6. Any declaration which the Assembly adopts must build on these foundations. In placing on record a solemn expression of our aspirations for all peoples who do not have a full measure of freedom, we must not—as the Soviet Union and its supporters would have us do—ignore or belittle the honest efforts and substantial progress which have been made. Our solicitude must extend to all the peoples whose actual state of independence and subordination is not avowed.

7. In particular, the Assembly's attention should not be confined to the Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories which already come under the scrutiny of the appropriate organs of the United Nations. We must take into account other and truly sinister forms of colonialism—sinister because there are no pledges to end them, no endeavours to redress wrongs actively perpetrated in our own times, in defiance of Charter obligations and in full awareness of the human suffering and degradation they have caused.

8. My delegation has welcomed the initiative taken by the African and Asian States which have put forward a draft declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples [A/L.323 and Add.1-5]. This proposal must be regarded as a continuation of the work begun when the Charter marked out the path towards the goal of universal independence. We would readily agree that to place any obstacles in this path would be wholly at variance with the letter and the spirit of the Charter.

9. Yet the Charter itself recognizes that every people and territory which travels this path must set a pace in keeping with its capabilities. That is why the detailed provisions governing Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories left room for a flexible approach capable of being adjusted to the circumstances of each territory. This flexible approach was necessary only because the immediate grant of self-government or independence would in most cases have been detrimental to the real interests of the territory concerned. Many of the sponsors of the draft declaration have first-hand experience of the provisions of Chapters XI and XII of the Charter and how they have worked out in practice. We have not heard any suggestion that when these provisions are fully acknowledged and implemented by the administering Power concerned they operate in any way to the detriment of a Trust or Non-Self-Governing Territory or to delay its independence unreasonably.

10. New Zealand also is in a position to judge for itself the efficacy of the Trusteeship System. There is no doubt that its application to Western Samoa, for example, has substantially hastened the day, now arrived, when the people of Western Samoa feel able and ready to become independent. This is not because in the absence of a trusteeship agreement New Zealand would have wished or would have been able to refuse demands for independence. It is simply that the standards set by the Assembly and by the Trusteeship Council and their careful appraisal of progress have encouraged the growth of political institutions, the development of economic and technical resources and the training of a nucleus of officials, teachers and experts. The existence of this basic equipment is the prerequisite for an independence having any reality or stability. When the Prime Minister of Western Samoa comes here next week to ask this Assembly to set in train the termination of the Trusteeship Agreement, I do not think we shall hear him say—as has been said from this rostrum in the course of this session—that the Trusteeship System has not justified itself anywhere and should be buried.

11. I repeat that we are building on the Charter, and that its detailed provisions have already proved their worth in securing—at a much faster rate than many would have thought possible—the independence of a large number of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories. This is the reality we need to bear in mind, if we are to make an honest assessment of the value and purposes of a new declaration. Such a document must deal in generalities. It cannot provide a rule of thumb which offers any automatic solution of remaining colonial problems; for, as the Charter recognizes, each case is governed by its own particular circumstances. The test is always that of determining what will best suit the interests of the peoples—of all the peoples—whose destiny is at stake.

12. It is in this light that my delegation judges the draft declaration submitted to us by the African and Asian States. What is here contemplated is not a treaty instrument, every stipulation of which would have to be minutely weighed by each country that contemplated adherence—and, indeed, it would seem to us almost impossible for such an instrument to improve upon the tried and tested provisions of the Charter. Rather it is the object of a declaration to capture and reflect faithfully ideals and principles which are of universal application.

13. A declaration such as that now proposed by the forty-two countries which have joined as co-sponsors [A/L.323 and Add.1-5] would be in the best United Nations tradition if it placed on record an optimum standard of attainment in the work of bringing to an end all forms of colonialism at the earliest possible date. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights is the great example of a statement of principle so generally recognized and so widely supported that it invokes the whole moral authority of the United Nations. To command the same universal respect, a declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples must come up to the same standards of objective validity and reflect the same positive approach. To take its place among the great documents of the United Nations, it must also be scrupulously fair and must not attribute to administering Powers motives and intentions which are the antithesis of their settled policies and the results they have already achieved.

14. We have no doubt that the intentions of the authors of the present draft are in keeping with those aims. It is certainly a praiseworthy objective to try to secure full acceptance and implementation by all States of their Charter obligations, and also to speed up—as much as is consistent with good sense and practical possibilities—the processes leading to independence for all peoples in the form which they themselves have chosen as best suited to their needs.

15. At a session of the Assembly which has been so deeply concerned with the tragic events in the Congo, we must be aware of the difficulties and complexities in bringing a territory to independence. Under the Charter an obligation to prepare dependent peoples for independence is imposed on the administering Power. It is therefore necessary to avoid any expression of principle which may weaken the force of this obligation or cast doubt upon the need for its fulfilment.

16. It may be that in some cases the work of preparing for independence should have begun earlier or have been carried on more quickly—though under the spur of the Charter our conceptions have changed in these last changing years. It is proper to ensure that all administering Powers are aware of their responsibilities and are taking steps to discharge them. But it will serve no one, least of all the peoples of the territory concerned, if the task still to be completed is simply abandoned.

17. We were all impressed when the leader of one of the great African nations admitted to membership this year paid a tribute to the work which the former Administering Authority had put into preparing his country for independence. Let us be honest enough to acknowledge freely the need for this preparation, to recognize that in most cases it is being carried on at an ever increasing rate, with an integrity of purpose and an unsurpassed devotion.

18. For all these reasons my delegation hopes that the sponsors will be willing to consider rephrasing some parts of their draft. In some cases, what is implicit could be made explicit. Understandably, many of the sponsors were preoccupied with the remaining large dependent territories in Africa. There is, however, a need to make sure that the rights of people subject to other forms of colonialism are equally protected, and that the different needs of smaller territories in regions other than Africa are not overlooked.

19. In relation to operative paragraph 5, there can be no reason for not giving express recognition to the acknowledged principle that, when the time comes, the people of these small territories may well choose a form of independence which does not involve their separate existence as a sovereign State. We also think it would be possible to bring out more clearly in this paragraph that the duty of administering Powers is to set in train immediately the processes which will enable their territories to achieve independence in an orderly manner at the earliest possible date.

20. We also feel that the seventh paragraph of the preamble does not take sufficient account of the many ways in which the more developed countries are sharing their resources with the less developed countries, whether or not they have yet attained independence. From what I have already said, it will be clear that we consider that the ninth paragraph of the preamble would be more happily expressed if it did not imply that colonialism was the source of segregation and discrimination.

21. The draft as a whole should, we think, reflect the fact that most of the administering Powers are already fully committed to the policy of permitting the peoples of their territories freely to determine their own future. In those circumstances it is wrong to imply in operative paragraph 4 that all armed action is necessarily directed toward preventing dependent peoples from exercising this free choice and obtaining its realization. Surely it would be desirable to make it clear that the uses of force which are legitimate in any State are not precluded. For example, the representative of Burma mentioned yesterday [930th meeting] that in order to prevent crime the police might need to use force.

22. Finally, the text should establish beyond doubt that we are concerned not only with the peoples of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories but with all peoples who do not at present enjoy an effective independence or full freedoms.

23. I mention the desirability of these clarifications because the New Zealand delegation is eager to give its whole-hearted support to a declaration which would testify not only to the uncompromising stand of the United Nations against the continuation of colonialism in any form but also to its ability to recognize good as well as to condemn evil and to face and to grapple with the very real practical problems which must be overcome before all territories and peoples can be truly free and independent.

24. Mr. MENEMENCIOGLU (Turkey): The Turkish delegation considers the discussion on the declaration concerning the independence of colonial countries and peoples as one of the most important tasks which has been taken up by the Assembly during recent years. We share the views expressed by many speakers who have preceded us to the effect that this debate may elucidate a number of important problems and may contribute to formulating certain fundamental principles of the utmost significance for the nations of the world.

25. The subject under consideration includes such high aspirations as "freedom", "self-determination", "independence" and "territorial integrity". These are high ideals which are dear to the people of my country. Indeed, in their history, both old and new, the Turkish people have given ample proof of the value which they attach to these high principles. Sometimes, under adverse conditions, our people have found themselves in the necessity of defending these principles single-handed and at the cost of great sacrifice. In consequence, like many other delegations, we are mindful of the need to give to this debate serious, objective and constructive attention. There should be no doubt that my delegation cannot participate in any attempt which might be made to deviate this important discussion towards purposes which are foreign to the high principles involved.

26. As we take up this discussion at the present session of the General Assembly, one aspect of this particular gathering is predominant in our minds: the fact that there are so many newly independent States sitting with us in this hall on the basis of equality and bringing their own valuable contributions in this debate which deals with a matter of such vital importance. Some time ago it would have been difficult even to imagine such rapid progress along the path of freedom and independence. This reality is in itself a most significant proof of the fact that the movement towards freedom is irreversible and will remain as the dominant characteristic trend of this century.

27. Another happy trend is constituted by the fact that the evolutionary processes which are culminating in a movement of emancipation over a large part of the world are commonly upheld by the majority of people in all the continents. Consequently, we can see today that the attainment of freedom and independence through evolutionary processes and without hideous bloodshed is gradually becoming the general rule instead of the exception, though, as we all know, quite a number of tragic cases in the opposite direction have existed in recent years and some continue to exist.

28. My own country has had its bitter share of war and bloodshed and devastation in the past. Therefore, we know what it is for a young nation to lose the cream of its youth and to have its resources laid waste. We also know that freedom and independence are to be treasured above everything else. But, as we have witnessed during the last decades, these high ideals have been attained and continue to be attained in certain parts of the world through evolutionary processes. We are of the opinion that, wherever such peaceful transitions may be attained, they should be considered as occasions for particular rejoicing.

29. As we take up this discussion today, these two important facts which I have mentioned show clearly that there exists agreement in large areas of the world over ultimate aims and ideals on the subject under consideration. It is, therefore, an occasion of profound satisfaction for my delegation to co-sponsor a draft declaration in defence of the ideals of freedom and independence, while we are conscious of the fact that today such a declaration cannot be construed as being against anybody, any country or any group of countries. This declaration aims at giving a forceful and epoch-making expression to a set of basic ideas which are deeply rooted among all the peoples of the world. We are confident that these ideals will continue to wield great influence wherever the cause of freedom and independence may be in jeopardy in the future.

30. The draft declaration co-sponsored by over forty countries [A/L.323 and Add.1-5] is aimed at extending freedom and independence to such dependent territories as have not yet attained these attributes. While formulating the conditions under which these territories may enjoy the fruits of their emancipation, it was inevitable and logical that we should try to extend to them all the basic prerequisites of freedom and independence which are cherished by our own peoples.

31. Consequently, the text before us makes reference to such high aspirations as freedom, self-determination, independence, territorial integrity and racial equality. These are lofty ideals which should be cherished by all countries old and new.

32. The incorporation of these principles in the draft declaration should serve to remind all countries which have newly attained freedom and independence, and all others which will soon follow, to be forever vigilant so as to preserve their freedom and independence in the face of whatever danger they may encounter in the future.

33. The attainment of independence is certainly not an end but a beginning. This was proclaimed with great insistence by Kemal Ataturk, the founder of modern Turkey. The legacy which he has left to the young generations of our country and which has had a profound influence in great areas of the world points to a two-fold purpose: first, to preserve at all cost the freedom, independence and territorial integrity of the country which have been obtained through great sacrifice; and second, to concentrate all efforts for accelerated development in the economic, social, cultural and political fields, not only with the aim of integrating our country with the most advanced conceptions of modern civilization, but also because such development constitutes, in the long run, the only true guarantee for preserving intact the fruits of freedom and independence which are cherished above all by my countrymen.

34. This legacy of our great founder, Kemal Ataturk, together with his motto, "Peace in the motherland and peace in the world", continue to be the solid cornerstones of our political conceptions in Turkey.

35. The Turkish Republic, which was founded some forty years ago on these convictions and which has evolved its policy in the same direction ever since, is particularly happy to collaborate with so many new Members of the United Nations for the solid entrenchment of these ideals in wide areas of the world. The fact that so many other countries will soon attain independence, and that they will soon join us here to make their own valuable contribution to the cause of peace and universal brotherhood in our Organization, is a matter which gives us further cause for satisfaction.

36. As co-sponsors of the draft declaration, we do not advance the pretension that this text in itself has formulated a new conception of human relations. We have attempted to bring together and to crystallize the fundamental ideals of our times in connexion with colonialism in all its forms and manifestations. In so doing, this text in its essence elucidates a basic movement which, having started with some political philosophers in France, the United States and England nearly two centuries ago, has evolved to constitute an outstanding universal trend of the present period.

37. The co-sponsors of this draft declaration have had a constructive and practical aim in mind. As I have said before, we do not construe this text as being directed against anybody; neither is it our intention to hamper any efforts now being made in many territories for a peaceful and orderly transition to independence with the co-operation of all concerned.

38. My delegation is aware that in certain cases the necessity of harmonizing the interests of the peoples who should be the rightful masters of the newly established States has made it imperative to have preparatory consultations in order to arrive at a mutually acceptable constitutional formula upon which a stable and peaceful national existence could be based. This has been the case in certain federative States and in others which were previously faced by similar problems. We have among us today as Members of the United Nations some outstanding examples of successful solutions which have been found to such problems through the constructive efforts of all concerned. Such constitutional and practical achievements of many nations and peoples represented here, as well as the determined efforts which they have made in order to reach these happy results, can undoubtedly serve as valuable examples wherever similar problems may arise. An atmosphere of union and harmony has always been of the utmost importance for newly-established States in allowing them to concentrate all their efforts towards economic, social, cultural and political advancement, which is the only guarantee of their survival as truly free and independent nations.

39. The draft declaration before us proclaims the end of an era and the beginning of a new one. No one can contest the validity of this claim. What is important today is that all our efforts should be united to make this end speedy and unconditional. There is no better way of serving the cause of international peace and understanding, which are the essence of our Charter, than to accelerate all efforts aimed at securing freedom and independence to the dependent peoples who ardently desire these attributes.

40. At the same time, the draft declaration sets forth certain prerequisites for the full and continued enjoyment of freedom and independence. Therefore, the principles embodied in the draft declaration also recommend themselves as elements which will serve the cause of peace, which is a common aim of the peoples of the world.

41. In conclusion, I wish to state once again that my delegation considers this debate as one of utmost importance. We are aware that the subject-matter deals with problems which are of vital significance at the present time. We have been conscious of the heavy responsibility which weighs upon us, as upon every other delegation in this Assembly, in trying to make a contribution both in this debate and in the preparation of the draft declaration. In making our modest contribution, we have served the ideals in which we strongly believe, while at the same time trying to achieve these ends through harmony instead of discord. We hope that these discussions may bring about such harmony of views and that the principles embodied in the draft declaration may be proclaimed to all the world in a manner which will leave no doubt as to their momentous significance.

42. Mr. MEZINCESCU (Romania) (translated from French): The Romanian delegation attaches particular importance to this debate on the abolition of the colonial régime, an item which was placed on the agenda of the fifteenth session of the General Assembly at the request of the Government of the Soviet Union [A/4501].

43. The achievement of the fundamental aims of the United Nations is inconceivable without the abolition of the colonial régime. The colonial wars and repressive military operations against the patriotic national-liberation movements, which have hardly ceased since the end of the Second World War, are a denial of the principles of the Charter and a permanent threat to international peace and security.

44. At a time when the colonial régime is still depriving more than one hundred million people of their freedom and national independence, how is it possible to speak of friendly relations among nations, "based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples", to quote the terms of Article 1, paragraph 2, of the Charter?

45. As the Head of the Romanian delegation, Mr. Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, stated in the course of the general debate:

"... adherence to the principles of the United Nations Charter has become incompatible with colonial oppression perpetrated by Member States of the United Nations. Consequently, it is high time for the United Nations to call upon all Governments strictly to observe the provisions of the Charter on equality and respect for sovereign rights and for the territorial integrity of all States without exception, rejecting any manifestation of colonialism, any exclusive right or privilege for the benefit of some States to the detriment of others." [873rd meeting, para. 44.]

46. Only the permanent abolition of the colonial régime and of all vestiges of colonialism can satisfy the legitimate desire of the colonial peoples for freedom and national independence, and satisfy progressive public opinion throughout the world, which is demanding that this disgrace to humanity be removed from our planet once and for all.

47. The position taken by States on the abolition of the colonial régime in all its forms and the immediate granting of independence to the colonial peoples is a test of their loyalty to the principles of the United Nations Charter.

48. All those who sincerely adhere to the principles of freedom and of the right of peoples to use the resources of their country for their own benefit cannot fail to support the immediate granting of complete independence to all the colonial countries, to all the Trust Territories and other Non-Self-Governing Territories, and the abolition of the leasing of property and whole areas in the territory of other States.

49. A categorical "yes" by States to the concrete and practical proposal for the immediate abolition of the colonial régime places them on the side of the forces of progress and peace. A negative or evasive reply places them on the side of the forces of reaction and aggression.

50. This is not a case of "psychological terrorism". The laws of historical development of human society create situations in which equivocation is no longer possible, however subtle the masters of that school of thought may be.

51. The force of the liberation and national independence movement, and the irresistible tide of opinion in favour of the abolition of the colonial régime place the colonial Powers and their representatives in this debate in an unenviable position. On no other question is Western diplomacy obliged to conceal more effectively the difference between what it practices and what it preaches.

52. It is admittedly extremely difficult for the colonial masters to reject directly and categorically, in the name of "Western freedom" and the "free world", freedom and independence for over one hundred million people who are still subjected to colonial slavery; it is equally difficult for them to give a categorically affirmative reply to this question: the tiger does not turn vegetarian just because his prey becomes scarce and elusive.

53. This is why, since the opening of this discussion, we have witnessed the efforts of certain delegations to avoid replying by a categorical yes or no to these questions, and the efforts of other delegations to eulogize the "civilizing mission", the "generosity" and the "magnanimity" of the colonial oppressors.

54. The most authoritative representatives of the peoples who have regained their independence as a result of the collapse of the former colonial empires have already given caustic but dignified replies to the apologists for slavery and colonial exploitation. It is not gratitude towards the former colonialist rulers that they have expressed from this rostrum, but scorn and condemnation of colonial oppression and exploitation.

55. I have only a few remarks to add to what has already been said. We must make no mistake about the motives of colonialism, the reasons for its collapse and the conditions which must be established if it is not to recur in a new form.

56. As regards the "generosity" and the "civilizing mission" of colonialism, I think that Africa—and, at this session of the United Nations, is this not the year of Africa?—is the continent which, better than any other part of the world, reveals the true value of the "generosity" and the "civilizing mission" of the colonialists. From whatever angle we consider the matter and whatever our standard of comparison, Africa is the most backward region of the world with respect to per caput national income, level of industrial development, education, public health and medical assistance. Is this backwardness due to a lack of natural resources, particular climatic conditions, or the inability of its peoples to develop the natural resources of their countries? Certainly not. Africa has the bulk of the capitalist world's reserves of gold, diamonds, uranium, chromium, stibnite and phosphorites, with 60 per cent of its manganese, 48 per cent of its copper, 47 per cent of its bauxite, 40 per cent of its hydro-electric resources, etc. The recent discoveries of petroleum and natural gas in the Sahara are opening new development prospects for Africa and prove that the full extent of its natural resources has still to be explored. In addition, there are the very rich and varied agricultural crops of Africa which, while they may not provide the world with its daily bread, do add a certain spice to it in the form of delicious fruits, dishes and drinks. It is not the natural conditions or the incapacity of the population which have prevented the development of the African soil and sub-soil for the welfare of the peoples of Africa. It is the seizure of these resources and the exploitation of the African peoples by foreign monopolies which are the cause of the poverty and sufferings of the African peoples.

57. It is with African labour, the cheapest in the world, and under African conditions that the Western monopolies are making record profits, recovering their capital investments in only three or four years, or even sooner. The current profits of the Rhodesian Selection Trust group, controlled by the New York Company, American Metal, amount to double the wages of the 39,000 miners which this group employs. The Anglo-American group, with its Chairman Harry Oppenheimer, whose empire extends from Lake Victoria to the Cape, last year made profits which alone amount to three and a half times the total sum which the United States Government considers necessary for the programme of economic development in Africa. This shows very clearly where the material means to cure Africa of the after-effects of colonialism should be sought.

58. As a further example to add to those already given by other speakers, I shall quote the following lines published in the May 1960 issue of the magazine Fortune. Speaking of the Western Deep Levels gold mine, in the Transvaal, the author of an article in defence of the millionaire Harry Oppenheimer and the Anglo-American group wrote:

"For seven and a half hours a day, since drilling first started in 1945, native miners have been digging out the shafts of the new mine in this watery hell amidst the deafening roar of pneumatic drills..."

59. By 1964 they will be down to the deep reefs at 10,000 feet. Then Western Deep Levels of the Transvaal will be the richest gold mine in the world. In its expected lifetime it will produce more than $2,200 million worth of gold at today's prices. When the mine is finally in operation, Anglo-American will have spent more than $84 million—mark the difference!—under the ground and also above it for the plants to turn ore into ingots, for the construction of compounds for native workers—note this well!—and for modern housing for white employees. How kind, how magnanimous and generous! No usurers, however hard-hearted, could fail to be enraptured by such remunerative "generosity".

60. As other speakers before me have shown, it is in fact not a question of generosity or of a civilizing mission, but simply one of plunder and exploitation carried to extremes.

61. If the colonialist Powers are now forced to seek new methods and tactics to ensure the continued flow of profits from the colonial countries, this is due to the pressure of the powerful movement for liberation and national independence among the colonial peoples. The colonialists are obliged, by the force of events, to recognize that when they obstinately cling to extreme forms of colonial oppression—as is the case in Algeria, Kenya and Rhodesia—they risk losing everything.

62. This was frankly admitted by the American ideologists of neo-colonialism, Strausz-Hupé and Hazard, who wrote in their book The Idea of Colonialism: "...the right course for the West is not to retreat or 'get out', but to find acceptable solutions in order to stay"^{1/}—in the colonies, it is understood.

63. When the colonialist Powers claim that a particular territory is not yet ready for self-government, it can be stated, without fear of contradiction, that it is precisely the question of the "succession" that they have failed to solve. This excuse for delaying the granting of freedom and independence to the colonial peoples has been made several times during this debate. But those who wish to use this excuse to involve the solution to the colonial problem in a vicious circle have avoided saying who has prevented and is still preventing the colonial peoples from preparing themselves for self-government.

64. To admit that after decades—and in some cases centuries—of the "civilizing mission" of the colonialist countries, the peoples concerned are not yet ready to govern themselves, is tantamount to admitting not only the failure of the colonialist "civilizing mission", but also the falsity of any claims based upon it.

65. Dr. Banda, the leader of the national liberation movement in Nyasaland, rightly pointed out that to make the granting of independence contingent upon the degree of preparation of the indigenous inhabitants was equivalent "to asking tennis players first to take part in the Wimbledon Tournament and then to learn to hold a racket".

66. It is the struggle against oppression and colonial exploitation which has been and still is the hard training ground for the "cadres" through which the colonial peoples would be able to govern themselves. This struggle is going on wherever colonies still exist. This training ground has produced remarkable politicians, who have not only proved to be skilled leaders of their peoples but have also gained considerable international authority, such as Nehru, Sukarno, Nkrumah, Sékou Touré, Ferhat Abbas and many others. It is in the prisons, in the concentration camps or in exile that the "cadres" through which the colonial peoples will be able to govern themselves must be sought. It is in the colonialist prisons that are to be found leaders of the vast national liberation movements, such as Kenyatta in Kenya, Rukeba in Ruanda, Mohammed Ben Bella and other leaders of the Algerian people's struggle for national liberation and, according to the latest news, Lumumba in the Congo.

67. Without ignoring past or present difficulties, it is clear that the immediate granting of independence to the colonial peoples is the surest and most rapid means of maturing and training "cadres" in all fields. The example of the States which have become truly independent is most edifying in this regard.

68. My delegation would like to draw the Assembly's attention to the importance of abolishing all forms of colonial domination, which includes the restoring to their legitimate owners of the possessions and leased areas held by the colonial Powers in the territory of other States. In this connexion, it must be pointed out, in the first place, that possessions and leased areas of this kind are used mainly for military purposes and represent a particularly dangerous form of the colonial régime which it is absolutely essential to eradicate.

69. The existence of possessions and leased areas not only prevents States from exercising their sovereignty over the whole of the national territory, but, in addition, is always accompanied by brutal intervention in the domestic affairs of the States in whose territory the possessions and leased areas are situated on the part of the colonial Powers which hold them.

70. Moreover, since these possessions and leased areas, which are scattered throughout Asia, Africa, Latin America and even Europe, are used almost exclusively as sites for military, naval and air bases or for rocket launching grounds, it is easy to see what a threat to international peace and security this form of colonial domination represents.

^{1/} Robert Strausz-Hupé and Harry W. Hazard, The Idea of Colonialism (New York, Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1958), pp. 42-43.

71. The most authoritative leaders of the peoples of Africa and Asia have drawn attention to the danger represented by the maintenance and organization of new foreign military bases in Africa and Asia. They rightly concluded, in the course of the general debate, that "as long as a single square yard of African and Asian land is still under foreign domination, the world will know no peace". This is particularly understandable as the network of military bases encircling the globe is controlled by the military alliances of the colonialist countries; this explains the anxiety of so many peoples still subjected to colonial slavery, and of those which have recently regained their independence. These peoples fully realize that the military bases belonging to the United States and its allies are not only directed against the socialist countries, but are also designed to maintain or impose colonial domination in one form or another.

72. Very often, the smaller colonialist countries which are members of NATO use the American military bases installed in different territories of their colonial empire in shameful transactions aimed at obtaining aid and assistance from the United States and the other colonialist NATO Powers to suppress the struggle for liberation of the oppressed peoples. Everyone will undoubtedly remember that the Belgian colonialists made their future participation in NATO contingent on their receiving support from the United States—and the United Nations—and from other colonial Powers for the defence of Belgian colonial interests in the Congo. This support was granted, to the satisfaction of Belgian colonialist circles.

73. The New York Times of 25 October 1960 informed its American readers that a former Minister of Portugal, in an article which appeared at Lisbon, "reminded American leaders that Portugal had granted bases in the Azores to the United States" and said that the United States should manifest "comprehension and solidarity in the case of Portuguese territories in Africa".

74. Once they have gained their freedom and political independence, the former colonial peoples have to face the problem of the struggle for economic independence and the free possession and development of their resources for their own benefit.

75. The struggle for economic independence, which should give real meaning to and consolidate political independence, is as legitimate and inexorable a process as the movement for liberation and national independence among the colonial peoples.

76. If we bear in mind that almost all the fortunes of the Western world were largely built upon the exploitation of the colonial peoples, we can also understand the irritation of certain representatives who have spoken during this debate at the attempt which has been made by the representatives of the colonialist Powers, directly or through other persons, to divert the Assembly's attention from the problem which it is discussing and the roots of the evil which must be eliminated. My delegation thinks that the insinuations made by certain representatives deserve no other reply than the expression of our deepest scorn.

77. The United Nations is now called upon to decide in favour of the total and permanent abolition of the colonial régime. But the peoples which have gained their political independence or will, we hope, gain it in the near future, have and will continue to have to struggle desperately to rid themselves of the infiltration of foreign monopolies into their economies, which constitutes not only a relic of colonial domination, but also a formidable obstacle to overcoming the lag in economic and cultural development which these peoples have inherited from colonial slavery.

78. The colonialist Powers which succeeded, fifteen years ago, in preventing the words "colony", "colonial" and "colonialism" from appearing in Chapter XI of the Charter, have been unable to prevent the historic destiny of colonialism from being now almost entirely fulfilled. They are no longer able to prevent the last traces of colonialism from being erased.

79. The abolition of colonialism, on which the United Nations must reach a decision, represents the climax of a historical process. This climax can no longer be postponed, whatever decision is taken by the General Assembly. But it could be expedited and the abolition of colonialism could be completed if the General Assembly would unequivocally condemn all forms and manifestations of colonial domination, without exception.

80. Mr. TOURE Ismaël (Guinea) (translated from French): Until 1950, the great majority of the people of Africa, colonialism's favourite continent, lived under foreign domination. Only three States—the Egyptian Province of the United Arab Republic, Liberia and Ethiopia—enjoyed national independence. In other words, ten years ago, the free population of the African continent amounted to only 45 million persons spread over a total area of 2.3 million square kilometres. During the eight-year period from 1950 to 1958, the liberation movement, which began after the last world war, brought about the liberation of 37 million people and 5,250,000 square kilometres. For the statistician, this already reflected considerable progress, because this first thrust towards independence meant an increase of more than 100 per cent in terms of the geographical area of the territories liberated and of more than 80 per cent in terms of the number of people liberated. As we know, this trend has taken a sharp upturn during the year 1960. Returning to our statistics, we note that, in all, 82 million people and 7.5 million square kilometres had passed from the colonial system to sovereignty by 31 December 1958. In 1960 alone, seventeen African States have either regained or are about to regain their independence, a total of more than 85 million people and 12 million square kilometres. In other words, these figures during a single year show an increase of over 100 per cent in terms of numbers of people and 150 per cent in terms of total area.

81. Thus, the year 1960 truly deserves the name "Year of Africa". The liberation movement has grown by geometric progression. The very logic of this progression makes us think that the year 1961 will be the terminal year of the colonial era in Africa, because only the last third of this continent remains to be liberated, though this still means that more than 60 million people and 9.5 million square kilometres remain under foreign domination. With the accession of these 60 million men and women to national independence, the political aspect of the phenomenon of colonialism can be considered as virtually a thing of the past.

82. The end of the colonial system does not, however, imply the end of the effects of the system. The main characteristic of colonialism—under-development—cannot be eliminated overnight; it will take time, and great effort. And the reason why it is important to put an immediate end to all systems of colonization is precisely so as to speed up the struggle against the aftermath of foreign domination. For a great many years still, the African continent, even after it has completely freed itself from servitude, will have to continue to devote its energies to the development of its economic, social and cultural institutions. Like Asia, Africa has now become aware of the absolute necessity of ridding itself of the colonial system, which has shown itself to be utterly bankrupt in all respects. It is, of course, true that no one actually defends the colonial system, but there are some who wish to delay its demise on the pretext that the colonial peoples must be trained for independence. That is not a very weighty argument nor does it take any account either of the past history of the colonial peoples or of the real problems they must solve in order to build a future for themselves. To those who postulate the need for a period of so-called preparation for independence, it is always a valid reply that that very fact constitutes an additional damning indictment of colonialism. In reality, it has never been any part of the purpose of colonialism to fulfil any mission of civilization whatever or to carry through any endeavour to educate the colonial peoples for the exercise of their sovereignty. Hence, if, in its declining days, colonialism makes a feverish attempt to teach the colonial peoples how to govern themselves, it thereby acknowledges its own failure, because it must not be forgotten that at the time of their colonization, these peoples have in all instances been found eminently capable of governing themselves through their own national institutions, which had sometimes reached an advanced stage of development. These peoples never called in the colonizers, and in some cases they had attained a degree of civilization which was infinitely higher than that of their conquerors. There can be no doubt that colonialism has always been based exclusively on the interests of the colonizers. In the fifteenth century, the main incentive was the search for such products as spices, aromatic drugs, perfumes, sugar, camphor, opium, gums and resins, etc., of which Europe had need and which had at all costs to be sought in other continents.

83. Little by little, the search for gold was added to speculation in exotic spices. In the seventeenth century, the merchant bankers, who allied themselves with the sovereign against the all-powerful feudal lords, began to appear in Europe. At that moment, the era of colonial adventures dawned. The terms civilizing mission, genius, or humanism of any type are out of place here. Thus, it would be altogether ironical to describe that bygone age as an era of so-called builders of empires; the term merely disguises exploiters of whole peoples, even of whole continents. The illustrious Christopher Columbus wrote on 14 October 1492:

"There must be many things growing here which I do not know about, but I cannot let myself be distracted from my purpose, which is to find gold by exploring the islands. If I have the time, I shall ransack the whole island until I find the king and discover the extent of his wealth in gold."

Believing that he had found Japan, he wrote:

"When I see what reserves of gold and spices are to be found here, I shall consider what is the best thing to do."

84. The search for gold very quickly outstripped the search for spices and other exotic curiosities. Colonization brought about the establishment of great colonial companies which engaged in a real scramble for treasure. In an article entitled "The Days of Don Quixote" in the January 1956 issue of the magazine Europe, Pierre Vilar wrote:

"The occupation of land, the subjection of men, the pillaging of treasuries do not constitute any kind of preparation for investment, in the capitalist meaning of the term. A nascent bourgeoisie could do this. And from about 1480 to 1550 the Spanish bourgeoisie did exactly that. Only, because of its position astride the silver trade, it first experimented with capitalism at ports and fairs. Much was spent, imported, or loaned out at interest, but little was produced. Prices and salaries soared. Parasitism developed and enterprise declined, spelling future destitution."

85. As a result of this threat, between the years 1870 and 1890 the world was divided up with a view to the more wholesale and more efficient exploitation of the subjugated peoples and their wealth. Each colonial Power set up its own empire and its own zone of influence. We shall not dwell upon colonialist methods, whether peaceful or brutal and ranging from cunning to the most bloody repression, for they are already well known.

"The design of these colonies", Montesquieu wrote in his Esprit des lois, "is to trade on more advantageous conditions than could otherwise be done with neighbouring people to whom all advantages are reciprocal. It has been established that the metropolis or mother country alone may trade in the colonies, and that for a very good reason; because the design of the settlement is the extension of commerce, not the foundation of a city or a new empire."

86. It is known that the great country of China, the home of a civilization several thousand years old, was not spared this rush towards the virgin territories. In this feverish race, the idea of "fortune" predominated over the idea of "civilization", which was only a pretext, and the great Powers, no doubt because they were conscience-stricken, spoke of what they called their "civilizing mission".

87. Jules Ferry, the father of the French colonial empire, said in the Chamber of Deputies on 30 November 1883:

"Thus from all sides we see the pull exerted by interest or greed directed towards what was the dream of all and the desire of each: China, that immense treasure of the Pacific; China, the ancient and marvellous; China, the focus of all schemes and hopes, with its immense market of 400 to 500 million consumers, its subsoil rich in coal deposits extending over an area of more than 700,000 square kilometres, its inexhaustible ore deposits, its immense provinces, crying out for industrial equipment, railroads, and metal supplies. And the European rivals vied with one another to reach this Eldorado first and to carve out their portion, their zone of influence, their privileged domain ..."

"... it was Germany which set things in motion by deciding, somewhat belatedly, that it also wanted to become a colonial nation. But greed forced Germany to make up for lost time. It coveted one of the best morsels of China, Shantung, with its 30 million people and its immense natural wealth. Using as a pretext the convenient killing of two German missionaries, Germany dispatched a squadron, seized Shantung, and gave the signal for the scramble for spoils. Russia hurried in, extended the Trans-Siberian Railway and obtained the lease of Liaotung, which she had forced the Japanese to return. England claimed Weihaiwei, and France, wishing to balance her holdings, occupied Kwangchow, in the vicinity of Indo-China."

88. Some people naively believe that the history of the peoples who have been victims of colonialism began with colonial penetration. This is a serious error which, in the majority of cases, results from the efforts of the colonial system of education to drop the veil completely on the past and the history of those peoples and to instil in them a dependency complex. In this way, the official history of Africa has transformed the foreign conquerors into so-called apostles of civilization.

89. On the other hand, the greatest of the African heroes, who opposed foreign domination and brought the sense of liberty and dignity of our peoples to its highest point, have been disparagingly depicted in the colonial manuals as common bandits or as ambitious and blood-thirsty upstarts.

90. This systematic distortion has been fostered by the lack of written data on the history of the African continent. Bad faith has gone to such lengths that attempts have even been made to convince some Africans that their ancestors were blue-eyed, flax-haired Gauls. This was the best way of providing a semblance of justification for the so-called civilizing mission of the colonial Powers. It had to be shown somehow that at the time of the colonial conquest, Africa was inhabited by barbaric tribes who were incapable of governing themselves. But in the history of Africa as it actually was, several large and well-organized empires such as the Mali Empire of the fourteenth century, had attained a degree of culture and civilization that Europe during the same age might well envy. When Ibn Batuta, a geographer entrusted with a mission for the Sultan of Fez, visited the Mali Empire in 1352, it impressed him as a rich and happy land. Indeed, during the reign of Mansa Suleiman, the Empire of Mali covered all the part of the African continent which today corresponds roughly to West Africa. Nor was the reign of Mansa Suleiman the most brilliant in the history of the Mali Empire. However, according to the account Ibn Batuta gave of his journey, Mansa Suleiman, who reigned as sovereign over Mali from 1336 to 1359, was a great patron of education and culture. He gathered around him a body of men of law and maintained very close diplomatic relations with the sovereigns of the North. Like his brother Mansa Moussa, known as the King of the Pilgrimage, he journeyed to Mecca in 1351. On his return, he built the famous Camanbolon hut, where he deposited the holy books he had brought back with him. Clearly everything that we know about the Mali Empire reveals a State organization that was both democratic and strong and a civilization which bore no resemblance to the usual picture in the manuals on Africa, showing a band of hideous-looking Negroes dancing a weird dance around a wood fire.

91. In the Geographical Description of Spain and Africa another Arab author states that a stable civilization was already flourishing in the Sudan in the eleventh century. At the time when the Empire of Ghana had reached its peak, alchemy, a science composed of an equal proportion of naiveté and superstition, was rampant in Europe.

92. The Mali Empire reached its peak in the fourteenth century under the famous Kankan Moussa, who reigned from 1307 to 1332. Arab writers are unstinting in their praise of Kankan Moussa, a pious emperor who founded the compulsory Koranic School for the children of the capital. His pilgrimage to Mecca in 1324 was of unparalleled importance and magnificence. According to Ibn Khaldun there were no less than 80,000 men in the train of the sovereign El Hajj Mansa Moussa. Tradition, in the form of chanted poetry, has recorded the names of the principal personages in the sovereign's retinue. To mention only a few: Tungku Magnuma, Tungku Manian, the two holy men Kan Touré and Kan Cissé, Sirimanban, Dalamina Mamadou Kouyaté. The Tarikh el-Fettach described the scene of Mansa Moussa's wife's bath in the middle of the desert. There is another, and no less important, aspect of this pilgrimage—it is possible to date the beginning of the so-called Sudanese style of architecture at about 1325. It is still found in Africa, particularly in the present Republic of Mali, and it originated with Ibrahim Es-Sahili, a native of Granada brought back by Kankan Moussa.

93. Ibn Khaldun relates:

"Sultan Merinide Abou Hassein maintained friendly relations with the Sultan of Mali and the two monarchs exchanged gifts through their grand viziers. The Sultan of the Maghreb even had a selection of the finest products of his kingdom made and entrusted Ali Ibn Ghanem, the Emir of the Makils, with the task of bringing this truly royal gift to the Sultan of the Blacks."

94. To give some idea of the strength of Kankan Moussa's army, we may point out that according to Al Omari he had 100,000 foot-soldiers and 10,000 cavalry. Under the influence of Islam, Mali saw the flowering of such great cultural centres as Timbuktu, Kéné, Gao, Oualata and Niani. Several Imams of Mali studied in the cities of North Africa, the most eminent of whom was the jurist of Timbuktu, Kateb Moussa, who studied at Fez. Even Maghrebians did not consider it beneath them to attend the universities on the banks of the Niger. The Tarikh es-Soudan contains the following anecdote:

"Abderhaman et-Temini, who had come from Hedjaz with Mansa Moussa, realized in Timbuktu that he was dealing with eminent jurists. He returned to Fez to complete his education and then came back to hold his own among the scholars of Timbuktu."

95. It was also under the reign of Kankan Moussa that trade between the Sudan and the Mediterranean countries appears to have reached its peak, fostered by the peace then prevailing: gold and salt were the main commodities. More extensive research has made it possible to determine the institutions of this great African empire of the fourteenth century. Life at the court of Mali was regulated by very elaborate protocol. The monarch lived withdrawn in his palaces. According to Ibn Batuta he held two types of audience: one under the famous cupola built by the architect Es-

Saheli, the other in the open air on a dais or "bembé" reserved for the Emperor alone. During the audience under the cupola the Emperor heard complaints and grievances and the reports of the provincial governors or "Farma" and the military chiefs or "Fari". Throughout the audience the lieutenant or "Kanfari" stood by the Sovereign's side. During the open-air audiences, however, the Emperor was seated. Ibn Batuta notes that the dais was covered with silken cloth and strewn with cushions; above was a parasol resembling a silken dome, topped by a golden bird as large as a hawk. It was here that the Emperor received ambassadors and sometimes watched great ceremonial processions.

96. The government consisted chiefly of high dignitaries, jurists and other officials. The principal posts, five in number, were most often entrusted to close relatives of the Emperor. The "Babili Farma" was Minister of Agriculture; the "Waneï Farma" was Minister of Lands; the "Sao Farma" was in charge of forests; the "Khalissi Farma" was Minister of Finance. Lastly, the "Hari Farma" was Minister of Waters, responsible for fisheries and for navigation on the Niger.

97. This brief outline gives some idea of the mighty empire of Mali which began as a modest kingdom, a vassal of Ghana and later of Soso, entered on its period of greatness with Sunjata Keita in 1230 and ultimately extended eastwards of the Niger. It is clear that by the Middle Ages Black Africa had already, several centuries before the colonial penetration, attained a high degree of development and culture.

98. From the fourteenth to the sixteenth centuries, after the decay of the Mali Empire, the Songhai Empire of Gao was destined to achieve particular brilliance, reaching its zenith under Askia Mohamed, who reigned from 1492 to 1527. Askia Mohamed founded the system of municipalities; he also made a pilgrimage to Mecca. On that important journey he was escorted by 500 horsemen and 1,000 foot-soldiers. He carried with him 300,000 pieces of gold from the treasury of his predecessor, the Emperor Sonni Ali Ber. He established an élite guard limited to a small number of professional soldiers, well equipped and trained. A great military leader himself, Askia Mohamed is considered in Sudanese history as an enlightened administrator and a great organizer and, as such, deserves a special place among African sovereigns.

99. The civilizations which were founded and developed mainly on the banks of the Nile, the Niger and the Congo were abruptly confronted with the phenomenon of colonialism, which triumphed by force and treachery alone. Closer to our own times, genuine heroes, such as El Hajj Umar, Samory, Behanzin and many others, would never bow to subjection and fought to the end against all foreign domination. In 1895, the Moro Naba of Ouagadougou made the following celebrated declaration to Captain Destenaves, who had been sent to conclude a treaty with him:

"I think my country is fine as it is. I have no need of them"—meaning the conquerors, of course. "I know what I need and what I want. I have my traders, so count yourself lucky that I do not have your head cut off. Go, then, and never come back."

100. Today once more, the whole of Africa is calling with one voice for the immediate ending of the colonial system. My delegation, one of the sponsors of draft resolution A/L.323 and Add.1-5 submitted by forty-two States of Africa and Asia, wishes to congratulate the delegation of the Soviet Union to whose initiative we owe this debate in the plenary Assembly. If the declaration proposed by that delegation [A/4502 and Corr.1] is put to the vote my delegation will support it whole-heartedly.

101. On the other hand, we shall be unable to support the draft resolution submitted by Honduras [A/L.324], for the very simple reason that it provides no valid answer to the fundamental question of the immediate liberation of the colonial peoples.

102. Law and morality, and the development of fraternal human relations between the peoples of Africa and other nations demand that an answer be given that will, without evasion or hesitation, give the colonial peoples the justice, dignity and equality which are their right. It is not isolation that we want, because, after all, Africa has never been isolated except during the colonial era. Then each territory was isolated from the other and in each the social classes were isolated and opposed to each other.

103. The empires of the different colonizers, even when adjoining or inter-penetrating, were isolated from each other. To put it more concretely, Conakry was closer to Paris than to Freetown, Monrovia or Tunis. To get to Accra from Dakar one had first to go to Paris. To get to Brazzaville, whatever the point of departure in West Africa, the shortest route is still via London or Paris. This isolation is absurd and the peoples of Africa will no longer tolerate it. We want sound and useful relationships to be established among the various African States and their peoples, and between the African continent and all the other continents. For this to be possible, the ancient shackles of colonialism must be broken. The only positive step to be taken for the future is to put an end to this absurdity which history condemns.

104. Africa offers the hand of friendship but demands that the last fetters of foreign domination be broken. There is no hatred on our part in spite of all that we have suffered in the past. We wish only to turn the page and face the future. In calling for an end to the colonial system, we are sure we shall be giving freedom not only to the African people and other colonial peoples, but also to the peoples of the metropolitan countries in whose name the domination and exploitation of the colonies are carried on. Injustice, brutality and plundering in the colonies have always gravely impaired freedom, and even more surely, morality, in the metropolitan countries themselves.

105. On 28 September 1958 my country graduated unexpectedly and, one might say, instantaneously from the status of a colony to that of a sovereign State, without any preparation. In Guinea, independence did not become a political watchword until only a few weeks before General de Gaulle's historic referendum. Naturally the leaders of the young Republic of Guinea have had to face many important problems. It is fitting, too, to stress the wholly peaceful character of our accession to independence, without the shedding of a drop of blood, without a shot being fired and in the most complete national unity, in spite of the provocations of the colonial Power.

106. Those who then predicted disorders and disturbances witnessed how, in the most complete calm, the Guinean authorities took over all the services which had previously been run by French officials—general and regional administrative officers, judges, army officers, engineers and technicians, and the like. There was no interruption in any of those services, in spite of the deliberate haste with which the French Government withdrew its personnel.

107. Thus, in proclaiming the independence of all territories still under foreign domination, we are convinced that they will find national personnel with sufficient awareness of their capacity and their responsibilities to cope with the immense tasks that confront us, as under-developed countries, in Africa. We do not exclude technical assistance, provided that it is inspired by a spirit that is entirely new and different from the colonial spirit.

108. We know that the attainment of independence will not solve the problem of under-development, but nothing can justify the maintenance of a system that is now an anachronism. Independence is necessary and indispensable but it is not by any means an end in itself. Political independence, so long as it is not supplemented and guaranteed by economic independence, cannot be the goal.

109. On the other hand it would be quite futile to try to ensure any economic development in conditions of non-independence. Neither the psychological conditions nor the material means required to promote a valid economic policy can exist until the former colonial territories exercise full and complete sovereignty.

110. Not only are the colonized peoples incapable of development so long as they remain under foreign domination, but they cannot take any effective part in the efforts that all peoples are making for the maintenance and strengthening of peace. A people that is deprived of freedom and is unable to express itself directly through its own free institutions has no way of contributing to the struggle for the establishment of a world of equality and peace.

111. Thus, the general and immediate proclamation of the independence of the still dependent peoples will strengthen the ranks of the peoples and nations devoted to peace.

112. For Africa, the problem of independence, while still the most urgent, is already giving way to another and much more difficult problem: that of the struggle against neo-colonialism. How will the African States succeed in consolidating their independence while strengthening their unity?

113. This question is today becoming more important than political independence itself. It may be that colonialism will recognize the impossibility of surviving without changing its form, while remaining determined to safeguard its economic interests and privileges. The actual stand taken by the new nations, anxious to maintain national cohesion and poorly equipped to cope with the many problems created by the rapid evolution of the populations for which they are responsible, will determine whether the outcome is to be a new form of subjugation or a prosperous and stable future.

114. The danger of controlled independence is already a reality, but it is not by delaying the liberation of the still colonized territories that this new scourge will be avoided. It is plain that unity of action alone will enable the new States to avoid the temptation to barter away part of their sovereignty to satisfy the material needs of the moment. It is hard to conceive that any State, large or small, belonging to the category of under-developed countries could make progress and settle its problems at the expense of the others. For Africa, which has known the slave-trade and colonization, a sham independence would be a real catastrophe, an historic curse.

115. In the end the former masters would be the only ones to benefit from division and disagreements among their former colonies. While it is true that assistance and co-operation are indispensable for the progress of the under-developed countries, the gap separating them from the technically advanced countries can only be bridged if loyal co-operation is established within the framework of national independence for all countries, for the task of transforming and industrializing the economic structures of the backward countries.

116. The quality of the contribution by the new States, which has a direct bearing on the question of world peace, will depend not on their governments but on the degree of freedom enjoyed by their peoples and on the opportunities afforded them of devoting their efforts to the general welfare.

117. The future of a former colony can no longer be considered in isolation from that of its neighbours. It would be equally futile to seek a world balance restricted to the advanced and industrialized nations. Henceforth, it is mankind's lot to agree unanimously to deign an indivisible peace and universal happiness. Accordingly it can be said that the question of the liberation of the colonial peoples is directly linked to the crucial question of general and complete disarmament.

118. I should like to conclude this presentation of the views of the delegation of the Republic of Guinea with the following words from President Sékou Touré's message of 30 November 1960:

"The choice before the conscience of your Assembly today is between positive world construction and world division, between unanimous solidarity and domination and exploitation, between the liberation of man and social slavery...".

119. Confident of the outcome of this debate we believe, with President Sékou Touré, that it is for this session to mark in history the opening of a new and decisive era in universal evolution, and to lay the foundation-stone of a world based on loyal co-operation, human solidarity, justice and universal peace.

The meeting rose at 12.55 p.m.

1. Mr. BUDO (Albania) (translated from French): On the initiative of the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Nations has before it a grave problem with vast international ramifications: the problem of the final and complete eradication of that shameful survival of another era known as colonialism. At a time when human society has taken enormous strides on the road to progress and well-being and when man's genius knows no bounds in harnessing the forces of nature to ensure to all mankind a happy life in prosperity and dignity, the existence on our planet of millions of human beings who still endure the colonialist yoke, in whatever form, not only is an intolerable anachronism unworthy of our society but is at the same time the gravest possible crime against humanity and human civilization and one which directly affects the question of world peace. It is high time to put an end to it altogether, once and for all.

2. The attainment of national independence and freedom by the still subject peoples is inevitable. This is the natural evolution of human history and there is no force in the world powerful enough to stop the tremendous tide of this movement of national liberation which over the last few years has gathered volume at an unprecedentedly rapid rate.

3. Now, however, the world turns to the United Nations to ask it, in accordance with the fundamental purposes and principles of the Charter, to make its important contribution to the immediate abolition of the colonial slavery which has become intolerable and to do this before the peoples, relying only on themselves, achieve their liberation solely through their own efforts. Upon the response which the United Nations will be able to give to this categorical imperative of our century—which is not only the urgent demand of the subjugated peoples but also the ardent wish of mankind as a whole—will depend in large measure the very future of our Organization.

4. Indeed, is it not the human being who is the final end of our Organization? Was it not in order to ensure to peoples and to nations, whether great or small, the full enjoyment of their fundamental rights, self-determination, equal rights, freedom, independence and well-being that the United Nations was established?

5. The problem of the colonial enslavement of peoples is nothing new. It has existed for centuries, and even goes as far back as the first aggressive wars waged by the strong to enslave the weak and strip them of their wealth. It is the very essence of the history of all the wars which the imperialists have waged to subjugate the peoples of different continents by force, fire and the sword in order to secure for themselves the profits to be obtained by exploiting those peoples and their wealth. In the final analysis all the wars of the past century had the same causes: the inordinate desire of the imperialist Powers to seize control of world markets, the sources of raw materials and areas of investment opportunity and, to that end, to secure colonies and spheres of influence and to divide up and redistribute the world's wealth. The two world wars which have taken place in this century had their origin in the greed of these same Powers for a further division of the world and its wealth, for an imperialist world hegemony and for the selfish and exclusive exploitation of the wealth of this terrestrial globe. The same causes have been at the root of the wars and armed conflicts which have taken place since the end of the Second World War. The cause of these wars has been the imperialists' determination to prevent people from achieving their national liberation and the young States from developing in freedom and independence. This was true of the wars in Indo-China and Indonesia and of the armed aggression against Egypt; it was also true of the aggression and of the armed threats of the imperialist Powers, and primarily of the United States of America, in the countries of the Near and Middle East. The colonialist-imperialist wars are continuing at the present time and are everywhere causing the loss of countless lives and material goods. A case in point is Algeria, where the valiant Algerian people have won the admiration and sympathy of the world in their heroic struggle for national liberation and their six-year resistance to the most brutal kind of armed repression. This is also the case of the Congo, where we are witnessing the armed intervention of the Western Powers which are members of NATO, and in particular the United States and Belgium. Again, this is the case of Oman, where the valiant people of that country, despite the enemy's military superiority, are waging a selfless and unremitting struggle to free themselves of the British imperialist yoke. Lastly, this is the case of Cuba, where the United States imperialists shrink from nothing—neither bombings, nor murder, nor subversion nor demonstrations of force by the United States Navy—in their efforts to undermine the régime set up by the people and to protect, once again, the interests of the United States monopolies. In this connexion, it is pertinent to note that the United States Navy, which at one time appears off the Mediterranean ports of the Middle East, at another in the Straits of Taiwan and at another in the Caribbean Sea, in accordance with the requirements of the Pentagon's aggressive plans, has become the symbol of provocation, the threat of force and the aggravation of international tension.

6. The problem of the liberation of the peoples enslaved by colonialism thus touches upon the very essence of the question of peace and war, with which it is intimately linked. The eradication from our society of the last vestiges of this shameful rottenness, the colonial system, and the ending of exploitation by foreign monopolies would not only constitute the most elementary recognition of the inalienable right of the colonial peoples to the alleviation of their age-old sufferings, but would also create the necessary conditions for the full social, economic and cultural development of these peoples. Without the slightest doubt, this would serve to reduce international tension and to create propitious conditions for the solution of other international problems, chief among which is the unquestionably urgent problem of general and complete disarmament.

7. We feel called upon at this point to refer to disarmament because we think it essential always to remember that as long as the imperialist Powers have in their hands the means of oppressing other peoples, they will not give up the possibility of using them each time their selfish interests are affected, and thus it will be impossible to ensure a lasting world peace. There can be no doubt that the eradication of the colonial system will very substantially enhance the unremitting efforts of the peace-loving peoples and the peaceful countries to establish co-operative and good-neighbourly relations between all nations, large and small, on the basis of the sovereign equality of States, respect for the right of peoples to self-determination, and non-interference in the internal affairs of other States—all this in the mutual interest of States and in the interest of the international community as a whole. This would be in full conformity with the purposes and principles set forth in the Charter of our Organization.

8. The colonial peoples have always fought for their national liberation. After the great Russian Revolution of October 1917, a new era dawned in the history of mankind. The lofty humanitarian principles of the October Revolution spread throughout the entire world and found an especially warm welcome on the part of the peoples suffering under colonialist-imperialist domination. After the Second World War, a number of countries broke the chains of colonial and national oppression. The great victory over fascism in the Second World War resulted in breaking the chains of imperialism in Central and Eastern Europe, where new Socialist countries came into being. The historic victory of the great Chinese people's revolution gave rise to the People's Republic of China, whose population amounts to some 700 million. These countries now constitute the world's Socialist system, which exerts a salutary influence on the course of world events and represents a factor of paramount importance for international peace and security.

9. During the same period, the struggle of the oppressed peoples enabled many countries of Asia and Africa to throw off the colonial yoke and achieve independence. During its most recent phase, the liberation movement has gained increasing momentum, and this year has seen the emergence of sixteen new independent States in Africa, so that 1960 has been aptly called "the Year of Africa". The new States, which are now Members of the United Nations, are taking an active part in international life. They have thus greatly enlarged the area of peace. The colonial system is consequently disintegrating, and its very foundations are cracking; a new era is opening up for mankind. The face of Africa and Asia has been completely transformed, and the movement of national liberation and independence is growing in Latin America. Each day the struggle of the peoples still subject to the colonial yoke in Africa, Asia and Latin America is assuming larger dimensions. These peoples, numbering some 100 million human beings, will, without the slightest doubt, attain their independence, but in the meantime they continue to suffer under colonialist-imperialist domination. The United Nations owes it to itself therefore, in accordance with the principles of its Charter, to take effective measures to put an end totally and for all time to this shameful blemish on our civilization.

10. The liberation of the colonial countries has never been attributable to the colonial Powers, despite what their best spokesmen try to make us believe. It has resulted from the sustained efforts of the enslaved peoples and of the support which they have always received from other peaceful States and peoples. The imperialists never of their own volition forfeit the fabulous profits which they derive from the most savage exploitation of other people. The world is well informed on that score. There is no need to seek very far afield for conclusive evidence of this. It is enough to recall here the recent events in the Congo, which show how the imperialists, even at the moment when a country attains independence, conspire to take back what they had been forced to yield.

11. The colonial peoples have languished for centuries under inhuman exploitation by the imperialists. Millions of men have suffered under it; millions have fallen as victims of repression or in the struggle they have waged to achieve a free and independent life. The time has surely come to put an end to this régime of obscurantism, terror and exploitation.

12. One quick glance at the situation now prevailing in the countries still subjected to the colonial system is enough to convince anyone of the urgency of the duty incumbent upon the United Nations to make every effort to bring about the immediate elimination of this shameful aberration in human society, in whatever form it may appear.

13. An examination of the United Kingdom's colonial policy in Africa during recent years gives us an idea of the state of slavery in which the subject peoples live, and shows that the United Kingdom imperialists have not hesitated to adopt the cruellest methods whenever the interests of their powerful financial oligarchy were threatened by a movement of national liberation on the part of the subject peoples.

14. Let us take, for instance, the case of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. In Northern Rhodesia the white settlers, who number only 70,000, hold more than half of the best lands, leaving to more than 2.5 million Africans the other half consisting of infertile lands. A scandalous form of discrimination between white settlers and indigenous inhabitants is also practised with regard to wages. African workers are employed on the hardest kinds of work and sometimes receive wages twenty to thirty times lower than those of the whites, as in the case of the 40,000 miners of Southern Rhodesia. The colonialists make fabulous profits from the systematic exploitation of the great riches of these territories and cheap labour. Northern Rhodesia, neighbouring on Katanga, is very rich in copper, and in 1959 accounted for 15 per cent of the world copper output. But who enjoys this wealth? Only the United Kingdom colonialists and their partners, while the indigenous inhabitants, for all their exhausting work, lead a life of poverty. To satisfy the need for cheap African labour, the most abominable laws have been enacted which enable the colonialists to apply in one form or another, racial discrimination, forced labour and the herding together of Africans in reservations where a system of unheard-of poverty and terror prevails and where men die by the hundreds. Yet the representatives of the colonial Powers come here to tell us of the benefits of the colonial system! The most elementary rights are trampled underfoot. To cite only one example, the number of Africans on the electoral rolls in Southern Rhodesia in 1938 was forty, and twenty years later, in 1958, that figure was not more than 550. This shows how much the colonialists care about emancipation and civilization with regard to the indigenous inhabitants!

15. The history of foreign domination in central Africa, as indeed in all colonies, is simply a long succession of cunning stratagems, hypocrisy, intrigues, repression and terror exercised by various colonialists.

16. In Kenya, a colony under United Kingdom domination where blood has been shed unceasingly, the struggle for national liberation is developing again after the ferocity with which the national movement was crushed by the United Kingdom colonialists a few years ago. According to the United Kingdom Press itself, more than 4,000 troops have recently been sent to Kenya in order to suppress any desire for freedom and to quell any national movement. During recent months 2,000 persons have been imprisoned; 800 persons have been in prison for fifteen years, and the head of the nationalist movement, Jomo Kenyatta, was after seven years of imprisonment again tried and deported.

17. Portugal, one of the oldest colonial Powers, does not admit that it has colonies, but only overseas provinces. Thus Angola, Mozambique and other Portuguese colonies in Africa and Asia, which are thousands of kilometres away from Portugal, are considered by the Portuguese colonialists to be nothing more than geographical extensions of the metropolitan territory. It is an undeniable fact that in the Portuguese colonies the colonialists employ the cruellest methods to stifle the national feeling of the indigenous population which, despite the most brutal colonial subjugation for many centuries, offers unceasing resistance to assimilation and extermination.

18. To get some idea of the situation in Angola, reference may be made to the booklet published by the American Committee on Africa entitled Angola:

Repression and Revolt in Portuguese Africa. I should like to quote this typical passage:

"While in decades past there may have been fewer visible signs of the color bar in Angola than in some of her neighboring territories, in recent years racial discrimination has grown. . . . Signs on the doors of some restaurants read, 'Right of admission is reserved'. All-white towns . . . have been built. In public service it is hard to find an African in a position higher than that of interpreter. . . . While the color bar is thus obvious in the larger coastal cities, it is even more prevalent in the interior."

19. Clear proof of popular dissatisfaction with the colonial authorities is given by the military preparations which the Portuguese are making in Angola in order to stifle resistance. Recently 2,000 Portuguese soldiers were sent to reinforce the 20,000 already there. These troops are equipped with Panhard type tanks, field guns and armoured transport cars. Barracks and military airfields are being built in haste, and naval vessels are patrolling the coasts and rivers. Angola is thus being transformed into a NATO base to serve the aggressive schemes of the imperialist Powers for dividing Africa and crushing any national liberation movement. Military circles in Portugal were evidently able to convince President Eisenhower when he visited Lisbon in May 1960 of the necessity to use armaments supplied to Portugal by the United States to crush national liberation movements of the African people. This, of course, is nothing new since United States arms have been used for years, under cover of NATO and other aggressive treaties, to crush national liberation movements in various African countries, as is being done in Algeria, the Congo and elsewhere.

20. All this goes to show how the imperialist and colonialist Powers defend their common cause of keeping the colonial peoples under their control and of mercilessly exploiting their wealth and the forced labour of the indigenous inhabitants. The imperialist Powers--beginning with the United Kingdom which is making efforts to appear more liberal, down to the most refractory one, the Union of South Africa, which is flouting all the resolutions adopted by the United Nations General Assembly--are all pursuing the same aims; they have no intention of renouncing their shameful privileges, and they devise all sorts of manoeuvres, intrigues and even crimes to prolong the life of the moribund colonial system. This has been evident even within our Organization, particularly with regard to the Congo question, on which the colonialist Powers have joined forces in order to defend colonial domination. The fact that we see the colonialist Powers drawing more closely together at the very time when colonialism is in its death throes only serves to show their weakness.

21. Let us consider also the case of South West Africa. The Assembly has now been concerned with this question for fifteen years; dozens of resolutions have been adopted; commissions and committees have been set up; and numerous petitioners have been given a hearing in the Fourth Committee and have reported on the intolerable situation in which the indigenous population languishes. It is well known that in that unhappy country "apartheid" and racial discrimination are the rule. Men are treated like beasts of burden, and forced labour is common practice. The Government of the Union of South Africa has completely disregarded the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly, and the situation has deteriorated in South West Africa from year to year. It is to be noted that the Government of the Union of South Africa has been encouraged in this attitude by the other colonial Powers.

22. Through systematic and unceasing pillage of colonial territories in Africa, Asia and elsewhere, the monopolies in the various metropolitan countries have accumulated fabulous riches while leaving the subject peoples in a backward state of poverty and under-development that is in striking contrast to the wealth and development of the metropolitan countries.

23. It is understandable then that the imperialists are unwilling to loosen their hold on their colonial possessions and are using every possible means to avoid doing so. To prevent the liberation of the territories under their control the colonial Powers have indeed had recourse to every possible means, for in addition to murderous wars in which they have not hesitated to employ the most barbarous weapons, including napalm bombs, and in which millions of persons have perished, the imperialists have resorted to a wide range of obstacles and manoeuvres. One of the arguments which the colonialists have never ceased to repeat whenever there has been any question of liberating colonies is that colonial or dependent peoples do not yet possess the necessary maturity for independence and self-government, this idea having developed from the racist concept of the imperialists that peoples not belonging to the white race are inferior.

24. In an attempt to justify the policy of colonial domination and the continuance of that domination, the imperialists and their champions never tire of telling us of their famous "civilizing mission". They even have the audacity cynically to claim that nine-tenths of the Africans are illiterate, and that their lack of culture shows that these people are not ready to accede to independence and assume the control of their own affairs. This statement is made as though the imperialists themselves were not responsible for the situation. The world, however, is well aware that as long as the colonial system endures in a country, the doors to education and culture will be closed to the subject peoples, who, without freedom and independence, will never be able to make a start towards national development, progress and prosperity. The reactionary claims that Africans have no cultural tradition are refuted by history, which in fact teaches us that there was a time when Africa was more advanced than Asia and Europe. The fact that Africa has had its own culture is born out by the ancient history of Egypt as well as that of the Napata, Meroë and Aksum States, which were inhabited by the ancestors of the Ethiopians. A remarkable explanation of all these barefaced claims of the representatives of imperialism has been given by the Malagasy poet Rabemananjara, who said "The Negro became a savage on the day when the white man discovered how much profit could be derived from that state".

25. The many countries of Africa, Asia and other parts of the world which have acquired independence and are taking an active part in international life show how peoples which have become free and independent are able to direct and govern their countries and at the same time to become a very important element of world peace and stability. Countries like India, the United Arab Republic, Guinea and others are playing an active and positive part in the solution of international problems. We cannot adequately convey the joy that we feel when here in the United Nations we see the young African States taking the lead in the struggle for the defence of the legitimate rights of enslaved peoples and for the total and final abolition of their enslavement.

26. Haunted by the possibility of losing everything connected with their colonial system, the colonialists resort to fraud and, by labelling themselves benefactors and philanthropists, try to give the impression that colonialism has now ceased to be colonialism and no longer exists as such. At the same time they endeavour, as it has been aptly said, to shroud the corpse of the discredited colonial system and employ new methods and new approaches to ensure their hold over the economies of their former colonies or of the under-developed countries. The United States and West German imperialists are particularly active in that respect, even to the detriment of the traditional colonial Powers, which seem to have difficulty in adapting themselves to the new conditions.

27. Under the cover of economic aid to the under-developed countries and of association between the industrialized and the under-developed countries, the masters of the monopolies wish to ensure their economic supremacy in those countries. One of their objectives is to delay the industrial development of the under-developed countries so as to be able to dispose of their industrial products in the markets of those countries and to buy their raw materials there at prices which they impose.

28. In order to ensure an economic hold over newly independent and other under-developed countries, an effort is made to include them in organizations like the Common Market and OEEC, the purpose of which is to co-ordinate the economic policy of certain Western Powers so as to embrace under-developed countries which, according to their plans, are to be transformed into economically and politically dependent countries. This is the new phenomenon of collective colonialism, which is being revealed in the common struggle of the colonial and imperialist NATO countries against the national liberation movements of the peoples of Africa, Asia and Latin America. The military treaties of NATO and SEATO help the imperialist Powers to realize their colonial objectives and to gain a footing in other countries, particularly by the construction of military bases for piratical schemes of conquest and world supremacy, thus endangering peace and security, and in particular the peace and security of the countries in which such bases are situated.

29. It should be noted that in their efforts to safeguard their colonial possessions, the European imperialists enjoy the support and aid of the United States of America. The ruling circles in the United States are doing their best to play a double game. While trying to pose as friends of Africa, they are at the same time organizing collective aggression in the Congo and supplying the French Government with money and military equipment to continue the war in Algeria. Furthermore, the American monopolies cherish the hope of seizing the African inheritance which the colonialists of Western Europe are obliged to relinquish, and the same is true of other colonies previously held by Europeans. Along with the establishment of military, air and naval bases, the United States Government, through so-called advisers and missionaries, is setting up in the African countries a vast espionage network for the purpose, among others, of carrying out sabotage.

30. Africa, however, has completely changed and is today no longer what it was before the Second World War. The people of Africa are well aware of their rights and their interests, and they know where they stand; they can distinguish between their friends and their foes, whatever mask the United States of America may wear.

31. The people of Africa, Asia and Latin America are well aware of the methods by which the imperialists hope to carry out their colonial policy and of how really dangerous that policy is. That is why they are resolutely intensifying their struggle to throw off the colonial and imperialist yoke regardless of the form it may assume.

32. The Albanian people know from their own centuries-long experience what foreign domination means. They have always sympathized with and supported the struggle of peoples for independence.

33. This spirit of deep sympathy which the Albanian people feel for people under the colonial yoke and their whole-hearted support for those people in their heroic struggle for national liberation are the reasons why the delegation of the People's Republic of Albania firmly supports the declaration of the Soviet Union on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples [A/4502 and Corr.1].

34. The elimination from human society of colonialism in all its forms constitutes not only a recognition of the inalienable right of all people to live in sovereign freedom and equality, but also a prerequisite for their progress towards political, economic, cultural and social maturity.

35. The accession of all colonial peoples to a free and independent existence is an irresistible and irreversible process. The world is changing before our very eyes at an incredible speed. The shameful system of colonialism is drawing to an end and only deserves a place on the scrap-heap of history. The decisive factor in this process of change is, of course, the struggle of the colonial and dependent peoples, who have the sympathy and support of all those who believe in progress.

36. It is nevertheless the supreme duty of the United Nations, in conformity with the Charter, to do its utmost to ensure that this inevitable liberation is accomplished within the shortest possible time. The General Assembly should demand the immediate and final accession to complete independence and liberty of all countries under colonial domination and of all Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories.

37. The United Nations should demand and even take action to ensure that the imperialist Powers refrain from any form of interference with, and that they strictly respect, the sovereignty and independence of the newly independent States, and of those which will become independent after the adoption of the declaration now under discussion.

38. The United Nations cannot afford to remain indifferent before the spectacle of the poverty and suffering at present being endured by the colonial and dependent peoples.

39. No one can doubt that the radical and final elimination of colonialism would be of considerable importance for international economic co-operation on a basis of equality and mutual advantage. That would assist in the creation of the conditions necessary for normal international relations based on understanding and good-neighbourliness and would thus contribute directly and effectively to the relaxation of tension and the strengthening of international peace and security.

40. Hence the adoption by the General Assembly of the declaration submitted by the Soviet Union on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples would be a substantial contribution to the efforts of peace-loving countries for the improvement of international relations and the strengthening of universal peace.

41. Mr. DIOP (Senegal) (translated from French) In this debate we are watching the countries which want to hold on to their colonial possessions, come what may, at bay, facing the final attack of the world conscience; we are watching their last rearguard action and their last desperate struggles.

42. The colonial story is an old, old story, as old as the world itself. It is the eternal story of the exploitation of man by man by brute force. Homo homini lupus, as the ancients used to say.

43. Man was exploited by man in our African land by Europeans, first of all through the establishment of the slave-trade some centuries ago. Millions and millions of men were torn from their native land. They were transplanted to America and elsewhere, and were thus involved in a whole series of frightful miseries and sufferings. Out of the ten million men thus trasplanted, scarcely a million survived.

44. But, just as man's injustice to man is constant, so is the progress of the human conscience. A few centuries later, voices were raised in protest, voices which expressed the highest values of the human conscience. To give only a few examples, the first voice to be heard was that of the great thinkers of the French Revolution of 1789; and in the United States, it was the voice of a man like Abraham Lincoln, at the time of the War of Secession. These voices rang out condemning slavery, demanding its abolition; but their effect was not to be felt until more than a century later, about 1848. Even later than that, when most of the European nations had accepted the principle of the abolition of slavery, there were still some recalcitrants, some backward people, set in their ways, who continued the slave-trade as pirates. The most sincere European nations had to police the seas in order to enforce the abolition of slavery by other European States, and even by their own nationals.

45. Slavery was finally abolished, at last. But scarcely had it been abolished than the exploitation of man by man was reborn from the ashes of slavery under the guise of colonialism. There was no more transplanting: the exploiters went to Africa to do their dominating and exploiting on the spot.

46. This colonialism, which flourished also for more than two hundred and fifty years, was condemned year after year as the conscience of mankind steadily developed and also thanks to the gradual awakening of the colonized peoples who, little by little, became aware of their own dignity and their national feeling. These colonized peoples gradually abandoned the intellectual, cultural and artistic livery they had worn under colonialism and went back to the sources of their own individual and original genius to draw from them the strength they required to regain their individuality and also their sovereignty and independence. This is a movement of humanism and renewal that some have called "negritude".

47. It may be as well to state here also that this movement of renewal, humanism and liberation at all levels has never had any racial tinge, has never involved the rejection of any other culture or of any other civilization, of the benefits of any other culture or of any other civilization, whatever it might be, whether Graeco-Latin, American or Chinese.

48. At last, in the course of years, human progress triumphed over this second form of the exploitation of man by man, this neo-slavery called colonialism; and considerable progress has been achieved, particularly since the end of the last World War. Particularly in Africa, in less than fifteen years, we have witnessed liberation and the achievement of national independence by three-quarters of the dependent peoples that were once colonized.

49. However—as I emphasized just now—in spite of the abolition of slavery by declarations of principle and through laws enacted by the European countries, there were some recalcitrants, set in their ways, who continued to make slavery a prosperous concern. What happened with regard to slavery is now happening with regard to colonialism.

50. In the field of colonialism also, there are some backward people, some hardened cases, people set in their ways, who wish to maintain their positions in spite of everything and regardless of the trend of history. They will be swept away by the irreversible torrent of history; they will be swept away like straws.

51. But to await the ineluctable future is not enough for the United Nations. Here, at another focus of world conscience, we must take a positive position; we must start a new crusade and this time, in order to police, not the seas, but the continents and to ensure that colonialism and the exploitation of man by man shall cease.

52. That is why the delegation of Senegal has agreed to join in sponsoring a draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-5] calling for the end of colonialism in Africa and everywhere else, and for the dependent nations, in Africa and everywhere else, at last to become free, sovereign and independent.

Mr. Zorin (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), Vice-President, took the Chair.

53. Mr. PLIMSOLL (Australia): The large number of speeches that we have heard so far and the even larger number that are to come are some evidence of the interest, in the international community here in this Organization and among the peoples that we represent, in the carrying-out of the obligations that are laid down in the Charter towards Trust Territories and towards non-self-governing areas. The Covenant of the League of Nations represented a statement in a formal international document of a new principle, the principle of international accountability, for the administration by Powers over the indigenous inhabitants of the territories under their control; and this doctrine, this movement, was carried a step further at San Francisco in the Charter of the United Nations. There are very important chapters of the Charter, integral parts of the whole organization that became the United Nations, and in the drafting of those chapters and the working-out of the substance, Australia and New Zealand played a very large part. They were in the forefront of those Powers that were pressing for a clear recognition and acceptance of wider international responsibility and accountability than had existed before the war.

54. After the Charter came into effect, Australia proceeded to place under the International Trusteeship System the mandates which it had held under the League of Nations. Furthermore, although the Charter does not lay down as an obligation the submission of political information on Non-Self-Governing Territories the Australian Government has, from the very beginning, voluntarily submitted this information to the United Nations. We have, throughout, co-operated with the United Nations, we have explained our policies in the Trusteeship Council and in the Fourth Committee, and we have endeavoured in the last fifteen years to discharge our obligations under the Charter faithfully. So we do not come before this Organization now, or at any time, in a reluctant way. We come on each occasion to give an account of what we have voluntarily undertaken and, indeed, gladly undertaken.

55. Colonialism is, like all institutions, a human institution. It varies in different parts of the world; it varies with human beings; it can be bad; it may sometimes be bad. But, at its best, I submit, it has been and is continuing to be a necessary transitional phase, and many of the wrongs that have occurred under colonialism—and some of them have been outlined here in this debate—are really examples of man's inhumanity to man, which we find in so many international and so many human institutions.

56. I have felt when I have heard some of the problems that have been posed here and in the Fourth Committee that they are common problems that we are facing in all our countries—that they are part of our common drive for the betterment of mankind by the raising of standards of living throughout the world, for the observation of human rights and the fostering of human rights everywhere. Many of these problems are problems of humanity.

57. It seems to me that one essential point in considering this question is that we cannot think of all colonies as being exactly the same. They are different not only in their physical conditions, not only in the nature of the inhabitants, not only in the nature of the administering Powers: they are different in their historical background, and in so many other respects. Some of the countries that became colonies were old civilizations, old cultures, perhaps large political groupings. Some of them were not nations but, nevertheless, were aggregates of substantial social groups—perhaps large tribal structures of many, many thousands, even tens of thousands. And then in other cases the colonies consisted of groups, very small in number, disorganized, perhaps unrelated to one another, scattered, unconnected. And our approach to the problems of colonialism can, I think, be fruitful only when we recognize that there are different sorts of colonies, just as there are different sorts of administering Powers, different sorts of problems to be overcome and different sorts of ways of meeting them.

58. Nor is it true that in all cases colonialism has meant taking independence away from people who would otherwise today be living at the same standards of living as Western Europe. That may be true in some parts of the world, but in other parts of the world it obviously is not true. In some places, before the present administering Powers came, there were no national entities, there was internecine warfare and tribal fighting, there were no human rights, and there was slavery—because slavery is not just an institution that Europeans have practised on other peoples. Slavery is an age-old institution that we have to fight wherever it occurs and whatever the peoples which may be practising it.

59. We have heard in this debate, at various stages, fanciful phrases about the lash of the overseer, about the crimes of the colonialists. And when I heard them I thought that they might be true in some times of history and in some places in this world, but they are certainly not true of any territory that has been administered by Australia, and it is for Australia that I am speaking. I am not speaking for any other administering Power, but it might be useful, and perhaps even helpful, to this Assembly if I said something about eastern New Guinea, for which Australia is responsible.

60. Eastern New Guinea has long been isolated from the rest of the world. Its people had no contacts with other peoples for hundreds of years—probably for thousands of years. It was, therefore, different, for example, from the peoples of Africa who, at various stages over a long period of time, have had fruitful contact with other cultures in other parts of Africa, in parts of Asia and in various other parts of the world. New Guinea was a completely isolated series of communities cut off from cultural and other contacts. Even today it contains fewer than two million people. The population has been growing steadily in recent years, but it is still fewer than two million, and between them they speak 510 languages and some thousands of dialects; and the people who speak one of those 510 languages do not understand anyone who speaks another, so that one has a large number of groups unable, for all practical purposes, to communicate with one another—people who have had no concept of a nation, people who have had no concept of the size of the island that they inhabit and the fact that there might be some common interest, even some common bond, between them and the other people on that island. They have lived primitive lives. On the whole their way of life consisted of gathering food and eating it rapidly. Storage of food, for example, was an idea that barely entered into their way of living. They were dominated by sorcery and witchcraft. In many cases they practised cannibalism.

61. These are not people who, until recent times, formed a nation with a highly sophisticated political or social structure. I am not one of those who confuses civilization with Western ways of living, but I know that there are many Members of this Organization in many continents who have within their borders small groups of peoples living primitive lives, with limited traditions, and with, up to the present, limited opportunities. And I ask the representatives of those countries to imagine an island every one of whose inhabitants is a person of that background.

That shows the immensity of the task. It is a question of bringing men in a few years from the stone age up to the modern complicated civilization. And this is not a problem that confronts any country in this Organization. It is not a problem that has confronted the Members of this Organization in recent times. This is almost a unique situation—unique in the size of the people, whose standard is such that they have quite a way to go before they can take their place among us. This view is not based on any feeling of racial superiority. The people of New Guinea will be able to attain their place alongside everybody else. The relatively backward state in which they found themselves is a product of long isolation from the rest of mankind. It is the result of historical circumstances.

62. Australia has had the great task—and it is a task which we have gladly accepted, and one which we have chosen to accept—of bringing these people into the twentieth century, of making them peaceful neighbours of Australia and of the other countries in our Western Pacific region, people who will be partners of all of us in a peaceful world.

63. Profit has not been our motive. As far as Australia is concerned, the task of administering New Guinea and of advancing the indigenous inhabitants has been a heavy economic and financial burden, and it is a burden that will continue. Therefore, the classical ideas of the economic exploitation of colonies do not apply in the case of New Guinea.

64. The people of New Guinea are our neighbours. The island of New Guinea is next to us; we live with its people cheek by jowl in this world. We want to be friends with them. We want them to be partners with us in a common endeavour and in the interests of our common peace. We look forward to bringing them to nationhood. We have accepted and have gone beyond our obligations under the Charter to bring them to nationhood.

65. Let me say something about the problems that have confronted Australia in a country like New Guinea—and, when I say this, perhaps it will answer questions that could arise in your minds as to why it is taking some time to achieve our objective.

66. Australia has had the Trust Territory of New Guinea for forty years. That is the lifetime of one individual. Before that, it was a German colony. Australia also has a Non-Self-Governing Territory to the south of the Trust Territory, where we have been somewhat longer. But I shall speak about the two together because we are applying common policies, we have a common aspiration of giving self-determination to the people in both territories.

67. New Guinea is in the tropics. It has a rough terrain. It has a jungle that is frequently impenetrable. When you think of New Guinea, perhaps you could put it alongside the Amazon as a vast area which it is extremely difficult to penetrate. That is one of the reasons why it has taken a long time to open up the country. Even today there are areas that are not yet under administration. It has been a hard and a long task. We must remember that all the resources that are available today were not available forty years ago, or even twenty years ago. I am thinking in particular of aircraft and of the bulldozer. It often takes a man on foot many, many days to go a very few miles. We have been able to overcome this problem of space and of impenetrable jungle by using aircraft.

Australia did a lot of the pioneering work in the world in opening up a territory by aircraft. In the late twenties and in the thirties, we built a whole town in the mountains of New Guinea, supplied completely by air—the town of Bulolo—and in those days that was quite a feat. It was something from which other countries learned, but it was something that was not possible until we had mastered the use of aircraft for the transport of heavy machinery and heavy goods. Even today there are settlements in New Guinea where a substantial part of the supplies and communications have to come in by air—an expensive and sometimes a difficult project because, in addition to this jungle, there are high mountain ranges and there are various indentations of valleys. Many people who have come to New Guinea, including some of our United Nations colleagues and visiting missions, have been quite alarmed at the conditions under which they have had to fly from place to place in New Guinea through mists and fogs, a condition that is quite normal in the lives of those who have to live and work in New Guinea.

68. And then we had, in the middle of our task in New Guinea, a war which devastated New Guinea. New Guinea was the scene of active fighting for five years. During that time, a large number of buildings, roads, wharves and docks were destroyed in shelling and other forms of warfare. The jungle swallowed them up.

69. I can remember going to Finschhafen, on the northern coast of New Guinea, where there was a big building of about the same size as the Delegates' Dining Room, with a floor of concrete six to nine inches thick. And yet, in a period of six months, that enormous slab of concrete had been completely destroyed by the jungle: trees had forced themselves up through the concrete, splitting it in two. And so, by the end of five years of fighting, there was very little of a material nature left in northern New Guinea, and we had to start off again from scratch in a material sense. Quite apart from warfare, of course, this great tropical growth of New Guinea imposes enormous tasks upon us annually in maintenance. The task of maintaining roads and buildings is very great.

70. Then there has been the problem of overcoming disease. The whole coast of New Guinea was an area in which malaria was prevalent, an area of great sickness for the indigenous inhabitants and for any Australians who came there. We have gradually overcome that. But it has taken a long while, because the knowledge and the drugs that exist today did not exist until comparatively recently. Here, again, pioneering work has been done in Australia by people like Sir Hamilton Fairley. The work done in New Guinea in coping with malaria has served as a lesson and has been applied in places like Burma and other parts of South-East Asia and in the continent of Africa. Nowadays, in the development of under-developed countries, we can take account of things like atabrin and paludrin. We have learned more about the importance of draining areas, where it is possible, and how to drain them. We have learned about using fish to swallow and keep in check the larvae of mosquitoes. All these things have gradually been learned over the years and applied throughout the world. But, until some of these things were learned, there were serious impediments to the development of many parts of the world and certainly to the development of New Guinea.

71. Scientific research has been needed, and in Australia itself a large part of our economic history has consisted of learning how to acclimatize to Australian conditions animals and vegetation from Europe. We had great problems in getting even sheep, which are now the backbone of our exports, to live in Australia. We had problems with wheat.

72. We have had the same problems in New Guinea. I have been up in the highlands of New Guinea in the last few years, where we have been experimenting with cattle and sheep and pigs—livestock which did not exist in those parts even five years ago, livestock which is still not at home in those parts and still not an economic proposition. The gradual application of research and experimentation will, we hope, make it possible for areas which at present can carry nothing to become productive areas, but these things take time. Even the breeding period for livestock is of some duration. We need time for these things.

73. I have said this because I know, and I have heard it said here, that the development of some of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the Trust Territories has appeared to go slowly. But one reason in many cases, and certainly one reason in the case of New Guinea, has been the difficulties of the terrain, the physical obstacles that any Government would have had to overcome slowly and painfully.

74. We are making efforts, apart from the material work, some of which I have referred to, such as roads, bridges, hospitals and so on. We have applied ourselves industrially to carry out our obligations to prepare the peoples for self-government, and in this process, of course, there is a fanning out. We started off with nothing in this respect, as far as the indigenous inhabitants were concerned, but you build up a nucleus, and the nucleus itself can play a part in training others, and so you get a fanning out. You teach some teachers, and then the teachers teach other teachers. So, instead of political and economic development proceeding at a steady, uniform pace, we can look to it proceeding at a steadily accelerating pace.

75. In the political field, there is increased participation in the public service and in the central Government. This year there have been reforms in the Legislative Council which have increased the number of indigenous inhabitants serving in that Council. There has been steady development of local and regional government. This is not uniform all over the territories. We are not holding back one province because another province is not ready for a particular form of self-government, but in towns and in villages, and gradually in higher forms of organization, the indigenous inhabitants of the particular localities are playing a bigger and bigger part in running their own affairs.

76. Education is steadily growing. There are now 200,000 at school in New Guinea. As I have said, the total population of adults and children is less than 2 million. Technical training, not only in various forms of industry but in agriculture, is steadily being expanded. For example, I myself visited a large plywood factory in Bulolo in 1956 and again in 1957, and in that period I could see a steadily increasing proportion of indigenous inhabitants taking part in the operations of that establishment, operations which were highly sophisticated, with electric eyes and various operating methods that could be used in any city in the world.

77. Health services have been expanded. This does not only apply to hospitals and so forth where European doctors and others could help, but we are training and preparing the indigenous inhabitants for health services on their own account. We are building so that the people themselves will take over these functions.

78. Law and order now prevails over nearly the whole territory. There are still some areas, as I have said, that are not under administration, but most of it is, and here is law and order where all the people of the territories can look to the protection of the courts against arbitrary action by individuals or arbitrary action by Government. The territory is subject to the rule of law, and the rule of law applies to all the inhabitants.

79. We are gradually reforming or amending restrictions imposed by tribal or religious custom. That, of course, is a complicated question, and many representatives here will have had personal experience and will have personal views on the extent to which an Administering Authority should interfere in old inherited customs. This is something where we have tried as far as possible to adapt ourselves and to adapt our laws to the wishes and the freely accepted desires of the indigenous people. As you know, local customs can make difficult the most economical use of land, to take just one example. However, with regard to land, the Australian Government has pursued the policy that no land can be acquired from the indigenous inhabitants except by the Administration itself, and then only under safeguards. The result is that 97 per cent of the land in New Guinea is under indigenous ownership, and less than 1 per cent is in use by or occupied by non-indigenous people. We have felt that, as part of our sacred trust—using the words of the Charter—we had an obligation to see to it that the lands in New Guinea remained in the ownership and at the disposal of the people of New Guinea.

80. As I have said, Australia has accepted the obligations of the Charter. These are obligations to the United Nations, to the international community, but they are also obligations to the indigenous inhabitants themselves. The Charter is precise on this. It is a treaty obligation.

81. Now we have before us, submitted by a large number of nations on the initiative of the African-Asian group, a declaration [A/L.323 and Add.1-5]. This declaration is different from the Charter. The Charter, as I say, is a treaty obligation and precisely worked out. This declaration is different even from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which was carefully worked over in a commission and a committee and even then had no binding or enforceable status. It is difficult to be precise in a general declaration. It is designed to cover different types of territory; it is designed to cover different types of administrative régimes. But this declaration, not being able to override the Charter, or go beyond the powers of this Assembly, represents rather a general statement of agreed aspirations.

82. Some here would have liked it to go further, as we have heard. Some would have liked it to go less far. Some would have liked it to be more precise. Others would have preferred different wording. There is, I imagine, no Member here who would not like to see some change in the draft declaration as it appears before us, who would not have preferred different wording. For example, I do not think it is true that, as stated in the preamble, in all cases the continued existence of colonialism "impedes the social, cultural and economic development of dependent peoples". I hope that what I have said about New Guinea indicates that there at least colonialism is helping the indigenous inhabitants forward and that without the Australian Administering Authority the people would have no immediate hopes of advancement and of self-government.

83. Operative paragraph 3, referring to pretexts for delaying independence, might perhaps be misinterpreted. There are parts of the world where the immediate abandonment by the Administering Authority would result in chaos, but I think we would all agree that as a pretext, as a false reason, unjustified by facts, the conditions in that paragraph should not be used.

84. There has already been reference by the representatives of Burma and New Zealand to operative paragraph 4 about armed action, and they have explained their interpretation that this is not intended to prevent the use of police in the normal maintenance of law and order.

85. There is also a paragraph stating that immediate steps should be taken to transfer all powers in accordance with the freely expressed will of the indigenous inhabitants. As far as we are concerned in our territories, Australia is taking steps—and it has been taking them—to transfer powers as rapidly as possible to the indigenous inhabitants, and we, I believe, are giving effect to that paragraph of this declaration.

86. This debate has been useful in revealing the currents of thought and in demonstrating the feeling, not only among those of us who are here, but among those whom we represent here. The most effective speeches—if I might say so—have been those which were restrained and which balanced good and bad. None of us would say that there is no good or no bad in this institution of colonialism. But we are all agreed that we should bring it, as rapidly as possible, to an end in the form of self-government for all the peoples of the world.

87. I have tried today to make Australia's position clear as an administering Power. I have tried not to mislead the General Assembly, but to show the difficulties and the aims that we have in our territories, how we are trying to cope with those difficulties, and how we are trying to pursue those aims. The Prime Minister of Australia said in this very Assembly hall on 5 October 1960: "... we regard ourselves as having a duty to produce as soon as it is practicable an opportunity for complete self-determination for the people of Papua and New Guinea." [888th meeting, para. 46.]

88. Mr. MIYAZAKI (Japan): The question of the abolition of colonialism is no new issue. In the Covenant of the League of Nations, we have seen the idea of mandate, the forerunner of the international accountability of dependent territories. In the Charter of the United Nations this is more clear and precise. The provisions on Non-Self-Governing Territories and Trust Territories in Chapters XI, XII and XIII envisage future self-government or independence of these Territories.

89. In point of fact as well, since the United Nations came into being, former Non-Self-Governing Territories and Trust Territories, totalling more than thirty, attained independence in accordance with the letter and spirit of the Charter. This is no mean record for the United Nations, and with seventeen newly independent nations among us here at this session, the trend and the urge for independence are all the more mounting and pronounced.

90. My delegation shares the view that the question of colonialism is one of the most important problems of the day. There should be no time lost in bringing the whole question to a reasonable perspective. Unrest in more than one part of still dependent areas in Africa and the situation in the Congo compel our urgent attention to this question.

91. We have three declarations on the end of colonialism before us. All are so phrased as to be applicable throughout the world. My delegation attaches great importance to the scope of application. It is the conviction of my delegation that a declaration of this nature should be universal in its application, that is, such a declaration must be applied to every part of the world without exception.

92. My delegation wishes to point out, however, that although universal in its scope, actual application must be flexible. In a sense, universality of application necessitates flexibility. Especially with regard to the timing of independence, no wholesale determination is practicable or even possible.

93. I submit this because we have to recognize great differences in the conditions obtaining in Africa and those in the Pacific Ocean. In Africa, territories awaiting independence are invariably land masses of considerable size and population. In the case of the Pacific areas, there are thousands of small islands, separated by sea and many of them sparsely populated. Some of them may be too small as a unit of an independent State while, more often than not, cohesion among islands and propensity towards national unity are yet to come. Such peculiarity of the Pacific area was already forcibly and eloquently expressed in the Fourth Committee by the representative of the Philippines. My delegation, also representing an insular nation in that part of the world, fully shares his view and congratulates him on speaking out concerning what is rightly worrying this Government.

94. It may, therefore, be unreasonable to expect a mechanically uniform implementation of the declaration in all territories of the world. Chaos and void, through which anything might creep in, should never be allowed in that part of the world which has, so far, been spared from turmoil and remains true to its name. This caution on the part of my delegation does not imply lack of sympathy for those people on the islands in the Pacific. On the contrary, we hope that those people on the Pacific islands may eventually be enabled to formulate freely what status they shall assume in the future, to give full sway to their own genius, and to enjoy the fruits of their labour to the full.

95. My delegation should like to take this opportunity to pay attention to some considerations necessary for nations which have newly emerged on the international scene.

96. Since the sixteenth century the billows of colonialism stormed my country, but with staunch determination we maintained our independence against formidable odds. After emergence from three centuries of seclusion, my country encountered the harsh realities of international life. At that time there was no League of Nations or United Nations to lean upon and my country had to see through early days of contact and confrontation with the rest of the world entirely single-handedly.

97. Modernization of political structure and educational institutions, inauguration of industries using machines and electricity, had to be done solely on our own resources. It was a hard road that my country had to trudge along, but will and determination carried us to a position among the nations of the world that is not easily influenced by outside forces.

98. Because of our own experience, we in Japan have a deep sympathy not only for the independence of colonial countries, but also for the inevitable future that awaits them after the attainment of independence—a hard climb uphill taxing them, requiring every bit of will power and arduous work. Today, with the United Nations standing by all Member nations and ready to extend a helping hand where it is reasonably necessary, things are considerably easier. This is surely an advancement of our international society in which we live today. Nevertheless, in spite of all the aid and assistance at the disposal of young nations of today, the mainstay of orderly progress should rest on the self-help of each nation.

99. As I mentioned before, there is a sense of urgency among non-independent peoples today. My delegation fully sympathizes with it. It goes without saying that we must not dally and tarry in bringing about independence or self-government to all the peoples. On the other hand, hatred and mistrust towards colonial Powers linger among some peoples who have experienced the humiliation of subjection under the colonial régime. We perceive this from the tone and vocabulary of some of the speeches in this Assembly. It is understandable and we cannot but sympathize with such feelings.

100. Recollection and recounting of the past with rancour serve little purpose in our march towards freedom and independence. We had better look ahead. We have come to agree that colonialism is a matter of bygone days. The scramble for colonies, which was the order of the day in past centuries, does not and should not exist now. With the change of the times and human thinking, and with the United Nations and its Charter among us, the rules of the game of international society have definitely changed. We should exhort administering Powers to recognize this change of the rules. Accusations, if they should be made, may only be directed to those who refuse to acknowledge the change of the times and spared on those who are quick to acknowledge this and act accordingly.

101. A chain reaction of accusation, impatience, haste and violence is deplorable, to say the least. There is no gainsaying that transition from a status of dependency to independence had better be smooth and peaceful. My delegation, therefore, sincerely appeals to the administering Powers to respect fully the desires of dependent people. Any attempt to delay unduly the progress towards independence or self-government should never be countenanced. At the same time, to the dependent people, my delegation makes an appeal to have patience and to choose the way of peaceful transition, based on goodwill and co-operation.

102. In conclusion, my delegation wishes to express its earnest hope that adoption by the General Assembly of a declaration on the end of colonialism will put a final period to the era of hatred and antagonism and open a new era of harmony and co-operation in the history of mankind.

103. Mr. COMAY (Israel): The most exciting feature of this historic debate is that it could not have taken place a generation ago. It is five centuries since the vigorous and intelligent nations on the western fringes of Europe started setting out to discover and conquer new continents. They became the masters of the known world, from the vast and nearly empty plains of North America to the ancient civilizations of Asia. One hundred eighty years ago the tide started turning, when a shot was fired at Concord which rang around the world. The American Revolution was followed by the liberation of Latin America, and by the evolution within the British Empire towards Dominion status.

104. What marked this phase was the emancipation, by force or consent, of communities of European stock no longer willing to live under the control of distant parent countries. It was in a much more recent phase that the process extended to the indigenous non-white peoples of Asia and Africa. It is only since the end of World War II, and the signing of the United Nations Charter in San Francisco fifteen years ago, that national independence on these two continents has become an irresistible flood, changing the political face of the earth so radically that the school atlases we used as boys, with the different empires each painted in with its own special colour, have now become museum pieces.

105. Even in the short span of these post-war years, Africa lagged behind Asia, and it now remains the one major field for what has come to be called "decolonization". That is why we have all felt such genuine joy at the spectacular change which has taken place in the last year or two, marked by the admission of so many new African Member States at the present Assembly session. For too long Africa has been the forgotten continent, languishing in poverty and backwardness, its resources squeezed to enrich others, the outside world too often reaching into its depths only in the frightful guise of the slave-trader, whose traffic in human flesh still persists to this day in certain parts of the Middle East.

106. It is only in our time that the philosophical ideals of human freedom and equality are at last being turned into practical international policies. Men will only be brothers in the real sense of the word when the pigment of their skins and the shape of their features are no longer relevant to their individual position in society or to the status of their people.

107. My delegation agrees with what was said by the representative of Argentina in his eloquent statement—namely, that:

"To draw up a balance-sheet of colonialism might take us much further than we want to go. The important thing to note is that whatever judgement may be passed on the system now or by future historians, colonialism no longer fits into the political structures of our time. It is a type of relationship which has ended forever." [927th meeting, para. 17.]

Whatever that balance-sheet may be, there is no question that the earlier record of colonialism is stained with oppression and exploitation. There can also be no question that the contemporary policies and outlook of the two major colonial Powers, the United Kingdom and France, are based on an honourable desire to bring their colonies to self rule. For proof they can legitimately point to the many seats which their former subjects now occupy in this United Nations as sovereign and equal States. Acknowledgement of this fact should not be withheld through proper resentment of the evils of an earlier colonial era.

108. Where new States wish of their own free will to maintain an association with the former metropolitan country, on a basis of equality and mutual respect, and where they find such links to be beneficial to them, there is no need to label such a relationship as "neo-colonialism". This is a matter which the new States must decide for themselves, in the exercise of their own sovereign prerogatives. What is important to stress is that there is no special merit in achieving independence in circumstances of conflict and chaos if the transfer of power can take place in an agreed and orderly manner, as has happened in many cases and as we hope will happen very soon with all the remaining Non-Self-Governing Territories.

109. The principle of national independence, spelt out in the draft resolution in document A/L.323 and Add.1-5, is one which touches the deepest sentiments and the most venerable memories of the people of Israel. Thousands of years ago we were struggling for our independence against the great colonial empires of the ancient world. Time after time their marching armies trampled our freedom into the dust. Time after time the standard of revolt was raised again, for a people can never be finally conquered so long as the love of freedom remains alive in their hearts.

110. This recurrent struggle is enshrined in the Hebrew calendar. Every year, at the Feast of Passover, Jews recall the time, over three thousand years ago, when Moses led the children of Israel out of their bondage in Egypt so that they could live as free men in the Promised Land. Every year, on the ninth day of the month of Av, religious Jews fast in mourning for the destruction of our national independence by Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, in 586 B.C., and again by the Roman Legions under Titus, in 70 A.D. Channukah, the Feast of Lights, commemorates the revolt of Judas Maccabeas and his brothers against the domination and the religious and cultural suppression of the Syrian-Hellenist empire. On Lag B'Omer, the eighteenth day of the month of Iyar, we remember the heroic and bloodily repressed Jewish revolt led by Bar-Kochba and Rabbi Akiva against the imperial power of Rome, in the second century A.D.

111. These events were the historic background to Israel's renewed independence in 1948, after a bitter and painful struggle against what had in effect become a colonial régime—a struggle which involved deportations, loss of life and the detention of our leaders and thousands of our people. But I do not want to dwelt upon that conflict now, for throughout its course we kept intact our belief in the basic decency of the British people and our regard for what it has contributed to civilized values, and we are glad that there are today good and friendly relations between the United Kingdom and us. Our only purpose in mentioning our ancient and modern experience is to explain why we so passionately reject any concept of superior or inferior races and any belief that one country, nation or people has the right to rule over another.

112. Who has better reason than we to "reaffirm faith . . . in the dignity and worth of the human person" or to hate and reject "all practices of segregation and discrimination"? Down the centuries, our people have been classic victims of these practices and have survived through many dark and bloody episodes, reaching their climax in our own lifetime in the Nazi design to procure what they called a final solution to the Jewish problem by genocide—that is, by the extermination of a whole people.

113. We cannot forget past suffering, and we would not suggest to others that they do so. What we have, however, urged upon ourselves and do suggest to other newly independent States is that we and they should not dwell too much in the past, but should instead concentrate on building the future.

114. All of us who are newly emergent States have discovered in turn that the proclamation of independence is not an end, but only a beginning. On the morrow of the celebrations, the leaders of each of us have had to face difficult internal problems and looming external dangers, and each of us has suffered failures and frustrations. That is so not only for recently independent countries. We have listened in this debate to sober and mature statements by representatives of Latin American countries which liberated themselves from colonial tutelage over a century ago and are still engaged today in the battle to fill the frame of their sovereignty with the content of human welfare.

115. Speaking in the general debate on 10 October 1960, the Foreign Minister of Israel said:

"We, the new countries, have gained our independence in an era of man's greatest achievements. In parts of the world the standard of living and development has reached fantastic heights. We should not be told to go slow in our development; we should not be told that the advances of the developed countries have taken generations and centuries to attain. We cannot wait. We must develop quickly . . .

" . . . we will never be really free as long as our children need to be fed by others. Our freedom will be complete only when we have learned to bring forth from our own soil the food that we need. The cry that goes out from the African and Asian continents today is: share with us not only food, but also your knowledge of how to produce it. The inequality in the world today is not only in the gap of material things, but what is even more frightening, in the gap between those who literally reach for the moon and those who do not know how to reach efficiently into their own soil to produce their daily needs.

"To satisfy the hunger of the mind is no less urgent than to satisfy the hunger for bread. The question is how the world can organize itself to span the time-lag of generations and share this knowledge with those who need it." [897th meeting, paras. 128-130.]

116. The aching gulf between the political sovereignty of their countries and the actual conditions of life of their peoples is fully understood by the statesmen of the new countries, as has been reflected in the views expressed here by their delegations. I would mention, in particular, the stress laid by the representative of Ghana on the economic and social factors in the great anti-colonial revolutions of our time, on the creative energies released by independence, and on the need for sound economic relations between the under-developed countries of Asia and Africa, and the great industrial countries of Europe and America. My delegation fully agrees with these views.

117. National independence is essential but it is not enough. No nation can be an island unto itself. We inhabit one world in which all peoples must learn to live together or must perish together. In his Introduction to the Israel Government Year Book, published a few weeks ago, the Prime Minister, Mr. David Ben-Gurion writes:

"Nations of every size, long under foreign rule, some with ancient cultures, others for centuries untutored, are casting that yoke aside and grasping independence. The day cannot be far when all peoples, no matter what their colour, race or culture, will be members of mankind's family, equal in rights, sovereign and free.

"Yet all nations, whatever their strength or stature, are growing more and more dependent each upon the other. There is hardly a State, large, rich and powerful though it be, that can do without the co-operation and support of others."

Beyond the independence of each people lies the interdependence of all peoples.

118. We have carefully studied the wording of the proposed draft resolution contained in document A/L.323 and Add.1-5, and we shall vote for it and support its aspirations. To us, these aspirations are already foreshadowed in the sublime and universal vision of Isaiah, Jeremiah and the other ancient Hebrew Prophets, who preached the equality of all men and all nations. In the words of the Prophet Amos:

"Are ye not as children of the Ethiopians unto me, O children of Israel? saith the Lord."

119. Mr. HERRARTE (Guatemala) (translated from Spanish): The delegation of Guatemala, pursuing the course that it has always followed both inside and outside the United Nations, wishes to declare once again that it is in favour of the freedom of peoples and the abolition of the historical phenomenon known as colonialism, which has definitely been on the decline for some time.

120. We have not come here to make accusations of any kind. As a nation that emerged into independent life after a long colonial period we Guatemalans have learned to love liberty; we jealously guard our independence, and we are firmly convinced that all peoples are capable of self-determination and self-government—the best means of developing their cultural heritage, promoting their welfare and exploiting their natural riches for their own benefit.

121. We would be unjust if we included only those Western nations which possess, or have until recently possessed, colonies, among the colonial Powers. In our opinion, colonialism began when man first exploited man; when the first tribes subjugated neighboring tribes; when the great empires of antiquity were formed through the conquest of more or less distant nations, which were yet within reach, using the means of communication available at the time. Colonialism was brought by Alexander the Great and his conquering hosts that overran the Middle East; colonialism was practised by ancient Rome, which conquered so many different peoples along the shores of the mare nostrum and converted them into provinces of its vast empire. It was by colonialist methods that such great countries as China were formed, and Holy Russia, which extended its conquests into distant Siberia, the extreme east of the continent of Asia. Neighbouring peoples were brought under their dominion and the frontiers were widened as their conquests were consolidated. Colonialism and imperialism are two terms which overlap and have the same meaning.

122. Advances in the art of navigation and the progress of science enabled the peoples who possessed this knowledge to reach distant continents. The discovery of America charted a new course for colonialism. With the advent of transoceanic communication the Europeans, with their technical skills, overflowed first into America, then into Asia, and finally into Africa and other regions.

123. This is no place to relate the long history of colonialism in modern times. However, as technical knowledge spread and nations became less isolated, colonialism began, paradoxically, to decline until in recent years it reached a point of almost complete disintegration.

124. Now that over a hundred years have elapsed since we became independent of the mother country, we have come to understand that not everything was bad in the colony; that we did receive inestimable spiritual benefits from Spain which form our cultural heritage and give us strength to face the vicissitudes of life. Those new countries, too, which are emerging to independent life today will have to realize that hostility and resentment must give way to understanding and healthy co-operation, which does not mean subjection in any sense, nor disguised exploitation. The road before them is a rough one and is full of stumbling blocks.

125. The liquidation of colonialism, a process which had its feeble beginnings after the First World War when the Mandates System was applied by the League of Nations to the colonies of the defeated countries, took a tremendous step forward with the ratification of the United Nations Charter, establishing the right of peoples to self-determination and instituting the Trusteeship System for the territories formerly under mandate, for the territories taken away from the enemy States during the Second World War, and for those territories which were voluntarily placed under trusteeship by the States responsible for their administration. The provisions relating to the Trusteeship System clearly state that its objectives are to promote political, economic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants of the Trust Territories, and their progressive development towards self-government or independence, as may be appropriate to the particular circumstances of each territory and the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned. The Charter also contains a special chapter on Non-Self-Governing Territories. Although in this case the provisions do not go so far, nothing else could have been expected, in view of the great political and economic interests of the colonialist Powers. Yet that was the beginning of the end. The Powers undertook to transmit information on those territories when they accepted the sacred trust of administration, and they made binding statements recognizing that the interests of the inhabitants were paramount and obligating themselves to promote self-government and the political aspirations of those peoples.

126. The result of these wise provisions has been definitely encouraging. Of course, the fate of all dependent territories could have been decided at that time by a single stroke of the pen. But the political conditions were not sufficiently favourable and great decisions of that kind are not arrived at suddenly. There is always much reluctance on the part of the colonizing countries to accept the loss of their privileges. That is why the fight for independence is always a bitter one and why in most cases victory is won only after a violent struggle.

127. We should therefore rejoice that in recent years the liquidation of colonialism has developed for the most part along peaceful lines, thanks to the spirit that reigned at the San Francisco Conference, and we should also rejoice that this process is now in its final stage.

128. My country, to its great satisfaction and pride, was a member of the Trusteeship Council and the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. We believe that we have discharged a great humanitarian duty by watching over and working for the development of the dependent peoples and the achievement of their independence. We have continued to fulfil these duties in the General Assembly.

129. My delegation has witnessed with the deepest satisfaction the entry into the United Nations of many new Members, States which were previously colonies or Trust Territories. The best proof of this process of "decolonization" is provided by the fact that when the United Nations was founded, fifteen years ago, there were in all fifty-one Members and now we are approaching one hundred, or nearly double the original number. If we were to compare a map of the world as it was at the end of the war, showing in different colours the various dependent territories, with a map of today, we should realize how encouraging the prospects are, and that we may now speak of the last remnants of colonialism.

130. Therefore, my delegation believes that the liquidation of colonialism will not take long, and that the matter should not be exploited for demagogic purposes in the cold war, but treated with the seriousness and good sense that the times call for. Above all, we must prevent the countries on the threshold of independence from becoming the victims of the cold war—pawns in a dangerous game, bearing the label of independence but suffering worse subjection than when they were colonies.

131. We should not disregard the praiseworthy efforts of the recently emancipated countries in favour of the total abolition of colonialism. This is the same seed that flourished in America, when the moment for independence spread over the whole continent. It is the same force that was exerted by the Latin American peoples at the very beginning of the United Nations, for the successive liberation of the peoples of Asia and Africa; now these efforts are being taken up by those peoples themselves, so that colonialism may be done away with once and for all.

132. The spirit that reigned at our famous American Congress of 1826, convened on the initiative of the liberator Simón Bolívar, is the same spirit that was manifested at the Bandung, Accra and Addis Ababa Conferences, so dear to the hearts of the peoples of Asia and Africa.

133. We have heard the demands of these peoples for the liquidation of colonialism in their continents. But there are still vestiges of colonialism in free America, a heritage of former times, which should also be done away with. In the West Indies, in the Guianas and in part of the Guatemalan territory unlawfully occupied by the United Kingdom, our own territory of Belize, colonialism seems still to be deeply rooted. We were encouraged to hear the statement by the United Kingdom representative [925th meeting] to the effect that his country is in entire sympathy with the feelings and aims of the African-Asian delegations as regards the earliest possible achievement of independence by all the peoples not yet enjoying it. These are our own feelings, and I trust that the United Kingdom, honouring its own statement, will decide to put an end to the century-old controversy with Guatemala regarding our territory of Belize and will respect the territorial integrity of a country which, because of its weakness and lack of resources, has no other weapon than the justice of its cause.

134. I do not wish to tax the patience of the Assembly with this particular question and I shall therefore not go into it in detail. However, I must declare that in conformity with Article 1 of our Constitution, Belize is part of the national territory and we consider its reincorporation to be of vital importance.

135. If colonialism cannot be justified anywhere on earth, it is unthinkable that there should still be remnants of this odious system in the American continent, which was the first to accede to independence and to give the world its greatest lesson in liberty and self-determination. In a century and a half of independence we have learned to love freedom, and despite our political wranglings we jealously guard this heritage from our liberators and have devoted our efforts and our enthusiasm to the liberation of other countries. We hope, therefore, that justice will be done also in regard to the American claims. The breath of freedom, which is today a strong wind that blows over the whole world, must also reach America, where it started, and sweep away forever the last remnants of colonialism. We are sure that the peoples of Asia and Africa will respond in the same generous spirit that has been shown by the Latin American countries for the independence of those distant lands.

136. My delegation is firmly convinced that, if we are to implement effectively the provisions of Article 1 of the United Nations Charter, especially in respect of the fundamental aim of maintaining international peace and security, colonialism must be abolished. The subjugation of one people by another inevitably leads to constant irritation between the oppressor and the oppressed. This irritation is reflected in friction and struggle and sometimes in long, cruel wars which leave behind them a legacy of hatred that is hard to dissipate. There can be no true international co-operation on the basis of the subjection of one people by another or the violation of territorial integrity. For these essential reasons colonialism is an anachronism and if we are to respect the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations Charter, these forms of domination must cease to exist. The well-known pretext that those peoples are backward has no justification. We have seen how peoples regarded as backward are reborn, assimilate modern techniques, and join the universal movement of progress. The struggle against economic and political domination and against racial discrimination in any form is the sign of the times, and nothing can halt the march of the under-developed nations towards their complete economic, political and social liberation.

137. It is also obvious that colonialism is in open conflict with any sound legal and philosophical conception of human rights. How can the empty pretexts which are advanced to justify colonialism be reconciled with the glorious declarations on human rights made in this august Assembly twelve years ago? What arguments, what legal concepts can be raised against the precept, which is but a recognition of the truth, that all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights? The Universal Declaration of Human Rights states that no one shall be held in slavery or servitude, but what is the basis of colonialism if it is not slavery and servitude? Therefore my delegation, in condemning all forms of colonialism, also condemns all its disguised forms, imposed upon countries which once were independent, against which it cannot be said that they lack preparation for independence, countries in which respect for the dignity and freedom of the individual and for great spiritual values has been suppressed. For these reasons, we were surprised that the Soviet Union should propose the abolition of colonialism since it has obdurately opposed any consideration of the case of the nations which have fallen victim to Russian neo-colonialism.

138. Let us then accomplish our task in favour of human liberty, conscious of doing our duty, without demagogical arguments or futile recriminations. My delegation is pleased that in the near future many more countries will take their place in this Organization, after achieving full independence, in fulfilment of our aim of universality and of unity in freedom, now that man, having made prodigious scientific discoveries, faces the choice between his own destruction and the exploration of new worlds. Let this be a sign for man to choose the path of reason and justice.

139. We were pleased at the submission of draft resolution A/L.323 and Add.1-5 sponsored by a large number of countries, especially those of Africa and Asia, and including many of the premises necessary for the abolition of colonialism. We find this draft resolution constructive, and its general lines are in agreement with our point of view. We also welcome the draft resolution introduced yesterday by the delegation of Honduras [A/L.324], calling for the eradication of colonialism and the appointment of a commission to visit the territories which are still dependent and make recommendations to the next session of the General Assembly on the most rapid and efficient ways of wiping out the colonial system. We shall devote our most careful attention to these draft resolutions and we reserve the right to speak again when they come up for discussion.

Mr. Boland (Ireland) resumed the Chair.

140. Mr. BENTES VINUEZA (Ecuador) (translated from Spanish): In this hall are assembled the representatives of ninety-nine States. It might well be said that this is indeed what has been called the Assembly of Humanity. We are the representatives of the peoples of the United Nations, so speaks the Charter, and this is tantamount to saying that we are the representatives of the peoples of the world. Yet there is a gap in our ranks here which is, paradoxically enough, an accusing presence. I refer to the absence of those who are suffering under the colonial yoke—the subject peoples of the earth.

141. That absence is all too grave an accusation levelled against our consciences as free men, because it confronts us with an inescapable dilemma: these people are not here either because they have not been granted the freedom they deserve or because there are in the world conditions of cultural under-development which do not allow them to exercise their rights to self-government. One way or the other, this signifies the open acceptance of an injustice.

142. While I have heard the representative of a great Power declare that, on colonial questions, he would listen with attention and respect to what the countries of Asia and Africa have to say, I believe that the countries of Latin America also have something to say on this problem. Surely the representative to whom I am alluding is aware of the great contributions in money and blood made by the United Kingdom to the countries of Latin America more than a century ago for their political emancipation, and he is also aware that in America there are still dependent territories and territories claimed by more than one State. I do not, however, think it necessary to invoke special prerogatives in order to speak on the injustice inherent in the colonial system.

143. The State which I represent lived for three centuries under a system of alien domination which, despite the fact that it was actually feudal, is usually referred to as colonial. To achieve emancipation, we had to wage a cruel war of twenty years' duration. That war called for incredible sacrifices, including economic sacrifices which bore heavily upon our future development. We do not want the peoples now striving towards their freedom to have to shed blood, to make sacrifices or to jeopardize their long-range future. We do not want them to have to repeat our painful experiences, and this is as valid a reason as any for coming to this rostrum.

144. As I stand here, I feel the weight of a heavy responsibility. The subject we are dealing with signifies human suffering. A deep and simple thing is expressed in those two words, but there is nothing more sacred than the suffering of man. That is why my delegation cannot consent to this being turned into a means for propaganda or a lamentable instrument of the cold war. We refuse to allow it to be turned into a jugglery of colonialist dialectics; but we also reject its becoming a battle cry of the purveyors of democracy, who are selling their magic recipes for collective happiness in all corners of the world.

145. First, I must express on behalf of the Government of Ecuador, the profound sympathy that we feel for the peoples oppressed under the colonial yoke. Generally speaking, colonialism is a type of racism and has been so throughout its history; the State I represent is based upon a multiracial society that passed through a colonial status. The indigenous society of Ecuador was multiracial; it suffered under the colonialism of the Incas for almost two generations and had to shake off that oppressive domination. Spain, which held its position of colonizer during three centuries, was also a multiracial society, being composed of Celtic, Iberian, Greek, Phoenicians, Roman, Gothic, Hebrew and—lastly and gloriously—Arabic elements. The African contributions were also multiracial—those men and women who were brought over in the slave ships to satisfy the slave-owning rapacity of the white man. Thus we know, from our remote pre-Hispanic past, what is meant by colonial domination, and in the one century of our life as a republic we have known how heavy is the weight of that past.

146. I have hesitated, however, to refer to the three-century domination of Spain in America, and thus also in my own country, as colonialism. The phenomenon of the expansion of Spain beyond the seas is original and unique in history. It did not at all resemble the establishment of ports of call for trading purposes by the Phoenicians in the Mediterranean; nor did it resemble those city states which Greece founded as foci of its marvellous culture, which was based on a system of slave labour; nor, again, did it resemble the Roman colonial system, a masterpiece of organization for the exploitation of tributary lands. Spain yearned to form America in her own image and likeness. It sought the souls of the indigenous inhabitants as the supreme object of its colonizing task in order to save them and, according to its Christian conception, to incorporate them into the Kingdom of God. It was a feeling of tenderness towards this newly-discovered human being, whom through a naive mistake was called the Indian, that, long before Grotius, led Spanish jurists such as Suárez and Vitoria to create a system of international law based upon respect for the dignity of the human person and the denial of the right of conquest. It was this urge that led Spain's jurists to establish the most humane code of laws that any colonizing people has ever formulated—the "Leyes de Indias". Spain raised no barriers between races, but joined with them, creating our mixed society. True, there were injustices; undeniably there was cruelty, but if there was harsh domination, it was the fault of irresponsible people and occurred against the will of the mother country, which always considered the lands in America to be overseas provinces.

147. Colonialism as we see it in the modern world is based on principles contrary to those adopted by Spain. It is founded, in the first place, on the assumption of the inequality of human beings as a basis for economic exploitation. There is an underlying racism in its doctrine or, at least, in its historic basis. The mariners of ancient times on their voyages of discovery believed that when they reached the equator their skins would become black, like those of the men who lived in Africa. This fear of becoming black continued to exist in the subconscious minds of the descendants of the slave-traders who, of course, were never Spaniards. I do not wish to draw unpleasant conclusions or to cite concrete cases, but, obviously, it is this same state of mind that leads the racists of today to set up the barriers in cities, neighbourhoods and public services between Negroes and Whites.

148. Thus, racism and colonialism were inseparably joined at birth. The search for spice-producing tropical countries was the motive. In their search for spices, the Portuguese set out on the Mare Tenebrum; they rounded the Cape of Good Hope, discovered Madagascar and reached India, while others set off on a different route towards the coasts where the brazil-wood grew. Looking for the Indies where the spices grew, the Spanish navigators set forth on the mysterious western Atlantic, and the Spanish pilots Vicente Yáñez and Martín Alonso Pinzón, in the employ of the navigator Christopher Columbus, discovered America. The discovery of the tropical lands created, in its turn, new needs and brought the beginning of the most inhuman of all trades, the trade in human beings. The Negro became a commodity to be bought and sold. He was hunted on the coasts of Africa. He was hunted like a wild beast. The doctrine of slavery came into being to justify this savage hunt, and slavery became the twin brother of colonialism, which is but the collective form of slavery. Such was the genesis of classic colonialism.

149. Economic necessity gave impetus to its development. The peopling of distant lands increased the investment of capital in industry. Private capital, which, working in closely-knit fashion, had sufficed during the era of discovery, was no longer enough. So there came into being that great instrument of modern capitalism, the limited liability stock company, and it is noteworthy that the first of these was a colonial enterprise, the Dutch East India Company. The colonial system transformed the old guild economy. It produced mercantilism as a State policy, and mercantilism, in its turn, gave greater impetus to colonialism. The struggle for markets inevitably produced international tensions. When colonies could not be obtained through negotiation, wars of conquest or violent diplomatic struggles ensued. We all know the history of Europe between the seventeenth and nineteenth centuries, and I need not go into it here.

150. Colonialism thus acquired its so-called classic form, which we desire to see liquidated today. From the nineteenth century onwards, it was completely developed as a means of exploiting under-developed countries capable of producing cheap raw materials on a basis almost of slave labour, and of absorbing industrial excess products at high prices. That colonialism has been the cause of strife and war. The States which arrived late in a world already divided up demanded their share. Almost all the wars of that period, including the First World War, were brought about by this struggle for colonial and semi-colonial markets. And it is not to be wondered at that the first attempt at world organization, which came out of the First World War, continued to endorse the colonial system.

151. Please excuse me for this historical digression. I can assure you that it has not been a mere academic pastime. At the start of this debate, mention was made—and rightly so—of classic colonialism and neo-colonialism. It was therefore necessary to glance retrospectively at classic colonialism so as to explain its strength and persistence. I now wish to refer to what lies behind the assumption of its approaching liquidation.

152. My delegation wishes to remain on a strictly objective plane and seek out the guide line which will lead us through the labyrinth of opinions. I shall therefore start with an examination of what the Charter of the United Nations has to say in this regard. It must be noted that the Charter has completely suppressed any recognition of the colonial system, in contrast to the Covenant of the League of Nations. It was logical that this should be so, for the Charter in its Preamble sets forth a body of principles regarding the equality of men and the rights of peoples—principles which are incompatible with colonial servitude. In the face, however, of unavoidable realities, it has created a system of administration for the former colonies which is outlined in Chapters XI and XII.

153. I take the liberty of pointing out that there is no essential difference between those two Chapters. Actually both the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the Trust Territories are under a similar juridical system, and similar provisions govern the relations between dependent territories and the Administering States. The need for making a distinction was based on practical necessities.

154. As a matter of fact, in both cases it is the Organization which grants the power to administer. Article 73 provides, with regard to Non-Self-Governing Territories, that the assumption of administrative responsibility by the administering State is "a sacred trust", and it sets forth the rules for such administration.

155. Article 75 of the Charter states quite clearly that: "The United Nations shall establish under its authority an international trusteeship system for the administration and supervision of such territories as may be placed thereunder by subsequent individual agreements." In both these cases the Charter lays down that it is the Organization which exercises the functions of mandator and the administering State which accepts the obligations of a mandatory and thus binds itself to observe the regulations conforming to that legal relationship.

156. The relationship between the Organization and the administering State established by the Charter—that of mandator and mandatory—creates a series of juridical ties. Just as, in civil law, an administrator does not exercise property rights over the assets he administers, so, on the international plane, the administering State does not exercise sovereignty over the territories in respect of which it exercises a mandate. It has no vested rights in those territories either of ownership or sovereignty. Sovereignty implies a totality of rights which is incompatible with the simple exercise of administration. In this case sovereignty has been suspended until a condition is fulfilled—to wit, the attainment of self-government. Sovereignty belongs to the people whose territory is under administration even though they are unable to exercise it, just as the assets of a minor belong to him even though he cannot at the time exercise full rights over them. The legal status of the dependent peoples is that of incomplete States. Of the three elements of the modern State they have only two—a people and a territory—and they are lacking in the third element, which is self-government.

157. It is obvious that the fulfilment of the condition is not a recommendation that may or may not be complied with by the administering State, but rather an inescapable obligation to lead the administered peoples toward self-government. The administering State is responsible for the fulfilment of this condition, and the Organization, as the mandator, has the power to insist upon this without regard to the exception provided in Article 2, paragraph 7, since that State has voluntarily placed itself under international jurisdiction by accepting the obligations of the Charter, which is a multilateral treaty.

158. Seven years ago, in 1953, I had the honour to expound this interpretation of Chapters XI and XII of the Charter in the Fourth Committee on behalf of the delegation of Ecuador.^{1/} We held at that time, and we continue to hold, the firm hope that the problems of colonialism can be settled by juridical means through a correct interpretation of the principles set forth in the Charter. Many of the sovereign peoples of today, whose representatives honour this Assembly with their presence, were at that time petitioners. We heard some of them speak, and the fact that they are now sitting among us is a clear proof of the rapid decline of colonialism.

159. I must admit that the presence here in this hall of the representatives of those territories, which at that time were dependent territories but which now are sovereign States, is to a large extent due to their courage, their constancy, their clear fighting spirit, their love of liberty and their tenacity in achieving it. Once again we pay them a tribute. But we cannot ignore the fact that their emancipation has been due also to the efficacy of the principles of the Charter which have helped them in their purposes, and to the understanding shown by many of the administering States which have fulfilled the conditions for leading these peoples towards the final goal of self-government. The wisdom of the representatives of those former colonies which today are independent States is eloquent proof of the concern which, in accordance with the provisions of the Charter, has been shown by the one-time administrators to ensure for them steady educational progress.

160. These facts strengthen the faith of my delegation in the juridical solution of colonial problems in and through the United Nations. Our Organization is the mandator, and it is in the power of the mandator to bring the mandate to an end if and when the conditions are not fulfilled or there are unwarrantable delays in their fulfilment. We accordingly believe that each case should be examined in the light of its own merits and circumstances and against its own background, and that it should be measured in its own consequences. Emancipation "en masse" does not seem to us a good method, any more than is condemnation "en masse".

161. I have so far referred to what is usually called "classic colonialism", but we cannot ignore the fact that colonialism, like Proteus in the Greek myth, is multiform. It has mimetic powers, and it is obvious that there exist forms of neo-colonialism which need to be destroyed at the source.

162. I shall pass now, like the salamander over fire, to a new form of political and economic colonialism which subjugates peoples while leaving them with a self-government which appears to be genuine but is jealously watched over by military forces ready to drown in blood any attempt at rebellion. I shall not refer to the countries which are suffering under exclusivist political parties. Nor shall I refer to those new "mitimáes"—an old Quechuan word for describing the peoples that were transported wholesale for collective work under the totalitarian imperialism and colonialism of the Incas. There was brainwashing in those days too—a fact that bears out Solomon's remark in Ecclesiastes that there is nothing new under the sun.

163. My delegation feels that in order to combat this neo-colonialism, whether it comes from the left or the right, the Charter sets forth methods which the United Nations should develop and perfect. The methods in question refer to the growing application of the principle of self-determination of peoples. Anything which guarantees its exercise, anything which contributes to implanting its existence, will prevent the development of neo-colonialism. This principle must, however, be exercised broadly without discrimination and without admitting exclusivist subtleties or fallacious exceptions, whether from the side of classic colonialism or of neo-colonialism, and whether from the left or the right.

164. There is, finally, an insidious type of colonialism against which it would be well to arm ourselves. I refer to the so-called economic semi-colonialism which endeavors to preserve a state of under-development in order to retain sources of cheap raw materials and outlets for expensive manufactured goods. It is essential, in this case, to increase international co-operation in the field of economic aid.

165. I will now refer briefly to the draft resolution which has been circulated as document A/L.323 and Add.1-5. Its generous spirit, the wisdom with which it presents the problem and the noble feeling for humanity which pervades it deserve our tribute, because it aspires to be a declaration of the rights of colonial peoples which will complement the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

166. I am bound to examine it in the light of the ideas which my delegation has just submitted, and on this point I must say that I find certain discrepancies. I shall overlook the purely doctrinaire discrepancies, such as that set forth in the fifth preambular paragraph referring to the role of the United Nations in assisting the movement for independence in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories. It would seem that this paragraph seeks to assign the United Nations an active role as a mediator in colonial problems, placing it in between the dependent territories and the administering States. My delegation has held that the juridical relationship between the United Nations and the Administering States must be that of mandator to mandatory.

167. In the operative part, which takes the form of a declaration of principles, my delegation has certain doubts regarding paragraph 3. These doubts have both a juridical and a practical basis. My delegation believes that the indispensable condition for the attainment of self-government is that dependent peoples should have reached a sufficient degree of cultural, social and economic development which in each case must be assessed against the background of its own circumstances. The declaration in paragraph 3 might lead to a massive emancipation, even in the case where the stage of development necessary for the granting of self-government has not been reached. The practical difficulties of independence for a people that has not attained the requisite degree of social, economic and cultural development would obviously be very serious indeed.

168. My delegation also entertains certain doubts regarding the usefulness of operative paragraph 4—not so far as the principles are concerned but because it appears to be redundant.

169. Despite these observations, my delegation is happy to congratulate the sponsors of this draft, although we do reserve our right to express a final opinion on it later. We nevertheless wish to state for the record that we unconditionally support two fundamental principles contained in the declaration, namely, the right to self-determination as the basis for the independence of States, and the condemnation of any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity or the territorial integrity of a country.

170. Self-determination is the indispensable premise in any ethical or political consideration of human beings, whether individually or collectively. It is, therefore, the fundamental condition for the existence of democracy. Determinism, which is the philosophical negation of self-determination, leads individuals to automation and peoples to slavery. Anything that is done to strengthen the principle of self-determination and guarantee its exercise will receive the fervent support of my delegation.

171. My delegation also condemns any attempt to disrupt the national unity or territorial integrity of a country as being contrary to the principles of the Charter and to the foundations of law and peaceful co-existence. Wars of conquest, the imposition of treaties that mutilate the territorial heritage of a State, and military occupation as a means of settling international disputes are all unfortunately the survivals of a retarded colonialist mentality.

172. May I be allowed to recall with a certain pride that, in the juridical development of the American continent as embodied in international instruments, the principle of self-determination is set down as the basis for peaceful relations between States and within the international community. The international doctrine of uti possidetis juris came into being at the same time as we attained our independence, since Simón Bolívar, our liberator, took it as the basis for the existence of States. On the basis of this principle, nationalities became territorial entities, and respect for this principle has been maintained throughout the course of our American juridical development. Thus, American international law condemns the dismemberment of States by armed intervention and conquest. We cannot allow the civilized world to resound to the tragic Vae victis of the ancient barbarians.

173. This is why we give our enthusiastic support to the embodiment of this principle in the declaration contained in the draft resolution.

174. I must also refer to the considerable effort towards a solution of this problem represented by the draft resolution submitted by Honduras [A/L.324]. A commission such as the one proposed would, through a detailed and careful field survey, facilitate an objective appraisal of the situation even though it might not itself provide a solution. My delegation feels that there is a technical obstacle which will make it difficult for us to support the draft resolution, namely, that when speaking of colonies, it refers to a concept which does not have any legal basis in the Charter and which it might be appropriate to clarify so as to indicate whether the reference is merely to Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories or also includes those overseas territories that some States regard as part of their metropolitan territory. We therefore consider that there is a certain vagueness about the terms used.

175. I believe that, in this matter of the liquidation of colonialism, we are on the right road; but we have not yet reached the goal. The goal is still very far off, and the road is beset with difficulties. A study such as the one suggested offers one possibility of reaching that goal but another would be to determine how the United Nations could obtain compliance with the measures for the furtherance of self-government when the administering States fail to comply with their obligations. Otherwise, we shall find ourselves in a vicious circle. It will be impossible to give independence to certain peoples because they will be regarded as not fulfilling the necessary conditions for self-government, and it will also be impossible to insist that the administering States achieve those conditions by constructive efforts. This would effectively kill all hope and would perpetuate an injustice.

176. I must again apologize for having spoken at such great length, but this is a sacred cause—that of the oppressed peoples. We do not want them to suffer what we had to suffer to attain our independence. For them we want an independence that is based upon the principle of self-determination, a freedom that is without subterfuge or limitation. We feel responsible for their hopes, and we cannot allow despair to lead them, by logical reaction, to accept the totalitarian Charybdis after having escaped from the colonialist Scylla. The independence of today's dependent peoples, based upon self-determination, will inevitably lead them by their free decisions, free alike from pressures and from blandishments, to their own unique forms of government. This, as far as my delegation is concerned, is the great responsibility of the peoples of the United Nations.

177. Mr. SUMULONG (Philippines): As all delegations are aware, the item "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples" was originally proposed by the Government of the USSR [A/4501] and unanimously approved by the General Assembly for inclusion in the agenda of the present session. On 23 September 1960, Chairman Khrushchev formally presented the draft text of the declaration which is contained in document A/4502. During the debate on the recommendation of the General Committee to include the item and to allocate it to the First Committee, my delegation was among the first to give its support to an amendment proposed by the delegation of the Soviet Union [A/L.312/Rev.1] to have the question discussed instead in the General Assembly in plenary session. We were in agreement with the Soviet view that the vital importance of this question fully warranted its consideration by this body. We made it clear that, in our opinion, this item had a scope and significance much broader than that which had been indicated by the terms of the explanatory memorandum and of the draft declaration submitted by the Soviet delegation. We accordingly rejected the notion that the General Assembly, in considering this question, would be bound by the restricted and tendentious terms of the Soviet draft declaration. We maintained that such a declaration must cover the cases of all countries and peoples anywhere in the world that remain under alien subjection, victims of imperialist domination both old and new, and in all its forms and manifestations.

178. It was upon the basis of this understanding that the Philippine delegation co-operated with other countries of Asia and Africa in the elaboration of the draft declaration which is to be found in document A/L.323 and Add.1-5. In accordance with the instructions of my Government, the Philippine delegation has joined the rapidly increasing number of co-sponsors of this proposal, which at the present moment, if I am not mistaken, number forty-two.

179. My country's profound interest in this question is easily explained. Our experience of colonial subjection, which lasted unbroken for nearly four hundred years, was certainly one of the longest in all recorded history. We have drunk of the bitter cup of alien domination to the dregs. But we also recall with relief and gratitude that the Republic of the Philippines was the first-born independent State of this revolutionary era of the United Nations—this era which will forever be distinguished in the annals of human civilization by the emergence into freedom and independence of forty-odd countries within a period of only fifteen years.

