear: so long as a territory did not satisfy the conditions laid down in paragraphs a, b, c, d and e of Article 73 it could not be considered to have attained a full measure of self-government and the Administering Member responsible for it continued to be bound by its obligations under Chapter XI. Those obligations were not, as certain Powers would make out, either unilateral or exclusively moral. It was anachronistic in the twentieth century to believe that an agreement could be concluded with an abstract entity; to be objective and valid, international law had to be applied and enforced by a concrete agency which, in the case in question, was the United Nations. Consequently, the United Nations General Assembly was competent to determine in each individual case whether a territory continued to come within the scope of Chapter XI or had attained a full measure of self-government. According to certain delegations the fact that the Administering Members had been instructed to draw up the list of territories contained in General Assembly resolution 66 (I) proved that the General Assembly had recognized the exclusive competence of those Powers. That list, however, had been purely provisional until the General Assembly had confirmed it in its resolution 66 (I); it was designed merely to facilitate the Assembly's work. It was significant that that list included only the territories with regard to which certain stronger, more ingenious States had assumed exclusive competence, without granting them the same rights as the metropolitan territories.

11. It was to those less fortunate countries that the provisions of Chapter XI applied: they could not be extended to other territories without endangering the security and sovereignty of the small countries. It was to avert that threat that at Bogotá in 1948 the Ninth International Conference of American States had adopted resolution XXXIII in which it declared that the process of the emancipation of America would not be complete so long as there remained on the continent a vestige of the European colonial régime. There could be no question that in other parts of the world where colonies and protectorates still existed the small Powers shared the same views, if not the same apprehension. It was undeniable also that those Powers would be able to co-operate much more fruitfully with the United Nations if the great Powers, and more especially the European Powers, approached that political problem in the spirit of good faith and constructive co-operation which had inspired them at San Francisco.

12. Since the First World War a number of Powers had conquered defenceless peoples or had created States whose independence was wholly fictitious. At the present time, however, the world realized much more clearly than at the time of the League of Nations that the task of promoting the advancement of the peoples of territories other than sovereign States was a matter for the whole body of civilized nations which were Members of the United Nations. As Marshal Smuts had declared at San Francisco, the international Organization's right of supervision should extend even to the colonies and protectorates of the countries which had vanquished the Axis Powers.

13. Chapter XI of the Charter represented an important stage in the process which was to lead all the peoples to freedom, since it was inconceivable that weak countries should be converted into colonies.

14. It was time to conclude the study of factors. The current list was virtually identical with that drawn up in 1952 (resolution 648 (VII), annex). Any prolongation of the discussion gave the Administering Members the opportunity to make statements threatening the independence of the small countries which were still struggling to throw off the last vestiges of colonialism. The amendments contained in document A/C.4/L.273 were based exclusively on the principles proclaimed in the Charter; hence, they could not fail to win the approval of those Member States which did not wish to go beyond the scope of the international convention they had signed.

15. In conclusion, he pointed out how dangerous it might be to delay the solution of certain problems, and especially that of the political development of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories, since those problems might then become acute and provoke grave crises.

16. Mr. JUSTINIANO (Chile) said that his delegation congratulated the Ad Hoc Committee and unreservedly approved its report. It was ready to accept any proposal enabling the provisions of the Charter to be applied more effectively. Despite what some delegations had said, the Charter, and in particular Chapter XI, clearly defined the obligations of the Administering Members, and there was not the least doubt that those obligations were legal and not merely moral. Chapter XI of the Charter also made unequivocally clear that the Administering Members were not exclusively entitled to decide whether a territory had or had not obtained a full measure of self-government.

17. The Chilean delegation regretted that some Administering Members, through an unjustified interpretation of Chapter XI, were attempting to extend the provisions of that chapter to countries which were formerly colonies. He referred especially to the arguments of the Belgian representative, in paragraph 40 of document A/2428. At the end of the First World War, the possessions of Germany and Turkey had lost their status as colonies and had been entrusted to the victor nations in order to put an end to the partitioning of Africa and certain areas of Asia. Those former colonies had been made mandated territories, which had been designed as "A", "B" or "C" mandates according to the level of civilization attained by the people. The level of civilization existing in a sovereign State or a part of its territory could not be adopted as a valid basis for asserting that such State came under the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter. The Chilean delegation accordingly rejected any attempt to set up a comparison between the populations of Non-Self-Governing Territories and the indigenous populations of Latin America, irrespective of the level of civilization of the latter. In Chile, moreover, the problem of indigenous populations did not exist.

18. Lord HUDSON (United Kingdom) said that in the opinion of his delegation the report of the Ad Hoc Committee should be accepted and that no further study of the list of factors should be entrusted to a specially appointed body. The Brazilian draft resolution, to the extent that it set out the same conclusions, could be supported by the United Kingdom delegation, but that draft unfortunately contained a number of elements which the United Kingdom Government could not accept.

19. There was room for doubt, for example, concerning the true meaning of the statement in paragraph 6 of the operative part that "it is essential that its people shall have attained a full measure of self-government," because the Ad Hoc Committee had not succeeded in satisfactorily defining the term "a full measure of self-government". There was a danger that that paragraph could in practice support interpretations which the Government of the United Kingdom could not accept. When an administering Power and the people of a Non-Self-Governing Territory, by processes well established in law, jointly agreed that the government of the territory should take over full responsibility for certain fields of administration, or that the territory should become self-governing or independent, then that decision should be accepted as final, and it entailed as a necessary consequence that the transmission of information under Article 73 e should cease, since the relationship between the territory and the metropolitan government was no longer governed by the provisions of that article. In the case, moreover, of a territory attaining self-government by stages, a point might be reached when information to be transmitted under Article 73 e would relate to fields that were no longer within the jurisdiction of the administering Power, but it was unlikely that in the circumstances the administering Power would maintain that the territory is in question for that reason no longer fell within the scope of the remainder of Article 73. That was the main objection of the United Kingdom delegation to the Brazilian proposal.

20. He added that despite the skill with which paragraph 3 had been drafted, the United Kingdom delegation could not accept the principle that a decision whether a territory did or did not come under the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter rested equally with the Administering Member and the Assembly. It was quite clear that the Administering Member should take the initial decision; the General Assembly would be wise to accept that decision after due explanations had been given. It was true that the objectives of the Administering Members and of the General Assembly with regard to Chapter XI were identical, but, in spite of the provisions of paragraph 5, it was to be feared that the Brazilian draft resolution would create the impression that the Assembly was seeking to interpose some veto on the attainment of self-government by Non-Self-Governing Territories.

21. The United Kingdom delegation also regretted the inclusion in paragraph 4 of the words "the people concerned has exercised its rights to self-determination". That phrase was ill-defined and should be deleted.

22. It was, moreover, superfluous that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories should be permanently entrusted with studying relevant documentation in the light of the list of factors, as was proposed in paragraph 7.

23. The United Kingdom delegation would vote on the various paragraphs of the Brazilian draft resolution and on the resolution as a whole in the light of the views just expressed.

24. Mr. KAISR (Czechoslovakia) said that the arbitrary decision by the Administering Members to cease transmitting information on conditions in some Non-Self-Governing Territories and the frequent violation of the principles of the Charter, especially of Article 73 e, by those Members had obliged the General Assembly to seek some means of preventing them from taking unilateral decisions in the matter at hand. The means had been the list of factors.

25. The Czechoslovak delegation believed that such a list would never have more than a somewhat theoretical value, even though it were faultless in all respects. It would be productive of practical results only through the concrete application of the factors in each particular case in the light of the objective to be attained, namely the realization of the incontestable right of the people to self-determination. As clearly indicated in resolution 648 (VII), the list of factors was not intended to prevent Non-Self-Governing Territories from attaining a full measure of self-government but, on the contrary, was designed to serve as a guide capable of furthering progress towards self-government and independence and to prevent the administering Powers from arbitrarily and unilaterally changing the status of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. That was why the Czechoslovak Government regarded the drafting of a list of factors as a relatively useful idea.

26. The Czechoslovak delegation had carefully examined the list of factors prepared by the Ad Hoc Committee, as provided in resolution 648 (VII). It noted with regret that the so-called new list differed very little from the old one, and thought it should try to find out why that was so. The ten members of the Ad Hoc Committee included five administering Powers who, as document A/2428 proved, had exerted considerable effort to weaken the meaning and scope of the factors as much as possible. The membership of the Ad Hoc Committee had thus been one of the principal obstacles preventing the Committee from working more efficiently and obtaining more satisfactory results.

27. The Czechoslovak delegation did not regard the list of factors as a rule which could be applied automatically. It regarded the list as a sort of guide, and had observed during the lengthy debate on the question in the Fourth Committee that the same opinion was shared by most delegations, with the sole exception of the Administering Members.

28. The Czechoslovak delegation believed, like several other delegations, that Article 73 of the Charter formed a unit and as such constituted an obligation upon all

Member States without exception. The Administering Members were therefore not justified in regarding paragraph e of that article as merely a formal declaration, because it was a positive rule of law and consequently binding on them.

29. It logically followed that the decision whether a territory referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter had or had not attained a full measure of self-government did not rest exclusively with the Administering Members. The taking of such a decision was, first and foremost, the right and duty of every Member of the United Nations. The list of factors would accordingly be useful in enabling the General Assembly to take decisions of that kind, which it, and it alone, should take.

30. Passing on to a detailed examination of the list of factors set out in document A/2428, he found it necessary to object to some points.

31. The title of the second part contained the words "continuing association" of the territory with the metropolitan country. Resolution 648 (VII) stated clearly, however, that the list of factors should in no way be a hindrance to the attainment of self-government by the territories. The word "continuing" used in the title was neither logical nor appropriate, because in some cases its interpretation might be a hindrance to the attainment of self-government by a particular territory. Even taking for granted the improbable case in which the people of a Non-Self-Governing Territory would, without intervention or pressure, freely renounce their complete independence in order to be freely associated with the metropolitan country, it was inconceivable that the people in question could agree that the association should have a continuing character, because they would thus be renouncing independence for all time.

32. The Czechoslovak delegation could not unreservedly accept factor A.1 of the second part of the list of factors. The drafting of that factor was also inappropriate, since the fact that the people of a territory were asking for self-government and independence was in itself sufficient evidence of their political maturity and any criterion other than a freely expressed desire for a full measure of independence and self-government which might eventually be used for interpreting factor A.1 could easily be a hindrance to the attainment of self-government and independence by the territory concerned.

33. The second and third parts of the list of factors contained criteria which permitted interference by one country in the internal affairs of another. Such criteria were in contradiction with the right of self-determination of peoples and with the concept of a full measure of self-government, a concept for which the Ad Hoc Committee, as stated in paragraph 11 of document A/2428, could not find a satisfactory definition.

34. He wondered whether the factors presented by the Ad Hoc Committee could not be improved through a more thorough study by a body which could provide a better guarantee of impartiality. The various delegations which had participated in the debate had, by their statements, already shown that such a procedure was possible. In those circumstances the Czechoslovak delegation would support any proposal to improve, revise and clarify the factors before finally adopting them.

35. Thus his delegation was prepared to accept the first part of the list of factors proposed in document

A/2428, but it could not accept the second and third parts of that list; it asked, therefore, that the three parts of the list should be voted upon separately.

36. With regard to the draft resolution submitted by the delegation of Brazil the Czechoslovak delegation likewise requested that each paragraph should be voted upon separately. It was prepared to vote for paragraphs 1, 4, 5, 6 and 8 of the operative part, but would be obliged to vote against paragraphs 2, 3 and 7, because the second and third parts of the list did not seem to accomplish their purpose. It accepted the first three paragraphs of the preamble but objected to the fourth, because the list of factors presented did not seem to correspond satisfactorily with the intentions of the General Assembly as expressed in resolution 648 (VII), especially paragraphs 6 and 7 of that resolution.

37. The Czechoslovak delegation therefore requested that the draft resolution submitted by Brazil (A/C.4/272) should be voted upon paragraph by paragraph.

38. Mr. ITANI (Lebanon) felt that it was not surprising that all the previous speakers had stressed the exceptional importance of the question of factors, since it was so closely connected with the freedom of peoples generally. Lebanon, which had always defended the right of peoples to self-determination and raised its voice in support of freedom for all the countries of the world, was bound to adopt a position in keeping with its past and its traditions.

39. The study of factors had been decided upon by the General Assembly because certain Administering Members had ceased to transmit information on thirteen Non-Self-Governing Territories. Those Members had thus taken a unilateral decision in regard to those territories, although the responsibilities they had assumed were of an international character and could not legally be discontinued except in pursuance of a decision of the General Assembly.

40. The purpose of Chapter XI of the Charter was, above all, to determine the special relations which must exist between the United Nations and the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Unless one wished to depart from the letter and spirit of Article 73 of the Charter, the Administering Members were far from exclusively competent to decide whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory had attained a full measure of self-government.

41. Turning to the list of factors proposed by the Ad Hoc Committee, he said that the Lebanese delegation wished to make certain general comments, while reserving its Government's position in relation to any amendment or proposal which might come before the Committee.

42. First, the opinion of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be the deciding factor. For that reason, the Lebanese delegation expressed formal reservations in regard to such expressions as "association", "assimilation", "incorporation" or "annexation", particularly where there were differences of race, language, religion, culture and so forth.

43. Secondly, it was of paramount importance to specify the procedure which had to be followed in applying the list of factors; indeed, if the Administering Members did not declare that they were immediately ready to respect the decisions of the Assembly, in accordance with the list, all the work of the Ad Hoc Committee would have been a sheer waste of time, and the prestige of the United Nations would have been severely lowered.

44. Thirdly, it was very difficult, if not impossible, to frame a complete and final definition of the notion of full self-government. For that reason the list of factors was merely an indication and guide, which it was for the Assembly to complete when fresh circumstances so required.

45. Fourthly, though conscious of the need to introduce certain additional elements into the list, the Lebanese delegation wished to thank the Ad Hoc Committee for the efforts which the latter had made and which had resulted in the document before the Fourth Committee.

46. Fifthly, the Lebanese delegation called on the Members concerned, in conformity with their liberal traditions, not to fail in the obligations they had assumed when they had acceded to the Charter, but to endeavour to strengthen international collaboration, the brotherhood of peoples and the prestige of the United Nations. If they did so, it would be possible to end the present deadlock and to attain the objective of Article 73 of the Charter.

47. He did not wish to enter upon a detailed examination of the proposed factors because that list required improvement. He considered that the essential condition was to give proof of good faith, and show a sincere desire to solve the question in accordance with international law and the right of peoples to self-determination, setting aside all economic and political interests which might prevent the complete, sincere, and resolute application of Article 73 of the Charter.

48. Mr. NAUDE (Union of South Africa) said that his delegation had not intended to take part in the present debate, but in view of the discussion which had taken place, he felt bound at least to compliment the Ad Hoc Committee on the work which it had accomplished, particularly since the notions with which it had had to deal were not capable of definition.

49. His delegation had hoped, after the view originally expressed, that it would not be necessary to propose that the General Assembly should take a formal decision on the list of factors. Unfortunately, the question of competence had been introduced and, in the view of his delegation, had become the principal element in the discussion. The proposed amendments to the Brazilian draft resolution confirmed that opinion.

50. In the present circumstances, his delegation felt that the tendency to introduce the question of competence was not likely to assist the Fourth Committee in successfully completing its work by drafting a text acceptable to all.

51. In the past the South African delegation had on many occasions been obliged to draw attention to the dangers of submitting amendments by interpretation. He regretted that the Fourth Committee was now faced with a case of that nature. It was a serious situation.

52. The Union of South Africa considered that it was exclusively for the Administering Members to decide whether the territories administered by them had attained self-government in the matters listed in Article 73 e. His delegation understood the lofty ideals inspiring those delegations which desired a specific list of factors. It was, however, worth observing that the United Nations was not a world parliament. Nevertheless, the law which governed the Organization, namely the Charter, seemed to his delegation to be as clear as possible.

53. It was therefore important that the Fourth Committee should give the matter mature consideration, before reaching any decision as to the action to be taken to implement the submitted list of factors.

54. Mr. WORM-MULLER (Norway) stated that the Norwegian Government regarded the development of self-government in Non-Self-Governing Territories as a question of primary importance, and public opinion in Norway strongly supported the emancipation of the peoples of those territories. It was therefore incumbent on the Assembly to take every appropriate step to speed such development.

55. The matter should be regarded from a practical angle. The first step had been taken in San Francisco when Chapter XI was drafted. Under that chapter the Administering Members had accepted a sacred trust. The obligation to transmit information in accordance with Article 73 e provided an incentive to improve conditions in the territories administered. Every Administering Member felt in honour bound to prove that constructive steps had been taken to that end.

56. It was in the interests of the Non-Self-Governing Territories that there should exist a feeling of mutual confidence between the Administering Members and the organs of the United Nations which dealt particularly with those subjects. If there were distrust, the Non-Self-Governing Territories would derive little benefit.

57. It appeared evident that there were sharply divided opinions in the Fourth Committee, and that the Administering Members could not be expected to vote for the draft resolution submitted by the Brazilian delegation. He referred in particular to the statement made earlier in the meeting by the representative of the United Kingdom.

58. Since it had not been possible to find a generally acceptable compromise resolution, it seemed best for the continued close collaboration within the Committee and in the interests of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to lay aside the controversial questions of principle and to proceed to take appropriate decisions concerning the report on factors which had been submitted to the Committee.

59. His delegation could not, therefore, vote for the draft resolution submitted by the Brazilian delegation.

60. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) said that he wished to remove the misunderstanding which seemed to have arisen at the previous meeting, particularly between the representative of Bolivia and himself.

61. The Bolivian representative had pointed out what he regarded as a contradiction in the reservations made by the Belgian representative in the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors. According to the former, the Belgian representative had admitted in paragraph 40 (a) of document A/2428 that Chapter XI of the Charter applied only to colonies and protectorates, but had said in paragraph 40 (e) that the same chapter applied to many peoples in sovereign territories.

62. In fact, the Belgian reservations did not state that Chapter XI applied only to the peoples of colonies and protectorates. On the contrary, the very object of those reservations had been to point out that the expressions "territories whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government" on the one hand, and "colonies and protectorates" on the other, were not synonymous. The only definition which the Charter gave of the peoples to whom the protection of Chapter XI extended was in Article 73. The words "colony" and "protectorate" were not to be found in that article, which simply said: "territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government", without making any further distinction. That article could be given a wide interpretation, and also a narrow one. The wide interpretation extended the protection of the Charter to the peoples of all territories whose inhabitants had not a full measure of self-government, whether such territories were included within the continental boundaries of a state or situated overseas. It was that wide interpretation which Belgium adopted and proposed. The other interpretation was restrictive. It limited the application of Chapter XI to the overseas territories of certain so-called "colonial Powers". It deprived all other backward peoples of international protection.

63. None would dispute that there were non-self-governing peoples outside of the colonies, protectorates, and Trust Territories. The memoranda submitted by the Belgian delegation (A/AC.58/1, A/AC.67/2) had listed an impressive number of such peoples. For example, it was beyond doubt that peoples living in a state of complete savagery, without any contact with civilized peoples, were not enjoying full self-government within the meaning of the Charter.

64. The representative of Uruguay had said, at the previous meeting, that the authors of the Charter had never intended Chapter XI to extend to peoples who were not fully self-governing but lived within the frontiers of sovereign States.

65. That was not the right approach to the question. Indigenous peoples, in all territories without distinction, had been included in the protective provisions of the Covenant of the League of Nations. All the Members of the League had solemnly undertaken to ensure fair treatment for all indigenous peoples living throughout their territories, whether metropolitan or colonial, continental or overseas. The wide interpretation of Article 73 maintained that notion of universal protection of indigenous peoples; the restrictive interpretation withdrew it from a large number. The question, therefore, was whether the supporters of the restrictive interpretation wished to exclude from the protection of the Charter peoples who had for twenty-five years enjoyed the protection guaranteed by Article 23 of the League of Nations Covenant, and whether those among them who had also signed that Covenant wished to repudiate their solemn undertakings and refuse to accept the same obligations under the United Nations Charter. If the answer was in the affirmative, his delegation asked that they should admit it. It would also ask them to explain the reason for that retrograde step. Had the indigenous peoples in metropolitan territories been less worthy of interest in 1945 than in 1919? Had the United Nations wished to deprive them of the protection which the League of Nations had accorded them? In the Belgian delegation's view, the answer to both questions was in the negative. The restrictive interpretation of Article 73, imputing to the words "territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government" the meaning of "peoples of colonial territories alone", gave an affirmative answer. His delegation asked each Member State to make its choice.

66. At the previous meeting, the Syrian representative had asked, with irony, whether the Belgian delegation had in mind those dependent territories which were falsely represented as self-governing. His reply, without irony, was that it referred to all territories, whether dependent or not, whose peoples had not attained full self-government, and concerning which the Secretary-General of the United Nations received no information.

67. The Bolivian representative had said at the same meeting that he could never permit his country to be considered a colony. He felt bound to answer that if, in the light of the work of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors, a State conceded that Chapter XI of the Charter applied to certain peoples for which it was responsible, and decided, without any pressure from the Assembly, to transmit the information specified in Article 73 e, all would admire the generosity thus displayed through its liberal interpretation of the Charter. None would dream of disputing the full sovereignty of any such State or of regarding it as a colony.

68. As for the documents before the Committee, he was of the opinion that the Fourth Committee should take note of the meritorious work accomplished by the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors.

69. The Belgian representative would abstain from voting on the paragraph of the draft resolution which approved the list of factors proposed by the Committee. It would be forced to vote against all those paragraphs of the draft resolution and all those amendments which, either expressly or by implication, recognized the competence of the Assembly, supported the theory, contrary to reality and facts, of the indivisibility of self-government, or set up some distinction, not justified by the Charter, between the duty to continue to transmit information and the duty to begin transmitting information where that had not previously been done.

70. Mr. LAWRENCE (Liberia) said that his delegation had listened with interest to all that had been said by the various representatives who had participated in the current discussion, many of whom had expressed opinions which he shared.

71. He wished to congratulate the Ad Hoc Committee, whose efforts had resulted in the report contained in document A/2428. His delegation agreed with the delegations which considered that the proposed list of factors could serve only as a guide and that each specific case had to be considered in the light of the particular circumstances of that case.

72. One question which had been the subject of particularly lively discussion was that of the procedure to be adopted in applying those factors to a particular territory. The Administering Members had argued that they alone were competent to apply them. An Administering Member could not, however, legally revoke or change the status of a territory unilaterally without reference to the General Assembly. Under the Charter, the General Assembly alone had the power to say whether the people of a territory had attained a full measure of self-government.

73. There was, however, a new difficulty: the meaning of "a full measure of self-government". Two views had been expressed in the Committee: that of the Administering Members and that of the non-administering Members. The former thought that peoples could achieve a full measure of self-government while remaining firmly attached to the administering Power, whereas the latter felt that the well-being of the peoples of those territories should be paramount and that their desires should receive free expression in connexion with any proposed change in the form of their government.

74. While fully appreciating the high ideals which had always inspired the administering Powers where the well-being of the peoples of those territories was concerned, his delegation felt that the desires and aspirations of those peoples should be determined through the good offices of the General Assembly.

75. His delegation was concerned about another point of procedure, the time when the factors could be applied. From the discussion, it appeared that the factors should, in the opinion of some delegations, be applied after an Administering Member had reported a change in the status of a territory and had then ceased to transmit information, thus presenting the United Nations with a fait accompli.

76. His delegation wondered how the ideals of peace, well-being and liberty, which had impelled the governments of Member States to send representatives to the General Assembly, could be achieved as long as millions of human beings throughout the world were exposed to oppression, misery and suffering. The problem could not be solved by avoiding it. On the contrary, the situation must be faced and a solution must be sought conscientiously and with determination.

77. The General Assembly must not be presented with a fait accompli by the Administering Members; on the contrary, whenever an Administering Member thought that the people of a given territory had really attained a full measure of self-government, it should so inform the General Assembly so that the latter could take the necessary steps to ascertain whether that was the case and could declare accordingly.

78. Mr. ARAOZ (Bolivia) said that the Belgian representative had again resorted to sophistry in an attempt to misrepresent the statements of certain delegations and to argue that the talk of colonies and protectorates concealed an intention to return to the colonial system. That might be the objective of the administering Powers, but it was certainly not that of the Committee.

79. He had given an outline of developments in Bolivia because he had considered it useful to show how a country which was still struggling for complete independence in certain fields had succeeded in achieving national unity; in so doing, he had hoped that the discussion would be concentrated on a number of specific points. In Bolivia no group was subject to discrimination. The economic, educational and land reform programmes involved the whole population, and the results would bring benefits to all without distinction. If the Belgian representative visited Bolivia he would be able to verify the truth of that statement for himself. He would see a united people working to knit even closer together the various groups of the population and would find evidence of the high cultural values which were the age-old inheritance handed down by the various races that had inhabited Bolivia.

80. The Bolivian delegation was participating in the Committee's discussion in a constructive spirit motivated only by its desire to help the dependent peoples to attain self-government. It would always be ready to defend the fundamental principles which must govern the progress of mankind. His delegation had not objected to the Belgian representative's reservations because it had been offended by the comparison of Bolivia to a colony. On the contrary, the Bolivian people, formerly scorned and oppressed, was proud that it had freed itself from that oppression and was now ruled by a truly representative government. Bolivia was not ashamed of the semi-feudal situation which still prevailed there, because it was proud of the efforts undertaken to abolish it. The example of Bolivia could appropriately be cited in a discussion on Non-Self-Governing Territories, the peoples of which had the right to determine their own fate in accordance with the wishes of the great majority and not those of an oligarchic minority representing foreign interests.

81. Finally, he maintained his opinion about the contradiction which he had indicated in the Belgian representative's reservations. Those reservations were intended only to divert the Committee from what should be its main task, that of promoting the progress of the dependent peoples towards complete self-government.

82. Mr. TRIANTAPHYLLAKOS (Greece) congratulated the Ad Hoc Committee and was prepared to accept the list of factors it had prepared, with two reservations. First, it must be clearly understood that the list could serve only as a guide to assist in the examination of each case in the light of the particular circumstances of that case. Secondly, as the Guatemalan representative and other delegations had pointed out, the word "continuing" used to describe the association of the Non-Self-Governing Territories with the metropolitan country in the title of the second part of the list of factors should be deleted. It was in the light of those considerations, and taking into account the primary need to maintain co-operation among all the parties concerned in order to ensure the implementation of Chapter XI, that the Greek delegation would decide on the Brazilian draft resolution and the amendments thereto.

83. Mrs. BOLTON (United States of America) paid a tribute to the effort made by the Brazilian representative to frame a draft resolution that would be generally acceptable. Her delegation could not, however, accept the principle underlying paragraph 3 of the operative part of that draft. No Member State, whether or not responsible for the administration of a Non-Self-Governing Territory, could relinquish its right to determine the constitutional status of a territory under its sovereignty. It was, therefore, for the Administering Member concerned alone to decide whether to stop transmitting information under Article 73 e.

84. It did not follow that the General Assembly had not a useful part to play. On the contrary, the General Assembly had already done valuable work in that connexion. Under Article 10 the General Assembly was entitled to study the concept of Non-Self-Governing Territories and of territories whose people had not attained a full measure of self-government, and to try to find a definition. The Assembly also had the right to recommend that Member States should study any definition which it might adopt and even to express in general terms its opinion regarding the principles on which the Administering Members might base or might have based their decision to cease transmitting information on the territories under their administration. The Assembly's resolution should not, however, imply that the decision of the Administering Members must be approved or disapproved by the General Assembly.

85. Her delegation would therefore be obliged to vote against the Brazilian draft resolution and against any other proposal which contained the same implications.

86. Mr. PIGNON (France) felt that it was unnecessary to restate the French Government's position, which had already been clearly enough defined; but he proposed to examine the legal theories that had been put forward during the discussion. The French delegation had listened to those theories with interest but had not been, and could not be, convinced by them because they were based on an erroneous interpretation of a treaty, in the case in point, the Charter. To interpret a treaty, it was necessary to determine, by referring to the preliminary work on it, and in particular to the records of the discussions, the intention of its authors—in the present case, the intention of the co-signatories to the Charter—just as in interpreting a law, reference was first made to the records of the parliamentary debates. It was quite clear that the authors of the Charter had neither foreseen nor desired the developments and additions which an attempt was now being made to introduce by means of resolutions.

87. The history of the question of the cessation of the transmission of information showed that that was the case. At its third session the General Assembly had felt so uncertain of its ground and its rights that in resolution 222 (III) it had merely stated that it was essential that the United Nations should be informed of any change in the constitutional position and status of any territory as a result of which the responsible government concerned thought it unnecessary to transmit information in respect of that territory under Article 73 e of the Charter. Memories of San Francisco had still been too fresh in representatives' minds for an attempt to be made to question the exclusive competence of the Administering Member. With resolution 334 (IV) the General Assembly had taken a further step and had considered that it was within the responsibility of the General Assembly to express its opinion on the principles which had guided or which might in future guide the Members concerned in enumerating the territories in question. Even at that stage the Assembly had shown a tendency to limit the freedom of judgment of the responsible governments, but it had asserted its competence only with regard to principles; the power of decision in each particular case had continued to be vested in the Administering Member. At the fifth session, by resolution 448 (V), the Assembly had deliberately gone beyond questions of theory and had requested the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to examine such information as might be transmitted in future to the Secretary-General in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 222 (III) and to report thereon to the General Assembly. With that resolution, the frontiers which had until then been respected had been crossed, and the Assembly had assumed the right not only of expressing opinions of a general nature but of examining and discussing each particular case. At its sixth session, the Assembly had been too preoccupied with the list of factors to explore further the dangerous field of competence. However, in resolution 568 (VI) it had reaffirmed the principles laid down in resolution 448 (V). The decisive step had been taken at the seventh session when the Assembly had asserted its competence as being self-evident without seeking to base it on any considerations of law or of fact.

88. That history of the successive conquests of the majority showed clearly that the legal construction in question had not been based upon a strict interpretation of the Charter. At its third session the Assembly would not have hesitated to affirm its competence in the particular case then before the Fourth Committee if it had thought it possible to do so in accordance with the Charter. Already, fired with enthusiasm which made them forget the starting point, some representatives were considering further steps. Certain delegations had proposed that only the first part of the list of factors should be retained; others had stated that the notion of full self-government laid down in the Charter could only mean independence. It should not be forgotten, however, that the legal construction which the majority seemed to think required only improvements of detail would remain without foundation and without legal effect until it was embodied in a new treaty or an addition to the Charter in the manner provided in Article 109.

89. The French delegation had listened with great interest to the argument concerning the responsibility of the Administering Members developed by the Ecuadorian representative. The Administering Members did not deny that responsibility, but accepted it unreservedly. However, it remained a moral responsibility without legal consequences because any form of supervisory machinery or specialized jurisdiction which would make that responsibility legal in character had been expressly and intentionally excluded from the Charter. Certain delegations might regret what they considered to be an omission, but they should also understand that it was not in their power to try to remedy it through the inappropriate and ineffective medium of recommendations.

90. The French delegation could not, therefore, support the Brazilian draft resolution although it appreciated the sincere efforts the Brazilian representative had made to end the present deadlock in the Committee's work. Paragraph 3 of the operative part of the resolution in effect reaffirmed the competence of the General Assembly. The same objection applied to paragraph 4, since the Assembly would obviously have the ultimate responsibility of deciding whether evidence that the people concerned had exercised its rights to self-determination had been furnished. Paragraph 6 reintroduced the difficulties of interpretation which an attempt had been made to eliminate by establishing a list of factors. "A full measure of self-government" had still not been defined and although some delegations had made up their minds without hesitation their opinion was not equivalent to a decision. Finally paragraphs 7 and 8 conferred on the Committee on Information powers which the French delegation considered unacceptable and contrary to the compromise which had enabled it to continue to take part in the work of that body. For the same reasons, the French delegation would oppose the amendments submitted jointly by the eleven delegations (A/C.4/L.273). The very fact that those amendments had been submitted gave added force to his argument and fully justified, if further justification were necessary, the French Government's position. Those amendments had systematically eliminated all that was conciliatory in the original Brazilian draft resolution. At least there now remained no doubts or misunderstandings.

91. In view of the importance of the problem the French delegation would not be satisfied merely with registering a negative vote. In accordance with the formal instructions from its Government it was compelled to repeat explicitly the reservations which it had made on resolution 647 (VII) and which were contained in the summary record of the 279th meeting of the Fourth Committee (A/C.4/SR.279, para. 1 to 3). The French Government had not accepted resolution 647 (VII) as binding in any way whatever, and it would not accept the Brazilian draft resolution as binding if, as was probable, it was adopted. The French delegation felt the more justified in making that statement since, at San Francisco it had taken the precaution of making a reservation on the question of competence; that reservation could be found in the report of Committee 4 of Commission II and in annex D of that report, dated 20 June 1945.¹ Nobody could therefore express surprise at or take exception to an attitude which remained constantly clear, frank and consistent. The French delegation regretted, however, that it was forced to take that negative and defensive position. It was certainly not along those lines that it had envisaged collaboration with the United Nations. It was still possible for the Committee to start afresh and discover ways and means of accomplishing fruitful work. Several days previously, Mr. Maurice Schumann had informed the General Assembly at its 445th plenary meeting that the French Government fully and unreservedly accepted the aims of Chapter XI of the Charter. In the Committee itself the United Kingdom representative had stressed the identity of aims which should unite Committee members. It was sufficient to attempt to apply the Charter without seeking at the moment to supplement or modify it. The French Government had given numerous examples of its good faith; it was ready to make new efforts but it could not remain satisfied with appeals for conciliation which lacked any tangible expression of comprehension and which still presupposed that the administering Powers had to obtain forgiveness for some kind of original sin.

92. The reasons underlying the French Government's position were evident. The French delegation could not admit that the General Assembly should discuss the constitutional development of territories administered by France for the simple reason that such a discussion would involve constitutional questions which were matters of domestic policy and were the exclusive prerogative of the legislature. The French Constitution strictly limited the powers of the executive. In international affairs, the Government could negotiate and undertake commitments subject to the subsequent approval of Parliament. With regard to the status of territories, Parliament held the right of decision, and neither the French Government nor the French delegation could waive in any way whatever the sovereignty of Parliament. It was easy to foresee the consequences of the process which had been set in motion and the increasing demands that would be made to subject the administering Powers to still stricter control by the United Nations. A moment's reflection would suffice to reveal the dangers which would result, in the domestic field, from interference by an international organization which eventually would meddle arbitrarily with internal policies, whether with good intentions or not. Similarly, in the present disturbed international situation such interference would create a situation of constant inferiority at the international level by making possible blackmail and manoeuvres which would serve neither the cause of peace nor that of co-operation between nations. What the French Government once more requested was that certain members of the Committee should take the trouble to put themselves from time to time in the French Government's place and judge the situation objectively. Whatever the Committee's decision on the Brazilian draft resolution, the discussions which had taken place would have had the great merit of enabling the Committee to discuss the substance of the problem. The Committee had reached the stage where ideological conceptions were clashing with the facts. It should decide whether it should continue to take theoretical decisions or whether, realizing the futility of such an undertaking, it should direct its attention resolutely towards its proper functions.

93. Mr. LOPEZ (Philippines) said that the Philippines, which, after four centuries of oppression, had become an independent State after the Second World War, was deeply interested in the question of factors and in the broader question of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

94. At the San Francisco Conference, the Philippine delegation had argued that the word "self-government" should be replaced, or at least supplemented, by the word "independence" in all the provisions of the Charter where it appeared. His delegation had been afraid that if the notion of independence were replaced by the vaguer notion of self-government, misunderstandings might arise. Experience had shown that those fears were justified. The Philippine delegation had not pressed its suggestion at San Francisco because the administering Powers had given it an assurance that self-government was synonymous with independence and that it was in that way that the notion of self-government would be interpreted in practice. It had been found, however, that the vagueness of the expression "self-government" was the source of many misunderstandings and had led to lengthy studies and prolonged discussions. It had been illogical to speak only of self-government in Chapter XI when in Chapter XII the word "independence" was also used. In any case, the time had come to clarify the notion of self-government. In that respect, the work of the Ad Hoc Committee was extremely valuable.

95. Mr. López paid a tribute to the Ad Hoc Committee and agreed with the Venezuelan representative that further studies should be suspended. It was time to apply the factors which the Ad Hoc Committee had listed. That would be possible only if there was sincere co-operation between the Administering and the non-administering Members. He was convinced that the members of the Committee could resolutely set aside controversial subjects and agree in recognizing that it was necessary to hasten the progress of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in order to maintain peace, a purpose which concerned all States, whether they administered Non-Self-Governing Territories or not. The Administering Members should understand that by basing their claim to exclusive jurisdiction on Article 2, paragraph 7, they gave the impression of wanting to keep at all costs what they regarded as their property. If they recognized that the character of the colonial problem had been changed since the Charter had made the future of the Non-Self-Governing Territories an international problem, it would be possible to proceed to practical action.

96. If an area of agreement was to be found, the principle must first be established that the Administering Members could not decide unilaterally whether a territory had become self-governing, and that such decisions must be made by agreement by those Members and the General Assembly after appropriate consultations. The list of factors was valuable only as a body of general rules the application of which would depend upon political realities varying from territory to territory.

97. He was also of the opinion that the problem of the cessation of the transmission of information had two aspects. In some cases, the Non-Self-Governing Territories might think that by continuing to communicate information about them the administering Power was casting doubts on the reality of their self-government, which might hurt the national feelings of the peoples concerned. In other cases, the administering Powers might seek by that means to conceal the real situation in the territory which they claimed had become self-governing.

98. The Philippine delegation believed that the Brazilian draft resolution provided the framework within which agreement might be reached. It hoped the draft resolution would be studied sympathetically and that the difficulties of principle raised by paragraph 3 might thus be overcome.

99. In conclusion, he emphasized that the Committee's decisions could be fruitful only if an agreement based on political realities was reached.

100. The CHAIRMAN closed the list of speakers in the general discussion. He invited delegations which wished to explain their vote to place their names on the list.

The meeting rose at 1.20 p.m.

Chairman: Mr. Santiago PEREZ PEREZ (Venezuela).

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2428, A/C.4/L.272, A/C.4/L.273, A/C.4/L.274) (continued)

[Item 33]*

1. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) wished to reply to the points raised by the Belgian representative at the 326th meeting. He recalled that when the Belgian argument had been advanced at the seventh session of the General Assembly, it had been conceded that Guatemala had no responsibility whatever under Chapter XI of the Charter. Nevertheless, he felt that some reply should be made to an ingenious thesis which was tending to distract the Committee from its true objective.

2. In point of fact, the Belgian argument had been dealt with at San Francisco. The question had come up during the discussion of the classification of dependent territories and it had been made quite clear that the "peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world", referred to in a first draft of what had become Article 73 of the Charter, were not peoples within the metropolitan frontiers of any State. He read extracts from the background document prepared by the Secretariat on the definition of the concept of a full measure of self-government (A/AC.67/L.1), which quoted from the records of the meetings at San Francisco at which the declaration regarding the Non-Self-Governing Territories had been discussed, showing that the question had been raised and settled. The drafting sub-committee which had prepared that portion of the Charter had undoubtedly borne those discussions in mind in preparing the final version of Article 73. The Belgian representative's contention that the phrase "territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government" could apply to territories forming part of the metropolitan area was thus disproved by reference to the expressed intentions of the authors of the Charter.

* Indicates the item number on the agenda of the General Assembly.

3. Sir Douglas COPLAND (Australia) said that the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272) was an attempt to steer a course between the two conflicting points of view that had emerged in the Committee and, as such, deserved attention. It should not be forgotten that the Administering Members had freely dedicated themselves to the advancement of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and as freely undertaken to transmit information on economic, social and educational conditions in those territories to the General Assembly. Australia was a country which had itself experienced the rise from dependent status to a full measure of self-government and was thus able to realize that the problem was extremely complicated and that no definite rules could be formulated. He urged the Committee to consider the Brazilian resolution in the light of the difficulty that had been encountered in defining a full measure of self-government, and suggested that it should give up its attempt to find a legal definition. The Australian delegation would consider the resolution, not as a definitive legal interpretation of self-government, but rather as a framework within which it could discharge its responsibilities towards the Non-Self-Governing Territory for which it was responsible.

4. The most serious objection to the list of factors in the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories), contained in document A/2428, was that it regarded independence as a criterion of a full measure of self-government. The Australian delegation felt that independent status was irrelevant to the question of self-government. Independence was an external attribute, whereas self-government was an internal attribute, the achievement of which was normally followed by external independence. However, a territory could be self-governing without being independent, just as it could be independent without being self-governing. The report also admitted that the Ad Hoc Committee had been unable to define a full measure of self-government. In considering the Brazilian draft resolution, therefore, the Committee should take care not to appear to be agreeing on a point on which there was in fact fundamental disagreement. Lastly, the report made it quite clear that the list of factors could be regarded only as a guide and not as a series of hard and fast rules.

5. Paragraphs 1 and 2 of the operative part of the Brazilian draft resolution took note of the conclusions of the report of the Ad Hoc Committee and approved the list of factors contained in the report. The Australian delegation found it difficult to accept paragraph 2 because it felt that it was unnecessary to approve the list when paragraph 1 merely took note of the report's conclusions.

6. Paragraph 6 of the operative part of the draft resolution seemed to assume that the attainment of self-government was a definitive act. The Australian delegation felt that self-government was, in fact, reached in stages and in varying forms. Since the Ad Hoc Committee had been unable to define a "full measure of self-government" the Australian delegation could not agree to paragraph 6. Those Member States which had declared themselves to be responsible for certain Non-Self-Governing Territories had undertaken to submit information on economic, social and educational conditions in those territories. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories was fully entitled to consider whether the information that was submitted was adequate and relevant. However, if the Committee on Information were to say that an Administering Member must continue to send in such information, despite its agreement with a Non-Self-Governing Territory, on all matters on which information was to be submitted, that would be tantamount to asking the said Power to abrogate the self-government that had been agreed on. If a territory had full control over economic, social and educational matters within its boundaries, it would be entitled to insist that the administering Power had no right to continue to report to the General Assembly upon them. If the General Assembly were to require the continuation of such reports, it would not be promoting self-government in the Non-Self-Governing Territories or helping the Administering Members to discharge their obligations.

7. Operative paragraphs 7 and 8 were over-specific. The question of factors had been examined over and over again; if, in the light of experience, the list was found to be inadequate, an arrangement could be made to revise it at the end of five years or so.

8. Unfortunately, the Brazilian draft resolution had been the subject of a series of drastic amendments submitted jointly by a number of delegations (A/C.4/L.273). As amended, the resolution would take up a position diametrically opposed to that which the Administering Members were charged with defending. He urged the Committee to try to reach some reasonable compromise on the issue, lest the General Assembly should adopt a resolution that would be unenforceable.

9. Mr. FRAZAO (Brazil) would reaffirm that the Brazilian delegation maintained, as it had done in the past, that the final competence for taking a decision concerning the cessation of the transmission of information from a Non-Self-Governing Territory rested with the General Assembly.

10. In his delegation's view, the Charter should not be regarded as a multilateral agreement establishing certain legal obligations. At the time of its signature it had been a contract, but it was one no longer. It was an organic act establishing the competence of the United Nations with regard to the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The United Nations had assumed some of the competence of the contracting parties. Its purposes were more than the sum of the purposes of the contracting parties. That conception of an institution was familiar to those countries where the principles of the Code Napoléon had been adopted. His statement on the institutional jurisdiction of the United Nations over the Non-Self-Governing Territories was based on that conception.

11. The amendments contained in document A/C.4/L.273 were not in his opinion amendments in the proper sense of the term. Nevertheless he was able to agree to the new paragraph proposed in amendment 1.

12. He could not, however, agree to the proposal in amendment 2, to the effect that the fourth paragraph of the preamble of the Brazilian draft resolution should be deleted, because he did not consider that the right of peoples to self-determination could be treated as a factor or given an interpretation in one case which might differ from that given in other cases. The right of peoples to self-determination must be re-established as a postulate.

13. Nor could he agree to amendment 5, which merely reintroduced the previously existing confusion between general principles and specific circumstances.

14. He had no objection to amendment 3; indeed he felt it would improve the Brazilian text.

15. With reference to amendment 4, the Brazilian delegation agreed with the terms of paragraph 2 of General Assembly resolution 648 (VII), i.e., that each concrete case should be considered and decided in the light of the particular circumstances of that case. With regard to the question of competence, there could be no doubt that the meaning of paragraph 3 of the Brazilian draft resolution was that the General Assembly was competent to decide whether a territory was or was no longer within the scope of Article XI. The conclusion was clear, but it had been thought preferable not to state it categorically in order to avoid friction, in view of the conflicting opinions on the subject that existed within the Committee. General Assembly resolution 222 (III) stated that it was essential for the United Nations to be informed of any change that might take place in the constitutional status of any Non-Self-Governing Territory. That was in order that a decision might be reached whether or not information should continue to be transmitted in relation to that territory. Clearly the obligation rested on the Administering Member and the decision would be made by the General Assembly. The members of the Fourth Committee should approach the question in the light of the general principles involved rather than attempt to gain debating points. The Brazilian delegation did not object in principle to the proposed addition of the words "by the General Assembly" in paragraph 3, although it thought it unnecessary. The wording it had proposed said the same thing without offending the administering States.

16. With regard to amendment 6, which proposed new paragraphs 5 and 6, he felt that the Brazilian text said the same thing better and in more general terms. Proof of the wishes of the people was required not only in cases of association but in all cases, including integration in the metropolitan territory. Paragraph 4 of the Brazilian draft resolution already recommended that paramount consideration should be given to evidence indicating that the people concerned had exercised its right to self-determination. The attempt in the amendment to emphasize the principle of the right of peoples to self-determination in special cases tended to weaken its general applicability as a fundamental consideration in all cases. The new paragraph 6 proposed in the amendment tended to compress too many ideas in a single paragraph. It was somewhat illogical to approve the list of factors but at the same time to imply that the three forms of self-government were not equally valid. The Brazilian delegation agreed that the aim of political evolution in the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be complete independence and membership in the United Nations, but Chapter XI of the Charter did contain the notion of domestic self-government, a type of internal political sovereignty that was not yet independence. Chapter XI might be interpreted as justifying the cessation of the transmission of information after a people had freely chosen a system of integration or association which would give it full freedom to decide its domestic affairs while at the same time leaving the attributes of external sovereignty to be exercised by another State. The proposed new paragraph 6 thus reopened a point which the Ad Hoc Committee had already settled.

17. Amendments 7 and 8 of document A/C.4/L.273 improved the Brazilian text and were therefore acceptable.

18. He did not, however, understand the proposal in amendment 9, to the effect that that part of paragraph 7 of the Brazilian draft resolution following "the cessation of information" should be deleted. If a desire for brevity had inspired the proposal, he would accept it, but not if the intention was to discard the provisions of paragraph 2 of resolution 448 (V). The Brazilian delegation felt that the Committee on Information had a great part to play in the advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and that no attempt should be made to detract from the importance of that part.

19. He felt that the wording of the final paragraph proposed in amendment 10 tended to question the quality of the list of factors in advance, and he preferred the original final paragraph 8 of the Brazilian draft amendment.

20. He urged the Administering Members to accept the Brazilian text in the light of his explanations. He hoped that they would show sufficient goodwill to meet the other members of the Committee half way, and perhaps to inaugurate a new stage in the relations of the administering and non-administering Powers.

21. Mr. KUCHKAROV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that while his delegation was in general agreement with the first part of the list of factors approved by the Ad Hoc Committee, the second and third parts of the list were completely unsatisfactory and unacceptable since they did not envisage the ultimate attainment by the Non-Self-Governing Territories of the status of independent and sovereign States and permitted the limitation of sovereignty and outside intervention in the internal affairs of the Territories concerned. He was therefore unable to accept the fourth paragraph of the preamble to the Brazilian draft resolution. He would vote against any parts of the draft resolution implying the Committee's approval of the list of factors as a whole, but in favour of paragraphs 1, 4, 5, 6 and 8. He asked for a vote paragraph by paragraph.

22. Mr. SPITS (Netherlands) had no objections, in general, to the operative part of the proposal in so far as it instructed the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to use the list of factors as a guide in studying specific cases. When an Administering Member ceased to transmit information, it was logical, if only as a gesture of courtesy, that it should inform the General Assembly of the reasons for its action. It was logical, too, that the Committee on Information should study those reasons. Nevertheless, that did not imply that the General Assembly was competent to approve or disapprove the cessation of the transmission of information. Several representatives had based their argument that the Assembly was competent on Chapter XI of the Charter, contending that it was in the nature of an international agreement. He was prepared to some extent to agree with the latter contention, provided that it was recognized that Chapter XI had been included in the form of a declaration. Since Chapter XI was admittedly vague, the Committee would do better to resolve its doubts on the basis of practice. In 1946, the Administering Members had enumerated the territories on which they were prepared to transmit information and, in resolution 66 (I), the General Assembly had taken note of—not approved—that list of territories. It was difficult, therefore, to see why the Assembly's approval should be required in the case of the cessation of the transmission of information. Therein lay his delegation's main objection to the draft resolution. Paragraph 6, moreover, was vague and ambiguous. Hence, although his delegation appreciated the goodwill shown by the Brazilian delegation, he would be compelled to vote against the draft resolution and, guided by the same principles, against the eleven-Power amendments.

23. Mr. SCOTT (New Zealand) doubted whether the action proposed to the General Assembly was realistic. His delegation's position had been stated on many earlier occasions and he had not felt it necessary to intervene in the general debate. He had hoped that the Committee would be prepared merely to adopt the list of factors and recognize the difficulty of defining such terms as "Non-Self-Governing Territories" and "a full measure of self-government". The lack of effective definitions of those terms would continue to be a source of disagreement between the administering and the non-administering Powers and it would be wiser not to press the issue as far as the draft resolution and, more particularly, the amendments did. It was certainly not in the interests of the non-self-governing peoples to perpetuate the disagreement between the Administering Members and the other Member States. That was the reason why his delegation had not replied to the Secretary-General's request for observations on the list of factors.

24. On the main issue of the General Assembly's competence, his delegation's position was very clear. Each Member State alone was competent to decide whether the territories under its sovereignty or jurisdiction fell within the scope of Chapter XI and, similarly, when such territories had reached a stage of development at which its obligations under Article 73 e no longer applied. He would therefore vote against any paragraph implying that the responsibility for such a decision might be shared between the Administering Members and the General Assembly.

25. Mrs. SKOTTSBERG-AHMAN (Sweden) announced that her delegation was prepared to accept the list of factors as it stood and to support the Brazilian draft resolution in so far as it approved that list as a guide. Her delegation had always insisted that the list should not be more than a guide and that each concrete case should be judged on its own merits. That idea was contained in paragraph 3. Paragraph 6, however, somewhat inconsistently attempted to lay down a rigid rule which would leave no lee-way for taking into account the circumstances pertinent to each particular situation. Furthermore, it was generally admitted that it was impossible to define the term "a full measure of self-government" for the purposes of Chapter XI, and it was therefore of doubtful value to make the attainment of that indefinable status a prerequisite for a Territory to be deemed self-governing in economic, social or educational affairs. Her delegation would therefore vote against paragraph 6 and, if it was retained, it would abstain from voting on the draft resolution as a whole.

26. The eleven-Power amendments stressed the competence of the General Assembly almost to the exclusion of the administering Powers. That issue was one of the main dividing lines in the Committee, and it would be most unwise to widen and perpetuate the gulf between the Administering and non-administering Members. No useful purpose would be served by adopting categorical statements in the certain knowledge that they would not be accepted by the Administering Members, whose co-operation was essential. Her delegation would therefore vote against the amendments. If they were accepted, it would be compelled to vote against the draft resolution as a whole.

27. Mr. PATTERSON (Canada) said that his delegation fully appreciated the work of the Ad Hoc Committee and had no objection in principle to the study of a list of factors, nor to the list itself, which might have a useful bearing on some of the questions pertaining to the work of the Committee and of the Trusteeship Council and be of service to the administering Powers. To that extent, paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Brazilian draft resolution were acceptable.

28. For the reasons which the Canadian representative had outlined in the Fourth Committee (273rd meeting) at the seventh session, he was compelled to take exception to the principles in paragraph 6 and to those implied in paragraphs 3 and 7. The principle contained in paragraph 6 could hardly be accepted by the representatives of a country such as Canada, which had at one stage in its constitutional evolution enjoyed complete autonomy in economic, social and educational affairs, although it had not at the time attained a full measure of self-government. With regard to the wording of paragraphs 3 and 7, the Canadian delegation could not agree that the United Nations alone was entitled to determine whether or not a territory had ceased to be non-self-governing or that every Administering Member should continue to transmit information until the provisions of Chapter XI had been fulfilled. The Non-Self-Governing Territories would normally advance towards self-government by stages and, at a given moment, they would reach a stage at which the Administering Members no longer exercised effective and practical control over the fields in which information was to be submitted. In such cases their obligation to transmit information would logically end, although that would not imply that they no longer had the obligation, under Chapter XI, to promote a full measure of self-government in the territory concerned.

29. His delegation was grateful to the Brazilian delegation for its effort at compromise and for the fact that the Brazilian draft resolution did not call for a continuing study of factors by a special committee; it seriously doubted whether any further study would result in a more satisfactory solution. Nevertheless, the objections he had outlined concerned such fundamental issues that his delegation could not support the Brazilian draft resolution as it stood. Subject to those observations, it was prepared to approve the list of factors contained in the Ad Hoc Committee's report on the understanding that it was to be used exclusively as a guide and that it was not meant to be a rigid pattern to be automatically applied by the General Assembly to all Non-Self-Governing Territories. His delegation would oppose the eleven-Power amendments and any subsequent amendment to the Brazilian proposal which ran counter to the basic principles by which it was guided.

30. Mr. NAJAR (Israel) felt that the mandate of the United Nations as expressed throughout the Charter and the corresponding terms of reference conferred on the General Assembly by Article 10 were sufficiently broad to obviate the need for any discussion of the Assembly's competence in the Committee. There seemed to be a general tendency to confuse the Assembly's competence and its powers. Obviously the Assembly received information under Article 73 e and documents on the cessation of the transmission of information so that it could express an opinion thereon. Its competence to vote resolutions, therefore, was not at issue, but its powers and rights to have them implemented in fact.

31. During the general debate, he had expressed his delegation's preference for examining each case of the cessation of the transmission of information on its own merits. Generally speaking, if the Assembly wished to preserve its effectiveness and prestige, its recommendations must be realistic. The adoption of doctrinal resolutions might well bring the Assembly into conflict with reality.

32. In the case under discussion, the Administering Members felt that the power to decide whether or not to continue transmitting information rested exclusively with them. Were the General Assembly to assert in a solemn and doctrinal resolution that, on the contrary, such power rested exclusively with the Assembly, it might well find that the constitutional development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories ran counter to its resolutions. That would be most unfortunate. The General Assembly should hesitate before embarking on such open conflicts and administering and non-administering Powers would be well advised to heed the old diplomatic motto, "Toujours négocier".

33. His delegation would have preferred merely to adopt the list of factors and to postpone any decision on the theoretical points of principle raised in the Brazilian draft resolution until the Committee had had a chance to apply the factors to the two concrete cases of the cessation of information that it would shortly be considering. Although he questioned the advisability of affirming the competence of the General Assembly as a principle, rather than in relation to concrete cases, his delegation would support the draft resolution on that issue, but he reserved its position with regard to the definition of terms. Such a definition would be tantamount to interpreting the Charter and should not be done through a resolution, especially when several delegations had expressed the view that it would be wise to consult the International Court of Justice on the points.

34. Mr. MENDEZ (Philippines) said that it was clear from the discussion that the General Assembly was a necessary party to the cessation of the transmission of information. The information submitted under Article 73 e was clearly intended to help the Assembly to determine whether or not the situation in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was satisfactory in the light of the Charter. That implied the Assembly's right to decide when such information need no longer be submitted. There was nothing in Chapter XI to suggest that the Administering Members were entitled to act on a unilateral basis. Nevertheless consultation and agreement were preferable to arbitrary and unilateral actions, and paragraph 3 of the Brazilian draft resolution might be improved by inserting the words "in appropriate consultations" after the words "as a guide", and by replacing the words "a decision may be taken" by the words "agreement may be reached".

35. Mr. LANNUNG (Denmark) would not go into the merits of the proposed amendments, but would like to have some elucidation from their sponsors.

36. Amendment 3 apparently meant that the list of factors was accepted as it stood, or with some minor amendments; indeed it had already been agreed to by three of the sponsors—Guatemala, Iraq and Venezuela—which had been members of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors. However, the new paragraph 6 which it was proposed to insert seemed, if not actually in contradiction with amendment 3, at least illogical and inconsistent. He suggested that the words "although it is recognized that self-government can also be achieved" should be deleted and replaced by the word "or".

37. Mr. DJERDJA (Yugoslavia) said that the amendments to the list of factors (A/C.4/L.274), of which his delegation had been one of the sponsors, embodied the constructive suggestions made by different delegations during the debate on the report of the Ad Hoc Committee. They were based on the conviction that although the main work of drafting the list of factors had been accomplished, that list must be brought into harmony with the high responsibilities of the General Assembly and the spirit of the times.

38. Drafting a list of factors was not an abstract or theoretical activity. The chief aim of such a list, which must be made as useful and realistic as possible, was to help the United Nations in the protection it afforded to the Non-Self-Governing Territories. As he had already pointed out, the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories placed great hopes in the United Nations. It must not disappoint those hopes or bring about a situation in which the people concerned would be compelled to follow another road and seek different solutions, with possible serious repercussions for world peace.

39. Some delegations would perhaps find the amendments unacceptable and irreconcilable with their views and interpretations of the Charter. Nevertheless, the Yugoslav delegation felt it to be its duty, today more than ever, to uphold the cause of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, both for reasons of principle and for practical reasons, as long as the problem remained on the agenda. It would be very glad if the problem were to disappear from the agenda as a result of the attainment by those peoples of a status equal to that of the free peoples of the world, but since they had not yet attained such a status, the only possible course was to strive, within the framework of the Charter and in harmony with present necessities, to improve the conditions of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and accelerate their progress towards a better future.

40. The Yugoslav delegation believed that the proposed amendments would make the list of factors clearer and more precise. Only one amendment was submitted to the first part of the list, which clarified the idea without altering the substance. The proposal to change the position of factors A.1 and A.2 in the second part of the list was due to the fact that many delegations had stressed that the opinion of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories should be the basic factor. That concept justified the introduction of a new factor A.2—freedom of choice—since clearly the opinion of the population must be expressed in full freedom to choose between several possibilities, including independence.

41. From the same factor sprang the need to introduce, and to some extent reword, factor A.3, in view of the circumstances in which decisions were often taken regarding modifications in the status of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

42. The same observations applied also to the amendments submitted to the third part of the list of factors, which had been rendered somewhat more precise and complete. The freely expressed opinion of the population presupposed association on a basis of equality, and hence there should be no association on the basis of the constitution of the metropolitan country.

43. Mr. KHOMAN (Thailand) thought the list of factors could usefully serve as a guide for the General Assembly and the Administering Members in determining the status of a Territory as well as whether information concerning that Territory should continue to be submitted. The question whether information should continue to be transmitted should undoubtedly be decided by the Administering Member concerned, which was responsible for conducting the Territory's affairs in accordance with the principles laid down by the Charter. But, once that decision had been taken, it was subject to revision by the United Nations in conformity with the principles enunciated in Article 73; otherwise the United Nations would renounce the exercise of one of the essential functions provided under the Charter. Thailand was prepared to support the principle that complete self-government could not be conditional but, although having various aspects, must cover the political, economic and social fields.

44. He would vote in favour of the Brazilian draft resolution. He was unable to agree to some of the proposed amendments, and especially those contained in amendment 6. If the amendments were voted on paragraph by paragraph he would abstain on certain points.

45. Mr. ESPINOSA Y PRIETO (Mexico), referring to the Danish representative's criticism of the proposed new paragraph 6, explained that the word "primarily" had been inserted before the words "through the attainment of independence". That word appeared in document A/C.4/L.273, but did not appear in the earlier draft of the amendments which was before the Danish representative.

46. Mr. DE MARHUENA (Dominican Republic) suggested that in view of the complexity and importance of the question, the debate should be postponed until Thursday, 8 October.

47. Mr. DE HOLTE CASTELLO (Colombia) supported that proposal.

48. Mr. L. S. BOKHARI (Pakistan), referring to the remarks made by the French representative at the previous meeting, explained that in using the expression "black list", in his statement at the 323rd meeting, he had had no intention of giving offence. He agreed that the Administering Members were performing an honourable and arduous task in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He had merely meant to say that if the name of a Territory remained indefinitely on the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories, that might give rise to certain doubts.

The meeting rose at 5.25 p.m.

Chairman: Mr. Santiago PEREZ PEREZ (Venezuela).

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2428, A/C.4/L.272, A/C.4/L.273, A/C.4/L.274, A/C.4/L.275) (continued)

[Item 33]*

1. The CHAIRMAN drew attention to an amendment by the Philippines (A/C.4/L.275) to the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272); the amendment had been submitted orally at the previous meeting and hence was within the time-limit set by the Committee.

2. He recognized the Iranian representative, who had reserved his right to speak in the general debate.

3. Mr. GHASSEMZADEH (Iran) said that the question of factors was of intimate concern to tens of millions of human beings who, despite differences in race, language, religion, customs, culture and geographical situation, were nevertheless an inseparable part of the human community. In line with the principles which it was possible to enunciate after the Second World War, the Member States which had taken part in the San Francisco Conference had devoted Chapter XI of the Charter to the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and Chapter XII and XIII to the International Trusteeship System. In Article 73 the Administering Members had recognized the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were paramount, had accepted as a sacred trust the obligation to promote their well-being, and to that end had accepted responsibility to the international community for the duties set forth in Article 73 a and b. So that the United Nations might supervise the application of those provisions, it had been provided that the Administering Members would transmit regularly to the Secretary-General the information referred to in Article 73 e.

4. The true sense of Article 73, and the views and intentions of the Administering Members in relation to it, were made sufficiently plain in the statements made by the Netherlands and United Kingdom representatives at San Francisco, reproduced in document A/AC.67/L.1, paragraphs 46, 48 and 49. The Netherlands representative had said that when the development of economic, social and political institutions in a dependent territory had reached a certain stage, the achievement of the final goal was inevitable. The realization of self-government might take the form of a continued equal partnership within one commonwealth or that of an independent nation, as the inhabitants of the territory might decide. The United Kingdom representative had compared properly constituted colonial empires to a ladder up which non-self-governing peoples were constantly moving as they attained a higher measure of self-government. He had taken the experience of the British Commonwealth and Empire, in which there were the most primitive peoples capable of taking only a very limited part in conducting their own affairs; then territories where the peoples took an ever-increasing part in their own administration, and some of which enjoyed a large measure of local autonomy; and lastly, the great self-governing Dominions. He had added that that progressive, dynamic conception was the right one, that the dependent territories could not all afford the risks of independence for which they were ill-equipped, and that they had to be gradually trained in the management of their own affairs until they were ready for the independence which would ultimately come.

5. The Iranian delegation agreed that very backward populations could not claim independence or even a full measure of self-government, for the peoples in question had to go through a political, economic and social development before they reached that stage. There could be no disagreement between administering and non-administering Powers on that score. But the administering Powers should recognize that, under Chapter XI of the Charter, they had expressly pledged themselves to prepare the dependent peoples, however backward, for a full measure of self-government and even independence. No people could suffer indefinitely economic exploitation and political domination by another people. Chapter XI could not in any way be regarded as a unilateral declaration by the administering Powers; it contained commitments towards the United Nations, was an inseparable part of the Charter and, in common with all the other Chapters, had been signed by all the Member States and ratified by their legislative organs. Moreover, in conformity with the principle of the self-determination of peoples enshrined in the Charter, any dependent people which had attained a sufficient degree of development would be able to declare its independence.

6. With regard to the definition of the notion of a full measure of self-government, he said it was not possible to find an exact and complete definition applicable to every single case; the only value of the list of factors would be that of a set of guiding notes, and each case would have to be decided individually in the light of its special circumstances.

* Indicates the item number on the agenda of the General Assembly.

7. Lastly, referring to the question of jurisdiction, he said it was incorrect to argue from Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter that the Administering Members possessed exclusive jurisdiction; that provision applied only to matters not dealt with by the Charter.

8. The Iranian delegation would support any draft resolution or amendment not inconsistent with the views he had expressed.

9. Mr. ESPINOSA Y PRIETO (Mexico) said that the sponsors of the joint amendment (A/C.4/L.273) had originally intended to submit a draft resolution but, since the Brazilian delegation had been the first to put forward a text on the subject, their draft had, a fortiori, taken the form of a series of amendments. The delegations concerned had also submitted a series of amendments (A/C.4/L.274) to the list of factors drawn up by the Ad Hoc Committee (A/2428, section VI), and he wished first to offer some explanatory observations on the latter proposal, the text of which had been circulated more recently than that of the amendments to the Brazilian draft resolution.

10. Unlike the representative of Brazil, the co-sponsors of the amendments to the list of factors did not feel that the Committee could adopt the list of factors as it stood. But the amendments, whatever the lively differences of opinion displayed in debate might suggest, made no fundamental alteration to the list. With a few exceptions they were drafting amendments. Thus, for instance, the joint amendments proposed the replacement of the factor A.4 mentioned in the original text of the first part by the following formula: "National defence. Sovereign right to provide for its national defence". That wording would indicate better than the original wording that a State had attained its independence, without in any way prejudicing the right of a sovereign State to enter into regional agreements to provide for its defence. The object of some other drafting alterations was to transfer to the second part factors listed in the third part, and vice versa: that was true, for example, of the factors dealing with geographical considerations, at present in the third part, and of that relating to economic, social and cultural jurisdiction, at present in the second part. The joint amendments likewise sought to rearrange certain factors in order of importance, and to change the titles of the second and third parts; in the original text the second and third parts both dealt with an association in which the territory participated, and it would at times be difficult to determine whether the second or the third part was applicable to a given territory. The joint amendment removed all ambiguity concerning that point.