180. In his speech before the Assembly on 29 November 1960 [927th meeting], Mr. Shukairy, the representative of Saudi Arabia, was generous enough to recall that the Philippines was the only Asian country that in San Francisco fought for the inclusion in the Charter of the United Nations of independence as the just and rightful goal of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The colonial Powers at the time would concede no more than the principle that in these territories they would "develop self-government" and "take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples", and they tried hard to convince us that the general concept of self-government would include and would embrace the goal of independence. From this semantic confusion has sprung one of the seeming inconsistencies or, shall we say, one of the political curiosities of the Charter; for, whereas Article 76 of the Charter clearly establishes "self-government or independence" as the goal of the inhabitants of the Trust Territories, Article 73 merely obligates the colonial Powers "to develop self-government" for the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

181. It was the view of the Philippine delegation at the San Francisco Conference, and it still remains the view of the Philippine delegation now, that independence should be the common objective of all the peoples of dependent territories, whether Trust or Non-Self-Governing. We were assured in San Francisco that this was indeed the case, in the spirit if not in the letter of the Charter. We were vastly outnumbered in San Francisco and we lost the struggle for this one crucial word. But this word was not simply a word that could be made to disappear by sleight-of-hand or by incantation. It was a word so instinct with life, so dear and so near to the hearts and minds of so many millions of dependent people, so tightly woven into the fabric of the present and the future, and so linked to the purposes and principles of the United Nations, that it could not for long be ignored or kept, so to say, in cold storage.

182. The forward movement of history could not be arrested by any kind of verbal legerdemain, however ingenious. Thus, today, we are in the process of adopting a "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples" as a necessary follow-up and clarification of the "Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories" which is embodied in Chapter XI of the Charter.

183. Some may wonder whether this new declaration, by specifying independence, does not constitute a revision of the existing declaration in the Charter. This is a legitimate concern which it is well for us to consider. In this connexion, we would recall the assurances that were offered to us in San Francisco to the effect that self-government and independence were virtually synonymous—an interpretation which the dictionary as well as textbooks on political science tend to support.

184. Moreover, Article 73 b of the Charter obligates the colonial Powers "to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples"—an obligation which most of the colonial Powers have respected during the last fifteen years since the end of the Second World War, by satisfying the supreme political aspiration of any people, which is independence, readily and voluntarily in some cases, grudgingly and by making a virtue of necessity in others.

185. Considering that nearly forty countries have achieved independence since the Charter was promulgated, it is the colonial Powers themselves who have borne the responsibility for the progressive interpretation of Article 73 of the Charter. It is they who have dared to carry the letter of this provision of the Charter to its logical conclusion, and this new declaration which we are proposing does no more than confirm the wisdom they have shown in the face of ineluctable historical necessity.

186. The Philippine delegation stands four-square behind the terms of the declaration proposed by forty-two Asian and African States [A/L.323 and Add.1-5]. If it be objected that this declaration is considerably more exuberant in letter and spirit than the corresponding declaration in the Charter, our answer is that the difference is due to the new complexion of the United Nations and the radically altered environment in which it operates today. In San Francisco the great Powers that won the war influenced and determined the form and character of the Charter; they understandably hoped to preserve what they then possessed for as long as possible and they were not in any mood for voluntary sacrifices and acts of renunciation. Their domination of the San Francisco Conference is therefore reflected in the rather conservative, though not ungenerous, language of Article 73.

187. But fifteen years have passed since then, and the membership of the United Nations has doubled since the Charter was written because of the admission of States newly emerged from colonial subjection. When these new States speak, as they do now, in the proposed declaration, the world must be prepared to hear a voice with strong undertones of remembered injustice and hurt, and vibrant with sympathy for peoples still waiting to be free.

188. Some doubt has been expressed in connexion with paragraph 5 of the draft declaration, which reads:

"5. Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, without any distinction as to race, creed or colour, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom."

189. At first blush, this provision might appear to be in contrast to the philosophy of gradualism which underlies Article 73 of the Charter and is implicit in the words, "progressive development of . . . free political institutions, according to the particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples and their varying stages of advancement". However, it is clear that what is enjoined in paragraph 5 of the proposed declaration is not the immediate transfer of all powers to the peoples of those territories, but rather the taking or initiating forthwith of steps which would lead to such transfer of power. What is intended to be corrected is a policy of deliberate procrastination and delay, of failure to launch a dependent people upon the road to independence—a policy which, as we have seen, has had such tragic results in the case of the former Belgian Congo.

190. Our support of this paragraph springs from our experience as a former dependent territory of the United States. After the United States had completed the conquest of my country at the turn of the century, the leaders of my people began to petition and campaign for immediate, complete and absolute freedom, and they asked the United States for repeated guarantees towards that end. The American people and Government gave us the guarantees we asked for, and although our independence was not recognized immediately from the moment we petitioned for it, still it was gratifying to recall that by virtue of the guarantees thus obtained there was never any doubt from the beginning that steps would be taken immediately towards the goal of independence.

191. In point of fact, on the exact date promised to us by the United States, on 4 July 1946, Philippine independence was granted and recognized, and all this was accomplished without need of shedding a single drop of human blood.

192. Had the United Nations existed then, my country would surely have benefitted by the moral pressure of the Organization, and the period of preparation would have been much shorter. What paragraph 5, and indeed what the declaration, means is that the deliberate delay or withholding of independence shall no longer be tolerated, having regard for the greatly accelerated pace of developments in the world today, the irrepressible aspirations of peoples for political and economic emancipation, and the irreversible march of history.

193. The heart of the forty-two-Power draft declaration [A/L.323 and Add.1-5], however, is to be found in the words:

"The General Assembly,

"Solemnly proclaims the necessity of bringing to a speedy and unconditional end colonialism in all its forms and manifestations;

"And to this end

"Declares that:

"1. The subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights, is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and is an impediment to the promotion of world peace and co-operation."

194. By these forthright affirmations, we make it indubitably clear that we intend this declaration to apply to all subjugated peoples in any part of the world, whether in front of the iron and bamboo curtains, or behind them, whether dominated and exploited overtly or covertly by the methods of classical imperialism or neo-imperialism.

195. We have no tears to shed as yet for the old colonial imperialism that has died. Of it we can say truly that the sooner it is finally liquidated, the better for mankind. But equally we have no words of welcome to offer to the new colonial imperialism that is arising to take its place. We feel we have a duty to warn peoples against the new colonialism which is seeking to impose itself upon weak peoples by force or upon unsuspecting nations by stealth. Constant vigilance is our only weapon against the resurgence of the old colonialism that is dying as well as against the new colonialism that is coming to birth.

196. By adopting the African-Asian draft declaration we shall give proof of our capacity to see through pretence and hypocrisy. We shall proclaim the integrity of our own judgement, uninfluenced by pity or flattery. We shall give notice to the neo-imperialists and to the crypto-imperialists that we are not prepared to accept any lessons from them in the matter of winning freedom and independence. But should they persist in the attempt we shall be constrained to say unto them: What you now do to destroy the freedom of human beings and the independence of peoples is so loud, so deafening, that we cannot hear what you say.

197. Mr. PALAMARCHUK (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) (translated from Russian): The General Assembly is discussing the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. The vast dome of this chamber seems to have swelled with the passionate, emotional appeal for the complete and final elimination of the colonial régime in all its forms and manifestations. For the first time since its foundation the United Nations is resolutely declaring its convictions, intentions and demands to assist the still oppressed peoples in the colonies to win freedom and independence. The wise and vibrant words of the Soviet Union Declaration [A/4502 and Corr.1], to the effect that "peoples that oppress other peoples cannot be free", should be carved in gold letters in the granite entrance to the United Nations.

198. For several days now page after page has been read out from this rostrum telling with anger, conviction and pride of the broken chains of colonialism in Asia; of the great awakening in Africa; of the bonfires of independence already kindled and burning under the blue skies of Africa; of the disgrace of our century—the remains of the colonial system in the ancient lands of Africa and Asia, on the islands of Oceania and the shores of the Caribbean, where colonialism is still rampant. Land and people, one hundred million people, still bear the colonial yoke of slavery.

199. The calm voices of the representatives of Africa and Asia conceal tremendous strength, the strength of struggle. Its slogan is, as it always has been, "independence and freedom". But the cunning yet cowardly lackeys of imperialism and even the colonialists themselves, with obvious dissimulation and a certain malicious intent, all sing the same tune about the aims and ideas of the Soviet Declaration: be on your guard, they say, the Soviet Declaration is a call for revolt.

200. One might think that the fires of popular revolt had never blazed forth in Africa and Asia; that struggle is not a natural expression of protest against national and social oppression but a sort of export commodity, presented moreover in the form of a "dangerous" declaration.

201. But it is useless to dissimulate: whoever puts chains on other persons, countries or peoples kindles the sacred flame of struggle in their hearts. Struggle, not submission. Struggle, not non-resistance to that most terrible evil, colonialism. It is this struggle, nothing else, that is pushing forward the frontiers of independence and freedom in Asia and Africa and in other parts of the world.

202. It is the duty of the free peoples, of the whole United Nations to help the still oppressed peoples to remove the barbed wire of colonialism wherever it still remains, protecting stagnation against progress, slavery against freedom, darkness against light. The citadels of the old order have always collapsed whenever the burden of the obsolescent became intolerable, whenever the old garments became too tight for the mighty and growing human society.

203. The great October Socialist Revolution in our country was the result of mankind's century-old struggle for freedom and progress. The revolutionary explosion of indignation of the multi-million masses of the former Russian empire was prepared by the whole course of historical development. A new era, an era of liberation of the working people from all forms of oppression—colonial, national and social—was born in the world to testify to the fact that mankind had become mature enough for the greatest historic accomplishments.

204. A most important constitutional instrument adopted by the young Soviet Republic—the "Declaration of the rights of toiling and exploited mankind"—proclaimed the elimination of all exploitation of man by man and repudiated the policy of enslavement by so-called chosen nations of "hundreds of millions of the toiling population in Asia, in the colonies generally and in the small countries". In the new historical conditions, that Declaration emphasized with particular force the need for a radical solution of the colonial problem in favour of the enslaved nations. Immediately after the victory of the October Socialist Revolution, the founder of the Soviet State, the great Lenin, expressed the firm conviction that the time was near when

"the popular masses of the East will rise as independent participants, as creators of a new life, because hundreds of millions of these populations belong to the dependent, under-privileged nations which, as far as capitalist culture and civilization are concerned, exist only as material for fertilizer".^{2/}

^{2/} V. I. Lenin, Collected Works (Russian edition), vol. 30, pp. 138-139.

205. These words of Lenin, which sparkle with the clarity of his thought and foresight, are extremely noteworthy today. They can provide the key to understanding the reasons why the imperialists plunder the colonies and seek to maintain the colonial régimes, and also to understanding the fear which besets certain representatives of the colonial Powers in this Assembly. You will recall with what haste the United Kingdom representative, despite the staidness of the British character, used every effort to banish from his sight, like an apparition, the demands of the Soviet Union's Declaration. Such was his haste, indeed, that he declared his sympathy—whether warm or not, I cannot say—for the voices of Africa and Asia which, at the time he began to speak, he had not yet heard, as they had not spoken. I do not reproach him for this: I merely note the fact.

206. Subsequently, in the usual Western fashion, he lost his footing in the slippery task of contrasting the ideas, arguments and aims of the Soviet Declaration and those of the African-Asian countries, as he attempted in fact to dissociate those countries from the socialist countries with respect to their common views on the question of the complete and immediate liquidation of colonialism. These are favourite, though, to tell the truth, excessively straightforward tactics, that are being employed with particular emphasis at this session of the General Assembly. However, let the United Kingdom representative be heartened that, as he thinks, the African and Asian Members of the United Nations "do not . . . regard the Soviet contribution to our debates as a particularly serious one". May God grant him his daily illusion on this score! His statement, however, the Ukrainian delegation most firmly believes, makes one think of a straw in the flood of accusatory denunciations of the remnants of the colonial system and demands for their prompt liquidation. For that, indeed, is the whole tenor and burden of the discussion that is taking place in the Assembly in connexion with the submission by the Soviet Union Government, for the Assembly's consideration, of the historic Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples [A/4502 and Corr.1].

207. To return, however, to the main point: the peoples of Asia and Africa have awakened and are acting in the interests of the destiny of all mankind. That is now an irrefutable fact. Colonialism today, raised to the highest degree of parasitism, is the source of the peoples' calamities and sufferings. It plunders and sucks the blood of the peoples and places a blank wall between them and progressive development. During the years of their domination the colonial Powers have wrung untold wealth out of the subjugated countries. In the period 1955-1958, for instance, Belgium had a favourable payments balance in its trade with the Congo amounting to 373 million pounds sterling. Of this sum only 82 million pounds went back to the Congo in the same period. This means that in four years the clear profit extorted from the colony amounted to the enormous sum of 291 million pounds.

208. According to the most modest estimates, the United States monopolies made a profit of more than $1,500 million in Africa alone in the post-war years 1946-1959, a sum sufficient to pay for the construction of more than one hundred and fifty 100,000-kilowatt power stations for the Africans.

209. For many decades, throughout the entire history of colonialism indeed, the economy of the colonial countries has remained dreadfully backward, and the colonialists are doing everything possible to perpetuate that condition. In all the African colonies and the dependent countries two economic sectors have been created, which differ both socio-economically and nationally: they are the highly-organized capitalist economy of the Europeans, in which foreign capital predominates, and the wretched subsistence and petty-commodity economy of the indigenous population. The foreign monopolies doom the economy of the countries they exploit to unnatural one-sided development, use the colonies as sources of cheap raw materials and labour, and pitilessly exploit them by means of an unbalanced system of trade between the countries.

210. However, as already stated, the plundering of the colonies is not only directed against productive capital. The colonial countries are doing everything possible to deny the colonies and under-developed countries access to the world market and are endeavouring to dominate completely the foreign trade and much of the domestic trade of the colonies, amassing great wealth in the process. For instance, in 1951 the cost of a ton of oil extracted in Kuwait was 73 cents, while the same oil was sold on the world market at the price of the most expensive oil, $US17-18 per ton. In other words, the monopolies earned a profit of 2,000 per cent on each ton.

211. The colonialists are thus reaping a rich harvest, while the colonial peoples are becoming impoverished and are falling further and further below the level of the highly-developed countries.

212. I should like to draw the attention of representatives to an interesting document—the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories [A/4371]. This report was prepared pursuant to resolution 1461 (XIV) of the United Nations General Assembly. The Committee set itself the task of formulating observations and conclusions on the progress achieved by the inhabitants of the so-called Non-Self-Governing Territories in the past fifteen years. The objective sense of the Committee's report is that the so-called Non-Self-Governing Territories essentially have the status of colonies, with all the ensuing consequences. The Committee reached the conclusion that to this day "the economy of the Territories remained, in general, at a low stage of development, based mainly on subsistence agriculture and, also, on the production of a few primary products for export" [A/4371, part two, para. 45]. The economy of these Territories is doomed to stagnation, since "the production of capital goods remained in its infancy" [ibid., para. 46]. The report contains striking illustrations of the fact that, in its words, "the per caput personal incomes of the indigenous population of the African Territories for which data were available for 1956 or 1957 were among the lowest in the world" [ibid., para. 53], and that there is an enormous disparity, measurable in factors of ten, between the incomes of the Territory's various population groups—and not, of course, in favour of the indigenous Africans, i.e., the indigenous population of the colonies. The report also acknowledges many other equally eloquent facts: the weakening of family ties among the indigenous population, an increase in juvenile delinquency, unemployment and underemployment, the spread of dreadful diseases, in many places widespread illiteracy, deprivation of rights and racial discrimination.

213. Can such a situation be tolerated any longer? No, it cannot, if we cherish the interests of the cause of peace, the interests of humanity and progress.

214. Each year the United Nations receives thousands of petitions from the inhabitants of so-called Trust Territories. These petitions are often the only form in which the dependent peoples can appeal to the international community for help. There are 20,000 such petitions buried in the dusty archives of the United Nations which should rather be published in millions of copies.

215. One of these petitions states that in South West Africa there is an organization known as the South West Africa Native Labour Association. This Association is authorized to sell (I emphasize the word sell) Africans from the Native reservations outside the territory.

216. I shall now quote from another petition:

"At this moment when the General Assembly of the United Nations is going into the details of colonial matters and discussing colonial administration in dependent overseas territories, we, the peoples' representatives of the British crown colony of British Guiana, would like to draw the attention of the Honourable delegates to our unfortunate plight.

Hereby we, the frustrated people of British Guiana... take the opportunity of presenting our case before this world assembly. We want political independence. We want to run our national affairs, political, social and economic, according to the wishes and aspirations of our people and for a better Guiana. We place here before the Honourable delegates no indictment, as our intention is not of impeaching British imperialism. We only endeavour to show our national wounds, which the shoe of colonialism has made into our body politic. Ours is a cry of mortal agony and what we request is that Great Britain be asked by this distinguished assembly to be great enough and lift her shoe because where the shoe rests there happens to be more than half a million feeble Guianese throats."

217. There are other documents too, the documents of the Conference of Independent African States that was held at Accra. The Conference heard moving reports by representatives of the participating organizations of the brutal deeds of colonialism and imperialism on the African continent. It was told that through the activities of the imperialists the Africans have been deprived of the basic human rights, freedom of speech, of assembly, of movement, freedom to live in plenty. Wherever the remains of the colonial system persist there is dreadful poverty, denial of rights to oppressed peoples, the savage rule of ignorance and violence, and people dying off like burnt grass. Only those whose hearts are made of stone and who today stand guard for colonialism close their ears to this.

218. Document A/AC.73/3, which has been distributed to this Assembly, contains a number of statements which, we think, should also be published in a great many copies so that the whole world may see the foul visage of the champions of the colonial system. One of these statements alleges that "'Apartheid' is to the black people a perfectly comprehensible system which they employ among themselves" [A/AC.73/3, petition No. 10]. In another equally shameful statement it is frankly asserted that "Once the natives govern themselves, we are convinced that the history of Africa will be turned back by 100 to 200 years" [ibid., petition No. 20].

219. In order to ensure that history is not "turned back", crimes are committed. The conscience of mankind winces at these crimes, whether committed in Algiers, in South West Africa or in the Republic of the Congo. Judging by the nature of the events that are taking place there, the Republic of the Congo has been chosen as a testing ground in which to raise the tree of neo-colonialism, no less poisonous than colonialism itself. Renegades of the Mobutu type are ploughing this ground with weapons. The example of the Republic of the Congo makes it clear to all that colonial fascism and neo-colonialism are twins and are attempting to stifle everything live, independent and national in the colonial countries.

220. A long time ago a "Tree of Liberty" was planted in American soil liberated from the British colonialists, and Thomas Jefferson said that for the tree to grow it had to be refreshed with the blood of tyrants. From American soil we have heard the fiery words of Walt Whitman who declared that a world in which masters and slaves existed had grown old, and who passionately believed that a new and mighty race of men with firm and regular step would remove from our planet the traces of oppression of man by man.

221. Today, however, other voices are heard from the United States of America. According to reports, the United States Congress intends to spend several million dollars on propaganda in Africa in the 1960-1961 financial year. Several thousand United States missionaries have already entrenched themselves in a number of African countries and the messengers of all kinds of "charitable foundations", such as those of Ford and Rockefeller, have gone there in droves. With no sense of constraint Senator Cross openly declared in the United States Congress that a propaganda campaign must be prepared for the African continent, so as to open up that vast new region where wealth lay waiting to be mined. With even greater candour the Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs said that the United States would soon be able to make up for the comparative lack of success of its policy in Asia and the Middle East, that Africa afforded it the opportunity to get its revenge. What is involved, then, is the United States desire to establish its political, economic and military domination over Africa. Neo-colonialism, daubed with the paint and powder of imperialism, is being implanted to replace the old colonialism that is now discredited forever.

222. The words "get revenge" are a faithful reflection of policy and, behind this policy, of practical action being taken inside and outside the United States. Life, of course, teaches even the colonialists something: it has taught them—not all of them perhaps—to seek to gain their ends by more subtle methods. Today they do not say: colonialism is a boon and do not dare ask for its abolition. In their lexicon the words "independence" and "self-government" are employed only as indicating mere intentions that relate to the remote future. One speaker quite clearly and definitely indicated that there were no differences of intention between the colonialist Powers and the countries of Asia and Africa; there were differences as to the methods and sometimes the time for granting independence and freedom.

223. But they have long been singing these odes to good intentions that have no reference to time, while the date for the complete elimination of the colonial régime is being deferred on various ridiculous and, I might say, demagogic pretexts. That precisely is the crux of the differences of principle. At one pole stand the colonial countries with their intentions, at the other pole the countries demanding immediate elimination of the colonial system. The declaration of the African-Asian countries [A/L.323 and Add.1-5], like that of the Soviet Union, solemnly proclaims the necessity of bringing to a speedy and unconditional end colonialism in all its forms and manifestations. What need then was there for the draft resolution of Honduras [A/L.324]? It was needed by those who stand behind Honduras, and who they are it is not hard to guess. Its purpose is to prevent, if possible, the adoption of the declaration and thus prolong the life of the colonial system. Our delegation—and I say this with full respect for the countries of Latin America—would be greatly disturbed to learn that the Honduran draft resolution expresses the views of all Latin American countries.

224. That draft resolution in fact repeats the demagogic and slanderous assertion that the colonies are not prepared for self-government, that they lack the political and social leadership necessary to enable them to assume the functions of government.

225. The draft resolution, of course, proclaims the elimination of colonialism throughout the world. But it does not indicate when the eradication of this blot on the twentieth century is to take place. It is not difficult to understand that once again it is a question of intentions, and in order to mask those intentions it is proposed that a commission should be appointed. What is this commission to do? It is to visit the colonial possessions and draft recommendations for proposal to the General Assembly at its sixteenth session. Recommendations about what? About the most appropriate, expeditious and effective way of achieving the complete abolition of colonialism. This is a mere meaningless collection of words. The same thing has happened before in the United Nations: as soon as it is desired to block any sound and progressive action by the Organization, a heavy-weight draft resolution, like that of Honduras, is got ready. For some delegations, perhaps, such a draft resolution is a sort of safety-valve or a shadow in which they can hide conveniently. For its part, however, the Ukrainian delegation wishes to state clearly that the Honduran draft resolution is unacceptable from beginning to end. We cannot support a draft resolution which has as its aim not the elimination of colonialism but merely the ascertaining, the verification of the readiness of the colonies for independence and self-government.

226. The peoples fighting for their liberation and the establishment of genuine independence have a tremendous strength which is set against all the cowardly stratagems of the colonialists and neo-colonialists. That strength is unity and solidarity. At Bandung, the Asian and African States formulated the basic principles of African-Asian solidarity. That solidarity is based on a common hatred of colonialism in whatever form; a common hatred of racism; and a common desire for the preservation and consolidation of peace in the world. Since that time there have been similar meetings of the fighting peoples, at Accra, Tunis and Conakry. The voice of Latin America, embodied in the ardent appeals of the Havana Declaration, has reverberated throughout the world.

227. At the present time, on the initiative of the Soviet Union—a country of peace, a country of true fraternity and friendship of peoples, a country which, in the words of a distinguished leader of modern Asia, has laid the foundation of a new civilization in which the world can move ahead—the almost one hundred States represented in the United Nations are considering and discussing with deep emotion the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. The liberation of nations and peoples from colonial domination will bring about an improvement in international relations and a strengthening of peace. The struggle of the colonial peoples for liberation cannot be halted. As Nikita Sergeevich Khrushchev said in his statement at the present session of the General Assembly, "it is a great historic process, one of ever-growing and invincible power". We say, and we repeat, that full independence and freedom must be given to the peoples of the colonies and the Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, not some time in the future, but today, without delay.

228. The free people and Government of independent Soviet Ukraine stand side by side and shoulder to shoulder with all free peoples and give full and unqualified support to the lofty ideas and aims of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples.

229. Mr. CHAMPASSAK (Laos) (translated from French): The reason why my delegation feels impelled to take part in the discussion of the problem of granting independence to the colonial peoples is that it believes that the problem of colonialism is of exceptional importance. Some of the speakers who have preceded me have stressed that it was infamous that the colonialist scourge should still exist. Others have emphasized the progressive disappearance of colonialism and also the appearance of this scourge in a new form, aimed at perpetuating the domination of one country by another and the exploitation of man by man. They have all adduced abundant proof that colonialism in all its forms is a danger to international peace and security.

230. After the Second World War great waves of nationalism beat on the continent of Asia, shaking the colonial positions that had stood so firm in the past. Nearly a thousand million men have recovered their outraged dignity and freedom. There can be no doubt that the San Francisco Charter, proclaimed amid the rejoicing at the end of the Second World War, has accelerated the process of decolonization, because of its moral bases. The policy of the traditionally anti-colonialist countries, rapid technical progress and the increasing exchange of ideas have made the positions of the colonialist Powers untenable. Under the combined influence of these different factors, empires have broken up more quickly.

231. The Bandung Conference of 1955, which was a historic milestone in the relations of the peoples of Africa and Asia, gave a new impetus to the liberation movement in Africa.

232. After Asia, Africa, with all its wealth and human potential, is awaking to international life and, as every speaker here has stressed, quite rightly, 1960 is Africa's year. By its dynamic energy, Africa has already made an important contribution to our work.

233. Except for a few isolated areas where the colonialists are dominant and still the law-makers, it may be said that this is the end of the colonialist era. These few areas still exist, but the deeply rooted emancipation movement will soon sweep them away. For in this era of interdependence and of a peace that is one and indivisible, a dying colonialism can hardly survive.

234. The Laotian people, belonging to a Buddhist country, have always found all forms of domination, whether ideological or material, utterly repugnant. We feel that humiliation is worse than poverty, that a man can get used to hunger but never to humiliation. However, brought up on principles of tolerance and humanism, we refuse to look only at the dark side of this problem.

235. We strongly support the peoples who are struggling for freedom and independence. We feel that it is only through self-determination that the political consciousness of the oppressed peoples can be changed and harmony re-established. We are convinced the emancipation movement is irresistible and irreversible, but we are opposed to those who foster hatred, who use violent slogans for social or racial ends, or merely to divert attention from political difficulties, for we feel that these are debased ways of thinking which are incompatible with moral principles.

236. Let us take care, however, not to let ourselves be involved in demonstrations of hysterical racism through hatred of colonialism. It is not enough to denounce colonialism in verbal fireworks; the reasons for its continued existence must be removed so that it cannot return. Racism and xenophobia are in our opinion the two keynotes on which the supporters of colonialism play in an attempt to resuscitate their past grandeur and superiority. If such feelings were outlawed, the colonial Powers would be forced increasingly into isolation, and the very germs of colonialism would be destroyed. Newly acquired independence must not develop into blind dependence, for there is no alternative to freedom. We feel that the battle against colonialism must be fought at the same time as the battle for social well-being and economic progress, for to combat colonialism on only one front, while neglecting the problem of hunger and ignorance, would be useless and worse than a crime.

237. Our anti-colonialism must not blind us to the political designs of any ideological bloc which is trying to capture the new States while they are still weak and at a loss, and either bring them directly within its orbit or turn them into useful clients. Any State that falls into the traps set by this new imperialism runs the risk of becoming a mere cog in a machine. In that case, the independence for which it has struggled would be only second-class independence.

238. In the view of my delegation it would be pointless to indulge in controversy if we have not the same concept of freedom and human dignity. If the freedom and equality of peoples has not the same meaning, the same significance, everywhere, if it is merely an export for the consumption of the poor and ignorant masses, to serve the cause of certain interests, then there is no point in passionately fighting the ancient scourge of colonialism here in the United Nations.

239. Our way to peace and harmony will always be strewn with obstacles as long as there are nations which, for all their talk of peace, freedom and emancipation, are really dreaming only of extending their pride and power beyond their frontiers either by force of arms, or by cunning and subversion, a worse evil than colonialism itself. These nations, over-sure of their philosophy, convinced that they have the key of the future and imbued with missionary spirit, use any means, even the most brutal, to impose their domination. These Powers, which are trying to give us a new version of the colonial saga, must be told that the dissolution of the colonial empires has now gone so far that only the most conciliatory and imaginative liberalism can replace past obligations by freely accepted links. The necessary adjustments must be made through a dispassionate appraisal of the present relationships between the Powers, by redefining interest, so that it excludes vulgar concepts of national grandeur, in order to re-establish confidence, friendship and peace.

240. My delegation is one of the sponsors of the forty-two-Power draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-5] which has been submitted to this Assembly for its consideration. It believes that the structure and ideas of this draft resolution are a faithful reflection of the noble principles of the United Nations Charter. It hopes that the draft resolution will be adopted by the largest possible majority.

AGENDA ITEM 87

Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial

1. Mr. TSATSOS (Greece) (translated from French):
The colonial era is a recent stage of world history the last vestiges of which are rapidly disappearing from the face of the earth. That is a fact that no one doubts today, and from that fact certain problems arise. But before examining them, and in order to dispel any misunderstandings—which are all the more undesirable as the atmosphere in which we live is already heavy with suspicion—it might be useful to define the historical notion of colonies and colonialism.

2. The modern understanding of the term "colony" is very different from what it was in ancient times. A colony is the result of the forceful domination by an organized people having its own territory—hence a State—over a people living in another territory, irrespective of the legal form the domination takes and the organization it involves. "Colonialism" is the body of circumstances relating to the establishment and maintenance of colonies in modern times. This definition of "colony" and "colonialism" may be too narrow for some to accept, but it has the advantage of not giving rise to serious controversy. It should be added that colonialism is not the only possible form of domination of one people by another. Anyone who fails to condemn such domination in all its forms must be lacking in logic and moral consistency.

3. Oddly enough, before colonialism has quite disappeared, we already know the moral judgement that history will pass on it. To the extent that it impeded instead of hastening the development of peoples, it was one of the worst forms of domination of man by man, and in that sense it was a prolongation of slavery. But to the extent that it enabled the colonial peoples to attain a higher cultural and social level, colonialism was a positive factor in world evolution. In any case, it is now fated to disappear, and on this world public opinion is in unanimous agreement, for I do not suppose that there is a single nation in our great world family which wishes to or can contend that there is or could still be any justification for colonialism.

4. The ending of a historical era always raises the same problem: What should be remembered and what forgotten? Generally speaking, the memories of colonialism evoke in the minds of all peoples, but especially those that have been colonized, a profound bitterness, the legitimacy of which cannot be denied.

This bitterness disturbs the unanimity with which the world conscience today pronounces its condemnation of colonialism. To be able to forget the evil done to us is sometimes a necessity. It is an especially vital necessity in politics. And it is particularly important today, at least for those who have no psychological complexes to blind their eyes and divert them from their goals and who truly wish to strengthen the unity needed to hold the international community together and maintain world peace.

5. No one could possibly doubt that the principle of freedom for individuals and peoples cannot be deemed to have been realized in practice if it has been applied in only one part of the world. It is only when it is world-wide and the entire globe is mantled in its royal purple, that this freedom will become a reality. This no one would venture to deny. Indeed, that declaration itself gives us a glimpse of one of the finest victories awaiting mankind, a victory which will be all the greater because it will be won, and won gloriously, under the sole moral impetus of the idea of freedom.

6. It will be recalled that in the two Americas, both North and South, colonialism yielded before the patriots' boldness and courage and before the force of arms. Later, in Asia, it had to beat a retreat mainly because of the magnificent moral resistance displayed by the Asian peoples. Finally, in Africa, the accession to independence of so many peoples, whose worthy representatives we are proud to have among us today, was due to part, of course, to these peoples' resolve to win their place among the free nations, but it was also partly the result of the ripening in Europe of the great liberal and peace-minded climate of opinion that led to the political changes which are bringing the colonial era to a close. It would be both unjust and dangerous to try to overlook this fact which, moreover, as we are bound to admit, offers the only genuine guarantee of the final and enduring victory of freedom in a world without war.

7. The end of colonialism in Africa and wherever else it still clings on is only a matter of time. No one doubts this, but it would be ingenuous to believe that the end can be instantaneous. To undo the evil, while taking pains to preserve the good, to remove what has been accumulated over many decades, is an operation on the largest scale, and if it is to succeed it must be executed without procrastination but also with prudence and with a deep sense of responsibility. Each case has features particular to it. The Charter itself provides for several different paths of development. What is essential is to guarantee that in each case the decisive factor is the freely expressed will of the people. That is the common denominator in this vast operation to sweep away the remnants of colonialism. Those who claim that a lightning attack on colonialism could be carried out on a world scale are setting an impossible goal for themselves. We trust that the course of our debate will demonstrate that it is not the wish of the Assembly to compromise the possible by demanding the impossible.

8. But if the end of what remains of colonialism cannot be instantaneous, it can—and since it can, it must—be rapid. Furthermore, it must be recognized that to the extent that this process is not moving along at the accelerated pace one might wish, the blame for it rests in the first instance with certain colonial Powers which have adopted a policy running counter to the current of history and to the real interests of these Powers themselves, viewed in the light of their own future. Hence it is the bounden duty of all colonial Powers to speed up the emancipation of the peoples still under their domination and to do this by stages, on the basis of a detailed plan. I should like to repeat that this is not only the bounden duty of the colonial Powers, but it is also in their own interests, for only in this way can they give decisive proof of their good faith, proof that they are acting not by force of circumstances but because their own conscience makes it morally necessary for them to put an end to colonialism as quickly as possible.

9. If to achieve this goal the colonial Powers need our confidence, let us give it to them. I am thinking not of a mere gesture. My argument runs deeper than that. If the African victory had been won on African soil alone, if it had not become part and parcel of the European conscience, the confidence I speak of could justly be withheld. But, as I have pointed out, the African victory was won not only in Africa itself but also in Europe. I believe this fact to be of capital importance. It enables us to see the problem, as it will develop in the future, in its true perspective, and this is the only consideration which should occupy our minds if we are to deal constructively with the question of wiping out colonialism. The fact that colonialism was fought on its own ground, that public opinion in the colonial Powers is almost unanimously opposed to the unjustified perpetuation of a system which the course of history has condemned, assures us not only that it will disappear, but that its disappearance will be quick and irrevocable. No Government, no power on earth can oppose this moral force which springs from the very depths of the popular conscience, a conscience which is by nature liberal.

10. The political maturity and the excellent grasp of history and sociology displayed by the representatives of the new African States give proof of the advancement of the African élite and demonstrate the possibility of a general development of their peoples. But we must note that there is a difference between the levels of political development and economic development achieved in a number of the former colonies. This gives rise to a problem which is very difficult to solve. What must be said, and said with emphasis, is that political independence must not be delayed until a corresponding degree of economic development has been attained. Consequently, the nations which have achieved a high degree of economic development bear a moral obligation—whose urgency is no whit lessened by its nature—to help the African world to develop its economy without interfering politically and without seeking any direct benefit. By acting in this way, countries would in the long run be accomplishing a double purpose: they would be acting at once justly and in their own interests, because it is only by bringing the African world, on a footing of equality, as an active factor, into the world economy that a more stable and highly developed world economy can be achieved.

11. Although I am an Athenian, and proud of it, I have a high regard for Sparta and laconic speech. I have tried to be brief, and I have but a few words to add. I know that there was a time, and it was not so long ago, when the word "never" would have been the only reply—tinged possibly with some contempt—to idealists who might have undertaken an anti-colonialist campaign and asserted then what all of us nowadays regard as an obvious truth. But those who are an active element in the shaping of world history should know that it is a serious mistake to use the word "never".

12. Ancient Greece created the idea of liberty and the ideal of democracy. We are proud of that. But we are even prouder of the example which, ever since its rebirth at the beginning of the last century, modern Greece has given to the world by its sacrifices and its devotion to the ideas of liberty and human dignity. The Greek nation greets the end of colonialism as a human conquest of world-wide importance, to the achievement of which it has contributed to the fullest extent of its ability.

13. Mr. PETER (Hungary): As an introduction to what I am going to say I wish to invoke an old African proverb: "When minds are the same, that which is far off will come." The saying goes back to the ancient life of the East-African peoples. It is still current in the Swahili language and has a direct application to this debate.

14. By quoting this ancient proverb I wish to pay at least symbolic tribute to the living heritage in the thinking of peoples emerging from the shadows of colonial ages. However long and disastrous the centuries of slavery were in many parts of the colonial territories, old human traditions were preserved everywhere in the form of legends, songs, proverbs, written or engraved words, popular customs and monuments—all rich in cultural values. The peoples have not forgotten their own ancient history. It is being transmitted orally from generation to generation. We are already and will go on witnessing a resurgence of national life, a revival of old cultural values with the coming of independence and a rebirth of the consciousness of peoples everywhere, which will be effectively instrumental in shaping the economic and political life in the new age of their existence. This national renaissance will add to the cultural treasure of the family of nations as a whole.

15. The proverb I have just quoted expresses something essential regarding the present collapse of the colonial system. A few years ago one could hardly have imagined the speed with which the peoples of the old colonial territories would regain their freedom and independence. Among the many factors which have contributed toward this happy development, one of the most striking has been the joint effort of those who for generations have struggled against colonial rule. The minds of peoples and those of their national leaders have become the same and so that which seemed to be far off has come.

16. Now, in the present debate in this Organization, we are about to achieve an even greater unity of all minds and forces in order to complete the liquidation of every kind of colonial rule. The peoples of Africa and Asia have become so strong and united in their struggle for independence that they would be powerful enough to rid themselves by force of what is left from old colonial times. The very fact that this session of the General Assembly is debating this question shows that there is a real possibility of a peaceful solution of remaining problems. The greater the unity of minds willing to put a definite end to colonial rule, the brighter will be the prospects of finding an immediate and peaceful solution to all colonial problems. In this connexion we may say that when minds are the same here in this hall, that which is still far off will soon be reached.

17. We should find it easier to reach a common understanding if we could all accept the same interpretation of the colonial system which peoples having experienced colonial rule for generations are giving to it. For beyond all its connotations the word "colonialism" has two essential meanings. These two meanings are confronting each other in this debate whenever the discussion becomes controversial. The meaning of colonialism is not the same for the colonial Powers and their successors as it is for the peoples under colonial rule. For the colonial Powers there is nothing dishonest in colonialism. Not so long ago in Europe the possession of as many colonies as possible was one of the main criteria for the international and worldwide authority of some States. As a child under the late Austro-Hungarian Empire, I saw that beyond subjugating a whole series of nationalities, one of the main objectives was to acquire by conquest or otherwise the richest possible territories in Asia or Africa for colonial administration. The attack in the thirties by Mussolini's Italy on Ethiopia was one of the last displays of appetite for colonial territories. Unfortunately, those bad old days are not entirely past. There are still governments which do not consider it dishonest to have colonial offices and ministries for colonial affairs, and to train officials to regard it as an honour to serve in a colonial administration.

18. But the other aspect of colonialism is entirely, essentially different, in fact just the opposite. In the eyes of peoples that have experienced colonial rule, colonialism is the most detestable evil of human life. It would be worth while to reiterate what has been already said by Asian and African delegations about the tragic conditions of colonial times, because for the sake of a better future it is as well not to forget the past and the vestiges of the past. Yet I will not do so. Instead, I will sum up the general impressions left by their statements.

19. If human sufferings were measurable and comparable experiences, it could be argued that centuries of colonial slavery had caused human societies even more suffering, loss, devastation and impoverishment than all the wars fought during the whole history of mankind, and let us add that wars have mostly been fought against peoples under colonial rule and at their expense. But even if human sufferings are not comparable the comparison has its meaning, and it does stand to indicate what colonialism meant to those familiar with its inside story.

20. Any resolution resulting from this debate can have real value and can mean effective help to peoples under colonial rule only if it is based on a true interpretation of the meaning of colonialism as understood by those whose fate lay or still lies under the shadow of colonialism. Both the declaration presented by the Government of the Soviet Union [A/4502] and the draft resolution submitted by a number of States [A/L.323 and Add 1-5] are based on this interpretation. The latter should be made to coincide more closely with the former mainly as regards the means of implementation. The more delegations there are which understand the real meaning of colonialism as seen by the peoples of the colonial territories, the greater will be the possibility of formulating the results of this debate in such a way as to be really effective against colonial domination.

21. Mr. President, before venturing to suggest the main characteristics of a possible resolution likely to prove effective, I should like, with your kind permission, to say a few words about the basic principle guiding my delegation in the common effort to achieve the best possible results from this discussion. Only one motivation is justifiable in the eyes of those on whose behalf this whole debate has been initiated—only one, namely, the consciousness of human solidarity. All the delegations which in this debate have stood up for the immediate liquidation of all the remains of the colonial past have borne witness to deep human solidarity. The best guarantee of a helpful attitude in this matter is unconditional solidarity with those peoples for whose sake this item has been placed on the agenda. Any attempt to avoid or postpone an effective resolution or to sidetrack the debate indicates that the true feeling of human solidarity has relinquished its decisive role and certain other interests have taken its place—interests alien to the cause of liquidating all types of colonial rule. Mr. President, as you may know, the Secretary-General was good enough to provide an excellent illustration of this attitude by distributing a so-called report by an extremely distinguished special representative. But I do not wish to elaborate on this point. On the basis of human solidarity an effective stand by the General Assembly on the problems of colonial countries and peoples should be characterized by a genuine and meaningful document designed to avert all possible attempts at embellishing the picture of colonialism and to condemn unreservedly the ages of colonialism and make it clear that the United Nations will not tolerate colonial rule any longer.

22. To embellish the picture serves no justifiable or unjustifiable purpose. It does not even serve the interests of the colonial Powers. It is no use trying to embellish the picture. The peoples familiar with the intimate picture of colonialism will never accept any misrepresentation of that true picture. It may be that persons of colonial origin who have lost every organic contact with their peoples will be taken in by such embellishments, but it will be impossible to mislead the peoples themselves. On the contrary, any attempt at embellishment merely helps to aggravate the situation in every respect, both in the colonial territories and in the United Nations also. Here is an example to illustrate this.

23. A recent report by an American (Negro) writer on the situation in Africa, based on a journey to Africa last summer, gives an astonishing account of a talk with a white settler in Kenya who is a political figure, and even a person of some importance, having taken part in the Lancaster House conference. Speaking to this American (Negro) writer about the prospects in Kenya, he said:

"I think Kenya should be independent. I think the Africans must one day run the country. But first I think the British Government should give us £10 million to launch a full-scale education programme for these Africans. That will take from ten to twenty years. That is the only way to do it. I have said this on the floor of Parliament and I have told it to the Colonial Secretary. Now I realize I will get nowhere with this. So I have asked Mr. Mboya and his African friends to give us Europeans the following assurances: a promise that land and properties will not be confiscated once Africans are in control, and a promise that we will be free to send our children to schools of our own choice. And I have asked the British Government to impound certain Kenya money to guarantee that Africans will respect and honour such an agreement once it is made."^{1/}

I think it would be rather instructive to quote other parts of that talk, but I do not propose to do so as they are of an even more inflammatory character.

24. To realise all the dangerous and even tragic implications of such a tragicomic attitude, we must remember that the talk to which I have just referred took place in Nairobi, Kenya, at exactly the same time as the crisis which broke out in Leopoldville. The attitude of certain prominent figures in the colonial territories largely reflects that of the colonial Powers themselves and their allies, who thus make official or semi-official statements designed to redress the colonial past and present. All such attempts at embellishment will only provide new motives for renewed tragedies. The march of history hits back in a merciless way at all who venture to trifle with the real forces at work in a historical process.

25. Here is another example to illustrate my point, and which refers to an experience common to all of us in this hall.

26. During the last two or three weeks we have seen that on some controversial issues, for instance in connexion with the Congo, the Western Powers, although opposed by the majority of Asian and African delegations, have succeeded in attaining majority votes with the help of their military allies. The smell of victory has been in the air—and what a smell! But those who want to embellish the situation do not realize that such actions carried out against the common will of the majority of Asian and African States will only contribute to widening the gap and sharpening the contradictions between Asian and African countries and the Western Powers. If we, from the point of view of the socialist countries, looked upon these happenings in a cold-war spirit, we would feel gratified to see the way in which some Western Powers undermine their own relations with Asian and African countries. But we are not guided by a cold-war spirit. We are not gratified when we see many delegations from Asia and Africa becoming embittered by the power-policy of the cold war. No, we are not. We are so anxious for peaceful coexistence that we wish former colonies to be on good terms with their former colonial masters, on the basis of equality and mutual respect. We desire the peaceful coexistence of Cuba and the United States, of the two States of the Congo and France and Belgium, and so on. Hence, the illusions created by an embellishment of colonial conditions even work against the very interests of the Western Powers. To conclude: for the sake of peace, security and the peaceful coexistence of former colonies and former colonial Powers, a real, helpful and effective document should condemn the colonial systems, with a view to liquidating all their remains.

27. The second main characteristic of such a real, helpful and effective document, following logically from the condemnation of colonial rule, should be to stress the urgent need to liquidate all existing colonial systems. Any delay will only aggravate the situation. In the general debate on the subject in this hall, the First Secretary of the Socialist Workers' Party of Hungary, Mr. Janos Kádár, as Chairman of my delegation, spoke as follows:

"The foundations of the colonial system have been shaken so much that any attempt at obstructing the progress of liberation will not stop but accelerate it." [883rd meeting, para. 30].

Yes, accelerate it; any attempt to halt or divert this process will result in renewed forcible action on the part of peoples under colonial rule. In the present world situation real conditions prevail for an immediate and peaceful solution of these problems. It is not a sheer coincidence that this world Organization is dealing with problems of general and complete disarmament and problems of liquidating all kinds of colonial rule almost at the same time. The two issues are interdependent and the feasibility of both rests on the present international situation, where the new balance of power is in favour both of disarmament and the liquidation of the colonial system. In view of the great political, moral and material forces at the disposal of the Soviet Union and the socialist countries in general, present international relations are not such as to favour the colonial Powers if they try to thwart the independence movements of colonial peoples. The forces of the colonial peoples, together with those recently liberated in Asia and Africa, are so powerful that they could achieve their demands by forcible action, and this will certainly happen if the solution comes too late. And it is almost too late—as we see now from recent events in the Congo. The peoples of the former colonies and of those still existing, together with their leaders, would like to avoid the use of violence and to act in a peaceful way. If the present session of the General Assembly heeds the signs of the times, they will be helped to implement their goodwill. To conclude: for the sake of a peaceful solution, a real, helpful and effective document will make clear the urgent need for finding a solution to the problems of the colonial territories.

28. Many previous speakers have underlined how important it is that the proposal of the Soviet Union on the problem of colonialism as a whole should become a main concern of this Organization. The Government of the Soviet Union has thereby rendered a service not only to the colonial peoples by bringing their case to the attention of the General Assembly but also to this Organization, and even to the colonial Powers—even to them. This Organization has been given a great opportunity to say what it should so as to usher in a new era for all mankind, and the colonial Powers have been offered friendly aid in liquidating a dishonest heritage of the past in a decent, honest and peaceful way.

29. The results of re-establishing the independence of all colonial countries will be of tremendous benefit not only to the countries concerned but to all of us, and this for two reasons. This new situation will help to eliminate tensions and create more relaxed international relations beneficial to all countries, large and small, without exception. At the same time the family of nations will be enriched by the participation of the newly independent nations in international endeavours. Peoples and their representatives, inspired by their struggle for independence, peace and human existence, usually bring a powerful and constructive element into international organizations, and this promotes the honest solution of such controversial issues as peace, security and social progress. May I be allowed to express the hope that the present debate will serve this end.

30. The PRESIDENT: Before I call on the next speaker, may I intervene at this point to say that, according to the best information available to the Chair, if the Assembly were prepared to sit until sometime after 2 o'clock—which I think would not be later than 2.30 p.m.—it would be possible to dispose of the list of speakers inscribed for today and an afternoon meeting would not be necessary. The Chair would propose, with the agreement of the Assembly, to pursue this course.

It was so decided.

31. Mr. GARIN (Portugal): The important item being discussed now deserves the closest attention of my delegation—particularly because its common interpretation requires some points of clarification—and this is the reason for my intervention. Either directly or indirectly, many speakers from this rostrum during the present debate have attempted to include Portugal in the problem of the elimination of colonialism in the world. However, the more I heard about colonialism as an economic and political system, the more I heard about its fundamental characteristics and the different facets it presents, the more it became manifest that Portuguese nationhood was completely alien to the practice of colonialism. Whatever the confused reasonings, misunderstandings, innuendoes and insinuations advanced in good or bad faith by some, in connexion with the moral, political and juridical structure of my country, the fact remains that no type of colonialism is practised within the Portuguese nation.

32. Portugal has been for centuries a unitary nation and it has always been recognized as such by the international community. We are, like many other nations, multi-racial; our land and our people are dispersed over several continents, as is also the case with other nations. But we form only one unit, completely independent and solid—politically, juridically and socially, one country with the same strong national feeling. Nowhere in my country is there any subjugation of peoples to foreign domination because all our people, wherever they may live, are themselves the body and soul of the nation. From the point of view of economic initiative, no one part of the nation enjoys any special privilege or benefit with respect to other parts or to the whole, and all Portuguese nationals, whatever their race, origin or religion, enjoy identical economic privileges on a footing of absolute equality, wherever they may find themselves.

33. Juridically, there is no distinction among the Portuguese in any part of the nation in their enjoyment of Portuguese nationality, with its privileges and its opportunities. Whatever their origin, race or religion, the Portuguese have always found in the law the means of enjoying the same rights and opportunities and of holding the highest posts, whether in government or private enterprise, as well as in public and social life. A nation which has had as President of its Supreme Court of Justice in Lisbon a Portuguese national of a non-European race, born in an overseas province—not to speak of Cabinet Members and countless other high government officials—certainly is not a country which follows the tenets of colonialism. This tradition is long and deeply rooted; it was not improvised overnight to please some of the Members of this Assembly. It is a tradition of equality that has never faltered. The same fundamental human rights and freedoms are guaranteed to all nationals, and we draw justifiable pride from the fact that we have been pioneers of non-racism in the four corners of the globe during the last five centuries. On this score, we are certainly not prepared to accept lessons or advice from anybody, however well-meaning these may appear, especially from those who seem to have discovered only recently that racism constitutes disrespect for the will of God.

34. Politically as well as juridically, the Portuguese Overseas Provinces are, and always have been, an integral part of the nation and, as such, they enjoy administrative and financial autonomy and dispose entirely of their own revenues. Through their directly-elected representatives in the National Assembly, where they have been represented since 1821 when we held our first parliament after the Napoleonic wars, they play an active part in the formation and functioning of the central organs of sovereignty on a basis of absolute equality. This situation, resulting from a long historical process, is indeed remarkable, since it does not correspond to the outsider's preconceived ideas of paramount economic motives and feelings of racial pride which are often associated with the relations between peoples of different continents. The impartial observer, travelling in Portuguese territory, cannot fail to observe this complete identity between Portuguese populations of different races and religions, but with the same national ideal. The moral climate discerned by the impartial observer reflects the profound fact that only one nation exists in the minds of the people and is represented in their institutions and ways of life. Admittedly, the Portuguese nation presents a unique case which does not lend itself to alien standards of measurement—quite apart from the fact that such alien standards would not be applied for the benefit of our people, but for the selfish and hypocritical purposes of some outsiders. But here again, our particularism was not designed overnight as a matter of expediency; it sprang from the roots of our national character, was moulded by the circumstances of history, and consolidated in the centuries-old communion and brotherhood of our populations.

35. It was indeed a radically different process, an altogether different attitude, from that associated with the exploitation of the soil and sub-soil through commercial enterprises which did not call for permanent settlement by the European. In such cases, the States responsible for the administration of the territories concerned have always declared their intention of steering the local populations towards independence. When the Portuguese nation was set up and extended over other continents, usually on unoccupied or unused land, some very striking factors became apparent: to those peoples which had not yet conceived the idea of a homeland, it offered one; it also offered a common language, the guarantee of peace and an organized economic and community life without disrupting the indigenous way of life.

36. In his recent speech before the National Assembly in Lisbon, the President of the Council of Ministers of Portugal declared:

"The idea of racial superiority is not ours, but that of human brotherhood certainly is, as well as equality before the law based on the principle of equality of merit, as is proper to progressive societies.

"In all these territories the mingling of populations was intended to aid the process of forming a multi-racial society. The most important element, however, the truly essential one, lay in the spirit of familiar contact with local elements, the recognition of possibilities of access in economic and social life, the principles of a more advanced culture and a higher moral code that, even when isolated, was the rule of public and private behaviour. These means have necessarily exercised a slow action, but where a community has been formed with a certain degree of cohesion by them, then we can say that the task has been successful: the independence and equality of the peoples integrated with their territories into a national unity.

"Inspired by that same ideal, we worked in Brazil for over three hundred years and what is to be observed there is truly extraordinary. Brazil opens its doors to people from almost everywhere in the world and welds them into the variety of its population. It absorbs them, assimilates them, and yet does not lose any of its own spirit. There is no country to whose formation different races have contributed that can compare with Brazil in the matter of so complete an absence of racial prejudices in legislation, in political organization and in social conduct. Brazil is the greatest modern experiment in a multiracial society and is at the same time a magnificent example of the transposition of Western civilization into the tropics and onto the continent of America. Peaceful, stable, dynamically progressive, Brazil, even when it improves upon its own creations, does not need to deny its origins or its homeland.

"A multiracial society is therefore possible, whether of Luso-American stock, as in Brazil, on a Luso-Asiatic basis, as in Goa, or Luso-African, as we see in Angola and Mozambique.

"There is nothing, there has never been anything, which could lead one to accept the opposite conclusion. The simple fact is that such a society excludes any manifestation of racism—whether white, black or yellow—and calls for a long development and the toil of centuries, within the principles that underlie the Portuguese community".

37. Later in his speech before the Portuguese National Assembly, Dr. Oliveira Salazar continued:

"It is possible to find many defects in our work, and we are the first to regret that our limited resources have not enabled us to make greater progress. Much remains for us to do, above all in communications, the spread of educational facilities, health organization. But, even in these, as in many other fields, when we compare ourselves with others we have no call to feel ashamed. Our towns and villages, our railways, our ports, the hydro-electrical schemes, the preparation of irrigated land and its distribution to white men and black, the exploitation of the wealth of the sub-soil, the installations of our public services—all have their merits. But a greater achievement still is the atmosphere of security, peace and brotherly contact among the very different elements of the population, which is something unique in present-day Africa, for material progress can be attained by anyone who has money at his disposal, whereas this achievement of ours cannot".

38. The factors to which I have referred concerning the unity of the nation in the plurality of its territories also call for unity of political orientation, with the co-operation of all elements; but this principle does not affect certain problems which relate to administrative organization and to the greater or lesser degree of decentralization and autonomy. In this connexion, the President of the Council of Ministers of Portugal stated in the course of his speech of a few days ago:

"In the last few decades the economy of the Overseas Provinces, especially that of Goa, Angola and Mozambique, has undergone a great development, while side by side with economic progress and the progress in education an increasingly large class of persons capable of administering the territories has come forward. This is, furthermore, a natural feature—the tendency for functions to expand in relation to growing needs and the means available. On the other hand, the vast size of the territories, and even the distances separating them, as well as the particular features of some of their problems, will make it inevitable for larger sectors of their administration to be handed over to local organs. This may represent a gain of time and even, at least theoretically, a truer appreciation of local circumstances; yet nothing can dispense with the need for the competent leadership of a large élite in the government services. One factor only would seem to me to belie the spirit of unity, and that would be the conception of a kind of exclusiveness or privilege whereby a Portuguese would be denied the right to work or serve in any part of our territory, according to his ability. Have we not Goans and people from Mozambique in Lisbon, Europeans and inhabitants of Cabo Verde in Guinea, people from Angola or Guinea in Mozambique, and people from Mozambique in Timor? So, I think, it should continue to be.

"The Government keeps an open mind as to all modifications in the administrative structure, except in the case of those which might endanger the unity of the nation and the general interest".

39. It is certainly deplorable that this Organization, created to uphold peace and harmony between nations, has been used as a stage and an instrument by some delegations for slanderous attacks and false accusations against a nation which, perhaps more than any other in the history of the world, had the foresight to build with faith and feelings of racial brotherhood and religious tolerance a political and human unity which, in these times of turmoil, lives and works in peace in four continents of the earth, without the slightest unrest among its populations a state of peace which no outsiders will be allowed to disturb. Some of the self-appointed champions of anti-colonialism allege that colonies cannot be integrated into a political unitary body simply by a stroke of the pen or a juridical fiction—I believe these were the expressions used by certain delegations, that Portugal has merely attached a label to its overseas territories as an expedient device to face the wave of anti-colonialism. Those who may have made such a statement in good faith—and I wish to stress that not all have necessarily done so—reveal a total ignorance of the ideals and methods which inspired the formation of the Portuguese nation and of the history of its constitutional laws.

40. Some of our detractors attempt to convince the Assembly that we have hurriedly converted "colonies" into "provinces". Such an objection has already been answered. But if it is a question of technical nomenclature, I have no difficulty in answering our earnest but ill-informed critics: it simply is not true that Portugal has only recently named its extra-European territories "provinces". Anyone who will take the trouble to look into Portuguese constitutional history before attacking us on false premises can easily find out for himself the following facts:

41. The political and administrative concept of "province" is a tradition in Portuguese common law as well as in customary law. The great Portuguese historian João de Barros in the sixteenth century, as well as the other chroniclers of the time, refers to the lands beyond the seas as "Provinces". In the public documents of the following century, the seventeenth, the same designation is applied. Laws enacted in 1663 formalized the expression "Overseas Province". The designation has since been adopted by the Constitutional Laws of Portugal. For the enlightenment of interested parties, I should like to stress that the Portuguese Cortes, or Parliament, of 1820, which provided the basis for the first written Constitution, adopted the designation "Overseas Provinces" as being the most accurate and consistent with the principles of national unity. Clearly, the Portuguese legislators of 1820—140 years ago—were not thinking of the United Nations Organization nor of any other international body, when they referred to our Overseas Provinces as such.

42. The first Constitution, of 1821, says, in Article 132: "The administration of the provinces will remain as it is for the time being, until altered by law". Title X of the 1832 Constitution reads: "The Overseas Provinces". The same designation was adopted in Title X of the Constitution of 2 May 1842, as well as in the Constitutional Amendment of 1852, and again in the Overseas Legislation of 1867. The tradition has not been changed with the Republic. Title V of the 1911 Constitution was: "Administration of the Overseas Provinces". The 1933 Constitution, at present in force, refers in Article 135 to "The Overseas Provinces...". Furthermore, since 1612 the Overseas Provinces have been considered as being an integral part of the Portuguese nation. Portuguese Public Law has always followed this traditional pattern, which has been reflected accordingly in the acts of the administration. And Article 135 of the present Constitution says: "The Overseas Provinces, as an integral part of the Portuguese State, are united as between themselves and with Metropolitan Portugal". It is also evident that the attitude of the Portuguese from the very beginning of their communion with the peoples overseas was in advance of the times; the so-called "winds of change" came to us long ago. To those who express their incomprehension of the Portuguese attitude, we can only reply that we cannot sacrifice the sacred interests of the Portuguese populations in the national community simply in order to meet their desires or gratify their emotions.

43. The unitary Portuguese nation represents a unique historical realization which has always obtained international recognition. It was precisely that politico-social structure of a unitary state with its overseas provinces integrated in the nation—it was precisely that political structure, I repeat—which was admitted unanimously as a Member of the United Nations. The personality of a State is inalienable and indivisible. That personality is made up of the spiritual values common to the populations as well as of the material values, that is, the territories which constitute the physical body of the State. Thus, the indivisibility of the State refers to the unity of its spiritual values as well as to the physical components of the whole. It is, then, the integrity and unity of the Portuguese State, as well as of any other State admitted to this Organization, which all Members of the United Nations have committed themselves to respect and protect. This has been the attitude invariably adopted by this Organization and very recently reaffirmed in resolutions of the Security Council and of this Assembly. Certainly no unitary or federal State Member of this Organization would tolerate a request for the disintegration of that State. No delegation, no matter how obsessed by the results of propaganda has the legal or moral right to go so far, and we solemnly protest against those who come here with such preposterous suggestions.

44. Using an alleged colonialism as an excuse, some of the delegations in this Assembly have addressed slanderous attacks against my country. But their true intentions are perfectly clear to us. Their aim is to spread disorder where peace reigns, to encourage subversion where perfect harmony exists, and to create new problems artificially so as to make even more difficult the solution of the complex ones already facing the world, and for which the countries represented by the delegations I have in mind are mostly responsible. I am not going to address myself to these malevolent delegations whose partisan motives are transparent. I have listened to them with the contempt they deserve, as my delegation fully knows that such detractors are not interested in the truth. I am also convinced that one or two other delegations, moved by their customary hostility toward Portugal, will likewise not be interested in listening to me. But I particularly regret the remarks made by those who allowed themselves to be guided by their emotions—emotions inspired in political concepts which are alien and not adaptable to the Portuguese case. I have in mind particularly the allegations made by one or two delegations from the African States.

45. First of all, I should like to address myself to those African delegations to tell them of the very sincere desire and intention of the Portuguese nation to maintain the most cordial relations with all the African States in accordance with the principles of peaceful coexistence and good-neighbourliness—principles which have always been traditional in our policy. My Government firmly believes that the great changes which have taken place in the political structure of the territories adjacent to my country in Africa—due to the welcome access to independence of those new States—should not hinder in the least the relations of mutual trust and friendship which have hitherto existed between our respective peoples—indeed, that such relations will have an effective bearing on the necessary contacts and commercial and cultural exchanges between neighbours. In our relations with the new African States, we shall always be inspired by the scrupulous application of the principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

46. Together with the new African States, we are deeply interested in the return to normality of the entire African continent, to an atmosphere of harmony and joint constructive effort that will permit the solution of existing problems in peace and goodwill and the building of a future of mutually beneficial work and prosperity. Certainly, my country's interest in solving the problems of Africa is no less than that of the most interested parties. The accusations directed against my country by one or other of the African States are entirely without foundation. As I prefer to believe that those delegations which are responsible for them would not act in bad faith or merely on a whim, I am convinced that the reason for their accusations lies in the distorted or fabricated information somehow placed in their hands.

47. My Government has always, and scrupulously, respected its international obligations. We have been dealing with other countries and Governments for many centuries and our record of living by the law and of observing the rules of international conduct is blameless. We are not going to change our attitude as a responsible and sovereign State and a Member of the United Nations simply because those delegations attacking us appear to forget the principles of parliamentary responsibility. We could, if we wanted, be as fertile as the representative of Liberia, for example, in the matter of gratuitous accusations. After all, the easiest thing in the world, under the immunity afforded by this Assembly, is to make accusations the accuracy of which need not be proved. But we shall not embark on that easy path, because we hold self-respect in high esteem and we continue to believe that the spirit of this Organization deserves more respectful treatment.

48. It must be admitted that in the last few weeks the irresponsible or malevolent accusations voiced against Portugal in this Organization—particularly during a recent debate in the Fourth Committee—have had a considerable effect in my country, though certainly not the effect our detractors had hoped for. Anyone who has recently travelled through Portugal—European or Overseas—or anyone who may read the Portuguese newspapers, will realise what a tremendous wave of indignation is sweeping the nation. There have been massive demonstrations, as impressive and intense in the Overseas provinces as in continental Portugal, to protest against the attempted vilification and verbal attacks directed against Portugal by various delegations. Such eloquent demonstrations, which have taken place daily in both the larger and smaller towns of continental Portugal, in Angola and Mozambique and in other Portuguese overseas provinces, are the natural outcome of genuine offended feelings. The Portuguese press, in Europe or overseas, printed, for what they were worth, the full texts of the accusations brought against us in this Organization. The effect was an immediate reaction of indignation and outraged feelings by the people, by the whole nation, against such attacks and the countries responsible for them, and the reaffirmation of the profound patriotism and brotherhood which unites all Portuguese, regardless of origin, race, colour or creed. From one end of the Portuguese nation to the other, from the Atlantic islands of Cape Verde to the distant shores of Timor, on every parcel of the national territory where the Portuguese people of all races live and work in peace, there has been a simultaneous protest and absolute rejection of these vile accusations, and the united and determined voice of the entire Portuguese nation has never been stronger.

49. Mr. KISELEV (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) (translated from Russian): We are at present discussing a historic document—the "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples" [A/4502], submitted for our consideration by the Soviet delegation. As the Declaration states, the immediate abolition of the colonial system and the transformation of the present colonies into independent States will pave the way for replacing relationships of domination and subjection by relationships based on the principles of equality of rights, friendship and mutual respect.

50. But that will be impossible while colonialism and the discrimination against entire countries and peoples which it involves still exist. As has been rightly pointed out in the statements made earlier in the debate by the representatives of the Soviet Union, Ghana, Guinea, the United Arab Republic, Saudi Arabia, Ceylon and other countries, the immediate liquidation of colonialism would be a signal victory for the forces of peace, progress, freedom and independence in their fight against the forces of reaction.

51. In his statement made on 23 September, during the general debate at the present session of the Assembly, Mr. Khrushchev, the head of the Soviet Government, said:

"...there is no means and no force which can halt this struggle of the peoples for their liberation, for it is a great historic process, one of ever-growing and invincible power. It may be possible to prolong the dominion of one State over another for a year or two, but just as in the past the bourgeois order of things came to replace feudalism and as, now, socialism is replacing capitalism, so colonial slavery is giving place to freedom. Such are the rules of human development, and only adventurers can believe that mountains of corpses and millions of victims will delay the advent of a radiant future." [869th meeting, para.172]

52. In these few brief words the historically inevitable development which is taking place in our era is defined. It must be pointed out that whatever the colonialists do to preserve their dominion over the colonies, their efforts will fail. The abolition of colonialism would undoubtedly be an important contribution to the consolidation of peace and security throughout the world, and a vital step towards reducing international tension. It is the duty of the United Nations to put an immediate end to this evil.

53. We are living in remarkable times, times in which we can witness with our own eyes the irresistible struggle of countries and peoples to liberate themselves from the colonial yoke. Many representatives in this chamber have raised the banner of freedom and national independence in their own countries and are taking an active part in the struggle for the emancipation of hundreds of millions of oppressed people from colonial slavery. Let me venture on behalf of the Byelorussian people to congratulate them on their glorious victory. In the fifteen years since the end of the war, forty new States with a population amounting to 1500 million—or more than half the population of the world—have come into being and are successfully developing.

54. Asia, in particular, has been transformed unrecognizably, thanks to the great successes won by its peoples in their struggle for national liberation. Since the war, sixteen new States have come into being in Asia, among them such great States as India, Indonesia and Burma, which are carrying out a policy of independence and neutrality and are successfully strengthening their independence and sovereignty.

55. Great events are taking place in our era on the African continent. The heroic fight of the peoples of Africa for their freedom and independence has borne its splendid fruit. When the United Nations came into existence, Africa was represented in the Organization by only four States; today it already counts thirty Member States, with a population of one hundred million. At the current session of the General Assembly alone, we have had the opportunity to admit as Members of the United Nations sixteen new African States [resolutions 1476 (XV) to 1488 (XV) and 1490 (XV) to 1492 (XV)]. How true has proved the great Lenin's prophecy that "In the history of the world, tomorrow will be the day when the peoples oppressed by imperialism, now awakened, will open their eyes once and for all, and when the decisive, long and laborious struggle for their liberation will begin."

56. Colonialism has been sentenced to death by history: its day is over. The disintegration of the time-honoured colonial system now taking place bears unmistakable witness to the truth of Lenin's prophecy. The question of the complete and immediate abolition of colonial systems has been placed on the order of the day by life itself; for all objective conditions are ripe for the downfall of colonialism—that black page in the great annals of history.

57. But it would be premature to conclude that the colonial system of imperialism has breathed its last. The Western colonial Powers still retain their domination over vast territories, territories which are of great importance from the standpoint of economics and military strategy.

58. At present, more than a hundred million people in Asia and Africa are still suffering under direct colonial oppression. In Asia, more than fifty million people are suffering under the colonial yoke. And more than sixty million indigenous inhabitants of Africa are still being oppressed by the colonialists. Thus, the liquidation of the colonial system is not yet complete. Imperialism and colonialism still exist; they are trying to turn the wheel of history back and doing everything in their power, stopping at nothing, to preserve their domination. As Mr. Sukarno, the President of Indonesia, has said in this chamber, "Imperialism is not yet dead...the dying imperialism is dangerous, as dangerous as the wounded tiger in a tropical jungle." [880th meeting, para. 63]. The disintegration of colonialism is being accompanied not only by the constructive process of the formation of new independent States, whose admission to membership in the United Nations we here welcome fervently and with all our hearts, but also by determined efforts on the part of the colonialists to preserve their domination in the colonies in new forms. These activities of the colonialists are giving rise to an extremely tense situation in Asia and Africa, and are creating the danger of new conflicts which could have serious consequences.

59. But the advance of the peoples of Asia and Africa towards immediate independence is an impetuous and irresistible one. As Mr. Khrushchev said last autumn from the rostrum of the United Nations General Assembly.

"The last strongholds of the decaying colonial system are crumbling away for good, and that is one of the most significant factors of our time. If we look at the map of Asia and Africa we shall see the spectacle of the liberation of hundreds of millions of people from foreign exploitation after centuries of repression."^{2/}

60. The grandiose events taking place in our era confirm the truth of Mr. Khrushchev's words. The knell of colonial robbery has sounded. But if even the very idea of colonialism is to become a thing of the past, the United Nations, in accordance with the spirit of its Charter, must help the peoples and countries which are still groaning under colonial oppression to win their independence more rapidly. At the same time, it is important that this process of liberation should not take place to the sound of the alarms of war and the groans of human beings; for emancipation from colonialism has in the past cost many peoples too much blood and too many lives. We must see that the conditions which permit the colonialists illegally to continue their domination in foreign countries, on the pretext that the colonial peoples are not mature enough and not yet ready for self-government and independence, are done away with for good. We believe that any people can govern itself; all that needs to be done is to give it the opportunity to do so—and that means to abolish colonial oppression and colonial domination.

61. The representatives of the United Kingdom, Portugal and other countries have enlarged here on the "civilizing mission" which they profess to have carried out, and to be carrying out, in the colonial and dependent countries. They have cited statistics on the development of industry, agriculture, public education, public health and transport in their colonies to convince us that they have made a great contribution to the prosperity and culture of the peoples concerned. But what, in point of fact, have the colonialists of Europe and America brought these peoples? Let me quote some facts which illustrate the results of former colonialist rule.

62. I have recently read a highly interesting book, A Hundred Countries and One-and-a-Quarter Billion People, written by the present Managing Director of the United Nations Special Fund, Paul Hoffman, an American, and published this year in Washington^{3/}. It deals with the problem of economic assistance to the under-developed countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America. According to the author, there are over one hundred such countries in the world, numbering more than 1,250 million people. The annual average income per person in those countries, Hoffman says, is at present $100, whereas the corresponding figure for the United States and most of Western Europe is $1000-2000, or ten to twenty times greater. These figures show what merciless exploitation and robbery the indigenous populations have suffered.

63. According to the report^{4/} of the United Nations Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, drawn up this April for the fifteenth session of the General Assembly, per capita personal income in the African territories for which data are available for the year 1957 was among the lowest in the world. In Nigeria the figure was $67, in Uganda $43.34, in the former Belgian Congo, $42.2 and in Kenya, $35.55. Thus per capita income in the United Kingdom is some tens of times greater than per capita income in Nigeria, Uganda and Kenya. These figures, which would be difficult to deny, speak for themselves.

64. As we see, then, colonialism is in essence a repulsive mixture of unprecedented exploitation, discrimination of various kinds and deprivation of elementary human rights. By the blood and sweat of the indigenous peoples the colonialists amass vast riches out of which all they leave the peoples they exploit is a few miserable crumbs. The export of their wealth, the accumulation of fabulous profits, hunger, poverty and arbitrary law—that is what the colonialists bring the indigenous peoples.

65. Let me quote a few figures which illustrate the sharp contrast between the incomes of the indigenous peoples and those of the European settlers. According to the report I have mentioned, per capita personal income in the former Belgian Congo in 1957 was $42.2 for the African population, and $2973, or eighty times more, for the Europeans. In the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, European incomes were 43 times greater; in Kenya, 30 times. Such are the fruits of Western "civilization" in Africa.

66. Representatives of the colonial Powers who have addressed the United Nations General Assembly at various sessions have said not one word about the profits they make from their "benevolence". They have deliberately failed to mention such horrifying facts as the almost complete illiteracy which exists in the colonies and the fact that they have the highest death rate and the lowest life-expectancy in the world. Whereas life-expectancy in the United Kingdom is sixty years, in Nigeria, which has only just freed itself from colonial rule, it is substantially less than thirty. Relatively speaking, the population of Nigeria has sixty times fewer doctors than that of the United Kingdom; and it has only one dentist per two million inhabitants. The wage of the Negro worker in this former British colony is twelve times smaller than the average wage of the British worker. The United States has an average of 1.1 doctors per thousand inhabitants. The corresponding figure for Africa is 0.11, which means that Africa has only thirty-six doctors per million inhabitants. The illiteracy rate among the population of Africa is seventy to ninety per cent. In Algeria the illiteracy rate among the Moslem population is ninety per cent, whereas in 1830, when France conquered Algeria, there was less illiteracy there than in France. Such are the "achievements" of the French "civilizers" in that colonial country. Hunger and sickness, brutal exploitation and forced labour—all these have brought about the extinction of entire peoples. During the half-century of Belgian domination the population of the Congo has been almost halved; in Madagascar, sixty years of French domination have more than halved the population. I have taken these figures from the American journalist John Gunther's book Inside Africa^{5/}, published in New York in 1955. Gunther, who is a spokesman and theoretician of American neo-colonialism, was compelled to acknowledge the existence of the frightful colonial practice of mutilation—the amputation of the hands or feet of Negroes for bad work in the plantations and mines—and to publish photographs illustrating it. These barbarities practised by the Europeans are in no way different from the barbarities perpetrated by the Nazis during the Second World War.

67. The efforts of the colonial Powers to preserve their weakened positions in Africa are explained by the fact that the African continent possesses enormous mineral resources and is a vital market and source of raw materials for the capitalist countries. According to United States figures, Africa accounts for 98 per cent of the world's output of diamonds, 81 per cent of its cobalt, 59 per cent of its gold, 42 per cent of its antimony, 40 per cent of its chromite, 36 per cent of its manganese and 27 per cent of its copper. Africa provides more than four-fifths of the capitalist world's output of uranium ore. In the Sahara, petroleum has been discovered in huge deposits amounting to thousands of millions of tons. Africa possesses more than 40 per cent of the world's resources of water-power. Many African territories have rich deposits of bauxite, manganese ores, iron ore, nickel, zinc, lead, phosphates and other minerals. That is why Africa is of such great importance both to the United States and to Western Europe; for it is one of the greatest world producers of certain scarce raw materials.

68. However, the interests of the colonialists differ from those of the indigenous inhabitants of the African territories. The representatives of the monopolists look upon the Africans as cheap labour, labour which can be mercilessly exploited. The so-called plans for the industrialization of the African territories mean nothing more than the development of sectors of industry—in particular the mining industry—which the colonialists find profitable. But there is not a word in these plans of the colonialist Powers about the creation of a heavy industry—the essential foundation of any genuine independence for the new States.

69. At the same time, Africa plays an essential part in the colonial Powers' strategic preparations, which envisage the use of the continent as a powerful base and rear echelon of the West Atlantic bloc. In his book L'Eurafrrique—notre dernière chance^{6/}, the French author Pierre Nord writes:

"Strategically speaking, no one would dare to attack the geo-military complex of Eurafrica: Eurafrica, a vaster living-space than Siberia; Eurafrica, a safer industrial base than the Urals; Eurafrica, where in a few years we shall be able to produce atom bombs over the deposits which provide their raw materials."

70. Thus the purpose of the association of Europe with Africa, in this author's mind, is the creation of a mighty bloc of States designed to combat the national liberation movement of the African peoples and to solve the internal difficulties of the metropolitan countries at the expense of the indigenous inhabitants of the African territories. The white settlers, according to the colonialists' plans, are to be assigned a privileged position and to perform the function of defenders of colonialism. The author is a zealous advocate of the theory of "collective colonialism", the object of which is to preserve Africa, by the combined efforts of the industrially advanced countries of Western Europe and America, as a colonialist base.

71. Such are the words and the deeds of the present-day colonialists. Thus there is no justification whatsoever for the appeal addressed to us by Mr. Macmillan, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, when he called on us in his statement to the plenary meeting of this General Assembly held on 29 September to "free ourselves from old and worn-out slogans and obsolete battle-cries"—which is how he sees the words "colonialism" and "imperialism". [877th meeting, para. 98].

^{5/} Harper and Brothers.

^{6/} Paris, Librairie Arthème Fayard, 1955, p. 11.

72. No, Mr. Macmillan, these are not old and worn-out slogans: to put an end at once to the remnants of the shameful heritage of imperialism is the real battle-cry of our era. The sacred fire of struggle for freedom burns in the hearts of all the colonial peoples, and of the peoples of all the other dependent territories. And in this fire the fetters of slavery are melting away and real independence is being forged. All the world knows of the heroic struggle of the people of Kenya for their freedom and independence. The revolt they began in 1952 was brutally crushed by the colonialists after four years of colonial warfare during which 10,000 of the people of Kenya were killed and 150,000 thrown into prison. Kenya has 6 million African inhabitants, and 63,000 British settlers. Yet the British own the most fertile areas, having cleared them of their indigenous inhabitants and settled them with 12,000 British farmers. Each of these farmers owns an average of 2.5 square kilometres of land, whereas the indigenous inhabitants of Kenya live in reservations in which the density of population is as high as 400 per square kilometre. No wonder, then, that the average annual income of an indigenous Kenyan is thirty times smaller than that of a British settler. Ask any indigenous inhabitant of Kenya whether the immediate abolition of colonialism is an obsolete slogan. His reply, I venture to think, will be that it is far from obsolete; that on the contrary it is a highly topical and vital slogan.

73. Mr. Macmillan, singing the praises of his action in the British colonies, declared from this rostrum:

"Our aim is...clear and constant: to build the people of these countries, or help them build up, societies in which all these, the people, of whatever race, tribe or religious persuasion, may live and work harmoniously together. To that purpose we are pledged, and for that purpose we shall continue to work." [Ibid., para. 106].

74. Mr. Ormsby-Gore, the United Kingdom representative, told us roughly the same thing, though in different words, when he addressed us here on 28 November. Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Ormsby-Gore tried to represent themselves to us as good "fatherly" men and to depict the colonial peoples as children, who need to be taught, prepared to go out into the world, to be sent to school. Naturally, therefore, they said nothing about the acts of brutality and repression and the other deeds perpetrated by the British colonialists in their colonies, of the sufferings, want, arbitrary rule and harsh exploitation to which they have subjected them. Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Ormsby-Gore were silent about the guns which are at present thundering in the ancient lands of Oman—representatives of which are here among us—Nyasaland and Rhodesia. The whole world knows that the independence achieved by the former British colonies is not the fruit of "British magnanimity" but has been won by the bloody struggle of the peoples of those countries. To assert that the independence of these countries is the result of the colonialists' solicitude for their "progress" is to falsify history. The liberation of the peoples of the colonies from colonial oppression and the collapse of the colonial system are part of an objective historical process which no repression, no guns and machine guns can arrest. The colonialists are trying to stop this inexorable historical process, and even to turn it back; but they will not succeed.

75. As you know, the proposed Declaration [A/4502] calls for the immediate grant to the oppressed colonial peoples of complete independence and freedom. Only in conditions of genuine independence, as is convincingly demonstrated by the manifold development of the young African republics, including Guinea, Ghana and other States, can all the political, economic, social and cultural problems involved be solved. What we are witnessing is the efforts of the monopolists of the Western countries and the United States to make up for their defeat in Asia at the expense of Africa. Immediately after the Second World War they began the policy of pushing forward their expansion in Africa. The Rockefeller, Morgan and Mellon monopolist groups now have huge investments in Africa.

76. Direct private investment by American companies in Africa was estimated to amount at the end of 1958 to $789 million—three times the figure for 1950. At the end of 1959 about 200 American companies "had interests" in Africa, most of them companies engaged in the extraction of industrial raw materials, especially strategic raw materials. With its rich natural resources and the exceptionally low wages of its workers, Africa offers the United States monopolies prospects of profits and wealth that are extraordinary even in the conditions of colonialism. Interesting data in this connexion may be found in a report, published in 1959 in Washington, compiled under the African Research Programme of Northwestern University for the United States Senate Foreign Relations Committee. According to the data it provides, while the average rate of profit on American capital invested abroad as a whole is 26 per cent, the figure for Africa is 30 per cent. The report shows that American monopolies are taking a direct part, together with Western European monopolies, in exploiting the peoples of Africa and extracting profits from Africa. In the Congo, for example, the United States, according to American data, every year takes out of the country 60 per cent of its output of cobalt, 64 per cent of its manganese, 79 per cent of its tantalum, 87 per cent of its diamonds, and nearly 100 per cent of its uranium ore and lithium. In addition, part of the Congo's resources is diverted to West Germany's war industry, which is controlled by the United States. It must be clear to everyone that this penetration of United States capital into Africa is barefaced neo-colonialism, which represents a new form of enslavement of the African peoples. And close on the heels of the American monopolists come the West German industrialists, some of whom recently toured the African countries. In the international consortium set up under the name of "Konsafrik", the German Deutsche Bank is a partner with Belgian, British and French banks. German monopolies have a predominant influence in this consortium, which has interests in the iron ore, manganese, aluminium and other mineral deposits of the Congo and other African territories. Since the Congo's basic mineral resources are at present exploited in Katanga, any talk of recognizing Katanga as a separate State is a manoeuvre of the Belgian and United States colonialists aimed at preserving the main source of their high profits—the exploitation of Katanga's natural resources. The Byelorussian people, together with all the other peoples of the Soviet Union and with progressive mankind as a whole, believes that the day is not far off when the natural resources of the Republic of the Congo will advance the people of that country to the forefront of the struggle for the progress of all Africa and of the entire human race.

77. The struggle for national freedom and independence is continuing and spreading in Oman, Uganda, Tanganyika and Zanzibar, in the Portuguese colonies of Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea, in the Belgian Trust Territory of Ruanda-Urundi, in the South African colony of South West Africa, in the United States colony of Puerto Rico and in many other areas.

78. The colonialists are trying to preserve their rule over the countries they have enslaved at all costs, and are using a wide variety of means to that end. As the Soviet Declaration [A/4502] rightly states: "they compel the colonial peoples to maintain foreign troops and a foreign administration in peacetime, i.e. to pay for the chains in which they are held." They make extensive use of the old system of "divide and rule", setting tribe against tribe, as at present in the Congo. They also use subtler methods, manoeuvring and making apparent concessions, such as extending the franchise for Africans; and they engage in the large-scale bribery of African leaders, so as to have others to do their dirty work for them. Referring to the new methods at present being used to preserve colonialism, Mr. Nasser, the President of the United Arab Republic, rightly said from this rostrum that "The aggression on Suez was the end of unmasked imperialism and its graveyard. Today we find the Congo presenting us with masked imperialism, which does not shrink from exploiting the United Nations itself in order to realize its hidden designs and aims." [873rd meeting, para. 120] We entirely agree with that statement.

79. Nowadays the colonialists are even going to the length of granting their colonies political independence; but they retain the key positions in economic affairs, finance and the armed forces for themselves, and not infrequently select traitors to their own people to place in power as their puppets. There is no fundamental difference between all these methods; all of them are identical in purpose: to preserve, or at any rate prolong, their colonial rule and the spoliation of the colonial peoples.

80. People all over the world are alarmed at the news of the forcible seizure of the person of Mr. Patrice Lumumba, Prime Minister of the Congolese Government, by Mobutu's armed gangs. This act of gross violence and lawlessness against the legal head of the Government of the Republic of the Congo has been committed despite the presence in the Congo of United Nations forces sent there at Mr. Lumumba's request. The mission of the United Nations is to carry out the Security Council's decisions; yet the policy actually being carried out is one of appeasing the illegal and dictatorial régime of Mobutu, the henchman of the Belgian, United States and French colonialists.

81. The Byelorussian delegation wishes to protest emphatically, from this rostrum, against the savage, arbitrary and illegal arrest of Mr. Patrice Lumumba, Prime Minister of the Republic of the Congo, and demands his immediate release. We believe that conditions must be created in the Congo such as to permit the Parliament of the Republic to resume its activity...

82. The PRESIDENT: I am sorry to interrupt the speaker at the rostrum. I hope, however, that he is not going to take advantage of his intervention in this essentially general debate on the subject of colonialism to discuss the present situation in the Congo, a subject upon which the General Assembly has decided to adjourn discussion. I am afraid that any detailed statement of views on the situation in the Congo would not be in order in the present debate. I would ask the speaker to continue, taking account of the statement I have just made.

83. Mr. KISELEV (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) (translated from Russian): I have said what I had to say. I will continue.

84. The abolition of the colonial system also implies the abolition of its twin—the trusteeship system. When, in accordance with the United Nations Charter, the trusteeship system was established, the assumption was that the Administering Authorities were under the obligation of promoting the development of the Trust Territories towards self-government and independence. Yet fifteen years after the adoption of the Charter, only four of the eleven Territories originally under trusteeship have attained their independence. So far as concerned the other Trust Territories, no firm dates have been set for their independence. The largest of them are Tanganyika, Ruanda-Urundi and New Guinea; and the vast African territory of South West Africa has been annexed by the racists of the Union of South Africa. The colonial Powers responsible for "trusteeship" are in reality, and in defiance of the United Nations Charter, preserving the colonial regime in the Trust Territories, brutally exploiting the local peoples and despoiling their natural resources for the benefit of their own monopolies, holding back the economic and political development of the Territories and savagely repressing all who demand independence—including those who send petitions to the United Nations. The United Nations receives thousands of petitions from the peoples of the Trust Territories, which are examined by the Fourth Committee. They speak for millions of the inhabitants of the Trust Territories. These petitions, many of them written in human blood, constitute an indictment of the policies of the Administering Authorities. The facts they cite arouse the anger and indignation of the public all over the world.

85. As the Soviet Declaration rightly says, "The trusteeship system has not justified itself anywhere and should be buried together with the entire colonial system, which is an anachronism" [A/4502].

86. The representative of Portugal, who addressed the Assembly just before me, asserted in defiance of truth and of the facts that colonialism is alien to his country. Such fairy-tales, surely, must be addressed to innocents, and are intended to pull the wool over people's eyes. The whole world knows that in the Portuguese African colonies of Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea, which have an area equal to more than half that of Western Europe, with a population of 11 million, there is not a single institution of higher education, and virtually no secondary or primary education. The Portuguese colonialists pursue their policy of oppression and racial discrimination behind the smoke-screen of a policy of "assimilation". According to them, the Africans are progressively being granted civil rights, and even Portuguese citizenship.

87. But to acquire these advantages Africans must know the Portuguese language and must satisfy educational qualifications and a high property qualification. In the five centuries of their rule the colonialists have "assimilated" less than 0.3 per cent of the African population; the remaining 99.7 per cent have no rights of any kind and are mercilessly exploited by their oppressors, who can even drive Africans off any land that pleases them. If the Africans resist and protest, the Portuguese authorities resort to repressive measures of the most ferocious kind. In 1959 the Portuguese Government was even obliged to dispatch aircraft and warships to Guinea to beat down the population. Those facts are known to the Portuguese representative and to the whole world.

88. I should like also to speak briefly of the United Nations Trust Territory of Ruanda-Urundi under Belgian administration, which has a population of 5 million inhabitants including 6,000 Europeans. In connexion with this Territory the General Assembly adopted recommendations [1413 (XIV) and 1419 (XIV)] under which Belgium was to fix a period during which the Territory was to be prepared for political independence; but the Belgian Government has not complied with these recommendations.

89. In Ruandi-Urundi monstrous racial discrimination is practised in all its forms, political, legal and social, and flogging still exists as a judicial penalty—in our era! According to UNESCO data, about 400,000 of Ruanda-Urundi's 600,000 children do not go to school. The result of more than forty years of Belgian rule is the general impoverishment of the local population. In November 1959 the masses of the people, reduced to despair by the oppression of the Belgian colonialists, rose in revolt, but were crushed with the use of parachute troops. Violent methods of repression were used, causing hundreds of deaths and the burning of some tens of villages. All this was reported in the American Press. Many other facts could be cited; but those I have mentioned are enough to show that the nature of colonialism has not changed. Africa has a population of more than 200 million. Of this figure, only 5 million are Europeans, or 2 per cent of the population.

90. The flames of freedom are sweeping through the African continent and will rapidly consume the strongholds of colonialism. The colonialists are offering stubborn resistance, manoeuvring, and attempting to arrest by fire and sword the onrush of the national liberation movements. But the struggle of the peoples for their freedom and independence is constantly expanding and deepening. There is not one corner left on African soil where the ground is not burning under the colonialists' feet. Whatever means of repression they use, the colonialists will not be strong enough to halt the course of history. We believe that the day is not far off when Africa will be free.

91. The experience of the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries in dealing with the national question shows that the cause of close co-operation among the peoples can be served only by granting all peoples genuine equality of rights and the opportunity of free national development.

92. The United Nations could effectively promote the abolition of colonialism and racism. The United Nations must make its contribution to the abolition of the colonial system, in accordance with the provisions of its Charter proclaiming the right of nations to self-determination. It could best make this contribution by adopting the "Declaration on the grant of independence to colonial countries and peoples" submitted for our consideration by the Soviet Union. The Declaration provides that all States Members of the United Nations should solemnly proclaim the following demands:

"1. All colonial countries and Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories must be granted forthwith complete independence and freedom to build their own national States in accordance with the freely expressed will and desire of their peoples. The colonial system and colonial administration in all its forms must be completely abolished in order to afford the peoples of the territories concerned an opportunity to determine their own destiny and form of government.

"2. Similarly, all strongholds of colonialism in the form of possessions and leased areas in the territory of other States must be eliminated.

"3. The Governments of all countries are urged to observe strictly and steadfastly the provisions of the United Nations Charter and of this Declaration concerning the equality and respect for the sovereign rights and territorial integrity of all States without exception, allowing no manifestations of colonialism or any special rights or advantages for some States to the detriment of other States." [A/4502.]

The Declaration also provides that Powers which have colonial possessions should enter into negotiations on an equal footing with representatives of the peoples of the colonies and reach agreements on the granting of freedom and independence to the colonial countries, definite and early dates being fixed for the negotiations and any possibility of coercion and aggression on the part of the colonial Powers being eliminated.

93. In the opinion of the Byelorussian delegation, the Declaration represents a programme of action that could and should, in present conditions, be followed by the United Nations with a view to the abolition of the colonial system. It lays down general principles by which all States Members of the United Nations should be guided in dealing with this problem. Naturally, we do not expect the Western colonial Powers to support the Soviet Declaration. They have thought up every possible idea, have resorted to every possible "argument", in order to distort the sense and the motives of the Soviet Declaration.

94. I should like to comment briefly on these "arguments". We have heard the old, hackneyed argument that this is all "Soviet propaganda". We are all, I think, used to the United States and its military partners crying "propaganda" whenever the Soviet Union presents any proposal designed to reduce international tension. I have heard that accusation here year after year. But what prevents the Western Powers from carrying on propaganda of the same kind? Clearly, they have nothing in store to set against the Soviet proposals; and that is inevitable, for the Soviet Union has truth on its side, and there can only be one truth. In asserting that the Soviet Declaration is "propaganda" they are giving themselves away; they are showing that they have nothing to oppose to it because in reality they are against the abolition of the colonial system and for continuing the looting of the colonies. No juggling with words will help them here.

95. It is also said that the Soviet Declaration is too general; that the problem of the abolition of colonialism is a highly complex one, that one must bear in mind the "services" the colonial Powers have rendered to their colonies by establishing a link between the colonies and the metropolitan countries, and so forth. One speaker who took this line was Mr. Ormsby-Gore, the representative of the United Kingdom, in his statements during the discussion of the Soviet Declaration at the plenary meetings held on 12 October [902nd meeting] and 28 November [925th meeting]. So far as concerns the "services" rendered by the colonialists in the colonies, I have already dealt with that subject in some detail, and I shall not repeat myself.

96. It is said, too, that the adoption of the Declaration would entail amending the United Nations Charter, in its provisions relating to the trusteeship system. That assertion was made, in particular, by Mr. Shanahan, the representative of New Zealand, in his statements in plenary session on 12 October [902nd meeting] and 2 December [932nd meeting], as an "argument" against the adoption of the Declaration. But is it an argument? We drafted and signed the United Nations Charter, and we are equally entitled to amend it in the light of the radical changes which have taken place in the international situation. There is nothing eternal on earth. Governments change, so do States; social systems change, and even life on earth changes. A fortiori, the United Nations Charter can be changed.

97. Many Western leaders, particularly in the United States, are opposing the Declaration on the ground that it is an invitation to disturbances in the colonies. In his statement to the Assembly on 28 November, Mr. Ormsby-Gore, the representative of the United Kingdom, went to the length of indulging in a gross distortion of the facts and a direct slander of the Soviet Union, when he asserted that the only purpose of the Soviet Declaration was "to generate hatred rather than friendship, violence rather than peace, and chaos rather than order". [925th meeting, para. 18].

98. These statements give their authors away; their meaning is that they fear the colonial independence movements, are putting obstacles in the way of the prompt granting of independence, and are trying to prolong colonial rule. It is precisely their policy and practice in the colonies which lead to disturbances. Such "disturbances", "violence" and "chaos" occurred long before the Soviet Declaration was submitted to the Assembly; they occurred, are still occurring, and will continue to occur so long as independence is denied to the oppressed peoples of the colonies and so long as the colonialists refuse to leave the colonies and go back to their own countries.

99. The great historical significance of the "Declaration on the grant of independence to colonial countries and peoples" cannot be challenged; for the Declaration has raised an issue which should long ago have been disposed of—that of the complete and final abolition of the colonial system in all its forms and manifestations. It has met with an enthusiastic welcome among the peoples of the colonial and former colonial countries, and among freedom-loving peoples all over the world.

100. The United Nations, unless it is content to let the great historical process of the abolition of the colonial régime pass it by, must adopt recommendations designed to bring that system to an end. If it does not, then, as Mr. Khrushchev, the head of the Soviet Government, said in his statement to the plenary meeting of the General Assembly held this session on 12 October:

"...the peoples of the colonial countries will have no option but to take up arms. If they are not granted the right to lead an independent existence, to have a political and social system of their own choosing and to organize their life in their own country as they themselves see fit, they will win that right in combat." [902nd meeting, para. 13.]

101. Thus, it is the duty of all peoples which stand for the abolition of the colonial system to give every possible assistance to those who are fighting against colonial oppression, against the colonialists and imperialists; to give moral, material and all other help in order to bring the sacred and righteous struggle of the peoples for their independence to its consummation.

102. For its part, the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, like all the other Republics of the great Soviet Union, faithful to its policy of peace and of supporting the struggle of oppressed peoples for national independence—a policy proclaimed by Vladimir Ilyich Lenin, the founder of the Soviet State—has stood, still stands and will always stand at the side of the peoples fighting for liberation from colonial oppression and for freedom and national independence. To all these peoples we hold out a helping hand. Nothing can prevent the collapse of the doomed colonial system.

103. The Byelorussian delegation warmly supports the "Declaration on the grant of independence to colonial countries and peoples" submitted by the Government of the Soviet Union for the consideration of the General Assembly at its present session. We call upon all States Members of the United Nations to support this Declaration. We appeal to the representatives of the Asian and African countries which have recently emancipated themselves from the colonial yoke, and to the countries of Latin America, and call upon them to vote for the "Declaration on the grant of independence to colonial countries and peoples".

104. I should like to conclude my remarks with a quotation from a poem by an African poet, Bernard Dadié, a native of the Ivory Coast, which speaks of the great march of events in present-day Africa:

"In the chaos of the century ancient Africa has awoken;
People, be not weak!
At the crossroads, under the baobab trees,
In the prisons and in the huts of the workers'
districts
I shout to every man and woman,
To the poor people of my land:
You — you are the king of the factories! You are the king of the fields!
You are the people,
You then are the Master!"*

105. Mr. KAKA (Niger) (translated from French): In taking the floor, Mr. President, may I be allowed to congratulate you, although it is a little late to do so.

106. As the Argentine representative pointed out with great relevance: "This predominance of colonial questions in the United Nations is not the result of chance nor is it entirely due to capricious or arbitrary manoeuvres. It is a reflection of the reality that confronts us today." [927th meeting, para. 1]. That reality has made this fifteenth session of the United Nations the session of Africa and of the many problems born of under-development and all its consequences.

107. My voice is that of a country which came out from the shadow of the colonial system only a few months ago, and it will not be a timid voice. I wish at once to declare solemnly that my country, which has fought for years to break the yoke of colonialism, is proud to add its name to the long list of nations which propose that this Assembly should adopt the draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-5] on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. I said that my voice would not be a timid voice; nor will the tone be one of hatred. I should like it to be impassioned only when I speak of the right to freedom and the right to dignity, which are clearly recognized by the Charter and which must be granted immediately to the peoples living under foreign domination.

108. History teaches us that certain nations, at certain times, could no longer be contained within their narrow frontiers. Led now by a spirit of adventure, now by self-interest, they convinced themselves that it would be good to impose their science, their culture and their civilization on other peoples. Since they were masters of the world at the time, they resorted to the right of the strongest. The need to survive by bringing many kinds of influence to bear overseas, the need for markets to develop their economies and hence their industrial methods, and the search for resources to raise the standard of living of their people—these are the only justifications for their many misdeeds. I shall not abuse my right as an ex-colonial to censure them. Colonization is a fact of history, and every people represented here has known periods of greatness and periods of humiliation. Some have been driven from their lands, others have been crushed under the heel of blood-thirsty and ambitious conquerors, while still others were not merely dominated but "digested". None has escaped these tragic upheavals, which have marked the history of mankind from time immemorial.

109. When colonialism first began, international law was confined to the established nations of the old continent. A certain meeting, held at the end of the last century to discuss taking possession of Africa and cutting it up, affords a striking example of the spirit and conception of this law. This law was based on the "right of the strongest", which is unjust and which all here condemn, in its essence and right down to its least manifestations. But the narrowly circumscribed world of that day could create its own rights to suit its interests. Now that our world embraces the whole planet, and now that distances are so reduced that the opinion of any man, anywhere on the globe, weighs in the balance of human relations, colonization can no longer be justified.

110. The administering nations which have adapted or are adapting their ideas to modern life do not, I think, deserve the systematic and impassioned charges made against them. They certainly still have much to do, and the best thing they can do is to hasten the liberation of all the peoples they still dominate. It is not my purpose to justify any form of domination. But we are dealing with a historical fact. I intend to put it in its context, so that it can be appraised calmly and objectively. I know that, if we took all the modern cases of colonization, we should have a very sombre picture. Direct or indirect domination, and imperialism in every shape and form, are by their nature hateful. There is no need for me to list the facts which condemn them. There are many in this Assembly who preach anti-colonialism and, since this discussion opened, most of the delegations of former colonies have had occasion to portray, with icy self-control, the misdeeds of colonialism. Yet there is one point I should like to stress.

111. Some colonialist methods, marked by a spirit of cynicism, consist in infecting the dependent peoples with the virus of a complex—a racial complex, an inferiority complex, an imperfectibility complex—deliberately maintaining cultural malnutrition and turning the person into a human wreck, incapable of initiative and of healthy and logical reactions. Man, in whom all dignity has been blunted, is thus morally diminished. Certain administering nations have come to commit this moral genocide in order to ensure perpetual domination. Shut up in their ivory towers, they imagine that no prying eyes can glimpse the consummate art with which they contrive to mould servile minds. While these nations in their folly continue secretly to plunder human resources, all mankind will rise up to say no.

112. We want—nay, we demand—the liberation of peoples and of individuals. Those who hold back, who believe they can escape from the realities of the second half of the twentieth century by subterfuges, will bear a heavy responsibility before history. Their contempt for human dignity carries in it the fertile seeds of conflict. With the passing of time, this senseless contempt will seem more and more intolerable. The principles of the United Nations Charter clearly set forth the right to freedom, and allow of no biased interpretation. It is unthinkable that otherwise brave and worthy nations, whose history has not lacked human greatness, should continue to practise dishonesty by following a policy different from that laid down in the United Nations Charter, which they have solemnly accepted before the eyes of the world. Such an attitude is indecent. The right of the strongest is out of date. It can no longer be a foundation for contemporary relations between peoples.

113. In conclusion, I appeal most earnestly, on behalf of my delegation, to the great Powers which divide the world into spheres of influence. The end of colonialism, for which all hope so fervently, is certainly one of the most important human problems that our generation has had to face. For the sake of suffering men deprived of their elementary rights and kept in servitude, for the sake of those destitute ones who have just broken free and whose first steps are still unsure, we ask you to protect us, at least for a time, from your cold war disputes. Decolonization cannot be used as an instrument to demonstrate the particular advantages of a social system. The young liberated peoples will need to find their bearings and, with the means at hand, patiently to build up their countries.

114. We know that there are some who yearn for the past, and think themselves shrewd enough and strong enough, where decolonization is concerned, to take back with their left hand what they have given with their right. We also know that some are chafing with impatience to replace the administrators of yesterday. These struggles for influence between friendly or hostile brothers are unrealistic. We are of age from the moment when we have the full use of our freedom. There are no countries which are under age when it comes to the exercise of freedom. We firmly condemn colonialism in all its forms.

115. I need hardly say that the peoples which aspire to freedom and independence expect much of this august Assembly. I ask you, in the name of human dignity, whether you can say no to this natural and legitimate aspiration?

116. I am still convinced that all nations which love peace, justice and freedom will join us, and that this Assembly will adopt the resolution unanimously.

117. Mr. De FREITAS-VALLE (Brazil): Before going into the heart of the subject, it appears to me indispensable to follow an ancient practice: to define what is to be discussed, namely, to establish the concept of colonialism. The first difficulty is immediately encountered, as current concepts of colonialism derive from different political philosophies.

118. There is, on the one hand, what might be called the expansionist definition of colonialism, for example that of Hobson:^{2/}

"Colonialism, in its best sense, is a natural overflow of nationality; its test is the power of colonists to transplant the civilization they represent to the new natural and social environment in which they find themselves."

On the other hand, one might recall the old Pan-Germanistic definition of colonialism—only recently revived by Nazi-Fascism. Here we have the lebensraum theory: the power of peoples, who consider themselves superior, to occupy the space required for the accomplishment of their political aims. We could also refer to Lenin's interpretation of colonialism as the inevitable consequence of the development of capitalism and imperialism. Then there are those who look upon colonialism as the "white man's burden": the humanitarian mission incumbent upon certain powers to bring progress, technical know-how, education and material comfort to backward peoples. In most cases, this definition served to conceal naked imperialism. One could not overlook the most modern and highly aggressive form of colonialism: ideological colonialism. This is tantamount, as we all know, to the total domination of one people by another, through the imposition of an alien ideology upon the dominated people.

119. The colonialism that we are considering in this debate—to remain strictly within the limits of our agenda—refers to the political and juridical status of the territories which, in the terms of the Charter, "have not yet attained a full measure of self-government". [Art. 73].

120. The classic forms of colonialism—sprung from the Industrial Revolution, capitalism, the spirit of adventure, need to expand and also from greed, often unscrupulous—have already completed their historic cycle. In this regard, it would appear to me not to be an exaggeration to attribute to the authors of the United Nations Charter the delivery of the coup de grâce to colonialism. The Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories—which was not contained in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, but which was wisely incorporated into the very text of the Charter [Chapter XI]:—deals with the juridical situation of the heritage of colonialism and establishes the conditions for its gradual elimination. Owing chiefly to the principles of the Charter, to its practical and political devices and to the moral impact of its decisions, the United Nations is gradually being transformed into the real instrument of the great revolution of our times: the liberation of the colonial peoples not only from political slavery but also from economic slavery. This is not the time to draw up a balance-sheet of the achievements of the United Nations in this field. But even the most casual onlooker knows that the United Nations has contributed substantially to the multiplication of the coloured flags which glorify this Organization.

121. In order to examine the colonial question in the light of the Charter, one should seek to face it with an open heart within the context of the political reality of the times. One should remember that we live in one world which is split into two rival political blocs and which is paralysed by the terror of a thermo-nuclear war. Consequently, the colonial question unfortunately tends to be examined in terms of ideological struggle and of power politics. This is a serious and dangerous error. To increase the areas of political tension, multiply points of friction, reinforce the walls of misunderstanding, signifies not only to prejudice the immediate and future interests of the colonial peoples, but also to weaken the possibilities of peaceful settlement of the problems which separate the rival blocs. This would also transform the United Nations, not into the instrument of the revolution of hope for which we, soldiers of peace, fight, but into the instrument of a revolution of resentment.

122. If one must separate the colonial question from the problem of the cold war, one cannot, however, separate it from the fundamental political problems of our time. The colonial question, for instance, speeds up the nationalist movement which is sweeping over Asia and Africa. The nationalist movement occurs at the same time as the ideological offensive of Communism throughout the world. Many fear that this coincidence might taint the independence of the newly independent peoples. Others fear that the old colonial Powers may seek to grant to the newly independent countries merely nominal independence, continuing to maintain over them a disguised political domination through economic control.

123. On the other hand, the scientific revolution of our day brings a new dimension to the nationalist movement in the colonial countries. The awareness of their misery coincides with the maximum utilization of the resources of the new technology in the highly industrialized countries. Instead of being at the service of the whole of humanity, the new technology widens the already so striking gap between the "haves" and the "have nots". To give one example, I would recall that the exploitation of nuclear energy today benefits very few countries, while its risks and dangers threaten every human being. The newly independent States join the international community with the fear that the cold war is going to delay the solution of their fundamental problems. In their despair, many States, under the delusion of accelerating their economic and social development and of appeasing the restlessness of their populations, might seek political solutions which could jeopardize their newly acquired independence.

124. I realize that it is most difficult to reason in abstracto when such grave problems weigh on the hearts of millions and on my own heart. But I am convinced that we in the United Nations have the obligation to separate the colonial question from the battles and skirmishes of the cold war.

125. The San Francisco Charter, in its Chapter XI, outlines, wisely and cautiously, the course we should follow. I refer in principle to Article 73. It is incumbent upon us to implement its provisions with determination and, above all, with sincerity. To do so, it is necessary for the colonial Powers to admit that the legitimacy of a juridical situation cannot halt the nationalist explosion which sprang less from the physical distances existing between the metropolitan Powers and the colonies than from sociological and cultural differences and from unquenchable aspirations. It is necessary that the colonial Powers also convince themselves of the uselessness of any attempts to substitute indirect domination for classic colonialism. It is necessary that the former colonial Powers and the peoples who attained their independence from them join hands in the new struggle for the social and economic development of the latter. It is necessary that the world's two rival blocs refrain from considering the States reaching independence as a no-man's-land over which they might extend their influence in order to tip in their favour the balance of power. Lastly, it is necessary that the peoples still under a colonial régime convince themselves that independence is not just a magic word followed by a flag, an anthem and diplomatic representation, but the effective political, economic and cultural mastery of the country's wealth and heritage, their utilization in the service of the whole population, and the practice of liberty through political institutions based upon a representative régime with full freedom of opinion.

126. The obligation of the United Nations—our obligation—is to prepare the peoples still under colonial régimes for independence with the utmost speed. We would be failing in our obligation by delaying their complete emancipation. But we would be improperly fulfilling this obligation if we were to forget the provisions of the Charter by exposing these peoples indiscriminately and without the proper precautions—in the name of an independence which would therefore be fictitious—to the risks and dangers of two new colonialisms: the colonialism of the totalitarian ideologies, which suppresses freedom of the people, and the form of colonialism consisting of possible attempts by the former colonial Powers towards maintaining under a new guise their economic and political domination.

127. The statesmen who drew up the United Nations Charter had political vision and firmness in establishing the course to be followed. Having in mind the principles of the Charter and guided by the observations I have just made, the Brazilian delegation considers with sympathy the draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-5] and will examine it in the light of the suggestions and remarks put forth during this debate.

128. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Mexico in exercise of the right of reply.

129. Mr. CUEVAS CANCINO (Mexico) (translated from Spanish): In his brilliant speech yesterday [933rd meeting], the representative of Guatemala referred to the future of the Territory of Belize. I have come to this rostrum for a few minutes to make some remarks on that subject.

130. My country has rights to Belize which it has claimed for many years, and I feel it necessary for me to reiterate its position on this occasion. Ever since the people of Mexico attained their independence, the Mexican Government has fought for the total abolition of the colonial system. It looks upon that system as an anachronism which should not continue to exist in the world of today. It is thus pursuing the American road of liberty and justice for all, with which ideal it links the principle of non-intervention. We consider that every people must develop freely within the norms which it chooses for itself, in accordance with its understanding of history. We also consider that every people should create its own form of organization in conformity with its ideals, developed independently from those of other nations.

131. The great strides taken by the United Nations towards a final liquidation of colonialism are now bringing it toward its goal. Thus aspirations which have a long history in the annals of America are being fulfilled. The Inter-American Conferences have referred to the subject on many occasions; resolution 96 of the Tenth Inter-American Conference, held in Caracas in March 1954 in particular, is especially relevant. The American nations reiterate therein their conviction that self-determination for all peoples is an essential bulwark, and declare that it was the will of the nations of America that colonialism maintained against the desire of peoples, and the occupation of American territories, should be definitively ended.

132. The very next resolution of that same Inter-American Conference, namely, resolution 97, expresses the need that extra-continental countries having colonies in the territory of America should carry to completion the measures envisaged in our Charter in order to make it possible for those American peoples that have not yet done so to exercise fully their rights to self-determination.

133. These two documents embody the two key principles on which the position of the Mexican Government in respect of Belize is based. The first includes the historical and legal background of the Territory. The origins of British rule in this part of the American continent are quite humble: a concession granted by the Spanish sovereign for the cutting of logwood became with the passage of time a presumed and imaginary right. The repeated requests for the recognition of its sovereignty made by the Government of Mexico during the course of the nineteenth century fell on deaf ears. The great colonial Power awaited the advent of difficult times in Mexico in order to force on it the acceptance of an onerous treaty, in contravention of Mexico's rights; nevertheless, my country has respected that treaty scrupulously. However, that has not prevented it from repeatedly pointing out that if the status of Belize is altered, it has rights, based on legal grounds, which it can and must exercise.

134. The other and basic guiding principle for my country in the matter is founded on Article 73 of the Charter. As was well said by the representative of Guatemala yesterday [933rd meeting], the interests of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories are paramount. In the case of Belize, my Government considers that the promotion of self-government and the fulfilment of the political aspirations of the people of Belize constitute a task which the international community cannot evade.

135. This, then, is Mexico's position with regard to Belize. My Government has declared, and reiterates here, that, should the present status of Belize be altered, Mexico, while using only means in keeping with the peaceful and friendly procedures which characterize its international relations, will put forward claims which are based on well-known historical and legal factors. My Government recognizes, at the same time, that the interests of the inhabitants of the Territory of Belize are paramount. It therefore holds that in the attainment of self-government by the Territory of Belize, the true and freely expressed political aspirations of its people cannot be ignored.

136. Consequently, as the Mexican Foreign Minister stated before this Assembly on 6 October 1958,^{8/} the Government of Mexico will not omit to take into account, when the time comes, that a solution to the problem of the future of Belize must be based on freedom and independence for the people of Belize.

137. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Belgium, who wishes to speak in exercise of the right of reply.

138. Mr. PARISIS (Belgium) (translated from French): Among the glaring misrepresentations concerning Belgium in the speeches made from this rostrum, I shall refer to only one today.

^{8/} Official Records of the General Assembly, thirteenth session, plenary meetings, 771st meeting.

139. People have taken pleasure in writing and saying that during half a century of Belgian colonial domination, the population of the Congo was reduced to less than half its former size as a result of punitive expeditions, famine and disease. It is absurd to compare current population figures with estimates for a period when the territory was unexplored and impenetrable in many places. It had to be open to traffic in all directions for decades before a census could be taken. That this is a glaring error of judgement becomes obvious if we analyse the drop in the mortality rate and the increase in the birth rate and if we consider that, as a result, the growth rate of the population quadrupled over twenty years, from 1935 to 1957, for example. On the eve of independence, half the population of the Congo consisted of children under fifteen, an exceptional sign of dynamic growth, especially if we remember that in the last century, unfortunately, one out of every two children born in the Congo died in infancy.

140. The error which I have just pointed out is but one example of the bad faith shown in some speeches, but this does not prevent Belgium from being proud of what it has achieved in collaboration with the Congolese people.

The meeting rose at 2.15 p.m.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY

FIFTEENTH SESSION

Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples (continued). . 1130

President: Mr. Frederick H. BOLAND (Ireland).

it appropriate to go into the matter in detail. However, at the 934th meeting on 3 December 1960, the representative of Mexico saw fit to refer to the case of Belize in connexion with my statement, and stated the problem in a form open to misunderstanding and misinterpretation.

18. My delegation thanks the representative of Mexico for giving it the opportunity to go into the problem of Belize in more detail. My delegation wishes to state once again, as it has been doing for several years, that the claim recently put forward by Mexico regarding rights in the territory of Belize which it would advance if that territory's status should be changed in response to Guatemala's demands, is not, under any circumstances or for any reason, to be regarded as a move made jointly or in concert with my country, which has claimed exclusive rights to the territory for over 100 years.

19. I should like to add a few comments on this matter. The Belize problem is purely and simply a case of seizure of territory by a great Power from a weak country which lacked the means to ensure that its rights were respected. It is true that, as the representative of Mexico said, the occupation of the territory began in virtue of the permits for timber felling granted to Great Britain by Spain under the treaty of 1773, for the area from the river Hondo to the river Belize, and the treaty of 1776, which added the area between the river Hondo and the river Sibún. In both treaties, Spain expressly reserved its sovereignty over the territory while granting the British the usufruct thereof free of charge, subject to certain restrictions, particularly with regard to the right to build fortifications. These concessions lay within the Captaincy-General of Guatemala, in the Province of Petén; the river Hondo separated the Captaincy-General of Guatemala from the Captaincy of Yucatán.

20. When the Captaincy-General of Guatemala was declared independent on 15 September 1821, the Federal Republic of Central America was formed and inherited all rights of sovereignty over the territories which it covered. The United Kingdom's precarious usufruct of the Belize area expired in virtue of international law, inasmuch as new States start their independent existence free of all commitments made by the previous sovereign, such commitments being res inter alios acta.

21. The independent existence of the Federal Republic of Central America was beset by many trials; the great Power in question, wishing to gain control of the canal routes, worked for its division. The Federal Republic of Central America was unable to secure recognition by the United Kingdom save at the price of cession of the territory of Belize. It also extended, by way of the Mosquitia shore and the Bay Islands, to the territories of Honduras and Nicaragua.

22. When the Federal Republic of Central America was dissolved and divided into the five independent Republics of Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica, each with jurisdiction over the territory of the corresponding former State, the territory of Belize fell within the jurisdiction of Guatemala under the rule of uti possidetis.

23. The serious threat that loomed over the Central American States was to some extent dispelled by the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty of 1850, under which Great

16. The PRESIDENT: Before I come to the list of speakers inscribed today on the item before us, I give the floor to the representative of Guatemala in exercise of his right of reply.

17. Mr. HERRARTE (Guatemala) (translated from Spanish): In its statement in the general debate on the item "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples", the delegation of Guatemala mentioned in passing the wrongful occupation of the Guatemalan territory of Belize by the United Kingdom, but, in view of the general nature of the item now under discussion, we did not consider Britain and the United States undertook not to occupy any part of Central America.

24. For reasons which I need not go into here, and under the pressure of circumstances, the Government of Guatemala was forced to conclude with Great Britain the Convention of 1859. This was a real treaty of cession and increased the area of the territory from 6,000 to more than 22,000 square kilometres. It contained a compensation clause with which the United Kingdom did not comply; Guatemala has therefore denounced the treaty, but the United Kingdom has not returned the territory wrongfully held.

25. The Government of Mexico concluded with the United Kingdom Government in 1893 a frontier treaty under which the river Hondo—the boundary between the Captaincy of Yucatán and the Captaincy-General of Guatemala in colonial times, as we have seen—was recognized as the frontier between the territory of Belize and the Province of Yucatán, in Mexico. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Mexico recognized at the time that the 1859 Convention between Great Britain and Guatemala had been a treaty concerning the cession of territory, that the only issue with Mexico was one of boundaries and that no sacrifice of Mexican territory was involved.

26. At this point, I should like to remind the Mexican representative of what some illustrious Mexicans have said in connexion with the Guatemalan case regarding Belize. General Eduardo Hay, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Mexico, in a very cordial note to the Guatemalan Foreign Ministry in 1939, recognized Guatemala's rights to Belize "in accordance", as he put it, "with the historical, geographical and legal background to the case". General Lázaro Cárdenas, the President of Mexico, said in a statement in 1940:

"Just as Mexico feels strengthened by these proofs of solidarity, it also feels bound to reciprocate, either by making proposals for peace or neutrality or by supporting the territorial claims of sister nations which, like Guatemala in Belize, justly seek the settlement of long-standing disputes and the healing of mutilations inflicted by force and in defiance of the rules of international law."

27. The same attitude of solidarity has been shown by the Central American Republics on several occasions and more particularly in the Declaration of Principles of Central American Co-Existence (Declaration of Antigua Guatemala), which included the following:

"The First Meeting of Ministers for Foreign Affairs of Central America declares, on behalf of the States represented:... Seventhly: its rejection of the survival of colonialism in America and its express statement that the territory of Belize is an integral part of Guatemalan, and therefore of Central American, territory, and that the action taken to reclaim it concerns all the States signatories of this Declaration."

28. It would take a long time to narrate the Guatemalan people's unrelenting, heroic and worthy struggle for the victory of their just cause. We have heard the voices of the most eminent jurists and public figures of our continent raised in encouragement and support of our right. It is consequently painful to us that, in recent years, the delegation of Mexico has advanced at the United Nations claims which it had never previously made, which are opportunist in character, and which present the Belize problem in a form very different from the historical reality. I should also like to remind the Mexican representative of what his country means to us. We are proud of the historical and cultural bonds between us. For the small countries of Central America, Mexico is like an elder brother. We admire its great civic deeds, its nobility, its deep and historical sense of continental solidarity, and its relations with our peoples have always been most cordial. We are therefore entitled to expect from that great country what Benito Juárez, one of its greatest men, expressed in the monumental words: "Peace is respect in the rights of others".

29. Mr. OBEID (Sudan): May my first words in this brief intervention be words of tribute and congratulation to the delegation of the Soviet Union, under the leadership of Premier Khrushchev, for having taken the very timely initiative of proposing that this item be placed on the agenda of this session and for having successfully advocated its discussion in plenary meeting.

30. The progress of the debate thus far has demonstrated with devastating force the depth of convictions guiding the freedom-loving peoples of the world in this determined struggle to eradicate a sinister phenomenon from which humanity has suffered only too long and which has generated much poison in the relations between man and man.

31. I believe that everything that ought to be said has been said by the more enlightened speakers who have preceded me to this rostrum and I am, therefore, not going to protract this debate by covering the same ground again. It is not my intention to go into the details of the history of colonialism; but I shall try to follow a brighter theme—that of the struggle against colonialism which has resulted in freedom and independence.

32. Two conceptions have, over the years, been developed by the colonial Powers as justifications for dominating others. In the first place, they tell us that, in subjugating the colonial peoples, they have a civilizing mission to perform. In the second place, they tell us that they have been entrusted with that mission because they are superior. This latter conception went to the heads of some of the colonial Powers to an extent that it has developed into a policy as sinister and as diabolical as colonialism itself and which we now call "racialism". It does not need much ingenuity to discover the flimsiness and even absurdity of such theories. Civilization is one of those great words that has so far defied definition. Theories of racial superiority have led their propagators to nothing but inevitable and all-embracing disaster, and history sometimes repeats itself. It is not naïve to state that these theories are used to cover the exploitation of peoples and to justify the enjoyment of the material fruits of their land and their labour. But human beings, by their very nature, cannot accept or tolerate foreign domination and the injustice, humiliation and degradation that necessarily accompany it. It was only natural then for those peoples to rise, to resist, and to struggle to redeem a birthright. These resistance movements against colonialism were rather isolated in the early days of colonialism. The odds were heavy, the conditions were adverse, the costs were incalculable, countless lives were lost or sacrificed, prisons overflowed with what the colonialists called "agitators" but who were, in fact, freedom lovers. But the will of God and the determination of his creatures to redeem what he has decreed for them prevailed against injustice and inequality.

33. Rivalries between the colonial Powers helped this liberation movement. Many times, and notably during the last two wars, they tried to win the colonial peoples to their side and gave them glittering promises which were soon to be forgotten after the hour of distress was over. But the colonial peoples did not forget; they accelerated their efforts and intensified their struggle, so that the colonial Powers were, in the end, forced to concede to them what was theirs—their independence.

34. The best example of these promises unfulfilled is the famous Arab revolt. When the First World War broke out and Turkey joined the side of Germany, the Allies encouraged the Arabs—who were under Turkey then—to revolt. They promised them complete independence after victory. The Arabs revolted, fought bravely on the side of the Allies and, within two to three years, the Turks were driven out of Arabia, Syria, Palestine and Lebanon. To the dismay of the Arabs, it was soon discovered that the Allies had made a secret treaty between them, called the Sykes-Picot Agreement, sharing, amongst themselves, the Arab world. Not only that, but by the Balfour Declaration, Great Britain promised the creation of a national home for the Jews in Palestine against the clearly expressed wish of the overwhelming majority of the Palestinians. The tragic consequences of that unfortunate decision are well known, since they have been with us here in the United Nations for the last thirteen years.

35. But the Arabs did not succumb. They continued the bitter fight even after the Allies had won the war and imposed their authority over the Arab world. Again, the wishes of the people and their indomitable determination to realize them prevailed and most of the Arab countries of the Middle East have achieved their complete independence. It is regrettable that one of the Arab countries in that area is still fighting for its independence, but we hope it will not be long before Palestine will join the free nations of the world, in spite of attempts to keep it in the present forced desert camp settlement.

36. The sacrifice and endurance of the colonial peoples during their struggle were worth while; after the Second World War, many Afro-Asian countries, led by the great peoples of the Indian Sub-continent and by Burma, Ceylon and Indonesia, gained their independence.

37. This episode brings us to the new and auspicious era of the collective rise against colonialism. The leaders of the independent Asian and African countries realized that the plight of the colonial peoples in Asia and Africa was the same and that their collective efforts against colonialism would be more effective than their individual action. Hence, the epoch-making Asian-African Conference held at Bandung in 1955, which constitutes a veritable landmark in man's relentless and purposeful march on the road of liberty and independence. The lofty principles adopted by the Conference are ever inspiring and shall always stand as a beacon of liberty and freedom. Then followed the first Conference of Independent African States, held at Accra in 1958. All Africa listened and held its breath for its results. It adopted forceful resolutions, particularly in the sphere of freedom and the future of dependent territories in Africa. Resolution II reads:

"The Conference of Independent African States,

"Recognising that the existence of colonialism in any shape or form is a threat to the security and independence of the African States and to world peace,

"Considering that the problems and the future of dependent territories in Africa are not the exclusive concern of the Colonial Powers but the responsibility of all Members of the United Nations and in particular of the Independent African States,

"Condemning categorically all colonial systems still enforced in our Continent and which impose arbitrary rule and repression on the peoples of Africa,

"Convinced that a definite date should be set for the attainment of independence by each of the Colonial Territories in accordance with the will of the people of the territories and the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations,

"1. Calls upon the Administering Powers to respect the Charter of the United Nations in this regard, and to take rapid steps to implement the provisions of the Charter and the political aspirations of the people namely self-determination and independence, according to the will of the people;

"2. Calls upon the Administering Powers to refrain from repression and arbitrary rule in these territories and to respect all human rights as provided for in the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;

"3. Calls upon the Administering Powers to bring to bring to an end immediately every form of discrimination in these territories;

"4. Recommends that all Participating Governments should give all possible assistance to the dependent peoples in their struggle to achieve self-determination and independence;

"5. Recommends that the Independent African States assembled here should offer facilities for training and educating peoples of the dependent territories;

"6. Decides that the 15th April of every year be celebrated as Africa Freedom Day."

My purpose in quoting this resolution in full is to have it recorded in the annals of the United Nations.

38. This is how and why the present liberation movement in Africa gathered force and brought the sweeping change in the continent. Just this year, sixteen African countries gained their independence and others are on the way to independence. It is the collective will and stand of all Africa for freedom and independence that brought the change and determined to eradicate colonialism and racialism from the soil of Africa. Africa—a continent that has for so long been ravished by the scourge of colonialism and its concomitants—has shaken its chains. It will not wear them again.

39. We, the African people, who have suffered so much and who have now, through our own efforts and with the assistance of the freedom-loving peoples, achieved our independence, realize the difference between our miserable past and the bright present, and still brighter future. It has been demonstrated beyond any doubt that countries progress more rapidly in all fields after independence.

40. In the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/4371, part I, para. 23), the representatives of India and Iraq stated that, although in the past the Administering Members had held that self-government should be the culmination of a long process of economic and social development, experience had shown that the Territories progressed more rapidly after they had become self-governing or independent. The representative of India also emphasized that the Committee should consider not only the progress achieved but what more should and could be done. Moreover, it was important that the progress should be assessed not only in terms of statistics and percentages, but also by the extent to which the needs or aspirations of the people had been met. He emphasized that it could no longer be accepted that the attainment of freedom by peoples in Non-Self-Governing Territories should be made conditional on their prior attainment of certain standards in other fields.

41. Judging by our own experience, we totally agree with these views. It has been proved beyond doubt that colonialism is sterile and cannot contribute to progress. The African independent States followed the march of struggle to free the remaining part of the continent. The three conferences in Accra, Monrovia and Addis Ababa intensified the pressure against colonialism. But in spite of the march of freedom, we find today some colonial Powers which hide their heads in the sand. Portugal follows the most oppressive and degrading policy in its African colonies of Mozambique, Angola, Guinea and others. Its policy can easily be compared with the racist policy of the Union of South Africa, which is also applied in the Territory of South West Africa. We should like these two countries to watch the tempo of the time and to act in harmony with the requirements of the age in which they, and we, live. These people will not be forsaken or forgotten. They will find assistance from all Africa and the freedom-loving countries, until they achieve their independence. We call upon the administering Powers responsible for the affairs of Rhodesia, Nyasaland, Kenya, Uganda, Malta, West Sahara, Somalia territory under France, and West Irian to accede to the will, wishes and aspirations of the peoples of these territories.

42. As for Algeria, the greatest tragedy of our time, so much has been said but very little has been done to put an end to a brutal war now in its seventh year. With every day that passes, this war in Algeria becomes more and more furious. Loss of human life—both French and Algerian—mounts by the hour. More than one-fourth of the population of Algeria are held in prisons and internment camps where they are subjected to the most cruel and humiliating treatment. This latter aspect of this inhuman war was shockingly revealed in a report of the International Committee of the Red Cross and was the subject of a strong protest addressed to the Secretary-General by twenty Afro-Asian Members of the United Nations in February of this year.

43. This was the tragic result of the French Government's not abiding by President de Gaulle's recognition of the right of the Algerian people to self-determination. The behaviour of the Provisional Government of Algeria, since President de Gaulle's declaration of 16 September 1959, has consistently been characterized by a sense of responsibility, political maturity, statesmanship and peaceful intentions.

44. In its declaration of 28 September 1959, in response to General de Gaulle's declaration, the Provisional Government of Algeria agreed with the French position that the right of self-determination should be the basis for a solution of the Algerian problem. It also agreed with the French Government that recourse to universal suffrage as a means of determining the political future of Algeria cannot take place without the return of peace. It only asked for an opportunity to discuss with France the political and military conditions for the cease-fire and the conditions and guarantees for the application of the principle of self-determination. This was a natural demand. But, from what transpired during the year since President de Gaulle's declaration, France seems insistent that any discussions regarding the cease-fire or regarding the conditions and modalities of any meeting between France and the representatives of the Provisional Government of Algeria should be unilaterally decided by France. We have ample proof of this from what took place at Melun between 25 and 29 June of this year. The conditions made by France at that meeting—these conditions and modalities of a meeting between French and Algerian delegations—were described by a former French Prime Minister, Mr. Mendes-France, as follows and I quote: "conditions so humiliating that they were equivalent to a demand for capitulation."

45. But the valiant Algerian people, who have fought so long and so courageously for an honourable cause, will not capitulate to the weight of French armour, because they have the right on their side and the right will ultimately win.

46. We are convinced that Algeria will be independent and that the representatives of Algeria will soon be sitting amongst us here. We are happy that today the United Nations decided to throw its moral weight against colonialism and for the independence of subjugated peoples. It has contributed greatly in the movement of progress and independence of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories. It is acting in accordance with the determination proclaimed by the peoples of the world in the Charter of the United Nations:

"...to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small,

"...to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom,".

47. To us, the draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-5], of which my delegation has the honour to be a co-sponsor, marks the climax of the struggle and the formal denunciation of colonialism in any form or shape. We are convinced that the continued existence of colonialism prevents the development of international co-operation, impedes the social, cultural and economic development of dependent peoples and militates against the United Nations ideals of universal peace. We are convinced that the craving of dependent peoples for freedom and independence is natural and rational and that the process of liberation is irresistible and irreversible, and, in order to avoid serious crises, an end must be put to colonialism and all practices of segregation and discrimination associated with it. The United Nations is richer and stronger with the emergence of the new independent States, and we must see that all peoples of the world are free and loyal Members of the United Nations.

48. The policy of my Government towards the freedom movement in Africa is well defined and set forth clearly. It leaves no room for doubt. We shall help, morally and materially, all African peoples struggling for freedom, independence and equality. In a recent communiqué, the President of the United Arab Republic and the President of the Republic of the Sudan declared their condemnation of the policies designed to subjugate and enslave the peoples, or to undermine human dignity because of colour, race or creed. They also declared that they will continue to support the cause of national liberation of the African countries which are yet to achieve independence. They condemned all nefarious attempts aimed at disorganizing this liberation struggle and supported all attempts to uproot colonialism and racialism from African soil.

49. We shall not remain silent in the face of injustice nor fail to criticize whatever is manifestly wrong. We shall always express our views honestly and fearlessly and shall always render any assistance within our power to freedom fighters all over the world until freedom and justice for all peoples throughout the world are ensured.

50. In conclusion, we hope that the draft resolution will be carried unanimously and that its implementation will immediately follow its adoption. The goodwill and the co-operation of the Administering Powers are hopefully sought in rising to this challenge. We shall expect them to try to forget the theories with which they sought to justify colonialism. On our part, we shall also try to forget and what we cannot forget we shall try to forgive.

51. Mr. SHAHA (Nepal): My delegation welcomes the initiative of the delegation of the USSR in sponsoring the item entitled "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples". We feel that the time has come for the United Nations to pronounce itself clearly and unequivocally on the necessity and urgency of unconditionally ending colonialism in all its forms and manifestations.

52. The advanced thinking and the enlightened conscience of mankind in the mid-twentieth century has far outstripped even the most radical and progressive concepts of colonialism, no matter what justification the colonial Powers themselves may have for their own policies and actions in this regard. It is true that some countries have a better colonial record than others, but this alone does not entitle those countries with a more favourable record to seek justification for the pursuit of their colonial policy in the changed circumstances of the present-day world.

53. We might have some reservations of our own with regard to the form of the Soviet declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples [A/4502 and Corr.1], but it cannot be denied that the Soviet declaration brings this idea of the ending of colonialism into a sharp focus. Every Member should realize the importance and seriousness of this matter that is presently being debated and should direct all its efforts and attention towards enabling the peoples still under colonial domination in the world to realize their aspirations for freedom and independence in the immediate future.

54. We are afraid of one thing and this is that, like any other subject, it might also be treated by certain interested parties as an item for cold war propaganda. But to us, in Asia and Africa, who have experienced colonial domination in the past and are even now seeing the true picture of colonialism with its grim consequences to the people under its yoke, this is a matter which should not be treated lightly and must not be allowed to be given the cold war treatment in this debate. To us it is something which is vital to the evolution of a new world order based on freedom, justice and equality for all men, irrespective of their colour or the region to which they belong. In our opinion, this is the kind of world order which is envisaged in the Charter of the United Nations itself.

55. We were heartened and gratified to hear Mr. David Ormsby-Gore, the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs of the United Kingdom, remark earlier in the course of his intervention on this subject:

"Let me say at once that the United Kingdom delegation is in entire sympathy with what I know to be the ... main purposes of these delegations"—from the context it follows that these delegations are the Asian and African delegations—"the achievement with all possible speed of full self-government and independence by those people who do not yet enjoy these things." [925th meeting, para. 32.]

The Minister of State for Foreign Affairs of the United Kingdom referred—and I must say rightly—to the obligations the colonial Powers have undertaken under Article 73 of the United Nations Charter. But the question is how many of the colonial Powers, even to this day, have shown respect for these obligations in their colonial policies.

56. Yet, from another point of view, the speed with which the Government of the United Kingdom itself might have advanced the cause of self-government in different colonies—Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories under its administration—might have been "remarkable in the light of the expectations of the world in 1946"—these are the words of Mr. David Ormsby-Gore [ibid., para. 35]—but the relevant question is whether this speed with which self-government has been advanced in the above-mentioned Territories satisfies the growing demands of world public opinion in 1960.

57. As we have said before, if the United Nations is to keep pace with events in the world and with the growth of consciousness among the peoples of the world in this regard, the time has come for it to declare its position on this question in clear and unmistakable terms. We know that the Principles and Purposes of the United Nations Charter, and the chapters in it dealing with international economic and social co-operation and the international trusteeship system are oriented towards the eventual eradication of colonialism. But that alone does not seem to satisfy the rising expectations of the peoples in the countries that are still under colonial domination. This is the main reason that has led us, along with so many other Asian and African delegations, to co-sponsor the draft resolution.

58. For understandable reasons, my delegation does not wish to go into the origins of colonialism at this stage, nor does it wish to analyse its causes and motives. In our opinion, colonialism, as a force in international politics, has to be examined in terms of its effects on international relations. Judged in this light, it has proved to be an unmitigated evil which has not only vitiated the relations between the colonial peoples but also has led to wars between the colonial Powers themselves.

59. The history of the scramble for Africa in the last century, and even in the early twentieth century, bears testimony to this fact. The end of the Second World War gave new impetus to the freedom movement in Asia and Africa and, as a result of the general awakening that ensued, quite a few countries in Asia and Africa attained their independence and freedom and took their rightful places in the community of nations.

60. If there has been any subject on which the nations of Asia and Africa have been able to put up a united front before the world, it has been that of colonialism. The Conference of the African-Asian nations held at Bandung in April 1955 gave an answer to the question as to how the peoples of Asia and Africa stand on this subject.

61. It is our sincere belief that colonialism is no longer tenable, that it is indeed on its last legs and that a final effort must be made, here and now, for its complete eradication. The Soviet initiative has given us an opportunity to reaffirm our faith in the lofty principles of the Charter in relation to colonialism and declare ourselves finally and unequivocally against it. In the opinion of my delegation, a solemn declaration to the effect that colonialism must and will go quite a long way to inspire hope and confidence in the minds of the peoples of the world, and particularly those of Asia and Africa, who have suffered and continue to suffer most from colonialism.

62. As I have already said, my delegation is aware that different colonial Powers have different colonial records and these Powers make different kinds of claims as to the success or failure of the colonial system. Over-enthusiastic colonial thinkers have even tended to regard colonialism as an unmixed blessing. According to them, colonialism is just an extension of the great European liberal tradition of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries—a movement of civilization itself. The adoption of this attitude towards colonialism has led many colonial Powers to make extravagant claims on behalf of their colonies. For instance, it is sometimes claimed that a strong colonial Power has established unity where there was chaos before. Moreover, statistics are adduced to prove that there has been constant social and economic progress in the colonies.

63. My delegation, while admitting that the balance-sheet of colonialism is far from uniform, as applied to the records of different colonial Powers, believes that colonialism is unsatisfactory as a system of relations among nations. European liberalism has achieved many wonderful things no doubt, but colonialism is not one of its strongest points. In the face of poverty and backwardness, which are wide-spread over the colonies and former colonies in Asia and Africa, in the face of wide-spread disturbance in many such territories before and after independence, and in the face of complete balkanization of continents such as that occurring in the continent of Africa at the present moment, claims of unity, order and progress made on behalf of colonies appear to us unjustified.

64. We recognize that remarkable progress has been made since the last war towards the emancipation of the colonial peoples. People who have become free are far larger in number than people who still remain to be freed. But since a large number of people have attained freedom, the continuation of a smaller number in the dependent status has become even more unacceptable and more irritating. Judging from the intensity of bitterness that continued colonialism engenders, not only in the minds of the peoples of the dependent countries, but also in the minds of peoples who have recently freed themselves from colonialism, we are persuaded to believe that the continuation of colonialism, even in small territories, is undesirable. The volume and intensity of ill feeling alone seem to outweigh all other considerations, practical or otherwise, that might be cited in favour of maintaining the status quo in a particular territory.

65. In these circumstances, it would have been most fitting if the colonial Powers themselves had taken the initiative to persuade the United Nations to declare itself in unmistakable terms against colonialism. Colonialism, as it was understood in the nineteenth century and has been understood so far, is definitely in its death throes, and the colonial Powers have themselves realized this. We hope, therefore, that all the States Members of this Organization will find it possible to support the forty-two-Power draft resolution which has been submitted to the General Assembly on behalf of the Asian and African group. In the opinion of its sponsors, the question of colonialism is far too serious a subject, and in the drafting of the text care has been taken to make it acceptable to all.

66. I should like to explain the draft resolution which we have the honour to co-sponsor with forty-one other Powers. I do not wish to refer to its preambular paragraphs in detail, because they do not contain anything which is not already contained in the United Nations Charter and which has not, as such, been accepted by the Members of this Organization. If there are any suggestions with regard to improvement of the phrasing of these paragraphs, they could be considered by the sponsors, but I need hardly add that the process in which United Nations resolutions are drafted and prepared is not always conducive to the production of the best text.

67. The first preambular paragraph speaks of the determination proclaimed by the peoples of the world in the same words in which it is expressed in the Preamble of the United Nations Charter. The second preambular paragraph is obviously based on Article 55 of Chapter IX of the Charter that deals with international economic and social co-operation; and the remaining paragraphs merely state facts or principles of international co-operation and conduct that have been accepted by all. We do not think that any delegation represented here will have any serious objections to the preambular paragraphs as such.

68. The final communiqué of the Asian-African Conference at Bandung shows that the Conference was, inter alia, agreed on the following: first, in declaring that colonialism, in all its manifestations, is an evil which should speedily be brought to an end; secondly, in affirming that the subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights, is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and is an impediment to the promotion of world peace and co-operation;

thirdly, in declaring its support of the cause of freedom and independence for all such peoples; and finally, in calling upon the Powers concerned to grant freedom and independence to such peoples.

69. The operative part of the forty-two-Power draft resolution begins with the words:

"Solemnly proclaims the necessity of bringing to a speedy and unconditional end colonialism in all its forms and manifestations;

"And to this end

"Declares that:

"1. The subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights, is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and is an impediment to the promotion of world peace and co-operation."

As is clear, these paragraphs are based on the text of the final communiqué of the Asian-African Conference at Bandung. It is also to be noted that the second Conference of Independent African States which met at Addis Ababa from 14 to 26 June 1960 voiced the same sentiments and aspirations in its resolutions on the eradication of colonial rule in Africa.

70. The second principle in the operative part of the draft resolution relates to the right of self-determination and is based on article 1 of the draft Covenant on Human Rights dealing with the right of self-determination which has been accepted by most of the Members of this Assembly.

71. The third principle is self-explanatory and merely implies that political, economic, social or educational unpreparedness must not be used as a pretext for delaying independence.

72. The fourth principle implies that the people in the countries under colonial domination must not be subjected to armed action or repressive measures that will prevent them from exercising their right to independence freely and without pressure of any kind from Administering Authorities. It further says that the integrity of the national territory shall be respected. The stipulations contained in this principle are based on the practical experience of the countries in their struggle for freedom against the colonial Powers. Hence, it is full of meaning and significance to the peoples still under the colonial yoke.

73. The fifth principle is, in our opinion, the most important one and forms the key paragraph in the whole draft resolution, the implementation of which alone can make it effective. It has been argued that this paragraph appears a little irresponsible because it does not take into account the peculiar circumstances of each territory under colonial or Trust administration, and its adoption may make it unnecessarily difficult for the Administering Power to discharge its responsibilities. However, it is proposed by the sponsors merely in the hope and belief that the adoption of this paragraph will give an added incentive to the colonial Powers to draw up and declare suitable time limits for the granting of independence to the countries under colonial rule as soon as feasible, taking into account both the rising expectations and demands of the peoples and the peculiar circumstances prevailing in each dependent territory, Trust Territory or colony.

74. The sixth principle cautions, in the light of the living experience of the colonial territories, against any attempt on the part of the colonial Powers at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of the colonial country by stating that such attempts would be incompatible with the Charter of the United Nations.

75. Paragraph 7 merely reiterates and reaffirms that all States shall observe the provisions of the declaration along with those of the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, on the basis of equality, non-interference in the internal affairs of all States, and respect for the sovereign rights of all peoples and their territorial integrity. The principles that have been put forward as the basis for the observance of the above-mentioned provisions of the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights are manifestly the principles which have been enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations itself and generally accepted by every Member of this Organization.

76. We commend this draft resolution to the unanimous acceptance of the Members of this Assembly.

77. Mr. PAZHAWAK (Afghanistan): The serious interest demonstrated in the consideration of the item before the General Assembly is in itself evidence of the great importance which the people of the world and the United Nations attach to the necessity of an immediate end to the system of domination of peoples and nations. I do not see any need to restate my country's traditional firm policy of full support of the absolute elimination of the system of domination in all its forms and manifestations. Our stand on this matter is not only clear but has been outstanding.

78. In my intervention of 12 October 1960 before the General Assembly [902nd meeting], I emphasized that a declaration on the abolition of colonialism should have been the first order of business at the time of the establishment of the United Nations, and I regretted that it had been delayed. I have asked permission to speak on this issue at this stage to explain why we have actively participated in the drafting of one of the declarations which we have ultimately co-sponsored and to state our own understanding of this declaration.

79. We have listened to all the statements with great care. We have naturally felt associated with all strong arguments in favour of the urgent abolition of the system of domination and colonialism put forward by those who have preceded us. However, on our part, we are proud to say that we do not have anything to complain about regarding the colonial Powers, if the colonial Powers which attempted to attack us have nothing to complain about regarding us. They attacked us and we defended our rights, and that is that. It is a matter which belongs to a history which we do not wish to be repeated. Therefore, I do not intend to repeat the tragic history or the sad consequences of the policies of domination, as we think we are here not to deal with the faults of the past but to prevent their continuation and to abolish the possibility of their revival—a history which should in no way be allowed to repeat itself.

80. Moreover, I do not intend to go into the matter of the definition of colonialism or domination of peoples and nations, particularly since I speak before an Assembly the majority of whose Members are eye-witnesses to different forms of suffering emanating from the different forms of domination. Without the intention, therefore, of repeating what has already been said, I shall confine myself to a few general observations, as our specific ideas are incorporated in the draft resolution under consideration of which we are a co-sponsor.

81. First, the system that we should like to see immediately abolished is the domination of any people by an alien people in all its forms and manifestations. Second, independence from domination should apply not only to those peoples and territories which are usually called colonies but to all dependent peoples. Third, the abolition of domination by giving independence should be complete; it can be completed only if it is meant to stop forever any attempt at the revival of any alien influence on peoples and nations after they have achieved their independence. Fourth, independence should not mean only political independence, but should mean economic and cultural independence, free from any direct or indirect influence or exercise of pressure of any kind on peoples and nations in any form and under any pretence. Fifth, the implementation of the provisions of the declaration should be universal and should apply to all peoples and territories, not only for the achievement but also for the preservation of their full and absolute independence, solely dependent on the free will and determination of the peoples themselves, and free from any influence whatsoever.

82. The draft resolution covers all these principles in the real sense and spirit of its provisions. No other interpretation should be considered a part of our understanding of this declaration, particularly anything which would in any way cast a shadow of doubt on these principles and their undeniable acceptance by the peoples of the world.

83. There are two paragraphs in this draft resolution which were incorporated as a result of the particular interest which my delegation attaches to their provisions: operative paragraph 2 of the declaration, which reads:

"All peoples have the right to self-determination; by virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development."

and the eighth paragraph of the preamble, which affirms that:

"peoples may, for their own ends, freely dispose of their natural wealth and resources without prejudice to any obligations arising out of international economic co-operation, based upon the principle of mutual benefit, and international law,".

84. I mention this only to emphasize the importance of these provisions among other provisions of the declaration for the abolition of dependence and colonialism, to all of which we have agreed with full conviction.

85. It is our strong hope that the United Nations will not fail to adopt the most effective measures at the conclusion of its consideration of the issue before it. My delegation will support any other constructive measures which would strengthen the stand of the United Nations in favour of the natural and undeniable right of peoples and nations and which would bring about the end of all forms of domination of man by man.

86. Before concluding, I wish to express our appreciation of one of the great constructive changes which separates our time from that of the past. With the world following two main ideological systems, it is a source of gratification to us that, within each system, the Powers most capable of domination are not colonial Powers. I refer, evidently, to the Soviet Union and the United States. The great responsibilities of these big Powers in the implementation of the declaration cannot and should not be ignored.

87. The fact that the initiative for a declaration on the abolition of domination and colonialism to be acted upon by the United Nations was taken by the delegation of the Soviet Union is greatly appreciated by us. I wish to pay a warm tribute to the Government and people of the Soviet Union for their effort in this field. It is our hope that all other Powers, including the colonial Powers, will follow the same policy for the achievement and preservation of the right of all nations and peoples to freedom and the right of man to dignity.

88. When the declaration on the abolition of domination and colonialism is put to the vote, it will be an historic moment in which the real stand and the real, sincere intentions of all countries, large and small, will be put to the test. This will not be a vote that, if cast negatively, will leave room for any positive explanation of vote understandable to mankind.

89. It is our strong hope, therefore, that no nation in this Organization will fail itself in this great historic test.

90. Mr. AIKEN (Ireland): When my delegation read the statement introducing the proposed "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples" [A/4502 and Corr.1], we feared we were about to witness only another intense propaganda battle. We feared that the greater part of the discussion would be directed not to the consideration of how best to win independence for the peoples not now enjoying independence, but that their rightful aspirations and vital interests would be set at naught in an attempt to use them as cannon fodder in the cold war.

91. We welcome, therefore, the constructive efforts of those who prepared the draft resolution [A/L.323] and of all those who contributed to this debate with the sole object of securing a fruitful outcome; instead of sowing hatred and confusion, they have tried to promote friendship, co-operation and freedom. We welcome, too, the many emphatic statements that the peoples have the inalienable right to enjoy a full measure of independence for their national territories. Many peoples stand deprived of that right today. Some of these peoples have never achieved independent statehood. Some others—and their fate is not less tragic—had their independence and lost it.

92. Representing a nation that fought for centuries to uphold the principles of freedom for men and nations—the principles that are now inscribed in our Charter—the Irish delegation, like most other delegations, has one interest and one interest only in this debate: that is, to secure the passage of a resolution by this Assembly that will best serve the long-term interests of all nations and give fresh impetus to the speedy and orderly implementation of our Charter principles. In this way, we can help to lay firm foundations for a true peace and for a great co-operative effort to reduce poverty, illiteracy and disease throughout the world.

93. Most of us here, I believe, are concerned to ensure that our resolution shall be as universal in its application as is the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It is essential that it should not be selective or directed to certain cases or to certain parts of the world; it is essential, we submit, that the rights it proclaims for peoples not now enjoying full national independence should be applicable to all peoples in all parts of the world, east or west, north or south; that the right to exercise full national independence should be recognized as justly belonging to all peoples, whether the oppressors and the oppressed were of the same race, creed or colour or of different races, creeds and colours; whether the oppressed peoples came under the domination of an outside Power many centuries ago like my own country, or in the last century like many countries in Africa, or in recent years like Tibet. We are concerned also to ensure that if, in the future, a small country anywhere in the world should come under the domination of an outside Power, our resolution should affirm the right of that country to regain its freedom.

94. The draft resolution sponsored by Afghanistan and forty-one other countries, clearly maintains this essential principle of universality when it reminds us that the Charter of the United Nations reaffirms our "faith in fundamental human rights" and in the "equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small".

95. The draft resolution emphasizes the need for "respect for the principles of equal rights and self-determination of all peoples, and of universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion".

96. The draft resolution recognizes further "the passionate yearning for freedom in all dependent peoples" and the fact that "the peoples of the world ardently desire the end of colonialism in all its manifestations".

97. It asserts our conviction that "the continued existence of colonialism prevents the development of international ... co-operation... and militates against the United Nations ideal of universal peace".

98. It affirms the right of peoples freely to dispose of their national wealth in accordance with the principle of mutual benefit and international law.

99. It asserts the principle that "all peoples have an inalienable right to complete freedom, the exercise of their sovereignty and the integrity of their national territory".

100. It "solemnly proclaims the necessity of bringing to a speedy and unconditional end colonialism in all its forms and manifestations".

101. The draft resolution firmly maintains the principle of universality when it declares that "the subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights, is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and is an impediment to the promotion of world peace and co-operation".

102. The same principle of universality is explicitly asserted in the declaration, namely: "All peoples have the right to self-determination".

103. This principle also underlies the following declarations:

"Inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence."

"All armed action or repressive measures of all kinds directed against dependent peoples shall cease in order to enable them to exercise peacefully and freely their right to complete independence, and the integrity of their national territory shall be respected."

"Any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country is incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations."

"All States shall observe faithfully and strictly the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the present Declaration on the basis of equality, non-interference in the internal affairs of all States, and respect for the sovereign rights of all peoples and their territorial integrity."

104. It will be noted, I am sure, that all the quotations I have given from various paragraphs of the draft resolution are couched in clear and unambiguous language and are of universal application. In these paragraphs definite and clear-cut principles are asserted without limitation of time or geography, or limitation as to race, creed or colour; the rights apply universally to all peoples, and the duties apply universally to all peoples.

105. In the quotations I have given, the draft resolution speaks of the "fundamental" human rights, of the "equal rights of nations", of the rights to self-determination of "all peoples", of the freedom of "all" dependent peoples, of the end of colonialism in "all its manifestations", of the right of peoples to dispose of their national wealth, of the end of "all practices" of segregation, of the inalienable right of "all peoples" to complete freedom, independence and territorial unity, of an end to colonialism in "all its forms" and manifestations, of the principle that independence shall "never" be delayed by a pretext of unpreparedness, of the duty of "all States" to observe the Charter of the United Nations and respect the sovereign rights of "all peoples" and their territorial integrity, of the truth that human rights and fundamental freedoms belong to "all peoples", without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.

106. All the assertions of rights to which I have just referred seem to me to be general and universal in their application. The opening part of operative paragraph 5 seems, however, to be more restricted in its scope. It refers to territories which have not yet attained independence, without referring specifically to the case of peoples who once enjoyed independence, but lost it.

107. For the sake of clarity and uniformity with other parts of the draft resolution, my delegation therefore would prefer that the opening part of operative paragraph 5 should read:

"Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, and in all cases where the sovereign rights proclaimed in the present Declaration are denied to any people, to transfer all powers to the people concerned without any conditions or reservations..."

108. However, we know the difficulty, in the few days now at our disposal for this debate, of changing the wording of a draft already agreed upon by the Governments of forty-two Member States after many weeks of discussion between their representatives. We are accordingly prepared, if the sponsors are not in a position to amend the wording as I have suggested, to accept the draft resolution as a whole as meaning that all peoples in all parts of the world now subject, or who may become subject in the future, in whole or in part, to an outside Power are entitled to full national independence for all their territory, and that immediate steps shall be taken to apply to them, in a speedy and orderly manner, the fundamental rights proclaimed for all peoples in this declaration.

109. In addressing this Assembly containing so many representatives of newly emerged nations and of the Powers which once held dominion over them, I wish to say how profoundly we are impressed by the widening of freedom which has occurred in our time through the efforts of former subject peoples and, often, through the wise and realistic statesmanship of the colonial Powers. The United Nations is entitled to be proud of the help it has given in the peaceful and orderly achievement of independence by many States in the last fifteen years. The result has been spectacular.

110. What Irishman would have believed forty years ago that he would live to hear a British statesman proclaim, in relation to all the remaining territories under United Kingdom administration, the words uttered here a few days ago by the representative of the United Kingdom, Mr. Ormsby-Gore: "In these territories", he said, "there is no argument about the right of the people to independence; there is no argument whether the people will be independent or not. Certainly they will" [925th meeting, para. 50]. Which of us would have believed forty years ago that he would have lived to see a hundred nations participating on the basis of equality in a world Organization with a fundamental law such as the Charter of the United Nations? I gladly pay tribute to the part played in that achievement not only by the gallant men and noble women of the subject countries who fought for freedom through the centuries, but also by forward-looking statesmen and liberal-minded citizens of the colonial Powers.

111. The draft resolution we are discussing emphasizes the fact that, though much has been accomplished in the widening of freedom, much remains to be done.

112. In Ireland, we have not yet recovered the historic unity of our national territory. We therefore note with particular satisfaction the principle declared in operative paragraph 6 of this draft resolution:

"Any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country is incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations."

113. We have every hope that, with the growth of goodwill and better understanding, the unity of our country will be recovered with reasonable speed and in a peaceful and orderly manner, in keeping with the interests of the Irish nation as a whole, and of the United Kingdom as well.

114. In many parts of the world, there are still many millions not now enjoying the rights proclaimed in this draft resolution. We trust the good work of extending freedom will continue until all the peoples of the world are free and until, through peaceful and generous co-operation, the resources and skills at the disposal of mankind are fully developed to bring peace, prosperity and the chance of happiness to all corners of the globe.

115. Mr. KAMIL (Federation of Malaya): The delegation of the Federation of Malaya considers it a special and signal honour and pride to be associated with more than forty other delegations of Asian and African countries in co-sponsoring the draft declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples [A/L.323 and Add.1-5].

116. While in terms of sponsorship this declaration appears essentially an Asian-African initiative, this in no way implies that the liquidation of colonialism in all its forms is exclusively the concern of the Asian-African world. The distaste and abhorrence for the institution and practice of the subjugation of man by man and the domination of nations by nations is universally shared by men of conscience everywhere, inasmuch as the yearning for freedom and the determination to defend it are commonly felt by all humanity.

117. I would venture to say that the noble aims enunciated in this declaration, echoing and reiterating as they do the lofty principles of the United Nations Charter, will be welcomed as a source of stirring inspiration by all peoples, not only in Asia and Africa where the vestiges of colonialism still persist in one form or another, but also in other parts of the world where millions of people are forcibly denied the full enjoyment of complete freedom and national independence. Freedom and liberty are universal, and any declaration for the cause of freedom and liberty must, as a matter of course, be taken as universal in its application and scope.

118. That the Asian and African countries show a particular concern and anxiety for the speedy liquidation of colonialism is easily explained by the events of history. For the past many centuries, the pattern of history has been shaped by the subjugation and domination of weaker peoples by stronger nations. Invariably in this process, the victims had been, by and large, the Asian and African peoples. For centuries, Asia and Africa laboured and stagnated under a foreign yoke of one form or another. Although the force of nationalism and the yearning for freedom stirred in the hearts and souls of men, it was only in this century that this force gathered momentum and unleashed its full impact. Thus, the last few decades—particularly since the end of the Second World War—witnessed the emergence into full independence and sovereignty of a great many countries, first in Asia, then in Africa, representing over 500 million people of the world's population. The year 1960 alone saw the emergence of eighteen independent States, almost all of them from the great continent of Africa.

119. The admission of so many new States to membership of the United Nations during this session of the General Assembly was indeed a stirring reminder of the irreversible course of history in the direction of freedom and emancipation of peoples long subjected to alien domination. This process is still continuing, gathering momentum and ever powerful force with the passage of time. It is the tragedy of the moment that there are still instances where the ruling authorities fail to take full cognizance of this historical force, but chose instead to repress the aspirations of their subject peoples.

120. My delegation is gratified, on the other hand, to note the assurances given by some colonial Powers of their undertaking to prepare their colonial peoples and territories for the exercise of full sovereignty without undue delay. It is only in conditions where the Powers concerned take full cognizance of the aspirations of their subject peoples for independence and, accordingly, take the necessary steps to facilitate the early fulfilment of these aspirations, that the danger of hate and violence can be averted and independence achieved in a friendly and harmonious atmosphere. Any obstinacy on the part of the ruling authorities to recognize and give way to the irrepressible urge of the subject peoples for emancipation will inevitably erupt into violence which, ultimately, could have far-reaching consequences detrimental to relations among nations and to international peace and harmony.

121. On the other hand, a sensible and realistic handling of this problem on the part of the ruling authorities, as has been proven in many cases, cannot but lead to a cordial and harmonious transfer of power which, instead of abruptly breaking the ties between the master and the ruled in an atmosphere of hate and vengeance, would upon a new vista of happy relations and co-operation between them as equal partners in the world community of sovereign nations.

122. The Federation of Malaya happily is one of several countries that acceded to full sovereignty in a friendly and constitutional process. Today, as an independent nation, we enjoy the warmest and most cordial relations with the United Kingdom. Yet, our struggle for national liberation did not follow an easy path. There were many difficulties in the way and many obstacles to overcome. But, throughout this process, both our leaders and peoples, as well as the Administering Authority, displayed such measure of wisdom and understanding that our independence was achieved earlier than planned and without leaving any traces of hate or resentment. The harmonious transfer of power which marked the end of a colonial régime marked also an auspicious beginning for our task of national development and consolidation and for new relations with the United Kingdom as equal partners in the Commonwealth of Nations.

123. My delegation, therefore, understands the joy and gratification of those many new nations which have regained their independence in a similarly harmonious atmosphere. We realize, however, that not all are as fortunate. Many of our sister nations have achieved liberty only at the high sacrifice of human lives and material resources to the extent that their task of national development has been rendered extremely difficult by the added task of national rehabilitation and reconstruction. My delegation views, therefore, with the profoundest concern, the instances in some parts of the world today where unnecessary and senseless war is being waged against subject peoples who are struggling for their just and legitimate right to self-determination.

124. As a nation which had just attained its independence from colonial rule, however beneficent that régime may be, the Federation of Malaya has dedicated and continues to dedicate itself to the just cause of peoples and nations everywhere for the right to self-determination and freedom from alien bondage in all its forms, manifestations and guises. This dedication to the cause of freedom has become one of the cardinal principles that form the cornerstone of my Government's foreign policy.

125. It is in this spirit that my delegation has felt proud and honoured to join other delegations of Asian and African countries, most of whom—like our country—had had a colonial past, in proposing the adoption of the draft declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. It would be wishful thinking to suggest that this declaration is intended to create the process of history. Rather, the aim is to assist and accelerate the course of history that is already set in motion by the irrepressible urge of subjected peoples for their emancipation from bondage to freedom and liberty.

126. This declaration, when adopted, as I have no doubt it will be, and I hope unanimously by all Members of this Assembly, will become another momentous, living and inspiring document of the United Nations, such as the Charter itself. Its aims are noble and lofty and are bound to touch the hearts and souls of all freedom-loving peoples. Its scope, as my delegation sees it, is universal; that is to say it speaks out for freedom of all peoples still living in colonial bondage, all peoples who in one way or another are forcibly denied the full enjoyment of complete and unrestricted sovereignty and independence. Thus the declaration proclaims in operative paragraph 2:

"All peoples have the right to self-determination; by virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development."

127. In calling for the total elimination of alien rule, the declaration is also mindful of the danger to which new nations in their tender years are liable to be exposed. Thus, to guarantee the safety of the newly won independence, the declaration stresses in paragraph 7:

"All States shall observe faithfully and strictly the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the present Declaration on the basis of equality, non-interference in the internal affairs of all States, and respect for the sovereign rights of all peoples and their territorial integrity."

128. My delegation is fully aware, from the experience of our own country, of the dangers of new forms of alien domination which come in subtle guises, such as economic domination and, most dangerous of all, ideological domination. The latter, if unchecked, could lead to the total compromise of the political and economic independence to alien subjugation. Even before the attainment of our independence—and through the years of our existence as a sovereign nation—our people have steadfastly fought to keep the nation free from being subjugated by this form of alien ideological domination. We are determined to continue to be alert against this new and more sinister form of human bondage.

129. The Asian and African sponsored declaration, as my delegation sees it, is realistic in its approach to the problem of colonialism. It seeks not to condemn the colonial Powers, for condemnation, however justified in some cases, does not serve the interest of the colonial peoples. But, rightly so, it focuses attention on the evils and dangers inherent in the institution and practice of colonialism. It brings to light the anachronism of colonialism in the present-day world in which the ideals of equality and liberty have become an ever powerful driving force in the course of history. It points out that the continuation of colonial domination is not only opposed to the Charter of the United Nations, but constitutes an impediment to the promotion of world peace and co-operation.

130. Thus, it calls for the ending of colonialism in all its forms and manifestations and for immediate steps to be taken in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories and all other territories which have not yet attained independence to transfer all powers to the peoples concerned. By making this call, the declaration does not envisage, in the view of my delegation, that all powers shall be transferred forthwith. What is called for is that immediate steps be taken for the necessary preparation for the final transfer of power. All too often colonial Powers have delayed independence on the fabricated grounds of unpreparedness, while nothing is done towards this preparation, if indeed the territory concerned is as yet unprepared. Thus, alleged inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness has all too often been used as a pretext for delaying independence. This is a deplorable attitude on the part of the colonial Powers and contrary to the obligations under the Charter, which provides as a responsibility and duty of the Administering Authority that preparations be made for subject peoples to assume responsibility in the shortest possible time for independence.

131. My delegation deems it essential that all Administering Authorities of Trust Territories, Non-Self-Governing Territories and all other colonial territories carry out faithfully their obligations under the Charter so that the neglect of their responsibilities will not be the lamentable cause of indefinite delays for the fulfilment of the aspirations of their subject peoples for independence. The consequences of neglect should furthermore be studied closely and in true conscience, for such consequences of neglect have been demonstrated so glaringly in the crisis of the Congo.

132. I should like to venture to conclude my intervention with a reminder that the problem with which this Assembly is seized is a serious and grave problem which affects the lives, destiny and aspirations of millions of our fellow mankind who are still labouring under some form of alien subjugation or other. These people have no voice here, nor can their voice be heard outside of their own homes. They look to us here to champion their cause, with the keenest hope and anticipation that this momentous and historic debate will pave the way for the eventual removal of the injustices and humiliation they have suffered for so long. My delegation sincerely hopes, in the interests of these still subjected peoples and in the interest of future international harmony and co-operation, that this debate, in trying to pave the way for the liquidation of colonialism, does not leave in its wake traces of resentment and bitterness which might inject a sour note to future international peace and co-operation. The ending of colonialism should be an auspicious and happy landmark in the history of mankind, and to this end we should all dedicate ourselves.

Mr. Illueca (Panama), Vice-President, took the Chair.

133. Mr. TSIANG (China): The United Nations has, in the past fifteen years, frequently debated particular colonial questions arising from different parts of the world. The General Assembly, the Security Council and, of course, the Trusteeship Council have all had colonial questions on their agenda. Hitherto, all such questions considered by the United Nations have been concrete questions, relating to a particular country or region. This is the first time that the United Nations is considering colonialism in general.

134. My delegation has delayed our participation in this discussion because we are not sure about the practical fruitfulness of such a debate. If the purpose of the present debate is to achieve a general agreement on the principles relating to colonialism, such a debate does not seem particularly necessary, since we have had such general agreement already for fifteen years. The principles relating to colonialism are all enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations, to the fulfilment of which we are all legally and morally committed. If, on the other hand, the present debate is intended to promote the application of the principles to the colonial questions that still remain, then, I submit the debate should be particularized and not generalized. No two colonial problems are alike; each colonial area or country has its special background and its special present-day conditions. What is suitable for one area is not necessarily suitable for the others. It is only through systematic study of each question by itself that we can make progress. I hope that the present debate will be useful in hastening the end of colonialism everywhere. I am, however, certain that it is not, and cannot be, a substitute for the systematic study of particular concrete colonial questions.

135. Among the countries of Asia and Africa, my country is one of the earliest to embrace modern nationalism and to fight for emancipation from European colonialism or imperialism. Sun Yat-sen, the father of the Chinese Republic—indeed, the father of modern Chinese nationalism—began, towards the end of the nineteenth century, to lead the Chinese people in their two-fold task of freeing China from European exploitation and of building up in China a modern State, ready and capable of exercising the full rights of national sovereignty and of providing for the welfare of the Chinese people. In the course of this struggle, Sun Yat-sen found that there were many peoples in Asia and Africa living under conditions as bad as those prevailing in China and, in some cases, even worse. In his last will and testament, Sun Yat-sen emphasized that the new China—Nationalist China—should always sympathize with and support the oppressed peoples of the world and give them, in their struggle for independence and freedom, such support as the Chinese people are capable of.

136. My delegation and my Government have always been faithful to the teachings of Sun Yat-sen. When I first came here to represent my country, one of the critical problems that the United Nations faced at that time was the struggle for national independence by the people of Indonesia. In the long debates in the Security Council on that question, my delegation was second to none in its warm support of Indonesian freedom. From that time to the present, my delegation has been consistent in this respect.

137. It is generally assumed that the problem of colonialism is a problem between certain European peoples on the one side and certain Asian-African peoples on the other side. It is also generally assumed that the problem of colonialism concerns the relations between the industrialized nations and the under-developed nations of the world. My delegation believes that these two assumptions are in general correct, but we also believe, however, that these assumptions over-simplify the problem of colonialism. There are exceptions to and variations of these assumptions that call for some consideration in order to get at the full truth. I wish, therefore, to speak briefly on the variations and exceptions to the general rule.

138. It is not true that the problem of colonialism only arises when more highly developed nations try to dominate less developed nations. History records many instances where less developed people have tried to exercise domination over a more developed people. I shall cite an example which has the merit of not arousing any contemporary controversy. The example is that of the Mongol empire of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The Mongols, led by Genghis Khan, were predominantly nomads. Their economy was very primitive, mainly limited to sheep-raising. Their political organization was in the main along tribal lines. Yet, these people conquered China and held it under subjection for almost a century. They conquered and held in subjection also large parts of western Asia and eastern Europe which were, for the most part, as was China, far more advanced than Mongolia was in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries.

139. The Mongols, under Genghis Khan, were not seeking markets for their export trade, for in fact they had almost nothing to export. They were not seeking foreign fields for investment, for in fact they had no capital to invest in their own country, to say nothing about foreign countries. They were not seeking raw materials, for in fact they would not have known what to do with coal, iron, rubber, oil, coconut or tin. They were seeking power and tribute. Nevertheless, such a relatively under-developed people, motivated by a crude desire for power and loot, built an empire as big as any that the history of mankind has ever seen.

140. The example of the Mongol Empire demonstrates conclusively that colonialism or imperialism is not the exclusive property of any particular economic, political or social system. Indeed, if we study history carefully, we find that peoples in all parts of the world, in all stages of development, from the Stone Age through nomadism, agriculture, commerce to modern mechanical industry and capitalism, have all made attempts at colonization and empire-building. The problem of colonialism is as old and as complex as human history itself.

141. It is also not true that only European peoples have practised colonialism and imperialism, or that they practise colonialism and imperialism only against non-European peoples. My example of the Mongol Empire is a case of an Asian people practising colonialism and imperialism against other Asian peoples and against Europe as well. In the mediaeval period, there was the Moorish Empire, stretching to Portugal and Spain and even at one time threatening to colonize France. In the early modern period, there was the Ottoman Empire covering parts of Asia, Africa and south-eastern Europe. Europe itself has practised colonialism and imperialism against European, as well as against non-European, peoples. I need only cite here the case of the Napoleonic Empire. I might also cite the case of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

142. In connexion with the Austro-Hungarian Empire, I might be permitted to remind the Assembly of the Peace Conference in Paris in the middle of the nineteenth century, at the end of the Crimean war. One of the nationalist movements of that time was that of Italy. Led by Cavour and other Italian statesmen and prophets, the Italian people strove for emancipation from Austro-Hungarian domination of Lombardy-Venetia as well as for Italian unity. At the Paris Conference, France sympathized with Italian nationalism and wished to give Cavour a chance to plead for Italian freedom and unity and to speak about Lombardy-Venetia. The Austro-Hungarian delegation to the Paris Conference protested on the ground that the question of Lombardy-Venetia was one of Austrian domestic jurisdiction, that the Austrian title to Lombardy-Venetia had been sanctified by treaty and tradition, and that, therefore, it was an uncalled-for interference if the Conference in Paris should touch on problems relating to northern Italy.

143. As is well known, the Austro-Hungarian objections were overruled by Count Walewski, the President of the Conference, and Count Cavour had his chance to speak on behalf of Italian freedom and unity. I recall this episode partly because, although it occurred one hundred years ago, it still holds certain lessons valid for us today and partly because that episode is a good demonstration of the fact that the European nations have exercised colonialism and imperialism over other European peoples.

144. Colonialism changes with time. It is as varied as human society itself. It would be unrealistic and ineffective if we limited our attention to any one type of colonialism and overlooked the dangers and threats of other types of colonialism.

145. In the modern period of history, that is, in the last four or five centuries, the main trend of colonialism is that of European expansion to the other continents of the world. It is in the main a struggle of the economically and politically better organized States of Europe against the politically and economically less developed peoples of Asia, Africa and America. In the course of these centuries, the whole world has been, to some degree at least, Europeanized. If there is one feature in modern history that can be said to dominate the whole period, we can say that it is the Europeanization of the world. The process has been a mixture of the evil with the good. I shall not stop to analyse and differentiate or to assign blame and responsibility. Some of the evil done by Europe to Asia and Africa was unintended; some was intended. Likewise with the good; some of the good done was incidental and unintended; on the other hand, there has been some good which was intentional and planned. The whole process of the Europeanization or colonization of the world is indeed very human—a great mixture of the good with the evil.

146. When Europe started on its grand movement for expansion beyond Europe, it divided into two currents. Nations of Western Europe expanded overseas to America, Asia and Africa. Russia, that is Tsarist Russia, on the other hand, expanded overland. The Russians crossed the Ural Mountains to conquer and colonize Siberia and Central Asia. Furthermore, Russia took Crimea, the Caucasus and certain parts of Eastern Europe. It has been an accident of geography that most of the countries of Asia and Africa were reached only by the overseas expansion of Western Europe and were untouched by the overland expansion of Tsarist Russia. As a result of this geographical circumstance, most of the peoples of Asia and Africa, but not all, have had the colonialism of Western Europe burned into their consciousness and have almost no room in their minds for the overland colonialism of Russia. For this reason, the present prevailing opinion in many Asian-African countries in regard to European colonialism is one-sided, distorted and, to a certain degree, non-objective.

147. The two currents of European expansion, that is, the overseas expansion of Western Europe and the overland expansion of Russia, met with relatively weak opposition on the part of the peoples of Asia, Africa and America. In both currents, the participants were a great mixture of adventurers, lawless persons, patriots, religious zealots and fortune hunters. In the case of Russia, the first expansionist leader was Yermak, who led a band of 840 men across the Ural Mountains in the year 1579. In about sixty years, a succession of Russian adventurers managed to reach the Pacific Coast, in the region of Okhotsk. In those sixty years, the entire extent of Siberia became a part of the Tsarist Empire, with a total area of 4 million square miles, more than twice the size of European Russia.

148. In this long march to the Pacific across Siberia, the first organized opposition the Russians met came from the Kuchum Khanate, on the upper part of the Ob River. The Khanate was one of the remnant parts of the great Mongol Empire. In 1583, Yermak captured Sibir, whence the name of Siberia, the capital of the Khanate. When the Russians reached the Far East, they met the opposition of China. Here, in the region watered by the upper tributaries of the Amur River, China and Russia fought a series of skirmishes. Militarily it was a draw. The military stalemate resulted in the Treaty of Nerchinsk, signed on 27 August 1689. According to that Treaty, the valley of the Amur River and its tributaries was acknowledged to be part of China.

149. In the nineteenth century, the Russians renewed their aggression along the Amur River. By a combination of military action and diplomacy, Tsarist Russia took from China the northern bank of the Amur River and the eastern bank of the Ussuri River. These two areas today constitute the Amur Province and the Maritime Province of the Russian Far East. The city of Vladivostok was, up to 1860, a Chinese settlement called "Hai-shen-wei"; the Russians changed it to "Vladivostok", which means "Dominant of the East". These regions of the Amur and Ussuri, which Tsarist Russia took from China in 1860, and which Soviet Russia retains, have a total area of 400,000 square miles.

150. I shall not relate here the history of Russian expansion in Central Asia. The so-called Republics of Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, Kirghizia, Turkmenistan and Tadzhikistan of today had been independent countries before they were annexed by Tsarist Russia. I shall also not relate the story of Russian expansion in Europe itself. Others in this hall know that story even better than I do.

151. In his long speech before the General Assembly on 23 September 1960 which, among other things, opened the present debate on colonialism, Mr. Khrushchev, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Soviet Union, had some very important as well as interesting things to say about colonialism in Tsarist Russia:

"The Tsarist Government pursued in the borderlands of Russia an essentially colonialist policy which differed little from what can be observed today in colonial countries, Uzbeks, Kazakhs, Tadzhiks and other non-Russian nationalities were scornfully called 'aliens'. They were not considered human beings and were ruthlessly exploited. National differences, hatred and dissension were fomented between these nationalities, and the Tsarist Empire was held together only by bayonets and oppression." [869th meeting, para. 207.]

152. With Mr. Khrushchev as our authority, we can conclude that Russia, at least up to the Revolution of 1917, had a colonial empire, differing but little from the other colonial empires of the world. What he called "borderlands... held together only by bayonets and oppression" included Finland, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Bessarabia, the Ukraine, the Caucasus, Central Asia, Eastern Siberia and parts of Manchuria. They covered 15 million square kilometres of land, or about 70 per cent of the total area of the Russian Empire. That is the heritage left by Tsarist Russia to Soviet Russia. The all-important question is: What has the Soviet Union done with this Tsarist heritage?

153. At the time of the Revolution in 1917, all former colonial areas of Russia rose in revolt and declared their independence. Some succeeded, some failed. Finland, under Marshal Mannerheim, won its war of independence which ended with the signing of the treaty of 14 October 1920; the same happened in Poland, which, under Marshal Pilsudski, had its independence confirmed by a treaty signed on 18 March 1921; and also in Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania, which signed treaties on 22 February, 11 August and 12 July 1920, respectively. But it was not the same for the other colonial areas. The independence of the Ukraine was suppressed in August 1920, that of Georgia in February 1921, and that of Central Asia through a long campaign that lasted from 1922 to 1924. In recent years, the Soviet Union has retaken Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania and has, in addition, brought other European countries under its domination. Today, the Soviet Empire is bigger than that of the Tsars. We know from the example of Hungary how the Soviet Union would deal with any of its subject peoples if they should fight for freedom.

154. The Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Soviet Union painted a bright picture of the development of the Central Asian Republics in the Soviet Union on the one side, and a dark picture of the colonies of Western European nations on the other. Certain delegations in this Assembly hall can examine his account of conditions in the Western colonies with greater authority than I. I wish, for the moment, to call the attention of the Assembly to conditions in Central Asia. Mr. Khrushchev admitted the following:

"Conditions in remote areas of the Tsarist empire hardly differed from those of colonies because their populations were cruelly exploited by the autocracy, by capitalism." [Ibid., para. 192.]

He went on to say that the picture has greatly changed since the October 1917 Revolution:

"Today Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, Kirghizia, Turkmenistan, Tadzhikistan—all the sister republics of Central Asia—have been transformed from backward colonies of Tsarist Russia into advanced, industrially developed socialist republics." [Ibid., para. 193.]

155. It is true indeed that there has been considerable industrial development in Soviet Central Asia, but there has likewise been considerable industrial development in many of the Western colonies. The fact remains that in the huge Soviet Empire industrialization has been very uneven. Take the example of the textile industry. According to Mr. Baransky, a member of the Academy of Sciences of the Soviet Union, in his book on the economic geography of the Soviet Union, 80 per cent of the textile industry of the USSR is concentrated in the three purely Russian regions of Moscow, Yaroslavl and Ivanovo, and only 20 per cent in the cotton-producing areas which are in Central Asia.

156. The natural resources of the Soviet Union are unevenly distributed. The non-Russian Republics of Turkestan, Caucasasia and the Ukraine and some historically non-Russian areas of Siberia are the richest in the Soviet Empire. Almost 100 per cent of the oil resources are concentrated in the Moslem republics. Basic iron and coal deposits, manganese, non-ferrous metals, sugarbeet, cotton, grain and cattle breeding are also mostly concentrated in non-Russian areas, while the ethnic Russian areas are generally poor in natural resources. In spite of this fact, industrial development has been much more concentrated in Russia proper and is much less significant in the non-Russian territories. According to official Soviet statistical sources, Russia proper produces 75 per cent of all Soviet engineering and metal-working products, 92 per cent of all automobiles, 87 per cent of all finished cotton goods and 82 per cent of wool products.

157. In addition to the favoured position of Russia proper in the huge Soviet Empire, the Russians have migrated in large numbers into many of these so-called sister republics. According to the Great Soviet Encyclopaedia, the population of Kazakhstan, which is the largest of the non-Russian republics, was, in 1933, 57 per cent native Kazakh and 19.7 per cent Russian, with a certain percentage of other minor groups. According to the Soviet census of 1959, the population of Kazakhstan has become only 30 per cent Kazakh, 42.7 per cent Russian, 9.2 per cent Ukrainian, with the remainder consisting of minor ethnic groups.

158. Mr. Khrushchev had also much to say on the subject of the cultural development of the non-Russian republics in the Soviet Union. He said:

"It is known, for example that before the revolution the peoples of Kazakhstan and the Central Asian republics were almost entirely illiterate. There were almost no people with secondary and higher education. The Soviet Power has made education and culture widely accessible to all peoples." [Ibid., para. 199.]

Unfortunately, we do not know much about the cultural conditions in Central Asia in the earlier periods—at least, I do not. Nevertheless, I have the feeling that Mr. Khrushchev's characterization of these peoples as being almost entirely illiterate is a gross caricature. According to the Russian geographer, Khanykov, who explored the Bukhara region in about 1840, and who was, by the way, strongly anti-Moslem, schools in the Bukhara Emirate were spread all over the country, both in towns and in villages. In towns, almost every street had its primary school and, according to an approximate evaluation, about one-quarter of the population of the Emirate was literate. During the first half of the nineteenth century, such a high percentage of literacy was high even for Western countries.

159. Leaving aside the cultural conditions of Central Asia in the pre-Russian period, we know for certain that the cultural development in the Soviet Union is also uneven. Take, for example, Uzbekistan. The population of Uzbekistan is 14.5 times less than that of Russia proper, but the number of students is 18 times less, the number of books and journals published per year is 44 times less and the number of issues of newspapers published per year is 40 times less.

160. Let us take Kazakhstan. The population of Kazakhstan is 12 times less than that of Russia proper, but the number of students is 24.5 times less, books and journals published per year 66 times less and newspapers issued 35 times less.

161. Or let us take the Ukraine. According to official Soviet statistics, the population of the Ukrainian Republic is 2.8 times less than that of the Russian Republic, but the number of students in higher schools is 3.6 times less, the number of books and journals published per year is 10 times less and the number of issues of newspapers published per year is 7 times less. There was a time when the culture of the Ukraine was ahead of that of Russia. One cannot possibly argue that the present state of Ukrainian culture is due to its old backwardness.

162. Mr. Khrushchev painted for us a glorious picture of the national freedom in the Soviet Union, when he said:

"Under the Constitution, each of our fifteen Union Republics has the right to remain in the Union or to leave it, if it so desires. The existence of nineteen autonomous republics, nine autonomous regions and ten national territories makes it possible to preserve the national characteristics and cultural originality and individuality of each people and nationality." [Ibid., para. 209.]

163. It is true that article 17 of the Soviet Constitution does declare that every Soviet Republic has the right to secede from the Soviet Union. But Mr. Khrushchev forgot to mention to us two other articles of the same Constitution, namely, articles 21 and 133. Article 21 stipulates: "Uniform Union citizenship is established for citizens of the USSR." Article 133 reads: "To defend the country is the sacred duty of every citizen of the USSR. Treason to the Motherland—violation of the oath of allegiance, desertion to the enemy, impairing the military power of the State, espionage—is punishable with all the severity of the law as the most heinous of crimes". In fact, any attempt to obtain any advantage from article 17 of the Constitution automatically becomes a serious crime, according to articles 21 and 133.

164. It should be remembered that, while the political structure of the Soviet Union is nominally a federation, actual political power is centralized in the Russian Communist Party. The Communist Parties of the constituent republics are treated as local committees of the Russian Communist Party.

165. The question may be asked: Why do the Soviets, while refusing their own captive peoples the right to secede and establish themselves as independent States, propagate the slogan of liberation of colonial peoples in Asia and Africa? Lenin answered this question in the following words:

"We, as Communists, must and will support the bourgeois emancipation movements in colonial countries when those movements have a real revolutionary character and when the representatives of those movements will not hinder us in educating and organizing the peasants and the exploited masses in the revolutionary spirit."

I have taken this quotation from Lenin's Works, 4th Edition, Volume XXXI, page 217.

166. Later, Stalin also gave an answer to this question:

"The slogan of self-determination of nations at the present moment, when the flame of emancipation is spreading in the colonies, is a revolutionary password for us. While the Soviet States are uniting into a federation of their own will, the nations forming the Russian Socialist Federation will not voluntarily use the right of secession. However, if we deal with colonies still under the claws of Britain, France, America, Japan, if we deal with such countries as Arabia, Mesopotamia, Turkey, India, which are colonies or half-colonies of the Entente, then the right of nations to separate becomes a revolutionary slogan and to give it up means to help the imperialists."

I take this quotation from the Works of Stalin, Volume V, page 43.

167. In plain language, Stalin's idea was this: the Soviet Union supports the liberating movements in Western colonies because such support will help the Soviet Union to spread its power and its interests the world over. Within the borders of the Soviet Union, the Soviets are naturally against any liberating movements and against any form of federation of free nations. That is the crux of the matter. Let us not misunderstand the Soviet initiative in this session of the General Assembly.

168. Lenin declared long ago:

"Marxism cannot be reconciled with nationalism even if the latter is just, irreproachable and civilized. Marxism is moving forward ahead of every nationalism as an international idea of the amalgamation of all nations into a higher whole. National culture is in general the culture of estate-owners, clergy and bourgeoisie."

This quotation is found in Lenin's Works, Volume XX, page 8.

169. We are against colonialism of any type, shape or origin. A colony is a colony, whether it is the product of overseas expansion or the product of overland expansion. We have nothing good to say about colonialism. We wish it to be terminated as early as possible and, for this reason, my delegation will support the forty-two Power draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-5]. Wherever people in Asia, Africa, Europe or America struggle against colonialism, China will lend them its support.

170. The world faces a gigantic contradiction in its developments. On the one hand, we have the development of the colonies of Western European countries into independent nations, many of which are represented here today. On the other hand, we have the Soviet Empire ever expanding. I think I am not wrong or immoderate when I say that the nations of Western Europe are trying to live up to, even though somewhat slowly, too slowly, the principles of the Charter and the basic aspirations of mankind. The Soviet Empire is today pushing and forging ahead against the ideals of the United Nations Charter and the basic yearnings for freedom of people everywhere. This is the problem of colonialism which the United Nations faces today.

colonial countries and peoples (continued). . 1147President: Mr. Frederick H. BOLAND (Ireland).

AGENDA ITEM 87

Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial

1. Mr. THORS (Iceland): For the last eight days, we have been discussing here in plenary session a declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples [A/4502]. This is a great cause, a big order, and much has been said by many delegations and remains to be said by others. The delegation of Iceland wishes to testify to its great interest in this matter by giving expression to a few of its deliberations.

2. From the very beginning of the United Nations, from the days of its creation in San Francisco in 1945, the question of colonialism in all its forms has been one of its chief preoccupations. Thus, one of the main bodies of the Organization was to become the Trusteeship Council, and one of the six of the original permanent Committees—the Fourth Committee—was to devote its time and thought to these problems, including those of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

3. At the end of the Middle Ages, colonialism began to set its mark on the continents of the world and soon became a great factor in the development of human history. It has had its few beneficial aspects, but many more destructive influences on the colonialized peoples through exploitation and stagnation, and it has even led to misery for those peoples. Colonialism was created by the exploratory and expansionist spirit of the brave and adventurous European explorers who sailed to every corner of the world and discovered new continents. These new lands were made colonies of the then dominating Powers of Europe, and the colonial system reached its peak in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

4. Today times have changed radically, and we are even, with the feeling of being fully justified by reality, here and now planning the complete liquidation of colonial rule. This evolution has been marked by hard struggles inside and outside all the colonialized lands. It has caused the shedding of blood on many continents and imposed tremendous sacrifices and sufferings on the subjugated peoples everywhere.

5. The people of Iceland have always taken the side of the subjugated peoples and held dearly to the ideal that every people should, through the right of self-determination, become master of its fate and future.

We have here in the United Nations, therefore, always and in every case—such as, for example, the questions of Cyprus and Algeria—voted for the self-determination of the small countries, no matter what big Power saw reason to oppose such moves towards freedom and independence. We, the Icelandic people, could not act otherwise, since we have had our own experience of foreign domination, and therefore we can appreciate the blessings and benefits enjoyed by each nation when it is master in its own house and in a position to utilize for its own benefit the country's natural resources on land and in the sea so as to bring progress to, and increase the prosperity of its own people.

6. Although Iceland was independent for three centuries—from the ninth to the thirteenth—we only regained our full sovereignty in 1918, and therefore have had a renewed experience of sovereign rule for over forty years, although our reborn Republic only dates back to 1944. Our history is different from that of many countries since we parted with our former political associate, Denmark, as a result of negotiations and as good friends, only to become still more closely and intimately linked with her after the complete separation.

7. It can be said that colonialism has been on the wane and gradually losing ground during the last two centuries. Perhaps the greatest blow it ever suffered was delivered here during the American Revolution, when, in the Declaration of Independence of 1776, it was stated:

"We, therefore, the Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress, Assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the Name, and by the Authority of the good People of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare, That these United Colonies are, and of Right ought to be Free and Independent States;"

About two years later, after a vigorous and victorious fight against heavy odds for the maintenance of this independence, George Washington wrote to a friend these brave and wise words:

"Nothing, short of independence, it appears to me can possibly do. A peace on other terms would, if I may be allowed the expression, be a peace of war".

8. The revolution in North America and the words and deeds of men like George Washington, inspired the leaders of the Latin American countries such as Simón Bolívar, José Martí and similar outstanding men, who led the widespread anti-colonial revolution against the British and Spanish colonial rulers in the Americas. The lives and deeds of these men and of their friends and associates gave inspiration to later generations and to their leaders who, thenceforward and up to the present day, were to take up the torch to light the road of the nations to freedom and independence. The peoples of the world have always been either dominated or led, either under the authority of rulers who take or under that of leaders who give. It became obvious in the relations between the colonial Powers and the colonized countries that charity begins at home. The interests of the homeland were paramount and in most cases the colonial rulers exploited the resources of the far-away regions of the world and enriched themselves, whereas the people of the colonies were kept under, in poverty, illiteracy, and even misery.

9. Experience gained during the two most horrifying conflicts in human history—World War I and World War II—opened people's eyes everywhere to the reciprocal relations between nations and to the fact that, since people everywhere were forced, or might be forced, to bear burdens and make sacrifices for mankind, they could therefore claim to enjoy the same human rights and to be masters of their own destiny.

10. Such has been the trend of the times, and to this point had the evolution of human thought and yearning for universal human rights reached when the United Nations Charter was drawn up in San Francisco, in 1945. These progressive ideas found expression in various provisions of the Charter.

11. In Article 1, para. 2, one of the main purposes of the United Nations is stated to be as follows:

"To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace;"

In the next paragraph of the same article, we have all expressed our support of the high ideal of "promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion;". Similar commitments are repeated in Article 55. Let us remember that three whole chapters of the United Nations Charter are devoted to what we call colonial questions. These are Chapters XI, XII and XIII. It is also well to remember some of the principles of the Declaration contained in Article 73, which states:

"Members of the United Nations which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government recognize the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of these territories are paramount, and accept as a sacred trust the obligation to promote to the utmost, within the system of international peace and security established by the present Charter, the well-being of the inhabitants of these territories..."

In Article 76, it is further stated that one of the basic objectives of the trusteeship system is "to promote the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants of the Trust Territories and their progressive development towards self-government or independence as may be appropriate to the particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples and the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned..."

12. I have found it appropriate to cite all these explicit expressions in the Charter in order to remind us all that these are firm commitments which each and every Member of the United Nations has solemnly undertaken by signing the United Nations Charter. It might therefore be asked whether a renewed adherence to these lofty principles was necessary or imperative. The Icelandic delegation is of the opinion that this exhaustive and world-wide debate should be concluded by adopting a resolution. Let us also remember that these ideals of freedom and independence were proclaimed at the African-Asian Conference at Bandung in 1955, although they were expressed in the following form: "That colonialism in its manifestations is an evil which should speedily be brought to an end". The same sentiments have subsequently been repeated in resolutions adopted at various other conferences of African States.

13. Let us now consider for a moment what has happened in the world since the tremendous undertakings of the United Nations Charter in 1945. It must be a source of pride and satisfaction to all adherents of freedom and independence that since 1945 more than forty-five countries have acceded to independence, among them such countries as India, Pakistan, Ceylon and Burma with a total of more than 450 million inhabitants. Besides that more than 175 million who belonged to colonies, Trust Territories or Non-Self-Governing Territories have acquired their full freedom. These are enormous steps forward which have all been taken within the last fifteen years. During this session of the General Assembly, we have seen seventeen new nations emerge and become fully fledged and independent Members of our Organization, which is a great encouragement for all of us and augurs well for the future. Let us remember that when we refer to these figures we are not dealing with statistics but with human beings, individual souls and minds, who have received the gift of freedom and whose life therefore looms brighter than ever before.

14. However, there are still some 100 million people in various continents who continue to live under the domination of some foreign and distant Power. It is the present position of these peoples and their future fate with which we are immediately concerned at this juncture, under the item appearing with the imposing title: "Declaration of the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples." This item was proposed by Mr. Khrushchev, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Soviet Union, during his visit to the General Assembly [869th meeting], and it is an initiative which, at this present stage, is to be welcomed. The Icelandic delegation, however, regrets that it is unable to consider that all the statements and assertions expressed in the declaration of the Soviet Union are relevant in this case or helpful to the cause of the liberation of all oppressed peoples; nor could we subscribe to many of the allegations therein contained. We are, therefore, not in a position to vote for that declaration as a whole should the Soviet Union want to put it to a vote in the Assembly.

15. We are grateful to the forty-five nations of the African-Asian group who worked jointly in preparing another declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples which is now before us [A/L.323 and Add.1-5], and which already has been sponsored by forty-two countries. It is with optimism and a feeling of great satisfaction, that the Icelandic delegation will vote for every expression contained in the African-Asian declaration and for the draft resolution as a whole.

16. Allow me to express some few considerations relating to the draft resolution.

17. In paragraph 6 of the preamble it is stated that the General Assembly "recognizes that the peoples of the world ardently desire the end of colonialism in all its manifestations". We are certain that this is a true statement of the actual position. The same applies to the assertion in paragraph 9 where it says that we "believe that the process of liberation is irresistible and irreversible and that in order to avoid serious crises, an end must be put to colonialism and all practices of segregation and discrimination associated therewith".

18. We are glad to see that segregation and discrimination against races are repudiated and such a declaration is in complete conformity with what the Icelandic delegation has maintained and voted for through all the sessions of the General Assembly. The practices of segregation and discrimination should be repudiated, not only in the colonized countries, but everywhere in the world, in all countries whether they be old or new. Furthermore, the declaration solemnly proclaims the necessity for bringing to "a speedy and unconditional end colonialism in all its forms and manifestations". We think it is appropriate and wise to use the word "speedy" in this connexion, but not "immediate", as reality shows us that the complete liquidation of colonialism in various parts of the world will, in view of the individual people's actual position and standard of development, have to come gradually and progressively and as soon as possible. Therefore we find it necessary in this respect to stress the important role of the United Nations in assisting the movement for independence in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, as expressed in paragraph 5 of the preamble.

19. It is evident that international assistance, preferably through the United Nations, will be required by the peoples still under the colonial system. This includes financial assistance, and clearly on a large scale, which, as in all such cases, has to come from the greater and richer countries of the world; we have to admit, in all humility, that a small country like Iceland can be of only little assistance in this matter. It would certainly be of the greatest benefit to mankind as a whole if every nation would voluntarily agree to sacrifice some part of its military budget and to devote even if it be no more than one per cent of the amount thus saved annually to increase welfare and promote industry in the less developed countries of the world and assist the colonized peoples in their endeavours to acquire financial and economic independence.

20. It is also evident that greatly increased technical assistance in all spheres is urgently required, whether it be for industrial purposes, communications or for training sufficient personnel from among the nationals of those countries to enable them to take over efficiently the administration of their own affairs. Paragraph 3 of the draft declaration states that:

"Inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence".

We agree that no such pretexts should be applied, but it is equally clear that independence should not come all of a sudden without due preparedness, but must be gradually obtained step by step, and that such procedures are by necessity required. In this respect we can also subscribe to paragraph 5, which states that:

"Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, without any distinction as to race, creed or colour, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom".

21. The Icelandic delegation wishes to stress the importance of the words "immediate steps", which mean that independence cannot come like lightning from the skies but only through evolution and progressive development. These words, in our opinion, mean that such evolution should commence immediately and the first steps should be taken without delay. The road to independence may be short in some cases, somewhat longer in others. But it is of the utmost importance that the hope and assurance of independence and liberty be immediately bestowed on all the peoples of the world so that they can, in confidence and security, march forward on the road to complete freedom.

22. The Icelandic delegation welcomes this declaration of freedom and is grateful to the African-Asian countries for having taken the lead in this sincere and idealistic movement and for having brought the light of a happier and better future to all oppressed and discontented peoples everywhere. We trust that this declaration of freedom will be genuinely and wholeheartedly supported and implemented by all the nations of the world, and particularly by those nations that still hold dominion over peoples in any part of the world. We consider that this declaration of freedom does not only refer to those peoples that at present are governed by other nations, but means that all nations of today and tomorrow should enjoy their full freedom without undue and undesirable interference from any other nation whatever.

23. May the torch of liberty be kindled in every nation, in every part of our globe. But let us not forget that lofty ideals and high-sounding words and promises are of little avail if they are not followed by genuine acts. Let us also remember that whereas no nation has the right to govern other nations, so is it the primary duty of each nation to govern itself and firmly and adequately to pursue its independence on its own, and lead its own people to progress, education and prosperity.

24. Every nation—and particularly the small nations—should be truly conscious of the fact that its struggle for independence does not end with the formal proclamation and celebration of independence. On the contrary, it is then that the struggle for real independence begins. The nation has then to chart its own course across the immense ocean of world affairs. It must then be master of its own ship and breast the high waves of international struggle and intrigue, and only through the combined and skilful efforts of the crew can it hope to reach its desired destination. Without a united crew, the ship of state may be wrecked. Vigilance, caution and perseverance will of necessity be required.

25. In voting for the declaration of independence of all peoples, the Icelandic delegation does so without angry or reproachful feelings toward any nation, but with a sincere expression of good wishes to all nations, large and small.

26. Mr. WIRJOPRANOTO (Indonesia): This is the first time that the United Nations is considering the entire question of colonialism. Concretely speaking, this is the first time that the United Nations is asked to proclaim solemnly "the necessity of bringing to a speedy and unconditional end colonialism in all its forms and manifestations". [A/L.323 and Add.1-5, last paragraph of preamble] If it had done this a decade earlier, it would certainly have been hailed as a bold and historic act of international statesmanship. If it had done this in 1955, following the great conference of Asian and African nations at Bandung, or even in 1958, following the first conference of independent African nations at Accra, it still would have been an enlightened and inspiring act. But we have had to wait until 1960 for a full and open airing of this pressing question.

27. Some may feel, therefore, that our discussions have come rather late in the day. Instead of spearheading the drive for freedom, the United Nations seems to be trailing behind the rapid march of events. But, though we may have reached the twilight hour, we feel it is still not too late to act. The grave of colonialism has been dug. Now the United Nations must prepare for its final burial.

28. In the life of nations, negotiations for freedom succeed the active and often violent struggle for national liberation. Sometimes, as in the case of my own country, negotiations may be interrupted by a renewal of armed conflict, precipitated by the stubborn and reactionary resistance of the colonial mind to the winds of change. However, notwithstanding some momentary setbacks, the victory of the dependent peoples remains in sight.

29. This is the stage we have now reached in the United Nations. The first major battle has been won. There is no longer any serious quarrel with the assertion that colonialism must disappear from the face of the earth. We are participating today, on an international level, in discussions for the complete eradication of colonialism and the acceptance of the new trend, the new forces of nationalism, in the world.

30. Seen in this perspective, our struggle has not been in vain. Not only are our voices being heard, not only has our struggle confirmed the inexorable demise of colonialism, but it has created the hope of today that the speedy end of colonialism will be brought about by our concerted efforts in accordance with the United Nations Charter. Let not this hope of today be still-born.

31. Under the preamble of the Charter, we, the peoples of the United Nations, are determined "to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small", and "to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom". We ask this Assembly now to express the conviction "that all peoples have an inalienable right to complete freedom, the exercise of their sovereignty and the integrity of their national territory". [A/L.323 and Add.1-5, paragraph 11 of the preamble] We ask this Assembly solemnly to proclaim the speedy and unconditional end of colonialism. For there still is colonialism in the world. A few colonial Powers are still locked in the arms of the past. They even have some friends who sympathize with their colonial affliction. We could perhaps pity them, if all our pity, all our sadness, all our thoughts were not directed toward the peoples whom they condemn, by their blindness, to live a senseless life of subjugation. It is the suffering of these peoples that is our heavy burden. It is their grief that fills our hearts and minds with anguish and with anxiety.

32. Our anxiety should indeed be shared by all. Surely no one who has lived through the last fifteen restless years can look with equanimity upon the persistence of the most virulent form of colonialism, which seeks to maintain a nation, a people, as its own private preserve. This antiquated way of thinking is responsible today for the war in Algeria, the turmoil in the Congo, the strife in South Africa, South West Africa, Mozambique and Angola, as well as in other parts of Africa, Asia and even the Americas. It is responsible for the dangerously smouldering discontent in West Irian. Wherever it persists, it breeds such despair as is bound to explode into armed conflict. This is no inflammatory statement. It is a fact, and a clear warning. From our own tragic experience, we call upon the colonial Powers and their sympathizers to open their eyes and see the writing on the wall. We appeal to them to follow the example of others who are walking towards the light.

33. Scanning this Assembly, one cannot but be struck by the changing world picture. It finds its physical embodiment here. We are certainly grateful for the healthy realism shown by some colonial Powers towards the drive for freedom. But, at the same time, we are aware of the heavy sacrifices made by the dependent peoples in the attainment of their independence. If blood, sweat and tears made possible the triumph of democracy over totalitarianism, if it made possible the United Nations, then it must be said that the same blood, sweat and tears of the dependent peoples have made possible the triumph of democracy over colonialism, have made possible our new United Nations, our new world. Their deep yearning for freedom has accomplished much. Think of the fact that, about thirty years ago, the Indonesian national leader, Sukarno, was imprisoned for merely prophesying the end of colonialism and the freedom of Indonesia. Today, Indonesia is free, along with other African-Asian nations, and President Sukarno could proclaim before this Assembly [880th meeting], without fear of dissent, that colonialism is dying.

34. Is it then merely a question of when all colonies are to be free, not whether they are to be free? Is it only a question of patience or impatience? No. That is only one aspect of a much broader and fundamental issue. Indeed, the central issue today is the lack of a common judgement of colonialism, of its actual character. The absence of a common understanding on this point continues to be a source of discord and even conflict. Here is where the real and present danger lurks.

35. We, the nations of new Asia and new Africa, reject colonialism in all its forms and manifestations because it is an evil. On the other hand, there are those who, even while acknowledging it as an evil, seek to justify colonialism on the basis of some ideal. But those who adopt this attitude should remember that, though the innocent victims of incarceration may for their own comfort extract some crumbs of consolation from their confinement, the gaoler should beware of preaching that prison is a good rather than an evil. To think that consolation can be a justification for evil is dangerous and misleading. Nevertheless, the colonial Powers and their supporters try to justify in humanitarian, economic, social and cultural terms the exploitation of man by man, discrimination because of race, colour or creed. What are the claims, and what are the facts? Let me briefly recall the past.

36. It is said that colonialism brought progress and prosperity to the colonies. Waste and open lands were converted into plantations; the wealth of the sub-soil was exploited; transportation was taken care of so that a stream of valuable primary products, including minerals and oil, became available to the world. Gradually, in the belief that they caused poor and barren countries to become fertile and productive territories, the colonizing nations found an economic justification for their domination of foreign peoples. They believed so strongly in this kind of reasoning that the voice of their conscience became silent and numb. Moreover, when at long last some education was given to the colonized nations, bolder assertions were made. These grew into the well-known theory of the "white man's burden", according to which a noble and high humanitarian, cultural and economic mission was being fulfilled. But, in fact, when the colonizers came to our shores, we were neither poor nor without civilization. It was indeed the wealth of our lands that had attracted their attention for centuries. Our economy was developed in those days. It was diversified. We in Indonesia, for example, were the producers of many products—now called the products of small-scale industries, of ships, in addition to the pepper, cloves and other spices that particularly attracted the Portuguese and Dutch. We were willing to exchange our goods for the products of the West. Ours were of a high quality and much desired by the peoples who came to us—unfortunately, so much so that they were not satisfied to obtain them through the channels of mutually beneficial trade. Our States—yes, our States, because we were nations possessing statehood in those days—became the victims of the military might of the West.

37. Then we entered a long, agonizing period of darkness, which has been lifted in some, but not all, parts of the world. Much of our productive capacity was wantonly destroyed by the colonizers in order to maintain high prices in the world market. In Indonesia, there were the well known Hongi raids by the Dutch, which destroyed the spice plantations of our people so as to ensure high prices in the world market. In more recent days, restrictions were imposed on the production of rubber on the people's plantations, not the large foreign estates. The interest of our countries was certainly not the dominating factor in organizing our productive capacity. No longer masters of our own fate and destiny, our diversified economy gradually became one-sided. The economic face of our land turned agrarian, our merchant fleet did not carry our own produce and ceased to exist as such. The plantations that came into being were cultivated by our people, as indentured labour, and produced the crops demanded by the markets of our rulers.

38. It would be interesting to speculate, at this point, on the possible economic situation of our countries if we had not been colonized, if we could have pursued the course of our own national life, if we could have organized our own production after our contacts with the new markets of the West. For example, how would the developing technology in the West have affected us if that technology had come within our reach through peaceful contacts? As it is, such technology was withheld from us. I cannot prove—at least not mathematically—that under conditions of freedom our countries would undoubtedly have developed economically since such conditions were not given to us. But we have the previous example of Japan, and, in our days, that of China, India, the other countries of Asia including my own, those of Latin America, the Middle East and Africa—all of which are on the march to achieve economic progress without colonial rule. I am confident we will succeed.

39. It is, therefore, an unfair interpretation of the facts to state that colonialism brought wealth to our countries which would not have been created without colonial rule. Of course, at a very heavy cost, we inherited some productive capacity from our former rulers. But if one robs a house and later puts some furniture in it, one cannot claim that the owner had a poor house which he could not furnish himself. The owner was deprived of the liberty to adorn his own house. Moreover, aside from the tantalizing question of whether we could have created our own wealth, as we had in the past, what was the share accorded to our people on whose soil and with whose labour mines and plantations came into being?

40. I will not tire this Assembly with an abundance of figures. Allow me to cite just the following: In 1936, about 97 1/2 per cent of the total population of my country were Indonesians. Their share in the national income was estimated at about 20 per cent. Asian aliens amounted to approximately 2 per cent of the total population. Their share in the total national income was also 20 per cent. The non-Asian aliens were only one half per cent of our total population. Their share in our national income was the remaining 60 per cent. One half per cent of the total population, 60 per cent of the total national income. These are Dutch figures, illustrating the prosperity—or, rather, deprivation—of my people under colonial rule. This was the paradox of Indonesia: a rich country—a "garland of emerald round the equator" as one Dutchman described it—with a desperately poor people. As another Dutchman described it, Indonesia was a nation of coolies and a coolie among the nations.

41. In the light of these facts and figures, does not the philosophy of the "white man's burden", with his self-imposed mission to civilize and develop, sound rather hollow? I have only mentioned the economic stagnation, without touching upon the social and cultural stagnation, the destruction of human dignity, that accompany colonial rule. In fact, if colonialism is so benign and benevolent, why did the Americans in the North and South revolt? Why, in our time, have Asia, Africa, the Middle East revolted? Because colonialism is evil, because it is based on greed, because it means the domination of man by man. No fairy-tale of a mission, of a task, of a responsibility can quench the burning desire in man to be free, to be his own master, to take his destiny into his own hands. Yet, not only do the colonial Powers and their supporters cling desperately to their "white man's burden" but, what is worse, they attempt now to rationalize their justification of colonialism into a justification for maintaining colonial rule in their former dependent territories, directly or indirectly. On the justification of the past, they seek to build a new edifice of colonial rule. Believing—alas, perhaps in good faith—that they know best, they hope to maintain their economic, strategic, social and cultural dominance, even while recognizing political independence. I speak here soberly from our own recent experience.

42. When the Dutch departed from Indonesia, we were saddled with an enormous debt, including the debts incurred by the Dutch in their first and second military aggressions against us. We were confronted not only with this unjust financial burden but with an empty treasury as well. We were left with only a handful of trained administrators and technicians. More than 95 per cent of our exports, imports, banking, shipping and industries remained in Dutch hands. The Dutch retained their economic control, while we were to remain as the hewers of wood and drawers of water in our own country. We had political freedom without economic freedom, and that is no real freedom at all. We were determined, therefore, to uproot this inequity. We did uproot it. Notwithstanding the most dire warnings of imminent economic collapse, we took over the instruments of production and the financial institutions, and we survived. Today, instead of the Dutch or other aliens, Indonesians are playing the most important role in our economic life. Unquestionably we face economic difficulties. Undoubtedly we make mistakes. But they are our difficulties and our mistakes. We are now masters in our own house, and that is what counts.

43. There were also Dutch attempts to retain political and military control over Indonesia. We overcame the Dutch-inspired design to fragmentize our unitary State into numerous weak States, which they could then dominate, divide and rule. We put down the military disturbances caused by the Dutch adventurer Westering. We nullified the separatist movements, originated or encouraged by Dutch colonial groups, such as that of the so-called Republic of the Moluccas. We nullified their recent encouragements to separatism in Java, Sumatra, Celebes and other islands of Indonesia. We eliminated all these political, economic and military acts of subversion that were instigated and encouraged by those Dutch interests which still sought to preserve themselves in our territory and to capitalize on a troubled and turbulent situation.

44. However, one act of subversion, one question remains—the question of West Irian. It is not my intention to dwell in detail on this dispute which arose, solely and directly, from the Netherlands' refusal to live up to their explicit agreement, their solemn pledge, that the complete, unconditional and irrevocable transfer of sovereignty to the independent Republic of Indonesia was to cover the whole territory of the former Netherlands East Indies. But, in the context of examining the Western pretexts for continuing colonialism, I would like to expose their distortion of the right of self-determination. In West Irian, the Dutch are perverting this right of self-determination into a justification for an amputation of Indonesian sovereign territory. Again, the "white man's burden" is being used as a cloak for the retention of colonial rule and the unilateral annexation of a part of a sovereign nation.

45. The Dutch claim that they must train and prepare the people of West Irian to exercise their right of self-determination. The Dutch, who even after 350 years of colonial rule—yes, even after adhering to the Charter of the United Nations—sought by armed conflict and subversion to destroy this right of self-determination for the Indonesian people, now so suddenly, so piously, so exclusively invoke this noble right. It is ridiculous and certainly suspicious. Do they really wish to prepare the Indonesians in West Irian for self-determination, and I stress the word "self"? No, what they mean today, as in the recent past, is not self-determination but Dutch-made, Dutch-dictated determination. Why else do they ban the use of the Indonesian language in West Irian? Why else do they forbid the West Irians to listen to the radio broadcasts of the Republic of Indonesia? Why do they smash all organizations that favour the reuniting of West Irian and Indonesia? Why do they imprison any West Irian who shows the slightest sympathy for the Republic of Indonesia? Why try thus to brain-wash the West Irians, whose leaders and political organizations, together with the leaders and political organizations of the rest of Indonesia, have fought for the freedom of the whole of our country? Do not forget that the people of West Irian have long ago exercised their right of self-determination. They have done so in the same manner, with the same fervour and at the same time as all the other people of Indonesia. Moreover, is the massacre of our people in West Irian—in the Baliem Valley of West Irian—part and parcel of the Dutch programme of self-determination? This happened recently under the time-worn pretext of pacification.

46. All these are concrete questions to which we have never received any answers from the Dutch, because they cannot answer. Indeed, instead of answers that cannot be forthcoming, we want solutions of these colonial problems and disputes.

47. Make no mistake about it: we are standing at a new crossroads. Colonialism is dying, and in its place the nationalism of Asia and Africa, of former dependent peoples throughout the world, is surging to the centre of the stage. Will this bring peace or a new confrontation? Will there be an understanding of the positive forces at play in the reawakened and reborn nations of the world, or will a new colonialism, seeking to justify the past, arise from the ashes of the old to cross swords with the resurgent nationalism of Asia, Africa and Latin America? That is the choice, the challenge, of today.

48. Reject colonialism in all its manifestations, and there will be an end to the recurrent conflicts. Reject the colonial attitude, and you will be able to see our nationalism as a positive force for peace. Understand that our nationalism is not a chauvinistic and aggressive nationalism. Born in the crucible of foreign domination, it seeks new horizons not in the conquest or plunder of foreign lands, but in the development of our own material resources, in the rediscovery of our own creative resources, in the achievement of greater opportunities for all our people. Basically our nationalism is an assertion of our right and responsibility to live our own lives, to fashion our own political, economic, social and cultural institutions, in accordance with our needs and conditions.

49. We are still in the exciting process of rediscovering and perfecting our own national personality. Do not label us, then, as advocates of the right or the left, as sibling capitalists or sibling communists. You will misunderstand us unless you approach us as pioneers in search of our own way of life. Of course, in the process of that search we shall make mistakes. We do not boast of perfection. But is the right to make mistakes, to correct one's own mistakes, not an essential attribute of freedom? Look backwards to the grave mistakes committed in this century alone by the old, established nations, and then ask yourselves if a paternalistic attitude is not rather arrogant. God forbid that we should be guilty of such mistakes. In the search for our own, unique personality, we shall imbibe deeply from the fountain of world knowledge and ideas. But we also intend to make our contribution. We believe that we have something to contribute in new ideas to the world fund of knowledge.

50. Finally, we need and we want certain assistance in the rebuilding of our nationhood because we are engaged in a great war against poverty and disease. We are waging war on the sources of war themselves. We are racing against time to fulfil the rising demands—not expectations, but demands—of our people. In asking for assistance in this battle, which is the battle of all mankind, we insist, however, that such assistance should be rendered as between equals, in a spirit of mutual benefit and mutual respect. We are, in fact, not alone on the receiving end. We know that we also have something to give in the search for international peace and stability. That our assistance is needed has been abundantly proven, for instance, in the operations of the United Nations. We have not shirked our obligations in that respect.

51. Indeed, there must exist a co-operative relationship in the community of nations. Mutual help rather than the survival of the fittest—that is the underlying philosophy of the Indonesian way of life. That is also in conformity with the spirit and avowed purpose of the United Nations: to achieve international co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural and humanitarian character. That is the very basis, the "raison d'être", of the forty-two-Power draft declaration [A/L.323 and Add.1-5] on the independence of colonial countries and peoples, of which my country is a co-sponsor. Several of our co-sponsors have already presented and effectively explained this draft declaration to the Assembly. I shall limit myself, therefore, to underlining what we consider to be some of its salient features.

52. The pillars of the draft resolution are the three main principles underlying the declarations of Bandung, Accra and Addis Ababa. These are: the United Nations reaffirmation of faith in the equal rights of nations, large and small; the United Nations purpose to develop friendly relations among nations, based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples; and the human right, as adopted and enshrined in the draft Covenants on Human Rights, that all peoples have the right to self-determination.

53. The heart of the forty-two-Power draft declaration is, of course, the solemn proclamation that a speedy and unconditional end shall be put to colonialism in all its forms and manifestations. Let us be clear, therefore, about what we mean by colonialism in all its forms and manifestations. There should be no confusion on this issue. We are not here describing situations in the world that reflect the present day ideological conflict, in either its political or its military forms. Nor have we drafted a declaration for use by either side to promote its particular ideological aims. This draft declaration is not concerned with so-called satellites or with military bases, but exclusively with those still dependent peoples and territories whose fate was in the minds of the drafters of the United Nations Charter. To avoid the possibility of any misunderstanding on this point, we have, in paragraph 5 of our draft declaration, clearly delineated these dependent peoples and territories as "Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence". As a material expression of the solemn pledge to end colonialism in all its forms and manifestations, we declare that immediate steps should be taken to transfer all powers to the peoples of these specified territories. If the adoption of a solemn pledge on other issues is desired, we urge that that be done in the same exclusive manner.

54. There is another issue on which I should like to offer a brief clarification, so as to avoid any future misunderstanding. Our declaration on the independence of colonial countries and peoples is an assertion of the fact that the relationship between colonial Powers and their dependent peoples is a matter of United Nations concern and action. Consequently, the provision in paragraph 7 on non-interference in the internal affairs of another State can be understood only as non-interference in the internal affairs of a sovereign State and, in particular, non-interference by colonial Powers in the internal affairs of their former dependent territories. Our entire declaration is, in fact, designed to obtain concerted action, through the United Nations, for the independence of dependent peoples and territories, without any conditions or reservations, without any undermining of their right freely to develop their own political, economic, social and cultural institutions.

55. Moreover, it is a matter of great importance to us that this declaration is designed to prevent any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and territorial integrity of a country. It emphatically declares in paragraphs 4, 6 and 7 that the integrity of the national territories of peoples which have attained independence shall be respected. This is a rejection of colonial activities which create disputes such as that of West Irian between Indonesia and the Netherlands. It is a categorical rejection, therefore, of the Dutch colonial policy which, as I have already pointed out, misuses the sacred right of self-determination in order to continue colonialism in an integral part of our national territory, West Irian.

56. In co-sponsoring the 42-Power draft declaration, we are expressing our firm belief that it represents a major and decisive contribution towards making our Organization a viable instrument for peace, ready to meet and capable of meeting the pressing needs of the time.

57. Mr. AKAKPO (Togo) (translated from French): At this fifteenth session the United Nations is about to turn, on behalf of ninety-nine States, to a new page in the history of mankind. It is to examine today the very important question of the abolition of colonialism, under the heading of: "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples". I am confident that this new page of history will open on a new world in which all peoples, whoever they may be and whatever their whereabouts on this planet, are to be free and equal. Colonialism is no longer tolerated in our time, because it has always been—and now, in mid-twentieth century, is even more markedly—a shameful, hideous and repellent phenomenon. It is not an exploit of which the colonialists should be proud. All the speakers who have preceded me to this rostrum have branded colonialism, and stressed all the harm it has done to the world at large and to the colonial peoples in particular.

58. How did the whole thing start? Before the colonial period began in Africa, the African peoples lived a happy life. Their woods were full of fruit, their fields of crops, and their forests of game. All this belonged to them. The sunlight filled them with health and vigour, so that they constantly sang, danced and laughed with carefree hearts. At night the African sky rang with their laughter, the sound of their tom-toms, and their songs. Every village had its chief and its court, and they meted out justice according to their laws. They had their own civilization which, like any other civilization, followed its normal course and obeyed the inexorable law of evolution.

59. The colonialists who filtered in among these people in Africa were aware of the venality of their own designs, and their work of colonization almost always began with a lie. They almost always said that they had come to bring the people health, friendship and the protection of their great white chiefs far, far away across the sea, and asked permission to stay and trade. The African, by nature hospitable and generous, often agreed without demur and welcomed his guests, with no suspicion that they had in their luggage only fetters with which to shackle him in the name of colonialism.

60. The colonialism thus established in Africa for nearly 500 years has changed the face of the continent, the course of events and the character of men, by arresting the development of Africa's own civilization. The colonial system has prevailed in Africa for nearly 500 years; it consists of the out and out exploitation of man by man, robbing the colonized of all freedom, dignity, rights and individuality. In the territories under foreign rule, despite steadily increasing labour, poverty spreads ever more widely among the colonized peoples. Who knows what the civilization of the peoples harnessed for centuries to the colonial yoke might have produced if it had been allowed to evolve unchecked? But I do not wish to dwell on the nature of colonialism. As I said a few moments ago, other speakers have described it in all its aspects.

61. As soon as the Second World War ended, there was a universal revulsion against colonialism, chiefly in the territories under its sway. All men of good conscience are in revolt against the domination of peoples, and know that peace and security in the world in which we live depend upon the elimination of all injustice and the restoration of the freedom and rights of nations, large or small.

62. The States which met at San Francisco, desiring to build a new world on a firm foundation of freedom and equal rights for all peoples, were disturbed at the exploitation visited upon the colonized peoples and regarded it as a shameful crime. They called for the elimination of that injustice. The United Nations Charter, produced at the San Francisco Conference as soon as the Second World War had ended, was the first instrument to impose on the colonial Powers an obligation to liberate the colonized countries. Article 73, regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories, provides as follows:

"Member^s of the United Nations which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government recognize the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of these territories are paramount, and accept as a sacred trust the obligation to promote to the utmost, within the system of international peace and security established by the present Charter, the well-being of the inhabitants of these territories, and, to this end:...

"b. to develop self-government ...".

As to the Trust Territories, Article 76 requires those Powers:

"...b. to promote the political, economic, social, and educational advancement of the inhabitants of the trust territories, and their progressive development towards self-government or independence..."

These are the obligations we assumed when we agreed to become Members of the United Nations.

63. One of the basic purposes of the Bandung Conference of 1955, at which the Asian and African States representing the aspirations of the colonized countries were assembled, was the condemnation of colonialism. The famous "communiqué" which was issued at this Conference, and which has become historic, stressed that the members were agreed:

"(a) in declaring that colonialism in all its manifestations is an evil which should speedily be brought to an end;

"(b) in affirming that the subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights, is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and is an impediment to the promotion of world peace and co-operation;"

Those present at Bandung expressed the aspirations of millions upon millions of people, mainly those who are still under domination and who want to put an end to the degrading colonial system as rapidly as possible. As the anti-colonialist movement has gained ever-widening support, yet more conferences have recently been held, at Accra, Monrovia and Addis Ababa, on the colonialism which continues to defile our century and which must at all costs be abolished.

64. The awakening of the Africans and Asians and their aspiration to freedom can no longer be checked without causing serious disturbances which may jeopardize world peace and security. All men of good will voice the need to make short work of colonialism and to restore freedom and dignity to the Africans, to the Asians, and to all those whom the system of exploitation has kept from the enjoyment of their natural rights. The colonized peoples have done with the shackles of slavery. They have done with forced labour for masters. They have done with seeing their continents plundered. They have done with subjection to racial discrimination. They have done with arbitrary imprisonment, concentration camps and pointless suffering. They have done with famine and ignorance. They want their independence, their freedom, their rights, their dignity as human beings. The might of their aspirations is such that all repressive measures must go down before it.

65. The grant of their independence is a matter of urgency, for the greatest good of mankind. Our concern here is not merely to condemn colonialism and adopt the principle of the grant of independence. It is of the greatest importance that we should also draw up, here and now, a time-table of dates on which the colonized territories are to be granted independence. Otherwise the countries still in bondage will have to face another long struggle against colonial power. To take an example: Togo, my country, was as you know a Trust Territory for whose independence no date had been fixed, and the Togolese people had to struggle for that independence for twelve years; whereas in Italian Somaliland, which was also a Trust Territory but for whose liberation a date had been fixed, the people calmly awaited their independence. The need for a time-table did not escape the Addis Ababa Conference. Allow me, Mr. President, to quote in this connexion a paragraph from the operative part of the resolution adopted at that Conference:

"Urges the colonial Powers to fix dates in conformity with the will of the people for the immediate attainment of independence by all non-independent countries and to communicate those dates to the people concerned."

66. The movement of liberation from the colonial yoke which began, as I said, immediately after the Second World War has some sensational victories to its credit. The liberation, first of all, of India, Ghana, Tunisia, Morocco, Indonesia, Cambodia, Ceylon, Guinea, Burma, etc., and then this year, in 1960, of Cameroun, Togo, Congo (Leopoldville), Somalia, Dahomey, Niger, Upper Volta, Ivory Coast, Congo (Brazzaville), Gabon, Chad, Central African Republic, Cyprus, Nigeria, Senegal, Mali and Madagascar, has restored their freedom to millions upon millions of human beings.

67. But, despite those mortal blows, colonialism is not yet completely defeated. It is staggering, but is still showing fight in some places. Thus in North Africa blood has been flowing for more than six years; in central Africa the people are subjected to inhuman reprisals; and in South Africa to racial discrimination. Elsewhere colonialism is trying to disguise itself, to change its name. Forced to release its prey, it resorts to subterfuge. Thus—as the Togolese delegation pointed out in the Fourth Committee^{1/}—certain Powers maintain that the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their rule, although ethnically, culturally, economically and politically different from the metropolitan country, are nevertheless an integral part of it, solely in virtue of the enactment by the metropolitan Parliament of a law to that effect, merely replacing the word "colony" by the word "province" and taking no account of the people's will and deep aspirations. Other Powers have invented a whole series of names for their empires in order to placate the subject peoples and to conceal the truth about the administration of their colonies.

68. For the sake of peace—of lasting peace—this must be done away with once and for all. Real independence must be granted to all peoples. There are still many peoples demanding their freedom. Most of them are in Africa and Asia. On the continent of Africa alone, colonialism must be stamped out in the territories of Algeria, Uganda, Kenya, Northern Rhodesia, Southern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, South West Africa, Ruanda-Urundi, Angola, Mozambique, Portuguese Guinea and Spanish Guinea, to mention only a few.

69. On behalf of all the peoples that are suffering all over the world, we are going to vote unanimously, here in this Assembly Hall, to abolish the colonial system. The delegation of Spain has already told the Fourth Committee^{2/} that Spain is anti-colonialist, and that it has always condemned, and still condemns as an anachronism, colonialism and the exploitation of peoples. I hope that, when we vote on the draft resolution co-sponsored by my country, we shall find Spain in the ranks of the anti-colonialist countries in favour of demolishing colonialism.

70. At this historic moment, we, the representatives of ninety-nine nations are faced with a most poignant humanitarian problem, on which we are about to take a decision which will be vital to the progress of peoples throughout the world, now and in the future, and to peace and security on this earth. The votes we cast will go down to posterity, which will thank us for ridding the world of a scourge. For ourselves, we shall have peace of mind and the satisfaction of having helped to see justice triumph, to revive human dignity, to restore equal rights among all peoples, and to maintain peace and the greatness of our respective countries.

1. The PRESIDENT: Before coming to the first speaker inscribed for this afternoon, I give the floor to the representative of Honduras in exercise of his right of reply.

2. Mr. MILLA BERMUDEZ (Honduras) (translated from Spanish): In exercising its right of reply, my delegation wishes also to take this opportunity to clarify, as requested, some points in its draft resolution (A/L.324).

3. In the first place, the Honduran proposal is in no sense an alternative to the African-Asian draft resolution. On the contrary, it is a supplement which we consider necessary for the implementation of the latter proposal. What is more, my delegation will vote in favour of the African-Asian draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-5]. The Honduran proposal, then, is designed merely to help in solving the problem of ways and means, of the proper implementation of the African-Asian draft resolution. In other words, we establish a right and proper link between the two. I should also like to make it quite clear that the position of Honduras in this matter, as in any other, is above suspicion, and that we shall never lend ourselves to manoeuvres on either side.

4. In the second place, I have been told that no provision is made for an East European country among the members of the commission. I disagree. The proposal provides for the representation of two Administering Powers. It is therefore incorrect to call the Honduran proposal inadmissible on the ground that it excludes a representative area, for there is nothing to prevent the inclusion of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics as an Administering Power.

5. In the third place, I have been asked to specify what I mean by colonies, or what colonies I have in mind. This is a more difficult question to answer, for there are disputes pending now before the Assembly, for which no solution has been found in previous years; Algeria is a case in point. We all know which colonies still exist in the world. But if debate or the interpretation of international law has so far failed to produce, or if entanglement in the conflict of two worlds and in the cold war has so far prevented any agreement on this matter, it is hardly for the Honduran delegation to supply the panacea—the solution to this problem—by defining which territories are still colonies. This Assembly has not been able to define exactly what constitutes aggression either. Nevertheless, if pressed sufficiently, we might hazard the following definition: colonies are all those groups or peoples that do not yet govern themselves and cannot choose their rulers by democratic means.

6. In the fourth place, we have been told that the commission proposed by Honduras would solve nothing and would merely delay matters. We do not agree. The commission can do a great service; it can chart the course for the peoples that are still seeking independence. Again, the argument that visiting commissions should not be sanctioned, because they are not allowed to enter the territories concerned, is no reason for rejecting the draft resolution, for such a situation is not new to this Assembly. Four years have passed since the establishment of the Special Committee on the Problem of Hungary, and Sir Leslie Munro, a former President of this Assembly, has just submitted another report [A/4606] to us without setting foot on Hungarian soil.

7. To sum up: the Honduran draft resolution supplies the African-Asian group's proposal with a means of carrying out the liberation process.

8. Mr. WADSWORTH (United States of America): Through all its life, the United Nations has been deeply concerned with the progress of dependent peoples towards self-government and independence. That progress has embraced nearly 800 million people. It has become the greatest tide of political liberation in all history.

9. This year, with the admission of seventeen newly-established nations to our midst, the independence movement has reached a climax. It is well, therefore, in the presence of so many nations which have achieved independence in recent times, that this session of the General Assembly should consider the future of this momentous movement. The movement itself is natural, just, and irresistible. It is determined not so much by what we say here as by historic forces which cannot be reversed. But it seems reasonable to hope that our deliberations here may help to speed it, and to make it more orderly, more peaceful and more just for the scores of millions whose future is bound up with it.

10. No people supports the idea of freedom and national independence more eagerly or more proudly than the people of the United States. All delegations here are aware of the historical background which led the founders of my country to make and carry into effect the famous Declaration of Independence, which we celebrate every fourth of July. After one hundred and fifty years of colonial rule, and after the economic and social development of the original colonies had attained a point where they were able to stand on their own feet, and when repressive acts reached a point where they were regarded as unendurable, our leaders issued this immortal declaration. By it they brought into being a new nation, founded on certain self-evident truths: "that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

11. Our founders declared, and we still hold, that these truths are not the heritage of any particular race or any particular nation but of all men. And so it has proved in fact, for the influence of that Declaration reverberated around the world and still reverberates today.

12. Therefore the general sentiment of the American people has always been that freedom and independence are among the basic natural rights of every people and nation. Our public opinion has shown no ambition to dominate other nations and has had little enthusiasm for colonial ventures, whether by ourselves or by others. When a former colony emerges as a new nation we instinctively remember our own origin and we respond with heartfelt rejoicing.

13. In this debate, on a subject where so many nations have greater experience than we, it would be idle for the United States to try to preach to anybody. Nor shall we try to rouse passions by lurid accusations. We are more interested in the future than in the past. We believe that the rapid progress of the independence movement is essential to peace. And in this statement we shall try to set forth some of the broad principles by which that progress should be governed.

14. From its very founding the United Nations conceived of the long-established colonial Governments, which then embraced a major part of the globe, not as sources of profits to the governing Power but rather as a "sacred trust" and a means of progress for dependent peoples. This was made plain by Article 73 of the Charter, under Chapter XI entitled: "Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories". That Article makes clear that the Administering Powers have a responsibility to the community of nations; that the interests of the indigenous populations come first; that among those interests are progress toward self-government and free institutions and the realization of their "political aspirations"—which, in most cases, has meant independence. The same article also makes clear that the pace and method of progress must take into account the "particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples and their varying stages of advancement".

15. In the fifteen years of the United Nations, Article 73 has been put into effect with greater speed and on a grander scale than any other provision of the Charter. Some thirty-four countries, containing over 775 million people, have attained independence since 1946. Nearly all are Members of the United Nations with representatives in this hall. In Africa alone no less than twenty-one States have made this transition, until two thirds of the whole of Africa is free and independent. And, as the representative of the United Kingdom reminded us in his statement early in this debate [925th meeting], still others will follow in the years just ahead.

16. Now this success has given a powerful impetus to the drive for independence and full self-government in other countries which are still dependent today and which feel themselves to be part of the same great stream of history. It is natural and healthy that this should be so. The very presence in our midst of a greatly increased number of new nations, all free to express their views as they think right, imparts to this question a new urgency.

17. It is equally fitting that, within the context of the Charter provisions to which I referred just now, an effort should be made to state the sense of the General Assembly in a new declaration which accords with the circumstances of 1960. For that task no one among us is so well qualified as the nations of Africa and Asia, to most of whom this question is a matter of first-hand experience and who are the sponsors of the draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-5] before the Assembly. We of the United States wish to be in a position to support their declaration. We hope that whatever questions of language might remain can still be worked out. We applaud their initiative and the spirit which animates it.

18. In this statement, rather than dissect the draft resolution, I shall try to set forth in broad terms the point of view of the United States.

19. First, let me say what we mean by colonialism. There is no need for a formal definition. We have learned from history certain of its characteristics. It is the imposition of alien power over a people, usually by force, and without the formal and free consent of the governed. It is the perpetuation of that power. It is the denial of the right of self-determination—whether by suppressing free expression or by withholding necessary educational, economic and social development. Obviously not all colonial régimes have been the same. Some have been benevolent and have expended great sums for the benefit of the indigenous people; others have been harsh and repressive. Some have understood the justice and inevitability of progress by the indigenous people to full self-government and self-determination, and have shaped their policies accordingly; others have not. But however important these differences, the fact remains that colonialism in any form is undesirable. Neither the most benevolent paternalism by a ruling Power, nor the most grateful acceptance of these benefits by indigenous leaders can meet the test of the Charter or satisfy the spirit of this age. In fact, the only colonial rule which can meet that test is that which energetically works to turn over full power to the indigenous people and thus seeks to bring itself to an end as soon as possible. Time and again, that test has been met. The vast areas which, in generations past, were overseas possessions of Western nations have been transformed by the joint efforts of the governing and the governed, until today the complete end of this traditional colonial era is a certainty. In spite of inevitable friction and some tragic instances of violence, this historic transformation has been largely peaceful; and for that blessing great credit is due to statesmen and leaders on both sides.

20. The United States devoutly hopes that the complete ending of the colonial age will be still more peaceful and harmonious. That this should be so is manifestly in the future interest of all concerned. We cannot help remarking on the fact that some speakers who have taken a prominent part in this debate, and who maintain that they themselves are all free and independent and have no colonies, have outdone all the rest of the speakers here in the violence of their language. They give the impression that they would prefer, for reasons best known to themselves, to see the colonial regimes of which they speak brought to an end by violence, with the greatest possible hatred and bitterness on both sides.

21. Now we could describe at this point, if it would be helpful to any suffering people to do so, a new colonial system which does not span any oceans but which is nonetheless as complete a violation of the rights of man as any that has ever existed. This colonial system was imposed by force on many peoples of many races, many of whom had for centuries been free and independent States and had been Members of the League of Nations. Some lost their independence even in form; all of them lost it in fact. This entire system is disguised by censorship, by ruthless thought control, and by an elaborate misuse of words like "democratic" and "autonomous". But its tragic reality is attested by the millions who have escaped from it and by the tens of thousands who have died in their vain efforts to shake it off.

22. That is the new colonialism. In the very years when the old colonialism was being transformed by the independence movement, the new colonialism was spreading to still other nations. It is the largest colonial empire in all the world today, yet it seeks to spread still further under the false banner of "liberation". Fortunately, its further spread has been checked by the increasing ability of free peoples to understand the reality through the disguise. We are convinced that this new colonial system too will die out—and we hope and pray it will die peacefully. Its time, perhaps, is not yet, but its time will come. Meanwhile, when we hear the practitioners of this new colonialism launch their thunderbolts against the old, we are tempted to recall the old proverb: "What you do speaks so loud that I cannot hear what you say".

23. The arch practitioner of this new and lethal colonialism demonstrated to us as recently as last Sunday the true colours of its cynical and hypocritical nature, which it hides under the false banner of liberation and behind masses of words and slogans expounding freedom from colonial domination and independence for all peoples of the world. I know I do not need to refresh your memories that it was the Soviet Union which, last Sunday morning in the Security Council,^{1/} vetoed the draft resolution proposing the admission of the recently free and independent Islamic Republic of Mauritania. This veto, a bare-faced attempt to blackmail the Security Council into accepting a package deal, has effectively prevented Mauritania from achieving its full status and rights in the community of nations. I ask you to think about the implications of the Soviet Union's action on Sunday morning. Particularly consider this veto on the admission of a sovereign State to the United Nations when the representative of the Soviet Union next takes the floor to champion, with his hollow oratory, the independence and equal rights of all peoples.

24. I have made this short digression to describe the "new colonial system" so that we may not forget the many millions of people who suffer under this "new colonialism" and whose fate, rightly or wrongly, most Members of the General Assembly have chosen not to talk about at this time. At the same time, I think, we should and must recall that the draft resolution now before us quite rightly speaks out against colonialism "in all its manifestations", just as did the historic declaration following the Bandung Conference. I return now, however, to the old colonial system. In the view of the United States, certain points are clear.

25. First, the ending of the colonial era is already far advanced and its complete end is certain. The sentiment of nationalism is one of the strongest and most irresistible forces of modern times. It should not be thwarted or suppressed—indeed, it cannot be. Modern history records many instances of nations which were partitioned or completely extinguished, only to emerge again as members of the family of nations. Some of these are sitting in our midst today; others may be here tomorrow. In any case, those who have responsibility under Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories must realize that their tutelage at best can be only temporary. Any attempt to prolong it by unnecessary delays, any failure to prepare for it with all possible speed, will only frustrate the inevitable and sow a harvest of bitterness which will persist long after independence has been achieved.

26. Secondly, it is not enough merely to liquidate the old; it is necessary also to plan soundly for what will replace it. And in this the wishes of the indigenous people must be paramount. Experience shows that a separate independence is usually, but by no means always, the people's choice. For instance, contrary to the impression left by the declaration which Mr. Zorin read here some weeks ago [925th meeting], the people of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico do not now desire independence. They are fully self-governing and have freely chosen to be associated with the United States as a self-governing commonwealth. There are strong economic, financial and other reasons behind their decision. On 8 November last they re-elected Governor Munoz Marín, who is a strong advocate of the commonwealth solution and in fact one of its chief architects, by a clear majority of 58 per cent of the vote in a free election. Perhaps just as significant is the fact that another 32 per cent of the voters advocated statehood, or full political integration with the United States, and that means in simple terms that over 90 per cent of the voters of Puerto Rico wish to have commonwealth status or a closer permanent tie with the United States. There are other examples, countries which, on emerging from colonial rule, have freely chosen to join with a neighbouring State in a single sovereignty. Solutions like these may also be preferred by other peoples, particularly those who live in small and widely scattered islands. Thus independence is only the most obvious of several possible choices. The essential point is that the people should choose.

27. My third point is related to this principle of popular choice. The vital test for the administering authority of every dependent area is the test of free consultation with the people through free elections or through some equally valid means of self-determination. This means more than a ceremony in which the people are permitted to ratify a single predetermined decision. It means an actual choice among alternatives. That is the essence of the principle of self-determination of peoples which is included among the Purposes of the United Nations. It is futile to argue that the people may make the wrong decision, or a decision which may prove to be bad for them. At some moment, and better soon than late, the administering authority must trust in the people's wisdom and put their destiny in their own hands. This has been done with success in so many cases that there can be no denying its practical validity. Let more use be made of free elections, then, so that peoples everywhere may be free to determine their own destiny.

28. Now I come to the question of time. How soon shall the remaining dependencies become independent or be given the opportunity to decide their future? The United States believes that steps must be taken immediately towards self-government or independence. In many cases this process is already far advanced. Where it is not so advanced, there must be no delay. Certainly no administering authority should maintain the colonial status or relationship one day longer than may be necessary to enable each territory to stand on its own feet in the strenuous conditions of the modern world. Moreover, the determination of a timetable should not be arbitrary but should be the result of continuous consultation with the indigenous peoples and with their leaders. The Charter makes it clear, in its Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories, that the progressive development of free political institutions is to be carried out according "to the particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples and their varying stages of advancement" [Article 73 b]. All Members of the United Nations, in subscribing to the Charter, have accepted this principle; and its wisdom has been fully demonstrated by experience. If independence is to be real and not merely formal, it must be accompanied by economic, social and political growth and stability. Even in the same region there may be wide variations in this regard. The Trust Territory of Western Samoa, for example, which will soon have a plebiscite regarding its future, has a very advanced society compared to the Trust Territory of New Guinea, large parts of which are still unexplored and unknown to the outside world. Thus, to deal with both as if they were in comparable stages of advancement would not ensure to either what the Charter pledges, namely, "their just treatment, and their protection against abuses".

29. We can sum up our views on the matter of timing in this way. Common sense, and the terms of the Charter as well, make it inescapable that independence—or whatever final result the people may choose—must be reached in progressive steps. Sometimes the remaining road is short; in other cases it is still long, and a long road should not be attempted in one leap. It is a poor service to any people to convert them overnight from colonial subjection to a paper independence which they are not equipped to sustain. The result is certain to be a collapse into chaos and violence—and perhaps an attempt by other stronger Powers to put them under a new yoke. It could be simply jumping from the frying pan into the fire.

30. Yet none of these cautions should be used as an excuse for delay with the urgent business in hand. Administering authorities should consult with the people to establish timetables of progress. And the steps along the way must be immediate. Both the administering authority and the people must feel an urgent obligation to speed the day of full liberation. That obligation is imposed upon us by history, and to shirk it would lead only to tragic and needless conflict.

31. We are speaking here of one of the great liberating movements of history—the creation of new sovereign nations. It is fitting to recall to ourselves how much this movement already owes—and how much it is sure to owe in the future—to the United Nations. Not only has this Organization, under its Charter, already taken a substantial and creative interest in the liberating process itself; the United Nations also provides—and this may be even a greater service in the long run—a house for the community of nations. And here the world's many independent nations, in all their variety and despite all their discord, can find a sound and strong framework within which to dwell in peace.

32. This priceless value of the United Nations for the emerging nations was recognized by President Eisenhower—when he proposed, in his address to the General Assembly on 22 September [868th meeting], a United Nations programme for Africa. Among the points in this programme are an immediate increase in the size of the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance and of the United Nations Special Fund; expansion and permanent status for the United Nations programme to provide operational and executive personnel to newly developing countries; special attention to Africa by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund; and a new United Nations programme of education, so that the peoples of Africa can more rapidly acquire the mental tools to preserve and develop their freedom.

33. We shall develop these proposals further when the Assembly considers the item which the United States delegation proposed entitled "Africa: a United Nations programme for independence and development" [Item 88]. We shall welcome particularly the ideas of the African States on that programme. Already we have been greatly interested to hear a number of speakers from Africa, during the present debate, emphasize their wish that aid to Africa should come as much as possible through the United Nations. With that attitude we entirely agree.

34. By such steps as these, we shall take the most statesmanlike course of all—the course which strengthens the independence of nations and at the same time strengthens the world institutions which bind us together in peace. Only from that unity in diversity can a peaceful world community be built. And only in such a community can freedom be achieved, and securely sustained, for all the peoples of the world. The President of the United States, in his address to the General Assembly earlier this fall, described this ideal in these words:

"This concept of unity in freedom, drawn from the diversity of many racial strains and cultures, we would like to see made a reality for all mankind. This concept should apply within every nation as it does among nations. We believe that the right of every man to participate, through his or her vote, in self-government is as precious as the right of each nation here represented to vote its own convictions in this Assembly. I should like to see a universal plebiscite in which every individual in the world would be given the opportunity freely and secretly to answer this question: 'Do you want this right?' Opposed to the idea of two hostile, embittered worlds in perpetual conflict, we envisage a single world community, as yet unrealized but advancing steadily towards fulfilment through our plans, our efforts and our collective ideas.

"Thus we see, as our goal, not a super-State above nations, but a world community embracing them all, rooted in law and justice and enhancing the potentialities and common purposes of all peoples." [868th meeting, paras. 84-85]

35. In the light of those ideals, we rejoice to see the age of colonies pass into history and a host of new nations emerging into the community of freedom. Let that great community grow steadily to completion, overcoming all fanatical divisions and groundless ambitions, until it embraces—as one day it surely must—all the members of the family of man.

36. Mr. AMMOUN (Lebanon) (translated from French): During these memorable days we are writing a great page of history, not the history we studied not so long ago about nations and their kings and wars, but universal history as it must henceforth be taught: the history of mankind, of its progress and achievements. The history of mankind is a history of continuous liberation—liberation from domination of man by man, whether it involved individuals, communities or peoples, that is to say, liberation from slavery and colonialism.

37. But before we reached our present stage, how much suffering was inflicted, how much blood and tears shed! And also, how many failures, set-backs and painful new beginnings! At each turning in this tortuous road a bright summit has emerged like the peak of Mount Sinai. Once it was the great Phoenician invention of the alphabet, then, closer to our time, paper imported into Europe from China by the Arabs, then Gutenberg's printing press and finally the newspaper—all stages in the extension of knowledge and the liberation of thought and hence the liberation of man. The flowering of democracy in Great Britain and its extension to other parts of the world was to be one of the main consequences of that process of liberation which is today enshrined in the democratic principles of the United Nations Charter.

38. Today the subjugation of individuals by slavery is coming to an end. Nevertheless it has not completely vanished. Remnants of it remain in racial discrimination, serfdom and forced labour.

39. Until the beginning of the Christian era there was only a sporadic struggle against this endemic evil and revolts which were speedily repressed. In the eyes of his contemporaries Spartacus was a rebel to be punished, a rebel against an established institution, a threat to one of the foundations of the civilization of the time.

40. With the advent of Christianity, the legitimacy of slavery was called in question. After it had been abolished in Europe it still subsisted in Czarist Russia in the milder form of serfdom, despite repeated attempts at liberation and the two great revolutions in the United States and France, together with the Declarations of the Rights of Man which they brought forth in pain. But it needed an Abraham Lincoln and a Civil War for slavery to be abolished in the United States, and the General Act of the Brussels Conference relative to the African Slave Trade of 1890^{2/} for it to be condemned also in Asia and Africa. The Powers that had officially protected the slave trade on the Atlantic Ocean made it their duty to combat it in the eastern seas. That was a reparation they owed to the peoples they had oppressed. The activities of European navies against the African slavers were instrumental in suppressing this hideous trade, which was ended for good by the International Convention for the Suppression of Slavery adopted by the League of Nations, and signed at Geneva on 25 September 1926.^{3/}

41. But, as has been observed, the remnants of slavery remain in the form of racial discrimination, which rages in at least two countries: the Union of South Africa and Israel.

42. It is time, high time, that these inhuman practices should cease. The struggle against racial discrimination in the United States is proceeding successfully, albeit slowly and considerably more in the legislative acts and court decisions than in popular practices and reactions, but so far little progress has been made in South Africa despite repeated United Nations intervention. The policy of "apartheid", which we have condemned more than once, remains an open sore in the side of mankind. How long will the United Nations tolerate this affront to its most noble and lofty principles? The draft resolution before us [A/L.323 and Add.1-5], and on which we are called upon to vote, condemns once and for all this policy which violates both moral law and the precepts of religion, of all religions. Will the Government of the Union of South Africa withhold its vote from this draft resolution? It is being offered an opportunity to reconsider its policy, which is as disastrous for the community which it defends as for the one which is its wretched victim.

43. As to Israel, there have been many denunciations of its policy, a State policy which has racial discrimination as one of its corner-stones. The very Constitution of Israel, a theocratic State, is based on the notion that only the Jew is a real citizen, the non-Jew being a second class subject. Racial discrimination results from the existence of a racist State. It appears there as an institution of the State itself. Whether in the form of segregation imposed on the Arabs under the pretext of national security, or of inequality before the State and the public authorities, it constitutes one of the fundamental laws of the State. The censure incurred by the Union of South Africa is merited to an even greater extent by Israel. How long will people close their eyes to this anomaly, to this monstrosity of racist policy in an anachronistic State, and of the Zionism which nourishes it?

44. Slavery in all its forms, as the League of Nations declared, slavery in its most diverse shapes and with all its hideous remnants, must finally give way to real equality between men of all races and colours, and to respect for the human dignity of each and every person.

45. Even before voting on the resolution condemning racial discrimination, we should like to believe that this resolution will not, like so many other United Nations resolutions, remain a dead letter. A people whose actions violate the principles of the Charter and the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, whether it be Israel or any other country, must henceforth incur not only moral penalties in the form of United Nations censure, but the legal penalties attaching to the violation of the rules of conduct for peoples and individuals. We hope that the world, which has seen the advent of independence for so many peoples, will in the near future see the advent of universal law and justice for all.

46. A last word before turning from racial discrimination, which besets the individual, to colonialism, which affects entire peoples. For the common good, we hope that racial discrimination will not spring up again in the relations between the newly emancipated peoples, or those soon to be freed, and their former masters. We entreat these long-suffering peoples to rise above malice and vengeance. At stake are their own interests, which can be fulfilled only through co-operation on an equal footing, in an atmosphere of mutual confidence among all men and peoples.

47. The draft resolution before us states that the liberation of peoples is an irreversible process. Whatever anyone may say, international morality is winning a victory. It will be one of the greatest achievements of the United Nations, if not the greatest of all, to have taken part in this regeneration of the world by helping all peoples still in bondage in their struggle for independence. What the League of Nations did to free the individual from slavery, the United Nations is in the process of doing to liberate all peoples from the bonds of servitude.

48. We do not wish to deny to the colonial Powers, or at least some of them, the merit of having understood this movement and of having risen to the heights of this morality, yielding to the pressure of peoples striving for freedom. In the past two decades the United Kingdom, France and Italy have cut the bonds of subjection placed on more than thirty nations inhabited by more than a thousand million people. This Organization and these Powers are today insistently urged to extend to all the peoples of the earth, on whatever continent they live, and whether they are black or white, the blessings of freedom and dignity. Let them put a speedy end to bloodshed in the countries where the struggle is continuing. Let the territories taken away from sovereign nations be restored to them, for parts of their flesh and blood in Asia and Africa remain in the hands of occupying Powers and forces.

49. Special mention should be made of a land, the most holy of lands, which a rapacious colonialism, Zionism, has usurped and occupied in defiance of human laws and, I may add, of Divine Law, since this is the land of the Holy Places and the Holy City. While the whole world acknowledges that the age of conquest and colonialism is past and while dozens of nations are holding up their heads and advancing towards freedom and light, colonialist Zionism is clinging desperately to the alleged rights of conquest so as to dispossess a people of its ancestral fatherland and open the land for colonization. Palestine—the land of Canaan—was not a Sahara, an uninhabited desert. It was, in the words of the Bible, a land flowing with milk and honey, a land bearing huge bunches of grapes that astonished the nomadic Israelites. It was conquered in the time of Joshua, and conquered again three thousand years later in a no less cruel fashion, under the very eyes of the United Nations and in spite of and in violation of its principles and its most solemn resolution. Israel, in defiance of logic and decency, masks this new colonialism under a screen of principles proclaiming freedom, but the United Nations must be true to itself by unmasking this deception, by exposing and hunting down colonialism wherever it seeks to perpetuate or reinstate itself. By occupying a part of Arab Palestine, Zionism has violated both the sovereignty of the people it expelled from their homes and the integrity of the national territory. While pretending to assert a right, it violates with impunity the most elementary principles of good faith.

50. Without a doubt, the colonial Powers have spread their civilization in the colonized countries, to a greater or lesser extent. This cultural expansion was at times attended by violence. It was imposed rather than accepted. It may be that without this culture and without this violence, the colonized countries would not have awakened so quickly to independence and freedom. This has happened at various times in history. In antiquity, in the Middle Ages and in modern times the currents of culture sweeping through the world, sometimes from East to West and sometimes from West to East, were not always peaceful currents. Far from it. But this no longer holds true today. The book can dispense with the sword and the rifle. Economic development must no longer mean exploitation, as it often meant in times gone by, in all eras and under all skies—exploitation of natural resources as well as of men.

51. Our age is one of co-operation among free and equal peoples and men. More still, it is an age of human brotherhood, association and mutual assistance. This mutual assistance is more particularly necessary since justice—economic and social justice—did not always in the past govern the relations between nations. The economic and technical development of some peoples was sometimes achieved at the expense of others.

52. The proposal for assistance to African countries which have attained independence, submitted by the United States [868th meeting], comes at a timely moment. It springs from the new spirit. It will be welcome, as will also be any assistance which the countries of western Europe may propose to give to the States they once administered. The same may be said of the decision of the Soviet Union, announced in the Second Committee,^{4/} to increase its contribution to the programme of assistance to newly independent States.

53. This assistance has already been the subject of two important resolutions of the Second Committee, one on assistance to newly independent States [A/4649, draft resolution I] and the other on concerted action for the economic development of all peoples [A/4648, draft resolution I]. These two resolutions underline the duty of the United Nations to promote the economic and social advancement of all the less developed peoples. They complement the draft resolution which is now before you. They constitute the economic charter of a new world in which all peoples must work together.

54. If this assistance is accompanied by respect for the independence and sovereignty of young States, as required by the draft resolution on concerted action for economic development, if the recipient States are not drawn into the conflicts and rivalries of the Great Powers and are enabled to develop in peace and tranquillity, an effective contribution will indeed have been made to human progress and universal harmony in the world. Let us not regard this as a vision or as a figment of the imagination. It will be the reality of our time, and of the years to come, dictated by the sequence of events and the course of history. The United Nations will give the seal of its approval by adopting the draft resolution sponsored by forty-two States [A/L.323 and Add.1-5]. This resolution will be the new charter proclaiming the freedom of peoples and the dignity of man.

Mr. Nesbitt (Canada), Vice-President, took the Chair.

55. Mr. VELAZQUEZ (Uruguay) (translated from Spanish): The delegation of Uruguay is taking part in this debate in full awareness of the importance of the matter before us.

56. There are still many millions of people in Asia, Africa and even our own America for whom the words we speak here have special significance. There are many millions of people whose eyes are fixed on the United Nations at this moment, and who await from us a word to hearten them in their struggle, a word of encouragement to help them to endure their ceaseless sufferings, a word of hope in their dejection.

57. This lends particular gravity to our discussion and compels us to approach the subject with the honest intention of working only for the objective which we have set ourselves. We do not want this debate to be used as a cold weapon in a cold war, much less as an instrument of propaganda for an ideology which has itself proved to be a modern version of colonialism—of a colonialism that is implacable, rigid and inhuman. My delegation has therefore been glad to note the moderation and deliberation which have characterized the statements of many countries that in recent times have fought most fiercely against the colonial system. The peoples of Asia and Africa, more immediately affected than ourselves by whatever is said or done in this Assembly, have shown an admirable prudence. We hail this fact as a favourable augury for the future of the United Nations.

58. Uruguay, like its fellow nations of Spanish and Latin America, can claim a special justification for intervening in this debate. Our independence, like that of our fellows, was attained at the cost of great sacrifices. The war of independence in South America lasted fourteen years and, even after the Battle of Ayacucho, which set the final seal on America's destiny, we had to fight on for another five years. For then we had no United Nations. There was no chapter XI and no Trusteeship System. There was only an indomitable will to independence. Independence did not come to us as a gift. Nor was it an act of justice on our behalf by a third party. Independence was the exercise of a right; but the right was exercised through sacrifice and pain.

59. It is true that the circumstances then were not the same as those which came to prevail in the countries exploited by the typical colonialism of the nineteenth century. We should be unfair, and we should be simplifying historical fact to the point of distortion, if we failed to distinguish between the colonialism against which we rose and the colonialism of more recent times, particularly in the ruthless forms which characterized it at least until the end of the First World War.

60. For our part—and this point has already been made by other representatives of Spanish America—we must acknowledge that the Spanish venture began in an age when values and standards higher than the capricious will of men were still acknowledged; in an age still strong enough in Christian tradition to resist the divorcement of political action from ethical action; in an age which still held man to be fully responsible for his every action.

61. Spain may have made many mistakes in the American Indies. Indeed, its very conception of the enterprise of colonization—as a gigantic effort to lift the conquered countries to what it considered a higher plane of morality and living—may have been a mistake. It may have been a mistake from beginning to end; and yet, for all the fire and passion which we put into our struggle for independence, that mistake does not blind us to the beauty and transcendence of the conception. With all its faults and cruelties—though the latter seem innocuous in comparison with the methods of mass extermination used in our century—it was an enterprise of high civilization. It was the Spanish moralists, jurists and theologians who proclaimed before the world that justice was the source of all law, and that reason and morality prevailed above the absolute will of monarchs. It was they who drafted the admirable pages of the Code of the Indies that governed the life of the American communities for three hundred years.

62. Spain's work in America is present here today; we ourselves are that work—we who, for a century and a half, have been dealing with the mother country on a footing of equality, with no misgivings, suspicions or fears. Even without our presence to testify to its continuity, the earth and flesh of America would still abound with evidence of its prodigious labour of civilization, to which these lines from Quevedo's moving sonnet could well be applied: "They will abandon their bodies, but not their care. They will be ashes, but will have feeling. They will be dust, but loving dust."

63. I said that we should be unfair if we simplified historical fact by attaching the same label or applying the same yardstick to all colonialism. To be fair, we must now recognize that it was the West itself which, in the context of the modern age, took a tragically wrong turning. It was Western thought that questioned the existence of those supreme and objective values of justice and morality which could and did give meaning to the Spanish enterprise of colonization. That scepticism, rooted deep in history, had enormous explosive force. If there was no law but that imposed on the community by the monarch; if it was will, and not reason, that made the legal rules; if in so doing, that will was not enlightened by the law of understanding and the objective nature of things; if force was not measured and regulated by a higher law, by that law whose edicts in the fine words of Sophocles' heroine Antigone, "are not of yesterday or today, but everlasting, though where they came from, none of us can tell"; then is it any wonder that crime should now be rewarded and transgression praised? If whatever is good and just is not good and just of itself, but only because an omniscient and omnipotent ruler willed it so, then in the name of what logic, that we shall never succeed in understanding, has our conscience the right to revolt against the daily spectacle of injustice and disorder? I do not know whether they were many or few who perceived at the time the danger that lurked in this philosophy. I know only that we have here the rightful fruits of that philosophy: the grave of Katyn, the gas chambers of Dachau, the fiery mushroom over Hiroshima, the millions of human beings who still live in fear, anguish and slavery.

64. It was colonialism conceived in the shadow of that sceptical and therefore materialistic philosophy; it was colonialism born beneath the sign of the spirit of gain; it was colonialism as the legitimate child of the capitalistic spirit, which was responsible for the sad reality of the colonial empires, the exploitation of peoples, and the stupid myth of racial superiority. It is this cold, calculating, unfeeling colonialism that we are going to condemn in this Assembly in the name of the essential equality of men and peoples, in the name of that common ancestry of the human race which makes us but a single community and a single family.

65. To be completely fair—and, I repeat, we have heard much that was just and sensible said in this debate—we must obviously be extremely cautious when it comes to judging or condemning any specific colonial situation. The responsibility of the colonial Powers is not always self-evident, nor can we affirm a priori that the Governments of those Powers must in all cases be held answerable for the acts of their nationals. Many noble efforts to guide social conduct along more rational paths come up against indifference, prejudice or selfishness. Moreover, we are bound to say, not everything stems from foreign oppression. Since colonialism, in the sense of exploitation of human beings, is a state of mind, there is national colonialism as well as foreign colonialism. The exploitation of our peoples by men of the same stock, by groups indifferent to the requirements of the common good, is a moral and adverse fact, as adverse as colonialism itself; and, be it said in passing, that situation of privilege and injustice has always been the most effective ally of foreign interests in reducing the sovereignty of weak and small nations to thralldom.

66. Although independence and self-government represent the first objectives to be attained in the process of gaining freedom and eradicating colonialism, they are not the ultimate goal. The ultimate goal is independence in the fullest sense of the word, independence which really makes us masters of our fate, independence in each and every activity of the political community to which we belong. I readily acknowledge that political independence may be a sine qua non for the achievement of this other independence; but it is not in itself enough. We, the peoples of Spanish America, know a great deal about this. At any rate we know—and perhaps our experience may be of some use in this debate—that political independence and the establishment of a country's own Government presuppose an intelligent adaptation of legal forms to the sociological realities of that country. Speaking for a country which, like its fellows in America, was in the past perpetually torn between ideal constitutions and real constitutions, between written constitutions and sociological constitutions—happily, the conflict was settled in Uruguay more than fifty years ago—we can appreciate how important it is that the formulas through which free institutions develop should be made to fit—not like a ready-made suit, but like one made to measure—the always complex conditions in which the Government is to function. Every country must, of course, experiment with formulas for itself; but the goal must be the same for all: to ensure that—subject to those basic principles, such as the sovereignty of the people and respect for fundamental human rights, which have absolute validity regardless of the situation—the institutions are adapted to the real structure of the country. Otherwise independence leads to chaos, and chaos reverts to colonialism or to spurious forms of political government which, as experience has shown, are always used to further interests foreign to the legitimate interests of the nation.

67. It would, however, be naive to think that political independence can be maintained without breaking the bonds of economic colonialism. I neither mean nor claim that such bonds can be broken overnight once freedom is won. We know all too well that the intricate network of interests in which the world is, to some extent, held prisoner cannot be broken so easily. Again, it has never, perhaps, been the part of political wisdom to make an abrupt break; whether we like it or not, we have to reckon with world realities. What is important is to fight on resolutely and with a true sense of patriotism. Let there be an end to the paradox of political independence and economic dependence. At a time when the end of colonialism is already a fact, perhaps our main concern should be, not so much to issue a declaration which in the last analysis merely takes note of that fact, as to issue a warning that there will be no real end to colonialism while the peoples enjoy no genuine and authentic freedom to dispose of and exploit their natural wealth and resources for the benefit of their communities; while we must rest content with the role of mere providers of raw materials for the industrial Powers, and while we lack that minimum of self-sufficiency which, within the natural interdependence of nations, is the truest sign of full and genuine independence.

68. An understanding of these truths, a generous attitude on the part of those who until yesterday were the masters—by what right we need not consider now—of the fate and wealth of vast areas of the world, is not merely an attitude which morality dictates but perhaps the one factor upon which, in the long run, the fate of the free world depends. Whenever the free world clashes within itself, whenever the West betrays the great and imperishable principles which have sealed the greatness of its culture, the West loses a battle; and every battle lost by the West is a battle lost for man; for the values of the West—the freedom which Greece bequeathed to us, the sense of law and order contributed by the genius of Rome, the grace whereby Christianity transformed the temporal meaning of our life—are, in one way or another, the values of mankind, which are now threatened by atheistic and totalitarian reaction. If the West understands, there is nothing to fear, whatever triumphs the adversary may seem to gain. If the West does not understand, that lack of understanding, and not nuclear war, will be the real self-destruction of mankind.

69. Mr. MARTINO (Italy) (translated from French): The problem of the independence of Non-Self-Governing Territories and colonial peoples has already, in the past, been the subject of lively debate in which many contrasting views have been expressed. That is quite logical, for it is no accident that one of the main purposes of this Organization, since it was established, has been to urge and to help Member States to lead the territories which they administer, and which have not yet gained their independence, to the gradual achievement of that supreme aspiration of mankind.

70. The freedom of peoples is now the central preoccupation of the human race. We live in an age marked by continual changes in the relations between peoples. These changes are partly the effect of extraordinary technical progress, but it is not only technical progress which unites the thoughts and interests of men and which now allows no man to live separate from his fellows. Technical progress is a creation of the human mind and its inventions are the fruit of ideals. Technical progress is therefore bound to obey moral and spiritual demands.

71. Whatever may be the motives which have led a Member of the Assembly to request this debate, we regard the initiative as a useful one. It further demonstrates the importance which this problem has acquired and the urgent need to seek a solution. The present, which has its roots in the past, is dominated by a powerful unifying force. We are moving towards unity.

72. Italy is convinced that, because of its recent experience, its awareness of present problems and the general approval of its action in the territories it once administered, it is in a position to speak objectively, to calm passions and to make a fair assessment of the true aspects of the problem, without any attempt at demagogic exaltation or ideological or political exploitation. I believe I can say truly that the Italian nation has, to its own great satisfaction, played a part in the development of the countries for whose government and administration it was responsible. This is borne out by the cordial relations of trust and co-operation that have been established with the States which were once under Italian trusteeship or which were Italian colonies.

73. We are also convinced that nothing is more likely to lead to useful results, in the best interests of all countries, than sincere technical and economic co-operation. Some are strongly critical of such co-operation between countries which have just gained their independence and their former administrators. They speak of neo-colonialism, condemning it as a sequel to or a substitute for past colonial exploitation. Even if we can sometimes understand and appreciate the reasons for these charges, we should resist the temptation to make them indiscriminately. Such a generalization would not only be completely unjustified, it would also be dangerous. It might be used as a pretext by those who are in no way concerned lest such co-operation should hinder peaceful progress towards the independence of the former colonial countries, but who are concerned and afraid that such co-operation might be an obstacle to the enslavement and ideological domination of these peoples—by those who fan the flames of resentment and pride, in the hope that the work of renewal will take the form of an anti-western movement and an attack on certain ways of life, rather than on certain western peoples.

74. This shows the delicate nature and the importance of the question we are discussing today. The Italian delegation is firmly convinced that every possible effort must be made to ensure that the debate will lead to useful and constructive decisions. It can obviously have but one objective, the ending in all continents, of all forms of rule over one people by another; no other objective would be justified. But, if we are to achieve this objective by the most suitable means, we must calmly assess what has been done in the past to the same end, and we must then look towards the future, having made a correct and intelligent assessment of the past.

75. We believe that several forces have helped to determine and to accelerate the emancipation of colonial peoples, but it is true, as the representative of Lebanon has said, that this process was helped and furthered by the policy of those countries which understood the historical reality of the hour and the true meaning and responsibilities of their mission. Within this very Assembly, several representatives of territories which were until recently non-self-governing, have acknowledged this fact and have openly declared themselves satisfied with the work done by the administering countries, with which, in several cases, the new countries have relations of close co-operation. A few moments ago I referred to the concern which this co-operation may cause. Yet, although we recognize that such a concern is legitimate in certain cases, we can only consider the tendency to oppose such co-operation as the most serious threat to the development of the former colonial peoples. These peoples feel a deep desire for renewal—a desire which should not be a cause of separation and inevitable conflict, but should, as a rule, lead to closer understanding and more fruitful and lasting co-operation. If there is to be such an understanding, it is essential that both sides should quickly free themselves of all remnants of resentment and regret.

76. When we speak of colonization, it is necessary to emphasize, not only its executive aspects, but also the spiritual values and forces which it eventually succeeded in releasing. This is exactly what the distinguished representative of Uruguay did a few moments ago. K. M. Panikkar, the Indian author of Asia and Western Dominance, which is regarded as the sternest indictment of the colonizing West, once, in the course of a lecture emphasized India's debt to the West in terms which may perhaps apply to all former colonial peoples. He said that social reform in Hindu society, the raising of the untouchables and the profoundly significant purification of Hinduism, all of which were greater and more lasting things than even the independence of India, were reflections of that country's western heritage. The organization of the democratic and secular State, the structure of its institutions and the political principles on which it was based were essentially European in inspiration.

77. As in all human history, good is inseparable from evil and must always combat it. It is to be hoped that the countries which have gained their independence will find in themselves the strength to reject both the bondage of their recent past, which still bears the germs of distrust and resentment, and the repeated and tempting incitements of those who would gain by their isolation which would place them more completely at their mercy. But it is also desirable that the peoples of the West should understand that their task does not end where the independence of colonial countries begins. The assistance which the more advanced countries should give to the less developed nations is not a complete moral and political solution. The peoples of the West must play a part in the creative efforts of the newly self-governing countries, to their full capacity and with a firm resolve to understand the full meaning of those efforts and to further them with a view to making joint progress.

78. In this survey of the problem before us, we cannot forget the part which the United Nations, through its organs, has played in this emancipation process, particularly at the moment of accession to independence. The Trusteeship Council has certainly done excellent work from every point of view. The work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories has increased our understanding of many situations, especially in the economic, social and cultural sectors and with regard to the rate of development towards political independence. In this connexion may we also point out that, if we consider the various fields of international co-operation provided for in the Charter of the United Nations, we will find that the same results and the same progress have not been achieved in each of these sectors in the fifteen years of our Organization's life. However, as far as the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the trusteeship system are concerned, remarkable progress has been made, possibly even exceeding the initial expectations. I shall not pause here to repeat the list of admittedly extraordinary achievements which the representative of the United Kingdom [925th meeting] quoted to us on the first day of our debate. Those facts and figures are in any case well known to all Members of the United Nations. The number and population of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are today a very small fraction of what they were in 1945. The progress made in the Trust Territories has been no less rapid and decisive. It seems to us indisputable, after what I have just said, that the Non-Self-Governing Territories have come a long way in the last fifteen years. The United Nations must take the credit for this development, especially for the gradual and orderly way in which it has been achieved. Experience has shown that the principles enunciated in Chapters XI, XII and XIII of the Charter were inspired by very wise and well balanced views. It is those principles that have guided our action, and we feel that it is in that we should seek inspiration for the decisions we must take in this debate.

79. We also believe that our most important task is to look beyond the simple question of independence. The achievement of political independence by the new countries should be a stage rather than a goal, although it is, of course, a very important stage. Independence should not give rise to disorder and chaos. It should not mean political and economic isolation. It should not cause sudden imbalances and, above all, it should not provide an occasion for friction or controversy. I said that the emancipation of peoples still ruled by or under trusteeship of another country was the main goal which we should set ourselves. But that task, arduous and ambitious though it may be, does not exhaust the role the United Nations has to play. The essential task of the Organization is to defend peace and put an end to war as a means of settling disputes between peoples. To this end, we must fight the causes of war, which are poverty, slavery and ignorance. It is essential to establish living conditions which are by nature peaceful, and forces for peace. It is therefore indispensable to create, in the social structure of the various peoples, conditions more conducive to understanding and co-operation, to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights and in the dignity and worth of the human person, and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom.

80. The circumstances of each people being different, so also is their capacity to participate in the common effort needed to establish peace as a part of civilization. All peoples, however, have a duty to contribute to the best of their ability. That is why the new idea of collective solidarity, which is reflected in the United Nations Charter and replaces the earlier antagonism created when the more advanced nations took control of the less-developed countries, is an essential part of our Organization's activity and one of the most suitable instruments for the maintenance of world peace.

81. There is no need for me to recall the principles enunciated in Chapters XI and XII of the Charter, but I think it may be useful to point out that these principles set two essential tasks for the United Nations.

82. The first is to encourage and promote in the best possible way the further development of Non-Self-Governing or Trust Territories which have not reached the final stage of their political development. This does not mean, however, that attainment of this objective necessarily entails the creation of new national entities. Certain territories—it is true—because of their limited size or population, do not have the necessary resources to become independent States. However, in such cases, it is necessary at least to provide for special forms of self-government, in association with the metropolitan country or with other adjoining countries. Such forms of government are in keeping with the United Nations Charter, which envisaged them as a natural conclusion of the development of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

83. The second task facing the United Nations today is that of selecting the best means of helping those countries which have only recently become independent because, as I said before, political independence is only one stage in the present complex process of development. Forms of economic co-operation with these countries will become increasingly necessary, as will also forms of political co-operation, which may frequently prove effective in a regional framework. Co-operation on a basis of trust, between the more developed and industrialized countries and the less developed ones may be the best means of furthering development in the political field. This co-operation may be based on technical assistance, commercial interests and economic co-operation. As well as economic relations, cultural relations can also make a considerable contribution to a later development towards more perfect forms of political self-government.