11. The substantive amendments were three in number, and concerned respectively: the freedom to choose, on the basis of the right of self-determination of peoples, between several possibilities, including independence; the voluntary limitation of sovereignty, a provision which stipulated the freedom of the population of a territory which had associated itself with the metropolitan country to modify at any time that status through the expression of their will by democratic means (a similar provision would be introduced into the third part); and the right to change the political status of the territory in the light of the consideration whether that territory was or was not subject to any claim or litigation on the part of another State.

12. Those amendments were not meant to express criticism of the Ad Hoc Committee's excellent work; but the sponsors of the amendments had believed that they could not conscientiously support the very important list of factors which the Committee was asked to adopt without making the changes they deemed requisite.

13. He then discussed the eleven-Power amendments (A/C.4/L.273) to the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272), and thanked the French representative for acknowledging that they had at least illuminated the Committee. They had met with such wide support simply because they showed no sign of an adamant or hostile attitude. Thus, in dealing with the question of competence, they simply stated that the Assembly was competent to consider the principles that should guide the United Nations and the Member States and to make recommendations in connexion with them, which was merely a restatement of the Assembly's undoubted powers. The question whether the Assembly could take a decision could be settled and the misunderstanding that had arisen could be dispelled, as there was a general desire among the members of the Committee to reach agreement. Very many delegations believed that the Administering Members could not unilaterally evade commitments towards the Assembly once they had entered into them. Some had argued that the Administering Members alone were competent, that the Assembly's function was merely to take note of a statement whereby an Administering Member notified it that a Non-Self-Governing Territory was no longer covered by Chapter XI and that the Assembly could neither consider the matter nor express an opinion. Such a view was wholly unacceptable and would jeopardize the United Nations prestige. The amendments were not, however, intended to confer on the Assembly powers not vested in it by the Charter. Under those amendments the Assembly could consider each case and give its opinion in a resolution; if it should reach a conclusion conflicting with that of the Administering Member, it could recommend that the latter should continue to transmit information. If the Administering Member refused to do so, an eventuality which he would regret, nothing could force it to do so.

14. Amendment 5 mentioned the right of self-determination of peoples; that basic principle, which should guide the future of mankind, had been purposely reaffirmed. In the paragraph 6 proposed in amendment 6, the sponsors had stressed that Non-Self-Governing Territories could become fully self-governing primarily through the attainment of independence, but that did not preclude the possibility of an association with one or more States in the circumstances set out in the second and third parts of the list of factors. He fully appreciated the merits of a system similar to the Commonwealth, but preferred independence the expression of another principle laid down in the Charter and one to which Latin Americans were deeply attached. Countries such as the United States, France, the United Kingdom, Belgium and the Netherlands, though they were deeply attached to the idea of independence and though their example had guided others in their fight for independence, would be damaging their own prestige if they appeared to refuse to other territories the independence which they themselves enjoyed.

15. He wished to assure the Administering Members that the sponsors of the joint amendment were quite objective in their motives. They did not underestimate the work those Powers had performed nor the magnitude of the problems raised by the Non-Self-Governing Territories and by public opinion at home, which sometimes tended to regard the attainment of self-government by dependent peoples with some dislike.

16. Lord HUDSON (United Kingdom) said that he was somewhat amazed at the way in which the discussion had developed during the recent meetings. As a newcomer, he had anticipated taking part in an enlightening debate, which, in keeping with the humanitarian ideals of the Charter, would tend to promote the prosperity of territories whose inhabitants were not yet fully self-governing, and encourage the administrators, who were endeavouring to improve the lot of those territories, in their frequently unrewarding labours.

17. A great deal of work had been expended on drawing up the list of factors. The most recent Ad Hoc Committee on Factors had submitted a unanimous report (A/C.4/L.274). At the beginning of the general debate the Committee had seemed generally inclined to adopt that list as the most satisfactory that could be drawn up in existing circumstances. Hence it was astonishing that some delegations, including three which had been members of the Ad Hoc Committee, had proposed far-reaching amendments (A/C.4/L.274) to that list. If the Fourth Committee was thus going to reopen the discussion of the list drawn up by the Ad Hoc Committee, differences of opinion might well become more acute, as some States believed that some of the arguments heard in Committee almost amounted to intervention in their domestic affairs. Such dissension would be certain to destroy the harmony without which the Committee could not achieve anything worth while. Furthermore, if a committee of sixty started revising the list of factors on which a body of eight had spent so much time, the discussion would be interminable. To forestall those two dangers, he would urge the Fourth Committee to make do with the list of factors in the Ad Hoc Committee's report and not to jeopardize, by lengthy and fruitless discussion, the respect that millions had for the United Nations.

18. The conciliatory spirit invariably shown by the Brazilian representative and by the speakers who had supported his draft resolution was commendable. The differences of opinion among members of the Committee should not prevent it from making a constructive effort towards the application of the principles of Chapter XI of the Charter. It was to be hoped that time would solve the problems that now seemed so hard.

19. He asked the Chairman to put the Brazilian draft resolution to the vote forthwith and he urged the Committee to adopt paragraph 2 of the operative part, which implied the rejection of amendment 3 in document A/C.4/L.273. The Committee would thus be adopting the list of factors as it stood in the Ad Hoc Committee's report.

20. Mr. LOPEZ (Philippines) said it was time to put an end to the debate on the question of factors and to attack the problem of putting the list into practice. The Committee should cease to be concerned with theoretical and legal considerations and instead consider practical, political questions. Whereas legal principles, for instance, those stated in the list of factors, should be defined as precisely as possible and even perhaps somewhat dogmatically, they should be applied very flexibly and progress should be gradual, with halts, if need be, to take stock. The Committee had only to adopt the Brazilian draft resolution to make that transition, the need for which was becoming increasingly urgent. In so doing it would be consolidating the United Nations previous achievements and paving the way for fresh advances.

21. The United Nations had gone far in eight years and was exerting an ever-increasing influence on the future of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter was comparable in importance to the Magna Carta, the Declaration of Independence and the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, but, unlike them, it had not been wrested from a despot but had been freely and generously granted by the metropolitan Powers actuated by the irresistible ideal for which they had fought the Second World War. Chapter XI was a great victory for moral force and a true measure of the evolution of political philosophy in recent centuries. If that Chapter was so regarded, there would be no reason to despair of the United Nations. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Ad Hoc Committees on Factors and the Fourth Committee itself had given world public opinion a chance to be heard. To proceed from the preparation of legal texts to their enforcement with all the requisite flexibility and energy was a slow process, but nothing could halt it.

22. With those considerations in mind the Philippine delegation had submitted its amendment (A/C.4/L.275) to the Brazilian draft resolution. Perhaps the time was not yet ripe for settling the question of competence and deciding whether it was for the Administering Member alone or for the General Assembly to judge if a territory had attained self-government or not. To adopt the existing list of factors would be wiser. The parties concerned could then conduct consultations, on the basis of that list, and in such exchanges of views reason and sense would inevitably prevail over the dogmatic and uncompromising approach. That was the only way for the Committee to reconcile conflicting views and so to contribute to the relaxation of the international tension that was beginning to be felt in the Security Council, the First Committee and the Ad Hoc Political Committee.

23. Sir Douglas COPLAND (Australia) said that he was glad to find a more conciliatory mood prevailing at the current meeting. He agreed with the United Kingdom and Philippine representatives that the only result of considering document A/C.4/L.274 would be to protract the discussion unduly while other urgent matters awaited the Committee's attention and to aggravate the dissensions among Member States. The list of factors so patiently and carefully worked out by the Ad Hoc Committee was neither complete nor final, and only after it had been applied for some time could it be changed as circumstances might require. A final decision would be neither possible nor timely at that stage. Reserving the position his delegation would adopt when the vote was taken on the list of factors, he said that the sponsors of document A/C.4/L.274 should accept the list submitted by the Ad Hoc Committee if they wished the Fourth Committee to adopt a list of factors in 1953, for if it discussed the amendments it would inevitably refer the questions back to the Ad Hoc Committee and thus lose another year. He hoped that debate and a vote on document A/C.4/L.274 could be avoided, so that the Committee could vote on the list of factors as a whole as drawn up by the Ad Hoc Committee.

24. Mr. RIVAS (Venezuela) was sorry that the Brazilian representative had regarded the amendments to his draft resolution as a separate resolution. They were intended merely to develop the sound premises and conclusions of the Brazilian draft resolution. The Brazilian delegation had in any case announced that it was ready to accept some of those amendments, thus showing that it did not claim that its wording could not be carried further.

25. Amendments 4 and 5 in document A/C.4/L.273 were intended merely to alter the arrangement of material in operative paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Brazilian draft resolution. The principle that each "concrete case should be considered and decided upon in the light of the particular circumstances of that case and taking into account the right of self-determination of peoples" had never caused the least difference of opinion between the administering and non-administering Powers. That principle had been accepted, and to reassert it in a separate paragraph, as had always been done, was to preserve a basis for agreement.

26. The new or apparently new feature—that the decision should rest with the Assembly—had already been implied in the Brazilian draft resolution, as the Brazilian representative had himself said at the previous meeting. In any event, whether that principle were expressed or not, the delegations of the Administering Members would still oppose it since in their view only the Administering Member concerned was competent.

27. In order to make it easier to understand new paragraph 5 proposed in amendment 6, he first explained the new paragraph 6 proposed in the same amendment, which also supplemented rather than contradicted the Brazilian proposal so far as substance was concerned. It merely stressed that it was primarily by attaining independence that the territories mentioned in Chapter XI of the Charter could attain full self-government. However, those considerations led directly to the conclusion, repeatedly arrived at by the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors, that it was recognized that self-government could also be achieved by association with another State or group of States if that were done freely and on the basis of absolute equality. When embodied in the operative part of a resolution, that conclusion, having been recognized both by the administering and the non-administering Powers, ceased to be a mere guide and became a principle of the General Assembly.

28. The reason why the attainment of independence should be regarded as the essential means by which the territories in question would attain full self-government was so obvious that it had not been discussed either in the Fourth Committee or in the Ad Hoc Committee. In fact, it was the least doubtful form of self-government and the one which lent itself least to misinterpretations or to the maintenance of a disguised form of dependence. For that reason, the factors indicative of independence were fewest in number. For that reason also, the factors relating to political advancement and the opinion of the population were not included among them, for it would be inconceivable that independence could be imposed by force on a territory, or that the population of a Non-Self-Governing Territory which chose independence had not reached a sufficient stage of maturity to take that step. The mere fact that a people took that step was a sign of sufficient political advancement. In any case, that was not the issue on which the administering and the non-administering Powers were divided. The reason for the suspiciousness of the former was their fear that a majority of the States Members of the United Nations might treat independence as the only possible means of attaining full self-government. The addition of that new paragraph 6, proposed by the delegations of eleven non-administering States, was therefore designed to eliminate that cause of misunderstanding.

29. The idea of independence as the means par excellence of attaining full self-government necessarily implied the fundamental condition which governed every type of association between a Non-Self-Governing Territory and the metropolitan Power or any other country. That condition was conveyed by the words "the freely expressed will of the people at the time of the taking of this decision", in the new paragraph 5 proposed in amendment 6. It was not impossible that not only an administering Power but also some other State might annex a Non-Self-Governing Territory by force and claim that the territory had thereby attained full self-government. Accordingly, the condition stipulated did not apply only to the metropolitan government, but to any State, whether a Member of the United Nations or not. Furthermore, since the San Francisco Conference no administering Power had attempted to base a territory's change of status on circumstances unconnected with the will of the people concerned. Similarly, however forcefully they might argue the exclusive competence of the administering Power, the delegations of metropolitan Powers had never seriously disputed the proposition that a change of status had to be carried out in conformity with the wishes of the population.

30. Amendment 9 called for no comments from his delegation. However, he would be grateful if the other sponsors of the amendments in document A/C.4/L.273 would agree to withdraw that amendment. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories had derived its terms of reference from resolutions 334 (IV) and 448 (V).

31. On the other hand, amendment 10 proposed a wording more appropriate to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. That Committee was, in a way, concerned with procedural questions, and was not expected to take action. Its functions were limited to organizing the work and proposing solutions to the General Assembly. Under the particular amendment, the Committee was to propose modifications to improve the list of factors, in other words changes which would clarify the list and make it progressively easier to apply.

32. Finally, he discussed amendments 3 and 4, which had given the Brazilian delegation and some others the most anxiety. That anxiety would have been mitigated very largely if the amendments (A/C.4/L.273) to the Brazilian draft resolution and the amendments to (A/C.4/L.274) to the list of factors had been distributed at the same time. In the light of the amendments proposed to the list of factors it had appeared inappropriate, even illogical, to let paragraph 2 of the Brazilian draft stand.

33. He then commented on the proposed amendments to the list of factors. Those amendments had been worked out by negotiations and compromises between the various delegations sponsoring it. The item had been so forcefully argued in Committee that it was felt something should be done to dispel the mistrust displayed in debate. If each delegation had put forward its own amendments as suggested to it by the examination of the list of factors, no final resolution could have been adopted on the factors, and it would have been impossible to end that regrettable controversy which had divided the delegations of friendly countries with similar viewpoints on world politics. The Venezuelan delegation had always been opposed to extreme proposals. Furthermore, it was convinced that most of the differences of opinion arose from the form in which those opinions were presented and not from their actual substance, and it had therefore always tried to reconcile different points of view. It was glad to state that it found the same desire for understanding among those delegations which had acted as co-sponsors of the amendments under discussion.

34. New factors were not necessarily new unavoidable conditions, but new guides, new data, which could be used or not, according to the circumstances of each case, and in accordance with the principle laid down the previous year in resolution 648 (VII) and confirmed in paragraph 5 of the Brazilian draft, namely, that the factors "should in no way be interpreted as a hindrance to the attainment of a full measure of self-government by the Non-Self-Governing Territories".

35. The amendment to factor A.4, "National defence", in the first part of the list of factors, was surely generally acceptable; the proposal was due to the initiative of the Mexican delegation.

36. With regard to the second part, amendment 1 was simply intended to restore the title which had been adopted at the Sixth Session by Sub-Committee 9 of the Fourth Committee¹ and which had then been quite acceptable to the representatives of the Administering Members, including the Australian representative, who had rightly asked that the status of Dominions or members of the British Commonwealth should be taken into account. The Commonwealth was certainly an association of independent States which, collectively, limited their sovereignty to a certain extent. However, the term "association" was not only somewhat vague but could also lead to confusion between that distinct form of self-government and the type of union or association referred to in the third part of the list.

37. Amendments 2 and 3 to the second part required no comment, as they simply recommend a rearrangement of the order of the factors.

38. Amendment 4 might be said to introduce a new element. It would, however, be difficult to describe those other distinct forms of self-government as such if the States concerned had not, when the question of association arose, the power and ability to choose independence, as had been the case of Burma, for example, immediately after the Second World War.

39. Amendment 5 merely involved the deletion of the first part of factor A.3, the negative part; it allowed the positive part to stand. The extent to which a territory had freely and on its own initiative limited its sovereignty was not a positive factor. The decisive test for determining whether a people had attained some other separate system of self-government was: how were the attributes of sovereignty, thus limited, exercised? That positive element had been introduced by the Ad Hoc Committee in 1953, on his delegation's proposal (A/2428, para. 34).

40. Owing to the successive changes which had been made in the proposals of the several delegations sponsoring the amendments, and with a view to putting the amendments forward as quickly as possible, amendment 8, entitled "Change of political status", contained a passage which might well have been placed at the end of amendment 5.

41. By the very nature of the attainment of full self-government, States associated in that way, being independent, could separate and form distinct units. It would not otherwise be possible to speak of "other separate systems of self-government".

42. The additions proposed in amendments 6 and 7 were based on the need to give territories the possibility of seceding from the association for geographic, cultural or ethnic reasons. The phrase in amendment 6, "the extent to which the interests of boundary States may be affected, bearing in mind the general principle of good-neighbourliness referred to in Article 74 of the Charter" was based on the Charter.

43. He pointed out a typing error in amendment 9, which should read "The existing factor B.2 will become B.1".

44. Commenting on the third part, he said a Non-Self-Governing Territory could hardly attain full self-government by associating with the metropolitan State or with another country or by becoming an integral part of that country, if that incorporation or association did not take place on a basis of absolute equality with the other parts of the State concerned, unless the inequality left the territory the possibility of changing its decision in the future.

45. That was the reason for the addition of the words "or in any other form" and was the purpose of amendment 5, which noted the existence of States with constitutional powers for granting that advantage. His delegation wished to emphasize that, while it endorsed the addition of that new factor, it did not insist that metropolitan and other States should alter their constitutions to give effect to that factor. Any such insistence would constitute an infringement of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter. The fact that the Venezuelan delegation supported the amendment did not mean that it intended to place obstacles in the path of Non-Self-Governing Territories which, in freely expressing their will, might choose as a means of attaining full self-government association or integration on an absolutely equal basis with other constituent parts of the State in which they were being incorporated or with which they were associating.

46. The Venezuelan delegation was not responsible for introducing amendment 6, but had agreed to sponsor it in accordance with the obligations that it had contracted by approving resolution XXXIII of the Ninth International Conference of American States.

47. Amendment 9 was obviously reasonable. If a Non-Self-Governing Territory were declared to be incorporated in a metropolitan State by virtue of a constitution in the preparation of which the representatives of the Non-Self-Governing Territory had not participated, that incorporation might possibly lack the consent of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories; that would be contrary to Chapter XI, the general spirit of the list of factors and the principle which would be endorsed by a General Assembly resolution if the proposed amendments were adopted.

48. He emphasized that, in associating with other delegations which had drafted the amendments, the Venezuelan delegation had not intended, as had been alleged, to correct the list of factors and to resume the work of the Ad Hoc Committee. Nevertheless, the list, which the Venezuelan delegation had helped to prepare as a member of the Ad Hoc Committee, could not be regarded as unamendable, so long as its substance was not affected.

49. It was to be hoped that the General Assembly would adopt a definitive resolution at the present session and that a debate which was constantly being resumed and which gave rise to differences between friendly countries would thus be brought to an end.

50. Mr. CALLE Y CALLE (Peru) said that the list of factors reflected the General Assembly's wish to establish, for itself and for the Administering Members, regulations for the application of Chapter XI of the Charter. On the basis of those criteria, the General Assembly would be able to judge the merits of any communication notifying it of the cessation of the transmission of information and to decide on the motives for such cessation. The General Assembly could then choose between three decisions: it could take note of the cessation; it could weigh the merits of the case for cessation by applying the criteria of the list of factors and taking into account the circumstances peculiar to each case; or it could disapprove of the decision to cease the transmission of information. It might be assumed that in the third case the Administering Member would continue to transmit the information concerned.

51. By approving the factors, the Fourth Committee would not be taking a decision on the question of competence, nor was it its intention to treat those criteria as though they were rules governing the application of Chapter XI of the Charter. Hence whatever resolution was adopted should not be regarded as having the rigidity of a legislative text. The purpose of the list of factors was to serve as a guide. Accordingly, it would be sufficient to state in the resolution that the General Assembly approved the list of factors submitted in the report of the Ad Hoc Committee and that the list was intended, for the time being, as a guide for the application of Chapter XI of the Charter.

52. He agreed that the Brazilian draft resolution was motivated by a conciliatory intention and by the wish to facilitate the task of the General Assembly and that of the Administering Members. The draft was also an improvement on resolution 648 (VII) and contained only judicious language, the practical consequences of which would be visible in the future. Those remarks also applied to the Philippine amendment.

53. His delegation would vote for the Brazilian draft resolution but could not support the amendments to that text or the amendments to the list of factors.

54. Mr. PETERSON (Canada) recalled that his delegation had spoken earlier on the Brazilian draft resolution and the amendments thereto. He now wished to state its attitude to the amendments to the list of factors (A/C.4/L.274).

55. As mentioned before, the Ad Hoc Committee's list was a synthesis of the opinions expressed during three years of continued study, during which the list had been even submitted to the governments of all Member States for comment. He therefore agreed with certain other representatives that it would be pointless for a committee of sixty members to reopen the discussion of the existing list of factors. It seemed highly improbable that such a discussion would serve any useful purpose.

56. The Venezuelan representative had said that the amendments in document A/C.4/L.274 seemed to have aroused unwarranted anxiety and that they were in fact simple and clear. That might be true of some of the amendments, but, in the very short time it had had to consider them, the Canadian delegation had found that some of the proposed changes gave rise to difficulties of interpretation and raised questions of principle which could not be solved merely by brief explanations.

57. As stated at the previous meeting, the Canadian delegation was prepared to vote for the list of factors as submitted by the Ad Hoc Committee and hoped that the list would be put to the vote as a whole. If, however, the draft amendments in document A/C.4/L.274 were put to the vote, the Canadian delegation would be obliged to vote against all of them because of the impossibility, in the present circumstances, of giving them adequate consideration.

58. Mr. FERREIRA DE SOUZA (Brazil) explained his delegation's attitude to the amendments contained in document A/C.4/L.273. His delegation would accept amendment 1, which considerably improved the Brazilian text, but could not accept amendments 2 and 3; the latter presupposed the alteration of the list of factors proposed by the Ad Hoc Committee. The Brazilian delegation would accept the first part of amendment 4, because it believed that the purpose of the change was to lay stress on the primary responsibility of the General Assembly. With regard to the second part of the amendment, his delegation would vote first for its own text, which it considered clear enough to settle the question of competence. It was unnecessary to repeat why it took that view for it had stated the reasons at the preceding meeting. His delegation would accept amendments 7 and 8, but not amendments 5, 6, 9 and 10.

59. He quite understood the worthy motives underlying the Philippine amendment (A/C.4/L.275) but considered it incompatible with his delegation's basic thesis of the Assembly's competence.

60. The CHAIRMAN read Conference Room Paper No. 1,² in which he explained what voting procedure he proposed to follow concerning the question of factors.

61. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) pointed out that a vote on amendment 1 in document A/C.4/L.273 should be unnecessary since the Brazilian delegation had accepted it. Such a vote would be necessary only if a delegation asked for a separate vote.

62. Mr. SCOTT (New Zealand) asked why the words "and the Member States" had been included after the words "United Nations" in amendment 1 of document A/C.4/L.273.

63. The CHAIRMAN said that both those points would be dealt with at the following meeting.

The meeting rose at 1 p.m.

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (continued).....	83

Chairman: Mr. Santiago PEREZ PEREZ (Venezuela).

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2428, A/C.4/L.272, A/C.4/L.273, A/C.4/L.274, A/C.4/L.275) (continued)

[Item 33]*

1. The CHAIRMAN drew attention to Conference Room Paper No. 1,¹ which contained his proposals for the procedure to be followed in voting.
2. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) suggested that before examining the Brazilian draft resolution, A/C.4/L.272 and the proposed amendments thereto (A/C.4/L.273, A/C.4/L.275), the Committee should consider and vote upon the proposed amendments to the Ad Hoc Committee's list of factors (A/C.4/L.274).
3. Mr. BOZOVIC (Yugoslavia) supported that proposal. Logically the Committee should first decide on the list of factors and then consider the Brazilian draft resolution, whose purpose was the adoption of the list, and the proposed amendments to that resolution. The Ad Hoc Committee's list should be treated as an original proposal, and in accordance with rule 129 of the rules of procedure the amendments to it should be voted on first.
4. Mr. KAISR (Czechoslovakia) recalled an earlier proposal made by the Czechoslovak delegation (326th meeting) to the effect that a separate vote should be held on the individual sections of the list of factors, and, in that connexion, expressed his delegation's support of the Guatemalan representative's proposal.
5. Lord HUDSON (United Kingdom) suggested that the Chairman's proposal should be put to the vote immediately.
6. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) maintained that the list of factors drawn up by the Ad Hoc Committee did not constitute a proposal in the sense of rule 129, but that paragraphs 1 and 2 of the operative part of the Brazilian draft resolution did. The Committee should therefore vote first on the amendments to that draft resolution.

* Indicates the item number on the agenda of the General Assembly.

7. Mr. FERREIRA DE SOUZA (Brazil) thought the Committee should first decide on the principal question: whether or not it wished to adopt the list of factors as it stood. If it rejected the list it could then vote on the amendments.

8. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) supported that proposal.

9. Mr. ARAOZ (Bolivia) supported the Guatemalan proposal.

10. Mr. DE HOLTE CASTELLO (Colombia) suggested that the Chairman should put the Guatemalan proposal to the vote first and then, if that were rejected, his own proposal.

The Guatemalan proposal was adopted by 26 votes to 22, with 4 abstentions.

11. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) suggested that a vote should be taken immediately on amendment 3 of the eleven-Power draft amendments (A/C.4/L.273).

12. The CHAIRMAN called on the Committee to consider the amendments to the list of factors (A/C.4/L.274).

13. Mrs. BOLTON (United States of America) said that she would not touch on the substance of the matter because the United States delegation had serious doubts, on procedural grounds, concerning the practicability of the step the Committee was being asked to take. The list of factors contained in the Ad Hoc Committee's report (A/2428) was the outcome of the deliberations of several special committees which had devoted many meetings to a thorough study of the views of governments on the question of factors. The Ad Hoc Committee's report had been in the hands of Member States for many weeks. The United States Government considered that the Ad Hoc Committee had carried the study of factors as far as it could profitably be pursued at present. However, the Fourth Committee had been presented with a number of amendments which it was expected to examine in a few days. At best, the consideration the Committee would be able to give those amendments would be hurried and incomplete. Furthermore, even such hasty consideration would entail lengthy discussion and take more time than the Committee could spare.

14. The United States delegation was therefore of the opinion that the Committee should not attempt to amend the Ad Hoc Committee's list but should approve it as it stood.

15. Mr. PIGNON (France) entirely shared the United States representative's view. Since, however, the majority of the members of the Committee were evidently determined to vote on the amendments he would explain his delegation's position.

16. The position of the French delegation in the matter had always been perfectly clear. While it had the most serious reservations with regard to the General Assembly's competence to apply the list of factors drawn up by the Ad Hoc Committee, it considered, as it had always done, that the study of such a list was legitimate and useful, on the understanding that the list would constitute not a rigid and inflexible code but a guide to States in dealing with specific cases. Despite its obvious imperfections the list contained in document A/2428 could be used as such a guide.

17. However, the amendments submitted, no doubt with the praiseworthy intention of improving the Ad Hoc Committee's work, completely vitiated it and destroyed a structure which, though uneven, had nevertheless had a certain balance. The amendments aggravated the list's existing defects to such a point that they rendered it unacceptable.

18. Those defects derived primarily from the fact that, for an increasing number of delegations, political considerations outweighed the objectivity so essential in dealing with such questions. It was the negation of all scientific method to erect a general theory on special cases; yet that was what had been done in the second part of the list by introducing such controversial ideas as those contained in amendments 6, 7 and 8 of the second and third parts of the eleven-Power amendments. For the sake of the prestige of the United Nations the Fourth Committee must be careful of the quality of its work. The proposed new factor A.4, in the second part of the list, to cite an example, introduced a principle of intervention which was contrary to the spirit and the letter of the Charter and which would endanger that very good-neighbourliness which it was intended to foster. An attempt had been made to establish a spurious link between that idea and Article 74 of the Charter.

19. In the view of the French delegation, however, the most serious fault of the amendments was that they created confusion between the three parts of the original list. The factors of independence, of self-government in association and of self-government through integration were completely confused, and he doubted the usefulness of such a list in the proper sphere of the Committee's work—Chapter XI of the Charter. It was hardly necessary to reiterate that self-government could and did exist without independence; he would merely emphasize that the sponsors of the amendments had wished to create the impression that the second and third parts of the list of factors were useless in practice. In so doing they had deliberately ignored the Fourth Committee's terms of reference and the very object of its work, i.e., the progress of certain territories towards self-government.

20. For those reasons, the French delegation would vote against the proposed amendments as a whole.

21. Lord HUDSON (United Kingdom) regretted that the attempt he had made at the previous meeting to prevent a sterile debate and to obtain some measure of agreement had failed.

22. His delegation had made no secret of the fact that the contents of the list of factors were a matter of comparative indifference to it. The United Kingdom Government had no need for factors and their application by others could have no effect on the status of any of the territories for which it was responsible. The application of the list of factors was thereby limited at one stroke to, at the most, one-third of the territories at present reported on.

23. However, the United Kingdom had responsibilities as a Member of the United Nations of the Ad Hoc Committee. It had no political interest in the outcome but had sought to assist the Committee in evolving a list which satisfied a coherence theory of truth and was in line with the political realities of the modern world. Nine other delegations had co-operated in the work. A list had been approved after eight months of preparation and two weeks of debate, during which the views of all governments that had wished to submit written observations had been taken into account. Now, when the Fourth Committee was on the point of voting on a draft resolution, a series of amendments to the list had been submitted by eleven delegations, three of which had been represented in the Ad Hoc Committee; indeed the representative of one of them had been its Chairman.

24. In the view of the United Kingdom delegation the amendments were a supreme demonstration of intellectual confusion. For the most part they appeared to be attempts to assert certain political maxims, some of which were unacceptable to his delegation. Many could be identified as arising from the political ends of particular delegations. That fact should be borne in mind during the vote.

25. With regard to the amendment to the first part he would suggest that if a State existed it had a manifest right to provide for its national defence. Its capacity to do so might be more doubtful and might indeed be considered as a factor in its choice of political orientation.

26. In the second part, amendments 6 and 7 attempted to insert two factors from the third part of which the United Kingdom delegation had never been in favour. Amendment 6 was in effect a reaffirmation of what had been called the "salt-water fallacy", namely, that land-locked imperialism was morally admirable whereas transoceanic communities were ethically obnoxious. The experience of the United Kingdom was that the ocean was a link rather than a barrier. Amendment 7 amounted virtually to the endorsement of racial discrimination and was unworthy of the Fourth Committee.

27. With reference to amendment 8, the United Kingdom delegation could not accept the view that the political development of Non-Self-Governing Territories should be impeded by the existence of a dispute between nations claiming sovereignty over them. As the Australian representative had truly said, there was a world of difference between international status and internal responsibility. The duty of any Member State having sovereignty over a Non-Self-Governing Territory was to promote to the utmost the realization of the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter, including the development of a full measure of self-government. Undoubtedly all members of the Committee would agree that, in the event of a Non-Self-Governing Territory's passing from the sovereignty of one Member State to that of another, the new sovereign would inherit all the obligations of the old under Chapter XI. The representative of Guatemala had referred to sovereign independence as the manifest goal for Non-Self-Governing Territories, even though that objective was not referred to in Chapter XI. It would be strange if an administering Power were to be inhibited from pursuing the objectives of Chapter XI because of the existence of a claim on the part of another State which must be assumed equally to support the principles of that chapter; for otherwise the existence of such a claim might be construed as a claim for the annexation of the territories in question without regard to the objectives of Chapter XI.

28. If the amendments were adopted the only effect they could have would be to prevent the attainment of independence by any Non-Self-Governing Territory.

29. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) regretted that his delegation would be obliged to vote against nearly all the proposed amendments to the list of factors contained in the Ad Hoc Committee's report. The only point with which he agreed was the first half of the proposed new factor A.4 in the second part, which seemed to recognize the error of supposing that an ocean was a greater barrier than a land frontier. However, he could not agree to the second half.

30. The representative of Iran had said at the previous meeting that although there were backward peoples which were not in a position to claim their independence, they must not remain indefinitely subject to exploitation by more advanced peoples. Belgium differed on that point: it had always held that backward peoples should never be exploited. The duty of the Administering Members was to administer the Non-Self-Governing Territories on behalf of the peoples of those territories until they were able to do so by themselves; it was clear that the interests of the peoples must be paramount. The votes which the Belgian delegation would be forced to cast against the proposed amendments to the list of factors were therefore based purely on considerations of principle; they did not mean that Belgium did not recognize its obligations under Chapter XI of the Charter or that it would cease to discharge them faithfully.

31. Mr. M. S. ESFANDIARY (Iran) said that the representative of Belgium, in his intervention, had made several references to the statement made by the representative of Iran. While thanking him for his kind words, he would like to reserve his delegation's position in regard to those remarks.

32. Mr. PACHACHI (Iraq) said that, although Iraq had been a member of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors, its delegation had made it clear in that Committee that it did not regard the list of factors approved as final and incapable of improvement. The amendments jointly proposed by eleven delegations were improvements over the original list, making it more coherent and affording better protection for the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He deplored the attitude of inflexible opposition adopted by the United Kingdom and Belgian delegations.

33. Mr. CALLE Y CALLE (Peru) said that, although his delegation was not opposed to the principles embodied in the joint amendments, it intended to vote against them all on the ground that it was impractical to pursue any further the discussion of the list of factors proposed by the Ad Hoc Committee. The Fourth Committee ought simply to take note of the results of the Ad Hoc Committee's deliberations and not attempt to continue that committee's work to the detriment of other items on its own agenda.

34. Mr. MENDEZ (Philippines) noted that the Belgian representative had suggested that a vote on amendment 3 of the joint amendments (A/C.4/L.273) to the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272) might save the Fourth Committee a great deal of time by making it unnecessary to discuss the draft amendments to the list of factors point by point. That suggestion might well have been put to the vote.

35. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) noted, in connexion with certain observations made by the United Kingdom delegation, that the position of the Guatemalan delegation in regard to dependent territories which were subject to any claim or litigation on the part of another State had been made quite clear at the Committee's 322nd meeting. His Government would welcome the achievement of complete independence by such Non-Self-Governing Territories, but wished to ensure that illegally occupied territories which were subject to litigation should not have their political status changed by forms of association before such litigation was settled.

36. In connexion with the proposed amendments to the list of factors he objected that the question was being made too complicated. The purpose of the list of factors was not to help the General Assembly to decide whether the status conferred on a Non-Self-Governing Territory was good for the territory or whether it was what the territory wanted, but merely to enable it to analyse the situation and determine whether the Administering Member was in fact released from its obligation to transmit information on the territory to the United Nations. If the number of Non-Self-Governing Territories on which information was transmitted remained constant, no list would be necessary; but if it continued to dwindle it was essential that the General Assembly should have some such guide. He did not agree that the General Assembly had not enough time to improve the list of factors suggested by the Ad Hoc Committee; the work of the various bodies which had prepared the list of factors had in fact been compressed into a very short time.

37. The CHAIRMAN called upon the Committee to vote on the amendments contained in document A/C.4/L.274 to the list of factors as contained in the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors, document A/2428, section VI.

38. He put to the vote the amendment proposing that a new factor A.4 should be added to the first part of the list.

That amendment was adopted by 31 votes to 9, with 10 abstentions.

39. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of the list of factors (A/2428, section VI), as amended.

The first part of the list, as amended, was adopted by 34 votes to 7, with 10 abstentions.

40. The CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the amendments (A/C.4/L.274) concerning the second part of the list.

Amendment 1 was adopted by 27 votes to 15, with 9 abstentions.

41. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote amendment 2. The adoption of that amendment would automatically imply the adoption of amendment 3.

Amendment 2 was adopted by 21 votes to 12, with 16 abstentions.

42. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote amendment 4.

Amendment 4 was adopted by 27 votes to 15, with 8 abstentions.

43. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) asked for a separate vote on the first part of the text of amendment 5, up to the words "thus associated". He intended to vote against both parts of that paragraph; however, many delegations might be in favour of the first part of the text but not of the universal right of secession embodied in the second part.

44. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of amendment 5.

The first part of amendment 5 was adopted by 30 votes to 8, with 12 abstentions.

45. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium), requested that the vote on the second part of amendment 5 should be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

Lebanon, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Egypt, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq.

Against: Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, Poland, Sweden, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of South Africa, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Australia, Belgium, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, France.

Abstaining: United States of America, Brazil, Burma, China, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Greece, India, Israel.

The second part of amendment 5 was adopted by 25 votes to 18, with 10 abstentions.

46. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote amendment 5 as a whole.

Amendment 5, as a whole, was adopted by 25 votes to 18, with 9 abstentions.

47. Mr. CALLE Y CALLE (Peru) explained that he had voted against the second part of amendment 5 and abstained from voting on the whole amendment because he could not endorse the right of secession in all cases.

48. In response to a request by Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium), who asked for a separate vote on the two parts of amendment 6, which had nothing in common, the CHAIRMAN put to the vote successively the first and second parts of that amendment.

The first part of amendment 6 was adopted by 26 votes to 14, with 11 abstentions.

The second part of amendment 6 was adopted by 23 votes to 18, with 10 abstentions.

49. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote amendment 6 as a whole.

Amendment 6, as a whole, was adopted by 24 votes to 17, with 8 abstentions.

50. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote amendment 7.

Amendment 7 was adopted by 26 votes to 17, with 8 abstentions.

51. The CHAIRMAN said that no amendments had been submitted to factor B.1 of the second part of the Ad Hoc Committee's list, and that, unless there were any objections, he would consider it adopted.

It was so decided.

52. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote amendment 8, the adoption of which would automatically imply the adoption of amendment 9.

Amendment 8 was adopted by 23 votes to 18, with 12 abstentions.

53. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second part of the list of factors (A/2428, section VI), as a whole, as amended.

The second part of the list of factors, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 24 votes to 18, with 11 abstentions.

54. The CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the amendments in document A/C.4/L.274 applying to the third part of the list of factors.

Amendment 1 was adopted by 25 votes to 15, with 13 abstentions.

Amendment 2 was adopted by 26 votes to 14, with 15 abstentions.

55. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote amendment 3, whose adoption would automatically imply the adoption of amendment 4.

Amendment 3 was adopted by 23 votes to 9, with 18 abstentions.

56. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) requested that the vote on amendment 5 should be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

France, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Guatemala, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Egypt, El Salvador.

Against: France, Greece, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Poland, Sweden, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of South Africa, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Australia, Belgium, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Denmark.

Abstaining: Israel, Norway, Peru, United States of America, Brazil, Burma, China, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia.

Amendment 5 was adopted by 25 votes to 17, with 10 abstentions.

57. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republican) drew the secretariat's attention to certain changes that should be made in the Spanish text of amendment 6.

58. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote amendment 6.

Amendment 6 was adopted by 22 votes to 18, with 11 abstentions.

59. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote factor A.3 of the third part of the list (A/2428, section VI), as amended by the adoption of amendment 6.

Factor A.3, as amended, was adopted by 23 votes to 18, with 8 abstentions.

60. The CHAIRMAN said that no amendments had been submitted to factor A.4 and that, unless there were any objections, he would consider it adopted.

It was so decided.

61. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote amendment 7 (A/C.4/L.274).

Amendment 7 was adopted by 28 to 13, with 10 abstentions.

62. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote factor A.5 of the third part of the list (A/2428, section VI), as amended by the adoption of amendment 7.

Factor A.5, as amended, was adopted by 23 votes to 18, with 9 abstentions.

63. The CHAIRMAN said that no amendments had been submitted to factor B.1., and that, unless there were any objections, he would consider it adopted.

It was so decided.

64. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote amendment 8 (A/C.4/L.274).

Amendment 8 was adopted by 25 votes to 16, with 9 abstentions.

65. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote amendment 9.

Amendment 9 was adopted by 25 votes to 17, with 8 abstentions.

66. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the third part of the list of factors (A/2428, section VI), as a whole, as amended.

The third part of the list of factors, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 23 votes to 16, with 11 abstentions

67. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the list of factors, as a whole, as amended.

The list of factors, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 25 votes to 18, with 8 abstentions.

68. Mrs. BOLTON (United States of America) had abstained from voting on any of the amendments to the list of factors because the Committee had been able to consider them only in hurried and incomplete fashion. She reserved her delegation's position on their substance and regretted that the Chairman had not followed the procedure suggested by the representative of Belgium, the Philippines and the United States.

69. Mr. S. S. LIU (China) said that his abstention on the amendments had been without prejudice to their substance. The list of factors proposed by the Ad Hoc Committee had seemed to be a satisfactory guide, and his delegation had not felt that there was any need to amend it at the present juncture. Furthermore, that list, as the outcome of a long period of arduous work, might have obtained a wider measure of support in the General Assembly itself. No list of factors could be exhaustive or final.

70. Mr. DE HOLTE CASTELLO (Colombia) had abstained on all the amendments without prejudice to their substance and without going into their merits. His delegation supported the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272) and would vote in favour of it.

71. Mr. NAJAR (Israel) said that his abstention on all the amendments should not be construed as implying any stand on the principles and definitions embodied in them. There was a wide difference between adopting proposals at forty-eight hours' notice and adopting a list which had been given long and careful study. It was regrettable that the Committee should not have seized the opportunity for obtaining a broad measure of agreement offered by the list submitted by the Ad

Hoc Committee, but had instead preferred to adopt the amended list by a rather small majority. He feared that a list adopted in such circumstances would not produce the desired results.

72. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) explained that he would have abstained from voting on the original list of factors, which represented the work of several years, but he had felt compelled to cast negative votes in the haphazard adoption of amendments that had just taken place.

73. Mr. DONS MOELLER (Denmark) would have been prepared to vote in favour of the list of factors submitted by the Ad Hoc Committee. The introduction of the amendments at the present stage had caused his delegation surprise, and there had been very little time to consider them. He had been able to support a few of them but the majority had not appeared to offer any improvement on the original text. The new factor A.2 in the third part, namely, the possible wishes of the population of a Non-Self-Governing Territory at some future date, was not a factor at all because it related to subsequent events. Furthermore, it either implied that the integration with the metropolitan country was not complete, or would constitute intervention in the domestic affairs of another State, which was contrary to the Charter. He had therefore been compelled to vote against the introduction of that new factor and against certain other amendments.

74. Mr. PIGNON (France) noted with regret that the majority which had approved the amended list of factors had not even tried to answer the criticism that had been levelled against the amendments.

75. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) wished to make it clear once again that his delegation had always been in favour of drawing up a list of factors and had been prepared to approve the list submitted by the Ad Hoc Committee. It had been surprised at the introduction of amendments at the present stage, and had been unable to vote in favour of them, since it would have preferred the adoption of the original list.

76. Mr. FERREIRA DE SOUZA (Brazil) explained that his delegation had abstained from voting on any of the amendments in the same spirit of conciliation that had led it to introduce its draft resolution. Moreover, the amendments had not been adequately studied and he reserved his delegation's position on them in the General Assembly.

77. Mr. NAUDE (Union of South Africa) wished to make it quite clear that his voting on the amendments had been without prejudice to their substance.

The meeting rose at 6.5 p.m.

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet obtained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (continued)	89

Chairman: Mr. Santiago PEREZ PEREZ (Venezuela).

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet obtained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2428, A/C.4/L.272, A/C.4/L.273, A/C.4/L.274, A/C.4/L.275, A/C.4/L.276, A/C.4/L.277) (continued)

[Item 33]*

1. Mr. L. S. BOKHARI (Pakistan) said that before the introduction of the eleven-Power amendments (A/C.4/L.274) to the list of factors proposed in the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories), (A/2428), his delegation had intended to support the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272) since it was in favour of that list of factors as a guide and had felt that further discussion of it in the Committee was unnecessary. He had hoped that the Brazilian draft resolution would be widely supported and help to narrow the gap between the administering and the non-administering Powers. At the previous meeting he had voted against the Guatemalan representative's proposal that the amendments (A/C.4/L.274) to the list of factors should be considered before the Brazilian draft resolution and the amendments thereto. Subsequently, however, since he was not opposed to the substance of the amendments to the list of factors, he had voted in favour of them though he did not feel very satisfied with the result in view of the very small majority by which most of them had been adopted.

2. Mr. FRAZAO (Brazil) said that the procedure followed by the Committee at the previous meeting had led to the adoption of certain decisions, as a result of which his delegation had had to reconsider its attitude to its draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272). That draft resolution had been based on the conviction that there were certain basic principles of international responsibility that the General Assembly should adopt and certain basic responsibilities of the Administering Members. He had hoped that it would prove acceptable to a large majority of the Committee. Its central provision was the adoption of the list of factors proposed by the Ad Hoc Committee, though the possibility of subsequent revision by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories had been left open in paragraph 8. The list proposed by the Ad Hoc Committee was the outcome of nearly three years' work, and his delegation had advocated its adoption in the belief that it would further international collaboration to promote the objectives of Chapter X of the Charter. He deeply regretted the decisions taken by the Committee at the previous meeting. His delegation had considered withdrawing its draft since paragraph 2 was irreconcilable with those decisions, but in order not to complicate the Committee's work it had in the end decided to maintain it, including paragraph 2. He urged the Committee to adopt that paragraph as it stood, in which case the decisions at the previous meeting would be annulled.

3. He wished to place the motive for his delegation's action on record and to make it clear that his delegation retained full liberty to support any compromise that might be suggested in the General Assembly.

4. Mrs. BOLTON (United States of America) said that her delegation appreciated the effort of the delegation of Brazil. Although her delegation was not entirely satisfied with the Brazilian draft resolution it would, in a spirit of conciliation, vote for eleven of the twelve paragraphs as they stood. If operative paragraph 3 was modified the United States delegation could also support it and vote for the draft resolution as a whole. She hoped that other delegations would vote in the same spirit.

5. The General Assembly had already performed a useful service in clarifying the complex and variable factors which indicated the achievement of a full measure of self-government. Although her delegation could not accept the principle implied in paragraph 3 of the Brazilian draft, its position on that matter was not a negative one. Under Article 10 of the Charter the Assembly was competent to discuss and attempt to define the expressions "Non-Self-Governing Territories" and "territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government"; it was entitled to recommend to the Administering Members in general the consideration of any definition it adopted or even to express its opinion in general terms on the principles which had guided or might guide such Members in deciding on which territories to transmit information. Moreover, her delegation had no objection to discussion by the Assembly of the information transmitted by the Administering Members in explanation of their decision to cease reporting on territories which had become self-governing. However, the United States Constitution gave the United States Congress the sovereign and exclusive power to decide upon changes in the constitutional status of United States territories. Only the United States could decide when one of its territories had attained self-government within the terms of Article 73 of the Charter. She had therefore been startled to find that some delegations were supporting recommendations which would have no legally binding effect on the United States Congress and would be misunderstood by the people of the United States. As a practical matter such recommendations would be generally meaningless and, to the extent that they had any meaning, harmful. She appealed to the delegations concerned not to try to force such proposals through the Committee.

6. In the hope that her appeal would be effective, she wished to propose a change in paragraph 3 of the operative part of the Brazilian draft resolution. She therefore requested the Chairman to take a separate vote on the words "by the Administering Members and by the General Assembly" in paragraph 3 of the Brazilian draft resolution and on the last part of that paragraph beginning with the words "in order that . . .".

7. Her delegation was prepared to support several of the eleven-Power amendments (A/C.4/L.273) to the Brazilian draft resolution but it would vote against amendments 2 and 3, because it supported the list of factors in the Ad Hoc Committee's report. If those amendments were rejected, the Committee would have an opportunity—by voting for the present text of the paragraphs of the Brazilian draft to which they referred—to remedy the hasty and unfortunate action it had taken at the previous meeting and to approve the list of factors proposed by the Ad Hoc Committee (A/2428). In order to meet the wishes of the eleven sponsors of the amendments to the list of factors the Committee might consider the possibility of referring the summary records of its debates on the question of factors to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories with instructions to consider the suggestions of members of the Assembly when and if that Committee decided to consider further revisions in the list of factors.¹

8. Mr. FRAZAO (Brazil) welcomed the United States amendment as a very reasonable solution to the difficulty. He hoped that the sponsors of the amendments in document A/C.4/L.274 would be prepared to vote in favour of it and, consequently, of paragraph 2 of the Brazilian draft resolution. His delegation would be glad of an opportunity to consider the amendments to the list of factors in the Committee of Information and might well be able to support many of them. At the previous meeting, however, those amendments had been adopted without proper consideration.

9. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala), supported by Mr. BOZOVIC (Yugoslavia) and Mr. ESPINOSA Y PRIETO (Mexico), argued that to vote on paragraph 2 of the Brazilian draft resolution would be tantamount to reversing the Committee's decisions at the previous meeting. Under rule 122 of the rules of procedure such a step could be taken only if the Committee so decided by a two-thirds majority.

10. Mr. AROAZ (Bolivia) pointed out that whether the Committee approved paragraph 2 of the Brazilian draft or paragraph 3 of the amendments (A/C.4/L.273) the net result would be the same. The Committee had before it only one list of factors, namely, the amended list, since by the very act of amendment the original list of factors proposed by the Ad Hoc Committee had ceased to exist. If the Committee wished to reconsider its decision to amend the list of factors the rules of procedure governing such cases must be strictly applied.

11. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) and Mr. FRAZAO (Brazil) could not agree that the list proposed by the Ad Hoc Committee no longer existed. In any case, the Committee had not considered any part of the Brazilian draft resolution or the amendments thereto at the previous meeting. It had voted only on the amendments to the list of factors. It must now proceed to vote on the draft resolution and amendments.

12. The CHAIRMAN ruled that the voting on the Brazilian draft resolution and amendments would not constitute reconsideration of the Committee's previous decisions and, consequently, that rule 122 did not apply.

13. No amendments had been submitted to the first two paragraphs of the preamble of the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272) and, unless there were any objections, he would consider them adopted.

It was so decided.

14. The CHAIRMAN announced that amendment 1 of document A/C.4/L.273, proposing the insertion of a new third paragraph in the preamble, had been accepted by the Brazilian representative.

15. Mr. PIGNON (France) requested that the paragraph should nevertheless be put to the vote.

16. Mr. WINIEWICZ (Poland) requested that the vote should be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

Iraq, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Thailand, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran.

Against: Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France.

Abstaining: Norway, Sweden.

The amendment was adopted by 37 votes to 11, with 2 abstentions.

17. The CHAIRMAN announced that no amendments had been submitted to the original third—now fourth—paragraph of the preamble to the Brazilian draft resolution and that, unless there were any objections, he would consider it adopted.

It was so decided.

18. The CHAIRMAN pointed out that the fate of the original fourth paragraph of the preamble to the draft resolution and, consequently, of amendment 2 of the document A/C.4/L.273 would automatically be decided by the vote on paragraph 2 of the draft resolution.

19. No amendments had been submitted to paragraph 1 of the operative part of the Brazilian draft resolution and, unless there were any objections, he would consider it adopted.

It was so decided.

¹ An amendment to that effect was submitted by the United States delegation later in the meeting and was circulated as document A/C.4/L.276.

20. Mr. FRAZAO (Brazil) pointed out that the additional paragraph proposed by the United States might well affect the way in which a number of delegations voted on paragraph 2 of the Brazilian draft resolution and the amendment thereto. He therefore proposed that the meeting should be suspended pending circulation of the United States amendment.

21. The CHAIRMAN put the motion for suspension to the vote.

The motion was rejected by 17 votes to 12, with 14 abstentions.

22. Mr. DORSINVILLE (Haiti) requested a separate vote on the first part of amendment 3 of document A/C.4/L.273, down to the words "is attached".

23. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of amendment 3.

The first part of amendment 3 was rejected by 24 votes to 20, with 3 abstentions.

24. The CHAIRMAN observed that the second part of the paragraph would be meaningless by itself so that no vote could be taken on it.

25. Mrs. MENON (India) proposed that in paragraph 2 of the operative part of the Brazilian draft resolution the words "contained in that report" should be deleted and replaced by "as adopted by the Fourth Committee".

26. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) supported that proposal, both for reasons of substance and for reasons of procedure. Since the Committee had already approved the amended list of factors, there was no point in voting on a paragraph which approved the Ad Hoc Committee's list.

27. Mr. MATHIESON (United Kingdom) maintained that despite the vote taken at the previous meeting there were still two lists of factors: that proposed by the Ad Hoc Committee and that approved by the Fourth Committee. There was no reason why the Committee should not vote on a draft resolution approving the former if the Brazilian delegation so wished.

28. Mr. FRAZAO (Brazil), speaking on a point of order, did not consider it proper that a new amendment should be submitted when the Committee had already begun voting on the eleven-Power amendments.

29. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) did not think the Indian amendment could be put to the vote since it would in effect reintroduce the amendment the Committee had just rejected.

30. Mr. PIGNON (France) said the Indian amendment was one of substance and the voting on the eleven-Power amendments could not be interrupted to take a vote on it.

31. Mrs. MENON (India) insisted that by rejecting amendment 3 of the eleven-Power amendments the Committee had in effect rejected the amended list of factors which it had adopted at the previous meeting. On the other hand, by adopting the amended list of factors it had automatically rejected the original list. In fact, therefore, no list remained on which it could vote.

32. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) urged that the Committee should vote on the Brazilian draft resolution.

33. The CHAIRMAN proposed to put the Indian amendment to the vote.

34. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) emphasized that the Indian amendment was out of order under rule 127 of the rules of procedure. Furthermore, the amendment reopened a subject on which the Committee had already come to a decision.

35. The CHAIRMAN asked the Committee to decide whether it wished to vote on the Indian amendment.

The Committee decided by 25 votes to 19, with 4 abstentions, to vote on the Indian amendment.

36. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic), speaking on a point of order, said that under rule 119 of the rules of procedure the Indian amendment should be circulated in writing and the Committee should be given time to study it.

37. The CHAIRMAN said that the meeting would be suspended for fifteen minutes to allow the Indian amendment to be circulated in writing.

The meeting was suspended at 5.15 p.m. and was resumed at 5.45 p.m.

38. Mr. CALLE Y CALLE (Peru) said that although rule 119 of the rules of procedure allowed the Chairman to permit the discussion of amendments which had not been circulated, it did not allow him to put such amendments to the vote before circulation. Moreover, rule 127 said that voting could not be interrupted except on a point of order in connexion with the actual conduct of the voting. The Indian amendment (A/C.4/L.277) was not a point of order and it had been submitted in the course of the voting.

39. Mr. DE MARCHENA (Dominican Republic) agreed that the Indian amendment was not purely formal, but insisted that even if it were, the fact that it had been introduced during the voting meant that to receive it would create a very serious precedent. In view of the grave implications he felt that the Committee should have time to study the Indian amendment. He therefore suggested that the meeting should be adjourned.

The proposal was not adopted, 19 votes being cast in favour and 19 against, with 11 abstentions.

40. Mrs. MENON (India) said that the amendment proposed by her delegation was not substantive but merely a consequential change in view of the fact that the Committee had adopted an amended list of factors at its previous meeting.

41. Mr. FRAZAO (Brazil) noted for the purposes of the summary record and the report that at the proposal of the Chairman the Committee had voted on and rejected the first part of amendment 3 of the joint amendments (A/C.4/L.273), and was to vote on the Indian amendment after the rejection of the joint amendment.

42. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Indian amendment (A/C.4/L.277) to paragraph 2 of the operative part of the draft resolution submitted by Brazil (A/C.4/L.272).

43. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) requested that the vote should be taken by roll-call.

The vote was taken by roll-call.

Sweden, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Syria, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Poland, Saudi Arabia.

Against: Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Colombia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru.

Abstaining: Thailand, China, Greece, Philippines.

The amendment was adopted by 30 votes to 18, with 4 abstentions.

44. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 2 of the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272), as amended, noting that the amendment implied the deletion of the fourth paragraph of the preamble.

45. Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) requested that the vote should be taken by roll-call.

The vote was taken by roll-call.

The Philippines, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Saudi Arabia, Syria, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Burma, Chile, Cuba, Egypt, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan.

Against: Poland, Sweden, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of South Africa, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru.

Abstaining: Philippines, Thailand, China, Greece.

Paragraph 2, as amended, was adopted by 25 votes to 23, with 4 abstentions.

46. Mrs. BOLTON (United States) withdrew her proposal for a separate vote on paragraph 3 of the Brazilian draft resolution.

47. The CHAIRMAN said that, in the absence of any objection, he would regard the first part of paragraph 3 of the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272) as far as the word "as a guide", as adopted.

It was so decided.

48. Mr. WINIEWICZ (Poland) said that if a vote had been taken, his delegation would have voted against the first part of paragraph 3.

49. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote point (a) of the Philippine amendment (A/C.4/L.275), to the effect that the words "in appropriate consultations" should be inserted after the words "as a guide" in paragraph 3 of the operative part of the Brazilian draft resolution.

The amendment was rejected by 26 votes to 15, with 9 abstentions.

50. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second part of amendment 4 of the eleven-Power amendments (A/C.4/L.273), to the effect that the clause "and applied in the light of all relevant circumstances pertinent to each particular situation . . ." should be deleted from paragraph 3 of the operative part of the Brazilian draft resolution.

The amendment was adopted by 26 votes to 18, with 6 abstentions.

51. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote point (b) of the Philippine amendment (A/C.4/L.275), to the effect that the words "a decision may be taken", in paragraph 3 of the operative part of the Brazilian draft resolution, should be replaced by the words "agreement may be reached".

The amendment was rejected by 19 votes to 13, with 4 abstentions.

52. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the third part of amendment 4 of the eleven-Power amendments (A/C.4/L.273), to the effect that the words "by the General Assembly" should be inserted between the words "may be taken" and the words "on the continuation", in paragraph 3 of the operative part of the Brazilian draft resolution.

The amendment was adopted by 30 votes to 15, with 5 abstentions.

53. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the whole of paragraph 3 of the operative part of the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272), as amended.

Paragraph 3, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 25 votes to 23, with 3 abstentions.

54. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote amendment 5 of the eleven-Power amendments (A/C.4/L.273), proposing a new text for paragraph 4 of the Brazilian draft resolution.

Amendment 5 was adopted by 35 votes to 11, with 4 abstentions.

55. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the new operative paragraph 5 proposed in amendment 6 of the eleven-Power amendments (A/C.4/L.273).

The new paragraph 5 was adopted by 29 votes to 19, with 4 abstentions.

56. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of the new operative paragraph 6 proposed in amendment 6 of the eleven-Power amendments (A/C.4/L.273), as far as the words "the attainment of independence", as requested by the representative of Poland.

57. Mr. WINIEWICZ (Poland) requested that the vote should be taken by roll-call.

The vote was taken by roll-call.

Pakistan, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Peru, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico.

Against: Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway.

Abstaining: Pakistan, Thailand, China, Ethiopia.

That part of the new paragraph 6 was adopted by 35 votes to 13, with 4 abstentions.

58. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the remainder of the new paragraph 6.

The remainder of the new paragraph 6 was adopted by 28 votes to 7 with 15 abstentions.

59. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the new paragraph 6 as a whole.

Paragraph 6, as a whole, was adopted by 28 votes to 18, with 3 abstentions.

60. The CHAIRMAN said that, in the absence of any objection to amendments 7 and 8 of the eleven-

Power amendments (A/C.4/L.273), which had been accepted by Brazil, the original paragraphs 5 and 6 of the Brazilian draft resolution, as amended, which would now become paragraphs 7 and 8, would be regarded as adopted.

It was so decided.

61. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of amendment 9 of the eleven-Power amendments, to the effect that the word "further" should be deleted from the first line of paragraph 7 of the operative part of the Brazilian draft resolution, which had become paragraph 9.

The amendment was adopted by 23 votes to 2, with 21 abstentions.

62. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second part of amendment 9 of the eleven-Power amendments, to the effect that the part of paragraph 9 of the Brazilian draft resolution following the words "of cessation of information" should be deleted.

The amendment was adopted by 23 votes to 3, with 13 abstentions.

63. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 9 of the Brazilian draft resolution, as amended.

Paragraph 9, as amended, was adopted by 28 votes to 21, with 2 abstentions.

64. The CHAIRMAN put to the vote amendment 10 of the eleven-Power amendments, which proposed a new text for the last paragraph, formerly paragraph 8, of the Brazilian draft resolution.

The amendment was adopted by 33 votes to 13, with 4 abstentions.

65. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) noted that he had voted against the amendment, but not because he did not think that the list was capable of improvement.

66. The CHAIRMAN stated that the United States amendment (A/C.4/L.276) had been withdrawn.

67. He put to the vote the whole of the Brazilian draft resolution, as amended, with the list of factors, as amended.

68. Mr. ESPINOSA Y PRIETO (Mexico) requested that the vote should be taken by roll-call.

The vote was taken by roll-call.

The Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Burma, Chile, Cuba, Egypt, Ethiopia, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Syria.

Against: Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of South Africa, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Israel, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, Poland, Sweden.

Abstaining: China, Thailand.

The Brazilian draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by 27 votes to 23, with 2 abstentions.

69. Mr. WINIEWICZ (Poland) said that the position of the Polish delegation on the list of factors had been motivated by its support for the principle of self-determination of peoples. Thus, although it had been able to accept and vote for the first part of the list, it had found the second and third parts unacceptable because they did not provide for the accession of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to the status of sovereign States. The second and third parts could thus be open to an interpretation serving the perpetuation of colonial rule under another form, instead of serving the aim of ultimate independence for dependent peoples.

70. The Polish delegation had been obliged to vote against the Brazilian draft resolution, even as amended, because its essential part consisted of an approval of the unsatisfactory list of factors. Neither the amendments suggested to the list of factors nor the amendments to the draft resolution had improved the original text and thus disposed of the Polish delegation's serious doubts.

71. He wished to re-emphasize another fundamental consideration already expressed by the Polish delegation during the previous discussion of the same topic by the Fourth Committee. The obligation to transmit information undertaken by the colonial Powers was a binding agreement, and the international responsibility assumed by those Powers could be disposed of only by international decision of the General Assembly. Before any Administering Member could be released from its duty to submit information under Article 73 e of the Charter, the General Assembly must consider all the data relating to the changes in the status of the territory and take the final decision, having regard to all the relevant circumstances of the case. Those considerations would guide the Polish delegation in the future, whenever the General Assembly was called upon to decide whether a territory was or was not a territory whose people had not yet attained a full measure of self-government.

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet obtained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (continued)	95
Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter (continued)	98

Chairman: Mr. Santiago PEREZ PEREZ (Venezuela).

Factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government: report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2428) (continued)

[Item 33]*

1. Lord HUDSON (United Kingdom) said that at the 330th meeting his delegation had voted against the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272) for the reasons given in the United Kingdom's first statement in the debate on the item (326th meeting). Moreover, should any member of the General Assembly invoke the resolution in support of any claim that might be put forward at some future date, the United Kingdom delegation expressly reserved its position.

2. Mrs. MENON (India) said that although the Indian delegation had been prepared to accept the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories) (A/2428) as it stood, it had had no objection to an elaboration and restatement of the principles contained in the list of factors (A/2428, section VI) as well as in the Brazilian draft resolution (A/C.4/L.272). It had therefore voted in favour of the eleven-Power amendments to the list (A/C.4/L.274) and to the draft resolution (A/C.4/L.273). Some delegations had objected to the re-examination of the list of factors on the grounds that the Ad Hoc Committee had already worked on the list, and to the proposed amendments on the grounds that the Fourth Committee had not been given time to study them. A small body such as the Ad Hoc Committee could obviously not represent the views of all the sixty nations on the Fourth Committee but some of the amendments proposed had first been discussed at the San Francisco Conference, so that the ideas contained in them had long been familiar. It had been agreed that the list of factors was only a guide and therefore illustrative rather than exhaustive, and that each case submitted to the United Nations would be examined separately in the light of its particular circumstances. The scope and applicability of the list of factors had therefore been at the same time limited and expanded. The list itself was a sincere attempt to fit facts into theories rather than theories into facts and was of purely academic value.

3. To the Indian delegation, two points were important: first, there must be a certain degree of understanding between the Administering and non-administering Members if the Committee's work was to be pursued; and secondly, the Committee's decisions ought to accelerate the progress envisaged in Chapter XI of the Charter. Those objectives could be attained only through co-operation. Although there was nothing in the Charter to compel the Administering Members to adopt a particular course, the Fourth Committee was seeking within its limitations to give effect to the decisions of the General Assembly. Once those limitations had been realized, it seemed unnecessary to argue about the respective claims of the Administering Members and the United Nations. The constant reassertion by the Administering Members that their decisions regarding the status of the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which they were responsible would be unilateral, that they had made all the concessions which they were prepared to make in accepting Chapter XI, and that anything else demanded of them would be a violation of the Charter, did not promote understanding, and at the same time made nonsense of Chapter XI. The Indian delegation believed that when a Member State accepted the Charter, it could not accept some of it as binding and the rest not. It agreed with other delegations that the provisions of Chapter XI were not and could not be regarded as unilateral declarations by certain Member States, but were the content of a treaty to which all the Members of the United Nations were contracting parties. Thus, the obligation to transmit information was not permanently limited to a few Administering Members, for the possibility that other Members might assume such obligations was not excluded. All the Members of the United Nations were responsible for the fulfilment of the objectives listed in Chapter XI, and that was one reason why the non-administering Members were so interested in the welfare of the peoples of dependent territories.

4. The Indian delegation did not underestimate the value of definitions but it believed that facts were more important. There could be voluntary association between countries only when the countries concerned enjoyed equality of status. Thus, association and co-operation at an international level could be valid and feasible only after a territory had been freed from all external political pressure. Therefore, in all such cases the correct procedure would be independence first, followed by association, as in the case of India itself. Since the Charter said that Member States had accepted their various obligations under Article 73 as a sacred trust, it was hard to see why the Administering

Members should fear the words independence and self-determination of peoples. Their arguments ignored recent developments of political thought. Events showed that theories and legal interpretations had ceased to withstand the force of popular desire for freedom. The administering Powers should move with the times and not wait for time to move them. In Europe, sovereign States were surrendering the right to provide national defence, which had been accepted as one of the distinctive marks of sovereignty, while all over the world dependent peoples were claiming the right to be independent. It was against that background that the Committee had discussed the list of factors.

5. It was strange and unfortunate that certain Member States, which were fulfilling their obligations under Chapter XI in the true spirit, should have expressed their indifference to the list of factors as such and reasserted their oft-repeated claim that neither the General Assembly nor any other power could influence them in decisions regarding the status of the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration. The Indian delegation shared the concern for the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and as always would extend its full support to any step which accelerated or helped to accelerate the movement for independence in those territories.