84. We have heard in this Assembly of the cultural enslavement of colonial peoples. I should like to point out that culture is an end and not a means. Political institutions, as the poet T.S. Eliot says, are the things that are built, but culture is something that grows. It is not possible to build it, just as it is not possible to build a tree. Hence there can be no true cultural enslavement. Only people deprived of their freedom can take what is often called unilateral education to be culture. The life of the mind is a perpetual synthesis, bringing together and developing various ideas, and conditions of freedom are necessary to this synthesis. If such conditions do not exist, we may truly say there is enslavement; but we cannot speak of culture.

85. As I mentioned at the opening of my statement, the forces which have encouraged the process of development that has already taken place in a large number of countries, and which are the ones that will inevitably determine future progress, have not affected all geographical areas in the same degree. These signs of development, in which we take pride, and which have led to the formation of new States which are now Members of the United Nations, have not appeared in certain areas. In certain cases we have even seen movements in the opposite direction, towards the enslavement and foreign domination of peoples who once were free. It is clear that the historic expansion known as colonialism, which occurred essentially in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, was not confined to the countries of western Europe. Other countries played their part in it, including Tsarist Russia which extended its power beyond the Urals to the frontiers of China, into the very heart of widely different territories and peoples. Even today, in the centre of Asia, we have witnessed expansionist moves with all the painful oppression and repression they entail, which have been made in defiance of the traditional freedoms of the Tibetan people. Other States of eastern and northern Europe, which yesterday were still free, have now lost their freedom.

86. We cannot remain indifferent to the fate of these peoples. Any declaration or resolution which we are to approve cannot concern only some other continent; it must be regarded as being equally valid in every corner of the earth, where peoples still live under any form of foreign oppression, even if such oppression is concealed or consists only of a limitation of their independence.

87. The Italian delegation hopes that this debate will lead to an agreement which is the result of enlightened and objective considerations, not of acrimonious attempts to disturb the atmosphere of international relations. We are bound to distrust the Soviet Union's proposals, because it is clear that they are designed to stir up the hatred and resentment of former colonial countries against their previous rulers and to excite their passions, in order to turn their energies to the advantage of the Soviet Union. Its initiative is too obviously designed to serve Soviet propaganda purposes to be favourably viewed by this Assembly. It is only a clumsy attempt to make the germs of distrust more virulent, in order to separate the West from the peoples who have recently emerged to independence and to bring them under the ideological and political domination of the Soviet Union.

88. On the other hand, my delegation does view with favour the initiative taken by a group of African-Asian countries, which has submitted for our consideration a responsible and constructive draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-5]. We sincerely appreciate its aim, even if we have some doubts regarding the manner in which certain points in the declaration are expressed. The Italian delegation fervently hopes that any final text the Assembly may approve will mention the results already achieved and our gratitude to the United Nations organs which have laboured most effectively with results of which we can rightly be proud.

89. Looking ahead, the most important task is to ensure a more rapid development of the Territories which are still non-self-governing. But this should be done in an orderly and peaceful manner, in international co-operation. This is the goal we must set ourselves in this debate.

90. Mr. ROA (Cuba) (translated from Spanish): This year has been called, with more than ample justification, the Year of Africa. In the course of 1960, sixteen African countries have attained independence and are already sharing in the duties and responsibilities of the United Nations. This year should also be the Year of the Proclamation of Independence for all colonial countries and peoples. The majority of the peoples and countries still subjugated beneath the yoke of colonialism are to be found in Africa. There are also countries and peoples in colonial status in Asia and Oceania, while various European Powers still have colonial establishments in Latin America. The United States has possessions, dependencies, leased territories and an inter-ocean canal in Latin America and its economic policy towards the Latin-American nations is in its nature, structure and objectives, typically colonialist. If we proclaimed the abolition of all vassal status in all continents where it survives in one form or another, the Year of Africa might reach a glorious culmination as the Year of the Liberation of Humanity. This is not a flight of fantasy. Such a proclamation would be an act of free will depending exclusively on the representatives of the peoples of the United Nations.

91. Colonialism is the most shameful survival of a régime of mercantile expansion and of a geographical shift of political power spurred on first and foremost by the prospect of boundless wealth. This régime and the remaining vestiges of it have now come into fundamental contradiction with contemporary society's need for development and progress. They are dying before our very eyes. They are doomed to destruction. Even though mortally wounded, however, the Leviathan that is colonialism still possesses sufficient strength and sufficient means to prolong its last gasping breath and its death-throes. It also has before it the alternative of peacefully surrendering a degrading but highly profitable dominion which will be snatched away from it at the eleventh hour by the inexorable laws of history. This alternative was given to it by the General Assembly when by acclamation [903rd meeting] it approved the allocation to the plenary meetings of the item "Declaration on the granting of independence to the colonial countries and peoples", proposed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; and in the face of this alternative there is no room for compromises or half-measures. The time has come for straightforward statements, not for circumlocution. The time has come to put the finishing touches on the process of emancipation of the peoples, not to retard it. Cuba is utterly at variance with those who, demagogically donning the Phrygian cap, have tried to light a resplendent candle to the god of colonialism and a feeble one to the devil of anti-colonialism. And since it is impossible to serve both God and Mammon, what they serve, objectively, is colonialism and what they are trying to undermine, subjectively, is anti-colonialism. Trying to appear subtle, they turn out to be heavy-handed. It is understandable that the instigators and beneficiaries of the colonial system should resort to subterfuge, phantasy and dissembling; what is not understandable is that those who in the past have suffered its crudest manifestations, and even those who are still suffering them in disguised form, should do so too.

92. The unconditional and immediate abolition of colonialism in all its forms and manifestations—that is what Cuba demands of this historic debate. How could Cuba take any other stand without betraying itself, the tradition of Bolívar and the peoples who are struggling heroically to win self-determination, independence, sovereignty and dignity? How could a people which, in the flesh and in the spirit, has suffered without respite the colonial system of Spain and the imperialistic domination of the United States take any other stand?

93. It is worth placing this on record. Three years ago, Cuba would not have been able to speak in the straightforward, upright manner it uses today. Three years ago, the true voice of Cuba was not heard in this universal forum of the nations. The flatulent tones of the docile, muffled and obsequious voice of its official representatives reflected a state of international vassalage which gave the lie to the bogus independence and sovereignty of the Cuban State. According to its official political and juridical structure, Cuba was a republic and possessed the formal attributes of independence and sovereignty: a flag, a shield, an anthem, a separate colour on the map, and a seat in international organizations. But its voice in those organizations was mere mimicry, an echo pure and simple of the political, economic, military and diplomatic interests of a foreign Power. Its voice sounded with borrowed accents. It was not Cuba which spoke, but imperialism. Colonies, where they are officially acknowledged, have nothing to say. Where they exist in disguise, they speak with a voice not their own. And now, because Cuba has for ever ceased to be a colony and effectively exercises its own self-determination and sovereignty, the voice of its official representatives is the clear, full, deep voice of its people and its Government, merged for the first time in our history, in a dynamic community of thought and action. Since the fourteenth regular session, which coincided with the glorious year of its liberation, this new Cuba has given clear and firm proof of the independence of its foreign policy. Cuba—let it be said at once—supports all parts of the draft declaration submitted by the Soviet Union [A/4502].

94. At this stage of the debate, it would be idle to enter into the history of colonialism or to refer to its depredations, its perfidies, its outrages and its opportunism. The task of refreshing the memory of those who find it convenient to disguise themselves as innocent angels has already been undertaken in a dramatic recital of injuries and facts and figures by representatives of peoples whose backs, torn by the claws of colonial exploitation, still bear mute witness to their wounds, suffering and brutal treatment. But what we must not fail to emphasize is the true nature, the real motives and the specific aims of the colonial system. Cuba has lived in the monster's maw, and it has a moral obligation to reveal it to the world.

95. Colonialism is the legitimate child of the profound and sweeping changes that took place in the economic structure of European society during the fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and of their concomitant repercussions on political, juridical, social, religious and cultural life. Renaissance humanism—the evocation of the uomo singolare in a society rent internally—is the fine flower of the tempestuous advent of modern capitalism, and the spring-like flowering of ideal societies that went with it, starting with Thomas More's Utopia, was a denunciation in advance of its miseries, degradations, inequalities, performances, conflicts, wars and revolutions. This new society which rose victorious from the crackling embers of feudalism, rested on the more and more pronounced predominance of merchants, money-lenders, bankers, entrepreneurs, and ship-owners. Its emblem was the class system; its instrument, the Graeco-Roman culture; its oracle, nature; its Archimedean lever, technology; its desire, the chimera of gold; its cry, liberty; its fetish, trade; and its criterion of truth, quantitative evaluation.

96. The dynamics of the new constellation of economic interests, social relations, political forms and tables of ethical values which accompanied this prodigious upheaval required, before it could take root and grow, the freedom of labour, of markets and of expansion, and also the unlimited assistance of science and technology to stimulate its rate of development and satisfy its desire for domination. The questioning spirit, held back for ten centuries by the brake of scholasticism, thrust forward into all fields and expanded the horizons of scientific knowledge. The clock conquered time; the telescope, space; the experimental method, nature; the compass, the sea; the machine, production; rationalist philosophy, the conscience of man. The acquisitive spirit and the lust for expansion, spurred on by this extraordinary adventure of the mind and impelled by the beckoning gleam of precious metals, was soon crystallized in commercial operations, mercantile enterprises and agencies for exploiting the terra incognita which was taken over by the great maritime Powers of the time, especially Spain, England, Holland, Portugal and France, by a process similar to the transformation of territorial revenues into monetary wealth.

97. The main source of the political power and economic potential of the rising merchant class was its huge profits derived from the pillaging of the colonies, from mass slavery and from the systematic depletion of the soil and sub-soil of the territories which had been discovered, conquered and subjugated. "We have become rich", wrote Werner Sombart, "because whole peoples and races have died on our account; on our account, whole continents have been decimated." Here in a few words is summed up the real essence of colonialism, which had, and still has, its theoreticians and its apologists skilled in the art of making "spiritual values" tally with highly lucrative necessities. Language and religion, education and culture were tools used to twist the minds of the subjugated peoples, psychological devices for castrating any urge to break away, just as highways and hospitals, railways and factories tended and still tend to increase the productivity of forced labour and total returns. This was and is the total achievement of the "civilizing mission" of the colonial and administering Powers. Their education and indoctrination is for slavery, not for freedom; they exploit the resources and wealth of other people for themselves, not for the peoples who produce them in labour, sweat and poverty.

98. In this respect, Cuba the Spanish colony, and Cuba the American colony, nurses bitter experience in plenty. But it has always been able to keep the social root of the crime and the historical background of the oppression separate from the people in whose name and on whose behalf they were committed. Thus, when it took its stand against the colonial domination of Spain, it stated clearly that the war was against Spanish domination and not against the Spanish people, just as it has established, with equal clarity, that its struggle for emancipation from the colonial domination of the United States is directed against the instigators, beneficiaries and agents, and not against the American people, despite the fact that their wealth, power and standard of living are in large measure based on colonialist and imperialistic exploitation. In the last analysis, the people do not share the responsibilities contracted by their governing castes towards the inexorable justice of history. This principle affords ample ground for fruitful co-operation in the future between the former colonial peoples and the former colonialist peoples on the basis of mutual respect, mutual benefit and absolute equality. The day will come when both, prompted by identity of interests, needs, values and aspirations in a world in which the free development of each is the condition for the free development of all, will consider colonialism, imperialism and thermo-nuclear war as the most abhorrent and primitive form of life in the days before the advent of human coexistence.

99. I must stress this point. The peoples who have been subjugated and exploited in the name of civilization were just as civilized in the sociological meaning of the word as their self-appointed tutors—and in some important aspects, far more so. Some were the repositories of ancient and lofty cultures, like China and India. When the ancestors of the English were still climbing trees—as Julius Caesar records in his Commentaries—the Chinese were already living in cities, were politically organized in an empire, had discovered gunpowder and could print the writings of their philosophers, poets and statesmen. Yet that same China, which set standards for the world and today, rejuvenated, is waging a bitter struggle for self-determination, independence and unity, is denied its rightful place in this Assembly through the pressure of the colonial Powers which in former times usurped its wealth.

100. In India, religion and culture had reached remarkable levels centuries before Socrates brought his penetrating wisdom to the market-places of Athens and before Jesus and his disciples, in persecution and poverty, had founded Christianity. Ceylon, Indonesia and Burma, like many other Asian nations, have an eminent position in the history of human culture. Egypt, the age-old cradle of a complex and mature civilization, made a decisive contribution, through the Minoan civilization, to the advent of that ever-glorious triumph of the human spirit, the "Greek miracle". The Arabs, who created a unique civilization and preserved the wisdom of Greece and Rome, revived and enriched with priceless contributions the apathetic and turbid currents of Western thought. Its imprint on Spanish culture and on the Renaissance still sheds a brilliant light. Preserved in the sub-soil of the plains of Black Africa there are vestiges of ancient and highly-developed cultures which have been mysteriously lost or have disappeared; and that continent may well boast of its vivid folklore, its rich patrimony of art forms, its priceless contribution to the universal culture, and above all, its burning passion for liberty, which is the highest possible form of cultural expression when slavery is the mode of life. Cuba, though geographically located in the Western hemisphere and a Spanish-speaking country, prides itself on the African sap which strengthens and colours its folklore, its art, its culture, its religion and its national development.

101. The international landmarks of the "civilizing mission" of colonialism and imperialism—the same process of economic exploitation and political domination carried one stage further—are called by sadly familiar names: Overseas provinces, Holy Alliance, Monroe doctrine, Manifest destiny, Platt Amendment, Spheres of influence, Reciprocal agreements, Open-door policy, Dollar diplomacy, War debts, Protectorates, Quota system, Tariff privileges, Mandates, Private investments, Associated free State, Dumping, Guantánamo Naval base, Trusts, North Atlantic Treaty Organization, South-East Asia Treaty Organization, Central Intelligence Agency. These landmarks have been a source of friction, violence, rapine, and wars between imperialists. They are at present the major obstacles to the independent development of the emancipated peoples, the launching-platforms for neo-colonialism and the worst enemies of international peace and security. A good proof of this is the policy of harassment, intrigue, compulsion, threats, subversion and aggression waged by the U.S. Department of State, the Pentagon and the American monopolies with the crude aim of breaking the Cuban people by force and making them surrender through hunger. And if this is not proof enough, you have only to look at the Congo which was for a time a former Belgian colony and is today the coveted prey fought over by those in temporary alliance—its former colonizers and neo-colonialism whose main driving force is American imperialism.

102. The plot against the self-determination, independence and sovereignty of the Congo, to which this Organization is unfortunately no stranger, is an unequivocal sign of colonialism's stubbornness in continuing by other means the economic exploitation and political domination of the territories and peoples which have apparently been freed. Colonialism is moribund; but even so, like Proteus, it can assume new forms and overtly or covertly reconquer its privileges and reimpose its exactions. Before our very eyes, the neocolonialists and imperialists have destroyed the constitutional structure of the Congo, deposed Lumumba, conferred autocratic powers on Mobutu, recognized the secession of Tshombe and given its full support to Kasa-Vubu after the latter had capitulated to their evil designs. Neocolonialism and imperialism have again planted the boot on the Congo. At this moment, the Congo is the victim of intervention. The self-determination, independence, sovereignty, unity, security and peace of Africa are in danger; and international peace and security is also in danger. The arrest, derision and abuse of Lumumba by Mobutu's Praetorian guard and his probable execution at the bidding of neocolonialism and imperialism constitute a flagrant attack on the right of peoples and a portent of tragic times to come. The life of Lumumba, the rightful Prime Minister of the Congo and the indomitable leader of the Congolese people, hangs by a thread and the responsibility for saving it rests upon the United Nations. The Revolutionary Government of Cuba has given me express instructions to press for rapid, energetic and effective action before it is too late.

103. Some representatives have deplored the scant attention that has been paid in this debate to the vestiges and methods of colonialism in Latin America; but I have been surprised to see that in their indictments the majority have merely asked for the abolition of the European colonies and have omitted mention of the colonial dependencies of the United States and its colonialist policy in our hemisphere. They have also forgotten the Panama Canal, the Guantánamo Naval Base and the Swan Islands. I should like to give this subject the urgent attention it deserves.

Mr. Boland (Ireland) resumed the Chair.

104. The PRESIDENT: I am sorry to interrupt the Foreign Minister of Cuba, but a point of order has been raised from the floor. I call upon the representative of Honduras, on a point of order.

105. Mr. MILLA BERMUDEZ (Honduras) (translated from Spanish): I protest at the implication that the Islas del Cisne, or Swan Islands, are a United States colony. The fact of the matter is that these islands are Honduran territory. They have been illegally and arbitrarily occupied by the United States, but I will never tolerate their being described as a United States colony.

106. The PRESIDENT: I would ask Members of the Assembly, when they ask for the floor on a point of order, to do so only when the point they have to raise is one of order. Other points may be dealt with by way of the right of reply; but the right to intervene on a point of order exists only where there is a point of order involved.

107. I ask the Foreign Minister of Cuba to be good enough to resume.

108. Mr. ROA (Cuba) (translated from Spanish): I should like to point out to the representative of Honduras that I fully share his point of view. As far as we are concerned, the Swan Islands belong to Honduras, but they are occupied arbitrarily by the United States, which considers them as a colony, and that is a different matter.

109. To define the United States as an imperialist power is tautology indeed, since in this case what is defined constitutes the definition. The history of the United States is, for the most part, the history of its territorial expansion at the expense of Spain and Latin America and of its exploitation of the natural resources of peoples living between the Rio Grande and Patagonia. This ambitious design of expansion and supremacy was conceived in the very earliest days of the independence of the thirteen colonies. Jefferson, Madison and John Quincy Adams were its first prophets and exponents. From Adams came the theory of the ripe fruit—according to the law of political gravity, Cuba must inevitably fall into the lap of the Union; and likewise from Adams, who imitated the Englishman Canning while thwarting his cunning, came the Monroe doctrine, which may be summed up in the motto: "Rest of the world, hands off America; free hand for the United States." This unilateral doctrine, ostensibly directed against hypothetical reconquests by the Holy Alliance, and in fact applied to prevent Cuba from liberating itself from Spain if it was not acquired or annexed by the United States, converted the whole of Latin America, without its consent and to the detriment of its unity, development and emancipation, into a sphere of North American influence, thanks to the use, as a political weapon with an obvious purpose, of dollar diplomacy, hemispheric isolation, and international intimidation. Under the protection of this colonialist doctrine and its imperialist corollaries the Government of the United States, with the close co-operation of Latin-American dictators and oligarchies, opened up the way for its merchants, bankers and corporations in their economic exploitation of our under-developed, unarmed and disunited peoples.

110. Among these corollaries may be mentioned in connexion with Cuba the Platt Amendment, the Treaty defining the relations between the United States and Cuba, the compulsory lease of the Guantánamo Naval Base, treaties of reciprocal aid, the sugar agreement, public service monopolies and mining concessions; and in connexion with Latin America the occupation of Puerto Rico, the control of the Panama Canal zone and the exploitation of natural resources, the control of markets, leonine loans and investments of the colonial type, throughout Latin America.

111. So far as Cuba is concerned, Prime Minister Fidel Castro made a very acute and shrewd analysis of the devastating consequences of the political domination and economic exploitation of the country by the United States up to the time of the triumph of our Revolution, and there is nothing to add. I do propose, however, to make a few comments on the Guantánamo Naval Base. It is true that the territory on which the Base is situated was leased to the United States for the incredible sum of two thousand dollars a year, under article VIII of the Platt Amendment, the Treaty of Relations and the agreements signed in 1903. It is equally true, however, that no civil contract or international treaty is complete unless the parties thereto negotiate on an equal footing and are allowed free expression of their wishes. The Platt Amendment was a law approved by the United States Congress and imposed on the Cuban Constituent Convention in a territory under military occupation. The lease first granted under article VIII of that Amendment is therefore null and void under international law. The Naval Base, the outcome of the most outrageous chicanery, undermines the territorial integrity of the Cuban State and constitutes a threat to the security of the island, placing it at the mercy of the warlike adventures and disputes of the United States. Furthermore, it is today a focus of conspiracy, provocation and subversion against the Government and people of Cuba.

112. It should not surprise us that the United States Government considers as its own property a territory which it usurped fraudulently and which therefore does not belong to it. Imperialist countries think that wherever they set foot the soil belongs to them. They believe, too, that they can utilize the air space of other nations as though it were their own preserve without exposing the inhabitants of their own country to the danger and destruction that might result from the explosion of their erratic missiles over the territory of others, as has just happened in the eastern region of Cuba. Nor is it surprising that President Eisenhower finally threw off the mask before world public opinion, and from the "bag of stinging adders" kept by the United States Government to combat democracy, anti-colonialism and socialism produced $1 million to subsidize the subversive activities of Cuban war criminals and counter-revolutionaries, in defiance and disregard of the United Nations Charter and of international juridical order in the Americas.

113. The Revolutionary Government of Cuba solemnly repeats to the United Nations General Assembly that it has not intended and does not intend to reclaim by force that part of its national territory occupied by the Guantánamo Naval Base. It also repeats, however, with equal solemnity that it intends to ask for the return of the Base, when it deems the time appropriate, under the rules of international law. Consequently and for the time being it considers that claim to be covered by the declaration proposed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics [A/4502] and by the draft resolution submitted by a number of African-Asian countries (A/L.323 and Add.1-5).

114. For four centuries Puerto Rico was under the Spanish yoke. For more than half a century it has been under United States domination. Puerto Rico, the smallest island of the Greater Antilles, a stable country with a cultural tradition, a history, a seasoned personality and a national consciousness all its own, has not yet been able to take its place among the American States. Endowed with all the attributes of a nation, the people whom José Martí helped to gain their freedom together with ours are the only American people of Spanish origin who, in spite of their unshakable will for independence, have never been free. That is there drama, a drama shared by all nations of our America and particularly by those who live in the area of the Antilles. The catastrophic fall of José Martí and the intervention of the United States in the Spanish-Cuban War, when the liberators of my country were already at the gates of the capital of the colony and the Spanish army was practically routed, changed the destiny of Cuba and Puerto Rico. On 25 July 1898 the vanguard of the occupation army landed at Guánica. General Nelson A. Miles, Commander-in-Chief of the expeditionary forces, declared emphatically that the people of the United States had come to Puerto Rico in the name of humanity and justice, bearing the banner of freedom and inspired by a noble purpose. And the joint resolution of the United States Congress proclaimed that the people of Cuba were and had the right to be free and independent. In spite of that emphatic statement and the solemn undertaking of the joint resolution, Cuba was taken over temporarily and the Platt Amendment was imposed. And Puerto Rico was handed over as the spoils of war to the United States Government and subjected to an absolutist régime which was to convert it into a military outpost and an area of dispute.

115. The mask of the "civilizing mission" was of course intended to cover up the real aim of nascent United States imperialism. The Puerto Ricans, as in earlier times the Indians, the Chinese, the Egyptians, the Arabs, the Sudanese, the Nigerians, the Ghanaians, the Burmese, the Ceylonese, the Indonesians, the Guineans and the Congolese, were not yet ready for self-government and the exercise of their sovereignty. They needed a prolonged paternalistic education, to forget their past, to deny their culture, to debase their language and to accept joyfully as a promise of future bliss, the self-righteous trusteeship of their generous redeemers. Beveridge said as much when he stated that the United States war against Spain was the great purpose of God manifested in the instincts of the Anglo-Saxon race; its immediate phase represented personal gain, but the final end was the christianization of humanity. It had to be so, since they were dealing with a "racially inferior" people, of different culture, providing cheap labour and able to produce sugar plentifully at low cost. To be a colony of plantations and the black market of imperialism was the manifest destiny of Puerto Rico. It became apparent that the Puerto Rican people had simply changed masters; and the new master was still more hateful than the old because he brought enslavement in the name of freedom. As was only natural, from bewilderment they passed abruptly to perplexity, from perplexity to confusion, from confusion to scepticism, from scepticism to desperation, from desperation to rebellion and then from rebellion to the organization of the independence movement already consecrated with the blood of heroes and martyrs.

116. Seventy-two years after the United States Government undertook, in article IX of the Peace Treaty between Spain and the United States, signed in Paris on 10 December 1898, to settle the problem of its sovereignty, Puerto Rico, a freely associated State on paper, is still a dependent territory, placed outside the jurisdiction of the United Nations by a clever stratagem. In 1953 the United States Government sent a note [A/AC.35/L.121] to the Secretary-General informing him that from that date no further information on the dependent territory of Puerto Rico would be transmitted since it had ceased to be a dependent territory by virtue of provisions in the constitution of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico approved by the United States Congress. When the matter was brought before it the Fourth Committee decided by 22 votes to 18, with 19 abstentions to refer it to the General Assembly.^{5/} When the item was before the General Assembly the United States representative made an official declaration^{6/} guaranteeing that if at any time the Legislative Assembly of Puerto Rico adopted a resolution in favour of independence the Executive would immediately thereafter recommend to Congress that such independence be granted. The General Assembly was favourably impressed by that declaration and agreed [resolution 748 (VIII)] to relieve the United States of the obligation to submit annual information in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter. The undertaking was violated, in connivance with the United States Government, by the Legislative Assembly of Puerto Rico and, against the sovereign will of its people, the smallest of the Great Antilles is today a dependent territory.

117. Like every colonial nation, the people of Puerto Rico have no power to speak for themselves in international bodies. Those who speak officially on their behalf do not and cannot represent them. The Cuban delegation, in renewal of the pact of José Martí, interprets the voice and spirit of Puerto Rico and requests the General Assembly in its name and on its behalf to uphold the just claim and right of Puerto Rico to be a constituent nation by granting it absolute self-determination, independence and sovereignty.

118. At this critical juncture in the history of the United Nations Cuba reaffirms emphatically its anti-colonialist position. My delegation will vote without reservations in favour of the memorable declaration submitted by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and will carefully study the draft resolution sponsored by a number of African-Asian countries, reserving its right to make at the appropriate time the serious comments which it deserves.

119. Interpreting the feeling of peoples and countries which desire but have not yet been able to secure freedom, and especially the spirit of the intrepid, selfless and invincible warriors of Algeria, brothers in courage and ideals of the Cuban guerrillas of the Sierra Maestra, my delegation proposes that we do not abandon this debate until we have broken the last links in the chain of colonialism.

120. Mr. JAWAD (Iraq): This is indeed a historic and momentous occasion. At long last, the General Assembly has been given the opportunity to consider and to pronounce its opinion clearly and unequivocally on the most important issue of our time: that of freedom from colonial rule and domination. The present debate on colonialism is, therefore, one of the most historic and far-reaching ever held by this General Assembly or any other international body. We are most grateful, therefore, for the initiative of the Soviet Union in bringing this urgent and important problem to the attention of the United Nations at a moment when the future of civilization is in danger and when colonialism still keeps in bondage many millions of people all over the world. The draft declaration presented by the Soviet Union [A/4502] represents a true appraisal of world feeling towards colonialism and its adoption would provide the world with a basis for positive action in dealing with the problem.

121. The fight against colonialism has become one of the most decisive factors shaping the present age. The peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America, after centuries of alien domination, have reached a highly advanced stage in their heroic struggle against foreign rule and exploitation. Motivated by their strong desire to live freely, they have followed the example of many peoples in America, and in Europe itself who, during the last two centuries, were able to throw off the shackles of foreign domination. The movements of national liberation have spread all over Asia, Africa and the Middle East, and the struggle against imperialism in its various forms has become a major factor in the development of these countries and the establishment of their national and international status.

122. The struggle for freedom is as old as civilization itself; in fact, it has always been the propelling force for the progress and development of human society. Ever since human society was organized, man has been endeavouring to achieve higher levels of liberty and justice in order to free himself from the despotism of his fellow men and gain control over social and natural forces.

123. Man has experienced many types of despotism, but one of the worst and most shameful was that produced under the colonial system in its modern form, involving the alien subjugation and oppression of nations, the exploitation of their human and material resources for the benefit of others, and the denial of their right to lead a free and decent life.

124. With the extension of European domination over large areas of Asia and Africa, another evil was added to the many evils of colonialism: the evil of racial discrimination which is still practised on a large scale toward some of the people of Africa. It is hardly necessary to cite in detail the evils of the colonial system and the immeasurable suffering and hardship it has inflicted upon the people who have fallen under its domination. Neither is it necessary to explain the way in which the colonial system has restricted the development of the people colonized. These evils are well known, although they are too many to enumerate. I must mention, however, some of the examples that we in the Arab world have experienced.

125. I do not think that I exaggerate when I say that few nations in the world have suffered as much as the Arab nation under colonial rule. Our first experience of European imperialism in modern times was the French conquest of Algeria in 1830. This was followed by the French occupation of Tunisia in 1881, the British occupation of Egypt in 1882 and the Sudan in 1898; the Italian conquest of Libya in 1911 and the French occupation of Morocco in 1912. Then came the turn of Syria, Lebanon, Palestine, Jordan and Iraq, which fell under French and British rule during and after the First World War. If we add the gradual extension of British influence and rule in large parts of Southern and South-Eastern Arabia, we will have the complete colonial picture in the Arab world. With a few exceptions, almost the entire Arab homeland was thus occupied by foreign invaders during the nineteenth and the early part of the twentieth century. This imposed upon our people the duty to wage a relentless struggle to achieve their freedom and independence. It took Egypt more than seventy years to liberate itself from British occupation, only to be subjected shortly thereafter to invasion and war by certain colonial Powers in an effort to reimpose once again their colonial domination. Libya's struggle against the Italian invaders took over thirty years, marked by recurrent rebellions and severe repressions. Only recently Morocco and Tunisia were able to achieve their freedom and independence, at the cost of considerable suffering and sacrifice.

126. In our area of the Middle East, foreign European rule was perpetuated for a long time under the guise of the Mandates System, imposed on unwilling peoples by the colonial Powers after their countries had been conquered during the First World War. The people of Iraq, Syria, Lebanon, Palestine and Jordan never accepted the Mandates and waged a relentless struggle against this new form of colonialism. In Iraq, the Mandate which was officially terminated in 1932 was replaced by a new relationship which retained for the former Mandatory Power great influence in the affairs of the country. It took another twenty-six years and our great July Revolution of 1958 for the people of Iraq to rid the country finally of the last vestiges of foreign domination and influence.

127. Our experience of the Mandate—bitter as it was—cannot be compared with the tragedy which befell the people of Palestine. They were the victims of the worst type of colonialism, a type which has no parallel in the annals of modern history. The ostensible objective of the Mandate was to help the peoples liberated from the rule of the vanquished Powers after the First World War, to stand by themselves. Theoretically, the principle underlying the whole Mandates System was that the interests and well-being of the people themselves was a sacred trust of the world community. How was this sacred trust carried out in the case of the people of Palestine? The interests of the Arabs, who constituted over 90 per cent of the population of the country at the beginning of the Mandate in 1920, were subordinated to the interests of the Mandatory Power and, under its protection, to the Zionist immigrant invaders. In no other colony or Mandated Territory were the interests of a whole nation so systematically ignored and disregarded. Nowhere were the legitimate aspirations of a whole people so ruthlessly suppressed and their basic rights so flagrantly violated. The sacred trust became a nightmare of treachery, oppression and deceit. A whole country was taken away from its people and given to the foreigners with the encouragement and connivance of the Mandatory Power. When Great Britain finally gave up her Mandate and relinquished her sacred trust, she left behind her in Palestine the shambles of a once proud nation, now destitute refugees living on the charity of the world community.

128. If we survey the Arab world today, we see that, besides Palestine, there are still areas where imperialism is waging a stubborn fight to stem the tide of national liberation. France has, for the last six years, been waging a war of murder and devastation against the Algerian people in order to keep them in bondage and slavery, and to prevent them from joining the community of free and independent nations. In this way, France is trying to deny other nations the rights and liberties which every Frenchman enjoys. We are confident that France is trying in vain, for the bitter and heroic struggle of the Algerian people will ultimately triumph. In Oman and Southern Arabia, also, the struggle against foreign rule and domination continues unabated. While this General Assembly is expressing itself most forcefully against the colonial system and in support of a people's right to live in freedom and peace, the armed forces of Great Britain are carrying out repressive operations in Oman, Southern Arabia and the colony of Aden.

129. It can be seen from what I have just said that the Arab people have known colonialism in its worst forms and manifestations. They have experienced at first hand its oppression and treachery and have suffered from it physically, materially and spiritually as few others have. This is one of the reasons why we have such a deep sympathy and understanding for the struggle of other nations for freedom and independence and will continue to support the aspirations of the peoples of the remaining colonies in Africa and elsewhere.

130. Our experience of colonialism has been extensive. We have seen economic exploitation and the plundering of our wealth and resources by the colonialists. We have had the bitter experience of the suppression of our liberties by force and we have known the methods by which a nation can be kept at a low level of cultural and political development. These facts do not perhaps require great emphasis, but one thing really should be recalled here, that is the use of colonial people in the process of suppressing the movement towards liberation of other people under colonial rule. The sad story of the Indian soldiers who fell in the valleys of Mesopotamia during the First World War, or the Moroccans who lost their lives on European battlefields, or the other millions of colonial peoples who were driven to fight neither under their own banner nor for their own national cause but to defend the colonialists' interests and to suppress the rights and liberties of oppressed peoples will ever figure in the tragic annals of history. This shameful employment of the colonial peoples as cannon-fodder should remind us of the value set by the colonialists on the human lives of those whom they dominated.

131. Because of our tragic experience of colonialism, and in view of our belief in the right of all nations to live freely and in peace, we have taken a strong stand on all colonial questions in the United Nations. In the Fourth Committee, where these questions have been discussed, Iraq has spared no effort to serve the cause of freedom in Africa and elsewhere. We have tried and succeeded in breathing life into the Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories contained in Chapter XI of the Charter. Through our collective efforts we have been able to make the United Nations play a significant and beneficent role in the progress of a number of dependent Territories towards freedom and independence, and thus assisted in bringing to fruition one of the most important principles of the Charter.

132. As to the draft declaration [A/L.323 and Add.1-5] which my delegation has the honour to co-sponsor, together with a number of Asian and African States, we present it to the Assembly in the hope that it will become a universal declaration like the one on human rights—a landmark and a great milestone in the work of this Organization. This is a charter of freedom for the dependent and oppressed peoples of the world submitted by countries many of which have emerged from colonialism in the very recent past.

133. In this draft declaration we recall some of the basic principles and ideals of the Charter and we emphasize the dangers to international peace and security resulting from conflicts arising out of the denial of freedom to dependent peoples. The declaration proclaims certain facts and principles which are self-evident—that colonialism prevents the development of international economic co-operation and impedes the social, cultural and economic development of dependent peoples; that alien subjugation and exploitation constitute a denial of fundamental human rights and are contrary to the Charter of the United Nations, and that all peoples have the right to self-determination. The declaration categorically rejects the arguments that the colonialists have consistently advanced to justify the perpetuation of their domination over dependent countries, one argument being that the peoples of the colonies are not prepared to rule themselves, that they lack political maturity, and that economically, socially and educationally they are not sufficiently developed to be fully independent. The fallacy of this argument is evident and has been discredited even by some of the colonial Powers themselves, which today admit that political independence and emancipation should not be delayed on account of the inadequacy of political, economic and social preparedness. The world has come to recognize, too, that freedom and independence provide a very powerful stimulus for accelerating the pace of advance in all fields of human activity. It is hardly necessary to cite the examples of so many countries, including my own, which have been able to advance at a much more rapid pace after achieving their full liberation from foreign rule.

134. One of the most important articles in this declaration is the one which deals with the need for stopping all armed action and repressive measures directed against dependent peoples struggling to achieve their just aspirations for freedom and dignity. Examples of such armed action and aggression are too well known to make it necessary for me to elaborate on this theme; but it is essential that nations should not be compelled to pay the heavy price of partitioning their own homeland in order to achieve independence. We have already seen many examples of this and it is a danger which the United Nations must always guard against. It is therefore imperative that the declaration should contain a paragraph condemning the partial or total disruption of the national unity and territorial integrity of countries.

135. Paragraph 5 of the draft declaration is of special significance. It asks that immediate steps be taken in all territories which have not yet obtained their independence to arrange the unconditional transfer of all powers to the peoples of those territories in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire. This is a call to all those Powers that presently administer dependent territories to take immediate action with a view to enabling the peoples of those territories to achieve their independence without delay.

136. By adopting this declaration unanimously, the General Assembly would be fulfilling one of the greatest purposes of the Charter and would cause a fundamental change in the present dangerous trends of development in the power relations between States and in the balance of risks which have so far dominated human relationships. The final liquidation of the colonial system is bound to usher in a new era in the history of human society, an era in which relationships between nations will evolve according to principles of justice and equity, aiming at the elimination of violence and the use of force. Above all, it will reduce international tension and pave the way for a better understanding between the advanced and the under-developed countries.

137. It is the highest duty of the United Nations to assist in the emergence of this new community of nations by helping forward the emancipation of those nations which were—and still are—under colonial rule, thus responding to the exigencies of the present era in history. In the words of Mr. Khrushchev:

"Ours is an era of swift renewal of society; an era in which more progressive and equitable ways of life are being affirmed; an era in which man is soaring upwards to unprecedented mastery over forces of nature. The time has come for the complete and final liberation of peoples languishing in colonial bondage." [A/4502]

The United Nations cannot remain indifferent to the way certain colonial Powers are trampling on the rights of peoples and keeping them in subjugation by the most brutal methods. It cannot close its eyes to the way in which these colonial Powers are plundering the wealth of other nations, thus keeping them in great poverty and backwardness. The immediate elimination of colonialism will no doubt be in the interests of all nations. Recent experience has shown most clearly how much emancipated nations are able to contribute to world progress and prosperity. The liberation of the colonial countries has created many new conditions favouring their normal economic, political and cultural development and contributed to an appreciable rise in the standard of living everywhere.

138. Only free people can join in building up the new world order envisaged in the United Nations Charter, and the colonial system is a denial of freedom and therefore contrary to the principles of that Charter and to the spirit and rising forces of our modern age.

139. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Panama who wishes to exercise his right of reply.

140. Mr. ILLUECA (Panama) (translated from Spanish): A few moments ago the Foreign Minister of Cuba made a reference to the Panama Canal Zone which my delegation cannot allow to go unanswered.

141. The Panama Canal Zone, a small strip of land some ten miles wide and barely fifty miles long, is an integral part of the territory of the Republic of Panama, which exercises its sovereignty and has sovereign rights over that territory. Those rights have been recognized by the United States Government, by the President of the United States, and the flag of Panama flies over the Canal Zone.

142. I deeply deplore the fact that the Foreign Minister of Cuba should have made a reference of this kind at a time when a representative of the Republic of Panama was present in this Assembly. Just as the Cuban Foreign Minister affirmed here that his country is free and is not under the trusteeship of the United States or of the Soviet Union, so the Republic of Panama is also a free, honourable and sovereign State with its representative in the world Organization, and the Panamanian people does not wish any more than his to be under the trusteeship of any Power great or small, and obviously not under the trusteeship of Cuba either.

143. I would therefore beg the Foreign Minister of Cuba, the next time he speaks on any matter of an international nature in this Assembly, to be good enough to respect the legitimate rights of other representatives constituting this august body.

144. My delegation reserves the right to speak again on this matter if circumstances so require.

The meeting rose at 6.15 p.m.

AGENDA ITEM 87

Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples (continued)

Mr. Illueca (Panama), Vice-President, took the Chair.

1. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): Continuing the debate on the agenda item, I give the floor to the representative of the United States of America in exercise of his right of reply.

2. Mr. PAYNE (United States of America): It is not surprising to us that in his statement the representative of Cuba saw fit to refer to the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and I cannot really say that we are disappointed—because the remarks of the representative of Cuba make it possible for us to talk on a subject which is a considerable source of pride to the United States. I must say, however, that references to Puerto Rico by the representative of Cuba, while not intended to make our proceedings more orderly, may in fact result in a positive contribution to our discussions, positive because facts—and I repeat, facts—will be brought to light.

3. Since Puerto Rico was last mentioned in our general debate—that was in September—an election has been held in Puerto Rico, and the results of that election, to which Mr. Wadsworth referred in his statement this afternoon [937th meeting], speak more eloquently than I could hope to do. With these results in mind, one could wonder for what purpose this subject was raised in this debate. Surely it must strike many here as ironic that a Commonwealth where true democracy exists should be attacked by the Foreign Minister of a country whose people have not been allowed freely to express their wishes through democratic processes.

4. By its resolution 748 (VIII) of 27 November 1953 the General Assembly recognized that the people of Puerto Rico expressed their will in a free and democratic way, that they effectively exercised their right to self-determination, and that Puerto Rico clearly was an autonomous political entity. Operative paragraph 9 of this resolution had this to say:

"Expresses its assurance that, in accordance with the spirit of the present resolution, the ideals embodied in the Charter of the United Nations, the traditions of the people of the United States of America and the political advancement attained by the people of Puerto Rico, due regard will be paid to the will of both the Puerto Rican and American peoples in the conduct of their relations under their present legal statute, and also in the eventuality that either of the parties to the mutually agreed association may desire any change in the terms of this association".

5. The people of Puerto Rico and the people of the United States have lived up in every way to the expectations of the United Nations, a fact which is a source of pride to all Americans.

6. If any of you assembled here have any doubts concerning the present status of Puerto Rico, I would suggest that you read the full text of the message from the Honourable Luis Muñoz Marín, Governor of the Commonwealth, which was circulated as a United Nations document. I should like to quote a part of it [A/4519]:

"The people of Puerto Rico strongly adhere to the democratic way of life, based on the respect of minority rights, the protection and furtherance of individual freedoms, and the effective exercise of the right to vote in free, unhindered elections. There can be no genuine self-determination unless these conditions are met.

"Puerto Rico has truly and effectively met them and it has freely chosen its present relationship with the United States. The people of Puerto Rico are a self-governing people freely associated to the United States of America on the basis of mutual consent and respect. The policies regarding the cultural and economic development of Puerto Rico are in the hands of the people of Puerto Rico themselves for them to determine according to their best interests.

"The United Nations General Assembly, by resolution of November 1953, has solemnly recognized that the people of Puerto Rico effectively exercised their right to self-determination in establishing the Commonwealth as an autonomous political entity on a mutually agreed association with the United States. In further regard to the principle of self-determination, the Commonwealth Legislative Assembly has approved this very year a law authorizing another vote on Puerto Rico's status whenever 10 per cent of the electors request it".

7. That is what the Governor had to say. And what of his opposition? Only today, Mr. Wadsworth received this telegram:

"As gubernatorial candidate of the Statehood Republican Party of Puerto Rico advocating statehood for this island, which polled more than 250,000 or 32.4 per cent votes cast election last November which, when added to 58 per cent votes polled by the party in power, which also advocated permanent union between Puerto Rico and the United States, with common American citizenship representing more than 90 per cent our electorate, we consider it improper for small group of Independentist leaders whose party polled only 24,000 votes or less than 3 per cent of electorate, to go before United Nations to misrepresent the situation in Puerto Rico, which is a community of American citizens by its own free will. This is a reproachable attempt to interfere with the process of self-determination which has been freely exercised by the community of American citizens of Puerto Rico.

(Signed) Luis A. Ferre

8. If, after hearing these communications, any representative in the Assembly still has doubts about the wishes of the Puerto Rican people, I recommend that he go there to see for himself. He will be greeted with the traditional warmth and innate courtesy of the Puerto Rican people—American citizens all—and he will find Puerto Rico one of the most delightful islands on this globe, a place particularly well suited for relaxation after this rather arduous session of the Assembly is over.

9. Mr. PARISIS (Belgium) (translated from French): Belgium brought the colonial régime to an end of its own accord. The independence proclaimed at Leopoldville on 3 June 1960 was not the outcome of age-long struggle or the end of a régime of oppression. The transfer of power was complete and unreserved; there has never been any question of going back on it. The Belgians have no other colonies.

10. At the present time Belgium still exercises trusteeship over Ruanda-Urundi. It does so in virtue of a Trusteeship Agreement which succeeded a League of Nations mandate. Belgium, through its Government, stated on 9 September 1960 the wish that the trusteeship regime should end in the first six months of 1962. This was confirmed by the representative of Belgium in the Fourth Committee on 25 November 1960.^{1/}

11. With a little more discernment, a little more concern for truth, we shall have a clearer insight into the problems that confront us. I need only recall the wise words uttered by President Fulbert Youlou on 18 November:

"We know what colonialism, like any other human activity, has sometimes imposed on us in the way of humiliations and injustices, but we do not wish to deny the extent to which it has also enriched us, both materially and spiritually." [917th plenary meeting, para. 8.]

12. On the other hand, I am bound to note that the Soviet statement [A/4502] contains errors of the first magnitude. I have already disposed of the slanderous allegation that the population of the Congo was decimated in fifty years. I have shown that, on the contrary, the rate of increase of the Congolese people has quadrupled during the past twenty years. This same document even contains the audacious statement that when the independence of the Republic of the Congo was proclaimed "only a few of its inhabitants could read and write". Is it not realized, then, that in July 1960 there was a complete educational system, comprising teacher training, technical, secondary and primary schools, attended by nearly 2 million children, or one-sixth of the total population of the Congo? This figure represented 57 per cent of the school-age population. Fifty-seven per cent! This figure must be compared with that for African countries which have been independent for a long time, and where school attendance varies between 5 and 25 per cent of the school-age population. Mr. Khrushchev does not mention the existence of two Congolese universities, which were established, respectively, in 1954 at Leopoldville, and at Elisabethville in 1956, and where racial discrimination is unknown.

13. Perhaps he does not know that the only nuclear reactor in Africa is in operation at the University of Lovanium, twenty kilometres from Leopoldville.

14. In the same document Mr. Khrushchev says of Africa that "... its main agricultural implements, just as they were thousands of years ago, are the mattock, the wooden plough and the sharpened stake; its primitive system of agriculture is causing soil exhaustion and erosion". Unfortunately he pulled out the wrong index card; the description he gives us applies to the situation fifty-two years ago, when the Belgian State set to work on African soil. Since then the Belgians have laid an economic and social infrastructure which has entailed the investment of $3,000 million over the past ten years. This represents a per capita investment rate of $148 a year, whereas in other independent African and Asian countries the rate of such investment does not exceed $30 a year.

15. Again, need I remind the Assembly of the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, which refers to the ten-year development plan^{2/} that has been carried out at a cost of 48,000 million francs—or about $1,000 million—entirely by the Belgians in the Congo? If we consider the countries of Africa that are in process of industrialization, we read in the same report that "... the Belgian Congo, with 152,758 employed in 1956, representing 4.86 per cent of the total economically active population, was well in the lead among African territories ..."^{3/}

16. Belgium has just brought about the accession of the Republic of the Congo to independence. Contrary to what has been said, that accession was prepared. Elections took place and were followed by the setting up of local institutions in 1957 and 1959. A parliamentary working group travelled all over the Congo in 1958. Two round-table conferences, one dealing with political questions and the other with economic and financial problems, were held at Brussels in January and May 1960 respectively. There Congolese leaders met with representatives of Belgium to work out terms for the accession to independence. The joint task was completed in 1960 by the holding of general elections. Such were the stages in setting up the institutions of the Republic of the Congo.

17. At the same time the Belgians made available to the new State, along with extensive aid, the services of its own qualified personnel: 10,000 teachers, magistrates and civil servants were placed under the exclusive authority of the Congolese Government.

18. It has been stated from this rostrum that Belgium showed liberalism in agreeing to proclaim the independence of the Congo; but it was added that Belgium had sabotaged that independence. Such an accusation is as absurd as it is unjust and groundless. Belgian policy is based essentially on the principle of respect for the sovereignty and independence of the Republic of the Congo, and on non-interference in its domestic affairs. The Belgians consider that those affairs should be handled exclusively by the Congolese.

19. If we re-read our history we find that a great many countries represented here have been in the course of their history, by turns, colonized and colonizing. Belgium itself had known many a foreign domination before, in this century, it was invaded twice in twenty-five years, from 1914 to 1918 and from 1940 to 1945. The misdeeds of colonialism are, alas! to be seen everywhere—throughout the past, and in all parts of the world. We cannot but condemn them wherever they appear, not excepting the USSR. The representative of the Soviet Union may have maintained at the Assembly's 925th meeting that internal affairs were involved. But colonial questions are, in principle, internal in character because they relate to Territories under the sovereignty of a State. That does not prevent the Soviet Union from mounting a solid attack on the countries which have, or have had, colonies. In meeting the representative of the Soviet Union on his own ground, I am merely exercising my right of reply. There cannot be two sets of standards....

20. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): I would ask the representative of Belgium kindly to leave the rostrum in order that the representative of the Soviet Union may raise a point of order.

21. Mr. ROSHCHIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (translated from Russian): Mr. President, we are here discussing the colonial question. This question is on the General Assembly's agenda and, accordingly, the references that the Belgian representative is making here to the Soviet Union and other countries and that have no bearing on this question, are not related in any way to the item we are discussing in this Assembly. I should be glad, therefore, if the President would call the representative of Belgium to order, since it is precisely the colonial question that we are considering.

22. The Belgian representative spoke here of the very great work that has been done in the Congo. We are ourselves witnessing just what is going on in the Congo today; it is just the situation which has now arisen in the Congolese Republic that the General Assembly is discussing, precisely through Belgium's fault. There is no direct connexion between the matter we are now discussing—colonialism—and the question touched upon here by the Belgian representative. I would accordingly ask the President to call the Belgian representative to order and to point out to him the need to adhere strictly to the questions we are now discussing.

23. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): The Chair wishes to be objective and, at the same time, to give all representatives ample opportunity to express the views of their Government. Nevertheless I should like to remind all representatives, as Mr. Boland has done on other occasions, that the General Assembly has decided to postpone its consideration of the question of the Congo. That being so, I would request all representatives, when speaking, to confine their remarks to the agenda item under discussion.

24. The representative of Belgium may again have the floor.

25. Mr. PARISIS (Belgium) (translated from French): In the course of these discussions, many attacks have been made on my country. We have never interrupted; we have exercised our right of reply when necessary, and we thought we could count on the President for protection.

26. I resume my statement where I left off. I regret that Mr. Roshchin found it necessary to interrupt me, for I was about to quote from a report of 12 January 1957 by Mr. Gorkin, Secretary of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet, and I do not imagine that the representative of the Soviet Union will impugn this authority. The quotation reads as follows:

"The Twentieth Congress of the Communist Party took cognizance of certain facts that are in flagrant violation of the fundamental principles of Leninist policy regarding nationalities in the Soviet State. These violations took the form of the unwarranted eviction of whole peoples and the imposition of restrictions on them in their new place of residence. Thus at the end of 1943 and at the beginning of 1944 the Balkars, Chechens, Kalmuks and Karachais were sent from the northern Caucasus to areas in Kazakhstan and Central Asia ...".

27. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): I would request the representative of Belgium to be good enough to leave the rostrum to allow the representative of the Soviet Union to raise a point of order.

28. Mr. ROSHCHIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (translated from Russian): I would like to point out to the President that in this instance he is not maintaining sufficient objectivity in the conduct of this plenary meeting.

29. The item under discussion is the colonial question. This is determined quite clearly by the agenda and the range of questions that we are considering. In order to distract the Assembly's attention from consideration of this item, the Belgian representative is trying to divert the Assembly into discussing matters that have no bearing on this item. If he were to attract closer attention by the General Assembly to colonial matters and, in particular, to the situation into which the Belgian administration has brought the Congo, that would, of course, be in the order of business and would perhaps be a contribution to our discussion of this item. Indeed, the situation in the colonies and, in particular perhaps, in the Belgian colonies is receiving great public attention throughout the world, in all countries. The colonial question has aroused great and profound interest in all continents of the globe. The discussion we have had here has shown that all delegations wish to speak on this urgent and important question of the day.

30. In order to diminish the tremendous effect that the discussion of this question is having in all circles throughout the world and on public opinion in all countries, the Belgian representative is now attempting to divert attention by referring to events which took place in various countries and which were due to certain historical circumstances, to the war, the extremely grievous war endured by all the peoples of the world, and particularly the peoples of the Soviet Union. In this way he seeks to divert attention from the matters which the General Assembly is now discussing and on which the attention of the whole world is focused, to matters which have no connexion whatsoever with our agenda.

31. I should be glad, if, in view of this circumstance, the President would call the Belgian representative to order, so that he should not take up any more of our time, since the matter is one of such extreme importance. There are many other questions we could discuss here in connexion with this circumstance. If there were need, we could now begin a detailed and thorough examination of the Belgian administration's activities in the Congo. But the situation in the Congo and the patently unlawful acts of the Belgian administration, the Belgian Government and the Belgian ruling circles in that country constitute a separate agenda item which we shall discuss at the meeting of the Security Council tomorrow morning and in the plenary General Assembly two days hence. I wish once again to draw the President's attention to the necessity of calling the Belgian representative to order.

32. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): I give the floor to the representative of Ceylon who has asked for it in order to raise a point of order.

33. Mr. PERERA (Ceylon): I am intervening to support the point of order raised by the representative of the Soviet Union. As a sponsor of the draft resolution.

34. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): I would ask the representative of Ceylon to bear in mind the fact that the point of order raised by the representative of the Soviet Union must be ruled upon by the President. Points of order are not open to debate. I would therefore ask him to allow the Chair to deal with the point of order raised by the representative of the Soviet Union. If the representative of Ceylon then desires to raise a new point of order I shall be glad to grant him the floor. I cannot, however, allow him to continue to speak now, since I have to rule on the point of order raised by the representative of the Soviet Union.

35. Mr. PERERA (Ceylon): I bow to your ruling, but I want to save you from making two rulings. It is on the same point. Maybe I can clarify it this way: as a sponsor of the draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6] on the ending of colonialism, I submit, Mr. President, that the representative of the Belgian Government has made submissions which are improper and irrelevant.

36. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): I wish to refer to the point of order raised by the representative of the Soviet Union.

37. I repeat that I wish to allow representatives who have the floor to state the position of their Government. In that connexion I invite representatives to exercise discretion, because I cannot stop a representative who is stating a position. The Chair wishes to point out that the representative of Belgium was quoting something and that the representative of the Soviet Union will have an opportunity in due course to exercise his right of reply. I repeat, however that the President cannot stop the representative of Belgium from speaking, since his rights are those guaranteed to every Member of this Assembly. I call upon the representative of Belgium to continue his statement.

38. Mr. PARISIS (Belgium) (translated from French): I have finished my quotation from the report of Mr. Gorkin, Secretary of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet. I have nothing to add to it and no comment to make on it; but I am amazed at Mr. Roshchin's touchiness, which is of a completely different order from our own patience.

39. Mr. Roshchin has said that colonialism has aroused the deepest interest on all continents. To go on from there, I shall observe with reference to the joint draft resolution, that the Belgian delegation cannot but declare itself in favour of the basic principle underlying that proposal. It is a principle which Belgium, for the reasons I have just stated, has recently applied to the full in the case of the Congo and whose implementation it is actively pursuing in the case of Ruanda-Urundi. However, my delegation is bound to note that the resolution contains several inaccuracies, including some of a legal nature.

40. Like the other delegations that have spoken here, we censure the misdeeds of colonialism and other forms of subjection. We believe that the essential co-operation among peoples must develop in an atmosphere of mutual respect and esteem; and whatever our detractors may say, the General Assembly can be sure that it was this honest conviction which led us to summon our Congolese brothers to independence.

41. Mr. LHEYET-GABOKA. (Congo [Brazzaville]) (translated from French): In addressing this Assembly, I cannot claim to produce any remedy, any support, or any palliative for the uneasiness left by the many statements which have been made here regarding the colonial system. Quite the contrary. The many speakers who have succeeded one another at this rostrum have already examined all the symptoms and diagnosed all the ills; one after another, they have put their finger on the open sore of colonialism in all its forms and in all its ambitions. Those speakers have laid bare the truth—a truth hot as heat itself, tasteless, bitter, and indigestible for those who joy in the conquest and submission of the weak; in colonies and their inexhaustible wealth; and in peoples deceived, perpetual children doomed to bondage.

42. My predecessors at this rostrum, then, have put their finger on the running sore of colonialism. Since we must burn colonialism to ashes; since we must corner it and face it with its own image; since we must lance the abscess in this Assembly; since we have the opportunity to speak freely and frankly, you gentlemen will not hold it against me if I, in my turn, clear a little ground on the path to freedom. That freedom is not a favour begged by long-subjected peoples from their alleged masters but an indefeasible, legitimate right; for all men are born free and equal, whatever their skin pigmentation, the level of their civilization, the size of their nation and the geographical position of their country.

43. No race here below, whether white, yellow or black, can claim a right of seniority over other races in order to impose its will on them. There are only good-natured people, who too often preen themselves on the enlightened nature of their civilization and pass on that account for the world's most intelligent; but intelligence does not follow the barometer. Birth in a cold country is not a title to everything there is, and birth in a hot country is not an atavism which debars one from everything, even from freedom.

44. Will you not agree with me that a bird shut up in a cage escapes, if it can, to fly in the air again? Will you not agree with me that a dog long pent in its kennel barks madly for release? If animals, with only instinct to guide them, can grasp and understand the need to be free and to live their own lives, how could man, the thinker, fail to share that imperative need?

45. Every child, in his youth, inexperience and lack of initiative, lives under the wing of his parents. When he grows up, he leaves his parents' home, goes out into the world and makes a home for himself far from those who reared him, because he feels free in his person and personality. Then should the colonized, ever submissive, have his freedom rationed by his colonizer? In the country of the blind, where the one-eyed man is king, does nothing begin and nothing end? Is colonialism to survive indefinitely in Africa, Asia and Oceania, to mention only three parts of the globe? Must slavery, imperialism, dogmatism and all their viruses continue to thrive in Africa, in Asia, and in Oceania? Must colonialism be upheld in order to avoid cold war, to disarm the nations and to pacify the whole world? I do not think so. Everything here below has a beginning and an end, and only the naïve expect to outlive their allotted span. Only the blind cannot see where the sun rises and where it sets.

46. Not long ago we were being poisoned with the sugared venom of colonization—colonization with its "Alice in Wonderland" marvels, its milkless breasts, and its keen-edged mandibles, which cut slowly but more surely than a lancet. Not long ago we watched what our masters did, and said not a word to them. Our masters took advantage of our silence to sate themselves on our natural wealth. They took advantage of it to plunder our villages, and in return—a fine return!—they taught us to go backwards instead of forwards and gave us tools, good or bad, without showing us how to use them.

47. But we have outgrown the stage of servitude, we are no longer credulous children who can be made to believe in Santa Claus forever. Those days are over, and colonialism has been outstripped at every point. Africa, Asia and Oceania are no longer an "open sesame" for men who, through their own rudeness, their own discourteous and humiliating ways, have bred embittered minds, peaceful revolutionaries who seek only the liberation of their country and people from the yoke of colonial occupation.

48. Yesterday we were told, uphill and down dale and in emphatic terms, about a wet-nurse by the name of colonization. Today that wet-nurse has been dressed up and is called "decolonization". It is a fine thing, this dressing-up, this neologism that is the outcome of several distressing and regrettable events. What did they mean yesterday by "colonizing"? What do they mean by "decolonizing" today? The answer to that question lies ready in the minds of yesterday's colonizers and today's decolonizers.

49. I have no wish to labour the point but it will be well to remind our princelings that colonizing, to them, meant "divide and rule"; it meant breaking up the conquered lands and sharing them out like game, so as to make fat profits from them at the expense of other men, who are yet their equals in the redness of their blood and the invisibility of their souls. Colonizing meant entrenching themselves in countries which did not belong to them, in order to corner their wealth and to oppress their peoples, to the length of reducing them to their lowest terms—to utter non-existence.

50. Well, they have at last come round to the idea of decolonizing; and in my humble opinion as a Negro, and thus as one of yesterday's subject people, decolonizing means admitting their past errors, making confession after plundering and playing the master, after paralysing and immobilizing the evolution of the beasts of burden. Decolonizing means lifting off Africa, Asia and Oceania the heavy and massive carapace of colonialism. Decolonizing means restoring freedom to peoples who were born free but who, out of sheer presumption, were long condemned to ignorance and bondage. That is the part of greatness and sincerity.

51. At a time when the United Nations is taking up the question of colonialism we must be mindful of the existence, spread across the world, of colonized peoples, subjugated peoples, who are looking to us. These peoples, whether African or European, expect of the United Nations positive action to deliver them for all time from the yoke of colonialism, the system that disgraces the twentieth century, in which nuclear weapons seem a superhuman discovery. My meaning is that our century is the one in which mankind has reached perfection; also that the time has come when the colonizers must realize that our cries of protest are justified; for in this century, in which man has mastered science and rivals the Creator in inventiveness, freedom for the former colonies must not be the cause of bloodshed and mourning.

52. Convinced that decolonization will fling wide the gates to independence for the colonial countries and peoples, the delegation of the Republic of the Congo takes this opportunity to express once again its gratitude to France and to General de Gaulle, President of France, who was quick to realize that to keep the peoples subject to an outdated system in this century was contrary to the principle that every people should enjoy self-determination.

53. My delegation wishes also to congratulate all those African and Asian States which worked at Bandung in 1955 and denounced colonialism in all its forms. The Congolese people are grateful to all those who have helped and are helping to condemn the colonialist system. The Congolese people are proud that they are now free to join the ranks of the fighters for the freedom of all peoples. Not long ago my country was a French colony. Eminent speakers from this rostrum have vigorously and eloquently branded every aspect of colonialism. As an African, and as a Congolese, I am too well acquainted with the horrors of the colonized not to associate myself with all who, for love of freedom, are waging a bitter struggle to end the colonialist system once and for all.

54. The political developments which, happily, have lately been gathering speed, enabling many African States to attain independence, gave rise in 1960 to acts made more memorable by the fact that that year will be remembered as the year in which Africa's history started anew. It should be recognized that a great step has already been taken towards the freedom of the colonized countries and peoples; even more, however, it should be stressed that, for the future, decolonization must be effected without disguise and without hypocrisy. For we have also to wage a determined war on racial segregation and to bury it for all time.

55. There is a country—Cabinda—which knows no freedom. Though the sun is said to shine for everyone, the people of Cabinda still vegetate under colonialist rule. Its foreign occupiers seek to dazzle the world by representing it as part of a Portuguese province, whereas there is in reality a considerable margin between colonizers and colonized in that country. I do not wish to go into details, but merely to draw the attention of the United Nations to a situation which is certain to cost us more bloodshed and mourning in Africa. From 1946 to 1958, according to a provision of the French Constitution of 1946, we Congolese were French citizens; but this did not prevent France from giving us independence. What France has done other nations can do, especially those which claim to be Christian.

56. But if there are still peoples under the colonialist yoke in Africa, it should not be forgotten that there are countries elsewhere in the world which know no freedom either. Even in Europe, which prides itself on its civilization, we can count up the peoples who, at the present time, certainly envy the lot of the African States which have attained independence. We must not forget those countries whose cries are stifled and hence cannot reach us. What are their colonizers waiting for before decolonizing them?

57. I have no desire to set myself up as defence counsel for France in this Assembly. I know that that nation, like all other civilizing nations, committed serious mistakes in the countries which were under its colonial occupation. But allow me, in passing, to emphasize the greatness shown by France in knowing when to free its African colonies, after having brought them to an undeniable political maturity, after seeing them climb the successive rungs of the "indigénat" system, the "loi-cadre" that led to internal self-government, and finally independence.

58. France's nobility of heart is far from being equalled by other civilizing nations, which cling jealously to their colonies. France did not wait for pressure from outside before recognizing the right of its former colonies to the freedom it owed them. I do not want to put the cart before the horse by stating this as a fact, but the state of public opinion indicates to me that France will not delay much longer in decolonizing Algeria; for, speaking personally, I have complete confidence in its good faith and greatness, whatever people may say. France will not wait until the most disastrous possible moment like Portugal, which persists in ruling Cabinda by magic wand and keeping it under the yoke of its prejudices. France has not waited for the hour of doom as did Belgium which, through obstinacy and lust for permanent dominion, carried monsters on its shoulders and turned the Congo (Leopoldville) into a vast arena for brawls, massacres, fratricidal war and senseless violence.

59. Freedom is not a shoddy item to be bought, in the world's every market place, for the blood that has become current coin in our times. It is an inborn right; no one here below can claim to be freedom's master, to give it or take it away as he pleases. Down with colonialism! Down with dogmatism, down with the imperialists and capitalists who plundered Africa, my native land, that became a laughing-stock for other nations!

60. This brings me to the end, but I must state in conclusion that the Congo (Brazzaville) delegation will join wholeheartedly in voting for the draft resolution before us [A/L.323 and Add.1-6] and keenly desires to see decolonization speeded up, so that all peoples may live in freedom and independence.

Mr. Liu (China), Vice-President, took the Chair.

61. Mr. N'GOUA (Gabon) (translated from French): My delegation, representing an independent State which was once a colonial territory, cannot remain silent on the important question of colonialism which we are now discussing. I shall be brief, firstly in order to avoid the repetition to which some speakers are prone, and secondly in order not to abuse the indulgence of the Assembly. But I do not wish to forego this opportunity of expressing my country's views.

62. In its latest report, which has been circulated to delegations, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories noted that

".... the Administering Members, and others alike, seem agreed that the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are entitled in each case, and on a basis of complete equality, regardless of the differences of race, colour or creed, to complete independence, or, if they prefer, to some form of full self-government freely chosen by them, and that it will be for them to determine their future status."⁴

63. Here, clearly defined, is the basic principle upon which—I hope—everyone in this Assembly is agreed. In giving his approval to this principle, however, the representative of Gabon has no sensation of pushing an open door, for it became clear to him during the discussions in Committee that there were differences of opinion on various points, particularly as to the form in which that development should take place; differences which were sometimes on minor points but which, influenced by partisan feeling, often confused the discussion and obscured the main issue, just as it is sometimes impossible to see the wood for the trees.

64. That is why Gabon wishes to play its part in restoring calm by recalling a few elementary truths; these are worth repeating after so many statements which, although perhaps inspired by very lofty considerations of political principle, have in many cases been distorted by what I might call a certain demagoguery. The representative of Argentina rightly said in Committee, as many others had said before him, that one of the principal conditions for the peaceful evolution of Non-Self-Governing Territories towards independence was the existence of proper administrative and technical staffs capable of operating the complex services required by the modern structure of the State. In our view it is not sufficient to clamour for the immediate liberation of thousands of beings who are still, in one way or another, dependent; the right conditions must be created for that liberation. There may be a desire—and a most laudable one—to bring the date of independence or self-government forward somewhat; but the main consideration is to have ready for the take-over the new structures without which there can be no viable and durable independence. It is a fact that the colonial system is outmoded and doomed, but the problem is to prepare the peoples for their new responsibilities. That will not be accomplished by subversion, hatred and the unleashing of political passions.

⁴/ Ibid., para. 25.

65. I referred, in my short statement in Committee, to the example of the former Belgian Congo. The causes of the chaos which now reigns in that unhappy country could be discussed indefinitely. It pains me, as a brother African, to learn each day of fresh misfortunes afflicting that young nation. Each one may, according to his political lights, lay greater or lesser stress on the underlying causes of that unfortunate situation and throw the blame for the catastrophe on this or that State or political ideology; but the fact remains—and I do not think I am the only African to reason thus—that the main cause of this fiasco is the lack of preparation for, or rather the improvisation of, that independence. It is not my purpose here to expatiate on the errors which may have been committed by the responsible Power. Impartial observers recognize that Belgium made commendable efforts; but without wishing to overwhelm that country with reproaches we must admit that, intentionally or not, the colonial Power failed to prepare the Congo sufficiently for independence. Proof of this truth has unfortunately been supplied by the distressing events we have experienced. But that is not all. If we turn to the Second Progress Report of Mr. Dayal, Special Representative of the Secretary-General in the Congo, we read the following:

"There is clear evidence of the steady return, in recent weeks, of Belgians to the Congo, and within this framework, of increasing Belgian participation in political and administrative activities, whether as advisers, counsellors or executive officials." [A/4557, para. 39.]

Mr. Dayal goes on to say that there is at Brussels a recruiting agency for the Congo, the object of which seems to be to assist in re-establishing a civil service of Belgian nationality principally at the policy level. Here, then, is a striking case in point. An attempt was made to rush the fences—to climb the ladder too fast. The rungs gave way, and the climber was back where he started, if not further down.

66. These are the serious disadvantages of independence granted without transition, disadvantages which the Governments of some colonial Powers have endeavoured to avoid. Thus the majority of African States recently admitted here have attained independence quite smoothly and without jolts; and, although not everything is yet perfect in our countries, the conditions are set for steady progress. Our new States are firmly established, and our accession to independence is none the less genuine and irreversible for having come about gradually. By way of illustration I need only recall the stages through which Gabon has passed: from the colonial regime, known as the French Empire, to the institutions of the French Union; then to the more liberal "loi-cadre" which transformed what had been a colony into a territory already enjoying broad self-government, with its own Parliament and Government; and finally to the recent proclamation of the Gabon Republic and the ultimate accolade of our country's admission to this Organization.

67. It could thus be said that here was a perfectly successful decolonization. I do not think this can be seriously questioned on the legal or political side: our freedom and independence are real. On the other hand it could also be said, and rightly, that on the economic side inequality persists. We are aware of it. We know that in the near future we must aim at more satisfactory economic structures, including an adequate industrial sector. We know that we should move away from the single-product type of economy, which is particularly vulnerable, and try to secure more equitable terms of trade so that our international dealings do not go against us. We know all that.

68. But we know also that our countries are under-developed, and that we are in great need of capital equipment. Furthermore, until national personnel can be trained, we badly need international technical assistance, whether bilateral or multilateral under the United Nations. As we listened to some representatives, however, we received the impression that these needs were sometimes overlooked, and that the provision of assistance to under-developed countries like ours was sometimes regarded as a manifestation of neo-colonialism in that it crystallized the inequality between the country assisting and the country assisted. I therefore wish to state, on my country's behalf, that economic aid or technical assistance of any kind, rendered with no thought of domination, that is to say on an equitable basis and in respect for our freedom and independence, cannot be dubbed neo-colonialism.

69. My country decided to associate itself with the submission of the draft resolution on decolonization [A/L.323 and Add.1-6], and that was a perfectly natural step to take. Gabon, proud of its independence and imbued with the principles of freedom, cannot but wish all peoples without exception, not only in Africa but on all continents, to enjoy the supreme benefits of freedom and independence.

70. I also felt it my duty, however—and I think the Assembly will share my feeling—to stress the need to avoid exposing this independence to the scourges that arise from improvisation. True, we mistrust those enemies of freedom who always tend to think it too soon to make the necessary changes. The trend to emancipation is irreversible. But we should not wish our brethren in Africa or elsewhere who are still living under foreign tutelage to be thrown without preparation or resources into the formidable tasks that confront young States. Such a policy of the worst way out would mean in practice that they would pass from foreign domination to the tyranny of anarchy, in which all freedoms and prospects of well-being perish together. The process of liberation, then, must be speeded up; but so must the installation of the personnel and machinery in whose absence the freedom granted would be merely nominal and would founder in chaos; for we well know that the confusion thus created would deprive the recently emancipated peoples of the benefits they are entitled to expect, and give free rein to the least acceptable influences.

Mr. Liu (China), Vice-President, took the Chair.

71. Mr. ILLUECA (Panama) (translated from Spanish): The delegation of Panama voted, both in the General Committee of the Assembly and in the plenary meeting, to place on the agenda item 87, concerning the declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. Our attitude reflects a political view which the Republic of Panama has constantly maintained, ever since the foundation of the United Nations—the view that all peoples should effectively enjoy the right of self-determination, respect for their integrity and independence and all fundamental human rights and freedoms, and that colonialism should be abolished by peaceful means. In this connexion, I need only recall that Panama was the country which had the honour to submit to the San Francisco Conference the first draft universal declaration of human rights considered by the Organization.

72. An outstanding feature of the history of Latin America is the struggle for one of the fundamental ideals advocated by the Liberator, Simón Bolívar. This ideal was the safeguarding of the political independence and territorial integrity of American States, which entailed the condemnation of the so-called right of conquest. This question of safeguarding the territorial integrity and political independence of American States was dealt with in the Treaty of Perpetual Union, League of Perpetual Confederation, conceived at the Congress of Panama convened by Bolívar in 1826. That treaty laid the foundations of our present American regional system and anticipated this world Organization.

73. The views of the leaders of our region were expressed at the International Conferences of American States, which began towards the end of the last century. I shall quote a few examples. The resolution adopted on 18 April 1890 by the First Conference, held in Washington, declared that "the principle of conquest shall not, ... be recognized as admissible under American public law" and that "all cessions of territory ... shall be void if made under threats of war or in the presence of an armed force".

74. The Seventh International Conference of American States held at Montevideo in 1933, laid down a fundamental doctrine of American public law in article 11 of the Convention on the Rights and Duties of States. That article provides as follows:

"The contracting states definitely establish as the rule of their conduct the precise obligation not to recognize territorial acquisitions or special advantages which have been obtained by force whether this consists in the employment of arms, in threatening diplomatic representations, or in any other effective coercive measure. The territory of a state is inviolable and may not be the object of military occupation nor of other measures of force imposed by another state directly or indirectly or for any motive whatever even temporarily."

75. We also think the thought of Bolívar was accurately expressed in resolution XCVI of the Tenth Inter-American Conference [Caracas, 1-28 March 1954], which reaffirms the right to self-determination of peoples and declares that it is the will of the peoples of America that colonialism and the occupation of territories should be definitively ended.

76. It is against this background that my country comes to this rostrum to reaffirm its democratic faith and, through its representative, to declare that it intends to contribute, to the best of its ability and within the United Nations system, to the achievement of the aims of the Organization's Charter, in order that the countries and peoples still under colonial domination may obtain their independence. We believe sincerely that those countries and peoples could become a beneficial influence and could help to bring about the conditions of peace, harmony, goodwill and confidence, which the modern world needs if it is to move towards a creative peace that will put science to work for the progress, security and well-being of mankind in every part of the world.

77. In this endeavour we can look towards a more promising future, in which the threat of war and internal struggles will disappear and, in their place, we shall see a strengthening of the independence of States great and small which, exercising the principle of sovereign equality, are prepared to co-operate in a sound and well-directed international effort to solve the grave and distressing economic and social problems which afflict great masses of people in various parts of the world.

78. This debate, with all its vicissitudes and controversies, must serve constructive purposes. There is no denying that colonialism, as a system of political and economic domination, has lost its hold. The greatest contemporary historians go so far as to say that, in the not too distant future, nationalism, which is the latest stage but which now seems very deeply rooted, will also give way to a new system of world government, in which frontiers and political boundaries will disappear.

79. I do not intend to digress into historical or philosophical considerations and shall therefore confine myself to a few brief remarks on the item we are discussing. One cannot generalize on the subject of colonialism, a system which has influenced the history of many peoples. Impartiality requires us to consider each case separately. Some metropolitan Powers have evolved a wise policy, which, in the course of time, has led to a voluntary and harmonious association between former colonies and the metropolitan country. Their contribution to the international community cannot be ignored. There are other Powers, however, which in the course of history have used an utterly repugnant kind of colonialism as an instrument of repression, cruelty and exploitation, and have left no pleasant memories in the lives of colonial peoples. Yet cultural and religious forces have played a significant part in the restoration of harmonious relations between the independent peoples and their former oppressors.

80. It is fitting that we should recognize the immense value of the work done by the United Nations in furthering the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants of the dependent subject territories and their gradual development towards independence. The important role which the United Nations Trusteeship System has played in this connexion, in spite of its limitations cannot be overestimated, as the results it has achieved demonstrate. A large number of independent States, which are now seated with honour and dignity in this Assembly, achieved their independence through the United Nations Trusteeship System.

81. We are therefore extremely surprised that the draft declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples [A/4502], submitted for the consideration of the Assembly by the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Soviet Union, Mr. Khrushchev, states, inter alia, the following:

"The trusteeship system has not justified itself anywhere and should be buried together with the entire colonial system, which is an anachronism."

82. As far as the Trusteeship System is concerned, my delegation does not believe that this violent statement is justified either by the facts or by any arguments. For the last fifteen years the Soviet Union has been a permanent member of the Trusteeship Council. It is therefore aware of the tasks successfully carried out by that body, not only with its participation but with its vote and its co-operation with the United States, the United Kingdom, France, China and other Member States.

83. The Trusteeship System cannot be buried with a mere sentence, however resounding it may be. To bury means to inter something dead or to stifle something living. If what the Soviet Union proposes in its draft declaration is the ending and abolition of the International Trusteeship System and its removal from the structure of the United Nations, it should resort legally to Chapter XVIII of the Charter, which deals with amendments to that instrument. We are apparently faced with a contradiction, since it has not yet proved possible to alter the membership of the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council, owing to opposition by one of the great Powers, whose negative vote amounts to a veto of any attempt to do so.

84. The day is not far off when all dependent countries and peoples will have achieved independence. Then, and only then, will Chapters XI, XII and XIII of the Charter cease to apply and the Trusteeship Council, having no reason to exist, will disappear in accordance with the Charter, since there will no longer be any Administering Authorities, Trust Territories or trusteeship agreements. However, until the ideal of self-government has been achieved by all peoples, we must strengthen the United Nations system in order to achieve the highest purposes of the Charter.

85. The experience obtained by the Trusteeship Council suggests that we should strengthen rather than weaken the United Nations system as far as the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the International Trusteeship System, referred to in Chapters XI and XII of the Charter, are concerned so that, as stated in the African-Asian draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-5], steps are taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those territories, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom.

86. There is no doubt that Chapter XI of the Charter has led to heated controversies since it was adopted at San Francisco. The declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories which is embodied in the Charter, means that the colonial Powers accepted extensive general obligations to promote to the utmost the well-being of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions. There was, however, one defect in the drafting of the provisions of the Charter, not only because it did not specify the means by which the Administering Powers' obligations were to be made effective, but because it did not define the functions of the United Nations with regard to the fulfilment of obligations assumed by Member States.

87. In this connexion it might have been useful to take in account the recommendations of certain experts, such as Professors Grenville Clark and Louis B. Sohn. In the second edition of their book "World Peace through World Law", published by the Harvard University Press in 1960, they propose to amend Article 73 in order to clarify the obligations accepted by member states as to Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration, and completely to revise Article 87 so as to broaden the responsibility and authority of the General Assembly and the Trusteeship Council in respect of many Non-Self-Governing Territories other than Trust Territories.

88. I would now like to turn to the draft resolution which the representative of Honduras has submitted for our consideration [A/L.324]. Perhaps the Honduran draft, which has been laid before the Assembly by a sovereign country inspired by sound motives, aims to give the United Nations greater influence in the process of emancipation of the Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories. Although we appreciate our Honduran colleague's good intentions, my delegation reserves the right to make certain comments on his draft in a future statement, if circumstances make this advisable.

89. Paragraph 5 of the draft declaration submitted by the African-Asian countries [A/L.323 and Add.1-6] reads as follows:

"5. Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, without any distinction as to race, creed or colour, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom."

90. My delegation wonders what immediate steps should be adopted in accordance with the African-Asian draft. The document does not say. It says, of course, that all powers should be transferred to the peoples of those territories in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire. But what legal means are to be used to determine the peoples' choice? Is that to be a matter exclusively within the internal jurisdiction of the Administering Authority, or is the United Nations to exercise international supervision over the method of consultation? All these are problems which will have to be considered, and presumably they cannot be settled immediately through the power of some miraculous phrase. Objective analysis is required if practical steps are to be taken to enable the United Nations to promote efforts to secure the independence of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories.

91. My delegation is aware of the complexity of the question we are considering and realizes that a declaration of this kind cannot cover all the practical aspects of attainment of its objectives. We must recognize that this declaration by itself will not be enough, and that we shall have to continue to work within the framework of the United Nations for the freedom of subject peoples, through a peaceful process which is of the greatest interest to the whole international community.

92. My delegation cannot support the Soviet draft resolution [A/4502] in the form in which it has been submitted to this Assembly, as it contains certain elements which would make it difficult to find harmonious and peaceful settlements. We are opposed to injection of a controversial, hostile and harmful cold war atmosphere into a matter of such great importance.

93. I have already said on a previous occasion that the small Powers should become a real force for mediation and understanding between the great opposing blocs. For this reason we view with considerable favour the joint draft resolution submitted to this Assembly by the African-Asian delegations.

Mr. Illueca (Panama), Vice-President, took the Chair.

94. Mr. NIMNANHEMINDA (Thailand): It affords me much pleasure to note that the General Assembly has unanimously accepted [903rd meeting] the proposal made by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to discuss the vexed question of colonialism in the plenary meeting instead of referring this most momentous subject to the First Committee. On this point I am happy to note that for once the view of my delegation is in perfect accord with that of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The matter is ripe to be brought before this Assembly so that wholehearted attention can be paid to it.

95. My delegation wishes to put it on record that we unreservedly support the draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6], submitted by Afghanistan, Burma and other Member States, and that we shall vote for it and for all that it stands for.

96. Ours is one of the very few nations in Asia that somehow or other succeeded in eluding the clutch of colonialism or imperialism, eastern as well as western, during the last 700 years of its distinctive existence, after the Thai people had finally settled in its present territory. I am sure that our past experiences both in dodging and in temporizing with evil—and I think that everybody agrees that colonialism is evil—when such evil became inevitable, may prove to be of interest to some of us here today in dealing with the evil aspects of colonialism that they may come across, now or in the near future.

97. As you know, my country is called Thailand in English. In our language, we call it "Pratate Thai" or "Muang Thai", which means "The Land of the Free". The mind of our people, as its name implies, is always actively conscious of the idea of freedom and independence, and it always arouses our sympathy to observe that so many of our fellow beings are still deprived of their birthright, the right to be free and to be master of their own destiny. The fact that we always have been free makes us all the more sympathetic to the yearnings and aspirations of our less fortunate fellow beings. In our contact with many peoples, we are constantly being asked on what day we celebrate our independence, and we are always at a loss to answer this query. We have no Independence Day; every day, to us, is always our Day of Independence.

98. Perhaps by this time you must be thinking that I am carried away by emotional feelings, so let me make my position clear. Our past efforts in defending our independence and in eluding and evading foreign domination or colonialism, entailed an almost infinite amount of hardship, privation, self-restraint plus no less an amount of self-renunciation and personal sacrifice. We had often to exercise infinite patience and to pocket our pride in the face of great and irritating provocations.

99. It is my thesis, however, that whilst it is not beyond human effort and endeavour to acquire freedom and independence, it is definitely more difficult, once complete freedom from enslaving colonialism has been acquired, to maintain and preserve this independence intact for future generations. Circumspection as well as wisdom and correct self-appraisal must be vigilantly kept in mind, or else we may fall into another and greater evil.

100. Let me cite an example of how we managed to evade and then to temporize with the expansionism and imperialistic drive from our then powerful—and still no less powerful now—neighbour of the North.

101. Towards the middle of the thirteenth century of the Christian era, the great Mongol Emperor who ruled over China, Kublai Khan, ordered his invincible army to attack the early Thai principalities of Nan Chao, or what is now known as the Chinese Province of Yunnan. Instead of submitting tamely to the Chinese yoke and accepting the colonialism which they abhorred, the Thais of various branches preferred to migrate elsewhere where they could breathe the air of freedom as far from Chinese contact as was then possible. Some of them moved into present-day Assam Province, in India; a large group calling themselves "The Major Thais" settled down in the Shan States of Burma; some migrated into present-day Viet-Nam; while the largest group managed to move farther south into present-day Thailand and Laos.

102. In spite of all these mass migrations, the great Kublai Khan's territorial appetite was not completely satiated. He later on sent envoys into these new colonies or territories to demand tribute and acknowledgement of his suzerainty. Similar envoys were also sent to Sukhothai, the then capital of Thailand. There is a Thai proverb which says "Do not attempt to break the handle of a chopper with your own knees", meaning, of course, that one should not attempt the impossible and hurt oneself at the same time. King Ram Kamhaeng of Thailand, therefore, for the first time, put into practice what is known as personal diplomacy by personally travelling to Peking to make better acquaintance with Kublai Khan himself, and paid him due respect in virtue of his seniority in rank as well as age. By this gracious gesture, he found favour with the Emperor who initiated, for the first time in our history, a technical assistance programme, sending back with King Ram Kamhaeng a group of experts on pottery, who taught our people the art of glazing pottery by setting up kilns at Sangkaloke and Sukhothai for turning out Sangkaloke ware which found its way to different markets as far apart as Borneo and Persia.

103. Not more than two and a half centuries after having settled in the country, we began to receive attention from the outside world; first, from early Portuguese adventurers, envoys and Roman Catholic priests of that nationality. They were always welcomed with warmth and tolerance in accordance with the teachings of Buddhism. Land was given to them on which to build their camps and their churches and many of them were taken into the King's service as gunners.

104. The advent of the Dutch some time later weakened the hold of the Portuguese and lessened their arrogance. After having consolidated themselves firmly, the Dutch began to exercise pressure on us. As a result of a treaty signed in 1664, we granted the Dutch monopolies in various commodities and in the shipping of our produce to neighbouring countries. They in turn were responsible for the introduction into Thailand, for the first time, of that obnoxious and subsequently much abused practice of extraterritoriality.

105. Finding the presence of, and pressure from, the Dutch well-nigh intolerable, the Thais sought relief by addressing themselves to the French and entering into diplomatic relations with Louis XIV, who exchanged several ambassadors with our King, Phra Narai. But, there again, we soon found that the French intentions did not much differ from those of the Dutch, except that there were far more French troops in the country. It was only by means of a timely Thai version of the famous Sicilian Vespers that we were able to stave off the first attempt to plant a French colonial empire upon us. From that time onwards until the fall of Ayudhya in 1767, our relations with western countries were chiefly confined to a small amount of trading carried on by private traders from the West.

106. In 1833, less than sixty years after the Americans had discarded their colonial yoke and made their presence felt in the commerce of Asia, and twenty years before Commodore Perry's forcible opening of Japan to other nations in addition to the Dutch, the Thais entered into diplomatic relations with the United States of America. From 1855 onwards, treaties of friendship and commerce were concluded with the United Kingdom, France and other Western Powers.

107. Although we freely opened our country before forcible measures were taken against us, this does not mean that we have come out of the colonialistic game unsullied and unscathed. In order to avoid total extinction, we had to submit to the conclusion of a series of one-sided, unjust and iniquitous treaties without any terminating clause, thereby perpetuating that odious extraterritorial practice and the limitation imposed on our fiscal autonomy, which precluded us from levying duties on exports or imports over and above 3 per cent ad valorem. Furthermore, our borders were also subjected to periodical grabbings, known euphemistically as "rectification of frontiers".

108. To the Thai people, extraterritoriality was both humiliating and unjust. Fiscal limitation prevented us from embarking upon several necessary reforms through want of essential revenues. Before Thailand's association with colonial Powers, the area of the country exceeded 350,000 square miles, or 900,000 square kilometres. After 1907, its area was reduced to barely 200,000 square miles, or just over 500,000 square kilometres.

109. Throughout the whole of the nineteenth century, and for many years after, the keynote of Thai policy was that it was better to lose a certain part than to lose the whole country: half a loaf seemed better than no bread. I think that a well-known Russian story will illustrate our policy at that time very graphically.

A certain Russian gentleman went on a business trip in a carriage drawn by four horses. On his way home, he was pursued by a pack of hungry wolves. The gentleman drove hard, yet the pack managed somehow to overtake him after some time. To save the situation, he cut loose one of the horses to distract the wolves from pursuing him, at any rate for a brief respite. After that horse had been made short work of, the howling pack rushed after him again. He repeated this with a second and a third horse, until finally he reached a post of safety with but one horse. I need not point out the moral of this fable, nor trouble you with the identities of those big bad wolves.

110. Now we can more or less breathe freely seeing that the brazen type of land grabbing and the naked and shameless type of colonialism have become things of the past. In Thailand we deem that we managed to escape from "the mouths of the tigers and the bears" with the skin of our teeth. We are proud of the wisdom of our forbears in having chosen the better part so as to preserve our independence to this very day. We adhere, as good Buddhists, to our Lord's teaching, which says: "Hatred ceaseth not with hatred, hatred ceaseth only with non-hatred, this is an old law." Thus said the Buddha. We adopt a realistic view of the world. We refuse to live in the past, nor will we keep looking backward to the past all the time. We deem it a waste of time to cry over spilt milk, but we shall take care not to spill any more milk. It is our aim and our objective to lead our people to the goal where reign freedom from fear, from hunger, from disease and from ignorance.

111. Colonialism of the old days is dead, and in this Assembly we are driving home the nails into its coffin. But like the phoenix of old, while land-grabbing colonialism is no longer with us, out of its ashes a new type of colonialism is arising. It is far more dangerous, because it is cynically insidious; like the Kingdom of God, it seldom comes with observation; it often comes under the guise of liberation; it preaches a new gospel of salvation; it heralds a new millenium; and it comes in sheep's clothing. In my delegation's opinion, it is far more dangerous because of its deceptive ideological attraction. When it enters by one door, freedom flies out of the other. I think the case of present-day Tibet is an example which clearly illustrates my point.

112. Now, may I put one question: What shall it profit a country to gain complete independence only to lose its own soul?

1. Mr. ZORIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (translated from Russian) The debate on the question of the immediate and complete abolition of the colonial system which has been proceeding in the plenary General Assembly has shown how timely it was to place this question before the General Assembly, how essential it is that the United Nations should take action at once to ensure the freedom and independence of the countries and peoples which are still under colonial rule. Thanks to the initiative taken by Mr. Khrushchev, the head of the Soviet Government, in submitting the "Declaration on the grant of independence to colonial countries and peoples" to the General Assembly for consideration at its fifteenth session [869th meeting], the question of the abolition of the colonial order, of the immediate liberation of the colonial peoples, is being exhaustively discussed for the first time in the history of the United Nations, in the Organization's highest forum—the plenary General Assembly.

2. It has to be said that the colonial Powers have not entered into this discussion willingly, but have been compelled to agree to it by the mighty pressure of the anti-colonialist forces. For as everyone well knows, the colonial Powers have in the past, throughout the existence of the United Nations, always opposed any discussion of questions relating to the political development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Such Powers as Spain and Portugal have resorted to a variety of legal fictions to try to pretend that they have no colonies at all, and that there is absolutely no such thing as Spanish and Portuguese colonialism. The General Assembly's decision to consider the question of the abolition of the colonial system is in itself alone an important victory for the countries which are fighting against colonial rule.

3. The Soviet delegation expresses its gratitude to those representatives who have voiced appreciation of the step taken by the Soviet Government, and by Mr. Khrushchev in person, in raising the question of the abolition of colonialism before the General Assembly, and of the Soviet Union's consistent and energetic struggle, since 1917, for the emancipation of all colonial and dependent peoples. Life itself now demands the full discussion and correct solution of this burning problem.

4. Some representatives of the colonial Powers, including the representative of the United Kingdom, have tried to assert that in calling upon the General Assembly to adopt the "Declaration on the grant of independence to colonial countries and peoples" the Soviet Union is pursuing "ulterior motives"; that the Soviet delegation is trying to exploit the debate on this question for its own private purposes, to fan the flames of the "cold war". But as all delegations have been able to see for themselves, it is actually the representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States, Belgium and other colonial Powers who have attempted to impose "cold war" polemics on the General Assembly and to divert its attention from any serious and practical discussion of the supremely important question of the immediate and complete abolition of the colonial system.

5. Of course, the purposes of the Soviet delegation are diametrically opposed to those of the delegations of the colonial Powers. In submitting its "Declaration on the grant of independence to colonial countries and peoples" to the General Assembly for its consideration, the Government of the Soviet Union is pursuing a single goal: that of putting an immediate and final end to colonialism, of bringing freedom and independence to all colonies. It is precisely for that reason that the Soviet Union is interested in a serious discussion of this question, and in the adoption of effective measures for its solution. The delegations of the United States, the United Kingdom, Belgium, Portugal and the other colonial Powers, on the other hand, are trying to preserve the colonial system. Because of that, they would like to embroil the question in a wrangle conducted in the worst spirit of the "cold war". Naturally, it would be most convenient for the colonialists if they could succeed in disrupting any practical discussion and in preventing the General Assembly from adopting any measures on this question. That is why they have tried to inflame the atmosphere here by injecting "cold war" elements into our debate

[The speaker was interrupted by shouts from the public gallery]

6. That shows very well how serious debate on the question of colonialism is organized in the United States. It offers even better evidence of the fact that the United Nations cannot work tranquilly in United States territory, where patently provocative outbursts are organized during the General Assembly's discussions.

7. As the debate on the colonial system has shown, these manoeuvres by the colonialists have been a fiasco. The colonialists have not been successful in diverting the attention of the General Assembly from the essential problem of colonialism and in leading it off into a discussion of matters having nothing to do with that problem. The overwhelming majority of those attending this session, expressing the demands of history in its objective advance, have supported the proposal for the abolition of colonialism at the earliest possible date, regarding the existence of the colonial system as a disgrace to humanity.

8. In the course of the discussion the representatives of the socialist countries, and of many African and Asian States, have voiced well-founded and convincing criticism of the colonial order, have cited actual examples and facts to show not only that the colonial system is a brake on the economic, social and cultural development of the colonial peoples, but that it crushes, tramples underfoot and oppresses millions of people, robs them of human dignity, humiliates them and inflicts countless sufferings upon the colonial peoples.

9. So great is the pressure of the anti-colonialist forces at this session of the General Assembly that even the colonialists do not dare to defend the colonial system openly. They try to do so in veiled form, and resort to tricks and manoeuvres of all kinds in order to justify the preservation of their colonial rule, to justify their attempts to keep the colonial countries in dependence for as much longer as possible. One of the so-called arguments in defence of colonialism advanced by the colonialists and their sympathizers is that colonialism has brought the peoples under their rule modern civilization, has enriched their culture, has encouraged the diffusion of the "creative genius" of man, as one speaker put it. Naturally, the purpose of such sophistries is to distort the historical reality and the causes of colonial usurpation and of the enslavement of entire peoples by foreign Powers. Those who indulge in arguments of this kind try to do everything possible to whitewash the history of colonialism and to pretend that the conscience of the colonialists is clear; that they have brought the colonies of the present and the past no sufferings but only benefits.

10. But the colonialists are well aware that the seizure of vast territories in Asia, Africa and Latin America and the enslavement of their indigenous peoples were carried out for purposes of profit and for the plunder of the natural and human resources of the countries concerned. The history of colonial usurpation in various parts of the world, and particularly in Africa, shows what injustices and what crimes have been committed by the colonialists against the peoples of those continents. As long ago as the first half of the nineteenth century, that was well described by William Howitt in his book Colonization and Christianity. Let me cite one sentence from that book:

"The barbarities and desperate outrages of the so-called Christian race, throughout every region of the world, and upon every people that they have been able to subdue, are not to be paralleled by those of any other race, however fierce, however untaught, and however reckless of mercy and of shame, in any age of the earth."^{1/}

That was written even in the nineteenth century.

11. The defenders of colonialism usually deny that any African civilization existed before the arrival of Europeans in Africa. Quite often it is asserted that even civilizations such as those of Ethiopia and Egypt were founded and developed by members of the white race. All these theories have one aim and one alone: to justify colonialism. Their purpose is to convince Africans that they have never possessed any developed civilization; that they have given mankind nothing of value; that culture and civilization came to them only with colonization. This denial of the cultural past of the African peoples serves as an ideological weapon, used, firstly, to magnify the non-existent "services" rendered by the colonialists in spreading civilization on the African continent, and secondly, to induce the African peoples to renounce any national aspirations and to bend their backs submissively to the burden of colonialism, either in its old or, so to speak, "classical" form or in new camouflaged forms.

12. But these theories are false from beginning to end, and have nothing to do with the historical truth. In recent years a great deal of objective historical research has been published by scholars of various countries, research showing that long before the appearance of the first white man on the African continent the peoples of Africa lived an independent life, created States of their own, developed their native cultures, carried on trade. This research of course includes Basil Davidson's book Old Africa Rediscovered, published in London in 1960. The author, using the most recent archaeological data, throws considerable light on the history of a number of areas of Africa which have hitherto been little studied. For example, he describes the civilization of Kush, of the famous cities of Napata and Meroe, from which, as long ago as eight centuries before our era, there were diffused new tools and new methods of working metals. He tells us of the ancient States of the Western Sudan, Mali, Ghana and Songhay, which at their peak were the equals of many States of medieval Europe. The gold of these States did much to promote the development of the economy of Europe before the inauguration of the great geographical discoveries. He describes in detail the ancient city-States of the east coast of Africa, Kilwa, Gedi, Mogadiscio and others, which according to the reports of the Portuguese, yielded nothing to the most prosperous cities of Europe. Another author, Sheikh Anta Diop, points out in his book Nations nègres et culture^{2/} that even in the fifteenth century the African States were, in political and social organization, the equals, and in some cases indeed the superiors, of the European States.

13. The martyrdom of the peoples of the African continent began with the arrival of the European slave-traders. The first ship laden with Africans captured for sale into slavery arrived in Lisbon, the capital of Portugal, in 1441. For nearly four centuries after that, millions of slaves were exported from Africa, and vast numbers fell in inter-tribal wars caused by the slave-traders and in their armed raids. That was an incalculable disaster. The African continent was depopulated. Its economy and culture decayed. Dr. Du Bois, the well-known historian, whose great-grandfather was captured by slave-traders on the Guinea coast of Africa and carried off to America, writes:

"It would be no exaggeration to say that the slave trade cost Negro Africa 100 million souls. Yet today there are still people who seek the reasons for the stagnation in the development of Africa's culture!"

14. The nineteenth century was the era of the territorial partition of Africa by the European colonial Powers, the era of colonial wars and the military seizure of African lands. So far as they were able, the Africans offered stubborn resistance to the European invaders. The colonialists met this resistance by sending entire armies to Africa, armies supplied with the best technical equipment of their day. For several decades, the earth of Africa was plentifully watered with the blood of its peoples. Hundreds of thousands of Africans defending their freedom fell in unequal struggle.

15. An example of the heroic resistance offered by the peoples of Africa to the foreign invaders, one which at the same time refutes the colonialists' assertions that the penetration of the African continent by the Europeans was a peaceful process, may be found in the struggle of the Matabele and Mashona peoples, inhabiting the region between the rivers Zambezi and Limpopo, against the seizure of their territory by the British company controlled by Cecil Rhodes. In the eighties of the last century, British colonialists were actively scheming to appropriate Southern African lands rich in gold, diamonds and other minerals, in the territory since named after its conqueror Rhodesia. Operating in that area at the time was one of the most powerful British groups of capitalists, represented by Rhodes, and in 1888 this group forced Lobengula, the king of the Matabele, to accept an agreement of far-reaching intention. In return for a small rent, the British won the exclusive right to exploit all minerals in the territories subject to the Matabele. That agreement was an outright fraud on the Africans, since their king, like his retainers illiterate, was entirely ignorant of the real significance of the document to which he had set his mark by way of signature. Nevertheless, the British Government used the agreement of 1888 to justify the outright annexation of the lands of the Matabele and Mashona peoples. In the wars which followed, the Maxim guns used by the British turned every battle between the colonialists and the Africans into a massacre. Rhodes himself estimated the Matabele losses at 3,000. The beaten Matabele were forced to surrender; their territory became a colony, and was given the name of Southern Rhodesia.

16. In the new British possessions, Africans were brutally exploited. All their best lands were expropriated. By decision of a land commission made up of representatives of the British Government and of Rhodes' company, the Africans were driven into reservations. Some idea of the nature of these reservations may be gained from the fact that they consisted partly of areas of endemic sleeping-sickness and partly of areas of drought.

17. Those are a few historic facts. For more than sixty years now, colonial oppression has persisted in this country, named after the man who drenched it in blood. Events during this period show that the successors of Cecil Rhodes are carrying on his black business. For what is the situation in Southern Rhodesia sixty years after? How has the United Kingdom promoted the development of this country in the "interests" of its indigenous, African population? Clearly, that can best be told us by the inhabitants of the territory themselves, and for that reason I venture to cite a few extracts from a brochure on Southern Rhodesia published in London in 1960 by the National Democratic Party of Southern Rhodesia. According to this brochure:

"Thanks to the various methods devised to prevent Africans from taking part in elections, the Parliament of Southern Rhodesia has since 1923 enjoyed pure white representation.

"As a result, 1923 saw the initiation of a series of despotic and discriminatory statutes directed against Africans. There are at present 70,000 European voters and less than 2,000 African voters.

"Since 1949, 82,500 African families have been resettled outside the so-called native lands, and 21,500 have been moved from the Zambezi River basin to special areas. It is anticipated that by 1962 all Africans living in native lands or in localities settled by Europeans will have been moved to these areas."

"Under the Masters and Servants Act, the African worker is entirely dependent on and at the mercy of the European. He is prohibited by law from leaving his work if he considers that his employer is treating him badly or sweating him. If he strikes, he is prosecuted like a criminal.

"Totalitarianism, oppression and intimidation have taken the place of the freedom and democracy which are supposed to be the traditional characteristics of the British people.

"The colour bar remains just what it was before 1953. Everywhere there are notices 'Natives Only', 'Europeans Only'. Africans are still not allowed to enter cinemas, shops and hotels. Africans are still discriminated against just as badly as they were ten years ago."

Those are all quotations from this brochure. This, I may say, is not Soviet propaganda—the colonialists' favourite catchword. It is the first-hand report of a political party of Southern Rhodesia.

18. Life itself confirms the truth of Karl Marx's comment that the profound hypocrisy characteristic of bourgeois civilization is revealed not in the metropolitan countries, where that civilization assumes respectable forms, but in the colonies, where it operates without the slightest concealment. The facts, both of history and of the present day, lend particular relief to the hypocrisy and sanctimoniousness of those who attempt to whitewash colonialism, to represent it as virtually the noblest enterprise of civilized Christian men—an enterprise which for some unknown reason is now coming to a close at the zenith of its glory, to quote some representatives at this session.

19. Mr. Ormsby-Gore, in his efforts to present United Kingdom policy in whatever favourable light he can, has tried to make out that for the last century, at least, Britain's only concern has been either to grant its colonies independence or to intensify its efforts, sparing no pains, to prepare them for independence. But the historical truth is that the colonialists themselves never voluntarily grant the peoples of the colonies independence, and have never done so. Did not the peoples of India, Burma, Pakistan, Ghana and other now independent States have to win their independence in stubborn struggle with the colonialists; were not the leaders of the national liberation movements in those countries incarcerated for long years in British jails; and were they not also subjected to other forms of repression? Did not the French colonialists crush the struggle for emancipation of the peoples of Madagascar and Cameroun by the most savage and merciless means, just as they are at present trying to drown in blood the selflessly courageous struggle of the Algerian people for their independence and liberty?

20. The colonialists are compelled to agree to the grant of independence to their colonies only when the national liberation movement acquires such strength that the colonial Powers are unable to cope with it. For that reason, the principal factors in the liberation of the colonies are the struggle of the oppressed peoples themselves for their national freedom and independence and the support given to that righteous struggle by all progressive forces.

21. When one listens to statements such as that made by Mr. Ormsby-Gore, one can only wonder. For the entire history of Britain's colonial rule in Africa, Asia and other parts of the world abounds in examples of colonial wars and brutal violence against the indigenous peoples. Has Mr. Ormsby-Gore forgotten that in the last few years alone, British army and police units have exterminated thousands of Africans and cast tens of thousands into prisons and concentration camps in Kenya, Nyasaland, Southern and Northern Rhodesia and other colonies? The world knows that in 1952-1955 numerous Africans of Kenya were savagely beaten and shot down. Using as their pretext for crushing the national liberation movement in Kenya the myth of the terrorist activities practised by a secret society known as Mau-Mau—a myth invented by the British settlers—the British colonialists tried to make an end of the patriotic forces of Kenya once and for all. By 1955, thanks to punitive expeditions, mass round-ups and man-hunts, more than 11,000 indigenous inhabitants had been murdered and 62,000, including 14,000 women and 2,000 children, herded into concentration camps. Many inhabitants, entire tribes, were transferred to barren reservations in remote areas. The African political parties in Kenya, and then in Nyasaland and Northern and Southern Rhodesia, were declared "subversive" organizations and banned.

22. The colonialists regard any struggle for freedom and independence as subversive, while at the same time hypocritically declaring that they are helping forward the emancipation of the colonies. One must really have lost all sense of shame to take up such an attitude in the General Assembly, where there are so many men who have felt in their own persons or seen with their own eyes the crimes of the colonialists, the oppression and repression, the prisons and concentration camps in their countries.

23. The tyranny of the British colonialists is not confined to the territory of the African continent. In other parts of the world, too, there are still remnants of the once spacious British Empire where independence movements are crushed by means of outright violence. One of these is British Guiana, in South America. In a petition dated 11 November 1960 addressed to the United Nations General Assembly, Dr. Cheddi Jagan, leader of the People's Progressive Party of British Guiana, cites numbers of facts illustrating the British colonialists' oppression of the local people. This document has been circulated in the United Nations. Refuting the colonialists' professions of their "lofty, civilizing mission", Cheddi Jagan writes:

"... the Guianese are tired and sick of being told that the metropolitan countries hold colonies in trust for their colonial subjects; that the policy of such countries is to lead step by step all colonies to the goal of independence. Bribery and corruption and intrigue and deception, and the constant threat of the use of force are the order of the day. Are the Guianese to believe that these are the means to lead them to freedom and democracy and to the building of a New Nation?"

From its foundation in 1950, the People's Progressive Party led by Jagan has tirelessly agitated for the grant of independence to British Guiana. In 1953, the Party won eighteen out of twenty-four seats in the elections to the House of Assembly; but after a few months they were removed by force. As the petition states, battleships and British soldiers with the threat of bullets replaced the ballot box. For four years, from 1953 to 1957, the people of Guiana suffered under an authoritarian police régime. At the 1957 elections, the British authorities gerrymandered the electoral constituencies in order to ensure the defeat of the Party defending the interests of the people of Guiana. Yet even then the People's Progressive Party won a victory, gaining nine out of fourteen seats. Jagan, the leader of the Party, goes on in his petition to say that although his Party heads the present Government of British Guiana, his hands are fettered in colonialist shackles. He ends the petition with an appeal to the United Nations General Assembly to help the people of British Guiana: "British Guiana needs your help to free itself from the yoke of foreign rule, because like peace, political independence and freedom are also indivisible."

24. The colonialists also use other methods, whose goal, however, remains identical—to preserve their rule in the colonies, and prevent any transfer of real power to the indigenous peoples of the colonies. This policy is carried on under the false slogans of "racial harmony" and "peace and tranquillity" in the colonies. The representative of the United Kingdom has developed this argument here at some length. But let us see what this policy of "racial harmony" amounts to in actual fact.

25. So far as concerns East Africa, which Mr. Ormsby-Gore mentioned here, the obvious aim of the United Kingdom Government's policy is to create States or Unions on the lines of the Union of South Africa, that is, ostensibly independent States in which all power and all positions of control are in the hands of the European settlers who constitute a quite insignificant minority of the population. Instead of satisfying the just demands of the peoples of Northern and Southern Rhodesia and of Nyasaland, the British colonialists have in defiance of the wishes of these peoples set up the so-called Central African Federation, and have extended the power of the upper stratum of white settlers in Southern Rhodesia to cover Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia. By this means they hope to carry through their plan to establish in the centre of Africa yet another racist State on the lines of the Union of South Africa. The establishment of the so-called administrative union between the Trust Territory of Tanganyika and the colonies of Kenya and Uganda is intended to serve similar aims. The United Kingdom Government is doing everything in its power to crush and beat down the national liberation movements in Kenya and Uganda, to consolidate the positions of the white settlers in Kenya and then to attach Tanganyika and Uganda to Kenya in order to place them in a position of subjection within the union thus created. In its territories in East Africa, the United Kingdom has carried out measures by means of which all political power and control has been placed in the hands of the European minority. Thus the "racial harmony" which the colonialists are attempting to ensure in Africa, where the population is 97 per cent African and only 3 per cent non-African, is one under which the 3 per cent of Europeans and other outsiders are to dominate the 97 per cent of Africans, within the framework of so-called independent States.

26. The European colonial settlers seize control not only over political life in the colonies, but also over their economies. With the help of the colonial authorities, vast areas of land belonging to the indigenous population are alienated to European colonists and foreign companies. We all know the story—a sad one for the Africans—of the "White Highlands" of Kenya, where the finest land in the country, the most fertile and the best-suited to agriculture, was transferred to the exclusive monopoly ownership of Europeans. In Southern Rhodesia, the centre of the colonialist Central African Federation, that process has gone so far that the Europeans, who make up no more than 9 per cent of the country's population, now own more than half the total land area, while the Africans, or 90 per cent of the population, are crowded into 22 per cent of the territory's area. And it must be noted that those same Europeans work only 2.5 per cent of the land they have usurped. That is a practical example of how the colonialists "care" for the interests of the indigenous peoples, of how they develop the economies of the colonies in the interests of their peoples. In Tanganyika, the alienation of land belonging to the indigenous population has gone on for many years and has proceeded on such a scale that up to the present more than 2.5 million acres have been taken from the indigenous population and transferred to Europeans. And it must be remembered that, according to the report prepared by a British Royal Commission, the alienated lands are those best suited to crops of various kinds and are located in the areas having the best rainfall and climate.

27. Yet the United Kingdom representative has spoken to us here, in the plenary General Assembly, of the "racial harmony" and "co-operation" that exist in Tanganyika between Europeans and Africans! No wonder people in Africa now say: "When the white men came to us, they had the Bible and we had the land; now, they have the land and we have the Bible." The United Kingdom representative specifically mentioned Tanganyika, in his statement, as an example of a territory where "racial harmony" reigned. But what is the United Kingdom representative so pleased about; and what is it he is extolling under the guise of this celebrated "racial harmony"? The British colonialists have proclaimed this slogan in order to ensure the hegemony of the European minority over the Africans and thereby put off the day for the granting of independence to Tanganyika. At first, the British authorities tried to establish in Tanganyika the principle of so-called "parity of representation" between the three racial groups—Africans, Asians and Europeans. Under this system, Africans and Europeans would have been represented on a basis of "parity" in Tanganyika's legislative and administrative organs, although the country has 9 million Africans and only 20,000 Europeans. The British authorities' attempts to impose the system of "parity representation" on the Africans of Tanganyika met with failure. But Britain did not give up its plans. Under the guise of reform, a system was introduced in this Trust Territory under which the Africans have one representative for every 180,000 inhabitants, whereas the Europeans have one representative for every 2,000 inhabitants. There is equality of rights for you! There you have the "racial harmony" and "equitable race representation" which were defended in such glowing terms by the United Kingdom representative!

28. The Administering Authority is doing everything it can to put off the day of Tanganyika's independence. It is a typical fact that only recently, at the Trusteeship Council's twenty-third session, held in 1959, the representatives of the Administering Authority refused even to entertain the idea of Tanganyika's being granted independence in the near future. They asserted that while Tanganyika would be granted independence as soon as possible, the Territory still had a long way to go before it could attain self-government. The Administering Authority to this day refuses to comply with the demands of the Trust Territory's largest political parties—the Tanganyika African National Union and the Tanganyika African National Congress—for the immediate grant of independence to Tanganyika. In a memorandum submitted to the United Nations Visiting Mission which came to the Trust Territory in 1960, the Tanganyika African National Union declared that:

"Events in Africa, other Trust Territories and the world at large, and within the Territory are such that Tanganyika has to attain independence immediately . . . We strongly believe that most economic and social development can only be accelerated and attained under conditions of political independence."^{3/}

Despite these clear and specific demands of Tanganyika's main political parties for the immediate grant to the Territory of independence, the United Kingdom, as in the past, is trying to put off to some later date what will, for all its efforts, inevitably have to be done; is trying to prolong its rule over Tanganyika until the last possible moment. Speaking at this session of the General Assembly, the United Kingdom representative has kept silence with regard to this paramount and crucial issue for the Trust Territory. Instead of naming a specific date for the proclamation of Tanganyika's independence, he has limited himself to an obscure statement to the effect that the United Kingdom proposes at this session of the General Assembly to submit a proposal for the termination of the Trusteeship Agreement for Tanganyika after the proclamation of the Trust Territory's independence. No one can be in any doubt that the Trusteeship Agreement will in fact cease to have effect after the proclamation of the Trust Territory's independence. But the whole point is, when will the independence of Tanganyika be proclaimed? We are confident that the people of Tanganyika will win their independence in the very near future despite all the obstacles placed in their path by the Administering Authority.

29. In Tanganyika, as in other colonial Trust Territories, colonialism is leaving behind a grim heritage:

^{3/} Official Records of the Trusteeship Council, twenty-sixth session, Supplement No. 2 (T/1532 and Add.1), Annex II.

an almost complete lack of any manufacturing industry, a highly backward subsistence agriculture, a deficient transport system, disordered finances and a chronic budget deficit, poor public health and an inadequate educational system, a low standard of living among the indigenous population—that is what the Administering Authority is bequeathing the people of Tanganyika after forty years of rule. If we turn to one of the territories under British administration in West Africa, we shall find there again another example of the tragic outcome of many years of colonial oppression.

30. Thus, in the Trust Territory of the Cameroons under British administration, official data indicate that in the southern areas of the country 90 per cent of the population are illiterate. The figure for the northern areas is 96 per cent. This information may be found in the report of the Administering Authority for 1958 (page 298). According to UNESCO figures for 1957, Africa had about 100 million illiterates, representing 80 to 85 per cent of the continent's total population. Only 4.7 per cent of the African population—and in Angola, for example, only 1.4 per cent—were receiving elementary education. These figures are literally an indictment of colonialism, which beneath the mask of trusteeship has for many decades doomed the population of Africa to darkness and illiteracy.

31. All these facts show that the goal of the colonialists has not been the development of the colonies in the interests of their peoples—has not, in particular, been the development of education. The colonialists have deliberately kept the colonial peoples illiterate, and are still doing so; they have barred their access to education and have prevented them from acquiring trained leaders and administrators of their own—and all this with the aim of keeping them in a state of colonial slavery on the pretext that they lack adequate numbers of trained personnel, of qualified and educated people. The same position was taken by the representative of Belgium, in trying to justify to us Belgium's colonial rule over the Congo. But the results of this colonial rule are today making themselves acutely felt in the events at present taking place in the Congo.

32. In the large and populous territories with well-developed national liberation movements, the British colonialists try to do everything possible to put off the day for granting political independence, and to ensure that the European minorities in these countries continue in the future to maintain their positions of dominance. In the small territories, however, they take a different line—that of trying to preserve them as strongholds of colonialism, of merging or "uniting" them with the metropolitan country. That is the general policy followed by all the colonialists. The United States, the United Kingdom, France, Spain and Portugal are trying at all costs to retain such territories as the Panama Canal, Gibraltar, Singapore, Goa, Macao, West Irian, Belize, the Falkland Islands, the Azores and the Canary Islands, Fernando Po, Rfo Muni, Ifni and so forth as strategic bases and strongpoints for use in crushing the national liberation struggle of the colonial peoples and in bringing pressure to bear on neighbouring independent States.

33. It is for this reason that the second point in the Soviet draft declaration [A/4502], which refers to the liquidation of strongholds and strategic bases, is of great importance for the solution of the problem of the abolition of colonialism as a whole.

34. In his statement of 28 November [925th meeting], Mr. Ormsby-Gore, the representative of the United Kingdom, took a position opposed in principle to the existence as independent States of small territories at present under the colonial yoke. He referred in this connexion to territories having a population of under one million. The people of these territories, he felt, should not sacrifice economic and social "progress" in order to "assume responsibility for maintaining the expensive apparatus of a modern independent State". What solicitude for the lot of the small territories! It would seem in order to ask the United Kingdom representative a question on this point—and the United States representative too, since he takes the same position. What is their attitude to the existence as independent States of such countries as Luxembourg, with a population of 300,000, or Iceland, with a population of 164,000? Or do the United Kingdom and United States representatives have two different sets of standards, one for Western countries and another for African and Asian countries at present in a state of colonial dependence?

35. We take a different view. We believe that all colonial peoples ought to be liberated.

36. It was not for nothing, we suspect, that the United Kingdom representative referred in his statement to the twelve principles approved by the Fourth Committee [See A/C.4/L.648 and Add.1] and particularly to that part of them relating to the association or integration of a colony with an independent State. Clearly, the association or integration of the colonies with the metropolitan countries would be most convenient to the colonialists. They would like in this way to retain their position in those territories while at the same time formally complying with certain "principles" by proclaiming, for appearances' sake, that the goal of full self-government or independence for the colonies had already been attained. But there is one not unimportant fact that must be mentioned in this connexion. When the principles to which the United Kingdom representative referred were being discussed, many African and Asian representatives in the Fourth Committee emphasized that the peoples of the colonies must be guaranteed full freedom to express their will by democratic means, without any obstacles or threats. As such a guarantee of the free exercise of the will of the peoples of the colonies, the Delegations of Togo and Tunisia proposed, before the Fourth Committee [1043rd meeting], the adoption of a provision entitling the United Nations, whenever it felt that such action was necessary, to exercise supervision over the implementation of the right of the peoples of the colonies to free self-determination. The Soviet Union, the other socialist countries and most of the African and Asian countries supported that proposal. Yet the representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, France and other colonial Powers which hypocritically come forward here in the role of supporters of the free self-determination of peoples, opposed this proposal and voted against it in the Fourth Committee.

37. The United Kingdom representative devoted a considerable part of his statement to emphasizing the need of special care for the small territories. Let us see, then, how the colonialists actually care for the small territories and peoples. Let us take as our example, if you will, the tiny dependent territory of Nauru, an island under trusteeship, which has only some few thousand inhabitants. As you know, trusteeship over this territory is the responsibility of three States—the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand. It may be wondered why trusteeship over so small an island had to be assigned to so powerful a combination of forces. The answer is very simple: virtually the entire island of Nauru consists of phosphates, and for that reason the Governments of the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand came to an agreement on the exploitation of these phosphate deposits as far back as 1919. This agreement may with entire justification be called a colonial treaty for the robbery and apportionment of Nauru's natural resources. The agreement fixes the share of each party: the United Kingdom is to receive 42 per cent of the total output, Australia 42 per cent and New Zealand 16 per cent. Provision to this effect may be found in article 14 of the agreement signed on 2 July 1919. But even now that Nauru has formally been brought under the International Trusteeship System, the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand are still as in the past despoiling the island of its natural resources and gradually turning it into a barren desert. It has been calculated that Nauru's remaining deposits of phosphates will last for about another thirty to forty years; and its population will then have to abandon their island, since it will no longer provide them with a livelihood. For that reason, the Administering Authority declares—verbally—that it is preparing the population of Nauru for the attainment of the goal of trusteeship, that is, self-government or independence. In fact, however, and by its practical actions, it is simply preparing for the removal of the inhabitants of Nauru from the island so as to prevent them from interfering with the continued looting of its natural resources. In a document submitted to the Trusteeship Council, the Administering Authority has plainly stated that the only real possibility for the Nauruans is to agree to be re-settled as immigrants in some country in the Pacific region. And it is a statement of this kind that the Administering Authority tries to represent as reflecting the freely expressed will of the population of this Trust Territory, as an expression of its care for a small people under its trusteeship.

38. Such is the face of the old type of colonialism—what might be called the "classical" type. But in present-day conditions that is not the only and not the principle form of colonialism. In our day the mightiest colonial State is not enfeebled Britain or France, not decrepit Portugal or backward Spain, but the United States of America, the greatest imperial Power.

39. The United States representative, who for some reason preferred to speak at the very close of this debate, tried in his statement to infuse new life into the cold war themes which the United Kingdom representative had so carefully attempted to insinuate into our discussion. However, the statements of all the speakers who followed him showed that Mr. Wadsworth's efforts were just as unsuccessful as Mr. Ormsby-Gore's. A suitable answer to these two representatives of the two existing variants of national oppression—"classic" colonialism and neo-colonialism—was given by many speakers. Even the representatives of countries such as Honduras and Panama were obliged to acknowledge publicly that a number of territories seized or, as it is euphemistically termed, leased by the United States are, in fact, part of those countries. The statement made by the representative of Cuba completely demolished the hypocritical assertions of United States representatives that they have granted "freedom" to Puerto Rico and have no designs on the freedom and independence of other countries, the Latin American countries in particular.

40. Mr. Wadsworth's statement could easily have given some innocent the impression that the United States, the dominant colonial and imperial Power, is the best and most unselfish friend of the colonial peoples, that it is doing everything possible to bring about their liberation, and is moved to joy and ecstasy whenever a new independent State is born. In reality, however, the United States representative's remarks are made up partly of hypocrisy and partly of outright attempts to justify the preservation of colonial régimes indefinitely, on the pretext of preventing "chaos" and "violence" and of giving the colonies the training necessary to enable them to "stand on their own feet". Characteristically, the United States representative said not a word to us about when the United States proposes to grant independence to its own colonies—the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, Guam, the Virgin Islands, Samoa and Puerto Rico. Why is it that while New Zealand has agreed to terminate its trusteeship over Western Samoa in 1961, the United States still obstinately clings to its colony of Samoa and intends to keep that island in a state of colonial subjection? Why does the United States stubbornly refuse to grant independence to Puerto Rico, falsely and cynically asserting that the people of that country do not at present desire independence?

41. The United States representative yesterday enlarged at some length on the importance of ensuring that the dependent peoples are given the opportunity of freely and democratically expressing their will. Why, then, did the United States representative in the Fourth Committee vote at this session of the General Assembly against the African countries' proposals for United Nations supervision to ensure the free expression of the will of the colonial peoples, with a view to preventing the intrigues which the colonialists engage in with such alacrity? That in itself alone demonstrates the hypocrisy of United States "care" for the fate of the colonial peoples, and exposes that country's real colonialist policy.

42. While United States colonialism is in many respects similar to the colonialism of the old European Powers, it has an even more dangerous and sinister side. The history of United States colonialism, too, is full of wars and armed expeditions organized with a view to the seizure of foreign territories and the oppression of other peoples, or with a view to repressive action against "recalcitrant" native peoples. As we know, the Spanish-American War of 1898 was the first imperialist war fought for the repartitioning of an already partitioned world. As a result of that war the United States was able to take over the Philippines and Puerto Rico and to subjugate Cuba. The United States still holds some of these territories as outright colonies. But the inhabitants of these colonies, like the other colonial peoples, are legitimately demanding their freedom and independence, and consider that the time has come to put an end to American colonialism.

43. Let me cite as an example the statement made by two inhabitants of the Marshall Islands, Mr. Bolkein,

Magistrate of Kwajalein Atoll, and Mr. Amata Kabua, a former President of the Marshall Islands Congress, at the Trusteeship Council's twenty-sixth session. The petitioners declared as follows:

"Our complaints are simple. Our standard of living under United States rule has gone down. Our land has been taken for sixteen years and no payment was offered us until thirteen years after it was taken from us. Our island home has been made an atomic testing ground. Our people have suffered radiation sickness and burns and other serious damages.... Our ancient ways are being destroyed. We fear for our future as the Marshallese race....

"Many, many years ago we protected ourselves without help from any other nation. Then came the Spanish who protected us, and we became a colonial possession. Next the Germans came to protect us. This was more colonialism.... Now the United States is protecting us. We are still a part of colonialism. We think we can protect ourselves better and much more cheaply. We are willing to learn democracy. We believe that democracy is a good way. But we do not believe the way we are being treated is a good example of democracy.

"...Maybe it would be better if we were given our ancient freedom. The people of Africa and Asia are getting their freedom. We think we can do as good a job of governing ourselves as do these new countries."^{4/}

That is what these petitioners declared. That is the voice of the indigenous population of the American colonies—a voice which the United States, for all its efforts, will certainly never succeed in stifling.

44. In speaking of American colonialism, however, it has to be borne in mind that this type of colonialism is expressed not only in the form of the open seizure and possession of foreign territories, but also in the concealed—and therefore more dangerous—form of the subjugation and control of even formally independent territories and countries. The economic penetration of American monopolies into the countries of Latin America, Asia and Africa has resulted in the creation of an outwardly "invisible" United States colonial empire.

45. The main features of American colonialism which have taken shape in this way were described some years ago very expressively by Mr. Nehru, in a letter to his daughter dated 3 January 1933—at which time, of course, he was not his country's Prime Minister. This is what Mr. Nehru wrote to his daughter:

"Do not imagine that the Empire of the United States is confined to the Philippine Islands. Outwardly that is the only empire they have got, but, profiting by the experience and troubles of other imperialist powers, they have improved on the old methods. They do not take the trouble to annex a country, as Britain annexed India; all they are interested in is profit and so they take steps to control the wealth of the country. Through the control of the wealth it is easy enough to control the people of the country and, indeed, the land itself.

And so without much trouble, or friction with an aggressive nationalism, they control the country and share its wealth. This ingenious method is called economic imperialism. The map does not show it. A country may appear to be free and independent if you consult a geography or an atlas. But if you see behind the veil you will find that it is in the grip of another country, or rather its bankers and big businessmen. It is this invisible empire that the United States of America possess."^{5/}

46. The history of the years which have followed the writing of these words has only confirmed their truth. Since the Second World War, the characteristic feature of United States colonialism has been its drive to secure for itself the undivided dominion of the economically under-developed and colonial countries, to dislodge its competitors—in the name of the battle against "world communism"—from their positions, to take over their former colonial possessions, and to crush the national liberation movements in the countries of Asia, Latin America and Africa. Particularly active in recent years have been United States efforts to penetrate into Africa. While the commanding positions in Africa's economy are still, as in the past, in the hands of the United Kingdom and France, these countries are more and more being crowded out by American colonialism. This is well illustrated by the single fact that in 1959 United States private and public investment in Africa had already reached more than $2000 million, or more than twenty times the figure for the pre-war period. During the same period, American private investment in Africa rose by about 1100 per cent—which means that it had more than doubled the over-all rate of growth of United States private investment abroad. As a result, the tentacles of American monopoly capital have already fastened onto many African countries.

47. The United States is not in the slightest interested in the peoples of the colonies achieving full and genuine independence, for in that event the American monopolies would lose their privileged positions in the colonies, would lose the sources of their self-enrichment. The United States cannot be present in the ranks of those who fight for the liberation of the colonies and for the abolition of colonialism, since it takes a direct and active part in the spoliation of the colonies. American imperialism has become the dominant international exploiter, the main bastion of present-day colonialism.

48. Headed by the United States, the imperialists are making desperate efforts to continue by new methods and in new forms the colonial exploitation of the peoples of the former colonies. The monopolies are trying to retain in their hands the levers of economic control and political influence in the countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America. Their aim in these efforts is to preserve their old positions in the economies of the liberated countries and to gain possession of new positions under the cloak of economic "assistance", to inveigle the liberated countries into military blocs, to plant military dictatorships and set up military bases in them. The imperialists are trying to emasculate and subvert the national sovereignty of the liberated countries, to distort the meaning of self-determination, to impose on them, under the guise of "inter-dependence", new forms of colonial rule, to place imperialist puppets in power in the liberated colonial countries, to bribe part of their national bourgeoisie, and to exploit the poisoned weapon of ethnic discord in order to sap the strength of these young and still feeble States. For these purposes they make active use of aggressive military blocs and bilateral aggressive military alliances.

^{4/} This statement was made at the 1061st meeting of the Trusteeship Council, the official record of which was published only in summary form.

^{5/} Jawaharlal Nehru, Glimpses of World History, Allahabad, 1935, pp 748 and 749.

49. The main colonialist bloc is NATO. One of its fundamental purposes is to set up a system of collective colonialism and to organize collective measures for the repression of the national liberation movement in the colonies. For direct proof of this one need look no further than the fact that NATO includes in its ranks such colonial Powers as the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, the Netherlands and Portugal. This indicates that the colonial Powers, faced with the extraordinary drive of the national liberation movement and unable to meet it in isolation, are endeavouring to find the necessary strength in union. The United States has repeatedly and openly formed a united front with the old colonial Powers in combating the national liberation movement. It has interfered flagrantly in the internal affairs of many countries and tried to turn them into bases for attacks on other countries.

50. Convincing evidence of the fact that the United States is now assuming the role of main bastion of the colonial system may be found in the "Eisenhower doctrine", a doctrine of patently imperialist character based on the policy of "negotiating from strength". In the past, the function of policeman in the Near East was carried out mainly by the British and French imperialists; today, the United States is trying to step into that role. The United States-United Kingdom intervention in Lebanon and Jordan in 1958 showed the whole world what the "Eisenhower doctrine" means.

51. The position taken by the United States is creating serious difficulties for Indonesia in its struggle for West Irian. The United States prefers West Irian to remain in the hands of the Netherlands, which with time it may be able to edge out of this area—as occurred with France in South Viet-Nam.

52. Under the banner of the "Monroe Doctrine", the United States has declared Latin America its own preserve and sphere of influence. But the days of tranquil and undisturbed United States hegemony in Latin America are past. A new day has dawned—the day of growing national self-consciousness among the peoples of the American continent and of their emancipation from United States spoliation.

53. As the principal colonial Power, the United States gives active assistance to its decrepit and senile partners, the other colonial Powers, in order to preserve their rule over the peoples fighting for their freedom and independence. The United States helped the French colonialists in their unsavoury war against the people of Viet-Nam. Now it is giving the French militarists arms and financial and economic assistance in their efforts to crush the revolt of the people of Algeria. It must be said plainly that the colonial war in Algeria would be impossible, and the Algerian people would long ago have won their freedom and independence, if the American imperialists and colonialists had not given the French colonialists all possible assistance. And is it not a fact that the collective aggression of the NATO States in the Congo is being carried out with the direct help of the United States? I do not, of course, propose to embark at this point on a detailed analysis of the situation in the Congo; that is a special item on our agenda. But I think it desirable that I should draw attention to those general aspects of the question which are bound up with the problem of colonialism as a whole.

54. Events in the Congo have shown that the North Atlantic bloc, headed by the United States, has openly taken the field against the people of the Congo, who have united around the Government of Patrice Lumumba and the Congolese Parliament. The purpose of this aggression is to destroy the independence won by the Congolese people in a tenacious struggle. What is going on in the Congo at present is a redistribution of influence as between the colonial Powers—the United States, Belgium, the United Kingdom and France. This redistribution, as in similar cases in the past, is taking place on the basis of the new balance of forces and of changes in the appetites of the colonialists for the wealth of other peoples

55. The PRESIDENT: I hope the speaker at the rostrum will adhere to the statement of intention which he himself made just now and refrain from going into the question of the situation in the Congo in any detail. As he knows, this question is at present under discussion elsewhere, and it is also an item on the agenda of the Assembly, an item on which the Assembly has decided to adjourn debate. I hope, therefore, that he will not try to go into the question in any detail now. As he knows, other speakers who have seemed to do so have been asked to refrain from discussing the question of the Congo. I must ask the representative of the Soviet Union to do the same.

56. Mr. ZORIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (translated from Russian): As I said when I took up this point, it is not my intention to go into a detailed discussion of the problem of the Congo as such. My intention is to deal with it in its relation—and solely in its relation—to the problem of colonialism, and that is what I have largely done already. For the colonialists are as one man trying to exploit the example of the Congo as a "lesson" to the peoples of Africa, and trying to prove their theory—a theory they themselves invented—that the young African States which have won their independence will be unable to live and develop without the aid of those who for many decades and even centuries have crushed all attempts by the African peoples to win their freedom and independence. I am convinced, however, that the lessons which the peoples of Africa, Asia and the whole world will learn from the tragic example of the Congo will be different ones.

57. It is hardly necessary to show that a weak and backward country like Portugal could not possibly preserve its rule over eleven million Africans without assistance from the United States and its other NATO allies. Portugal has dared to defy all the African peoples and countries and to deny independence to Angola, Mozambique and its other colonies only because it feels itself to be supported by the other colonial Powers. I entirely agree with the following statement made by Mr. Nkrumah, President of the Republic of Ghana, in his address to the General Assembly at this session, on 23 September:

"In regard to Portugal, my view is that a particular responsibility rests on the NATO members who are also Members of the United Nations . . . " [869th meeting, para. 47].

58. But after all, how can the United States fail to help its Portuguese friends when the Portuguese colonies are dominated by American banks and companies like Standard Oil, the Chase National Bank, the National City Bank of New York and the Gulf Oil Corporation, which control most of the Portuguese diamond, petroleum, rubber and other companies? Thus, the colonialists form a mutual guarantee system—a system which reflects their moral and spiritual affinity. As the proverb has it, dog does not eat dog. Naturally, the United States cannot now come forward publicly in the United Nations and declare to the whole world, as it did at the close of the bilateral conversations between the United States and Portugal, that it supports Portugal and that there are no differences of opinion between the two States. At this session the United States representative prefers to keep silent on that point. It must nevertheless be pointed out that the question of the Portuguese and Spanish colonies has been discussed in some detail at this session in the Fourth Committee and that that discussion made it clear that Portugal is in a position of almost complete isolation.

59. Many delegations from African, Asian, socialist and other countries have sharply criticized the brutal colonialist practices established by Portugal in its colonies. They have cited many facts and a great deal of evidence, which the Portuguese representative was unable to refute. In addressing this plenary session [934th meeting], the Portuguese representative found no better way than to deny indiscriminately all the facts and arguments advanced by other delegations. But is it not a fact that a brutal system of racial discrimination and forced labour exists in the Portuguese colonies? Neither in the Fourth Committee nor in the plenary General Assembly has the Portuguese representative even attempted to deny that in the Portuguese colonies all the inhabitants are classified as "civilized" (assimilated) or "uncivilized". And that in the twentieth century! So far as legal form is concerned, Africans in the Portuguese colonies may raise themselves to the status of "assimilated", but to do that they must prove that they know the Portuguese language, are Catholics, possess specified means, and are willing to renounce local custom and their own culture and traditions and to live in European style. In actual fact, however, only three out of every thousand Africans have been able, after five centuries of Portuguese occupation, to acquire "assimilated" status; the rest are still as in the past called natives and denied all civil and political rights. They have no representation in any single administrative organ or in the metropolitan legislative organs; they enjoy no legal protection of any kind. They can be arbitrarily expelled from lands which have been theirs from time immemorial; the authorities can have them flogged or sent to do forced labour without trial for any misdemeanour. The only thing that is prohibited in the Portuguese colonies is the overt enslavement of the indigenous inhabitants; all other forms of servitude are not only not prohibited but sanctified by law.