6. The Indian delegation did not agree with those delegations which emphasized the difficulty of finding a proper definition of self-government. The difficulty was not the absence of a definition but the absence of agreement on the definition. The Indian delegation believed that there was no difference between a full measure of self-government and independence. There might be degrees of self-government, but a full measure of self-government should be equated with independence.

7. It was those beliefs which had impelled the Indian delegation to accept the eleven-Power amendments and the principles embodied in the Brazilian draft resolution.

8. Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) said that the Belgian delegation had voted in accord with certain unvarying principles, of universal application and in full conformity with the law.

9. The representative of the United States had made it quite clear that it was the United States Congress alone which exercised the sovereign power of decision over the status of the United States territories. Similarly, the Belgian Parliament alone could decide the status of the Belgian territories, which were an integral part of the Belgian State. When Belgium had decided that the Belgian Congo fell within the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter, it had decided, without consulting the General Assembly, to transmit the information provided for in that article; the General Assembly had simply noted the decision and had not been called upon to approve it. When Belgium decided that the Belgian Congo had ceased to fall within the purview of Article 73 e, it would decide, again without consulting the General Assembly and without requiring its approval, to cease to transmit information. That was the law and no vote by the Fourth Committee or recommendation by the General Assembly would change it, for they could not invest the General Assembly with powers which the Charter had not conferred upon it and they could not deprive the signatory States of a sovereignty which they had not abdicated. The draft resolution adopted at the previous meeting would therefore remain a dead letter.

10. The Belgian argument that all non-self-governing peoples were entitled to be treated fairly and protected against abuses, and that all States which possessed territories inhabited by peoples who did not administer themselves were obliged, under Article 73 e of the Charter, to supply certain information to the Secretary-General, had never been refuted. In an effort to do so the Guatemalan representative had quoted the views expressed at the San Francisco Conference by the Greek and United Kingdom representatives, but individual opinions could not stand against the clear statement in the Charter. No real defence had been put up against the irrefutable case developed in paragraphs 59 et seq. of the Belgian memorandum of 30 April 1953 (A/AC.67/2).

11. If the Charter was applied in the letter and the spirit, there would be nothing alarming in the Belgian argument. All men were entitled to fair treatment and protection from abuse merely as human beings, even had that right never been laid down in the Charter. All civilized States had recognized that right in Article 23 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. Even those States which now claimed not to have recognized it in the Charter would never dare to admit that they had ceased to believe in it and that they wished to deprive their indigenous populations of an international safeguard which they had formerly recognized. All civilized States which administered indigenous populations had set up for their protection services which published reports. The Charter did not require such States, nor were they being asked, to inform the General Assembly of their political difficulties. All that was being asked of them and all that the Charter did require was that they should extract from those reports certain statistical and other information of a technical character relating to economic, social and cultural matters and communicate it officially to the Secretary-General.

12. It was hard to see how such an argument could be unacceptable to any sovereign State. If certain States did reject it it was because they wished to impose on those few Powers which had recognized and were fulfilling their obligations, an abusive interpretation of the Charter which they would not accept in their own cases. However, logic had its own inviolable laws. What was true in the Committee did not become false outside it. Although the decisions taken at the two preceding meetings would not achieve their aim, they would nevertheless have certain repercussions which might prove very different from what had been intended. The extraordinary theories which those decisions implied—the oneness of self-government and independence, the right of secession presented as being inherent in the right of peoples to self-determination, the exclusive competence of the Assembly to decide when a territory ceased to fall within the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter—might cause some amusement in legal circles, and their sponsors might possibly have refused to uphold them elsewhere than in the Fourth Committee. Nevertheless, they had been upheld, and those delegations which had upheld them in the Committee could expect to have them quoted against them in other circumstances. If the factors which had been adopted as criteria were valid, they were so in all countries, not only in the colonial territories. If they could be used to decide when a State could cease to transmit information, they could also be used to decide when a State should start to transmit such information. If the Assembly was competent, it was so in regard to all States and not only in regard to the colonial Powers.

13. Certain members of the Committee had affirmed in a roll-call vote that the right of the colonial peoples to self-determination included the right of secession. Some governments might well fail to applaud the votes cast in the Committee by their representatives. It was doubtful whether they would confirm them when they had weighed the consequences and when each of them was called upon to assume its responsibilities in the General Assembly. The colonial territories were not the only places where there were peoples subject to a State which they had not chosen and from which they would gladly secede. When such peoples demanded the application of the principles implied in the votes in favour of the list of factors and the amended draft resolution, they would be told that of course the principles applied only to the peoples of "superior" territories and not to peoples living within the continental frontiers of a sovereign State. They might well fail to appreciate the fine shade of meaning. There were many States in which national minorities demanded a certain degree of self-government. They would learn from the resolution that there was no real self-government outside total independence. Henceforth, they might not be content merely to claim self-government. He reminded the members of the Committee of the proverb "Who sows the wind, reaps the whirlwind". Those who had voted for the amended draft resolution were sowing the wind, and when the whirlwind blew it would be too late to disclaim responsibility.

14. Mr. FRAZAO (Brazil) wished to explain the reason for his negative vote on the amendments to his delegation's draft resolution, in order to avoid any possibility of misunderstanding.

15. During the debate he had pointed out that there was no fundamental difference with regard to either principle or purpose between his delegation and the authors of the amendments. That was proved by the fact that the Brazilian delegation had accepted the additional paragraph of the preamble concerning the competence of the General Assembly in the implementation of obligations arising from Chapter XI of the Charter (A/C.4/L.273, amendment 1).

16. With regard to the other amendments, however, the Brazilian delegation had wished to show its preference for the manner in which it had defined the competence of the General Assembly in connexion with the cessation of the transmission of information and the principle of relativity which should condition the application of the list. Moreover, it did not consider that the text had been improved by the deletion of paragraph 4 of the operative part. It would have preferred to retain its own formulation of the right of peoples to self-determination as the main postulate to which all other considerations must be subordinated. Furthermore, it felt that the drafting of paragraphs 5 and 6 of the amended text was not very happy. Paragraph 5 repeated the idea embodied in paragraph 4 of the Brazilian text. Paragraph 6 contained an expression of opinion as to the value of two forms of self-government. The drafting implied a certain prejudice against any form of association and might be interpreted as meaning that the Committee condemned such association and would prefer that the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories should not choose it. The cessation of the transmission of information on the grounds that the territory reported on had attained a footing of absolute equality was possible in only three situations: union; federation of the classic type; and the Commonwealth as it existed today, since at one stage in its evolution the Dominions had not possessed absolute equality with the United Kingdom. There was therefore a contradiction in the text adopted. According to paragraph 6 a territory might become self-governing by association with another State if it were done on the basis of absolute equality. That provision would however exclude incorporation or integration in a federation, since when States signed a federal pact their legal personality became subordinate to that of the union. It could not therefore be said that integration in an existing union would be on a footing of equality. Nor did the paragraph admit the possibility of another type of integration: that in a unitary State. He would not, however, go into that question.

17. He thought he had sufficiently explained the apprehensions with which the Brazilian delegation viewed the amended text. He had wished to voice his disapproval of the hasty manner in which the Committee had radically altered the list of factors. In admitting its draft resolution the Brazilian delegation had wished to take advantage of the compromise reached in the Ad Hoc Committee. It would have been desirable for the Administering Members willing to accept a list of factors. True, they had not been very favourable to the Ad Hoc Committee's list, but they could not reject it since they had helped to draw it up. A resolution supported by them would have had great force. The Brazilian text, in spite of opposition from some quarters, would have secured a large majority in favour of the list. That opportunity had been thrown away.

18. The Committee had not been justified, in the light of past experience, in thinking that it would be able to improve within the space of a few days on the results of three years' work. It had abandoned the prudence with which it had begun the study and classification of factors. In 1952 representatives on the Fourth Committee had reserved their position on the question until their governments had had time to consider the list. At the 330th meeting decisions of far-reaching importance had been taken. The Brazilian delegation had felt that the list of factors had been sufficiently considered and that it would be better for the time being to let the question rest in view of the danger of serious dissension. The Ad Hoc Committee had shared that view, as had two-thirds of the speakers in the general debate. Then there had been an abrupt change and a number of speakers had taken the opposite view. The Brazilian delegation had been unable to follow that change of direction and had not had time to consult its Government with regard to the proposed amendments, which required study and consideration. It had taken no further part in the debate; it had not even intimated that it regarded the Indian amendment (A/C.4/L.277) as a substantive one. The last chance of conciliation had been lost when the Committee had refused to consider the United States amendment (A/C.4/L.276).

19. With reference to the statement made earlier by the Belgian representative, he was surprised that such a thesis should be defended at the present stage. He would not, for the time being, deal with the Belgian representative's conclusions, either from the legal point of view or from that of the Charter, but would return to the question when the Committee discussed the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/2465).

20. Mr. SHTOKALO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) reminded the Committee that on 2 October (at the 324th meeting) his delegation had stated that although the first part of the list of factors required elucidation, it was nevertheless acceptable, but that the factors in the second and third parts of the list were not such as would further the aims and purposes of the Committee. Those factors did not relate to the achievement of self-government and independence but to association with the metropolitan country or with other countries. Such factors could only play into the hands of the colonial Powers, who wished to determine the destinies of the Non-Self-Governing Territories without outside control. The Ukrainian delegation had therefore voted for the first part of the list and against the second and third parts. It had also voted against the relevant paragraphs of the Brazilian draft resolution and the draft resolution as a whole, and the relevant paragraphs of the various amendments.

21. Mr. FERNANDEZ (Uruguay) said that he had supported all the amendments proposed by the eleven Powers (A/C.4/L.273) which in his opinion made the text of the draft resolution on factors clear and precise and brought it within the juridical framework of the Charter.

22. Mr. L. S. BOKHARI (Pakistan) said he had favoured the Brazilian draft resolution on the grounds that it was conciliatory and should be acceptable to the Administering Members. However, the debate had shown that those Members were opposed to its operative clauses. Hence he had voted for most of the amendments submitted by the eleven Powers, since he had no serious objections of principle to them. Nevertheless he felt that the draft resolution as finally approved had no chance of a smooth passage through the General Assembly.

23. Despite its affirmative vote, his delegation still hoped that the Committee would find a way to avoid a deadlock and reach a compromise between the administering and the non-administering Powers. He appealed to both groups to reconsider their attitude. His delegation firmly believed that decisions reached in a spirit of goodwill and co-operation would be more useful than decisions forced on the Administering Members in the face of their determined opposition.

24. Mr. KAISR (Czechoslovakia) said that Chapter XI of the Charter was a clear directive to all Member States to accept as a sacred trust the obligation to promote to the utmost the welfare and political aspirations of the dependent peoples, and only those factors could be accepted which faithfully reflected unconditional respect for the freely-expressed will of the peoples and their desire for true and full independence.

25. His delegation had voted for the first part of the list of factors and the amendments (A/C.4/L.274) thereto because it believed that they would assist the Non-Self-Governing Territories in their struggle to achieve self-government and independence. The second and third parts of the list, however, did not strengthen the principles affirmed in the first part but, on the contrary, weakened them; he had therefore voted against those parts of the list and against most of the amendments relating to them. The sincere desire for complete independence was the universal characteristic of all national liberation movements, which never sought any form of association with the metropolitan Powers. Hence, it was absurd that the second and third parts of the list of factors should legalize such an association. Even with the eleven-Power amendments, those parts of the list would still permit outside intervention in the domestic affairs of territories and would constitute a dangerous instrument in the hands of the administering Powers and help them to prolong the reign of colonial oppression in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

26. His delegation had accepted eight paragraphs of the Brazilian draft resolution and the amendments relating to those paragraphs, but it had voted against those parts of the draft resolution and of the amendments which implied approval of the list of factors and against the amended draft resolution as a whole.

27. Mr. ESPINOSA Y PRIETO (Mexico) announced that the eleven delegations that had sponsored the amendments to the list of factors and the Brazilian draft resolution had submitted an explanatory statement which would be circulated as a conference room paper.

28. Mrs. BOLTON (United States of America) said that her delegation shared the regret expressed by the representatives of Brazil and Pakistan, among others, at the Committee's hasty and ill-considered decisions at its two previous meetings. Those decisions would not help the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and would jeopardize the co-operation and harmony which had, in the past, made the Committee an effective instrument for promoting the welfare of those peoples. Her Government did its utmost to fulfil its Charter obligations with regard to the Non-Self-Governing Territories under its administration.

29. Mr. LYNKOV (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that his delegation had always maintained that the first part of the list of factors was acceptable but that the second and third parts were not, since they would not protect the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories or ensure their independence and sovereignty. He had voted against the fourth paragraph of the preamble and paragraphs 2, 3 and 7 of the Brazilian draft resolution and the relevant amendments and against the draft resolution as a whole, because his favourable vote would have signified approval of the list of factors. For the same reasons, he had also voted against the list of factors and the amendments thereto.

30. Mrs. MENON (India), speaking as Rapporteur of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, introduced the Committee's report (A/2465). The Committee's work had been marked by a spirit of harmony and co-operation and both parts of the report had been adopted unanimously.

31. Two draft resolutions were proposed for the consideration of the General Assembly, one on educational conditions and one on the association of representatives from Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee on Information. They would be found in annex II to part one of the report. The Committee had adopted a third resolution, on the cessation of the transmission of information on Puerto Rico, which formed an integral part of the Committee's report (A/2465, part one, para. 67). It had been adopted with no opposition and three abstentions. It was submitted to the General Assembly for information only.

32. A real attempt had been made to study the problems sincerely and the new spirit of conciliation was particularly apparent in the draft resolution on the association of indigenous representatives in the Committee's work. There was still far to go, however, before the ideals of Chapter XI would be realized, and she appealed to the members of the Fourth Committee for constructive co-operation.

33. Mr. LOOMES (Australia), speaking as Chairman of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, commended the Committee's report to the Fourth Committee. The Committee had carried out its detailed study of educational conditions on the basis of the summaries and analyses prepared by the Secretariat from the information transmitted by the Administering Members. A number of excellent studies had been submitted by the United Nations Secretariat¹ and by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization, the International Labour Organisation and the World Health Organization. The Committee had also profited from the presence of educational experts on the delegations of some of the Administering Members. The discussions throughout had been cordial and co-operative, although some divergence of views had become apparent on the question of associating representatives from the territories in the work of the Committee. There too, however, it had ultimately proved possible to reconcile the various points of view to a very large extent. The draft resolution in question had been adopted by 12 votes to one, with 2 abstentions. The draft resolution on educational conditions had been adopted unanimously.

The meeting rose at 11.55 a.m.

1514 (XV). Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples

The General Assembly,

Mindful of the determination proclaimed by the peoples of the world in the Charter of the United Nations to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom,

Conscious of the need for the creation of conditions of stability and well-being and peaceful and friendly relations based on respect for the principles of equal rights and self-determination of all peoples, and of universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

Recognizing the passionate yearning for freedom in all dependent peoples and the decisive role of such peoples in the attainment of their independence,

Aware of the increasing conflicts resulting from the denial of or impediments in the way of the freedom of such peoples, which constitute a serious threat to world peace,

Considering the important role of the United Nations in assisting the movement for independence in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories,

Recognizing that the peoples of the world ardently desire the end of colonialism in all its manifestations,

Convinced that the continued existence of colonialism prevents the development of international economic co-operation, impedes the social, cultural and economic development of dependent peoples and militates against the United Nations ideal of universal peace,

Affirming that peoples may, for their own ends, freely dispose of their natural wealth and resources without prejudice to any obligations arising out of international economic co-operation, based upon the principle of mutual benefit, and international law,

Believing that the process of liberation is irresistible and irreversible and that, in order to avoid serious crises, an end must be put to colonialism and all practices of segregation and discrimination associated therewith,

Welcoming the emergence in recent years of a large number of dependent territories into freedom and independence, and recognizing the increasingly powerful trends towards freedom in such territories which have not yet attained independence, ³⁶ Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifteenth Session, Supplement No. 2 (A/4494).

Convinced that all peoples have an inalienable right to complete freedom, the exercise of their sovereignty and the integrity of their national territory,

Solemnly proclaims the necessity of bringing to a speedy and unconditional end colonialism in all its forms and manifestations;

And to this end

Declares that:

1. The subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights, is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and is an impediment to the promotion of world peace and co-operation.

2. All peoples have the right to self-determination; by virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.

3. Inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence.

4. All armed action or repressive measures of all kinds directed against dependent peoples shall cease in order to enable them to exercise peacefully and freely their right to complete independence, and the integrity of their national territory shall be respected.

5. Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, without any distinction as to race, creed or colour, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom.

6. Any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country is incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

7. All States shall observe faithfully and strictly the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the present Declaration on the basis of equality, non-interference in the internal affairs of all States, and respect for the sovereign rights of all peoples and their territorial integrity.

colonial countries and peoples 981

AGENDA ITEM 87

Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples

1. Mr. ZORIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (translated from Russian): We, the representatives of almost one hundred States of the world, have gathered here to consider and take an historic decision on a question of vital importance for the whole world, the question of the final and complete liquidation of the colonial system and the liberation of all colonial countries and peoples.

2. Our descendants, when studying the development of human society, will have every justification for calling the middle of the twentieth century, after the great October Socialist Revolution, a significant epoch of construction of a new world, a world of freedom and independence of peoples.

3. The destruction of the most shameful phenomenon in the life of mankind, colonialism, has become the sign of our times. During the lifetime of our generation the colonial system has suffered crushing blows. Since the Second World War, India, Indonesia, Burma, Ceylon, Cambodia, the United Arab Republic, Iraq, Morocco, Tunisia, Ghana, Guinea and many other countries have thrown off the domination of the colonialists. In 1960 alone, seventeen new States have burst their colonial bonds and gained independence. Now 1,500 million people, but lately languishing in colonial bondage, are following the path of national regeneration.

4. The liberation struggle has changed the entire face of modern Asia. Tremendous, indeed historic, changes have taken and are still taking place on the African continent. Profound processes of national liberation are going on in the countries of Latin America, whose peoples are rising with ever-increasing resolution to fight imperialism. Close at hand now is the complete collapse of the whole colonial system of imperialism, foreseen by the best minds of mankind and predicted by the great Vladimir Ilyich Lenin.

5. But colonialism is not yet dead. Not all States and peoples by any means have liberated themselves from colonial oppression and enslavement.

6. Even those which have become independent are far from having done away with colonial domination, with the attempts of the colonialists to regain their lost positions, as is graphically shown by recent events in the Congo, which have been the subject of heated discussion in the General Assembly.

7. There are still many countries in Asia, Africa, Latin America and Oceania that are languishing under the yoke of foreign usurpers. It would be a delusion to consider the struggle against the colonialists as ended. One has only to glance at a map of the world to see scattered upon it, like so many birth-marks of the past, the remains of the ruined colonial empires where the colonialists still succeed in keeping tens of millions of people in slavery. There, colonial wars continue to take their bloody toll. Hundreds and thousands of patriots, fighting for the freedom of their peoples, are confined in prisons and concentration camps there. As a result of the plundering carried out by the colonialists in the colonies, it is there that are to be found, side by side, the longest working day and the lowest standard of living, the highest illiteracy rate, the lowest expectancy of life and the highest mortality rate among the population. Repulsive racial discrimination, which insults and degrades the dignity of man, is practised there in its worst forms.

8. Can the United Nations and its Member States acquiesce in this? Who but we should speak out for the complete and prompt elimination of colonialism in all its forms and manifestations and thus fulfil the task entrusted to us of reaffirming faith in human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equality of rights of all nations great and small?

9. On 23 September 1960 [869th meeting], the Chairman of the delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Nikita Sergeevitch Khrushchev, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR, expressing the will of millions of Soviet people, submitted a Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples [A/4502 and Corr.1] for consideration by the United Nations General Assembly at its fifteenth session.

[The speaker then read the text of document A/4502 and Corr.1.1/]

10. The extreme importance of the problem of liberating the peoples and countries still remaining under colonial domination should be obvious to all. The time has come to make an end of colonialism and free mankind from this shameful vestige of the past.

11. Statements to this effect have been made at this session of the General Assembly by Prime Minister Nehru of India [880th meeting], President Nasser of the United Arab Republic [873rd meeting], President Sukarno of the Republic of Indonesia [880th meeting], President Nkrumah of Ghana [869th meeting], Prime Minister Castro of Cuba [872nd meeting], President Sékou Touré of the Republic of Guinea [903rd meeting], Mr. Shukairy, Chairman of the Saudi Arabian delegation [879th meeting], and many other representatives.

12. Speaking in this chamber on 12 October 1960 [902nd meeting], Mr. Khrushchev, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR, emphasized that the General Assembly should be fully aware that unless the most urgent measures are taken colonialism is capable of inflicting much more suffering and loss, ruining many more millions of lives and spawning armed conflicts and wars, creating a threat to peace and security not only in certain quarters of the globe but all over the world.

13. The Soviet delegation regards as a good and encouraging sign the unanimous decision of the General Assembly [903rd meeting] to discuss the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples in plenary meeting, that is to say, in the highest forum of the United Nations. This decision can be considered a new blow against colonialism, a new victory for the peace-loving forces in the great struggle for peace and the freedom of peoples.

14. The Soviet Union delegation expresses its firm belief that the fifteenth session of the General Assembly will become a historic landmark on the road to the complete and final liquidation of colonialism and that 1960 will rightfully be called not only the "year of Africa" but also the year of the liberation from colonial slavery of all peoples wherever they lived—in Africa, Asia, Latin America, anywhere in the world.

15. The Declaration submitted by the Soviet Government is a document containing a programme for the struggle for the liberation of all colonial peoples. It defines the principal tasks and indicates the general approach to the solution of this historic problem. We are convinced that the peoples of all continents and all delegations to this session that are anxious for a speedy and radical solution of the historic task of liquidating the shameful colonial system will support this Declaration and its humanitarian, progressive principles as a noble and powerful appeal for the complete liberation of mankind from the shameful past, for the complete freedom and independence of all colonial peoples.

16. Mr. ORMSBY-GORE (United Kingdom): I think my first duty should be to congratulate Mr. Zorin on a very accurate reading of document A/4502, submitted by Mr. Khrushchev on 23 September 1960. I followed the text, which I had read two months ago, and I found his rendering clear and faultless, but I am bound to say that I did not find it any more helpful or constructive than when I first read it for myself two months ago.

17. When the delegation of the Soviet Union asked for the inscription on our agenda of the item which we are now considering, "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples", I had hoped that the debate upon it could be made the occasion of a serious discussion of the ways in which we can all help to realize the aspirations of those peoples who do not yet enjoy what is described in the Charter of the United Nations as a "full measure of self-government". This is an aspect of world affairs with which we in the United Kingdom have for long been vitaly concerned. We know the great force of nationalism in the world today. We have seen how the achievement of independence has given to the many millions of people for whose administration we were once responsible the incentive to develop their own countries with added energy and vigour. We have seen how it has given them the opportunity by taking their place here in the United Nations to serve the world community and the interests of international peace and security. The example of the new nations, great and small, of Africa and Asia has been a great stimulus to us in the common effort which we share with the people of the dependent territories which still remain. It has spurred us forward in our policy of helping them build strong and vigorous nations, undivided by tribal, ideological or racial strife and imbued with the strength which only freedom and prosperity can give.

18. I have been shocked, as I am sure many representatives have been, by the manner in which the Soviet delegation and its friends have sought to pervert for their own purposes the deeply and genuinely felt desire for independence of so many millions of people—a desire which is supported and applauded by the great majority of mankind. Both in the document which Mr. Zorin read out to us this morning, in which the Soviet delegation asked for the inscription of this item, and in the speech with which the Soviet representative opened this debate, there is no sign of recognition of the facts of the situation which they have caricatured. Their only purpose seems to be to generate hatred rather than friendship, violence rather than peace, and chaos rather than order.

19. The representative of the Soviet Union appears to wish to use this debate simply as another occasion for vilifying my country and other Administering Powers and for carrying the cold war into Africa, in the hope that perhaps it can there be hotted up to his advantage. I must warn him that if I chose to follow suit, I would have much better ammunition than he has. Since 1939, some 500 million people, formerly under British rule, have achieved freedom and independence, and their representatives sit here. In that same period, the whole or part of six countries, with a population of 22 million, have been forcibly incorporated into the Soviet Union; they include the world's three newest colonies; Lithuania, Estonia and Latvia. In addition the Soviet Union exercises economic, political and military domination over millions of other men and women in neighbouring countries. Countless efforts have been made by national movements in countries under Russian control to gain independence. All have been suppressed. In Central Asia, we have seen examples of a colonial policy which, as Mr. Khrushchev himself told us at great length earlier in the session [869th meeting], has in material terms been an outstanding success. He did not tell us of the mass deportations of populations and the ruthless suppression of nationalities which went with it. I shall not harrow the feelings of this Assembly by reciting the whole grisly catalogue; one or two examples must suffice. The so-called German Autonomous Republic was abolished by a stroke of the pen and the Volga Germans who inhabited it were removed to various localities in the East. This populous group was thus scattered and liquidated as a community. Again, the entire populations of the Crimean Tatar, Kalmyk and Chechen "Autonomous" Soviet Socialist Republics, amounting with some smaller communities to nearly a million people...

20. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the Soviet Union on a point of order. Perhaps the speaker at the rostrum would kindly stand aside while I deal with the point.

21. Mr. ZORIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (translated from Russian): Mr. President, in the statement I just made I did not say one word about the United Kingdom; I did not speak about that country at all.

22. The United Kingdom representative, however, has just attempted to start a discussion of the internal affairs of the Soviet Union. This is a violation of the generally accepted principle that governs the work of this Assembly. I ask you, Mr. President, to protect the delegation of the Soviet Union and the delegations of other countries against attempts to intervene in the Soviet Union's internal affairs.

23. It is perfectly natural that the United Kingdom representative should have nothing to say about the "beneficent" effect the United Kingdom is having on the colonial territories under what he called its "administration". There is, of course, nothing favourable that he can say in that connexion. However, attempts at intervention in the internal affairs of the Soviet Union are inadmissible; we must protest against them and regard the use of such methods of discussion as utterly illegal.

24. The United Kingdom representative said that he wanted to avoid the cold war, but he was the first to take this line in speaking from this rostrum. If he continues in the same vein he will receive an appropriate answer both from the Soviet Union and from the other countries that are anxious to discuss the liquidation of the colonial régimes existing in the territories dependent upon the colonial Powers, but will not permit intervention in the affairs of the peoples that exist and act in freedom within the framework of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries.

25. The PRESIDENT: The point of order raised by the representative of the Soviet Union places the Chair in somewhat of a difficulty. As all delegations here are aware, charges and accusations of the kind against which the representative of the Soviet Union has just protested have become only too common coin in our discussions here in the Assembly. They are not confined to any one delegation or to any one group of delegations. They are made indifferently by many delegations.

26. The purport of all charges and accusations of this type, and in many cases their actual substance, is the same. It is impossible for the Chair to discriminate between them. To rule some of them out of order and others not would involve the Chair in a series of arbitrary judgements which it would be impossible to justify. To rule them all out of order might rightfully be regarded as an undue restriction of the right of free expression. In these circumstances, the primary responsibility falls on delegations themselves. Charges and accusations of the kind complained of rarely add force to argument and do much to lower the tone of the Assembly's debates. I would appeal, therefore, to the good judgement and the good sense of delegations to refrain from making these charges and accusations gratuitously and, by so doing, to help to keep the tone of this debate on a level in keeping with the importance of the subject matter.

27. I would ask the representative of the United Kingdom kindly to continue.

28. Mr. ORMSBY-GORE (United Kingdom): Mr. President, of course I will bow to your ruling.

29. I felt that we had certain charges made against us. We had been called robbers; we had been told that we indulged in ceaseless carnage, and so on. I did not think the words that I had used in reference to the Soviet Union should have made Mr. Zorin oversensitive. But I am aware that the Soviet delegation does not like discussion here of certain aspects of their home policy, nor does the Soviet Government facilitate the publication by the free Press of the world of the facts about it. Very well; we have to accept that.

30. It is a tragic fact that there is little which we in the United Nations can do to help these people under Soviet domination, and it would be no service to the peoples of the rest of the world who are passionately concerned about their own desire for independence to play the Soviet game, to answer them back in their own kind and thus to allow the affairs of Africa and Asia to become lost underneath a barrage of charges and counter charges. All I ask is that the United Nations machinery for dealing with Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, and the structure of co-operation which has been built up over the years, should not be destroyed by the unconstructive and irresponsible assaults of the Soviet delegation and their friends. For this reason, I do not propose to waste further time on the draft declaration on this subject put forward by the Government of the Soviet Union.

31. On the subject of colonialism, my Government will listen with the greatest attention to the voices of Africa and Asia; but we see no reason why our serious discussions on this great subject should be degraded by the calumnies and distortions which are the stock in trade of the greatest oppressor of our day.

32. I am heartened that the African and Asian Members of the United Nations do not appear themselves to regard the Soviet contribution to our debates as a particularly serious one, and that they intend to put forward a draft declaration of their own. Let me say at once that the United Kingdom delegation is in entire sympathy with what I know to be the feelings and the main purposes of these delegations, the achievement with all possible speed of full self-government and independence by those people who do not yet enjoy these things. If we have sometimes had differences of opinion on this question, these have been differences of method and sometimes of timing; they are not differences of intention. They are differences which can be discussed between Member States, speaking as equals and speaking in good faith, speaking, in fact, as those who have the same goals in view.

33. Let us look objectively at the nature of the problem. We hear a lot in the United Nations and elsewhere of the fact that colonialism is dying or that it is disappearing. Of course it is, in those parts of the world where we and those who think like us bear responsibility. It is dying in the sense that the Phoenix died, dying at the moment of its greatest glory, when it gives birth to new nations. Indeed, in the sense that colonialism involved the permanent subjection of one people to another, it was already accepted as an out-of-date political relationship by all those who, like the United Kingdom, subscribed without reservation to Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter and have since honoured it in practice.

34. I find it hard to improve upon the terms of Article 73 of the Charter as a description of the British concept of the modern colonial relationship, which is, by definition, a living and constantly evolving one and one which, by its very nature, must be rapidly replaced by something new. Let me quote a few passages from this article. We, the United Kingdom Government, as an original Member of the United Nations, "recognize the principle that the interests of the inhabitants" of the Non-Self-Governing Territories "are paramount". We "accept as a sacred trust the obligation to promote to the utmost...the well-being of the inhabitants of these territories". We undertake "to ensure, with due respect for the culture of the peoples concerned, their political, economic, social and educational advancement". In this connexion, I notice that Mr. Krishna Menon of India observed in committee the other day that we have never tried to turn other people into Englishmen. Moreover, we undertake "to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions, according to the particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples and their varying stages of advancement".

35. These obligations we have honoured, and the manner in which we have done so is known to all the world. I think it is fair to say that the speed with which we have developed self-government has been remarkable, in the light of the expectations of the world in 1946. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories has just reviewed the progress made in these territories during the first ten years. It has observed, and rightly:

"The aspirations of peoples towards self-government or independence have too often far outstripped the pace of their economic and social advancement..."

[A/4371, part two, para. 24.]

36. This is true. Economic and social progress, though steady, has nowhere been as spectacular as political progress. This does not mean that political progress must be slowed down. Far from it. No one can deny that political advance is affected by the success of economic and social policy, but independence cannot be delayed until all economic and social problems are solved. Nor, of course, are these problems solved automatically by independence, and there are other items on our agenda which call attention to the need for the United Nations to continue to expand its work in the newly independent States to help them tackle and solve the problems which remain.

37. Let us look for a moment at the facts and figures of this political progress. It is people that we are concerned with, and not just territories; so the figures I will give are figures of population. The 450 million or so people who lived in India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Burma, all achieved independence after the war. Not counting these, the total population of the Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories of the world was in 1946 approximately 225 million. Ten years later it had fallen to approximately 125 million, a figure which included a natural population increase in the remaining territories of about 25 million over the period. Since 1956, the pace has further speeded up, and roughly another 75 million have achieved their independence, all of them in Africa. That is to say that, as regards people living outside the Soviet empire, 650 million have achieved complete independence in the past fifteen years. The only people living within the Soviet empire who have gained their freedom are the few millions who have escaped from it as refugees. Of those who remain in dependent territories, about 40 million live in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories for which the United Kingdom is responsible. As far as we are concerned, these are the people whom this debate is about.

38. But in these, too, progress towards independence is extremely rapid. Over two million of them live in Sierra Leone, where, according to the representative of the Soviet Union speaking at the beginning of this session, "the struggle for liberation still goes on". This particular "struggle" can best be described as a figment of the Soviet imagination, over-heated perhaps by the perusal of out-of-date Marxist text-books and the incantation of worn-out Leninist slogans. In fact, the people of Sierra Leone know perfectly well that they will be independent in five months' time. The distinguished Sierra Leonean Minister, who is already concerning himself with problems of foreign affairs, was here in New York a few weeks ago studying the problems of United Nations representation for a small country. Many delegations met him. Three million more of these people live in the Federation of the West Indies, which will also, without doubt, be independent in the near future. Nine million more live in Tanganyika, the biggest territory for which the United Kingdom remains responsible and where, according to the representative of the Soviet Union, there has been "unending carnage". There has been nothing of the sort. Instead, there has been an inspiring example of harmony between all communities in the Territory, a harmony which has already brought it to the verge of independence, with a peaceful and exciting future before it. In response to a request from Mr. Julius Nyerere, Chief Minister of Tanganyika, the United Kingdom proposes to introduce, later in this very session of the General Assembly, a draft resolution designed to terminate the Trusteeship Agreement for Tanganyika on its attainment of independence, with effect from a date to be agreed between the United Kingdom Government and the elected leaders of Tanganyika. No one can doubt that that date will not be far away; at least, it is not doubted in Tanganyika or in the United Kingdom. So, proceeding at their own pace and in their own way, the way of co-operation and statesmanship, the people of Tanganyika are blazing the trail for the rest of East Africa.

39. What, then, are the problems which remain? What is so different about the remaining territories, the ones which I have not mentioned, which prevents them from acceding to immediate independence? There are, I think, two different kinds of problem; they differ according to the circumstances of the territories concerned. The first kind concerns territories which are small and sometimes isolated. There are no fewer than twenty-nine Non-Self-Governing Territories now under United Kingdom administration which have a population of under one million each. Fourteen of these have a population of less than 100,000. The people of these small territories have to think carefully about their future. There are many factors, different in each case, which may cause their people to hesitate about separate independence. They may be isolated geographically, with an economy barely sufficient to meet the expanding needs of their people. These people may have no wish to sacrifice the economic and social progress to which they are entitled in order to assume responsibility for maintaining the expensive apparatus of a modern independent State.

40. Alternatively, in some cases the people of these territories feel—justly or unjustly—threatened by a large and powerful neighbour. They fear that their independence might not long endure and that they might, unprotected, lose the political freedom which they now enjoy.

41. The people of these small territories deserve our consideration just as much as those who live in the great States of the world. They each have their own peculiar political problems, and we in the United Kingdom consider it as our solemn obligation, in accordance with Article 73 b of the Charter, to work out with the people concerned the form of independence which will best satisfy their aspirations.

42. The other day the Fourth Committee adopted, by a majority of 62 to 3,^{2/} a draft resolution [A/C.4/L.648 and Add.1] approving twelve principles, which are to serve as a guide to Member States in determining whether they are under an obligation to transmit information to the Secretary-General in respect of particular territories in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter. Principles VI, VII, VIII and IX refer to the circumstances in which such territories can be said to have reached a full measure of self-government. I will read out Principle VI:

"A non-Self-Governing Territory can be said to have reached a full measure of self-government by:"

- "(a) Emergence as a sovereign independent State;
- "(b) Free association with an independent State; or
- "(c) Integration with an independent State".

43. Principles VII, VIII and IX go on, very properly, to define with some care the circumstances in which free association or integration is acceptable as full self-government.

44. An important point in these principles is that the free and voluntary choice of such a status by the people concerned must be the result—and I use the words of the draft resolution—of "informed and democratic processes". Now, these processes take time; although perhaps, in comparison with an earlier age, not much time.

45. The United Kingdom is doing all it can to hurry on the processes of self-government as fast as possible, but it would surely be a betrayal of the whole spirit of Chapter XI of the Charter for us to say that the people of, for example, the Seychelles Islands, or the Gilbert Islands, should decide immediately what form they wish their ultimate independence to take; or, to take other examples, the people of Basutoland or Hong Kong.

46. So much for the smaller territories; let us look now at the nature of the problems in the larger territories which are still dependent. These are perhaps more important in the eyes of most Members of the United Nations. They contain more people and they are in Africa.

47. Here I must return to the theme which I stated earlier. Every action of the United Kingdom in regard to these territories is directed towards the building of new nations, nations which will be united and free, and through which the people can realize their aspirations for peace, independence, prosperity and individual freedom. It is of fundamental importance to the future peace and prosperity of Africa that the countries of that continent should retain their integrity, and that their independence should not be followed by civil war and economic collapse.

48. In these last few years, during which we still retain a direct responsibility for these territories, we are framing our policy in such a way that the different tribes and communities who inhabit these territories can learn confidence and trust in each other. Working all the time with the people, we are trying to ensure, before the date of independence is determined, that the new States will command the loyalty and the energies of all tribes, all communities alike.

49. We think that this has already been achieved in Tanganyika. In the neighbouring territories in this region of Africa certain fears still remain. The process is a delicate one. There are groups in all these countries, sometimes African, sometimes European, sometimes Asian, who fear that independence when it comes will hurt them. The task is to dispel this fear, as similar fears have been dispelled in countries which have already achieved independence.

50. In these territories, there is no argument about the right of the people to independence; there is no argument whether the people will be independent or not. Certainly they will. The only question is when, and the answer must be, just as soon as there can be confidence that the new nations will thrive, and that their independence will be really effective and have real meaning and will not be sapped by internal strife or external pressure. The people of these countries want independence in the form which suits them, and not according to some ideological pattern imposed on them from outside. They want to avoid violence and chaos, for these things bring with them outside pressure and interference.

51. It is our obligation to see that they achieve their genuine aspirations and to help them frustrate those who wish them ill. In this I am confident that we shall have the support of the great majority of the Members of the United Nations. I only wish that we could have the support of all of them.

52. In view of some of the things which have been said during this Assembly, I should like to emphasize once again that the policy of the United Kingdom in those parts of Africa for which we are responsible is a non-racial policy, as indeed it is elsewhere in the world. To quote the words used by the United Kingdom representative, Mr. Selwyn Lloyd, from this rostrum at the fourteenth session, on 17 September 1959:

"In those territories where different races or tribes live side by side, the task is to ensure that all the people may enjoy security and freedom and the chance to contribute as individuals to the progress and well-being of these countries. We reject the idea of any inherent superiority of one race over another. Our policy therefore is non-racial; it offers a future in which Africans, Europeans, Asians, the peoples of the Pacific and others with whom we are concerned, will all play their full part as citizens in the countries where they live, and in which feelings of race will be submerged in loyalty to new nations." [798th meeting, para. 30.]

53. To sum up, we believe that the peoples of dependent territories should advance to self-government and independence as fast as is humanly possible. We believe that new nations should be strong and prosperous and at peace with themselves and their neighbours. We hold these beliefs because, to us, they are manifestly right, and because we know that the peoples of these countries ardently desire these things. But we also hold these beliefs because they are in our own interests, and indeed in the interests of every one of us represented in this Assembly. If the new nations are strong and peaceful, they have a great contribution to make to world peace, which is indivisible. If they are prosperous and dynamic in their progress, they have a great contribution to make to the raising of standards of living, to the development of world resources and to the progress and well-being of mankind as a whole. These are the deeply and sincerely held beliefs of the British people. For many years they have guided our actions toward the peoples of countries overseas. On them will continue to be founded our common efforts, until we have achieved the goals of our policy and they, the peoples of these countries, have realized their national aspirations.

54. Mr. CARDOSO (Congo, Leopoldville) (translated from French): It is painful for the delegation of the Congo to have to speak after a clash between two powerful delegations. It was not enough that we had to enter the United Nations through an emergency door; we also had to receive our baptism of fire.

55. However, Mr. President, we wish to thank you and all those who have made it possible for us to speak here.

56. On 22 November 1960 the General Assembly decided [924th meeting] that the representatives of the Republic of the Congo (Leopoldville) would not only be recognized here but would also have the right to speak. Having been unanimously admitted to membership in the United Nations on 20 September 1960 [864th meeting], the Republic of the Congo could no longer be denied the right to make its voice heard.

57. While all Members of the Organization have used and even abused the right to speak about the Congo, some of them going so far as to speak in its name, it must be acknowledged that this right belongs, in the first place, to the Congolese themselves. No one is better qualified to speak of the Congo than the Congolese, who are the first to suffer from the Government crisis which has lasted all too long.

58. The decision of 22 November gave international confirmation to the undisputed authority of our country's highest institution, the office of the Head of State. The Congolese people is resolved to defend all the institutions which it has freely chosen. Our Head of State, President Kasa-Vubu, who has been recalled to Leopoldville by duties which permit no delay, has asked me to convey to the General Assembly his regret that he could not himself express his satisfaction at the decision of 22 November, and he has asked me to read the following message to the Assembly:

"The Republic of the Congo fully appreciates the assistance which the United Nations has decided to afford it in this exceptionally difficult period of its history. It realizes how great are the sacrifices in men and money which several Member States are making in order to help bring about the successful solution of critical problems.

"In expressing the hope that this assistance will continue, I undertake, as Head of the Congolese State, to do everything in my power to make the best use of it for the sake of peace and progress in the Congo. More than any other country, the Congo needs national unity and agreement. At the proper time, all persons of good will who can contribute to this task will be called upon to do so."

59. That is the message from the President of our Republic. You must understand that the Congolese people, in its determination to free itself from imperialism in any form, is in the pay of no one. It is both futile and insulting to preach that any revolution which does not embrace a particular ideology must inevitably be condemned by history.

60. The dialectic whose intellectual legitimacy has never been acknowledged by some, does not seem to tolerate any surprise. The Congo, alas, is a country of surprises. Imperialists of all persuasions have opposed each other there and have all failed lamentably. The Congolese people has defeated colonialism once and for all. The colonialists of the West and East alike, too long accustomed to thinking of Africa as the perfect country for colonization, now seem bent on "decolonizing" it. In obedience to the wave of new ideas, they intend to "decolonize" at any cost, as if to ease their consciences. But Africa remains vigilant and refuses to be taken in by the pedlars of good intentions.

61. It was these same pedlars of good intentions who yesterday devastated our countries with the hateful slave-trade and with colonialism. They are the ones who today promise us the moon and the stars. They act as though they were dealing not only with economic and social under-development, but also with congenital intellectual under-development.

62. Africa, however, is on the alert to protect its freedom and cultural personality. All peaceful means will be used to promote the unity of Africa, and the magic of mere words and slogans will not prevail against it. Tomorrow Africa, one and indivisible, will release from colonialism the peoples still under arbitrary rule, for it cannot be the only continent of "decolonization". Tomorrow Africa will give the world a more human aspect, so that the true hope of mankind, to live in peace, may not be disappointed.

63. The PRESIDENT: I call upon the representative of China in exercise of the right of reply.

64. Mr. LIU (China): In the wild and far-ranging distortions in his statement, the representative of the Soviet Union made a reference to Taiwan against which, he said, "the United States has committed aggression". I did not wish at that moment to interrupt the orderly proceedings of the General Assembly by table-thumping or otherwise raising a point of order, but I ask for the floor now in my exercise of the right of reply to say that the United States military personnel on Taiwan are there by the invitation of my Government in connexion with my Government's programme of defence against communist aggression in that area. I need not add that no Soviet distortion can alter the fact that the Government of the Republic of China now based on Taiwan is an independent and sovereign Government, and it is utter falsehood to allege that the United States has committed aggression against China.

The meeting rose at 12.50 p.m.

AGENDA ITEM 87

Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial

1. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will continue its consideration of the item entitled "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples".

2. Before calling on the next speaker inscribed on my list, I give the floor to the representative of Portugal in exercise of his right of reply.

3. Mr. GARIN (Portugal): Mr. President, may I thank you for granting me the right of reply. It is for my delegation a matter of deep regret that the representative from the Soviet Union has thought it appropriate to blur this debate—a debate which should be solely concerned with the discussion of general principles and high ideals—by coming here and making remarks and statements which certainly are not a contribution to harmony and agreement. Indeed, the representative of the Soviet Union has made accusations which my delegation must reject categorically. It is not surprising that such vilifications should be made by the delegation of the Soviet Union: as we all know the delegation of the Soviet Union is always at its best when indulging in sub-standard propaganda, and when addressing to others certain accusations which more properly should be directed elsewhere, namely, to themselves.

4. My delegation strongly rejects and emphatically protests against the statements made in regard to Portugal by the representative of the Soviet Union. They are entirely baseless and, should the representative of the Soviet Union pretend to prove them, he would have to offer still more fabrications.

5. The Soviet representative accused my country of carrying out unending reprisals in the Portuguese Overseas Provinces and of practising forced labour, virtual slavery, colonial tyranny and the like. These are outrageous slanders and my delegation, on behalf of the Portuguese nation and its Government, vehemently denies such accusations and once again repudiates every one of them.

6. When the Soviet representative becomes intoxicated with the high sound of his irresponsible words—particularly when he feels that the Assembly will tolerate his verbal abuse of my country and Government—he is likely to stop at nothing for as long as he senses that this forum renders him a degree of immunity.

7. We take pride in the unceasing toil and work that for nearly five centuries of common history we have achieved overseas—it has been the work of maintaining order, organizing community life, promoting economic development, providing education at all levels, investing capital, and raising living standards. However, one thing is certain: at least, the progress and development which we brought and are still bringing into our Overseas Provinces was not and is not done by methods which are repugnant to the conscience of mankind nor by violations of human rights. We have not and we will not achieve progress through subjugation of peoples and territories, physical and moral slavery, complete political repression, deportations of people "en masse", forced migration, absolute lack of freedom—political or intellectual—constant threats against other nations and peoples, exploitation of the weak, and so on.

8. I hope that the Soviet representative will understand why I objected to his irresponsible remarks about Portugal. However, if he insists on fictitious and utterly unwarranted remarks about a so-called Portuguese colonialism, I will be compelled to return here in due course to remind him and to elaborate on a certain type of colonialism, which, I am sure, he is very familiar with.

9. Mr. NONG KIMNY (Cambodia) (translated from French): I have the honour to submit formally to the General Assembly the draft declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples contained in document A/L.323, on behalf of the delegations of Afghanistan, Burma, Cambodia, Ceylon, Chad, Ethiopia, Ghana, Guinea, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Morocco, Nepal, Nigeria, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Togo, Tunisia and Turkey.

10. Since the text was distributed, three other delegations—those of Cyprus, Mali and the United Arab Republic—have joined the co-sponsors [A/L.323/Add.1].

11. In submitting this draft declaration, we wish to inform the General Assembly that we have taken the greatest care in drafting it and giving it its final form. In preparing it we have tried, in particular, to find formulas and solutions which we hope will be acceptable to the great majority of delegations, if not to the entire General Assembly. The co-sponsors of the document therefore appeal to all delegations to consider it with open minds, as a means of putting an end to a situation which is now an anachronism in the history of mankind, the domination of one country by another and the exploitation of one people by another.

12. Since the historic Bandung Conference of 1955, enormous progress has been made in applying the principles laid down at that first meeting of the African-Asian countries. We are anxious that the present draft declaration should be yet another step forward in the irresistible process of the emancipation of peoples. We hope that all the countries concerned, especially those responsible for the future of the peoples who are still dependent, will see their way to support this declaration; and in our desire to ensure peaceful development and a bright future of freedom for all peoples who have not yet gained independence, we have kept the language used in our draft declaration strictly in conformity with that of the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

13. Since I am speaking now solely to submit our draft declaration formally, I have the honour to inform you that the co-sponsors reserve the right to speak again in order to present their views. I should also like to say that it seems probable that other delegations, which are now waiting for instructions from their Governments, will join us later as co-sponsors of the draft.

14. Mr. VAKIL (Iran) (translated from French): There is no doubt that the debate which began this morning is of exceptional historical importance. Colonialism is in its last throes, as a result of the irresistible and irreversible movement of peoples towards full emancipation; and here we are, the peoples of the United Nations, giving historic expression to this universal moment of truth.

15. It is a moment between a past of inequality and a glorious future, in which all peoples of the world seem resolved to re-establish human brotherhood, now won back at last, and to work together for their common happiness, on a footing of equality and the solidarity of free men.

16. As the representative of one of the oldest free and independent States in the world—though it is situated in a continent which has for long been ravaged by the curse of colonialism—I am deeply aware of the great honour it is for me to be able to put my country's views on the problem before us.

17. At this moment, when the victorious struggle of the colonial peoples has brought about the disintegration of the colonial system, and when more than forty-five countries have become independent since the establishment of the United Nations, over 100 million of our brothers and sisters are still experiencing the horrors of a system which has inflicted indescribable sufferings on dependent peoples.

18. Before I begin to discuss colonialism, it may be useful, I think, to try to define it. Colonialism might be defined as a political and economic system imposed and maintained by foreign Powers on the national territory of other peoples, its main feature in those territories being the arbitrary establishment of a system introduced from outside, without the consent of the peoples administered, and designed mainly to serve the interests of the administering Powers.

19. As this definition shows, one of the main features of colonialism has been the use of force with or without provocation, either brute force or force cleverly disguised in the best paternalistic traditions. We can say, without danger of partiality, that colonialism, stripped of its trappings, was a system established by force, and then developed, becoming more subtle, and even in a way, more humane, likewise by force and, I must add, a force designed primarily to hold up the development of the colonial peoples whenever development was not seen to be essential, in one way or another, to the development of the colonial interests. It was therefore basically a force opposed to those peoples' development, antagonistic to that development, a force based on principles which often paid no heed to the fate of the subject peoples.

20. This does not mean, by the way, that a settler was by nature a contemptible exploiter; not necessarily so. He was like so many other kinds of men; he might, as an individual, be as pleasant as the next, as helpful and as good as the exploited black person. The trouble was inherent in the very nature of his status and of the colonial system, which sought to exploit the conquered countries in whatever manner would be best for production, profit and a reassuring absence of trouble.

21. In its pursuit of this purpose, the colonial system was, by its very nature, in the opposite camp to the colonial peoples. It unconsciously, but justifiably, considered any real progress and any awakening of the colonial peoples as a real threat to its own existence, and it did not allow those peoples to develop except in so far as their development was essential to its own existence, and only in whatever conditions of peace and stability, or rather social stagnation, were most suitable to the colonial system.

22. Colonialism, initially imposed by force, very soon became a highly complicated system of direct or indirect political and economic domination of all the less developed peoples. Hence, according to the kind of interests concerned and the advantages to be gained, the colonial Power would resort either to direct control of the subject territories, or to indirect control, by systematically supporting ruling classes which were kept in power to defend colonial interests against the indigenous peoples.

23. Whatever the method of controlling these territories applied by the metropolitan country, colonialism succeeded through this control in establishing and maintaining powerful machinery designed to bring in the greatest possible profits, regardless of the interests of the indigenous inhabitants. So the colonial system, by the support it gave to the forces of social reaction in subject territories and to tribal classes and hierarchies which would otherwise have disappeared, distorted the dynamic working of the forces of change and froze political and social development at the primitive stage. This is why colonialism must be held responsible for the considerable backwardness of the dependent countries in relation to the general progress throughout the world, and for the tragic gulf between these dependent countries and the industrialized countries.

24. In order to maintain and increase its profits, to protect colonial enterprise against all risks and dangers and to perpetuate its rule, colonialism was forced to perpetuate an order based essentially on social stagnation and the maintenance of the status quo, and marked by the paralysis of the forces of progress. For these purposes the colonial régime used such devices as racial discrimination, enslavement by humiliation, fear and ignorance, exploitation under paternalistic labels and other practices calculated to deprive the man living under colonialism of his identity and human dignity. As I have said, it permitted no progress of subject peoples unless such progress was seen to be essential to its own existence.

25. It is, of course, true that, to serve its own purposes and to exploit the wealth of conquered territories in the manner best suited to production, profit and relative absence of trouble, colonialism introduced features typical of more advanced societies.

26. Here, obviously, colonialism could hardly escape the general law of contradiction inherent in every living process. This is also a point which must be brought out if we are to understand the complex and sometimes misleading nature of the colonial problem. It would be a mistake to carry hatred of colonialism, however understandable, to the point of simply denying or refusing to recognize the undoubtedly useful features produced by and inherent in the very exploitation system itself. It is by no means true that colonialism has done absolutely nothing in the colonies. We personally feel that colonialism has undeniably made definite contributions, some of them of the greatest importance for the later development of the colonies. However, we must at once make clear the nature of these contributions and put them in their historical setting, in order to avoid confusion and distortion of the truth. Any objective analysis of the facts will thus show clearly that the so-called benefits of the colonial system, far from being essential features of colonialism, are simply its inevitable secondary consequences, and are caused by the very contradictions in the system.

27. It is important to carry this analysis further. The source of the contradiction lay in the actual development of modern society and in the needs of a system of profitable exploitation of colonial countries. This meant, among other things, that the peoples had to play a greater part in the colonial enterprise. The system needed labour which was not only cheap but also skilled and properly organized. It had to set up what has been called the economic infra-structure necessary for the development of transport, commerce and the economy in general. It could not do without roads, buildings, schools or even hospitals, all of which are now part of any large-scale, efficiently run and expanding commercial enterprise. As I say, these indisputable features of colonialism, although they are there for all to see, are not evidence of any sacred mission of the colonial Powers, but are to be explained as the inevitable consequences of a system based essentially on profit and the colonial interests concerned. These same consequences were also to bring about the gradual disintegration of the system.

28. The contradictions inherent in the colonial system, in fact, became more apparent as the system enlarged its horizons. The development of means of communication, the establishment of urban centres, the introduction of the new system of trade and organized labour, as well as such things as the gradual impoverishment of the indigenous peoples, were strong enough to break out of the framework artificially maintained by the settlers and finally led the colonial peoples to self-awareness in the face of the whole phenomenon of colonialist rule.

29. The revolutionary changes which followed the Second World War and affected the fate of about 1,500 million persons belonging to the Asian peoples gave a new impulse to the independence movement of the African peoples. In a sense, they served to bring to a head what I have called the secondary consequences of socialism. Those who had been trained and schooled for the deliberate purpose of serving their former masters more diligently became aware of their human and national strength and refused to be used as the instruments of their own ruin.

30. So the African awakening, which has been the most important feature of the history of the black continent over the past fifteen years, pitted against colonialism in Africa a force of such power, scope and lightning development that it has surprised not only the colonialists but sometimes those who set it in motion, namely the prime movers of the African emancipation movement.

31. During the period which followed the African awakening after the Second World War, there was a certain confusion in the colonial camp. Was brute force to be stepped up and were the old colonial methods to be continued, with still heavier oppression and repression? Would it be better to adapt them to the more democratic climate of the time? Or had the time come to make an agonizing reappraisal of the traditional methods and simply to keep pace with the troublemakers?

32. The foreign and colonial offices had never seen such extraordinarily swift deployment of forces which they could not even understand. And, while they tried one solution after another, each testing what seemed to it the most effective way of dealing with the situation, the peoples themselves continued the struggle, which grew like a snowball and threatened to become a general movement going beyond the purposes which the colonial peoples had set for themselves.

33. As may be imagined, the political conditions arising out of the cold war were not likely to make it easier to deal with the more and more threatening rise of the anti-colonial tide. Those who had a clearer sense of history and more practical vision decided at this point to adapt their thinking to the new conditions and to achieve the only possible balance capable of maintaining positions which had become precarious. Some such concern would appear to have been behind the famous "new wind of change" policy in Africa, which the Africans, though they realize its nature, have welcomed. It is a true expression of the real forces concerned, since it exists, clearly, first and foremost because of the courage and struggles of the African peoples for independence, and also because of the practical good sense and enlightenment of the colonial Powers concerned.

34. The United Kingdom, feeling this wind of change, is breaking up its former colonial empire with undeniable success, and often with the effective co-operation of the peoples concerned. In this England has once again shown its political genius for adapting itself to the changing conditions of the times.

35. It is this wind of change that has brought France, with glory and success, to restore to most of its former African possessions the great principles born of the French Revolution and of its rights of man and of the citizen.

36. The admission to the United Nations of ten new States, all members of the French Community, does credit to the courageous decolonization operation undertaken by the Fifth Republic. Let us hope that this wind of change will be strong enough to blow, not only through the former French territories which have already been freed, but also through other territories in which this sincere effort is still held back by unwarranted vested interests.

37. Thus in the annals of colonialism the wind of change is a new phenomenon which has come to stay. It is an expression of this moment of truth when colonialism, realizing the implications of the emancipation movement and the new and only possible balance of forces, sees no alternative but to make an agonizing reappraisal of its general attitude towards the very problem of the colonial system.

38. Colonialism, which had been more or less firmly founded on brute force—the most efficacious and practical instrument of supremacy at the time—is turning to a new strategy. Instead of opposing the tide, it will now follow the tide. Instead of stopping it with a force which is no longer effective, colonialism will try to use it in a new way, seeking to co-operate with the former rebels and trying now to maintain, as far as possible, its only remaining bastion, namely its economic and technical supremacy.

39. It is of the greatest theoretical and practical importance for the under-developed peoples to study the complex features of this wind of change which has begun to blow through Africa and has opened the last chapter of colonialism. This wind must not deceive the African people by its freshness or by the new sense of dignity and freedom it brings them. Nor should it be neglected and simply opposed, just because it rises in the white hills of the West. Like every historical fact, and like colonialism itself, it is made up of opposing forces. It is our task, as the peoples of the developing countries, to turn it to the best advantage without falling into the snares of inexcusable credulity or of an anachronistic and dogmatic orthodoxy.

40. The colonial peoples, I am sure, will tackle this new situation, with all its inherent hopes and dangers, its possibilities in the way of co-operation, its pitfalls and dilemmas. But this will of course require great vigilance and discernment everywhere. For the constructive and promising aspects of the wind of change are, after all, only an intelligent reaction to and a realistic estimate of the new balance which history has imposed on the colonial Powers. It should be welcomed and encouraged wherever it truly and effectively expresses a realistic and enlightened sense of history and is based on the premise, now evident and well established, that no kind of political enterprise can last in the context of tyranny and the subjugation of peoples.

41. It would be a very different thing if other Powers, more obstinate and less imaginative, were to look on the wind of change as a simple tactical manoeuvre, regarding it in Machiavellian terms as a safety valve to be opened when the pressure reached the point of explosion. The events of the past year have revealed two significant tendencies in the colonial situation at its present stage of development. On the one hand, they have familiarized us with the more intelligent, long-term policy of the wind of change; on the other hand, they have shown us once more that, in their desperate struggle for existence, colonial vested interests have more than one trick up their sleeve and that neo-colonialism is a very much more cunning, and hence far more dangerous, child than the parents who gave it birth.

42. In point of fact, traditional colonialism as such can henceforth be considered as a historical phenomenon belonging to the past. Even if in some territories it is still rampant and still provokes crises marked by the blood and tears of the indigenous people, even if it still exists in a considerable number of territories, with a total population of 100 million, the colonial system as a whole is already on its deathbed, already breathing its last, and its hysterical outbreaks of violence show even more clearly that its end is near and inevitable. Thus it is not the old colonialism, asthmatic and with one foot in the grave, that now threatens to deprive peoples of genuine independence, but the young and virulent neo-colonialism. With its complex network of political, economic, ideological and other weapons, neo-colonialism is out to defend the same interests over the corpse of the old-style colonialism. The nature and purpose of both are the same, and on the whole only the tactics seem to have changed, to fit in with the political, economic and psychological requirements of the modern world. No one should be deceived by appearances, and precisely for that reason, as long ago as 1955, at Bandung, all the African and Asian peoples decided to denounce colonialism, solemnly declaring it, in all its forms and manifestations, to be an evil which must be quickly brought to an end.

43. There is no doubt that the vested interests which caused the colonial scourge to appear in the world and have enabled it to endure will continue to exist long after colonialism itself has been eliminated. Hence it is to be expected that they will refuse to submit to the verdict of the liberated peoples and will do everything they can to return to the scene and recreate colonialism in new forms better suited to the conditions of the modern world. This being so, it is imperative that the peoples concerned should continue to extend their struggle against the colonial phenomenon to all forms of colonialism, whether economic or political, which directly or indirectly threaten their national sovereignty and the workings of the democratic institutions deriving therefrom.

44. The problems and circumstances to which I have referred show clearly that the whole question of colonialism is far from being simple. It has theoretical aspects which particularly call for study so as to enable the peoples of the world to follow its development better as time goes on and to prepare themselves to confront the dangers it presents. But such a study would be altogether outside the scope of this debate. With your permission, therefore, I shall try as briefly as possible to put forward some considerations of a general nature and to deal with the main practical problems which face us today, seeking at the same time to establish certain principles which we feel should be brought to the attention of the Member States concerned.

45. (1) Let me say once more what pleasure it gives my country to note that this year seventeen former colonial territories have come to swell our ranks as fully sovereign and independent Members. It is a brilliant victory, not only for the peoples concerned, but also for the international community as a whole, and, of course, for the United Nations. It is obvious that the contribution of new States not only strengthens the position and prestige of the United Nations, but is also an important factor in ensuring international peace and security.

46. (2) While recognizing the merits and progressive nature of the efforts recently made by certain Administering Powers to lead a large number of territories under their administration towards independence, my delegation hopes that the policy of decolonization thus begun will be adopted and followed by all Powers administering overseas territories and will be extended to all colonial territories where the indigenous peoples are still deprived of the fundamental right of self-determination. By virtue of this recognized right of all peoples, they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development. Article 1, paragraph 2, of the draft International Covenants on Human Rights, already adopted by the Third Committee of the General Assembly, recognizes further that:

"The peoples may, for their own ends, freely dispose of their natural wealth and resources without prejudice to any obligations arising out of international economic co-operation, based upon the principle of mutual benefit and international law. In no case may a people be deprived of its own means of subsistence."^{1/}

47. (3) The United Nations is to be congratulated on its contribution to the movement to emancipate the peoples of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories and on its support for the principle of self-determination. The International Trusteeship System, and a dynamic interpretation of the spirit of Chapter XI of the Charter, have proved effective means of helping these peoples to achieve progressive emancipation and preparing them gradually for independence. It is, however, regrettable to note that in this field the resistance of certain Administering Powers to the constructive efforts of the United Nations and their systematic policy of meeting the liberal spirit of the Charter with a narrow and outmoded interpretation of the letter of the Charter have had this effect of reducing considerably, and even paralysing, the possibilities of action by the international community.

48. (4) World development, particularly during the past fifteen years, shows unquestionably that in present circumstances the conditions necessary for lasting international co-operation based on respect for fundamental human rights not only run parallel to, but are identical with, the essential conditions for preserving the legitimate economic and political interests of the great Powers. The incomprehensible insistence of some Powers on maintaining certain colonial practices which in the past proved successful methods of achieving colonial ends, cannot today but ruin the last chances of co-operation between the developing peoples and the more privileged Powers.

49. More particularly, it is of the greatest importance that countries inspired by the ideals of liberty and democracy should yield to the evidence of a new order of things and should not precipitate, whether through indifference or lack of vision, situations which can only benefit the enemies of all peoples. The logical development of the colonial peoples is proceeding at such a furious pace that it is now no longer permissible to keep to a narrow conception of immediate self-interest. Today more than ever, sincere and frank talks between colonial Powers and colonial peoples is necessary, and on these talks depend the future of the whole world. If they take place and are carried on in a friendly atmosphere, there is every reason to believe that an era of fruitful co-operation for the common good could come about; and that would not be a defeat, but a victory for all.

50. The very natural suspicions of both sides, the misunderstandings, the mutual recriminations, could thus gradually disappear in an atmosphere marked by joint efforts on the part of the free and independent peoples to create a new community of nations, free from unjust bondage, free from racial or other prejudices, and free from the tyranny of things and of men.

51. Such a policy of co-operation is, in our view, the only one which can help the former colonial peoples to follow their course of development without discord and enable them to solve the problems, particularly the economic problems, which will arise along this arduous path. It is also the only one which can lay the foundations of a solid and lasting peace, in the regions concerned and in the whole world. If, by some mischance, such co-operation is not achieved in time, and if the debate does not proceed on a basis of equality and mutual confidence, it is to be feared that the whirlwind of events will engulf all men of goodwill and open the door to tyranny, which alone in such circumstances would be capable of putting an end to the chaos thus unleashed.

52. All peoples, therefore, and all free and independent States, particularly the Administering Powers, must recognize this complex situation, which is as fraught with danger as it is full of opportunities for co-operation. To this end they must establish and develop their relations with the former colonial peoples on the fundamental, sacred principle that all peoples without exception have an inalienable right to complete independence, to the exercise of sovereignty and to the integrity of their national territory, and on this basis are determined to take their destinies into their own hands, in complete freedom, without any pressure from outside. They must realize once and for all that the general movement of peoples towards complete emancipation is an irreversible and irresistible phenomenon and that any attempt, either direct or indirect, to resist it is not only immoral and contrary to international law, but is doomed in advance to certain failure. They must have confidence in all peoples and abstain from any intervention of a political, economic or other kind in their internal affairs. The free peoples and the Powers which were and still are responsible for administering the colonial territories must do all that is in their power to work for the success of this historical movement, on which the future and the happiness of all mankind largely depend.

53. (5) The present situation thus imposes new responsibilities on the former colonial Powers. These new responsibilities must, first of all, lead them to do everything they can to bridge the gap which now separates them from the colonial peoples and, to that end, to seek the required solutions in sincere co-operation with the peoples concerned.