60. In Mozambique, for example, systematic trade in Africans still goes on, under the guise of the contract system. Under the so-called Mozambique Convention of 1928, which is regularly renewed, 100,000 Negroes are exported every year from Mozambique to the Union of South Africa and about the same number to Rhodesia and Nyasaland. In addition, there is a special Government organization whose function it is to recruit labour for the gold-mines and coal-pits of the Transvaal. Most of the contracted workers, according to bourgeois observers, die on the journey, from sickness, hunger and epidemics, or perish on the job itself.

61. I should like to cite the issue for 8 April 1960 of The Guardian, an English newspaper. According to this newspaper, the use of forced labour in the Portuguese colonies has constantly expanded over the last twenty years; and the practice has now become so widespread that forced labour is the predominant form of labour both in Mozambique and in Angola. And allow me also to quote from a memorandum circulated to representatives attending the fifteenth session of the General Assembly by the Union of Peoples of Angola:

"The basic feature of Portuguese colonialism is Fascism of the worst type, bearing the stamp of the most inhuman racism. Racist policy is in practice carried out with brutal ferocity in the spheres of culture, economics and social affairs."

Later in the same document it is stated that:

"Since the beginning of 1959 a veritable policy of bloody intimidation has been carried on. Mass murders in so-called Portuguese Guinea, the arrival of military reinforcements in Angola, arrests, tortures and the exile of patriots in Angola, the distribution of arms to the colonialists, who are converted into militiamen authorized to destroy any suspicious individual. Our compatriots are subjected to every imaginable form of punishment and torture. Examples which can be cited are those of the patriot Alfred Bengé, who was left dumb and paralyzed, and Ramos Lundila, who lost his reason after torture with electricity and is now in a psychiatric institution . . . the patriots José Manuel Martins, Domingo João and Manuel Francisco were executed at Ramal de Bengo."

62. Can the Portuguese representative deny this testimony to the tortures, repressions and hardships inflicted on the indigenous population? Is it not a fact that in Mozambique about one out of every two new-born infants dies in the first days of life? Is it not a fact that 99 per cent of the indigenous population of Angola, Mozambique and other Portuguese colonies remain illiterate after five hundred years of "enlightened" administration and "civilization"?

63. The Portuguese representative prefers to remain silent on these matters and merely to assert gratuitously that some delegations engage in "propaganda" and make unjustified attacks on Portugal. He even goes so far as to assert that those delegations which are trying to bring about the abolition of the colonialist order in the Portuguese colonies are interfering in Portugal's internal affairs; that in any event, Portugal has no colonies at all, but only overseas provinces. The falsity of such assertions is quite obvious. For the mere fact that on 11 June 1951 the Portuguese Constitution was amended by proclaiming the Portuguese colonies to be overseas provinces in no way altered the situation of these territories, and the colonial system has continued in them quite unchanged. No one, I need hardly say, will be deceived by legal sophistries or chicaneries of that kind, and the demand voiced by all freedom-loving peoples that the shameful phenomenon of colonialism be brought to an end applies fully and without qualification to the Portuguese colonies too. And if the Portuguese colonialists stop their ears to the voice of reason and fail to understand the historical inevitability of the collapse of the colonial order, then they will ultimately be swept from the face of Asia and Africa by the mighty surge of the national liberation movement.

64. We have not cited all these facts merely for the sake of criticizing the colonial Powers: this has not been criticism for the sake of criticism. The Soviet Union, with other peace-loving and freedom-loving countries, tirelessly opposes the colonial system, because it is vile, because it means depriving entire peoples of elementary rights and freedoms, because it is a mockery of human dignity, because it means the humiliation and suffering of the many millions of inhabitants of the colonies.

65. The total collapse of the system of colonial slavery under the pressure of the national liberation movement is inevitable; it is an irresistible and irreversible process. A sharp intensification in the struggle of the colonial peoples for their liberation took place under the impetus of the great October Socialist Revolution, which awakened the East and swept the colonial peoples into the general tide of the world revolutionary movement of emancipation. History is confirming the truth of the prophecy made by the great Lenin that:

"The period of the awakening of the East to the revolution of our times will be followed by a period in which all the peoples of the East will take part in deciding the destinies of the whole world, will cease to be a mere object of exploitation; a period in which all peoples will decide the destinies of all mankind."

The victory of the Soviet Union in the Second World War, the establishment of the people's democratic system in a number of countries of Europe and Asia, the triumph of the socialist revolution in China, the formation of a world socialist system have enormously accelerated the development of this process.

66. The heroic struggle of the colonial peoples and the support given them in that struggle by the socialist and other freedom-loving countries—those are the basic factors ensuring the collapse of the colonial system. But for the existence of the world socialist system, the imperialists would by their united efforts have crushed the national liberation movement in the colonial and dependent countries. But the world balance of forces is now such that the colonialists can no longer, even by force of arms, stave off the disintegration of the colonial system. The special feature of the situation in our day is that the imperialists, under pressure from the peoples and given the existence of a mighty camp of peace and socialism, are compelled in many cases to withdraw "peacefully" from their colonies, although they strive to enmesh them in inconscionable agreements of various kinds. With the representatives of the colonial Powers in mind, Mr. Khrushchev, the head of the Soviet Government, in a statement made to the General Assembly at this session, said:

"We cannot, of course, expect that our proposals for the liquidation of the colonial system, consistent though they are with mankind's vital interests, will meet with sympathy on the part of those who are still clinging to the colonial order of things. I can hear in advance the criticism of those who defend the colonial system. But to those accustomed to build their prosperity at the expense of the oppressed peoples of the colonies we say this: Think, look carefully at what is happening around you. If not today, then soon, very soon, will come the final collapse of the colonial order, and if you do not get out of the way in time, you will be swept away just the same. The life of the doomed colonial system of government cannot be lengthened either by plots or even by force of arms. Such efforts will merely intensify and embitter the struggle of the peoples against this utterly decayed system." [869th meeting, para. 221].

67. The Soviet Union fights consistently and as a matter of principle for the immediate liquidation of the disgraceful colonial system. We openly criticize the colonial Powers and do not fear their slanders or insinuations, for we are fighting for a just cause—the freedom and independence of the colonial peoples. Our present statement is a reply not only to those representatives of the colonial Powers who have spoken from this rostrum in the course of this debate, but also to the representatives of France, Spain and the Netherlands, who have preferred to keep silent. We regard that as a ruse on the part of colonialists who are waging war in Algeria and are maintaining their occupation of various territories in Africa and Asia. We say bluntly to the representatives of the colonial Powers: Understand the historical necessity and inevitability of the liquidation of colonialism; quit the colonies of your own volition and with whole skins. Otherwise the peoples of the colonies will throw you out of their countries. At this moment you are being called upon in the United Nations to agree to grant the colonial peoples their independence peacefully. But if the colonialists refuse to take this course and compel the oppressed peoples to take up arms to expel their discredited oppressors, then it will be the duty of all peace-loving countries to give assistance of every kind in the righteous cause of the national liberation of the colonial peoples.

68. The debate on the colonial system at this fifteenth session of the General Assembly puts the United Nations to a serious test. Colonialism will be destroyed whatever may happen, with or without the help of the United Nations, for the collapse of the colonial system is part of the objective march of history, which no one can arrest. But the issue for the United Nations is this: either that Organization will hasten progress, or, remaining indifferent to the destinies of millions of oppressed people and allowing itself to be controlled by the colonialists, it will stand aside from this progress, or, what is worse, will be an obstacle to the speedy abolition of the despicable colonial system.

69. The broad discussion which has taken place on the subject of the draft declaration on the grant of independence to colonial countries and peoples has shown that world public opinion is so strongly in favour of the immediate and complete abolition of colonialism that it cannot be ignored by the colonial Powers. As the debate has shown, most delegations take their stand on behalf of a genuine struggle against colonialism. The Soviet delegation has listened with great attention and interest to the statements made by the representatives of Ceylon, Saudi Arabia, Ghana, Guinea, Mali, the United Arab Republic, India, Indonesia, Morocco, Iraq and other countries of Africa and Asia, and is gratified to note the community of aspirations and goals in the struggle against colonialism which was manifested in those statements.

70. At the same time, it has to be noted that some delegations, while paying lip-service to the cause of anti-colonialism, in actual fact came to the defence of colonialist interests and argued in favour of putting off the inevitable end of the colonial system. For example, the representative of the Philippines [933rd meeting], despite the fact that at the last moment he even joined the original co-sponsors of the African-Asian draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6], made it clear that he interpreted the purposes and intentions of that draft resolution in a way completely different from the purposes and intentions of the overwhelming majority of its co-sponsors. He gave a mistaken interpretation of paragraph 5 of the African-Asian draft resolution, asserting that it did not imply the immediate transfer of all powers to the peoples of the colonies. It would appear that the representative of the Philippines set himself the task of subverting the meaning of the African-Asian draft resolution and castrating it for the benefit of the colonialists. That, essentially, was also the position taken by the Argentine representative [927th meeting], who, in effect, opposed the immediate liberation of the colonies and appealed to us not to precipitate artificially the process of decolonization, which, in his view, is going ahead at a rapid pace. He also opposed the establishment of a time-limit for the grant of independence to colonial countries and peoples. It is clear that statements of this kind merely encourage the colonial Powers in their refusal to grant the colonies freedom and independence. The representative of Honduras went even further. He has submitted a draft resolution [A/L.324/Rev.1] which amounts to a colonialist proposal. The Honduran draft resolution can be regarded only as a diversionary manoeuvre directed against the desire of the great majority of Members of the United Nations to put an end to colonialism. The Soviet delegation will of course vote against the Honduran proposal, which, while it puts up a show of opposition to the colonial system, actually implies the continuance of that system. We are confident that the General Assembly will not allow itself to be diverted from dealing with historically important issues, whatever tricks and manoeuvres the colonial Powers and their myrmidons may resort to.

71. The debate in plenary Assembly has also shown that there are a number of delegations which for various reasons either will not or cannot put the question of the abolition of colonialism in sharp and decisive form; which are aiming at some sort of "compromise" on the question with the colonial Powers. They apparently do not realize that on a matter of principle as vital for millions of people as the abolition of colonialism, efforts at compromise with the colonialists can only harm the anti-colonial struggle, can only operate to the advantage of the foreign oppressors. Any concession to the colonialists will prolong the sufferings of the colonial peoples. Surely that has been proved by the fourteen years of unsuccessful search for a compromise with the Government of the Union of South Africa on the question of South West Africa. The outcome of such concessions to the South African colonialists has been the preservation of colonial slavery in South West Africa and the de facto annexation of that territory.

Further evidence of the pernicious results of concessions to the colonialists and of efforts at compromise with them is provided by the present tragic situation of the Congolese people.

72. For that reason, the Soviet Union's view is that the question of the abolition of colonialism must be raised in consistent and decisive form, and that a radical solution to it must be found within the framework of the United Nations. Such a solution means that the General Assembly would have to express quite definitely, at this session, its support for the immediate and final abolition of colonialism in all its forms and manifestations. The Soviet delegation considers that the draft declaration submitted by the Soviet Union for consideration at this session [A/4502] most fully meets the demands of the colonial peoples, since it calls for their immediate and complete liberation from foreign rule. That is a demand made by life itself. Such a decision would have enormous historic—and immediately practical—significance. It would hasten the hour of liberation of all peoples from foreign oppression, and would enable us to end the shameful phenomenon of colonialism for good. We are convinced that all countries which are sincerely interested in the grant of freedom and independence without delay to all colonies and Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories will support the draft declaration submitted by the Soviet Union.

73. In accordance with rule 93 of the rules of procedure of the General Assembly, the Soviet draft declaration should be put to the vote first, since it was introduced for consideration first. The Soviet delegation formally proposes that that procedure, which is provided for in the rules of procedure, should be followed.

74. With regard to the draft resolution submitted by the African and Asian States [A/L.323 and Add.1-6], the Soviet delegation applauds the desire shown by the overwhelming majority of African and Asian delegations that measures should be taken at the fifteenth session of the General Assembly to advance the realization of that lofty goal—the complete liberation of the peoples of all colonies and dependent countries. We remember that as long ago as 1955, the representatives of twenty-nine Asian and African States proclaimed at Bandung that colonialism in all its manifestations is an evil which should be speedily brought to an end. We also remember that in 1960, at Addis Ababa, the representatives of ten independent African countries and of a number of African territories which had not yet obtained their independence, addressed an urgent appeal to the colonial Powers to fix dates in conformity with the will of the people for the attainment of independence by all non-independent countries, and to communicate those dates to the people concerned.

75. The Soviet delegation reserves the right to speak at a later stage and explain its views on the specific provisions of the African-Asian draft resolution.

Mr. Hasan (Pakistan), Vice-President, took the Chair.

76. Mr. SOSA RODRIGUEZ (Venezuela) [translated from Spanish]: The discussion in this Assembly of item 87 entitled "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples" unquestionably constitutes a landmark of decisive importance in the history of mankind. The mere fact that an item whose object is a solemn proclamation that colonialism should once and for all be considered a thing of the past has been included in the agenda of this Assembly without reservations or objections, is evidence of the vast progress being made in this second half of the twentieth century in regard to the recognition of human dignity.

77. The history of colonialism is almost as old as the history of the world itself. It is the history of the desire of the stronger to dominate the weaker. By whatever title the process is graced and on whatever pretext it is carried out, it is always the history of the exploitation of the weaker by the stronger. Everywhere and at all times, a colonial system has invariably begun with an act of force, the imposition by force of a system contrary to the legitimate and natural aspirations of the human being. It is therefore not surprising that in all times and places there has always been a violent reaction to this system. History is full of examples of so-called colonial wars; both wars of conquest and wars to preserve conquests already made.

78. Underlying any colonial system—and I do not think this is an over-simplification—there have always been two factors: a belief in the racial, cultural or intellectual superiority of certain peoples over others, and a desire to exploit the natural resources of some peoples for the benefit of others. In certain cases there has also been a desire for territorial expansion as a solution to problems of over-population.

79. Human relations being a complex and subtle matter, other factors have also entered into the phenomenon of colonialism, and for that reason the balance sheet of colonial régimes has not been entirely negative. Many peoples have attained higher levels of culture and material progress under the influence of the colonizing country, but that is not a sufficiently cogent argument to justify the evil inherent in all colonial régimes. Except for the missionaries who went to foreign lands in a spirit of selfless devotion to preach their faith and whose goal was to win souls for God, I doubt whether any colonial undertaking could be said to be free of ulterior motives.

80. Nevertheless, the fact that Spain's colonial endeavour in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries was marked by that spiritual quality gave it special features which we do not find in the colonialization of the twentieth century. Throughout the period of the Spanish colonial régime in America in the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Spain and its American colonies were gradually forging a common identity. The children of the "conquistadores" were children of America and the American territories became an extension of Spain. That is why the American peoples, who on acquiring a sense of their own individuality, struggled for long years to win their independence from Spain, nevertheless retain for it the love of children for their mother—we even call Spain the mother country—since Spanish blood flows in our veins and our language and religion are also a legacy of Spain.

81. Racial discrimination is unknown to Spanish America and the concept of a superior race or people is completely alien to us. It is for that reason that the process of colonialization in Asia and especially in Africa, despite the benefits which the peoples of the colonies may sometimes have derived from it, has always been repugnant to our consciences and has stirred us deeply.

82. Venezuela was called upon to play a leading part in the process of the emancipation of America, and it is to the genius and perseverance of Simón Bolívar that six nations of our continent owe their independence. That is why there exists in my country a profound antipathy to colonialism and a lively sympathy for the cause of the peoples who are still struggling for their independence.

83. The Charter of the United Nations unquestionably marked a great advance towards the solution of the problem of colonialism and brought hope to those peoples still subjected to that régime. Clearly, the existence of the colonial régime is incompatible with many of the principles embodied in our Charter, and the provisions of Chapters XI and XII, viewed in the spirit of the Charter, can be considered only as the last compromise between the interests of the colonial Powers and the powerful movement in favour of the sacred principles of self-determination of peoples and absolute equality among men.

84. The system established by the Charter has yielded excellent results and, thanks to the increasing acceptance of its guiding principles by the peoples, we have witnessed the emergence since 1945 of a large number of newly independent States which are today Members of the United Nations. Millions of human beings are, however, still living under the colonial régime and, in their interest, more rapid progress must be made. The declaration on the independence of those countries and peoples, which we are discussing in this year 1960, will meet this requirement and fulfil that legitimate aspiration. This declaration will be the instrument which will make possible the adoption of measures directed towards the final eradication of colonialism. The United Nations must continue to play a vital part in this process, by providing the newly independent nations with the technical assistance they need and by protecting them from economic dependence on the former colonial Power, or on any other Power.

85. Political independence does not by itself constitute real independence; it needs to be accompanied by economic independence. That is why the principle of the right of peoples to the use of their natural resources is of such importance; in other words, this right is an integral part of the right of self-determination. Natural resources should be used for the advantage and benefit of the country owning them, subject of course to the obligations stemming from economic co-operation among nations and from international law.

86. The course of events is the same with nations as with individuals. A human being cannot develop his talents to the full or be truly free unless, in addition to enjoying all the civil and political rights which freedom implies, he has reached a certain level of economic well-being which enables him to make effective use of that freedom. In the field of domestic law, we can trace this process of liberation from the French Revolution, which established the principle of equality before the law and abolished class privileges, to the enactment during the past and especially the present century of social legislation specifically designed to protect the worker and the economically weak classes. This process of evolution which has taken place in domestic law in relation to the individual is the same as is now taking place in international law in relation to nations, and in this process the existence of the United Nations has unquestionably been, and will continue to be, a dominant and decisive factor. The declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, which this Assembly will adopt, will constitute a major landmark in this process of evolution.

87. Although the declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples refers specifically to those countries and peoples which the United Nations Charter defines as Non-Self-Governing or Trust Territories, it must in fact have a much wider application, as it once again endorses the principle of self-determination of peoples, which includes the right of every people to choose its own form of government, to enjoy its spiritual and material patrimony without restriction, to live freely in accordance with its most cherished traditions, and to be exempt from any form of subjection to any other more powerful nation or people.

88. This point underlines a characteristic which any declaration on the abolition of colonialism must possess, namely, universality. Such a declaration is, in effect, based on universal principles which cannot be limited to any particular time or place. These are the principles underlying the dignity of the human being and the undeniable right of peoples to freedom:

freedom to become independent nations; freedom to choose the political system which most closely corresponds to their traditions and ideals; freedom of education; freedom of religion; in short, freedom to live their own lives, subject only to respect for the same rights of other peoples. The declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples must, therefore, apply to all countries and peoples in all continents who remain subject to the colonial régime or who do not enjoy such independence, and it must also apply not only to the past and the present, but also to the future in the sense that independent countries must be prevented from again falling victims to colonialism.

89. It is in this broad sense that my delegation interprets any declaration against colonialism, and it is from this standpoint that it will vote on the draft resolutions submitted for the consideration of this Assembly. In voting in favour of a declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, the Venezuelan delegation will merely reaffirm the position it has consistently taken and endorsed by its votes and its statements in the United Nations in favour of the independence of all peoples and the implementation in all continents of the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations Charter.

The meeting rose at 5:30 p.m.

1. The PRESIDENT: The first speaker on my list this morning is the representative of Portugal, in exercise of the right of reply.

2. Mr. GARIN (Portugal): Using the most insulting language, the baseness of which I can only guess at from the English translation, the Soviet representative, at the 939th meeting, unrestrainedly insulted Portugal and the Portuguese people from this rostrum. Pursuing his Government's well-known policy of injecting falsehoods and distortions into any issue, the Soviet representative embarked the other day on a rampant and vicious attack against many countries. My own country was included, and the Soviet representative unleashed against us unprovoked, unjustified, unwarranted, gratuitous and thoroughly malevolent accusations. This abuse by the Soviet delegation of a self-respecting Member of this Organization cannot go unanswered.

3. The Soviet representative began his false allegations by asserting that in the Portuguese Overseas Provinces are found " . . . American banks and companies like Standard Oil, the Chase National Bank, the National City Bank of New York and the Gulf Oil Corporation, which control most of the Portuguese diamond, petroleum, rubber and other companies" [939th meeting, para. 58]. None of these allegations is true. Neither the National City Bank nor the Standard Oil Company nor the Chase National Bank controls anything in Portuguese territory, nor have they in any territory even an agency. All those who know the Portuguese economy and who are acting in good faith are very much aware that there is no American control, nor any foreign control for that matter, over any Portuguese enterprises or companies, and that any American interests, as they may exist, are negligible. Besides, in accordance with Portuguese law, the administration of any company or enterprise, even though it may have some foreign capital, must always remain in Portuguese hands; and under the provisions of the current Portuguese legislation, foreign capital is not allowed to hold more than 40 per cent of the total social capital. Therefore, we have here a plain falsehood and a plain distortion of the true facts.

4. The Soviet representative also placed before the Assembly the question whether or not it was a fact that in Portuguese territory " . . . a brutal system of racial discrimination and of forced slave labour exists . . . " [ibid., para. 59]. No, it is not a fact. It is merely another falsehood, and we firmly and strongly repudiate it. I am not going to burden the Assembly with details, but I must say that there is absolute freedom of labour and absolute freedom of choice of employment. Furthermore, my Government has ratified the Convention concerning Forced or Compulsory Labour of 1930^{1/} and the Convention concerning the Abolition of Forced labour of 1957^{2/} of the International Labour Organisation. Also, the Portuguese Constitution and the labour laws explicitly prohibit forced labour, or any other form of compulsory labour, which is considered by us as a crime. Anyone wishing to do so can consult our laws.

5. As for the allegation concerning racial discrimination, no imagination, no matter how fertile, could conceive of any more unjust and unfounded accusation, nor of any accusation which could have hurt us more deeply had it come from a responsible source. Let me quote a responsible source, the renowned historian Arnold Toynbee, who in an article published in The New York Times magazine section of 7 August 1960 wrote:

"There are large and important sections of the human race in which race prejudice is conspicuous by its absence: I am thinking particularly of the Moslems and of the Spanish-speaking and Portuguese-speaking peoples."

And again, the same historian wrote in the same article:

"Anyway, the freedom of the Spanish- and of the Portuguese-speaking peoples from race feeling is an unquestionable fact, whatever its historic origins may be."

6. I could quote many other independent and responsible authorities, but I doubt that the Soviet representative would be much interested in independent and responsible sources.

7. Here is another accusation by the Soviet delegation:

"Neither in the Fourth Committee nor in the plenary General Assembly has the Portuguese representative even attempted to deny that in the Portuguese colonies all the inhabitants are classified as

^{1/} International Labour Conference, Conventions and Recommendations, 1919-1949 (Geneva, International Labour Office, 1949), Convention No. 29.

^{2/} International Labour Office, Official Bulletin, vol. XL (1957), No. 1, Convention No. 105.

'civilized' (assimilated) or 'uncivilized'." [939th meeting, para. 59.]

The Portuguese delegation has done more than try to deny; we have strongly denied it, and, what is more, the Portuguese delegation has explained in detail that such accusations have no foundation whatever in Portuguese law or practice. The indisputable fact is that the distinction between "civilized" and "uncivilized" is unknown to Portuguese law and if others, like the Soviet delegation, have framed such an invention for reasons of propaganda and political expediency, the fault is not ours and we reject any such blame.

8. For those who may be interested in more details, I would refer them to the debates in the Fourth Committee on this question in which this point was fully explained beyond doubt.

9. Then the Soviet delegation has stated that in one Portuguese territory there has been carried on "a veritable policy of bloody intimidation" and "mass murders" [ibid., para. 61]. Those were the actual words. This is a most outrageous accusation and, unless the Soviet delegation is accustomed to taking such things lightly, it seems to my delegation inconceivable that any responsible member of this Assembly should make such preposterous statements without substantiation and without the vaguest proof.

10. I strongly protest against these outrageous accusations made by the Soviet delegation. There is still another falsehood. The Soviet representative said that the inhabitants of our overseas territories "have no representation in any single administrative organ or in the metropolitan legislative organs" [ibid., para. 59]. It is not true; they have such representation. The Soviet representative said that the population "may be arbitrarily expelled from lands which have been theirs from time immemorial" [ibid.]. It is not true; they cannot.

11. Shall I go on? I do not wish to try the patience of the Assembly. I submit that it would be a divine miracle if the Soviet Government which, by ruthless and violent means, has consistently denied freedom, and whose record of oppression is second to none, were truly interested in what it calls the freedom of colonial peoples. Actually, we are left with the same old story of Soviet manoeuvres in this Assembly. They will use anything—that is, anything but the truth—or anyone, to plant the seeds of hatred and chaos on earth so that the ground will be ripe for communist conquest and exploitation, through penetration in Africa and elsewhere in the world, so as to carry out the "prophecy of the great Lenin" to which the Soviet representative referred at the same meeting [ibid., para. 65].

12. These matters of the subjugation of peoples and territories, physical and moral slavery complete with political repression, deportations of people en masse, forced immigration, absolute lack of political and intellectual freedom, constant threats against other nations and peoples, exploitation of the weak, of which the Soviet representative spoke at length in his slanderous speech, are well known characteristics of the new type of colonialism which the world is facing: Soviet colonialism. It is tragically ironical that the Soviet representative carried his effrontery to the point of accusing the Portuguese nation of murderous activities. And who is making this accusation? It is the representative of the Soviet empire, if you please.

13. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Argentina to exercise his right of reply.

14. Mr. AMADEO (Argentina) (translated from Spanish): In his speech made on 7 December [939th meeting] the representative of the Soviet Union referred to the attitude adopted by the Argentine delegation in this debate.

15. The Soviet representative has blatantly distorted the views expressed by Argentina by asserting that, inasmuch as my speech showed, as he puts it, that we were opposed to the artificial acceleration of the decolonization process, it was encouraging the colonial Powers to refuse independence to their colonies.

16. The position of the Argentine delegation regarding the liquidation of the colonial system has been so clearly expounded that it does not need to be explained. In my speech I said:

"The important thing to note is that whatever judgement may be passed on the system now or by future historians, colonialism no longer fits into the political structure of our time. . . . It does not matter now what explanation or justification those systems may have had in the past. What is important is that in our day and age we should refuse to allow them to continue." [927th meeting, para. 17.]

17. This point of view is sufficiently clear-cut to require no clarification. The fact that we believe that the transfer of power to the new States must be effected as far as possible peacefully and in accord with the former metropolitan Powers and within the time-limits that are most convenient to the liberated countries, does not in any way mean that we modify the statement of principle affirming our opposition to the existence of the colonial system.

18. Accordingly, our vote in favour of the African-Asian draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6] is based on the conviction that the immediate steps referred to in paragraph 5 of the declaration imply the creation without delay of the conditions requisite for independence. We do not believe, on the other hand, that they presuppose an obligation to transform the existing juridical system.

19. It seems to us that the countries most directly interested in these problems have adopted a much more realistic attitude and one, undoubtedly, that will prove more advantageous to the non-self-governing peoples than those countries which have made a propaganda slogan out of the colonial problem.

20. As far as our attitude is concerned, we will allow no one to interpret it in a sense that is contrary to the letter and the spirit of our own words. We can accept criticism of the views we express but we reject interpretations which, whether from fair or from unfair motives, seek to change them.

21. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Spain to exercise his right of reply.

22. Mr. DE LEQUERICA (Spain) (translated from Spanish): At the meeting on Wednesday last, 7 December [939th meeting], the representative of the Soviet Union made a speech which was heard by several members of the Spanish delegation, including myself personally, in its Spanish interpretation. We found not the slightest mention in it of the Canary Islands. Neither is any reference made in the Spanish text of the Soviet speech as it appeared in the provisional verbatim record to this province of Spain. But, on studying the English and French texts, we find a list which the Soviet representative gave of the various territories, some of them Spanish, which are customarily quoted in such cases, which could serve as bases for colonialism in countries other than the metropolitan countries, and we find cited in this list the Canary Islands.

23. I do not desire to offend the intelligence of fellow representatives, for you are all well aware of the fact that the Canaries are a very ancient Spanish province, an older member of the Spanish national community than some of the provinces in the European peninsula. Christopher Columbus stopped at the Canaries when he was sailing to America and the Canaries were a real centre for spreading the creative work of Spain in the Western hemisphere. In America, during the centuries when it was united with the Spanish crown, people talked constantly of "peninsular Spaniards" and "Canarian Spaniards". Many Americans of Central and South America come from the Canaries, speak our language and belong to our race. The greatest Spanish novelist of the nineteenth century, Galdós, came from the Canaries. It is, therefore, a historical monstrosity, unworthy of the culture of the Soviet delegation, to say what was stated by its spokesman. It is to manifest ignorance of something that any schoolboy with a slight knowledge of European geography knows.

24. A Minister of the Spanish Government, Mr. Carrero Blanco, gave a good definition of the historical and geographical character of Spain when he said that the Spanish nation is, geographically, a peninsula that has a tenuous link with the European continent and various islands and territories in the Atlantic and Mediterranean that are Spanish land. The peninsula, the Minister went on, has a great resemblance to an island. The sole bond of union of our nation is the sea, and he concluded by saying that we are an immense archipelago.

25. But, above all, the Soviet Union representative's statement implies an attack on Spain's sovereignty and integrity, which are guaranteed by the Charter of the United Nations, and against this we enter a most energetic protest and we deeply regret that such an act of aggression should have occurred in these discussions.

26. When the United Kingdom representative referred [925th meeting] to mass deportations of whole populations of the Soviet Union and to the suppression of nationality which accompanied those deportations, pointing out that this had happened to the Crimean Tartars, the Kalmucks and other smaller communities, the representative of the Soviet Union violently protested and, bursting with indignation, came to this platform to declare that it was a violation of the principles generally recognized as governing the proceedings of this Assembly. And he requested the President to protect the Soviet delegation and the delegations of other States against such an attempt to interfere in the domestic affairs of a country. I take the opportunity of making the same appeal in this case and, following the precedent thus established, I appeal to you, in the spirit and the letter of our Charter, to take cognizance of this unspeakable attack made by the delegation of the Soviet Union, which obviously has no respect for the law nor for the text, that we all know so well, of the Charter. The Soviet Union has two quite different methods of approach to a problem; whenever any reference is made to the notorious Soviet imperialism or colonialism, it immediately voices a loud protest but, at the same time, it does not hesitate, as the whole history of the Soviet régime shows, to intervene in the domestic affairs of other countries and to attack the territorial integrity of my country, as it did last Wednesday.

27. As we are only very indirectly affected by colonial problems, we can speak on the subject in an impartial and disinterested fashion. I take advantage of this occasion—though I had not intended to intervene in this discussion—to pay tribute to the honest way in which the African and Asian countries, in spite of the major interest they have in the problem, have avoided making the same mistake in this discussion as the Soviet delegation and have maintained the debate on colonialism on the appropriate intellectual and political level, without resorting to the acrobatic tricks of those who seek not to achieve the progress of mankind but to find pretexts for confusing the issue.

28. As I have this opportunity here, I cannot refrain from mentioning that the peoples of Central and Southern America have given recognition in moving terms—and these are gratefully acknowledged—and on a high intellectual and critical level to the past history of Spain and have maintained their links with the old European peninsula and its Canary Islands, Balearic Islands and other island provinces.

29. Before concluding, I must say that God forbid I should follow the bad example set by the Soviet Union, as that would only mean interrupting the very important discussions that have been begun and which, as I have already said, concern the social advancement of the whole world. Were I to be tempted, however—which God forbid—merely to read an article in The New York Times of 24 September 1960, we would find subject matter to talk about Soviet colonialism for many more meetings. This article enumerates all the countries which have been "colonized" by violence by Soviet Russia, and I have no desire to mention the nations that figure among us here as independent nations since we have very definite scruples on this point. There was a discussion in this Assembly on the question of Tibet and, as we were not sure that Tibet was independent of Chinese suzerainty, we abstained from voting out of respect for the Charter, although the aggression committed there was obvious. In the article in The New York Times, as I was saying, you will find listed, among the countries colonized by the Soviet Union, Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Armenia, Georgia, Azerbaijan, Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Kirgizia, Tadzhikistan, Kazakhstan, Tartu and the Yakut and Buriat territories. What a long time we could spend discussing each and every one of these problems and submitting proposals designed to alleviate the lot of those peoples. But, I repeat, it would never occur to us to do so.

30. And without going such a distance or delving into all the complications of human geography, we could, with reference to Sir Leslie Munro's report,^{3/} cite the case of the Hungarians. And we could, by merely taking a glance at the map, mention Eastern Germany. But we prefer for the moment not to trouble this meeting with such superfluous references which do little honour to those who make them and would carry no more serious weight than would be implicit in, say, a request by us to free Odessa or Leningrad from Soviet colonialism.

31. Mr. RAKOTOMALALA (Madagascar) (translated from French): The speakers who have preceded me at this rostrum have defined in very lofty intellectual phrases the object and purposes of the discussion which is now proceeding in the United Nations General Assembly and is being attentively followed by the whole world. The peoples who are longing for their emancipation are turning hopefully towards us and are expecting that speedy and positive solutions will emerge from our proceedings.

32. I shall now deal briefly with the substance of the problem.

33. With the advent of the eighteenth century and the French Revolution, despotic régimes disappeared and the rights of man were affirmed.

34. Slavery was abolished in the nineteenth century.

35. The twentieth century should see the triumph of equality as between all peoples. In the first half of this century human folly led men to kill their fellow-men in two terrible wars. Now, in the second half of the century, the peoples, having reached the age of reason, will no longer, so we hope, seek to subjugate one another.

36. The hearts of all who yearned for independence were filled with immense joy when, fifteen years ago, the Charter of the United Nations drafted at San Francisco solemnly declared that the Powers which had control over non-self-governing peoples had the obligation to lead them towards self-government and democratic management of their own affairs. A fresh chapter was thus opened up in the book of the life of nations and we have the privilege now of writing the last pages which will prepare for the closing of this chapter.

37. The draft resolution of which Madagascar is a sponsor [A/L.323 and Add.1-6] is designed to give a firm reminder to the Powers who still administer Non-Self-Governing Territories that it is high time that the provisions of the Charter be implemented all over the world and that the United Nations resolutely follow the policy which is laid down in the Charter and which should end in the abolition of colonialism.

38. My country has regained its international sovereignty after a break of sixty-four years. Determined as it is to safeguard this priceless gift of independence, it has entered the big family of the United Nations firmly resolved to contribute unreservedly to the maintenance of peace and the territorial integrity of States, but also, and above all, to pursue the lofty ideal of fraternity and equality which is the very foundation of the United Nations.

39. My delegation sincerely hopes that the draft resolution which it submits to you jointly with all the other African and Asian States will be adopted unanimously or, at any rate, by such a large majority that it will have to be regarded as manifesting the determination of the peoples of the world not to accept any further useless and endless delays. It is convinced that the Powers who are still administering Non-Self-Governing Territories will loyally bow to this will and will immediately take steps to enable the populations concerned to express their feelings freely. It considers that it is the duty of these Powers, in any case, to prepare all the peoples for democratic self-government. Preparations must forthwith be made by stages to ensure that changes of status are made in orderly fashion, to see that the essential organs of modern administration are installed as soon as possible and that fully qualified nationals get immediately accustomed to the exercise of authority.

40. It is only by following this peaceful procedure, which Madagascar itself was fortunate to experience when France granted her internal autonomy in 1957 and independence in 1960, that the struggles and disorders can be avoided which bring suffering on the populations and leave germs of hatred and xenophobia behind in peoples' hearts.

41. My delegation makes a very broad-based appeal, therefore, to the consciences of the administering Powers and begs them to comply not only with the letter but also with the spirit of our draft resolution.

42. My delegation also trusts that the peoples who will be called upon to choose their future lot will fully realize the obligations they will have to assume on gaining their freedom. As they evoke and strengthen their national feelings and their patriotism, let them also try to ensure that their accession to international sovereignty is not accompanied by disorder, for the accession to such sovereignty should not be motivated by hatred but should form an important contribution to friendship and concord between men and nations.

43. It is with this prospect in mind that the Malagasy delegation, having given its support to the forty-three-Power draft resolution, will refuse to accept any amendment which would alter its meaning or scope, and will support it fervently, realizing that in so doing it is helping to promote the ideal of justice and peace throughout the world.

44. Mr. WACHUKU (Nigeria): I thank the President for giving me the opportunity to make a short statement with regard to the subject under consideration, that is, the declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples.

45. First of all, I want to express the gratitude of my delegation to the delegation of the Soviet Union, which took the initiative in having this subject placed on the agenda of the plenary meetings of the General Assembly. I also want to express my thanks to the delegations of the United Kingdom, the United States and all those non-African countries who are not bound by the force of circumstances as intimately with this subject as we are, but have expressed their support for the drive against this nefarious practice which holds mainly Africa in thralldom.

46. I speak as one who is more closely concerned with the subject. The main colonial area of the world today is Africa. Therefore when one discusses colonialism, it is of greater concern to African States than to any other States. Indeed, other countries can abstain; they can walk away. They can say, "Well, it does not concern us." And they would be quite entitled to do so. But no African State can do likewise. For my delegation and for Nigeria the total liberation of African territory from foreign domination and imperialism is of primary concern. Indeed, that is one of the pillars and canons of our future policies. He who is not with us in this matter must be considered to be against us.

47. As I have said before, along with colonialism there is also the question of the humiliation of peoples of African descent throughout the world; in other words, racial discrimination against people of African descent.

48. As far as Nigeria is concerned, the time has come when this subject will no longer be considered an internal affair of any State but indeed as something quite intimately connected with our foreign policy. Anybody who is not prepared to eradicate the humiliation that has been meted out to people of African descent or people of our racial stock cannot claim to love us.

49. Colonialism and imperialism go hand in hand, and for Nigeria independence is not an end in itself but a means to an end: Nigeria is prepared to be the guinea pig, the sacrificial lamb, for the purpose of the total liberation of the African continent. There are so many millions of our people of Africa today who are under foreign domination. Therefore, when you see the name of Nigeria as one of the sponsors of the draft resolution submitted by the African-Asian group [A/L.323 and Add.1-6] you can appreciate why we whole-heartedly support this resolution.

50. Africa was broken up by European Powers at the Conference of Berlin in 1884-1885. At that time, no African was there; no representative of Africa was there. Those who were present sat down and used a carving knife and divided up the whole continent, each taking its own share, as though it were a Christmas turkey.

51. But now Africa is coming back into its own, and it is only right that we who constitute the largest single country in Africa, the most populous country in Africa and one that is not badly off as far as resources are concerned, should, in the very early stages of our independence, make our position in this matter very, very clear. There should be no doubt where Nigeria stands in this matter.

52. I take this opportunity once more, as I have done before, to address certain colonial Powers which still believe in certain strange ideologies. I must mention Portugal categorically. I want to tell Portugal not to deceive itself any longer when it tells us here that Angola, Mozambique and other African territories are part and parcel of Portugal's metropolitan territory. That is nonsense. Nigeria will never accept that fictitious doctrine. Portugal, all along, has been behaving as if it is not aware of the changes that are taking place in the world today. We do not hate it, but we love our Africans more. And I am taking this opportunity to serve notice upon Portugal that, while Nigeria does not hate Portugal, Nigeria can never agree with Portugal on an issue which means that the people of Africa in Angola will be held in thralldom and that no attempt will be made to give them an opportunity to live life more abundantly.

53. Portugal should learn a lesson from what is happening in the Congo. It is because Leopold II regarded the Congo as his private estate and, when the Belgians took it over, regarded it as a farm and trained people only as farmhands to produce wealth for the Belgian State, that, when the time came for nationalism to take its turn, Belgium was not up to dealing with the problem that was raised. And what have we on our hands now as far as the Congo is concerned? Chaos.

54. It is because we want to avoid a repetition of this type of anarchy and chaos elsewhere on the continent of Africa that we come here today to speak on this subject. Those who have ears to hear should hear—but those who have none, or those who have ears and are prepared to block them, should not be surprised when history repeats itself.

55. Since we came to this Assembly, we have read all sorts of things. In fact, there was a circular letter that we received at one time from a strange organization in this great country—when we demand total liquidation of all colonies, it is this type of thing that makes us do so unhesitatingly—and I think it is right that I should read that document so that everybody will know its contents. I know that it is the work of certain marginal individuals, but the fact that such marginal individuals can exist and that such organizations can exist in a democratic society, in a society that is governed by law—individuals and organizations aiming at the destruction or humiliation of people different from themselves because they regard them as colonials—acts as a stimulus to us. It does not generate hate in our hearts. Rather than that, it serves as a challenge to us to insist that, from now on, every square inch of African territory and every square inch of Asian territory and every square inch of any colonial territory must be liberated from foreign domination.

56. By doing that, we will be contributing to the establishment of peace and tranquillity in the world. There can never be any peace in our world until all colonial territories are liberated from colonialism. Let us not deceive ourselves. So long as any State believes that it can hold another State in bondage and exploit the resources of that other country to its own advantage—not utilizing the resources of that other country to the advantage of that country's people, but hoping to build up its own economy at the expense of the economy and well-being of other people—there can never be peace in our world. Let no one deceive himself about that. These people want the good things of this world; they want to develop their culture, their traditions and their institutions; they want to develop their spiritual, intellectual and moral qualities. For one nation to hold another in bondage, to repress it and suppress it and subjugate it, is to sow the seeds of world catastrophe.

57. The most unpredictable thing in the world is man himself. You can predict the weather these days, but you cannot say exactly what a man is likely to do so long as he has a mind of his own. In other words, the most uncertain thing in the world is man, and, so long as there is the fire of God and the divine element in man, he always has potentialities for good or bad.

58. If you repress the people for too long there comes a time when they do not count the cost and are prepared to die for a cause which they believe to be very dear to their hearts. I am saying this in relation to South Africa. Today colonialism is not confined to Europe. The Union of South Africa is one of those imperialistic States where a minority of 3 million people decide to subjugate, humiliate and virtually destroy the souls of 11 million others.

59. I say, just as I have told Portugal—and the same thing refers to Spain and other countries of Europe who think of Africa as the target of their ambitions—that the minority in South Africa that has had an opportunity to do good has decided to do evil all along. Nigeria takes this opportunity to serve notice on the minority elements that Nigeria cannot accept indefinitely the present position. But Nigeria is broad-minded enough to appreciate the forces of history. We do not want to treat the minority elements as aliens of South Africa to be driven into the sea or destroyed or expropriated.

60. I have said this before and I want to repeat it in this august Assembly: all we want South African rulers to practise today is the rule of law. There must be one law for all the people in South Africa. Those who are in power in South Africa must appreciate that if they are to survive in the near future they must acknowledge the rule of law and make use of the powers and the resources at their disposal to enable the majority to re-establish themselves so as to regain the confidence that they have lost because of years of oppression and repression. If they do not take the hint it is not Nigeria that will start the ball rolling; there will come a time when the majority will revolt, and we have already read of a number of incidents occurring in South Africa. There will be a time when the majority will revolt, and if those in power should be so indiscreet as to allow such an incident to occur, I cannot say nor can I imagine what the consequences may be. I can only say mildly that it will be a great disaster.

61. In order to avoid this holocaust Nigeria takes this opportunity to ask the minority rulers of South Africa to eradicate the colonialism and imperialism which have persisted in that territory for so long, and the humiliation that has been the lot of the people of Africa.

62. There is no use in telling Nigeria that this is an internal affair. We will never accept that as an internal affair of the Union of South Africa. As long as we live on a continent where there is racial discrimination against people of African descent—or as long as there is discrimination against people of African descent anywhere in the world—it can never be considered by Nigeria as an internal affair of any country. The sooner it is understood the better. That is one of the pillars of our policy in relation to all countries, and the sooner the United Nations puts an end to colonialism, imperialism and all that goes with them—which are so obnoxious, objectionable and unacceptable in a polite society—the sooner that is done the better we will be preparing for the establishment of world peace and human understanding.

63. I said that I was going to read a document. This was circulated to the new African States and the Asian States. This came to my office and I think it is necessary that we should put it on record. It is headed "White America rejects a bastardized United Nations".

"A foul stench spreads out from the East River and hangs over New York like a pall. It is the smell of sweat, the greasiest sweat of the black races of Africa and yellow races of Asia which have invaded the United Nations. It is enough to make every white Protestant American vomit.

"These sub-humans have come down from the trees and out of the swamps to lord it over the white race. Are they going to get away with it?

"The degenerate French, the Latin nations dominated by the Roman Pope and the Jew Slavs have already yielded, but we say America is white. We shall keep it white, no matter if the rest of the world is mongolized we shall keep our America pure.

"The Ku Klux Klan is on guard against the black and yellow peril sweeping in from across the seas.

"The present session of the General Assembly of the United Nations is controlled by the inferior races. It is a meeting of blacks and their brown and yellow brethren who are plotting to overthrow white Protestant America.

"What an insult to the founding fathers of our Republic for the black Nkrumah, the brown Nehru, the tan Nasser, the yellow Sukarno and the communistic-atheistic Tito, a traitor to God and the white race, to try to force President Eisenhower into a summit with the anti-Christ Khrushchev. These monkeys should have been tanned and feathered.

"The Lord in his infinite wisdom created the white race to rule over the animal kingdom and the lower races. Our Saviour Jesus Christ taught us to love and cherish even the slave, but he did not preach the domination of the slave over the master.

"The Ku Klux Klan wants the black and yellow delegates to stay close to the buildings of the United Nations and the brothels of Harlem and not to defile the hotels and restaurants of our white city. Our police will not relax their vigilance against the lawless acts of Africans like the delegate from Cameroun and other umpty blacks, and if you don't like it, get out. There is no welcome in America for a black and yellow United Nations. The fiery crosses shall burn."

64. I have read this document not with a view to engendering ill feeling, but to point out to this Assembly what greater reason we have for our determination to see to it that colonialism in all its forms is eradicated from the surface of this world.

65. I know that this organization, as I said, is composed of marginal individuals who cannot be considered to express the general will of the people of this great country. I know that this organization is composed of some men who are so warped in their outlook that they cannot see history—and perhaps they have not read history and have not had the opportunity of appreciating the lesson of history. They forget that even the wealth of the country of which they are proud to be loyal citizens was built with the sweat, blood and tears of these very blacks. Without them the economy and the greatness and even the creation of their great country would not have been possible, and the country could not be what it is today. That is history; we know that. I am prepared to acknowledge that this is due more to ignorance than to anything else, because Europe has dominated the course of history for so many centuries, and it is only recently that the Asian and African countries have come into the picture, in our twentieth century. These people with warped intellects have come to believe that there were no other people than themselves.

66. However, we find in the United Nations a mirror reflecting the various segments of the world. The United Nations is trying to bring about a balanced picture, and it is because of the resistance of such people to the simple truths that are shown here through the presence of the diverse nations and diverse races working in harmony for common humanity that such elements are afraid of the truth and are prepared to die in their ignorance. I have read this in order to enable the representatives of the great country that acts as our host to appreciate the amount of harm such organizations can do to a relationship between itself and other nations, so that they may exercise themselves in sending a message to their nation to take steps to eradicate this type of cancer in their political midst. I have not read it because I am embittered; rather I take it in my stride, because I have read worse than this, written even by men of learning, professors, who have prostituted their knowledge to serve imperialistic purposes. We have read and analysed these things, and our reading has not deviated us from the course we have set ourselves.

67. It is when we see this type of thing happening, when we see the justification of injustice because of fallacious theories and fallacious concepts, that we realize that the only way to prove conclusively that these things are erroneous is not by hate or bitterness against anybody but by organized effort to eradicate those things that make such warped thinking exist at all. One of the ways of doing that is the complete liquidation of all forms of colonialism in all the areas that are dominated by others. I am certain that when that happens the goodness that is in man will be liberated, the finer aspects of humanity will come to the surface, and the world will benefit by the diversity of the contributions that come from all sections of the world. We will have a world with many facets contributing to the totality of world culture, a world in which the mutual appreciation of one another and the mutual appreciation of diverse cultures and the recognition of the contribution of others in other spheres will bring a sense of balance and bring peace and harmony between State and State and between man and man.

68. We, the delegation of Nigeria, look at the future with confidence. It has been said that the world looks at us and expects us to play an important role in Africa and in the world. It is our intention to play this role—if it is our lot to play such a role—honestly, sincerely, fearlessly, with the truth as our guiding light. When it comes to a situation of this nature, one must face it, and face it boldly. It is in that light that I have read this document, so that those who have ears to hear may hear, those who have thoughts may think and those that have capacity to reflect may reflect and find a solution to this problem before it becomes too late.

69. The other races of mankind are determined to have the right to live in their territories, to make use of the good things that are located within their territories, to organize them, to exploit them, to build their institutions, to perpetuate their kind and their culture and their traditions and to be able to come to an assembly of this nature to contribute to the well-being of the world. They cannot do that if, by any fictitious doctrine or by any dubious means, any nation puts forth an idea that it has any divine right to govern another one. We know that this is not true. We know it is false. We know that throughout history the rise and fall of empires have been due to this very thing. It is said that history repeats itself, but history does not repeat itself necessarily. As long as men refuse to learn the lesson of history, that lesson still remains there until it is learnt. If it is not learnt, then it repeats itself because it has not been learnt. It is an assignment that has not been done. Then history repeats itself, and the lesson is learnt in a very expensive way.

70. The sponsors of the African-Asian draft resolution hope and believe that, following the trend of the discussion here, the Assembly will adopt this draft resolution unanimously, without any equivocation, so as to give hope to those countries that have been subjugated, those countries that have been deprived of their wherewithal, those countries that have been held in bondage, those countries that have been kept under heel, those countries that have not been allowed to exercise their God-given right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. I sincerely hope that the great Powers who profess democracy, who profess high ideals, who desire peace in the world, will see that by eradicating all forms of colonialism and opposing all forms of imperialism we will be achieving one of the objectives, indeed one of the corner-stones, in the achievement of world peace.

71. Colonialism and imperialism go hand in hand with war and destruction. You cannot maintain imperialism by peaceful means. It is always maintained by brute force. And brute force is the brother and the sister of war. That being the case, I take this opportunity to ask the great Powers and the small Powers, the medium Powers and the baby Powers, to go hand in hand in voting for this resolution, so that this Assembly can look back to this session with a feeling of satisfaction that something has been achieved.

72. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the United States, who wishes to make a brief statement concerning the letter read by the representative of Nigeria.

73. Mr. MORSE (United States of America): In behalf of my delegation and my Government I have asked for this opportunity to make a brief reply to the representative of Nigeria, Ambassador Jaja Wachuku. I want him to know that I speak out of a great personal fondness and a very high respect for him.

74. He has read this very unfortunate letter that was circulated to delegates. And I am glad that he read it because it gets it out on top of the table, so to speak, and gives us an opportunity to reply to it.

75. I want to say that we share his appraisal of the letter. We think it is a shocking epistle. I want him to know that we think it is not only an affront to the delegates from Africa and Asia and the other countries which it attacks, but it is an affront to the American people. I want to assure the representative from Nigeria that it does not represent the point of view of the American people but represents apparently the bias and the prejudice and the bigotry of some fringe group in America, if it was written by a fringe group in America.

76. This delegation of the United States at the United Nations is headed by a great American who believes in the dignity of man and in the equality of man and who has demonstrated, time and time again, these great qualities in his leadership of this delegation. On the very day this shocking, bigoted letter was sent to certain delegates at the United Nations, Mr. James Wadsworth, on 28 November, issued a statement which I am about to read. I think in fairness to this great American, who is the Chairman of our delegation, that our delegation owes it to him this morning to read his reply to the letter into the record in view of the fact that the representative of Nigeria has made it now a matter of public record—and I say quite rightly so. Mr. Wadsworth said on 28 November:

"It has come to my attention that a number of delegates received by mail today a scurrilous letter, purportedly originating from the Ku Klux Klan, which contains an outrageous racist attack. The author of this letter may be a crackpot. All societies have their crackpots, and the United States has laws designed to protect all members of society against vicious and threatening abuse created in sick minds.

"Whether this is the work of a crackpot or the work of others who seek to embarrass the United States, it is not possible to say at this time. I therefore ask that all those who have received this shocking letter be good enough to give me the envelopes, the letters and any other pertinent information. I have already asked the Federal Bureau of Investigation to launch an immediate investigation, and it is imperative that we receive as much evidence as is available in order to identify the source so that appropriate steps can be taken by United States authorities."

I think this answer by Mr. Wadsworth speaks for itself.

77. Let me add only this in addition. The internal contents of this letter are strange in some of its wordings. For example, it refers to "tan and feather". Let me say that if it were actually written by a bigoted group, such as the Ku Klux Klan, that group would well understand the meaning of "tar and feather" rather than "tan and feather". And this linguistic mistake in the letter, I think, speaks a great deal to the premise which we contend as to who produced the letter, namely, that it came from some obviously sick mind.

78. May I say further, as one in the Senate of the United States, who for many years in the Senate has been in the forefront of the fight against all discrimination in my country based upon race, colour or creed, that I can give assurance to this Assembly that this letter referred to by the representative from Nigeria does not bespeak the point of view of the American people.

79. I also want to say a word in behalf of a very distinguished member of our delegation, one of the great Negro women of America, Mrs. George. Dr. George is a personification, I think, of proof to this Assembly that we in our country and we as a Government believe in the elimination of any discrimination based upon race, colour or creed. And I know I bespeak the point of view of Dr. George when I give you further assurance that this letter does not represent either the point of view of the great Negro leaders in our society.

80. It is very difficult to apologize in behalf of people whom you do not know. But if this letter really were written by an American crackpot, I think that it is only fitting and proper on this occasion, in behalf of our delegation and of our Government, to express to the General Assembly our apologies that anyone in our country would see fit to spread such vicious bigotry.

81. I want to assure the representative of Nigeria that we have taken no offence over the fact that the letter was read into the record. In fact, as I said in the beginning, it is a good thing that it was done. But I want to give him assurance that this delegation and this Government stand behind him and every delegation here to do everything that we can to see to it that their stay in our country is pleasant. We are at their service, and we want them to know that this letter in no way bespeaks the point of view of any responsible citizen of the United States of America.

82. Mr. Krishna MENON (India): We are now coming very near to the end of a great debate which has taken several days of the working time of this Assembly, over fifty speaking hours, and in which some seventy speakers have participated. Now, it is easy to say that words do not have a real effect, but the very fact that the Assembly, in the seriousness of its business, has devoted its time to this item, and that a number of nations have participated in the debate—both those who have been here for a long time and those others who have recently joined, on whom the impact of the subject which we are discussing is more recent than on some of the others—is eloquent in itself. It should not be forgotten, however, that some of the more powerful nations of today who are here have also gone through the phase of being under colonial rule, and it is much to their credit and the advantage of the world as a whole that they still have memories of it and of their effort to throw it off, and are aware of its impact upon the history of the world.

83. Now, the subject comes before us this time, thanks to the initiative of the Soviet Union, in the shape of an item on the agenda; but it is by no means a new matter to the United Nations, being written into the Charter. I will not read these words and clauses, which are so familiar to everyone. Not only is it written into the Charter, but a Chapter of the Charter deals with this problem of Non-Self-Governing Territories, though perhaps in 1960 not as adequately, in the present circumstances of the world, as may have appeared in 1945.

84. Again that reminds us that even the Charter, good as it is, is not like the proverbial law of the Medes and the Persians, unalterable, but has to be vivified, has to be made more useful, by being responsive to the developing conditions of the world.

85. Colonialism, as it is called, the expansion of countries outside their borders, usually into far-off lands, resulting either in conquest or occupation, and what is called government from a distance—that is what it used to be called in the nineteenth century—is no new phenomenon, so far as we are concerned. I do not want to go into all the ancient history of this. It goes back perhaps to the early stages of the pre-Christian era, when Alexander the Great embarked upon his expeditions right to the frontiers of our own country, where he won his battle, but from where he returned without establishing an empire there. And then we had the whole period of the development of Europe, where they were concerned with their own internal troubles, European nations either coalescing with each other or throwing the yoke of one on the other, so that the present colonial lands of Asia and Africa did not attract their attention for a long time except in connexion with trade.

86. Now we come to the more important period of today. I say this because we should not think that suddenly, with the industrial civilization, a new idea developed in the mind of man, because then we are likely to think that we should not have to guard against these evils in the future. So in more recent times there has been expansion. This expansion took place partly as a result of exploration, partly in an attempt to gain riches, partly in order to provide for migration, and for dozens of causes—through the merchant; the explorer; the promoter of enterprises; the missionary; the political leaders of some countries; the advancing might of armies; more and more in recent years, particularly since the industrial revolution, the engineer; and also sometimes the very nationalistic, patriotic expansionist who saw in the conquest of other territories the glory of his own. All this is depicted by—I will not call it the newer surge of nationalism.

87. I want to say a word about this conception of nationalism, because it is at once the cause, the soul of empire and the mainspring of the resistance to it. After all, colonialism, as we understand it, is the attempt to expand power from one's own territory into another area. Europe particularly, having gone through the phase somewhere about the sixteenth century, or perhaps a little earlier, of having evolved into nations from small tribal states, found in that unification the possibility of greater unity. Now, as then, it was often coloured by idealism: either it could be talked about in the shape of pan-Christian ideas or the spreading of some universal doctrines, or the spread of the gospel, or whatever it may be. In fact, you will find that in the expansion of all these areas the source of authority has come from charters or other instruments granted to explorers which give the sovereign power of life and death over non-Christian peoples. It appears in the clauses of the charter of the East India Company in regard to India, in which Queen Elizabeth gave these merchants, who were private citizens in her kingdom at that time, sovereign rights of life and death over non-Christian people. That is how her empire began. But it is a great mistake to think that one motive or another can explain this.

88. And so we go through various phases where people explore everywhere in search of wealth and do not find it, or as in the case of Columbus, they stumble by mistake upon another land of vast riches, and so on. Skipping over this period from the early times of the explorers, or the Phoenician period, we hear of the discoveries that gave America its name by the Italian explorer, as it is said—I do not vouch for this. Afterwards there came the expansion to the four great territories of Asia, Africa, the Caribbean, and the American continent, resulting in what today—or yesterday, I should say—what yesterday was the situation, where a small number of people in each of these metropolitan countries ruled a very considerable number of people in other areas. But fortunately this phenomenon, with the exception of one or two countries, or one or two combinations, is on the way out. If I may submit without being misunderstood, one of the most potent hindrances, one of the greatest impediments in the way of progress, is not to recognize that progress is being made, because if we do not recognize that progress is being made, we are likely to apply the same remedies, have the same reactions to the changed conditions as to the previous conditions and thereby get all our orientation and our policies misrepresented, misunderstood and misapplied. Similarly, if we do not recognize that progress is being made, it is very likely that those who have been pressured into progress either by the agitations of colonial peoples or by liberal sentiments in their own countries will be encouraged to fall back and say to their own peoples, "We told you so." Therefore, we have to recognize that some progress has been made.

89. In modern times, since the fall of Constantinople, the European peoples, not knowing how to preserve their meat, had to resort to spices, and it was about that time that they learned the art of cooking properly. At the time when Constantinople went out of the Christian ambit as such, the sea routes became open and then all the European population, led by the Portuguese and the Spaniards, followed by the Dutch and the French, and the English last, came into all these areas. They spread out into the new world in America, they spread out into Asia, and later on, much later on, in some cases they spread out into Africa. At first this exploration was carried out by people with a real desire to travel to these lands, the great sea dogs of the time, people who just wanted to explore for the sake of exploration. But these exploration enterprises remind us of some of our modern sports tournaments; that is to say, some person who wants to establish himself in a very big way in some sport and wants to play in tournaments abroad gets promoted by the manufacturer of some commodity used in that sport. In the same way, behind the explorer gathered those interests who could gain by his explorations; thus economic interests got tied up with the pioneering spirit. But again, we must not forget that the great urge was nationalism, that it was the birth of nationalism in the European nation States, pride in a flag, rivalry with other nations, the fear that other nations may establish themselves in areas to the disadvantage of themselves, that pushed people forward time after time.

90. First we have the phase—and when we speak about phases we have to look for clear-cut, sharp lines of division—first we have the phase of the empires of settlement. Those empires of settlement may have arisen either as a result of a deliberate policy of sending people out or because—I will not mention names—in some cases of great imperial countries they used these far-away places to deport personalities whose liberal ideas were not acceptable at home; therefore the convict settlements, as they were called at that time, were composed of miscreants and anti-social people, as we would call them now. But they were probably the pioneers of revolutions, those who rebelled against the old order at home, so they were sent abroad to the colonies of settlement. In those areas the indigenous populations—and we will draw a curtain over their history—by and large became extinct and the settlements became practically patches of the old country in a new area. They were the colonies of settlement which are now full-fledged nations, and they have in various ways contributed both to progress and to regress in regard to this colonial system.

91. Then we come to the period from the beginning of the third phase, from the nineteenth century onward, when, as a result of the second industrial revolution and the growth of technology and, what is more, through mercantile expansion, the search for markets and raw materials began. Machines produced large quantities of goods. Sweated labour was available in the home country for some time. However, that source did not last because the people who were drawn from the rural part of the countryside in countries like the United Kingdom, for example, into the towns saw the attractions of industry and a way to live better, and so they began to put pressure on those who owned the machines because they wanted higher wages.

92. However, there was overseas a source of this underpaid labour and there was no particular difficulty in obtaining labourers. Most of these territories were not democratic. Public opinion of course always exists but agreements were reached with individual rulers which were to the advantage of the colonizing nations.

93. So we have a period where raw materials were produced by sweat-shop labour and where there were vast markets of underpaid people whose purchasing power was small but who made up for it by their numbers. Thus you have an empire which it is generally argued is an empire of profit. That was so in the old days, because it is most unlikely that most of these colonizing expeditions would have taken place if there had been no profit involved and thus no incentive.

94. Then came the break with imperialism, in which there have been many pioneers from distant times up to more modern times. The first break with imperialism was when some of the colonies revolted and in other cases the colonies—as I said, they were colonies of settlement—began to organize themselves into communities and as a result of the breakaway of others, some concession had to be made to them. I will not go into great detail about this or into the controversies that prevailed in the home countries. The most outstanding instance of this is the breakaway of the thirteen American colonies which was achieved under conditions which are well known in history by this time. This however had an effect—I suppose I may be wrong—on the expansion of the United States in later times because right through history you will find that the consolidation of that territory as it is today was by and large not achieved by the process of conquest but by methods which today perhaps we would decry but which at that time were regarded as progressive, namely, the purchase of territories. Thus we have the purchase of Florida, of Alaska, Louisiana or Rhode Island, which is very different from the way the colonial frontiers expanded in the case of other imperial territories.

95. In more modern times the most outstanding instance of the abdication of colonialism was soon after the 1917 revolution in Russia when the imperial possessions of the Czar were dispossessed by the Russians themselves. I will not go into the details of it, and this is no reference to modern history, it is only a historical survey of a situation. However, by that time other events had taken place. In more modern times the rule of colonial people has been of one race over another and thus, apart from the economic factor, the racial element was important, and gave rise to a racial doctrine, which now persists in South Africa and other places: "There are some people who are born to rule and some others to be ruled, and it is not possible to train people of certain racial origins to practise self-government". As against that, there was both in the metropolitan countries and in the countries so ruled a revolt against it. So there was some opposition to the racial doctrine, which however was responsible for the growth of slavery. But with the abolition of slavery on the one hand and the progress of liberal doctrines in the home country on the other, the situation changed.

96. However, the most outstanding instance in the context of our thinking was the blow to this racial superiority which was struck—though it seems far-fetched today—when in 1905 the Japanese defeated the Russians in the Russo-Japanese War. In those days we did not think of economic, ideological and other questions as we do today. But the whole of Asia saw this as the defeat of a European empire by a small, short-statured Asiatic people. I am not going into the question of the relevance of this struggle or the title to Port Arthur or anything of that kind. I am only dealing with the psychological aspect.

97. All through that period, when we were but children, this idea—which may have been a very half-cooked idea—that there was no longer a superiority of race spread. Then it was further developed in the period of the First World War. I am not for a moment suggesting that wars are to be prepared for or that they should take place in order that colonies should be liberated. But at the time of the First World War a great part of the world—I would not like to say how much, but the greater part of the world—was under colonial domination or something of that kind. Here I should like to say that a colony is a colony—I would not say as I have defined it, but as I have described it before—whatever it may be called. The British system, with which I am more familiar, has many types of colonies, such as crown colonies, which in the beginning were the private property of the crown, dependencies—India was called a dependency, not a colony—protectorates, and protected States. There are places like Malta which thirty years ago was called a British ship. Then there are other areas, but from an economic, social or political point of view all these are really part of the colonial empire.

98. So in modern times we have the great colonial Powers, the United Kingdom, France, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain. It is interesting that it is the most powerful of these empires that have given way first; this has been due to a large number of circumstances, and world organizations played their part in this—and I mention the International Labour Organisation in Geneva in this connexion. This was one of the survivors of the League of Nations which even survived the outbreak of the Second World War. With the impact of the International Labour Organisation it became difficult for countries that respected conventions to maintain the standards of labour in dependent countries, and impossible for them to do so formally.

99. Secondly, there was the spread of movements devoted to the emancipation and elevation of the working classes. This also made it difficult for the continuation of this process; so that in some instances, not all of them, you will find that empires have ceased to pay. Although empires have ceased to pay, this does not mean that some people did not make considerable profits on account of political power or that some countries did not do so. However, what is usually forgotten is that the great military arm of the Powers, the item that goes under the consolidated account with regard to obligations undertaken for these purposes, also comes under the cost of empire. So while it is quite true that it could be said that such and such a country spent so much on a territory, and that its balance of trade is favourable or unfavourable, that presents only one part of the picture. But at any rate there is very little doubt that this was one of the considerations.

100. Then later, when the world began to be divided up—one of those things that we must take care of in the future—between the great Powers, yet another category of empire was introduced, or came into existence, that usually called "spheres of influence", and the modern expression "filling a power vacuum" is a descendant of these "spheres of influence". So when France and Germany and Great Britain claimed various spheres of influence in various places, those territories, while sovereign, still did not have independence.

101. Now, there are cousins, descendants, of this today. As I said, there are "vacuums" being filled in the way of ambassadors in some countries who are not viceroys there, but who sometimes function as such. There is also the attempted penetration or conquest of the mind, as it is called—or conquest of the body, it may be. These things still resurrect themselves in various forms.

102. Now, why do I say all these things? Because, looking at the figures, we would find a vast liquidation process—I will give you the figures in a moment—a vast liquidation process where we are told that these great, enormous empires are now shrunk. But as to independence of the former colonies, we have to see whether the real substance is there, and if it is there, whether it is likely to last. In that connexion one would like to say that while we debate here day after day—and seventy speakers have taken part in the discussion—there is an air of unreality about the whole business, considering what happened in Algeria only two days ago; when there are countries today like France and Portugal that claim the people of these places are nationals of the metropolitan countries. As I have repeatedly said to this Assembly the British did not insult us by calling us Englishmen; the Portuguese and the French do the equivalent of that.

103. The war that has been raging in Algeria for seven or eight years could not be called a Moslem revolt, an Arab revolt or a revolt of anybody else: it is really a war of colonial independence, of the same type that occurred in this country, of the same type that has occurred in China. This has not occurred in our country because we achieved our independence by other methods, though you could also call it a war in some other form if you like. It is the resistance of the people against the force of arms, against the armed might of great empires.

104. That brings us to the consideration of several other problems concerned with world politics, and I want to spend the little time I have, not in the description either of the balance-sheet of empire in terms of pounds and pence or dollars and cents, or of the costs of this, that or the other. I think we must be realistic; we must realize that empires can flourish only in one way, and that is by imperialist methods. That is to say, when you want to suppress somebody, you will suppress them. So we have to take this in our stride and see how the modern world is likely to assist in the survival or the liquidation of imperialism.

105. On the one hand, after the period of the First World War, with the break-up of the Ottoman Empire the greater part of western Asia began to achieve its freedom irrespective of whatever internal progress in democracy might have been made. The Ottoman Empire, defeated in the war, in the old days would have had its territories annexed; but with the revolution in Czarist Russia, one of the great Allies in the war was removed from the context of the empire. With the emergence of the United States as one of the great Allies, having one of the strongest voices in the making of the peace treaties, its President brought up that conception once more before the world, but it was called "the sacred trust"—I am not talking about trusteeship at the moment. But there were no other peoples in the world that professed this. This brought in what, in the future, would emerge as a new theory of sovereignty, that is, sovereignty thrust on the people but not conferred upon them. What the empire does is just to oppress them; it remains latent and legal. And then the empire is lifted and the sovereign people come into their own. This really should be the modern theory of sovereignty instead of the command of a sovereign, anyway in the modern period.

106. So first of all there was this conception that there would be no annexations of territory, and though the discussions at Versailles and Geneva did not produce the results that were required, there was a break with imperialism; and so you find a third phase, where the attempt is made—at least in words—to expand or transform empires into what may be called "brotherhoods".

107. This is all the positive side of it. But at the same time there is the other side of the picture. There is Algeria; there is South Africa, where there is a situation of another type—I am not referring to the Union itself—where a Trust Territory has been misappropriated by the administering Power and treated as part of an empire; there is the situation in the Portuguese territories, where alone in the world today forced labour bordering on slavery prevails; there is, again, the attempt by France by force of arms to subjugate a people who are as capable of and as much entitled to freedom as any community sitting here, and who have, what is more, demonstrated to the world that their sacrifices and capacities, in spite of their limitations, could be as great as their aspiration for independence.

108. But in this matter we must not forget—and this is where, perhaps, there should be some soul-searching on the part of the people concerned—that the great military alliances of the world are an aid to these empires. It so happens that these great colonial Powers like France and Portugal depend on these alliances. Let us take Portugal as an example. Portugal is a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), and this organization definitely states that these alliances are not only in regard to the metropolitan countries but in regard to the whole of the sovereign areas. Now, it is quite difficult for a country like the United States, which has no colonies except for the territories in the Pacific area which could be considered in this broad category—it is quite difficult for them to say that they will make an alliance, but minus these territories. Whether or not there is going to be any such alliance, that would be a matter which I would not wish to go into. But it becomes an alliance with an empire. It is as though a free man were making a friendly agreement with a slave-master in regard to both his own free possessions and the master's possessions.

109. So these great military alliances, whether in the North or in Europe or elsewhere, become part of an agreement with colonialists of the worst type. It is not only in theory that this is bad—and here, now, there may be reservations on this; we believe that the resources of metropolitan France and Portugal for the oppression of the colonies, their moral power to maintain them, the size of the opposition that the revolting people have to face, are all affected by this factor. Portugal has proclaimed before that its presence in NATO attracts the friendship of its oldest ally, the United Kingdom. One of the oldest treaties in existence is that between the United Kingdom and Portugal.

110. Although the United Kingdom has made great strides in advancing independence—sometimes tardily, sometimes under pressure, sometimes under various circumstances as in the case of our own country, or, as in the case of the United States, by revolt followed by agreement—there still remain vast possessions. And these vast possessions have to become free countries.

111. Certain problems have to be considered at this stage. First, what is to happen to small areas of 50,000, 100,000 or 200,000 people who are as conscious of nationalism as any large country? To say to them that they are only a small speck of land somewhere and that they cannot be independent would neither fit into the Charter nor satisfy their desire for liberty in their own lands. That is one of the problems that both the United Nations and the metropolitan countries have to face. And I would like to submit that any attempt either to disregard their desire for national independence on the one hand, or to tell them they will be free in their master's home on the other hand, would not in the long run meet the bill. The Assembly will remember the recent example of Cyprus. Cyprus, incidentally, brought modern Greece into the context of anti-colonialism—and I hope it remains there. We found one of those great European countries, a NATO ally, standing up ultimately for colonial independence; but when they first came here, the idea was to divert attention from the agitation in the colony by presenting it either as a defence problem or a security problem for some people, or making the Cypriots a bargain for a cut-up among two or three people.

112. My own Government took the view that there was no question of this being anything but a colonial matter. Cyprus, by law and by circumstance, by economic factors, political factors, sociological factors, was a colony and nothing but a colony and, therefore, had to be treated as a colonial country entitled to full independence, and although it took a great deal of struggle in the United Nations—perhaps not always with the assistance of everybody concerned—Cyprus ultimately attained its independence, though on that basis it has been vitiated by circumstances. What I want to point out is that in the attempt to argue against the people who want freedom, often extraneous circumstances are introduced, which may perhaps provide some help for some time, but ultimately the people claim their own; and all that is left behind is a great deal of ill will and newer problems, newer complications which, if subject peoples do not take enough care, will become what will be called a joint imperialism.

113. I think it is right to say that a mandate, or a trusteeship, certainly represents the idea of the sacred trust and of divesting the old country of its colonial territories, but if the United Nations does not stick to the principles of the Charter and its spirit and intent, then it is likely to become a joint domination of a helpless people by a more powerful people. This is always in the minds of the colonial peoples.

114. Next I should like to say, before I come to specific problems, that sometime in 1939 the colonial territories of the great Powers were the following: the United Kingdom alone had about 13 million square miles; France had a huge empire of about 4 million square miles, eighty times that of Belgium; the Netherlands had its own colonies. All that is now dispersed, but still there are in this world somewhere about 75 million people who are under colonial rule. Out of the 75 million people, some 20 million belong to the British hegemony and are on the path towards self-government. Therefore, there actually remain some 50 million people still to be liberated; and when we think that out of this 50 million, 14,871,195 belong to the empire of Portugal, we have the situation that the Portuguese are the biggest imperial Power in the world. And it would be no answer to say that these people are not colonials, that they are Portuguese citizens, as I think has been argued here. So the greater part of these 50 million people are the 14 to 15 million in the Portuguese empire and the 11 to 12 million in Algeria. Thus, between France and Portugal are divided the largest colonial possessions—not the most scattered, but the largest colonial possessions.

115. In regard to their position in Africa, certain new problems are faced. Unless colonialism is totally liquidated on the African continent, it is more prone to become the scene of contending ambitions, either real or suspected, which will place the fortunes and development of the African people in serious jeopardy. Therefore, the total withdrawal of the empire from these territories is necessary and, as in the case of peace and war, there is no half-way house in this: either you have an empire or you do not have an empire. And that is why we do not believe that it would be possible to progress from stage to stage at this period of world evolution.

116. There is no country in the world that is not capable of governing itself. We have all had the experience of being asked, just before our imperial rulers left us: "Who will command your armies? Who will command your air force and your fleet? Who will administer? Who will run the finance ministry?", and so on. None of us found very serious difficulties with it any more than other countries, and I believe that these problems are common to independent countries as well. But then we are told that there are countries in Asia, such as Pakistan, India and Ceylon, which have ancient civilizations and, therefore, have had long periods of the rule of law, and so on, but it is our submission that civilization is not a peculiar monopoly of any part of the world. All we mean by making this distinction is that those of us who speak about it probably do not understand other people's civilizations; so we must abandon this distinction also and go straight to the position that this world must really be free in that sense. There should be no territory under foreign rule, no country whose territory can be used by someone else for purposes that have no relation to the benefit or the advantage of the people who inhabit it. That is why, particularly in this present time of vast military alliances, when the old system of strategic points, lifelines of empire, etc. is being transformed into the position of holding the strategic areas for purposes which are not strictly germane to the progress of the country, we must present our opposition.

117. As a result of this debate, whatever may have been the nature of the facts presented, the attention of the world which we represent is largely focused upon this question. We have also the situation that the resources of the world are attracting greater attention than ever before; and in this question of world development, every item of liberation, the more people we bring into the area of dynamic freedom, then the more people there are for constructive endeavour.

118. Let us take the case of Africa: the vast untold resources of the world are in Africa. This is not a counsel for other people to go and exploit them. In an area of somewhere about 11 million square miles with a population of about 222 million, 98 per cent of all the diamonds in the world, 94 per cent of all the columbite, 84 per cent of the copper, 55 per cent of the gold, 45 per cent of the radium, 33 per cent of the manganese, and so on, are in this continent; and these are required not necessarily for the purpose of building armaments, but in order that the world may move to higher standards of civilization. Therefore, even from the point of view of making available the resources of the world, and making those resources available without the cost of blood and pressure—which is what a colonial war means—it would be to our advantage to introduce this gospel to implement the United Nations Charter in its reality. The Charter says this in what may be called more or less embryonic language, but it should be made a reality in that we must now address ourselves to the total liberation of these territories.

119. It is not a question of setting targets and dates. The only limitation of time on this should be the time required for transfer. And if one may say so, those people with the responsibility should not be permitted to take the attitude of the gauntlet with a gift in it: that is, to say as in the case of the Congo: "There is freedom"—and then to come back the other way because there had been no preparation for it. I think that the Belgian Congo as it was formerly is the most distressing instance of an empire of modern times. After seventy or eighty years of colonial rule nothing has been left in the political, administrative or other organizations, and what is more, after the withdrawal of the empire the former ruler comes back. That is one thing we have to guard against.

120. The second thing is that no Trust Territory should be given independence merely on the intimation of the Administering Authority that it is ready for independence, without our being shown that it is so, and without the United Nations taking care that the transfer of power will be carried out in such a way as to make re-entry impossible. In the Fourth Committee soon we shall be discussing the problem of Ruanda-Urundi, and my Government takes a serious view of this question. I informed the Security Council only two days ago that, to the best of our knowledge, there were two concentrations in Ruanda for the purpose of operations against the Congo. But over and above that, we have now been told that Ruanda-Urundi is fit for independence and, therefore, an election is to take place in a short time. I do not want to discuss the details here because it will come up in the Fourth Committee, but while we yield to no one in the passion to limit the period of transition, we do not want to see that used in such a way that independence becomes "independence"—that is, things change only to remain the same or become worse. That situation should not arise.

121. Thirdly, I would like to say that we of the colonial areas who have been liberated have to take to heart the lessons of the empires of the past, and the fate of the peoples who are still not liberated. Therefore the Assembly, and particularly those nations who have different views from ours on colonial questions, should bear with us when we feel moved, when we seem to concern ourselves with something that is not our own territory. The place of every liberated country—I am not speaking of the others—is with the struggle of the colonial peoples. It is the determined policy of the Government of India that while we shall not participate in external military or other movements, while we shall not promote trouble in any areas, while we believe that no revolutions can be exported, our sympathies and our solidarity are with those who struggle for independence. It is part and parcel of a country's attainment of national independence that it does not run away from the whole campaign for human freedom, for the freedom of colonial peoples.

122. Again, it is necessary that people like ourselves who have been liberated from colonial empires should see to it that our place in world politics is a functional position leading to progress rather than to regression. That is to say, our independent positions should not be used by us or by others in order to further aggressive causes or to fasten tutelage upon other people. It would be the greatest tragedy if some of our liberated countries found themselves aligned against the campaigns of independence or the liberation of other peoples. That independence is not real, even though it may have all the forms and the trappings of independence. The reality of independence must come from the people themselves. And that reality is really not only political but also economic.

123. We, ourselves, do not object—in fact, it is a good thing—if there are fraternities formed either among the liberated territories or with their former rulers on the basis of freedom. But this should not be merely another name for empire—whether you call it a commonwealth or co-operation, whatever it is—that would not meet the situation. Those of us who are liberated have to make use of our liberation. We should not be subject peoples under another name.

124. It is in the sense of the advancement of our territories in economic terms—more food, more shelter, more sanitation, more education and more use of liberation—that is the implementation of independence.

125. We constantly say in India that on 15 August 1947, what happened was not independence but the removal of the main obstacle to independence, namely foreign rule; independence had still to be attained. When people have adequate food, adequate shelter, adequate sanitation, adequate dignity, the capacity to exercise them—that is independence.

126. No country should, under any circumstances, be drawn willy-nilly into any kind of alliance, any kind of alignment which promotes either war or the domination of that country. Far be it from me to say that sovereign territories which are independent cannot make their own policies. But we have the right to hope that people who have seen the consequences of the worst wars in history—the great wars have been imperialist wars, whatever form they may take—should contribute their might, their ideals, their moral authority, in order to extend the areas of peace.

127. That is why you will find, in spite of the great conflicts in the world, that colonial territories tend more and more to move into the position, even if they are formally members of an alliance, of asking to be left alone. And I think the most outstanding instance of this is the United States of America which for 150 years wanted to keep free from foreign entanglements and wanted to be left alone for its own economic development.

128. So it behooves those who are powerful people, who have other interests, not necessarily of a selfish character, but who see things in another way, to leave these territories alone to develop for themselves. The cause of world peace would be assisted by the contribution that liberated peoples can make with the enthusiasm which they bring, and what is more, by the evidence they give to the world that human efforts and human co-operation can lead to advancement.

129. It should not be forgotten that in the last few years, apart from all alliances, apart from all Charter provisions and so on, the conditions in the liberated territories, which have an economic impact upon other countries, have led to the process of co-operation. There is no country in the world today which either has refused to receive or does not receive or does not give assistance in one form or another. Therefore, willy-nilly, a form of world co-operation develops. But for all this, it is necessary that there should be no reservations in this matter: no giving with one hand and taking away with the other. That is why a young country like ours stands very strongly against any imperialist power making agreements before independence in regard to either political, territorial or other rights. That is to say, if these areas which are in tutelage before they become free agree, as the price of freedom, to the establishment of bases or to enter into trade agreements or military agreements, they have not gained real freedom.

130. What is more, the liberty that the liberated territories get is conditioned by the burdens which they cannot carry. And I think the great countries of the world must take the risk that in conditions of freedom, peoples would act sensibly, would act in the line of progress and not otherwise; and immediate advantages should not take precedence over these distant ideals.

131. It is one of the great phenomena of the world that while some forty or fifty years ago maybe 1,200 million or 1,600 million people were under one form of subjection or another and—if we exclude China which, though colonial in an economic and social sense, was not so in a literal sense—nearly 1,000 million people were under colonial rule. As I said, only some 75 million people are left, but they are scattered all over the world. They form a cancer on the body politic of the world. So long as there is any place in the world which is not liberated, so long as the people struggle for liberation, no attempt to give colonial rule other names, no show of force, no military alliances or anything of that kind, would succeed.

132. We have made progress on this subject at the present session. That progress has resulted not only from the fact that we have debated these matters here, but from the fact that the United Nations has asked Portugal to supply information. Portugal is the last stronghold of colonialism, and that stronghold has not fallen but it is very badly beleaguered. Spain has agreed to accept the provisions of the Charter; Portugal has not agreed, and therefore stands today isolated. If this last stronghold falls, we shall have made another advance.

133. But we must not forget that the real objective is to abolish from this world any kind of rule by one nation or people of another nation or people, particularly if it is based on racial discrimination and similar considerations. After all, a people's own economic interests are more important to it than the economic interests of someone else.

134. There are various drafts before the Assembly on this subject. The first, the draft declaration in document A/4502, has been submitted by the Soviet Union. We have read that text, and we find nothing in it to which we can object. That is to say, we are in favour of national States' achieving their freedom in accordance with the freely expressed will and desire of their peoples; we are against extraterritoriality in any form; and we are in favour of the implementation of the principles of the Charter.

135. The second, the draft resolution in document A/L.323 and Add.1-6, is sponsored by my delegation, among others. It is quite true that the draft resolution could have been shorter; perhaps there is a certain amount of repetition. On the whole, however, it represents what I have been trying to submit to the Assembly. There is no attempt at recrimination, no attempt to place responsibility on anyone but the United Nations as a whole.

136. I would conclude by saying that the emergence of so many countries into freedom is one of the great assets of the United Nations. While we may not always say this in so many words—and it is not applicable to every country—we have to pay a tribute to those countries which, whatever their past, have in more recent times made progress. We must recognize that progress is being made, but it is not being made fast enough. And the fact that progress is being made is no argument for our stopping our efforts. In the next year or two we should see the liquidation of all these dependent and colonial territories. All these places—whether they be small, like the Island of Malta, or large, like Algeria—should emerge into complete statehood and become Members of this Organization, unless they themselves choose something else. We would be the last people to say that because a State is independent it should not seek its fraternity. In fact, that is our hope and it is the purpose of the present debate.

137. I hope that the drafts before the Assembly on the liquidation of colonialism will gain unanimous approval. It will be recalled that when the decision was taken to discuss this item my delegation said that we did not very much care where it was discussed so long as it was discussed. It was unanimously decided to discuss it in plenary meetings of the Assembly. That result was brought about by the arguments presented here and it is an index of our ca-capacity to persuade each other and of the desire on all sides of this Assembly that colonial territories should be a thing of the past, that this world should become really free and that the process of peace and world co-operation should thus be facilitated.

AGENDA ITEM 87

Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial

1. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of the Union of South Africa in exercise of the right of reply.
2. Mr. FOURIE (Union of South Africa): We have listened carefully to a debate which has lasted for many days. We were disappointed that most of those who participated in this debate concentrated only on one type of colonialism. It was our hope that more attention would have been given also to the subjugation of other peoples in other continents by conquest.
3. It is interesting to note that some of those who have so strongly criticized the old type of colonialism and who, I might mention in passing, also referred to my country, contrary to the rules of procedure, did not look under their own carpets to find glaring at them the new type of colonialism. Furthermore, some others, who also showed such keen interest in the affairs of my country, have been using complimentary language in referring to the attitude of a contemporary imperialist Power. I can only conclude that they have no concern for those who live in subjugation under the new type of colonialism or imperialism.
4. Many parts of the forty-three-Power draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6] are acceptable to my delegation. In fact, some have been taken verbatim from the Charter. There are, however, certain other parts which we cannot support, and it is therefore impossible for my delegation to go along with this draft resolution in its entirety. I may add that, in our opinion, this draft resolution must be regarded as a single unit; it stands or falls as a whole. This also applies to the other two drafts before the Assembly [A/4502, A/L.324/Rev.2]. My delegation does not, therefore, propose to vote on the constituent paragraphs if these are put to the vote separately. We feel that you cannot take any of these parts out of the general context.
5. Since I was here on the rostrum, I thought I might briefly explain my vote.
6. Mr. OMAR (Somalia): I should like to open this statement by saying that my delegation is happy to give its full support to draft resolution A/L.323 and Add.1-6, of which Somalia is a sponsor, or, for that matter, to any other draft resolution which calls for the eradication of colonialism from the face of the earth. In this matter my delegation speaks for a people which, like so many other peoples represented here, is qualified by experience to make an expert report on the results of colonialism. Unfortunately, we of Somalia can testify from our personal knowledge to the suffering which is the invariable concomitant of colonial rule. The absence in our country until very recently of vigorous measures to achieve progress in such vital areas as education, health, transportation, communications and agricultural and commercial development is a typical legacy of colonialism which has left its mark in the poverty and destitution which is the lot of so many of our countrymen. We know too the heavy hand of colonialism in the unfortunate division of the Somali people into five separate territories, which artificial division has inevitably compounded the social and economic problems of our people.

7. My delegation would, therefore, be not only the first to call for, but also the first to lend support to anyone who advocates the end of colonialism in all its manifestations. In view of this, the Soviet Union has earned both our congratulations and our gratitude for having taken the initiative to secure the inclusion of this item in the agenda of this Assembly.

8. We are at a moment in history when all the conditions are ripe, as Toynbee has said, "for an age of welfare for all"; but this is genuinely true only because it is also an age when there may be freedom for all. The technological, intellectual and political developments of the centuries have combined to make possible the emancipation of mankind from economic as well as political bondage. In the economic sense, this was a bondage dictated in the past not only by man's inhumanity to man but also by the absence of those technical developments which have now made possible the creation of an economy of abundance, freeing man from the unremitting toil which for so long has been his inescapable lot.

9. It is too well known to require elaboration here that in mastering the forces of nature in the atomic age, man also has acquired a power of mutual annihilation. The incalculable powers of destruction at our disposal have deprived us of the ability of making whatever choice we would like to make in pursuance of world power politics. History and the atomic age dictate our answers to many questions, not excluding that of colonialism. We cannot afford the development or continuation of unrest and conflict in any part of the world today. The result of such situations is clearly to intensify the rivalries existing between the great Powers today and the setting up of rival claims and positions on the part of other nations that may be tempted to see in these areas of instability the opportunity for advancing their own views, if not their own interests. The rapid and orderly settlement of the claims of colonial peoples is indispensable if we are to avoid a repetition of the tragic circumstances which prevail today in the Congo and which have thus far defied solution by all the nations assembled at this session. Yet what has happened in the Congo may be only a minor catastrophe in comparison with what may yet come in other areas of the world.

10. In South Africa we still hear the plea of domestic jurisdiction invoked to preclude discussion of the deteriorating situation there, a situation which involves the fate of millions of oppressed people. It would be tragic enough if only the members of the self-styled "master race" were the insane victims of their own policies, or if the victims included only the innocent millions under their immediate control; but the obvious truth is that the explosion that takes place in the Union of South Africa, if we are unable to prevent it, may rock not only that country but the entire world. The West as a whole bears the moral onus of the inhuman practices of that most spiritually backward of all States, of those who have chosen to set themselves "apart" from the stream of humanity as a whole.

11. We do not believe it necessary to repeat here the theme that the record of colonialism has been and continues to be a dark age in human history. In our view, it is far more significant that the historic conditions which made possible this period of exploitation have long since passed and that the survival of colonialism is an anachronism we cannot afford to tolerate.

12. However, I have referred to the case of South Africa, and shall briefly mention conditions in Portuguese Africa, so that we may all understand that we are not dealing with an academic issue. I shall here content myself with the following quotation from an authoritative and moderate observer, Anthony Sampson, in his book Common Sense About Africa:

"The first major investigation was conducted by the British journalist H. W. Nevinson in 1905, who was sent out by Harper's Magazine to investigate allegations of slavery. His book, A Modern Slavery, and the reports of later investigators, revealed the large-scale use of forced labour, in conditions hardly distinguishable from slavery. Fifty years later Harper's sent another British journalist, Basil Davidson, on the same enquiry. His report in his book, The African Awakening, together with reports from the Anti-Slavery Society and the International Labour Office, suggest that the abuses of 'contract labour' or 'contratados' are still widespread. Nearly half the labour force of Angola, according to Davidson, is still made up by 'contratados' as opposed to 'voluntarios' (379,000 to 420,000). 'Contratados' are obtained by the local 'Chefe de Posto', who provides them either from tax-defaulters or by pressure on the local Chief: it is said that in many cases the Portuguese officials were heavily bribed to produce contract labourers. The workers on the cocoa fields of the island of São Tomé are still—as they were in the time of Nevinson—largely obtained from the forced labour of deported Africans."^{1/}

These quotations are enough to show that Africans in Portuguese Africa still live under subhuman conditions.

13. My delegation also cannot refrain from a brief reference to one of the most tragic demonstrations of the scourge of colonialism. We refer to the deplorable situation in Algeria, where the war against the Algerian people has now entered its seventh year. Every effort made to treat the Algerian case as different from any other manifestation of colonialism, to regard Algeria and its people as an integral part of metropolitan France, to bring about the dismemberment of Algeria which we regard as one and indivisible, and to deny to its people the right to self-determination under free conditions—all of these efforts are doomed to failure and can result only in perpetuation of the tragedy which has already persisted far too long.

14. The new cry that an African country, be it Algeria or that often-forgotten part of Somaliland known in colonial terminology as the French Somali Coast, can become part of France is unacceptable to us Africans.

15. The problem of Algeria is in no fundamental respect different from the problem of any other colony, and it can be successfully solved in no other way than by the unconditional liquidation of colonialism. We venture to make these few remarks on this subject because in our view Algeria epitomizes the entire colonial problem. We shall of course speak on this problem at much greater length when it is our turn to do so before the appropriate bodies of this Organization.

16. We have heard the view of some representatives that colonialism today is in effect self-liquidating. The evidence offered in support of this includes the admission to the United Nations of seventeen new nations this year. Those who put forward this view, however, overlook several facts. There was nothing automatic about the process of emancipation in the past. It was achieved only by the heroic sacrifice and struggle of millions in the colonial empire. Moreover, the countries still under colonial rule constitute a hard core, the piercing of which will require even more vigorous efforts than those heretofore exerted. In these efforts should be included both the co-operation of those nations which have espoused the principles of democracy and of the United Nations itself, representing the collective will and the public opinion of all the peoples of the world.

17. Sometimes we hear the argument of domestic jurisdiction adduced against United Nations measures. It is said that the United Nations has no right to intervene in colonial countries even by exerting moral pressure. It is the view of my delegation that the United Nations cannot be expected to abdicate its duty of using its moral prestige and its unequalled moral authority, as the custodian and symbol of the hopes of all the nations, to achieve the final stages of the liquidation of colonialism with the minimum dangers and the maximum benefits. If we are correct in our analysis that the survival of mankind depends upon eliminating all possible areas of friction and all threats to peace, then we are left with no alternative but to invoke the entire authority of this international Organization in voicing the demand that colonialism be speedily liquidated and that the newly independent nations be assisted in establishing effective government.

^{1/} Anthony Sampson, Common Sense About Africa (New York, The Macmillan Company, 1960), pp. 136-137.

18. The African-Asian draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6] properly refers to the impropriety of disrupting national unity and territorial integrity. Paragraph 6 of the draft declaration reads:

"Any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country is incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations."

19. In a similar theme, paragraph 7 reads:

"All States shall observe faithfully and strictly the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the present Declaration on the basis of equality, non-interference in the internal affairs of all States, and respect for the sovereign rights of all peoples and their territorial integrity."

20. Whilst my delegation fully supports the contents of these two paragraphs, we should like to emphasize that phrases such as "territorial integrity" and "non-interference in the internal affairs of States" should not be used as a disguise for the continued domination of dependent peoples and the denial to them of the right of self-determination. When we speak of dependent peoples, we do not mean merely those who live under the domination of overseas metropolitan Powers but also peoples who live under the domination of overland colonial Powers. In this connexion I hope that the representative of Ireland will allow me to quote from his well-thought-out speech delivered on 5 December of this year.

21. Speaking of the draft resolution sponsored by the African and Asian countries, the representative of Ireland said, among other things:

"... it is essential, we submit, that the rights it proclaims for peoples not now enjoying full national independence should be applicable to all peoples in all parts of the world, east or west, north or south; that the right to exercise full national independence should be recognized as justly belonging to all peoples, whether the oppressors and the oppressed were of the same race, creed or colour, or of different races, creeds and colours;" [935th meeting, para. 93].

22. These words, we submit, strike at the heart of the matter before this Assembly. In order that their meaning may be made clear in the draft resolution, the representative of Ireland expressed his delegation's preference that the opening part of paragraph 5 should read:

"Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, and in all cases where the sovereign rights proclaimed in this Declaration are denied to any people, to transfer all powers to the people concerned without any conditions or reservations...." [ibid., para. 107].

My delegation would be only too happy to support such a proposal.

23. I am certain that all of us would wish also to emphasize that all the elements which constitute a nation and its national territory must be considered in dealing with the question of territorial integrity and national unity. Unsettled boundaries or arbitrary delimitations must be rectified in accordance with the overriding and commonly accepted criterion of unification of those ethnic groups which also constitute indivisible economic entities. This is particularly true when artificial boundaries divide homogeneous population groups, creating economic and social hardships. We must be governed by the basic principle, as expressed in the Charter of the United Nations, that the interests of the inhabitants of the areas concerned are paramount. We cannot permit arbitrary lines to override the welfare and historical rights of peoples, or to conflict with the obvious implications of the geographical contiguity of the regions concerned and the wishes of their inhabitants. The disregard of such principles may well lead to disguised forms of colonialism, as wolves in the garb of sheep sometimes creep into the fold.

24. Indeed, in our view the worst legacy of colonialism in Africa will be the endless number of territorial problems which it has created as a result of the artificial divisions of homogeneous national entities.

25. Colonialism has seen to it, by leaving these territorial disputes on their hands, that Africans shall be divided amongst themselves for a long time to come so that erstwhile colonial Powers can exploit this division for their own advantage. It is for us Africans to take full cognizance of this fact and to strive for the amicable solution of our differences so that the Machiavellian doctrine of "divide and rule" may not reappear in a different and more subtle form from that it has taken in the past.

26. In conclusion, if an overwhelming majority of the nations represented at this session of the General Assembly agree on a vigorous declaration, this session of the Assembly may well go down in history as the "Assembly of Freedom" and our declaration, as a "Declaration of Freedom", would rank with the great Charters of mankind: the Magna Carta, the Declaration of Independence, the Declaration of the Rights of Man, and the Charter of the United Nations.

27. In so doing we shall, it is true, primarily be recognizing history rather than making it, for the march towards independence is so indelibly inscribed in the agenda of mankind that it cannot be halted; nevertheless, in a sense we shall be making history as well.

28. Mr. BOUCETTA (Morocco) (translated from French): Earlier speakers from this rostrum have described, with a talent I cannot hope to equal, the origin, history and consequences of the sorry scourge that is called colonialism. Some of the most brilliant speakers have sought to give it a definition and to reveal to the world all the hardship, suffering and intrigues that it conceals, and also the racial discrimination and segregation involved, culminating in the end in the exploitation in inhuman and shameful fashion of man by man, whereas men are borne free and people are all equal and should be treated as such.

29. I shall add nothing to what has been said—and well said—to define this phenomenon of colonialism, which will long remain, alas, deeply engraved in the hearts and minds of those who have endured it. To understand what it means in practice, without consulting dictionaries or encyclopedias, ask a man, a woman, an old person, a child, a family, a people, a nation that have been colonized, that have endured it or are still enduring it, what colonialism means. Maybe, they will give you no answer; but how meaningful and eloquent will be their silence! How many generations have for centuries suffered and are still suffering under it, from the days of the concessions and up to the brutal occupation by armed force, which went on all through the last century and the beginning of this century.

30. Times have changed and we are witnessing today this same phenomenon appear in new forms, with a new ideology and a new doctrine. That is why the task we are pursuing today and for which are forefathers gave their lives and their happiness is a noble and major task. It must also be accomplished completely and definitively; it must unmask colonialism in both its ancient and its present-day forms.

31. The disintegration and liquidation of colonial empires is certainly one of the most salient features of contemporary history. After lengthy sufferings and a heroic struggle, millions of human beings have successfully shaken off the oppressors' yoke and a large number of nations have regained their freedom and their dignity. Nevertheless, anachronistic though it may seem in the world of 1960, the expeditions, conspiracies and acts of force that marked the establishment of huge areas of domination in the not very remote past show that the era of colonialism is not by any means a thing of the past. Not only does it survive in its most brutal classical forms, not only does it continue to wage absurd colonial wars but, in addition—and this too is a characteristic feature of our time—we find it assuming new forms of domination that are no whit less virulent.

32. This is a problem which merits all the attention and vigilance we can devote to it. That is why Morocco, a country which has endured foreign occupation and its bitter experience, a country that is devoted to the freedom and dignity of individuals and nations, is gratified to see the General Assembly taking up the important question of the grant of independence to colonial countries and peoples. It is only natural that the United Nations should take up this—in our view, essential—problem. Specific clauses in the Charter clearly show the importance attached to the development of dependent countries and their economic and social improvement with a view to enabling them to govern themselves and gain their freedom. Furthermore, the basic principles of the United Nations, the aims which are the justification for its existence, oblige it to deal, with the least possible delay, with the serious problems raised by colonialism and its consequences; for, as long as this phenomenon persists, all the principles on which the United Nations is based and which should govern any international community worthy of its name will be violated—whether it be respect for human rights and dignity or equality as between persons and peoples or the right of peoples to self-determination.

33. We fail to understand, speaking for ourselves, how anyone can still talk here about certain obsolete ideas, acclaiming the merits of "enlightened" colonialism, vaunting its lofty ideals or attributing to it any kind of humanitarian or civilizing mission. The history of colonial conquests, far from being a peak achievement, confronts us with quite different realities. It is nothing other than a stormy succession of wars and expeditions waged by Powers intoxicated by their economic and military potential, seeking to gain strategic positions and hankering for wealth and prestige. The struggles for power between these opposing Powers, their policies of collusion and their intrigues to partition whole continents reflect little credit on the Powers involved and are certainly not a glorious page in the history of mankind.

34. And how could it be otherwise, seeing that colonialism has its laws and its dogmas, its own dialectic and its own logic. To start with, it infringes the principle of the equality of individuals and ignores their most elementary rights. Above all, it signifies domination, enslavement and exploitation of the individual. Occupation of any territory entails, to begin with, a clash between two temperaments, two personalities, discrimination between the colonizer and the colonized. The inferiority of the latter to the former becomes a sacrosanct principle of colonialism.

35. It is a point worth mentioning that the occupying countries which have often thought fit to regard the occupied territories as an integral part of their own territory—some of them even, in a fancied display of generosity, granting their citizenship to the conquered populations—have never gone so far as to carry this fiction to its logical consequence and grant complete equality of rights.

36. The recent history of Algeria is most instructive on this point and shows us the innumerable changes that have been made in the legal status of the Algerians at the whim of the colonizing Power and the various categories through which it has successively passed to fit the needs of the policy of the moment.

37. Colonialism, by its very nature, excludes any form of equal rights which might operate to its disadvantage or undermine its rule. Even where it parades its civilizing virtues and certain humanitarian ideals, it is mainly directed towards the exploitation of wealth and is prone to look upon the native of the country merely as a means to an end, a means of producing something cheaply. The merciless logic of such a policy has led, and is still leading, colonialism to practise the most extreme forms of inequality of rights and to build up a system of racial segregation.

38. World public opinion continues to feel deep resentment at the outmoded policies that are still followed in certain parts of the world, more especially in Africa, which constitute a negation of the basic values of civilization and a serious affront to human dignity.

39. The African and Asian countries most immediately affected by racial discrimination have often been heard denouncing and stigmatizing such behaviour. The serious decadence in human civilization reflected by this disgraceful behaviour was strongly condemned at the Asian-African Conference held at Bandung in 1955, and again at the sessions of the Conference of Independent African States held at Accra and Monrovia and quite recently also at Addis-Ababa.

40. These voices from Africa and Asia met with a resounding response from world public opinion. The problem of racial segregation is still one of the gravest and most difficult problems which our Organization must solve. For instance, under a screen of humanitarian intentions, the colonialists often trample underfoot the most elementary rights of the individual. Similarly, on the pretext that the inhabitants of the occupied regions are unable to exploit their wealth, and that they want to help them to develop their economy, the colonialists do not hesitate to proceed systematically to exploit that wealth.

41. An individual is not even allowed to prove his ability. He finds his energies stifled and subjugated. Now that many countries in Africa and Asia have attained independence we can see how emancipation and the expansion of energies that were formerly muzzled have stimulated the progress and well-being of the populations and that it was foreign occupation that kept the economy, trade and agriculture at such a backward level.

42. After being for long regarded as a reserve of raw materials and plentiful cheap manpower, the countries of Africa and Asia have now become aware of themselves and have realized that, by freeing their energies, independence opens the door to economic expansion and social and cultural progress. Several examples of this have been cited. I would like to add the case of my own country, Morocco, where in four years of independent existence we have provided schooling for more than a million children, or ten times more than was achieved in forty-four years of occupation. Our economy, which was a subsidiary and slave economy, is gradually becoming a national economy operating for the progress and well-being of the people. Social security benefits are available for everyone and the social welfare measures introduced since we became independent are much, very much, superior to those which existed before. Discrimination and differentiation of every kind have been abolished and we are continuing the fight against unemployment and for the happiness, prosperity and well-being of our people.

43. This means the disappearance of the myth of chronic incapacity which the colonialists were fond of attributing to the peoples whom they oppressed. One of the most disturbing aspects of colonialism, however, particularly at a time when all efforts are directed towards maintaining peace, is the permanent threat which it represents for the security and stability of the world.

44. The reason for this is, firstly, that colonial settlement often goes hand in hand with territorial partitioning and evokes the divisions, or even exploits the disputes, which at a given moment in history may exist between certain peoples.

45. The territorial partitioning which resulted from the splitting up of whole continents into zones of influence, the intrigues and manoeuvres resorted to by colonialism in order to achieve its aims have always had the effect of exasperating the peoples who have suffered from them. This partitioning and dismantling of territories stands in formal contradiction to the very principles of our Charter and prejudices, seriously prejudices, the territorial unity and integrity of States.

46. That is how, as we have had occasion to point out and to repeat, our country was partitioned, split up, mutilated and divided because colonial Powers wanted at the outset of this century to divide it up between them, quite heedless of either the wishes of the population or natural historical and geographical circumstances. That is how a united Morocco, forming one single indelible entity, has been amputated of what is nowadays presented as the independent State of Mauritania and of territories the populations of which still languish under colonial occupation, such as Ifni, Segouia El Hamra, Rio de Oro, Tindouf, Tidikelt, Ceuta and Melilla. Each of these territories is under occupation, designated variously as overseas territory, overseas establishment, "presidio" or suzerain area; but the form is everywhere and always the same and is nothing other than colonial occupation.

47. Our task here today is to lead the attack against these tricks of division and disunity. It is also to resist, in the best way we can, colonialist designs based on the principle of "divide and rule" or "disunite in order to hold on".

48. We refuse to accept balkanization, "katanganization" and "mauritization". We cannot but voice our regret and resentment at the fact that the same colonial Powers, which at the end of the last and beginning of the present century partitioned and divided up Africa into zones of influence, are today objecting to reunification and regrouping. Thus, by seeking to have Mauritania admitted to the United Nations, France and her allies sought to make the partitioning and division of Morocco a "fait accompli", guaranteed and ratified by the United Nations. The Soviet Union, in opposing that admission, and the fifty-six delegations which expressed themselves in the First Committee by their affirmative vote or their abstention,^{2/} were but respecting the principle enshrined in the Charter which demands respect for the territorial integrity of Member States.

49. We are profoundly sorry that certain representatives of great Powers not only disregarded this principle but also failed to comply with their own obligations as signatory Powers of such international instruments as the General Act of the International Conference at Algiers in 1906.

50. They go on stubbornly persisting in their mistakes and in this very Assembly they reproach those who took the correct view with having acted consequentially. We would like, therefore, to have this point made absolutely clear: we claim that the Soviet Union, by casting its veto, signified its objection, invoking the United Nations Charter, to recognizing the violation of the territory of a Member State of the United Nations by another Member State. The Soviet Government desired in this way to respect its special obligations towards Morocco whose independence it had recognized in 1956. Why was not the same attitude adopted by all the delegations and all the members of the Security Council? We can only regret the fact but we feel bound to denounce the colonialist action which divides up our country, rends asunder our people and mutilates our State. Anyhow, we shall continue the fight for complete liberation and for the safeguarding of our territorial integrity. This is a fight based on right and justice. It is also the continuation of a policy that has long since been devised to combat colonialism, for resistance to oppression has been written into the history of peoples and forms one of its essential factors. There is no instance of colonial domination which in the long run has not been obliged to capitulate to such resistance. That, of course, does imply a lot of hardship and suffering but the struggle of a people for its freedom steels its energies and adds lustre to its name. What makes the situation more serious is that the centres of intrigue and trouble whence colonialism launches its attacks for the conquest of strongholds constitute a grave threat to peace and stability in a number of very sensitive areas.

51. We cannot remain indifferent to the situation in Oman and West Irian, for in present-day circumstances peace and security are indivisible. The concept of localized conflict tends to disappear; the extension and the generalization of disputes are always to be feared. One of the most striking examples of the threat which colonialism holds suspended over world peace is the disturbing situation which prevails in Palestine, a country where cruel and despotic behaviour has reached its peak. A whole nation has been displaced, deprived of its land and its wealth, and doomed for the last fourteen years to live in exile. This Palestine situation, which evokes feelings of indignation and revolt in everyone's conscience, must be vigilantly watched, for it is highly explosive. It has already led to a local war, in 1948; it nearly produced a general conflagration in 1956 and it constitutes a permanent source of disturbances and instability in a highly sensitive area of the world. Generally speaking, the conquest of strategic strong-points, which is still the major aim of colonialism, is a constant source of trouble and a serious threat to world peace and security. We all know how one event leads to the next and how the process marches inevitably on—establishment of military bases, armaments race, the organization of aggressive blocs.

52. The presence of armed forces, which used to be excused chiefly by the desire to consolidate political domination and maintain powerful economic interests, becomes an end in itself, dictated by strategic considerations and forming an integral part of a policy of blocs and alliances. We energetically protest against the threats which, in this way, bear particularly heavily on Africa where certain Powers, rejecting the disarmament policy which the peace-loving nations propose should be followed, continue to nourish aggressive ambitions and, under the pretext of joint defence, set up bases and carry out nuclear tests despite general disapproval and contrary to the wishes of the peoples of Africa.

53. We protest even more forcibly against the coalition of powerful interests, the leagues of aggressive blocs formed against peoples who are fighting to regain their independence, and this is where we come to the most revolting aspect of colonialist domination. The building up of overseas territories has not been accomplished smoothly and peacefully. Empires on which the sun never sets have not been built up in an atmosphere of peace and calm. The path of colonialist conquests has always been marked by bloody expeditions in its various phases, more especially in its decline. The liberation of colonized peoples has almost always been characterized by merciless wars, for neither the deployment of a formidable military potential nor the strongest coalition of interests can possibly prevent the oppressed populations from waging to the utmost their lawful struggle for recognition of their sacred and undeniable rights.

54. There is no need to dip very far back into history to come upon classical examples of colonial conflicts. Some Powers have been engaged in war for many long years. Only recently Indo-China was the scene of large-scale operations which had a profound effect on world security and stability. The war in Algeria, which has been going on relentlessly for more than six years bringing unhappiness and suffering in its train, continues to remind us of a past we would like to see never recur. It continues to be a manifestation of colonialism in its most brutal form. The endurance and tenacity of the Algerian people evoke our admiration and our sympathy. The various phases of its heroic fight are so well known that there is no need to describe or recall them here in detail.

55. Our Organization has already on several occasions considered, and is bound again, this year, marked as it is by the accession of several African countries to independence, to consider this drama which dangerously affects international peace. We merely wish to stress once more the grave risks of the conflict being widened and internationalized, more especially because of the assistance which some nations persist in giving to the colonialist aggressor. Facing as it does a desire for domination which disregards historical evolution and the irresistible advance of nationalisms, the Algerian people yet enjoys the support and sympathy of 1,500 million human beings who used to live not long ago in colonialist slavery and who have succeeded, after long decades of suffering, in regaining their freedom and their dignity.

56. Asia and Africa show a new face to the world nowadays and we are convinced that the last strongholds, behind which colonialism has taken refuge, will in their turn soon crumble away. Thus, the great family of the nations which have recently achieved independence will go on expanding, to the maximum advantage of everyone, since its function will be to play a decisive role in maintaining peace improving international relations and promoting the progress, prosperity and well-being of the peoples. At the same time, though, as they are performing this noble but very difficult task, they must consolidate their dearly-bought independence, put their economies on a sound footing and continue to be more vigilant than ever, for the colonial Powers resort to other ways and means of perpetuating their domination and their influence.

57. That is the reason why we want to thank the Soviet delegation for having requested the inclusion of this item in our agenda and insisting that it should be discussed, with all the proper formality, in our Organization. We shall support its draft resolution and my delegation will, likewise, support any resolution or solemn declaration that proclaims the immediate ending of colonialism in all its forms and urges respect for the sovereign rights and territorial integrity of all States without exception. It goes without saying that, as regards my country, these resolutions or declarations cover the whole complex of colonial territories, however they may be tricked out or disguised as overseas territories or departments, "presidios" or suzerain areas, colonies or protectorates, mandated or trust territories. We have seen that, though the designation may be different, the system and methods remain the same and the single objective is to exploit human beings, to exploit the natural wealth for themselves irrespective of any other consideration.

58. We say loudly and clearly that we want no independence "at a discount"; we will never accept dependence or servility and so we will always and everywhere denounce puppet régimes, balkanization, political, economic, military or cultural domination. We stand for real, true independence, which will foster the development of the individual and guarantee the peoples advancement and well-being. That is how we understand our fight for the future, one which will have no time for obsequiousness or beating about the bush or hesitation of any kind. Accordingly, the independence to be granted to the colonial peoples must be one which protects their territorial integrity and does not place them under any kind of domination. My country is as anxious as any other to see colonialism in its death throes and liquidated once and for all, but it wants this independence to be something genuine, both as regards territory and as regards population.

59. We are aware of the pretext advanced to the effect that the colonial countries are not yet capable of conducting their own affairs. That is a misleading and baseless pretext and we reject it categorically. We consider that the first step is to free the peoples from colonial domination; that is the essential prerequisite for their speedy evolution. So long as they remain dependent, they will be unable to organize their countries politically, economically and socially in effective fashion and so as to serve their own interests.

60. We can now perhaps draw a few conclusions from what has already been said.

61. Firstly, the eradication of colonialism on a world-wide scale is desired by decent people all over the world. The liquidation and burial of this parasitical evil was long overdue. Colonialism stands condemned everywhere and nowadays even the colonial powers are ashamed of it. They hide their faces when it is referred to but they hide them under a veil which does not differ from the classical colonialism, nowadays known as neo-colonialism.

62. Secondly, the conscience of mankind rejects colonialism as a derogation from the concept of freedom, something that favours the spirit of domination, based on a kind of parasitism in which man behaves like a wolf to his fellow-man. The moral conscience is revolted and this leads inevitably to instability which, in turn, hampers the advance of progress.

63. Thirdly, the moral conscience used to depict the formation of empires as a civilizing mission. This same conscience presents the neo-colonialist imperialism of today as a system for the defence of freedom. While this imperialism combats freedom in Algeria, while it provokes secessionist movements in Katanga and Mauritania, having first set up puppet and completely unrepresentative governments, the desire for power, the motives of profit, domination and exploitation hide themselves behind the false mask of freedom and take cover behind a military system imposed on a large number of weak countries.

64. Before 1960 the fight for freedom was waged against direct colonial administration. This classical form of colonialism tried to secure in the countries placed under its control a monopoly of raw materials, cheap manpower and forced labour, sought to corner markets, control points of strategic importance and keep a watch on foreign competition and, lastly, sought the so-called cannon fodder still to be found on the battlefields in Algeria. The characteristic feature of this classical colonialism is its domination of all the departments of public life—administrative, political, military, economic, cultural, social and diplomatic.

65. After 1960 the fight for freedom enters a phase which differs only superficially from the previous phase. After emancipation and liberation from direct administration, the peoples will soon realize that political independence brings them to a period of rehabilitation, marked by a struggle against balkanization and the partitioning of countries, against a reversion to capitalist feudalism, against foreign economic control and against military domination. In a word, neo-colonialism confronts the countries that took part in the Bandung Conference with the prospect of fighting against the keeping of young countries in a state of dependence. With the prospect of such a sombre future before it, neo-colonialism, in order to maintain itself, seeks to create and to aggravate the divisions between the African-Asian countries and elsewhere also; it is using and will go on using every means available to break up the Bandung bloc. It is trying to separate Asia from Africa. In Africa it seeks to separate North Africa from Central Africa and from South Africa. Neo-colonialism fights against the authentic independence that has been won at the cost of struggle and suffering. It is redoubling its efforts to have in Africa and other countries only those forms of independence that are perverted or even imposed, as in Mauritania in Southern Morocco.

66. In the United Nations forum classical colonialism was wont to use a certain number of falsehoods like pacification, civilizing mission, respect for traditions, serving an apprenticeship to democracy, defence of religion, properly qualified spokesmen, foreign influence, etc.

67. Nowadays neo-colonialism represents itself as a system of orderly evolution, the protector of freedom, in order to maintain its economic and military domination. It splits up the territorial unity of nations and offers it as a further contribution to freedom and independence. The line marking the boundary between the notion of evolution and that of revolution becomes harder and harder to perceive.

68. We live in an age of scientific and technical revolution and, at the same time, our era is also an age of political and social revolutions, which explains why the unconditional eradication of colonialism is categorically imperative.

69. The trend of history is following the direction of freedom and unity. Freedom is a concrete idea—an economic, political, social and spiritual concept. Unity is a concrete idea implying the equality, regrouping and universality of rights and duties.

70. When these two ideas are respected, the evolutionary process follows the simple path of emancipation and reconstruction. When neo-colonialism interferes with its intrigues and provocations, as in the Congo or Mauritania, the process becomes complicated. It passes from classical colonialism to balkanization, economic exploitation, popular revolutions and then to natural regrouping and, finally, to national reconstruction in every sphere.

71. That is why the concept of independence is entirely relative unless it is placed within the framework of territorial integrity and representative government.

72. The Soviet Union's proposal will constitute a landmark in history. With colonialism and neo-colonialism destroyed, it will become more possible and feasible to bring men together. Since imperialism and the spirit of domination were the major causes of world wars, the problem of disarmament itself will be simplified by the liquidation of the last vestiges of the old empires. Peace is indivisible; it goes hand in hand with justice. When the evil that afflicts humanity has been extirpated, the beneficial effects will be felt in every department of human activity.

Mr. Fekini (Libya), Vice-President, took the Chair.

73. Mr. ROSSIDES (Cyprus): The subject which we are now debating in this Assembly—the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples—is one of pre-eminent significance, in relation both to its moral content and to its global encompassment. It is, in fact, an issue of world freedom.

74. The dedication of the people of Cyprus to the ideals of freedom and self-determination has been amply established by their hard and long struggle for liberation. As a people who have long suffered under foreign domination and experienced one of the saddest manifestations of colonialism and its policy of "divide and rule", and as a country having to cope with the effects of colonialism, we feel deeply with all subject peoples yearning and struggling for their freedom. With fullness of heart we espouse their cause, which is our cause, the cause of all peoples spiritually free.

75. We are therefore happy to co-sponsor the African-Asian draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6] and to endorse its vigorous declarations. We endorse it not only because it contains a message of freedom but also because it contains the meaning of peace.

76. Freedom and peace are inseparable concepts and indivisible realities. Those who seek peace and deny freedom are working at cross purposes. The negativeness of the latter destroys the positiveness of the former.

77. Disarmament and peace can only be achieved where world order reigns, and world order is impossible so long as nations seek to dominate other nations and peoples. Domination is linked with force, and force is the enemy of peace.

78. We are not theorizing; we are speaking from experience. After a long struggle for freedom in the political field over many decades, the people of Cyprus turned with faith to the United Nations, hoping for a just and peaceful solution. When negative results brought disillusionment and frustration, bloodshed and armed resistance followed during four years of fighting, with all its feats of heroism and self-sacrifice, and also with its heavy toll in human life and suffering.

79. Criticism is not the objective of this reference to the past. Its sense is to convey an experience and an enduring lesson, that peace cannot last where freedom is denied, and that United Nations apathy and inaction on issues of freedom do not help the cause of peace. When this simple truth is realized, many grave problems of today will find their natural solution. If we are to move effectively towards world peace, we must ensure world freedom; and to ensure world freedom, all forms of subjugation and domination should be eliminated.

80. Colonialism is a system of domination that still survives and, therefore, it should, in the first place, be speedily abolished. Its abandonment will bring in its wake the liberation of all subject peoples in whatever lands and by whatever means their freedom is denied.

81. The resolution which, as we hope, will emerge from this debate is of far-reaching importance. It will be the collective voice of humanity making its decisive pronouncement against colonialism and in support of the right of all peoples to self-determination. In its wider significance the resolution will mark the approaching end of a long era in human history, an era conditioned by the concept of force and domination, and will open up vistas of a new world, a world based on equality and the brotherhood of man.

82. The primary and direct effect, however, of this resolution will lie in the termination of colonialism as a world system, a system which still openly sanctions domination by one people over another.

83. Historically, colonialism, which started by way of settlement for purposes of trade, soon took the form of subjugation and domination of primitive and under-developed lands and countries in Asia and Africa, and eventually grew into a political system and a legal institution. Recognized under international law, expounded and classified in constitutional laws, colonialism came to be accepted as a normal state of affairs. Geography was traced in terms of colonialism, and national and international life, for over two centuries, turned on its axis. In other words, domination by force, resulting in the deprivation of fundamental human rights to freedom, equality and justice, has been, and sadly enough still is, in the name of colonialism, sanctioned and treated as the norm. However, the subjection and exploitation of man by man and of nation by nation, so long tolerated and even admitted in practice, now offend against the moral conscience of humanity.

84. In the course of history mankind has gone through many stages and conditions, but ultimately their fate has been decided by the human attitude towards them. They survive where moral principle and freedom prevail; they finally decay and die when they run counter to man's inherent sense of right and justice. Humanity, finding no hope in them, casts them aside. Even slavery, now long outlawed, was for centuries an accepted and lawful practice.

85. The continuous human evolution, shaped by industrial progress and technological achievements, slow at first, has in our present times so gained in momentum that it successively revolutionizes all preconceived notions that do not rest on a moral basis.

86. The stage has now come when the institution of colonialism, or any other forcible domination of one people over another, will, in its turn, be universally condemned and abandoned.

87. Paragraphs 1 and 2 of the declaration in the African-Asian draft resolution read as follows:

"The subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights, is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and is an impediment to the promotion of world peace and co-operation.

"All peoples have the right of self-determination; by virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development."

This is the call of humanity today, and these are the dictates of moral principle. They cannot go unheeded. The age of domination by force already belongs to the past. All peoples have a right to live in freedom and to develop freely their own culture and their own political and economic systems. The principle of self-determination has been aptly called the cornerstone of the United Nations and the master key of the Charter. People the world over look to freedom and self-determination not only because they promote human dignity and the assertion of human personality but also as elements of peace and conditions necessary for effective progress and international co-operation. For, indeed, the wider the extent of self-determination, the broader the basis of peace in the world. Relationships of dominant and subject peoples should be replaced by relations between free peoples on a footing of equality and trust. In this way, co-operation and peace can take the place of antagonism and war.

88. The earlier this is realized by those directly concerned, the better for them and for world peace. An imaginative policy on the part of those who wield power can lead no other way. They should move with the moving times and the spirit of the age. Even from the viewpoint of expediency, it would be in the interests of the dominant Powers to co-operate now with what is right while there is still time and before rapid developments force them to co-operate with the inevitable. Almost all the merit of that co-operation would then be lost.

89. Forty-two years ago, Woodrow Wilson gave a far-sighted warning to the world. In his address to the United States Congress on 11 February 1918, he said: "Self-determination is not a mere phrase. It is an imperative principle of action which statesmen will henceforth ignore at their peril." The wisdom of that statement is now obvious from everyday realities.

90. I am glad to note from the statement of the representative of the United Kingdom, Mr. Ormsby-Gore, in regard to the smaller British colonies, that his country is prepared, as he said, "in accordance with Article 73 b of the Charter, to work out with the people concerned the form of independence which will best satisfy their aspirations." [925th meeting, para. 41.]

91. Therefore, even in the case of all the small colonies, their independence is promised by the United Kingdom. We earnestly hope that this will apply also to the brave people of Malta, whose progress to self-determination seems to have suffered a marked regression in the new constitution now offered to them, which is substantially less liberal than the previous one. That is why we make particular mention of this colony.

92. Another vital aspect of the draft resolution is its declaration in paragraph 6, which runs:

"Any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country is incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations."

93. This is essential in order to counter the consequences of the policy of "divide and rule", which often is the sad legacy of colonialism and carries its evil effects further into the future.

94. The abolition of colonialism will be a historic landmark in the moral progress of mankind. There is no doubt that its impact upon all forms of domination and oppression will inevitably be far-reaching.

95. We cannot, however, hope that colonialism will disappear overnight. For a time its existence will inevitably continue, but only while it is being gradually liquidated, in much the same way—to draw a rough analogy—in which a company continues to exist while in liquidation. The resolution under discussion will be, in a sense, the receiving order issued by the collective judgement of nations in the matter of colonialism. The United Nations could well be the trustee in this liquidation.

96. The Charter of the United Nations, in Chapters XI, XII and XIII, while taking cognizance of colonialism, made provision for the progress towards independence of colonial peoples and territories. However, the progress achieved in these fifteen years has proved too slow to cope with the growing rapidity of international developments, which seem to take by surprise those more directly concerned with them. One manifestation of these rapid developments is the almost sudden collapse of colonialism, now evidenced in this debate. The human instinct for liberty, developing into an urge and an impelling necessity, is now an irresistible force. That force inspires this debate and the resolution which will be the outcome of it.

97. The inscription in the agenda of the General Assembly of an item like the present one was thought wholly unrealistic and unattainable even a few years ago. Such was then the grip of the old concept of colonialism. It was not then an uncommon occurrence for questions of freedom and self-determination brought to the United Nations to be put aside, or bypassed, in resolutions without substance, instead of leading to the adoption of constructive resolutions. This was damaging to the prestige of the United Nations and to the cause of peace. For peace is not served by covering up anomalous situations which stem from violations of the very principles on which the United Nations stands. That simply leads to greater anomaly—and we are witnessing the effect of that policy today.

98. Adherence to principle is steadily becoming more pronounced in the United Nations. The expansion of membership by the addition of so many new States from Asia and Africa, which long struggled for justice and freedom in their own cause, brings to the United Nations a growing dedication to the Charter, particularly noticeable on questions of freedom and human dignity.

99. It is common knowledge that colonialism in its accepted form is a product of Western civilization. But it should in all fairness also be said that it was that civilization which voiced the staunchest moral condemnations of colonialism and exploitation and first expounded the principle of self-determination. All freedom movements have in some way or another been inspired by Western civilization and blossomed in its concepts. Some staunch opposers of British and other colonialism may be found today in Britain, and we are grateful to those liberal minds in Britain, no less than to those in other nations, who stood by our side in the difficult times of our struggle for freedom.

100. Another aspect that has been put forward is that of ensuring full independence to newly emerging countries. To quote Mr. Walter Lippman: "Colonialism does not always end with the grant of political independence". Although a territory is independent, yet the legacy of colonialism may sometimes be there and may in its effect be a hindrance to the fullness of independence.

101. From the economic aspect, I should like to turn to what has been said by the representative of Iran, to the effect that the economic reconstruction and development of new countries must be aided and their freedom ensured so that they "will never find it necessary, for reasons of national defence, to allocate to military expenditure funds essential to their national development" [926th meeting, para. 69].

102. Difficult economic problems face the new countries, problems that have to be provided for. The United Nations has a distinct obligation in that respect. It should be prepared to render all necessary economic and other assistance. Meeting these requirements is a necessity and a challenge for the United Nations.

103. We therefore support the United States proposal for a United Nations programme for independence and development in Africa, and we hope that such a programme of development may be extended to Cyprus.

104. We would also wish to see the United Nations take a more active part in helping newly emerging countries, as well as countries and peoples in the transitory period to independence. A United Nations committee could be established to assist where there are differences, by offering its good offices, by mediation and by bridging the gulfs, thereby helping in the smooth and speedy progress toward independence.

105. Although the African-Asian draft resolution is mainly concerned with the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, yet it is in no way restricted. Its scope, in terms of freedom and self-determination, is all-embracing. It includes all peoples, in whatever land and in whatever circumstances they are dominated and by whatever means they are deprived of their inalienable right to self-determination and freedom.

106. This resolution will, in a sense, be a sequel to and a counterpart of the Bandung Declaration, adopted at the Asian-African Conference of 1955. The importance of that declaration cannot be over-emphasized. It was the dynamic expression of the awakening African-Asian world unanimous in its declaration on basic moral and political principles. That declaration was equally all-embracing in its condemnation of imperialism and colonialism, in all their manifestations, and in upholding the right of self-determination. From that conference a chain of events followed that cannot be unrelated to the spirit of Bandung. They produced a healthier international climate leading up to the Geneva summit conference.^{3/} Subsequent adverse events in international relations interrupted the trend of that positive move towards greater understanding and co-operation. We hope and trust that, with the resolution to be now adopted, the thread will be taken up and a new move forward will be made in the right direction, towards freedom and towards peace based on freedom.

107. In concluding, I should like to point out that the draft resolution, by relating all its parts to the United Nations Charter and to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, not only gives a sound basis to its contents, but also revitalizes the spirit of the Charter. It restores to the Charter provisions on self-determination something of the strength and purpose which they may have lost over the years through ineffective treatment of relative items of freedom.

108. Furthermore, this draft resolution gives to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights a new sense of reality and validity. This is of importance, considering that that Declaration has no binding force in a legal sense, and that the completion and adoption of the draft International Covenants on Human Rights cannot be expected, at least at the present rate of progress, before many years have elapsed.

109. This resolution, if adopted, will make a signal contribution, juridically and politically, to the United Nations. It could become an epoch-making document, second only to the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. We hope it may be given, by this Assembly, the unanimous adoption it deserves.

110. Mr. ZORIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (translated from Russian): The Soviet delegation has already had the opportunity of presenting in detail its views on all aspects of the problem of the immediate elimination of colonialism; it has explained and given the reasons for its proposals. The Soviet Union is in favour of a radical and immediate solution of the whole problem of colonialism, and accordingly calls on all States that really desire the speedy liberation of the colonial peoples to adopt, at this fifteenth session of the General Assembly, the Declaration on the immediate granting of independence to all colonial countries and peoples the draft text of which has been submitted by the Soviet Government in document A/4502.

111. In its previous statements the USSR delegation has already pointed out that the overwhelming majority of African and Asian delegations have sincerely expressed their desire to see the immediate termination of the colonial system and the adoption at this session of the General Assembly of measures that would help in the performance of this noble task. We should like now to express our views on the draft resolution and declaration submitted by forty-three African and Asian States [A/L.323 and Add.1-6]. The Soviet delegation's opinion of this African-Asian draft resolution is, on the whole, favourable, even though we consider it inadequate and incomplete. The draft resolution-declaration contains a number of fundamental provisions that were put forward in the Soviet draft declaration submitted, as you all know, at the very beginning of the fifteenth session. It can be said that the Soviet draft declaration and the draft resolution presented by the African-Asian countries express a common platform and identical views on a number of vital questions. This is a gratifying fact that proves that in the protracted struggle for the elimination of colonialism conducted by the Soviet Union, all the socialist countries and the African and Asian countries and peoples, there is an identity of views and a single fundamental purpose.

^{3/} Conference of Heads of Government of the four great Powers, held at Geneva from 18 to 23 July 1955.

112. However, we must also point out the defects from which we think the African-Asian draft resolution suffers.

113. We could observe, first of all, that certain paragraphs are not drafted with sufficient clarity; as a result they are interpreted differently even by the sponsors of the draft resolution. We need only point out that the representative of the Philippines asserted that what was enjoined in paragraph 5 of the draft declaration was not the immediate transfer of all powers to the peoples of the colonies, but rather the taking or initiating forthwith of steps which would lead to such transfer of power. Approximately the same interpretation of that paragraph was given by the Malayan representative, who stated that "the declaration does not envisage ... that all powers shall be transferred forthwith" [935th meeting, para. 130]. We are inclined to think that this interpretation does not correspond to the desires of the overwhelming majority of the sponsors of the draft resolution. We have no doubt of the sincerity of the aspirations and motives of the overwhelming majority of the African and Asian delegations, and we think that they do not agree with such an interpretation and believe in the need for the immediate liberation of the colonial peoples. The Soviet delegation, too, interprets paragraph 5 in just that way.

114. In a number of other provisions, also, the wording could give rise to interpretations contrary to the basic meaning of the draft resolution as understood by the majority of the African and Asian countries, judging by their statements in the plenary Assembly. Leaving aside the question of the desirability of improving the wording in a number of places, since this could complicate the consideration of the draft resolution—and this the Soviet delegation has no intention of doing—we should like to indicate two fundamental provisions which, in our opinion, the sponsors of the draft resolution have completely failed to take into account.

115. Firstly, the draft resolution refers to the need for the speedy elimination of colonialism and for immediate steps to be taken to transfer all powers to the peoples of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories and of all other territories which have not yet attained independence. However, no precise target date for the grant of independence to the colonial countries is indicated. Moreover, the draft resolution contains no specific instructions for the Powers which are responsible for the liberation of the colonies and Trust Territories. It contains no indications whatever of what these Powers are to do and by what date.

116. Secondly, an important provision is missing: a provision to the effect that the General Assembly should consider the question of the implementation of this declaration at its next session; this is essential in order to ensure that the main provisions of the declaration are carried out.

117. The Soviet delegation has accordingly deemed it necessary to submit for consideration by the General Assembly certain amendments to the African-Asian draft resolution which, while leaving the existing text unchanged, would introduce some additional provisions that would give effectiveness to the general principles stated in the declaration and would help to bring about their speedy implementation.

118. The following are the essential points of these supplementary amendments.

119. First: we consider it essential to fix a target date by which all colonial countries and peoples must be liberated. The call for the prompt liberation of the colonies has been supported by a large number of States. It is common knowledge that resolutions on the speedy liberation of the colonial peoples have been adopted repeatedly at conferences of African and Asian States. As early as 1955, for instance, the States represented at the Asian-African Conference at Bandung adopted a declaration to the effect that "colonialism in all its manifestations is an evil which should speedily be brought to an end".

120. This demand of the Bandung Conference is reflected in the draft resolution now submitted to us. However, we must take into account the fact that this demand, adopted in 1955, i.e. five years ago, now needs developing further. Having regard to the very rapid rate of development of the national-liberation movement, it is not enough now merely to repeat the demands that were made five years ago.

121. It was for precisely this reason that at the second Conference of Independent African States, held at Addis Ababa in June 1960, a resolution was adopted urging the colonial Powers " ... to fix dates in conformity with the will of the people for the immediate attainment of independence by all non-independent countries and to communicate those dates to the people concerned". The Soviet delegation fully supports this demand made by the representatives of the independent countries of Africa.

122. Thus, in the past five years the demand for the speedy elimination of the colonial system has been transformed—and very naturally so—into a demand for the immediate elimination of the colonial system, for the immediate liberation of all peoples still living in conditions of colonial oppression. In conformity with the resolution adopted at Addis Ababa, the representative of Togo, when speaking here in the general debate, referred to the need to eliminate colonialism as an urgent matter and emphasized that:

"Our concern here is not merely to condemn colonialism and adopt the principle of the grant of independence. It is of the greatest importance that we should also draw up, here and now, a time-table of dates on which the colonized territories are to be granted independence. Otherwise the countries still in bondage will have to face another long struggle against colonial power." [936th meeting, para. 65.]