54. These responsibilities must also lead them to establish, instead of keeping up the united front of traditional colonialism, a new united front of free peoples against all those in the world who would like to maintain and establish positions of strength and unwarranted supremacy. The yoke of tyranny is still too fresh in the minds of the newly liberated peoples for them to want to seek new masters or to let themselves be deceived by anyone. Hence their most natural allies are those who truly and sincerely seek to make freedom a universal ideal. The colonial peoples will certainly fight as they have fought in the past against any form of domination, subjugation or exploitation in defence of their national dignity and their dearly-won freedom. It is therefore of the highest importance that all Powers with the same ideals of freedom, human dignity and social justice should understand this fact and, above all, that they should not, through lack of vision or patience, or as a result of hasty defensive reactions dictated by emotion or fear, spoil their chances of setting up a united front of freedom and democracy with the former colonial peoples.

55. It would be a great misfortune if the short-sighted desire to retain certain political, economic and other immediate advantages, and continued resort to certain modes of action incompatible with the freedom and the basic interest of these peoples were to aggravate misunderstandings, widen the existing gap and in addition, by omission or commission, force them to seek allies elsewhere than in the camp of those individuals and peoples who are inspired by the same ideals.

56. (6) The colonial Powers must recognize that one of the first and most important attributes of a people's independence is the exercise of sovereignty, which is the sole prerogative of those living within the national territory. Sovereignty appertains to them both de facto and de jure and no one may exercise it on their behalf without their freely-given consent. Hence, the Powers which have exercised sovereignty on behalf of the peoples of the territories under their administration in accordance with the United Nations Charter, must now take immediate measures to transfer that sovereignty to the duly qualified representatives of those peoples.

57. (7) In order to bring about the unconditional independence of the Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories, and of any other colonial territory which has not yet attained independence, the Administering Powers must take urgent and immediate steps to transfer all powers to the peoples of these territories without any conditions or reservations in accordance with their freely expressed will and aspirations, without any distinction as to race, creed or colour in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and the freedom to build their national States.

58. (8) The inadequate level of political, economic, social and educational advancement has in the past always been used by the Administering Powers as a reason for delaying the independence of the colonial countries. A more objective scrutiny of the problem reveals the danger inherent in this pretext and the bad faith which has often been behind the use of this argument. In fact, the argument runs in a vicious circle which the colonial interests collectively have sought to perpetuate. Thus, on the one hand, they have delayed giving the peoples the necessary training for various aspects of their national life, while on the other hand they have argued that, since independence requires a certain minimum degree of training, it cannot be granted to them without this. In these circumstances, it is hardly surprising that nothing substantial has been done in most of the colonies to prepare the necessary trained personnel and, correspondingly, that the attainment of independence has always posed serious problems when the necessary, suitably trained personnel are lacking.

59. Today, the difficulties which always spring from an inadequate level of development and from the shortage of trained personnel in the colonial territories—for which the colonial Powers must assume full responsibility—do not frighten the colonial peoples unduly, because over and above the definite advantages which independence holds out to them, they are confident that the peoples of the world will support them and that organizations like the United Nations will help them to remedy their deficiencies.

60. Moreover, even if their economic, social and political backwardness necessarily imposes a state of relative dependence on some of the under-developed countries, there is no reason to think that such dependence should be imposed upon them by the former Administering Power. The international community and the United Nations, among others, can easily give them the necessary aid and assistance without imposing upon them obligations incompatible with their independence.

61. These peoples know that they are no longer alone in an indifferent world. Moreover, they now possess confidence in themselves, and where they have been given the opportunity they have quickly shown that that confidence was amply justified. More particularly, the mere assumption by a people liberated from slavery of responsibility for their own destiny gives them the necessary strength to overcome all obstacles, including those deriving from their colonial heritage and from an inadequate level of political, economic or other training.

62. (9) In colonial territories where the peace has been disturbed either because of armed conflict or as a consequence of repressive measures taken against the people, the Powers responsible for the situation must take immediate measures for the re-establishment of the peaceful conditions needed if the people are to exercise their sacred and inalienable right to complete independence and to the integrity of their national territory. At the same time it is also essential that any armed or repressive action of any kind whatever should be prohibited and proscribed for the future.

63. In this connexion, let us remember that peace and freedom are indivisible; any nation which oppresses another violates not only the sovereign rights of the latter but also the freedom, conscience and dignity of mankind as a whole. By so doing, it likewise does violence to world peace and security and it must bear the full responsibility. The international community and the United Nations, then, have the right and the duty to make every effort to help the peoples thus subjected to oppression and violence to regain their sacred right to self-determination.

64. (10) There can be no doubt that the transfer of powers will inevitably be subject to the conditions peculiar to each territory. However, it seems to us that, in order to achieve the genuine and complete independence of these territories in a manner corresponding closely to the requirements of a democratic system of national power, the good of the peoples requires that their attainment of independence should, wherever national conditions make it possible and feasible, be preceded by a consultation of the people and by general elections held by universal suffrage and the secret ballot, preferably under the supervision and control of the United Nations. Such a procedure would make it possible for the States thus attaining their independence to build upon solid and democratic foundations and act as a strong safeguard against the return of colonialism in new guises.

65. (11) It is therefore in the interests of the dependent peoples that the date of their independence and the methods of achieving it should be established as a result of negotiations between the Administering Authorities and the duly qualified representatives of these peoples, meeting on a footing of equality.

66. The Administering Powers should refrain from attaching to independence any conditions or reservations which would restrict the exercise of the people's sovereignty. Unequal and restrictive treaties on economic, political financial or military matters, signed prior to independence and limiting in any way the exercise of national sovereignty, constitute a source of future misunderstandings and friction incompatible with the preservation of an atmosphere of mutual confidence and the maintenance of peaceful and friendly relations.

67. (12) Since freedom for the peoples on the threshold of independence is essentially a process of gradual and progressive liberation from their former bondage, and in particular from the tyranny of want and fear, no extrinsic factor should be allowed to hinder this process through which in the first instance, the peoples concerned themselves must pass. However, the indivisibility of freedom and peace and the cause of human solidarity make it imperative that the international community should spare no effort to help them accelerate this process of liberation if the peoples concerned so request.

68. (13) Since a newly independent State must immediately meet grave problems of all kinds, first and foremost the problems resulting from its colonial heritage, it is particularly necessary that the United Nations should give it all the economic, technical, social, cultural and other assistance it needs to pass through the initial stages of its independence. It is to the interest of the newly independent peoples that the great Powers, which are anxious to bring them aid and assistance, should likewise do so, as far as possible, through the United Nations and its specialized agencies so that no Power whatever should lay upon these peoples any obligation which might limit their freedom of action and thus impede their taking their own independent road towards their own destiny.

69. (14) In order to enable the newly emancipated peoples to devote all their human and economic resources to their national plans of reconstruction and development, all Member States, and in particular the great Powers, should act in such a way that these peoples will never find it necessary, for reasons of national defence, to allocate to military expenditure funds essential to their national development. More particularly, the great Powers are in duty bound to refrain from any action which directly or indirectly is likely to increase the military burden borne by the newly independent countries.

70. (15) It is of course understood that any act of aggression against an independent State constitutes a crime against humanity. This crime takes on an even graver complexion when it is directed against a country which has just attained its independence and is traversing the difficult initial stages of development.

71. Member States, and especially the former Administering Powers, must, moreover, refrain from any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country. Thus, it would be desirable if, in the declaration on the termination of colonialism, all Member States would solemnly reaffirm the undertaking they assumed under the United Nations Charter never in any way whatever to violate the national sovereignty and territorial integrity of another State.

72. (16) The peoples of the world should, finally, be on guard to prevent colonialism from trading on the internal weaknesses and difficulties of the small independent States and returning to the scene or infiltrating into the country in new guises. Any intervention by a more powerful State in the domestic affairs of another and any economic, political or ideological pressure being applied from outside with the intention of disrupting the normal functioning of the domestic institutions of a country thus constitute the basic elements of a neo-colonialism which is incompatible with national independence and sovereignty and with the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter.

73. Such are the few principles which my delegation deemed it appropriate to recall as we embark on our debate on the general problem of the attainment of independence by the colonial countries and their peoples. They are principles which we have always been proud to champion and support during the whole course of our participation in the work of the United Nations. My country, though it has never suffered from colonialism as such, is nevertheless proud that it has at all times, without exception, pleaded the cause of its less fortunate sister countries of Asia and Africa and contributed its moral support to the cause of all the colonial peoples fighting for their right to independence. Only a short time ago, His Majesty the Shahinshah made himself the mouthpiece of the unanimous sentiments of all the Iranian people when, at the inaugural meeting of the Senate, congratulating the African countries which had achieved independence, he said:

"We are happy that a considerable number of colonial countries have attained freedom and independence and are already taking part in the work of the United Nations and that others will in the future follow in their footsteps. From the bottom of our hearts we congratulate them on their achievement of freedom and wish them all possible prosperity and happiness in their path to true progress in accordance with the principles of democracy and the spirit of the United Nations Charter."

74. My delegation is most proud to have taken an active part in the preparation of the draft declaration which now stands before you [A/L.323 and Add.1] in the name of a large majority of African-Asian Powers, and deems it an honour to be one of the co-sponsors of the document. This draft declaration, which solemnly proclaims the necessity of bringing to a speedy and unconditional end to colonialism in all its forms and manifestations, also contains most of the principles which we feel should be adopted by the Assembly as a whole.

75. Those who have played a part in preparing this draft are best able to bear witness to the constructive spirit shown by its authors. There is no doubt, for example, that many of the co-sponsors of this draft declaration who have suffered greatly from the ravages of colonialism would have preferred a more expressive text, including clauses condemning colonialism in its most culpable aspects. However, in order to rally all currents of opinion in the Assembly in favour of a text acceptable to all the Members of the United Nations, they have, in a spirit of conciliation, accepted certain phrases of a much more moderate nature. We hope that the same spirit of constructive co-operation will inspire all the Members of this Assembly, and we also hope that they will unanimously support a text of such great historical importance which at this solemn moment is the instrument for the expression of the universal conscience of man in regard to the problem of colonialism in our time.

76. My delegation has the honour warmly to commend the draft declaration in document A/L.323 and Add.1 to the attention of the Members of the Assembly and more particularly to appeal to the Administering Powers to accord it their unreserved support.

77. In conclusion, my delegation would like to thank the Soviet Union delegation for taking the initiative in placing this problem on the agenda of the General Assembly's fifteenth session. However, for reasons having to do firstly with the positive ideas contained in our draft resolution, secondly with the need for securing the largest possible majority for the principles which should govern our attitude of anti-colonialism, and lastly with the need to limit any action which the Assembly may take on this point to those aspects of the question having an essential and exclusive connexion with the problem of colonialism, my delegation will be unable to support the Soviet declaration. Indeed, it earnestly hopes that the Soviet delegation will appreciate the reasons which have impelled the majority of the African-Asian powers to submit their own draft resolution, and will graciously withdraw its draft, making it possible for this Assembly to adopt the African-Asian draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1] unanimously. Such unanimity—it cannot be said too often—will give the present draft the historic place which rightfully belongs to it in the annals of anti-colonialism.

78. Mr. NOSEK (Czechoslovakia): The General Assembly has come to the consideration of one of the most important items on its agenda, that is, the declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. It is a question of great international bearing, whose immediate solution is of vital interest to the oppressed and exploited peoples of the colonial and dependent countries and, together with them, to the freedom-loving people all over the world.

79. Today, colonialism still keeps in bondage, mercilessly exploits, and oppresses tens of millions of people in Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Pacific. Mankind would be burdened by immense shame if, at a time when it learned to split the atom, when it can harness natural forces, and it prepares to master outer space, it should fail to break the chains of impudent colonialism and to compel the colonialist to grant without delay liberty and independence to the millions of people leading a miserable existence in the colonial countries.

80. The process of complete elimination of colonialism is a historic necessity of our time. The national liberation movement of the colonial and dependent countries makes every year a change in the political map of the world. If, prior to the Second World War, the map showed vast territories in Africa, Asia and other parts of the world in the few colours depicting the colonial systems of several colonial powers, a glance at this map today shows the substantial changes which have occurred in the world. From the territories of previous colonies there have emerged tens of sovereign States which won their freedom and independence in a long and hard struggle. The colonialists have been putting various obstacles in the way of the struggle of the colonial nations for their national liberation. Sometimes they use such unscrupulous means as napalm bombs and grenades, sometimes the tactics of pitting one colonial nation against the other. Of late, we often hear the contention that this or that nation is not developed, mature enough to shoulder the responsibilities of its freedom and independence and to organize a State of its own. There is no need for the colonialists to be unduly concerned and to cover their unwillingness to put an end to the shameful colonial system by showing "concern" over whether the colonial nations will be capable of running their countries. The example of many new independent countries proves that after their peoples have freed themselves from colonial slavery, they know well how to rule their countries and to build their economies.

81. Another argument we hear from some colonialist countries is the contention that their colonial territories are not in fact colonies, but, as they say, overseas provinces; that is, part of their homeland. There is as little logic or truth in this contention as if we said that some metropolitan countries were not part of Europe, but of the African continent or the Indian sub-continent.

82. The decline of colonialism, engendered by the national liberation movement of the colonial peoples, is inevitable and cannot be stopped by any kind of force, intrigue or juridical formula. It is a historical process which is bound to be crowned by the victories of the idea of liberty and independence.

83. However, the matter now is whether the complete decline of colonialism will be brought about by sanguineous struggles in which further hundreds of thousands of peoples will perish or whether ways and means will be found to accelerate and make easier the inevitable downfall of colonialism.

84. The United Nations, too, must help to find such ways and means. It must try its best to see that, throughout the world, not a single nation remains subjugated by other nations, that the peoples of colonial and Trust Territories be given full independence.

85. Long ago, the people of the world pronounced their verdict on colonialism, and this irrevocable verdict should now receive the full backing of the authority of the United Nations. In any case, it is a debt which the United Nations has, for fifteen years, owed to the purposes and principles embodied in its Charter. Keeping a single nation or even a tribe in the yoke of colonialism is a mockery of the lofty ideals of the United Nations.

86. A passing comparison between the development of metropolitan countries and the development of their colonies suffices to make it clear for everybody what a monstrosity is concealed in the very substance of colonialism. In the metropolitan countries we see examples of wealth and welfare which are the result of a long, unscrupulous robbing of millions of peoples in the colonies and the plunder of the natural wealth of foreign countries. The result of the colonialist administration of the oppressed countries is that the peoples there live in conditions of utmost poverty, illiteracy, disease; they are doomed to the shortest life span in the world, and more than half of the population dies during infancy.

87. The nations which are struggling against the colonialists for their independence take over their countries in a state which gives an astonishing testimony of the care and the civilizing mission of their former colonial overlords. Such instances as there not being a single factory, an enterprise of the country which could meet the requirements of the population, are not exceptional. The case of the Congo, which won its independence in a situation when there was no Congolese doctor or lawyer, engineer or officer in the country, is not an isolated one. The statistics which are available to the United Nations and the information which leaks from the colonial countries present a shocking picture of the results of the century of colonial rule. A good deal of information on this has been disclosed during the general debate at this session of the General Assembly by the most competent authorities—the representatives of the African countries.

88. But there cannot be other results because all the activities of the colonialists in their colonies have always been subordinated to a single purpose, that is, to ensure maximum profits for metropolitan monopolists. That is why the colonial countries have served as the raw material appendage of the imperialist countries, as a marketplace for metropolitan products; cheap manpower in the colonies and the output of raw materials and their export to the metropolitan countries, at almost no cost whatever, enable the colonialists to get huge profits from selling the raw materials and foodstuffs on world markets. That is why the colonialists deliberately retarded the development of local industries in the colonies and in so far as such industries were developed at all, they were merely raw material processing industries and light industry.

89. The colonialists used to draw attention to all the railways, roads, harbours and communication facilities which they built in the colonies. However, they did not build them in the interests of the local population but in their own interest, in the interest of an easier and intensified exploitation of the colonial people and their natural wealth. This situation in the colonial territories can hardly be a different one; it logically stems from the very substance of the oppressing and piratical nature of colonialism which, despite having been buried by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom during his statement at this session of the General Assembly, is not yet dead.

90. President Sukarno aptly characterized the present state of colonialism when he said at the current session of the General Assembly:

"People sometimes say that imperialism and colonialism are dead. No, imperialism is not yet dead. It is dying, yes. ... Still—and mark my words well—the dying imperialism is dangerous, as dangerous as the wounded tiger in a tropical jungle."
[880th meeting, para. 63.]

91. The United Nations, which embodied the respect for the principles of equality of rights and self-determination of nations, as well as human rights, in its Charter, cannot continue to stand idly by when the colonialists ruthlessly trample on these rights and keep the colonial nations in subjugation by the most brutal methods. We cannot pass over the oppression of the colonial nations and the unscrupulous squandering of their national wealth. We cannot close our eyes when we are confronted with colonial wars and the shedding of blood in Algeria, Kenya, Rhodesia, Oman, in the Portuguese colonies and elsewhere, when confronted with the fact that the colonial Powers use every means of naked force to prevent the people of colonial countries to assert their inalienable right to self-determination. The United Nations must exert all efforts aimed at the earliest possible removal of this shameful situation. This is the categorical demand of our time. Consequently, the General Assembly should adopt the declaration on the immediate elimination of colonialism and the granting of independence to all colonial and trust territories.

92. Czechoslovak public opinion welcomed the fact that at the Second Conference of Independent African States at Addis Ababa in June 1960, the African nations themselves expressed their determination to eliminate colonialism in Africa in the resolution on the eradication of colonial rule from Africa, which they adopted. The fact that the people of the African countries are ever more resolutely taking their affairs in their own hands is a matter of great significance as well as an important prerequisite for the earliest possible termination of the complete and final elimination of the colonial system. The determination of the young African States to continue to strive for complete liberation of Africa, a determination about which we learned from statements made in this General Assembly by such outstanding African representatives as the President of Ghana, Dr. Nkrumah, the President of Guinea, Sékou Touré, and others, makes the Czechoslovak delegation believe that the peoples of the remaining African territories will also take their destinies firmly in their own hands.

93. Recent developments have also shown that the perpetuation of the colonial system creates repeated international crises which threaten to drag mankind into the catastrophe of a world war. The immediate elimination of colonialism and all its vestiges would remove one of the sources of permanent tension and conflict in the world and considerably diminish the danger of war. Is it not well known that the disintegration of the colonial system has always been accompanied by provocations, military interventions, and much too often by colonial wars? It is sufficient to recall the colonial wars in Indonesia, Viet-Nam, Laos, Cambodia, the imperialist aggression against Egypt, the armed intervention of the colonialists in the Congo, and others. The United Nations must exert all its efforts to remove the common roots of these crises in Africa, Asia and Latin America, that is, the colonial system.

94. The United Nations must strive to enable the colonial nations to embark upon the road of independent free development. The problem of the consolidation of peace in the world, which is the basic task to which the United Nations must address itself is, therefore, most closely connected with the elimination of colonialism.

95. The Czechoslovak delegation, fully subscribes to the views expressed by the President of Ghana, Mr. Nkrumah, who stated in the general debate of this Assembly:

"As long as a single foot of African soil remains under foreign domination, the world will know no peace. ... The United Nations must call upon all nations that have colonies in Africa to grant complete independence to the territories still under their control. In my view possession of colonies is now quite incompatible with membership in the United Nations." [869th meeting, para. 5.]

96. No one can question the great importance of the emergence of the independent States after the Second World War for the maintenance of peace in the world. The overwhelming majority of these new countries energetically pursue a policy of positive neutrality and peace and refuse to take part in the aggressive groupings of the imperialists. Therefore, nobody can doubt that the immediate liberation of the remaining colonial peoples would be a great contribution to the future destinies and the development of human society. If the colonial Powers are sincerely in favour of the consolidation of peace, as they repeatedly proclaim, and if they take sincerely their commitments towards the United Nations, they should adopt the proposals contained in the declaration submitted by the Soviet Union [A/4502 and Corr.1], that is, they should first of all immediately grant complete independence and freedom to all colonial, trust and other non-self-governing countries and territories, remove all strongholds of colonialism maintained in the form of various domains and leased areas on alien territories, and all countries should strictly respect the sovereignty and territorial inviolability of countries which have recently gained or which will gain, after the adoption of the declaration, their independence.

97. By the adoption of the declaration, the colonial nations would have realistic prospects of achieving freedom by peaceful means, and peace in the world would thus be considerably strengthened. In our view, however, it is not sufficient merely to eliminate colonialism in its old form. The peoples of the countries which have liberated themselves or which will liberate themselves from colonial slavery must be extremely vigilant and stand on their guard against various forms of neo-colonialism which the imperialist Powers try to impose upon them. I have in mind particularly the attempts to drag the African-Asian countries into the aggressive alliances of the imperialists, forcing these countries to make available their territories for the military bases of the imperialists and to accept various kinds of unequal economic agreements and assistance.

98. In this connexion, we cannot pass over the ever-increasing activities of the ruling circles of the Federal Republic of Germany, which, by means of economic penetration into the countries of Asia and Africa, are covertly seeking to regain the lost positions of imperial Germany, which was one of the most brutal of the colonial countries.

99. The immediate elimination of colonialism would also be of tremendous importance for the development of international economic co-operation and the economic development of the present colonies. The colonialists ruthlessly plundered the wealth of the colonial countries, opposed their industrialization, and crippled their economies as a whole by forcing them to maintain a one-crop agricultural production. The liberation of the colonial countries from colonial bondage creates favourable prerequisites for a normal development of their economies, increases the volume of world trade, and is beneficial to all countries. The immediate elimination of colonialism likewise would be of tremendous importance for the raising of the standards of living and the culture of the peoples of the colonial countries, and for the liquidation of illiteracy and the diseases scourging the population.

100. That the immediate elimination of the shameful system of colonial slavery would be to the common benefit of all nations is clearly apparent from the rich experience gained in the period following the Second World War, when approximately thirty countries with a population of 1,500 million people liberated themselves from the colonial yoke. Bearing this experience in mind, the Czechoslovak delegation deems it right for the United Nations to appeal to all the peoples of the world not to remain indifferent to the suffering of the colonial nations. The United Nations must emphatically call upon the Powers which possess colonial dominions to initiate without delay, and on an equal footing, negotiations with the representatives of the colonial countries on the establishment of freedom and independence in all colonial, trust and non-self-governing territories and countries. If the colonial Powers attempt to delay the liberation of the colonies and deny to their peoples their inalienable rights to freedom and independence, then the peace-loving nations will have to render every material assistance to the people of the colonial countries in their struggle against the oppressors.

101. The warm sympathies of the Czechoslovak people for the national and liberation movements have deep roots. They stem from the bitter experience of the hard times of the Hitlerite occupation, when foreign intruders unscrupulously oppressed our peoples and plundered our country. We proceed, therefore, from the principle that every nation has an absolute right to self-determination and to an independent existence. The Czechoslovak Socialist Republic maintains very close and all-round relations, established on the principle of equality and mutual advantage, with the States of Asia and Africa which have liberated themselves from colonial rule. Particularly in the field of economic co-operation, Czechoslovakia contributes within its power and possibilities to enabling these new countries to overcome their present economic backwardness and thus strengthen their political and economic independence. Basing itself on the unshakable principles of the Czechoslovak foreign policy, the delegation of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic fully supports the proposal on the immediate elimination of colonial régimes and the granting of full independence and liberty to the colonial nations. The President of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic, Mr. Novotný, expressed the will of all the Czechoslovak people when he stated in the general debate of this session of the General Assembly:

"We are convinced that it is necessary to abolish forever the whole system of colonialism and give all nations every opportunity to gain freedom. This is why we unreservedly endorse agenda item 87: Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, submitted by the delegation of the Soviet Union at the present session of the General Assembly." [871st meeting, para. 56.]

102. The delegation of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic fully supports the proposal of the declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples submitted by the delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics [A/4502 and Corr.1]. The adoption of this declaration by the General Assembly would be a significant contribution by the United Nations for the improvement of international relations, in the consolidation of peace in the world and the development of friendly international co-operation.

103. This afternoon a twenty-eight-Power draft resolution has been submitted [A/L.323 and Add.1] and introduced by the representative of Cambodia. I reserve my right to comment on it at a later stage of our deliberations.

104. Before concluding, I consider it necessary to reply to the statement made this morning [925th meeting] by the representative of the United Kingdom, who tried to take advantage of the debate on the immediate liquidation of colonialism and attacked slanderously the socialist States. These attacks are aimed at diverting the attention of the Assembly, as well as public opinion, from the solution of the urgent problem of the immediate liquidation of colonialism and the liberation of nations living so far under the colonial yoke. The representative of the United Kingdom endeavoured to divert the Assembly's attention from the question we have under consideration and to substitute the serious, business-like debate on the liquidation of colonialism by offensive attacks against the socialist States in the spirit of the cold war.

105. We are not surprised by these attacks. Some representatives—and the representative of the United Kingdom did it this morning—are following this course because of their hatred of the socialist countries, whose peoples have in the past freely and irrevocably decided their course, namely that of building socialism in their countries. There is no power in the world which could stop the advance of the socialist countries, and the imperialists should realize that.

106. The hundreds of millions of dollars officially allotted every year to financing the subversive activities against the socialist countries, the dispatching of agents and saboteurs, the organization of inflammatory campaigns, the attempts at interference, and other provocations, have proved to be of little help. It is well known that real freedom, independence and the sovereignty of States cannot be evaluated either by the sonority of phrases and statements made in the United Nations or by the rudeness and impertinence of attacks against the socialist States, but, for example, by such criteria as the assurance of equal rights for all, irrespective of colour, sex or denomination, or by economic, cultural and social development, and growth in the living standards of the population.

107. The principal task of our discussion on this question is to adopt an unequivocal declaration on the immediate liquidation of colonialism, to renounce colonialism as a disgrace and dishonour to mankind in the twentieth century. Our debate should be conducive to the adoption of an urgent appeal to colonialist Powers that they grant, without delay, fundamental rights to peoples living so far under the servile and undignified conditions of the colonial rule. Neither the imperialist colonial Powers, which under various pretexts rule and exploit the people in colonies, nor the countries which support the former, can avoid the solution of this urgent question by slanderous attacks against the socialist countries. The democratic public opinion of the world expects from them, by right, an unequivocal declaration to the effect that they are willing to grant immediate freedom and independence to the oppressed peoples in colonies, in harmony with the noble principles and objectives of the Charter of the United Nations, in place of offensive attacks against the socialist countries in the spirit of the cold war.

Mr. Nesbitt (Canada), Vice-President, took the Chair.

108. Mr. PERERA (Ceylon): The delegation of Ceylon is privileged to co-sponsor the draft resolution which has been presented as document A/L.323 and Add.1. While sponsoring the draft resolution, the delegation of Ceylon also ventures to submit that the item which has resulted in the present discussion marks a turning point in the development of international society and the community of nations.

109. Indeed, I would not be able to improve on the words used by Mr. Khrushchev, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, contained in document A/4502, on 23 September 1960. I would like to quote a few sentences from that document, wherein the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Soviet Union said:

"Ours is an era of swift renewal of society; an era in which more progressive and equitable ways of life are being affirmed; an era in which man is soaring upwards to unprecedented mastery over forces of nature. The time has come for the complete and final liberation of peoples languishing in colonial bondage." [A/4502.]

110. Indeed, we cannot remind ourselves too often of the maxim: "People that oppress other peoples cannot be free". Chairman Khrushchev in the very same document, as well as President Sékou Touré of Guinea when addressing this Assembly at the fourteenth session [837th meeting], cited this maxim. It is, therefore, in this context that the delegation of Ceylon makes this intervention.

111. The emancipation of subject peoples has always been dear to the hearts of the people of Ceylon. If I may be pardoned for so stating, Ceylon played a not inconsiderable role at some of the great international conferences at which the subject of the ending of colonialism was discussed. And may I say that the Government of Ceylon would prefer to use the term "the ending of colonialism" than "the granting of independence". I refer, in particular, to the Asian Peoples Conference held in New Delhi in 1947 and the Bandung Conference of 1955. Since Bandung, we in Ceylon have not only accepted the declarations of the independent African States at the conferences held in Accra, Conakry and Addis Ababa, but we have been inspired and guided by these principles in the execution of our policies. In fact, the end of colonialism was a cardinal tenet in the policy of the People's Government, which came into power in April 1956, under Prime Minister Bandaranaike. The present Government, headed by Mrs. Bandaranaike, has intensified this policy; and I am not overstating my case when I say that our people regard the ending of colonialism as the first principle of their faith and also the last article of their creed.

112. I do not intend to examine the arcana imperii of the colonialist Powers, either of the past or of the present, but I am constrained to say that the "raison d'être" of the draft resolution now before this Assembly derives from the existence of colonialism in its various manifestations. It is therefore imperative that we take immediate measures to bring colonialism to an end. Let me remind representatives who were once subject people that we cannot be too grateful not only to the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Soviet Union, Mr. Khrushchev, for his untiring and determined efforts to place this item on the agenda of the fifteenth session, but also for the ceaseless activity of the Soviet Union since the Bolshevik revolution of 1917, to this end.

113. We do not accept the thesis that independence is granted to subject nations. I recall Mr. Krishna Menon's words in addressing this Assembly during the course of the general debate on more than one occasion, when he said that the more correct terminology would be "the ending of foreign rule or foreign domination". Of course, in some instances the term "transfer of power" is used. Be that as it may, we believe that the independence of subject peoples or peoples subject to domination, political and economic, has been won either by political struggle or by political struggle combined with international pressures that may be exerted by international bodies like the United Nations, or perhaps by the determined efforts and the stand taken by anti-colonialist Powers in helping those who were once dependent to gain their independence. We have long learned to despise the ignorance or, as some would say, the hypocrisy of those who speak of giving freedom, and here again I am reminded of the words of the poet who said:

*A gift of that which never can be given
By all the blended powers of earth and heaven.*

114. We have before us certain documents, and I, on behalf of the delegation of Ceylon, would like to attempt a dispassionate analysis both of those documents and of the draft resolution which has now been submitted by twenty-eight Asian and African Powers.

115. I must say that I was rather disturbed by the intervention of the Minister of State of the United Kingdom, Mr. Ormsby-Gore, this morning [925th meeting], when he read into document A/4502 an attempt to fan the cold war. I have sought in vain to find any semblance of this attempt to fan the cold war in this document. On the contrary, it is this document on which we have based our discussions, and that is why the delegation of Ceylon would like to place it before the representatives and perhaps draw the attention of representatives to certain passages, because we are here discussing the ending of colonialism and not either the continuation or the cessation of the cold war. In point of fact, the delegation of Ceylon, or, for that matter, the Government of Ceylon, is no party to such a war, even if such a war does exist. Perhaps we are naive enough not to believe that there is such a war. But we are at the moment concerned with the ending of colonialism. May I, therefore, go to the pith of the matter as contained in document A/4502, because it is for that reason that we ourselves are sponsoring a draft resolution. I refer to one sentence from that document: "The elimination of colonialism would be a key measure in reducing international tension." [A/4502]

116. That is one aspect of the matter. The second and perhaps a more important one for our purpose is this, and I quote again from the same document:

"Together with the infamous system of colonialism, the variant of the colonial régime known as the Trusteeship System has also outlived itself. Being a vestigial remnant of the Mandates System of the League of Nations, the present Trusteeship System in accordance with the United Nations Charter should have promoted the development of the Trust Territories towards self-government and independence. Fifteen years have elapsed, however, since the Charter was adopted, but only four out of eleven Trust Territories have attained independence.

"The Trusteeship System has not justified itself anywhere and should be buried together with the entire colonial system, which is an anachronism." [A/4502.]

117. As I said, the pith of the document lies in these paragraphs. There are also demands at the end of the document, and it is perhaps in respect of the demands that we, that is, the twenty-eight African-Asian States that have submitted the draft resolution, may appear to be at cross purposes. It is my hope that we may be able to find a solution at the end of our debate.

118. If one examines the proposals in document A/4502 and if one examines the draft resolution which we have submitted [A/L.323 and Add.1], one also finds that there is a sort of golden thread underlying both documents. Perhaps in some instances we are in agreement, and in some we are not, but one thing I could say with some confidence is that this very subject, when the question was debated of the allocation of the item either to the First Committee or to plenary meeting, was adopted by acclamation. When the item dealt with in document A/4502, entitled "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples", was placed before the General Assembly [903rd meeting], it was adopted without any dissension as such, and, what is more, there was no question of the cold war being involved in this. That is why it is disturbing to find that this issue has been raised.

119. On the other hand, we from Ceylon would like to consider this as a matter which concerns the world community as a whole. No doubt we still have Trust Territories, Non-Self-Governing Territories and perhaps colonies in various stages of political and economic development, and that is why I said that it is not for me at this stage to go into it, except very generally; I do not wish to go into the secrets of the nicer points of comparative colonial policy. But I may be permitted to quote from what the Secretary-General at that time, Mr. Trygve Lie, said almost at the beginning of this Assembly. I shall quote from a document dated 26 March 1947, as this is necessary for my argument. These are his words:

"... the International Trusteeship System is no mere prolongation of the Mandates System under the League of Nations. It is a new system of international supervision. Its scope is wider, its powers broader, and its potentialities far greater than those of the Mandates System."^{2/}

120. Bearing that in mind, we must examine it in relation to what document A/4502, submitted by the Soviet Union, states. That is why I submit to this Assembly that, if we consider the ending of colonialism, we must also examine the practical usefulness of the Trusteeship System as well. We all know that the Mandates System which was propounded at the end of the First World War, if it did not achieve any specific advantages for the subject peoples under the Mandates—of course, there were the variants, the "A", "B" and "C" Mandates—at least influenced public opinion, but are we content with that? The Second World War perhaps created and unleashed forces which the First World War did not. In this context the Trusteeship System has now been working for nearly fifteen years.

121. On the other hand, as far back as the sixth session of the General Assembly, in a memorandum submitted by the then Secretary-General to the Assembly, some misgivings were expressed as to the success of the Trusteeship System as well as about the purposes for which it was created and how those purposes were being served by the Administering Authorities. I refer also to document A/C.4/SR.245, of 12 January 1952, and a summary of that document, in which various views were expressed, clearly indicating that there were reasons why the Trusteeship System was not working properly, the reasons being—I will give just a few—that certain Administering Authorities were not complying with their obligations. In some cases, they had argued that the obligations were wholly unacceptable. What is more, the non-administering Powers repeatedly pointed out that those Administering Authorities were not only not fulfilling their obligations but in some cases were actually violating them. In other words, action was taken by the Trusteeship Council to call the attention of the Administering Authorities to their remissness and their lapses, and also a genuine attempt was made to put right the system. We did not, however, find that the Administering Authorities responded to the high calling of the dignity of their office.

122. Perhaps I am generalizing, but on the other hand these are facts. It is for that reason that the issue now raised demands our close attention, because it is not sufficient for us to comment that a system already exists; it is for us to find ways and means to end colonialism and colonial rule or domination. At the present moment, I submit on behalf of the delegation of Ceylon, there is no positive evidence to support the oft-repeated argument that trusteeship is the surest and quickest way of ensuring the goal of self-government or independence. I say this with a certain amount of emphasis because if the present Trusteeship System did provide such a guarantee I would not be standing here appealing for support for the draft resolution presented by the African-Asian countries.

123. It is in this connexion that I should like to recall certain cardinal principles which have motivated us in this respect. The representative of Iran in his own way attempted a definition of colonialism. This is another concept, a political as well as perhaps a juridical concept which could be defined in many ways, but basically we subscribe to the view that colonialism means economic exploitation, political domination and racial arrogance, and perhaps, in the process of achieving the aims of the Power dominating the subject or dependent people, a system whereby the moral prostitution of the indigenous population is brought about by the raping of its intellect.

124. Here I have attempted a definition. I do not claim that that definition is final for all time, but that is how it strikes us in Asia and it is a fact that colonialism in its various manifestations does exist. It appears under different names and in point of fact I would argue that Chapters XI, XII and XIII of the Charter became necessary because of the existence of colonialism. It still exists, in different forms perhaps. Its manifestations, or perhaps a better word would be its purposes, are many, and that is why we representatives from African-Asian countries in the Assembly, some of which won their independence quite recently, have not forgotten them and feel we ought to make a contribution to the ending of colonialism.

125. In the past colonialism appeared in various guises; the whole doctrine of extra-territoriality, the doctrine of capitulations—these were all facets of colonialism, as was also the division of the world in terms of colonialism. Even international lawyers talked in terms of colonialism and not in terms of a world or international community. It is perhaps a hackneyed reference, but I may be permitted to refer to this. It was in the nineteenth century that a very famous international lawyer, Professor Lorimer, Professor of International Law at Edinburgh, divided the world into three kinds of humanity. There was civilized humanity, as represented by Europe; there was barbarous humanity, as represented by a few Powers like Turkey and Iraq—because it was after the Treaty of 1856—and there was savage humanity, which covered the rest of Africa and Asia. We have travelled a long way since that time, but nevertheless, if I may put it this way, the damnosa hereditas of colonial rule gave rise to the problems which the world of 1945 had to face, and that is why Chapters XI, XII and XIII of the Charter had to be formulated to provide a system to end colonialism. Today we are not discussing the merits of Chapters XI, XII and XIII, but having found them wanting, we are now trying to find a way out.

126. For the moment I am not raising the question of changing the Charter—far be it for me to attempt that—but what I want to point out is that the Trusteeship System has been found wanting. I would like to subscribe to the view that perhaps certain Administering Authorities do observe strictly Article 73 of the Charter, but some do not. We know that; we have only to ask any member of the Fourth Committee to discover that. Some do not, and then there are others who would argue that Article 84 of the Charter gives a certain neutral status to the Administering Authority vis-à-vis the General Assembly itself. Be that as it may, today document A/4502 focuses our attention on the grave lacuna that exists in the Charter itself, and thus we go outside the strictly legal interpretation of the Charter to the existing realities of the world. That is why the movements in Asia and Africa, the conferences to which I referred, marked a turning point not only in the history of Asia and Africa but in the history of the world. Most of us belong to States which have really no armed power as such; we depend on the mobilization of public opinion and the justice of our cause. By remaining silent on this matter, by refraining from saying what we ought to say, it might be maintained that we are contributing to the purpose of history. But in this context I would say that if the General Assembly did remain silent on a matter like this it might, in future years, come to be regarded as perhaps an unconscious tool of history, when history will have got the better of this Assembly. But why not take the other point of view, why not become the conscious tool of the historical process and do something to end colonialism?

127. I should also refer to the fact that when we talk of the manifestations of colonialism we mean—and this is what the draft resolution tries to meet—the various methods, procedures and legal figments which are used by the colonial Powers to cover the nakedness of rank colonialism. For instance, as I said earlier, there is the question of the transfer of power. Sometimes the transfer of power must wait until the correct party, or the correct group of men, have been found in a colony to whom the power may be transferred. We have to wait, sometimes it is said, until people are politically and socially educated to be the equals of the people of the Administering Authority, and that is why the transfer of power is delayed. We have also seen that monstrous figment that has been brought up here more than once whereby it is argued that overseas territories are provinces of the metropolis, which makes those areas part of the metropolitan country and therefore not colonies or subject countries. That point was well argued elsewhere, and as I am discussing general principles I do not want to pursue the point, but we know that it is under the guise of these figments that some of the most brutal struggles concerning the subject peoples have been going on, where rank inequality has been continued for several years to justify this legal figment that they belong to the metropolis.

128. So, in that context it is my submission that under the guise of these legal figments we have ignored the Charter. After all, it does not require great intelligence or great wisdom to see that Articles 73, 76 and, what is more, Article 1, paragraph 2, of the Charter, or Article 55, are very simple matters, propositions which are accepted by the world community, and yet, in the implementation of these Articles we find that these authorities have not conformed to the obligations, and that is, as I say, the justification for our draft resolution and the justification for the declaration presented by the Soviet Union.

129. I dealt only in a general way with the basis of Chapters XI, XII and XIII. We are now faced also with another aspect of the problem. There have been unequal treaties, which is always a form or manifestation of colonialism—some have referred to this as neo-colonialism. There have been occasions where the Administering Authority or the dominant Power, while abdicating its power or transferring power, has still retained its economic stranglehold. We may call it neo-colonialism—the term does not matter.

130. Many years ago—and here in this context one cannot forget; one need not subscribe to the doctrine of communism or socialism as such—but it has been pointed out that the time may come—and here it was after the Congress of Berlin in the nineteenth century—it was pointed out by socialist theorists that the time may come when the conflict between the colonial Powers may lead to the point where they might combine to keep jointly a colonial stranglehold on some countries and territories.

131. I would like strictly to adhere to my subject, and this is why I am not mentioning any particular Power. Whether we call it neo-colonialism, or, as another author called it, ultra-imperialism, it is still there.

132. In this context I would say—and here I am not saying so because I want to pursue the point as against the representative of the United Kingdom who spoke this morning—that it is not a question of repeating Marxist texts or Leninist incantations. It is the radical tradition—I am using the word in a very broad sense—which has always guided a country's destinies in ultimate fulfilment of its goal. I can only, in this context, without going into comparative studies, refer to the radical tradition of England which was responsible for enlightened colonial policy at certain phases in its history. And that tradition continues, and it is because of that radical tradition that no less a man than Lenin himself, who in his famous book Imperialism—The Highest Stage of Capitalism, acknowledged a debt to J. Hobson, the English economist, who at the close of the nineteenth century wrote his classic book Imperialism. It is not a question of repeating Leninist incantations; it is a question of taking the struggle to a certain point. It is not a dogma like the Charter, for instance. Is the Charter made for all time? Are the organs and systems which were created in the Charter in 1945 good for all time?

133. Institutions, like human beings, are subject to decay. It is for us, therefore, we who want institutions, to see the ways and means whereby we may improve those institutions. It is in that sense that I would argue that one must not forget—it is not a question, I repeat, of Leninist incantations, but it is the strong radical tradition which has been displayed, or the liberal tradition displayed by those who fought for freedom—for example, even the countries of Latin America, if they had waited until all of them were so refined or so educated or politically and socially the equals of the colonial Powers, they would still have to wait perhaps until doomsday. In the long run we will all be dead and that is why it is necessary, at a particular stage in the history of human affairs, that we take stock of these things.

134. It is in that sense that I would argue that when we adopted by acclamation the inscription of this item on the agenda of the Assembly, we took upon ourselves a burden, the task of formulating either by some resolution or other measure—a declaration, if you care to put it that way—a proclamation whereby we would not only offer hope to those who are still in the colonies, but something which would be implemented by the colonial Powers as such.

135. I would like to regard the draft resolution which we have submitted as coming in the long line of various declarations which have now become international law. It is not a question here of a pure juridical concept or the creation of law; on the contrary, it is a question of trying to find the proper place in the development of human society for this particular measure.

136. I would argue that in the same way—and here it may be that some States were not parties to some of the great laws which today mark and perhaps enrich history; for instance, I refer to the Declaration of Paris in 1856, which marked the turning point in the laws of land warfare. I refer to the Declaration of St. Petersburg in 1868 which again took a further step in the development of the humanization of war. I refer, for instance, to the Hague Conventions of 1899 and 1907. Similarly, one could argue that here in our draft resolution perhaps—I would have not only to defend it but see in it certain merits, which may be absent from the Soviet declaration, but I think, and I submit, that the two are complementary; there is no fundamental disagreement in our basic objectives, and what is more, we can see that on the basic issues we are in agreement although we may say it in different ways.

137. I do not want to repeat that point, but I would like, in addressing an international Assembly like this, to point out that if these great declarations of the past, of the nineteenth century, culminating perhaps in the greatest declarations of our time, namely, the Charter, the judgements and the principles of Nuremberg, if they have been accepted by this Assembly, if they have passed into international law, it would be with a view to achieving a certain objective. It is in that light that I would like to ask the representatives to pass the declaration contained in our draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1].

138. Here again, may I say that as an international body we may not be a lawmaking body as such. The draft resolution which is before this Assembly has a sanction. It is the public opinion behind it, or the moral opinion of the world represented here. Perhaps in this declaration we would also find the moral judgement of the nations.

139. On this particular point, let me recall—because I am sure that the speakers who follow me tomorrow will go into the draft resolution in detail—the history, as it was, of one of the most important aspects of colonialism in the past. I regard it as colonialism because it was one form of colonialism of which, perhaps, we are not aware today. Historically, I would state that at the Congress of Vienna in 1815 it was the British delegate, Castlereagh himself, who proposed that in the Final Act of the Congress of Vienna there should be a clause eliminating or dealing with the suppression of the slave-trade, and so it was embodied, but that did not mean that slavery came to an end.

140. That is what I am concerned with when discussing the draft resolution—what was embodied in the Final Act in 1815. Similarly, as I argued—in 1919 we had the Mandates System, perhaps a manifestation of the then enlightened conscience of Europe, and in 1945 the Trusteeship System, but if I am to state the later history of the slave-trade—because it is pertinent to my task—as the slave-trade was not abolished immediately after 1815 because certain countries did not perhaps in their national legislation provide for its abolition. It was only in 1885, when, by the Berlin Act, it was formally adopted by all the nations. At that time the number of nations had increased since the time of the Congress of Vienna.

141. There was a further development in 1890. The Brussels Act also dealt with the suppression of the slave-trade, but unfortunately for the world, both these Acts dealt only with the Congo Basin, where the slave-trade was rampant. Therefore, the world had to wait for several years, even for the implementation of that Act. As recently as 1919, after the First World War, when the peace treaties were being debated and negotiated, it was by the Treaty of Saint-Germain in 1919 that the civilized world admitted that the slave-trade was going on in certain areas and that it had to be put down by the authorities concerned. So we have the Slavery Conventions of 1926 and 1956, the supplementary provisions, being dealt with by the International Labour Organisation, a specialized agency of the United Nations.

142. So you will see that there has been a long history, and I have taken just one example. It is a long history but, unfortunately, in the context of global politics today the world, and especially subject peoples are not content to wait so long for the implementation of such resolutions or such declarations. It is therefore essential that here in this body, where there are Administering Authorities—the so-called Trusteeship Powers, with their obligations to subject peoples—and where at the same time there are present, participating on a basis of equality, those who do not possess colonies or Non-Self-Governing Territories; it is essential, I repeat, that both sides—that is, the Administering Authorities and the non-Administering Authorities—subscribe to the view that we have stated as regards the general principles underlying the declaration contained in our draft resolution.

143. It is for that reason that I submit that the declaration and the draft resolution mark a stage in the development of the international conscience of mankind. In point of fact, I would go further and say that the success of the resolution does not depend on the mere adoption of it because we know that we cannot go to war on the ending of colonialism. The struggle continues because freedom is something which is dear to those people who are struggling for it. We may be told that there are peoples in Africa who perhaps still do not want freedom in that sense, who are content to be under the yoke of their colonial masters. It does not require a very brilliant thesis from me to disprove that. But that is the argument which is always adduced. But we here, who have perhaps seen the actual working of the Trusteeship System, we who have seen its effects, realize that without such a declaration it is not possible to take another step further because year in and year out we find the lapses of the Administering Authorities, we find the interplay of world politics coming into question. We also find that sometimes, when there is no argument to justify the withholding of independence, the argument is that the Administering Authority must protect the subject peoples, the dependent peoples from a pernicious doctrine like communism. I think it was in the eighteenth century that Dr. Johnson, a well-known figure in British literary circles, said that "Patriotism was the last refuge of a scoundrel". I am not one to say that those who now argue that we must keep these people in the subject territories immune to communism would subscribe to Dr. Johnson's statement. I am not going to say that here, but very often this argument has been put forward. It is on that basis perhaps that we all know that after the First World War certain States were created to keep Bolshevism out of Europe; but that did not prevent it.

144. So we in Asia, we who have perhaps seen better days and worse days, we who still may have a long way to go in the evolution of our own society, can, I submit, take a more correct view of the development of human society, and it is for that reason that the delegation of Ceylon, while supporting the draft resolution, would also like to say that we are prepared to accept any suggestion—I think I am speaking on behalf of all the co-sponsors—which would improve the resolution so that we could end colonialism once and for all; the sooner the better for all of us. I submit that the day such a declaration is adopted, it will mark a moment in the conscience of civilized mankind.

colonial countries and peoples (continued). 1005*

AGENDA ITEM 87

1. Mr. AMADEO (Argentina) (translated from Spanish): Colonial questions have taken up most of the meetings of this Assembly session and will, in all probability, take up a large part of what remains of the session. This predominance of colonial questions in the United Nations is not the result of chance nor is it entirely due to capricious or arbitrary manoeuvres. It is a reflection of the reality that confronts us today.

2. Our Organization is among other things a great sounding-board where the questions of major concern to the world strongly reverberate. It was inevitable, therefore, that it should be confronted with this question of colonialism—or, if you will, the end of colonialism—which is one of the most deeply disturbing and bitterly controversial topics of this mid-twentieth century.

3. The question takes on added relevance and virulence by reason of being closely linked with the international tension between the great Powers, that is, with what has come to be known as the cold war. There does in fact exist an intimate relationship between the process of liquidating the colonial systems and the balance of power between the strongest nations of the earth. That is what complicates the problem and makes it the pivot on which turn the issues of war and peace.

4. Now the colonial question returns once again in a new guise for our consideration, in the shape of a declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. This is clearly no trivial matter. Hence, it seems impossible to deal with it without a general review, however sketchy, of the scope and significance of colonialism. I hasten to state that I shall try to limit my remarks to what is strictly essential to make our position clear.

5. There is one point which we feel compelled to make at the outset. That is the monotonous persistence with which ready-made phrases and prefabricated slogans recur whenever these colonial questions are discussed. The use of propaganda themes and catchwords is indeed one of the evils of the modern world. The slogan has the advantage that it saves us the trouble of thinking, and as many of our fellow human beings have apparently a real horror of the arduous and difficult task of thinking it is a valuable labour-saving aid. Nevertheless the colonial issue is one of such path and moment that it requires our most objective attention and a serious effort on our part to discern its true essence. We are in fact in the presence of historical events of tremendous importance, and it is lamentable that we who have been privileged to witness such events should, instead of examining them with the passionate interest that is aroused at the sight of history on the march, view them through the veil of sectarianism or the thick cloak of our intellectual poverty.

6. This reproach is not levelled particularly at those who have just emerged from the colonial system or who are seeking to abolish it. When people are suffering or struggling for any cause they have some excuse for not being too impartial. We cannot ignore the legitimate grievances which some colonial peoples may have against their former masters, and a bare, cold analysis of what they have experienced at first hand would be as difficult for them as an objective study of the advantages of a given prison system would be for the inmate of a prison.

7. Those of us, however, whose attitude is not influenced by our past history are in duty bound to consider events in a spirit of justice and with respect for truth. That is the chief contribution which we can make so that this transition between the colonial system and independence may be effected without undue violence and in particular that it may not engender further and more serious explosions.

8. A kind of psychological tyranny has been created which makes it impossible to abandon the currently accepted catchwords in this matter without incurring the charge of complicity in what the phraseology of the moment terms "the enslaving exploitation of the colonial Powers".

9. We wish to state categorically that we shall not allow ourselves to be influenced by this atmosphere, and that we shall define our position without any fear of how it may be interpreted or judged. My country, which has emerged from a process of emancipation that strengthened rather than severed the bonds of affection with its country of origin, is in a position to speak freely on this subject.

10. We do not, it is needless to say, have any colonies, and although we have to make determined claims to one island sector of our territory under foreign control, we have maintained cordial relations in other fields with the Power exercising that control. We have therefore no preconceived notions, and if our sympathies tend to one side or the other, there can be no doubt, in the view of the ample witness which we have given in these very precincts, that these sympathies go to the peoples newly emerging to independence.

11. The colonization process was the outcome of Europe's tremendous impulse for expansion at the end of the Middle Ages. There is no doubt that the "little peninsula backing on Asia", as it was once described, comprised within its narrow confines a collection of peoples gifted with the most extraordinary qualities of intelligence, inventiveness and enterprise that mankind has ever known. The descendants of "Japheth's bold progeny", as the Latin poet called them, soon found the territory assigned to them too small and went off to the four corners of the earth in search of new theatres for the expansion of their creative genius. That was the beginning of the great colonial adventure whose final stages we are now witnessing.

12. We shall not attempt to sketch even briefly the stages in that great historical process which was so complex and had so many different forms and diverse facets. In any event a final judgement on the colonial system would in our opinion be premature. In a general way, however, we do not believe it possible—and least of all at this moment—to pronounce a simple straightforward opinion on what, in the language of Balzac, we might call the "grandeurs and miseries" of the colonial system. Individual cases vary with the period and with the colonizing and the colonized country. To apply a single standard or to render a single concise judgement would, in our opinion, merely misrepresent the extreme complexity of the colonial phenomenon.

13. It is hardly necessary for us to recall that there have been intolerable abuses in the system because we hear it repeated here daily. While some of the evils alleged against the colonial system may be exaggerated, many, on the other hand, are true. When Europe first substituted the desire for gain for the old Christian ideals which directed its first steps towards unknown lands, the profound significance of the colonizing effort was also transformed.

14. We should be engaging in melodramatic truculence if we recalled the now classic impression of those rapacious adventurers which has been conveyed by the cinema and the novel. Such is the disgusting and unfortunately only too true aspect of the colonial system which we cannot condemn too strongly.

15. We have, on the other hand, heard certain representatives of the new countries speaking from this rostrum and telling us that they are indebted to the colonial Powers for nothing except humiliation, tyranny and spoliation. We do not deny the truth of their complaints, but we have noticed one thing: we have noticed that they voice those complaints in an English or a French which is so correct and harmonious that it excites our envy.

16. The point is that when a people has received from another country such a valuable treasure as language, it cannot assert that it owes that country nothing. It is indebted at least for a form of culture so important that it influences even the thought that is expressed in the language. That, however, is not the only positive result of the system that has hitherto been in force. There is also the victorious campaign against disease, the educational work of the missionaries and the constructive efforts of technicians. It may be true that the colonial Powers have themselves benefited from that higher material level and that theirs has often been the lion's share, but it would also be wrong to say that at the end of the period of colonial domination all colonized peoples without exception are morally or materially worse off than before the arrival of the colonizers.

17. To draw up a balance-sheet of colonialism might take us much further than we want to go. The important thing to note is that whatever judgement may be passed on the system now or by future historians, colonialism no longer fits into the political structures of our time. It is a type of relationship which has ended forever. At a time when equality—and I say equality rather than liberty—represents to the masses the greatest good, the survival of systems in which some peoples are dominated by others is an anachronism. It does not matter now what explanation or justification those systems may have had in the past. What is important is that in our day and age we should refuse to allow them to continue.

18. I think that we are almost all agreed upon that point. In his eloquent statement yesterday [925th meeting] the representative of the United Kingdom made an impressive survey of his country's contribution to the emancipation of peoples. It is a policy which has now become general, and we must not underestimate the corresponding contribution which France, the other great colonial Power, has made to that emancipation. It is no longer a question of discussing whether or not colonialism must be brought to an end, but of determining the methods, time limits and procedures by which the process of liquidation is to be effected.

19. Before voting on the specific proposal that has given rise to this debate, we think that some of the chief problems raised by the liquidation of colonialism should be rapidly examined. It is not enough, in our opinion, simply to decree, with all the omnipotence of the Creator when He separated the light from the dark on the first day of the Creation, that "Colonialism is at an end". What is essential, and particularly for the international Organization to which we belong, is to ascertain and attempt to solve the main problems that will follow the end of colonialism.

20. The most important problem which the end of colonialism brings in its wake is the imbalance between the desire for independence of formerly subject peoples and their economic and technical possibilities for self-development. I should like in this regard to make our position quite clear. We do not believe that because a people does not possess the economic potentialities for self-government it should as a matter of principle be deprived of access to independence. Independence is a spiritual value and cannot therefore be reduced to economic terms. It would not be in keeping with the dignity of the human person to say that a people cannot accede to independence because it does not have the material resources to support itself, or because it does not have enough technicians to establish an industry or because it does not have officials qualified to constitute an organic administration.

21. This does not mean that new countries lacking economic or technical resources will not be faced with problems which, in the present state of the world, automatically take on the character of major international crises. This is true because this inability to meet their own needs and the disproportion between their legitimate and sincere desire for independence and the inadequacy of their resources inevitably raise the question of foreign intervention. And with foreign intervention there also arises the question of a covert revival of colonialism and the struggle between world blocs for supremacy in the emancipated countries.

22. This explains why there has recently been so much talk here of "neo-colonialism". The term in itself seems tendentious, but the fact that we may object to the term does not mean that the reality which it seeks to define does not exist. The attainment of independence by some countries—and I say some, not all—does create a problem when they lack the material means for assuming all the responsibilities which independence implies.

23. This problem has already arisen and has been solved in various ways. In some cases the independent countries have retained close links with the former metropolitan country, which provides them with equipment, technicians and financial assistance. It is precisely this type of co-operation which has been vilified as "neo-colonialism". We should find it impossible to agree with this attitude because the co-operation and assistance of the former dominating Power to its newly emancipated colony do not seem to us to be intrinsically evil but appear rather to be in keeping with the natural order of things. Who, after all, is more aware of the country's problems, who has greater experience of its needs, and who can provide it with better qualified technicians than the one that is thoroughly familiar with the country? This is said to be a prolongation of colonialism in another form, but do those who say this have any magic formula by which a country structurally in its infancy can alone, and without external aid, achieve the status of a mature nation?

24. There is of course a second formula: support from one or other of the great Powers which are competing for world influence. The new countries can—and legally there is nothing to prevent this—become "clients" in the Roman sense of the word, of one of these great Powers and receive assistance in exchange for full incorporation into its sphere of influence. But what, we may ask, has then been gained? What difference is there between maintaining bonds with a country with which, after all, links forged by past association still remain, and attachment to some new country, whose hegemony automatically implies entry as a passive element into the struggle for world power?

25. There is, however, a third solution, and we believe that all forces should be channelled towards it. This is collective assistance to new countries through an international organization.

26. If the former colonial Powers and the great Powers of the world want the new States to enjoy a prosperity which does not mean making feudal vassals of them nor aligning them with one of the camps in the cold war, then co-operation through international organizations must be regarded as the ideal solution. We are aware that this channelling of aid is not easy to achieve, and in the case of the Congo we have already seen the difficulties it involves. At the least, however, it is important for us to agree that this international co-operation, rather than individual assistance obtained as a result of conflicting influences, provides the solution which we should seek. In the meantime, until a climate favourable to that solution has been created, we refuse to condemn friendly co-operation at any level between the former metropolitan countries and the new countries, and even more do we refuse to condemn this co-operation when the only alternative is the ideological and political incorporation of the new States into the factions that are struggling for world domination.

27. In making these remarks, it would be unfair not to point out, with reference to the great world Powers, that while the United States has strongly urged that international assistance to the emancipated colonies should be channelled mainly through the United Nations, the Soviet Union, by contrast, has so far done nothing to facilitate this. We have not lost hope, however, that there will be a change of attitude that will allow that great country to co-operate effectively in the effort to place the technical development of the new States under international protection at the level required by their newly acquired independence, and thus keep those countries aloof from the world struggle for power.

28. We cannot conclude these remarks on the assistance that should be provided to new countries without elucidating two basic points.

29. We believe, first of all, that although it may be legitimate for us to consider one form of assistance to be better than another, and although we believe that international assistance is the most beneficial for the recipient country and most conducive to the preservation of peace, we are nevertheless convinced that the final judge of these criteria is the recipient country itself. To place restrictions on its freedom of choice would be to impose conditions on the independence that has been granted to it and to diminish the full sovereignty which that independence implies.

30. Secondly, our support for the continuation of friendly co-operation between the former colonies and metropolitan countries refers only to co-operation that rests on effective equality and mutual respect.

31. We believe that it would be a farce, to which no serious State could lend itself, to grant nominal independence but in fact to maintain clandestine relations of dependency. We do not, however, have any reason to believe that such Machiavellian plans are being carried out, and we have complete faith in the sincerity with which the metropolitan Powers are encouraging the process of emancipation.

32. We have been told, and it has been proposed, that the colonial system should be brought to an immediate end. Our opinion of this proposal is as follows. We think that we have made clear, beyond all doubt, what our views are with regard to the liquidation of colonialism.

33. The problem, then, is not to decide for or against the colonial system, but rather to be prudent in the true Aristotelian sense of the word. Hence any proposal on this subject should, above all, take into account the information provided by actual facts.

34. Now what do the facts tell us? They tell us that the process of "decolonization", if I may be pardoned for the neologism, is going ahead at a rapid pace and will, without any need for artificial assistance, be largely accomplished in a very short space of time. In this respect, we may count upon the assurances given by the main colonial Powers. Also, the fact that this year the United Nations has admitted seventeen new countries, which were previously dependent on these Powers, provides in our opinion a firm guarantee that these assurances were not given in vain.

35. Naturally my Government does not oppose nor could it ever oppose any desire expressed in fulfilment of our common aspiration to see the colonial system come to an end as soon as possible, once and for all. We do not, on the other hand, believe that the fixing of a dead-line here and now would really accelerate the process. The situations are not all the same, and each one requires its own specific tempo. The important thing is to help to create an atmosphere of mutual understanding and harmony that will facilitate the progressive and expeditious dissolution of the old colonial bonds. If they were to be broken in an atmosphere of hatred, the result would be to slow down the process and condemn the countries achieving emancipation to the alternative of chaos or a new and graver form of submission.

36. In declaring that the colonial era has ended, we cannot consider the process of emancipation to be complete so long as certain forms of domination by some States over others, which while not usually included under the term "colonialism" are nevertheless particularly odious and oppressive, persist in the world. Therefore, we cannot allow this opportunity to pass without emphatically stating that if colonialism is to disappear, then there is equally good reason for the elimination of those forms of political and ideological oppression under which many millions of human beings in Europe and in Asia are living today. They also deserve our close attention and solidarity.

37. At this stage of the debate a large group of African-Asian countries has submitted a draft resolution which appears in document A/L.323 and Add.1. My delegation, after carefully examining this text, considers that in its general lines it coincides with the views I have just expressed, and we are therefore in principle ready to support it. My delegation naturally reserves the right to express further opinions on any revision or amendment that may be submitted.

38. In times such as those through which the African and Asian continents are now passing, it is natural that an atmosphere of optimism and elation should arise. These times remind us of the eve of the French Revolution when, in a fervent hour of liberation, the nobility and the clergy gave up century-old privileges. We should, nevertheless, issue a warning of the dangers that may lie ahead. The road that now awaits the new, free countries is, as the nations of Latin America know all too well, both difficult and tortuous.

39. We are convinced that fewer difficulties will be encountered on this road if the new nations will combine their national and continental aspirations with a spirit of generous universality. For this it is necessary that no bitterness should remain from the stage through which they have already passed. Their independence must really mark the beginning of an era dedicated entirely to the future.

40. Argentina greets the awakening of the new nations with optimism and hope and brings them its message of fraternal solidarity.

41. Mr. QUAISON-SACKY (Ghana): This is a day of salvation to millions of people living in colonial territories and other territories which are yet to be independent. For the first time, this world Organization is pronouncing itself on the fate of these millions. In fact, today, the General Assembly has taken up one of the most important problems of contemporary international politics, namely, the problem of the complete eradication of colonialism from the world. From the earliest times to this very day, the problem of imperialism has vexed and puzzled the human conscience and men have never been able to find a satisfactory solution to it. Mankind has never been able to find any moral justification for the imposition of foreign rule by one country or race over another. The human mind can never justify imperialism, no matter how hard it tries, because it is morally indefensible and utterly unjustifiable for any group of people to claim that they have an inherent right to impose their rule, with all its attendant consequences, over others.

42. We have met on this momentous occasion to find a lasting and just solution to this problem; and to abolish all the inequalities of imperialism. We are not here to engage in an idle or philosophical exercise, because we are dealing with an ever-present issue which endangers the very peace and stability of our present-day world. It is my delegation's view that the issue of the complete eradication of colonialism is inextricably bound up with the problem of establishing and maintaining peace and friendship among peoples of all races and civilizations. In the final analysis, peace and stability can come to the world only when all peoples are free and enjoy equal rights and fundamental freedoms, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion. This, then, is the noble task on which we have embarked at these historic plenary meetings of the General Assembly. It is the earnest hope of my delegation that no attempts will be made by any delegation to drag into our deliberations any extraneous factors or preoccupations.

43. The question with which we are dealing, namely, the burning desire and aspirations of millions of people who still live in the non-independent territories, is far too serious to be approached in a partisan or irresponsible spirit. Let us therefore deal in a constructive manner with the practical problems of securing freedom for such peoples as have not yet, in the words of Article 73 of the United Nations Charter, attained a full measure of self-government. The colonial Powers have, I believe, accepted the solemn obligations of our Charter to promote to the utmost, as a sacred trust, the welfare of these peoples, to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of these peoples and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions.

44. With the exception of Portugal and Spain, all the colonial Powers have co-operated with the United Nations in fully accepting the doctrine of international accountability contained in Chapters XI to XIII of the Charter, dealing with peoples living in Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories. Ghana has always maintained that no part of Africa can be regarded as an extension of Europe. Continental pride alone will not suffer us to take kindly to Portuguese and Spanish claims. Now that the report of the Special Committee of Six [A/4526] has been approved by the Fourth Committee, my delegation appreciates the readiness of the Government of Spain to yield ground, and we hope that both Spain and Portugal will stop clinging to the juridical fiction that their possessions are "overseas provinces" and that they will furnish to the United Nations full information on these territories and will take immediate steps to transfer to the peoples of Angola, Mozambique, Ifni and West Sahara all the powers which will enable them to enjoy their sovereignty and independence and to safeguard their territorial integrity. Ghana calls upon Portugal and Spain to follow the example of France and the United Kingdom, which have seen the light of day, and to express their clear intention also to allow their territories in Africa and elsewhere to attain complete independence.