123. We support this proposal of the Togolese delegation for the fixing of a time-limit for the granting of independence and we propose that the end of 1961 should be set as the target date. We accordingly propose that a provision should be inserted in the draft resolution of the African-Asian States, stating that all colonial countries and peoples should attain complete freedom and independence not later than the end of 1961. In our view, this shameful relic of the defunct colonial system can no longer be tolerated.

124. At the same time, for the implementation of the practical measures necessary for the transfer of all powers to the peoples of the colonies, the Soviet delegation proposes that the General Assembly should call upon the colonial Powers to enter into negotiations with representatives of the indigenous inhabitants of the colonial countries. In order that these representatives may truly express the will and aspirations of the colonial peoples, the Soviet delegation deems it essential that elections should be held in all colonies on the basis of universal suffrage. In order to ensure a free expression of their will by the peoples of the colonies and to prevent any manipulation of or juggling with the election results, we consider it desirable that the United Nations should, if necessary, supervise the conduct of the elections.

125. In this connexion, it is necessary to recall that during the recent discussion in the Fourth Committee a majority of the Committee's members approved a proposal by Togo and Tunisia that the United Nations could, when it deemed necessary, supervise the democratic processes by which the peoples of the colonies express their wishes [see A/4651, paras. 5-8]. We are all well aware of the importance which many African and Asian countries, and other countries too, attach to the holding, for instance, of a referendum in Algeria under United Nations supervision, in order to ensure the people's freedom to express their will.

126. Second: we consider that the declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples is different from the usual run of declarations—such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, for example—in that it is not a programme to be applied for all time, but a programme of immediate action to implement the lofty principles proclaimed in the declaration. That is why, in the case of the declaration of independence for the colonies, the time factor is of great importance. The United Nations cannot simply confine itself to proclaiming certain principles, without taking steps for the application of those principles and for the implementation of the declaration adopted. We therefore think that provision must be made in the African-Asian draft resolution for a clause providing that the General Assembly should consider at its sixteenth session in 1961 the question of the implementation of this declaration.

127. For the reasons I have stated, the Soviet delegation has already circulated and now formally submits for consideration by the General Assembly the following amendments to the draft resolution submitted by forty-three countries of Africa and Asia [A/L.323 and Add.1-6]:

"Add the following paragraphs after operative paragraph 7:

'8. Calls upon the Powers concerned to ensure the transfer of full and sovereign power to the peoples of all dependent territories in accordance with the principles stated above and, for this purpose, to enter into negotiations with representatives of the colonial peoples elected on the basis of universal suffrage, if necessary under United Nations supervision, so that all colonial countries and peoples should attain independence not later than the end of 1961 and take their rightful place in the community of nations;

'9. Decides to consider the question of the implementation of this resolution at its sixteenth regular session.' * 4/

128. As regards the Guatemalan amendments [A/L.325] to the African-Asian draft resolution, the Soviet delegation is unable to support these amendments since they provide for a limitation of the fundamental right of all peoples to self-determination and are thus contrary to paragraph 2 of the declaration in the African-Asian draft resolution, which quite rightly states that "All peoples have the right of self-determination". If any States have any claims or reservations to put forward with regard to the disposition of any particular territory, such matters should, in our opinion, be settled according to merit in each individual case; no attempt should be made to raise private claims and reservations to the level of a general principle restricting the inalienable right of every people to self-determination.

129. For the reasons I have just stated the Soviet delegation will vote against the Guatemalan amendments.

Mr. Sosa Rodríguez (Venezuela), Vice-President, took the Chair.

130. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): I give the floor to the representative of France, in the exercise of the right of reply.

131. Mr. BERARD (France) (translated from French): I had not intended to intervene in this discussion, but, as references have been made to France by several speakers, may I be permitted to make use of my right to reply to the various representatives concerned.

132. To some of these let me say, first, that the French delegation was very glad to see this question placed on our agenda. I would remind them that in the history of our Organization there had been nothing like what has happened in the course of the present session—I mean the admission to the United Nations of seventeen States that were formerly colonial territories. And thirteen of these States were formerly under French administration. So, as regards the decolonization process and as far as France is concerned, the facts speak for themselves. These States were admitted unanimously; in other words; the most scornful of our critics did in this case add their votes to that of France and it was not our fault if a fourteenth African State failed this week to become the hundredth member of our Organization.

133. There has been no improvisation about this evolution. We have no regrets about it. Quite the contrary; we have constantly encouraged it. Several speakers were good enough to admit this and to recognize the merits of this action. I would thank them for this testimony, revealing as it does both their honesty and their character.

134. I shall define the French position on this problem by recalling the words uttered by General de Gaulle on 5 September 1960:

"Regarding the whole movement of decolonization which is taking place all over the world, I have not ceased, since the day when the world war led me to speak and to act in the name of France, to follow the same course, because I think the emancipation of the peoples—for that is what is at stake—is consistent both with the spirit of our country... and with the irresistible movement set in motion by the world war and its aftermath.

"I then directed French policy along this path—the path of emancipation—and for the past two years I have steered it in the same direction."

135. We were also happy to hear the many references made in this discussion to freedom. Nothing that relates to freedom can leave us indifferent. Let me be quite clear: the freedom I am referring to is not the freedom of a minority to impose its laws nor of a majority to silence any voice raised in disagreement. It is the freedom of the group as well as of the individual. It is liberation from hunger, from fear and from ignorance. It is the freedom of self-expression, of action, freedom to construct without constraint, without anxiety or any hinderance other than respect for the freedom of others. We want to have all that for ourselves; we want it for others; and in this connexion I would like to pay tribute to the speakers who contributed constructive ideas to this discussion.

136. Others have proffered criticisms of my country and have taken up a different attitude. One might well be surprised and shocked to find one Power represented here trying to play the leading role when we have waited in vain so far for the slightest sign on its part of any policy of decolonization. Such a degree of brazen-facedness might well impress those of us who are not so well informed but, after the veto cast on 4 December in the Security Council, the mask has been dropped and I feel sure that in future more of us will be able to discern the difference between, on the one hand, fine words, righteous indignation, advice, warnings of all kinds and, on the other hand, deeds. These false façades have an unfortunate habit of collapsing.

137. When people talk about independence, we also have in mind something other than the behaviour of those who disappoint and bore us by constantly repeating year after year what they have been told to say by the master brain. If some day or other a speech of theirs shows the slightest sign of originality, the faintest breath of genuine freedom, that will be a great day in the history of our Organization.

138. Now I would like to reply to those speakers who, in discussing the colonial problem in Latin America, referred to the French "départements" in the Antilles. This is an unfortunate confusion which derives from an obvious misunderstanding both of the legal situation and of political reality. My country does not administer any colonies now in Latin America. The "départements" there are French "départements" and the only special feature about them is that they are separated from the rest of the Republic by the sea, in the same way as Corsica is. These lands have been French for more than three centuries and are some of the oldest French provinces. Is it really necessary to remind you that the Antilles were present at the Constituent Assembly in 1789? Is anyone unaware of the fact that, ever since the Second Republic and the introduction of universal suffrage, i.e. since 1848, these countries have sent deputies and senators to Parliament? The "départements" of Guadeloupe, Martinique and Guiana are integral parts of the French Republic on the same footing as any other. Their citizens have equal status and citizenship rights without distinction or discrimination. They have equal representation and take part at all levels in the political and administrative life of the nation. The most distinguished sons of the Antilles have given, and continue to give, the French Republic thinkers, men of action and statesmen who are the pride of all my compatriots.

139. Lastly, I would like to say a few words to the authors of the draft resolution in document A/L.323 and Add.1-6, since some of them have in the course of their remarks thought fit to refer to my country.

140. There have been many words spoken during this debate. Some of them were good, some were not so good and this difference is reflected in the draft resolution before us. I quite recognize the sincerity of many of the sponsors of this draft resolution and I would pay tribute here to the efforts made to invest this document with a certain nobility, to make it into something other than a weapon in the cold war.

141. We particularly welcome several of the paragraphs in the preamble. We, too, consider that every people has the right of free determination, that the national unity and territorial integrity of States should be respected. But certain of the passages in this document merely reiterate commitments which are contained in the Charter. We recognize and we respect these obligations. We wonder, though, whether these repetitions add anything at all to what is laid down in the international moral code.

142. Above all, however, the draft before us is, unhappily, not devoid of considerations that have nothing to do with the aims that are sought. It reflects, possibly unintentionally, the antagonisms which I mentioned earlier on. In that respect the declaration before us will not help to promote the spirit of international comprehension which should animate us all. It also contains certain contradictions. For instance, in paragraph 7 of the draft declaration, a rather solemn reference is made to the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of States, but, quite frankly, can it be claimed that the draft does not contain a whole series of admonitions which all constitute interference in the internal affairs of States?

143. I am quite aware of the fact that the drafting of a text of this kind does inevitably confront its authors with serious difficulties and I am the first to pay tribute to the conscientiousness of those who have taken on such a responsible task. Nevertheless, my delegation does not feel that it can, for the reasons I have stated, support the draft resolution in the form in which it has been laid before the Assembly.

144. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): I call on the representative of Spain to exercise the right of reply.

145. Mr. DE LEQUERICA (Spain) (translated from Spanish): This debate on colonialism is extremely interesting and, in my opinion, very valuable for the development of the interests of mankind in general, but it undoubtedly offers extraordinary surprises for those who are listening to it attentively and with feeling. For example—and I am grateful to the President for giving me the right to speak—I have been listening this afternoon to the representative of Morocco, whose remarks I have had an opportunity of appreciating on other occasions and whose views I always find of interest, particularly as he represents a friendly country, when suddenly, in a list of presumably colonial countries—some of them Spanish—which I shall not discuss now, though there is good reason to do so, I came across the names not of two Spanish provinces, as I pointed out this morning [944th meeting] for another reason, but of two Spanish cities belonging to two different provinces.

146. Mention, I noticed, was made of Ceuta, a city of 67,000 Christian and 13,000 Moslem inhabitants, all Spaniards, belonging to the province of Cádiz; and of Melilla, a city in the province of Málaga, with a population of 85,000 Christians and 7,000 Moslems, all Spaniards.

147. I remember in the last years of the old elected type of Parliament having found myself sitting next to the deputy from Algeciras, who was also the deputy for Melilla, and now, all of a sudden, by an incredible inversion of values, it comes about that not two provinces but two cities belonging to two different Spanish provinces, which have been inhabited for five or six centuries past by Spaniards of different religions though predominantly Christian—which has not changed their character—are regarded, quite incomprehensibly and confusedly, as territories to be investigated, transformed and placed under other peoples' sovereignty.

148. Accordingly, I beg to invoke, as I did this morning for a different reason, the principle that has already been very shrewdly appealed to by the Soviet delegation to the effect that it is quite inadmissible, save under due protest, to make an attack on the unity or the sovereignty of States Members of the United Nations who are protected by its Charter, and I beg to protest, most respectfully but most energetically, against this strange phenomenon of a reference to Ceuta and Melilla being made in our debate by the representative of Morocco.

149. I would add—I do not wish to say much, but it is important, and I have some essential facts on the point to hand—that Ceuta, under the name of Abila, was already known at the time of the discovery of the famous Pillars of Hercules; that the Greeks called it Heptadelphe because of its seven hills; that the Romans called it Septem Fratres (The Seven Brothers), whence the derivation of the names Septa and Ceuta; that it formed part of the dominions of Carthage, and when that republic was annihilated by Rome, it became the capital of Mauritania Tingitana, a Roman province; and that in the times of the Emperor Otho it was included in the juridical convention of Cádiz.

150. In the same neighbourhood landed the 80,000 Vandals who, under the command of Genseric, invaded North Africa. Later, between 531 and 548 it was conquered by the Visigoth King of Spain, Teudis. It was also conquered by Justinian, Emperor of Byzantium, though I do not think it remained long in his power. It was in the possession of the Visigoths, i.e. the Kingdom of Spain, when it was occupied by Muza before he invaded Spain in 710.

151. After innumerable historical vicissitudes, in the year 1437 the five brothers of Edward I, King of Portugal, landed at Ceuta and tried to capture Tangiers. Under Philip II of Spain, heir to the possessions of the Kingdom of Portugal, which also included Ceuta, they were already incorporated in Spain in the sixteenth century. Again, in 1640, when Portugal separated from Spain, the nobles of Ceuta proclaimed it as belonging to the King of Spain, Philip IV. Under the treaty concluded on 13 February 1663, the towns and dominions held in Africa were ceded to Portugal, except Ceuta which Spain reserved for itself, and its possession was confirmed in article 2 of the treaty of 1678. Since that date it has belonged to Spain.

152. I read from a text, not a Spanish text but the Enciclopedia Italiana (vol. IX, page 903), that, being in constant touch with Europe, Ceuta has become a Spanish city where the Moslem population is few in numbers and it has many features in common with the ports of the Iberian Peninsula which face it.

153. Now did the one-time sultans, now kings of Morocco, ever at any time lay claim to Ceuta? No; on the contrary, in many treaties signed before the Protectorate was set up and when, according to specific declarations made by the Moroccan delegation, the sultans were free, the territories around Ceuta were discussed but never Ceuta itself.

154. I do not want to burden you with dates but in article III of the Treaty of Peace and Amity between Spain and Morocco, signed at Tetuan on 26 April 1860, it is stated that "in order to carry into effect what is stipulated in the preceding article, His Majesty the King of Morocco cedes to Her Majesty the Queen of Spain, in full dominion and sovereignty, the territory included between the sea and along the heights of Sierra Bullones, and the ravine of Anghera...". I do not propose to read the detailed texts but there is no mention of Ceuta in any of these instruments, since it was a centuries-old Spanish city.

155. And now Melilla. Melilla belonged to an old Rusadir founded by the Phoenicians and which Ptolemy called Ryssadiron. It came into the possession of the Visigoths, and was the seat of a Christian bishop in the fifth century; it then passed to the Moors who gave it the name of Milla, a very common name in North Africa; its inhabitants devoted themselves to the exploitation of mines, as they do to this day. Meanwhile, in 1496, Don Juan Clarós de Guzmán, Duke of Medina Sidonia, financed an expedition under his officer, Don Pedro de Estupiñán, who captured the city which at that time belonged to the King of Tlemcen. Up to 1556 it was held by the Dukes of Medina Sidonia with the title of Captains-General. It was frequently attacked when it was in Spanish possession. In 1856 a convention was signed extending its boundaries. And, just as in the case of Ceuta, all the treaties with the sultans of Morocco recognized that Melilla was Spanish; for example, the Convention between Spain and Morocco signed at Tetuan on 24 August 1859 talks of "ceding to Her Catholic Majesty in full dominion and sovereignty the land contiguous to the Spanish city of Melilla, as far as the points that will most adequately ensure the defence and tranquillity of that township".

156. In a further article emphasis is again laid on this point but there is never any mention of authority over Melilla. What then is the point of bringing into this debate, one that is replete with serious problems and with matters that fully justify preoccupation and the need for all of us to re-examine our consciences, arbitrary statements that are devoid of all historical significance? Or are we to believe that by one of those fancies which French seventeenth-century historians defined as ad usum Delphini and which were used to satisfy the Dauphins who liked to believe that their States were more powerful than they actually were—an analogy that has since then lost its dynastic significance so that the phrase ad usum Delphini means, in general, "for the gratification of the mighty"—are we, I say, to believe that with arbitrary assertions of this kind we are going to transform the geographical fact that these two African cities form an essential part of Spain? Or, to recall the eloquent remarks of the representative of France, are we going to draw geographical lines that will upset human history, century-old coexistence and the existence of permanent spiritual values?

157. I shall not dissemble the fact—and I am proud to state it—that Spain is a Euro-African Power and has been such for many centuries; that it has had possessions or, rather, establishments in Africa that are more ancient than any establishments that the Moslem kings can boast of, as I have just shown. I have no need to add that this north of Africa was never at any time a hard and fast unity, as invented history asserts. This was quite clearly proved in the discussion about Mauritania. We Spaniards were a colony not of Morocco—although that is partially true—but definitely of Mauritania—and I cite the dates as I recall them from that discussion—between 1094 and 1149. The Mauritians, the Almoravides, or probably people from those tribes, occupied a great part of Spain, built a castle in the Alfajerfa and controlled practically the whole of Moslem Spain. We were an Afro-Asian colony—and I say it proudly—there is no need to hide the fact. To that circumstance we owe the Alhambra of Granada, Cordoba and the immense cultural monuments that have become part of our culture. Perhaps the link we enjoy with the most advanced European philosophy of the period, as our American brothers have on occasion pointed out, is also responsible for many of the cultural and spiritual values in our past history.

158. Only people with confused minds, to whom an arbitrarily simplified version of history appeals, will put forward claims for a specific frontier line within which sole authority would be exercised. This is a claim we must contest on historical grounds and for the sake of the spiritual values cherished by our people. And we regret that a country with such a respect for law as Morocco has, a country with which we have none but cordial relations, should disregard the other discussions on frontiers that are going on and embark on a course of action that is so inconsistent with the United Nations Charter and shows so little respect also for justice and law, by claiming two old Spanish cities which regard it as a great honour to belong to our country. How long then will they wait before asking for Guadalajara, which has a Moslem name, or before settling down on the banks of the Guadalquivir, which also has a Moslem name, or in some other part of the country? Are we going to turn world history into a veritable bedlam? Are we going to transform historians and politicians into—and many of the representatives belong to countries in which this type of person is not well known, though many of the older countries are familiar with it—that type of genealogist, who, for a money fee, will very often discover a relationship, for someone who wants to acquire powerful ancestors, with Napoleon Bonaparte or the Emperors of Constantinople? Are we not going to set limits for ourselves in all these discussions?

159. I am doubly sorry about this instance because it was brought up by a country like Morocco, which has given us so many proofs of affection. In our common past there have been plenty of difficulties, which, for our part at any rate, have only increased the admiration we have felt for the heroism shown by Moroccans on the battlefield. Yet Morocco used not to forget how greatly Spain helped Morocco to re-establish itself as a free Power. That fact has been recognized more than once by some of its representatives. I need only quote, for example, the following words spoken by Crown Prince Moulay Hassan when he visited Tetuan on 17 June 1956:

"Moroccans, men and women, old people and children, will never forget the work done by Spain and the immense services rendered to His Majesty the Sultan and to Morocco in those difficult moments when justice was trampled upon and persecution was rampant.

"The realization of this work did no more than reflect the nobility and chivalry of the Spanish people and sow the seed of the sincere attachment and affection, as well as the heartfelt friendship between Morocco and Spain, which is of such great advantage to both countries."

And the Prince concluded by exclaiming "Long live Spain! Long live Morocco!"

160. I could quote other texts that would express the same sentiments, and I myself have heard distinguished representatives of this friendly country make similar references with regard to Spain. That is why I am so surprised and why I must enter a protest against this astonishing behaviour which is so foreign to the customary conduct of our discussions. Can it be perhaps that a pro-Bolshevik infection has for the moment afflicted our good friends, and in many respects our brothers, of Morocco? It may well be the case but I do not feel inclined to criticize too harshly. It is easy to be tempted and many honourable countries yield to it, but will they not regret it later? That is not the least of the peculiar features of this evil called colonialism, a subject on which I had not the least intention of intervening. And, if I may be permitted the digression, I will tell you why: because we have very few countries to be talked about in Africa; we are a tiny country in the colonial sense. We could borrow a well-known French tag and say: "Au banquet de la vie, infortuné convive". And we might well add: "Au banquet d'Afrique, infortuné convive".

161. In the great colonial enterprises of the nineteenth century, so widely discussed and on which so much could be said, we participated only to a very limited and remote degree. However, that does not prevent us from taking a sensitive and impartial view of the problem, or from listening to Soviet speeches—such as the one we have just heard—which really indicated anxiety for freedom and the sufferings of peoples—which may be the beginning of a phase of reflexion or perhaps, even, of repentance. Before such unbelievable happenings as that we shall not take our eyes off the fundamental problem that is being constantly referred to here as colonialism.

162. It is true that there has been harshness shown, there has been persecution, that justice has been lacking in many of our relationships. Our brothers of Central and South America have, with due reservations and with highly intelligent observations based on history, commented here—it was a moving experience to listen to them—on the colonial problem and on the difficulties and, at the same time, the splendid achievements of Spain. We have no colonial past in Africa, there have been very few interventions by Spain. But that does not alter our profound conviction. And it is this circumstance of not being personally involved that leads us not only to proclaim how much we have done but also to think and vote on African problems with profound respect for the countries of that continent and with the desire that they should always attain the realization of all their just aspirations in legal and orderly fashion.

163. I ventured in the general debate [886th meeting] to cite the texts of the great Spanish jurists of the sixteenth century who, at the time when America was discovered, recognized the rights of the primitive inhabitants of that continent and refused to grant rights of tutelage and vassalage that were not consistent with law. Mr. Belaúnde has also alluded to those jurists in this debate. That is the spirit in which we are taking part in this discussion and it is in that spirit that we shall vote, subject to the necessary reservations regarding those phrases which are perhaps not really consistent with the meaning of the United Nations Charter. But this should not be taken as representing our attitude towards attacks on the sovereignty of Spain, which I very strongly denounce here and now.

164. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): I call upon the representative of Denmark to speak in explanation of his vote.

165. Mr. CHRISTIANSEN (Denmark): The Danish people has welcomed most heartily the tide of liberation from colonialism and the emergence of new States which are characteristic of the present epoch. It is a blessing for mankind that in the years since the Second World War there has been an increasingly strong trend towards liberating dependent nations from the dominion of other nations.

166. I should like at this point to compliment in particular the United Kingdom Government, which in the years immediately following the war gave the signal for this new development by granting independence to India and other peoples within the British Empire.

167. In recent years we have witnessed great and rapid advances in this respect, especially in Africa. All friends of progress and liberty welcome the liberation of Africa as another victory for the high ideal that all peoples have the right to enjoy complete freedom and independence. In Denmark we have tried to live up to that ideal, which we highly cherish.

168. In this connexion I should like to mention the manner in which relations between Iceland and Denmark were settled, in full agreement between the two countries, first in 1918 and later in 1944. I need only refer to the warm-hearted statements made by the representative of Iceland during the debate here. There is a most intimate friendship between the Icelandic people and the Danish people, and the ties between our two countries are growing increasingly strong.

169. I would further mention the reorganization with regard to Greenland which, with the approval of the United Nations, was carried out in 1953. On 22 November 1954 the General Assembly of the United Nations adopted a resolution in which it was established that the Greenland population had freely expressed its will and had been placed on an equal footing with other parts of the Kingdom of Denmark [resolution 849 (IX)]. May I add that this reorganization has proved to be a happy one, satisfactory for the population of Greenland as well as for the Danish population as a whole. This does not mean that all problems have been solved. But progress has been made and continues to be made. As the latest important step in this direction I should like to mention that when the Danish Government was reconstructed after our general election in November of this year a Member of Parliament elected by the Greenland population was made a Cabinet Minister.

170. Against this background it will easily be understood that Denmark whole-heartedly supports the idea of the adoption by the United Nations of a declaration stressing the necessity of bringing to a speedy end colonialism in all its forms and manifestations.

171. We support the draft resolution submitted by a large number of African and Asian States [A/L.323 and Add.1-6]. In our opinion, it covers the problem better than the draft resolution submitted by Honduras [A/L.324/Rev.2], and also much better than the draft submitted by the USSR [A/4502].

172. The African-Asian draft resolution certainly has its merits, although we would have preferred a somewhat different wording of certain passages. Take, for instance, the following:

"Convinced that the continued existence of colonialism prevents the development of international economic co-operation, impedes the social, cultural and economic development of dependent peoples and militates against the United Nations ideal of universal peace."

173. This can hardly be said to be a correct analysis of colonialism. There have undoubtedly been cases in which colonialism did not prevent developments such as those mentioned. On the other hand, there have unfortunately been instances in which colonialism was an impediment to such development. We find that this passage is a generalization and therefore incorrect.

174. There are a few more points to which I should like to call your attention. Paragraph 3 reads as follows:

"Inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence."

This wording is not quite clear, although there could not, I think, be any doubt as to what the meaning actually is. Would not a correct interpretation be that colonial Powers shall not be able to prevent transition to independence by pointing to the political, economic or cultural inadequacies in the territory concerned, inadequacies for which they themselves would probably be responsible?

175. This undoubtedly touches upon a problem which should not be overlooked. It would be unrealistic to maintain that immediate transition to independence would always be more advantageous for the population than a gradual transition, irrespective of the state of development the population has reached. It is a great problem and one to which it is extremely difficult to find a just and equitable solution.

176. If we look at the development that has taken place in Africa in the last few years, I think that many would say with regard to a certain territory that the transition to independence occurred at a time when it had not been adequately prepared. On the other hand, many would argue that there have been several instances in which delay in the transition to independence caused extremely great difficulties. But it should be borne in mind that the rulers of a territory—or even a group of people—would be apt to think that the dependent people had not yet attained sufficient maturity. It is, however, explicitly stated in the draft resolution that this should not be used as a pretext, which in our interpretation means that there might be instances in which inadequate preparation might justify postponement of the transition to independence until such time as conditions improve.

177. May I say in conclusion that it would be only fair to assume that the peoples who wish to attain freedom are in a hurry and that it should not be possible by pretexts that are more or less invented to prevent them from attaining freedom. I would put it like this: better freedom and independence too early than too late. But while stressing this wish most emphatically, we should not overlook the problems facing us in this respect. One important aspect should be borne in mind. When all advocates of the liberation of formerly dependent peoples invoke democratic ideals and principles for the attainment of that goal, it would indeed be disgraceful if groups of people in newly established States subsequently exploit the inadequate development of the population to introduce not a democratic rule, but dictatorship, which actually delays and impedes necessary social and political developments.

178. The comments I have made here on paragraph 3 may be said also to apply to paragraph 5, which reads as follows:

"Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those Territories, without any conditions or reservations in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, without any distinction as to race, creed or colour, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom."

It appears from statements made by responsible speakers that it is recognized that the meaning of the words "immediate steps shall be taken" is that we shall proceed towards the goal and shall not allow ourselves to be stopped by unnecessary hindrance. This is in conformity with the view I have just expressed.

179. Our critical comments on certain passages of the draft resolution do not, however, prevent us from voting for it; this so much more, as it contains several highly desirable statements. I am thinking of the following:

"Convinced that all peoples have an inalienable right to complete freedom, the exercise of their sovereignty and the integrity of their national territory."

A more satisfactory wording could perhaps have been found. However, we interpret it as a pledge given to all nations.

180. In previous resolutions certain continents were mentioned by name. While ours—Europe—was not, its people of course have the same right to freedom and independence as all other peoples. I think that the wording is good in so far as it says that all people have the right to complete freedom, and does not limit the attainment of freedom and independence to certain parts of the world.

181. We know that there are many forms of suppression of people and of groups of people. During our debate on this question many representatives in this hall were opposed by representatives of nations in many parts of the world who complained of the lack of freedom. This draft resolution should offer encouragement to the democratic forces working for the freedom of suppressed nations by peaceful means. Many of the nations now suppressed may today think that the horizon is dark but they will hardly give up hope. This draft resolution will undoubtedly justify and strengthen them in keeping up their hopes. Here we must rejoice in the existence of the United Nations. As I see it, the United Nations has so far played its most decisive role in assisting by peaceful means in making so many peoples free and independent. We hope that it will be possible, through our international Organization, by peaceful means, to secure for all nations, without distinction as to race, colour or geographical location, the freedom to which the people of all countries have an absolute right.

182. It is on the basis of these views that Denmark will vote in favour of the African-Asian draft resolution.

183. The PRESIDENT (translated from Spanish): I call upon the representative of Austria, who wishes to speak in explanation of his vote.

184. Mr. MATSCH (Austria): I am most grateful to the President for giving me the floor to explain briefly the position of my delegation.

185. We have heard a most interesting debate, a debate which was initiated by the delegation of the USSR, to whom our thanks are due. My delegation will vote for the draft resolution which has been submitted by forty-three delegations from Africa and Asia [A/L.323 and Add.1-6]. They are pleading their own cause, a just cause, and we are glad to support them.

186. My country has never been what is termed today a colonial Power, nor did the old Austro-Hungarian Empire possess any colonies. This is a well-known fact. We have no first-hand knowledge of the experiences and conditions in colonies and have, therefore, not taken part in the debate. But the Austrian people, on whose behalf I have the honour to speak here, have always been in sympathy with the struggle of nations and peoples which have not enjoyed full freedom. We have, therefore, been delighted to see that after the Second World War many great and many small nations have become independent and we have been happy to establish contacts and firm and cordial relations with them. We know by our own experience the value of freedom, because for seventeen long years we were deprived of it, and I believe that one never values something more than when one has lost it.

187. Furthermore, we believe that freedom is as indivisible as peace, and as long as there are countries and peoples that have not attained their freedom we who enjoy our own freedom will not be secure. May I say in parenthesis that we believe in my country that this high principle does not only apply to nations and peoples but also to the individual. As long as personal freedom and the rule of law have not been firmly established everywhere, the freedom of every man, woman and child anywhere will be in danger.

188. It is for this reason that we shall vote for the draft resolution as it stands. We shall do so although, to be quite frank, we have certain misgivings with regard to some of the expressions used in the declaration, some of the requests made and some of the procedures envisaged in it. In view of the high ideals of freedom and the equality of all men on which the declaration is based, we have felt, however, that such considerations should not prevent us from giving it our full support.

189. May I take this opportunity of adding a further observation. In voting for the declaration, we do not mean merely to pay lip service to the desires and aspirations of the people emerging from colonial rule. We want to assure them, by voting for this draft resolution, that we will support all measures within the limits of our own resources to establish their political and economic independence, because we believe that one cannot exist without the other. The Austrian authorities are at present actively engaged in exploring various possibilities of co-operation with the newly independent nations. We share their feeling of urgency and we believe that they are justified in demanding high priority for their request. We are convinced that they in turn will make a most important contribution to our common aim, namely, the preservation of peace.

The meeting rose at 6.30 p.m.

AGENDA ITEM 87

Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial

1. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Israel in exercise of the right of reply.

2. Mr. COMAY (Israel): In the earlier stages of this debate several Arab speakers tried to drag into it the differences which unfortunately still persist between Israel and the Arab States. In its statement before the Assembly on 2 December [933rd meeting], my delegation deliberately refrained from reacting to these attacks, and did not refer to them at all. We felt that the subject of this debate was of such deep and serious concern to the world, and especially to the new States, and to those who are still subject peoples, that we should disregard attempts to exploit it for propaganda purposes. Unfortunately, this self-restraint was one-sided. I would refer particularly to the statement made on 6 December [937th meeting] by the representative of Lebanon, which, as a piece of mudslinging against another Member State of the United Nations, was just about as offensive as anything yet heard from this rostrum. My delegation feels obliged briefly to exercise its right of reply. We shall do so in relation to three points which have been raised, although none of them, in our opinion, are really relevant to the item under discussion.

3. Firstly, we repudiate as morally unworthy and historically stupid the attempt to equate Zionism with colonialism. Zionism is one of the noblest, the most moving, the most constructive national movements in human history. Behind it lies a unique and unbroken connexion, extending over 4,000 years, between the Jewish people and Palestine. No Jew could dwell in Israel as a stranger or an alien, for there is not a foot of its soil unhallowed by the bones of his Biblical ancestors. It was here that the moral and spiritual genius of our people gave birth to Judaism, from which also sprang the Christian religion. It was here that our people enjoyed national independence, which they lost and regained and lost again, in the perpetual struggle against the great colonial empires of that time. The vital bond between the Jewish people and the land of Israel is the very essence of our long and often tragic history.

4. In modern times, spurred by the twin forces of nationalism and persecution, our people dreamt of rebuilding its ancient homeland, and organized the Zionist movement to promote this ideal, both by gaining understanding for it amongst the nations, and by constructive pioneering work in what had become a backward corner of the Ottoman Empire. This idea gained support at one time from Britain, for which we were grateful, and the concept of a Jewish National Home was expressly written into the terms of the League of Nations Mandate for Palestine. In the end, however, Israel gained its independence through a bitter struggle against British rule, and a further struggle for survival against invading Arab armies. We stand ready today, as we always have been, to live in peace with our neighbours. But we are not ready to have the nature of the Zionist movement perverted to serve demagogic purposes.

5. These labels of "colonialism" are blatantly meant to influence other new States in Asia and Africa which have relations with Israel. In the statement in reply made by the Israel Foreign Minister, in the general debate, on 17 October, Mrs. Meir dealt with this point, and I would take leave to quote a few sentences:

"We know that this is nonsense. The Arabs know that it is nonsense and, what is more important, the Africans themselves know that it is nonsense. The leaders of African countries are not to be frightened by meaningless slogans. They can be relied upon to judge their relations with other countries by the behaviour of those other countries towards them, and not by propaganda speeches in New York." [907th meeting, para. 87.]

6. It is not Israel but certain other States who profess to be the brothers of the African peoples, but meddle in their affairs and act as Trojan horses for new imperialisms in Africa. As to who these States are, the African peoples will judge for themselves, in the light of recent experience on their continent.

7. Secondly, the representative of Lebanon wept crocodile tears over the treatment of Israel's Arab citizens, of whom there are a quarter of a million, both Moslems and Christians. Here again, I would refer to the statement by the Israel Foreign Minister on 17 October, in which she again pointed out that Israel Arabs enjoy exactly the same political rights as do Israel Jews; that their economic, social and cultural standards have risen rapidly since the establishment of the State of Israel; and that "no Arab State can point to the achievement of a standard of living for the masses of its population that may be compared favourably to the standard of living of the Israel Arabs" [Ibid., para. 83]. Our country is open to the world, and anyone is free to visit it and verify these facts for himself. Tens of thousands of visitors have done so; their impressions are on record, and they refute the calumnies which have been repeated here.

8. Thirdly and lastly, the representative of Lebanon had the effrontery to suggest that Israel was one of two countries in which vestiges of slavery remained. The charge itself is too silly to be taken seriously. Israel's Constitution and way of life ensure equality and freedom for all its citizens without distinction of race, sex or religion. But, if I were an Arab representative, I would be very hesitant about raising the issue of slavery, in the context of a debate on colonialism. Does he think the African peoples have forgotten the black and ugly record of the Arab slave traders on their continent? Does he think they are unaware that there are Arab countries in the Middle East in which African men, women and children, and especially young girls, are still bought and sold like cattle? If he himself is unaware of these facts, I would advise him to read the many reports which have been published on the matter in recent years, including those of the Anti-Slavery Society.

9. My delegation has intervened again in the debate with reluctance. We have no desire to engage in controversy on these matters. On the other hand, the impression should not gain ground that any Arab representative can, with impunity, utilize the forum of the United Nations in order to besmirch the State of Israel.

10. The PRESIDENT: A number of delegations have asked to explain their vote before the voting. I propose to call on these delegations in order. I give the floor first to the representative of Sweden.

11. Mrs. RÖSSEL (Sweden): The Swedish delegation will cast its vote in favour of the draft declaration submitted, in document A/L.323 and Add.1-6, by the African-Asian countries. We will do so because we find that it is in full accord with the spirit of the Charter provisions on self-determination, self-government and national independence. The Swedish Government and the Swedish people have followed with intent interest and great sympathy the historical process by which the large majority of formerly dependent peoples have come to enjoy the great boon of national freedom. If the declaration will help to keep the desire for freedom burning in men's minds everywhere, it will serve a useful purpose.

12. The attitude of my delegation does not mean, however, that we are entirely happy about the language used in some parts of the draft resolution. In fact, there are some paragraphs that seem to us to leave room for different interpretations, while other paragraphs, in our view, are too categorical or too rigid. Let me give you a few examples to illustrate my point.

13. The last preambular paragraph of the draft resolution states that "all peoples have an inalienable right to complete freedom, the exercise of their sovereignty and the integrity of their national territory". The application of this unimpeachable principle in practice could surely become a matter of controversy. We all remember how, during the recent debate in the First Committee on the problem of Mauritania, there existed different opinions even among those countries sponsoring the present draft declaration on how this principle should find expression in that particular case.

14. The same principle is also laid down in paragraph 2 of the draft declaration, which declares that "all peoples have the right of self-determination". One may be allowed to wonder whether the practical implication of this general principle would be, to take only one example, that provinces of the Republic of the Congo (Leopoldville) would be justified in claiming the right to separate from other parts of the Republic. Or should another paragraph of the draft declaration be applied in such cases, namely paragraph 6, which opposes "any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country"?

15. Another observation which comes to our mind when studying the text of the draft declaration is that there are in some parts of the world dependent territories which are too small and too isolated to be able to lead a successful life as independent States. Also, it seems to my delegation that we should not overlook the fact that too rapid a transition of a territory from colonial status to independence may cause serious difficulties for its population. A transitional period may be necessary.

16. The comments I have now made do not deter us from supporting the draft declaration. We understand it to be meant as a statement of general objectives and not as an act of legislation which would place immediate juridical obligations on Member States and which is designed to be applied literally. The General Assembly does not have the competence to adopt acts of legislation which are binding on the Member States. From a legal point of view, the draft declaration would, therefore, seem to be of the same nature as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

17. In making a comparison between the two declarations it is, perhaps, appropriate to draw attention to the fact that while the goals set out in the earlier declaration, that is, to further the observance of human rights in the whole world, are still very far from being achieved, the aims pursued by the present declaration, that is, to secure the right of the peoples to national independence, have already largely been attained as far as the former colonial empires are concerned. Without wishing to diminish the importance of this new declaration, one cannot escape the conclusion that it will not play the same constructive and instructive role as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which, ever since it was adopted in 1948, has no doubt served as a useful model for legislation in many countries and as a constant reminder of certain noble principles which are all too often honoured more in the breach than in the observance.

18. In the light of the observations which I have made, the Swedish delegation is, as I said before, prepared to vote in favour of the draft resolution submitted by the African-Asian States as a whole and in its present form, and will vote against other draft resolutions and amendments.

19. Mr. AUGUSTE (Haiti) (translated from French): The problem of colonialism is the chief focus of international attention at this session; it is accompanied by an avalanche of documents and a torrential flow of words which often call to mind the heated atmosphere in which the equally important questions of disarmament and under-development were discussed. In theory, colonialism as we have known it in the past when it sought by false, erroneous and sophisticated reasoning to justify the domination of one Power over another and exalt to the level of a dogma the privileges and prerogatives which certain reputedly superior races had arrogated to themselves, has irrevocably and undoubtedly had its day.

20. It can no longer continue to function as an economic or politico-economic system, that is, as a kind of area reserved for the home country guaranteeing it a market sheltered from all competition and freely open for the full expansion of its foreign trade. This form of exploitation of man by man, accompanied at times by episodes which do little honour to those who have raised the ridiculous claim of the inequality of races—this situation individuals and the passage of time have undertaken to liquidate.

21. But, when this thorny problem is mentioned, I would be loath not to mention the United Nations, this great crossroads which for fifteen years past has served as a happy meeting-place between peoples, a kind of melting-pot of humanity where the course of history has perhaps been speeded up in a different direction.

22. But ideas, generally speaking, take a lot of killing. Those people, who, as they recall their reading, remember the pages on scientific subjects bequeathed to them by great writers, realize the long process of their development, as well as their authority and their strength, when they merge into our subconscious mind. Ideas might be compared to a tree with numerous, long-living roots. Merely to cut down the trunk without uprooting the tree would sometimes do not more than retard its growth.

23. All those who, in a remote or recent past, have suffered from colonialism, know this. Therefore, steps must be taken to prevent its return, not so much in the impossible form it assumed in the past, as in the pretentious, distinctly dangerous—yes, I would add, extremely dangerous—form it assumes in the present day world, full of malice, guile and trickery, like a wolf in sheep's clothing.

24. I confess that these are reflections which an authentic son of the Republic of Haiti could not help but feel as he listened to the charges levelled by certain self-constituted public prosecutors, lifting the veil off the policy of neo-colonialism, of which Alfred de Musset, if he were still among us—yes, Musset, the delightful poet of those immortal nights we all used to sing about in days gone by—would say: "but it all looks as much like you as your brother."

25. The struggle against this new type or new form or structure of colonialism must be our constant concern and we must fight it wherever it sets itself up.

26. I confess I fear it just as much as I do its older brother, which did such great harm to my ancestors and to the men of my race. As a more pernicious phenomenon, characterized by great astuteness, because it assumes the guise of both wolf and shepherd, it wins over simple minds nowadays by offering them not gifts of gold, as formerly, but something rather more subtle—the magic and the seduction of the promises latent in the new organization of the world of tomorrow, securing the well-being and the dignity of all men in order to put an end to the economic inequalities from which they have so long suffered.

27. To destroy colonialism in order to have it replaced by another evil—let us agree to call it neo-colonialism—would be to reject as hopeless the lessons of history, of experience, of human intelligence and even the need for freedom and independence felt by all those who have been deprived of it for so long; it would be like saying: "Get out of there and let me in."

28. My delegation would like to congratulate all those who have so clearly discerned the danger of neocolonialism in all its forms. True to the anti-colonialist policy of the great Dessalines, who founded the Haitian nation, faithful also to the policies of the father of my country's republic, the distinguished Alexandre Petion, who in 1811, inspired by the same lofty sentiments and high ideals which animate us all today, assisted Bolívar in his fight for liberation from Spanish domination, my delegation, as heir to the political testament of those giants in the history of my country, will vote in favour of any draft resolution which condemns colonialism, demands independence and freedom for some, while at the same time devising means of protecting others, by forestalling the introduction anywhere in the world of neo-colonialism in any shape or form.

29. Mr. PAZHWAK (Afghanistan): I have asked to speak in order to explain my vote on the various proposals which are now before the General Assembly. This explanation will be given in the light of the statement which I made in the general debate [935th meeting] in which I expressed the views of my delegation on the principles to which we adhere and which guide us in taking a position on any action by the Assembly with respect to this item. Afghanistan is a sponsor of one draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6], and we have explained our reasons for sponsoring it. My explanation of vote will therefore refer to the other draft resolutions of which we are not sponsors.

30. With respect to the draft resolution submitted by Honduras [A/L.324/Rev.2], we hope that, in view of the nature of this draft, it will not be pressed to a vote and will be withdrawn. However, if it is put to the vote, my delegation will be compelled to vote against it. We are opposed to this draft resolution because, in the consideration at this stage by the General Assembly of the item before us related to the abolition of colonialism and domination in all its forms as soon as possible and, in our view, immediately, the presentation of such a draft is completely out of place. We do not think that it would serve any useful purpose, and we therefore do not believe that it should be adopted by the General Assembly. We shall vote against this draft resolution.

31. With respect to the amendments submitted by Guatemala [A/L.325] to the draft resolution contained in document A/L.323 and Add.1-6, we have no objection in principle to them but we think that the provisions of these amendments are covered in paragraph 6 of the draft declaration of the African-Asian countries. We therefore believe that these amendments are superfluous and we shall abstain in the vote on them.

32. The Soviet Union has submitted two amendments [A/L.328] to the draft resolution which we have sponsored. These amendments are useful and constructive, and my delegation will vote for them. The contents of these amendments are quite simple, but they bring out certain points of which we want to take particular note, and that is why we shall vote for them. The first point recognizes in substance the right of the rightful representatives of peoples and nations to enter into negotiations on the basis of self-determination, a principle to which we have always adhered in all cases related to dependent peoples. Secondly, these amendments contain the element of the time-limit, which expresses what we had asked for in the general debate, namely, the immediate abolition of colonialism and domination in all its forms and manifestations. Thirdly, these amendments emphasize the implementation of the resolution on the abolition of colonialism, which, to us, has always been the true and only effective aim with respect to the question of the abolition of the colonial system.

33. I come now to the draft declaration submitted by the Soviet Union (A/4502), which we have considered very carefully. We would have preferred to have the substantive part of this draft put to the vote, and not the whole declaration. If the entire document is put to the vote, I should like to request the President to put it to the vote in two parts. We suggest that a separate vote should be taken on the part beginning with the words "... the States Members of the United Nations solemnly proclaim the following demands:" and including the numbered paragraphs 1, 2 and 3. A separate vote should be taken on the rest of the document.

34. When the separate vote is taken, my delegation will vote for the substantive part to which I have referred, and we will vote for it without any reservations whatsoever. When the rest of the document is put to the vote, my delegation will support it because we do not see any objection to the principles contained therein; but we would like to state, in explanation of our vote, that our vote in favour of that part of the document should be considered as being confined to the principles contained therein and only to the principles which would help the immediate abolition of domination and colonialism.

35. Secondly, we would like to state here that in supporting this part of the document, it is our understanding that the territories to which specific reference has been made in this document do not constitute a complete list of the territories or peoples which are under alien domination, and should not be taken as such. By this we mean that the implementation of this draft declaration at any time should not be confined to the territories and peoples which, as a matter of example, have been mentioned in the document, and that the provisions should apply to all territories and all peoples under any form of domination in any part of the world, even though they have not been mentioned in this document.

36. With these two reservations, we would like to state once again that our support of this document should be considered as being confined to the principles contained therein.

37. Mr. RIFA'I (Jordan): I am taking the floor in order to explain the position of my delegation on the Soviet draft declaration contained in document A/4502 and on the amendments to the African-Asian draft resolution of which my delegation is a sponsor.

38. The forty-three Power draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6] is the outcome of thorough consideration and wide consultations. It was drafted in a way which would respond to the universal call for freedom and independence and which would, at the same time, secure the maximum possible support in this General Assembly. We certainly do not claim that it contains all the views and wishes within the scope of the national aspirations of the peoples. My delegation considers that the Soviet amendments contained in document A/L.328 and the Guatemalan amendments contained in document A/L.325 contain some of these views. In accepting or opposing these amendments, my delegation, as one of the sponsors of the African-Asian draft resolution, wishes to avoid any procedure which might lead to a reduction of the support for this draft resolution, but in this case the question of principle is involved. In the case of the Soviet amendments and the Guatemalan amendments, my delegation feels that it should give priority to the principles contained in each of these amendments rather than to the technicalities to which I have referred.

39. The Soviet amendments contain a principle which my delegation fully supports, and we shall therefore vote in favour of them. The Guatemalan amendments include the principle of the right of nations to recover their territorial integrity; they also provide that the principle of self-determination of peoples may in no case impair the right to territorial integrity of any State. We know that there have been certain cases in which the territorial integrity of nations was impaired. The usurpation of a part of the Arab territory of Palestine by the joint aggression of colonialism and Zionism is an outstanding international question. We uphold the right of the lawful people of any territory to recover their territorial integrity. We shall therefore vote in favour of the Guatemalan amendments.

40. With regard to the Soviet draft declaration contained in document A/4502, we are told that this document is going to be put to the vote as one unit. We are ready to support most of its parts, but we cannot subscribe to every paragraph in it. In one of the paragraphs, reference is made to my own country. In another place, China is mentioned, and it is known that my country recognizes Nationalist China. Therefore, if this draft declaration is put to the vote as a whole, my delegation cannot support it.

41. Mr. SUGAIR (Saudi Arabia): My delegation will vote in favour of the draft declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and people, embodied in document A/4502. In the opinion of my delegation, it is in conformity with the principles of the United Nations Charter as well as with the principles of human rights. Our vote, therefore, in support of this draft declaration signifies our endorsement of the basic principles contained therein. This does not mean, however, that we are in full agreement with certain conclusions made or with certain of its phraseology. Worthy of particular mention is the question of the status of Nationalist China.

42. Mr. RAHNEMA (Iran) (translated from French): My delegation has already had occasion to set forth, in detail and without equivocation, its attitude on all the aspects of the problem of the unconditional liquidation of the colonial régime. Consequently, my explanation of vote will bear solely on the Soviet amendments [A/L.328], the Guatemalan amendments [A/L.325] and the draft resolution submitted by Honduras [A/L.324/Rev.2]. In so doing, I shall try, more particularly, to reply to certain objections made yesterday [945th meeting] by the Soviet representative to the forty-three-Power draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6].

43. The Soviet delegation considered that the forty-three-Power draft resolution was obscure on certain points and might give rise to ambiguities as regards how it could be interpreted. My delegation, which took quite an active part in drafting this draft resolution, does not think that is so.

44. Indeed, I feel that the principles we wanted to defend are set forth rather clearly. I am prepared to agree with Mr. Zorin that the points in question can be variously interpreted. But, quite frankly, what text, in the context in which we are operating in this Assembly, could fail to give rise to different interpretations? The interpretations that we attach to a text must always be deduced by the majority of the members of this Assembly and, above all, by the sponsors of the text submitted. The interpretation of this draft resolution has already been amply expounded, particularly by its sponsors, who have given their explanations on the matter and who have, almost all of them, done this fairly clearly.

45. Almost all the members of the African-Asian group have, after all, interpreted this document as one which must solemnly proclaim the necessity of bringing to a speedy and unconditional end colonialism in all its forms and manifestations, the need never to delay the granting of independence on the pretext, for example, of inadequate preparation in the political, economic, social or other fields, and, lastly, the need for immediate steps to be taken to transfer power to the peoples of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, without any distinction as to race, creed or colour, in order to enable them to enjoy complete freedom and independence.

46. We have tried, in the text now before you, to state as clearly as possible the principles that we wanted to defend. But I must tell the Soviet representative that, for reasons which will be easily understood and which will derive from the special circumstances of each State, we did not want to specify how these principles should be applied. For example, the Soviet representative has pointed out that an exact date or time-limit should have been specified for countries to attain independence. In preparing this text we felt that we should not fix a date arbitrarily but should simply state the need for putting an end, speedily and unconditionally, to colonialism. We considered that, in certain cases, it would be advisable even that the transfer of power should not be effected immediately, for it would be essential beforehand to make sure that this transfer was made to the genuine representatives of the population in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire. Some latitude should also be left; some countries, for instance, demand an immediate technical transfer; others demand a rather short interval for the transfer of power. So we thought that, in a general declaration of this kind, it was better to confine ourselves to laying down the principle. This principle is clear: it is the principle of unconditional and speedy independence, leaving it to the various committees to decide how the principle should be implemented in each particular case. Consequently, the fact that we have not, in our draft resolution, specified a date or fixed an exact time-table does not in the least mean that we were opposed to fixing such a time-table in certain particular cases or that we intended deferring independence in any way whatsoever. It simply means that we felt that the fixing of a rigid target date—the same date for all the countries—would smack of artificiality and would not suit the differing and individual circumstances of each particular case.

47. Moreover, there were divergent views on this point among the sponsors. One delegation, for instance, thought that the date should be an immediate date, say 1960 or 1961; other delegations considered that the dates should be in the very near future. Therefore, as I have just said, we left it to the various committees which deal with the problems attaching to each particular case to decide on these dates.

48. Another objection raised by the Soviet delegation related to the problem of universal suffrage and elections. Here again we thought it was essential not to lay down a hard and fast rule, which, however unexceptionable it might be in general, might raise certain special problems within the context of the special nature of the development of each State fighting for its independence. Some delegations even thought that, in some cases, the organization of elections by universal suffrage might ultimately be used as a pretext for delaying independence. Hence the need to specify the principle of the transfer of power, as I have pointed out, in accordance with the freely expressed will and desire of the peoples. This will, of course, can and in most cases should—I emphasize, in most cases—be expressed by organizing a plebiscite or elections on the basis of universal suffrage held in due and proper form and preferably—and wherever it is possible—guaranteed by the presence and supervision of the United Nations. Nevertheless, this should, as I said just a moment ago, be decided for each State according to the special circumstances of its development.

49. For example, at the present moment there are two draft resolutions before the Fourth Committee, one on Ruanda-Urundi [A/C.4/L.664] and one on Western Samoa [A/C.4/L.663], in which it is proposed to apply these principles, in the light of the local conditions and special circumstances, to those territories. The committees concerned will take up the matter and will see that the general principles are applied with the maximum flexibility and with due consideration for the special situation of each of these Territories.

50. Speaking as a member of the group which drafted the forty-three-Power draft resolution, I would like to assure the Soviet Union representative that we spent a long time weighing the pros and cons of each sentence, each phrase and each word. We did so because we never forgot that we had to frame a text that reflects as closely as possible the general aspirations of the African and Asian peoples—aspirations which we are very glad to have the Soviet representative's assurance he also shares—as well as the sometimes complicated conditions surrounding the liquidation of the colonial régime.

51. I must admit that this is not a perfect text. But in a collective task of this kind, where allowance has to be made for the complicated nature of the problems and the differing points of view held about their solution, it is, humanly speaking, very difficult to arrive at a general text which will best express the collective aspirations of the African and Asian peoples.

52. As regards the draft resolution submitted by Honduras [A/L.324/Rev.2] and the Guatemalan amendments [A/L.325] to the forty-three-Power draft resolution, I should like to make a brief comment.

53. The draft resolution submitted by Honduras, though it pursues praiseworthy aims, seems to us at the present moment rather remote from the immediate objectives which the anti-colonial Powers are pursuing in the present circumstances; the Honduran text does not, we feel, satisfy current requirements.

54. Regarding the amendments submitted by Guatemala, I admit that we are in agreement with the intentions behind it. However, I should immediately add that, in so far as these intentions relate to the objective of the present declaration, they are stated and expressed clearly enough in paragraph 6 of the declaration in our draft resolution, which reads as follows:

"Any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country is incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations."

55. In conclusion, I would like to add once again that this text was the result of lengthy discussions and exchanges of views, which took a very long time to materialize. It represents an important piece of work and its particularly delicate balance has been achieved as a result of the fixed determination of the African and Asian Powers to express the aspirations of their peoples through a historical text which—and this is most important—would reflect the united front of these peoples and of all countries against colonialism.

56. Such being the case, we consider that the adoption, or even the insertion, of the amendments submitted might spoil this difficult and especially delicate balance that we have tried to maintain and would even threaten to split the unity of the African-Asian peoples on this question.

57. My delegation would be extremely happy if the sponsors of these draft resolutions and amendments, in the light of the explanations we have given, would not press for them to be put to the vote. If that should not be the case, however, my delegation, for the reasons already stated, but mainly in a spirit of African-Asian solidarity, would not be able to support them.

58. I would like to add one last word regarding the text of paragraph 9 submitted by the USSR in document A/L.328, according to which the General Assembly would decide to consider the question of the implementation of the resolution at its sixteenth regular session.

59. Quite obviously, my delegation—just as much, I fancy, as any of the other sponsors of the draft resolution—has no objection in principle to this paragraph, but the reason why we did not think fit to include it is that we felt it touched on a point of procedure which, in our view, was out of place in a historical declaration which would virtually be a classic text to be studied in schools and in various kinds of organizations, that is, one in which a sentence of a technical character like the one proposed would really be out of place.

60. In my opinion this proposal might be made later by a delegation, possibly as part of another draft resolution, but we really do believe that it is out of place in such an important, such a very solemn declaration as that which we are at present discussing.

61. However, since on this procedural point we have no objection to raise in principle—all the more so as it would not in substance change the balance of the text in any way—we would leave its adoption or rejection, as it now stands, to the collective wisdom of the Assembly and will ourselves abstain from voting on this point.

62. The PRESIDENT: The list of speakers on this item is now finally concluded and the Assembly, therefore, is in a position to proceed to the vote. In view of the fact, however, that the voting on the various proposals before the Assembly is likely to be a protracted process and that it is now a few minutes before the usual time of adjournment, the Chair proposes to adjourn the meeting now and to ask the Assembly to proceed to vote as the first item of business at its next meeting.

The meeting rose at 12.55 p.m.

Agenda item 87:

Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples (concluded) . 1271

President: Mr. Frederick H. BOLAND (Ireland).

AGENDA ITEM 87

Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples (concluded)

1. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now proceed to vote on the various proposals that are before it in connexion with agenda item 87.

2. I propose to submit to the vote first the draft declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples submitted by the USSR in document A/4502.

3. I propose, secondly, to submit to the vote the amendments submitted by Guatemala [A/L.325] to the draft resolution submitted by forty-three African and Asian countries [A/L.323 and Add.1-6].

4. Thirdly, I propose to put to the vote the amendments submitted by the USSR [A/L.328] to the forty-three-Power draft resolution.

5. Fourthly, I propose to put to the vote the draft resolution submitted by forty-three African and Asian countries [A/L.323 and Add.1-6].

6. That leaves only the draft resolution submitted by Honduras [A/L.324/Rev.2]. In connexion with this document, I have been informed by the head of the delegation of Honduras that he does not desire that this draft resolution should be submitted to the vote.

7. I call on the representative of Indonesia on a point of order.

8. Mr. PALAR (Indonesia): It was not the intention of my delegation to explain its vote before the voting takes place, but we believe that an explanation of paragraph 6 in the draft resolution submitted by the forty-three Powers may persuade the representative of Guatemala to withdraw his amendments to this draft resolution. In fact, my delegation requests the representative of Guatemala to withdraw his amendments for the following reasons. Allow me to read paragraph 6:

"Any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country is incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations."

9. When drafting this document my delegation was one of the sponsors of paragraph 6, and in bringing it into the draft resolution we had in mind that the continuation of Dutch colonialism in West Irian is a partial disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of our country.

10. As we have often explained here, the Dutch are using the right of self-determination—in fact, they are misusing it—to justify the continuation of their colonial activities in West Irian. We do not consider it necessary to explain this again, particularly as we have already done so in our statement during the general debate on this item [936th meeting]. It is for this reason that we consider that the idea expressed in the Guatemalan amendments is already fully expressed in paragraph 6 of our draft resolution, and it is for the same reason that we consider that the territories and peoples which the Guatemalan delegation had in mind have been taken into consideration in our paragraph 6.

11. Since I am on this rostrum and attempting to persuade the representative of Guatemala to withdraw his amendments, I should like to take this opportunity of explaining our vote on the draft resolution and on the amendments...

12. The PRESIDENT: I am very reluctant indeed to interrupt the representative of Indonesia, but I gave him the floor on a point of order and, as I announced at the end of the meeting this morning, the list of speakers, including those wishing to give explanations of vote, was finally closed this morning. I should like very much to be able to allow the representative of Indonesia to continue, but I am afraid that, on the basis of the procedure which we have adopted, it is no longer open to me to do so.

13. Mr. PALAR (Indonesia): I apologize. I hope that my effort to persuade the representative of Guatemala may be considered as a point of order.

14. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Guatemala on a point of order.

15. Mr. HERRARTE (Guatemala) (translated from Spanish): I have just heard the statement of the representative of Indonesia, who requested my delegation to withdraw its amendments [A/L.325] to the forty-three-Power draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6].

16. As a matter of fact, we heard this morning several of the sponsors of the draft resolution giving their interpretation of paragraph 6. We fully accept this interpretation and, although we would have liked to have the principle of territorial integrity more clearly expressed, as it is in the text contained in our amendments, I raise no objection and will ask the President, on behalf of my delegation, not to put our amendments to the vote.

17. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Ghana on a point of order.

18. Mr. QUAISON-SACKEY (Ghana): I must apologize for taking the time of the Assembly to raise a point of order, but I am moved by the hope that delegations who submitted amendments to our draft resolution might find their way clear to withdrawing them, and I appeal to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics also to withdraw its amendments [A/L.328], particularly its proposed paragraph 8.

19. I make this appeal because I find that on reading that particular paragraph in conjunction with our paragraph 5, the two do not read very well. In paragraph 5 of our draft declaration [A/L.323 and Add.1-6] we say:

"Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers ...".

20. Paragraph 8 proposed by the USSR (A/L.328) calls upon the colonial Powers to "enter into negotiations". The same idea is there. One says "transfer all powers"; the other says "enter into negotiations". The only novel aspect of their paragraph is the date which they have fixed. I think those of us who took part in the drafting of the African-Asian draft know very well the various views expressed before paragraph 5 was put in. Therefore on the basis that we shall be voting on the draft declaration of the Soviet Union without any amendment, we feel that all amendments to our draft resolution should be withdrawn.

21. Therefore, in that spirit, may I appeal to the representative of the Soviet Union to withdraw his amendment.

22. Mr. ZORIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (translated from Russian): The Soviet delegation has already explained the reasons why we considered it essential to introduce the amendments to which the representative of Ghana has just referred. In our statement we emphasized that our motive was to facilitate the adoption at this session of a resolution that would basically settle this question of the elimination of colonialism. Accordingly, we did not submit any amendments to the actual paragraphs of the resolution introduced by the forty-three African and Asian countries, precisely in order to facilitate the positive solution of this problem.

23. As regards the additional paragraphs proposed in our document, and, in particular, the additional paragraph 8, to which the representative of Ghana referred, we consider that addition absolutely essential because the main issue now is how to implement this decision on the liquidation of colonialism and the liberation of dependent and colonial peoples, and the paragraph in question contains an effective indication of how to solve this problem and sets a time-limit for its successful solution.

24. We know, of course, that there is no one single point of view on this question, even among the African and Asian countries themselves; we believe, however, that the absence of such a single point of view will not make it difficult for those countries that regard the elimination of colonialism as an urgent and pressing problem to vote for the proposal introduced in the amendment to which I have just referred since, in the last analysis, the representative of Ghana, when he spoke here expressing his views, the views of his Government, said that the Government of Ghana considered that the deadline for the completion of this process of liquidating the colonial system should be the beginning of 1962.

25. Thus, between our proposal and the view defended by the Government of Ghana there are no major differences of substance. Of course, there are other points of view too, but I believe that the voting should disclose the positions of all countries and reveal who is interested in the speedy elimination of the colonial system. We regret, therefore, that we shall not be able to comply with the Ghanaian representative's request and shall press for a vote on both our amendments.

26. The PRESIDENT: The Assembly will now proceed to the vote. The Assembly will have before it three documents which I propose to submit to the vote in the following order: first, the draft declaration proposed by the Soviet Union and contained in document A/4502; secondly, the amendments submitted by the Soviet Union [A/L.328] to the forty-three-Power draft resolution; and finally, the forty-three-Power draft resolution itself [A/L.323 and Add.1-6].

27. Coming to the first vote which is the vote on the draft declaration submitted by the Soviet Union, as representatives may remember, a request was made this morning [946th meeting] to have the vote on this draft declaration in parts: first, a separate vote on the part beginning with the words, "... the States Members of the United Nations solemnly proclaim the following demands:" and including the numbered paragraphs 1, 2 and 3. Then a vote will be taken on the rest of the draft declaration, and finally a vote on the draft declaration as a whole.

28. I now put to the vote the part of the draft declaration submitted by the Soviet Union [A/4502] beginning with the words, "... the States Members of the United Nations solemnly proclaim the following demands:" and including the following paragraphs numbered 1, 2 and 3.

29. A roll-call vote has been requested.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

Mexico, having been drawn by lot by the President, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Morocco, Nepal, Poland, Romania, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Togo, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Republic, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Albania, Bulgaria, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Ceylon, Chad, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia, Ghana, Guinea, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Mali.

That part of the declaration was rejected by 35 votes to 32, with 30 abstentions.

30. The PRESIDENT: I will now put to the Assembly the rest of the Soviet draft declaration. I think that the request for a roll-call covers the declaration as a whole, so I propose to put this part to a vote by roll-call also.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

Albania, having been drawn by lot by the President, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Albania, Bulgaria, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Ceylon, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia, Ghana, Guinea, Hungary, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Liberia, Madagascar, Mali, Morocco, Niger, Poland, Romania, Saudi Arabia, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Republic, Yemen, Afghanistan.

The rest of the declaration was rejected by 43 votes to 25, with 29 abstentions.

31. The PRESIDENT: As neither part of the draft declaration has received the approval of the Assembly, it is perhaps unnecessary to submit to the Assembly the draft declaration as a whole.

32. I now propose to put to the vote the amendments submitted by the USSR [A/L.328] to the forty-three-Power draft resolution. Separate roll-call votes have been requested on each of the paragraphs in document A/L.328. Therefore, I now put to the vote the first of these two paragraphs, paragraph 8.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

Against: Honduras, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Norway, Pakistan, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Thailand, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Denmark, Federation of Malaya, Finland, France, Greece.

The paragraph was not adopted, having failed to obtain the required two-thirds majority.

34. The PRESIDENT: The General Assembly will now proceed to vote on the forty-three-Power draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6].

can Republic, Ceylon, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo (Brazzaville), Congo (Leopoldville), Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Ecuador, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Federation of Malaya, Finland, Gabon, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Portugal, Spain, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Dominican Republic, France.

The draft resolution was adopted by 89 votes to none, with 9 abstentions.^{1/}

35. The PRESIDENT: A number of representatives have asked to explain their votes after the voting. I give the floor to the first of these, the representative of Canada.

36. Mr. NESBITT (Canada): I wish to explain the vote of the Canadian delegation on the forty-three-Power draft resolution on the granting of independence to colonial countries.

37. The Canadian delegation welcomed the initiative taken by the sponsors of this draft resolution, which we think a very good one and for which we were very pleased to vote. We are inclined indeed to congratulate the United Nations itself upon an achievement which should give encouragement to our Member Governments and peoples at a moment when perhaps the United Nations can do with a breath of encouragement. It is an event worth noting, when forty-three nations, some with, some without a history of colonialism, agree upon the content of a resolution of this breadth and depth in an area by no means devoid of controversy.

38. In a resolution of this length and importance there are inevitably passages which one might wish on first reading to have seen differently worded. For this reason, we have cause to be grateful to the several sponsors who took the trouble of explaining or interpreting various clauses and expressions. We were pleased to hear from some of the sponsors, for example, that a condemnation of all colony-holding States in the past and present is not intended. Canada would belie its own history, its history under two colonizing States over a period of 200 years, if we were not to affirm that the partnership and harmony of one country and another, even though at first not in terms of mutual equality, must often result in benefit to both. A dozen speakers have given this testimony in the present debate.

39. When, however, that harmony vanishes, the benefits fail, and then the whole of the old colonial system must perish, as it is perishing before our eyes.

40. Nevertheless, history also has its rights and prerogatives, of which no power on earth can deprive it. If interrupted too recklessly, too precipitately, in its course, history takes its own revenge. We do not need to look far to see examples of this.

41. We note with care, therefore, what this resolution says; it says: let all colonies be liberated. It does not say, and several of its sponsors have pointed out that it does not mean: let all colonies and territories, regardless of their circumstances, regardless of their readiness, regardless even of their own wishes, be liberated at this moment. The resolution does not try to force any people against its own wishes and against its own best interests into any particular form of government or into any prescribed relationship in reference to any other country. Nor does it seek to forbid to any territory the right to maintain a connexion with another territory if it desires to maintain that connexion. To do these things would, in fact, be contrary to the principles already recommended by the Fourth Committee for adoption in this Assembly, following consideration by that Committee of the report of the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter [A/4526].

42. In voting for this draft resolution, Canada is glad to have had the opportunity of joining the sponsors who have put forward this resolution and the many speakers who have supported it and clarified its terms, as well as those administering Powers who have demonstrated their compliance with its principles.

43. I should now like to add a word of explanation in connexion with the vote which the Canadian delegation cast against the Soviet draft declaration in document A/4502. The sponsors of the African-Asian draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6] made it very clear in their statements before the Assembly that they wished this matter of the independence of colonies and Trust Territories to remain completely divorced from the great Powers' rivalry and the political objectives of any of the great Powers. We had hoped that the delegation of the USSR would have taken this evident and laudable desire of the sponsors into consideration and refrained from pressing their declaration to a vote, couched as it is in highly inflammatory terms. At the very least, we had hoped that the Soviet delegation would not have seized this as an appropriate opportunity to wage propaganda warfare.

44. Contrary to these reasonable expectations, the Soviet delegation, in every intervention, has attacked the administering Powers, always extravagantly, often savagely, and in nearly every case unjustly. Under these circumstances, we now feel free to recall to the mind of the Assembly certain words spoken by the Prime Minister of Canada from this rostrum at the beginning of this session. Mr. Diefenbaker invited the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR, who then stood before us as the self-proclaimed liberator of the colonial peoples, "... to give to those nations under his domination the right of free elections—to give them the opportunity to determine the kind of government they want under genuinely free conditions." [871st meeting, para. 197.] By doing so, Mr. Khrushchev could show that he really desired "the complete and final elimination of the colonial régime in all its forms and manifestations". These circumstances constitute part, but by no means all, of the reasons why the Canadian delegation voted against the Soviet draft declaration.

Mr. Hasan (Pakistan), Vice-President, took the Chair.

45. Mr. ORMSBY-GORE (United Kingdom): My delegation has listened to the long debate on this item with the greatest attention, for it is a debate on a matter of vital concern to us. An important part of the obligations we owe to the international community concerns the remaining overseas territories under our administration. These obligations are covered by two sections of the United Nations Charter, different in character but with the same objectives—Chapter XI, covering Non-Self-Governing Territories, and Chapters XII and XIII, covering Trust Territories.

^{1/}The delegation of Dahomey, which was absent when the vote was taken, subsequently informed the President that it would have voted in favour of the draft resolution (see paragraph 99 below).

46. The debate has shown that there is widespread understanding and indeed appreciation here in the United Nations of the manner in which we are discharging those obligations. The degree to which the peoples of these territories, with our help, can succeed in creating new nations, undivided, strong and genuinely independent, is, we believe, crucial both to their own future happiness and to the progress and well-being of mankind as a whole. It is with this in mind that we have approached this debate.

47. Many of the sponsors of the forty-three-Power draft resolution, which has just been adopted by the Assembly, have made it clear by what they have said in the debate that their basic objectives are the same as ours. They are indeed the objectives set forth in the Charter of the United Nations. For this reason we would like to have been able to vote for the declaration, especially since, as some of the sponsors have said, it is intended to be universal in its application, to bring within its scope those forms of—and I use the words of the resolution—"alien subjugation, domination and exploitation", the practitioners of which try to exempt themselves from the strictures of world public opinion.

48. But in a matter as important as this, we have felt bound to look most closely at the wording of the resolution, and, to our regret, we came to the conclusion that its wording in certain respects was not such that we could support it. We would have been prepared in a matter which concerns us so closely to have had discussions on the drafting with the sponsors. We believe that had this been done we could have contributed some suggestions from our own experience which would not have derogated from the basic purpose of the draft and could have, at the same time, made it possible for us to accept it.

49. The majority of the peoples now covered under Chapters XI, XII and XIII of the Charter live in territories under United Kingdom administration. We have a special responsibility, therefore, to ensure that our position on the matters covered by the declaration is not misunderstood. For example, paragraph 1 of the declaration is, I must assume, simply not applicable to the people in these territories for which we are responsible, since it refers to a system of alien domination which is contrary to the United Nations Charter, whereas the United Kingdom administration of dependent territories is conducted strictly in accord with the relevant provisions of the Charter. I wish that the sponsors could have made this more explicit in the text of paragraph 1. As it is, I think that it may be open to misinterpretation.

50. There are other paragraphs in the declaration which cannot be held to apply to territories for which the United Kingdom is responsible. For example, the seventh paragraph of the preamble reads:

"Convinced that the continued existence of colonialism prevents the development of international economic co-operation, impedes the social, cultural and economic development of dependent peoples..."

The policies which the United Kingdom Government is pursuing in connexion with the territories under its administration are framed strictly in accord with Article 73 of the Charter. Under this we are obliged to ensure the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the dependent peoples and to promote co-operation with international bodies with a view to the practical achievement of these purposes. This we do, and the manner in which we do it is well known and is exhaustively examined by various organs of the United Nations.

51. All delegations here are aware, for example, of the participation of territories under United Kingdom administration in the work of such bodies as the Economic Commission for Africa. The development of inspiring examples of international economic co-operation of this kind has not been impeded by the fact that these territories are not yet fully independent. Equally, social, cultural and economic development is going steadily forward in the territories under our administration through the joint efforts of the peoples concerned and ourselves.

52. My delegation regrets the criticism implied, in this and other paragraphs, of the policies which we are carrying out in accordance with our Charter obligations. We also feel that the declaration might in several places have laid more stress on the positive responsibilities of those who still administer dependent territories. For instance, we accept that the inadequacy of preparedness in the various fields mentioned in paragraph 3 should not serve as a pretext—and by pretext I mean what one of the sponsors defined as "fabricated grounds of unpreparedness"—for delaying independence. But we also share the views of those sponsors who urged that constructive steps must be taken in the political, economic, social and educational fields as a preparation for independence in order that independence, when it comes, can be effective and have real meaning. We think that the declaration could have been improved if these constructive aspects could have found a place in it.

53. On the other hand, paragraph 2 of the declaration seems to my delegation to be out of place in this context. The United Kingdom, of course, subscribes wholeheartedly to the principle of self-determination set out in the Charter itself, and we feel that we have done as much to implement this principle during the past fifteen years as any delegation in this Assembly. Nevertheless, members of the Assembly will be familiar with the difficulties which have arisen in connexion with the discussion of the draft International Covenants on Human Rights and in defining the right to self-determination in a universally acceptable form. These difficulties have not yet been finally resolved by the Assembly, and we feel that it might have been better not to make the attempt now in a rather different context.

54. Some of the sponsors have described paragraph 5 of the declaration as the key paragraph and have emphasized that what this means is that immediate steps should be taken for the necessary preparation for the final transfer of power to the inhabitants of the territories and that there should be no deliberate procrastination and delay in this. The United Kingdom delegation entirely agrees with these sentiments, although we wish that this paragraph too might have been expressed more clearly. The method and timing of progress towards independence must be a matter for the people themselves to work out together with the administering Power. The circumstances of every territory are different, and there is no one pattern which can be imposed from outside upon them all. In this respect, the speech of the representative of Australia [933rd meeting] describing the problems facing New Guinea is worth close attention, particularly by those who, like the representative of the Soviet Union, have used the debate for the repetition of outworn political slogans and have revealed an astonishing ignorance of the whole subject.

55. For all the reasons I have mentioned, my delegation abstained on this draft resolution. Nevertheless, I should like to say that we do regard it as a considerable achievement that forty-three delegations should have been able to agree upon the text of a declaration upon so controversial a matter as this. We should like to pay tribute to those delegations which we know have worked hard and long to produce a text which could command as wide a support as this one has. We should especially like to congratulate them on having produced a text which, in spite of the imperfections which we still see in it, has succeeded in emancipating the subject of the granting of independence to all colonial countries and peoples from the tendentious and unconstructive language of the Soviet draft declaration which was rejected by this Assembly. I do not think that the Assembly would expect me to comment on the extraordinary collection of falsehoods in the speech of the representative of the Soviet Union on a number of occasions, and particularly on 7 December. Anyone familiar with the political situation in East Africa, for example, will know how completely he misrepresented it. The aspirations of the people of Africa are not what Mr. Zorin says they are and he cannot speak for them. The amendments that his delegation submitted again showed how ill qualified he was to speak on their behalf and how much he has to learn of the real problems involved.

56. We are proud of the work which we are doing in co-operation with the peoples of the territories for which we are responsible, helping them by every means at our command to create new nations, prosperous and free. We look to the future not to the past, a future in which new and strong nations will take their places in the world community without fear of internal strife or outside pressure.

57. In the course of this debate one of the sponsors of the draft resolution referred with approval to a paragraph in the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories which concludes with the following sentence:

"The Committee is confident that the knowledge that their ultimate destiny is for them to choose, will encourage the inhabitants of the Territories to multiply many times their own efforts to build a new and prosperous future for themselves during a period of smooth, constructive and purposeful transition."
[A/4371, part two, para. 25.]

58. We share that confidence and we are grateful to all those Members of the General Assembly who share it also and who have shown understanding of the policies which the United Kingdom is following to bring about this new and prosperous future with all speed.

59. Mr. SCHURMANN (Netherlands): My delegation voted for the draft resolution which was sponsored by forty-three African and Asian countries [A/L.323 and Add.1-6]. We did so because we agree with the principles it contains, which are also the principles by which we are guided in the administration of the only Non-Self-Governing Territory still under our administration.

60. Our agreement with the principles of the resolution does not mean that we are entirely happy about all of its wording. Although we are convinced, for instance, that independence will foster the development of international economic co-operation and will promote social, economic and educational development, we do not consider that the mere fact of dependence necessarily impedes development. As administering Power we are doing all we can to promote these various forms of development in Netherlands New Guinea, as is indeed our duty under the terms of Article 73 e of the Charter.

61. I could give some more examples of not fully accurate phrasing, but the fact that we voted for the resolution as a whole proves that we did not consider them of decisive importance and so I shall not revert to them.

62. What we cannot accept, however, is the inference drawn by one speaker in the debate from paragraph 6 of the declaration. That paragraph is a reaffirmation of Article 2, paragraph 4, of the United Nations Charter. As such it naturally has our full support and approval. But we fail to see by what strange kind of reasoning the representative of Indonesia could possibly deduce from the terms of paragraph 6 of the declaration that the right of self-determination should be granted to all peoples of the world except only to the people living in the western half of the island of New Guinea, which is Netherlands New Guinea. Such a contention is contrary to the Charter and most certainly finds no basis in the resolution.

63. Mr. HERRARTE (Guatemala) (translated from Spanish): In supporting the draft resolution of the African-Asian Powers [A/L.323 and Add.1-6], my delegation had introduced the amendment contained in document A/L.325 to the effect that the principle of the self-determination of peoples may in no case impair the right of territorial integrity of any State or its right to the recovery of territory. This reservation seemed to be absolutely desirable since there are many territories disputed or claimed by other States as an integral part of their respective countries which are improperly held by colonial Powers, and in such disputes the solution cannot run counter to the principle of self-determination, as that would infringe the other very important principle of a country's territorial integrity.

64. It is true that paragraph 6 of the resolution contains a positive statement to the effect that "any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country is incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations". However, my delegation thought it appropriate to make its point of view clearer, as is set out in the amendments already mentioned. Nevertheless, my delegation made no objection to withdrawing its amendments in view of the statements made by several of the sponsors in interpreting paragraph 6 and the request made by the representative of Indonesia, on the understanding that the rights it was seeking to safeguard would be duly protected by paragraph 6.

65. We are extremely gratified that the draft resolution of the African and Asian countries has been approved by such a large majority. In any case my delegation wishes to state that the adoption of the resolution cannot in any way affect the legitimate rights that Guatemala has been maintaining against the United Kingdom regarding the Guatemalan territory of Belize. The occupation of this territory is no more than a sequel to the old British piracy practised on the coasts of Central America and merely represents the triumph of might over right.

66. I must on this occasion place on record the fact that, at the San Francisco Conference, Guatemala expressly reserved its rights when the international trusteeship system was discussed^{2/} and also during the discussion concerning reports from countries administering non-self-governing territories. It has restated these reservations in this Assembly, in the Trusteeship Council and in various United Nations committees when it was necessary.

67. The Republic of Guatemala has maintained the same attitude at the various inter-American conferences that have dealt with the abolition of colonialism, an idea to which it has given its warmest and most enthusiastic support. At the Chapultepec Conference in 1945, when the American States endorsed the principles of the Atlantic Charter,^{3/} Guatemala also entered a formal reservation^{4/} to the effect that the principle of self-determination could not affect its right of territorial integrity as regards the problem of Belize, being a territory in dispute.

68. Consequently, my delegation maintains that the resolution adopted will not affect territories which are the subject of dispute or litigation.

69. Mr. PERERA (Ceylon): The delegation of Ceylon in its intervention on 28 November [926th meeting] explained its position regarding documents A/L.323 and A/4502. Today the delegation of Ceylon has voted for both parts of the Soviet draft declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. We agree in toto with every word that is stated in the declaration of the Soviet Union and contained in document A/4502. The delegation of Ceylon abstained on the first of the Soviet amendments in document A/L.328 to the forty-three-Power African-Asian draft resolution, and we abstained for the following reasons.

70. First, in paragraph 5 of the African-Asian draft resolution we have, to some extent, covered the ground dealt with in the first paragraph of the Soviet amendments. Secondly, we abstained on the first paragraph because we found that it does not perhaps cover every possible issue that may arise in the future. I refer particularly—and this is in line with the intervention by the delegation of Ceylon on 28 November—to the fact that not only must we safeguard ourselves against the colonialist Powers that still exist in the world, but we must also safeguard the position of the colonial peoples in the event of the colonial Powers combining to continue and perpetuate colonialism. It was the view of the delegation of Ceylon that although the principle contained in the first paragraph of the amendment of the Soviet Union may be correct, what in principle may be correct does not go far enough.

71. In short, the Government of Ceylon takes a more revolutionary position regarding the substance of the first of the Soviet amendments. It is the submission of the delegation of Ceylon, in explaining our vote, that it is tantamount, to some extent, to a fetter on certain rights which all colonial peoples will have.

72. I do not wish to refer to items which are now being discussed in the First Committee of the Assembly, but I would say that any attempt made by a group of colonial Powers, or by a single colonial Power, to perpetuate colonialism would also mean that in future the right of conquest would give the peoples of those colonies the right to rebellion. In that sense, the Government of Ceylon goes further than the first paragraph proposed in document A/L.328.

73. It is for that reason that the delegation of Ceylon abstained on that paragraph. But may I say that on the principles contained therein, we are in agreement with the Soviet Union; and if colonial peoples, through their elected representatives, can negotiate with the colonial masters, or the colonial Powers, we shall welcome it. But we also act on the principle: "peacefully if we may, forcibly if we must"; in short, the principle that the right of conquest gives the right of rebellion to the people, and not merely the right to negotiate.

74. For those reasons we abstained on the first paragraph of the Soviet amendments but we voted for the second paragraph, which would have placed this question on the agenda of the sixteenth session. We did so because we feel that this is in line with what is contained in document A/4502—and here I repeat, the delegation of Ceylon accepts every word in the Soviet draft declaration—and because it is necessary to put the colonial Powers "on the spot", if I may use that expression. That is why we voted for it.

75. I take this opportunity, while explaining our vote, to say that the Government of Ceylon, through the delegation of Ceylon, expresses its gratitude to the Soviet Union for having requested the inclusion of this item in the agenda of the fifteenth session.

76. Mr. ZORIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (translated from Russian): More than two months have passed since Mr. Khrushchev, the Head of the Soviet Government, submitted to the General Assembly for its consideration the declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples and called on all Members of the United Nations to adopt a decision on the immediate and complete elimination of colonialism in all its forms and manifestations [869th meeting].

77. That proposal proved to be a powerful means of mobilizing all anti-colonial forces and a broad discussion developed around it in which more than seventy delegations took part. Of great significance was the fact that with the exception of a very insignificant group of colonial Powers and their stooges, the great majority of delegations condemned colonialism and demanded its complete and immediate elimination. The discussion in the United Nations on the question of the liberation of all colonial countries and peoples shows that powerful forces opposed to the shameful colonial system have come into being in the world today and have joined together. At the present time the relationship of economic, political and military factors is such that the colonial Powers can now no longer maintain their colonial possessions under their domination and cannot avert the collapse of the colonial system. A situation has come about in which the peaceful elimination of the colonial system is possible. If all States, all forces that are demanding freedom and independence for the colonial peoples unite and together take action against the attempts of the colonial Powers to maintain their domination over territories and peoples not their own.

78. Taking this real relationship of forces into account, the Soviet Union took the initiative in the United Nations and called on all States to declare themselves in favour of a peaceful solution of the problem and of the adoption, within the framework of the United Nations, of measures which would help to bring about the complete elimination of the colonial system. The declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples that has just been adopted by the General Assembly is a great victory for the united front of anti-colonial forces represented in the United Nations. It is noteworthy that only eight colonial Powers—Portugal, Spain, Belgium, the Union of South Africa, Australia, the United Kingdom, France and the United States—did not approve that declaration, although they did not venture, in face of the powerful anti-colonial front, openly to oppose its endorsement. The whole world can now see who in fact is in favour of eliminating the shameful colonial system and who is opposed to it.

79. The Soviet delegation expresses its gratification that the overwhelming majority of States Members of the United Nations have supported the fundamental provisions of the Soviet draft declaration that are reflected in the text of the declaration now approved by the General Assembly. We are happy, too, that thirty-two delegations actively supported with their votes all the operative paragraphs of the Soviet draft declaration, and that twenty-nine delegations voted in favour of the Soviet proposal for the granting of independence to all colonial countries and peoples not later than 1961.

80. The fact that forty-one delegations have deemed it necessary to place the question of the implementation of the resolution just adopted on the agenda of the sixteenth session of the General Assembly indicates that the question will inevitably come up at the sixteenth session. The whole course of the discussion on this item confirms that the Soviet Union's action in raising the question of the elimination of colonialism in the General Assembly has fully justified itself. The draft declaration submitted by the Soviet Government on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples played an effective and positive role in determining the position of delegations and in preparing the ground for the adoption of the solemn United Nations declaration on the elimination of colonialism in all its forms and manifestations. The declaration submitted by the Soviet Union is a living document of historic importance, a programme of action for the peoples of the colonial countries. It will serve as a symbol of the support of all peace-loving forces for the national-liberation movement in the colonies and will be a call to all peoples to make an end of colonialism without delay and to erase this monstrous phenomenon, this blot on the twentieth century, from the face of the earth.

81. Mr. NINCIC (Yugoslavia): I would just like to say a word in explanation of the votes my delegation has just cast on the draft resolutions that were before us.

82. My delegation has voted in favour of that part of document A/4502 which, in our view, contained the declaration proper. We abstained with regard to the rest of the document because we felt it was of an explanatory nature, and that to vote for it might well have created a precedent. That is why we did not deem it possible to accept every word of the text thus formulated, no matter how much we were in agreement with its general context. Had the document been put to the vote as a whole, we would, of course, have voted in its favour.

83. My delegation also voted in favour of the forty-three-Power draft resolution, which we felt met the basic requirements of the situation and whose overwhelming adoption a moment ago constitutes, in our view, a highly important and most welcome event.

84. We also voted in favour of the Soviet amendments to that draft resolution which, in our view, would have strengthened it quite considerably.

85. Mr. JHA (India): The declaration that has just been adopted is truly one of the landmarks in the progress of the United Nations. I believe that future historians will regard it as one of the noblest declarations, one of the noblest resolutions coming out of the United Nations; and there is no doubt that this resolution will rank perhaps as the most constructive achievement of this session of the General Assembly of the United Nations. It is a resolution which will inspire everyone, inspire the peoples who are under colonial domination, and give them hope and faith, not only in themselves but in the United Nations. We have no doubt that it will enormously expedite the processes which are working towards the liberation of dependent peoples.

86. I take the floor for just a few minutes in order to explain the voting of my delegation on the draft declaration contained in document A/4502 and on the amendments contained in document A/L.328.

87. My delegation voted for the three paragraphs of the draft declaration numbered 1, 2 and 3 in document A/4502. There was nothing in these paragraphs which was contrary to the expressed views and attitudes of the Government of India. Indeed, we found in these paragraphs all that my country has stood for ever since the inauguration of the United Nations and the views expressed by the responsible leaders and the Government of India. Therefore, we whole-heartedly supported those three paragraphs.

88. As for the rest of the document, we would like to say that we are entirely in accord with a very large part of it. Indeed, the rest of this document contains statements which are highly noble and inspiring. For example, it says:

"We all inhabit the same planet. On this planet we are born, we work, raise our children and pass on to them all we have achieved in life. And although there exist different States in the world, all men are born equal in dignity."

This is a noble statement, and there is no one—certainly not in my delegation—who would have the slightest hesitation or compunction in voting for this.

89. As I said, we are in whole-hearted agreement with most of the draft declaration, but our understanding as regards voting on a historic declaration of this nature, which goes into the formal records of the United Nations, is that if we vote for it, we subscribe to each and every sentence of it, and we found some difficulty in doing that. We found that some parts, some statements, or perhaps the manner of expressing certain views, were such as did not accord with the traditional position and the traditional attitudes of the Government of India. We were, therefore, unable to vote in favour of it and we abstained on that part of the document.

90. Coming to the amendments contained in document [A/L.328, we abstained on the first amendment, which would have figured as paragraph 8 in the forty-three-Power draft resolution. I should like to make it clear on behalf of my delegation that we would welcome, and we do welcome, the immediate emancipation and freedom of all dependent peoples. None would be happier to see the end of the colonial system in all its forms and manifestations by the end of 1961 so that the world might become a completely free world by that date. But in the discussions that preceded the vote—very lengthy discussions and, if I may say so, very thorough discussions, which were conducted with a great sense of responsibility and of realization of the importance of this declaration—it was felt that we should strike a somewhat different line; we should keep the resolution in the form of a declaration of principles which will be a source of inspiration and guidance perennially and which can be used and cited at any time. It was felt that any circumscription of those principles by putting a target date would be somewhat out of tune with the conception that was behind that resolution.

91. Secondly, we felt that the proposed paragraph 8 in some ways—of course it was an advance in the sense that it wanted independence to be attained at the end of 1961—was some sort of limitation on the key paragraph, which is paragraph 5 of the forty-three-Power draft declaration. Paragraph 5 is very clear. It says:

"Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those territories ... without any conditions or reservations..."

It seemed to us that the idea of negotiations embodied in the proposed paragraph 8 was in some way a limitation inasmuch as negotiations presuppose the possible introduction of some conditions or reservations. The thing behind paragraph 5—at least from the point of view of my delegation—is that there is nothing further to be done; no pretext can be advanced for delaying the freedom of dependent peoples. All that is necessary is to take immediate steps. Those steps, naturally, have to be taken in accordance with democratic practices, but the steps cannot be delayed on any ground, and no negotiations can be a ground for delaying the taking of immediate steps—and these immediate steps might even mean immediate independence, that is to say, even before the end of 1961. Therefore, while we fully appreciated the spirit behind the proposed paragraph 8, we felt, being sponsor of the forty-three-Power draft resolution, and with the thinking that went behind paragraph 5 of that text, that we should abstain on paragraph 8 as proposed in document A/L.328.

92. We had no difficulty in deciding to vote for the second Soviet amendment because we feel that the whole question cannot be left like that. The question of implementation of this resolution must come before the General Assembly at its sixteenth session in some form or other.

93. The PRESIDENT: The representative of Indonesia has asked for the floor to exercise his right of reply.

94. Mr. PALAR (Indonesia): It is not only in order to exercise our right of reply that I have taken the floor; my delegation wishes also to explain its vote on the amendments submitted by the USSR in document A/L.328.

95. My delegation participated intensively in the preparation of the forty-three-Power draft resolution. We felt that it was a happy compromise between views that were very far apart. It took us about four weeks to draft this resolution and, therefore, it is understandable that the sponsors should have some difficulty in accepting amendments. As a matter of fact, we were inclined to accept the amendments submitted by the USSR but, as I explained before, we took the position that it would not be helpful to accept any amendment to our resolution. That was also the reason why we succeeded in persuading the representative of Guatemala to withdraw his amendments.

96. Now I should like to make use of my delegation's right of reply to the representative of the Netherlands.

97. The representative of the Netherlands has tried to interpret paragraph 6 of our declaration in his own way. In fact, what he tried to do was to tell us that his delegation knew better than the forty-three sponsors of the draft resolution what their desire was in submitting this resolution. We have had some experience of Dutch masterfulness in the interpretation of resolutions and agreements. I should like to draw the attention of the Assembly to something that happened between the Netherlands and Indonesia about fifteen years ago when we concluded an agreement with the Dutch. This agreement was called the Linggadjati Agreement. In that agreement there was a provision that if the parties did not agree on its interpretation, this difference of opinion should be submitted to arbitration. At that time I was a Member of the Dutch Parliament and I experienced much astonishment that the Dutch Parliament and Government succeeded in convincing themselves that this provision of arbitration did not in fact mean anything resembling arbitration. In fact, they managed to convince themselves that while there was a provision for arbitration in the agreement, it was not necessary for them to accept arbitration.

98. This is a kind of interpretation that we know from the Netherlands. I can understand that the Netherlands could try to treat Indonesia, which was very inexperienced, this way, but I am quite surprised to see the representative of the Netherlands come to this forum and try to give his own interpretation of a resolution that has been sponsored by forty-three members of this body. Obviously, the representative of the Netherlands knows better what we wish than we ourselves. It is very difficult to characterize this, but I think we may just call it Dutch.

99. The PRESIDENT: Before I proceed with the list of speakers I have an announcement to make. The representative of Dahomey has asked me to announce his inability to attend the voting on this item, but he wishes it to be recorded that had he been present he would have voted for the forty-three-Power draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6].

100. I give the floor now to the representative of Portugal.

101. Mr. GARIN (Portugal): I wish to explain briefly the vote of my delegation. My delegation has followed with great attention the debate on colonialism which the Assembly has just concluded. Much was said from this rostrum with which my delegation is in agreement. As was stressed by many representatives during the debate, the most criticized aspects of colonialism implied the idea of race superiority, of economic exploitation, and of subjugation of peoples for ideological or political purposes. With the exception of a few delegations I am sure no one in this Assembly is a defender of such features of colonialism, and my delegation whole-heartedly shares such feelings. In this context my delegation joins others in their anxiety for the termination of that kind of new and ruthless colonialism which is found within a great State or in those nations which during the last few decades have lost their independence or which enjoy nothing but symbolic independence.

102. Also, in respect of Trust Territories or other territories in regard to which there may be international obligations, it is certainly desirable that the principles of the United Nations Charter should be implemented, due respect being paid to the particular circumstances of each case, in a way and at a time which should not be detrimental to the real interests of all concerned.

103. My delegation had carefully studied the draft resolutions and the amendments submitted thereto. My delegation felt that although we have had a prolonged and exhaustive debate the texts before us were not sufficiently discussed in the debate with the care that the importance of the subject would seem to require. The texts which the Assembly has just approved do not, in our view, take into account the complexity of the various problems which they raise and the repercussions to which they may lead. Many implications and practical realities have not been taken into consideration and proper perspective is lacking; and certain political, economic and cultural aspects may be involved without due attention having been paid to them.

104. Also, we have heard from this rostrum leaders from four or five countries who have referred to the new type of colonialism which is certainly the worst and the most repugnant political and economic system that the world has ever been confronted with and which has brought about the tyrannical subjugation and oppression of many countries. My delegation would have thought that this type of colonialism would have found its proper place in the draft resolution and we believe that an effort in that direction could have been made for the benefit of mankind. The Assembly, however, felt differently and the text just adopted has therefore lost the wider meaning and impact which it could have had otherwise.

105. Finally, during the debate some unfounded and unwarranted attacks were addressed to my country, and a few delegations have been at great pains to connect principles and situations which in fact bear no relation and which were quite outside the scope of the debate. We had the opportunity to repudiate the accusations made, but the fact that they were made raised in our minds some doubts which the course of the debate did not otherwise dispel.

106. For all these reasons and in the context of the statement which I had the opportunity of delivering during the debate [934th meeting], my delegation found it necessary to abstain.

107. Mr. SHAWARBI (Yemen): The Government of Yemen strongly believes in the necessity of taking all measures which would lead to the granting of full independence to all peoples. The Yemen delegation therefore voted for the draft resolution contained in document A/L.323 and Add.1-6, calling for immediate steps to transfer all powers to the peoples of all dependent territories, and respect for the territorial integrity of any State.

108. Mr. OWANO (Cameroun) (translated from French): The delegation of the Republic of Cameroun does not need to explain the vote it has given in favour of the draft resolution submitted by the delegations from Africa and Asia, since it was a sponsor of that resolution. The quasi-unanimity of the vote sufficiently and eloquently stresses the importance of this historic fact and illustrates the absolute necessity of a community of views on finding solutions for African problems. If it still needed to be emphasized here, this vote would go to show that the needs of Africa and of the African countries can only be properly analyzed, surveyed and studied by Africans and the parties concerned and that, for all their goodwill, all the non-African countries cannot but hold different views from ours on the problems affecting us and cannot but follow methods which are inapplicable to our continent and our peoples.

109. The applause which greeted the vote makes comment superfluous.

110. I would like to add a few words to explain my delegation's vote on the Soviet draft declaration [A/4502] and the Soviet amendments [A/L.328] to the African-Asian draft resolution. I did not want to ask the Assembly to adopt the method which, I felt, would best have enabled it to express its views on the subject of the Soviet draft declaration. For I felt that the work of this Assembly was drawing to its close, that there were still decisions to be taken on important problems, that the discussions on this declaration had lasted long enough and that it was undesirable to protract the debate further on points of procedure. Had that not been so, we would have asked for separate consideration to be given to each of the three numbered paragraphs of the Soviet declaration. My delegation would have had good reasons for wanting separate votes to be taken on these particular paragraphs.

111. The first of the numbered paragraphs reads as follows:

"1. All colonial countries and Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories must be granted forthwith complete independence and freedom to build their own national States in accordance with the freely-expressed will and desire of their peoples. The colonial system and colonial administration in all its forms must be completely abolished in order to afford the peoples of the territories concerned an opportunity to determine their own destiny and form of government."

This part of the Soviet declaration is in conformity with the views of the Camerounian delegation, so we would have liked a vote to have been taken on this specific paragraph. My delegation would have voted in favour of this paragraph, except for the word "forthwith", which I would have asked to be deleted. I shall explain my position on this point later on in connexion with the Soviet amendment.

112. The second numbered paragraph reads as follows:

"2. Similarly, all strongholds of colonialism in the form of possessions and leased areas in the territory of other States must be eliminated."

Had a separate vote been taken on this paragraph, my delegation would have abstained because of the wording: "leased areas in the territory of other States". As I have already explained, it is the view of my delegation that neither the United Nations nor anyone else in the world can express an opinion on a lease or a contract made in a foreign country. So we would have abstained if a vote had been taken on that particular paragraph.

113. My delegation would have voted in favour of the paragraph numbered 3 in the Soviet draft declaration. Unfortunately, it was not voted on separately, and so we were unable to express our Government's view on that paragraph.

114. We abstained during the voting on the Soviet draft declaration because we thought that the African-Asian draft resolution summarized, in general terms, the Soviet point of view and that, besides, a country which had sponsored a resolution submitted by all the Powers concerned could not well dissent from the views it had already stated.

115. As regards the Soviet amendments [A/L.328], we would also have asked for the deletion of the second part of paragraph 8, which would then have read as follows:

"Calls upon the Powers concerned to ensure the transfer of full and sovereign power to the peoples of all dependent territories in accordance with the principles stated above and, for this purpose, to enter into negotiations with representatives of the colonial peoples".

That is where I would have stopped and I would have asked for a vote to be taken on this first part of paragraph 8. My delegation would have supported this paragraph for, as I have already said in connexion with paragraph 1 in the Soviet draft declaration [A/4502], I think that the words "forthwith" and "negotiation" cannot go together.

116. In the same way as we were obliged to abstain on the Soviet draft declaration because of the word "forthwith" in paragraph 1, so we had to abstain in the vote on paragraph 8 of the Soviet amendments because of the second part of the text of that paragraph. I did not manage to ask for a separate vote to be taken on the first part of that paragraph asking for negotiations to be initiated. The Camerounian Government is in favour of negotiations; it has welcomed the admission of seventeen new African and Asian Member States to the United Nations at this session of the Assembly—and the accession of these States to independence followed on negotiations. My delegation would have voted in favour of negotiations because they would have led inevitably to the independence and sovereignty of the African peoples.

117. Now I would like to explain why I voted in favour of paragraph 9 of the Soviet amendments reading:

"Decides to consider the question of the implementation of this resolution at its sixteenth regular session."

The Cameroun delegation considered that, whatever the Assembly decided, the question would have to be examined in future by our Organization. We supported this amendment because we thought that, even though a similar text was not included in our draft, this question would in any case be placed again on the agenda of the sixteenth session of the Assembly and that it was highly desirable that our draft resolution should contain provisions that would enable an evaluation to be made of the text we have adopted virtually unanimously.

118. Those are the reasons which induced my delegation to abstain in the voting on the draft declaration and amendments submitted by the USSR, and to cast our vote simply on a paragraph which was put to the vote separately.

119. To conclude, I would say that the Camerounian Government and I myself are thoroughly convinced that the result of the voting on the African-Asian draft resolution proves absolutely beyond a doubt that any action that may be taken in Africa will be doomed to failure unless the Africans are consulted and unless an opportunity is given them of expressing their wishes and indicating how they expect them to be realized.

120. Mr. ROSSIDES (Cyprus): We believe that the draft resolution which we sponsored dealt fully and satisfactorily with the problem of foreign domination and colonialism, with which the people of Cyprus had been concerned for quite a long time. We therefore abstained from voting on any other declarations or on amendments to our resolution except in so far as concerned the implementation of our resolution.

121. This session had been noted until now for its ineffectiveness, as no agreement had been reached on any of the issues before it and, therefore, no fruitful results were yielded. Jokes even went around about the "Do-Nothing Committee" and the "Special Do-Nothing Committee". But the resolution that has just been adopted almost unanimously more than compensates for ineffectiveness in other directions. It redeems this session and, indeed, places it high in the records of the United Nations. By this resolution, ideals and concepts which have been in the minds and in the hearts of men through the ages, and for which wars were waged, now take in a peaceful way a concrete form and realization. This is a great and historic fact. This resolution has a significance which is far-reaching. History will place this session in rank of importance immediately after the original session by which the United Nations was established, for the document which has now been adopted is an epoch-making document, second only to the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, on both of which it is based and both of which it revitalizes; for they needed revitalization, and this resolution does in effect revitalize them.

122. This resolution puts an end to a long chapter in history, that of domination by force and subjugation and exploitation, and a new chapter is opened, one based on equality and the brotherhood of man. We therefore can, with modesty, be proud about the resolution which has just been almost unanimously adopted.

123. Mr. AMMOUN (Lebanon) (translated from French): I come to the rostrum to explain my delegation's vote on the Soviet Union's draft declaration. We voted for the three numbered paragraphs in the said draft because they condemn colonialism everywhere and in all its forms. We find in it, essentially, the condemnation of a new and sinister manifestation of colonialism: Zionist colonialism.

124. How can a certain representative of Israel dare deny the fact when we see a motherland taken away from its inhabitants by brute force and occupied by people scraped together here and there from all over the world? While these aliens occupy the country they have invaded, a whole people is left without a home and without a mother country. Colonialism in Asia...

125. The PRESIDENT: I call on the representative of Israel, who wishes to speak on a point of order.

126. Mr. COMAY (Israel): I would just like to ask the President whether it is in order under rule 90 of the rules of procedure, dealing with explanations of vote, for a delegation, in explaining its vote on a draft resolution, to indulge in a renewed attack on another Member State. I would recall that this attack was made before, and in the legitimate exercise of its right of reply my delegation briefly replied to it at the end of the debate on this item and before we came to the voting and the explanations of vote.

127. I would therefore suggest that it would be in accordance with the rules of procedure and in accordance with the interests of winding up our debate if the President ruled out of order any renewed attacks, to which I have already had occasion to make a reply here today.

128. The PRESIDENT: I would request the representative of Lebanon to confine himself to the explanation of his vote.

129. Mr. AMMOUN (Lebanon) (translated from French): The explanation of vote that I am giving relates to a text which my delegation did not help to draft. Lebanon, together with other countries from all over the world, submitted to the Assembly a draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6] which has been adopted. My explanation, however, concerns a different text which was submitted by another delegation and which bears on certain points on which I must give some explanations, since I voted for this new text. With the permission of the President, I shall continue the explanation of this vote given by my delegation in support of the Soviet draft declaration [A/4502].

130. I was saying that colonialism in Asia and in Africa really does come, all the same, under the scope of colonialism. This colonialism in Asia and in Africa occupies, or has occupied, certain regions without dispossessing their inhabitants or pillaging everything that belonged to them. These inhabitants are now becoming independent again and masters of their own country. That was not what happened in another colonized country and that is still what I am referring to. I am referring to Palestine, a country which has not only been occupied but stripped, not merely of its possessions but even of its inhabitants. And the representative whom you have just heard was brazen-faced enough to deny that this was colonialism, whereas we have here a case of double colonialism, as it were, since the country is deprived both of its sovereignty and of its territory. Not only did the representative in question deny the facts but he has also, unwittingly, given the lie to a certain personality whom all Jews respect and who was the actual founder of Zionism a hundred years ago and who, as we all know, entreated Great Britain to help in creating a Jewish national home in Palestine, so that Palestine might become, as he said, a bridge-head for European colonialism in Asia.

131. Unfortunately, though colonialism has disappeared or is disappearing from Asia, the bridge-head has remained and that is precisely what has got to be eliminated.

132. Secondly, the condemnation of colonialism made in the Soviet text, in favour of which my delegation has voted, castigates the manifestation of the endemic evil of racial discrimination. Can the brazen denials of the representative of Israel, or even of the delegates who spoke before him, conceal a reality which is so blatant? Israel is, after all, a Jewish State. Therefore, it follows incontrovertibly that a non-Jew is a citizen of a different category. Is it not in a Jewish State's Parliament that people are discussing the question whether the Jews of the Exodus were six thousand or sixty thousand or six hundred thousand and where the Head of the Government, Mr. Ben Gurion, because he ventured to express views differing from those held by certain other political parties, is now faced with an interpellation and even, possibly, a vote of confidence? Is that body a Parliament or a synagogue? We are perfectly justified in asking that question.

133. The Jewish State of Israel being what it is, a non-Jew is, in point of fact, treated as a second-class citizen, as a gentile, as the Jews used formerly to say. We are again passing through an era of gentleness! It is this new manifestation of colonialism that is condemned by the Soviet text which we voted for.

134. Thirdly, and finally, the representatives of Israel uttered vehement protests when we explained how Palestine had been invaded and colonized. They protested, more particularly, against the charge of having employed Hitler-like methods against the population of the Holy Land. After all, though, it was not the Arabs who compared Israeli behaviour with Hitler's of ten years previously. It happened in 1948 in the Security Council and the person who spoke in those terms was not an Arab representative. The one who was aroused by the disgraced behaviour of Jews and who said that the Jews in Palestine had been...

135. Mr. COMAY (Israel) (from the floor): A point of order.

136. Mr. AMMOUN (Lebanon) (translated from French): I have finished, Mr. President.

137. The PRESIDENT: As the representative of Lebanon has finished, I give the floor to the representative of Israel on a point of order.

138. Mr. COMAY (Israel): I think the kindest thing I can do about the last speaker's statement is to repudiate it in toto and refer him for the reasons to the statement I made this morning [946th meeting] in reply to the statement his delegation made earlier.

139. My delegation fully supported the draft resolution submitted by a group of Asian and African countries, and we are happy that it has been adopted without opposition. This result gives proper expression to the dramatic changes that have come over the world in our time. We feel that it is in the best interests of the subject peoples themselves that attainment of independence and the transfer of powers should, wherever possible, take place in an agreed and orderly manner, and not in circumstances of conflict and chaos.

140. It is for that reason that we have voted against proposals which would categorically insist that all Non-Self-Governing Territories should become independent forthwith, or even by the end of 1961. The more flexible and realistic wording of draft resolution A/L.323 and Add.1-6 commended itself to us more strongly, particularly as it constitutes the common ground which evolved in the discussions among the sponsors themselves.

141. We have also voted against a declaration which injected the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples into the controversies of the cold war. We believe this, too, is not what is beneficial for the peoples concerned and not what they want themselves.

142. Mr. WADSWORTH (United States of America): I wish to explain the attitude of the United States towards the forty-three-Power draft resolution, which has just been adopted without opposition, and the reasons for our abstention in the vote. The United States, as I said in my previous intervention in this debate [937th meeting], warmly supports and endorses the interest and concern of the United Nations in promoting larger freedom for peoples everywhere. The support of freedom is a concept springing from deeply-held beliefs of the American people. We accordingly welcomed the underlying purpose of this resolution sponsored by the forty-three delegations, which we understand to be the advancement of human freedom in the broadest sense.

143. The concept of human freedom, as the resolution just passed makes perfectly clear, applies not only to peoples who are achieving self-government or independence under the administration of the various Member States, but also to other peoples whose desire to live under free institutions of their own choosing is brutally stifled. Freedom is indeed indivisible.

144. Now, there are difficulties in the language and thought of this resolution, which I shall comment on more specifically in a moment, which made it impossible for us to support it, because they seem to negate certain clear provisions of the United Nations Charter. This we deeply regret, that these questions of language could not have been straightened out, and we regret it because, as I have said, the United States endorses the support of the United Nations, as set forth in its Charter, for the basic quest of people everywhere for political institutions and governmental forms in keeping with their rights to live in dignity and in freedom.

145. One thing is clear, however. This resolution applies equally to all areas of the world which are not free, whether they are in the Western hemisphere, in Africa, Asia or Europe. It speaks of freedom from alien subjugation, domination and exploitation for all peoples. It proclaims that all people have the right to self-determination. It condemns colonialism in all its manifestations. Members of the United Nations would not be true to their trusts and responsibilities under the Charter if they failed to consider the plight of some of the peoples to whom the Charter's provisions and those of the new declaration are clearly relevant. I refer specifically to peoples living under Soviet colonial domination, whose plight I mentioned in my previous intervention.

146. We found difficulties, as I noted earlier, in the language and thought of this resolution. For instance, it is hard to understand why a resolution on this broad subject should be completely silent on the important contributions which the administering Powers, including my own Government, have made in the advancement of dependent peoples towards self-government or independence.

147. The resolution also is heavily weighted towards complete independence as the only acceptable goal, thus ignoring the Charter provisions for self-government of dependent areas within larger political contexts. We see this reflected in the title of the resolution and in many of its paragraphs. The penultimate preambular paragraph, for example, speaks of the inalienable right of all peoples to complete freedom, which seems to point to full independence in all cases.

148. For our part, we must question the wisdom of espousing principles which would result in some cases in unnecessary political fragmentation and which would also fly in the face of political and economic realities in many areas of the world. Full democratic self-government within a larger and stable political system is sometimes a more worthy immediate objective than full political independence.

149. In examining with care, as we have done, the major aspects of this resolution, we reached the conclusion that paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 are susceptible to serious misinterpretations which could cause basic misunderstanding of the attitude of the various Governments here on the need for orderly and effective preparations for self-government or independence in accordance with the Charter provisions. Although we are sure that this was not the intent of the sponsors of the resolution, paragraph 3 permits the interpretation that the question of preparation for independence is wholly irrelevant. Adequate preparation for self-government or independence is a matter of elementary prudence and is a responsibility which must be accepted by those administering dependent peoples. It is clearly essential that emerging peoples be reasonably able to undertake the responsibilities they will have to face. On the other hand, we would never agree that false allegations in respect of political, economic, social or educational preparation should be used to retard political development.

150. Paragraph 4, written in unqualified language, seems to preclude even legitimate measures for the maintenance of law and order, and this is, of course, incompatible with the obligations of the Administering Authorities towards the peoples under their administration.

151. As for paragraph 5, here again is a very strong statement that only complete independence and freedom is the acceptable political goal for dependent peoples. This paragraph also calls for immediate steps to transfer all powers to the peoples of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, without any conditions or reservations.

152. The record of the United States in taking steps for the self-government or independence of peoples under its administration is an open book. We are proud of that record. We have taken many steps in the past, we are taking steps now, and we will take further steps in the future, and we will do this in a manner in consonance with our international responsibilities under the Charter and our responsibilities for the people under our administration. Like many other Members of the United Nations, we regard the provisions of Chapters XI and XII of the Charter, which deal specifically with Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories, as controlling so far as the Territories for which we are responsible are concerned. The United States Government will continue to advance these Territories and their peoples towards self-government or independence in accordance with the provisions of the Charter and the obligations we have assumed under the Trusteeship Agreement for the Trust Territory we administer.

153. I would call attention to a very wise statement which was made from this rostrum not long ago by the representative of India who, while discussing his delegation's position on another matter, said, "We do not feel that we could fully support it unless we could support every word of it". This is the major reason why the United States felt constrained to abstain on this particular vote. I should like to say, however, that I am sure that the devotion of the United States to the principles of human freedom and political advancement will be judged by what the United States has done, is doing and will continue to do in the cause of freedom. I have every confidence that our support of these principles will be considered on the basis of our record in action as it really is, and not as it is distorted or may in the future be distorted by the words of others.

154. I will turn now very briefly to the Soviet draft which the Soviet delegation pressed before the Assembly in this debate. That draft would have added nothing useful to the forty-three-Power draft resolution, which we all knew would be adopted without opposition. We regret that the Soviet representative insisted on pressing it, as well as on pressing his amendment to the forty-three-Power draft resolution; in view of the Soviet record of imperialism and colonialism in the relatively brief history of the USSR, and particularly since the Second World War, it would have been a travesty to adopt the Soviet proposal on this question, and we therefore voted against it.

155. Mr. BEN ABOUD (Morocco) (translated from French): All the declarations and resolutions concerning the eradication of colonialism in all its forms follow the normal trend of history and all of them, without exception, correspond to the hopes of mankind as a whole for the advent and the consolidation of the reign of positive and real freedom. That is why we voted in favour of the draft declaration submitted by the Soviet Union [A/4502], more especially as regards the three numbered paragraphs. Of course, the substance of the provisions contained in this declaration is to be found, more or less, in the declaration which is contained in the African-Asian draft resolution [A/L.323 and Add.1-6]. We are pleased to note that this latter document has been adopted without opposition.

156. We voted in favour of the draft declaration submitted by the Soviet Union so that we might by so doing contribute to the final abolition of the enslavement, overt or covert, of man by his fellow man. Nevertheless, if there is an objection at this late hour to giving a lengthy enumeration of the reasons for our vote, we feel it is important to state one at least of these reasons.

157. The three numbered paragraphs in the Soviet Union's declaration refer to: real and not fictitious independence, complete and unequivocal; the elimination of colonialist strongholds, which nowadays disturb the tranquillity of the international atmosphere, and respect for territorial integrity.

158. The same principles are mentioned in the African-Asian draft resolution. In particular, paragraph 6 explains very well what our delegation understands by territorial integrity. When we discussed this document and agreed to become a sponsor, we had in mind a long list of examples of the partitioning and disruption of the unity of national territories. I shall confine myself to mentioning three of these examples.

159. First, there is the attempt, which we trust will prove futile and unsuccessful, to dismember the Congo, particularly in Katanga.

160. Secondly, I would mention the regrettable dismemberment and occupation of Palestine, which we trust is only temporary and brief, by this new phenomenon of foreign colonialism known as international Zionism.

161. Thirdly, there are the efforts—employing the soft and silent tactics of the viper—of French colonialism to partition Morocco and disrupt its national territorial unity, by setting up an artificial State in the area of Southern Morocco which the colonialists call Mauritania. The population of that area does not even know the word "Mauritania". If you tell a Bedouin of so-called Mauritania that you are in Mauritania, he will not understand what you are talking about. In that area a miniature capital has been created out of absolutely nothing; up to now it did not even have a single hotel. A newly-built school has even been converted into living quarters.

162. Thus, the Soviet draft declaration for which we voted follows a line similar to that of the African-Asian declaration demanding the radical and complete elimination of colonialism, be it European or Zionist, and of the kind of balkanization that is being practised in Africa, the Middle East and elsewhere.

163. The PRESIDENT: All delegations wishing to explain their votes have now done so and the item "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples" is concluded. The Assembly may well congratulate itself on this accomplishment.

The meeting rose at 6.15 p.m.

Fifteenth session

DECLARATION ON THE GRANT OF INDEPENDENCE TO COLONIAL COUNTRIES AND PEOPLES

Submitted by Mr. N.S. Khrushchev, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR, Chairman of the USSR Delegation, on 23 September 1960 for consideration by the United Nations
General Assembly at its fifteenth session

The States that set up the United Nations founded its Charter upon the lofty and humane ideals of equality of rights and the self-determination of nations and peoples.

Born in the period of victorious conclusion of the Second World War, the United Nations embodied hopes that the inequality and enslavement of some nations and peoples by others would disappear along with the barbarity and criminal acts of fascism and militarism. But not all the hopes of the peoples came true. Still unsolved is a vital problem of our time: the complete liberation of mankind from the shameful colonial regimes inherited from the past.

Ours is an era of swift renewal of society; an era in which more progressive and equitable ways of life are being affirmed; an era in which man is soaring upwards to unprecedented mastery over forces of nature. The time has come for the complete and final liberation of peoples languishing in colonial bondage. Therefore the States Members of the United Nations solemnly declare their convictions, intentions and demands for the grant of independence to colonial countries and peoples.

Peoples that oppress other peoples cannot be free. Every free people should help to win freedom and independence for the peoples that are still oppressed.

The great rebirth of the enslaved peoples

The swift liberation and emancipation of countries and peoples is a significant feature of our time. Even in the lifetime of the present generation, two thirds of the world's population were living under colonial conditions. At the end of the First World War the chains of the colonial oppression of nations fell away in a number of countries. The banner of national independence, raised high over the world, has become now the banner of hundreds and hundreds of millions of people on all continents of the globe. The time has come for the liberation and rebirth of nations, peoples and tribes which were but recently oppressed and downtrodden. Tens of new States have joined the family of independent countries. The democratic ideas of equality of rights and self-determination of nations are being translated into reality.

The myth of the inability of colonial peoples to govern, to create and to build has crumbled to dust.

Today no one can say that the peoples of Asia, Africa or Latin American cannot govern themselves. Gigantic forces have awakened, exulting, to build a new independent life. Indeed, the settlement of international affairs is now inconceivable without the participation of the People's Republic of China, without the participation of the liberated peoples of India, Indonesia, Burma, Ceylon, the United Arab Republic, Iraq, Ghana, Guinea and other States, large and small.

Today no one can say that the liberation of nations and peoples formerly under the yoke of colonialism will bring in its train an expansion of the zone of conflicts and clashes between countries. On the contrary, national liberation has broadened the zone of peace, while colonial oppression and colonial policy have led, and still lead, to wars.

Today no one can assert that the liberation of nations will lead to depression of the economy, trade, crafts or agriculture. On the contrary, experience shows that it is the political liberation of colonial peoples and the establishment of new independent States that open the way for a genuine rise in the national economy.

Today no one will dare to assert that the liberation of peoples from the colonial yoke will lead to the decline of culture. Life shows that on the heels of liberation come the rebirth, upsurge and flowering of distinctive national cultures, the spread of public education, the improvement of health care, the training of skilled national personnel, and increased potentialities for enriching world culture.

It is not only the peoples of the East who gain from the liberation of previously oppressed nations, but the peoples of the West as well. The cause of the freedom of peoples, of relations among them on a footing of equality, and the preservation of peace in the world are placed on a firmer foundation.

But the liquidation of the colonial regime is yet to be completed.

The States Members of the United Nations cannot remain indifferent to the fact that, in the ancient lands of Africa and Asia, on the islands of Oceania, on the islands of the Caribbean and in other places, over one hundred million people still languish in colonial subjugation. The peoples of these countries have the right to national independence; nevertheless they are still without rights, they are still kept in the stocks. In these countries, violence and lawlessness reign as before; in these countries the highest law is profit for foreigners. Their interest is all, and the inalienable rights of man and people are nothing. The sway of foreign administrators who despise and loot the local population; the persecution of tribes; the derision of national customs; inequality of status and rights for the indigenous inhabitants; shameful disregard for their vital interests; and the humiliation of national and human dignity; all these arouse profound indignation in every man of honour.

There the swish of the overseer's lash is heard; there heads fall under the executioner's axe.

The peoples of the colonies do not want to live in slavery or in conditions of servitude; they are fighting for their rights and independence, for everything that other peoples enjoy. In their path, however, stand the selfish interests of imperialist circles in the West, hindering the fulfilment of the peoples' just aspirations. Colonial wars, punitive expeditions, the open looting of peoples by the monopolies, military tribunals and secret trials, reservations, colour bars, prisons and concentration camps - these are some of the methods by which overt and covert colonialists try to strangle everything alive, independent and national in colonial countries.

The Conference of African nations in Accra justly set the brand of colonial fascism on all this.

Those who stand for the preservation of the old systems of colonial rule still yearn for savage measures of retribution in the colonies. Of course, such measures are hampering liberation. But does not life take its course? Did cruel reprisals, carried out over a period of decades, stop the liberation of Indonesia? Did the massacre of tens and hundreds of thousands of people in Indo-China save colonial domination there? Can the crimes now being committed against the peoples of Africa stop the irresistible process of the liberation of African nations?

No forces of oppression and despotism will save the absolute colonial order. And of those killed on the road to freedom it cannot be said that they are dead; no, they are alive in the memory of the peoples, they will live forever as heroes of the struggle for national liberation.

Colonialism is in its death-throes. But in its last hour it can cause much suffering and take many victims, ruin many more lives in colonies and metropolitan countries, destroy much of the wealth created by the labour of many generations.

The United Nations appeals to all peoples on earth and to all Governments not to stand by as indifferent observers of the sufferings of the colonial peoples. Is it possible to remain deaf to the groans of the people of Kenya, where for eight years the colonial authorities have been exterminating the local population after driving it into reservations, prisons and concentration camps; to the sufferings of the people of Oman, against whom a war of usurpation is being waged? Who can remain calm in the face of the unending reprisals visited on the population of Nyasaland, Angola, Mozambique, Rhodesia, Ruanda-Urundi, South West Africa, Tanganyika, Uganda and West Irian?

It is inadmissible in this age of progress, brilliant scientific discoveries and immeasurably greater human control over the forces of nature that France should be waging a colonial war in Algeria with aircraft, artillery, tanks, napalm bombs and other means of mass destruction against the Algerians who have fought for nearly six years with selfless courage for the freedom and independence of their motherland. Hundreds of thousands of Algerians have been killed, many Algerian towns and villages burned and destroyed, a fifth of the country's population herded into concentration camps. Many sons of France are dying for this unjust cause.

Can such a situation continue to be tolerated? No, it cannot, if the interests of the great cause of peace, the interests of humanity and progress are valued.

For what purpose do those who refuse to renounce colonial rule wage murderous wars against peoples? Why are the freedom-loving aspirations of the enslaved peoples suppressed? Sometimes it is said that this is done in the interests of the "civilization" of the less developed countries to prepare them for self-government.

But this is a lie given the guise of truth.

What civilization have five centuries of colonial tyranny brought to the African countries of Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea, with an area of more than half that of Western Europe and a population of eleven million? They have brought poverty, the loss of all rights, the forcible confiscation of land watered with the sweat of many generations and the expulsion of farmers to barren and drought-ridden regions.

There, arbitrary rule, famine, ignorance and disease are rampant and virtual slavery and forced labour are still practised. There is not a single higher educational institution and practically no secondary education.

Why is Portugal allowed to practise such colonial despotism in this age? On what grounds?

In half a century of Belgian colonial domination the Congo's population declined by more than half through punitive expeditions, starvation and disease. When the independence of the Republic of the Congo was proclaimed only a few of its inhabitants could read and write.

The situation in other African colonies is no better.

Of course, in some parts of the colonies, roads, airfields, ports, mines and a few schools have been built. But all this is for the purpose of exploiting the indigenous population and plundering the natural wealth of those colonies.

The assertion that colonial rule is necessary to prevent strife, fratricidal wars between tribes and peoples in the colonies is also a deliberate lie.

Developments in the Congo show that colonialism thrives on discord and deliberately instigated quarrels between tribes and peoples. It tries to weaken their common struggle for liberation. The motto of the colonialists is still "divide and rule!"

...

What is inscribed on the banners of Asian and African peoples fighting for their national freedom and independence? The peace and solidarity slogans of Bandung and Accra are there inscribed.

Indifferent to the calls of justice, the colonialists try to preserve arbitrarily-drawn frontiers dividing peoples and tribes, as well as kindred economic regions of Africa and to disrupt the unity and territorial integrity of many countries.

The times demand independence for colonial countries and peoples

The United Nations appeals to peoples and Governments irrespective of where their countries may be - East or West, North or South - to ask the question posed today by events themselves: does the rotten colonial system match the ideals of nations and the potentialities of the present age?

One need only compare the development in the past century of the independent countries of Europe or North America with that of colonial countries in Africa to realize that the path of colonialism leads to the regression, atrophy, ruin and degradation of the forcibly enslaved countries.

While in the economically-developed countries industry, transport, agriculture, science and culture have reached a high level, vessels propelled by atomic energy have been built and artificial celestial bodies launched into space, Africa, a land of fabulous wealth, is backward and has become a continent of famine; its main agricultural implements, just as they were thousands of years ago, are the mattock, the wooden plough and the sharpened stake; its primitive system of agriculture is causing soil exhaustion and erosion.

There is now a veritable abyss between the highly-industrialized independent States and the colonial countries, whereas Asia and Africa were once the cradle of great civilizations which enriched the culture and civilization of other peoples.

The main object of the colonial regime is in fact to secure enormous profits for big foreign monopolies, which have seized the key economic positions in the colonies and to extort their wealth by every possible means. Therefore, the entire economy of a colony is one of exploitation. Having first of all been subordinated to the narrow interests and needs of the markets of the individual industrial countries, its development is slow, deformed and one-sided.

Only after Ghana had been liberated was it recognized that its future lies not in the production of cocoa alone, but in the development of modern industries with extensive utilization of its large resources of hydroelectric power and enormous deposits of bauxite and that this constitutes its greatest value in terms of world economy.

Under the colonial regime the enormous hydro-power resources of the Republic of the Congo also remained untapped, although their potential capacity is nearly equal to the present output of electric power in all the countries of Western Europe put together. The utilization of these resources alone would not only allow the full exploitation of colossal mineral wealth and raise the level of agriculture in the Republic of the Congo, but also substantially transform the entire economic pattern of the Central African countries and greatly improve the well-being of their populations.

It has been scientifically established that all the countries of the African continent, as well as those in other continents, possess vast, diverse and as yet largely unexplored natural resources. They could be made to serve the peoples of these countries and thereby serve the whole of mankind. But the colonial system deliberately and artificially perpetuates the economic backwardness of the colonies, hindering their industrialization and the rational utilization of their resources. This is coupled with an unprecedented squandering of public property, immense waste of labour and the predominance of the parasitic single-crop method of economic administration of the colonial countries adapted to the selfish interests of the metropolitan countries.

The present level of industrial and technological development and the latest achievements of science, agriculture and culture make it possible to place all this vast wealth in the service of the peoples within a comparatively short time. In order to use it, however, it is first of all necessary to secure for the peoples the right to an independent existence, to eliminate the colonial system, and to provide economic assistance in making use of this wealth. This will make it possible to improve the well-being of the local population, to expand the capacity of the internal market, and to do away with existing illiteracy, with the shortage of national cadres, and with the domination of the one-crop system in the colonial economy. The colonial system does not permit the solution of problems of this kind or the great technological achievements which are an inseparable part of modern civilization.

The benefits deriving from the exploitation of colonies do not in any sense go to the peoples but primarily to the big foreign monopolies - to billionaires. The peoples of both East and West are compelled to pay a heavy tribute to colonialism. Oil and coffee, rubber and cotton, copper and bananas, a variety of raw materials and foodstuffs brought in from the colonies are sold at prices many times higher than those for which they are purchased on the spot. The monopolies rob people twice - in the East when they buy and in the West when they sell colonial goods and raw materials.

Moreover, they compel the colonial peoples to maintain foreign troops and a foreign administration in peacetime, i.e. to pay for the chains in which they are held. At the same time, the monopolies impose higher taxes on taxpayers in the metropolitan countries for the purpose of inducting punitive expeditions and colonial wars, forcing the peoples of the metropolitan countries as well to pay for the shackles in which the monopolist-colonialists put other peoples. In fact, they are burying in fields of devastation the freedom of their own peoples together with the independence of other nations. This state of affairs is in itself a serious indictment of the colonial system.

Yet, if the States Members of the United Nations and above all, of course, those which at one time imposed the yoke of colonialism on numerous peoples showed even a minimum degree of understanding of the urgent needs of these peoples, they would find ways of meeting those needs. One of the main methods of doing this is to resolve the disarmament problem and curtail the military expenditure of States.

As is generally known, the States belonging to the military-colonialist North Atlantic bloc alone spend $62,000 million annually on the arms race. If even half of this sum that is spent annually for unproductive purposes that are dangerous to peace were used for the development and advancement of, for example, the African countries, gigantic engineering projects could be carried out, including the Ingui, Concure, ^{Zambesi}~~Zambesi~~ and Volta plans - plans for the construction of large hydroelectric stations, irrigation systems and industrial enterprises and for agricultural development. The liberated nations of Africa could build schools, universities, hospitals and roads everywhere and carry out other measures which would enable them to raise agriculture as well to a higher level of modern development.

At the same time, if the bonds of colonialism were removed from the African and other colonies, that would facilitate the utilization of their natural resources, increase the demand in those countries for European and American machinery and other industrial products, expand exports of raw materials for the industry of Europe and the United States, increase employment and the utilization of productive capacity, and raise the living standards of the peoples of the industrially-developed countries.

Every honest person and every Government that really stands for the equality of peoples, for the realization of the great purposes and principles proclaimed in the United Nations Charter, cannot but see that colonialism is an obsolete and shameful phenomenon in modern life. The complete and final elimination of colonialism would be the prelude not only to social progress but also to swift technical strides in industry and agriculture, just as the end of the slave trade lent a powerful impetus to the development of the productive forces of society.

The elimination of colonialism would be a key measure in reducing international tension. It was precisely the desire to prevent the liberation and the national development of the young States of Asia, Africa and Latin America that led to such armed conflicts and wars in the post-war period as those in Indonesia, Indo-China and Algeria, the aggression against Egypt, the foreign intervention in Lebanon and Jordan, the conspiracies against Syria and Iraq, and so forth. Indeed, throughout the last century most wars and armed conflicts were in one way or another connected with colonialism, with the struggle of the major Powers for the division and redistribution of colonies.

The peoples have on more than one occasion been subjected to the terrible danger that colonial wars would develop into a new world war. And now the intervention against the Republic of the Congo has led to aggravation of the international situation and has jeopardized the cause of peace in Africa and, indeed, not only in Africa. Can one forget that under present-day conditions, with nuclear and rocket weapons in existence, the flames of war, once kindled on one continent, can engulf in an instant the entire globe.

Many of the most important foci of the present international tension - in the Middle and the Far East, in Africa and in Latin America - are to a considerable degree the outgrowth of colonialist policy. Colonies and other so-called "non-self-governing territories" are often used as military bases of foreign Powers, as proving grounds for atomic tests. Can such a situation make people feel secure, relieve them of the fear of war, show them how to extricate themselves from the poverty, hunger and disease which are still the lot of the peoples of the countries which remain colonies and Trust Territories?

In addition to large colonies and Trust Territories, some Powers also retain strong points in different areas of the world, such as West Irian, Okinawa, Goa and Puerto Rico, not to mention Taiwan, against which the United States has committed aggression by occupying this territory of the People's Republic of China. Why do the highly-developed industrial Powers need such bases and "possessions" on the territory of other countries? Is this not a direct survival of the former era of colonial domination? What would the Europeans or Americans say if some Asian or African countries demanded bases for themselves in the countries of Western Europe or North America?

There cannot be two opinions on this score: these bases are retained in order to threaten the national independence and security of the neighbouring peoples. Just as the trading stations in the early days of colonialism served as a base for the extension of the system of colonial oppression in Africa, Asia and America, so today, when colonialism is disintegrating, the imperialists are trying to use the remaining bases and colonies to exert brutal pressure on the independent States of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

The shameful colonial regime should be buried

The States Members of the United Nations submitting this Declaration are of the opinion that every Government which is for peace and progress in deeds, and not in words should respect the lawful rights of all nations without exception in their demands for equality, justice and independence. Either these demands will be recognized by all States or the oppressed peoples, with the support of their numerous friends throughout the world, will take their destiny in their own hands and will win liberty and independence, breaking down all the artificial barriers erected in their way by the colonialists. The primary duty of all nations is to extend a helping hand in the sacred struggle for independence and against colonialist domination.

Together with the infamous system of colonialism, the variant of the colonial regime known as the trusteeship system has also outlived itself. Being a vestigial remnant of the mandates system of the League of Nations, the present trusteeship system in accordance with the United Nations Charter should have promoted the development of the Trust Territories towards self-government and independence. Fifteen years have elapsed, however, since the Charter was adopted, but only four out of eleven Trust Territories have attained independence.

So far no exact dates have been fixed for granting independence to Trust Territories, including the largest of them - Tanganyika, Ruanda-Urundi and New Guinea.

The Powers responsible for "trusteeship", disregarding the principles of the United Nations, are in fact preserving colonial regimes, mercilessly exploiting the population and plundering natural resources, repressing those who submitted petitions to the United Nations, hampering the economic and political development of the Trust Territories.

The trusteeship system has not justified itself anywhere and should be buried together with the entire colonial system, which is an anachronism.

The regime of colonial oppression has left to mankind a burdensome legacy in the form of numerous complicated problems. The tragic events taking place in the Congo as well as in other parts of the world where peoples are waging a just struggle for their rights, demand a reasonable solution of the problem of relations between the indigenous population and the settlers who came from other continents.

Racial discrimination in all its odious forms, i.e., division of peoples and nations into the privileged and the "inferior" is nothing but racism, an attempt to justify the crime of genocide, an adding of new atrocities to those already committed, of new crimes to old, a fomenting of mutual hatred and endless bloody conflicts between countries and peoples.

Different peoples have skins of a different colour, but the colour of their blood is the same. And not a single people can lay a claim to domination over other peoples.

The ties and relations between the peoples created at the time of colonialism must be replaced by new relations based on the principles of equality, friendship and mutual respect, regardless of the social and political systems of States, the ideology and political views of people or the colour of their skin. The peoples in colonies should be given real independence, not a fictitious one under which they would, in fact, be kept under a modified colonial regime. They are now demanding not only greater freedom within the colonial rule but the final elimination of this system, freedom for progress, the right to be their own masters, to use their own wealth and the fruits of their labour. Every form of enslavement, every manifestation of "trusteeship" or "charity" towards peoples is a serious insult to their dignity.

Present realities make it imperative to choose between stagnation and progress, between slavery and freedom, between division of the peoples and their unity, between war and peace.

The United Nations considers it its duty to urge the Powers that have colonial possessions to enter into negotiations on an equal footing with representatives of the peoples of the colonies and reach agreement on the granting of freedom and independence to the colonial countries.

Definite and early dates for negotiations should be fixed and any possibility of coercion or aggression on the part of the colonial Powers should be eliminated. But should those Powers turn a deaf ear to such an appeal, should they delay the liberation of the colonies and suppress the liberation movement of the colonial peoples, the peace-loving nations should render every assistance, moral and material, to the peoples fighting for their independence.