45. It is a source of gratification to my delegation that we have come to a juncture in history when we talk of the complete eradication of colonial rule. I must say that this is a splendid culmination of a process of development in international thinking and morality to which men of good will from all over the world have generously and valiantly contributed. Anti-colonialism is not the monopoly of one group or any race or philosophy or government. It has a long history, which, for convenience, we might date back to the first successful colonial revolutions of our time. I refer, indeed, to the revolutions of the Americans which overthrew the British and Spanish colonial rule in the Western Hemisphere and established the right of the peoples of this continent to live and develop as free men under political institutions of their own choice. The names of George Washington, Simón Bolívar and José Martí, who led the great anti-colonial revolutions against British and Spanish colonial rulers in the Americas, are known all over the world, and the deeds of these men have been sources of inspiration to the leaders of the national liberation movements throughout the world.

46. In fact, it was an Englishman, John Hobson, who in 1902 published a book entitled Imperialism in which he systematically examined the economic relations between the dependent peoples and their colonizers, mostly from the industrial nations of Europe, and thus gave a fruitful turn of meaning to this word which formed the title of his book. Other European thinkers, such as Lenin, starting from socialist assumptions, developed Hobson's analysis further to embrace more recent developments in the colonial world. Such analysis and writings no doubt influenced the thoughts and actions of a generation of leaders who later led the revolt against colonialism in Asia and Africa. It was, however, in the colonial world itself that the peoples, bent upon liberating themselves from alien rule, initiated their own anti-colonialist revolutions and drew on the rich experiences gained in ringing manifestos and resolutions which have become part of the history of our time.

47. In Africa, where many territories are still under foreign domination, words and positive action have not been lacking in making it clear to the colonizers that Africa wants to be completely free from the shackles of imperialism and colonialism. "Seek ye first the political kingdom," thundered Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana, "and all other things will be added unto it." Then, to those who have maintained that Africa needs foreign domination, exploitation and Western culture because Africa is a dark continent, the following lines written by Dei-Anang of Ghana in his Africa Speaks are an answer:

"In the pages of the past,
In the faithless days of long ago,
When vision was short, and knowledge scant,
Men called me 'Dark Africa'.

Dark Africa?
I, who raised the regal pyramids,
And held the fortunes
Of conqu'ring Caesars
In my tempting grasp?

Dark Africa?
Who nursed the doubtful child
Of civilization
On the wand'ring banks
Of life-giving Nile,
And gave to the teeming nations
Of the West
A Grecian gift!

The dazzling glare of iron and steel
Sometimes obscures non-metal worth;
So when I disdained my pristine
Bows and arrows,
And cared not much for iron and steel,
They called me 'Dark' in all the world.

But dearer far than cold steel and iron
Is the tranquil art
Of thinking together
And living together.

Dark Africa?
Underneath the clotted roots
Of my kingly whistling palms,
I keep a treasure that none can measure.

Dark Africa!
My dawn is here:
Behold, I see
A rich-warm glow in the East,
And my day will soon be here."

48. There has been a tremendous reawakening in Africa. What Prime Minister Macmillan described during his recent visit to Africa as a "wind of change" is rather a raging hurricane sweeping all before it. The writings of Rousseau, Jefferson, Marx, Thomas Paine, Machiavelli and other political thinkers have had their influence. Thus, everywhere in Africa, Africans demand freedom, equality and justice: whether in Algeria, where the Algerian heroes are fighting for independence against the forces of France; whether in Central Africa, where Africans refuse to have imposed upon them political institutions which they do not like; whether in South Africa, Angola, Mozambique or East Africa, where Africans are opposed to racial segregation and refuse to allow a minority of Europeans to hold in ransom a majority of Africans, the struggle continues.

49. Mention must of course be made of that great gathering of peoples from Asia and Africa at Bandung in 1955, where our leaders collectively declared emphatically their unrelenting opposition to imperialism and colonialism in all its forms. In the final "communiqué" of that great historic conference, the peoples of Asia and Africa agreed:

"First, in declaring that colonialism in all its manifestations is an evil which should speedily be brought to an end;

"Second, in affirming that the subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights, is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and is an impediment to the promotion of world peace and co-operation."

50. These sentiments have subsequently found echoes in resolutions adopted at the conferences of the independent African States held at Accra, Monrovia and, more recently, at Addis Ababa. It must be recalled that the First Conference of Independent African States held at Accra from 15 to 22 April 1958 marked a landmark in the history of the African continent. For the first time leaders of the independent African States came together to pool their ideas concerning problems confronting Africa. If in 1885 European Powers met in Berlin to decide what they should do to Africa, namely to scramble to Africa and to set up artificial frontiers, in April 1958 leaders of the independent African States met at Accra to undo that decision. Allow me to quote from the Addis Ababa Conference resolution on the eradication of colonial rule from Africa; it was a very important document:

"Recalling the declaration of Bandung and the resolutions of Accra and Monrovia proclaiming that colonialism in all its manifestations constitutes an evil which should speedily be brought to an end;

"Reaffirming that the subjugation of peoples to alien domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental rights which is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and is an impediment to the promotion of world peace and co-operation;

"Considering that Africa is the only continent where a large proportion of the inhabitants still live under colonial domination with all its privations and indignities;

"Considering further that the present awakening of the people of Africa and the independence movements can no longer be contained, without the risk of seriously compromising relations between the different nations;

"Believing that the restoration of the natural rights and human dignity to the Africans, in those parts of Africa at present under foreign subjugation, as well as the peaceful enjoyment of the hard-won freedom by the peoples of the Independent African States, could only be achieved through the complete eradication of colonial rule from our continent;

"...

"Urges the colonial Powers to fix dates in conformity with the will of the people for the immediate attainment of independence by all non-independent countries and to communicate those dates to the people concerned;

"Resolves that the Independent African States continue to exert concerted action to achieve through all possible peaceful means the complete eradication of colonial rule from Africa."

51. It must be said that the establishment of the United Nations coincided with a period of profound political transformation and revolution in Asia and Africa. At San Francisco fifteen years ago there was an awareness that something had to be done about the vast areas in Asia and Africa which were then under colonial domination. What prompted the United Nations at that time to draw a line between the former colonies of vanquished Germany on the one hand, and colonies under the rule of the victorious Allies on the other, remains a puzzle to my delegation. The principles of the sacred trust and international accountability should have applied in full measure and equal intensity to all non-independent territories; but instead there were enshrined in the Charter a declaration on Non-Self-Governing Territories and another one on Trusteeship, with the result that Trust Territories have, on the whole, moved faster towards independence than so-called Non-Self-Governing Territories. Another sorry result is that today the fate of South West Africa hangs in fire. Nevertheless, after the Second World War it became quite clear that it would be impossible to restore the supremacy of Western Europe militarily or economically over large parts of Asia and Africa.

52. Those European countries which misjudged the temper of those times, and thought they could return and set up shop as if nothing had happened, learned to their bitter cost that the times have indeed changed. Great and once submerged nations were thus reborn. The emancipation of Asia from white domination and supremacy was triumphantly proclaimed. Almost all of these reborn nations joined the United Nations, thus enriching our Organization with their ancient wisdom and cultures. This movement, which began in Asia, has now become a general revolt against colonialism everywhere—a revolt against political stranglehold, economic exploitation and racial inequality. As I have already said, there is a great reawakening in Africa, where today the largest concentrations of dependent and non-self-governing peoples are to be found. In summing up the effects of these revolutions in Asia and Africa, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, over which I had the privilege to preside, noted in April 1960 the following:

"The number of Territories fell from seventy-four to fifty-five and the aggregate of population from approximately 215 million to approximately 113 million, a figure which includes a natural population increase in the remaining Territories of some 22 million over the period. In particular, the total number of Asian and Pacific peoples identified as belonging to Non-Self-Governing Territories was reduced from more than 113 million to less than 14 million. By the end of the period, the continent of Africa contained the last great groups of peoples, totalling some 96 million, whose political status had yet to be finally determined." [A/4371, part two, para. 10.]

53. Nigeria and the former French territories in Africa have since become independent, but the number of those still living under colonial rule in Africa runs into the millions. It is the fate of these millions that we are called upon here to decide. The vast and most beneficent change that has come over contemporary international society today is that the former colonial peoples are no longer passive objects of policy but driving forces—driving forces for peace, sanity and racial equality in a world torn by bitter ideological conflicts. They have taken the initiative in building a world from which the scourge of war will forever be banished. Today they spearhead the movement to translate the lofty aims of our Charter into concrete actions for the betterment of all mankind.

54. The thinking of all progressive people, therefore, seems to be directed towards the eradication of colonial rule and imperialism because it is now evident that the continuation of this iniquitous system of domination and exploitation poses a serious threat to international peace and stability. The urgent problems that are to be solved on the African continent today are largely colonial problems. There is an urgent task of granting freedom to the peoples of Angola, Kenya, Uganda, Northern and Southern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, Ruanda-Urundi, South West Africa, the 11.5 million Africans of South Africa, Malta, Algeria and Mozambique, to name only a few territories which are yet to be represented in this world Organization.

55. Then, there is the tragic question of them all, and I refer to the problem of Algeria. The heroic struggle of the Algerian people against French colonialism is now in its seventh year. About this great tragedy, I wish to quote briefly from an editorial captioned "Another Seven Years War" which appeared in The New York Times of Wednesday, 2 November 1960:

"The war in Algeria, which began with rebel raids on November 1, 1954, enters its seventh year amid rising international tensions, mounting discord in France itself and growing involvement of the Communist bloc seeking to make this unhappy land a pawn in the cold war.

"This conflict, which in French eyes is a civil war in which no outsiders must interfere, has already cost 150,000—mostly rebel—lives, with an additional 14,000—mostly Moslem—civilians killed by terrorists. It keeps the bulk of the French Army pinned down in Algeria to the detriment of the West's main front in central Europe. It saps France of $1 billion a year. It raises the twin specters of Communist 'volunteers' in Algeria and another military coup in France.

"The special tragedy of this continued conflict is that both sides agree on the only possible solution for it. This solution is Algerian self-determination, offered by President de Gaulle, accepted by the rebels. But there is no agreement on giving practical effect to this proposal...."

56. I quote The New York Times because it is a paper that cannot be accused of being unsympathetic to the French point of view on this question. But even The New York Times sees clearly the tragedy and the futility of continuing a war which, to the mind of my delegation, will no doubt end only in the victory of the Algerian peoples and the establishment of an independent Algeria. Our world Organization must declare unequivocally that armed intervention against colonial peoples who demand their independence and sovereignty should be banned completely.

57. The solution of the colonial problem has thus become the most urgent problem of our time, and it is upon its solution that the peace, stability and orderly progress of our world depend. The profound aspirations of peoples who are still living under colonial rule in the Non-Self-Governing Territories must be fully realized if wars and racial conflicts are to be avoided. Reasons of inadequate economic, social or educational development must no longer be invoked as a pretext to delay the transfer of freedom and independence to these peoples. Their first and foremost demand is for freedom—freedom which will enable them to undertake the arduous tasks of international reconstruction and development.

58. What we are witnessing in the non-independent territories is what a great American has called the revolution of "rising expectations". The first objective of this resolution is to secure self-government and independence for peoples who still live under alien rule. Without freedom and independence, these peoples cannot hope to solve realistically and speedily their economic and social problems. It has been our experience in Ghana that national freedom and independence have released our creative energies and have given a fillip to a tremendous enthusiasm and willingness for building a better material and spiritual life. It has been our noble task, as an economically less developed country, to strive with all our resourcefulness to conquer poverty and malnutrition and to build up adequate social, medical and educational services, thus making Ghana a fit country for heroes to live in. We have no doubt that other re-emergent countries are moving in the same direction.

59. One must never lose sight of the underlying economic and social factors of the great anti-colonial revolutions of our time. Colonialism created a world which was and is, to a large extent, still divided into advanced industrial and under-developed colonial peoples. This division of function, broadly corresponding with a division of political status, was for a long time the basis of the world economy; political inequality matched inequality of economic status, as well as racial inequality. This division of the world between advanced and so-called backward peoples led to the intensive industrialization of metropolitan areas, to the exclusion of the so-called dependent territories. Have these colonial territories not enormous resources which can help transform them to economically advanced countries? It was Sir Winston Churchill who, in his book My African Journey, observed:

"So much power running to waste, such a coign of vantage unoccupied, such lever to control the natural forces of Africa ungripped, cannot but vex and stimulate the imagination."

60. But then, it has never been the policy of colonial Powers to develop the territories under them to an economically high level, because to them colonies must remain sources of raw materials and minerals. Thus it is that I do not know of any colonial territory in Africa which on the attainment of independence can be described as an economically advanced country. It is this sad legacy of colonialism that the anti-colonial revolution aims to destroy and to work for the type of a world economic system which will enable all peoples to enjoy a widely diffused and a high material and cultural standard of living. The pressing task of our time—and this will become more pressing after we have abolished colonialism—is the establishment of sound economic relations between the countries of Asia and Africa and the great industrial countries of Europe and America. Capital investment, technical assistance, planned national economies, planned international trade to protect the economies of these areas from excessive price fluctuations—these elements are necessary if the anti-colonial revolution is to be guided by the United Nations to a peaceful and successful consummation.

61. These great tasks of development can only be undertaken successfully in a world of freedom, independence and national dignity, and under governments freely chosen by these peoples without regard to race, creed or colour. Alien rule, no matter how benevolent or paternalistic, inhibits the free development of peoples, saps their creative energies and deprives them of their national self-respect and dignity. Foreign domination can never be a substitute for independence. Our task, therefore, is to liberate these peoples, to call upon the colonial Powers to take immediate steps to transfer to these peoples their God-given right to independence and sovereignty.

62. It is the conviction of my delegation that greater opportunities will be opened up for more fruitful international co-operation for economic and social development when all the countries that are still non-independent become free and their representatives join us here in the United Nations. We regard the independence of these peoples as a crucial and necessary step in building a world where all peoples, regardless of ideology, race, colour or creed, can co-operate in the establishment of those economic and social conditions which alone can guarantee peace and stability in our world.

63. I submit that our task is only beginning. We must first set these peoples free, so that they can join us here at the United Nations. Our next task will be to devise an appropriate machinery of international co-operation for the development of adequate economic, social and cultural standards for all peoples. I suggest, therefore, that, as a logical follow-up to the declaration which the General Assembly is about to adopt here, we also give serious thought to the speedy establishment of an international machinery which will provide adequate financial and technical aid to these peoples during the initial stages of their national reconstruction and development.

64. I hope that this General Assembly, before it adjourns, will take the first necessary steps to set up a United Nations capital development fund to aid all developing countries. If the rich countries of the world make available one per cent each of their national revenues to such a fund, this would help avoid East-West competition to win allies.

65. In conclusion, may I say that the draft declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples contained in document A/L.323 and Add.1, which is before this Assembly, has been prepared by forty-five Asian and African delegations whose countries have invariably passed through the colonial mill.

66. The declaration itself is self-explanatory. However, my delegation wishes to emphasize categorically, first, that Ghana is uncompromisingly opposed to colonialism in all its forms, and Ghana has no apology to render to anyone for this stand.

67. Secondly, we prefer complete independence with danger to servitude in tranquillity, and, therefore, we are firmly of the opinion that inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness should never be used as a pretext to delay the transfer of sovereignty and independence.

68. Thirdly, Ghana believes that the attainment of independence should not be based on any conditions. In this regard, Ghana is opposed to colonial Powers who cajole nationalist leaders to sign military treaties permitting the establishment of military bases and to grant economic concessions before independence, and we warn political leaders of this new colonialism which can be more devastating and soul-killing than the traditional colonialism which we all know.

69. Fourthly, Ghana calls upon all colonial Powers to eschew the use of armed action and other repressive acts directed against freedom fighters.

70. Fifthly, it is the firm view of Ghana that immediate measures should be initiated by the colonial Powers to hand over all powers, including the exercise of sovereignty, to all territories that are not yet independent, in accordance with their legitimate wishes for freedom and independence. If this is done now, Ghana believes that by 1962 all Africa, including Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, Angola and Mozambique, will be free.

71. Lastly, Ghana reaffirms its faith in the United Nations and is strongly of the belief that the United Nations should serve as a bulwark against all attacks on the territorial integrity, unity and independence of nations.

72. I would like to express the hope of my delegation that this draft declaration submitted by African-Asian States will be adopted unanimously by the General Assembly. This is not a document that should give rise to any partisan rancour. We are here dealing with the hopes and aspirations of millions of people who still live in the Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories of the world and who look to the United Nations to help them in their long and arduous march towards freedom and independence. Indeed, we would be failing in our duty if we were to forget these peoples and allow this debate to degenerate into one more fruitless exercise in the so-called cold war. History and, indeed, the silent millions in the under-developed areas who are carefully listening to our proceedings, will not forgive us if we allow our endeavours here to be bedevilled by irrelevant ideological wranglings. We should come out boldly and support the right of these peoples to freedom and independence. All of us—those of us from erstwhile colonial areas and those who presently colonize and administer alien peoples—should vote for an end to colonialism now and for the restoration of human rights and fundamental freedoms to all peoples without regard to race, colour or creed.

73. Mr. SHUKAIRY (Saudi Arabia): For the first time in the history of the United Nations, the question of colonialism is brought to the foreground on the platform of this Organization, which has opened its doors wide to it. In past years it is undeniable that colonial issues, whether in the General Assembly or in its Committees, have been examined under one item or the other, but never before has colonialism in its entirety been projected into the full light, into full-fledged discussion, with the lofty hope of collective action worthy of the authority of the United Nations and its dignity.

74. I preface my statement with this firm and sincere hope, for the problem of colonialism ranks uppermost in the history of human relations. It stands as high as a giant in the field of international relations. It involves political captivity, economic domination, social enslavement and cultural subjugation that affect not only the colonial peoples but human society as a whole. To measure its devastating evils, it is sufficient to know that colonialism involves at the present time the future of 100 million people. This fact, treated in passing, may sound of ordinary significance. It may not arouse deep reflection or provoke our imagination. Yet, when we pause for a steady focus, the picture shows up in all its shades and colours, and indeed in all its dimensions. The picture, then, presents the realities of the lives of millions and millions of people; their food—I dare say their starvation; their clothing—I dare say their nakedness; their shelter—I dare say their exposure; their education—I dare say their ignorance; their health—I dare say their debility; their social and economic progress—I dare say their social and economic misery.

75. All this should invite our attention to the importance of the problem. Colonialism is no casual problem which we can examine with our minds at leisure, and with our hearts at ease. It is a problem we should discuss with an alert mind, a lively heart and a restless soul. Of all international problems except disarmament, colonialism is second to none. In fact, colonialism, war and disarmament are the three unscrupulous musketeers that are driving the vehicle of humanity into the abyss—and what an abyss—of annihilation. I have placed colonialism first in order, because war for colonialism is the institution, and armaments are its tools. Armaments are not the great toys and hobbies of humanity; they are the grim reaper of mankind, and colonialism is the harvest. Neither is war an end in itself. All through our history, people did not war for war; they warred to achieve usurpation and exploitation. In plain terms, they warred to usurp the wealth of a territory and exploit the possessions of its people. They warred to realize high returns at a cheap cost, cheap labour and cheap raw materials. They warred to conquer a new ground of exploitation, to expand or to defend what had already been conquered. Even the First World War of 1914, which was thought to be one of ideas and ideals, was principally motivated by colonialism. In the words of Dr. Moon, an American authority on international affairs:

"The catastrophe of 1914 was not brought about by the personal vagaries of William Hohenzollern... The very alignment of European powers was dictated by imperialism, not by race or democracy or kinship of culture ... Imperialism is the root and 'raison d'être' of world politics ..."

76. I do not need to heap the evidence in support of this valid assertion. It is enough to recall that colonialism was behind many treaties, many alliances, many "ententes" and many conferences. Indeed, colonialism was behind the paradox of converting friends into enemies, of making enemies out of friends. In a word, colonialism has been the greatest single factor in history to make bad history. And what history is as bad as that when our generation was destined to witness two-thirds of the world's population groaning under the yoke of colonialism?

77. It is common knowledge that on the eve of the Second World War ten imperialist nations possessed colonies and protectorates seven times the size of Europe. It was estimated that, out of the two billion people inhabiting this planet, one-and-a-half billion were living under the régime of colonialism in company with disease, ignorance and poverty—the most notorious enemies of mankind. The estimate has revealed that every man, woman and child in Great Britain had ten colonial subjects, black, brown and yellow; and that for every acre in France there were twenty in the French colonies. At that time colonies were very much bigger than the so-called mother country. The colonies of Italy were six times the size of Italy; of Portugal, twenty-three times that of Portugal; and of Belgium, eighty-one times the size of Belgium. Hence, contrary to the rules of creation, the child was manifoldly bigger than its parents; indeed all the parents put together.

78. This picture has materially changed. The dimensions of colonialism have decreased and the forces of liberty have increased. Liberty has triumphed and many victories have been scored. The struggle of peoples for freedom, their yearnings for independence, their stirrings for economic betterment, their agitations for social advance, and in a word, their strivings for human fulfilment, have reversed the wrongful trend of history. Empires have fallen, shattered into splinters, and colonialism was withdrawing in retreat after retreat because liberty was scoring triumph after triumph.

79. The outcome, the glorious outcome, is now with us. Many nations here in the Assembly Hall have achieved their independence; indeed, I would say they have captured their independence. They entered the United Nations—indeed they have forced open its doors—and now they are here in the United Nations occupying their worthy seats, outnumbering their old masters. Many of their representatives, even those who come here to the rostrum of this Assembly, come from jails, from concentration camps and from detention cells as sovereign equals with their jailers.

80. The other day, when the question of the Congo was discussed in the General Assembly, I saw with my own eyes in this passage in the middle of this house, Mr. Ormsby-Gore, the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs of the United Kingdom, kneeling down on his knees and speaking before the delegations of Ghana and Nigeria, begging of them not to press for their proposal. Fortunately or unfortunately, the cameramen of the United Nations missed this historic occasion, that historic pose.

81. This is how the trend of events has been reversed from retrogression into progression, from monstrous history into glorious history and from the abyss of degradation into the heights of human dignity.

82. But the battle for freedom is not yet at an end. We still have an unfinished task to do. We must do it, here and now, at this session and in this Assembly. At this historic moment, when we are debating colonialism, we must recall that many a people in many a country are still chained in colonialism. Call them what you will—colonies, trust territories, non-self-governing countries, dominated areas—the simple truth cries out with anger and vehemence that 100 million people are still under the heels of foreign rule. And mind you, these 100 million souls are listening to our deliberations with mounting hope and promise. They are waiting for your voices to champion their freedom; for your resolutions to sponsor their liberty; and for your votes in support of their independence. That is their right and this is our duty. The dominated peoples are entitled to overthrow this domination, even by the force of arms, and the United Nations is duty-bound to declare its end. In fairness, I should say, this obligation of the United Nations has long been overdue, and it is high time to discharge our obligations, with no delay and without hesitation.

83. Surely our obligation in this regard has been overdue for a long time in the past. In the Charter of the United Nations, in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and in a host of United Nations resolutions, we have pledged ourselves to respect the principle of self-determination for all peoples, large and small. But colonialism is still reigning in many parts of the world.

84. Even in our books, in the United Nations books, the world is classified into dependent and independent peoples, thus consecrating the ugliest discrimination in the treatment of the human race. Dependence, as a status, must be finished and liquidated forever. By doing so the United Nations will truly become a United Nations. We have no valid title, at least to our name as a United Nations, when 100 million people are not with us in this Organization as fully independent and fully sovereign peoples. They must be with us, not as they have been, so far, as subjects of discussion, or as topics of debates; they should be with us as fully sovereign States and fully independent Members.

85. If colonialism is the impediment, then colonialism should be destroyed, and destroyed forever, and we have the task of destroying it. All peoples should become free. Men are born free, and no man should be allowed to enslave man. This is not only right and just, but it is the dictate of human brotherhood under the fatherhood of God.

86. This is no sermon preached to a religious congregation; neither is our Organization a worshipping house. This is simply a reiteration of our obligations, and a reaffirmation of our objectives. In fact, it is a summation of our Charter to which we have all solemnly subscribed. And if disarmament, as aptly described by Premier Khrushchev, is the problem of problems, then colonialism, I submit, is the evil of all evils, and we have to destroy colonialism, root and branch. This is the unfinished task which we must finish.

87. But this voice does not come only from the newly independent nations. This has been the voice of humanity ever since man started to dominate man. Even when colonialism was at its peak there were heroic voices condemning colonialism. At a time when the frontiers of the British Empire were racing with the setting and rising of the sun, there were many leading Englishmen condemning British imperialism. Jeremy Bentham, father of British radicalism, in a letter published in 1830 under the title "Emancipate Your Colonies", stressed that colonies involve a great military and naval expense, the danger of foreign war, and political corruption in the mother country. This was said just as though he were speaking to this Organization in 1960.

88. Along the same lines, James Mill, in his article in the 1818 supplement to the Encyclopedia Britannica, exposed colonialism and its evils. But the most devastating attack has come from Richard Cobden, the apostle of free trade. He called the British Government of that era "a standing conspiracy to rule and bamboozle the people". Probably "bamboozle" is a word foreign to our century, but these are the words of the British gentleman.

89. No matter how polite and courteous one can be, the fact cannot be avoided that colonialism, from beginning to end, is nothing but the exploitation of weak peoples and the usurpation of their wealth. I do not myself wish to use the words "robbery" or "bamboozle", for robbery is inherent in colonialism itself.

90. Of course, colonialism was not left without defence. But this is the case of the culprit who establishes himself as his own judge and pronounces his own innocence. The attempt was always abortive and it simply proved the guilt, and what a most heinous guilt it was.

91. Colonialism, it was claimed, has a civilizing mission, a "mission sacrée", towards the black race. In accordance with this baseless premise, the white man has a right to exercise, a duty to discharge and a burden to shoulder. The white man's burden is the whole philosophy of colonialism. But this philosophy was exposed by its own philosophers. It was Rudyard Kipling, the poet of imperialism, who sang:

"Take up the white man's burden,
Your new-caught, sullen peoples,
Half-devil and half-child."

92. The truth, I submit, is that colonialism is the devil itself. Colonialism is not the white man's burden. It has proved to be the white man's spoil and prize. If it had been a burden at all, it is because the white man was overburdened with the wealth of the black, with the treasure of the brown and with the riches of the yellow. This is the burden of the white man with which he was overburdened.

93. Yet the white man can legitimately be asked, and I put the question now: who has entrusted you with this burden to shoulder? And who has vested you with that right to exercise? And who has charged you with this obligation to discharge? Of the millions and millions of white men, let one single white man volunteer the answer—but a sensible answer.

94. You cannot deny that an answer to these questions has been attempted by many architects of colonialism. In this field the French have proved to be the cleverest advocates for a losing case. In 1886, Alfred Rambaud, a professor at the Sorbonne, wrote a whole volume in justification of colonialism, with a boastful title: La France coloniale. This title is enough to blemish the case of colonialism. In 1870, Beaulieu, a French economist, wrote to say that: "Every day that passes convinces me more and more of the importance of colonization in general, and its importance above all to France." So, above all, it is France which is at stake. More recently, in 1924, Victor Beauregard, in his book L'empire colonial de la France, declared: "The study of history reveals a conclusion which has the certainty of an axiom: France more than any other nation has a genius for colonization." This is a genius fallacy, and if this is an axiom then it is an axiom of fallacy. For shortly after this reference to the genius of France, the writer went on to say: "The future of France is in her colonies." So it was France, not the colonies, which was at stake.

95. But the true axiom is that colonialism is not a "mission sacrée", it is a "mission 'désacrée'". What is behind colonialism is subordinated markets, subverted consumers and usurped raw materials. Behind colonialism there is a dominating capital, land dispossession and forced labour—all in the interest of colonizers, under the umbrella of civilization.

96. Right from the very beginning, colonialism was launched as a campaign to capture business, to capture trade and industry—all carried out with a determined purpose of exploitation. Just remember the names of those great enterprises: the East India Companies, the West India Companies, the Levant Companies and the African Companies. And remember too that these companies had armies and mercenary troops which later built those vast empires. There is a lengthy record of confessions by empire builders themselves that the white man's burden is a pale argument. Colonialism is meant primarily to serve the interests of the so-called mother country. And what affection is it to starve the child and nourish the mother? The granting of independence to colonial territories is an economic liberation, for colonialism was intended initially as an economic domination. The record of colonialism is most eloquent, and here again the record of France rises above every record.

97. In 1884, the French Premier, Jules Ferry, declared in these terms: "The superior races"—and here France is speaking in terms of race superiority—"have a right as regards inferior races ... if France refrained from imperialism she would descend from the first rank to the third or the fourth". Hence colonialism for France is not to help the ascent of its colonies, but to avoid the descent of France to the fourth rank.

98. Again in 1890, the French Premier disclosed that "colonial policy is the daughter of industrial policy". If these words by the Prime Minister of France have any meaning, they only mean that a colony to France is nothing but a market, to sell at the highest price goods made of raw materials bought at the cheapest, with labour at the lowest. Nothing betrays the motives of French colonialism more than this statement by the Prime Minister of France himself.

99. In the same vein, in 1881, Mr. Gambetta justified the conquest of Tunisia, which is now an independent and fully sovereign State represented in the United Nations, in the Chamber of Deputies as follows: "Tunisia is necessary for our material prosperity." Thus it is the prosperity of France not the prosperity of Tunisia which was at stake.

100. Later, in 1895, Mr. Chautemps, Minister of Colonies, described himself—and it is interesting and amusing for the Minister of Colonies so to describe himself—as "in reality a Second Minister of Commerce". This is colonialism and we speak of a "mission sacrée", and the Minister of Colonies says that he is a "Second Minister of Commerce". I say in all humility that he should have described himself as the "First Minister of Commerce".

101. In 1882, Beaulieu, the French economist, exposed French colonialism to the last point of exposure. In plain terms he stated that "colonization is for France a question of life and death". So the matter is not the life and death of the colonial peoples. The heart of the matter is the life of France and the death of France. The colonial people are to live as they could, and they are to die as they should. They are left to their fate, to the mercy of destiny.

102. Thus colonialism is not exposed by its enemies but rather it is defeated by its very authors, by its philosophers, by its engineers, by its dreamers and schemers. The architects of colonialism, the builders of empires, whether dreamers or otherwise, have all gone. But they have left behind them a volume of confessions demonstrating the brutalities of colonialism and demolishing forever the fallacy of humanitarianism as a motive for colonialism. It was in the middle of the nineteenth century, when colonialism was at its peak, that it was stripped naked as a heinous institution primarily intended for usurpation and exploitation on an international scale. I say on an international scale because the words of the notorious imperialist of Great Britain, Cecil Rhodes, are still ringing in our ears. Speaking of the world of the nineteenth century Cecil Rhodes said:

"The world is nearly all parcelled out, and what there is left of it is being divided up, conquered and colonized ... If there be a God"—this is his challenge, the challenge of the British imperialists—"I think what He would like for me to do is to paint as much of the map of Africa British red as possible...."

Finding the world too small to meet the greed of British colonialism, Cecil Rhodes went on to say: "I would annex the planets if I could, I often think of that. It makes me sad to see them so clear and yet so far."

103. These words, I submit, about dividing, conquering and parcelling the world, as well as painting the map of Africa British red as much as possible, are a vivid expression of colonialism in its classical concept. But the greed, the fiery greed to annex the planets simply discloses that British imperialism of the nineteenth century, not satisfied with colonialism on earth, was hoping for colonialism in outer space. Today, the United Kingdom stands for the peaceful uses of outer space. It does not harbour any plans for colonialism in outer space, probably because it is so far behind in the race for planets.

104. The granting of independence to colonial peoples has another human aspect. In addition to bringing about economic liberation, independence leads to spiritual emancipation. It is a restoration of human dignity and a rehabilitation of human personality. Colonialism is based on race superiority. The supremacy of the whites is the fountainhead from which flows the entire philosophy of colonialism. Colonialism has two gospels—one to preach, on the ground of the white man's burden, and the other to practise, in an unquenchable thirst for prize and hunger for spoils. But the gospel to preach, which is supposed to inculcate an idea or propagate a principle, is drenched with the most shocking ideology—race supremacy.

105. Speaking of British colonialism, Cecil Rhodes declared: "I contend that we are the first race in the world, and that the more of the world we inhabit, the better it is for the human race." This is a blend of a paradox and a complex. It is a paradox that a superior race should condescend to rob the inferior race; and the complex is too flagrant to explain, a superiority complex.

106. But the stubborn reality is that it is human greed and not human grade which is the driving force of colonialism. It is not the gospel of "live and let live". "Live, and let no one else live" is the real gospel of colonialism.

107. This state of affairs is no past history. For all intents and purposes, this is present history. In classifying the world of today the phrase has been coined, here in the United Nations, "the haves and the have-nots". This terminology has found respectable room even in our records. It is a fact that of the 2 billion human beings on earth, one and a half billion are poor, incredibly poor. That explains why the "haves" are the minority and the "have-nots" are the majority. The minority are richer and have better living conditions; the majority are poor, living in misery. Surprisingly, however, the "have-nots" are richer in area, in mineral wealth and in material resources. Why, then, are they poor, incredibly poor? The answer is colonialism. The colonialism of the nineteenth century explains the poverty of the twentieth century. Colonialism is the "raison d'être" for classifying the nations of the world into the "haves" and the "have-nots".

108. In our United Nations books—in estimates and statistics—we are often faced with staggering figures about the national economy of the various States Members of the United Nations. The fact is frequently referred to, with pride, that certain States have a high standard of living while others have a low one. For instance, the United Kingdom, France and Belgium are shown to have a high standard of living, while countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America are shown to have a low standard of living. This is no credit to the rich, and no shame for the poor. It is not any particular genius which made the Western countries richer; neither is it because of a natural disability that the other countries are poorer. Colonialism is the explanation of the whole phenomenon of disparity. The peoples of Africa, Asia and Latin America, because of ages of colonialism, have been robbed of their gold, their diamonds, their cotton, their silk, their ivory, their spices, their drugs, their rubber, their oil, their animal wealth, and many times even robbed of their fabulous museums, including the dead kings and queens.

109. That is the whole story of the "haves and the have-nots" traced down to the very root of colonialism. The state of poverty and backwardness now prevalent in many areas of the world is the direct legacy of colonialism. The dominated peoples—those that have become independent and those on the waiting list—have a colossal and outstanding debt to claim. What is extended to them now in the form of economic assistance, grants-in-aid, technical assistance, or anything you please, is only a fraction of the grand total of that debt. It is not a moral debt, but one admitted and confessed with all the attributes of legal indebtedness. Just let me give you one illustration. Speaking on British colonial policy, Joseph Chamberlain said: "The Empire is commerce." Joseph Chamberlain summed up in two words what two volumes cannot say: "The Empire is commerce."

110. This empire of commerce was further portrayed by a well-known British imperialist. In a speech before the Manchester Chamber of Commerce in 1884, Henry Stanley said the following:

"There are 40 million people beyond the gateway of the Congo, and the cotton-spinners of Manchester are waiting to clothe them. Birmingham foundries are flowing with the red metal that will be made into iron-work for them and trinkets that shall adorn those dusky bosoms."

Such plain words call for no comment; they are self-explanatory. They go to show how colonialism has raised the standard of living in Manchester and Birmingham and how the whole of Africa was left in poverty and misery.

111. The present disparity between the "haves" and the "have-nots" could be eliminated and, to be more precise, its elimination could be speeded up by the granting of independence to all dependent countries. Since freedom and peace are indivisible, so economic prosperity also should be indivisible. The economic freedom of dependent countries requires now a chivalrous venture, at least as an expression of repentance on behalf of the colonial Powers, for their enslavement was the result of adventures devoid of chivalry. At times this colonialism of commerce was so outspoken that it required no evidence to prove it. A genius imperialist like Disraeli announced in his famous Crystal Palace speech that imperialism was one main objective in his policy. In practice, Disraeli showed himself to be a big contributor to colonialism as we find it in its present picture. Disraeli had many connexions with the Rothschilds and many other financiers. When the offer was made for the sale of shares in the Suez Canal enterprise, Disraeli, without waiting for a Parliamentary appropriation, immediately accepted the offer—an adventure which, as we know, added another chapter to the history of imperialism in the Middle East. But, to meet the offer, Disraeli had to borrow £4 million sterling from the Rothschilds; and we are told by Professor Moon, a well-known American authority on international relations, that the Rothschilds made £100,000 on this transaction.

112. This is only one instance to show how the wealth of the people was robbed, how fabulous profit was made and, finally, how colonialism has led to this economic disparity from which most of the nations of the world are suffering up to the present moment.

113. I might at this stage mention that it was this Rothschild who on 2 November 1917 received a letter from the British Foreign Secretary promising the establishment of a Jewish National Home in Palestine. It was Mr. Rothschild, this gentleman who made £100,000 on one single transaction, who received that promise for the establishment of a Jewish National Home in Palestine.

114. I bring this matter to the attention of the Assembly because, in examining colonialism, we should not forget that the establishment of a Jewish National Home in Palestine originated, right from the very beginning as an imperialist policy—just as other imperialist policies have been carried out in Africa, Asia or Latin America. In establishing a Jewish Home in Palestine, the British policy, shared and supported by the United States, has proved to be the ugliest form of imperialism. Colonialism has receded from many parts of the world leaving the land for its people, and the people in their land. But as enforced in Palestine, colonialism has led to the infiltration of one million Jews and the expulsion of one million Arabs, now living as refugees in their camps, as victims of imperialism and colonialism, in its ugliest form. However, the day is soon coming when the refugees will go back to their homeland, their country emancipated from Zionist occupation; and, with full sovereignty, will join the United Nations as the free and independent State of Palestine, embracing all the legitimate citizens of the country: Moslems, Christians and Jews alike.

115. In the remaining areas, consolation is not absent. Having reached its climax in the nineteenth century, colonialism in the twentieth century is now witnessing its own decline. In the past fifteen years, some 1,500 million human beings have destroyed their chains and have gone free. It was the biggest battle that restored liberty to more than half the world's population. Figures are sometimes more telling than volumes. Think of these figures and what they mean. They mean that, when established, the United Nations represented only one-half of the world, and that the second half was still under the yoke of colonialism. Now we have reached the stage where only 100 million peoples remain in this international captivity. The ratio of emancipation in the past fifteen years has been 100 million per year. It is, therefore, imperative that the United Nations should declare, here and now, in this Assembly, the liberty of the 100 million of our friends, of our brethren who are still in bondage. They are our brethren in spite of their race, in spite of their colour, in spite of their creed and faith, because we stand for no discrimination on any ground; and this is a test case for those who stand for no discrimination, to support the draft resolution sponsored by the African-Asians [A/L.323 and Add.1]. These brethren of ours are scattered far and wide on this planet, but they are united in their struggle for freedom, and their languishing for liberty.

116. The people of Palestine, Kenya, Oman, Aden, extremities of the Arabian peninsula, Nyasaland, Angola, Mozambique, Rhodesia, Ruanda-Urundi, South West Africa, Tanganyika, Uganda, West Irian, Malta, and other parts of the world should be set free in their homelands. Algeria in particular is a burning issue because war in Algeria enters now its seventh year. The people of Algeria are entitled to what we are entitled. They should be free as we are, have independence as we have, and enjoy dignity as we do. All human beings are born free, and as our great Caliph said, "By what right do you enslave the people when their mothers have begot them free?"

117. The colonial peoples have an inherent right to freedom, and it is our duty to recognize it and declare it. I stress recognition for I submit that the phrase, "the granting of independence", which was used in the memorandum of the Soviet Union [A/4501], for me is not a happy expression. The freedom of 100 million people is their privilege, not our grace. It is their inherent right not our grant.

118. Be that as it may, the argument has often been adduced that these people are now under tutelage and that their economic and social advancement requires that such tutelage should continue for some time. Well, this is an antiquated argument not worthy of the spirit of the day. This is a pale argument which is really worthy of a pale smile.

119. These people have been under tutelage for decades and some of them for ages. How long should we wait for this weary ordeal—for this painful trial—for this bitter experiment—an experiment on human beings, not an experiment on animals or senseless material? If the past tutelage has not been able, thus far, to raise these people from dependence to independence, then the tutelage is a failure, and the United Nations should put an end to this failure. There is also the recent plea drawn of the Congo situation. Some voices—and I would say, remnants of imperialism—are labouring to show that the Congo situation is a forceful illustration to warn against the untimely granting of independence. This is the latest fashion of logic, designed by the habitual designers of political fashion—and I would say, ugly political fashion. But this logic lacks every quality of real logic. To impeach such an argument, it is sufficient to know that it has been put on the market by the enemies of liberty, by the enemies of freedom.

120. The situation in the Congo, however, is an argument in the direction of freedom, not in the denial of freedom. The crisis of the Congo is not the outcome of speedy independence or untimely granting of independence. It is the outcome of speedy aggression against a newly emerging independence. Had the Congo been left on its own, the whole crisis would have been averted, the United Nations forces would not have been assembled, the Congo would not have become an item on the agenda of the United Nations; and the imperialists would not have been furnished with a poor illustration in favour of colonialism.

121. All these arguments, or to be more precise, these shallow arguments, fall to the ground. The colonial peoples should be set free. Let them go their way. They will take good care of themselves. They will look after their economic development, their social betterment, and their cultural advancement. They will be in safe hands because they will be in their own hands. There is nothing more useful, nothing more fruitful and nothing more honourable than to be on your own. And nothing is more gratifying for a people than to construct their national life in their own hands. Behind this reconstruction would be their own hands, their minds, their souls and their hearts. The result would no doubt be, not this decaying evolution of tutelage, but the revolutionary evolution of independence.

122. Take Ghana as an illustration. The potentials of water power have been lying dormant in Ghana for years during the colonial régime. With independence, the Volta River project, which shall make of Ghana an industrial plant, is now in execution. So is the case of Guinea with its dramatic projects. They have been lying dormant in the archives, here and there, under foreign domination.

123. Take the United Arab Republic—the project of the Aswan Dam was slumbering in the archives for decades. With real independence, under President Nasser, the project is now between the jaws of the most efficient equipment for development.

124. Take China, for so long dismembered, dominated and humiliated; it has become with independence a production giant, rightly termed the impatient giant. Impatient with time, China is endeavouring to catch up—and I am not bringing in the political implications of China.

125. And lastly, take India and Pakistan which had been, before independence, in complete stagnation. After independence, these two countries have become a beehive of plans and projects.

126. I will not proceed with more illustrations, for the one and a half billion peoples who have been liberated in the past fifteen years, are the greatest illustration of the greatest human experience.

127. One last point should not escape our attention. With colonialism brought to an end, the Trusteeship Council should be brought to an end also. In fact, the United Nations Trusteeship is an institution in the image of the Mandates System of the League of Nations. It is sad that the Trusteeship Council should remain up to this moment a principal organ of the United Nations, an organ which expresses the domination of the people, and still we should admit that one of the principal organs of the United Nations is handling colonialism and people of dependent status.

128. Equally sad is the term "self-government", which was assigned by the Charter as the goal to which the Trust Territories should be led. The final goal should have been expressly declared as independence, instead of the feeble, poor and miserable expression of self-government. When the question of trusteeship was discussed in San Francisco in 1945, Soviet Foreign Minister Molotov recommended that the purpose of the trusteeship should be independence. At that time, only the Philippine delegation stood for independence against self-government, and this is an occasion for me to admire the Philippines. Unfortunately, the opposition was led by the United States representative, Mr. Stettinius, who insisted that it be phrased as self-government. We hope that at this session our colleague from the United States will be ready to co-sponsor the idea of the elimination of the Trusteeship Council and this poor and miserable expression of self-government. Let us stand for direct independence and be direct and honest in our expressions. There is no shame in independence that we should hide behind this expression that has no meaning.

129. But this is now past history. Whether it is independence or self-government, let us now make a new history more worthy of our age. Let us declare the independence of all peoples, wherever they be and to what race or colour they may belong. Let us liquidate colonialism in all its forms and manifestations, from wherever it may come. Let us wind up imperialism in all its manifestations, and let us set free all peoples in all lands.

130. Each of the ninety-eight nations represented in this Organization, and I make no mistake about the number, has an independence day. Let us make this day an independence day for the whole world, so that with joy and pride we can commemorate a glorious achievement, liberty for all, sovereignty for all, independence for all and, what is more, a United Nations for all.

The meeting rose at 1.15 p.m.

AGENDA ITEM 87

 Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial

1. The PRESIDENT: Before calling on the first speaker inscribed on the list for this morning, I give the floor to the representative of Portugal in exercise of his right of reply.

2. Mr. GARIN (Portugal): I have been compelled to request the right of reply much against my wish because some of the previous speakers have once more attempted from this rostrum to interfere in the internal affairs of my country against the specific provisions of the Charter of the United Nations.

3. The representative of Ghana has gratuitously classified as juridical fiction the constitutional structure of my country. Now, I am sure that all of us will agree that to classify as fiction the constitutional structure of a country is a most serious statement, and this is precisely what the representative of Ghana has attempted to do in relation to my own country.

4. I have explained once and again from this rostrum that the Portuguese nation, as the result of a centuries-old historical process, is a unitarian State where all the component parts enjoy equal status before the law. The representative of Ghana is, of course, at liberty not to like our Constitution. However, not liking a particular national constitution is one thing, but impugning it in this Organization is another thing altogether. It is not only a violation of the principles of the Charter, but it also tends to create a dangerous precedent whereby the internal structure and affairs of Member countries—all of them, including Ghana—may be freely discussed from this rostrum.

5. I have never come here to question the internal political structure of Ghana or of any other State, nor do I intend to do so, and therefore, my delegation cannot accept without protest that an illegal exception should be made against Portugal. The representative of Ghana has carried his attempted interference into the internal affairs of my country to the point of hoping for immediate steps for the transfer of all powers of sovereignty over the Portuguese overseas provinces of Angola and Mozambique.

6. Now, I honestly think that this is carrying matters to a regrettable extent, when a representative, from this rostrum, asks for the dismemberment of a Member

State. However, I prefer to believe that the representative of Ghana did not really weigh his words when he spoke about his hope that the Portuguese nation should be dismembered and that sovereignty over the dismembered components should be elsewhere.

7. But there again, this is a very serious matter, and this Assembly is not the place for levity when the lives of countries and peoples are at stake. Therefore, I must strongly protest such verbal liberties taking place against the letter and spirit of the Charter, the result of which can only embitter the present debate.

8. Needless to say, this answer applies equally to another delegation which, yesterday, also subscribed to such preposterous suggestions. I do hope that the embitterment of this debate can still be avoided.

9. Mr. ALEMAYEHOU (Ethiopia): In 1945, when the United Nations was organized in San Francisco, about 1,000 million people were under the colonial system. A year or two later, with the independence of India and Pakistan, followed by the independence of Burma, Ceylon, Indonesia and other Asian countries, the system of colonialism remained untouched in the continent of Africa and Oceania.

10. In 1955, at the Asian-African Conference held in Bandung, the States assembled at that historic conference took stock of the colonial situation and initiated a number of fundamental principles which have become the cornerstones of the policy of independent countries of Africa and Asia towards the colonial countries and peoples. These principles have also inspired the struggle of the dependent peoples themselves towards freedom and independence in Asia, Africa and Oceania. Meanwhile, the struggle of the African-Asian States for the liberation of the dependent and colonial peoples continued in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly. The struggle consisted in liberalizing the rather conservative declaration contained in Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations. Although the provisions of the Charter were, so to speak, conservative, the African-Asian countries, with the help of Latin American and other countries, succeeded in making that document a living instrument for the purpose of aiding the colonial peoples towards freedom and independence.

11. While the achievement of independence by the colonial peoples cannot be claimed as the work of the United Nations, none the less, it is true to say that the influence of the United Nations has been felt and that the contribution of liberal forces has not been without effect in the colonial territories.

12. At a later stage of the struggle of the dependent peoples towards independence, we find that, with the independence of Sudan, Morocco and Tunisia, a new chapter was opened for ending colonialism on the continent of Africa. This process culminated with the independence of Ghana on the west coast of Africa, swiftly followed by the independence of Guinea and this year by so many African States and Cyprus which have taken their rightful place in the community of nations.

13. At this point it must be remembered that the African States themselves, following the example of Bandung, enunciated a number of concrete principles designed for the particular purpose of their own continent at their first historical Conference of Independent African States, held at Accra, Ghana, in 1958. At this Conference they adopted thirteen resolutions, all of which dealt with colonialism and the consolidation of the independence of African States. An examination of these resolutions shows that the eight African States were not satisfied in simply enunciating broad principles, but specifically asked the end of colonialism, "apartheid" and racial discrimination. In brief, the application of one vote to one man was called for so that governmental powers in all the colonial territories in Africa could be organized according to the will of the people, and not according to the dictates of so-called mother countries in far-off places.

14. At the same Conference, the African countries, realizing the unique situation of Algeria, called upon France:

"(a) To recognize the right of the people of Algeria to independence and self-determination;

"(b) To put an end to the hostilities and to withdraw all her troops from Algeria;

"(c) To enter into immediate peaceful negotiation with the Algerian Liberation Front with a view to reaching a final and just settlement."^{1/}

It can be seen immediately that the first aim has been achieved, while the remaining two have either become obsolete, due to a change in circumstances, or have been recognized as a necessity even by those who, at the time of the Conference, were moved to condemn the attitude of the African countries. The point, however, is that the demand by the African countries for the independence and self-determination of Algeria is now recognized by practically everyone concerned, and what remains is the application of these principles under conditions that will ensure to the Algerian people free choice as to their future.

15. A year later, the independent African countries assembled once more in an extraordinary conference in Monrovia^{2/} to consider the Algerian problem, in the first instance, and to deal with other problems of an urgent nature, such as the nuclear tests in the Sahara and the intensification of mass massacre and other repressive measures against the indigenous population in Africa as a result of racial discrimination, and adopted resolutions embodying certain principles on each of these problems. These principles, again, have been accepted by practically all the Members of the United Nations. All that remains is for them to be applied concretely on the spot in conditions which will result in respect by all concerned, so that when the matter has become history the process will have left intact the friendship of the peoples.

16. The independent countries of Africa—this time sixteen in number—met earlier this year in their regular conference at Addis Ababa,^{3/} and discussed and adopted a number of resolutions. These resolutions dealt with: (a) negotiated and peaceful settlement of the Algerian problem; (b) the question of South West Africa; (c) the cessation of nuclear and thermo-nuclear tests in the Sahara; (d) the eradication of colonial rule from Africa; (e) the question of a Central African Federation; (f) the policy of "apartheid" and racial discrimination in Africa; and other questions. One resolution called for the end of colonialism in all its forms and manifestations and proclaimed the equality of all the races in civil and religious matters and, in particular, the application of the principle of one vote for one man so that governmental power in all the colonies may be transferred to the representatives of the people.

17. Accordingly, the present draft resolution [A/L. 323 and Add.1-2], which my delegation has the honour to co-sponsor, is a consolidation of the ideals and principles which the African-Asian countries have proclaimed and supported ever since 1955, in Bandung, Accra, Monrovia and Addis Ababa. An examination of the draft resolution shows at once that all the paragraphs of the preamble have at one time or another and in one form or another been proclaimed in those historic conferences. From our point of view, therefore, the adoption of these principles by the United Nations would mean that their application was supported by each and every Member State.

18. At this point my delegation would like to pay a tribute to and congratulate the Soviet Union for its initiative in proposing to the fifteenth session of the General Assembly [A/4501] the item which is now under consideration—namely, a Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples [A/4502 and Corr.1]. This declaration on the abolition of colonialism, if adopted by the General Assembly—and I hope it will be adopted unanimously will undoubtedly be a great landmark in the history of the world. It will be a turning point in the history of international relations, in the relations of the States and peoples of the world. It will be a realization of the noble ideals and principles of the United Nations Charter. This declaration, if adopted and implemented, would undoubtedly open a new era to the peoples of the world to work together, to co-operate as members of a great family, for the achievement of common objectives—namely, peace and happiness for all. There can never be a lasting peace in such a great family if all members are not equally happy. Where there is not equal happiness, where there is not equal satisfaction for all, there may be an armed truce but not peace.

19. Hence, in order that there may be lasting peace among the nations and peoples of the world, in order that there may be friendly co-operation among the nations and peoples of the world, colonialism in all its forms and manifestations must come to an end, and the colonial Powers must recognize that the peoples under their domination have the same birthright freely to determine their destinies, as have the peoples in the respective colonial countries.

^{1/} Conference of Independent African States, Declaration and Resolutions, 22 April 1958, Accra, Ghana (Government Printer, 1958), resolution No. III.

^{2/} Conference of Independent African States, held at Monrovia, Liberia, from 4-8 August 1959.

^{3/} Second Conference of Independent African States, held at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, 14-24 June 1960.

20. It is therefore in the interest of lasting peace as against perpetual conflict, in the interest of brotherly co-operation for the common good as against animosity among the nations and peoples of the world, that we appeal to all States represented here to give their full support to the declaration under discussion so that it may be adopted by acclamation.

21. People under colonial rule and their supporters in Africa and Asia, and elsewhere, have been criticized by neutral—and, I am sure, honest—observers for being impatient and hasty in asking for an immediate and unconditional end to colonialism. According to such observers, the end of colonialism has in some cases led to conflicts among the native political leaders, as a result of the premature conclusion of colonial rule. They cite the situation in the Congo to support their view. These observers argue, further, that, whatever the peoples under colonial rule may feel about their colonizers, these colonizers must necessarily have contributed to the economic, social, educational and political development of the colonial peoples under their respective rule, and they must necessarily have their own economic or other interests which cannot and must not be disregarded. According to those observers, for all those reasons and in order to prepare the native political leaders for a smooth take-over of power, a longer term than that asked for by the colonial peoples and more patience are necessary.

22. But we have said to such observers, and we must reiterate, that the abolition of colonialism is long overdue and can never be premature. We understand these honest observations and criticisms which at first glance seem to be reasonable and sound for all neutral observers. We know how neutral observers, living in freedom, feel about colonialism in general, because we ourselves have lived both in freedom and under colonial rule. But they cannot understand how we feel about colonialism, because they have always lived in freedom and never under colonial rule. It is convenient and easy for all neutral observers, living in freedom, to criticize, because they have never been subjected to the most abject degradation and humiliation, because they have never been foreigners in their own country, because they have never fought and given their lives in wars which were not theirs and only added glory to their already glorious masters, and because they have never laboured to add more wealth to that of their already wealthy masters and to strengthen the hands oppressing them. One has to live under colonialism and experience these things for oneself in order to understand the full impact of colonialism.

23. It must be recognized that the colonial Powers must have contributed, to a greater or lesser degree, to the economic, social and educational development of their respective colonies. But what our critics have completely overlooked is the fact that invariably the contribution in economic, military and other fields made by the colonies to the metropolitan countries has been incomparably greater than that made by the metropolitan countries to their colonies.

24. As to certain political or economic difficulties and conflicts following the end of colonial rule in some countries, we can say to our critics that these difficulties are always engineered by foreign intrigues, with a view to discrediting and frustrating the irreversible movement towards emancipation by the subjugated peoples all over the world, particularly in Africa and Asia, and with a view to re-establishing the system of exploitation in one form or another. But, even if it is true that difficulties and conflicts among political leaders follow the end of colonialism in some countries, that should not be a reason for denying independence to the peoples claiming it. Fighting for power among political leaders is not an extraordinary thing. It happens everywhere. Political leaders all over the world have always fought for power by various means—some with money, others with their fists and still others with guns, tanks and airplanes. It should not, therefore, be taken as something so extraordinary simply because it happens in former colonial territories. This is purely and simply an excuse or pretext for maintaining colonial subjugation in those territories.

25. The peoples in the liberated countries, left alone without interference from foreign intriguers, will settle their differences in no time, as all the other peoples in similar circumstances have always done. Let the peoples of the liberated countries ~~alone~~. Let them fight if they want to, and settle their own affairs.

26. I say, in the first place, that there is no reason to believe that the colonies which have immensely contributed to the economic wealth of the metropolitan countries would not be able to build up economically viable States of their own. Nor is there any reason to believe that the peoples of the colonies, having fought long and hard to free themselves from colonial subjugation, and provided there is no foreign intrigue and subversion, would fail to enjoy peacefully the benefit of their hard-won freedom.

27. But if, in spite of all, the question would be to choose between freedom with all its attendant economic difficulties and internal conflicts on the one hand, and the maintenance of colonial rule with all its attendant subjugation, exploitation, degradation and humiliation, and so on, on the other, I would right away and unequivocally say that the peoples, all peoples, under colonial rule prefer poverty in freedom to wealth in slavery, and they will definitely prefer fighting in freedom to peace in slavery.

28. There was a time when the spirit of enterprise and heroism, the power, the greatness and prosperity of a nation were measured by the extent and number of its colonies. There was a time when to own colonies gave pride and glory to those nations owning such colonies. But that is all a matter of the past. Today, to own colonies is no longer glorifying. Today it is not in owning but in freeing colonies that nations take pride, and even those which still entertain the hope of keeping their colonies are trying to do so under different names. Thus, the terms "overseas territories", "overseas provinces", etc., are coined for the former colonies. The names "colonial Power" and "colonies", once a source of pride and glorification to those owning colonial territories, are now becoming more and more embarrassing to them, and I think we can safely say that it will not be long when to own colonies not only will be considered as a disgrace but also as a crime, in the same way as slavery has been so considered.

29. All this coining of new names for the colonies and inventing of excuses to delay the liberation of the colonial peoples on the part of the colonial Powers, are significant proof that colonialism is a thing which cannot be maintained and that the colonial Powers themselves know it.

30. In fact, the representative of the United Kingdom, whose political foresight, particularly, in this field has been widely appreciated, said only the other day from this rostrum [925th meeting] that it was as regards the method of achieving the end and not the end itself that differences of opinion exist between his Government and those insisting on immediate liberation of all the colonies.

31. Well, since there is no difference of opinion as regards the end—that is, the ultimate liberation of all the peoples presently under colonial rule on the basis of their right of self-determination—there cannot, or at least there should not be, in the view of my delegation, differences of opinion as regards the method to achieve such end.

32. We all agree that the ultimate end sought is the liberation of all colonial peoples from the colonial bonds. If so, is there a better method than ascertaining the wishes of the colonial peoples, under free conditions, as to what they think best for their future? We believe that this is the best method.

33. A declaration abolishing colonialism, a declaration telling the colonial peoples that they are free to choose what they want as to their future, does not prevent any of them from freely and voluntarily associating themselves with their former metropolitan countries in any form, if they deem such association advantageous to them.

34. With respect to certain territories in Africa and Asia considered as overseas provinces of metropolitan countries in Europe, we frankly fail to be persuaded by the arguments of our friends and colleagues representing such metropolitan countries. What makes these far-off territories part of the metropolitan countries? It is not geographical, economic, historical, racial, ethnical, cultural, or any other identity; nor is it a common agreement, freely and voluntarily arrived at. It is simply a law unilaterally enacted by the metropolitan countries. As to what effect such a law, enacted unilaterally and lacking the agreement of one of the parties, would have, the answer is, I think, clear. Just imagine country A, somewhere in Africa, enacting a law by which country B, in Europe or in America, is made a province of country A. What effect would such a law have? None. It would have no effect either in law or in fact, because country A has not the necessary military might to enforce its law nor has it the agreement of country B to become a province.

35. In the case between the colonial countries in Africa and Asia and the metropolitan countries in Europe, while the claim of these metropolitan countries that the far-off colonies can be considered as part of themselves cannot have legal effect because the agreement of one of the parties is lacking, such claim, however, has effect, in fact, simply because these metropolitan countries have military might over the unarmed peoples of their colonies. It is, therefore, a question of force; it is a question of domination by force; it is colonialism, again.

36. That is why I said a moment ago that the argument of some of the representatives of the metropolitan countries was not persuasive, and we appeal to these representatives and to all the other Members to give their full support to the draft resolution containing the declaration of which I have just spoken [A/L.323 and Add.1-2] and which, we believe, will serve the interests of all, including that of the colonial Powers.

37. Mr. WINIEWICZ (Poland): At none of the previous sessions of the General Assembly has the problem of the colonial peoples and of the final abolition of colonialism been presented with such convincing force as at our current session. The admission to United Nations membership of seventeen new States, every one of which in its history has experienced oppression and colonial exploitation, was a great demonstration of the international import of this problem. It became one of the key issues of our general debate. It ran as a major theme through discussions on many items on the agenda of the Main Committees of this session. It is now, on the initiative of the Soviet Union, being discussed here in the General Assembly in all its aspects, with a view to the adoption of the only just decision.

38. The problem has become ripe for final solution. The new balance of forces in the world has created a situation in which the laws of imperialism no longer play a decisive role. The victorious national liberation movements in Asia and Africa strengthen the anti-colonial front and inspire by their example the still dependent peoples.

39. The unprecedented progress of science and technology, the triumph of man's thought over the forces of nature, as well as the broad possibilities of the peaceful development of humanity, do not allow any further tolerance of colonial dependence and of keeping peoples in poverty and ignorance while they, like all of us, have the right to independence and to a better future.

40. Indeed, where colonialism extended its power, we saw the extermination of subjugated peoples, the destruction of their culture, the imposition of alien institutions and patterns. We saw the merciless exploitation of their labour and natural resources, inhuman racial discrimination, denial of the fruits of civilization. Its characteristic traits are not some of the very recent forms of colonial administration, evolved in recent years owing to ever stronger and ever growing pressures of the progressive forces all over the world. Those new forms, obtained thanks to the steadfast resistance of colonial peoples and the anti-colonial debates and resolutions of the United Nations, have not changed the very essence of colonialism.

41. The political importance, economic might and high standards of living of the metropolitan Powers have been built upon the sweat, blood and tears of the peoples of Africa, Asia and Latin America. What benefits accrued to the indigenous populations as the result of the discovery of gold and diamonds in Africa, of the establishment of rubber plantations and exploitation of the mineral riches of Asia, of sugar-cane plantations and tropical fruits in Latin America, of the finding of uranium in the Congo? The fate of those peoples was decided at the stock exchanges and commodity markets in London, Paris, Brussels and New York, and their life was regimented by the colonial offices in the metropolitan territories.

42. To what extent have the great achievements of science and civilization been spread among colonial peoples? What the colonial administration did—if it did anything at all—for the dependent peoples, it did not do in the sense of fulfilling any civilizing mission, as the defenders of colonialism, including the ill-advised

Mr. Ormsby-Gore, would like us to believe. It was done either for the sake of selfish interests or under the pressure of political circumstances.

43. May I be permitted to add here that the United Kingdom representative did try to divert our attention from the problem of colonialism by insinuations regarding the situation in Eastern Europe. But the record of his country in that part of the world cannot withstand any objective scrutiny; it is nothing that anyone can be proud of. I shall not say anything more on the matter. For our part, we prefer to stick to the topic of our debate.

44. I repeat: Whatever was done in the colonies was done for the sake of selfish interests. Roads were built, railways and communications systems established, because they were needed by the colonizers. A minimum of professional education was provided, only to the extent needed for exploitation of those territories. The minimum of political rights was meted out when the pressure of the masses grew and when the balance of forces in the world was changing.

45. What were the results? The per caput national income of France and Belgium is about $900 but, in some of the African countries which previously were colonies of those States, it does not exceed $50 to $70. In the United Kingdom, the per caput national income is about $1,100, while in Kenya, rich and amply endowed by nature, it is about $100, including, of course, the high incomes of white colonists. And we know from official United Nations data, from data contained in the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, that the per caput income of Africans in Kenya is thirty-three times less than that of the non-African population. In Rhodesia and Nyasaland, it is forty-three times less.

46. In Southern Rhodesia, 200,000 European settlers have taken 51 per cent of the best land, while the 3 million Africans have been restricted to the worst soil, occupying only 42 per cent of the whole area. The rest of the land is in the hands of the colonial administration and is being administered in the interests of the white settlers. In the African colonies of Portugal, there is forced labour. Almost the whole population is reduced to the humiliating status created by the colonial administration and described as "uncivilized". Shall I go on reminding you of facts which we all know well from the documents and from the proceedings, over many years, of the Fourth Committee?

47. Illiteracy in colonial territories is wide-spread, sometimes encompassing up to 90 per cent of the adult population. It cannot be otherwise when, for long years, the metropolitan Powers supported the principle that limitation of education prevents the growth of national consciousness and of tendencies to political emancipation. Colonial administrations of many countries have purposely, and in a planned way, hampered the education of the indigenous intelligentsia and of the indigenous "cadres" of skilled workers. This was particularly true in the Congo, and many political or administrative difficulties of the new Republic are a direct result of that policy of the colonizers.

48. Today, however, this state of affairs can no longer continue. The just national aspirations of the colonial peoples cannot be killed or deceived by offering piecemeal political rights. Besides, of what value is a constitution such as that of Malta or British Guiana, for example, which can be suspended by the colonial administration whenever it sees fit, in spite of the wishes of the people and at a moment when they want to avail themselves of the rights given to them? It is no mere coincidence that, at a time when the constitutions of Malta and British Guiana were suspended, Southern Rhodesian laws—forming the basis for the functioning of the colonial administration there, which follows the pattern of the discriminatory policy of the Union of South Africa—remain in force. Out of 3 million Africans in Southern Rhodesia, only 2,000 have the right to vote.

49. Colonial administrators may cherish the illusion that they can gain time by a policy of repression. But is it not obvious that they cannot arrest the ultimate defeat of colonialism? This had to be admitted even by the Advisory Commission of the British Government which inquired recently into the situation in Rhodesia and Nyasaland. We read in Lord Monckton's report:

"To say that events are moving fast in Africa is a truism. They are moving like an avalanche, and it appears only too likely that those who merely cling to their familiar position will be swept away."

They will be swept away, not only in Africa. Colonialism can neither be reformed nor improved. One cannot reform a system the very essence of which is domination by force, to subordinate the interests of the dependent peoples to political and economic needs of the colonial Powers. One cannot improve a system built upon the principle of racial and cultural inferiority of some nations in relation to others, this being a challenge to the basic tenets of humanism. One cannot deny to other peoples what one asks for one's own nation. The abolition of colonialism is in conformity with the objective laws governing the development of society; it is a requirement of justice and equity.

50. The colonial peoples have a right to independent existence. They demand today the right to decide their future, and this demand must be satisfied forthwith as the Soviet Declaration so rightly sets forth. This concerns all the colonial territories irrespective of their formal and legal status; it concerns Non-Self-Governing Territories and Trust Territories within the meaning of the United Nations Charter; it concerns also protectorates and areas leased in foreign lands. The majority of colonial territories are still to be found in Africa, but we should not forget that not only Asia but also Latin America and the Pacific region are not free from colonialism. What is at stake is the future of a hundred million people, and there can be no compromise on that.

51. The experience of history shows that colonialism is not yielding of its own will. Indeed, at times the strength of its stubborn resistance leads to sharp conflicts prolonging and increasing the sufferings of dependent peoples. The history of accession to independence of many post-colonial States such as India, Indonesia, Morocco, Cyprus and others, which are today Members of our Organization, is a telling illustration of this all too well founded truth. As a result of the very same colonial policy, Viet-Nam is still today divided and is not a Member of the United Nations. For seven years the Algerian people have been waging their heroic struggle for the right to freedom and independent existence, while in the Congo we witness attempts at restoring colonial dependence under new forms, of course, under new guise, even after the proclamation of independence.

52. That is why many leaders of former colonies which have already been liberated or of dependent territories still aspiring to independence were or are political prisoners whom the colonial administration has deprived of their freedom in order to prevent them from influencing their peoples. I can quote here the names of Pandit Nehru, Dr. Banda, Jomo Kenyatta, Dr. Jagan—to mention but a few. Many, like Um Nyobe of the Cameroons, were killed in the struggle for freedom. As the representative of Mali so rightly said in his speech on 28 September 1960: "The emancipation of colonies has always been the result of pressure..." [876th meeting, para. 188].

53. The United Nations decision concerning the final abolition of colonialism should be, therefore, very emphatic, unequivocal in its meaning, and backed by the whole authority of our Organization. We should not be swayed from this road by arguments advanced by the defenders of colonialism in the present discussion. We should in particular not be misled by the view that the colonial peoples allegedly require preparation for their freedom and that political independence must be preceded by a lengthy economic and social development, under foreign guidance.

54. It would be difficult to deny that the predatory colonial system, the exploitation of local labour kept purposely in a state of backwardness and ignorance, the stifling of political life, all those and other inalienable elements of colonialism leave in their wake the under-development of the dependent territories, so that those countries are backward in the technical and economic sense and lack qualified manpower. But all this precisely calls for the speediest possible abolition of the colonial system.

55. The colonizers are not the best educators of nations along the road towards independence. They are those in whose interest it is to maintain the status of dependence as long as possible. To paraphrase George Washington's words, "It is folly in a colonial country to look for disinterested favours from the colonizers". On the other hand, the experience of all newly established States shows clearly that after gaining independence, owing to the creative efforts of their own, they have begun to develop in all fields much quicker as compared with the period when they were under the colonial system.

56. The fallacy of the reactionary theory of dividing nations into those able and those unable to govern themselves has been completely exposed. Therefore, the historic Soviet Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples is fully justified in stating:

"Life shows that on the heels of liberation come the rebirth, upsurge and flowering of distinctive national cultures, the spread of public education, the improvement of health care, the training of skilled national personnel..." [A/4502].

57. The end to colonial exploitation facilitates the better use of the national resources of the hitherto dependent territories, increases their demand for foreign goods, enlarges their exports, raises their industrial capacity and serves the development of the world economy as a whole.

58. If the representative of Guinea will permit me, I will use the example of Guinea. Two years after accession to independence Guinea, in spite of the grave forecasts and in spite of attempts by colonizers, is developing favourably. The Three Year Economic Plan of that country envisages annual investments twenty-five times higher than the average annual investment during the last ten years of the colonial régime. The number of students and pupils has doubled while the number of scholarships has increased three times.

59. Again, with the permission of the representative of Ghana, may I say that the Government of Ghana has published the second Five Year Plan of National Development which envisages a considerable development of industry and diversification of economy. According to official data of the International Monetary Fund, the increase of the gross national product of Ghana in the years 1954-1957—when the country was a British colony—was 2.5 million pounds, whereas the relevant figures for the year following the independence were already 14.4 million pounds.

60. Nigeria is planning the development of its great hydro-electric potential and full utilization of its national riches of iron ores and oil. The independence gave West Africa a stimulus to an unprecedented growth. The same will happen to East Africa and all the countries which have to be released from colonial bonds.

61. The President of Guinea, M. Sékou Touré, was of course fully justified in stating from this rostrum on 10 October 1960:

"... national independence presupposes not only political liberation but also, and above all, total economic liberation. No social progress is possible unless those two essential conditions are met." [896th meeting, para. 16.]

62. The countries liberated from the yoke of colonialism must be assisted to join, under conditions of complete equality and non-discrimination, in the international exchange of goods and services. Those countries should have complete freedom of disposing of their natural resources and of establishing their economic relations with other countries on the basis of mutual advantages. We must create for them the possibilities of diversifying their economic structure. We should prevent them from falling under any new form of dependence. Do not forget how and why three years ago the colonial Powers were opposing here the establishment of the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa which can play an important role in the proper defence of the economic interests of that region.

63. At present we see again even more clearly the efforts of certain well-defined circles, particularly in the United States, to strengthen their influence in Africa, in the newly liberated States. Thus the independence of those States, so dearly paid for, could be speedily and cheaply lost in a new form of dependence, neo-colonial dependence. The Polish delegation will discuss this subject again in connexion with other items on the agenda of our session.

64. Only the immediate, complete abolition of colonial dependence can become the ultimate embodiment of the aims and purposes of the United Nations Charter, for the Charter recognized as one of the basic purposes of our Organization, "respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples". At the same time Article 73 of the Charter recognized the undeniable fact that there were in 1945 peoples who "have not yet attained a full measure of self-government". The very words "not yet" implied the provisional character of "Non-Self-Governing Territories". The same applies to Article 76, which lays down the objectives for the Trusteeship System.

65. Whatever interpretation is applied to Chapters XI and XII of the Charter, they clearly mean that the institutions and procedures provided by them are transitory and temporary. There can be no question as to whether independence is to be accorded to the peoples inhabiting the territories mentioned in these chapters, the only question to which a reply had to be given was "when?"

66. The purposes and principles of the United Nations are of basic character; they are the very foundation of our Organization and its very being depends on their implementation. To implement them, other provisions of the Charter call for proper interpretation. Wherever necessary, certain processes must be completed and terminated. This applies to Chapters XI and XII, which were meant to operate for a limited time only. Their artificial perpetuation or even prolongation would contradict paragraph 2 of Article 1 of the Charter. It would amount to the denial of the purposes of the United Nations to some peoples of our globe. No such meaning could be attributed to the Charter as a whole or to any of its provisions.

67. It is therefore obvious that these stipulations were not meant to last for ever, nor even for very long. The Charter left the reply to the question, when the institutions of Non-Self-Governing Territories or Trust Territories should be replaced by full self-determination and independence, to events, to life. And, indeed, life has offered this reply in the successive years after 1945, and the year 1960 seems to have given it in full. That is why it is in full accord with the Charter, both its letter and spirit, that both the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the Trust Territories ought to disappear, that all dependent territories and peoples should be granted full independence.

68. I would like to recall the words of the President Sukarno of Indonesia, who rightly stressed here on 30 September 1960:

"The balance of the world has changed since that day in June fifteen years ago when the Charter was signed in the United States city of San Francisco, at a moment when humanity was emerging from the horror of war. The fate of humanity can no longer be decided by a few large and powerful nations..." [880th meeting, para. 54].

President Sukarno also said:

"The United Nations is no longer the same body as that which signed the Charter fifteen years ago. Nor is this world the same world. Those who laboured in wisdom to produce the Charter of this Organization could not have foreseen the shape which it has taken today. Of those wise and far-sighted men, but few realized that the end of imperialism was in sight..." [ibid., para. 183].

69. The United Nations Charter was an expression of those ideals for which the peoples fought during the Second World War against fascism and nazism. The sons of Asia and Africa were also shedding their blood. Common was this struggle and also common should be the fruits of victory. The Charter has strengthened the conviction that the ideals of freedom and equality for which the peoples united in the fight against fascism and nazism gave their lives on the battlefields of the Second World War cannot be reconciled with colonialism, with the subjugation of nations, with racial discrimination. Indeed, in many a dependent territory the return of soldiers from the battlefields of the Second World War sounded the beginning of the struggle for independence. Do I need to cite more than two of those countries—Ghana and Nigeria?

70. All attempts at preserving the colonial system or at defending the privileged position which it has given to colonial Powers are contrary to the Charter. They are bound to render the development of international co-operation more difficult and constitute an obstacle on the road of social, cultural and economic development of all nations. How many conflicts, dangerous to peace, have arisen precisely as a result of the senseless resistance of the colonial forces against the irreversible trend of history?

71. The war in Algeria has become an international problem. The situation in the Congo is fraught with danger. The continuation of the present policy of the Governments of the Union of South Africa and of Portugal gives rise to fears of further disturbances in international relations. The policy pursued by the Western Powers and NATO in establishing military bases and experimental testing grounds for nuclear weapons, contrary to the manifest desires of the whole region, of the countries liberated from the colonial oppression, has also become an international problem. Nor does neo-colonialism, seeking new forms of imposing dependence, serve the interest of peace.

72. On the other hand the complete abolition of colonialism can set free all the best forces of the new nations. The countries liberated from under the colonial yoke have already made their valuable contribution to the building and the strengthening of peaceful coexistence of nations.

73. The Bandung Conference, during which such an important role was played by the People's Republic of China, was a great historic manifestation of the constructive peaceful role of those new forces. Following Bandung there were conferences in Tunis, Tangier, Conakry, Addis Ababa and Accra. The representative of Ethiopia, who preceded me on this rostrum, also mentioned this. All of these conferences were animated by concern not only for the common good of all the peoples of Asia and Africa but also for a further peaceful development of international relations all over the world. Indeed, the abolition of colonial dependence can also foster better understanding between the colonial peoples and the metropolitan nations. That is to be desired. Both would gain. The world community of nations would gain.

74. If the United Nations is to meet fully its tasks, it has also to react speedily to the changes now taking place in contemporary international relations. If it wants actively to influence the shaping of the present reality and reflect the desires and aspirations of peoples, the United Nations should without delay take a decision on the immediate abolition of colonialism.

75. The United Nations decision should urge all the colonial Powers immediately to enter into negotiations with representatives of the dependent peoples in order to reach an agreement on the establishment of freedom and independence for the hitherto colonial countries. Steps should be advised and undertaken in order to transfer all powers to the peoples of the colonial countries without any conditions or reservations. It should remain the task of the United Nations to safeguard the full implementation of such provisions. The United Nations is facing a historic decision. Historic in this respect is the responsibility of all the delegations assembled here. Let us meet this responsibility.

76. Mr. DJERDJA (Yugoslavia): In taking the floor in this debate, I wish to point out immediately that it is not my intention to examine when and how the phenomenon of colonialism appeared or how, when and why it came about in the world that some peoples imposed their domination upon others, compelling them to a life without freedom, often akin to the slavery of ancient times. A whole literature has been written about this aspect, and ample light has also been shed upon colonialism from this angle during the past fourteen sessions of the Assembly. Perhaps we should only add here that there are fewer and fewer people in the world today who dare openly to defend colonialism and colonial relationships and who dare to assert that such relationships are justified in the present-day world. Both the history and the actual substance of colonialism have been clarified to such an extent and exposed to such general condemnation that, no matter what one might think oneself or how one might try to act in practice, one cannot muster up the necessary courage to identify oneself with or to place oneself openly on the side of colonialism. This fact speaks rather eloquently for itself.

77. Our present debate arises out of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples presented to this session by the delegation of the USSR [A/4502 and Corr.1]. In our opinion, therefore, what we should actually debate here is the specific and complex question of existing colonial relationships as a whole. Or, to be even more precise, it is a question of concrete measures that we and our Organization should undertake here and now in order to put an end to these relationships and thus eliminate from contemporary society the remnants of a system which belongs to the past.

78. It appears from this that the way in which the problem under consideration presents itself to us is rather new. Actually, at earlier sessions we approached colonialism only from the angle of its individual aspects when discussing situations or conflicts in various colonies. A number of different circumstances—among which the evolution of colonialism itself during the past decade also has its place—have brought about a situation where we are today dealing with the colonial problem as a whole and where we are seeking solutions for the most complete and most direct abolition of colonialism in its entirety. During the last decade and a half, several dozens of colonies have found their rightful place in the world and they now live among us and act as free and independent States. They stand among us as a living proof of the obsolescence of a system which was built and maintained only on the basis of the right of the stronger. The remnants of this system in present-day society stand out like suspicious and unhealthy cancerous growths on a healthy human body. If there were no other reasons to search for final measures for a radical liquidation of these relationships, the very fact would suffice that they can and must be compared only with such growths on a human body which they threaten to poison and destroy if not eliminated entirely. The five-year war against the people of Algeria and also, in its many aspects, the months-long tragedy of the Congo, as a typical product of contemporary colonial policy—not to enumerate other examples for the time being—constitute a bloody confirmation of the truth that colonialism is one of the worst running sores of the present-day social and international community.

79. It actually appears rather absurd that here today, in 1960, while on the one hand we are already conquering the universe, entering an era in the development of mankind about which we could not even dare to dream only a few years ago, at this time we should find ourselves having to argue that we should not stand with a foot in the seventeenth or eighteenth century and that we should finally and forever rid ourselves of prejudices and negative legacies of the past which are dangerously pulling us backwards, threatening to lead us even more dangerously astray.

80. Because of such negative legacies and even more dubious material advantages, the protagonists of colonialism are unable to realize the untenability of their own situation and of the situation that they are creating by their short-sighted policies. They are stubbornly endeavouring to preserve the remnants of the past. For the sake of selfish privileges, they oppose the general course of events without hesitating to undertake actions aimed at forcibly interrupting or changing this course which unavoidably causes crises and conflicts and is a constant threat to peace. The anti-colonial transformation which has changed the face of whole continents since the Second World War, altering thereby the picture of the rest of the world as well, has passed unnoticed by the supporters of colonialism and has remained without echo. It appears that they often draw the conclusion from this and similar beneficial changes which have taken place in the course of the last two decades, namely, that they must persevere in their resistance and continue their efforts to put a stop to the process of change, and to achieve this regardless of the means employed.

81. Let us cite once again, for purposes of illustration and as a proof, the example of Algeria and the case of the Congo—not, perhaps, because they would be the only ones, but merely because their bloody drama, brought about by such a policy of the colonialists, is strikingly unfolding before our eyes. We cannot but point out here that a tendency has manifested itself simultaneously in various colonial capitals in recent times to place in the service of this policy, particularly on the soil of Africa, the military-political machinery of a coalition, which would multiply the present dangers to unheard-of proportions, and would increase our concern for peace and the future of Africa, resulting thereby in its dangerous involvement in the cold war.

82. Under these circumstances, we have discussed, at this session of the General Assembly, the colonial problems first of all in the Fourth Committee and also elsewhere, whenever they came up. Under these conditions it is natural that we approach the colonial problem here in plenary meeting with the conviction that it is high time to undertake measures which would bring about the direct and complete liquidation of remaining colonial relations. Actually, these relationships have been ripe for liquidation for a long time already; on the other hand, by their perpetuation, they exercise an ever more destructive influence upon progress and peace among nations in the world.

83. In the days of the founding of the United Nations, when the Charter of our Organization was drafted, there seemed to be a general consensus, tacit or explicit, that the days of colonial relationships were numbered, and that the termination of these relationships was one of the important tasks of the United Nations Organization, as well as the principal obligation of the colonial Powers towards the peoples over whom they had established their rule and domination. Since this seemed to be the case, the language of the Charter in regard to the colonial problem is perhaps not always precise; nevertheless, it is very definite and unequivocal, especially if we wish to ascertain the actual substance and to feel the spirit of what is embodied in the Charter.

84. In token of such an understanding, important provisions, contained especially in Chapters XI and XII of the Charter, were devoted to the colonies, and under this term we equally understand Non-Self-Governing as well as Trust Territories. These provisions were drafted and incorporated into the Charter in co-operation with the colonial Powers, which should be particularly borne in mind when interpreting them and when drawing conclusions about the rights and obligations of one side or the other. This co-operation of the colonial Powers with the United Nations was perhaps partly due to the general enthusiasm engendered in the world as a result of the victory over the enemy of freedom, over fascism. If it is so, this does not diminish in the least but, on the contrary—in our view—only enhances the value of the provisions of the Charter on the colonies, because in this way a corresponding moral substance is added to a formal legal obligation.

85. To our mind, the actual meaning of the aforementioned chapters of the Charter, in their substance, is that the colonial Powers should promote the progress of the peoples under their administration and to lead these peoples towards national independence through adequate administration and under the supervision and control of the United Nations. No time limits have been set, nor are the other individual elements sufficiently defined, but the sense and the aim are clear. Why, otherwise, would the chapters of the Charter on the colonies find their place in a document which was accepted in all parts of the world from the very beginning as a Charter of peace and freedom for all, without distinction? It is completely unbelievable that there should be some among us who would assert that these chapters were drafted and became an important component of the Charter of our Organization, perhaps for the purpose of legalizing and perpetuating, on the one hand, the rights and privileges of stronger and more advanced peoples and, on the other hand, the poverty and slavery of weaker and less advanced peoples.

86. What does Chapter XI of the Charter, relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories, specifically say concerning the tasks and obligations of the colonial Powers, and about colonial administration over these territories? Chapter XI stipulates, by way of introduction, that the colonial Powers have assumed, under the Charter, as a "sacred trust", the obligations embodied in sub-paragraphs a and b of Article 73. The said paragraphs read as follows:

"a. to ensure, with due respect for the culture of the peoples concerned, their political, economic, social, and educational advancement, their just treatment, and their protection against abuses;

"b. to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions, according to the particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples and their varying stages of advancement."

87. As we have already mentioned, the language of the chapter in this respect is perhaps not perfect with regard to precision, and had the texts of the above chapters been drafted later or today, they would probably be better as regards the wording and the form. However, it seems to us that, in spite of this, not an especially great effort is needed to ascertain and to deduce from these words and formulations their real meaning, that is to say, that the peoples in the colonies, all of them, without distinction, who have been deprived temporarily, and in every respect unlawfully, of their fundamental rights, are entitled to progress and national independence to which the colonial administration, under the supervision of the United Nations, should lead them.

88. Let us see now what Chapter XII, Article 76 b, says about Trust Territories:

"b. to promote the political, economic, social, and educational advancement of the inhabitants of the trust territories, and their progressive development towards self-government or independence as may be appropriate to the particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples and the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned, and as may be provided by the terms of each trusteeship agreement."

Both in form and language, this provision is clearer than the others, but the differences in words cannot conceal the substantial identity, in our view, of purposes, missions, and obligations. In both cases it is the task of the colonial Powers to promote the progress of the colonies, to respect their individualities, to protect these peoples from arbitrary acts and abuses, and finally to develop free democratic institutions on the basis of the aims and aspirations of these peoples towards self-government, freedom and independence.

89. If the document of a bureaucratic institution were involved, it might be possible, perhaps, to draw certain conclusions on the basis of isolated words and lack of precision. However, as we are faced here with a major historical document of an eminent moral, political and legal significance, we must approach it differently, we should consider it and appraise it in the light of historical relations and changes, and ascertain the spirit with which it is imbued, and the meaning which is inherent in it. By approaching it in this manner we cannot draw any other conclusions but those which we have constantly formulated and upheld—and not only at the current session of the General Assembly—demanding that the United Nations accept and implement them. Another approach and different conclusions to which the colonial Powers are inclined would mean to appraise the Charter as a document sanctioning and perpetuating the enslavement of some peoples for the benefit of other peoples, which would, in our view, amount to legal nonsense as well as to a morally and politically untenable thesis.

90. One decade and a half after the drafting of the Charter of our Organization, our understanding and interpretation of the aforementioned chapters of the Charter on the colonies have received an indirect, it is true, but rather solid confirmation in an important United Nations document to which we attach all the more significance as it was elaborated with the participation of the representatives of the colonial Powers. I have in mind the report of the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter—submitted this year as document A/4526—which was debated and accepted in the Fourth Committee. The Committee of Six was set up pursuant to General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) of 12 December 1959, with the task of formulating the so-called principles on some aspects of colonial problems. The Committee elaborated a report, paragraph 18 of which reads as follows:

"The Charter is a living document and the obligations under Chapter XI must be viewed in the light of the changing spirit of the times. Under Article 73 of the Charter, Members of the United Nations recognize that in Non-Self-Governing Territories the interests of the inhabitants are paramount. The progressive development of self-government must take into account the particular circumstances of a territory and the aspirations of its peoples. Such development must be in tune with the movement towards freedom and equality everywhere." [A/4526, para. 18.]

91. How else could we interpret this but as an expression of the acknowledgement that, according to a correct interpretation of the Charter, the colonial Powers have the duty and obligation to act, in the colonies, in such a way as to lead them to the fulfilment of their yearnings and aspirations, and to the attainment of their elementary right to freedom, of which they were deprived only because they were weak and helpless when the stronger and more powerful imposed their yoke upon them.

92. Therefore, if this happens to be the case, and if words and written documents have any meaning, we could say that there is less and less difference about what the Charter says on the destiny of the colonies and the future of the peoples under colonial administration, as well as on the nature of the obligations and duties of the colonial Powers arising out of the provisions of the Charter.

93. However, the question arises: why have we been obliged constantly, at all former sessions, to solve disputes, to end crises and to extinguish conflagrations which have flared up, now in one colony and then in another, which still happens to be the case today in more than one place in the world? If this is so, why are we then compelled, also at the current session, to substantiate once again the purposes of the Charter and the obligations of the colonial Powers, and to seek to abolish in the colonial sphere—once and for all, this time—the relations which are causing so much uncertainty and uneasiness in the world by their very continuation?

94. In our opinion, the answer to this and similar questions should be sought and can be found in the field of the practical policies in the colonies, in the way in which the colonial powers administer the colonies and operate in them.

95. In practice, in actual fact, almost as a rule, the provisions of the Charter and the obligations arising out of them are ignored. In most of the colonies these Powers have acted as if the colonies were the private property of the colonial Powers and of the colonialist settlers. The fate of the colonies is in their hands and, for this reason, on the whole, they do not wish to be responsible to anyone, either to the international community, or even less to the peoples of the colonies. Even those among the colonial Powers which have been submitting limited information to the United Nations refuse to transmit political information, and especially refuse to permit appropriate United Nations supervision and action when they prove to be necessary.

96. Portugal and Spain, for instance, so far have not permitted the United Nations to approach in any form the colonies under their administration, and even less to gain an insight into what is being done there. Further to increase the irony, they justify this by resorting to legal subterfuges, saying that overseas parts of the metropolitan country are involved, and that, therefore, any United Nations action would constitute an interference in the domestic affairs of Member States.

97. However, the situation in these colonies is sufficiently well known and, judging by the events taking place in Angola, Mozambique, Portuguese Guinea and elsewhere, which have come to light in spite of deliberate attempts at isolation and concealment, the situation is gloomy. The population is officially divided into several categories, of which the category of indigenous inhabitants is, of course, the lowest. The indigenous inhabitants who, in Angola and Mozambique taken together, number approximately 10 million people, belong to the category of "uncivilized" persons, who are outside the laws of the country as they are considered to be unworthy to enjoy the benefits of these laws. Only the settlers or small numbers of persons of mixed race may acquire these privileges; that is, may become equal to Portuguese citizens before the law. Thus it happens that in countries having a population of more than 10 million, only approximately two to three hundred thousand people enjoy the fundamental rights of the laws of the country, and even the majority of this number is composed of foreign settlers.

98. Belgium did not act differently in its colonies, nor is it acting better at present. The author John Gunther, in his well-known book Inside Africa, painted, some time ago, an appalling picture of events and relations in the former Belgian colony of the Congo, and this has also been confirmed by other sources. On the other hand, the facts which became public knowledge in June of this year with regard to the eighty-five-year-old policy in the fields of education and training of domestic personnel in the Congo—a country dozens of times larger than Belgium—show that the results achieved are smaller, incomparably smaller, than the results achieved in this field during a much shorter period of time by a small Belgian commune. It is understandable after this that this policy had to have its share in the later tragic developments in the former colony. It is understandable, in the same way, that a similar policy of the same country in Ruanda-Urundi obliges us to watch with uneasiness the future development of that country, if the United Nations does not take adequate action in time.

99. At the current session of the Assembly, only a few weeks ago, we listened to the statements of petitioners from South West Africa, a country which the Government of the Union of South Africa, in spite of its obligations and of the Charter, endeavours to denationalize and annex. The petitioners revealed, in the Fourth Committee, the fact that in their country, which has been under the rule of the Union of South Africa for forty years, there are fewer indigenous inhabitants with higher education than there are fingers on one hand. The Reverend Markus Kooper from the same country revealed on that occasion—I quote from the records of the Fourth Committee—that "in the hospitals at Gobabis and Keetmanshoop, which had been established to meet the criticisms of the United Nations, Africans were sometimes treated worse than dogs".^{4/}

100. The tragedy of Kenya during the past few years is widely known, and the struggle of the people of that country has already found its place in modern history. The peace and calm which reign in that country, at least for us observers from afar, greatly resembles the peace of the graves which have been strewn throughout the land during the course of the prolonged persecutions under various pretexts.

101. We could enumerate such examples indefinitely, and in doing this we could hardly exclude any colony because they have all gone through, or are going through, the trials experienced in their time by the colonies of Indo-China and Kenya, and which are now being experienced by Algeria, Oman and others.

102. The Fourth Committee had on its agenda this year an extraordinarily important document—the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories [A/4371], on the progress achieved by the colonies during the last decade. I will quote only a few data on some economic aspects in the development of the colonies, as well as the situation in the field of race relations.

103. Paragraph 95 of the report, which is part of the chapter dealing with economic conditions, says the following:

"To a greater extent than in any other field of economic activity, large-scale mining operations in the Territories were financed by external capital and managed by non-indigenous interests. The direct contribution of mining to an improvement in the standards of living of the population was not always substantial, especially as the number of wage-earners employed was often relatively small. Indigenous participation was usually for the most part through unskilled labour ..." [A/4371, part two, para. 95].

This cannot mean anything else but that the essential riches of Non-Self-Governing Territories have been appropriated by the colonialists and foreigners.

104. The following data are added inter alia in paragraph 53 of the report:

"Thus in 1957 in the Belgian Congo the per caput personal income of the African population was $42.20 and of the non-African $2,973; in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland the corresponding figures were $39.20 and $1,711; and in Kenya $33.55 and $1,100." [A/4371, part two, para. 53.]

Any further comment, of course, seems to us superfluous here. The extent of economic exploitation of peoples adequately speaks for itself.

105. In the majority of colonies, or to be more precise, in all the African colonies, the relations between races are poisoned and extremely tense because, in all these countries, actual and legal racial discrimination is being practised to the detriment, of course, of the peoples of the said countries. The world is sufficiently well acquainted with this also, and therefore I would limit myself here to quoting what the report has to say about this matter. The following description is to be found in section C, VI, paragraph 177:

"Discrimination on grounds of race or colour continued to exist in some Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was still to be found in its most acute form in African Territories, where immigrant communities are present. In all these Territories the indigenous inhabitants constitute the vast majority of the population, and the European group is often an extremely small minority, though the latter has exercised special political, social and economic privileges which are denied to the former. Not only was inferior treatment accorded in varying degrees to indigenous inhabitants in the field of human rights and fundamental freedoms, but in the economic and educational fields and in the exercise of political rights also, their role was restricted." [A/4371, part two, para. 177.]

106. In this respect I would like to quote only the example of Southern Rhodesia, which will illustrate concretely the above report. White settlers have divided the country into black and white areas, retaining, of course, as in the case of other colonies, the best land for themselves. This means practically that to the 3 million Africans, 39 million acres of land are allocated, while the less than a quarter of a million white settlers have some 48 million acres of the best land of the country set aside for them. In Southern Rhodesia no African may own land in the white area; he may not rent an office in an urban area, nor carry on business in a town or a city. African businesses must be carried on in segregated African townships.

107. In summarizing these data, which we could enumerate endlessly, we always come to the same conclusion, namely that policies contrary to the spirit and letter of the Charter were and still are pursued in the colonies. Instead of progress, which has been assigned a particularly prominent place in the Charter, an insignificant progress, and even a lagging behind, accompanied by ruthless exploitation, have been registered in the majority of colonies. In fact, this is only one of the by-products of colonialism, and if it were not so, we would not be faced every year with an ever growing list of problems for which we are trying to find solutions here, and which constitute the legacy and consequences of colonialism in the various regions of the world. Instead of the protection of the people against abuses and lawlessness, arbitrary rule and a system of brute force most frequently prevail in the colonies. Racial discrimination flourishes particularly, and in this respect we have reached in the colonies the highest degree of absurdity, namely, that peoples in the twentieth century, in their own countries and their own homes, must struggle for at least an equal place in life with foreign rulers and their followers—the colonialist settlers.

^{4/} Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifteenth Session, Fourth Committee, 1050th meeting.

108. Viewing the problem under consideration in this light, we must come to the conclusion that colonial policy, in trampling under foot the provisions of the Charter, simultaneously violates the basic norms of the civilized world. Even if we accepted for a moment different views on the significance of the provisions of the Charter, and even if we accepted for a moment a different interpretation of the Charter with regard to the colonies, we would still be fully justified in considering that practical policies and actions and their effects in the colonies have no connexion whatsoever even with such views and interpretations.

109. In this connexion I cannot help referring to the example of Malta, which illustrates rather faithfully the assertion I have just made. This territory enjoyed a certain measure of internal self-government from 1947 to 1958, when the Constitution was abrogated. According to that Constitution, foreign relations and defence were in the hands of the British Government. According to the new Constitution, which is now in preparation, in addition to foreign relations and defence, even the civil service and the police—which formerly, under the previous Constitution, had been within the competence of the Maltese Government—are to be under the control of the British Government. In other words, this means that instead of progress towards full self-government, a Constitution is being prepared for Malta which actually amounts to a retrogression compared with earlier achievements. Furthermore, the Constitution is such that the colonial Power may abrogate it at any moment, which shows that there can be no talk of real self-government.

110. The demand that an end be put to colonial relations and that the United Nations exert energetic efforts with a view to undertaking direct and radical measures—this demand constitutes the only realistic policy of the United Nations today, as well as a great historical obligation of the whole international community. To reconcile oneself to the prolongation of the present situation and relations in this field would be for us tantamount, particularly today, to exposing the interests of the international community to a great risk, and to abandoning them to the whims of selfish and short-sighted policies.

111. Colonial relations are incompatible with the requirements and needs of development of contemporary society; they are contrary to the interests of the present-day international community. For this reason they have not been able to escape their fate. The colonial system has been rapidly disintegrating since the Second World War. Thus, it has disappeared, on the whole, in Asia and in the Middle East, whereas in Africa its proportions have been considerably reduced. The formerly numerous colonies have been replaced by independent countries and States, which have taken signal positions in the world in the efforts for peace, independence and progress.

112. Although, today, colonialism continues to exist only in the form of remnants, it nevertheless appears and presents itself as a very acute problem for many reasons. In this final phase of colonialism it is rather natural that the peoples of the colonies should more actively claim their rights and the satisfaction of their national aspirations, which colonial policy tends to smother by resorting to repression and force, out of which stem crises, conflicts, and even wars. It is precisely for the reason that colonies and colonial problems are often viewed from the angle of the strategic needs of the cold war that this problem gains in urgency and that its solution imposes itself as a component part of our general efforts towards easing tensions and ensuring peace among nations.

113. Actually, it seems today that the liberation of peoples from colonial domination is one of the prerequisites for the success of any serious effort aimed at consolidating peace and relaxing tension in the world. Peace is threatened from various directions and in different ways, but it appears to us that one of the main sources of the danger today to peace is to be found in colonial policy which provokes, now on one point of the globe and now on another, conflicts and conflagrations which can be resolved and extinguished only if the untenable colonial relations are abolished and if the justified aspirations of the peoples are satisfied.

114. We have always considered that colonial relations are untenable, and we have demanded their abolition for legal, historical and moral-political reasons. Today, however, they obviously emerge as a direct threat to the highest interests of the world, and therefore it has become essential in the general interest that the world rid itself of such an anomaly without any hesitation. In pleading for this, my delegation has always believed that we should do it in the general interest and in our own national interests as well. The Yugoslav delegation believes that today the abolition of colonial relationships is also in the well-conceived interests of the colonial Powers themselves, which are facing the danger of bending under the burden of the stubborn pursuit of colonial policy—and we have seen this happen many times already.

115. What can the colonial Powers expect and hope to achieve today by stubbornly prolonging relations which are obsolete and untenable? The maintenance of a huge apparatus for oppression, of expensive armed forces which are exhausting the metropolitan countries both materially and morally, and yet remain without effect: this is a burden which cannot be eschewed, and the results in the end are always tantamount to defeat.

116. In the course of the process of the abolition of colonial relationships, our Organization has considerably contributed to the acceleration of that process and has, within the limits of its possibilities, exerted efforts to assist the peoples in the colonies to realize their legitimate and natural rights. Thanks to these efforts exerted by the United Nations, this process has often evolved less painfully and more rapidly than would otherwise have been the case, and the events in various complex situations have developed more steadily and smoothly than would have been the case without the presence and efforts of our Organization. For these reasons, and because of our belief that the United Nations has great possibilities and a great historical obligation with regard to the abolition of the remaining colonial relationships, we consider that, today also, this Organization's action in that field is vital and essential.

117. In this intervention we have, as on earlier occasions when problems of this nature have been discussed, taken the position upon which progress in the world and peace among nations depend to a very great extent. The United Nations, as the guardian of peace and the instrument of peaceful co-operation among nations, has, in our view, special responsibilities and great possibilities to make the future of peace and of the world in general more secure through the adoption of adequate decisions. The ideas on the liquidation of colonialism, as well as their adequate implementation, are in harmony with the responsibilities of the United Nations, with the responsibilities of the international community, and with the rights of the peoples in the colonies. Therefore, we consider the implementation of these ideas to be indispensable today.

118. Guided by such considerations, my delegation will accept and support all appropriate resolutions or decisions likely to lead us to the immediate abolition of colonial relationships. My delegation will support every decision likely to lead us to the unreserved recognition of the right of the peoples in the colonies to independence, every decision likely to bring about the disappearance—in the immediate future—from the soil of Asia, Latin America and, particularly, Africa, of the last remnants of a system which we rightly consider to be the running sore of the contemporary social community and one of the greatest sources of danger to peace in the present-day world.

119. In conclusion, I wish to reserve my delegation's right to speak again, when the time comes, in the debate on concrete draft resolutions or declarations.

The meeting rose at 12.45 p.m.

1. Mr. FEKINI (Libya) (translated from French): The present General Assembly debate on the adoption of a United Nations declaration on the granting of independence to countries and peoples still under foreign domination, calling for the immediate and final abolition of colonialism, is a significant stage in the history of mankind. The United Nations, by initiating such a declaration, is taking an important step towards discharging one of the solemn obligations to which Member States subscribed when they laid down certain definite purposes for the Organization. One of those purposes was "to develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace".

2. It is now universally acknowledged that the practices of colonialism, which consist purely and simply of the domination of certain countries by others and the subjugation of certain peoples by others, are a flagrant violation of the principle of "equal rights and self-determination of peoples" laid down in the Charter; while the practices of colonialism, by keeping a number of countries and their inhabitants subjected to the domination and exploitation of other countries, are the most obvious causes of the distress, the acts of violence and the disorders which are occurring in several parts of the world and seriously threatening international peace and security.

3. The colonial phenomenon, in the historical sense, reached its peak in the expansionist urge of the western European Powers during the nineteenth century, especially towards the end. Their ambition was achieved at the expense of a large number of Asian and African countries. A product of the mercantilism of earlier centuries, colonial expansion was based essentially on economic and strategic considerations, in a historical period marked by industrialization in Europe and dominated by the need to ensure that raw materials from the colonies found their way to the metropolitan countries, that strategic points were occupied for the control of land and sea routes and that manufactured goods could be disposed of in colonial markets.

4. More recently, colonization was also used as a pretext when a number of countries in Asia, Africa and Oceania were annexed for the establishment of colonial settlements designed to solve the problems of over-population in certain European countries.

5. What some western European historians like to call the colonial saga has produced—along with its plethora of military expeditions and wars of occupation—its missionaries, philosophers and theorists, and even its poets and its epics, as well as the false theories of superior races carrying out so-called civilizing missions among allegedly backward or inferior tribes.

6. But in spite of the various labels which the colonial Powers used to induce an ill-informed public opinion or a reluctant parliament to accept the vast expense of their conquests, the history of colonial expansion has clearly shown the reality of the materialistic motives, often cynical and selfish and dominated by the greed which inspired the colonialists.

7. In any case, colonialism has more often than not resorted to armed force to impose the rule of one country or people over another. In the eyes of colonial peoples, this domination by force has always been a sign of the illegality and immorality of their subjugation and the seizure of their natural wealth by foreign Powers. The colonial peoples have offered physical resistance to foreign domination, sometimes for decade after decade; and where they have submitted, they have not become resigned, but have submitted only temporarily, seizing every opportunity to assert themselves in a variety of ways.

8. The colonial peoples opposed exploitation, injustice and provocation with insubordination and demonstrations, and sometimes with uprisings, rebellions and revolts. Because of the refusal of the colonial peoples to accept foreign domination, and because they were aware of their right to attain their national ambitions, nationalist movements grew up giving the popular feeling of revolt a means of expression, disciplined organization and dynamic methods of action. Just as men are jealous of their personal rights and basic freedoms when these are threatened by the arbitrary rule of princes or States, so the colonial peoples were eager to enjoy self-respect and to regain their freedom with nations fashioned by their suffering and sacrifice and bearing aloft the ideals of national independence and territorial integrity. The modern history of Africa and Asia is dominated by this struggle of peoples subjugated by colonial Powers and oppressed by the forces of exploitation which seized their natural wealth. Since ideals and reactions are the same irrespective of ethnic diversity and geographical separation, the peoples colonized and dominated by foreign Powers found encouragement for their agitation, one after another, in the success of those who had fought the battle before them. Thus a vast movement of solidarity grew up throughout the world. At first it was spontaneous, then deliberate, and finally agreements were reached and the movement organized among all peoples still under foreign domination. After the Second World War the movement became one of the most important forces in the history of the second half of the twentieth century. This vast liberation movement, aiming at the fulfilment of the aspirations of all peoples under foreign domination, at victory for the dignity of the oppressed peoples and their rapid liberation from the colonial yoke, found a means of expression and a basis for its principles in the League of Arab States set up at the end of the Second World War, in the Conference of African and Asian States held in Bandung in 1955, which worked out a kind of anti-colonialist charter, and at the various pan-African conferences, from the Accra Conference of 1958 to the latest Conference of Independent African States, held at Addis Ababa in June 1960.

9. The principles of the Atlantic Charter and the purposes, principles, and ideals of the Charter of the United Nations have undoubtedly played a decisive part in this historic development of the movement for the abolition of colonialism and of the exploitation of one people by another; and a movement of public opinion in favour of the liberation of colonial peoples has also made a great contribution. This movement has appeared and prevailed because of its humanism, its vision and its nobility of purpose and ideals, even in those countries which are still, unfortunately, dominated by the forces of colonialist reaction. The countries formerly under foreign domination have shown their ability to manage their own affairs and a sense of responsibility in discharging their obligations as sovereign members of the family of nations. In this way they have shown, in the clearest possible way, how untenable are the arguments which the colonial Powers tend to use in order to maintain their supremacy and domination, including the argument that the countries concerned are not ready for self-government. Where peoples have resolved to resort to the most extreme means to achieve their national ambitions, they have shown an exemplary sense of sacrifice in their armed struggle against the forces of colonial oppression which have given the colonial Powers pause. They have realized that the only way to protect their interests is to speed up the process of emancipating the peoples under their domination to prevent them from using such methods to achieve their ends.

10. Thus a process of self-liquidation of colonialism—or decolonization, as it is now called—has made it possible, over the last few years, and especially more recently, for the United Nations to admit to membership many African nations which are free at last from foreign colonial domination.

11. But, alas, there is still much to be done. In several parts of the world, and especially in Africa and the Middle East, tens of millions of oppressed human beings, eager for freedom and a life of dignity and fully aware of their natural and lawful right to self-determination and independence, are fighting bravely against the blind forces of colonial exploitation and oppression. In Algeria, in Palestine, in the south of the Arabian peninsula and in various parts of Africa, the indigenous peoples are revolting against the foreign occupation of their national territory and are fighting against abuse, injustice, hardship, oppression and arbitrary rule. In all these parts of the world, the peoples concerned are paying a heavy tribute in blood, sweat and tears to the triumphant cause of their freedom, their dignity and the safeguarding of the integrity of their national heritage. The peoples in question are prepared to make great sacrifices, simply because they do not despair of the victory of their just struggle in a world where the forces of equity, justice and morality find their most eloquent expression in the purposes, principles and ideals of the United Nations Charter.

12. It is highly significant that the authors of the Charter tried to base the new order, the order of the United Nations, on the solemn determination of the peoples of the United Nations "to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small", and "to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom".

13. This fundamental concern with the dignity and worth of the human person was the source of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. That solemn proclamation was certainly a historic step forward in the struggle for the triumph of individual rights and essential freedoms.

14. No less important is the United Nations concern to achieve these freedoms within the framework of the equality of nations large and small. Chapters XI, XII and XIII of the Charter deal with obligations towards Non-Self-Governing Territories and territories under international trusteeship. Over the past fifteen years, the United Nations has worked most diligently to implement the provisions of the Charter which relate to these two kinds of territories and are basically concerned with ensuring the political, economic and social progress of the peoples of those territories, developing their administrative ability, catering for their political ambitions, helping them gradually to develop their political institutions and encouraging their steady growth towards self-government or independence.

15. Over the past fifteen years, the dependent peoples, or those under foreign domination, have taken every opportunity of expressing their most ardent and sincere wish to enjoy their freedom and self-respect and to be masters of their own fate. Those among them whose national aspirations have been fulfilled have considered it their duty to make the voice of the still oppressed peoples heard in international circles; they have become the interpreters of the legitimate desire of those peoples for human dignity and national independence.

16. Some of the dependent peoples, as we have already said, have determined in the face of injustice, misunderstanding and provocation to use extreme methods to gain their rights. This has led to tragic situations and bloody wars which are a serious threat to international peace and security. The long and painful war which has now gone on for six years in Algeria between the forces of nationalism and the armies of colonialist oppression, is a distressing and alarming example.

17. The acts of violence, clashes and disturbances, the instability and unrest characteristic of the Asian and African countries under foreign domination today and ever since the Second World War, have been caused mainly by this very failure of the colonial Powers in their so-called civilizing mission and the humanitarian principles they professed in order to bring the local peoples under their yoke. Denial of human dignity, ignorance of the demands of the indigenous masses and the negation of fundamental freedoms were unfortunately made still more intolerable by the racial discrimination and segregation practised against most of the peoples who had the misfortune to fall under foreign colonial domination.

18. The Administering Authorities have not given all the attention which was expected and desirable to the education of the indigenous masses, the improvement of their health conditions, the raising of their standard of living and their preparation for the responsibility of managing their own affairs.

19. Those peoples which did achieve their national ambitions immediately understood the enormous responsibilities facing their leaders, because almost everything had to be done from scratch. Large-scale public works were of course carried out in countries dominated by foreign Powers; bridges, harbours and roads were built and similar projects were carried out. But clearly all this was done to ensure the efficient running of colonial enterprises with a view to higher economic returns, almost exclusively in the interests of those who had the work done. It is nevertheless encouraging for all concerned that the colonial past, in spite of old scores, has hardly anywhere engendered bitterness or strong feelings, which would have been understandable; nor has it given rise to rankling hate, desire for revenge or xenophobia among the liberated peoples. On the contrary, in most of the countries formerly under European domination, including my own, foreign communities still live in an atmosphere of hospitality and tranquillity and enjoy a growing economic well-being and prosperity. The anxiety of certain colonial Powers to maintain their supremacy in order to ensure the safety and tranquillity of European minorities, is not based on any valid reasoning and is really no more than a pretext for maintaining colonialist privilege. It merely encourages the desire for domination and perpetuates greed for power and profit.

20. However skilful colonialism may be in maintaining its position by indirect economic technical or other domination, its skill will be of no avail in the face of the awakening of the peoples and their new-found awareness in every field.

21. In its constant concern to discharge its solemn obligations and to create the conditions of lasting peace and universal well-being based on respect for the principle of equal rights of peoples and the right of self-determination, the United Nations must take a stand in favour of ending the exploitation of one people by another, solemnly proclaiming the necessity of bringing colonialism in all its forms and manifestations to a speedy and unconditional end.

22. Once it is recognized that all dependent peoples long to achieve their goal of freedom and independence, it is the duty of the United Nations to denounce any subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination or exploitation as immoral, unlawful and contrary to the principles of the Charter. All peoples have the right of self-determination, the right freely to determine their political status and freely to pursue their economic, social and cultural development.

23. If the United Nations is convinced that the maintenance of colonialism is at variance with its ideal of universal peace, it is in duty bound to declare that all armed action or repressive measures directed against dependent peoples shall cease in order to enable them to exercise peacefully and freely their right to complete independence and to the integrity of their national territory.

24. In accordance with the demands of international morality, as expressed by the great majority of the international community, it is most urgent that the United Nations should declare solemnly that immediate steps shall be taken in all dependent countries, whatever their form of subjection and whatever fictions may be used to keep them in subjection, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those territories, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, preferably with adequate international guarantees.

25. For these reasons a number of delegations, including my own, have submitted to the General Assembly a draft declaration [A/L.323 and Add.1-2] expressing the wish of all the peoples of the earth to get rid of colonialism once and for all and proclaiming the right of dependent peoples to enjoy freedom, national independence and territorial integrity as soon as possible.

26. This draft, worded in extremely dignified and moderate language, is a sincere and realistic attempt to bring about the final victory of the principles of the United Nations and its ideals of equality among peoples and human dignity. The draft is a sign of good faith and goodwill, devoid of any harshness or demagoguery. By adopting it, we are convinced that the General Assembly will be taking a timely stand, in keeping with its noble mission throughout the world.

27. The moral effect of such a declaration will be to strengthen the hopes of the oppressed peoples who are fighting bravely to attain their legitimate ambitions, and allow the United Nations to create the conditions for a world governed by freedom, law and human values.

28. I should like on behalf of the Libyan delegation to express to the Soviet Union our heartfelt gratitude for its initiative in asking to have this important question placed on the agenda of the present session of the General Assembly [A/4501] and pressing for its solemn discussion in plenary meeting. I must assure the Soviet delegation that we have studied its draft declaration [A/4502 and Corr.1] with the closest attention, and I must say that we have found complete agreement between the views and purposes set out in their draft resolution and our own. Our purpose in associating ourselves with a number of Asian and African delegations to submit the draft declaration contained in document A/L.323 and Add.1-2 was simply to ensure that this question was considered objectively and without reference to any matters irrelevant to its essential purpose. We recommend it to the General Assembly, in the hope that it will be considered in its proper context and approved on its proper merits.

29. I should also like to express in advance our appreciation to the United States of America for taking the initiative in outlining a United Nations programme for the independence and development of Africa. We shall examine this proposal with equal interest when the time comes to consider it in the First Committee. May I say that the interest in the independence of peoples now shown by the two major Powers of the present world is significant in many ways.

30. In conclusion, my delegation sincerely hopes to see the beginning of a new age in the history of mankind when the peoples of the world, free at last from the domination of great Powers, will turn their energies to the service of everlasting peace and fruitful co-operation in a better world, governed by the wise and humane order of the United Nations.

Mr. Nesbitt (Canada), Vice-President, took the Chair.

31. Mr. TARABANOV (Bulgaria) (translated from French): Now that the draft declaration on the abolition of the colonial system and the granting of independence to colonial peoples has been introduced, everyone, even the most determined champions of the colonial system, agrees that colonialism has had its day. Sometimes, however, the champions of colonialism find really ingenious ways of presenting a case which is not in line with the general trend of ideas now uppermost in people's minds regarding the abolition of colonialism. They rack their brains to find expressions such as "an outmoded concept of political relationships" for colonialism, naturally so as not to have to take a clear and unequivocal decision on such a vital question as the abolition of colonialism in our times, or so as to prepare the ground and take up special positions for an out-and-out defence of the colonial system in a new guise.

32. But the declaration on the abolition of colonialism proposed by the USSR is so wide in scope and such a turning point in the history of this question that even those that are involved in colonial exploitation and their friends and allies find it difficult to defend the continuation of the colonial system. Colonialism has caused such untold and incalculable suffering to mankind in general and to the colonial people in particular now that no one can easily defend it openly. For centuries, the colonial peoples have been subjected to a horrible system under which they have been exploited and deprived of the most elementary human rights. We shall not dwell on some of the episodes of colonial history such as the extermination of whole peoples to make room for white settlers, since for the time being these have no direct bearing on the development of the question or on the decision to be taken with regard to the abolition of the colonial system. They are merely historical facts, but they give us an inkling of the ferocity with which colonization was carried out.

33. What is more important is to note that, at the present time, fifteen years after the foundation of the United Nations and the establishment of the system defined in Chapters XI, XII and XIII of the Charter relating to the colonial territories, there has been very little improvement in the situation of the people who are still groaning under the colonial yoke, compared with their lot in the past.

34. Indeed, because the economy of the colonial countries is the most backward in the world, because their agriculture is still at a stage comparable to that of the Middle Ages in Europe, because the fertile land has been taken over and developed by the white settlers while the indigenous population has been herded onto poor and arid land, because industry is very backward and the industrial enterprises are nearly all in the hands of the colonialists, who also exploit all the natural wealth of the colonies, the colonial people are still living in the most frightful poverty and the death rate in the colonies is still so high that the figures themselves do not give an adequate picture of the misery into which the people have been plunged.

In a word, the blood and sweat of the colonial peoples who are still beneath the colonial yoke and the ruthless exploitation of the labour and natural wealth of the colonies are still bringing in fabulous profits for the people who, through their representatives, are trying to convince us of their sacred civilizing mission and of their sincere efforts to prepare the colonial peoples for independence.

35. The results of this civilizing mission are only too obvious and too well known. We shall not dwell on the living standards of the colonial peoples. Other delegations have quoted figures in abundance. It is enough, perhaps, to point out that in most colonies, the per caput income of the indigenous inhabitants is often scores of times lower than the per caput income of the white colonists.

36. And these are not all the so-called virtues of the colonial system. There are others. The indigenous inhabitants are subjected to a monstrous system of racial discrimination, even in their own country—in South West Africa, Angola, Mozambique, Southern Rhodesia and elsewhere. They are not treated like human beings at all, but as though they were cattle. The colonists are indifferent not only to the interests of these people but even to their lives and their very existence.

37. Under these circumstances it is understandable that certain representatives have appealed to delegations not to bring up the appalling history of colonialism again in the present debate, in particular not to mention certain special and particularly vile instances of colonialism. Some have even gone so far as to claim that it would be introducing the language of the cold war to dwell on cases which show us some of the uglier facts of colonialism.

38. We representatives of the socialist countries would certainly like to find a solution to the problem of granting independence to the colonial peoples without going into all the past crimes of the colonialists or bringing up certain special cases. In fact this is the position and attitude we have adopted in the past and still maintain on every question, provided there is no attempt to use special tactics to defer and even prevent the necessary solutions—we have proved this on several occasions. We have no wish to introduce an acrimonious note into the debates on the item under discussion, either in the General Assembly or in the Committees. However, we cannot resign ourselves to mere statements, to expressions of pious hope that a just and adequate solution will be found for the problems facing the General Assembly, if and when the representatives of certain countries start manoeuvring to divert attention and prevent the necessary decisions from being taken. It is regrettable that in the course of the present debate, attempts have been made by the representatives of certain colonial Powers to present the vilest colonialism not only in a favourable light but as a boon to the colonial peoples who for decades and even centuries have been bowed beneath the colonial yoke. The United Kingdom representative, for instance, attempted to prove that the question of granting independence to the colonial peoples could not be considered a colonial question and sought to place it on another footing which he hoped would make it possible to thwart the colonial peoples struggling for their liberation and impatiently awaiting a decision from the Assembly. He strove to transfer the discussion to another field, the field of the cold war; but if we followed him, we should have even more arguments, and really effective ones, not hackneyed arguments such as he uses.

39. Some representatives of the colonial Powers have stood up here, both during the present debate and in other discussions in the United Nations, and tried to champion the colonial system without giving the appearance of doing so. The old form of colonialism, they tell us, is dead or at least dying. The colonial Powers themselves have granted independence to the colonial peoples; why, then, should we discuss the question of colonialism in such detail, they ask. Why propose such urgent measures against a system which is disappearing naturally, of its own accord?

40. It would be difficult to find statements so far from the truth. At the present time, more than a hundred million men are still under the colonial yoke. Not a day goes by without the Press and radio informing us of the cruelest repressive measures against the colonial peoples. Not only are colonialism and the colonialists unwilling to let go their prey, but realizing that their days are numbered, they often become much more aggressive and much more bloodthirsty. Where the colonial Powers are no longer able to resist the pressure of the masses of the people, they make political concessions, while at the same time striving to maintain their economic, strategic and other positions. If these are imperilled, they use every means at their disposal, including armed force, in an attempt to protect them. When they cannot do this alone, they enlist the aid of other colonial and imperialist Powers who are their allies.

41. This aggressive colonialist policy is fraught with enormous dangers for the whole of mankind, for colonialism and its methods of imposing colonial policy have always been linked with war and have always led to war. In the present situation, where there are weapons of mass destruction such as nuclear weapons, mankind can no longer run the risk of allowing such breeding grounds of conflict and the possibilities of war to persist indefinitely.

42. The United Kingdom representative, in his out-and-out defence of the principles of colonial policy and his attempt to find justification for not granting immediate independence to colonial countries, has adduced arguments marked by what, in this day and age, is a strange and completely misplaced logic. He has tried to prove that certain small nations and small territories should not be granted immediate independence. However, there is nothing to be found in the United Nations Charter which establishes an invidious distinction between small and large nations. Moreover, there are, of course, already in the United Nations several countries with a population of less than a million inhabitants. Freedom can surely not be denied to these peoples, still suffering under the colonialist yoke, for the trumped up reasons advanced by the United Kingdom representative. It has also been stated that these small colonial countries had, and will have need of financial assistance and special protection in order to survive. I fear I must question the sincerity of the "generous" concern expressed by the colonialists for those whom they have until now oppressed.

43. In the matter of financial assistance, the balance has, of course, always been in favour of the colonialist Power. As for the protection it is alleged that these small countries will need, why not let them make their own choice and express their own opinion on that point?

44. Reference has been made to another category of countries, where different tribes and communities live side by side and where "groups ... sometimes African, sometimes European, sometimes Asian ... fear that independence when it comes will hurt them".

45. Which groups are meant? If the reference is to the white colonialists who have profited by the colonization and exploitation of the indigenous populations, it will certainly be difficult to persuade the colonial peoples and world public opinion that the colonial system must be maintained in these countries in order to preserve the monstrous privileges enjoyed by these minorities.

46. As for the other communities, it is notorious that the colonialist policy has always sought to create conflicts among them, the more easily to keep them in subjection and slavery. All these contrived problems will disappear of themselves, once a democratic and independent system is established in the countries concerned, unless the colonialists attempt to interfere once again in the domestic affairs of the liberated countries.

47. All such arguments, as well as those extolling the benefits of the colonialist policy, are put forward here, as we have already stressed, to distract attention from the main question now under discussion, i.e. the immediate granting of independence to colonial peoples, to try to postpone a decision and maintain colonial domination until such time as the colonialist Powers are able to find other devices and other ways of dominating their former colonies. Under these circumstances, we must re-examine certain arguments and assertions that have been employed repeatedly by the representatives of the colonialist Powers.

48. On several occasions we have heard statements here to the effect that since 1939, 500 million men and women who were formerly under British domination have obtained freedom and independence and that their representatives are seated here. That is undoubtedly true. But it is odd that the United Kingdom representative should not hesitate to claim for his Government and for the United Kingdom colonialists in general the honour of having furthered this historical development. An attempt has been made to persuade us that British colonial policy was enlightened and that the United Kingdom Government made a great contribution to the liberation of the former colonies.

49. Perhaps the United Kingdom representative is counting on the colonial peoples having short memories, or is hoping that this joy at being independent has made them forget the dreadful reality of the past, the horror of colonialist subjugation and the protracted and heroic struggles they waged to achieve liberation and independence. The fact that these peoples have not forgotten and will never forget so long as colonial domination exists on this planet has been amply demonstrated in the discussions that have taken place here since the debate on the elimination of colonialism began. I refer to this matter, not to prove what is self-evident but merely to refresh the memory of certain representatives and to make them realize that unsupported assertions cut no ice with world public opinion.

50. The United Kingdom representatives have said more than once that the policies of the United Kingdom colonialists had brought hundreds of millions of human beings freedom and independence. However, the facts are entirely different. To learn what the United Kingdom policy really has been throughout the period when so many British colonies have attained independence, one must refer, not to the statements made by United Kingdom political leaders after this historical development had reached fruition—such as the statements by the present Prime Minister of the United Kingdom or by Mr. Ormsby-Gore, the United Kingdom representative to the United Nations which I will not cite, since they are so well known—but rather to the statements and acts of the political leaders of the United Kingdom at the time when these decisions were taken and the events in question took place.

51. Thus, we should like to cite the statements of the most eminent political leaders of the United Kingdom at the time when one of the largest British colonies, India, was about to attain independence.

52. Opening the debate on 5 March 1947 on the Labour Government's decision to transfer power in India within fourteen months, Sir Stafford Cripps stated, inter alia, that the Government was faced with two alternatives:

"...first, we could attempt to strengthen British control in India on the basis of an expanded personnel in the Secretary of State's services, and a considerable reinforcement of British troops, both of which would have been required, so that we should be in a position to maintain for as long as might be necessary our administrative responsibility"—note that the same innocuous expression is used today by Mr. Ormsby-Gore to describe British colonialist subjugation—"while awaiting an agreement amongst the Indian communities. Such a policy would entail a definite decision that we should remain in India for at least 15 to 20 years ... The second alternative was, we could accept the fact that the first alternative was not possible One thing that was, I think, quite obviously impossible was to decide to continue our responsibility indefinitely ... into a period when we had not the power to carry it out."

53. Thus, according to Sir Stafford Cripps' statement, the United Kingdom was obliged to recognize the independence of India because it did not have the power needed to stay in the country.

54. Sir Winston Churchill, speaking on behalf of the Opposition, declared that the members of the Opposition had to sever themselves altogether "from the Indian policy of His Majesty's Government, and to disclaim all responsibility for the consequences which will darken—aye, and redden—the coming years".

55. That is what Churchill said in 1947, and now Mr. Ormsby-Gore is trying to tell us that the aim of the British policy of this period was to bring about the liberation of the colonial peoples.

56. Later, Churchill said that if the United Kingdom, "through lack of physical and moral strength, cannot wind up our affairs in a responsible ... fashion,"—and by responsible fashion he meant the maintenance of colonialist subjugation in India and the setting up of a Government that would follow British policy—at least it should not end "by a premature, hurried scuttle", thus adding to the "ruin" and disaster, which is what Churchill called the attainment of independence by India and the other British colonies that liberated themselves thereafter and brought about the collapse of the British Empire.

57. Thus the fact is that India obtained its independence, not because the colonialists granted it independence willingly, but because they did not possess the military power necessary to maintain their colonial domination of that country.

58. But India is a large country. In other colonies, the United Kingdom colonialists were able to maintain enough troops to postpone independence for years and years and to maintain the colonial system by repression and massacre. To cite only one instance, the example of Kenya is still fresh in everybody's mind.

59. In an attempt to find reasons for postponing the liberation of certain countries and their attainment of immediate independence, the United Kingdom representative sought to persuade us that independence had been postponed only through a desire to give "the people of these countries ... independence in the form which suits them, and not according to some ideological pattern imposed on them from outside" [925th meeting, para. 50].

60. It is really startling to hear the United Kingdom representative make such a statement, at least for any one who has had an opportunity to follow the progress of the colonial people's fight for independence.

61. It will be recalled that scarcely seven years ago the People's Progressive Party of British Guiana achieved a signal victory at the polls and thereby chose the form of government which suited it. Unfortunately, that form of government did not suit the British colonialists. The United Kingdom Government sent its battleships, suspended the Constitution and declared the elections invalid. Speaking to the House of Commons on 22 October 1953, Mr. Oliver Lyttelton, Secretary of State for the Colonies, made the following observation: "Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to tolerate the setting up of Communist states in the British Commonwealth" As you see, that is quite a different tone from the one employed by Mr. Ormsby-Gore. Mr. Lyttelton's view was echoed by the following commentary from Mr. Bevan, speaking for the Labour Party. This version of the attitude of the British Government on the right of peoples to have whatever Government they liked was as follows: "You are free to have whatever Government you like as long as it is the kind of Government we like." In other words, the question was whether the Government pleased the British Government.

62. British Guiana is an interesting and instructive example of the manner in which the colonialists think they can arrange matters in their former colonies. For them, the establishment of an independent and popular régime would be a "bad" example which might have an unfortunate effect on the peoples of the adjacent territories.

63. The New York Herald Tribune was quite frank about the situation when it stated, on 9 October 1953, that the case of British Guiana is of vital importance to the United States, not because of the internal events in that colony, but because of its strategic position, since the neighbouring country of Venezuela is synonymous with two products very important to the United States economy: oil and iron ore.

64. That explains why in Guiana great forces were marshalled to disperse the popular régime headed by Mr. Jagan.

65. The entire history of colonialist misdeeds should convince us that it is impossible to trust the good faith and good will of the colonialists. That is just one more reason why the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples [A/4502 and Corr.1], proposed by the Soviet Union, is of capital importance at the present time.

66. The efforts by the colonialists to postpone the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples are made with a view to finding new ways and means of maintaining their economic and political dominion over these countries. But the machinations of the colonialist circles against the oppressed peoples of their colonies should spur us on to take a decision which will make it possible for these peoples to achieve independence immediately and to decide for themselves what form of government they want. The time has come to tell the colonial peoples that the United Nations, faithful to the principles of the Charter, will give them full support in their just fight against the most monstrous system known to mankind—colonial subjugation.

Mr. Boland (Ireland), resumed the Chair.

67. Mr. ALVAREZ RESTREPO (Colombia) (translated from Spanish): A few weeks ago, from this same rostrum, the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics referred to Colombia as a colonialist country simply because our delegation had expressed the view that this item could have been discussed in an atmosphere of greater serenity and calm in the First Committee rather than in this Assembly, which seems to lend itself to sharp exchanges of views or vehement oratory, so that statements made here are often uttered in a spirit of propaganda, with an eye to the outside world, rather than with a desire to inform the opinion or influence the calm judgement of the representatives of the various nations.

68. We could not therefore speak in this debate without stating beforehand that our country is one which ardently supports the self-determination of peoples, and which at no time in its history has been associated with any movement aimed at the suppression or limitation of that freedom elsewhere. On the contrary, when, 150 years ago, Colombia was beginning its life as a separate nation, and before it had even consolidated its own independence, it did not hesitate to send its armies to the neighbouring countries of Venezuela, Ecuador, Peru and Bolivia in order to support them in their struggle for final emancipation from Spanish rule.

69. In that magnificent epic struggle, the men of five nations fought under the inspiration and command of Simón Bolívar, the illustrious leader whose legendary exploits fill the pages of American history. The blood of Colombians was thus shed on American soil, from Caracas to La Paz, in a gigantic effort which far exceeded its capacity at the time and which was undertaken by my country with the sole aim of co-operating with the Spanish colonies in order that they might acquire full independence as sovereign nations.

70. We have therefore an honourable history as an anti-colonial country which entitles us to speak in this debate with a full sense of responsibility, and we cannot refrain from pointing out, in passing, that after our armies contributed to the liberation of five countries and the victory was won, all those brave stalwarts disbanded their armies and went peacefully back to their homeland or settled in the countries which they had helped to liberate, building their homes there and living in peace as simple citizens dedicated to the work and progress of the new emancipated lands. How very different is this attitude from that of other nations which in the very middle of the twentieth century send their armies not to help countries to be free but to co-operate with governments that drown in blood the sovereign aspirations of their peoples.

71. The subject of colonialism is as old as the world. Rome, Greece and Carthage were in their time colonies, as were also France, Spain, Germany and the United Kingdom. The history of the world is the story of the life of countries which, through changes extending over a long procession of years, eventually attained the full realization of their political personalities.

72. In the perpetual flow of time, new forms of life are substituted for others which in their day had their explanation and reason for existence. Even legal institutions change as the years go by; the theory of national sovereignty so dear to the writers of treatises on international law in the nineteenth century has been superseded by the new form of supra-national association which is the basis of the United Nations.

73. Our country too was a colony, and in the initial period of independence our people displayed the same rebellious attitudes and voiced the same bitter complaints as we now hear, with some justification, on the lips of the representatives of the new nations which have recently acquired their freedom and, by virtue of their new status, have been able to join our Organization after having lived for many years under the dominion of some foreign Power. The fact that we were a colony did not prevent us, once we had achieved our independence, from regarding Spain with the greatest affection as the country which governed us during the period of our early formation, and which gave us a language, a religion, a legal system and a broad cultural foundation, four elements which have been the fundamental pillars on which our society has been built.