The States Members of the United Nations proceed from the premise that every country, every nation has a full and inalienable right to independent existence. They feel confident that the elimination of the colonial regime will not mean the alienation of the countries of Africa and Europe from one another. On the contrary, it will promote still greater co-operation among them. Such unity and co-operation, however, should be reciprocal and freely granted.

The more consistently and directly the great principles of international co-operation are realized - the principles of equality, sovereignty and territorial integrity, non-interference in each others internal affairs, mutual benefit, peaceful coexistence and economic co-operation - the greater will be the mutual understanding and agreement among free and equal States of the world.

Only thus will the countries of the West and the East, the North and the South make progress towards genuine peaceful collaboration among nations, utilizing the great achievements of modern science and culture. Only thus can the high principles of the right of nations and peoples to self-determination enunciated in the United Nations Charter be translated into reality.

Moved by a fervent desire for the earliest establishment of mutual goodwill and agreement among States and peoples as well as between the indigenous population of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and those who have settled in such territories and wish to live there enjoying the same rights as those of the nationals of such countries, the States Members of the United Nations which have affixed their signatures to this Declaration appeal to all people, irrespective of language and race, religion and political views:

Let all the people of the globe hear us!

We all inhabit the same planet. On this planet we are born, we work, raise our children and pass on to them all we have achieved in life. And although there exist different States in the world, all men are born equal in dignity.

The very course of historic development now poses the question of complete and final elimination of the colonial regime in all its forms and manifestations, not some time in the distant future, but immediately and unconditionally!

Accordingly, the States Members of the United Nations solemnly proclaim the following demands:

1. All colonial countries and Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories must be granted forthwith complete independence and freedom to build their own national States in accordance with the freely-expressed will and desire of their peoples. The colonial system and colonial administration in all these forms must be completely abolished in order to afford the peoples of the territories concerned an opportunity to determine their own destiny and form of government.

2. Similarly, all strongholds of colonialism in the form of possessions and leased areas in the territory of other States must be eliminated.

3. The Governments of all countries are urged to observe strictly and steadfastly the provisions of the United Nations Charter and of this Declaration concerning the equality and respect for the sovereign rights and territorial integrity of all States without exception, allowing no manifestations of colonialism or any special rights or advantages for some States to the detriment of other States.

In keeping with the lofty principles of the Charter, the States Members of the United Nations cannot but regard the elimination of colonial rule as a most important stage in international life. This act in itself will provide a solid foundation for the development of friendly relations among all States and among all peoples and thereby for the realization of the great objective of securing a strong and lasting peace on earth.

It is the sacred duty of each State and each Government to promote an early and full implementation of this Declaration.

DECLARATION ON THE GRANTING OF INDEPENDENCE TO COLONIAL COUNTRIES AND PEOPLES

Afghanistan, Burma, Cambodia, Ceylon, Chad, Cyprus, Ethiopia, Ghana, Guinea, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Morocco, Nepal, Nigeria, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Togo, Tunisia and Turkey: draft resolution

The General Assembly,

Mindful of the determination proclaimed by the peoples of the world in the Charter of the United Nations "to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small" and "to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom",

Conscious of the need for the creation of conditions of stability and well-being and peaceful and friendly relations based on respect for the principles of equal rights and self-determination of all peoples, and of universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

Recognizing the passionate yearning for freedom in all dependent peoples and the decisive role of such peoples in the attainment of their independence,

Aware of the increasing conflicts resulting from the denial of, or impediments in the way of freedom of such peoples which constitute a serious threat to world peace,

Considering the important role of the United Nations in assisting the movement for independence in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories,

Recognizing that the peoples of the world ardently desire the end of colonialism in all its manifestations,

Convinced that the continued existence of colonialism prevents the development of international economic co-operation, impedes the social, cultural and economic development of dependent peoples and militates against the United Nations ideal of universal peace,

Affirming that peoples may, for their own ends, freely dispose of their natural wealth and resources without prejudice to any obligations arising out of international economic co-operation, based upon the principle of mutual benefit, and international law,

Believing that the process of liberation is irresistible and irreversible and that, in order to avoid serious crises, an end must be put to colonialism and all practices of segregation and discrimination associated therewith,

Welcoming the emergence of a large number of dependent territories into freedom and independence in recent years, and recognizing the increasingly powerful trends towards freedom in such territories which have not yet attained independence,

Convinced that all peoples have an inalienable right to complete freedom, the exercise of their sovereignty and the integrity of their national territory,

Solemnly proclaims the necessity of bringing to a speedy and unconditional end colonialism in all its forms and manifestations;

And to this end

Declares that:

1. The subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights, is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and is an impediment to the promotion of world peace and co-operation.

2. All peoples have the right of self-determination; by virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.

3. Inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence.

4. All armed action or repressive measures of all kinds directed against dependent peoples shall cease in order to enable them to exercise peacefully and freely their right to complete independence, and the integrity of their national territory shall be respected.

5. Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those Territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, without any distinction as to race, creed or colour, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom.

6. Any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country is incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

7. All States shall observe faithfully and strictly the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and this Declaration on the basis of equality, non-interference in the internal affairs of all States, and respect for the sovereign rights of all peoples and their territorial integrity.

case to determine whether or not an obligation exists to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter.

*948th plenary meeting,
15 December 1960.*

ANNEX

PRINCIPLES WHICH SHOULD GUIDE MEMBERS IN DETERMINING WHETHER OR NOT AN OBLIGATION EXISTS TO TRANSMIT THE INFORMATION CALLED FOR IN ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Principle I

The authors of the Charter of the United Nations had in mind that Chapter XI should be applicable to territories which were then known to be of the colonial type. An obligation exists to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter in respect of such territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government.

Principle II

Chapter XI of the Charter embodies the concept of Non-Self-Governing Territories in a dynamic state of evolution and progress towards a "full measure of self-government". As soon as a territory and its peoples attain a full measure of self-government, the obligation ceases. Until this comes about, the obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e continues.

Principle III

The obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter constitutes an international obligation and should be carried out with due regard to the fulfilment of international law.

Principle IV

Prima facie there is an obligation to transmit information in respect of a territory which is geographically separate and is distinct ethnically and/or culturally from the country administering it.

Principle V

Once it has been established that such a prima facie case of geographical and ethnical or cultural distinctness of a territory exists, other elements may then be brought into consideration. These additional elements may be, inter alia, of an administrative, political, juridical, economic or historical nature. If they affect the relationship between the metropolitan State and the territory concerned in a manner which arbitrarily places the latter in a position or status of subordination, they support the presumption that there is an obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter.

Principle VI

A Non-Self-Governing Territory can be said to have reached a full measure of self-government by:

- (a) Emergence as a sovereign independent State;
- (b) Free association with an independent State; or
- (c) Integration with an independent State.

Principle VII

(a) Free association should be the result of a free and voluntary choice by the peoples of the territory concerned expressed through informed and democratic processes. It should be one which respects the individuality and the cultural characteristics of the territory and its peoples, and retains for the peoples of the territory which is associated with an independent State the freedom to modify the status of that territory through the expression of their will by democratic means and through constitutional processes.

(b) The associated territory should have the right to determine its internal constitution without outside interference, in accordance with due constitutional processes and the freely

1541 (XV). Principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for under Article 73 e of the Charter

The General Assembly,

Considering the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations,

Bearing in mind the list of factors annexed to General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII) of 27 November 1953,

Having examined the report of the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter,¹² appointed under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) of 12 December 1959 to study the principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter and to report on the results of its study to the Assembly at its fifteenth session,

1. Expresses its appreciation of the work of the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter;

2. Approves the principles set out in section V, part B, of the report of the Committee, as amended and as they appear in the annex to the present resolution;

3. Decides that these principles should be applied in the light of the facts and the circumstances of each expressed wishes of the people. This does not preclude consultations as appropriate or necessary under the terms of the free association agreed upon.

Principle VIII

Integration with an independent State should be on the basis of complete equality between the peoples of the erstwhile Non-Self-Governing Territory and those of the independent country with which it is integrated. The peoples of both territories should have equal status and rights of citizenship and equal guarantees of fundamental rights and freedoms without any distinction or discrimination; both should have equal rights and opportunities for representation and effective participation at all levels in the executive, legislative and judicial organs of government.

Principle IX

Integration should have come about in the following circumstances:

(a) The integrating territory should have attained an advanced stage of self-government with free political institutions, so that its peoples would have the capacity to make a responsible choice through informed and democratic processes;

(b) The integration should be the result of the freely expressed wishes of the territory's peoples acting with full knowledge of the change in their status, their wishes having been expressed through informed and democratic processes, impartially conducted and based on universal adult suffrage. The United Nations could, when it deems it necessary, supervise these processes.

Principle X

The transmission of information in respect of Non-Self-Governing Territories under Article 73 e of the Charter is subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations may require. This means that the extent of the information may be limited in certain circumstances, but the limitation in Article 73 e cannot relieve a Member State of the obligations of Chapter XI. The "limitation" can relate only to the quantum of information of economic, social and educational nature to be transmitted.

Principle XI

The only constitutional considerations to which Article 73 e of the Charter refers are those arising from constitutional relations of the territory with the Administering Member. They refer to a situation in which the constitution of the territory gives it self-government in economic, social and educational matters through freely elected institutions. Nevertheless, the responsibility for transmitting information under Article 73 e continues, unless these constitutional relations preclude the Government or parliament of the Administering Member from receiving statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social and educational conditions in the territory.

Principle XII

Security considerations have not been invoked in the past. Only in very exceptional circumstances can information on economic, social and educational conditions have any security aspect. In other circumstances, therefore, there should be no necessity to limit the transmission of information on security grounds.

Third report of the General Committee . . .	1294

President: Mr. Frederick H. BOLAND (Ireland).

In connexion with these draft resolutions there is one point which is not immediately apparent from the report and which I believe deserves special mention. That is the fact that in the voting on each of these seven draft resolutions as a whole, not a single negative vote was cast in the Fourth Committee.

49. Another point to which I would like to draw special attention relates to paragraph 60 in document A/4650. Normally, consideration of an item is concluded by the Assembly once a report has been presented by a Committee and resolutions have been adopted. However, as members will see, the Fourth Committee decided that in view of the relation between this subject and the resolution which the Assembly adopted yesterday on colonialism [resolution 1514 (XV)], the items should be kept open so that, should the Fourth Committee so desire, it may consider them further at the resumed fifteenth session.

50. Finally, in connexion with document A/4650 I would like to make one small technical point. An error has crept into the text of this report, and I should now like to give the Assembly the corrected text. In paragraph 3, the sentence beginning with the words "The representative of Mexico ..." should read as follows: "The representative of Mexico restated the position of his Government regarding any change in the status of British Honduras (Belize)".

51. I now turn to the report contained in document A/4651. This report covers agenda item 38 and deals with the principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter. As a result of the deliberations on this subject in the Fourth Committee, two draft resolutions are submitted to the Assembly.

52. Draft resolution I deals with the principles which should apply in this context, and in an annex to this draft resolution twelve principles are listed. I might mention that these twelve principles, with one modification in principle IX (b), are exactly the same twelve principles as those which were proposed to the Fourth Committee by the Special Committee of Six established by this Assembly last year under resolution 1467 (XIV).

53. Draft resolution II deals with the concrete application of the principles.

54. With these brief remarks, I have the honour to submit, for the consideration and approval of the General Assembly, these two reports together with the draft resolutions attached thereto.

55. The PRESIDENT: I now call on the representative of Indonesia, who desires to explain his vote before the vote is taken.

56. Mr. PADMADISASTRA (Indonesia): Before a vote is taken on the draft resolutions contained in documents A/4650 and A/4651 on questions regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories falling under Article 73e of the Charter, permit me, under definite instructions of my Government, to express my Government's position with regard to that part of the territory of my country on which the Government of the Netherlands, on the false assumption of having sovereignty over the territory, has submitted information.

57. For the sake of our proceedings, I would not venture an all-out debate on this question in this

REPORT OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE (A/4650) AGENDA ITEM 38

Study of principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: report of the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV)

REPORT OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE (A/4651)

46. Mr. BOEG (Denmark), Rapporteur of the Fourth Committee: I appear before the General Assembly as Rapporteur of the Fourth Committee in full awareness of the heavy pressure of time under which the Assembly is now labouring. For that reason I shall be very brief and shall refrain from going into any detailed comments on the reports of the Committee. For the same reason, I shall, with the approval of the President, adopt the same procedure as was adopted by the Rapporteur of the Second Committee—in other words, I shall briefly comment upon the two Fourth Committee reports at the same time.

47. The first of the two reports presented to the Assembly today by the Fourth Committee [A/4650] relates to agenda items 37, 39, 40 and 41, pertaining to information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and various related questions. This is a procedural report outlining the deliberations which took place in the Fourth Committee on these items. The Committee has presented a joint report on these items because it decided to debate them jointly since the four items are so very much interrelated.

48. As a result of its deliberations, the Committee is submitting seven draft resolutions to the Assembly.

Assembly. Members may recall the exhaustive debates on this question at past sessions of the General Assembly and are well aware of the long-standing unresolved dispute which has caused so much bad blood between two Members of this Organization. What is more—and you may recall the statements in this Assembly of President Sukarno [880th meeting], of my Foreign Minister [888th meeting] and of Mr. Luns, the Foreign Minister of the Netherlands [886th meeting]—relations between the two nations have lately further deteriorated, due to the sending of reinforcements by the Netherlands to that territory.

58. Today, I would limit myself only to the following points relevant to our documents.

59. The first point concerns the question of submission of information on West Irian by the Netherlands Government, allegedly under the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter.

60. Article 73 e, as a sub-paragraph of Article 73 of the Charter, pertains to Non-Self-Governing Territories. West Irian is not a Non-Self-Governing Territory. It was a residency, that is, part of a province of the former colony of the Netherlands Indies. The Netherlands renamed the "Netherlands Indies" as "Indonesia" by an Act of 3 September 1948 amending the Constitution, so that West Irian therefore is nothing but a residency of Indonesia. The Netherlands Government recognized Indonesia as an independent State, after more than four years of warfare, on 28 December 1949, and on 28 September 1950 [289th meeting] the independent Republic of Indonesia was admitted unanimously as the sixtieth Member of our Organization.

61. West Irian, as a residency of Indonesia, is therefore only part of one of the provinces of another Member State of the United Nations and is by no means a Non-Self-Governing Territory. If the people of the territory continue to be barred at this time from enjoying the same rights and privileges as those living in the other provinces of Indonesia, it is only because of the Dutch military occupation of the territory.

62. I therefore wish here and now, on behalf of the Government and people of Indonesia, to submit a strong protest against the presence of Netherlands occupation forces in West Irian and the designation of that part of Indonesia as a Non-Self-Governing Territory.

63. My second point has to do with the assumption of Netherlands sovereignty over West Irian.

64. If I have shown that there are no legal or other arguments for the designation of West Irian as a Non-Self-Governing Territory, much less is there any basis for the assumption by the Netherlands Government of responsibilities in connexion with Article 73 of the Charter with regard to West Irian. As a Member State of the United Nations, the Netherlands Government, in the years 1947, 1948 and 1949, submitted to the Secretary-General, pursuant to Article 73 e of the Charter, information on the Non-Self-Governing Territory of the Netherlands Indies. As I said earlier, the Netherlands Government in 1948 replaced the designation of "Netherlands Indies" in all laws and regulations by the new name of "Indonesia". With the recognition of Indonesia as an independent Republic by the Government of the Netherlands on 28 December 1949, and its admission to the United Nations on 28 September 1950, the Netherlands ceased to have any obligation whatsoever in connexion with Article 73 e of the Charter with regard to the entire territory of Indonesia. The Netherlands Government knows this well. Consequently, it ceased the submission of information on Indonesia. There is no basis, therefore, for the Netherlands to start anew submitting reports on a part of her former colony that if recognized without any reservations as an independent Republic in 1949 and whose membership in the United Nations it sponsored and welcomed in September 1950.

65. Could it not be interpreted, then, that by submitting information on West Irian the Netherlands Government has conquered new territory in this part of the world? Further, with the submission of information on West Irian, is not the Netherlands Government actually suggesting that the United Nations accept this conquest?

66. My delegation wishes to state that the continued occupation by the Netherlands of a part of Indonesian territory is also in flagrant violation of earlier agreements, to the effect that the political status of West Irian should be determined by negotiations between the representatives of the Governments of Indonesia and the Netherlands.

67. The action of the Government of the Netherlands in continuing occupation of this territory beyond 27 December 1950 was a unilateral solution of a dispute and cannot but be regarded by Indonesia as an illegal action on the part of the Netherlands. My Government, as the Assembly may well be aware, has requested the General Assembly to seek a peaceful solution through negotiations, in accordance not only with the provisions of earlier agreements between the two parties but also in accordance with the principles and purposes of the United Nations Charter, to which both the Netherlands and Indonesia adhere as Members. As no such peaceful solution has been possible, because of the refusal of the Netherlands to negotiate, my Government at this stage cannot but protest, in the strongest possible terms, against this unilateral illegal action of the Netherlands in continuing the occupation of Indonesian territory.

68. My third point is the designation of West New Guinea as "Netherlands New Guinea". This new name was only established by the Netherlands in the amendments to the Constitution of 10 September 1956. It has come to the attention of the Government and people of Indonesia that even United Nations documents pertaining to the territory of West New Guinea bear the denomination of "Netherlands New Guinea". In view of the considerations mentioned earlier, such a designation is, of course, totally unacceptable and causes nothing but feelings of bitterness, discontent and unrest among all strata of our people in Indonesia as well as in sympathizing nations.

69. My delegation, of course, can only speak for Indonesia, and wishes to protest against this unilateral designation of the territory. We hope that at least United Nations documents will not use that title, which creates the impression of biased opinion on the issue.

70. The objective and neutral designation for the territory of West Irian since 1949—as the issue indeed was recorded for the first time in United Nations documents in that year—has been "the Residency of

New Guinea (Irian)*. This is the accepted title by both parties concerned and does not provoke any prejudice on the issue. Members of this Organization are aware of the still unsolved problem between the Governments of the Netherlands and Indonesia on the political status of this territory. In the absence of any solution, my delegation believes that changes in the accepted title are not desirable, much less since these changes have met with the strong opposition and protests from one of the interested parties. A unilateral change in 1956, in the midst of the dispute, without the consent of the other interested party, runs counter to the United Nations tradition of being objective in such political matters and does harm only to the prestige of our Organization.

71. Lastly, I would like to reiterate my Government's position with regard to an argument that has been advanced by the Government of the Netherlands in the matter of the submission of information on West Irian. The Netherlands raised the argument that if West Irian is administratively reunited with the rest of Indonesia the United Nations will no longer receive information on that territory under Article 73 e of the Charter. Aside from the fact that West Irian is not a Non-Self-Governing Territory but is part of an independent Member State of the United Nations, the absurdity of the argument of the Government of the Netherlands is obvious.

72. West Irian, when administratively reunited with free Indonesia, will be as open to the world and to all other media of information, including those of the United Nations, as are the other provinces or parts of Indonesia. This is not the situation on West Irian under the present legal military occupation of the Netherlands. It is because of the isolating policies of colonial Powers that the Charter provides for the transmission of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories. Such information is desirable only as a means of keeping some kind of check on the policies of certain colonial Powers. It certainly is not an end in itself, since otherwise no territory would ever be independent, on the ground that this would end the transmission of information to the United Nations under Article 73 e of the Charter. Not only the absurdity but indeed the perversion of the very principles and purposes of the Charter, implicit in such an argument, is typical of that conception, as was also pointed out yesterday [947th meeting] by the representative of Indonesia in regard to the question of the declaration on colonialism and, therefore, needs no further elaboration.

73. The fact that the Netherlands has raised this argument confirms the belief that it is their intention to hold on to West Irian indefinitely, keeping the people within their colonial grip. On the other hand, when fully restored to the Republic of Indonesia, the people of West Irian will be able to work in freedom, building up their country together with the people in the other provinces of Indonesia.

74. In voting for the draft resolutions in documents A/4650 and A/4651, my delegation wishes to reiterate that the territory of West Irian is not a Non-Self-Governing Territory but is part and parcel of Indonesia. Any of the resolutions contained in those documents, including the attached twelve principles in document A/4651, therefore, are not applicable to the territory of West Irian.

75. The PRESIDENT: I give the floor to the representative of the Netherlands in the exercise of the right of reply.

76. Mr. SCHURMANN (Netherlands): I am sure it must be becoming very boring for the members of the General Assembly to hear the Indonesian delegation air its views on Netherlands New Guinea on all suitable and unsuitable occasions. I must say that I personally consider this an unsuitable occasion, and I shall therefore not answer the remarks made by the representative of Indonesia.

77. Suffice it to say that my Government has submitted reports on Netherlands New Guinea for ten years now, that these reports have always been gratefully received by the Assembly and have been discussed in the Fourth Committee and in the plenary meetings; and my Government intends to go on doing this and to go on submitting these reports until the time when the population of Netherlands New Guinea will have itself decided about its future.

78. The PRESIDENT: May the Chair, for its part, remind the members of the General Assembly that, in considering the reports of Committees, interventions are limited to explanations of vote unless the procedure provided for in rule 68 of the rules of procedure is resorted to. In explanation of vote it is not in order to go into the substance or the merits of the reports made by the respective committees unless a due motion has been made under article 68. Explanations of vote should be limited to explanations of vote.

79. Since no other representative wishes to explain his vote before the voting takes place, I propose now to put to the General Assembly the seven draft resolutions recommended by the Fourth Committee in document A/4650.

Draft resolution I was adopted by 81 votes to none, with 11 abstentions.

Draft resolution II was adopted by 69 votes to none, with 20 abstentions.

80. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution III concerns racial discrimination in Non-Self-Governing Territories. A vote by roll call has been requested.

A vote was taken by roll call.

Indonesia, having been drawn by lot by the President, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Ivory Coast, Japan, Laos, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Mali, Mexico, Morocco, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Senegal, Somalia, Spain, Sudan, Sweden, Thailand, Togo, Tunisia, Turkey, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Republic, United States of America, Upper Volta, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Albania, Argentina, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cambodia, Canada, Central African Republic, Ceylon, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo (Leopoldville), Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Federation of Malaya, Finland, France, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India.

Against: None.

Abstaining: United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Australia.

Draft resolution III was adopted by 88 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

Draft resolution IV was adopted by 75 votes to none, with 11 abstentions.

Draft resolution V was adopted by 76 votes to none, with 11 abstentions.

Draft resolution VI was adopted by 79 votes to none, with 10 abstentions.

81. The PRESIDENT: Draft resolution VII, which concerns offers by Member States of study and training facilities for inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories, was adopted unanimously by the Fourth Committee. If there is no objection I would propose to record it as being approved also by the General Assembly.

Draft resolution VII was adopted.

82. The PRESIDENT: I now give the floor to the representative of the United Kingdom, who has expressed a desire to explain his vote after the voting.

83. Sir Andrew COHEN (United Kingdom): I should like to explain the vote of my delegation on the third of the resolutions which have just been adopted—draft resolution III about racial discrimination in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

84. It is a matter of great regret to my delegation that the Fourth Committee did not submit to the General Assembly a draft resolution on this subject to which we could have given our whole-hearted support. The United Kingdom Government entirely supports the spirit of this resolution, and most of the things in it are things which we would subscribe to without any qualification whatsoever. Nevertheless, my delegation found itself in the position of having to abstain on this resolution because of our great respect both for the spirit and the letter of resolutions adopted by the United Nations. We do not make a practice of voting for a resolution unless we are convinced that we can carry it out completely both in the spirit and the letter.

85. In two places this resolution calls for immediate action which, taken literally, would not, in our belief, necessarily produce the desired effect. In particular, operative paragraph 2 makes no provision for the continuance in force of legislation of a differentiating character which is still required in some Territories for the protection of the interests of the indigenous people. Operative paragraph 3 asks not only that there should be no discrimination between races in voting rights, but that there should be the immediate grant of universal franchise. This goes beyond the scope of removing racial discrimination.

86. In some of the Territories for which we are responsible we have been introducing a progressively widening qualitative franchise, a franchise which gives the vote very widely to the people of the Territories and which is on a non-racial and non-discriminatory basis. This we believe to be the right way of proceeding in these Territories and we could not, therefore, vote for the resolution.

87. Finally, I must repeat once more that we are absolutely opposed to racial discrimination and are dedicated to the task of removing it as quickly as possible by all means which are in our power. Even though we would have preferred to see this resolution passed in a form for which we ourselves could have voted, nevertheless we shall continue to do everything that we can in the Territories for which we are responsible to eradicate racial discrimination and thereby to achieve the principal objective of this resolution.

88. The PRESIDENT: The report of the Fourth Committee on agenda item 38 [A/4651] has already been presented to the Assembly by the Rapporteur. As no representative has asked to explain his vote before the two draft resolutions in this report are put to the vote, I propose now to put to the vote draft resolution I.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

Chile, having been drawn by lot by the President, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Chile, Colombia, Congo (Leopoldville), Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Denmark, Ecuador, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Federation of Malaya, Finland, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Haiti, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Ivory Coast, Japan, Laos, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Madagascar, Mali, Mexico, Morocco, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Senegal, Somalia, Sudan, Sweden, Thailand, Togo, Tunisia, Turkey, United Arab Republic, Upper Volta, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Austria, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Cambodia, Cameroun, Canada, Central African Republic, Ceylon, Chad.

Against: Portugal, Union of South Africa.

Abstaining: China, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, France, Hungary, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Poland, Romania, Spain, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Albania, Australia, Belgium, Bulgaria, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic.

Draft resolution I was adopted by 69 votes to 2, with 21 abstentions.

89. The PRESIDENT: The Chair has received some requests that separate votes be taken on parts of draft resolution II. It might be helpful to the Assembly if I asked those proposing these separate votes to come to the rostrum and explain the separate votes that they wish to have.

90. Mr. IMAM (Pakistan): I have asked for a separate vote on operative paragraph 1 of draft resolution II in document A/4651. This paragraph contains a list of territories to which this resolution would apply. We are not in a position to give our support with regard to all these territories. For this reason, we have asked that a separate vote be taken on the territories listed in items "(a) The Cape Verde Archipelago" to "(f) Mozambique" and a separate vote on the territories listed in the remaining items, from "(g) Goa and dependencies, called the State of India" to "(i) Timor and dependencies".

91. The PRESIDENT: The representative of Pakistan has asked for two separate votes, one on the list of territories from (a) to (f) inclusive and another on the list of territories from (g) to (i) inclusive, in operative paragraph 1 of draft resolution II [A/4651]. I propose now to put this draft resolution to the vote. I would ask the Assembly to vote first on the inclusion in the draft resolution of items (a) to (f), inclusive, in operative paragraph 1.

Items (a) to (f) were adopted by 57 votes to 4, with 22 abstentions.

92. The PRESIDENT: I now put to the Assembly the second separate vote which was asked for, which concerns the territories listed in items (g) to (i), inclusive, in operative paragraph 1.

Items (g) to (i) were adopted by 55 votes to 5, with 28 abstentions.

93. The PRESIDENT: I now put to the Assembly draft resolution II as a whole.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

Chile, having been drawn by lot by the President, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Congo (Brazzaville), Congo (Leopoldville), Cuba, Cyprus, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Ecuador, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Federation of Malaya, Finland, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Haiti, Honduras, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Ivory Coast, Laos, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Madagascar, Mali, Mexico, Morocco, Nepal, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Romania, Somalia, Sudan, Sweden, Thailand, Togo, Tunisia, Turkey, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Republic, Upper Volta, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Albania, Argentina, Bolivia, Bulgaria, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cambodia, Cameroun, Central African Republic, Ceylon, Chad.

Against: France, Portugal, Spain, Union of South Africa, Belgium, Brazil.

Abstaining: Chile, China, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Panama, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Australia, Austria, Canada.

Draft resolution II was adopted by 68 votes to 6, with 17 abstentions.

94. The PRESIDENT: Two or three members of the Assembly have expressed a desire to explain their votes after the voting. I call first on the representative of Spain.

95. Mr. DE LEQUERICA (Spain) (translated from Spanish): The Spanish delegation wishes to have it placed on record in the Assembly that it abstained on draft resolution I submitted by the Fourth Committee in document A/4651 because, though the principles set out therein contain valuable ideas, the draft seems to us to be confused, imprecise and open to erroneous interpretation.

96. We voted against draft resolution II contained in the same report because we did not think it fair that, without the elementary formality of publishing and circulating the text of the previous draft resolution that the Assembly has just approved (draft resolution I in document A/4651), conclusions prejudicial to a specific country should be drawn from that text.

97. Nevertheless, the Spanish delegation would point out that, had separate votes been taken, it would have reaffirmed the position which it took in the Fourth Committee and, consequently, it would have voted in favour of the fourth paragraph of the preamble and operative paragraph 4.

98. Mr. GARIN (Portugal): I wish to explain briefly the vote my delegation cast in regard to draft resolution II, contained in document A/4651, which the Assembly has just adopted.

99. In the view of my delegation, the resolution assumes in respect of Chapter XI of the Charter, and particularly in regard to Article 73 e, an interpretation which goes beyond the explicit terms of the Charter. It is our firm conviction that, as opposed to Chapters IX and X on the one hand and Chapter XII on the other, Chapter XI does not place and cannot be understood as placing upon Member States obligations which those States themselves are either not willing to undertake or not allowed to undertake in accordance with, and as a result of, their own constitutional law, which they, and they alone, are in a position to and have authority to interpret and apply.

100. The text of the resolution just approved is the outcome of a different interpretation which runs counter to the provisions of the Charter and, consequently, in our opinion is a clear violation of the basic law of our Organization.

101. On the other hand, the resolution ascribes to the General Assembly a competence which the Assembly does not possess. In fact, never in the past has the Assembly claimed to have competence to determine the legal and political status of any territory, nor has the Assembly ever claimed to have competence to impose on Member Governments the transmission of information on territories which, having no status subject to international jurisdiction or accountability, fall within the exclusive responsibility of Member States and for whose political status they alone are responsible. The General Assembly is not entitled to question replies from Governments of Member States in regard to the status of territories under their national sovereignty, and such replies, given in conformity with national and constitutional law, have to be accepted by the Assembly, which is not authorized by the Charter to impugn them. The resolution takes a different view, and by doing so is exceeding the competence of the Assembly, and this has not been the practice of the Assembly since the very beginning of this Organization.

102. If the Assembly now assumes a different attitude, and does so only in respect of a particular country, one is entitled to state that the Assembly has embarked upon a course of action which represents a clear discrimination against that country. This fact was clearly established during the debate on agenda item 38 in the Fourth Committee, when the report of the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter [A/4526] on the principles which should guide Members in determining their obligations under that Article and the draft resolution I am now commenting upon were discussed. In reality, although many delegations stated that the report should be widely and generally applied, the fact is that such a report, which is a guide for Member States and not the Assembly as such, was used solely for the purpose of questioning and attacking the replies of two Member Governments—in particular, the Portuguese reply—and it never occurred to delegations that were we to make a proper assessment of the principles of the report, then an opportunity should have been given to all Member Governments to study the report in its final text, something which the Fourth Committee simply refused to do.

103. We cannot escape the conclusion, therefore, that there was a purpose of discrimination against some countries, thereby violating the principle of the equality of Member States which is embodied in the Charter.

104. My delegation thinks it only right to point out that the views I am expressing are not held by my delegation alone. With regard to the correct interpretation of Article 73 and, in the context of its application, in respect of the voluntary obligations which may stem therefrom, and again on the question of the competence of the Assembly, many other delegations both in past sessions and at this session have expressed views similar to those which I have just outlined. I do not propose to take the time of the Assembly and I shall refrain from making any quotations, but I would draw the attention of members to the statements which were made at the 1049th meeting of the Fourth Committee in explanation of votes cast in respect of the resolution I am referring to by some delegations—among others, the delegations of the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Belgium—and all were to the effect that the resolution which has now been approved is not in conformity with a correct interpretation of Article 73 nor in accordance with the competence of the General Assembly, since it does not have competence in this case.

105. This opinion was also held by many other delegations as recently as the fourteenth session, but they have changed their attitude at this session for reasons of their own, reasons which, unfortunately, remain unknown to us.

106. Finally, it is the duty of my delegation to refer to another point. Whatever the interpretation any of us may hold as to the meaning of Article 73, and whatever the views anyone may have as to the competence of the Assembly in this matter, it has been made abundantly clear, both in the Fourth Committee and in this Assembly, that Article 73 does not apply to Portugal and that, therefore, no obligations may be placed on my Government in connexion with the implementation of that provision. Any attempt in an opposite direction means a flagrant violation of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter.

107. I do not wish to comment in detail on the actual text of the resolution. My delegation believes that the reasons which I have just set forth are sufficient to explain the stand of my delegation. Those were the reasons which compelled my delegation to cast a negative vote.

108. In view of the decision taken by the Assembly, however, it is my duty categorically to reserve the position of my Government, as my delegation did in the Fourth Committee [1048th meeting], in respect of this resolution.

109. Mr. ORMSBY-GORE (United Kingdom): I should like to explain the vote of my delegation on draft resolution II which has just been adopted. My delegation adheres to its view that it is not for the General Assembly to express an opinion whether or not an obligation exists to transmit information under Article 73 e in any particular case.

110. In resolution 1467 (XIV), the General Assembly expressed the opinion that it would be desirable for it to enumerate the principles which should guide Members—I repeat, Members—in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e. For this reason we were unable to vote for or against this particular resolution, since to do either might have been taken as an expression of opinion on the substance of the matter dealt with in the resolution. We therefore abstained.

111. I should, however, like to make two comments upon this resolution. The latter part of the third preambular paragraph states that the denial of the right of dependent peoples to self-determination constitutes a threat to international peace. This language seems to my delegation to be exaggerated. It is not clear to us in any case precisely what it means. The words "a threat ... to international peace" are words which in the United Nations should, in our view, be used with extreme care and only in circumstances where they have a more precise meaning. We question whether the use of these words was justified or necessary in this resolution, and we regret that these words were included.

112. My other comment is the following. This resolution singles out from all the Members of the United Nations the Government of Portugal. The Government of the United Kingdom has a long-standing friendship with Portugal, a friendship which is as strong today as it has ever been. Our treaty relations with Portugal date back to the fourteenth century, and in all those six hundred years our countries have enjoyed the closest ties and have remained amicably at peace with one another. A resolution singling out Portugal is therefore naturally distressing to us. This resolution, moreover, deals with a matter which in our view it is for the Government of Portugal rather than the General Assembly to determine. For that reason we were unable to support it.

Agenda item 38

STUDY OF PRINCIPLES WHICH SHOULD GUIDE MEMBERS IN DETERMINING WHETHER OR NOT AN OBLIGATION EXISTS TO TRANSMIT THE INFORMATION CALLED FOR IN ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER OF THE UNITED NATIONS: REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ESTABLISHED UNDER GENERAL ASSEMBLY
RESOLUTION 1467 (XIV)

Report of the Fourth Committee

Rapporteur: Mr. Poul BOEG (Denmark)

1. At its 881st plenary meeting on 1 October 1960, the General Assembly allocated to the Fourth Committee the following item on its agenda:

"38. Study of principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: report of the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV)."

2. The Committee considered this item from its 1031st to its 1049th meetings inclusive, from 1 to 14 November 1960.

3. The Committee had before it the report of the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter^{1/} established under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) of 12 December 1959, containing, as a result of its study, the general considerations and twelve principles which, in the unanimous opinion of the Committee of Six, should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for under Article 73 e of the Charter.

^{1/} A/4526.

4. Following the general debate on this item, the Committee, at the 1042nd meeting, took up a draft resolution (A/C.4/L.648) jointly sponsored by Iraq, Ireland, Nigeria and Venezuela. Subsequently, Bolivia joined as a co-sponsor (A/C.4/L.648/Add.1). Under the terms of this draft resolution, the General Assembly would, inter alia: (1) express its appreciation of the work of the Special Committee of Six; (2) approve the list of principles contained in the report of the Special Committee (and annexed to the text of the draft resolution); and (3) decide that these principles should be applied in the light of the facts and the circumstances of each case to determine whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for under Article 73 e.

5. The Committee discussed this draft resolution from its 1042nd to its 1045th meetings inclusive. At the 1043rd meeting, Togo and Tunisia submitted an amendment (A/C.4/L.650) which would replace the last sentence of sub-paragraph (b) of Principle IX, reading "it is recognized that in certain circumstances United Nations supervision of such processes may be desirable", by "Supervision of such processes by the United Nations is necessary". Many Members recalled that the Special Committee, which had been composed of an equal number of Administering and non-Administering Members, in the interest of unanimity, had accepted the text of the principles as a compromise, and appealed to the representatives of Togo and Tunisia to withdraw their amendment so that the principles could be adopted with the greatest possible majority. In response to these appeals, the representative of Tunisia, speaking also on behalf of Togo, at the 1044th meeting, orally revised the amendment to read: "The United Nations could, when it deems necessary, supervise these processes".

6. At the 1045th meeting, the representative of Guinea orally reintroduced the original amendment submitted by Togo and Tunisia but replaced the word "necessary" by the word "indispensable". Subsequently, at the same meeting, in response to appeals addressed to him by the sponsors of the original amendment, the representative of Guinea withdrew his amendment.

7. At the same meeting, the representative of Iran orally proposed an amendment to operative paragraph 2 to insert after the word "Approves" the words "the general considerations set out in part A and".

8. At the 1045th meeting, the Committee voted on the draft resolution (A/C.4/L.648) and the annex thereto, and the amendment (A/C.4/L.650) as orally revised. The representative of Haiti, who had expressed reservations concerning the principle of integration of a dependent Territory with an independent State as a satisfactory way of achieving independence in conformity with the objectives of the Charter, asked for Principles VI (c), VIII and IX to be put to the vote separately. The Committee decided to vote first separately on the various paragraphs in the annex. In the course of the vote, the representative of Iran withdrew his amendment. Following the adoption of the amendment to sub-paragraph (b) of Principle IX and the adoption of the annex as a whole, the representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland orally suggested a drafting change in operative paragraph 2 of the draft resolution to read "Approves the principles set out in part B of section V of the report of the Special Committee of Six, as amended, and as they appear in the annex to this resolution". The Committee agreed to this suggestion.

(1) The amendment submitted by Togo and Tunisia (A/C.4/L.650) as orally revised, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 38 to 24, with 26 abstentions. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Albania, Bulgaria, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cameroun, Central African Republic, Chad, Congo (Brazzaville), Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Hungary, Indonesia, Ivory Coast, Jordan, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Mali, Morocco, Niger, Pakistan, Panama, Philippines, Poland, Romania, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Somalia, Sudan, Thailand, Togo, Tunisia, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Arab Republic, Uruguay, Yugoslavia.

Against: Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, China, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Finland, France, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

Abstaining: Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Cambodia, Ceylon, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, El Salvador, Federation of Malaya, Ghana, Guatemala, Guinea, Haiti, India, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Nepal, Nigeria, Paraguay, Peru, Turkey, Venezuela.

(3) Principle VI, as a whole, was adopted by 67 votes to none, with 22 abstentions.

(4) Principle VIII was adopted by 69 votes to none, with 18 abstentions.

(5) Principle IX, sub-paragraph (a) was adopted by 68 votes to none, with 19 abstentions.

(6) Principle IX, sub-paragraph (b), as amended, was adopted by 57 votes to 5, with 24 abstentions.

(7) Principle IX, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 50 votes to 3, with 32 abstentions.

(8) The principles annexed to the draft resolution (A/C.4/L.648), as a whole as amended, were adopted by a roll-call vote of 66 to 3, with 19 abstentions. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Austria, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Cambodia, Cameroun, Canada, Central African Republic, Ceylon, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Congo (Brazzaville), Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Denmark, Ecuador, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Federation of Malaya, Finland, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Ivory Coast, Japan, Jordan, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Mali, Mexico, Morocco, Nepal, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Somalia, Sudan, Sweden, Thailand, Togo, Tunisia, Turkey, United Arab Republic, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Portugal, Spain, Union of South Africa.

Abstaining: Albania, Australia, Belgium, Bulgaria, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, China, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, France, Hungary, Italy, Netherlands, New Zealand, Poland, Romania, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

(9) The draft resolution and the annex thereto, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 62 to 3, with 19 abstentions. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Austria, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Cambodia, Cameroun, Canada, Central African Republic, Ceylon, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Cyprus, Denmark, Ecuador, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Federation of Malaya, Finland, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Ivory Coast, Japan, Jordan, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Mexico, Morocco, Nepal, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Somalia, Sudan, Sweden, Thailand, Togo, Tunisia, Turkey, United Arab Republic, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Portugal, Spain, Union of South Africa.

Abstaining: Albania, Australia, Belgium, Bulgaria, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, China, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, France, Hungary, Italy, Netherlands, New Zealand, Poland, Romania, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

9. The text as approved by the Committee appears in paragraph 19 of the present report as draft resolution I.

10. At the 1040th meeting, Afghanistan, Burma, Ceylon, Ghana, Guinea, India, Nepal and Nigeria jointly submitted a draft resolution (A/C.4/L.649) on the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter. Under the terms of this draft resolution, the General Assembly would, inter alia: (1) enumerate the territories under the administration of Spain and Portugal^{2/} which it considered to be Non-Self-Governing Territories in the light of the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter, General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII) of 27 November 1953 and the principles enumerated by the Special Committee of Six; (2) request the Governments of Portugal and Spain to transmit information in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter on these territories; and (3) urge the Governments of Portugal and Spain to ensure to the indigenous populations of these territories the enjoyment of full freedom for democratic political activities which would accelerate their attainment of independence.

^{2/} The Spanish Territories as enumerated were Ifni, West Sahara, Fernando Póo and Rio Muni. For the list of the Portuguese Territories, see paragraph 19 of the present report, draft resolution II.

11. The Committee considered this draft resolution from its 1046th to its 1049th meetings inclusive. At the 1046th meeting, the sponsors introduced a revised text of the draft resolution (A/C.4/L.649/Rev.1 and Rev.1/Corr.1) to take into account a statement made by the representative of Spain at the 1038th meeting on the transmission of information under Article 73 e.^{3/} The revised text also omitted the operative paragraph of the draft resolution referred to under (3) in paragraph 10 of the present report. Iraq, Liberia, Libya and Senegal joined as co-sponsors (A/C.4/L.649/Rev.1/Add.1).

12. At the same meeting, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic submitted amendments (A/C.4/L.651). These amendments were as follows: (1) In the fourth paragraph of the preamble to delete the words "with satisfaction", and add at the end of the paragraph "concerning the following Non-Self-Governing Territories: Ifni, West Sahara, Fernando Póo, Rio Muni, Canary Islands"; (2) to insert, as operative paragraph 2, the following:

"1. Urges the Governments of Spain and Portugal to grant to the indigenous populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration the enjoyment of full freedom for democratic political activities which would ensure their attainment of independence;"

(3) In operative paragraph 2, to insert after the words "concerning these Territories" the following: "until they are granted full independence"; (4) To delete operative paragraph 4.

13. At the 1048th meeting, the representative of Guinea orally proposed a drafting change in the list of territories enumerated as Non-Self-Governing Territories under the administration of Portugal, so that Cabinda, instead of being listed separately, would be listed with Angola as "Angola, including the enclave of Cabinda". This was accepted by the Committee.

14. The representative of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic did not insist on a vote on paragraph 2 of his amendment in view of the fact that the representative of Guinea stated during the discussion that a draft resolution would subsequently be submitted on the substance of this amendment.

^{3/} The statement of the representative of Spain was further clarified at the 1048th meeting (A/C.4/453), see paragraph 15 of the present report.

15. At the same meeting, the representative of Spain in further clarification of the position of his Government, stated that "The Government of Spain had decided to transmit to the Secretary-General the information pertaining to the territories referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter". In view of this statement, the representative of Bulgaria orally proposed an amendment to insert the words "at the 1048th meeting" in the fourth preambular paragraph, in which reference was made to the statement by Spain.

16. At the 1048th meeting, the Committee voted on the draft resolution (A/C.4/L.649/Rev.1 and Rev.1/Corr.1 and Rev.1/Add.1) and some of the amendments thereto submitted by the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic (A/C.4/L.651). In consequence of the adoption of the draft resolution on the principles,^{4/} the Committee accepted a drafting change in operative paragraph 1 as suggested by the Chairman to delete the words "enumerated by the Special Committee of Six and".

(1) The amendment to the fourth preambular paragraph to delete the words "with satisfaction" was rejected by 50 votes to 11, with 11 abstentions.

(2) The amendment orally proposed by the representative of Bulgaria to insert in the fourth preambular paragraph the words "at the 1048th meeting" was adopted by 57 votes to none, with 17 abstentions.

(3) The amendment to add at the end of the fourth paragraph of the preamble the words "concerning the following Non-Self-Governing Territories" was rejected by 42 votes to 15, with 16 abstentions. In consequence, the Committee did not vote on the remaining part of paragraph 1 of the Ukrainian amendment.

(4) The fourth preambular paragraph, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 54 to 8, with 13 abstentions. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Burma, Cambodia, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, Cyprus, Denmark, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Federation of Malaya, Finland, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Haiti, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Ireland, Israel, Japan, Lebanon, Liberia, Libya, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Somalia, Spain, Sweden, Thailand, Turkey, United Arab Republic, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Venezuela.

^{4/} See paragraph 19 of the present report, draft resolution I.

Against: Albania, Bulgaria, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Portugal, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Abstaining: Brazil, Chad, Dominican Republic, France, Hungary, Italy, Mali, Morocco, Romania, Togo, Tunisia, Union of South Africa, Yugoslavia.

(5) The third preambular paragraph was adopted by 64 votes to none, with 11 abstentions.

(6) In operative paragraph 1, the first part of the list of territories administered by Portugal, from "The Cape Verde Archipelago" to "Mozambique", as orally amended by Guinea, was adopted by 45 votes to 6, with 22 abstentions.

(7) The last part of the list of territories administered by Portugal, namely, "Goa and dependencies, called the 'State of India', Macao and dependencies, and Timor and dependencies", was adopted by 44 votes to 6, with 24 abstentions.

(8) Operative paragraph 1, as a whole, as revised and amended, was adopted by a roll-call vote of 50 to 6, with 19 abstentions. The voting was as follows:

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE

19. The Committee therefore recommends to the General Assembly the adoption of the following draft resolutions.

DRAFT RESOLUTION I

Principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for under Article 73 e of the Charter

The General Assembly,

Considering the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations,

Bearing in mind the list of factors annexed to General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII) of 27 November 1953,

Having examined the report of the Special Committee of Six on the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter^{5/} appointed under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) of 12 December 1959 to study the principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter, and to report on the results of its study to the General Assembly at its fifteenth session,

1. Expresses its appreciation of the work of the Special Committee of Six on the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter;
2. Approves the principles set out in part B of Section V of the report of the Special Committee of Six as amended and as they appear in the Annex to the present resolution;
3. Decides that the principles as annexed to this resolution should be applied in the light of the facts and the circumstances of each case to determine whether or not an obligation exists to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter.

ANNEX

LIST OF PRINCIPLES

Principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations

Principle I

The authors of the Charter of the United Nations had in mind that Chapter XI should be applicable to territories which were then known to be of the colonial type. An obligation exists to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter in respect of such territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government.

Principle II

Chapter XI embodies the concept of Non-Self-Governing Territories in a dynamic state of evolution and progress towards a "full measure of self-government". As soon as a territory and its peoples attain a full measure of self-government, the obligation ceases. Until this comes about, the obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e continues.

Principle III

The obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter constitutes an international obligation and should be carried out with due regard to the fulfilment of international law.

Principle IV

Prima facie there is an obligation to transmit information in respect of a territory which is geographically separate and is distinct ethnically and/or culturally from the country administering it.

Principle V

Once it has been established that such a prima facie case of geographical and ethnical or cultural distinctness of a territory exists, other elements may then be brought into consideration. These additional elements may be, inter alia, of an administrative, political, juridical, economic or historical nature. If they affect the relationship between the metropolitan State and the territory concerned in a manner which arbitrarily places the latter in a position or status of subordination, they support the presumption that there is an obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter.

Principle VI

A Non-Self-Governing Territory can be said to have reached a full measure of self-government by:

- (a) Emergence as a sovereign independent State;
- (b) Free association with an independent State; or
- (c) Integration with an independent State.

Principle VII

(a) Free association should be the result of a free and voluntary choice by the peoples of the territory concerned expressed by information and democratic processes. It should be one which respects the individuality and the cultural characteristics of the territory and its peoples, and retains for the peoples of the territory, which is associated with an independent State, the freedom to modify the status of that territory through the expression of their will by democratic means and through constitutional processes.

(b) The associated territory should have the right to determine its internal constitution without outside interference, in accordance with due constitutional processes and the freely expressed wishes of the people. This does not preclude consultations as appropriate or necessary under the terms of the free association agreed upon.

Principle VIII

Integration with an independent State should be on the basis of complete equality between the peoples of the erstwhile Non-Self-Governing Territory and those of the independent country with which it is integrated. The peoples of both territories should have equal status and rights of citizenship and equal guarantees of fundamental rights and freedoms without any distinction or discrimination; both should have equal rights and opportunities for representation and effective participation at all levels in the executive, legislative and judicial organs of government.

Principle IX

Integration should have come about in the following circumstances:

(a) The integrating territory should have attained an advanced stage of self-government with free political institutions, so that its peoples should have the capacity to make a responsible choice through informed and democratic processes;

(b) The integration should be the result of the freely expressed wishes of the territory's peoples with full knowledge of the change in their status and through informed and democratic processes, impartially conducted and based on universal adult suffrage. The United Nations could, when it deems necessary, supervise these processes.

Principle X

The transmission of information in respect of Non-Self-Governing Territories under Article 73 e is subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations may require. This means that the extent of the information may be limited in certain circumstances, but the limitation in Article 73 e cannot relieve a Member State of obligations of Chapter XI. The "limitation" can relate only to the quantum of information of economic, social and educational nature to be transmitted.

Principle XI

The only constitutional considerations to which Article 73 e refers are those arising from constitutional relations of the territory with the Administering Member. They refer to a situation in which the constitution of the Territory gives it self-government in economic, social and educational matters through freely elected institutions. Nevertheless, the responsibility for transmitting information under Article 73 e continues, unless these constitutional relations preclude the Government or parliament of the Administering Member from receiving statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social and educational conditions in the territory.

Principle XII

Security considerations have not been invoked in the past. Only in very exceptional circumstances can information on economic, social and educational conditions have any security aspect. In other circumstances, therefore, there should be no necessity to limit the transmission of information on security grounds.

DRAFT RESOLUTION II

Transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter

The General Assembly,

Recalling that, by resolution 742 (VIII) of 27 November 1953, the General Assembly approved a list of factors to be used as a guide in determining whether a Territory is or is no longer within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations,

Recalling also that differences of views arose among Member States concerning the status of certain territories under the administrations of Portugal and Spain, described by them as "overseas provinces" of the metropolitan State concerned, and that with a view to resolving those differences the General Assembly, by resolution 1467 (XIV) of 12 December 1959, appointed the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter to study the principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e,

Recognizing that the desire for independence is the rightful aspiration of peoples under colonial subjugation and that the denial of their right to self-determination constitutes a threat to the well-being of humanity and a threat to international peace,

Recalling with satisfaction the statement of the representative of Spain at the 1048th meeting of the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly,^{6/} that his Government agrees to transmit information to the Secretary-General in accordance with the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter,

Mindful of its responsibilities under Article 14 of the Charter,

Being aware that the Government of Portugal has not transmitted information on the territories under its administration which are enumerated in operative paragraph 1 below, and has not expressed any intention of doing so, and because such information as is otherwise available in regard to the conditions in these territories gives cause for concern,

1. Considers that, in the light of the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter, General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII) and the principles approved by the General Assembly in resolution _____, the territories under the administration of Portugal listed hereunder are Non-Self-Governing Territories within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter:

- (a) The Cap Verde Archipelago;
- (b) Guinea, called Portuguese Guinea;
- (c) Sao Tome and Principe and their dependencies;
- (d) Sao Joao Baptista de Ajuda;
- (e) Angola, including the enclave of Cabinda;
- (f) Mozambique;
- (g) Goa and dependencies, called the "State of India";
- (h) Macao and dependencies;
- (i) Timor and dependencies;

2. Declares that an obligation exists on the part of the Government of Portugal to transmit information under Chapter XI of the Charter concerning these territories and that it should be discharged without further delay;

3. Requests the Government of Portugal to transmit to the Secretary-General information in accordance with the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter on the conditions prevailing in the territories under its administration enumerated in operative paragraph 1 above;

^{6/} A/C.4/453.

4. Requests the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps in pursuance of the declaration of the Government of Spain that it is ready to act in accordance with the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter;

5. Invites the Governments of Portugal and Spain to participate in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories in accordance with the terms of operative paragraph 2 of General Assembly resolution 1332 (XIII) of 12 December 1958.

AGENDA ITEM 38

Study of principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: report of the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) (A/4526)

GENERAL DEBATE

1. Mr. JHA (India), introducing the report of the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter (A/4526), expressed the hope that the report would assist the Fourth Committee in the formulation and enumeration of the principles which should serve as a universal guide to Members in the discharge of their obligations under Chapter XI of the Charter. The conclusions in the report were related as closely as possible to the terms of reference of the Special Committee. The heart of the report was section V, part B, which enumerated twelve principles on the basis of which the General Assembly could appraise the circumstances in which information in respect of a Non-Self-Governing Territory should be transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

2. All the members of the Committee, which was composed of an equal number of administering and non-administering Powers, had made sincere efforts to reach agreement and had shown mutual understanding and a readiness to compromise where that was possible without sacrificing essential principles. They had endeavoured to reach unanimous conclusions, in the belief that any conclusions on which there was a division of opinion would not be of much assistance to the Assembly.

3. No better example of the harmony that had prevailed in the Committee could be found than that reflected in the formulation of the principles, for while both the administering and the non-administering members had been tempted to insist on their respective points of view on particular aspects of the principles, they had realized that that would have made agreement impossible and would have produced two sets of conflicting principles. They had therefore made every effort to reach unanimity. Where reservations had been made, they were recorded in paragraphs 13, 14 and 15 of the report. Any points which had arisen during the Committee's deliberations but were not explicitly covered in the report could be found in the summary records of the Committee (A/AC.100/SR.1-14).

4. The Special Committee had decided to confine itself to the enumeration of universal principles without reference to any particular Non-Self-Governing Territories, although individual Territories had occasionally been cited to illustrate certain points. The entire discussion had been held in the context of the present-day situation and of the problems of the Non-Self-Governing Territories as they had been studied in recent years in the Fourth Committee and the General Assembly. Not only had the Committee's work been carried out against the background of the no longer controversial ideal of a world in which no people could dominate another, but it had also taken account of such practical aspects as the different sizes, geographical situations and so forth of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the development and experiences of the last few years and the various studies that had already been made on the subject.

5. The Committee had taken fully into account the views of Member States submitted in response to General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) which were set out in document A/AC.100/1 and Add.1 and were submitted to the Fourth Committee together with the report. It had also taken into account the factors for determining whether or not a Non-Self-Governing Territory had attained a full measure of self-government, as laid down in General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII). It had been considerably assisted by the documentation prepared by the Secretariat, especially the reports in documents A/AC.100/2 and Add.1 and 2.

6. In presenting its report, the Committee felt that it had formulated principles on the basis of which the General Assembly would be able to determine in each specific case whether or not an obligation to transmit information existed under Article 73 e of the Charter. If, as the Committee hoped, the Fourth Committee and the General Assembly could unanimously adopt a set of principles, it would be possible to apply them effectively to individual cases. The adoption of the twelve principles proposed would remove any uncertainty with regard to the existence of an obligation to transmit information or the circumstances in which such an obligation existed and would provide a legal and constitutional basis for any action which the General Assembly might take in the matter.

7. Mr. ALWAN (Iraq) proposed that the full text of the Indian representative's statement should be distributed as a document.

It was so decided.^{1/}

8. Mr. CUEVAS CANCINO (Mexico) said that the interpretation of Chapter XI of the Charter, which had imposed certain obligations on the Powers administering Territories other than their own, had given rise to much heated controversy in the General Assembly. Many attempts had been made to clarify the meaning and scope of that Chapter; and even greater efforts had been made by the Fourth Committee to determine when such obligations began and ended. A firm direction had been given to those efforts by General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV), under which the Special Committee had been established.

9. His delegation had participated with enthusiasm in the work of the Committee, for the Mexican Government had always considered that the United Nations must concern itself with the future of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In view of the fact that the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals had said nothing on that point, that the Mexican Government had felt that the work begun by the League of Nations should be continued and that the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were asking for self-determination, Mexico had firmly maintained that the international community should supervise the development of those peoples which were still not free to conduct their own affairs and had affirmed that the international community itself should decide which Territories should be placed under its protection.

10. It would be a mistake to approach the item under discussion as if it were a question of adopting something entirely new. What the Committee was trying to do was to give substance to the doubts and hesitations which had accompanied the colonial movement. Western civilization had always presented two aspects: the aggressive spirit which had given rise to expansionist colonialism, under which so many nations had suffered; and the constructive spirit, which had always tried to oppose that movement, with its false emphasis on material aims. Thus at the present day, rising in opposition to the obsolescent colonial system, were those who defended the primacy of world interests over the private interests of any one Power.

11. From the very outset there had been great European intellectuals who had opposed the colonial system and had thought that there should be restrictions on the exercise of force against weak foreign nations. The same spirit had led Europe to reject slavery. Just as colonialism and its abuses had come from Europe, so had Europe also provided the antidote to colonialism: the idea of an international community, human rights, the primacy of general interests over the private interests of any one State.

12. The United Nations was therefore simply following a trend which had been in existence for centuries. The United Nations had been based upon ideas which Europe itself had conceived to eliminate the grave defects implicit in its expansionist surge. It was thus continuing a task which had begun with colonialism itself and its success would be the happy culmination of a process which crystallized the highest spiritual aspirations of mankind.

13. It had been the task of the Special Committee to study colonial problems as they had existed since the founding of the United Nations. That idea had found expression in the first of the principles it had adopted.

14. The ideas that had prevailed at the San Francisco Conference had changed in the course of fifteen years of colonial evolution. It had been said that the Special Committee should not interpret the Charter; yet he wondered whether that was not exactly what the Assembly or any other organ of the United Nations did with every action it took. The United Nations would be acting wrongly if, for fear of exceeding its powers, it were to abandon one of the primary goals sought by the Charter: the elimination of the colonial system throughout the world.

15. International development was observable in all fields, but in none more than in that of colonialism. What had been scarcely aspirations in 1945 were now accomplished facts. The reason was that other equally productive ideas had come to fulfilment, such as the concept of the sacred trust. That idea could be interpreted as the desire of the administering Powers to form the Non-Self-Governing Territories in their own image. Such an interpretation was not, however, acceptable in the present era, which admitted the co-existence of various civilizations from whose development along parallel lines a universal civilization would emerge. The sacred trust could not be interpreted as an imposition of Western values; on the contrary, it embodied the implicit undertaking to safeguard the culture of the non-self-governing peoples. His delegation considered it essential that the culture of each of those peoples should be preserved, as a necessary basis for their future development, without which they would have great difficulty in establishing themselves in a developing world. Of equal importance were their basic principles of justice and political organization. The General Assembly would do well to bear in mind the need for each of those peoples to reach self-determination according to its own standards.

16. Many colonial ideas were destructive, not the least being the imposition of alien juridical rules. Law was a social product and its indiscriminate application to national groups of different mental and political backgrounds could be extremely harmful. The problems of the non-self-governing peoples were very different from those of the administering Powers. The United Nations should assure them that they would attain independence according to their own legal concepts.

17. The Special Committee of Six had repeatedly stressed cultural distinctness. Under the Charter, all civilizations were of equal value and none was supreme; in consequence, the new nations found that the world was prepared to welcome their contribution to law and politics.

18. For centuries, statesmen in metropolitan countries, and notably in Spain, had inveighed against colonialism as a system of government. The reasons advanced by them were echoed in the Charter, the aim of which was to put an end to so outmoded and harmful a system. In so doing, it was guided by two main precepts: the first was to ensure that the just demands of the colonized peoples did not give rise to heavy loss of life, and the second to help those peoples to achieve independence in a way that would ensure their happiness. Unlike the Latin American countries in the days of their struggle for independence, the new nations could count on a favourable atmosphere.

^{1/} See A/C.4/450.

19. There was a close relationship between the reasoning which had led to General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII) and the principles which were now before the Committee. When it had approved those principles, the General Assembly would have established rules for dealing with two aspects of the same problem, namely, in what circumstances information regarding the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be transmitted to the United Nations, and in what circumstances the Administering Member was justified in ceasing to supply that information: in other words, the point at which a territory came under international supervision, and the point at which such supervision was no longer required. As the debates of the Committee had shown, the former question was of very great importance and principle IV made it clear that a prima facie obligation existed when a territory was geographically separate and ethnically and culturally distinct from the country administering it. With regard to principle V, he would lay particular emphasis on the reference to a territory being arbitrarily placed in a position or status of subordination.

20. Principles VI, VII, VIII and IX dealt with cases in which it could definitely be stated that there was no longer any reason for supervision. The basic idea was the same as that in General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII); where the principles differed was with regard to the actual historical moment when the transformation was complete.

21. His delegation considered the conclusions reached by the Special Committee of Six to be eminently constructive. It was only natural to assume that those who had drafted the Charter had considered the possibility of introducing changes in the quantity and scope of the information provided but they had certainly not contemplated its being reduced to nothing. What the Charter had sought to achieve was that the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be assisted in every possible way to achieve independence; anything that prevented that objective from being attained was contrary to the spirit of the Charter. As paragraph 17 of the report pointed out, the Charter was the culmination of progressive evolution in international thinking; the fulfilment of its behests was an important factor in the preservation of international peace and security.

22. The all-important question was whether the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter imposed an obligation on the Administering Members. His Government had never doubted that it did. It based its conviction on many reasons—the identity of views regarding the nature of the colonial problem which had informed both the Covenant of the League of Nations and the United Nations Charter; the fact that at San Francisco as much attention had been paid to the Non-Self-Governing Territories as to the Trust Territories; the fact that it was by a mere chance that the heading "Declaration" had been adopted for Chapter XI; the implication in the wording of that Chapter that an obligation existed; and the opinion of Professor Hans Kelsen, who had considered that the provisions of the Preamble and even more those of that Chapter entailed an obligation. If no clear statement regarding that question was to be found in document A/4526, it was because the positions of the delegations concerned had been established beforehand; nevertheless, marked progress had been made, thanks to the spirit of understanding shown by the members of the Special Committee of Six.

23. Principle III, which recognized that the obligations inherent in the possession of colonies were of an international nature, was of fundamental importance. Thus, the administration of colonies was no longer an instrument of policy of any Member State and the right of peoples to self-determination was no longer governed solely by the policies of the administering Power. The aim of international law was to ensure that justice would prevail among the nations and that each nation would receive its due, no matter what pressure was brought to bear. Principle III accordingly laid down that the fulfilment of the provisions of Article 73 e was an international obligation. If the international obligation to transmit information was accepted, then supervision by the General Assembly must be accepted also; were it not so, international rules could not be carried out.

24. His delegation considered that there was also a moral obligation and in that connexion he wished to emphasize the very importance which his delegation attached to Article 74 of the Charter. The principle of good neighbourliness, adopted by the American States as a legal tenet, had found expression both in the Preamble to the Charter and in Article 74; it was a modern adaptation of the old idea of the brotherhood of man. It meant that international relations were not to be conducted on the basis of selfish national interests. Every nation desiring to behave as a good neighbour was bound to take into consideration the well-being of the community and to ensure that its own interests were co-ordinated with those of the world in which it lived. The social meaning of private property had come to receive wide acceptance, and the same should be true of the universal meaning of State sovereignty. The implications of Article 74 were perfectly clear: no country was free to govern its colonies without taking into consideration the views of the international community. It was clear, therefore, that good neighbourliness was far more than a mere question of geographical proximity; it was founded on moral obligations which transcended geography. Moreover, it meant that the administering Powers must not only guide their colonies towards independence, but also take into account developments in the regions where those Territories were situated. All those aspects of the matter were well summarized in paragraph 19 of document A/4526 and his delegation was convinced that the introduction of that principle would have valuable results.

25. Although the principles drawn up by the Special Committee would probably fail to win the approval of those holding extremist views, they set out with sufficient clarity the conditions in which the obligations imposed under Article 73 e of the Charter were applicable. His delegation found them completely satisfactory and recommended them to the Fourth Committee.

26. Mr. DJERDJA (Yugoslavia) paid a tribute to the Special Committee of Six for the work it had done and the efforts it had made. His delegation was in agreement with virtually all its conclusions and observations. In particular it agreed with the opinion expressed in paragraph 18 of the Committee's report that "the Charter is a living document and the obligations under Chapter XI must be viewed in the light of the changing spirit of the times". The fact that that idea had been elaborated by a Committee in whose work representatives of administering Powers had taken part endowed it in his opinion with a practical significance and a special value.

27. The obligation to transmit information under Article 73 of the Charter, and all the other obligations embodied in Chapter XI, were legal obligations equally with any others arising out of the Charter. They could not therefore be abrogated by unilateral action or arbitrary interpretation by any Member State. The obligation to transmit information applied to all Territories whose peoples had not yet attained a full measure of self-government and remained in force from the time the administering Power concerned was admitted to the United Nations until the attainment of full self-government by the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Nothing less than full and complete self-government could free the Administering Members from that obligation. A limited measure of self-government in certain functional fields mentioned in Article 73 could not serve as a basis for the cessation of the transmission of information under that Article.

28. The General Assembly was competent to decide whether a territory had attained a full measure of self-government, or in other words whether it came within the purview of Chapter XI of the Charter. The competence of the General Assembly in that matter was clear from the relevant provisions of the Charter and had been confirmed by the General Assembly in numerous resolutions.

29. Nevertheless, the question of the establishment and determination of certain principles had no longer the same practical significance it had had in the past and had become to some extent academic. The situation had changed greatly since the time when the Charter had been adopted, and even since the fourteenth session of the General Assembly, when the Special Committee of Six had been established. The question of the liquidation of obsolete colonial relationships and of the granting of freedom and independence to all dependent peoples had become a question of the highest international significance, as was shown by the fact that at the present session attention was focused on colonial problems. The United Nations could not permit its decisions and actions to be overtaken by developments in the colonial and other fields; its decisions must keep abreast with the times and give concrete form to contemporary trends and aspirations. The enslaved peoples of Angola, Mozambique, so-called Portuguese Guinea and other territories, who were deprived of basic national rights and dignity, were confidently awaiting much more than a mere confirmation of principles from the decisions of the General Assembly.

30. His delegation, like many others, had never doubted that the territories under Portuguese and Spanish administration had always been and would remain colonies in the full sense of the word so long as they did not achieve complete independence. Those territories therefore came within the purview of Chapter XI of the Charter. The fact that Portugal had replaced the term "colonies" by "overseas provinces" did not alter their colonial status.

31. During the general debate on the question of Non-Self-Governing Territories his delegation had given some particulars concerning the situation in the Territories under Spanish and Portuguese control, as had other delegations, especially those from Africa. It would be useless for the administering Powers to attempt to refute the facts.

32. His delegation felt that the Fourth Committee should be concerned less with the determination of principles than with appropriate action leading to the early attainment of full independence by all Non-Self-Governing Territories and to the rapid elimination of colonial relationships in general.

33. The question of the Spanish and Portuguese colonies was a component part of the colonial problem and any decisions the General Assembly might take on that problem at the present session must apply to all dependent territories equally. He had in mind particularly the draft resolution relating to the participation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies approved by the Committee at its 1022nd meeting. On the basis of that resolution his delegation expected qualified representatives of the indigenous populations of the Portuguese and Spanish possessions to participate in the work of United Nations organs until they had achieved full liberation.

34. His delegation was ready to support every action designed to ensure the early and full emancipation of all Non-Self-Governing Territories.

35. Mr. SIDI BABA (Morocco) said that he had little to add to what had been said by the representatives of India and Mexico. As was only natural in view of the parity composition of the Special Committee of Six, the report represented a compromise and had to a certain extent been drafted in less categorical terms than the delegations of the non-administering Members might have desired. The Special Committee of Six had left it to the Fourth Committee to enumerate the territories in respect of which the obligation to transmit information should be applied and to specify the colonialist Powers concerned. In the opinion of the delegation of Morocco all dependent territories without exception should be included. All the colonialist Powers should abide by the principles laid down in the report and should take account of recent developments. The General Assembly had decided to examine in plenary session the draft declaration on the grant of independence to colonial countries and peoples (A/4502 and Corr.1). Thus a great evolution had taken place since the report of the Special Committee had been drafted.

36. He proposed that the statement just made by the representative of Mexico should be circulated as a Committee document.

37. Sir Andrew COHEN (United Kingdom) said that he would not make a long statement at the present stage but would like to make one or two general remarks.

38. The United Kingdom delegation had agreed to take part in the work of the Special Committee of Six because it had thought that Committee had a useful task to perform. None of those who had participated in the work of the Fourth Committee in past years could have failed to notice that, despite the close and friendly relations which existed between members, there had been a difference of view on the subject matter covered by the report of the Special Committee. Such differences were inevitable, since they arose from divergencies of national approach, but he felt that the degree of difference in the Committee was greater than it need have been. His delegation had always been convinced that, if a close study could be made of the principles which should guide Member States in the matter and if delegations could achieve greater understanding of each other's views, the differences could be greatly narrowed. Before the Special Committee had begun its work he had thought that the chances of arriving at an agreed report were problematical. The Fourth Committee could congratulate itself on the fact that that Committee had been able, through the good faith, sympathy, mutual understanding, patience and hard work of its members, to produce an agreed report.

39. The United Kingdom delegation had felt impelled to enter certain reservations with regard to some parts of the report; but in other parts of the report, the language had not been entirely satisfactory to it and his delegation had not made reservations. As the representative of Morocco had observed, it had been difficult at times to reach complete agreement and both sides had had to make every effort to do so. The fact that agreement had been reached showed that where important matters which affected the interests and future of millions of people were concerned it was possible for the members of the Special Committee of Six or of any other United Nations body to arrive by negotiation and compromise at something which could be widely if not unanimously accepted. That was encouraging and he hoped that in other important matters affecting the subject under discussion it would be possible to proceed in the same way. The United Kingdom delegation was glad that the Special Committee had been able to agree on principles which, in the words of General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV), "should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter". In his delegation's view those principles should be commended by the General Assembly to

Member States. They would have all the authority of a text agreed upon by such a widely representative Committee.

40. He supported the suggestion made by the representative of Morocco that the statement of the representative of Mexico should be circulated as an official document.

41. The CHAIRMAN said that if there were no objections the text of the statement made by the representative of Mexico would be circulated as a Committee document.

It was so decided.^{2/}

42. Miss BROOKS (Liberia) said that for the time being she would make no statement on the item before the Committee. She wished, however, to pay a tribute to Mr. Espinosa y Prieto, of Mexico, on whose initiative the draft resolution calling for the establishment of the Special Committee of Six had been submitted to the Fourth Committee at the fourteenth session. She thanked him, on behalf of the African States represented in the Committee, for his valiant defence of the interests of the dependent peoples.

43. Mr. CUEVAS CANCINO (Mexico) said that he would convey the remarks made by the representative of Liberia to Mr. Espinosa y Prieto.

The meeting rose at 12.20 p.m.

AGENDA ITEM 38

Study of principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: report of the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) (A/4526) (continued)

1. Mr. DINGEMANS (Netherlands) said that it had been a source of satisfaction to his delegation as a member of the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter, that that Committee had been able to arrive at an agreed report (A/4526) and he wished to pay a tribute to the spirit of harmony and good will that had prevailed. The final result naturally showed signs of compromise; nevertheless, it was a shining example of what could be achieved when Member States were united in good faith and perseverance. The language, especially that of the principles set out in section V, part B, of the report, was logical and clear, and his delegation had no doubt that the principles would be a useful guide to the Fourth Committee in determining whether an obligation existed to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter.

2. His delegation commended the report and hoped that it would receive unanimous approval.

3. Mr. BRAIMAH (Ghana) congratulated the Special Committee of Six, and in particular its Chairman, on the admirable work it had done. His delegation was glad to note that there had been a wide area of agreement on the approach to the problem and the basic principles involved, which had enabled the Committee to reach unanimous conclusions.

4. In the opinion of the delegation of Ghana, the primary task of the Special Committee had been to determine whether the non-European possessions of Spain and Portugal were to be regarded as provinces of those countries or as Non-Self-Governing Territories and thus whether those two European countries should be regarded as Administering Members with obligations to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter.

5. He drew attention to principle IV, and recalled that by a law of 11 June 1951 the status of the Portuguese overseas possessions, which were geographically separate from Portugal and whose populations were ethnically and culturally distinct from the Portuguese, had been changed from that of colonies to that of "overseas provinces". That change in status had not come about as a result of a free and voluntary choice by the people of the territories concerned expressed through informed and democratic processes; the law had not given those peoples the right to determine their internal constitution or taken into account their wishes and their aspirations.

6. The delegation of Ghana had always been of the opinion that Portugal, like other Western European colonial Powers, was engaged in a pure and old-fashioned colonialist and imperialist venture in Africa and Asia. The results of Portuguese colonialist expansion in those areas were no different from those of the actions of any other colonial Power in so far as they had meant domination over alien peoples. His delegation could not, therefore, agree that Portugal by a unilateral act should be allowed to escape the obligations of international accountability which were clearly set forth in Article 73 e of the Charter. The basic question was how the Portuguese themselves viewed their empire. Responsible Portuguese spokesmen fully agreed that Portugal was engaged in an old-fashioned and outmoded imperialist enterprise in their so-called overseas provinces. In the introduction (p. 11) to an official publication of the Portuguese Ministry of Overseas Provinces entitled Inquiry on Anti-Colonialism, published in 1957, the former Portuguese Minister for Overseas Provinces had written:

"It is an accepted fact that a great part of Western Europe has its history, its economy, its people and its very life bound up with Africa. Any acts likely to effect a separation would have direct repercussions on the economic independence of Europe and even in certain cases on the actual political independence of some countries.

"The European nations, so-called, once deprived of their African complement, would ineluctably be heading for ruin. Europe would thus lose her value in the Western alliance.

"Their sovereign rights [i.e., the rights of the Western European Powers] cannot be contested, nor yet may one doubt the benefits accruing to the peoples living therein, independently of their ethnic origins, from a rule and administration based on the organic structure of the old metropolitan countries with experience, means and strength of character to undertake a mission of progress and civilization which is continuing with assurance and enthusiasm. To try to break this rhythm in favour of granting independence to unqualified population groups, who have no title to preferential rights and, what is worse, would have put forward no claims of this kind had they not been suggested and encouraged from outside—to this, is to render a disservice to Africa and to all her inhabitants. It seems obvious that these peoples would have everything to gain from the continuation of their upward march, with the assistance and guidance, both protective and paternal, of the old metropolitan countries."

7. The philosophy expressed there was one of naked colonialism and imperialism and made a mockery of the Portuguese claim that Angola and Mozambique were provinces of Portugal in exactly the same way as Minho and Beira.

8. Another writer in the same volume dealt at length with the same outmoded and dangerous doctrines. He called for an organization of colonial Powers to safeguard their interests in Africa "despite the deviations, the weaknesses, the imprudence, the errors, — and, let the truth be stated courageously, the cowardice of some" (op. cit., p. 253), presumably referring to some of Portugal's allies which had been forced to liberate some of their colonial possessions. According to the writer, the organization in question should be built up by agreement among the States of Europe that possessed territories in Africa and the old independent or newly formed States of that continent (op. cit., p. 261). Both writers realized that what Portugal held in Africa was held by force and that the days of its imperialist rule in that rapidly changing continent were numbered. It was the assumptions and the words of these writers rather than any legalistic formulas advanced by the Portuguese Government that should be weighed carefully by the Fourth Committee in deciding whether Portugal should transmit information on its possessions in conformity with Article 73 e of the Charter.

9. In her book entitled Salazar in Portugal,^{1/} a French writer, Christine Garnier, described how the Prime Minister, when asked what system Portugal had adopted for the government of its overseas territories, had called its policy one of integration and had added that the reversion to the old name of "overseas provinces" did not imply any change of attitude on the part of Portugal as it did in other countries where colonies had become "States overseas". Thus the Prime Minister of Portugal himself admitted that the change in nomenclature meant no change in Portugal's traditional attitude towards its colonies and that the old system of domination and exploitation continued as before. It was that continuation of the old attitude which explained the inconsistencies which arose in practice when the conception of integration came to be applied in the overseas territories. The law regulating the status of the inhabitants of those territories differentiated between the Portuguese citizen and the Portuguese "Native". On that subject Lord Hailey had written that the Portuguese "Citizens" included of course those "civilizados" who had achieved the full status of citizenship; the Portuguese "Natives" comprised all the inhabitants of the territory who had not reached that status. The Portuguese conceived of Portuguese "Natives" as being in the position of minors who might become full citizens of Portugal when they reached the cultural maturity which entitled them to that standing.^{2/}

10. Needless to say the delegation of Ghana categorically rejected the racist approach which had led Portugal to adopt such an inhuman system of classifying human beings. Once more to quote Lord Hailey, for the purposes of the civil law the affairs of Portuguese "Natives" were regulated by custom and customary law and for administrative purposes they fell under the control of the Native Authorities, subject to the overriding authority of the administrative officers of the Government. In the matter of labour they came under a special régime, the Labour Code. In regard to land, their rights and tenures were regulated by the customary law and not by the "common law". The "Native" as such had no direct representation in the legislative organs of government; until he arrived at the full status of citizen he was compelled to carry an identification book and to show it on demand and he could not move from one locality to another without an authorization, which was duly entered in his identification book.^{3/}

11. It was clear from the above that there was no legal equality between the Portuguese and the people who inhabited their overseas possessions. The classification contravened principle VIII of the Special Committee of Six. It was the contention of the delegation of Ghana that the sharp distinctions which existed made a mockery of the Portuguese concept of integration, which purported to confer equal rights of citizenship on Europeans and Africans. Not only were the indigenous people denied a share in the political life of the territories but there was a real difference in juridical and administrative status between the two categories of inhabitants. The basis for the classification disregarded the rights and the self-respect of those peoples and was designed to destroy their cultural identity.

12. It was clear from what he had said that the participation of the indigenous inhabitants of the Portuguese possessions in the conduct of their affairs was severely limited, if not non-existent. There was no evidence to show that large sections of the population were actively associated with the formulation and implementation of policies affecting their economic, social, educational and political advancement. On the contrary, as Lord Hailey had noted, in all those possessions there was a high degree of centralization in government and administration, which had the effect of placing those possessions in a status of subordination to Portugal since the result was the integration of the economies of the territories in the economic system of Portugal. Hence Portugal could not escape the obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e.

13. Much of what he had said with regard to the Portuguese territories applied with equal force to the territories of Spain in Africa. Lord Hailey had not found much difference between the practices of colonial administration by those two countries.

14. The great movement for freedom and independence which was now sweeping Africa could not be stopped by legal and juridical formulas. Africans and Asians could not be transformed into Portuguese or Spaniards by a mere decree of the Portuguese or Spanish Government. Those two Governments should come to terms with the realities of the twentieth century and take fully into account the aspirations of the peoples for freedom and independence. It was a source of great concern to the delegation of Ghana that Portugal seemed determined actively to resist the great liberation movement in Africa. The so-called overseas provinces could not indefinitely be isolated from the wind of change which was sweeping Africa. Recent events in Nyasaland and the Congo had influenced those who were fighting for freedom in Mozambique and Angola, and recent events in French Africa had had repercussions in so-called Portuguese Guinea. The flight to Ghana of increasing numbers of political refugees from Angola indicated that the nationalist movement in that Territory was being intensified. The continued suppression by the Portuguese authorities of such nationalist movements would only lead to explosions such as had already occurred elsewhere and perhaps even to conflicts which might directly endanger international peace and security. The independent countries of Africa were determined to ensure that formal and legalistic constitutional devices were not invoked as justification for undermining freedom and independence to the Africans inhabiting the so-called Portuguese provinces in Africa. At the Second Conference of Independent African States, held recently at Addis Ababa, those States had resolved to continue to exert concerted action to achieve through all possible means the complete eradication of colonial rule from Africa.

15. His delegation welcomed the report of the Committee of Six; it was now for the Fourth Committee to implement its principles. As a first urgent step the Committee should call upon Portugal and Spain to transmit immediately information in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter, to free imprisoned nationalist leaders, to refrain from suppressing the national liberation movements in territories under their control and to set a definite date for the emancipation and independence of those territories.

16. Mr. KENNEDY (Ireland), after expressing his appreciation of the work accomplished by the Special Committee of Six, said that his delegation was in general agreement with the clear-cut basic principles which that Committee had evolved. Its report could hardly have come at a more appropriate time, dealing as it did with a crucial Chapter of the Charter concerned with the aims and hopes of millions of people spread over immense geographical areas. The old colonial system was crumbling all over the world and, in his delegation's view, the great importance of the Special Committee's work lay in the fact that it had been responsive to the mighty tide of freedom and social equality and that it had shown the Charter to be a living, evolving instrument, the spirit of which had to be adapted to the rapidly changing contemporary world.

17. His delegation had been encouraged to note that the Special Committee's general approach in formulating the twelve principles had been very similar to the views expressed by the Irish Government in its memorandum (A/AC.100/1/Add.1, paras. 3-7). That was true in particular of principle IV, the essence of the whole question, which his delegation welcomed and which constituted a sensible, realistic approach to the problem.

18. His delegation trusted that the twelve principles would be embodied in a resolution which would serve as a guide to all the Administering Members in assessing their responsibilities under Article 73 e and that every Member State would take the principles fully into consideration in assessing its obligations to the United Nations. Therein lay the only real hope of orderly and rapid progress towards the goals of the Charter in co-operation with the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and the other organs of the United Nations. At the current session the Fourth Committee, which meant so much to the smaller countries, was facing a deeply significant issue, to which the task entrusted to the Special Committee of Six was directly related. The issue was whether the progress of recent years was to continue in the immediate years to come in conditions of peace and security within the framework of the United Nations, or whether the organs of the United Nations and the very provisions of the Charter were to be abandoned and an end put to the great endeavours of the Fourth Committee. The Special Committee had shown the way towards orderly progress in the future and his delegation hoped that all Members would sustain and implement the principles it had drawn up.

19. Mr. ZULOAGA (Venezuela) said that, before it produced any draft resolutions to put into effect the twelve principles upon which the Special Committee of Six had unanimously agreed, the Fourth Committee would do well to consider one striking aspect of its recent unanimous approval of three draft resolutions of major importance. While unanimity was a worthy goal, it should not be allowed to obscure any subtle intention to undermine the resolutions and make them ineffectual and impossible to put into effect. On closer examination, it would be seen that the colonial Powers had been skilfully employing the tactics of abstention: either a simple abstention, which passed unnoticed, or abstention with an explanation of vote in which reservations were made that were sometimes more categorical than an outright negative vote would have been. One Power was employing the rather franker method of absenting itself. One of the Powers which systematically abstained in the vote did not even recognize the existence of the Committee on Information while two others managed, by employing certain terms and indulging in some juridical sleight-of-hand, to exclude themselves from the category of Administering Members. While every delegation represented in the Committee had the right to vote in any way it pleased, other delegations were entitled to analyse the votes and to draw their own conclusions about whether or not the resolutions would be duly implemented. The Fourth Committee should therefore endeavour to frame its draft resolutions in precise terms and should not be tempted to aim at a meaningless unanimity.

20. His delegation felt that the remedy for such parliamentary manoeuvres lay in amending the terms of reference of the Committee on Information to take account of the three very important draft resolutions which the Committee had unanimously approved.

21. With regard to the report of the Special Committee of Six (A/4526), his delegation considered that the statement in paragraph 18 that the Charter was a living document and that the obligation under Chapter XI must be viewed in the light of the changing spirit of the times was so important that it should appear in the preamble of every resolution the Committee approved during the current session. In that connexion, it was only fair to point out that some delegations which the previous year had opposed with determination and skill all the draft resolutions proposing the establishment of a committee to examine the principles to guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation existed to transmit information had whole-heartedly co-operated in the work of the Special Committee. There was therefore reason for optimism in regard to "the changing spirit of the times".

22. With regard to principle III, he pointed out that, by signing the Charter and thereby contracting certain international obligations, each Member State had surrendered a portion of its sovereignty and had acquired certain rights and the advantage of the protection of the international Organization, which was especially important to the smaller nations.

23. He would comment at a later stage on the United Kingdom reservation to principle IX, as set out in paragraph 13 of the Special Committee's report. That country's reservation to principle X, recorded in paragraph 15 of the report, was an example of the type of reservation to which he had referred and robbed its approval of the principle of all value.

24. He congratulated the six delegations on their excellent work which, he was confident, would enable the Fourth Committee to put an end to a situation in which the refusal of certain States to transmit information had discredited the United Nations in the eyes of the world, and in particular of the newly independent States and those which were still dependent upon metropolitan States.

25. Mr. LOIZOU (Cyprus) recalled that his country, which had recently won its independence by great sacrifices, honoured and supported all those in every part of the world who were still striving for liberation. It considered that the work of the Fourth Committee, though limited in scope by juridical considerations, was of the utmost importance for the speedy and peaceful accession to independence of all peoples who were still denied their inalienable right to self-determination.

26. His delegation noted with satisfaction the twelve principles specifying and governing the obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter, an obligation which could be terminated only when a territory had attained a full measure of self-government. No pretext advanced by any Administering Member could justify its refusal to comply with that legal obligation. Principles VI, VII, VIII and IX provided a clear definition of the term "full measure of self-government" and constituted a complete refutation of the arguments of those Powers who tried to give those words an arbitrary interpretation and who consistently disregarded the importance of the freely expressed will of the dependent peoples in determining their political and constitutional future. His delegation saw in that definition an expression of the principle of self-determination, for the words "free and voluntary choice ... expressed by informed and democratic processes" could have no other meaning.

27. With the foregoing considerations in mind, his delegation welcomed the report and agreed with its main conclusions and observations. He hoped that the report would be accepted by all Member States, particularly those who had hitherto interpreted the Charter in such a way as to serve their own interests and their aim of prolonging their domination over other peoples.

28. His country considered that anything short of the immediate and complete liberation of all peoples was only a form of temporary relief in a case calling for drastic and urgent action. It was unthinkable that in the present age any people should be deprived of freedom. He earnestly hoped that with the realization of the aspirations of all dependent peoples, the work of the Fourth Committee would very soon be brought to an end.

The meeting rose at 11.55 a.m.

AGENDA ITEM 38

Study of principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: report of the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) (A/4526) (continued)

1. Mr. MORSE (United States of America) recalled that his delegation had voted in favour of General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV). It had also participated in the work of the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter, established under that resolution, and in the drafting of that Committee's report (A/4526).

2. The United States Government had already applied the principles established by the Special Committee of Six in the Territories under its administration. It had regularly transmitted detailed information; in the case of Puerto Rico, Alaska and Hawaii, it had only ceased to do so when the people of those countries had themselves determined their new status.

3. He hoped that the report of the Special Committee of Six would win the approval of the General Assembly, not only because of the logical, reasonable and practical nature of the principles enunciated but also because they had had the unanimous support of the members of the Committee, which could be considered as representative of the General Assembly as a whole. His delegation supported the report of the Special Committee.

4. He would speak again later, when draft resolutions relating to the report were being considered.

5. U TIN MAUNG (Burma) recalled that the General Assembly had been studying the question of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter for many years. The attitude of Portugal, which stubbornly refused to transmit information on the territories under its administration, had been a source of considerable concern to the United Nations for many years. The other Administering Members transmitted more or less complete information on their Non-Self-Governing Territories; Portugal did not fulfil the obligation devolving upon it under Article 73 e, under the false pretext that its African possessions were an integral part of Portuguese territory. In the opinion of his delegation, those territories were indeed colonies; they had rightly been called the "Zone of Silence". In refusing to transmit information, Portugal was trying to evade the obligation placed upon it by Article 73 of the Charter to promote to the utmost the well-being of the indigenous inhabitants.

6. Before passing to the examination of the principles set out by the Special Committee of Six, he stressed that the mere solemn proclamation of those principles would not be enough to help the colonized peoples to attain independence or self-government. Much more radical measures were required and his delegation would endorse any draft resolution which was designed to oblige the colonialist Powers to modify their attitude with regard to the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

7. Some Administering Members advanced a number of arguments to explain their refusal to transmit information. They maintained, for example, that a territory could come under the general provisions of Chapter XI without, however, the obligation to transmit information being applicable to it. The General Assembly had never accepted that point of view. His delegation, for its part, was firmly convinced that the provisions of sub-paragraph e could not be isolated from the rest of Article 73 or from the political declaration that Chapter XI constituted. If that fallacious argument were accepted, the transmission of the information referred to in sub-paragraph e would be the ultimate objective, whereas it was only one of the means of achieving the aims set forth in the Charter.

8. The Administering Members also claimed that it was difficult for them to transmit information on territories whose constitutional development, according to them, was highly advanced. Those territories, they said, managed their own internal and external affairs and it was their Governments which should be asked to supply the information referred to in Article 73 e. That argument, however, was inadmissible for two reasons. First, those so-called self-governing or responsible Governments did not represent sovereign States and they had no seat in the United Nations General Assembly or in any other bodies of the international community. Secondly, Article 73 was a contract agreed on between the Administering Members and the rest of the United Nations. It was therefore the responsibility of the Administering Members to transmit information, and not that of the so-called autonomous Governments of territories which the United Nations had not yet recognized as having attained a full measure of self-government.

9. It was essential that the Administering Members should transmit information, so that the General Assembly not only could ascertain whether they were fulfilling their obligations to the people of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, but could also judge how close those Territories had come to self-government or complete independence. Only by studying the information transmitted by the Administering Members could the General Assembly ascertain whether they were complying with the obligations imposed upon them by Article 73 a, b, c and d. It was therefore regrettable that, despite the encouragement given by the General Assembly, very few of the Administering Members had agreed voluntarily to transmit political information on the Territories under their administration. Similarly, it was deplorable that some Administering Members agreed to transmit information out of respect for the General Assembly but resented the discreet supervision exercised by the United Nations under the Charter.

10. The obligations of Member States under Chapter XI were not limited to Article 73. Under Article 74, the Member States agreed to respect the principle of good neighbourliness, not only in respect of their metropolitan areas but also in regard to the territories for which they assumed responsibility. At a time when the forces of national liberation were spreading on the African continent and throughout the world, the Administering Members could no longer remain silent and stand apart in an attitude of negation, lest they endanger international peace and security.

11. He went on to consider the principles set forth by the Special Committee in section V, part B, of its report. He thought it highly regrettable that although the Committee had adopted its conclusions unanimously some members had expressed reservations with regard to a number of the principles. Those reservations were tantamount to saying both yes and no. The reservation that the representative of the United Kingdom had made in regard to principle IX (A/4526, para. 13) was particularly serious. Integration was such an important step that the people of a territory should have the capacity to make their choice in full knowledge of the facts; they could only do so if they could freely express their wishes through democratic processes, by means of impartial elections based on universal adult suffrage. To deny the inhabitants of the territories the right to decide their future by universal adult suffrage was an insult to their intelligence. Still referring to principle IX, his delegation agreed with the majority of the Special Committee that United Nations supervision might be desirable in some cases, but was not indispensable.

12. With regard to principle I, he wished only to point out that the General Assembly was competent to decide whether or not information should be transmitted on a given territory. It was likewise competent to decide if a territory had attained a full measure of self-government, as mentioned in principle II.

13. Under principle IV, Portugal could no longer consider itself exempt from the obligation to transmit information in respect of the territories under its administration, since those territories were geographically separate and ethnically and culturally distinct from the metropolitan country.

14. In conclusion, he stated that the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were demanding independence more and more vehemently. Africa had recently proclaimed its desire to free itself from the last vestiges of colonialism. Faithful to the noble principles of the Charter, the United Nations was in duty bound to reject the manoeuvres of the colonialists and to promote the liberation of all Non-Self-Governing Territories.

15. Miss SAFFOURI (Jordan) whole-heartedly endorsed the principles set forth in the report of the Special Committee of Six.

16. Her delegation agreed with that Committee that the Charter was a living document and that all the Administering Members must fulfil their obligations under Chapter XI. Moreover, those obligations were not limited to Article 73; the Administering Members were obliged to take into account the provisions of Article 74 also.

17. Without political independence there could be no economic, social or cultural independence. So long as a territory had not attained political independence, the obligations assumed by the administering Power remained valid. The Jordan delegation considered that the contention that no obligation existed for Portugal and Spain to transmit information under Article 73 e was not valid in regard to territories such as Mozambique and Angola, since the integration or association was in fact not free and since the status of the territories, in law and in practice, was not identical with that of the metropolitan countries. Hence the colonial policy of Portugal in that regard was in full contradiction with principles IV, VII and VIII.

18. It was the imperative duty of the United Nations to urge the Governments of Portugal and other Member States to transmit information on the territories under their administration; it should be pointed out, in that connexion, that the General Assembly alone was competent to decide whether a territory was or was not self-governing. The main task of the United Nations in that field was to contribute by every possible means to the speediest attainment of independence of the Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories and thereby implement the Principles and Purposes set forth in the United Nations Charter with regard to those territories.

19. Lastly, she wished to point out that her delegation considered the principles laid down in the Special Committee's report to be a means and not an end. It approved of them only to the extent that they could accelerate the progress of territories towards independence. Jordan's acceptance of those principles should not be taken to mean that it was prepared to agree to any delay in the attainment of independence by the Non-Self-Governing Territories. On the contrary, the independence of those Territories was the objective of the Fourth Committee.

20. Mr. NOGUEIRA (Portugal) reserved the right to reply later to the representatives who had spoken.

21. Mr. NEKLESSA (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) declared that the question now under discussion was not merely a theoretical, academic controversy. It had arisen because two colonial Powers, Spain and Portugal, refused to fulfil the obligations laid upon them by Chapter XI of the Charter. Those two Powers justified their position by claiming that Chapter XI laid no obligations on Member States, since it confined itself to expressing wishes, and that, above all, there were no Spanish or Portuguese colonies. The Ukrainian delegation, like the majority of the members of the Committee, could not accept either that interpretation of the Charter or that fiction. It had repeatedly affirmed that all Member States which administered colonial territories must be guided by the Purposes and Principles proclaimed in the Charter. The Charter laid international obligations on those States, including the obligation to further the well-being of the indigenous peoples, to develop self-government, and to transmit to the United Nations information on conditions in the colonies.

22. As was clear from principles I, II, III and X, the report of the Special Committee of Six confirmed the international character of the obligations deriving from Chapter XI; it also showed, in principles I and IV, how to distinguish those territories to which the provisions of Chapter XI applied. As the Moroccan representative had observed, the Committee had not mentioned any territory by name; it was evident that, since Administering Members made up half of its membership, it had not wished to offend Spain and Portugal. The fact was that the territories administered by Spain and Portugal were colonies and the Fourth Committee had wasted four years in proving that fact.

23. Taking advantage of the slow pace at which the United Nations was moving in the matter, the Spanish Government, which had originally decided to provide information on its colonies, had later changed its attitude and had declared, through its legislative bodies, that those colonies were now "overseas provinces". A change of name was in reality of little significance if colonial methods and the colonial régime did not disappear.

24. Portugal's dependencies, which were of the same area as Europe and had 11 million inhabitants, were among the oldest colonies in the world. The Portuguese colonizers had of course constantly proclaimed that they were fulfilling a "civilizing mission"; in the days of the ancestors of the present Portuguese colonialists that mission had been called the slave trade. In the course of two centuries 30,000 African slaves had been shipped to America each year from Angola alone. In 1939, Prime Minister Salazar himself had stated that the object of the Portuguese policy, which he called a bold one, was to defend the "inferior races" more effectively. In an issue of Foreign Affairs published in 1956, Prime Minister Salazar had expressed the view that most of Africa should remain under the domination of civilized peoples for an indefinite period.

25. What had been the fruits of that "civilizing mission" in the Portuguese colonies? No one could now be ignorant of the wretched system prevailing in Angola and Mozambique: the absence of political rights; restrictions on freedom of movement; a lack of doctors—one to every 80,000 inhabitants in Angola and 149 out of 6 million inhabitants in Mozambique; almost universal illiteracy, amounting to 99 per cent in Angola; forced labour—Portugal had long refused to sign the ILO Convention concerning the Abolition of Forced Labour; inhuman employment contracts involving the breaking up of families; corporal punishment and the like. Only 30,000 Angolans had been able to satisfy the conditions demanded by the "assimilation" law passed in 1917. At that rate, it would take more than 70,000 years for all the inhabitants of the territory to be assimilated. With its so-called policy of assimilation Portugal was concealing its policy of oppression of 11 million Africans. Moreover, assimilation signified in practice the application of the racist theory of the superiority of the white man and his civilization and the destruction of the African culture, for in order to be assimilated and to acquire the rights of citizenship Africans had to renounce their own culture, read and write Portuguese and adopt the Portuguese way of life. The equality which should theoretically have existed since 1951 between the metropolitan country and its so-called overseas provinces was simply a delusion: the governors and the governors-general had very wide discretionary powers and paid no heed, in practice, to the opinions of the legislative councils, which were composed of equal numbers of elected members and nominated members and included only a few so-called assimilated inhabitants. The Portuguese Government itself acknowledged that its rule in the overseas provinces was a "benevolent dictatorship".

26. In response to the intensification of oppression by the Portuguese colonialists and the foreign monopolies with which they were allied, the peoples of Angola and Mozambique had recently begun to demand more and more insistently the immediate granting of independence to their respective countries; to hold back that movement the Portuguese Government had instituted a reign of terror, arresting and torturing the leaders of the national movements and sending them to concentration camps; it was sending out reinforcements and was starting to construct aerodromes. The Portuguese colonial Press was publishing articles about the "enormous firepower available in the colonies for the purpose of destroying the agents of international communism". The countries of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization gave their support to Spain and Portugal for very obvious reasons: according to The New York Times of 25 October, a former Portuguese Minister for Foreign Affairs had asked the United States to continue to support Portugal in the United Nations, with the very apposite reminder that his country had given the United States military bases in the Azores. At the present time, Portuguese military circles were trying to have United States legislation with regard to military aid amended so that it would be possible to use American arms in Africa. According to a dispatch published in the United States Press at the time of the visit made to Portugal by the President of the United States, the President had stated that the United States and Portugal were working together without any differences of opinion.

27. The CHAIRMAN, intervening on a point of order raised by Mr. NOGUEIRA (Portugal), requested the representative of the Ukrainian SSR to keep to the point under discussion.

28. Mr. NEKLESSA (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic), continuing his statement, said that Portuguese capital, which had been predominant until recently, was tending to give way to American, British and Belgian capital, invested in the leading branches of agriculture and the mining industries; for example, the American oil company in Mozambique had obtained a huge concession and prospecting licences from the Portuguese Government.

29. The Governor-General of Angola had stated that there could be no question of giving self-government or independence to the territory and that the Portuguese authorities would take care that the present situation was maintained. The indigenous people were well aware, however, that that situation could not go on. There was no doubt that if, on their side, the Spanish and Portuguese Governments, in the face of the events taking place on the African continent, accepted the fact that the complete abolition of colonies was inevitable and took measures accordingly, they would avoid very unpleasant consequences. If they did not, the people of the colonies would themselves throw off the colonial yoke, throw off the shackles of slavery, just as their brothers in the neighbouring colonies had done. The liquidation of colonialism was to be discussed by the General Assembly in plenary session: it was essential that the United Nations should decide upon immediate independence for all colonies, including those of Portugal and Spain. The problem was not merely a theoretical one and it should not be a matter solely for oratorical contests on legal points: it required a practical and immediate conclusion, which could only be the immediate independence of the colonies of Portugal and Spain together with the other colonies, as proposed in the draft declaration submitted by the delegation of the Soviet Union (A/4502 and Corr.1) for consideration by the General Assembly at its fifteenth session.

30. Mr. DIALLO (Mali) expressed his delegation's congratulations to the members of the Special Committee of Six, who had managed to set out in a clear, concise and thorough report the guiding principles which would enable Member States to determine whether or not an obligation existed to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter. Spain and Portugal, which refused to transmit information on the territories which they administered, must finally realize that their chauvinistic machiavellianism was a weapon of despair which could no longer protect them. The United Nations had merely requested information in order that it might know what progress was being made in the Non-Self-Governing Territories; by refusing to give that information, Spain and Portugal made it clear that they were not easy in their conscience. Their refusal further increased and intensified the responsibility of the United Nations towards the oppressed peoples which were struggling for freedom and which placed their trust and their hopes in the Purposes and Principles proclaimed in the Charter.

31. The Portuguese Government claimed that Portugal had no colonies. Yet in 1957, 750,000 inhabitants of Angola had been subjected to forced labour; in 1959, three patriots of Angola had been executed merely because they had asked that basic human rights should be respected. The very term "colonies" had appeared in the Portuguese Constitution until 11 June 1951, when it had been replaced by the term "overseas provinces". At the previous meeting the Ghanaian representative had described the political and social conditions of Africans in the Portuguese colonies. The black population was classified into "non-civilized" and "civilized" persons, the latter being those closest to the Portuguese masters. No indigenous person could be elected; if he had voting rights, they could be used only to elect a Portuguese citizen; the authorities mercilessly imprisoned, tortured, exiled or killed those indigenous inhabitants who had succeeded in acquiring a certain degree of education. The United Nations therefore had a heavy moral and humanitarian obligation towards the liberation movements which had sprung up in the last two years in the Portuguese territories and which were suffering the onslaught of the Portuguese troops; it should be realized, however, that the combined armies of the whole world could never keep a people in slavery.

32. The Mali delegation fully subscribed to the principles and conclusions in the report of the Special Committee of Six; it hoped that the draft resolution that the Fourth Committee would approve would condemn those Powers which refused to supply information on human beings to whose plight the rest of the world could not remain indifferent. Portugal was well aware of that risk, for according to a press dispatch the Administration of Angola had for some time been subjecting political prisoners to strong pressure to compel them to protest against any resolution adopted by the General Assembly. Portugal declared that it would never leave Africa, claiming that its departure would open the door to the exploitation of blacks by blacks. For his own part, he was convinced that Portugal would indeed leave Africa, for it was impossible for one human being, whether black or white, to go on indefinitely exploiting another human being.

33. Mr. KIANG (China) said that the obligation to transmit information presented two problems which the General Assembly had been trying to solve since 1951. The first was to define what constituted a Non-Self-Governing Territory and the second, to determine the point at which such a Territory had achieved self-government or independence. The General Assembly had examined those questions in terms of the factors to be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory had attained a full measure of self-government, and it had been generally agreed that no enumeration of factors could do more than serve as a guide, since each case would have to be considered on its own merits. But what authority was to decide that the transmittal of information should cease? There had been no agreement on that point: the majority of Administering Members maintained that the competence to take that decision lay exclusively with them while the great majority of non-administering Members thought that the General Assembly should have the authority, either exclusively or jointly with the Administering Member concerned, to decide whether a Territory had ceased to be non-self-governing within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter. In spite of that difference of opinion all countries admitted that Chapter XI was not only a declaration of principles—which required all Member States to recognize the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories were paramount—but also a declaration of obligations accepted by Member States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories. In order to ensure respect for those obligations the Administering Members were urged to transmit statistical information, subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations might require.

34. His delegation had always believed that it was for the General Assembly to determine collectively the interpretation to be given to the term "Non-Self-Governing Territories" and "territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government". It therefore endorsed the principles laid down in the report of the Special Committee of Six for the guidance of the General Assembly in determining whether or not an obligation existed to transmit information. It would be dogmatic to argue that a definition of those principles was unnecessary. Such a definition would certainly be of value if it had the effect of changing certain rigid positions adopted since 1952 and 1953.

35. Mr. GUARDADO (El Salvador) wished to associate himself with the representatives who had congratulated the Special Committee of Six on its concise report, which would guide the Assembly in its implementation of the fundamental principles of the Charter. The work of that Committee had unfortunately not been in time to prevent certain regrettable developments which ran counter to the ideas proclaimed at the San Francisco Conference. His delegation regretted that the debate had not been confined to a legal study of the principles defined by the Special Committee but had extended to the application of those principles to particular cases like those of Spain and Portugal.

36. Since there had been no criticism of the report of the Special Committee, he moved the closure of the debate under article 118 of the rules of procedure.

37. Mr. KANAKARATNE (Ceylon) expressed astonishment at such a strange proposal so early in the debate. The Committee had not even devoted three full meetings to consideration of the report of the Special Committee of Six, which had only been introduced in the Fourth Committee at the 1031st meeting. His own delegation wished to study closely both the report and the interventions made thus far before stating its views. Any attempt to prevent delegations from speaking on so important a matter would be a serious encroachment upon freedom of discussion. The representative of El Salvador believed that the Committee should confine itself to the legal aspect of the problem. While the Committee must naturally concern itself with the principles laid down by the Special Committee of Six, the item under discussion was not an academic topic but a serious problem which the United Nations had been studying for several years. Sooner or later those principles would have to be applied, and without taking any stand at that stage on the situation in a given territory as depicted by certain representatives, his delegation would submit its views on the manner, time and place of their application. It should be given an opportunity for doing so. For that reason he strongly opposed the motion for closure.

38. Mr. Krishna MENON (India) pointed out that the report of the Special Committee of Six had only been before the Fourth Committee since the previous day. The latter would certainly need as much time to consider the report as the Special Committee had spent on its drafting. If the debate was closed immediately, the Fourth Committee would be unable to approve any draft resolution, as the delegations had had no opportunity to consult each other. That would be all the more regrettable since the item under discussion had been occupying the United Nations for a long time. The Committee should trace the problem back to its origins, namely to the drawing up of the Charter, whose authors had obviously intended to impose on Members administering Non-Self-Governing Territories similar obligations to those imposed on Authorities administering Trust Territories. Since those Members had received a sacred trust, they should be accountable for their actions to the international community. The Committee should not be content with an academic discussion of the principles involved but should decide how and in what circumstances they should be applied in order to avoid any violation of the Charter. He therefore hoped that the Committee would be able to go on with its work in the normal way.

39. Mr. GUARDADO (El Salvador) said that he had merely wished to draw the Committee's attention to the need for concentrating the debate on the principles laid down in the report because he feared that premature discussion of their application to any given country might jeopardize the success of many years' work in the United Nations. He was now confident that he had achieved that purpose and would withdraw his motion.

40. Mr. SALAMANCA (Bolivia) stressed the complex nature of the legal and political problem before the Committee. It was indeed difficult to say what constituted a nation. Certain countries were born weak and gradually gained strength; others had long-standing problems in the shape of minorities or regions difficult to integrate with the national community. A nation was a continual creation and might only represent in effect the will of a certain group to become a nation. The Committee must of course make sure that the will of such groups was not ignored, but it should not approve a draft resolution which would only have the effect of creating a climate of tension.

41. The principles laid down in the report of the Special Committee of Six raised very delicate problems; it might be fair to ask, for instance, how many independent States where the people were completely self-governing were to be found in the world of today. The essential thing was not to try to make all territories independent even if they had only a minute population but to ensure that human rights were everywhere respected. In discussing a report of such vast scope the representatives could obviously quote all the examples and mention all the territories they wished, but they should bear in mind that a general declaration must not be used as a weapon against one or two countries. The value of such a text would lie in its unanimous acceptance. The Fourth Committee would have to adopt the principles of the Special Committee of Six and see how they could be implemented before it could decide whether any given country was right or wrong to refuse to transmit information. For the time being any condemnation was premature.

The meeting rose at 5.30 p.m.

AGENDA ITEM 38

Study of principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: report of the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) (A/4526) (continued)

1. Miss BROOKS (Liberia) said that for a number of years the Liberian and other delegations had tried to impress upon the General Assembly the need for establishing a committee which would impartially and objectively enumerate principles on the basis of which Members which administered overseas territories could be asked to account for the administration of those territories before the international forum, in accordance with the terms of Chapter XI of the Charter. All attempts in that direction had been consistently frustrated until at its fourteenth session the General Assembly had decided that a study of such principles was advisable and necessary. As a consequence of the adoption of General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV), a six-member committee had been appointed whose composition gave the assurance of impartiality and whose report (A/4526) represented the points of view of both administering and non-administering Powers.

2. On many occasions in the past the question had been asked in the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Fourth Committee and the General Assembly whether there were any Member States which administered territories on which information under Article 73 e of the Charter was due but had not been forthcoming. The question had never received an authoritative reply; some delegations had given an affirmative answer, while others had asserted that the Assembly possessed no instrument on which a categorical ruling could be based. The factors outlined in General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII) had been considered by some to be in-applicable, since they had been intended to cover the cessation of the transmission of information rather than the obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e. Furthermore it had been contended that Article 73 e contained a limitative clause relating to security and constitutional considerations and also that under Article 2, paragraph 7, the administration of territories was a matter of domestic jurisdiction and therefore outside the competence of the United Nations.

3. The principles set forth in section V, part B, of the report of the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter (A/4526) would finally refute those contentions. If the Fourth Committee or any of its members felt that a legal instrument was needed defining the accountability of Members for the administration of dependent territories, such a legal instrument had been provided by the report of the Special Committee of Six. Although her delegation was not in favour of legal disputations about questions that by nature were not necessarily legal, it was glad to have available a well-documented instrument to strengthen its position in a matter which was fraught with political dangers and consequences.

4. Nothing in the principles enunciated by the Special Committee could cause her delegation to have any doubts that Portugal was an Administering Member in the fullest sense of the term and that the territories administered by the Portuguese Government were territories on which information should be transmitted without delay, in compliance with Article 73 e of the Charter. Even had her delegation's position not been strengthened and corroborated by the existence of the legal document, it would not have hesitated to address to the Government of Portugal an earnest appeal to fulfil its obligations. The political situation in the world, and more particularly in Africa, was such that the question of international responsibility for the administration of the Portuguese territories had become a matter of the utmost urgency. She felt that it would be a disservice not only to the United Nations, to Africa and to the whole world, but even to Portugal itself, not to insist that that country should take account of the present dangerous situation and relinquish its intransigent attitude for the sake of world peace.

5. The tide of African nationalism and the demand of the oppressed countries to stand on their own feet and be masters of their own affairs could no longer be treated as a matter of legal niceties and constitutional subtleties. There was an abundance of material available from Angola, Mozambique and dependent Guinea relating to the situation of the indigenous populations there and the determination of the people to obtain freedom by any means that were available to them. She would not dwell on the conditions prevailing in the territories under Portuguese administration, for those conditions were well known and the facts could be found in many books, pamphlets and newspapers. The representative of Portugal had in the past vigorously denied the facts but no documentation had been produced to corroborate such denials.

6. In its reply to the Secretary-General (A/AC.100/1, paras. 143-162) in compliance with General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV), the Portuguese Government had given a learned interpretation of the meaning of the word "Declaration" as the title of Chapter XI of the Charter, had upheld the competence of the State concerned as opposed to that of the General Assembly and had drawn a subtle distinction between the political status of territories and that of peoples. The time for such legal quibbles was past. If the Portuguese Government needed a legal document it had one in the report of the Special Committee of Six. However minutely any of the principles put forward by the Special Committee was examined, the conclusion must be that information on the territories under Portuguese administration was called for. The reality of the situation was more compelling than nice legal points. The fact that the Portuguese territories came within the purview of Chapter XI of the Charter was confirmed by the twelve principles, regardless of what their status might be according to the Constitution of Portugal. The territories were geographically separate and ethnically and culturally distinct from the country which administered them, in accordance with the terms of principle IV. They were not freely associated with an independent State, within the meaning of principle VII, or integrated into an independent State within the meaning of principles VIII or IX.

7. The question of constitutional limitation had been raised by the representative of Portugal on two previous occasions but in the light of the Portuguese reply to the Secretary-General's note that point would seem to have been abandoned by the Portuguese Government and she would therefore not dwell on it. The question of non-interference by the United Nations in Portugal's domestic affairs was much more fully covered in its reply. Her delegation had, however, already established the need for international accountability. The lesson of the former Belgian Congo had contributed much to Liberia's justified fears in that respect and the Government of Portugal would do well to heed that bitter lesson.

8. The General Assembly, her delegation submitted, had no choice but to request the Government of Portugal to implement the obligations it had undertaken in joining the United Nations. Furthermore, the General Assembly should recommend to the Government of Portugal that it should advance with the tide of history and see that the territories under its administration and the peoples under its rule in Africa and Asia were delivered from Portuguese administration and joined the community of free nations. Such a recommendation would be in accordance with the reality of the situation as it was today and as it would develop in the near future—perhaps nearer than anyone could foresee. The forecasts made five years earlier, or even less, regarding the date of the attainment of independence by dependent peoples had shown an astonishing lack of foresight on the part of certain Governments. There had been a great change from the spirit that had prevailed in the Fourth Committee and in the Committee on Information a few years earlier, when certain Administering Members had taken their stand on the principle of non-interference by the United Nations in the domestic affairs of States. Her delegation was glad to see that change and appreciated the wisdom of those Administering Members which had in fact and in practice accepted international responsibility for the administration of dependent territories and had adjusted their policies to the facts. It was to be hoped that a similar change, but a more rapid one, would take place on the part of the Portuguese Government.

9. With regard to the application of the principles enunciated by the Committee of Six to the territories administered by Spain, she thought that members of the Fourth Committee would agree that while the approach of the Spanish Government to the question of transmitting information with respect to the territories it administered was rather different from that of Portugal, the final result was the same. At the 670th meeting of the Fourth Committee, during the twelfth session of the General Assembly, the representative of Spain had stated that Spain's reply to the communication addressed by the Secretary-General to the new Member States in connexion with obligations under Article 73 of the Charter would be received in due course and that it would be entirely in accordance with the spirit of the Charter. Later the Spanish Government, through its Permanent Mission, had confirmed that statement^{1/} and had announced that the reply of Spain was under consideration and would shortly be transmitted to the Secretary-General and that it would be in keeping with the spirit of the Charter. In November 1958, however, the Spanish Government, through its Permanent Mission, had informed the Secretary-General^{2/} that Spain possessed no Non-Self-Governing Territories, since the territories subject to its sovereignty in Africa were classified as provinces of Spain and that consequently the Spanish Government did not regard itself as affected by Article 73.

10. The delegation of Liberia could never accept the principle that an administering State could by legislation deprive the dependent people it administered of their rights as guaranteed under the Charter; such action was in fact diametrically opposed to principles VI, VII, VIII and IX of the Special Committee of Six. Thus it was the duty of the General Assembly to call upon Spain to fulfil its obligations under the Charter in connexion with the territories it administered.

11. Her delegation was happy that many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories on which France had formerly transmitted information had joined the United Nations as independent States. Her delegation was, however, concerned about the territory commonly called French Somaliland. It considered that the United Nations should be informed by France of the exact conditions and status of that territory. If by the sixteenth session of the General Assembly French Somaliland had not obtained independent status, her delegation felt that France should be obliged to transmit information concerning that territory and to state specifically when it would attain independence.

12. On behalf of the millions of dependent peoples everywhere, the majority of whom dwelt in the conti-

^{1/} See A/C.4/375.

^{2/} See A/C.4/385/Rev.1.

ment of Africa, she appealed to Portugal, Spain and every colonial Power to direct their efforts towards the fulfilment of the provisions of the Charter and in doing so to accelerate their plans so that in the very near future all dependent people would be liberated and take their rightful place among the free nations of the world.

13. Mr. DIALLO (Mali), replying to the remarks made by the Bolivian representative at the 1033rd meeting, said that his delegation felt that it was its duty, in furthering the cause of justice and peace, to denounce the abominable practices of certain Powers, not in a spirit of malice but in order to save the United Nations from being considered an accomplice in the crimes committed by Portugal and Spain, which ignored the moral principles proclaimed by the United Nations.

14. Mr. Najmuddine RIFAI (United Arab Republic) said that the Committee would be well advised to concentrate on the principles elaborated by the Special Committee of Six; after adopting those principles, it could then proceed to investigate their application.

15. From the earliest days of the United Nations there had been arguments about the interpretation of Chapter XI of the Charter. With the passage of time, the legal position of some of the administering Powers had undergone a commendable change and the gap between the two opposing views had been narrowed. The Committee of Six had done its work well; his delegation fully endorsed both its findings and the principles set out in its report, which entirely confirmed the views it had unswervingly upheld, and it trusted that no more would be heard of the untenable thesis that the transmission of information was a purely voluntary act depending solely on the Administering Member concerned. The principles had the added advantage of providing the General Assembly with criteria which would enable it to determine whether or not any given territory was self-governing. Accordingly, the Administering Members could no longer sustain the argument that it was their prerogative to decide that point; that argument had been shown to be invalid from the legal point of view. Nor could it any longer be maintained that responsibility was not collective and that the General Assembly was not competent to decide whether or not an obligation to transmit information about a given territory existed.

16. Events had rendered discussion about the legal interpretation of Chapter XI increasingly unreal. He wondered what the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and many other territories would say if they heard that the United Nations was engaged in an academic discussion of that subject. At a time when many former dependent territories had become sovereign States, it was disheartening to find that, on the basis either of treaties which had invariably been imposed rather than negotiated or of certain constitutional provisions about which the colonial peoples had never been consulted, there were colonial Powers who still maintained that certain territories were outside the purview of Chapter XI of the Charter. Such an attitude was a danger to peace and was indeed harmful to those who upheld it.

17. The events occurring in the central part of northern Africa showed what was bound to happen in other colonial territories if considerations of fictitious legality were allowed to stand in the way of the tide of freedom. He appealed to the representatives of Spain and Portugal and to the other Administering Members to heed the lessons of history and not to try and prolong the life of a dying system; for no amount of legal verbiage or of twisting the meaning of the Charter could change reality. The peoples of Angola, Mozambique and other territories alleged to be fully self-governing and to be integral parts of the metropolitan country showed signs of holding views which did not tally with the views held by Portugal and Spain. That was because they had a different history and different racial and cultural characteristics, facts which no amount of legal assertion could alter. It was the Committee's duty to act speedily lest events overtook it.

18. Miss SHELTON (Cuba) said that, in view of the many debates and the different points of view held in the Fourth Committee on the question of the interpretation of Chapter XI of the Charter, the clear and precise report of the Special Committee of Six was particularly welcome.

19. Her delegation, which had voted in favour of General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) setting up the Special Committee, endorsed the statement in paragraph 17 of the report that independence was among the rightful aspirations of every nation, the fulfilment of which was an important factor in the preservation of international peace and security. The wind of change referred to by various representatives in the Committee had brought with it a clarion call for independence. Evidence of that was the presence in the Committee of a number of representatives of States which had recently been liberated from colonialism: her delegation welcomed their liberation with great joy, for Cuba had always championed the equality of rights of all peoples and their right to representation in the international community. It agreed with the statement in paragraph 18 of the Special Committee's report that the Charter was a living document and the obligations under Chapter XI must be viewed in the light of the changing spirit of the times.

20. In its twelve principles the Special Committee had given a clear and precise interpretation of Chapter XI, and especially Article 73 e. She would not comment on those principles, for there was little to add to what had already been said by previous speakers, and particularly by the Indian and Mexican representatives at the 1031st meeting, in their brilliant statements on the subject.

21. She associated herself with the Liberian representative in paying a tribute to Mr. Espinosa y Prieto of Mexico, whose conciliatory spirit, clear thinking and wide knowledge had contributed much to the success of the Fourth Committee's work, especially on the item at present before it.

22. Mr. THAPA (Nepal) said that he was glad to see from the Special Committee's report how large an area of agreement there was between the different groups of Member States even on seemingly controversial questions. The report reflected the spirit of understanding and compromise shown by the administering and the non-administering Powers. Although the stresses and strains of compromise were visible in certain passages, it was a good, practical report and a good basis for the Fourth Committee's work.

23. The validity of Article 73 of the Charter derived from its contribution to world peace. With the growth of nationalism in the colonies, it had been felt that the United Nations could establish peace only if it declared itself positively on the side of self-government. To keep a large part of the world's population in a dependent status from which it wished to free itself would be a threat to world peace. Article 73 must be interpreted in that context. When it was so interpreted, there appeared to be no limitations on the obligation to transmit information regarding any Non-Self-Governing Territory.

24. Moreover, Chapter XI was an expression of the human conscience, as it had developed after the bitter experience of the Second World War, in relation to the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The conscience of the world community as expressed in the Charter rejected any type of dependent status as a permanent solution. The United Nations therefore had a sacred responsibility and must work increasingly for the promotion of self-government in all the Non-Self-Governing Territories through the political, economic, social and educational advancement of those peoples. It could not properly discharge that responsibility without the possession of reliable and comprehensive information on the actual state of affairs obtaining in the Territories.

25. Some Member States, however, were not prepared to interpret that Article as liberally as his delegation would wish. No information had been supplied, for example, on Goa, Angola, Mozambique and other territories. In some cases political and constitutional difficulties were cited as an excuse for not transmitting information. In his delegation's opinion, where such difficulties existed the constitutional position should be adjusted to comply with the spirit of the Charter, rather than the spirit of the Charter being strained to accommodate a constitutional position which no longer accorded with it.

26. His delegation would have been happier if there had been no need to enunciate principles and if information had been transmitted on all Non-Self-Governing Territories. In the absence of such information, however, the next best thing was for the Committee to clarify the position by the enunciation of principles.

27. Principle I asserted that all colonial territories that had existed at the time of the drafting of the Charter were covered by Chapter XI; an absolute obligation existed to transmit information on each territory until it attained self-government either through association, integration or emergence as a sovereign and independent State. If there were any limitations to that obligation they pertained only to the granting of the information and not to the obligation itself.

28. His delegation hoped that the principles would be adopted and that the Member States which had refused to transmit information would reconsider their position.

Mr. Ortiz de Rozas (Argentina), Vice-Chairman, took the Chair.

29. Mr. KUCHAVA (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that it would be a useless exercise for the Committee to embark on an academic discussion of the report of the Special Committee of Six, which was the result of the Fourth Committee's inertia in past years. It was a well-known fact that Spain and Portugal, in violation of the Charter, had refused to provide information regarding their colonies and that with the support of other colonial Powers, they had several times succeeded in preventing the adoption of a definite decision to the effect that they were bound by the obligations laid down in Chapter XI of the Charter. In the end, and to a large extent on the initiative of the United Kingdom representative, the General Assembly had adopted resolution 1467 (XIV) and the Committee of Six had been set up.

30. To his delegation, like many others, it had always been perfectly clear that any legal investigation was pointless, since Angola, Mozambique, so-called Portuguese Guinea, Cape Verde and the Islands of São Tomé and Príncipe were colonies of Portugal, and that Ifni, the so-called Spanish Sahara, and the Canary Islands were colonies of Spain, acquired in all cases by military conquest leading to the enslavement of their peoples. Those facts were known to any schoolboy, yet the adult representatives of the colonial Powers were trying to pretend that those territories were an integral part of the metropolitan countries concerned. That attitude deceived no one and it was useless for Spain and Portugal to try to absorb those territories by calling them provinces of the metropolitan country. At a time when the national liberation movement of the colonized peoples had reached a decisive stage, the only realistic approach was the complete liquidation of colonialism, and the General Assembly would soon be considering a declaration to that effect. Were Portugal and Spain to be exceptions? Was the General Assembly to agree tacitly to the continuation of colonialism in their territories? It was obvious that the contentions of Spain and Portugal were fallacious, and his delegation regretted that the United Nations had taken several years to discover the fact. The basic objective now was not to ascertain whether the Spanish and Portuguese territories were colonies but to bring all colonial domination to an immediate end in both the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the Trust Territories; that included the Spanish and Portuguese colonies.

31. The Committee should not waste time discussing general principles, but should rather try and keep pace with events. It should immediately take note of the fact that since 1955, when Spain and Portugal had become Member States, they had been under an unconditional obligation under Article 73 of the Charter to transmit information about their colonies. Next, the General Assembly should deal with the vital question of the grant of independence to all Non-Self-Governing Territories, including those of Spain and Portugal, where so many millions of indigenous inhabitants were deprived of all rights and were the victims of cruel oppression.

32. The Spanish and Portuguese had often spoken of their "civilizing mission", as if they were bringing culture and civilization to "inferior" races but if their deeds rather than their words were examined an altogether different picture emerged. There was no information to show that industries were being established in Angola or Mozambique, that rapid economic progress was being made, or that the level of living and the literacy rate were being raised; on the contrary, despite strict Press censorship, reports showed that the African population had been deprived of its rights, that patriotic organizations were being persecuted and that the indigenous inhabitants lived in conditions of slavery.

33. By an amendment to the Portuguese Constitution made on 11 June 1951, the Portuguese colonies had become "overseas provinces" of Portugal, but their situation had remained exactly the same. Neither the colonies nor their inhabitants enjoyed equal rights with the metropolitan country; indeed, the indigenous population was subjected to cruel racial discrimination. The indigenous inhabitants were divided into "assimilated" and "non-assimilated" groups and under the law an African could rise to assimilated status only if he knew the Portuguese language, became a Catholic, possessed a certain amount of money and was prepared to reject local customs, culture and traditions and to live like a European. An African who fulfilled those conditions was given the right to Portuguese citizenship, and a Portuguese passport, he could vote and his children could receive education. Thus the policy of assimilation was a convenient means by which the Portuguese colonialists oppressed 11 million Africans. After five hundred years of Portuguese occupation, only 0.3 per cent of the Africans had been assimilated; the others enjoyed no political or civil rights, nor were they represented in any of the administrative or legislative organs of the metropolitan country. They were required to carry identity cards at all times, they could not move from one place to another without special permission and they enjoyed no protection under the law. They could be driven from their land and impressed into forced labour, which was in fact slave labour. Each year male indigenous inhabitants were required to contribute six months of compulsory labour. In the Portuguese colonies only overt slavery was prohibited: all other forms of enslavement not only were not forbidden, but were even legal. An organized trade in indigenous inhabitants went on in Mozambique under the guise of contract labour. Under the Mozambique Convention of 1928, 100,000 Africans from Mozambique were sent to the Union of South Africa each year and some 100,000 to Rhodesia and Nyasaland. There was a special government organ to recruit manpower for the Transvaal mines. The majority of those recruited died either en route, from disease, malnutrition or epidemics, or from work in the mines. In its issue of 8 April 1960, The Manchester Guardian had said that over the past twenty years forced labour had been playing a constantly increasing part in Mozambique and Angola.

34. That cruel colonial exploitation had reduced the indigenous populations of the Spanish and Portuguese territories to starvation and misery. Indeed, the colonial régime had brought them nothing but suffering. Why did approximately one out of every two newborn infants die in its first year in Mozambique? Why were 99 per cent of the indigenous population of Angola, Mozambique and other Portuguese colonies still illiterate after 500 years of "enlightened" administration and "civilization"? Surely no further proof was needed that the colonial régime constituted a major obstacle to the progress of the populations of the Portuguese, Spanish and other colonies. That obstacle must be removed immediately and the necessary conditions created for the economic, social and educational development of those peoples. The colonial Powers had often spoken of the "white man's burden"; the time had come to liberate them from that burden, but most of all to liberate the colonial peoples from their tutelage.

35. The USSR delegation called upon the Fourth Committee to decide formally that the Portuguese and Spanish colonies were Non-Self-Governing Territories, that Portugal and Spain bore full responsibility for implementing the obligations outlined in the Charter, and that the present and future resolutions of the General Assembly concerning the fulfilment of the purposes and principles of the Charter in regard to the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the immediate and complete liquidation of the colonial system in those Territories applied to the Spanish and Portuguese territories.

36. The Fourth Committee had already wasted much time in studying procedural and formal questions; the time had come for it to take an immediate decision on liberating the colonial peoples from the hated colonial régime.

AGENDA ITEM 38

Study of principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: report of the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) (A/4526) (continued)

1. Mr. HUSAIN (Pakistan) said that for the moment he would confine his remarks to the principles enunciated by the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter in section V, part B, of its report (A/4526); he would have an opportunity at a later stage to discuss the application of those principles to particular territories.

2. The only means that the United Nations possessed for securing ultimate self-government for the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the goal it had boldly set itself in Chapter XI of the Charter, was to request the Administering Members to keep it informed of the economic, social and educational development of those Territories. That means had proved to be a powerful weapon enabling the United Nations to keep a close watch over the situation. Advancement in the economic, social and educational fields had spurred on political progress and many Territories had attained independence as a result of the watchfulness of the small nations and the good will of a number of administering Powers.

3. Some Members, however, had refused to provide that information. They had argued that certain territories did not come within the scope of Chapter XI or that others were already self-governing, because the Charter failed to specify what constituted a Non-Self-Governing Territory. The General Assembly had previously decided that an Administering Member would not cease to have an obligation to transmit information in respect of a territory until that territory had attained a full measure of self-government and had made it clear that it was for the Assembly alone to determine, on the basis of certain criteria laid down in General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII), whether a given territory had reached that stage. The Special Committee of Six, reproducing the basic concepts of resolution 742 (VIII) in a more coherent form and a more logical order, had defined the principles which should serve as a guide in determining whether or not an obligation existed to transmit information.

4. Although it reserved the right to suggest some changes, the Pakistan delegation generally endorsed the Special Committee's recommendations. It agreed with the Committee that the Charter was a living document and that the application of Chapter XI should be viewed in the light of political realities and of the changing spirit of the times. It considered further that the principles should be applied in the light of the facts and the specific circumstances of each case. Geographical separation combined with ethnic distinctness created a prima facie presumption that the obligation to transmit information existed. The burden of proof that the presumption was not necessarily conclusive and that, as a result of constitutional and juridical factors, there was no obligation—notwithstanding that geographical separation and ethnic distinctness—lay with the Administering Member. Judging from the way in which certain countries interpreted Chapter XI, and in particular Article 73 e, it would appear that they denied that freedom was the highest of man's natural endowments and not the product of any political system and that every nation had the right to be free itself in order to protect the rights and freedoms of its citizens. Yet it was the vitality of that concept which had led many African States to independence and now enabled them to work for the development of Africa by Africans, for Africans and in the African way, free from the influence of the cold war. Most of the other peoples of Africa would like to achieve the same status, notwithstanding the anachronistic thinking of those who clung to imperialism.

5. Mr. ROHAL-ILKIV (Czechoslovakia) said that, in considering all the items on the Committee's agenda, his delegation continued to bear in mind the proposal of the Soviet Union for a declaration on the granting of independence to colonial peoples and countries (A/4502 and Corr.1). It firmly believed that colonialism should be totally and speedily liquidated and that it would ultimately cease to exist. That did not mean, however, that the Committee should be satisfied and await the end of colonialism. On the contrary, action should be taken simultaneously on all fronts and the problem under discussion was also a factor in the struggle against colonialism.

6. The Czechoslovak delegation had consistently striven for a correct interpretation of Article 73 e. Since the very inception of the United Nations, some administering Powers had been reticent about the territories for which they were responsible, evading the obligation assumed under Article 73 e, and had gone so far as to cease transmitting information. The non-administering Members had fought against that policy, with some measure of success, as would be seen from General Assembly resolutions 222 (III), 334 (IV), 742 (VIII) and 747 (VIII). Resolution 747 (VIII) gave the Assembly the right to decide when the transmission of information in regard to a Non-Self-Governing Territory should be discontinued, and that right was confirmed in resolution 748 (VIII), which established the competence of the Assembly to decide whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory had or had not attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter.

7. Portugal and Spain refused to transmit information in regard to the territories under their administration on the grounds that they no longer had any "colonies" and that those territories were now "overseas provinces". It would be interesting to ask an indigenous inhabitant of Angola whether life had changed in his "province" since it had ceased to be a colony: there could be no doubt regarding his reply, for the whole world knew that the Portuguese was the most brutal of colonial régimes. According to an article published in The Times of London on 21 and 22 June 1960, entitled "Portuguese Way in Africa", the legal fiction of changing the label did not alter the fact that Angola was still a colony; the density of its population was very low despite favourable conditions and the indigenous inhabitants were subjected to forced labour. In the opinion of The Times correspondent, the policy of assimilation applied in Angola might result in a "Portuguese Algeria".

8. As a result of the refusal of certain Administering Members to discharge their obligations under Chapter XI of the Charter, the General Assembly, in resolution 1467 (XIV), had established a special committee to draw up the principles which should guide those Members in determining whether or not the obligation to transmit information was applicable to them. Some conclusions of the Special Committee of Six could effectively serve the cause of the emancipation of colonial peoples: the Charter was indeed a living document and the obligations under Chapter XI should be viewed in the light of political realities and the changing spirit of the times; the obligations assumed by Member States were not limited to Article 73 and Chapter XI did indeed embody the concept of Non-Self-Governing Territories in a dynamic state of evolution and progress. Those conclusions and principles should, however, have been expressed in more forceful terms and should be accompanied by practical measures for their implementation. The Czechoslovak delegation had not expected revolutionary results from the Special Committee of Six since half of its members had been representatives of colonial Powers. In the General Assembly, however, there were only a few colonial Powers and that fact should be reflected in the decisions adopted.

9. The main thing was to dispose once and for all of the argument of the colonial Powers to the effect that Chapter XI was a mere declaration of intention which did not connote any obligation. On the contrary, like the Charter, of which it was a part, Chapter XI was an international instrument which imposed obligations on, and granted rights to, certain States. In the view of the Czechoslovak delegation, all Member States without exception were legally bound to transmit information in regard to the territories for which they were responsible. In practice, the General Assembly, and the General Assembly alone, should be the judge of whether a territory had attained a full measure of self-government. Moreover, the obligation to transmit information under Chapter XI meant not only that the Administering Member was not entitled to discontinue the transmission of information on its own authority, but also that it was obliged to transmit that information if the General Assembly so requested. Resolution 747 (VIII) left no doubt regarding the Assembly's competence in that respect.