74. Not every aspect of colonialism is as pernicious and harmful as some representatives here, more from political zeal than from a desire to understand history, try to make it appear. In the gradual formation of new nationalities one of the valuable cultural contributions to their future life is that which has been transmitted during the years of domination by the governing country, as we have been able to appreciate here as we listened to the erudite and judicious speeches of representatives like the Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Cameroun and Nigeria in which an outstanding cultural background was apparent.

75. In speaking of colonialism it may perhaps be appropriate at this stage to clear up one point in order to avoid a repetition of what some speakers have had the affrontery to insinuate, vaguely but none the less suggestively, when, in their references to the colonial problem in the world, they appear to include the whole of Latin America within the areas controlled by the colonial system.

76. It is true that in our continent there remain a few small areas under the control of European nations, and we hope that one day those areas may enjoy full liberty. It is equally true, however, that the Latin American countries represented here are not colonies of any Power. Each country has well-defined geographical and political boundaries, and on the soil of our continent there have arisen sovereign nations, each with its own personality, its own culture, its own history and its own unmistakable human characteristics. The one feature that might stamp us all as members of the same family would be the jealous care which we exercise on all occasions to avoid any threat to our sovereign autonomy. From the greatest to the smallest, from Brazil to Costa Rica, each of the twenty American States has its own personality, its own distinctive features and a proud belief in its independence that can never be effaced however difficult the circumstances that may arise in its national life. In that respect we all bear traces of the heritage we received from the Iberian peninsula, from Spain and Portugal, countries in which the cultivation of one's personality is inseparably linked with the words denoting "honour and nobility", which are so much esteemed in our language. We are no man's slave. Politically we move in the broad area of Western democracy, the same democracy by which the free nations of the world became united in one great phalanx to fight against totalitarian dictatorship. We choose our governments and our parliaments in public elections, in which every citizen has the opportunity of expressing his opinions according to his own conscience; we determine our own fate and order our own destiny according to the dictates of our national needs. It is time therefore for certain delegations to the United Nations to stop insinuating that we are some other nation's colonies when in reality the Latin American countries are sovereign and independent nations because they bought their independence many years ago with the blood of their heroes.

77. It would seem that there is a malicious and deliberate attempt to confuse the term "colonialism" with the term "under-development", but in fact the one term has nothing to do with the other in our case. We are indeed under-developed countries in the sense that we have a high birth-rate, a low per caput income, in many countries a high percentage of illiteracy, serious health and education problems, and in nearly all cases a high degree of dependence on the export of primary commodities. Thus, according to the experts, we have all the features that characterize an under-developed area. Economic backwardness must not, however, be confused with the loss of national dignity or of social and political autonomy. To use a well-known expression we might say, as they said in Spain when the great nobles lost their fortunes, we continue to be nobles despite our poverty.

78. The aim of this debate on colonialism, according to those who requested it, is to ensure the independence of peoples and to eliminate a shameful phenomenon of modern history. The declaration in its literal meaning presents no difficulty to us. Our legal tradition makes us naturally sympathetic to all that is implied by freedom, but this must be complete freedom in all places, in all latitudes and under all systems. We do not believe that colonialism alone deserves criticism as a system of subjection and submission, of control and enslavement. The item must be wider in scope. The great issue to be debated here is that of freedom in all its manifestations, the freedom to create, to worship, to teach, to write, to speak, to disseminate information, to criticize and to protest whenever this becomes necessary for the preservation of human dignity.

79. Mr. Sékou Touré, the President of the Republic of Guinea, said in this Assembly in his statement of 13 October 1960:

"We know that there are problems on which everyone may speak as he wishes, according to his own temperament; but there are other problems which cannot be considered as personal problems, and still less as problems related to the existence of this or that system or bloc. Such problems concern the very foundations of a life of dignity for every human being, whatever political or economic system he may choose and whatever his religion, colour or nationality." [903rd meeting, para. 4.]

He then added:

"There can be no doubt that the problem of freedom is the greatest problem in the world. No people and no thinking person can think that freedom is divisible or that it belongs to a single people, race or religion." [Ibid., para. 5.]

80. In listening to the speakers who have come to this rostrum to present colonialism as a system which has deprived thousands of human beings of their independence, we might have thought that colonialism, and colonialism alone, represents the problem of freedom in the world. All the terms that signify the submission of one country to another have been employed to convey to us the full horror of colonial policy, which subjugates, controls, enchains, oppresses, humiliates and crushes the dignity of many nations that should be free. In an impressive stream of words a picture of enslavement and bondage has been presented to us, but all the criticism has been directed one way and has had one objective, as if the problems of human freedom existed only in this quarter.

81. The truth, however, is that while political colonialism, for the greater good of humanity, moves rapidly towards its close because of the intelligent and far-sighted policy of the former metropolitan countries or through the force of circumstances, another type of colonialism has arisen to take its place. The only difference is that this is not the type of colonialism which exercises control over the soil and the harvests, the mountains and the rivers, the social life and political system, over education and health and, in fact, over all the externals of the life of a people; it is rather a colonialism which keeps watch over man's conscience, suppresses his freedoms and utterly destroys the life of the spirit.

82. There are, of course, deplorable legacies of the old colonial system, and millions of men are still awaiting their deliverance. Traces still remain of the system which until quite recently controlled vast areas of the world, and we have heard here the statement by the representative of the United Kingdom [925th meeting] who explained in detail how his country is preparing to grant complete self-government to those areas which are not yet independent.

83. What we have not heard here is the voice of those who keep in subjection, not newly-emerging countries, but nations with an old culture and noble historical traditions, and who have forced them to accept a régime of terror and silence. It might be said that while the colonialism which controls material factors and the world of wealth is progressively and continuously disappearing from vast areas of the world, there is arising in other areas what we might term the colonialism of souls. This form of colonialism not only holds in a grip of iron the economic activity of the countries it dominates, but also extends its oppressive sway much further by preventing the free expression of thought and abolishing at one blow the whole decalogue of freedoms written into the Universal Declaration of Human Rights that has been adopted by the United Nations.

84. President Sékou Touré was therefore right when he said that the problem of freedom was the greatest problem in the world, and it is that problem which we shall be attempting to solve by adopting the draft resolution that has been submitted here [A/L.323 and Add.1-2]. It is impossible, however, to divide this problem arbitrarily without falsifying the truth of history, for in the words of the Distinguished President of Guinea, the problems of freedom "concern the very foundations of a life of dignity for every human being".

85. That is the present position of our delegation, the position of a country which has known throughout its history the extraordinary benefits of freedom and will always be on the side of those who are trying to preserve and defend that precious gift for the world for mankind.

86. Some of the statements that have been made here have consisted mainly of an attempt to focus the spotlight and point the accusing finger in one direction only, towards colonialism. They analyse this phenomenon as a monstrous evil, as indeed it has been in the past, since it meant that self-determination was denied to countries which had a right to live in accordance with their own plans and on the product of their own resources. In our opinion, this approach is unilateral and exclusive. The problem of freedom is one and indivisible, and to lament oppression on one front only and in relation to one system only when the total freedom of man has disappeared elsewhere is to take a purely arbitrary stand. One speaker said yesterday that "we do not wish to discuss anything outside the scope of this debate", as if by saying that he could induce us to pass over in silence facts which are at least equal in importance to colonialism since they concern the same social and human phenomenon. They concern in fact all that the peoples of the United Nations jointly affirmed when they stated that they were determined, as the first preambular paragraph of the African-Asian draft resolution also says, to "re-affirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small," and "to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom".

87. These are the guiding principles of our Organization, its true justification in the minds of emancipated consciences, and the fruit of experience accumulated by humanity through many centuries. We are prepared to support the draft resolution submitted here by the thirty Powers, but with a few slight amendments which we consider necessary because of our conviction that any step forward in the process of granting freedom to new countries is a step towards the well-being of all mankind. It is thus with the deepest rejoicing that we welcome the emergence of these new States into the independent life which will enable them to devote all their resources and all their intellectual and moral faculties to the improvement of their own people and the increase of their own wealth. These countries are fortunate in finding the door wide open to international co-operation and the valuable assistance of the United Nations.

88. When, through their own efforts, the countries of Latin America obtained their freedom, they were faced with the grave problem of having to struggle alone and in isolation, with no economic resources or technical training, and with no one to extend them a helping hand in the first days of their independent existence. They were free, it is true, but they were setting foot on the road of world competition with the hesitating steps of young children. For a century we all went tottering along that road, some more unsteadily than others, but none of us sure of the direction we should take to reach the higher economic goals. We experimented with now one and then another political system which could not successfully take root in a land of rugged warriors who had been on the battlefield for twenty years and found it difficult to submit to a rule of law. This was a situation which continued for a long time and which by reason of its disorder and uncertainty, caused tremendous stores of human energy to be wasted.

89. The countries now coming of age are favoured by a circumstance that is of capital importance for their future, namely, the existence in the world of an atmosphere of unlimited co-operation thanks to the guiding influence of the United Nations. The subject of under-development and the measures to combat it constitute the most important element in the study of modern economics.

90. Hundreds of volumes have been devoted in the last ten years to the searching examination of subjects related to the economic organization of the State, the utilization of natural resources, the internal structure of the State, foreign trade, health and education.

91. Only countries like those of Latin America, which had to undergo a century-long process of uncertainty and doubt, unsuccessful experiments and serious mistakes, can appreciate the extent to which these new nations now coming of age are finding the way clear for their first steps on the road to progress. Their freedom, well-directed, can be of service to us all. Their material progress will be an important element in the balance of the world. Their intellectual activity can become an essential factor in the analysis of future problems. May fortune decree that they may all be able to preserve their independence and proudly maintain their own personality without allowing themselves to be deluded by those who play on the magic flute of friendship in order to attract their attention while preparing the chains that will later strangle their self-determination.

92. We shall vote on a draft resolution on colonialism, not in the spirit of recrimination that some would attach to it, but rather with the noble aim of making this a further step forward on the road to human freedom. It will be a happy day when the inhabitants of all countries of the earth, of all latitudes, from the east, the centre and the west, can truly and effectively live under the protection of the essential freedoms laid down in the United Nations Charter.

93. Mr. SLIM (Tunisia) (translated from French): It is the custom of certain historians to attach a descriptive label to various centuries and epochs in the life of humanity. Thus, the fifteenth century is described as the era of great discoveries, the eighteenth, nineteenth and early twentieth as that of the great colonial expansion which led to the subjection of the majority of the peoples of Africa and Asia. The year 1960 has been called the year of Africa, which is indeed an apt description since we have had the great satisfaction of welcoming sixteen new African States to our midst.

94. In accordance with the tradition of naming epochs after important events, the second half of the twentieth century will have the distinction of being known as the period of the liberation of peoples. For, whether we like it or not, whether force has to be used or persuasion, whether it is acceptable to the colonizing countries or not, there will soon no longer be any enslaved peoples. The era of colonial domination, of the enslavement of man by man, of the "indigénat" system and other laws imposing forced labour in the colonies, is over. All over the world colonialism, despite its power and resources, is retreating before the irresistible advance of men towards freedom and independence. The irrevocable march of history will certainly not be halted by the obstinacy of France in carrying on a futile and hopeless war in Algeria for the past six years; of Portugal in denying the evidence and clinging to absurd fictions; above all, of South Africa in isolating itself, despite universal reprobation, within an inhuman racism which it has raised to the status of national policy.

95. The upheavals brought about by their stubbornness will perhaps inevitably delay the achievement of freedom by some peoples, but at the cost of much unnecessary suffering and to the detriment of the friendship, understanding and co-operation which are so essential among the peoples.

96. The colonized countries will attain independence with or without the agreement of the colonizers, but they will attain it in any event, for no force in the world can arrest the irresistible march of history.

97. Ever since its establishment, the United Nations has been concerned with the situation of dependent territories and peoples and of those under international trusteeship. The Organization has undoubtedly made a substantial contribution to the peaceful liberation of the colonized peoples through the important debates it has held on the subject, particularly in the Fourth Committee and the Trusteeship Council, and through the numerous recommendations it has made.

98. Nevertheless, that contribution is not sufficient. On the one hand, the impatience of the colonized peoples is continually growing; on the other, the reluctance and the resistance of the colonizing countries have created difficulties which have delayed the recovery of sovereignty and independence by the peoples under their domination.

99. This disharmony between the two movements has frequently led to clashes and to sanguinary conflicts which have endangered the friendship between peoples and international peace and security. It is therefore essential that our Organization should endeavour to lay down basic principles clarifying the application of the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights to this sphere; it would thus indicate the road to be followed and clear it of obstacles.

100. For the sake of reinforcing the authority and effectiveness of this institution and in the interests of friendship, harmony and peace, it is desirable that the peoples should attain independence within the framework of the United Nations and with its assistance.

101. It is therefore appropriate that the General Assembly should hold a large-scale debate on the subject at this fifteenth session and that it should conclude the debate with the adoption of a resolution which will mark an important date in the history of the United Nations.

102. In the opinion of the Tunisian delegation, it is not enough to round off this debate by drawing up a proclamation stating the principle of the right of peoples to self-determination, since this is already enshrined in the Charter; what we must do, above all, is to reaffirm and strengthen those principles in the light of the difficulties raised by the colonizing countries with a view to delaying the liberation of the peoples under their charge.

103. Our task at this session is undoubtedly to provide a vigorous impetus and to give clear and general guidance on the means to be employed so that the peoples still under colonial domination may attain their end, which is also ours, that is to say universal independence.

104. Our essential purpose is to avoid what happened recently in Viet-Nam, what is happening today in Algeria and what has happened in the Congo.

105. Let me explain myself. Faced with the irresistible drive of those countries towards independence, the reaction of the two Powers which can be quoted as examples of the most recalcitrant colonialism—France and Belgium—has been either stubbornly to maintain domination by force of arms or to agree to independence and then to attempt to divide the liberated nations by preposterous manoeuvres and to regain domination by underhand means.

106. In Viet-Nam, for example, after seven years of appalling warfare which cost tens of thousands of lives, France was obliged to bow to facts and abandon the country, leaving behind not only ruins but a people divided into two States and thus providing more fuel for the cold war.

107. Unfortunately, the French colonialists did not profit by the lesson of Viet-Nam. Having learned nothing and forgotten nothing, for the past six years they have been committing the same mistakes in Algeria which were so disastrous in Viet-Nam both for France, for its former colony and for the whole of humanity.

108. In the Congo, Belgium demonstrated its liberalism to the world by agreeing to proclaim the independence of the country. Yet by instigating the secession of Katanga and Kasai and by engaging in manoeuvres designed to maintain its domination in another form, it has plunged the Congo into the tragedy of which we are aware and which today constitutes one of our most serious causes for anxiety.

109. In both cases the result has been a lamentable and grievous chronicle of ruin, misery and mourning. In neither case could the colonialists have hoped to retain their privileges. On the contrary, owing to the force of circumstances, the rift has steadily deepened and the possibility of understanding, reconciliation and co-operation has diminished with every passing day.

110. Would the result have been the same if the colonizing countries had accepted the inevitable and had spontaneously—or at least rationally—encouraged the liberation movement? I do not seriously think so. Viet-Nam, which joined the French Union in 1947, might today have been a unified, independent and sovereign State, linked to France by ties of friendship and fruitful co-operation; the same would be true of Algeria if that had been desired, if there had been a wish to avoid the continuation of the war.

111. The Congo would not have been the scene of the unfortunate exodus of the Belgians or of the appalling crisis through which it is now passing.

112. We consider that the time has come when the United Nations should face its responsibilities and resolutely put an end to the tragedy of the colonized peoples. The country which I have the honour to represent was one of the first of those placed by an unjust fate under foreign domination to initiate the struggle for honour, dignity and freedom. For three-quarters of a century—and particularly during the past thirty years—it waged unrelenting war against the occupying Power. At the time Tunisia's struggle might have been likened to that of David with Goliath, since the conscience of the world was not alive as it is today to the heroic efforts of the peoples to achieve dignity, freedom and independence. By the use of persuasion and force and by invoking humanitarian considerations and human solidarity, my country persevered on the road of honour until victory was achieved. Under the leadership of President Bourguiba, it has always advocated that colonial problems should be solved by negotiation, though it accepts the need for the use of force when faced by a lack of goodwill on the part of the colonialists.

113. On the day when it achieved independence, after having in desperation embarked upon a long and bitter armed conflict calling for patience, perseverance, sacrifice and courage, it accepted as an ideal the sacred duty of lending its support to the peoples struggling for freedom. Thus on 1 June 1955, when it had only just achieved internal self-government, when the whole question might have been reopened since France retained military bases and powerful means of action in the country, Tunisia did not hesitate to stand shoulder to shoulder with Algeria in its struggle for freedom. I shall have much to say on that subject when the question of Algeria comes up before the First Committee. For the moment I shall only make such allusions as I consider necessary in the present debate.

114. On 1 June 1956, when he was leaving French soil for his triumphant return to his own country, President Bourguiba said that he hoped with all his heart that the Tunisian experiment would be extended so that fighting might end in Algeria, as it had ended in Tunisia, with a settlement which would enable co-operation to be maintained and to continue.

115. A few months later Tunisia achieved independence and has since devoted all its efforts and all its resources to hastening the end of the war. During the past six years President Bourguiba has spared no endeavour to reconcile the two parties and to persuade them to negotiate. Unfortunately our efforts have not met with the success they deserve.

116. Nevertheless, despite the great anxiety caused to Tunisia by the continuance of the war in Algeria, which sometimes spills across its frontiers, Tunisia has never ceased to be concerned with the fate of the other colonized countries and particularly those of our own continent, Africa.

117. At all the African conferences, at Accra, Monrovia, Addis Ababa and recently at Leopoldville, Tu-

nia has associated itself with the other independent African countries in advocating the end of colonialism and endeavouring to find the most appropriate means to lighten the cross borne by our less fortunate brothers.

118. More than a year and a half ago, on 2 March 1959, at the Neo-Destour Congress, held at Sousse, President Bourguiba made a stirring appeal to the colonial countries to adopt a realistic attitude. I should like to quote briefly from his speech:

"The instability now prevailing in the world is born of the antagonism between two blocs, the West and the East, and of the desire of each to attract the largest number of peoples of Asia and Africa.

"However, we see the wheel of history turning inexorably in the direction of liberation, not colonization. The number of emancipated nations is increasing day by day. The future is certainly on the side of the freedom of nations—colonialism is doomed: France may persist in its obstinacy for a year or two more, but will not prevent Algeria from gaining independence.

"In the same way, the United Kingdom cannot prevent Kenya, Nyasaland, Rhodesia and Somaliland from becoming independent.

"It is futile to try to delay these developments at all costs.

"The reluctance and procrastination of these countries cannot stop the wheel of history, which crushes those who place themselves in its path.

"Why do the Western Powers not consider a return to wisdom?

"Instead of allowing this great battle to continue, in which liberty is waging an unsystematic and improvised struggle against tyranny, instead of leaving matters to chance and relying on the inspiration of events, let common sense take the upper hand, with a willingness to face the facts. I think there is still time for the nations which value liberty and dignity to reverse the trend of events.

"These nations can meet around the conference table to examine and solve the question of 'decolonization' and all its attendant problems in peace and tranquillity.

"The task is to ensure that mankind progresses from the colonial era into the age of co-operation. This process must take place in an atmosphere of calm. Reasonable stages can be established and the possibilities of fruitful co-operation and lasting friendship safeguarded. This must be possible. The colonized countries should not have to seize their independence at the cost of bloodshed and perhaps at the risk of being plunged into an anarchy which might be exploited by a hostile party to inflame grievances, propagate its ideology and pave the way for its domination."

President Bourguiba continued, on 2 March 1959:

"I can readily envisage a large conference attended by all those countries which are still colonies or semi-colonies.

"At such a conference, which would at first be confined to these countries, the latter could reach some agreement. They would then invite the representatives of the peoples concerned to meet them around the table, or alternatively, they might set up committees to make a separate study of the case of each individual country and examine its possibilities and particular conditions.

"Much useful information could be obtained from the experience of the United Kingdom, which is now making preparations for the independence of Nigeria in October 1960. By that date, the country's constitution will have been drawn up, administrative and technical personnel will have been trained, and its state institutions will be ready to function.

"What the United Kingdom has done for Ghana and Nigeria, and is preparing to do for Somaliland, can perhaps also be done tomorrow for Rhodesia, Kenya and Tanganyika.

"To adopt such a policy is to follow the natural course of development. Why is it that other countries—France for example—do not adopt this same policy?

"They could establish contact with the nationalist movements and, with their co-operation, organize free elections. Such elections would reveal the most influential and enlightened elements, with whom discussions could be held.

"The risks of terrorism, violence and anarchy could thus be avoided in the evolution of colonial peoples.

"Negotiations between colonists and colonized should be concerned, not only with determining the stages and methods of emancipation, but with the consideration of plans for economic assistance and development. The peoples must be saved from underdevelopment, which is a form of servitude.

"In pursuing such a course, the Western countries would merely be applying the principle which they profess to support, of helping the peoples to achieve political and economic liberation. Under the procedure that I propose, this liberation would be achieved in accordance with a reasonable plan providing for the restoration of power to the nationals of the country concerned, for the holding of elections and the training of the necessary personnel.

"Subsequently, ways and means of providing assistance and arranging investments would be investigated in order to speed up industrialization programmes.

"Thus, the road to economic and technical progress would be opened to the liberated peoples."

119. This appeal launched by President Bourguiba more than a year and a half ago appears prophetic in the light of the serious disturbances—of which he gave warning—that have since occurred in the Congo, South Africa, South West Africa and other important places on the African continent.

120. Unfortunately, his appeal to reason and realism went unheeded. Of course, some countries have since been liberated. Nigeria, the African States which were under French domination, and the Congo. But there has been no solution to the colonial problem as a whole, as urged by President Bourguiba, a solution which would have contributed substantially to the reduction of international tension.

121. It is true that sixteen new African States have recovered their independence and have been admitted this year to membership in the Organization. But there is still war in Algeria; there is still no programme of decolonization for Angola and Mozambique. This state of affairs should not be tolerated any longer. The experience of recent years has proved how dangerous it is for the colonizer and the colonized, and for all mankind, to allow colonialism to pursue its harmful course. We know that the colonialists and, more generally, all the peoples that dominate others, are clearly aware that their day is drawing to a close. But we also know that, in its death throes, colonialism may still be shaken with convulsions that are extremely dangerous for peace and international security. This was the case in Indonesia—why should we not recall it?—when the Netherlands, after having recognized the independence of that country, then tried to reconquer it.

122. This is the case today in Algeria and the Congo. I am not afraid to repeat myself on this subject, for the grave responsibility of France and Belgium in this connexion cannot be stated often enough. I cite these two cases deliberately, because they are used by the colonialists as arguments in their attempts to justify their policy of domination.

123. Indeed, it is in virtue of French legislation based on faked elections that Algeria is regarded as French territory. It is on the pretext of safeguarding the national heritage that war is at present being waged on the Algerian people.

124. Portugal, too, regards Angola and Mozambique as integral parts of the metropolitan territory.

125. This idea cannot be justified either on historical or geographical grounds. Nor has it any sound juridical foundation. Therefore it is of capital importance to publicize this fact so that the colonizing countries may not be able to evade their obligations by sheltering behind the national territory theory.

126. Now I come to the example of the Congo. The disturbances that occurred in that country immediately after it achieved independence were represented by the champions of colonialism as a solemn warning of the possible dangers of "premature independence". According to them, the lesson to be learned from the situation in the Congo is this: a colony which is liberated before attaining a certain level of economic development and a certain political maturity, and before qualified personnel have been trained, in other words, before it is prepared for its new responsibilities, runs the risk of lapsing into anarchy. This may be true especially if the former controlling Power does everything it can to sow the seeds of anarchy, as was the case in the Congo. But there is another truth which is also illustrated in the Congo, in Angola and in Mozambique: the colonial Powers are unfortunately incapable of preparing these countries for independence for the very good reason that they do not want them to be independent. Therefore, the only rational and fair-minded conclusion we can draw from the situation is the following: the colonial Powers must give a firm undertaking to refrain from any action that may cause disturbances in the liberated countries and avoid any attempt to create difficulties for the new governments. They must strictly respect the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the new States. In other words, we must prevent any further attempts to do what France hoped to do in Guinea and what Belgium unfortunately succeeded in doing in the Congo. In both these cases, the colonial Powers tried to sabotage the independence they had been forced to concede by the natural course of development.

127. But an undertaking by the colonial Powers, no matter how solemn, does not, in our opinion, constitute a sufficient guarantee. If need be, the United Nations must be able to ensure that the undertaking will be observed.

128. There is another kind of ruse regularly practised by the colonial Powers. This consists in demanding from the colonized country, under pressure, and before granting its independence, certain economic or other advantages.

129. It was indisputably Tunisia's experience—and this situation is still continuing—that before granting independence, certain Powers try to secure for themselves the largest possible number of cultural, economic, and even strategic advantages, which are presented to the other party as being in the mutual interests of both parties, having regard to the principle of the interdependence of peoples.

130. On the eve of its independence, a colonized people thus finds itself in a quandary: it can either reject the demands for concessions at the risk of losing the opportunity of peacefully recovering its sovereignty; or it can accept them at the risk, after independence, of finding its liberty of action restricted, as well as its freedom to determine its own interests, which are not necessarily identical with those of the former colonizing Power.

131. Faced with this painful conflict of conscience, a colonized people generally opts for the second alternative, but with the firm intention, once its sovereignty is recognized and regained, of retrieving whatever it had been forced to concede under pressure. It is then that new difficulties, and sometimes serious crises, arise in the relations between the new independent State and its former master. The latter argues that commitments which have been entered into must be respected and often tries to equate what it considers to be concessions on its part with the concessions which it extorted before independence. Hence the clashes and wrangling that cloud relations which might otherwise become increasingly friendly and trusting.

132. I have done no more than state the relevant and indisputable conclusions based on experience. I could quote exact facts and introduce irrefutable documentary evidence to show the disastrous consequences of agreements made between a colonial Power and a colonized people before the latter achieved its independence.

133. Such agreements must be considered as vitiated from the start. The colonial Powers should refrain from insisting on them. They should, at the very least, agree with good grace to their revision after the former colony takes over its new responsibilities as an independent and sovereign nation. That is a fundamental principle, which would enable peoples under foreign domination to achieve a real, healthy independence, free from the outset from any kind of mortgage.

134. There is a third point which, in my delegation's view, is of prime importance: the need to ensure that political independence has the best possible chance of functioning effectively in the interests of the people concerned—I am speaking of aid to newly liberated countries. They will need such aid, whether economic or technical. None of these States will be able to do without it if it wants to develop economically and socially. In general, this urgent need of new States provides a good opportunity for competition between the different forces in the world, and particularly between the two blocs, each seeking to impose its influence on the new countries. Technicians, equipment, and even considerable funds are offered on all sides from purportedly disinterested sources to States which no longer know whether it is more advantageous to turn to the left or the right. Whatever direction they choose, the result is the same: they find themselves aligned, often against their will, with one bloc or the other. From being an object of rivalry they thus become, despite themselves, parties to a struggle in which they have nothing to gain.

135. That is why we appeal to the great Powers of East and West, in the interests of the new States, for the sake of mankind and of peace, to stop making those States a field for competition. We ask them, in all seriousness and sincerity, to realize that by seeking to draw these peoples into their orbit they run the risk of jeopardizing the normal and natural evolution of these young nations.

136. Having their own ideologies, their own problems, these States urgently need to work in peace and freedom for the prosperity of their people, for higher standards of living. They cannot achieve this aim without the help of more developed countries. In order to improve the situation of their people, to set them on the path of economic and social progress and the application of modern science and technology, they are obliged to turn to the Powers which have attained a very high degree of industrialization and whose technical achievements have sometimes been revolutionary.

137. If the colonies, which are at present one of the factors in the cold war, and may even be one of the causes of a real war, are to stop being a source of discord once they have achieved independence, it is essential that the economic and technical aid which they need and which the two blocs are in a position to give should not be used as a means of binding them to one or other of those blocs. My delegation thinks, therefore, that the value of this aid would be enormously enhanced if it were given through the United Nations. In this way it would lose any political colouring, it would become truly unconditional and would be a disinterested manifestation of international co-operation and solidarity.

138. My delegation much appreciated the action of the Soviet Union in proposing this item for inclusion on the agenda of the present session [A/4501]. We are also very grateful for the warmth with which the Soviet delegation argued the case for discussion of this important question in the General Assembly.

139. However, although decolonization is a problem which concerns the whole world, it is no less true that it is our sacred duty, as countries formerly under colonial rule which have suffered directly from the misdeeds of the colonialists, it is, I say, our duty as uncommitted countries to be in the forefront of this battle. We are far from having any desire to claim a monopoly in the struggle for the freedom of peoples or any intention of refusing the assistance of the great Powers. On the contrary, we need everyone's help and we will not exclude anyone. It is just that we do not want to give this debate, I might even say this whole process of decolonization, an ideological character, which would link it to the struggle at present going on between East and West. We do not want this process to lead to a sterile situation where each of the two blocs tries to outbid the other, nor do we want it to become a means of intensifying the cold war.

140. To put it clearly, we should like there to be less talk of NATO, western bases, the countries of Central Europe and their internal régimes. Neither the first nor the second of these appears on the agenda of this debate, nor, in our opinion, are they related in any way to the question itself. On the contrary, if this debate took on an east-west, partisan, ideological character, we should be liable to get off the subject, to introduce emotion and to make the question a propaganda issue.

141. The problem is so serious that it demands from all of us an effort to lift this debate above any partisan, ideological considerations and give it an objective and disinterested character. I say "from all of us", because I do not see how anyone in this Assembly could honestly oppose the principles which are the very foundation of our Charter. There are still, it is true, some unrepentant colonialists; but, fortunately for mankind, their number is becoming smaller and smaller.

142. But apart from them, who in this hall is not aware of the irreversible process which has led and will lead all peoples to independence? Which of us can sincerely believe for an instant that there could exist any force capable of stopping man's irresistible progress towards freedom? Which of us doubts the impossibility of diverting history from its natural course?

143. There should be no men worthy of the name who refuse other men the right to dignity and freedom on the grounds of their colour, their religion or simply the fact that their countries are not sufficiently developed. Slavery may have been abolished, but is not colonialism one of the most pernicious forms of the enslavement of man by man?

144. In this century of technical progress, in this golden age of science, when man has succeeded in taming the forces of nature, constantly improving his standards of living, there should no longer be any place for servitude. For whereas in the days of slavery, men were bought and sold under a system which no one could have justified in terms of human values, colonialism claims to act in the name of civilization, humanitarian principles, and even by an irony of fate, democracy. Do we not see, even nowadays, States systematically exploiting whole peoples while proclaiming, with the support of figures, that they have lavished education on them, introduced public health services and improved their living conditions? Do we not see States keeping weak peoples under their domination on the grounds that they have granted them the same rights as their own nationals? Yet the results are far from being commensurate with the economic exploitation and the exploitation of human resources in which the colonial Powers have engaged, to the detriment of the colonies.

145. In my statement, I have quoted examples and have made specific mention of certain colonies and colonial Powers. I have done so in order to give this debate a practical character. In the opinion of my delegation, the time for professions of faith and affirmations of principle is past. Such statements of principle were made as long ago as the period after the First World War and aroused great hopes among the subject peoples. Those statements, however, remained a dead letter. At San Francisco, also, it was solemnly declared that the United Nations was determined "to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person..."

146. This is no longer the time to assert such principles, as no one contests them any longer. Our task is to avoid disappointing the peoples of the world, who believed in the San Francisco Charter, to avoid disappointing them as they were disappointed after the First World War.

147. What the present situation requires of us is no longer words, but a solemn declaration by which all Members of the United Nations would undertake to put those same principles into effect and to respect their commitments. It is our duty to achieve one of the aims of our Organization, namely, to give all men freedom and dignity.

148. It was this consciousness of a sacred duty that we all have towards mankind as a whole which prompted my delegation, together with other African and Asian delegations, to submit a draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-2]. This draft specifies the principles which should be the foundation for a general and rapid decolonization in peace, friendship and understanding.

149. We should, it is true, have liked this draft to define more closely the methods of negotiation which, alone, without any coercion or armed repression, should be used by the colonial Powers. We should have liked the draft to fix as short a time limit as possible for the attainment of complete independence by all peoples who are still, on whatever basis, under foreign domination. We have confined ourselves to stating indisputable principles, which do not seem to us to offer any grounds for controversy.

150. This draft could set our Organization on a new path, bringing it to grips with reality. It is one of the finest tasks that it could undertake. If we succeed in carrying it out, we can lay claim to the gratitude of future generations; we shall have helped, in large measure, to achieve the goal which is set before us by the first words of the Charter:

"We the peoples of the United Nations determined to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind..."

151. Not only shall we have reduced the risk of war, but we shall have given the world, in addition to peace, stability and prosperity. We shall have restored to hundreds of millions of men the concept of dignity, of honour, of freedom, and hence, of happiness. We shall have washed the brow of humanity free from the blot of colonialism.

Mr. Tarabanov (Bulgaria), Vice-President, took the Chair.

152. Mr. ASHA (United Arab Republic): In view of the importance of the question before us, the General Assembly, in its wisdom, has decided that it be discussed in plenary meeting rather than in committee. The problem of the liquidation of colonialism and the granting of independence to all colonial countries and peoples is, in the view of my delegation, the most important problem that is before this Organization after the question of disarmament. It raises some of the fundamental issues at stake in the present world and reflects all the cleavages, conflicts and stresses of our time.

153. I would like, therefore, on behalf of my delegation, to express our thanks for the initiative of Chairman Khrushchev in proposing this item: "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples." The declaration which the General Assembly will adopt will inevitably be one not merely about the matter in hand, but no less about ourselves and the future of our Organization. The inclusion in our agenda of this item was approved by acclamation in this Assembly [903rd meeting]—a fact of great significance. Let us, therefore, approve a declaration which will abolish colonialism and free humanity from its evils in the same manner.

154. My delegation has the honour to be one of the co-sponsors of the draft resolution contained in document A/L.323 and Add.1-2, entitled "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples", and I shall now state the views of my delegation on this question.

155. My delegation approaches this problem with a great sense of urgency—a sense of urgency which arises, as we had occasion to point out in the General Assembly and in its main committees, from the rapid and increasing pace of the liberation movement which has swept the two great continents of Asia and Africa, culminating in regaining independence for more than two-thirds of humanity. The events of the past fifteen years, and in particular the year 1960, are historic events, unparalleled in the history of mankind. These events have liberated scores of nations who have suffered, for varying periods, the oppression of the colonial system and have restored to them their fundamental human rights and their dignity, proclaimed in the Charter more than fifteen years ago.

156. But the atmosphere of these past fifteen years was, by far, more dynamic than that which existed in San Francisco in 1945, and vastly more so than before the Second World War—an atmosphere impregnated with ideas, revolutionary ideas, reflecting dissatisfaction with colonial rule, economic exploitation and traditional authority; ideas of the true value of human rights, the dignity and worth of the human person, the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small; ideas of political, economic, social and cultural freedom; ideas for more progress and better standards of life in larger freedom.

157. We cannot afford to pretend that these ideas will safely wait in cold storage while economic, social and educational advancement move on at the same slow pace as in the past. We cannot afford to pretend that the colonial peoples, even in the least developed areas, will be content, or indeed should be required, to come upwards to fitness for independence through the same long, slow, fumbling stages of evolution through which our own civilizations have passed in the course of centuries.

158. In this atmosphere, filled with the yearning of the colonial peoples for their inalienable rights of freedom and independence, one colonial empire after the other began to collapse. Yet they have not as yet totally disappeared, as we hope they will. The time has come when colonialism must be given its final death-blow once and for all to liberate the more than 100 million human beings still suffering from oppression and exploitation in various forms.

159. It is high time for the colonial Powers to forget the glories of former colonial empires and to recognize the emergent historical forces in the areas under their domination. The freedom-loving people of the world must exert all the pressure they can to strike the last nail in the coffin of colonialism, so that peace, stability and friendly relations, based on respect of equal rights, may prevail.

160. One of the great ironies of the present age is the curious inability of the colonial Powers to comprehend the fundamental urges of freedom and independence. Many of them were at one time or the other victims of aggression and lengthy occupation by foreign troops. Have they forgotten the degradation and suffering of these years? Have they forgotten that a great American said:

"... that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

They speak of liberty only to fill the jails and prisons; they declare their solemn devotion to the principles of fraternity and equality only to create more concentration camps for innocent people. They speak of democracy and free speech only to give orders to firing squads. And I ask the existent colonial Powers and the former colonial Powers: How many lives were lost in suppressing the nationalist and freedom-seeking people of their colonies, Trust Territories, Non-Self-Governing Territories, and others? What were their own casualties and what was their net profit and loss? What was the price for colonial domination?

161. Colonialism should have been liquidated a long time ago but, unfortunately, it is still alive. The concept of the right of peoples and nations to independence—that is to say, the right of self-determination—was the earliest aspect of human liberty to be accepted as a matter of international concern. The First World War, which owed its origin in considerable measure to the explosive forces of nationalism, crystallized the concept of self-determination. President Woodrow Wilson became the champion of this ideal even before the United States entered the First World War. He enunciated the principle:

"... that governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that no right anywhere exists to hand peoples about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were property."

162. The widespread acceptance of this principle contributed significantly to the world trend towards liquidation of colonialism. But neither the establishment by the League of Nations of the Mandates System, nor the Trusteeship System, which was established by the United Nations, was sufficiently effective to eradicate the colonial régime. Nevertheless, the position has been firmly taken that peoples and territories should not be used as pawns or be held by victor nations as "spoils of war".

163. During the past fifteen years colonial problems have come to hold the major place on the agendas of our annual sessions of the General Assembly. Indeed, they have dominated our debates.

164. Chapters XI, XII and XIII of the Charter reflect the serious concern of the founders about colonialism in 1945 at San Francisco. They devoted three of the nineteen Chapters of the Charter to the colonial problem because they acutely recognized its vital implications for security, and that real progress towards a solution was an essential element in any firm foundation for peace. They were also mindful of the fact that most of the colonial peoples had, in two great wars, fought and sacrificed at the side of the countries that ruled them and had contributed significantly to their victory. Despite this, the colonial peoples had no voice in international councils and little enough in the ordering of their domestic affairs.

165. It is true that over 800 million people have regained their independence, but there are over 100 million still struggling to win their freedom and liberty. As early as 1947, the late Mr. John Foster Dulles, with whom we disagreed on a number of occasions, was bold enough and courageous enough to ask for the liquidation of the colonial system. Speaking on behalf of the United States in the Fourth Committee, he said the following concerning colonialism:

"The colonial system should be done away with. It is obsolete, and if it ever had justification in the past it certainly has none in the future. It has borne some very evil fruit, primarily in that it has put people of one race to rule over those of another, which has been very bad for both races. I cannot find words to express myself sufficiently strongly on my belief that the system must come to an end and be liquidated in a prompt and orderly way." ^{1/}

166. Thirteen years have elapsed since this statement was made and yet this evil, the most sinister of evils, refuses to die of its own will, and it is up to us now to effect its demise. But to do so, all the colonial Powers must bow to the will of public opinion and provide us with the necessary means. The colonial Powers have all contended that the purpose of their remaining in other peoples' lands is to spread their language and culture to the peoples of these colonies and, in general, to enable them to carry out a "civilizing mission". Let me tell them here and now that they are wrong. In the first place, the former colonial peoples and those who are still not independent have their own cultures, their own civilizations, their own traditions, their own languages and their own customs. They are not only proud of their heritage, but they want to maintain it. They are determined to preserve it and to develop it in their own way. In the second place, these activities can be carried out just as well, if not better, if the colonialists make an exit, and a quick exit now.

167. The rulers of the colonies often declare publicly that the people of the colonies love them. If this is the case, that the subject peoples love them and wish to benefit from their culture and civilization, surely, if independence is granted, nothing will prevent the former rulers from carrying on their so-called civilizing work. Their schools will remain open, provided they operate within the national laws of the country; their settlers and traders will carry on their business—not as exploiters but as equals; and, instead of the former relationship of governor and governed, there will develop a new relationship of partnership, equal partnership. All this will be particularly true if, as we hope, all territories which have not as yet achieved independence become independent and the peoples can exercise their free choice as to the countries from which they wish to receive assistance in building up their society. Recent experience has given proof of the fact that the presence of a European Power as the ruler of an Asian or African country is actually an obstacle to the spreading of the culture and civilization of that European Power. Its presence as the ruler acts as an obstacle because, instead of admiration and love and desire to learn, which perhaps existed before, there is created an attitude of resistance on the part of the governed people, who naturally transfer this resistance from the political sphere to the sphere of the mind and spirit. All this shows that the cultural and civilizing influence, far from being harmed or destroyed by the absence of an accompanying political and administrative influence, may actually be strengthened and encouraged by that absence.

168. The colonial Powers complain, and at times they boast, of the heavy obligations and responsibilities they have to shoulder for the so-called development of the resources of the colonial countries and the welfare of their populations. We have often heard that these financial responsibilities cause a great drain on their treasuries. If this is so, why should they endure such a heavy burden? Would it not be in the interest of the colonial Powers to proclaim independence in their respective colonial territories and thus rid themselves of endless headaches?

169. Another reason why the liquidation of colonialism is in the interests of the colonial Powers themselves in particular and of Europe in general is that it will help them to trust each other. This can best be illustrated from the experience of the northern region of my country following the First World War.

170. The post-war settlement adopted by the League of Nations for the territories of the Ottoman Empire involved the partition of the Arab countries in the northern part of the Arabian peninsula between Great Britain and France. In the period between the two wars, and until the final termination of the French Mandate over Syria and Lebanon, nothing contributed so much to the creation of suspicion, distrust and rivalry between the United Kingdom and France as did their proximity as administering Powers in Palestine on the one hand, and in Syria and Lebanon on the other. The French Government believed that the British were stirring up revolt against their authority in the Levantine States; the British Government believed the French were not adverse to contributing discretely to the difficulties which they were encountering in Palestine. Far be it from me to judge how much truth there was in these mutual accusations; no one, however, could deny that these suspicions and tensions existed. The lesson which we may draw from all this is that nothing contributes so much to the disruption of friendly relations between European Powers as their proximity in territories outside their own metropolitan areas. History, recent history, tells us that many of the wars between the colonial Powers were waged by armies from the colonies and dependent territories. May I suggest that one of the blessings of the abolition of colonialism will be the denial of the manpower of the colonies to the colonial Powers, and that, as a result, the waging of war will become more difficult and the world's chances for peace will thereby be increased.

171. My arguments so far have been concerned only with the strict interests of the colonial Powers. When we consider the aspect of the problem that should be foremost in our minds—the liberty and freedom of these territories in accordance with their wishes and interests—any doubts that might linger as to the necessity of immediate independence vanish altogether. Immediate independence, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with the freely expressed will and desire of the people and without any distinction as to race, creed or colour, must be proclaimed without delay. This is the irrevocable decision which we must take with courage, boldness and determination. If we sincerely believe that the wishes of the people who are struggling for liberty are of paramount importance—and no one can deny this—then the adoption of a declaration to this effect becomes imperative.

172. We are familiar, for example, with the argument that such and such a territory is not ready for independence. When the Ottoman Empire was defeated in the First World War, the territories detached from it were subjected to varying treatment: while on the one hand the least prosperous were left independent, the more developed were placed under the Mandates System. The actual state of the territories in question was not the main criterion; the deciding factors were the rivalries of the great Powers and their inability to agree among themselves.

173. If any colonial Power should venture to say—and I hope none will—that some colonial territories are not prepared to assume independence, then we must treat with the greatest suspicion the assertion advanced by that Power. No serious argument can be advanced to support such an assertion; and if it is made, we are confident that no representative will accept it. In the past we have been told that some colonial territories are too poor to assume the great responsibilities of independence. If the existence of an unbalanced budget were an adequate argument for denying a country its independence, I am afraid we should see many empty seats in this great hall. There are many Governments represented here which do not balance their budgets every year, which receive support from outside sources, which make loans or just juggle along with a perpetual deficit. Only the malicious-minded could suggest that these countries do not deserve independence. Therefore, that argument falls to pieces also because, if the colonial Powers leave these territories, they will, I am sure, take care of themselves and, in co-operation with friendly States and the United Nations family, they will be able to recover their former prosperity once the colonial Powers cease exploiting their riches and natural resources. Financial and technical assistance could be given without denying them independence.

174. Certain colonial Powers are still clinging to the outmoded, discarded, and unjustified claim that certain territories are considered as parts of their metropolitan areas.

175. Those who are versed in the social and human elements colouring and characterizing these territories cannot deny that these territories have far more in common with the people of their sister States in Africa and Asia than with the so-called metropolitan countries. The relationship between these people and the independent people of Africa and Asia has been forged over long centuries of free association and common heritage, while the relationship of the colonial people to the colonial rulers is basically one that is predicated on force. The legal framework linking these territories to the colonialists is one of those anomalies of history that are held and sustained by the imbalance of power.

176. Herein lies a fundamental problem, and in this fact resides the basic cause of the present situation. Whether we take a geographical, historical or cultural approach, these territories cannot be considered as European in character, and I submit that no juridical situation, however valid, can ignore or supersede these basic elements in the formation of the human society. No law is immutable, and, for law to survive, it must ever respond to the dynamic existence of those societies whose evolution it purports to regulate. In the course of centuries of colonial domination these Powers have failed to engender in the conscience of the oppressed people anything of a durable value, and the relationship unfortunately continues to reflect a wide human gap bridged only by force. Otherwise how could we explain the violent upsurge of nationalism in these non-independent territories, this long yearning for independence from the colonial rulers, this turmoil of revolution and suppression in those countries? This is a fact which we must face, and face now. No legal niceties can suffice to explain the situation. It is undeniably a situation that calls for our concern as an international Organization, and the colonial Powers cannot claim in this respect any exclusive domestic jurisdiction. This aspect of the problem has been dealt with during this and past debates, and I need not take the time of the Assembly to dwell on it in detail.

177. Some of my colleagues have already exposed the myth that certain territories are integral parts of the metropolitan countries. It is therefore idle for the metropolitan Powers and those who support their thesis to claim that the questions pertaining to the so-called "overseas territories" are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the metropolitan Powers. These territories have nothing more than a colonial status and must therefore be liberated without delay.

178. I should like to stress one other point, and that is the preservation of the unity and territorial integrity of the colonial countries. I mention the necessity for unity and territorial integrity because of the unfortunate experience of recent years and of recent events. My delegation attaches full importance to these two considerations. We believe that the question of territorial integrity and unity cannot be divorced from the question of independence.

179. A colonial Power has on one occasion divided a small land into five independent States. In North Africa, Morocco was amputated from an integral part of its territory—Mauritania. Colonialism is also threatening the unity and territorial integrity of the Republic of the Congo (Leopoldville). One cannot forget the situation in Malta, where unfortunately the aspirations of the people are not receiving due respect by the Government of the United Kingdom.

180. In Palestine a division, drastic and disastrous, was the final outcome of the Mandatory régime. The colonialists have conspired against a whole nation. A nation was uprooted wholesale from its motherland and given away to others. In this connexion may I be permitted to quote what President Gamal Abdel Nasser said on 27 September 1960, before this august body:

"Imperialism has its own logic. The logic of imperialism, as manifested in its crime against the people of Palestine, has been to break the geographical unity of the Arab world, on the one hand, and, on the other, to create for itself in the very heart of the Arab world a base from which to threaten the Arab peoples. I believe no stronger proof of this could be given than the conspiracy which led to the tripartite aggression against us in 1956." [873rd meeting, para. 131.]

This new form of colonialism called Zionism must also be eradicated.

181. Another attempt at destroying unity is under way in Algeria. A colonial war has been waged for over six years. The colonial Power, in this case France, with military assistance from its allies, is using the most inhuman war weapons against the brave and heroic people of Algeria to perpetuate the subjugation of ten million Arabs. These Algerian brothers and sisters, who have suffered more than any people in the cause of regaining their freedom and liberty, are fighting selflessly to that end. As President Nasser said:

"It is really deplorable that the French Government persisted in setting up concentration camps and resorted to all sorts of brutal torture against the free men and women of the Algerian people, in a manner which aroused the human conscience all over the world, including France itself." [Ibid., para. 144.]

182. The valiant people of Algeria have lost hundreds of thousands of martyrs, their towns and villages were destroyed, over two million innocent civilians live in concentration camps, and hundreds of them die every day, so that their liberty may be restored. So far France has refused to settle this bloody war and now is threatening the territorial integrity and unity of Algeria. How much longer can we tolerate this shameful colonial aggression? How much longer can the human conscience endure such a degradation of the human person? It is time that we declare solemnly the end of colonialism in this dear Algeria, and France should be the first to affix its signature.

183. In this connexion I would like to quote President Gamal Abdel Nasser, who, speaking in the general debate on 27 September 1960, said:

"Today the United Nations should perform its duty. I do not think that we would be exaggerating in our demand if we now pressed for the right of the Algerian people to self-determination based on a plebiscite carried out under the supervision and protection of the United Nations." [873rd meeting, para. 147.]

184. Colonialism does not stop in Palestine and Algeria. It is there in Oman, in Southern Arabia and in the so-called protectorates and many parts of Africa. It is in Nyasaland, Angola, Mozambique, Rhodesia, Ruanda-Urundi, South West Africa, Tanganyika, Uganda, West Irian, Portuguese Guinea, and elsewhere. It is attempting to go back from where it was ejected. It must die and we must be certain that it is a genuine and final death.

185. The mighty forces of Asia and Africa have arisen. The two giant continents are awake. The misery of the colonial rule has not yet vanished from their memories. Their strong sympathies are with their brothers and sisters who are still living in bondage and servitude. They are impatient with the remnants of colonialism and they want to give it its death blow. Their voice is on the side of truth, and truth is freedom, and freedom is the road to peace.

186. The struggle against colonialism reached a dramatic climax at the Asian-African Conference in Bandung in April 1955. Among other historic decisions, the Conference declared that colonialism in all its manifestations is an evil which should speedily be brought to an end. It affirmed:

"that the subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights, is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and is an impediment to the promotion of world peace and co-operation."

It declared "its support of the cause of freedom and independence for all such peoples", and called "upon the Powers concerned to grant freedom and independence to such peoples".

187. The Independent African States, meeting in Accra in 1958, gave added support to the declaration adopted in Bandung. The African States were convinced that:

"a definite date should be set for the attainment of independence by each of the colonial territories in accordance with the will of the people of the territories and the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations."

188. Meeting in Addis Ababa in June 1960, the Second Conference of Independent African States reaffirmed the declaration of Bandung and the resolutions of Accra and Monrovia and stated:

"Considering further that the present awakening of the people of Africa and the independence movements can no longer be contained, without the risk of seriously compromising relations between the different nations,

"Believing that the restoration of the natural rights and human dignity to the Africans in those parts of Africa at present under foreign subjugation, as well as the peaceful enjoyment of their hard-won freedom by the peoples of the Independent African States, could only be achieved through the complete eradication of colonial rule from our continent,

"...

"Urges the colonial Powers to fix dates in conformity with the will of the people for the immediate attainment of independence by all non-independent countries..."

189. In conclusion, complete, unconditional, and immediate liquidation of colonialism in all its manifestations must be our irreducible decision. Never will its unjust nature, its horrors, its crimes be sufficiently denounced. Colonialism has never given liberty to its victims as a gift. History is full of the heroic struggle of those who wrested their freedom from their oppressors.

190. The era of colonization is over. This year, rightly called the African year, has seen sixteen sister States make their entry into the family of nations. This historical phenomenon of decolonization and of the achievement of an authentic national life is irresistible.

191. We must therefore give our fullest support to the cause of freedom and independence for all colonial people. Let the parties concerned begin immediate negotiations to transfer full sovereignty and authority to the rightful people without delay and let us welcome them in this world Organization as we have welcomed others during the past fifteen years.

192. It is in the pursuance of these aims that the draft resolution, which we have the honour to co-sponsor [A/L.323 and Add.1-2], has been submitted to the Assembly. There is no essential difference between the draft declaration which it contains and the declaration which has been submitted by the Soviet Union [A/4502 and Corr.1]. Both documents have but one objective, that is, the immediate eradication of colonialism.

193. I reserve the right of my delegation to intervene again later in the debate on the draft resolution, and I hope the President will be kind enough to give me the floor at the appropriate time.

The meeting rose at 6.30 p.m.

Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples (continued). . . 1053

AGENDA ITEM 87

1. U THANT (Burma): At the outset, let me offer the sincere thanks of my delegation to the delegation of the Soviet Union for having submitted a request [A/4501] for the inscription on our agenda of the item which we are now considering.

2. Since the end of the Second World War, the problem of colonialism has been engaging the attention of leaders of thought all over the world, and perhaps the most conspicuous feature of the post-war period has been the awakening of national consciousness on the part of peoples under colonialism. Immediately after the war, a profound change took place—a change which has affected the political landscape of the whole world. This change has been mainly centred in the continents of Asia and Africa.

3. It will be recalled that the long war years witnessed the sharp deterioration of relations between the rulers and the ruled. The strain and stress resulting from the bitter war were the culmination of a long and painful period of struggle for freedom by peoples under foreign domination. Peoples who hitherto were not sufficiently developed to be animated by any conscious desire for independence, were then demanding the same rights of national sovereignty which more advanced States long ago acquired.

4. It must be admitted that the European nations have benefited immensely by the discovery of vast regions possessing natural wealth where capital could be profitably developed and labour was cheap. The impact of Western civilization on the backward populations, most of whom had many centuries of their own type of civilization, has proceeded on imperialist lines. Usually the missionary and the explorer have been the pioneers, but the trader and the colonial civil servant followed in their wake. It must also be admitted that without this impact, the conditions of many of the native races would presumably have remained relatively primitive. But the incentive which has produced the impact has been the commercial enterprise of the European nations.

5. Whenever one discusses the question of colonialism one is apt to ask the question whether the imperialist method has morally justified itself, whether the impact of Western civilization has brought more blessings than evils on the subject peoples. Undoubtedly, the colonial record can claim to have controlled or eliminated some of the worst excesses of primitive life, such as the torture of prisoners or the tyranny of autocratic rulers. It has introduced hospitals and better sanitation. It has attempted to combat ignorance as well as disease.

6. Nevertheless, against these and other substantial reforms must be reckoned many features and tendencies which have counteracted these progressive influences. Chief among them is the fact that the primary motive of the colonial Power in developing the natural resources of a colony has been its own commercial profit. Consequently, the greater proportion of the wealth extracted from the soil has gone into the pockets of the colonial investors. The Republic of the Congo (Leopoldville) has been a classic example. Though the native standard of living may have been raised, it has been in the inevitable interest of the colonizers to keep profits high and, therefore, wages low.

7. Moreover, the cultural effect of the impact of European civilization has been offset by the fact that the European community has carefully segregated itself from native society. Clubs and railway carriages have been reserved strictly for Europeans, and this organized racial discrimination has created bitter resentment in the minds particularly of the educated subject peoples. Above all, the growth of national consciousness among the native peoples has meant a craving for political independence and an increasing antagonism against the white settlers who, whatever the economic and social improvements they have introduced, are regarded as aliens who have seized power and who have no moral title to this possession.

8. One great European colonial Power saw the imperative need to change the whole picture at the end of the Second World War. Britain fixed a definite date for ending its power in India, Pakistan and Burma. At once a catalytic element was introduced into Anglo-Asian relations, to which all else had to react. The day of liberation became a goal, a challenge and an aspiration. Hostility and bitterness melted away, and now, as far as my country is concerned, a very warm friendship with Britain has taken the place of the accumulated bitterness of a hundred years. I wish I could say the same thing regarding other colonial Powers, but the current happenings in the great continent of Africa clearly indicate that similar praise cannot be bestowed on those other masters. That is why this item, introduced by the Soviet Union, is, in the view of my delegation, a most timely one.

9. As I have stated in a previous session of the General Assembly, there is a very true historical maxim: When independence is too long postponed, a mood of frustration and desperation occurs which breeds undesirable traits like bitterness and hatred. If a country has to win independence too late, then some extreme forces come to the surface and become dominant. This certainly does not help the cause of democracy, which most of us desire, nor the cause of friendship and amity between nations.

10. Realizing, therefore, that all dependent peoples have a passionate yearning for freedom and the end of colonialism in all its manifestations, and being convinced that all peoples have an inalienable right to complete freedom, the Prime Ministers of five Asian countries—Burma, Ceylon, India, Indonesia and Pakistan—at the Bogor Conference, jointly sponsored the convening of the Asian-African Conference and invited twenty-five Asian-African countries to take part in it. With the exception of the Central African Federation, all these countries accepted the invitation. The Conference which took place in Bandung, Indonesia, has become history. It met from 18 to 24 April 1955, and with the unanimous agreement of the participating countries, the Conference completed its historic task, issued its final communiqué and a Declaration on the Promotion of World Peace and Co-operation, and defined the objectives which the participating countries would jointly strive for.

11. I need not go into the significance of this Bandung Declaration nor its impact on world history. I will say only that opposition to colonialism in all its manifestations and the striving for and safeguarding of national independence were the basic themes of the Conference. Twenty-nine Asian-African countries declared with one voice that colonialism in all its manifestations was an evil which should speedily be brought to an end.

12. Since then many dependent territories have regained their birthright of independence, but many more are still in colonial bondage. For the sake both of peace and of stability, immediate steps must be taken to transfer all powers to the peoples of dependent territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire. It is also of the utmost importance that all armed action and repressive measures of all kinds directed against dependent peoples cease.

13. This of course does not mean that the colonial Powers must do away with the ordinary police force which has to perform the normal and legitimate function of suppressing crime. Here a sharp distinction must be drawn between ordinary crimes and political actions. One great mistake of the colonial Powers has been, and still is, their failure to distinguish nationalist leaders from criminals. It is a commonplace that almost all the leaders of new nations happen to have spent a good part of their lives in colonialist prisons.

14. With all these considerations in mind, my delegation, along with thirty-nine other Asian-African delegations, has sponsored the draft resolution contained in document A/L.323 and Add.1-4, and I would appeal to the Assembly to give it unanimous support.

15. Before I conclude, let me deal very briefly with one aspect of post-independence phenomena prevailing in many countries which disturbs many observers of the world scene. This relates to the absence of democratic trappings in the set-up of several newly-independent countries. Almost all the nationalist movements are led by a class of people who are, in a sense, privileged people, that is, who have had the privilege of education—for in Africa this is still a facility enjoyed by few—and who are thus in a very advantageous position in relation to their other fellow countrymen. Through a variety of circumstances, this educated class fights in the vanguard of independence movements, and the transfer of power in most cases goes to this class. It would be a mistake to assume that the political institutions and forms of democracy in most of the newly-independent countries will be of the same type as those prevailing in Britain or the United States, or that there will necessarily be two main parties competing against each other for the votes of the people. The notion that democracy requires the existence of an organized opposition to the government of the day is not valid. Democracy requires only freedom for such an opposition, not necessarily the existence of it. In many newly independent countries—and I am thinking especially of African countries—it is most unlikely that there will be a two-party system for some years to come. The nationalist movements are going to be very powerful indeed; they will control the government and organize local development in the economic and social spheres without there being any effective challenge to them from within. And any challenge from outside will only strengthen them. It will take time before any issues arise in the new countries on which it will be possible to build a real opposition organization. It is worth bearing in mind that the democratic system of government, though most desirable, is at the same time the most difficult form of government to operate.

16. Mr. MILLA BERMUDEZ (Honduras) (translated from Spanish): The delegation of Honduras voted in favour of the inclusion of the item on colonialism in the agenda of the fifteenth session of the General Assembly [903rd meeting]. I now come to this rostrum to do honour to that vote, which responds to the aspirations of those individuals, groups and peoples who are still unable to exercise their sovereign rights because they are dominated by that dying politico-social phenomenon known as colonialism.

17. An objective examination of the facts compels us to state, firstly, that the nation least morally qualified to propose this item is the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. At the same time, we must give due recognition to those nations which, whether voluntarily or under pressure, have shown a favourable attitude towards the granting of freedom to the subjugated peoples and we must pay a tribute to France and the United Kingdom, which since the Second World War have liberated and sponsored for United Nations membership more than thirty peoples representing a total of over 750 million inhabitants and covering a land area of more than 10 million square kilometres.

18. Inspired by our devotion to the Latin American cause and by our desire to remedy situations which are of the utmost urgency but which are unfortunately being postponed or disregarded, we wish to make it clear once and for all that while colonialism may be dying, this process has been going on for a considerable time; that colonialism is not an exclusively African-Asian phenomenon, for colonies still exist in our America; that anti-colonialism is a cause, an object of devotion and above all a fundamental principle of freedom for which the countries of this hemisphere began their struggle more than 150 years ago.

19. In discussing this item, my delegation will eschew the delaying tactics adopted by the exponents of treaties or legal provisions and the subtle arguments to which the high priests of international law and diplomacy are so addicted. Our aim is merely this: to set a date for the elimination of colonies throughout the world and particularly in the Western Hemisphere.

20. The item proposed by the Soviet Union is entitled "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples" [A/4501]. We should now like to analyse what has been said by various countries during the general debate on this subject. We wish to make it clear that in quoting certain of our colleagues our intention is not to enter into any dispute, much less to appear to be criticizing anyone unfairly. Our sole aim is to draw attention to the persistent failure to define an anti-colonial policy for Latin America.

21. At the beginning of the fifteenth session of the General Assembly, on 22 September 1960, Marshal Tito said:

"These cold war conflicts also threaten on their part to spread to areas which had been or still are under colonial domination..." [868th meeting, para. 113.]

22. On the following day the President of Ghana said:

"The flowing tide of African nationalism sweeps everything before it and constitutes a challenge to the colonial Powers to make just restitution for the years of injustice and crime committed against our continent." [869th meeting, para. 1.]

"For years and years, Africa has been the footstool of colonialism and imperialism, exploitation and degradation... But those days are gone, and gone forever..." [Ibid., para. 3.]

23. On the same day Premier Khrushchev said:

"We must have done with colonialism, for it brings misfortunes and suffering ... to the peoples of the enslaved countries..." [869th meeting, para. 173.]

When Khrushchev says this, we think of the Latvians, Lithuanians, Slovenes, Czechs, Bulgarians, Ukrainians, Hungarians and so on who lost their freedom at the hands of the communizing colonialism of the Soviet Union.

24. When the turn of President Nasser of the United Arab Republic came, he said:

"Four years ago the African continent witnessed the end of one era of colonialism..." [873rd meeting, para. 120.]

But he is wrong. The era of colonialism will not end until all America is free.

25. The representative of Senegal, whose country has just been admitted to the United Nations, said:

"Once it is recognized that decolonization is the outstanding phenomenon of this century ... we see no reason why the parties involved should not endeavour to give effect to it in the best possible way." [876th meeting, para. 171.]

26. In his first statement, his colleague from the Republic of Mali stated:

"While it is true that Guinea first breached the French colonial structure in September 1958, it was Mali that strongly and patiently attacked the very foundations of that edifice which history had condemned." [Ibid., para. 187.]

27. And I ask: will 1961 or 1962 mark the end of colonialism in America?

28. On 29 September 1960 the representative of Liberia stated:

"Colonialism in any form dies painfully and slowly.... Africa is the last bulwark of such colonialism." [878th meeting, para. 255.]

But I ask: is it true that it is dying painfully? Is Africa the last bulwark of colonialism?

29. Mr. Turbay Ayala, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Colombia, after referring to the Conference of San José, Costa Rica, and its resolute stand against any foreign intervention, said:

"Latin America need have no fear of advanced ideas or of social justice... The time has come for the great social evolution..." [880th meeting, para. 242.]

He is right, but he might have dramatized his argument and described the present age and his own thoughts more explicitly by saying that the hour for the emancipation of the colonial territories has struck.

30. Let me reconstruct the pattern underlying these facts. America is continually defending the rights of other peoples to freedom; it now feels concern for Algeria, as earlier it felt concern for Tunisia, Morocco and other Arab States in Africa. It stretches out the hand of friendship to the peoples of "black" Africa as it did formerly to the peoples of Asia. Although not all the American countries support independence and liberation movements, many give them their support, their votes or at least their approval.

31. I now maintain that the hour has come for liberating the colonies that still remain in our America and I ask: Are we going to have the support of the African-Asian Powers?

32. While in one Committee of this Assembly the representative of Mali speaks of the prisons in Angola and makes a severe attack on the recalcitrant colonialist attitude of Portugal, his colleague from Liberia states that "the tide of African nationalism and the demand of the oppressed countries to stand on their own feet and be masters of their own affairs could no longer be treated as a matter of legal niceties and constitutional subtleties".^{1/} Thus both of them view the problem purely from the African point of view and make no mention of the American situation.

33. The Netherlands, for example, does not say very much about the independence of the Antilles, Aruba, Curaçao or Surinam (Dutch Guiana), which comprise more than 300,000 inhabitants and occupy a total area of 140,000 square kilometres. All these territories are geographically separated from the metropolitan country and are ethnically and culturally distinct from the countries which administer and exploit them.

^{1/} Official Records of the General Assembly, Fifteenth Session, Fourth Committee, 1034th meeting, para. 5.

34. France is still holding on to the islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe, as well as French Guiana, which are inhabited by more than half a million people and cover an area of over 94,000 square kilometres.

35. The United Kingdom is still withholding from us territories which will hardly become American under its influence. This process is being brought about through the West Indies Federation, in which Trinidad, Tobago and Jamaica play a preponderant role. It is nevertheless undeniable that the Federation is moving towards self-government and freedom. We therefore have only to rescue Belize, British Guiana and the Malvinas Islands.

36. Our aim therefore is to relate the problem to our continent, to stress its urgency, to include in it the strong currents of nationalism similar to those which gave rise to our own independence, and to ensure that the tide which washes the coast of Africa may extend to the Antilles, the Caribbean and the South Atlantic, for it is the same sea, though with different names, which unites or separates us.

37. During the general debate it became clear that we had forgotten—an unpardonable oversight—the colonial territories which still remain in America and which altogether cover an area of approximately 2,700,000 square kilometres, with an aggregate population of more than 3,000,000. It seems as though there has been a tacit agreement not even to mention the American colonies. It seems as though those territories have been condemned to remain colonies for ever.

38. My delegation finds the Soviet Union draft declaration [A/4502 and Corr.1] unacceptable and will vote against it. We reserve the right to speak about the African-Asian draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-4] later.

39. The delegation of Honduras considers that the best way of achieving a positive solution to this problem is to set up a commission which should prepare a specific report and make practical recommendations. I therefore formally submit the following draft resolution^{2/} for the consideration of this Assembly:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that mankind cannot remain indifferent to the fact that some peoples do not yet enjoy self-determination and self-government,

"Considering that the process of emancipation must be hastened so that the said peoples may progress, as rapidly as possible, towards the creation of the political and social leadership necessary to enable them to assume the attributes of governmental authority and to exercise rights and contract obligations as subjects of public law,

"1. Proclaims the elimination of colonialism all over the world;

"2. Decides to appoint a commission consisting of five members (one African, one Latin American, one Asian and two nationals of administering Powers) to visit those colonial possessions which do not yet enjoy independence and to submit recommendations to the General Assembly at its sixteenth session concerning the most appropriate, expeditious and effective means of ensuring the complete abolition of colonialism throughout the world and enabling all peoples which are still under colonial administration to acquire the status of independent and sovereign States."

40. Mr. RIFA'I (Jordan): At this momentous occasion when the General Assembly discusses the granting of independence to all peoples of the world, the cry for freedom echoes from the conscience of history to urge us all, without distinction, to recognize the freedom and independence of those who live in oppression and deprivation. This voice for freedom comes from the graveyard of the martyrs who sacrificed their souls to save their native land, from the battlefield where the soldier stands in defence of the honour of his nation, from the exile where the patriot is deported from his fatherland, from the shabby tent where the refugee is expelled from his home, from the prison where the hero languishes, and this voice for freedom comes from every man and every woman who is suppressed and denied the right of decent life. Freedom and independence are the basic factors for the progress of man and for the establishment of a life of peace and satisfaction in which all peoples enjoy equality and fraternity.

41. In his vast desert, with no confinements to halt his movement and no horizon to limit his imagination, the Bedouin struck far and deep searching for the truth. He explored the sea and discovered the earth. He observed the stars and examined nature. He then found his way towards eternity. Freedom released him from detention and made him a man of energy and action.

42. It was in the early days of the history of the Arabs that their second Caliph, fourteen hundred years ago, set his everlasting rule, "how can people be enslaved when they were born free?" This spirit of liberation flared up all over the Arab world during the last several decades. National revolutions broke out on every side and in every land, and caravans of martyrs fell in the fields of honour, great in life and glorious in death.

43. The Arabs, like many other nations, paid the price of their independence in full. Their plains and hills are true witnesses of their desperate struggle for independence and freedom. In every spot there is a temple of a martyr and a statue of a hero. Independence to us is the earning of years and the outcome of toil and strife. We culled it from the lion's den, and we marched to it under the shadow of spears. To us it is, therefore, the dearest thing we possess.

44. No nation could carry out its mission in life towards itself or towards mankind unless it were free and unless it stood on equal footing with other nations and shared equal opportunities. How could a nation fulfil its own aspirations and respond to its own wishes if its powers are restrained and its vigour is retarded? Independence is essential for a productive and prosperous life.

45. In the past several years, and particularly during the present year, a number of African States have recovered their full freedom and sovereignty. They are now among us, assuming their international responsibilities in a most impressive and remarkable manner, and are in the front line of the defence of the cause of freedom and peace. Many of them are scoring high in social reforms and economic developments. This is a fact which should provide the United Nations with the argument that the remaining inhabitants of Africa who have not yet won their independence should immediately be permitted to follow the procession of their African sovereign brothers. In Africa, along the southern shores of the Arabian peninsula, and in other parts of Asia there are still a considerable number of colonies, Trust Territories, protectorates and so-called overseas provinces. They all look today to the United Nations and wait to hear its pronouncement.

46. Today we are discussing the adoption of a solemn declaration to end colonialism and to grant independence to all colonized peoples of the world without exception. In fact, the continuance of colonialism has no justification whatsoever, for it is an old-fashioned rule representing a reactionary mentality which was applied at a time when the colonizer was assuming the status of the master, and the colonized was kept ignorant of the facts and values of life. Now ignorance of such values has vanished. Now the dignity and pride of nations and individuals reject the idea of a master and a slave. Now people realize that, if colonialism had contributed in certain areas, after generations of captivity, to the progress and benefit of some territories and nations, it has mostly brought misery and hardships to many others.

47. Was the Palestine tragedy not the ugliest example of colonialism? Was it not in flagrant violation of the rules of justice, right and honesty that after thirty years of foreign domination the Arabs of Palestine were left to a fatal end and their native land was usurped? Colonialism in Palestine not only dispersed the rightful inhabitants and shattered the territorial integrity of the country but it also established on the ashes of the victims a foreign State which is the tool of imperialistic aggression, whenever aggression is planned, and the means by which colonialism is being reintroduced in Africa, whenever colonialism creeps back in disguise.

48. Colonialism could have folded its pages in many areas with cheers of farewell rather than with the smoke of guns. Algeria could be spared several tens of thousands of the lives of its inhabitants if France would heed the voice of reason and wisdom. Indeed, the call for ending colonialism and declaring the independence of all nations is not a call of vengeance but rather one of harmony and friendship among peace-loving nations. Amicable relations among nations could only be established by goodwill, mutual confidence and the removal of doubt and suspicion. How pleasant life will be when nations live in real brotherhood; when the strong supports the weak; the wealthy helps the needy; the developed assists the under-developed; and when all such aids are made without conditions or strings attached.

49. The heavy yoke of colonialism has caused the new nationalism to adopt an attitude by which it tries to detach itself from all relationships with the outgoing colonial Powers and by which it refuses any aid which might be construed as a return to the colonial influence. Such a tendency is indeed a natural reaction to the manner in which colonial policies were applied in the colonized territories. Thus, if we all wish to develop among nations, new and old, big and small, a spirit of co-operation and trust, we must begin by persuading the big Powers to abandon the concept of might, superiority and exploitation.

50. To some small States that are needy and under-developed or that have newly acquired their independence, the question of how to maintain and safeguard independence is perhaps as difficult as how to achieve it. Keen on carrying out their responsibilities and meeting the requirements of their nationals, they feel in need of seeking foreign aid. They could receive it from old friends or from new acquaintances, but in both cases they have to make accurate calculations which would not pull them back to the old colonial orbit or drag them into the conflict of the cold war. Under such circumstances, the United Nations could undertake a useful task by extending its assistance to such countries for a transitional period which might be found necessary to enable them to stand on their own feet. It might sometimes happen that the poverty of a country leads it to fall under colonial influence. Yet it has always been a fact that colonialism leads countries under its rule, even if rich, to poverty.

51. It is not sufficient in our present world that we get rid of the colonial system in its military or administrative form. After all, international control and the development of democratic theories have offered adequate guarantees against the old imperialistic methods of military aggression and occupation. But there is a new phase of colonialism which aims at weakening other nations or subduing them through other means. It is economic colonialism by which the natural wealth of a nation becomes the target of exploitation and utilization, and the commodities and products of a country fall at the mercy of foreign economic measures. The abolition of the colonial system must, therefore, be accompanied by the eradication of the colonial mentality; otherwise it will continue to be a serious problem in the world, appearing in various forms and following different channels.

52. The delegation of Jordan, in joining many other delegations in the efforts towards adopting a draft resolution which would declare the end of the colonial system and the granting of independence to all dependent peoples in the world, feels confident that this great achievement will be a corner-stone in the establishment of international peace.

53. The independence and freedom of all will remove international friction and will curb rivalry and competition among strong Powers at the expense of small nations. Independence is a constructive development which will raise the tens of millions of human beings who are living at present in stagnation to a level of productivity and action.

54. My country, the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, believing that independence is a means to the fulfilment of higher aims, endeavours through its independence to achieve the following objectives: first, to utilize its potentialities and develop its natural resources for the well-being of its inhabitants and the betterment of their life; second, to lead a progressive life in the fields of technology, education, agriculture, trade, health, architecture, communications and other spheres, so as to raise the present standard of living; third, to promote in the individual a spirit of self-reliance and self-respect to enable him to be an active, free and responsible citizen; fourth, to build up an organized and enlightened society in which reason is the guide; fifth, to develop our national and political strength by promoting Arab unity and national solidarity; and, sixth, to defend peace in our region and to establish it on the principles of right and justice, and to this end to make every effort to remove aggression from our area, whether it is in the form of armed invasion, military occupation or foreign domination.

55. It is indeed gratifying to see this rostrum of the General Assembly of the United Nations at its fifteenth session a platform for declaring independence and freedom to all peoples of the world. May we hope that this remarkable new achievement will be a further step towards international brotherhood.

56. Mr. HASAN (Pakistan): The debate in which we are now engaged is one of special significance for our Organization. It takes place in a session which has witnessed the admission of sixteen new African States which were colonies until only the other day.

57. Today we join with them in proclaiming the end of colonialism. To conquer and to be conquered has been the fate of all the nations in history and of almost every people of the world. The advance of mankind has reached a state where this process is considered fundamentally iniquitous because it has brought so much misery to a large part of the human race. Its memory is still bitter.

58. While I listened to impassioned words, words which were intended to open up portals of freedom for humanity still in shackles, I was sometimes left untouched because, as one who has traversed the journey through life perhaps longer than some of these passionate fighters for the rights of men who have spoken during the last few days, I thought of the history of man which teaches us that freedom has never been won with words. If I may be forgiven for being a little personal, I would recall that I have seen fall around me thousands of my countrymen, massacred in a few hours because they assembled to protest against an iniquitous law ordained by foreign rulers. I refer to the historical events which occurred in 1919 and which is known as the massacre of Jallianwala Bagh in Amritsar, which was my own native town. I saw that myself as a very young boy, but its remembrance is indelibly scorched in my memory. But the struggle went on and after an even greater holocaust came freedom.

59. The freedom of Pakistan was the first of the series of emancipations of subjugated peoples in Asia and Africa, a series which continues until today and which we earnestly and passionately desire to continue until the last human being in bondage is free. That freedom hallowed the sacrifices and obliterated their bitterness, and now they brighten our history.

60. Our sacrifices taught us to honour and value our own freedom and the freedom of others, and our record in the United Nations over the thirteen years of our membership will show that we have, without one single exception, been on the side of the weak and the oppressed and we have stood and fought for the freedom of all nations. Our record of voting is open and we are proud of it. We have sought only one consistency in our vote: that it be for the righteous cause of freedom.

61. For us freedom came as the climax of a long and bitter struggle and our dedication to it is as deep as the suffering which preceded it. To preserve it, to preserve every inch of the beloved land which became our home, we consider our most sacred duty, and that devotion teaches us to honour the freedom and devotion to their homes of the other peoples of the world.

62. Our discussion of colonialism at this session, for which credit must be acknowledged to the Soviet initiative, is significant in that it formally registers the recognition that colonialism, political or economic, benign or oppressive, is an untenable system which history sadly recounts but cannot justify. Colonial empires sprang up through the use of armed might, and as newer and vaster areas of the world were overcome, colonialism procured a rationale for its existence. A concern for the welfare of subject peoples became its justification. Dissolution of the system was resisted on the ground that these subject peoples were not ready for self-government and that therefore they needed the tutelage of superior peoples for their welfare. The time has now come when the truth can be declared definitively, that no nation has a right to govern another, whatever its way of life. The right of subject peoples to shape their own destiny without the protection or intervention of another people is fully acknowledged. There is now no other valid basis on which relations between different peoples can be built. The experience of the last decade and a half has clearly shown that States have made greater and more rapid progress in all fields after their independence than when they lacked the right to govern themselves. Their increased prosperity has also been reflected in the prosperity of their erstwhile rulers.

63. The accession of colonial territories to independence has been hastened by the United Nations. The principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples was incorporated in the Charter with the final liberation of Non-Self-Governing Territories in view. By virtue of the provisions of Chapters XI, XII and XIII, the United Nations assumed the ultimate responsibility of bringing about the attainment of self-government by all colonial peoples. As year after year the United Nations dealt with the question of colonies, trust and mandated territories the demand for independence of their peoples was given forceful expression by the Asian and African countries in our proceedings. But although freedom has come to over two-score countries in the last fifteen years, colonialism has not yet completely liquidated itself. Here and there one still finds its remnants, in one case a remnant that is responsible for much strife and tragedy. We, the Members of the United Nations, must give unreserved support to its utter and unconditional termination. It is simply a question of fulfilling the task we all have undertaken in the United Nations Charter itself.

64. The basis of the United Nations is universality. From this principle it derives its greatest strength. There is an urgent need, therefore, for speed in bringing about the conditions in which all peace-loving States can participate equally in its deliberations. The entry of seventeen States this year has infused into the Organization a new vitality, but we cannot rest until the practice of colonialism is abandoned in those remaining areas where it still survives.

65. We deplore the fact that we should still need to declare that all peoples inhabiting this planet have the inalienable right to freedom and equality. But we also believe that a firm and solemn proclamation by all of us in the United Nations will quicken the emergence into independence of those territories which are still held in subjection. It will be a moral command which will issue from this Assembly and we trust that it will have the unqualified support of all Members. We fully realize the fact that it must be clothed in such words and form as not to lend itself to doubtful interpretation.

66. The end of colonialism must undoubtedly be sought, but it is not necessary to impart in the debate a wasteful note of recrimination. It is of greater importance to be concerned with the future of the newly independent countries, which must be shaped in accordance with their desires. If there is to be a peaceful and happy accession to freedom by others, germs of unrelated controversy and disputes about past happenings must not be allowed to infect our debates.

67. We have read with great interest the extremely well written draft declaration. One might disagree with many words, phrases and thoughts, but one must admire its literary composition. I am sure humanity itself will be grateful to Mr. Khrushchev and his delegation for their solicitude for the emancipation of mankind.

68. We have been reminded of all the exploitations that we have suffered, all the pains which we have borne, and the heritage of woe which descended from generation to generation. Somehow, it is like reminding a man who has recovered in health after a long illness of the dangers and anxieties that his illness entailed. A friend generally helps him to forget it and think only in gratitude to his God for the restored health and the promise of long life ahead.

69. The declaration seeks to keep alive the remembrance of the evil days of servitude. It has almost been sought to form a union of emancipated slaves. It is for the consideration of this General Assembly and the United Nations whether it is in the interest of the newly freed countries themselves to be made increasingly conscious of racial and colour divisions of the world and for chasms to be created between them and the more advanced countries, on whose help they have to depend so much for their economic and social advancement. In our view we are equal, the big and the small, the white and the coloured. Our worth depends on our pride, our dignity and the faith that we shall not be subjugated again. A shortage of wealth in a country does not make that country less proud or less worthy of devotion. The path of constructive action lies in the establishment, in a sense, of the largest community of interests amongst all peoples. This is essential for a smooth transition in the newly independent countries from dependence to independence, unaffected by the stresses and strains which, unhappily, have marred many transfers of power in recent years.

70. The delegation of Pakistan is privileged to co-sponsor, with thirty-nine other countries—Asian-African States, the draft resolution which has been issued as document A/L.323 and Add.1-4. On the strength of the eloquent statements which we have heard from the representatives of our fellow sponsoring Members, and on the basis of the submissions which I have just made, my delegation ventures to hope that the terms of our draft resolution will find general acceptance in this Assembly. Though we believe that these terms have the force of axiomatic truth, it may not perhaps be entirely superfluous to draw the attention of those Members who are not included among the sponsors of the draft resolution, to three of its provisions.

71. These three provisions are found in paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 of the declaration. While the other paragraphs state the principles, these three give expression to certain basic imperatives of the world situation today.

72. Paragraph 4 calls for the immediate cessation of all armed action or repressive measures against dependent peoples; paragraph 5 calls for the early transfer of all powers to the peoples of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories.

73. Lest our fellow Members be inclined to think that, in putting forth these imperatives without clarification, we are becoming oblivious to certain related demands of international security and a stable world order, we would point out the provisions of paragraph 6. This paragraph embodies an important safeguard against any attempt to disrupt the national unity and territorial integrity of a country.

74. In introducing this significant point of balance into the scheme of the whole draft resolution, we have, I believe, made it clear that we do not countenance, and do not intend to countenance, a misuse and perversion of the terms of our draft resolution for any ulterior ends of enlarging the territory of one country at the expense of another. In recommending this draft resolution to those Members who are not joined with us in sponsoring it, we are therefore in a position to extend to them a whole-hearted and unequivocal assurance that our proposed declaration shall not lend itself to be used for the disruptive ends of aggrandizement, of interference in the domestic affairs of other countries, and of generating new and unsuspected conflicts.

75. Our concern is with the ending of crises and conflicts. Our object is not to encourage new threats to world peace.

76. Finally, I submit that as we sit here, attempting to bring about the termination of colonialism, it should be our prayer that we will all remain on guard against all forms of this malaise. One form of it, painfully familiar to us all, will soon be extinct. Other forms of it may erupt in other ways. The most sinister would be one which uses no force, but grows insidiously, which seeks to enslave the hearts and minds of men, seduces them from their traditions and their faith with a philosophy which promises, but never attains full life.

77. Mr. BELAUNDE (Peru) (translated from Spanish): At this time of uncertainty and anxiety through which mankind is passing, one encouraging feature is the irreversible movement towards independence and freedom for all peoples. A compensation for the pains and sacrifices of the recent world wars has been the awakening of a patriotic consciousness in peoples under colonial rule, and the heed given to this consciousness, in many cases, by the great Powers exercising dominion or influence over vast expanses of Africa and Asia.

78. It is not our task now to pass judgement on the phenomenon of the formation of empires, nor on its effects in connexion with what the sociologists call "culture diffusion". Our point of view is determined by the supreme principle of the dignity of the human person, whether considered individually or collectively, and, consequently, of the right of all men to the outward expressions of freedom, including particularly the freedom to combine or associate in collective entities or nations, which, to achieve their ends, need the legal organism of the sovereign State.

79. We have been rightly reminded of the admirable course followed by the United Kingdom in recognizing the freedom of so many countries and, once their independence was established, in forming links of friendship and co-operation with them, thus working for the strengthening of peace.

80. Ten years ago we welcomed with joy the great Republic of Indonesia after its agreements with the Netherlands. It is appropriate to recall the policy recently followed by France whereby we today enjoy the company of the countries of the French Community, Cyprus, the remarkable meeting-place of so many cultures, attained its independence under an agreement which owes much to the United Nations, and thus that independence is a symbol of the efficacy of international co-operation. Belgium decided to grant independence to the Congo, and that country, now a Member of our Organization, is seeking the assistance which will enable it to strengthen its institutions.

81. The old bond of the imperium must be succeeded today by a broad and free co-operation, based on friendship, as President Wilson wished it, in terms of equality and in terms of honour.

82. The movement of liberation which we are witnessing today is no more than a continuation of the revolution which took place in our continent in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. The freeing of the peoples of America sowed the seeds, lit the way and provided a model for similar movements in territories of Africa, Asia and Oceania, the seats of ancient civilizations which preceded and influenced Western culture. The ideal expressed with unsurpassable eloquence by our liberators was that our revolution should spread throughout the world in order to bring about, in association with all free peoples, "a federation governed by a code of laws of universal value and based on the principle of absolute equality, without distinctions as to colour or race". I quote these words from that remarkable document—an intimate document of Bolívar's dated 20 February 1826—which was discovered by the Liberator's great biographer, Vicente Lecuna.

83. As far as we Ibero-Americans are concerned, the principles of self-determination which I have recalled were in conformity with the Hispanic juridical tradition in its highest expression. The European countries, and principally Spain and Portugal, adhered to the philosophy which bases the State not on power, as unfortunately was the case in the nineteenth century, but rather on justice. The Spanish "behetrías" and "cabildos" and the Hispano-American or Ibero-American "cabildos" which were their counterpart, were considered the depositories of a sovereignty which, in the event of not being exercised by the monarch, was completely invested in them. The discovery of America determined the concepts of Francisco de Vitoria, who, confronted by the tremendous reality of the empire of Charles V, unreservedly proclaimed the obligation to respect not only individual freedom and property but also the governments of indigenous peoples. Francisco Suárez, the doctor admirabilis to whom all Europe listened with respect, based the notion of sovereignty on the consent of the governed, and his teaching was in conformity with the ideas of modern political science, greatly surpassing the endeavours of other writers of his time. Thus it was that in the American revolution the vital force of our own self-assertion as nations was united with the spiritual values which we inherited from Spain and Portugal and which gave the revolution a high moral significance and an irrefutable legal foundation.

84. The draft resolution submitted by the African-Asian countries [A/L.323 and Add.1-4], which we are discussing at this time, represents the culmination of this historic evolution, the first signs of which appeared in the Covenant of the League of Nations, but which was emphatically affirmed for the first time in the San Francisco Charter. What we call the spirit of San Francisco had two elements: peace through justice, and the proclamation of the freedom of all men and all peoples. The authority exercised by some nations over territories which were not materially or culturally a part of those nations was not regarded as a privilege, but as a responsibility and a sacred duty to pursue the specific and unwavering objective of preparing those territories for independence. The sponsors of this draft resolution did well to include in its preamble quotations from the Charter by which we are governed, and they did even better by making a reference to the close link between individual freedom and effective national sovereignty. They have also clearly pointed out that the submission or subjugation of some peoples by others—whatever the form and whatever the pretext—involves a danger to peace among mankind today.

85. It might be said that the draft resolution generally follows the spirit and the letter of the Charter and responds to a desire for greater speed in the achievement of its aims than we contemplated fifteen years ago in the hopeful days of San Francisco. This desire for a higher rate of progress is explained by the fact that the rhythm of human progress as a whole has accelerated since that time while, in tragic contrast, there has also been a rapid growth in the causes of conflict, dissatisfaction and discord, with the accompanying danger of a war of universal destruction.

86. The proclamation of the freedom of all peoples cannot and must not in any way be individualistic, incoherent or isolated, but must be characterized by deep solidarity, cohesion and co-operation. Freedom can only be maintained by love and understanding and can never be based on narrow, rigid concepts or on chauvinistic exclusiveness. It must likewise not be an expression of the natural regionalism which has its roots in geography, history or a culture of long standing but which opposes or ignores the universal feeling of our time. The free peoples must, not only as the result of natural forces but also as a guarantee of their existence, move within an ever widening circle of solidarity. While freedom implies the voluntary choice of ways of life and culture, the association which in many cases is still encouraged by the old form of life in common should not leave a bitter residue of uselessly retrospective rancour and resentment. Spinoza said that only he who is inspired by love can fight for freedom. The struggle that has led to national sovereignty was not born of hatred, but of the ideals of creation and co-operation. Nations which have achieved liberty require, like individuals, an atmosphere of respect, friendship and disinterested help. We trust that the advent of freedom in Africa and Asia will assume the same noble and generous forms as in our own America. In the words of Bolívar, we achieved liberty against the will of the whole world, but yet we have forgotten the obstacles and the struggles, and our countries have offered shelter to all the peoples of the earth. We have diligently sought the friendship and co-operation of those who were our former but noble enemies, our unconvinced allies, or indifferent spectators. This attitude led to the linking of America to the rest of the world. We can thus proudly stress the universal character of our revolution, and we are sure that the same feelings animate the peoples of the African and Asian countries.

87. There is a further reason why this should be so. At the time when we achieved independence, there was no political institution which could claim to represent the whole of mankind. Slowly and painfully we raised—first in Panama, then in the Lima Conferences and finally in the Pan American Conferences—the edifices of our organization, the oldest and most complete of the regional bodies. The nations of Africa and Asia have attained independent life under the protective and watchful eyes of the United Nations. Jealously guarding the principles of the Charter, the United Nations has ensured that the provisions relating to self-government were fulfilled, and when these nations acceded to independence, the United Nations hastened to welcome them joyfully into its midst. Setting aside political debates, forgetting for a moment the problems of armaments, silencing tragic fears, this Organization offered economic and technical assistance to the full extent of its resources in order to prepare and maintain the independence of those nations. The ideal of peace carried with it another ideal: the possibility of investing, for the improvement of standards of living, the funds which could be saved by reducing armaments.

88. I am convinced that the nations which have recently attained independence will see in the United Nations an institution destined to ensure their liberty and guarantee their progress.

89. The great hope for the peace of the world—and I say this with the deepest conviction of my soul—is that the present Members of the United Nations, and those which tomorrow may become Members, should be inspired by a single ideal and should remain faithful, absolutely faithful, to the principles of the Charter without any affiliation, alliance or alignment which is incompatible with the principles of law and co-operation enshrined in our Charter, and that with stern and unswerving dignity they should defend themselves against all extraneous influence and against all political intrigue which, by reducing and suppressing their personality, might turn them into pawns of the cold war. We trust that they will unanimously defend and strictly apply the principles of the Charter with enthusiasm and with a miraculous spiritual force. The future of the United Nations—and I say this to all friendly nations, including those that will be with us tomorrow—is dependent upon the close union of all of you, great and small, and on your efforts to create an atmosphere which will make co-operation imperative and inevitable for all, both great and small, both strong and weak, in upholding our ideals of justice and peace.

AGENDA ITEM 87

Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial
countries and peoples (continued)

In the absence of the President, Mr. Hasan (Pakistan), Vice-President, took the Chair.

1. The PRESIDENT: I will give the floor to the representative of Netherlands, exercising his right of reply.
2. Mr. EINAAR (Netherlands): This morning [930th meeting] the representative of Honduras mentioned a number of territories in the region of Latin America which were still colonial possessions of other countries. Among those territories still having a colonial status he included "Aruba, Curaçao and Surinam".
3. The reason why I have asked for the floor is merely to point out to the representative of Honduras that the inclusion must have been due to a slip of the tongue, no doubt unintentional.
4. Under the Charter of the Kingdom of the Netherlands of 1954 the three parts of the realm, that is, the Netherlands, Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, have, of their free will, established a new constitutional order of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, in which the three countries henceforth form a free association of completely equal partners, and in which they conduct their internal interests autonomously, their common interests on a basis of equality, and accord each other reciprocal assistance.
5. Since 29 December 1954—the date on which this jointly drafted and agreed Charter entered into force—colonialism in any form whatsoever in Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles has been a thing of the past.
6. The General Assembly has recognized this by adopting resolution 945 (X) of 15 December 1955 by which the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the United Nations Charter in respect of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles by the Government of the Netherlands was approved.
7. I trust that the representative will accept this correction and will understand that we in Surinam and the Antilles are proud of our full self-government and cannot accept being called colonies.
8. Mr. AW (Mali) (translated from French): In taking part in the present debate on the end of colonialism—the first such debate in the General Assembly in the annals of the United Nations—the delegation of the Republic of Mali does not intend simply to take part in the trial and conviction of the system known by the name of colonialism. My delegation and the other co-sponsors of draft resolution A/L.323 and Add.1-4 who preceded me on the rostrum are hoping for more and are asking for more, because they consider that colonialism has already been judged. We hope that, by adopting unanimously the draft resolution we are submitting, the General Assembly will express to the whole world its determination to make an end at last of dying colonialism, although certain ill-intentioned hypocrites would like to make us sorry for it by reiterating—without conviction, I must say—that colonialism has not had an entirely bad effect on the peoples under its domination, since there were schools and hospitals built, roads laid out, etc.

9. Before replying to such hypocritical remarks, I should like to pay a tribute to the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR, who asked the President to submit to the General Assembly for consideration the item which we are discussing, entitled: "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples" [A/4501]. This proposal, which was received with well-deserved enthusiasm, is now the subject of our debate, and my delegation is convinced that the United Nations will not fail to seize this opportunity of accomplishing its mission of justice, freedom and peace in what is a particularly sensitive area, involving as it does the fate of tens of millions of human beings exploited in the name of an outdated paternalism for which no one would wish to be responsible before history.

10. Whether the colonialist countries accept or refuse to co-operate conscientiously in the great and noble work which we are undertaking is for them to decide; but let the representatives of those countries not appear here as wolves in sheep's clothing, protesting their innocence of all the sins of which they are accused and trying to divert our just complaints to the shifting sands of the cold war. Let them not tell us that by shooting peaceful and defenceless crowds they are contributing to their well-being, that by torturing patriots they are educating the people, or that by compelling women, children and old men to do forced labour they are raising the level of living. Let those who are trying to salve their conscience and conceal their crimes not tell us: "Before we came to those territories, there was nothing there." How wrong that is! There was nothing there—but before the advent of the colonialists there was independence, and independence means freedom. Is there anything in the world more precious to a people than freedom?

11. When General de Gaulle, in his vexation, told the people of Guinea in August 1958, "You want independence? Well, take it, with all its disadvantages", you will remember President Sékou Touré's retort: "We will take independence with its advantages!"

12. Who can fail to be aware today that the myth of the good Christian leaving his home to bring civilization to the Buddhists of Asia or the pagans of Africa and Oceania is now a matter for ridicule? Who would venture to deny that the general laws of human evolution would, by means of free and friendly exchanges, have allowed the colonial peoples to become happy and prosperous nations had not the colonialists appropriated their wealth, thus denying them all possibility of harmonious development? No enumeration of schools or hospitals built can conceal the dreadful truth of the crime against humanity perpetrated by the bearers of this sacrosanct civilization of theirs.

13. The point is not that colonization may have brought some degree of literacy to the children of the exploited countries or that it brought railways and roads; the point is whether a farmer who calls a veterinarian to care for his sick cow does so for humane reasons or simply to preserve his source of income.

14. Colonization was imposed by force or treachery on peoples which had their own civilization and asked nothing of anyone. Listen to the message dispatched in 1895 by an African emperor, the Moro Naba of Ouagadougou in Upper Volta, to Captain Destenaves who had been sent to him by the French Government to conclude a treaty:

"A long time ago I consulted the omens and they told me that if I saw a white man I would die. I know that the white men want to make me die so as to take my country; yet you assert that they want to help me organize my country. But I think my country is fine as it is. I have no need of them; I know what I need and what I want; I have my traders, so count yourself lucky that I do not have your head cut off. Go, then, and above all never come back."

15. That is clear enough. What, then, was the reason for colonization? There is no more authoritative voice to explain that than Georges Hardy, who wrote in his Histoire sociale de la colonisation française:

"For the statesmen of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, in France and elsewhere, colonization was merely business, a mercantile enterprise, an element in the great maritime trade."^{1/}

And Georges Hardy continues:

"There is nothing by which the mainsprings of that colonization are more clearly revealed than the economic system which was imposed upon the colonies and which is known as the colonial system or, more specifically, the exclusive system.

"Each trading company, in compensation for its responsibilities, was granted certain privileges, e.g., sovereign prerogatives in the occupied territories and various exemptions and subsidies. Its main advantage, however, was the monopoly of trade in the areas forming its domain. The inhabitants were obliged to sell their produce to it and to buy from it the goods which they needed; all other trade was excluded from that private preserve.

"This system was of course aimed against foreigners, but it was at the same time designed to prevent possible competition between the colonies and the metropolitan country. Already present in outline when the first colonies were founded, it took on under Colbert, who was particularly concerned about the shortage of money, the character of an established policy and, despite some modifications, persisted until the revolution. The various regulations to which it gives rise can be summed up in the following general statements: . . . colonial produce exists to supply the French consumer, and only French goods have access to the colonial market. Industries may be established in the colonies only if they do not duplicate French industries. Maritime transport between France and its colonies is permitted only under the French flag."^{2/}

16. This, as described by Mr. Georges Hardy, whom no one could suspect of having subversive or Communist ideas, is the economic system, misleadingly called the "colonial compact", which is the basis and essence of colonization.

17. The truth, however, is sometimes ugly, and the colonialists have had their experts in falsification and cynicism to present the great colonial epic through rose-coloured spectacles, depicting it as a philanthropic enterprise and a disinterested work of pacification and civilization.

18. Aimé Césaire, in the colourful style that is his own, has written as follows in his famous treatise colonialism:

"Colonization and civilization?"

"The most common misfortune in this connexion is to be, in all good faith, the dupe of a collective hypocrisy which is expert in presenting the problems in a misleading way so as better to justify the odious solutions which are provided for them.

"This amounts to saying that the essential thing here is to see clearly, to think clearly—that is to say, dangerously—and to reply clearly to the innocent original question: what in essence, is colonization? To do this is to concede that it is not the preaching of the Gospel, nor a philanthropic enterprise nor a desire to push back the frontiers of ignorance, disease and tyranny, nor the expansion of the kingdom of God, nor the extension of law. It is rather to acknowledge once for all, without fear of the consequences, that the decisive motive here is that of the adventurer and the pirate, the wholesale grocer and the shipowner, the gold seeker and the merchant, of greed and force, and that lurking evilly behind them, is the shadow of a form of civilization which, at a given moment in its history, feels an inner compulsion to extend on a world scale the competition of its antagonistic economic systems.

"Continuing my analysis, I find that the hypocrisy is of recent date, for neither Cortez discovering Mexico from the top of the great Teocalli, nor Pizarro before Cuzco (and still less Marco Polo before Cambaluc) claimed to be the harbingers of a superior system. They killed; they pillaged; they had helmets, lances and covetous instincts; but the loud-mouthed talkers came later. The chief culprit here is sanctimonious Christianity, because it formulated the false equation that Christianity is identical with civilization, and paganism with savagery, so that the inevitable result was the hideousness of colonialism and racism, and the victims were the red, the yellow and the black races."^{3/}

^{2/} Ibid., pp. 14-15.

19. I have taken the liberty of quoting this remarkable passage, the relevance of which I am sure will escape no one. Aimé Césaire concludes with these words:

"I acknowledge, of course, that it is good for different civilizations to be brought into contact with each other and that the marriage of different worlds is to be commended, for whatever the inner genius of a civilization, it inevitably loses its vigour if it withdraws into itself. I agree that international trade is like oxygen, that Europe's great opportunity lay in having been the crossroads, the geometric locus of all the ideas, the receptacle of all the philosophies and the home of all noble feelings, and that this has made it the best possible redistributor of energy.

"But having said this, I must then ask whether colonization really brought people into contact or, if you prefer, whether it was the best possible way of establishing contact.

"My answer is no, and I say that there is an infinite distance between colonization and civilization. I say that all the vast numbers of colonial expeditions, all the collections of colonial statutes and all the ministerial circulars which have been issued have not succeeded in producing a single human value."^{4/}

20. These words of Aimé Césaire are clear and precise; they seem to us to constitute an extremely sound argument and lead us naturally on to put another question. Is decolonization historically possible? This neologism certainly conceals a dangerous vagueness. The dizzying series of countries which became independent in 1960 has marked that year in the history of mankind and proves to us, if any proof were needed, that it is impossible to speak of progressive evolution when we see events unfolding at such a rate, for the fact is that there are no immature peoples incapable of governing themselves freely. Of course there are bad governments, but it must be admitted that they are to be found everywhere and at all levels.

21. Between Bandung and today, it seems as if several centuries have passed, so far-reaching are the upheavals which are everywhere shaking the edifice of colonialism to its foundations.

22. Fifteen years have passed since San Francisco. Those who, only five years ago, called countries of Asia and Africa their possessions, no longer deny that a people cannot be a possession. The analogy between a colonial subject and a slave has become obvious. If I am not mistaken, it was President Franklin D. Roosevelt who said that future generations would one day ask how it was that slavery had been abolished and yet, so long afterwards, the colonial system of relations between States was still accepted.

23. What was a slave? A human being bought in the market or a prisoner brought back from the battlefield after victory; a human being treated as a personal possession.

24. What is a colonized person? It should be pointed out that he does not exist as an individual phenomenon; individual persons or small groups are not objects of colonization. Colonization is the occupation of a whole country and the subjugation of an entire people. Like the slave, the colonized person obeys the wishes of his master, the colonizer, who treats him as a personal possession.

25. There can be no doubt about the immoral character of colonial rule, which it must be admitted in no way differs from slavery. Consequently all of us here are now unanimous in our condemnation of colonialism, but there does not seem to be the same unanimity when it comes to taking action. Who is it that disrupts this unanimity on the immediate liquidation of colonialism? It is of course the countries which still possess colonies. Their favourite argument is the gradual advancement of the colonial countries, and they base this argument on their experience as predestined metropolitan countries, particularly well versed in the problem of the advancement of colonies.

26. They like to tell us: we know from experience that by speeding up matters we would be doing these countries a disservice; and they add: look at the example of the former Belgian Congo—it could so easily happen to anyone. I should like to tell the proponents of that kind of argument that they have been overtaken by events.

27. The United Nations is no longer an assembly where, on the one hand, there are countries which can lay claim to long experience as expert colonizers and, on the other, countries which have no colonies and whose praiseworthy intentions concerning oppressed peoples are quickly denounced as demagogic manoeuvres. There are now other voices in the United Nations which can give irrefutable and impressive evidence on the subject of colonialism. There are now in the United Nations the representatives of peoples whose bodies and whose human dignity have suffered under colonialism. It is usually said that every generation feels that it is at a turning point in history. Present generations in dependent and colonial countries are undoubtedly at a turning point in their history, in fact at a turning point in all history. The delegations which speak in this Assembly of their colonial experience or proclaim the benefits of colonization can unfortunately only speak of the empire of their fathers' day; they speak of it as a heritage.

28. If their countries were colonized at some time in history, they know it only from history books. Therein lies the fundamental difference between those delegations and ours, who have personal experience of colonial rule. Our knowledge is not based on hearsay or on what we learnt in school; we were for decades the living embodiment of that system. Ours was a generation which, on coming of age, did not have the right to vote in its own country.

29. May we remind certain delegations that henceforth we, the peoples who were once colonized and dependent, but who are now peoples in our own right, are ready to give super-abundant testimony against the perpetuation of colonialism on any pretext whatsoever.

30. When we hear such commonplace arguments as those which reduce the positive accomplishments of colonialism to the presence of a few good speakers from the newly independent countries, this does not trouble us. On the contrary, we think it proves that the apologists of colonialism have no other arguments left. Perhaps we shall disillusion some delegations when we say that most of the advanced elements in the newly independent countries were not trained under normal conditions by colonial Powers; most of them were subjected to a special kind of education which opened no horizons and which imbued them with the cult and the superiority of the metropolitan country, while emphasizing their own congenital incapacity. Many of the advanced elements of today reached adolescence at school without having had any opportunity of learning that there were other countries in the world besides the metropolitan country, which was always described as a magnanimous saviour.

31. If these advanced elements have now shown themselves able to face their responsibilities, this should not be regarded as evidence of the colonial Power's intention to lead the dependent peoples towards their maturity, in accordance with the spirit of the United Nations Charter. On the contrary, the successes—which in our opinion are unfortunately too few—should be regarded as proof that no system of education, however severe, can destroy the qualities of a people determined to become free.

32. Our present experience in Africa shows, in any case, how fast the wheel of history can turn, making the astonished colonial Powers giddy, since they cannot understand that they have no choice but to accept the loss of their paradise, a paradise which was a hell for the millions of human beings who for too long had been reduced to the level of beasts of burden in the name of an imaginary racial superiority. Like Mr. Jean Bruhat, we pity the writers of geography textbooks who, he says,

"are hastily making and remaking maps of the Africa of 1956, which had six independent States, as against twenty-six in 1960. No sooner are these States 'set up' (to use the accepted form of words) than their institutions must be transformed."

33. And whenever the colonialists throw off some ballast, they hope to keep the main cargo, for we should never forget that they never lightly give up the exploitation of the countries they dominate.

34. We know that two Powers have thought that they could shelter themselves from the irresistible wind of independence blowing through the continent of Africa by inventing the legal artifice of overseas provinces in order thus to draw a modest veil over the frantic colonialism which they practise in their colonies. We are very pleased by the decision of the Fourth Committee of the United Nations General Assembly,^{5/} which has just levelled this last rampart by voting, by a commendable majority, for a draft resolution declaring that the so-called overseas provinces are simply colonies and should be considered such from now on.

35. The process of liberation has begun and cannot be turned back. In the words of Abraham Lincoln:

"It is true that you may fool all the people some of the time; you can even fool some of the people all the time; but you can't fool all of the people all the time."

36. We should like to tell the die-hard colonialists that the critical point in the liberation of the peoples under foreign domination was passed in 1960. The awakening is now universal, and all attempts to integrate the inhabitants of colonies with the nationals of metropolitan countries will be in vain. It must be realized, moreover, that the metropolitan country is never sincere in its desire for integration; integration always creates insoluble problems for the metropolitan country, and is directly against its interests, which are based essentially on defrauding those whose rights are ostensibly being restored.

37. Neither the balm of an illusory assimilation, as in Angola, nor organized subversion, as in the Congo, nor open war, as in Algeria, can save colonialism, for its doom has irrevocably been sealed. We repeat that the process is historic and irreversible, and we maintain that it is independent of the colonial Power's will. Let us remember this.

38. In the London Guildhall on 10 November 1942, Sir Winston Churchill said this of the colonies:

"We mean to hold our own. I have not become the King's Prime Minister in order to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire."

39. We should also remember the famous Brazzaville Conference, which, according to the Gaullists, was a liberal achievement of decolonization. This Conference began its recommendations with these words:

"The purposes of the work of civilization which France has carried out in its colonies rule out any idea of autonomy and any possibility of development outside the French bloc of the Empire. Possible self-government in the colonies, even in the distant future—mark this, even in the distant future—is out of the question."

40. Nor should we forget that the French Prime Minister said on 9 June 1960 in the French National Assembly: "We intend to protect our country's political interests, its strategic interests, its intellectual influence and its economic opportunities."

41. Nothing could be clearer. The exploiters of the colonial countries intend to give the colonial peoples with one hand only what they can take away with the other, since Africa produces, for example, 38.4 per cent of the world's diamonds, 66.4 per cent of its cobalt, 45 per cent of its gold, 35 per cent of its phosphates, 29 per cent of its manganese and nearly 25 per cent of its copper, apart from natural reserves of lead, zinc, bauxite, iron and radio-active minerals. The continent of Africa is also the world's largest producer of cocoa, ground-nuts and palm oil.

42. Should we conclude from all this that any independence which is granted is necessarily a false independence that is to be despised? We do not think so, because we are convinced that whenever a colonial people gains a fragment of freedom, it owes it above all to a certain awakening of its masses. Another reason why we do not think so is that we know that whenever a colonial people achieves some form of self-determination, this victory inevitably gives it another opportunity to win a greater victory over the forces of foreign domination.

43. General de Gaulle has understood this very well as he desperately clings to an "Algerian Algeria" while refusing to allow the Algerian people to speak for itself under United Nations control. We would be willing to wager that France, in its obstinate attempt to stifle the will of the proud and brave people of Algeria, will soon awake to the dazzling realities of a radiant Algeria, which will have burst its chains and laid down its arms at the feet of the United Nations, to hear the voice of its people in their new-found confidence.

44. Meanwhile, let us act in such a way that those who are not yet fighting to seize their freedom may be grateful to the United Nations for sparing them from a useless and unjust war. Is that not the first duty of a world-embracing organization that issued from the victory of peace-loving and freedom-loving peoples over the forces of Nazism and Fascism?

45. My delegation hopes that the Assembly will unanimously adopt all draft resolutions giving concrete form to the complete liquidation of colonialism which may be submitted to it. The Assembly must do this, not only because such an attitude is in keeping with the spirit of the Charter, but in particular because it would be the most effective possible contribution to the maintenance of world peace. As long as the United Nations recognizes that some people have the right to control other people, there will be the prospect of conflicts, which at any moment might break out in some corner of Africa, Asia or America and, in view of the present world political situation, lead to a large-scale conflagration.

46. The Assembly should not postpone its decision on the pretext that a State should reach a certain stage of development before being given control of its own affairs. Although it is easy to speak of the principle of a minimum level of development, we do not see how such a level could be defined nor how the criteria for setting time limits could be fixed. We see what Belgium did in the Congo in eighty years; we see what has been done in the other parts of the world in several centuries. When, moreover, we hear references being made to a level, we remember that the Nazi régime of Hitler regarded the countries of Europe as unfit to govern themselves. Everything, of course, is relative.

47. The right of peoples to self-determination is based, above all, on respect for human dignity, which must come before all other considerations. In the name of this sacred principle, my delegation has co-sponsored draft resolution A/L.323 and Add.1-4 and is ready to support any other efforts to speed the movement for the liberation of all peoples under foreign domination and to promote the unconditional granting of independence to all colonial and dependent countries.

48. Mr. DOSUMU-JOHNSON (Liberia): At the outset of my statement, I wish to express my delegation's great satisfaction at the trend of the world attitude towards this most debased political conception which is known as colonialism, and at the fact that we have wisely decided to discuss its complete eradication at this time. By this awareness, the United Nations is set to remove one of the greatest risks and dangers to world peace, and consequently to remove all obstacles between nations. The possession and non-possession of colonies and raw materials have been one of the chief sources of international conflict among the Western Powers, and definitely the cause of the two world wars. The theory of the "haves" and the "have nots" has its origin in colonial reflection and had always engendered jealousy and hatred among industrially developed States. The elimination of colonialism is therefore a contribution to the peace and prosperity of mankind.

49. My contemporaries in African nationalist movements, no matter how divergent our interpretations of present trends may be, will agree with me that World War II was a critical turning-point in modern colonial history. It put an end to complacency towards colonial political, economic and cultural aspirations. It marked the beginning of the positive liquidation of colonial empires, and the recognition of nationalist leaders not as hot-heads and ambitious radicals, but as men of sincere dedication to the cause of their people, entitled to the respect and recognition of the world.

50. But it would be fallacious to conclude that the profound changes now taking place in the interest of subject peoples are manifestly the result of our individual or even collective efforts. To my rather naive mind, looking back over the road we have travelled since 1919 when we organized the National Congress of British West Africa, with a secretariat in the then Gold Coast, and the Congress of the African Peoples of the World here in the United States, and viewing the speed with which things are happening in the colonial world of these days, I am inclined to conclude that some supernatural force, which we call God and others call Allah, is responsible for it all. Some may not agree with me, but this is my belief. We, the agitators, were only instruments in God's hands; and no ingenious manipulation of words from quarters however exalted will shift me one inch from the bed-rock of my confidence in God as the arbiter of human events. How else can you account for great colonial Powers giving up the bread-baskets of their colonial territories without a fight, if God's hand is not in it? I put my faith in God—this not as a set doctrine of belief, but as a tendency towards action, the matrix of a formulated creed and an inspiration to endeavour. Fear not, take courage; thy great sorrows are carved in marble and they will not be inscribed there in vain.

51. This, however, does not imply quiescence or passive gradualism. It does not mean that we should relax our efforts. It means that Heaven helps those who help themselves, and that that God who made possible the independent Ghana, Nigeria, Congo (Leopoldville) and, soon, Sierra Leone, and all the former French colonies now members of the French Community, will soon—possibly in a few years hence—make all Africa free, so that even South Africa and Algeria, I dare say, will be ruled by Africans.

52. My friends tell me that as I become older I become conservative. Nothing could be further from the truth. The simple fact is that my utterances are now governed by circumstances and time. While in the past I agitated with pugnacity, venom and emotion, now I endeavour to deliberate with logic, patience and intellect to achieve the same end. Life is a dynamic equilibrium.

53. Inherent in the Atlantic Charter is the principle of self-determination for all peoples. This principle was, at the formation of the United Nations, embodied in Article 73 of its Charter which I quote in extenso:

[The speaker read the text of Article 73 of the Charter of the United Nations.]

54. This article of the Charter is the basis of the declaration which the African-Asian members of this Assembly have submitted for the unqualified approval of the Assembly.

55. Colonialism has been the subject of much literature of description, analysis and dogma. Its origin is found in that pathological political attitude which predicated national greatness and prestige on overseas possessions. The subject of our declaration is to the effect that domination of any nation over another is a travesty of human justice; that it is always a source of conflict and, in this age of modern communication and rabid nationalism, can more easily than in the past provoke an international crisis. Any attempt to condone or uphold or support any form of colonialism is, to say the least, immoral.

56. The essence of colonialism is domination of one nation over one or several others. It may take several forms, such as conquest, outright purchase, extra-territoriality or economic condominium. Whatever aspect it assumes, in essence it is a group of persons coming from another land and imposing its will and pleasure on the original inhabitants without regard to their elementary interests, and they are invariably reduced to the position of hewers of wood and drawers of water, forever consigned to providing for the colonizers the prerequisites of a refined and cultured life, while they themselves are prevented by their poverty and ignorance from any share or part in that life.

57. Colonial empires have been built on the sweat and wretchedness of the aborigines. The great explorers of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, in their search for adventure, knowledge, glory for their kings, riches for themselves and their friends under the guise of the so-called civilizing mission, exploited, ravaged and pillaged colonial peoples and territories, leaving many of them homeless and debauched. Their complex of superiority left the aborigines no right which the colonizers were bound to respect. The atrocities and deprivations that accompanied colonialism are too sordid for recital here. Suffice it to say that it was a black era for Asia and Africa.

58. With the advent and growth of modern capitalism with its concomitant of commercial and trade expansion, remote areas were penetrated with the protection of Governments. Reluctant mandarins in China were subdued by foreign warships. The East European armies moved against the Emir of Bokhara.

59. Seized by so-called national needs and strategic interests, the British and French became involved in North America and India; Russia and Japan in Manchuria and Korea; Britain, France, Spain, Portugal, the Netherlands, Belgium, Italy and Germany were all involved in Asia and Africa, each netting as part of its booty colonial land areas several times larger than its size. The colonial mentality continued to be so strong an instrument of national policy that the Third Reich planned to turn Poland and Russia into vast colonies to be peopled by foreign farmers who would be served by the slave labour of the population that remained unexterminated.

60. This is among the compelling reasons why this Assembly should take positive steps to remove all traces of colonialism from the face of the earth. To this end my delegation is committed.

61. Here I would like to interpose that we note with satisfaction that the Spanish Government has agreed to review its position and to submit reports on its colonies to the United Nations periodically.

62. Despite the fact that colonialism has been a major topic in all African and Asian conferences of recent years—Bandung, Accra, Monrovia, Addis Ababa and elsewhere—we have never asked for the final ending of it in the United Nations. We must, therefore, appreciate the Soviet Union's action in placing this question on the agenda of the United Nations.

63. If the British and French were the only colonizing Powers in the world today, our argument would have been very much weakened by recent trends in their colonial policies. Although we are not in complete agreement with them on Algeria, Kenya and the Federation of Rhodesia, we are comforted by their willingness to co-operate, as they are setting their colonies free. They have perhaps learnt that they have more to gain by setting their colonies free and retaining their friendship than by forcing them to war; and the sooner they do this for the remaining colonies the better it will be for them.

64. However, there are die-hards, such as Portugal and Spain, which seek to make Africa a part of Europe. The Portuguese and Spanish colonies are the most deplorable and inhuman in the colonial history of these times, although they have been longer in the colonial field than any other European nations.

65. The Africans in Mozambique—5,780,000—and Angola—4,145,000—live under a dictatorship of the cruelest kind. I was not told this; I went there. All the fancy talk of equal rights and no colour bar, and that colonies are an integral part of Portugal, is a fraud and an insult to the conscience of mankind, because these are benefits designed for civilized persons, and under Portuguese practice few Africans qualify as such. The Africans in these territories live in abject poverty. Forced labour is practised on them, as they are always handed over to employers if they fail to pay the poll-tax. They are not even permitted to drive taxis, as such employment is reserved for Portuguese. Strangers are not permitted to talk to Africans in these two countries unless in the Portuguese language. This is official policy. Bissau and São Tomé are even worse than these. This Assembly must take positive measures to relieve the plight of the Africans in Spanish Fernando Po and the Portuguese colonies, and in the former British colony of South Africa. South Africa was a British colony, and in the transfer of power Britain should have protected the African population. Consequently, it shares responsibility for the plight of the African in the Union of South Africa.

66. Uganda, Kenya, the Central Federation of Rhodesia, South West Africa, Bechuanaland, Basutoland and a few others here and there on the colonial list cry out for independence. They are exposed to a colour bar and other inhuman treatment. Although there are hopeful signs, these are too small. The only remedy open to the Africans is complete political independence as a means of raising themselves from the degrading position of an incarnate Lazarus feeding on the crumbs of alien taxmasters to the posture of equality and human dignity which is their rightful heritage.

67. It is needless to compile statistics to prove the immorality of colonialism. It is a system that takes the manhood out of those exposed to it. It robs the people of their resources and gives them nothing comparable in return.

68. Viewing it in the light of the declaration which my delegation has co-sponsored with alacrity, let us examine this baneful system with regard to its political, economic and cultural implications and, where possible, disprove all pretexts for delaying independence.

69. Contrary to the belief often entertained by people whose education just suffices to elevate them from the status of boors, the Africans, prior to the advent of European traders in Africa, had a well-ordered and highly developed system of family life, community development, education for boys and girls, arts and health.

70. The heart of African society, since before the European invasion, has been the family. A broad view is taken of family relationship and responsibility. It is composed of every link in the family chain. Marriage is the business of the whole group. The cultural pristine value of the community and the chieftaincy will be attested to by all those who have observed it with unbiased minds, whether they be missionaries, anthropologists or sociologists. Because the African believes in the continuity of family and community, he does his level best to instil in his children the things for which the family and the community stand. The educational processes were by observation, involvement and formal learning. Notwithstanding all its aspects, this culture was ridiculed and the social system ignored or disrespected.

71. To say that the African had no government and that it took the Europeans to introduce political system in Africa is to make a statement without foundation in fact. When God divided the world, He gave a portion each to Shem, Ham and Japheth. Ham took Africa as his portion. With his sons, Cush, Phut and Mizraim, the government of Africa began and later gave rise to the empires of Sokoto, Gando, Kano, Conghoi and the various dynasties of Egypt. When European colonization of Africa began under the intrepid mariners of Prince Henry in the fifteenth century, Africans on the Atlantic shores were in trade contact with Mediterranean traders since as far back as 600 B.C. and were enjoying the benefits of a cultural evolution with its seat in the Nile, Tigris and Euphrates rivers. The claim that they came to protect us is balderdash, for when enemies really came we were usually left to our own fate.

72. Many of the things you hear about today, such as diseases, curable and incurable, did not begin to afflict the African until the invasion of alien forces, which ravaged and pillaged the homes of Africans and in some instances sold them into slavery. Being forced to do things against their will and to work for masters instead of for themselves was too bitter a pill to swallow. Death or indolence or shiftlessness was resorted to as a way of life. Freedom and democracy, the keystone of English liberty and the watchword of Europe, was never exported to the colonial territories. A strange form of freedom was inaugurated in dealing with Asians and Africans.

73. Colonialism in any shape or form is bad. It brought to Asia and Africa a great deal of evil which was encouraged in some instances by the colonizing Powers. Interested in the wealth that they could find to enrich the coffers of merchant princes in Europe, pirates and adventurers like Drake, Frobisher and Hawkins burnt down African towns and villages and sold their inhabitants into slavery. In many places the Africans were only beasts of burden. This is what Kipling's white man's burden did for Africa. We should thank God for the mosquitoes in West Africa.

74. Within forty years Africa's 11,545,000 square miles, with the exception of the areas occupied by sovereign Liberia and Ethiopia, were staked out among the great Powers, with unhappy consequences for the inhabitants. Despite the lofty humanitarian principles which were echoed in the platforms of Europe, the practices of these early colonizers were neither lofty nor humane. If you look at the treaties with their X's as symbols of acceptance by unlettered chieftains, you cannot but be convinced of the varying degrees of deception employed to induce Africans to sign papers they did not understand. If I do not understand these treaties today, you can imagine how much less they understood them then.

75. In some instances political affairs were left to private companies and individuals who were willing to condone the treatment of the African, which was not in harmony with their protestations of concern for his life and liberty. Some of the methods used to recruit labour and to keep it were the same as those employed by the slave driver, and resistance by the conscript met with counter-measures of the most brutal sort.

76. If we are anxious to have a declaration on colonialism in the face of the kaleidoscopic changes taking place in Africa today, it is because consistency is not a part of the vocabulary in colonial circles. The stream of colonial policy has many tributaries which are sensitive to changes in the intellectual climate of the home country.

77. The argument that the colonies are not yet prepared for independence is untenable. They said that about all the colonies that have attained independence. No amount of political tutelage can give a people the real robustness that independence supplies. Go there today and see what Africans have done for themselves since independence. The Africans managed their own affairs before the colonial era; I have no doubt that they can manage them today with the United Nations as their guide.

78. It would be a travesty on the principles of the purest justice if I failed to express my indebtedness to Western missions which set me and many others on the road to modern political practice, yes, my indebtedness to Western science and medicine, engineering, welfare, administration and other modern paraphernalia. But these cannot be substituted for the independence of my brethren who are systematically deprived of the right to speak and move about with the dignity that characterizes manhood.

79. All that the Africans—East, West, North or South—are asking the colonial and administering Powers and the great democratic nations is that they accord the colonies political independence so that they may develop better houses, better food, a higher standard of living generally; a vigorous national economy; a stable society with its concomitants of schools, colleges, welfare centres, hospitals, disciplined army and police, civil and political liberty.

80. People in territories under colonial domination desire a better life. It is not necessary for their children to be damned to come into the world with disease or for them themselves to be subject all their lives to its debilitating and incapacitating effects.

81. It is peculiarly obtuse for any Member of the United Nations to claim any section of Africa as part of his metropolitan territory, as is also the assertion recently made by a certain European Head of State, that in discussing Africa the United Nations is meddling in the domestic affairs of his country. This is an outmoded subterfuge. Any inhuman practice perpetrated on subject peoples, every colonial question in any part of the world, is within the competence of the United Nations, and it is so understood.

82. The year 1960 should be made complete in its claim as the "African Year" by the adoption of this declaration as a charter of freedom for the remaining colonial territories from exploitation and servitude, and thus make them beneficiaries of the fundamental human rights which the United Nations assures to all peoples.

83. Prepared or unprepared, experience has taught us that they will develop faster under a government of their own choosing.

84. The PRESIDENT: Before I call on the next speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the Assembly to document A/L.323/Add.5, which informs us that Gabon and the Philippines have been added to the list of sponsors of the draft resolution.

85. Mr. TOURA GABA (Chad) (translated from French): The delegation of Chad has listened with clearly understandable interest to the speakers who have preceded it to this rostrum. Indeed, of all the discussions in which it has had the honour to take part, my delegation considers the one in which we are engaged today as being by far the most important because it has a direct bearing on both the present and the future. Colonialism is not a stranger to the ills from which our unfortunate planet suffers.

86. My delegation would in this connexion like to address itself particularly to the delegations of those nations which still have political and economic responsibilities overseas.

87. For reasons which are well known, this debate concerns them as deeply, if not more deeply, than it concerns us, the representatives of the young nations that have co-sponsored the draft declaration on the end of colonialism which will be proposed, towards the end of our discussion, for the acceptance of this Assembly.

88. Since they boast of a Christian civilization which is built, so we are taught, on charity, justice, love for one's neighbour and other such principles, the representatives of the nations indicted in the declaration will undoubtedly find themselves on the horns of a dilemma and, as so many of their co-religionists, the victims of severe attacks of conscience. They certainly know the consequences, happy or disastrous as the case may be, of the vote they will cast at the end of this debate. Never has a vote had so much importance for the whole of the world, and for the white race in particular, paralysed as it is by its deep-rooted instinct of self-preservation. Never, owing to a handful of backward-looking people who obstinately cling to the last vestiges of an irretrievable past, has Christianity, of which the white race is apparently so proud, been in so great danger in the dependent countries. Never have other religions known such popularity in these colonies.

89. My delegation would like to hope that the colonialist nations will, this year, make a magnanimous gesture. They cannot show themselves inferior to those nations which have voluntarily recognized the necessity of liberating their colonies.

90. No one hesitates to proclaim from the roof-tops that he is free and democratic. But can a free and democratic person oppress other men? It is unthinkable to refuse to others what one demands for oneself.

91. Are not the flags and anthems of the colonialist countries themselves a sign of their great love for independence? The need to be free and independent is inherent in the human person. It would therefore be criminal, futile and against the will of God to refuse on any ground whatever to give full and total independence to an individual, and even more to a people, that demands it.

92. My delegation would further like to hope that the colonialist nations, which for well-known reasons have spread progressive ideas throughout the world, will not reverse themselves here; they must not fail to be logical with themselves. Hence my delegation directs a pressing appeal to them to unite their efforts with ours so that we may build a new world from which slavery will be banished and where justice, equality, brotherhood and harmony at last will reign.

93. In order to rouse its people to the struggle for national independence, one of the older republics which sits among us here reinvigorated the religion of its ancestors. Though clothing it in Christian rites, it drew Jesus Christ and his faithful apostles in its own image, excluding Judas of course. These people proudly tell us that without this metamorphosis they would never have succeeded in driving the invader from their country. If the colonialists continue to reason as their ancestors did, and like them allow themselves to be overtaken by the times, we fear that this phenomenon will recur on a large and devastating scale. It will carry everything before it, and nothing which recalls colonialism will remain.

94. Let us see to it together that, for the good of mankind, this calamity, which in poetical language has been described as a return to the well-springs of humanity, does not come about.

95. This sombre prospect gives singular importance to the debate which you, Mr. President, are directing with your customary competence and distinction. Would it be asking too much to beg you to use your influence so that those whom the colonial Powers heed might make an extra effort to bring about the freeing of colonies which all the peoples of the world so ardently desire? Our Assembly, the reflection of these peoples who thirst for justice and deeply believe in the necessity for peaceful coexistence, could not fail to be grateful to you.

96. The African continent is shaped somewhat like a question-mark, but also somewhat like a pistol pointed, as if by chance, at the Union of South Africa. It is for the colonial Powers to see to it that the continent is not transformed into a real pistol, but remains a peaceful question-mark. To do this the colonial Powers must henceforth show that they can respond in time to the questions put to them. This is vital to the interests of peace and friendship among peoples.

97. Africa does not bear malice or seek revenge; it is not racist and has no special dislike for foreigners. All races live there together, all opinions are freely expressed, except of course in the territories which are still under the colonial yoke. Africa also knows how to forget. The proof of this is in the young nations where the indigenous people and colonizers live and work together in friendship and dignity.

98. The draft resolution which is before you in document A/L.323 and Add.1-5 comes from most, if not all, of the formerly colonized nations. It is the expression of those who know the colonial régime better than anyone else and who can assess its advantages and disadvantages in a true perspective. The domination of one people by another, a condition contrary to fundamental human rights and to the Charter of the United Nations, is something that is known to all people. But henceforth colonialism is condemned, and its perpetuation is recognized to be a clear threat to international peace and security.

99. All peoples have the right of self-determination; no political, economic or social pretext may be used to deprive them of this right. We address a pressing appeal to all the great nations to put an end to all armed action and all other repressive measures directed against the still dependent peoples that peacefully claim their independence. Such is the spirit of our draft resolution.

100. Our continent knows its origins and its potentialities; it knows its value both for the present and for the future. Thus, when Africa and its sister continent Asia have occasion to speak of other continents, they sometimes wear the tender smile of an indulgent mother.

101. Africa cannot therefore ignore or dispense with the other continents. Perhaps more than them it needs outside assistance to develop its fabulous latent riches. It cannot, in the interdependent world of today, set itself apart or withdraw into itself. As in the past it wants to be both donor and recipient of everything that enriches and does honour to our common heritage: civilization.

102. The time has come when Africa as a whole must occupy the select place it deserves in the family of sovereign nations. Its intentions are pure, and, as in the past, it is worthy of confidence.

103. I shall conclude by renewing my appeal to the colonial Powers to join disinterestedly with us so that the breadth of the historic vote we shall take will not be lessened by a discordant note.

The meeting rose at 10.20 p.m.

Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples (continued). . . 1073

1. Mr. SHANAHAN (New Zealand): Since the founding of the United Nations a large part of its work has been directed to improving the position of peoples who could not play a full part, as adult members, in the government of the society to which they belonged. This work has not been confined to the application of the provisions of the Charter relating to Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories: it has found expression also in the steps taken by the United Nations to fulfil its declared purpose of promoting respect for human rights and freedoms for all, without distinctions of any kind.
2. The tree of freedom and independence is firmly rooted in the Charter; and, at this session of the General Assembly, we have witnessed its finest flowering. At this moment, when seventeen newly independent countries have so recently been admitted to membership, it is natural that we should turn our attention to the distance still to go, before the task can be completed. That is the reason why the concept of a draft declaration finds such a ready response in this Assembly.
3. The very essence of this project is a belief in the individual worth and dignity of all human beings—a belief which allows of no distinction on grounds of race, of colour or of nationality, and which cannot be fully vindicated as long as one people exercises any form of hegemony over another. My delegation can subscribe whole-heartedly—and without any reservation or qualification—to a reaffirmation of this belief. The people of New Zealand are as eager as those of any other country to see a world of independent nations working together for the common good of mankind, freed from the evils of racial discrimination and from all forms of domination and oppression.
4. Let me say at once that my delegation does not equate those evils with the term "colonialism". It would be no service to the ideals of this Organization to find a catch-phrase for all the shortcomings of the social order in national societies. When the existence of colonialism is openly recognized, as merely a passing phase in the development of a particular territory, it should not be used as a term of disparagement.

That is the position in the cases of the Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories whose peoples are admitted to be within the scope of the relevant chapters of the United Nations Charter.

5. It is a fact worth recalling that the States which have borne the heaviest responsibilities for the administration of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories were among the founding Members of this Organization, and that they freely and voluntarily assumed the obligations which the Charter created. Their record of performance is symbolized by the presence among us of the representatives of many new States, which have been brought to independence by the United Kingdom, France and other countries. In this process, the influence and moral authority of the United Nations have played their own unique part; but that in turn was made possible because the administering Powers joined with other independent States in framing and subscribing to the provisions of the Charter itself.