10. In deciding whether there were grounds for continuing or ceasing the transmission of information on a particular Non-Self-Governing Territory, the Assembly should ask itself whether the Territory in question had or had not attained self-government. In the opinion of the Czechoslovak delegation, the essential test could only be the attainment of genuine political independence, based on the freely expressed will of the people of the Territory, and not the attainment of a fictitious independence or independence proclaimed in a unilateral declaration of the administering Power.

11. Likewise, with regard to the volume of information to be submitted, he was of the opinion that Article 73 of the Charter should be interpreted as a whole: although sub-paragraph e of that Article mentioned only information "relating to economic, social, and educational conditions in the territories", sub-paragraphs a and b of the same Article spoke of the "political advancement" of the territories and of the "progressive development of their free political institutions". There was, moreover, a close relationship between the advancement achieved in each of those fields, and that advancement was more rapid when the territory had attained full independence. The Administering Members should therefore be required to transmit information of a political nature, for there was no other way of determining exactly how the principle of self-government of the peoples was implemented in those territories and to what extent they approached the objective set forth in the Charter, namely, independence. It was essential to act without delay and the United Nations should, as a first step, oblige Spain and Portugal to acknowledge that the territories they were administering were not self-governing territories and immediately to transmit information regarding them. But that was only the first step. It was necessary for those territories to be granted complete independence without delay.

12. The time had come to take a firm stand in support of the colonized peoples. The recent admission of new African States as Members of the United Nations worked in favour of that decision. Ever since the second session, the General Assembly and the Committee had been discussing the interpretation to be given to Article 73 e; the colonized peoples would not wait for the result of their debates and the Assembly had no right to hinder the course of history. The precise definition of the principles that should govern the interpretation of Article 73 was only a link in the chain of measures expediting that evolution. The Czechoslovak delegation was convinced that, by adopting a resolution compelling the Administering Members to respect the obligations imposed upon them by the Charter, the Assembly would have taken a favourable step forward towards the ultimate objective, immediate and complete elimination of colonialism.

13. Mr. KANAKARATNE (Ceylon) said that he would deal mainly with the principles formulated by the Special Committee of Six, for it was only after the Fourth Committee had expressed its views on those principles that it would be able to specify which Administering Members should consider themselves bound by them and on which territories those Members should transmit information. In adopting resolution 1467 (XIV), the General Assembly had declared itself competent to determine the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter, and in particular Article 73 e; on that point, the Ceylonese delegation did not in any way share the reservations of certain delegations. As early as the 16th meeting of the Fourth Committee, held during the second part of the first session of the Assembly, Mr. John Foster Dulles, representing the United States of America, had stated that his country, having adopted a broad view of its responsibilities under Chapter XI, had forwarded to the Secretary-General information relating to all the Non-Self-Governing Territories under its authority. The representative of Norway, in turn, had stated that Chapter XI might develop into a Magna Carta of liberty which would give new faith and hope to millions of people who were not represented among the United Nations. It was in that spirit that Chapter XI must be interpreted and applied to all peoples to whom it was applicable.

14. Certain countries that had transformed colonies into "overseas provinces" by a mere change of appellation and amendment of their basic laws were using that constitutional fiction as a basis for refusing to transmit information. It should be noted, however, that in 1946 all countries then administering Non-Self-Governing Territories had decided to transmit information, and the General Assembly had noted this in its resolution 66 (I), adopted in that year. Could Portugal and Spain be heard to say, in 1960, that if they had been Members of the United Nations in 1946—and had not, by a mere accident of history, become Members only in 1955—they would have had the effrontery at that time to refuse what Australia, Belgium, Denmark, the United States, France, New Zealand, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom accepted? Were the obligations assumed by the founding Members of the United Nations not binding upon the countries who became Members later?

15. It was moreover another accident of history that Ceylon had not remained a Portuguese colony and had thus been able to become a Member of the United Nations. If the Netherlands, and then the United Kingdom, had not in turn taken possession of the island, would Ceylon have been considered, like Angola or Mozambique today, to be an "overseas province" of Portugal to which the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter did not apply? Every one in the Committee, including the representatives of Spain and Portugal, would agree that that would have been absurd. It might be asked in what respect the present situation of Angola or Mozambique differed from what Ceylon's situation would have been in that case.

16. The Ceylonese delegation unreservedly endorsed the principles defined by the Special Committee of Six in its objective report. It noted, however, the United Kingdom reservation recorded in paragraph 15. For its part it considered that the constitutional limitation mentioned in principle X could apply only to the scope of the information and that it never exempted a Member State from the obligations incurred under Chapter XI. Acceptance of the United Kingdom's reservation would mean starting all over again from the beginning, for it was precisely because some States had refused to transmit information on the pretext of constitutional considerations that the Assembly had established the Committee of Six.

17. The Fourth Committee should not restrict itself to a mere academic discussion of the legal aspects of the question. The interpretation of Article 73 e was not a formal exercise in semantics but the means of attaining the lofty aims expressed so eloquently in 1946 by the representative of Norway. The adoption of the principles proposed by the Special Committee would mark not the end, but the beginning, of the work of the Committee, which was not an assembly of jurists but a political organ which was required to act in the context of current political realities. If it did not ensure that the principles were applied in practice, its efforts would have been in vain. The Ceylonese delegation was anxious that those principles should not remain a dead letter, for it was eager to secure a peaceful adjustment of a perilous situation, which it deemed likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations if it were allowed to continue. This was a duty imposed on the General Assembly by Article 14 of the Charter. If his delegation did not call for the peaceful adjustment of the situation in relation to the territories fictitiously incorporated in metropolitan countries, it would be false to the pledges it had made to itself, to its Government and to its people.

18. Mr. NOGUEIRA (Portugal), exercising his right of reply, said that he was glad that the history of Ceylon had so willed it that that former Portuguese colony was today a Member of the United Nations. If the United Nations had existed at the time when the Netherlands had expelled the Portuguese from Ceylon, Portugal would perhaps have appealed for United Nations intervention, and, as a result of that intervention, Ceylon would not now be sitting with the other members of the Committee.

19. Sir Andrew COHEN (United Kingdom) wished to reassure the delegations which had expressed concern about the United Kingdom's reservation with regard to the application of principle X and had gone so far as to call the United Kingdom delegation's remarks "double-talk".

20. Paragraph 15 of the Special Committee's report was not a reservation but a clarification. Principles X and XI, which should be read together to avoid misunderstanding, were concerned only with Non-Self-Governing Territories for which constitutional considerations might limit the scope of the information transmitted. The constitutional considerations referred to in Article 73 e could, as principle XI said, only arise from the constitutional relations between the territory and the administering State. Moreover, principle XI laid down that the responsibility for transmitting information continued unless the Government or Parliament of the Administering Member was prevented from receiving from the territory the information called for in Article 73 e. Those principles described a situation which might arise, if only exceptionally, in the constitutional relationships between the United Kingdom and a territory under its administration. The limit on the question of information could only apply when the territory enjoyed self-government in economic, social and educational matters.

21. Mr. ZULOAGA (Venezuela), exercising his right of reply, apologized for using the expression "double-talk", which had offended Sir Andrew Cohen. It would have been fairer to say, as had the representative of Burma, that in making his reservation about principle X the United Kingdom representative in the Special Committee of Six had said both yes and no. The explanation which Sir Andrew Cohen had just given did not convince him. If it was admitted that there might be circumstances in which constitutional considerations reduced to nil the amount of information which could be transmitted, that meant that it might be possible for a Member State to transmit no information whatever; that would run counter to principle X, which said that the extent of the information might be limited in certain circumstances, but that the limitation in Article 73 e could not relieve a Member State of obligations of Chapter XI. All the principles laid down by the Special Committee were made void by that dangerous reservation.

22. He wished to draw the Committee's attention to the importance of the first two sentences of principle XI. That passage might have applied, for instance, to Malta, or to Nigeria before its independence, because their constitutions gave them self-government in economic, social and educational matters through freely elected institutions; but in no case could it apply to the colonies of Spain and Portugal, the two countries which transmitted no information. The reservation made by the United Kingdom, which should have been completely satisfied by the last sentence of principle XI, might be used by Spain and Portugal as a pretext for giving no information about their territories.

23. Mr. SINGH (India), speaking on a point of order, requested that the full text of Sir Andrew Cohen's statement should be distributed to the Committee as soon as possible.

24. Sir Andrew COHEN (United Kingdom), exercising his right of reply, thanked the Venezuelan representative for his kind words. He said that the latter might be right in thinking the United Kingdom's position could have been met by principle XI alone.

25. Mr. ZULOAGA (Venezuela) requested that the full text to be distributed to the Committee should include also the United Kingdom representative's second statement.

26. The CHAIRMAN said that, if there was no objection, the full text of the two statements by the United Kingdom representative would be circulated as a document.

It was so decided.^{1/}

27. Mr. BAMALLI (Nigeria) thanked the members of the Special Committee of Six for their work. If that work had been done earlier, it might have prevented certain Member States from now deliberately violating the letter and spirit of the Charter and evading the obligations they had accepted at the time of their admission to the United Nations.

28. He feared, however, that principles X and XI as set forth in the Committee's report would provide a means of escape for Member States which refused to give information on territories they administered.

29. It was difficult to imagine a situation in which constitutional considerations might limit the extent of the information to be transmitted on a particular territory. The last two sentences of principle X defined the situation more clearly, but the Nigerian delegation thought that, when a territory enjoyed self-government in economic, social and educational matters but still came under Chapter XI of the Charter, it could only be said that the administering Power had delegated some powers to it; the final responsibility still lay with the administering Power and the obligation to transmit information was still valid. It was hard to see what difficulties an administering Power might experience in obtaining information from the Government of such a territory. Why should the constitution of a Non-Self-Governing Territory provide that it would not transmit information to the Administering Member? Such a provision would imply that the Government was completely independent. In order that principle XI should not provide a means of escape for Administering Members which wanted to avoid giving information, he proposed that principles X and XI should contain an additional clause to the effect that the transmission of information could be subject to such limitations as constitutional considerations might require only when the constitution of the Non-Self-Governing Territory concerned gave all its inhabitants the right to vote.

30. The Nigerian delegation thought that the General Assembly was competent to decide whether a territory was or was not covered by Chapter XI of the Charter. That meant that any Member State which was tempted to declare that it administered no Non-Self-Governing Territories must submit to the General Assembly's opinion. It had been argued that such an interpretation would give the General Assembly the right to discuss the constitution of a Member State and therefore ran counter to the principle of national sovereignty. Chapter XI of the Charter, however, already recognized implicitly that world public opinion considered that the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories was no longer a matter of national sovereignty.

31. Turning to the practical implementation of the principles laid down by the Special Committee of Six, he pointed out that Portugal persistently refused to give information about Angola and Mozambique, on the pretext that those colonies had become integral parts of Portugal. Principle VIII said that integration with an independent State should be on the basis of complete equality between the peoples of the erstwhile Non-Self-Governing Territory and those of the independent country with which it was integrated. Not only were Mozambique and Angola geographically and ethnically distinct from Portugal, but their people did not enjoy equality with the Portuguese people. Less than 0.1 per cent of the inhabitants of those territories were Portuguese citizens. The law called the rest "indigenas". The laws applicable to Portuguese citizens did not apply to "indigenas". The economies of Mozambique and Angola were based on forced labour. Ninety-nine per cent of the indigenous population was illiterate. The African people had no part in the administration of the territories and did not enjoy the most elementary safeguards against interference with their persons or their property. No "indigena" could travel or exercise a profession without permission; the Government could order or forbid him to sell his cattle and could force him to grow certain crops. The authorities' brutality towards the indigenous inhabitants was repugnant to human conscience. Yet the Portuguese representative had been cynical enough to vote in favour of the draft resolution on racial discrimination in Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/C.4/L.643 and Add.1 and 2), adopted at the Committee's 1028th meeting.

32. Summing up, he said that the so-called overseas provinces, Mozambique and Angola, were not integral parts of Portugal; they had no free political institutions; the indigenous peoples did not enjoy the same rights as Portuguese citizens; they took no real part in the administration; and their so-called integration was not the result of their freely expressed will. They were, in fact, two Non-Self-Governing Territories and came under Chapter XI of the Charter.

The meeting rose at 5.10 p.m.

AGENDA ITEM 38

Study of principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: report of the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) (A/4526) (continued)

1. Mr. ALWAN (Iraq) recalled that the initiative for the establishment of a special committee to study the principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation existed to transmit information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter had been taken by his delegation in 1955, after several new Members had been admitted to the United Nations. The Secretary-General had addressed letters to the new Members, including Portugal and Spain, drawing their attention to the obligation under Chapter XI and requesting them to inform him if they had under their administration any territories whose people had not yet attained a full measure of self-government. The replies of those two Governments had been negative. His delegation had therefore felt that it was the duty of the General Assembly to establish a committee to lay down the criteria for determining the territories to which Chapter XI applied. The Assembly had, however, failed to establish such a committee until its fourteenth session.

2. The Administering Members, who had played a leading role in the drafting of Chapter XI and in introducing the concept of the sacred trust, had adamantly opposed the establishment of a special committee; they had been joined by other Members, guided by the principle of expediency. One of the arguments advanced had been that any such proposal impugned the good faith of Members; yet in his delegation's opinion the negative answers of Spain and Portugal to the Secretary-General's letter impugned the good faith of the Secretary-General and of world public opinion. It had also been contended that an examination of the replies of the new Members would amount to discrimination against them, since the Assembly had not examined the replies received in 1946. Had Portugal been admitted to membership of the United Nations in 1945, however, Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea would automatically have been considered Non-Self-Governing Territories under Chapter XI. Another argument advanced had related to the principle of non-intervention in matters which were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State; it must always be remembered, however, that the Charter was a multilateral treaty and that the General Assembly was empowered to call upon Member States to fulfil their obligations under it.

3. A remarkable change had come about at the fourteenth session, at a time when momentous events had been taking place in Africa. The opposition had subsided to a great degree and the draft resolution which had become General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) had been adopted by the Fourth Committee with only nine negative votes—a remarkable achievement and the result of four years of tireless work by the anti-colonial groups.

4. In that connexion, he paid a tribute to Mr. Espinosa y Prieto of Mexico, who had played a leading role in the matter. The resolution was a credit to him and an honour to the liberal policies adopted by Mexico on colonial issues.

5. He was sure that, with the guidance of the principles set forth in Section V, part B, of the report of the Special Committee on the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter (A/4526), Member States would cease to express differing opinions on the application of the obligation under Article 73 e. It was encouraging that both the administering and the non-administering Powers represented on the Special Committee had arrived at a unanimous agreement and that the Committee had regarded the Charter as an instrument of welfare and freedom.

6. He proposed to examine the applicability of the principles to the so-called Portuguese provinces, not in the light of what had been said by African nationalists from those colonies, whom the Portuguese representative might consider biased, but on the basis of the report by Professor Marvin Harris entitled "Portugal's African 'Wards'",^{1/} which had been sponsored by the American Committee on Africa and dealt with labour and education in Mozambique.

7. Principle I dealt with the applicability of Chapter XI to territories which at the time of the drafting of the Charter had been known to be of the colonial type. The Portuguese territories had been so considered even by the representative of the Union of South Africa, who in May 1945, at the United Nations Conference on

^{1/} Published in Africa Today, vol. V, No. 6, November–December 1958.

International Organization had said that Portugal held valuable colonial territories. Moreover, prior to 1951 Portugal itself had referred to the so-called provinces as colonies. When the Constitution had been amended in 1951, the word "colonies" had been replaced by "overseas provinces".

8. According to principle II, Chapter XI embodied the concept of Non-Self-Governing Territories in a dynamic state of evolution toward a full measure of self-government. It was evident, however, from Professor Harris's statement to the effect that many people had risked their personal safety to tell him about the conditions in which they were forced to live, that, far from preparing the people of Mozambique for a full measure of self-government, Portugal kept them under a reign of terror.

9. According to principle III, the transmission of information was an international obligation. Portugal could not ignore that obligation as long as it was a Member of the United Nations.

10. Principle IV stated that there was an obligation to transmit information in respect of a territory which was geographically separate and was distinct ethnically and/or culturally from the country administering it; he left it to the members of the Committee to decide whether that principle applied to the so-called Portuguese provinces.

11. Principle V stated that if in addition, administrative, political, juridical, economical or historical elements affected the relationship between the metropolitan State and the territory concerned in a manner which arbitrarily placed the latter in a position of subordination, the obligation to transmit information existed.

12. Before dealing with the administrative subordination of the indigenous population in Mozambique, he thought it might be useful to touch upon the Portuguese administrative system for the "overseas provinces". The central organ of administration was the Ministry of Overseas Provinces, in Lisbon. According to the Organic Law relating to Portuguese Overseas Provinces, the functions of the Minister for Overseas Provinces included the appointment and dismissal of officials in the overseas provinces, in the Ministry and on the staff of any province and the approval, modification or rejection of suggestions on matters within his jurisdiction that were submitted to him by the governments of overseas provinces. A governor was the supreme authority in each overseas province, but the provinces of metropolitan Portugal had neither governors nor provincial legislative councils. Moreover, the indigenous population of the overseas provinces were subjected to a system of judicial and administrative controls known as the "indigenato". According to Professor Harris, that system rested upon the doctrine that the mass of Africans were culturally, linguistically, morally and intellectually unprepared to exercise Portuguese citizenship. Portugal's presence in Africa was officially described as a civilizing mission designed to convert the mass of the indigenous inhabitants into Portuguese citizens—a process known officially as assimilation, which required them to speak Portuguese correctly and to adopt the habits and customs presupposed for the application of Portuguese common law. Since the first assimilation law in 1917, only 5,000 Africans in Mozambique, or less than one-tenth of 1 per cent of the African population, had been granted the status of citizen.

13. The "indigenato" gave the Administration the power to control all the activities of the African masses. Among other things it empowered the Portuguese authorities to impose corporal punishment on maladjusted or disobedient persons; such punishment could be carried out simply by administrative decision. It also enabled the Portuguese Government to exercise control over the movement of the indigenous inhabitants through the devices of the passbook, which all Africans were required to carry at all times and without which they were unable to travel from one district to another, and the curfew, for the violation of which punishment could be prescribed at the whim of the Administrator. A third form of control was deportation: any African considered undesirable could, at the whim of the authorities, be deported to the island of São Tomé, which was greatly feared by the Africans. A political refugee from Mozambique had recently told the Iraqi delegation that most, if not all, of the undesirables were dropped into the sea before the boat arrived at São Tomé.

14. It was obvious that administratively subordinate as they were to metropolitan Portugal, the territories were also politically subordinate to it. One aspect of the question was that of racial discrimination. Notwithstanding the Portuguese representative's statement at the 1028th meeting that Portugal repudiated racial discrimination, the Statute of 20 May 1954 concerning Portuguese Natives of the Provinces of Guinea, Angola and Mozambique stipulated that Negroes who did not possess the learning and the social and personal habits presupposed for the unrestricted application of the public and private law pertaining to Portuguese citizens were considered to be Natives. Professor Harris had written that the effect of that special status was to deny to Negroes, but not to Whites, the most elementary safeguards against violations of person and property. Professor Harris had added that it was strange that a country which professed a tradition of anti-racism and which had amply demonstrated it in other quarters of the globe should in Mozambique be dedicated to one of the most systematic and thorough attempts to erect discriminatory barriers against the well-being and social progress of the great mass of the Negro population.

15. A simple examination of the Portuguese Organic Law showed the existence of juridical subordination also. Under that law, the Minister for Overseas Provinces had the power to annul the legislative measures taken by the governments of overseas provinces or decisions of the governor; the "indigenato" system made it impossible for civil maturity to be achieved outside the Portuguese State; and civil, commercial or criminal actions against the governor or the administrator of a province could be brought only in Lisbon courts.

16. The existence of economic subordination was proved by the fact that under the Portuguese Constitution, the Organic Law and the labour and agricultural system in the overseas provinces flagrant economic injustices were inflicted upon the indigenous people. To mention only a few, the Constitution forbade the overseas provinces to negotiate loans in foreign countries and declared that the achievement of a proper balance between the development needs and welfare of the peoples of the overseas provinces and the rights and legitimate advantage of the Portuguese nation was reserved to metropolitan Portugal; the Organic Law provided that banks of issue must maintain their reserves, headquarters and central administration in mainland Portugal; and that the Minister for Overseas Provinces must authorize the establishment, reopening and change of equipment or site of industrial enterprises and approve concessions of public land, railways deemed in the public interest, and important public works. The Minister also directed and controlled the budgets of the overseas provinces, and authorized budget transfers. According to Mr. Marcello Caetano, a former Portuguese Minister for the Colonies, Portugal did not accept in absolute terms the principle of the primacy of the interests of the indigenous inhabitants.

17. As for labour conditions in the overseas provinces, the Labour Code of 1899 prescribed that all Natives of the Portuguese provinces were subject to the obligation of seeking work and, if they did not comply with that obligation, the public authorities could force it upon them. Under that Code, African men and women were forced to work wherever they were needed. Professor Harris stated that forced labourers were paid the minimum legal wage in each region, ranging from $5 to less than $2 a month. He described the hygienic conditions under which the labourers worked as so appalling that during the early years of the mining operations the mortality rate among the Africans had been as high as among combatants in the Second World War. In other parts of the Portuguese colonies the exploitation of the African took the form of obliging farmers to plant specific crops. Professor Harris said that the aim of that policy was to bind the farmer to the land and to force him to plant cotton, which he must sell to the concession companies—which were private Portuguese companies—at prices which were fixed by the Government far below those available on the international market.

18. In view of the Portuguese representative's statement at the 892nd meeting of the General Assembly that Portugal had been able to ratify the two ILO Conventions concerning the abolition of forced labour without altering its internal laws, he would like to hear from the representative of the ILO whether that organization knew of the systems of forced labour in the Portuguese territories and what measures it had taken to put an end to them.

19. Principle VII (a) stipulated that free association should be the result of a free and voluntary choice by the peoples of the territory concerned expressed by informed and democratic processes. An examination of the legal and judicial systems revealed that the indigenous inhabitants of the provinces had no voice whatever because they were not Portuguese citizens. In that connexion, it was worth noting that under the Constitution the legislative functions of the governments of the overseas provinces were exercised under the supervision of the bodies in which sovereignty resided, namely the Head of State, the National Assembly, the Government and the courts of justice—all at Lisbon. According to article 151 of the Constitution, legislative measures by the governments of the overseas provinces could not revoke, suspend or be contrary to the provisions of the Constitution or of any other measures approved by the legislative bodies of metropolitan Portugal. By virtue of the Organic Law as amended by Law No. 2076, if the governor, who presided over the sessions of the overseas legislative councils, disagreed with the opinion of the council, he submitted the matter for decision to the Minister for Overseas Provinces. In accordance with the Organic Law, the majority of the legislative councils in the African provinces consisted of members elected every four years from among Portuguese citizens only.

20. It was clear from what he had said that the indigenous population of Africa had no place in the legal and constitutional picture. There could be no doubt that Portuguese sovereignty was imposed upon the people of the African territories and that the Constitution had been framed without even their knowledge.

21. Principle VIII determined the criteria of integration of a Non-Self-Governing Territory with an independent State. The application of those criteria to the peoples and territories of Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea led to certain conclusions. The first was that not all the inhabitants of the overseas provinces were Portuguese citizens, the overwhelming majority being indigenous inhabitants, or "non-civilized"; in Mozambique only about 1 per cent of the population were Portuguese citizens, in Angola about 3 per cent. Secondly, according to the Constitution and the Organic Law, the State could compel "Natives" to work on public works of general interest to the community, in the execution of judicial sentences of a penal character or for the discharge of fiscal liabilities. Thirdly, the acquisition of individual rights over real property by indigenous inhabitants was regulated by the Statute of May 1954 and those rights could in no case be freehold. Fourthly, the cultivation of certain cash crops was compulsory in the overseas provinces, for the purpose of providing supplies for the metropolitan country.

22. According to James Duffy's book entitled Portuguese Africa,^{2/} although native lands were guaranteed by the Statute, the actual boundaries of African lands were not clear; some African land was absorbed by European coffee plantations in north-eastern Angola and some Africans had been resettled in Mozambique to make room for sugar plantations. The same book spoke of the unequal status and rights of the European and indigenous populations and stated that every male "indigena" was required to possess an identification card and passbook with his tax record and fingerprints.

23. It was clear that the Portuguese system of colonialism went much further than any other form of European colonialism. It not only sought economic and political advantages but was endeavouring to obliterate the very concept of African nationalism. Under the assimilation system the African was taught to think of himself as a Portuguese and not as an African.

24. After the slave trade, armed conquest and colonial war, Portugal had brought those African territories under the heel of colonialism. Conquest did not, however, confer any rights; the Charter did not recognize that Members of the United Nations should hold on to their possessions. In the Portuguese colonies an unprecedented system of humiliation and servitude was practised with the implied approval of the so-called free world. If Portugal was to be regarded as part of the free world, another definition of freedom should be sought. The delegation of Iraq believed that humanity was one and indivisible and the reign of terror in Angola, Mozambique and Guinea was regarded by his Government with the utmost seriousness. It earnestly hoped that its concern was shared by other countries, in particular by those which claimed to stand for freedom.

25. Mr. BOUZIRI (Tunisia) recalled that the question under discussion had already been debated at length in the Fourth Committee but that, owing to the obstruction of the colonial Powers and in particular of Portugal, it had not been possible to lay down clear principles that could be embodied in a document which the General Assembly would approve. Now, however, as a result of the struggle of the oppressed peoples, colonialism was on the wane everywhere and the administering Powers themselves had agreed to the principles included in the report of the Special Committee of Six. That agreement was a matter of rejoicing to the Tunisian delegation.

26. In the view of his delegation, as of all the speakers who had preceded him, the report of the Special Committee was clear, concise and full of substance. There had apparently been some disagreement and certain reservations had been made, but they did not affect the value of the report. He would not make a detailed analysis of the report but would draw attention to certain passages which he felt to be particularly important.

27. His delegation was grateful to the Special Committee for having stressed the important truth stated in the last sentence of paragraph 17. It hoped that the colonialist Powers would appreciate its scope and assess the heavy responsibility which would be theirs if they continued to oppose the desire for independence of the nations under their yoke.

28. His delegation enthusiastically endorsed the idea expressed in paragraph 18, namely, that the Charter was a living document and the obligations under Chapter XI must be viewed in the light of the changing spirit of the times. The truth of that statement was manifested by the world-wide movement in favour of freedom and equality. Any attempt to stop or to delay that movement would not only create disturbances and upheavals over a large part of the earth but would be a serious blow to the principles of the Charter.

29. The Tunisian delegation had carefully studied the principles enunciated in the report. Actually those principles were not new and their reformulation might have been of purely academic interest had it not been for the fact that on the present occasion the administering Powers had accepted them and that the fate of millions of human beings depended upon their application. All the principles were based on common sense and on the understanding and precise interpretation of the United Nations Charter and of international law.

30. If any doubts still subsisted about the obligation to transmit information in accordance with Article 73, they should be finally dispelled by principles I and III; he hoped never again to hear the claim that the transmission of information depended on the good will of the Administering Member concerned. The ensuing principles defined the characteristics of Non-Self-Governing Territories which governed that obligation.

31. The principles should help to put an end to the legal fictions created by the colonial Powers, which were all too familiar to the formerly dependent territories. Those fictions deceived no one and the device by which Portugal and Spain had transformed their territories into overseas provinces would be overcome by the pressure of facts and reality. In the light of the racial discrimination practised in those territories, the geographical separation and the political, ethnical and cultural differences, there could be no doubt of the fact that those so-called provinces were in reality Non-Self-Governing Territories in the terms of Article 73 of the Charter.

32. His delegation would have been happy to see Spain and Portugal adopt a more reasonable attitude in conformity with their obligations as Member States. Unfortunately that had not occurred. It hoped that the report of the Special Committee and the principles enunciated therein would lead them to a more reasonable conception of their relations with the non-Self-Governing Territories under their domination and to the granting of independence as a pacific solution of their colonial problems. Those two countries should not forget that the United Nations, which was competent to decide the question, would no longer tolerate the decisions of the General Assembly being ignored. They should realize that if they persisted in their stubborn attitude, their aggressive policy would lead to serious consequences for which they would bear the entire responsibility. They should realize that all the African countries were behind the colonized territories in their struggle against colonialism and that they would not relinquish the struggle until all those territories, and especially those occupied by Portugal and Spain, achieved freedom. Lastly, they should realize that all the struggles of colonialism against the oppressed peoples had been defeated, that those it was now waging were being lost and that while they involved great sacrifices for the oppressed peoples they also entailed great human, material and spiritual losses for the colonizing countries.

33. In a few days his delegation would state its position on the inevitable end of colonialism, but in the meantime it hoped the Fourth Committee would adopt the principles in the report of the Special Committee of Six and seek a way of putting an end to the challenge to the United Nations launched by some of its Members.

34. Mr. NOGUEIRA (Portugal) said that, before explaining the position of his delegation with regard to the report of the Special Committee of Six, he thought it his duty to reiterate the stand of his Government regarding the proceedings which had led to the establishment of that Committee. In that connexion he drew attention to the relevant passage of his Government's reply to the Secretary-General in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) (A/AC.100/1, para. 143), which clarified his delegation's position in respect of the resolution and of any developments arising therefrom. His delegation, however, always kept an open mind and had studied the report without any preconceived views. It had also examined with all due respect and attention the replies received from other Governments. Incidentally, he pointed out that only twenty-six Governments had taken the trouble to respond to the Secretary-General's invitation—a fact which would seem to suggest that the subject had not aroused the interest of the large majority of Member Governments. Finally, his delegation had taken into account the compilation of legal opinions and other documents prepared by the Secretariat (A/AC.100/2/Add.2), the account of discussions (A/AC.100/2) and the various drafts of the report before its final formulation.

35. He thought the members of the Committee would agree with him that the question before it was once again the interpretation of Article 73 of the Charter. Precisely because various divergent interpretations had been placed on Article 73, the Special Committee of Six had tried to establish a set of principles which sought to implement that provision without interpreting it. His delegation, however, considered that no provision of the Charter or of any other legal document could be properly implemented without prior definition of its meaning and scope and that there could be no agreement on the implementation if there was no agreement on the substance. The question of interpretation therefore became once again of paramount importance.

36. Many interpretations had been suggested for Article 73. Every delegation was entitled to its opinion; his delegation requested for its views the same respect that it readily accorded to others. Nevertheless, the fact remained that Article 73 was a written provision of the Charter and that no interpretation was valid unless it was based on it. Many delegations were tempted to see everything they wished in Article 73. The following sentence from the first draft report of the Special Committee of Six gave a clear indication of the frame of mind of some delegations: "It [the Committee] therefore approached the problem from a practical point of view, bearing in mind the political realities of the world situation".^{3/} A practical point of view or the idea of a given political situation were, however, matters of individual interpretation and all sincere interpretations were equally valid and worthy of respect. Nevertheless they did not provide a juridical or legal foundation for any obligation. His delegation did not therefore feel that that was a good point of departure for an interpretation of Article 73 of the Charter. The only way was to revert to the letter and the spirit of Article 73 and try to make clear its meaning without indulging in flights of fancy.

37. Notwithstanding the views of individual delegations, Chapter XI was entitled "Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories". Some might suggest that the word "declaration" should not be understood literally but rather in the sense of an obligation. Such an interpretation might in principle be valid, but its validity must be tested and to that end Chapter XI must be placed in its proper context. If that were done it immediately became clear that the word "declaration" meant in fact nothing else but a declaration—an act which was entirely left to the initiative and discretion of Member Governments. The question therefore was in what context Article 73 and Chapter XI should be read and the obvious answer was that they should be read in the context of the Charter. The first clear indication provided by the Charter was that it established three different systems for the promotion of the welfare of peoples and for co-operation among nations in the social, economic, educational and political fields. The first system was that provided by Chapters IX and X of the Charter, entitled "International economic and social co-operation"; the second was that outlined in Chapter XI, entitled "Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories"; the third was laid down in Chapter XII, entitled "International Trusteeship System". Those systems were clearly delimited and the Charter had emphasized the differences by creating different forms of application for each of them. The first and third systems were "international" systems; in other words the authors of the Charter, by placing them under that heading, had intended that the international community, through the appropriate machinery of the United Nations, should have a say in their implementation. In regard to the second system, however, the word "international" had been omitted, which was an indication that the problem was considered to be national rather than international in character. Furthermore, the Charter emphasized the differences among the various systems by providing machinery for "international economic and social co-operation" in the form of the Economic and Social Council and for the "International Trusteeship System" in the form of the Trusteeship Council, while it did not provide any machinery for the supervision of the implementation of Chapter XI. There was no doubt, therefore, that the Charter did not ascribe to Chapter XI the same scope and the same obligations that it had embodied in Chapters IX and X on the one hand and Chapter XII on the other.

38. That conclusion was substantiated by the history of the provisions of the Charter with regard to the subject. Both the Preamble and Article 23 of the Covenant of the League of Nations had recognized the need for co-operative action in the economic, social and humanitarian fields. After the Second World War it had been obvious to the drafters of the Charter that the work done by the League in that sphere should be continued and even intensified. Therefore, in the Preamble and in Chapters IX and X of the Charter the idea had again been expressed that international peace and security on the one hand and economic and social welfare on the other were unavoidably linked. To strengthen international co-operation in that field provision had been made for adequate machinery within the framework of the United Nations. The purpose and meaning of Chapter XII, though very different in nature, had a somewhat similar origin: the Mandates System had not provided the necessary conditions that would enable all the territories under mandate to achieve independence and it had therefore been necessary to establish a new form of administration of those territories under international supervision, so the International Trusteeship System had come into being. Again adequate machinery had been needed and the Trusteeship Council had been established.

39. That contention could be given further proof by an analysis of other parts of the Charter; whenever the Charter provided for international action by the United Nations or action by Members which must be carried out under United Nations supervision, it provided for the existence of competent organs for the purpose. When the Charter had not provided for machinery and organs, that lack of machinery was clearly due to the fact that the subject had been deemed by the authors of the Charter to be of a national rather than an international character. That was precisely the case where Chapter XI was concerned.

40. A close scrutiny of the Charter confirmed those conclusions. Article 13, for instance, empowered the General Assembly to "initiate studies and make recommendations" and explicitly referred to Chapters IX and X. No reference was made to Chapter XI. Article 16 dealt with the functions of the General Assembly and explicitly referred to Chapters XII and XIII; again no mention was made of Chapter XI. Chapter IX provided further evidence: Article 55 mentioned the United Nations, Article 56 spoke of co-operation with the Organization, under Article 58 the Organization was entitled to make recommendations, Articles 59 and 60 entrusted the Organization with certain functions and responsibilities. Nothing similar was to be found in Chapter XI. As far as Chapters XII and XIII were concerned, Article 75 ascribed certain powers to the United Nations; Article 83 referred to the functions of the United Nations, as did also Articles 85 and 87. Again nothing equivalent was to be found in Chapter XI. The inescapable conclusion was that the Charter ascribed to the General Assembly certain functions and responsibilities in connexion with the implementation of the international system of economic co-operation and with the International Trusteeship System but none whatever in connexion with the "Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories". On the contrary, whereas the Charter always referred to the United Nations when dealing with matters covered by Chapters IX and XII, in Chapter XI the emphasis was on "Members of the United Nations", thereby placing upon them, and upon them only, the responsibilities and powers which under the other two systems were placed in the General Assembly. Members of the United Nations were not even requested to co-operate with the Organization for the implementation of Articles 73 and 74, as they were in connexion with Chapters IX and XII.

41. There could therefore be no doubt that the three systems were entirely different in nature and in scope. Similar views, although in another context, had been many times expressed in the Fourth Committee. As long ago as 1947, during the second session of the General Assembly, the United States representative had spoken of a sharp and fundamental distinction made at San Francisco between Chapter XI on the one hand and Chapters XII and XIII on the other. He had stated that in many Non-Self-Governing Territories sovereignty or jurisdiction was vested in the Administering States and that nothing in the Charter changed that fundamental fact. On the other hand, he had said, supervision of Trust Territories lay in the hands of the United Nations. It had appeared to the United States delegation to be of fundamental importance that the sharp differentiation made in the Charter between territories and peoples under the sovereignty or jurisdiction of an independent State and those which were not should be maintained. Chapters XII and XIII, he had concluded, materially altered the status of Non-Self-Governing Territories coming within their scope, whereas Chapter XI did not, and no effort should be made to blur that distinction.

42. For all those well-founded reasons, it was most surprising that some delegations had expressed the opinion that the provisions of the International Trusteeship System should apply also to the system of the Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories. Curiously enough, those same delegations rejected the logical consequences of their opinion and refused to accept in respect of Chapter XI the provision requiring a two-thirds majority for decisions on trusteeship matters, as also the provision of Article 77 c concerning the voluntary placing of territories under trusteeship.

43. The entire text of Articles 73 and 74 was addressed to Member States and they alone had the power to make declarations in consequence of which they might accept certain obligations. It was nowhere suggested that a declaration, whether in the form of a resolution or otherwise, might be made by the United Nations itself. Moreover, the text referred to Members which had or had assumed certain responsibilities. Although the United Nations might be aware of existing responsibilities, declared by a Member State, it had no means of learning what further responsibilities any Member State had assumed except by a new declaration from that State, which was free to declare such new responsibilities at its discretion. Again, Article 73 referred to "territories", a word which had no precise juridical meaning in international law and might have widely varying meanings in a constitutional text. It was nowhere defined in the Charter and it was therefore obvious that the General Assembly's powers to define its meaning were expressly limited to Article 77; in fact, the definition of the status of any territory other than those mentioned in Article 77 was left solely to Member States.

44. In his delegation's view, the concern of the Committee was rather with the people inhabiting a territory than with the definition of the status of a territory. The Charter stated in Article 73 that the interests of the inhabitants were paramount; that simply meant that the Charter took for granted the political status of the territory as defined by Member Governments and was therefore concerned only with the condition of the people.

45. Article 73 e referred to two important points: the question of the transmission of information and the question of the limitations arising from security and constitutional considerations. His delegation had devoted much attention to the subject and had taken into consideration the opinions expressed both within and without the Committee; the more it did so, the more firmly did it abide by the convictions which it held. There was no question that Article 73 did not, either in letter or spirit, prescribe any specific obligation other than that of making a declaration, the terms and scope of which were left entirely to the discretion of Member States. It followed that the only obligations assumed by Member States were those arising from that declaration; were it not so, the precepts laid down in Articles 73 and 74, addressed solely to Member States, would not be comprehensible. In fact the General Assembly, by accepting the practice established by the United Nations Secretariat, had always endorsed that interpretation—indeed, it could not do otherwise; Governments had always been free to reply to the Secretary-General in accordance with their own understanding of what was required of them under own legal and constitutional systems, of which they were the sole judges.

46. If the constitutional limitations referred to in Article 73 e derived from the constitutions of the Non-Self-Governing Territories themselves, as some delegations had claimed, then the security limitations referred to in the same paragraph would also derive from those constitutions, and responsibility for them would devolve on the Non-Self-Governing Territories rather than on the Member States concerned. That was certainly not the intention of the Charter, since Articles 73 and 74 concerned Member States only, no other entities being recognized by the Charter. If Member States, by their free declarations, assumed obligations under Article 73, they and they alone had the power to determine, in accordance with their own constitutions, the limitations which might exist. The interpretation of a national constitution was a matter within the exclusive competence of a Member State and was not one for discussion by any international body; a dangerous precedent would be set by acting otherwise. Constitutional limitation operated in two ways: it could limit the nature or amount of the information provided, in cases where a Government was allowed to transmit information, and it could prohibit a Member State from supplying information on territories and populations whose political status that State alone could define.

47. In short, the only obligation arising from Articles 73 and 74 was that Member States were required to make a declaration defining the obligation, if any, which they undertook. The scope of that declaration was left to the discretion of that State and constitutional considerations might limit or prevent the transmission of information. Many other delegations did in fact share that point of view, as did many authorities on international law. Some delegations on the other hand thought discussion of the provisions of the Charter to be useless and academic. The representative of Iran, for example, had maintained that, after fifteen years, many legal concepts of the Charter were out of date and failed to meet reality. But it was not possible to twist the meaning of the Charter to suit individual ideas or theories: it was the basic law of the United Nations. That was not to say that his delegation did not consider that some of its provisions failed to meet modern needs, but a way to effect changes in the Charter was provided in Articles 108 and 109. His delegation agreed that the Charter was a living document which should be kept alive; the best way to accomplish that end was to respect it, not to destroy it through distortions.

48. His delegation was not alone in holding those views. In an advisory opinion, recorded on page 62 of its Yearbook, 1947-1948, the International Court of Justice had said that the question of the interpretation of a provision of the Charter was a purely legal one. Again, General Assembly resolution 171 (II) had stated that it was of paramount importance that the interpretation of the Charter should be based on recognized principles of international law. At the 113th plenary meeting, held during the second session of the General Assembly, the Soviet Union representative, Mr. Vyshinsky, had said that the principles contained in the Charter were apparently regarded as a stumbling block by some delegations, which under the guise of various amendments and resolutions were seeking to amend it in the direction which they considered important.

49. Mr. Lachs, the Polish representative in the Sixth Committee, had said that the success or failure of the United Nations depended on how it adapted itself to the requirements of the day and that, to be successful, it must reflect changes in the field of law; the United Nations could not rely on the world of yesterday or the world as some wished it to be, but must maintain close contact with life.

50. His delegation's interpretation of the Charter had necessarily guided it in its examination of the report of the Special Committee of Six. Principle I referred to territories known at the time when the Charter had been drafted to be of the "colonial type". That not only implied that the word "colony" had been previously defined but it gave the report a much wider scope. In his delegation's view, that was an improvement. Again, principle I seemed to take it for granted that an obligation to transmit information did in fact exist under Article 73 e of the Charter—a view with which his delegation did not agree—whereas, by the terms of General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV), the Special Committee of Six had been given the very task of ascertaining whether or not such an obligation existed.

51. As to principle II, his delegation failed to understand what, in legal terms, a "dynamic state of evolution" might mean. Presumably the word "dynamic" was used in opposition to "static"; but, whatever those words might mean in terms of science, they were utterly meaningless in terms of law. Perhaps the phrase was intended to mean that the concept of a Non-Self-Governing Territory was a continuously changing reality evolving towards a certain target. If that was so, it confused two entirely distinct notions: the theoretical concept of Non-Self-Governing Territories, on the one hand, and the physical reality to which the concept applied on the other. The one was immutable, whereas the other could undergo a gradual change until it fell under a different concept, namely, the concept of a self-governing territory. Until it became a self-governing territory, however, and no matter how near it might be to that status, it was still a Non-Self-Governing Territory. If for the sake of argument fifty conditions had to be fulfilled before a territory became self-governing, it would still be non-self-governing if forty-nine of them had been met. Consequently, the words "dynamic evolution" were entirely meaningless and irrelevant.

52. Like principle I, principle III reached a conclusion on the basis of an assumption which was not discussed, when it was precisely that conclusion that was the subject of controversy.

53. With regard to principles IV and V, it was not clear whether geographical, ethnical or cultural distinctness were to be taken separately or together. If taken separately, it would mean that there could be a Non-Self-Governing Territory contiguous to, or even within, a metropolitan State, provided that ethnical or cultural differences existed; if there was no ethnical or cultural difference, a territory might be fully self-governing even though it might be geographically separate. Again, it might mean that a territory was non-self-governing if, being geographically contiguous and ethnically identical, it was culturally different. His delegation believed the philosophy behind those hypotheses to be in sharp contrast with the highest ideals of mankind. The suggestion was that all ethnic groups, no matter how small, should constitute different and autonomous entities with separate and autonomous political power and that such groups should necessarily be in conflict with other groups. It was a denial of the fact that, in the great and progressive nations of the world, a combination of many races and cultures had made possible their outstanding contribution to civilization, whereas a society having only one race, one culture or one language might seem to be happy but was certainly stagnant.

54. His delegation did not in principle reject the elements of an administrative, political, juridical, economic or historical nature referred to in principle V, and took it to mean that if those elements did not arbitrarily affect the relationship between the metropolitan country and a given territory and that if such a relationship did not place that territory in a position of subordination, then the result was a fully self-governing territory.

55. In principle VI, the Special Committee appeared to have taken it for granted that everyone knew when a State had emerged as a sovereign and independent State. That was not the case; sovereignty in international law was a very controversial subject and it had to be admitted that in the international community there were several degrees of sovereignty. There were States, like Andorra or San Marino, which, though independent, were not fully sovereign. Nor did such States fall within the next category mentioned in the report—namely, free association with an independent State—because they were themselves independent. Were they therefore not self-governing? Again, there were States which did not enjoy recognition by other States; recognition was unavoidably linked with sovereignty, since in international law the entry into legal existence of a State was marked by recognition. On the other hand, there were States which were not recognized by others but were Members of the United Nations, and States, like Switzerland, which had been recognized by all but which were not Members of the United Nations. The phrase "sovereign independent State" was therefore unfortunate and ambiguous, since emergence as a sovereign and independent country was not an immediately recognizable factor constituting a universally accepted criterion.

56. In principle VII, the Special Committee of Six had merely described a federation or a confederation of States. He thought that the Committee was agreed on those two possibilities but there had been an important omission; the principle made no reference to the secession of a State or territory after acceding to the federation or confederation concerned. Moreover, principle VII used the words "democratic processes" and "democratic means". Those words were difficult to define; there was more than one type of democracy; there were even ruthless dictatorships which called themselves not only democratic but popular. In his delegation's view, respect for national laws provided the only basis for an agreed definition of a democratic process through which the wishes of the people could be expressed.

57. His delegation had no comments to make on principle VIII and was in general agreement with that part of the report, but if principle VIII was to be taken with principle IX, then his earlier observations would again apply. In particular, his delegation would object to any recognition of supervision by the United Nations as being desirable in certain circumstances. The Charter nowhere envisaged such a supervision where Non-Self-Governing Territories were concerned, and his delegation was not prepared to subscribe to any violation of the Charter or to endorse any attempt to force the Charter to say what it did not say.

58. His delegation did not agree with principles X, XI and XII. He would not repeat what he had already said on the question of the transmission of information. He noted, however, that the Special Committee of Six had admitted that the quantum of information could be limited. Carried to its logical conclusion, that would mean that constitutional limitations might reduce the amount of information to nothing, and he wondered why the Special Committee had shied away from saying so. On the other hand, were the views of that Committee to be accepted, the way would be open for the examination and criticism of national constitutions by the various organs of the United Nations, for the question of the constitutional relations of a territory with the Administering Member could not be examined by the United Nations without examining the constitutions of Member States, which in his delegation's view would be unacceptable.

59. The points arising out of Articles 73 and 74 and the Special Committee's report might seem to be questions of detail, but the fact was that the Committee was facing a much wider problem and one which should be of the gravest concern to all Member States. The issue was most serious and the future work of the United Nations might be at stake. The Charter did not define a Non-Self-Governing Territory and the question under discussion was whether a legal definition should be accepted or whether a political definition should be evolved. Two guiding principles were provided by the Charter: namely, the responsibility of Member States for the administration of any given territories and the measure of self-government obtained by such territories: in other words, there was on the one hand the national constitution of a Member State and, on the other, the political situation of a territory and its inhabitants. The two factors were of an entirely different nature and could not be combined: a precise definition could only be reached if there was no divergence between the guiding criteria. As it was, the Committee had to choose between the acceptance or the rejection of national law. Once the international community had recognized a State, it was not entitled to express any further differing views; national law, it was his delegation's firm opinion, was not a matter for discussion. Some delegations, when defining a Non-Self-Governing Territory, sought to discard entirely the concept of national law and were apparently guided exclusively by political considerations: for them, legal arguments and the existence of national law were merely obstacles to progress and to the development of societies and peoples. That was a dangerous path to follow and, if they discarded the national laws of others, the time might come when their own might be brushed aside. Such a course of political expediency involved seeking shelter behind a majority gathered at random and prompted by motives which, however much they might at one time coincide, might become opposed; the States concerned would then be in a minority, at a time when their own national law was no longer respected. The question arose whether the majority of the General Assembly had the power to impose its decisions on a country in matters pertaining to that country's internal juridical order. His delegation's reply to that question was firmly in the negative; the United Nations was not a world parliament nor was it a world government.

60. He wished to draw attention to a most serious omission in the report of the Special Committee. As was well known, questions involving Non-Self-Governing Territories had been dealt with in association with what was called colonialism and imperialism. The Fourth Committee had for years concerned itself with a particular and narrow type of colonialism and imperialism; but the subject was in fact wider and should embrace imperialism of a political and ideological nature. In recent decades a new and more dangerous type of colonialism had developed and the report had failed to take that reality into account.

61. In conclusion, he wished to say that his country had been subjected to constant attack and to slanderous accusations in the Committees; he reserved his right to reply to them and to speak again if necessary.

62. Mr. KUCHAVA (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the representative of Portugal, in his attempt to convince the Committee that the Charter did not oblige his country to transmit information on the Portuguese colonies, had tried to enlist Mr. Vyshinsky in his cause. In the passage which the representative of Portugal had quoted, Mr. Vyshinsky had not spoken in favour of colonialism; he had been appealing for strict compliance with the terms of the Charter. That was precisely what his delegation required of Portugal.

Expression of sympathy on the occasion of the disasters in Pakistan

63. The CHAIRMAN expressed to the representative of Pakistan his own and the Committee's heartfelt sympathy on the two disasters which had occurred in Pakistan in recent weeks and on the heavy loss of life caused by the typhoons. He asked him to convey the Committee's sympathy to the Government and people of Pakistan.

64. Mr. HUSAIN (Pakistan) thanked the Chairman for his expression of sympathy, which he would convey to his Government.

AGENDA ITEM 38

Study of principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: report of the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) (A/4526) (continued)

1. Mr. LOOMES (Australia) associated his delegation with the congratulations offered to the members of the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter, on the constructive goodwill they had shown in the examination of a very complicated question. Although there was general agreement on the aims of Chapter XI of the Charter and on the fact that the interests of the inhabitants were paramount, opinions differed on the methods to be employed.

2. His delegation endorsed in general the twelve principles enunciated by the Special Committee in section V, part B, of its report (A/4526). Principle IX was the only one about which it had doubts: it wondered whether it was really necessary to insist on universal suffrage. The application of the principles, however, raised questions which would have to be studied later and in connexion with which his delegation reserved the right to make a further statement. The Australian Government had always transmitted the information requested in Article 73 e; it had even voluntarily provided information of a political and constitutional nature on Papua.

3. He was glad to note that principle VI, while recognizing various ways in which a Non-Self-Governing Territory could reach a full measure of self-government, took into account the development of the modern world, as a result of which certain small States could ~~understandably~~ decide in favour of association with a larger State, it being clearly understood that such association, as was stated in principle VII, should be the result of "a free and voluntary choice by the peoples of the territory concerned". The provisions of principle IX, which dealt with the integration of a territory with another independent State, were equally important. The principles drawn up by the Special Committee were also, however, a reflection of more general considerations, embodying the idea that the progressive development of self-government must take into account the particular circumstances of a territory and the aspirations of its peoples. It was on the basis of those principles and considerations that the smooth transition of the territories from dependent status to self-government or independence should be ensured.

4. Mr. KUDRYAVTSEV (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that, in his view, the point under discussion was not the subject for an academic exercise but was a practical problem of very great and urgent importance. Its importance was due not so much to the principles themselves, which were nothing new, as to the violation by two Member States, Spain and Portugal, of the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter. The two countries in question described territories which were simply colonies as "overseas provinces". It might seem surprising that the United Nations should tolerate that violation of the Charter, but Spain and Portugal had the support of other colonialist countries which were members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, such as the United States, the United Kingdom and Belgium. No legal argument, however, would convince the Committee that the territories administered by Spain and Portugal were not colonies, under the complete domination of the metropolitan country.

5. The Portuguese colonies were characterized by their economic backwardness. There were facts to prove it: in a lecture given at Lisbon in 1956 on Portugal in Africa, a Portuguese lecturer had said that there were some grounds for concern at the industrial and economic backwardness of Mozambique; an article in The Times of London on 22 June 1960 had pointed out that very little industrialization had taken place in Angola, with a view to preventing its competing with the metropolitan country. Thus for five hundred years the Portuguese colonialists had kept their colonies under the yoke in order to derive the greatest profits from them; under the pretext of bringing European civilization to Africa, they had sucked the Africans' blood. The result of Portugal's "civilizing mission" was well known: slaves, recruited by armies of mercenaries and transported to America, had increased the incomes of the Portuguese "bourgeoisie" in the metropolitan country. That policy, followed also by Spanish, English, French and other colonizers, had transformed Africa into a human hunting ground and had cost more than one hundred million Africans their life and freedom. Mankind would never forget the misfortunes of the colonial peoples. According to the same article in The Times, the slave trade and forced labour had reduced Angola to such a state of destitution that the density of the population was at present the lowest of all the countries of black Africa. The need for so-called assimilation had led the Portuguese authorities to introduce the system of contract labour, under which every African over eighteen years of age was obliged to work for at least six months in the year.

6. As far as education was concerned, according to the official statistics quoted by The Times only four Angolese out of 4,200,000 had had an opportunity to continue their studies beyond the secondary level, and the few schools, which were, moreover, run by the missions, were for European children only.

7. At the present time, when the whole world was tired of colonialism and more and more African States were acceding to independence, when life itself demanded that the whole colonial system should be abolished forthwith, the Portuguese colonizers were trying to extend their possessions by demarcating their frontiers. Thus they were continuing to practise in respect to the African population a policy of racial discrimination based on the theory of the superiority of European moral principles. That policy of racism was sanctioned by article 3 of the Statute of 20 May 1954, which laid down that any compromise with indigenous ways and customs was conditioned upon moral and humanitarian considerations and the supremacy of Portuguese interests. It was an affront to the dignity of the Africans, and the words spoken by the Portuguese representative at the previous meeting seemed ludicrous indeed beside the sufferings of the African peoples. Portugal had, of course, the support of the United States and its well defined place in the Western military blocs. At the present day, however, events showed that the African peoples had decided to sacrifice everything in order to win freedom. They were awakening, becoming aware of their strength, breaking the chains of slavery and driving out the invaders. The new Africa was being born in a terrible struggle of immense historic significance. The "backward" peoples were rising against those who claimed to be civilizers; the former were fighting for human freedom and dignity; the latter were endeavouring to obstruct their path to freedom. But no guns could withstand the will of peoples.

8. The United Nations should make its contribution to the great cause of the liberation of the colonial peoples forthwith. It should recognize that the Spanish and Portuguese possessions were colonies, and as such subject to the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter. It should adopt the draft declaration on the granting of independence (A/4502 and Corr.1), the implementation of which would mark the end of colonial rule and would bring freedom to all oppressed peoples.

9. Mr. EILAN (Israel) said that the report of the Special Committee was so important that it should certainly be taken into account whenever questions of colonial status arose. It had also, however, an immediate historic importance in that it demonstrated the Committee's responsibility in that field.

10. In voting in favour of General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) establishing the Special Committee, his delegation had been guided by two main considerations.

It had realized the practical value of principles in determining whether a territory had attained independence. It had also wished that everything possible should be done to accelerate the process of national emancipation, especially in Africa. During the general debate in the Assembly (897th plenary meeting) the Israel Minister for Foreign Affairs had said that nothing was so debasing as national dependence and inequality and nothing so exhilarating as national independence and equality, and that no nation had been ordained to rule over others or fated to be ruled by others.

11. The Special Committee's report sought to interpret certain provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter in the light of changing circumstances. If it were adopted, it would have to be regarded as an authoritative interpretation of the provisions governing the obligations of Member States in relation to territories for which they were responsible. Expressing his satisfaction that the Special Committee had achieved unanimity, he pointed out that the report rightly linked the fulfilment of the legitimate aspirations of dependent peoples with the preservation of international peace and security; the existence in Africa of Non-Self-Governing Territories side by side with free and independent States might well cause international friction.

12. Moreover, the Special Committee had confined itself strictly to its terms of reference. Despite the diversity among territories "of the colonial type", it stated, in principle I, that every Administering Member was under the obligation to transmit information; and, in principle III, that that obligation should be carried out with due regard to the fulfilment of international law. Principles IV and V defined the territories to which that obligation applied. In assuming that a territory might reach a full measure of self-government by free association with an independent State or by integration with an independent State, the Committee had obviously been guided by certain specific cases with which it was acquainted and by a problem with which it was faced at the current session and which concerned the practical application of the principles.

13. The representatives of Ghana, Liberia and Venezuela, among others, had drawn the Committee's attention to the specific case of the Portuguese possessions in Africa. Although there was no reference to them in the report, there was no doubt that it was a question of testing the contention of the Government of Portugal that those possessions were not colonies but an integral part of the metropolitan territory. That contention was based on the constitutional amendment of 11 June 1951, which had transformed the overseas territories into overseas provinces. It was essential, however, that the political realities of the day should be taken into account: if the principles set forth in the report were to be applied to Mozambique and Angola, the inevitable conclusion would be that principle IV imposed an a priori obligation on Portugal to transmit information on those two territories; similarly, that the integration which had taken place in 1951 had not met the conditions laid down in principle IX and that the people of the two territories did not possess "equal status and rights of citizenship and equal guarantees", as provided for in principle VIII. Angola and Mozambique could therefore be regarded as territories "of the colonial type", in the terms of principle I.

14. The question was whether or not Portugal was under an obligation—legal or moral—to submit information on the social, economic and educational advancement of those territories. The present situation was fraught with danger, for, as the Special Committee had pointed out, the obligations of Members under Chapter XI were not limited to Article 73: the principle of good neighbourliness mentioned in Article 74 reinforced the obligation to transmit information. His delegation therefore sincerely hoped that Portugal would consent to carry out to the full its obligations and responsibilities, as other Western Powers, no less great and ancient, had freely done.

15. Mr. SALL (Senegal) said that the obligations imposed on the Administering Members by the Charter reflected the unshakable determination of the international community to lead the colonized peoples to self-government or independence. Since 1946 more than a hundred million people in nearly thirty Non-Self-Governing Territories had attained the objectives of Chapter XI; the determination of the fifty founding Members to abolish the colonial system had therefore become the will of nearly ninety-nine States. The Committee was now better able to interpret Article 73 e in accordance with the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, for many of its members had experienced colonization and knew that independence was no longer a favour to be granted by the administering Power but an international obligation arising out of the political evolution of those Territories. It was the bounden duty of the United Nations to do away with the colonial system, which was characterized by political domination, economic exploitation and loss of human dignity. For that reason the Senegalese delegation was in favour of the clear and logical principles set out in the report of the Special Committee of Six, which would enable Member States to interpret Article 73 e in accordance with the spirit and letter of the Charter and with the lessons learnt from the political advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

16. Principle IV would suffice to prove that the possessions of Portugal and Spain, particularly those in Africa, were Non-Self-Governing Territories and that, by refusing to transmit information on those territories, the two States were violating the Charter. The Senegalese delegation solemnly urged the two States to abandon their negative attitude and to assist the peoples under their domination to advance towards self-government and independence in an orderly and peaceful manner. Those peoples, who knew themselves to have a civilization and a culture as authentic as those claimed by Spain and Portugal, would inevitably achieve the independence they aspired to, for Spain and Portugal would not be able to resist the terrific force of African nationalism. He could confirm the absolute accuracy of the information given at the previous meeting by the representative of Iraq, for refugees from Portuguese Guinea and the Cape Verde Islands were arriving in Senegal day after day. Radio Dakar had even organized special broadcasts in Portuguese for them. The humiliating system of servitude, to which the inhabitants of the Portuguese and Spanish possessions were subjected, was but one more reason for insisting on the application of Article 73 e to those territories. Portugal's contention was a myth which deceived no one. How could an inhabitant of Portuguese Guinea identify himself with a Portuguese, from whom he was divided by race, language, religion and belief? The entire system of Portuguese domination was based on the principle that the Portuguese were superior to the indigenous inhabitants. The truth was that the metropolitan country governed what it claimed were its overseas provinces without regard to the wishes of their inhabitants, whom it wrongly regarded as Portuguese, for they had never been consulted about the integration of their territories with Portugal. The explanations given by the Portuguese representative had not convinced the Senegalese delegation. It would vote in favour of the principles proposed by the Special Committee of Six and for their application to the Spanish and Portuguese possessions.

17. Mr. SOUZA-BRAGA (Brazil) remarked that, at previous sessions of the General Assembly, his delegation had considered only the legal aspects of the interpretation to be given to Chapter XI, and particularly Article 73 e, for the Brazilian people believed in law and were deeply suspicious of interpretations, because of their own history and the fact that their frontiers had been defined by arbitration. For that reason, the Brazilian delegation had always felt bound to exercise caution when considering international legal problems during the phase in which sources of law were being sought, the phase which a famous jurist had called that of "une construction de droit". When the Committee had approved the report before it, his delegation would feel bound to respect that decision also. It would then be a matter of "une constation de droit" and of defending a legal text.

18. The Brazilian delegation might be considered by some to be too loyal to its friends. It would emphasize, however, that the Africans, too, were its friends, for Brazil was the Latin-American country which was closest to Africa. Furthermore, bias usually arose from hatred, not from friendship. He who deplored a disagreement between two friends was often the person who listened to the voice of reason and whose only aim was to assist them.

19. The Brazilian delegation endorsed the principles set out in the report of the Special Committee of Six, which it would support. It trusted that the interpretation of those principles would be beyond reproach. It would be for the United Nations to make the final moral judgement, dispassionately. His delegation felt that it was too early, from a technical point of view, to give its opinion on the various theories which had been put forward regarding the application of the principles. It merely hoped that the draft resolutions to be submitted to the Committee—on which it reserved its position—would really help to improve the situation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and that the decision would be just and humane.

20. Mr. ABIKUSNO (Indonesia) observed that he had already pointed out, at the fourteenth session, that in view of the varying interpretations given to Article 73 and of recent events in Africa, it had become urgently necessary to establish the criteria for determining whether a territory was or was not a Non-Self-Governing Territory. The twelve principles defined by the Special Committee of Six were therefore very useful. They appeared to confirm the real nature of the links between the administering Powers and their dependent territories. As they were the result of agreement between three colonial Powers and three non-administering Powers, they should be a step forward towards a solution of the conflict between those two groups of Member States. Indeed, the administering Powers appeared to have no more doubts about their obligation to inform the United Nations of the policy they were applying in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The regrettable reservations made by some delegations, however, made it questionable whether the administering Powers had really been convinced that their former position was untenable. Only the application of the principles would show whether real progress had been made.

21. Principle I showed that there had been a considerable advance in colonial thinking, for it underlined the multilateral character of Chapter XI, particularly when principle I was considered in relation to principle III. It showed that it was for the United Nations to decide whether territories of the colonial type still existed and whether information about conditions in those territories should be transmitted. His delegation had always interpreted Chapter XI in that way.

22. Nevertheless, the Committee might still be faced with the same difficulties as before. Principle X acknowledged that the authority of the United Nations could be limited by security and constitutional considerations, which the colonial Powers would define unilaterally. Principle X therefore conflicted with principle III. Whereas principle III stated that the obligation to transmit information should be carried out in accordance with international law, under principle X the very elements of that law, such as the political and constitutional advancement of the territories, which would affect their future behaviour towards foreign countries, would remain within the exclusive competence of the colonial powers. The Fourth Committee had, however, recognized in many resolutions that advancement in the different fields was interconnected. Furthermore, the development of the former Non-Self-Governing Territories which had now become independent showed how desirable it was that the United Nations should be kept informed of the political and constitutional advancement of those Territories. It should be the responsibility of the United Nations to decide when security and constitutional considerations were to be taken into account. Otherwise, the United Nations might find itself without any information at a certain stage in the development of those Territories. The Indonesian delegation trusted that the principles defined by the Special Committee of Six would help the Non-Self-Governing Territories to achieve independence in a peaceful manner. It had nevertheless felt obliged to point out the difficulties which might arise in their application, particularly as the considerations put forward by Spain and Portugal to justify their intransigent attitude were of a constitutional nature.

23. Mr. KABBANI (Saudi Arabia) recalled that for many years the Committee had been holding long debates, in which some delegations had put forward legal quibbles to deny the real facts of geography and history, on the obligation laid down in Article 73 e, until the General Assembly had decided, in resolution 1467 (XIV), to establish the Special Committee of Six. He congratulated that Committee on the work it had done and whole-heartedly supported the twelve principles set forth in its report (A/4526).

24. Principles I, IV, VII, VIII and IX—the last two being so complementary that his delegation regarded them as one—conflicted with the views put forward by some of the administering Powers. It was not enough, however, to call some territories "overseas provinces" in order to avoid the obligation of transmitting information. In that connexion, he associated himself with the comments made by the representatives of Ceylon (1035th meeting) and Venezuela (1032nd meeting).

25. The twelve principles were, however, meaningless by themselves; they would take on full significance only if the Committee saw that they were applied in a realistic manner by clearly defining and listing the Non-Self-Governing Territories regarding which the Administering Members would be expected to transmit information. His delegation would be prepared to co-sponsor a draft resolution directed towards that end.

26. Mr. MAGHERU (Romania) observed that, by defining what should be understood by a "full measure of self-government", the Special Committee of Six had established the criteria for the application of Chapter XI and thus rendered a valuable service to the General Assembly; yet in so doing it had only reproduced, in greater detail, the sense of certain resolutions that had already been adopted on that question of principle. Its work had been essential, for since 1955, despite the efforts of the majority of delegations in the Fourth Committee, Spain and Portugal had refused to carry out their obligations under Chapter XI. The standards laid down by the Special Committee confirmed the fact that some territories such as Angola, Mozambique, Portuguese Guinea and Spanish Sahara, were not yet self-governing and did not satisfy the conditions set forth in principles VI et seq. of the report of the Special Committee; consequently, Spain and Portugal administered colonial territories and were therefore obliged to comply with the provisions of Chapter XI.

27. The continued refusal of those two States to accept their obligations was the more serious in that the national liberation movement of the colonial countries, especially those of Africa, was gaining unprecedented momentum and that the agenda of the General Assembly included a study of the draft declaration on the granting of independence. Yet the steps taken in the Portuguese colonies, for example, were not in the direction of independence but were designed to suppress any aspirations to independence; in a report made before the United States House of Representatives, some alarming facts had been disclosed: deportation and execution of leaders of the national liberation movement, official encouragement of colonization in Angola and Mozambique, exploitation of indigenous workers, corporal punishment and legally sanctioned racial discrimination. His delegation was convinced that the inhabitants of the Portuguese and Spanish territories had as much right to independence as any other people under colonial administration, and any decision which the General Assembly might take to proclaim the independence of the colonial peoples would be applicable to those territories.

28. Mr. ZIKRIA (Afghanistan) said that the Charter was a wisely integrated body of rules which should further the development of the international community in peace and security towards a prosperous and free world. It was thus a living document, the Chapters of which all hung together and could not be arbitrarily divided into totally separate entities. His delegation, which upheld that realistic and dynamic conception, had always wanted Chapter XI to be interpreted in keeping with the well-being of all peoples subjected to the domination of administering Powers and not in the interests of those Powers themselves. It had also maintained that the General Assembly itself was competent to decide on the principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation existed to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e and it had voted in favour of General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) establishing the Special Committee of Six.

29. The clarity and precision of the report submitted by the Special Committee was praiseworthy. The principles it set forth listed all the factors on the basis of which it could be concluded that all the territories known to be of the colonial type were indeed Non-Self-Governing Territories within the meaning of the Charter. They marked a decisive step in the history of the development of the right of peoples to self-determination and would make it possible to refute all the allegedly juridical arguments which certain colonial Powers, hopeful of protecting their private interests, had not hesitated to set up against the opinion of the large majority of Member States.

30. His delegation could not, however, fully endorse all the principles in their present form. It had particular reservations regarding principle IX (b), under which the possibility of United Nations supervision of the process of integration of a Non-Self-Governing Territory with an independent State was regarded only as a desirable contingency in certain circumstances. It could not agree that the peoples to whom the provisions of Chapter XI applied should not receive the same treatment as did the peoples under trusteeship and it had always called for effective United Nations supervision in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It categorically rejected the idea of the association or integration of a colonial territory with an independent State without supervision, for association and integration had often been effected against the will of the inhabitants and hence in defiance of the principles of self-determination and the provisions of Chapter XI.

31. His delegation had reservations also about principle II, which spoke only of a full measure of self-government as the objective for the territories, and not of independence, in spite of the definition of full autonomy given in principle VI. His delegation strongly urged that the term "independence" should appear in all parts of all documents dealing with the future of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

32. His delegation's general endorsement of the principles formulated by the Special Committee of Six did not imply that it wished to prolong the existence of the colonial system. The days of that system were numbered. Nothing could prevent the peoples still in subjection from attaining independence. The Administering Members would be well advised to carry out their Charter obligations in respect of dependent peoples conscientiously, before they were obliged to bow to an inescapable fate.

33. Mr. DARMAN (Somalia) said that, although his country had not taken part in the discussion which had led to the establishment of the Special Committee of Six, it could not, as an African State, fail to be concerned with the principles set forth in that Committee's report, since the fate of so many Africans depended on the outcome of the Fourth Committee's deliberations. Some speakers had implied that, as the item under discussion was of a delicate nature, the new Members should approach it with caution and should even abstain from participating in the debate. Yet it was precisely because his country was an African State which had only recently attained independence that it should make clear what independence meant to it, and there was no better way of doing that than by supporting any body of principles or resolutions which were calculated to accelerate the progress of all Africans and all dependent peoples towards a full measure of self-government. For Somalia to abdicate that responsibility would be to forfeit its right to independence.

34. His delegation fully supported the principles set forth by the Special Committee because they were equitable and just and respected both the spirit and the letter of Chapter XI of the Charter. Furthermore, they recognized the collective responsibility of Member States in respect of the self-determination of dependent peoples. It had been as a result of that collective responsibility that the General Assembly, in resolution 289 (IV), had placed Italian Somaliland under trusteeship for ten years, with such successful results that Somalia had become independent five months before the prescribed date.

35. He associated himself in particular with the observations of the representatives of Ghana (1032nd meeting), Mexico (1031st meeting), Nigeria and Ceylon (1035th meeting). Some speakers had named Mozambique, Angola and the Canary Islands as territories to which the twelve principles outlined by the Special Committee should apply; his delegation could think of other territories, too, and it reserved the right to advocate a more general application of the principles. It held that the General Assembly was competent to establish principles to guide the Administering Members in determining the territories for which there was an obligation to transmit information. His delegation would therefore support the approval of the report submitted by the Special Committee.

36. Mr. AZNAR (Spain), speaking on a point of order, pointed out to the Somali representative that no speaker had tried to include the Canary Islands among the territories to which the provisions of Article 73 should apply.

37. Mr. NOGUEIRA (Portugal) asked whether, in accordance with the established procedure, the Secretariat had written to the new Members to inquire whether they administered territories to which the provisions of Chapter XI applied and, if so, whether their replies had been received.

38. Mr. KUNST (Secretary of the Committee) said that the Secretariat had not yet had time to write to the new Members on the subject.

39. Mr. DIALLO (Mali) said that, as the representative of a new Member State, he considered it discourteous of the Portuguese representative to imply that the sixteen States which had just been admitted to the United Nations might have colonies. Those States, most of which were African, could in fact be proud of never having shown any racism.

40. Mr. NOGUEIRA (Portugal) explained that he had simply made use of his undeniable right to ask the Secretariat whether it had followed an established procedure.

41. Mr. BOUZIRI (Tunisia) observed that no doubt the Portuguese representative had not intended to be discourteous, but he had asked his question in a tendentious way, so that the African States had had reason to feel offended; in that sense he joined the Malian representative in protesting against statements which could cast aspersions on the new African States. The question asked by the representative of Portugal was in line with the colonialist policy of his government.

Statements by the representatives of Mali and Liberia

42. Mr. DIALLO (Mali) asked the Chairman of the Committee to convey his country's condolences to the family of Mr. Félix-Roland Moumié, whose recent death at Geneva had been the result of poisoning.

43. Miss BROOKS (Liberia) associated herself with the tribute to Mr. Moumié and wished also to pay a tribute to the memory of Mr. John Kale, who had likewise been active in the struggle for the liberation of Africa.

44. She announced that the Governments of Ethiopia and Liberia had instituted proceedings against the Union of South Africa in the International Court of Justice.

45. The CHAIRMAN took note of the statements made by the representatives of Mali and Liberia.

The meeting rose at 5.35 p.m.

AGENDA ITEM 38

Study of principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: report of the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) (A/4526) (continued)

1. Mr. BLUSZTAJN (Poland) wondered why the representative of Portugal had felt called upon to deal at such length on legal matters in his statement at the Committee's 1036th meeting, since in that representative's view the question under discussion was not of direct concern to his country. Perhaps Portugal believed that it had not only a civilizing mission in Africa but also an educating mission in the United Nations, or perhaps it thought itself to be the only true defender of international law and the Charter. Such a defence would be more convincing if it was more disinterested. The arguments put forward were not new. They had already been rejected by the majority of the Members of the United Nations and by a majority of the exponents of international law and commentators on the Charter. They were also in obvious contradiction to the entire body of practice of the General Assembly.

2. The representative of Portugal had, in support of his theory, cited various legal opinions, including that of Mr. Vyshinsky. Those opinions, however, tended rather to prove that the United Nations could only exist if its Members acted in conformity with the provisions of the Charter, and that the Charter, far from having been created as a means of perpetuating the colonial system, provided especially for the liberation of all people under colonial domination through the exercise of their right to self-determination. Those opinions also proved that the task of the United Nations was to apply the rules of international law in the interests of peace and progress. Neither the United Nations nor international law was an end in itself but rather the outcome of the social and historical evolution of the world, and they should both make it possible to find appropriate solutions for international problems.

3. The abstract title of the agenda item under discussion should not be allowed to mislead. It was not a question of indulging in theoretical discussions or of increasing already copious documentation but of solving practical problems arising from the refusal of two States to conform to the obligations of the Charter and to transmit information on overseas territories which to all intents and purposes were colonies. His delegation had voted without any great enthusiasm for General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV), under which the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter had been set up, because it had been convinced that the problem should have been solved long before and that the conclusions of that Committee would only confirm the opinions of his delegation. He asked whether there was any need to prove that the Charter was a multilateral international treaty whose every Chapter was a source of rights and obligations for Member States whatever the date of their admission; whether it was still necessary to prove that all the provisions of the Charter imposed obligations, regardless of the Chapter in which those provisions were contained; and whether it was still possible to deny that colonial problems were the concern of the international community and had therefore ceased to be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the administering Powers. No trick of interpretation could hide the fact that the principles of the sacred trust of the administering Powers and of the paramount interests of the inhabitants of the territories would be meaningless if the policy of those Powers was judged in the light of their own ideas of the happiness of the peoples of their colonies rather than according to the true aspirations of those peoples. Unilateral constitutional reforms were not sufficient to change the nature of a policy which remained fundamentally the same, for all the available information confirmed the tragic situation of the inhabitants of the territories administered by Spain and Portugal. The Governments of those countries would not make the inhabitants Spaniards or Portuguese by such methods. In any case, even if that policy succeeded, which seemed doubtful, it would be a reprehensible one, because no country had the right to assume the power of imposing on another people its own religion, culture and way of life. The policy of assimilation was a dishonest one which never aimed at equality between the colonizer and the colonial peoples but at maintaining the domination of the one over the other.

4. His delegation thought it unnecessary to analyse in detail the principles set forth in section V, part B, of the report of the Special Committee of Six (A/4526), since it was no longer a question of determining whether a given country should or should not transmit information on its colonies but of making a solemn declaration in favour of abolishing colonialism in all its forms and liberating immediately all peoples under colonial domination, including those colonized by Spain and Portugal.

Mr. Ortiz de Rozas (Argentina), Vice-Chairman, took the Chair.

5. Mr. CABA (Guinea) noted that the Special Committee of Six, in the light of the factors annexed to General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII), had established twelve principles which affirmed the exact legal interpretation to be given to Article 73 e of the Charter and which were applicable to certain African countries still under Portuguese, Spanish or United Kingdom domination.

6. Those who continued to defend the idea of integration or assimilation of so-called overseas provinces would come into conflict with the criterion of geographical separation set out in principle IV enunciated by the Special Committee. In those territories all legislative, executive and judicial powers were in the hands of the metropolitan country. Faced with the irresistible movement of African nationalism, certain Powers had attempted to give their colonies the fictitious status of overseas provinces by unilaterally providing them with constitutions which could not, however, in any way be binding on the people concerned. Any referendum on the question of association, assimilation or integration in Angola, Mozambique, Portuguese Guinea, the Cape Verde Islands, Rio de Oro or Spanish Guinea would prove that geographically, politically and economically the inhabitants of those territories had nothing in common with Portugal or Spain. In that connexion he would refer the Fourth Committee to principle VII of the Special Committee of Six.

7. Economic and social conditions in the territories under Portuguese, Spanish and United Kingdom domination bore all the marks of acute under-development. With the increase in the technical and industrial progress of the metropolitan countries, the economic imbalance in their colonies became more pronounced. In Angola, for instance, four fifths of the coffee plantations belonged to the colonists, and the colonial Administration fixed the prices of indigenous agricultural products at very low levels, was abolishing the system of barter, contributed no effective technical assistance, systematically drove the Africans from the most fertile lands, and confiscated agricultural implements on the pretext that the farmers were not paying their taxes. Under-nourishment was rife, and in most of the territories there was less than one physician to 100,000 inhabitants. According to information provided by WHO, the infant mortality rate among the people of Angola, for instance, was more than 40 per cent. In the island of São Tomé the mortality rate was the highest in the world. The people were deliberately kept in ignorance. The enforced use of foreign languages hindered the development of national languages, the flowering of indigenous arts, and the growth of a national consciousness. The Portuguese Government gave the most striking example of racial discrimination embodied in a constitutional law by dividing the inhabitants of Angola into five categories—Portuguese born in Portugal; Portuguese born in Angola or elsewhere in Africa; mulattos; assimilated Negroes, who constituted a very small minority; and other Negroes, namely the vast majority. Apropos of such a clearly defined system, he would like to ask the representative of Portugal how many of the people of Angola were represented on an equal footing with Portuguese in the metropolitan Parliament, since in the Portuguese colonies only Portuguese citizens had the right to vote.

8. He would point out, moreover, that when faced with the nationalist demands of underground movements, the Portuguese Government had mobilized a whole system of military repression in its colonies, and as a preventive measure had increased patrols, strengthened air force installations, fortified the more important frontier posts, and would soon increase the strength of Portuguese troops in Angola to 60,000 men.

9. The Africans were still struggling for their independence, and the Portuguese authorities were adopting repressive and often blood-thirsty measures, as they had done in February 1953 when thousands of Africans had been massacred, or in August 1959 when some thirty persons had been killed in so-called Portuguese Guinea. Political movements had nevertheless been launched, the best known of which was the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola, to which the majority of the fifty-seven persons involved in the Luanda trial belonged. In all the countries under Portuguese domination patriots were demanding more and more forcibly the immediate recognition of the right of peoples to national independence, as well as total and unconditional amnesty, the immediate release of all political prisoners, the establishment and effective exercise of public liberties, the immediate withdrawal of Portuguese armed forces and the liquidation of existing military bases on their territories. They were also demanding that before the end of 1960 a round-table conference, in which all political parties of the different countries and the Portuguese Government would be represented, should be held for the purpose of seeking a peaceful solution of the colonial problem in the so-called overseas provinces in the interests of all parties concerned, and particularly of the Portuguese Government.

10. In the view of his delegation, there was no doubt that the territories administered by Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom were in a position of subordination to a foreign Power and thus came within the scope of principle V enunciated by the Special Committee of Six. He observed that, in spite of the facts, the Spanish, French and Portuguese Governments had, like true colonial Powers, expressed identical views on the obligation to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter and had declared that they alone were competent in all matters concerning territories under their full sovereignty. While those three Powers admitted that the main concern of the Charter was the well-being and advancement of peoples, they considered that the legal and political status of a territory need only be taken into account in so far as it affected the life of the people. In that case, patent facts like forced labour, the officially sanctioned transfer each year of more than 400,000 Africans to the mines of Rhodesia and South Africa, the massacre of more than 1,000 Negroes on the island of São Tomé in February 1953, the tragic plight of Algeria and the fearful infant mortality rate in the Cape Verde Islands would all be deemed to be of no consequence in the life of the peoples concerned.

11. Mr. MAX (France), speaking on a point of order, recalled that the Committee was not discussing the question of Algeria.

12. Mr. ALWAN (Iraq) noted that the representative of Guinea had mentioned Algeria in the course of general remarks on colonialism, so that there seemed to him to be no need to raise a point of order.

13. The CHAIRMAN recalled that speakers should limit their remarks to the agenda item under discussion, but that the representative of Guinea had not brought up Algeria in connexion with the substance of the discussion.

14. Mr. MAX (France), taking the floor on a point of order, repeated his remark.

15. Mr. CABA (Guinea), continuing his statement, noted that the colonial Powers often cited the restrictive clauses in Article 73 e of the Charter, while forgetting that those clauses could refer only to the volume of information relating to economic, social and educational conditions that was to be transmitted and that the obligation to transmit that information remained. There likewise remained the obligation assumed by the Administering Members to assist the inhabitants in their progressive advancement towards self-government.

16. He was of the opinion that the Fourth Committee and the General Assembly ought to adopt unequivocally the principles formulated by the Special Committee of Six. Such action would make it possible to establish that: firstly, Rio de Oro, Ifni Territory, Spanish Guinea, the island of Fernando Pó and Rio Muni were Non-Self-Governing Territories under Spanish domination; secondly, so-called Portuguese Guinea, Angola, Mozambique, the Cape Verde Islands, the enclave of Cabinda, the islands of São Tomé and Príncipe, São João Batista de Ajudá, Goa and dependencies, Macau and dependencies, Timor and dependencies were Non-Self-Governing Territories under Portuguese domination; thirdly, Southern Rhodesia, Bechuanaland, Basutoland, Swaziland and Zanzibar were Non-Self-Governing Territories under United Kingdom domination. Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, which would thus be obliged to transmit information on those Territories, maintained that the General Assembly was not competent to require Member States to begin submitting information. The General Assembly had stated, however, in the last preambular paragraph of resolution 748 (VIII) and of resolution 849 (IX), that it was competent to decide whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory had or had not attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter. The General Assembly was thus by that fact also competent to decide when the Administering Members ought to begin submitting the information in question. He likewise recalled that the General Assembly had decided not to require a two-thirds majority in voting on questions dealing with information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and could therefore decide by a simple majority of the Member States to request Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom to fulfil the obligations imposed on them by Article 73 e of the Charter.

17. That decision was especially urgent as people of the colonized countries were more than ever determined to break the colonial yoke and henceforth only the will of the people concerned and their rightful aspirations to national independence should count. Portugal, Spain, the United Kingdom and France could not in any case block the national liberation movements, and in that connexion the discussion of the report of the Special Committee of Six was already outpaced by events, since the General Assembly had before it a draft declaration calling for the independence of the peoples in the colonial territories (A/4502 and Corr.1). The colonial Powers would be well advised to abandon their colonial positions in Africa before it was too late.

Mr. Pachachi (Iraq) resumed the Chair.

18. Mr. NOGUEIRA (Portugal) reserved the right to reply to the representative of Guinea as soon as he had been able to study the text of his statement, but he asked for clarification of the number and date of the Portuguese law which, according to the Guinean representative, was supposed to have established in Angola five categories of inhabitants.

19. Mr. CABA (Guinea) assured the representative of Portugal that his statement had been based on archives, official documents and statistics that were available to him. He added that the establishment of the five categories of inhabitants in Angola was but one discriminatory measure among many others.

20. Mr. AZNAR (Spain) felt that the present discussion should have given him an opportunity to prove the Spanish delegation's strong determination to take part in the work of the United Nations and co-operate in the common task provided for in the Charter. Two reasons had obliged him to change his plans and refrain from delivering the remarks he would have liked to utter. In the first place, at the 1036th meeting the representative of Portugal, in a remarkable speech, had analysed in detail the scope and significance of Article 73 e of the Charter, and it would be difficult to equal his arguments. It was unfortunate, however, that the political passions dominating the discussion were preventing the Committee from engaging in a thorough study of the legal problem stated by the Portuguese representative. In the second place, the intransigent position of those who refused to consider the substance of the problem because they could see only its superficial aspects might entail serious consequences for the coexistence, within the United Nations, of delegations of differing opinions and might extend the cold war to the Committee itself. What lay beyond the screen of quotations, figures and statistics was no more than desperate and furious political campaign instead of poised and serene argument.

21. The Committee had before it the report of the Special Committee of Six, which supposedly was to be considered in connexion with the present agenda item. In an important section of that report were listed the principles that were to guide the Member States in determining whether the obligation to submit information, in accordance with the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter, applied to them or not. The Spanish delegation, after careful study of the report and its principles, had felt in all good faith that the members of the Fourth Committee, disregarding their political position, would take up that code of conduct, that brief fundamental charter of information concerning the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Up to the present stage of the discussion, however, the Committee had been divided into three groups. Firstly, there were those that deemed it useful to consider the principles without as yet discussing their practical application; secondly, those that wished merely to consider the practical implementation of the principles; and, thirdly, those that maintained that it was pointless to open a discussion whose result was a foregone conclusion. For the last-mentioned delegations, any further argument and any further statement by the representatives of Spain or Portugal were rejected in advance on the grounds that the Committee had no time to waste in legal quibbling.

22. He asked, however, whether the Fourth Committee, with the exception of a few delegations, had seriously raised the question whether the principles enumerated by the Special Committee were consonant with reason, whether they were in accordance with the historical and legal realities of the problem, and whether they were in harmony with the fundamental principles of international law. Had it sufficiently clarified the question whether those principles really served the principles set forth in the Charter? Absolutely not. The representative of El Salvador, in proposing the closure of the debate at the 1033rd meeting, had, of course, intended only to draw the Committee's attention to the need for bringing the discussion to bear on the principles enumerated; at the same meeting the representative of Bolivia had, it is true, raised problems of interpretation of constitutional law; in a statement at the 1035th meeting the representative of Czechoslovakia had, indeed, approached the question in the manner desired by the Spanish delegation and had only cited specific examples out of concern for the substance of the problem; in presenting the Special Committee's report (1031st meeting), the representatives of Mexico and India had displayed, as usual, a lofty spirit. The fact remained, nevertheless, that the report of the Special Committee and the list of twelve principles had been praised in very general terms, as if out of mere courtesy.

23. For its part, the Spanish delegation wished to congratulate the Special Committee, several of whose members had had to renounce certain ideas and abandon certain profound personal convictions. That sacrifice, however, had led that Committee to take refuge behind a whole series of very vague expressions scattered throughout a framework that was imprecise and subject to the most widely varying interpretations. When the representative of Bolivia had noted the polemics on the concept of "nation" mentioned in paragraph 17 of the report, he had been told that that was merely a subject of academic interest. Likewise, when the Special Committee stated in paragraph 18 of its report that the "Charter is a living document and the obligations under Chapter XI must be viewed in the light of the changing spirit of the times", the question might be asked to whom this discovery was directed and whether the inescapable corollary to it was that the Fourth Committee might modify the Charter simply to keep it in step with the "changing spirit". When it was realized to what extent a country's constitution was protected against any violation and how provision was made for amendments only through a carefully controlled process, one could not help but ask what would happen if a majority group could without hindrance interpret a national constitution along lines favourable to its interests. Who, moreover, was going to define "the changing spirit of the times"? The truth was that when the Special Committee of Six considered that the principles should be applied "in the light of the facts and specific circumstances in each case", as was stated in paragraph 20 of its report, it was leaving the way open for all possible interpretations. To all appearances, then, its report was nothing more than an expression of an ideal which, though lofty, was very difficult to attain.

24. The Charter was categorical. If its wording was felt as not clearly representing the thoughts of its authors, then it must be amended by the prescribed procedure. Such a revision of the Charter was perhaps desirable, but there could be no question of altering its underlying meaning. The Special Committee had laid down, in principle IV, that there was, prima facie, an obligation to transmit information in respect of a territory which was geographically separate and distinct ethnically and/or culturally from the country administering it. It might be asked what the basis was for this criterion of geographical separation, and why it had been introduced into the principle in question. How wide must the separation be: the width of a strait or of an ocean? It was easy to see what dangers might result from too loose an interpretation of that principle. Yet the Special Committee had thought it proper to lay down, in addition to the geographical, ethnical and cultural distinctions, other elements of "an administrative, political, juridical, economic or historical nature" (principle V). Who was to define the various factors enumerated in those two principles—the Fourth Committee, the Special Committee, a tribunal or a supreme authority? If the various criteria there laid down had to be taken into consideration, the independence, liberty and sovereignty of States would be in jeopardy.

25. A majority of Member States might give their support to the principles set out by the Special Committee. Nevertheless, the substance of the problem would not have been examined by the Fourth Committee, doubtless because when political elements had been removed, there was nothing left of the document except the efforts made by its drafters to formulate definitions on paper with regard to a most complex matter.

26. Those delegations which considered that the Fourth Committee was wasting its time should perhaps be thanked for their frankness. Unless it was wished to embark on a protracted legal discussion of the principles contained in the report, there seemed to be little point in having raised the question or in having allowed the discussion to develop very rapidly into a series of specific attacks on two countries. The Fourth Committee had not observed the rules of a genuine discussion on universal principles applicable to all Member States. The supposition that Spain was a monster which lived on the flesh and blood of the African peoples and that its opponents were a group of archangels defending the liberty of the world had led the Committee to accuse and condemn one country, in an indefensibly discriminatory manner, under a law which did not yet exist. When the scale of values was reversed in that way, one could only cling to the hope that moral and spiritual forces would restore justice where it was being flouted and remedy the wrong.

27. The fact was that many delegations had forgotten the position taken up by the Spanish delegation on the interpretation of Chapter XI of the Charter, or had not yet had time to take note of it. He therefore felt obliged to repeat what he had said at the previous session, namely, that Spain did not know what a Non-Self-Governing Territory was and did not accept the obligation to send information on any so-called Non-Self-Governing Territories which it administered, but that in view of its desire to co-operate with the United Nations it was prepared in due course to transmit information on its overseas provinces, in the selection of which information he had himself collaborated. Although some had considered that attitude questionable, the allegation could hardly be made that the Spanish Government only replied with refusals. Spain condemned colonialism and all exploitation of peoples as being an anachronism, and had always done so. There was no problem which came within its jurisdiction which could not be resolved by means of bilateral negotiations with countries which considered that they had some just claim. The Spanish Government based its attitude on honour and justice, and only asked the same in return.

28. He reserved the right to speak again later with regard to the application of the principles contained in the report of the Special Committee of Six.

29. Mr. GASSOU (Togo) said that he was pleased to note that Spain considered itself an anti-colonialist country, and he hoped that in due time it would turn its statements into deeds.

30. The item on the agenda might seem a legal question. In reality it was an essentially political question. The reason why it was so important to discover the ideas behind Article 73 e, and to set that Article in its historical context, was that certain Member States had systematically refused to furnish any information at all on the territories which they ruled, on the pretext that those territories, in spite of their remoteness and their economic, ethnical and cultural differences, formed an integral part of the metropolitan country simply on the grounds that the metropolitan parliament had so decided without consulting the indigenous peoples. By invoking such legal and constitutional fictions, Portugal and Spain were in fact only repeating arguments which had already been invoked by other colonialist States, but the various appellations that the latter had successively given to their empires had not prevented those empires from crumbling. The mere change in names decided on by Portugal in 1951 had deceived nobody, not even the Portuguese; its sole object had been to enable Portugal, after its admission to the United Nations, to dispute the Organization's right to be informed on the conditions in which it administered its colonies. The reason was obvious. It would presumably not have had the courage to admit openly that the inhabitants of the territories were subjected to forced labour, slavery and racial discrimination.

31. The true meaning of Article 73 e of the Charter was made clear by the preamble of that Article, in which the words "not yet" indicated that it was essential that the peoples in question should one day attain a full measure of self-government; and by paragraphs a and b, which laid on Administering Members the obligation to ensure the economic and social advancement of the peoples, with due respect for their culture, and to develop self-government and assist in the progressive evolution of free political institutions. The obligations contained in paragraph e only ceased when a territory had attained a full measure of self-government; in other words, when the people, through free democratic processes, had appointed a parliament and a government or had decided in favour of union with some other independent country.

32. In its excellent report, the Special Committee of Six had clearly and logically codified the principles which should guide Member States in the interpretation of Article 73 e. The Togolese delegation endorsed that Committee's view that the Charter was a living document and that the obligations under Chapter XI must be viewed in the light of the changing spirit of the times. Since the drawing up of the Charter, the composition of the United Nations and the political map of the world had greatly altered, and the concessions made in 1945 to the colonial Powers would doubtless not have been possible today. Principle V was one of the most important and would be very useful in helping to decide whether the Portuguese territories were colonies or not. The reservations expressed by the United Kingdom with regard to principle X (A/4526, para. 15) were not encouraging if they meant that the information to be supplied could be reduced to nil even if the territory concerned was still of a colonial type. They were only acceptable if the requirements set out in alternative (a) of principle VI were fulfilled; in other words, if the territory became independent. Otherwise, the requirements laid down in principles VII, VIII and IX must be satisfied. The "constitutional relations" mentioned in principle XI were only to be taken into account if they resulted from the free expression of the wishes of the people, under universal adult suffrage, in a ballot supervised by the United Nations. Such supervision ought to be the rule in order to guarantee that the voting procedures were impartially conducted and to avoid what were commonly known as "elections 'à l'algérienne'".

33. The Togolese delegation therefore subscribed fully to the twelve principles set out by the Special Committee of Six, but reserved the right to speak again when consideration was given to the application of those principles in the case of the Portuguese and Spanish territories.

AGENDA ITEM 38

Study of principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: report of the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) (A/4526) (continued)

1. Miss BROOKS (Liberia) recalled that at the 1036th meeting the representative of Portugal had quoted extracts from a statement made to the Committee by the representative of the United States at the second session of the General Assembly. She would point out that many of those extracts had been quoted out of context. According to the Portuguese representative, the United States representative had said that sovereignty over dependent territories rested with the administering Power. In her view, which was supported by eminent international lawyers, that was not the case.
2. The representative of Portugal had quoted provisions of the Charter which he felt supported his point of view, but he had failed to substantiate his case or to convince the Liberian delegation that the principles set forth in section V, part B, of the report of the Special Committee on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter (A/4526) did not apply to the territories administered by Portugal.
3. Referring to the statement by the representative of Spain at the previous meeting, she said that while she took issue with that representative on his interpretation of Chapter XI of the Charter and, in certain respects, of the principles, she welcomed his assurance that his Government intended to transmit information on the territories it administered.
4. Mr. NOGUEIRA (Portugal) said that, though he appreciated the spirit in which her observation had been made, he felt bound to protest against the Liberian representative's suggestion that he had quoted passages out of context. The passage in question had been quoted from a book by Mr. Hans Kelsen,^{1/} who was a great authority on international law and a serious and reliable scholar.

5. Mr. FARAHMAND (Iran) said that his delegation had been glad to learn that there had been a wide area of agreement within the Special Committee of Six on the basic principles involved. The Committee's report was a document of major importance since it had tried to reflect the spirit of Article 73 of the Charter.

6. The report, particularly principle IV, showed that the provisions of the Charter, and especially its emphasis on the fact that the interests of the inhabitants of the territories were paramount, contradicted the narrow interpretation of the wording of Chapter XI put forward by certain administering Powers in order to justify a position which could not be reconciled with the principles and purposes of the Charter. The clear statement in the first paragraph of Article 73 that the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were paramount governed the rest of that Article, including the obligation to transmit information, laid down in sub-paragraph e. Before being admitted to membership of the United Nations, States accepted the obligations imposed in the Charter: Article 73 e clearly laid down that it was the obligation of Member States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories to transmit information about them. Consequently, the whole question was merely one of determining whether or not a territory was actually self-governing. To do so it was necessary to take certain facts into account, such as the geographical considerations which had given rise to the notion of "metropolitan areas" referred to in Article 74 of the Charter, and other considerations such as differences in race, language and cultural heritage. There were also the factors listed in General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII), but those should be regarded purely as a guide and individual cases should be decided in the light of their particular circumstances.

7. The obligation to transmit information was an international obligation: in view of the movement towards independence in all Non-Self-Governing Territories and the existing world situation, failure to comply with it was tantamount to a rejection of international co-operation and to a denial of the principles and spirit of the Charter. The obligation remained in force until all the Territories had achieved a full measure of self-government, and an Administering Member was bound to comply with it until the General Assembly had examined all the information relevant to a change in a Territory's status. It was the application of that principle which gave the provisions of Article 73 their real meaning.

^{1/} Hans Kelsen, The Law of the United Nations (New York, Frederick A. Praeger Inc., 1950), pp. 552-553, footnote.

8. His delegation was in full agreement with the principles drawn up by the Special Committee of Six and hoped that, when adopted, they would be effectively applied to each individual colony.

9. Mr. KUKAN (Libya) said that, like the Special Committee of Six, his Government regarded the Charter as a living document and it carried out its international obligations in conformity with the principles of the Charter. Unfortunately, Portugal and Spain, though adhering to the Charter, had never fully carried out their obligations under it; indeed, they were trying to convince the Committee that they had no obligations under Article 73 e. His delegation's view was that the General Assembly alone was competent to decide whether or not an obligation existed to transmit information; it could not accept any other interpretation. His country had suffered long from colonialism and his delegation was therefore in a good position to realize what the inhabitants of the dependent territories were suffering and to appreciate their struggle for freedom. It was the duty of Member States to support those peoples, who could not speak for themselves, and to put an end to their humiliation; the United Nations must take immediate steps to help the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea to achieve self-government and independence in accordance with the aims of the Charter.

10. His delegation subscribed to the ideas voiced at the 1031st meeting by the representatives of Mexico and Yugoslavia, at the 1032nd meeting by the representatives of Ghana and Venezuela and at the 1036th meeting by the representative of Iraq; and it associated itself with the tributes to the Special Committee of Six. It strongly supported the principles which that Committee had evolved and believed that they would put an end to differences of opinion on the subject of whether or not a territory was self-governing; it urged the Administering Members not to disregard them.

11. Mr. EL AMIN (Sudan) said that Article 73 of the Charter imposed definite obligations on Member States responsible for Non-Self-Governing Territories, with which the majority of those States had complied. The Charter should not be interpreted unilaterally by individual Member States; that was a task which the General Assembly alone was competent to undertake. His delegation could not accept the arguments put forward by the representative of Portugal. The Spanish representative's statement, though interesting, lacked positive and constructive features; despite that representative's condemnation of colonialism, it was nevertheless a fact that there were African territories under Spanish colonial domination. It was regrettable that neither Spain nor Portugal had complied with the obligation to transmit information. Portugal's failure to do so was due to a political misconception that the territories it administered were an integral part of the metropolitan country. Not until 1951 had it adopted that position; for five hundred years before then its territories had been considered colonies.

12. The report of the Special Committee of Six was of the greatest importance. His delegation accepted the principles enumerated by that Committee and regarded them as a true interpretation of the Charter. One of the main purposes in setting up the Special Committee had been to establish whether the colonies of Portugal and Spain were to be regarded as provinces or as Non-Self-Governing Territories. If principle IV was applied to them, it was clear that they were geographically separate and ethnically and culturally distinct, from which it followed that the two Powers were under an obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e.

13. The policy followed by Portugal in its territories contradicted both Chapter XI of the Charter and the principles in the report, especially principles V, VI, VII, VIII and IX. The policy of integration pursued by Portugal was detrimental to progress; that of so-called assimilation was not in the interests of the indigenous inhabitants and was carried on in defiance of Article 73 a of the Charter. Moreover, that policy had failed to produce many "assimilados"—in Mozambique there were only 4,349 out of a total population of some 5,650,000, the remainder being considered by the Portuguese authorities to be "non-civilized". The situation in the other Portuguese territories was no better and it was clear that the policy was only a cover for a ruthless policy of exploitation, the object of which was to keep the inhabitants in subjection in their own countries and to deprive them of education and national pride. He quoted several authorities who had reported that African adult males in those territories were compelled to work on the roads; if the men were absent on forced labour, then the women and children were called upon to repair the roads. Such conscript labour had to provide its own food and often its own tools.

14. In a recent joint communiqué, the Emperor of Ethiopia and the President of the Sudan had reaffirmed their determination to pursue the cause of the freedom of all Africans and the elimination of colonialism from Africa. His delegation and other African delegations were disturbed at the plight of Africans in the dependent territories. But there was a limit to human endurance; the nationalist movements around those peoples would not pass unheeded and his delegation felt that the policies in question were a danger to peace. A similar political myth had given rise to the situation in Algeria.

15. His delegation hoped that the principles would be approved unanimously.

Mr. Pachachi (Iraq) took the Chair.

16. Mr. MAX (France) protested against the reference in the closing remarks of the Sudanese representative's statement to a subject which was not on the agenda.

17. Mr. WESTERMAN (Panama) said that the Special Committee had carried out its task with great care and had succeeded in achieving agreement. The report marked a notable step forward towards the attainment of the aims set forth in Article 73 of the Charter, in particular in sub-paragraph b.

18. His delegation considered that the principles evolved by the Special Committee of Six, which were both moderate and precise, should be endorsed by the Fourth Committee and by the General Assembly. That was a matter of urgency in view of the shadows still cast over humanity by an anachronistic colonialism now completely outmoded. Principle III was of the greatest importance and his delegation fully agreed with the views the representative of Mexico had expressed on that principle at the 1031st meeting, to the effect that the fulfilment of the provisions of Article 73 e was an international obligation, that the inter-American system had affirmed that war was no longer an instrument of national policy, and that in the same manner the administration of colonies was no longer an instrument of policy of any Member State and the right of peoples to self-determination was no longer governed solely by the policies of the administering Power.

19. The Moroccan representative on the Special Committee of Six had stated that it was a point of principle for his Government that the process of consultation should be supervised by the United Nations. That was also the view of the Panamanian delegation, which attached great importance to popular consultations. Principle IX merely recognized the desirability of United Nations supervision; he was aware, however, that that wording was due to the fact that in some cases United Nations supervision could only take place with the consent of the State administering the territory in question.

20. It was his delegation's view that there should be international supervision in the circumstances envisaged in cases (b) and (c) of principle VI. It followed from that that international supervision should be contemplated not only in the case of integration, referred to in principle IX, but also in the circumstances set out in principle VII, i.e., free association with an independent State. When situations arose which endangered good relations between peoples, common sense rendered it advisable that a popular consultation should take place under United Nations supervision. That was all the more necessary in cases where hostilities had resulted, producing loss of life and suffering among the civilian population; where fundamental human rights must be protected and peace and international security preserved. Thus, if a popular consultation of the kind proposed by President de Gaulle was held in Algeria, its effect on international opinion would be heightened if it took place under United Nations supervision.

21. In his delegation's view, principles IV and V met the situation which had arisen as a result of the establishment of so-called overseas provinces. Obviously, a country which had not reached an advanced stage of self-government, which lacked free political institutions and whose inhabitants were not in a position to take responsible decisions, could not be incorporated into another State in that manner.

22. The principles formulated by the Special Committee of Six, which his delegation hoped the Fourth Committee would approve, would serve as a guide to Member States in determining whether or not an obligation existed to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter. An honourable solution would thus be found for cases such as Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea—territories which, on the basis of the principles, were certainly covered by the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter. His delegation hoped that those territories and any others in similar circumstances would benefit from any action which the General Assembly would take. It was confident that the Powers concerned would co-operate with the General Assembly and ensure that information would be forthcoming concerning all territories covered by Chapter XI of the Charter.

23. The main virtue of the principles under discussion lay in their conception of a peaceful procedure whereby peoples which had not yet achieved a full measure of self-government would be given an opportunity to advance and, at the appropriate moment, to exercise their right to self-determination, and in their encouragement of the idea that relations between the administering Powers and their dependent territories should be based on the general principle of good neighbourliness.

24. In conclusion, he associated himself with the tribute paid by the Liberian representative at the 1031st meeting on behalf of the African States, to the work done by the former representative of Mexico, Mr. Espinosa y Prieto, in the interest of the dependent peoples.

25. Mr. MAKKAWI (Lebanon) said that, in view of the comprehensive character of the statements made by the speakers who had preceded him in the debate, he would confine himself to explaining his Government's position on the important question before the Committee and on the report presented by the Special Committee of Six. It was encouraging to see that the two opposing groups in the Committee—the representatives of the administering and of the non-administering Powers—had managed to agree upon twelve principles. His delegation endorsed every word of those principles, which, if accepted, would constitute the basic premises for determining whether or not a particular territory fell within the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter.

26. The replies (A/AC.100/1 and Add.1) which certain countries had sent to the Secretary-General in response to General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) outlined a number of basic factors. Iran's reply, for instance, singled out the geographical considerations which had given rise to the notion of "metropolitan areas", found in Article 74 of the Charter; and differences in race, language, religion or cultural heritage. Morocco held the view that Chapter XI of the Charter applied to any territory whose people displayed marked differences, from the ethnical, geographical, historical, cultural or social standpoints, when compared with the people of the colonial Power, and any territory whose relationship with the administering Power arbitrarily placed the indigenous inhabitants on a lower footing. Those premises were clearly set out in principles IV and V.

27. A thorough examination of the so-called overseas provinces showed conclusively that principles IV and V applied to them. It might well be asked on what basis those territories were regarded as overseas provinces, whether that status had arisen as a result of a free and voluntary choice and whether informed and democratic processes had been at work. That was why his delegation attached great importance to principles VII, VIII and XI of the report.

28. The tide of nationalism and the yearning for freedom were at their peak everywhere, and particularly in Africa. It was high time for the colonial Powers, and especially Spain and Portugal, to change their attitude and meet the challenge of the day. His country, which had always sympathized with the dependent peoples in their struggle for emancipation, would vote in favour of a resolution approving the principles in the report of the Special Committee of Six.

29. Mr. LAMANI (Albania) said that, although Chapter XI of the Charter gave a clear definition of the obligations which administering Powers assumed on their admission to membership of the United Nations, the General Assembly—many years after the signing of the Charter—was still marking time because of the negative attitude adopted by the colonial Powers, while millions of human beings in the colonies were clamouring impatiently for complete and immediate independence. Whereas paragraph 18 of the report of the Special Committee of Six stated that the Charter was a living document and that the obligations under Chapter XI should be viewed in the light of the changing spirit of the times, the colonial Powers were not prepared to conform to the political situation and the changes occurring in the modern world. Portugal and Spain went so far as to supply no information on their colonies, on the pretext that they had no colonies but only "overseas provinces", and that there was therefore no obligation to transmit information.

30. The Fourth Committee and the General Assembly should adopt a firm attitude and should take the necessary steps for the liberation of the colonial peoples, whose complete independence could no longer be delayed. The people of the dependent territories were waiting for the United Nations to give them effective help.

31. While the colonial peoples were fighting to throw off the yoke, the representatives of the colonial Powers were endeavouring to defend the "principles" of colonialism, if that word could be applied in the context. The representative of the United Kingdom, who had obstinately defended the thesis, recorded in paragraph 15 of the report, that "there might be circumstances in which... considerations... reduced to nil the amount of information which could be transmitted", had taken exception to the Venezuelan representative's conclusion that such a reservation constituted a kind of "double-talk". The important point, however, was that the passage in question clearly demonstrated the efforts deployed by the United Kingdom representative in the Special Committee of Six and in the Fourth Committee with a view, first, to limiting the amount of information transmitted—on the basis of principle X—and then reducing it to nil with the help of the reservation in question. It was to be regretted that, despite the efforts which the representatives of India, Mexico and Morocco had made in the Special Committee to further the cause of the colonial peoples, the representatives of the colonial Powers had been successful in imposing upon certain paragraphs a wording that lent itself to interpretation in the interests of the prolongation of the system of colonial exploitation.

32. The colonialists had been trying to conceal the true situation in their colonies. Although the Portuguese representative had tried to deny facts which were there for everyone to see, the Committee could never forget the statements made by the representatives of Iraq, Ghana, Guinea and other countries, describing the inhuman methods to which the Portuguese colonialists resorted. In a publication entitled "Angola: Repression and Revolt in Portuguese Africa", the American Committee on Africa supplied evidence of racial segregation, forced labour and corporal punishment and torture; it spoke of military patrols which tried to prevent desertions from contractual labour obligations and of the careful screening of African students before they were allowed to leave Angola for higher education in Portugal.

33. In 1956, 1957 and 1958 efforts had been made by the Assembly to deal with the question of Portuguese and Spanish colonies in a diplomatic way but, as a result of the subtle manoeuvres of the colonialist and imperialist Powers, even the draft resolutions proposing the establishment of a committee to study the question had come to nought. It had not been until the fourteenth session that the problem had been discussed more openly and the Special Committee of Six set up.

34. Mankind could no longer tolerate a situation in which people were divided into masters and slaves. The United Nations was in duty bound to help the struggle of the colonial peoples for emancipation. The Albanian delegation fully associated itself with the numerous delegations which had stated that the Portuguese and the Spanish colonies should be regarded as Non-Self-Governing Territories until they attained complete independence. The United Nations should call upon Portugal and Spain to fulfil their obligations under the Charter.

35. Although his delegation could not endorse the report of the Special Committee of Six in its entirety, it wished to stress once again that it was ready to support all measures designed to promote the liberation of the colonial peoples.

36. Mr. CARPIO (Philippines) said that his country, which had never been a colonial Power or administered any dependent territories, could approach the question before the Committee with the objectivity that was indispensable for a wise solution. In dealing with the twelve principles drawn up by the Special Committee of Six, the Fourth Committee should discuss whether they were wise and whether they conformed with the letter and spirit of the Charter. Unfortunately, however, three tendencies had emerged: some speakers held that the Committee was dealing with a purely political question, which should be decided according to political views and to the spirit of the times, irrespective of whether the decision was in accordance with the letter of the Charter; others approached the problem in a purely legalistic way, ignoring altogether the temper of the times; a third group saw in the question a mixture of both political and juridical considerations.

37. His delegation, which had always taken an independent line in the United Nations, thought that in approaching the question now before the Committee it was necessary to recall the atmosphere prevailing at San Francisco in 1945. At that time the paramount consideration had been to ensure that the generations to come would be saved from the scourge of war. In order to achieve that goal it had been necessary to eliminate all the causes of misunderstanding. That aim, in its turn, had necessitated the creation of international machinery to promote better living conditions and greater freedom for the people in the world.

38. He could not agree with the delegations which argued that since Chapter XI of the Charter was entitled "Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories" the provisions of Article 73 were subject to unilateral interpretation by Member States. The heading of a legal text could clearly help in interpreting the text but the interpretation should be based on the actual wording of that text. Article 73 stated that Member States which administered dependent territories accepted an obligation as a sacred trust. It was quite clear that that obligation was as binding as any other portion of the Charter. It was for that reason that his delegation had always given Article 73 a very liberal interpretation, going further in that respect than most delegations. The obligation to transmit information on political developments was implied in the duty expressed in Article 73 a and b.

39. It was perhaps unfortunate that the Charter did not define the nature of a Non-Self-Governing Territory, but in fact the meaning of the term was clear. There might be cases where, although a people had not achieved a full measure of self-government, no obligation had been created on the part of the administering Power concerned. The great majority of Administering Members had voluntarily transmitted information on the territories under their administration and by so doing had assumed responsibility under the terms of Article 73, but the question was whether it could be shown that those which had not transmitted information had by their acceptance of the Charter assumed such responsibility. It was for that reason that, after two or three years of failure, the General Assembly had had, at its fourteenth session, set up the Special Committee of Six. The problem now before the Fourth Committee was to determine what factors should be taken into account and whether or not an obligation to transmit information existed. The problem differed from that considered by the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (Non-Self-Governing Territories), which had related chiefly to the conditions which should govern the cessation of the transmission of information. The point now at issue was whether and when the transmission of information should begin. Instead, however, of delegations examining the principles proposed by the Special Committee of Six in a dispassionate and well-reasoned manner, and so obtaining the co-operation and good will of every Member of the United Nations, the subject had been approached in the three different ways that he had already described.

40. One of the purposes of the United Nations was that it should constitute a harmonious whole in the solution of international problems. He could not help wondering what direction the United Nations was taking when he heard extremist views expressed, based on the assumption that the obligation to transmit information existed, condemning those who were supposedly disregarding that obligation and accusing certain Member States of committing crimes in their administration of dependent territories. In his delegation's opinion the Committee should first consider the principles and later, provided it approved them, endeavour to secure their enforcement. The proper way to proceed would be to reason with the Administering Members and try to persuade them to do what was right. It was going too far to utter dogmatic pronouncements to the effect that every people was entitled to independence immediately. His delegation fully understood and shared the desire of the nations of Africa that all dependent peoples should achieve freedom at an early date, but the Charter provided that relations between Member States must be governed by international law and must be based on understanding, friendship and good neighbourliness. It was not acting in accordance with the Charter to accuse fellow Members of crimes.

41. Turning to the principles, he observed that the first sentence of principle I gave rise to certain questions: firstly, what had been the territories known to be of the colonial type at the time of the drafting of the Charter, and secondly, why the obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e should be confined to those territories. The latter thesis seemed hardly consistent with the statement in paragraph 18 that the Charter was a living document and that the obligations under Chapter XI must be viewed in the light of the changing spirit of the times. There might be territories which had become territories of the colonial type since 1945; that was a matter for the Committee to consider. In his view the principles should be of universal application.

42. Throughout the report the Special Committee had used language that was consistent with the terms of Article 73. To assert, as did some delegations, that independence was the sole aim of all dependent peoples and that they should be liberated immediately was not in conformity with the letter or the spirit of that Article.

43. There appeared to be no important divergence of views about the wording of principle III; the words "international obligation" were in accordance with the text of Article 73.

44. His delegation had serious reservations with regard to principle IV. His own country, for example, consisted of over a thousand islands inhabited by a number of ethnic groups and he felt sure that there were other Member States which were similarly composed. Similarly there were countries in which different ethnic groups had become merged through intermarriage. Furthermore, the exact nature of the geographical separation referred to in principle IV was not clear.

45. His delegation welcomed the twelve principles submitted by the Special Committee of Six and considered that their adoption would constitute a practical step in the right direction. It wished, however, to dissociate itself from some of the statements that had been made condemning certain Member States for non-compliance with obligations which had not been proved to exist.

46. Mr. GRINBERG (Bulgaria) said that in assessing the work of the Special Committee of Six there were two possible approaches. If the report were looked at against the background of previous years it might be a source of considerable satisfaction owing to the fact that much that it contained, if taken at its face value, would indicate a substantial evolution in the views of some of the colonial Powers. In that connexion, he drew attention to the last sentence of paragraph 17 and the first sentence of paragraph 18.

47. In his delegation's view, however, the report should be judged entirely in the light of the circumstances at present prevailing. The general trend could be epitomized in two words: immediate independence. That idea overshadowed everything else; its presence threw doubt upon the attempts of the colonial Powers to demonstrate that there had been progress in their views.

48. Many delegations would remember the obstacles raised by the colonial Powers in recent years to prevent any action by the General Assembly to bring the colonies of Portugal and Spain within the purview of Chapter XI of the Charter. The sponsors of draft resolutions had done their utmost to couch them in the most inoffensive terms. References to Portugal and Spain had been taboo both in the draft resolutions and in most of the speeches. Yet the colonial Powers had opposed the adoption of any measure, no matter how innocuous it might be. At the fourteenth session of the General Assembly, however, there had been a sudden change. The colonial Powers had presumably realized that the mounting anti-colonialist tide in the world and the outcry for independence for all colonies necessitated the adoption of less exposed positions and that the imminent increase in the number of anti-colonialist countries in the United Nations demanded improved tactics. Thus the twelve principles had been worked out and submitted to the Fourth Committee, which should now decide what action it would take. The colonial Powers would doubtless advise the Committee to approve the principles without taking any specific action in regard to the colonies of Portugal and Spain. That would give the colonial Powers an opportunity to claim to have made a positive contribution towards the solution of the problem of the Portuguese and Spanish colonies while in actual fact it would amount to practically nothing.

49. The twelve principles enunciated by the Special Committee derived from Chapter XI of the Charter and merely reaffirmed positions that had been held by the anti-colonialist countries ever since the establishment of the United Nations. Up to the present Portugal and Spain had totally disregarded Chapter XI and there seemed little likelihood that the colonial countries would be more generous in respect of the twelve principles. Indeed, since Portugal had voted in favour of the draft resolution recommending the immediate abolition of racial discrimination (A/C.4/L.643 and Add.1 and 2), adopted at the Committee's 1028th meeting, it would not be surprising to see that delegation vote in favour of the adoption of the principles and subsequently claim that they did not apply to Portugal. In fact, in his long speech at the 1036th meeting the representative of Portugal, while not committing himself with regard to the principles as a whole, had made it clear that his Government did not intend to proceed with the fulfilment of its obligations under Chapter XI. He had analysed many of the Articles and Chapters of the Charter in an attempt to infuse new life into the moribund colonial thesis that it was within the sole discretion of the colonial Powers to decide whether or not to implement the provisions of Chapter XI. He had, however, omitted to mention Article 10, which was the key provision of the Charter and gave a complete answer to the question regarding the competence of the General Assembly in matters relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories. No less an authority than Mr. Hans Kelsen, in his book The Law of the United Nations, wrote (p. 551): "Since the General Assembly under Article 10 is authorised to discuss any matter within the scope of the Charter and to make recommendations on such matters to the Members or to the Security Council, and since the administration of the territories to which Chapter XI applies is certainly a matter within the scope of the Charter, the Assembly may discuss the matters to which Articles 73 and 74 refer and make recommendations on these matters". In a further passage of the same book he wrote (p. 556): "If the General Assembly is competent to make recommendations on matters regulated by Chapter XI, and that means to apply its provisions, the Assembly may—in form of a recommendation—specify these territories".

50. He would not go any further into that question since, with the exception of Portugal and Spain, no colonial Power seemed now to lay any emphasis on the alleged non-competence of the General Assembly.

51. The representative of Portugal had dwelt at great length on a number of juridical and other arguments but had not tried to refute any of the facts which had been brought forward by many delegations and which proved beyond doubt that the so-called overseas provinces of Portugal were nothing but colonial territories. The Committee should not allow itself to be drawn into futile discussion but should face the incontrovertible fact that Portugal possessed geographically separated territories inhabited by over 12 million people who were distinct ethnically and culturally from the Portuguese people and who had been arbitrarily placed in a position of subordination. The Portuguese representative had made references to democracy in his statement, but the situation in the Portuguese colonies could not be spoken of in terms of democracy since the facts pointed to something akin to slavery.

52. Nearly everything he had said applied with equal force to Spain, whose representative had, at the previous meeting, fully associated himself with the views expressed by the representative of Portugal.

53. In the opinion of the Bulgarian delegation, the United Nations had reached the stage of considering the immediate abolition of colonialism. That fact must obviously have a bearing on the way in which different colonial problems would be solved. If the Fourth Committee was to fulfil its responsibilities it should approve a draft resolution unequivocally stating that upon the admission of Portugal and Spain to United Nations membership the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter had become applicable to all their colonial territories, namely: Madeira, the Azores, São Tomé and Príncipe, São João Batista de Ajudá, Cabinda, Angola, Mozambique, Macau, Goa, Timor and other dependencies, under the administration of Portugal; and Infní, Spanish Sahara, Fernando Póo, Rio Muni and the Canary Islands, under the administration of Spain. Naturally any resolution which the General Assembly might adopt later regarding the immediate liberation of all colonies would apply also to the colonies of Portugal and Spain.

The meeting rose at 5.25 p.m.

AGENDA ITEM 38

Study of principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for in Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: report of the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1467 (XIV) (A/4526, A/C.4/L.648 and Add.1, A/C.4/L.649) (continued)

1. Mr. DORSINVILLE (Haiti) said that he was speaking, not with reference to the report of the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter (A/4526), which in the main the Haitian delegation approved of except for a few remarks elicited by the so-called integration principle, but rather to exercise his right of reply. In connexion with the definition of the word "territory", the representative of Portugal had repeated at the 1036th meeting, with respect for the letter but in contradiction to their spirit, certain terms of a statement which he himself had made in the Fourth Committee on 31 January 1957, during the eleventh session (618th meeting), at the time the Fourth Committee had been considering document A/C.4/331 and Add.1.

2. Repeating the text of his first statement, he made it clear that the word "territory" had, of course, no precise legal meaning in international law and might have widely varying meanings in a constitutional text. For example, the Australian Government had considered the Territory of Papua a Non-Self-Governing Territory, to which the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter were applicable, but no one had ever disputed that the Northern Territory of Australia, which formed part of the Australian continent, was not included in those same provisions. It was quite apparent that at the San Francisco Conference there had been unanimity in excluding metropolitan territories from the field of application of Chapter XI, which could be applied only to non-metropolitan regions, called colonies, possessions and protectorates, whose inhabitants had not yet attained full self-government. That was the argument which the Government of the United Kingdom had still maintained at the eighth session in connexion with the Fourth Committee's Consideration of the question of factors.

3. As for determining the difficult point whether "sovereignty" could be invoked with reference to Non-Self-Governing Territories, he simply drew attention to the fact that there was no mention whatever of sovereignty in Chapter XI of the Charter. The obligations it contained were assumed by the Member States "who have...responsibilities for the administration" of those Territories. Even where Territories integrated into the metropolitan country were concerned, the transmission of information under the provisions of Article 73 e had raised no problem for New Zealand, for example, with respect to the Cook Islands or the Tokelau Islands.

4. It had been said that the list of Territories enumerated in General Assembly resolution 66 (I) had confirmed the decision of only a few Member States, that that decision could not be binding upon other Member States, and that at San Francisco it had been decided not to discuss one Territory or another in particular. He recalled, however, that at San Francisco the Australian delegation had put forward the idea, which unfortunately had not been retained, that the General Assembly might designate the Territories for which the Administering Members were to submit annual reports to the United Nations, and that the General Assembly might also, before designating those Territories, call one or more conferences to be attended by those States administering territories whose inhabitants were not yet able to cope alone with the difficulties of the modern world and might take into consideration the recommendations emerging from such gatherings. Measures of that sort would have made it possible to settle once and for all the question still before the Committee. The fact none the less remained that the decision made at San Francisco was not final, and that the General Assembly had on several occasions made known its views concerning the obligation to transmit information on Non-Self-Governing Territories, as, for instance, in its resolutions 66 (I), 334 (IV) and 648 (VII).

5. Professor Hans Kelsen, an expert on the Charter, had concluded, with regard to Chapter XI, that the obligations embodied in that Chapter were binding upon States that had not taken part in the San Francisco Conference but had since become Members of the United Nations; that repeated violation of the obligations contained in Chapter XI might cause sanctions to be applied; that in its resolution 66 (I) the General Assembly had left to the Member States the task of determining which territories came within the category designated in Chapter XI; and that the General Assembly might nevertheless designate those territories in the form of a recommendation which would not, however, be mandatory.^{1/}

6. It could not be gainsaid, as was apparent from the last-mentioned conclusion, that the recommendations of the General Assembly might often be disregarded. It was true, none the less, that in becoming a Member of the United Nations, a State bound itself to respect both the spirit and the letter of the Charter, so that a simple study of the actual situation of certain territories might, apart from any legal argumentation, rightfully cause the question to be raised whether or not it would be proper to apply in some particular case or other the provisions of Articles 73 and 74. In his mind there was no doubt that in the territories under Portuguese administration, there was no equality of rights between the people administered and those administering.

7. Mr. Krishna MENON (India) said that he was keenly interested in the discussion of the principles that should govern the application of Article 73 e of the Charter, for the question was a fundamental one, involving the very meaning of the Charter. After admitting Spain and Portugal in 1955, the General Assembly had tried unsuccessfully, at its tenth, eleventh and twelfth sessions, to clarify the meaning of Chapter XI. That was why it had decided at its fourteenth session, in its resolution 1467 (XIV), to establish the Special Committee of Six, composed of Administering Members and non-administering Members. That Committee had formulated some excellent principles, which were set out in section V, part B, of its report and which the Fourth Committee would no doubt adopt.

8. In different ways, Spain and Portugal were maintaining that none of the territories under their administration came within the scope of the provisions of Chapter XI and that they were therefore not obliged to transmit information under Article 73 e. Spain, however, had adopted a more conciliatory attitude, in the sense that, although making legal reservations, it had transmitted material to the Secretary-General for information purposes. That was a gratifying step forward, and he hoped to be able to note further progress when the General Assembly had clearly expressed its opinion.

9. Portugal, on the other hand, felt itself under no obligation, as if its rights and duties were different from those of other States signatories to the Charter. It would be plainly to its advantage, however, to transmit information, since by keeping silent about its territories it in no wise prevented the world, and the Indian delegation in particular, from forming its own ideas about the lot of the local inhabitants. Actually, the problem was not so much one of transmitting information as of applying the Charter. The many proposals put forward during and after the Second World War, some even by administering Powers like the United Kingdom and Australia, had tended to recognize that the dependent peoples were a kind of moral "trust" and had therefore to be prepared for independence. The Charter was based upon that idea, notwithstanding the formal legal distinctions between Non-Self-Governing Territories and Trust Territories. Portugal claimed to be the only one to interpret the Charter properly—an extraordinary claim—and denied any obligation.

However, the United Nations was a body of States which had all accepted the provisions of the Charter. The Charter was an organic whole; to deny one of its provisions was tantamount to denying all of them. It was not a mere manifesto, but a multilateral instrument binding upon each signatory. Unlike conventions or treaties, it did not allow the Members of the United Nations the option of making reservations to some of its parts or of denouncing it as a whole. Each Member of the United Nations was bound by the Charter unless, through a regrettable decision, it decided to leave the Organization. Since Portugal had asked to be admitted, it ought to consider itself bound by the Charter.

10. The provisions of Articles 73 and 74 were applicable to all Member States without exception. Portugal claimed exemption from the obligations imposed by those Articles by using as an argument the meaning of the word "territory". It must however be noted that that word signified only an area of land or a region of the world; since it was not capitalized, there was no need to give it a special definition or interpretation. Therefore, Portugal could not claim that its colonies were not "territories", since that word had no special meaning. The only way of knowing whether the regions were within the scope of Articles 73 and 74 was to determine whether their peoples had not yet attained a full measure of self-government. That was indeed the case with the Portuguese possessions.

11. In accepting the sacred trust defined in Article 73, States signatories to the Charter acknowledged their accountability to the United Nations. While those Articles did not, like the ones dealing with the International Trusteeship System, give the United Nations the right to exercise supervision, they placed the General Assembly under a duty to require information from the Administering Members, in order to see that they discharged their trust. No Administering Member before Portugal had made the slightest difficulty; Portugal alone had raised the question of interpretation. But that stage had long since been passed. From 1945 to 1955 Member States had laid down how the Charter was to be understood. On becoming a Member of the United Nations, Portugal had become bound not only by the Charter, but also by the interpretation given to it by the General Assembly in ten years' practice.

12. Nor could Portugal take refuge in the argument of the supremacy of its national Constitution. That supremacy existed only to a certain degree. All the States signatories to the Charter had renounced the right to acquire territories by force, and municipal law could not take precedence over international law. That was also the view of the commentators on the Charter. Of the twenty-two jurists quoted in document A/AC.100/2/Add.2, which had been made available to the Special Committee of Six, only four, one of them Portuguese, had certain reservations on that point. Mr. Louis Delbez stated, on the other hand, in his Manuel de droit international public^{2/} (p. 139):

"All the Members of the United Nations agree to restrict their jurisdiction immediately in respect of all territories in their possession, which are no longer called colonies, but 'dependent territories'."

"As a result the legal status of the colonial territory is changed. Although it is still part of the national territory, it is detached from the metropolitan territory in the sense that it is no longer subject to the same juridical system. The metropolitan territory continues to be governed solely by municipal law, whereas the colonial territory is now in large measure subject to international law."

13. Furthermore, even if one accepted Portugal's argument that Chapter XI of the Charter was merely a unilateral declaration, one would be obliged to add that it was also the unilateral declaration of Portugal, as a Member of the United Nations. But Chapter XI was not a unilateral declaration. The use of the word "Declaration", at the head of the Chapter, should not cause misunderstanding. If some Chapters had binding force while others were mere statements of opinion, the result would be anarchy. The text in question was not a preamble, nor an explanatory note, nor a schedule, but a declaration which was as fully binding as a concordat or as the Paris Declaration of 1856. To think otherwise would amount to saying that a convention was not as binding as a treaty, because it bore a different name.

14. In reality, Portugal's only title was the right of conquest. It was first in search of spices, and then to spread Christianity, that the Portuguese explorers had set out to discover the world. The only ground invoked by Portugal for keeping its possessions was that they were very old. No conquest of that kind would be accepted today. Be that as it might, Portugal was the only country which wanted to make the inhabitants of its colonies Portuguese. The United Kingdom had never claimed that the Indians were English! The Indian delegation did not consider that conquest gave sovereignty to the conquering power. Sovereignty resided solely in the people of the conquered territory, and reverted to it when colonial rule ended.

15. The Portuguese possessions were not settled territories like Australia, but conquered territories, whose inhabitants were subjected by laws enacted without their consent to treatment different from that accorded to the inhabitants of the metropolitan country. The Portuguese themselves regarded those territories as colonies. In an article in the review Foreign Affairs^{3/}, Prime Minister Salazar had written in 1956: "...it may be said that Africa lives and must continue for an unforeseeable time to live under the control and guidance of a civilized State." Was not the domination of one country by another colonialism? By asserting the necessity of colonialism, was the Prime Minister not repudiating the very aim of the Charter? Prime Minister Salazar went on: "Public administration and the guidance of labor is unavoidably in the hands of a small minority of Europeans. Their tasks cannot be abandoned or handed over to the indigenous elements indiscriminately and all at once." In the same article, the Prime Minister had written: "In fact, when it is conscious of its mission the colonizing country ensures peace, is responsible for maintaining order, organizes life, promotes economic development... It may well be asked whether the same end would be reached as quickly in any other way." That meant that colonialism was not only necessary but desirable.

16. Accounts published of conditions in those territories—exaggerated accounts, perhaps, but it was for Portugal to prove that—were scarcely encouraging.

^{3/} Oliveira Salazar, "Goa and the Indian Union: The Portuguese View". Foreign Affairs, vol. 34, No. 3 (April 1956).

According to Mr. Peter Ritner in his book The Death of Africa,^{4/} all the inhabitants of the Portuguese African territories, with the exception of Europeans and some 10,000 "assimilated" persons, were liable to forced labour, instituted by the authorities at the end of the nineteenth century to make it appear that the territories had been Europeanized. Portugal had, in particular, signed labour agreements with the Union of South Africa to "facilitate" the hiring of Africans in Mozambique. According to Mr. Marvin Harris, idleness had become immoral and illegal for Africans. If an African could not prove that he was not idle, he was carried off to the police station; he then had to find a European employer, or agree to be hired by a South African agent, or be drafted by the Government into one of the conscript gangs which carried out construction works.

17. In Mozambique, a company set up by the mines had been granted a monopoly by the Portuguese authorities for the hiring of indigenous labour; since the formation of that company, the wages offered had fallen to a level below that of 1896. The vigorous suppression of labour agitation had contributed not a little to that result. There was in fact no collective bargaining and no law to protect indigenous labour. If the author of an article published in Lisbon in O Seculo on 4 August 1956 was to be believed: "It has been more than once demonstrated that the white man in Africa cannot carry out heavy tasks, which demand a fatiguing and exhausting human effort... He may only be given the task of directing and of guiding, administratively and technically. Other tasks are naturally reserved for the Negroes, since they are the only ones capable of carrying them out." Did not that mean that slavery was conceived for the good of the slave, who was good for nothing else?

18. Without wishing to dwell on discriminatory practices which were well known, and admittedly not the worst in the world, he must stress the deplorable educational situation. In Angola, with a population of 4 million, only 58,000 children had been attending school in 1954. In 1950 the proportion of African illiterates had been 99 per cent, as against 23 per cent of whites. Most schools reserved the few vacant places for the Portuguese. In 1956 the public primary schools had comprised 2,531 children of whites born in Europe, 3,382 children of whites born in Africa, 3,210 children of mulattos and only 737 children of Africans. The proportion had been a little better in the private schools, but generally speaking it appeared that only 5 per cent of the children of school age were able to attend school. According to Lord Hailey, the Portuguese territories were the only major areas in Africa unaffected by the acceleration of social and economic change which had elsewhere been the most important result of participation in the Second World War.

19. Lastly, the populations enjoyed no civil liberties. In Goa in particular, public meetings were banned, and permission was required even for prayer meetings. In 1955, Portuguese troops had fired on the inhabitants taking part in demonstrations of passive resistance. Many people had been killed. Others had been sentenced to terms of imprisonment of up to twenty-eight years; yet others had been deported to Africa and to Portugal. Between 1954 and 1959, several hundred Goans had been arrested, tortured and imprisoned for taking part in the freedom movement. Some were still in prison; others carried on them the marks of wounds or mutilations caused by the Portuguese. Despite that, India had stationed no troops on the Goan frontier. However, it must not be thought that its silence meant approval. It was because India was aware of its international responsibilities that it did not want to have any difficulties with Portugal or the international community. Nevertheless, it reserved the right to call for the liberation of Goa, which was as much an integral part of Indian territory as were the former French establishments.

20. It was no good ignoring the realities of the world. It had become impossible to speak of colonies from a purely legalistic point of view. The Charter prescribed respect for human rights and the maintenance of international peace and security. It imposed on the Portuguese Government the obligation at least to transmit information on economic, social and educational conditions in the territories it administered, and the General Assembly had the right to apply in that connexion the provisions of Article 10 of the Charter. It was because it was convinced of the truth of that assertion that his delegation had sponsored jointly with other delegations the draft resolution in document A/C.4/L.649. His delegation hoped that the draft resolution would receive the unanimous support of the Committee, particularly that of Portugal and Spain.

21. Mr. NOGUEIRA (Portugal) rejected categorically the Indian representative's allegations concerning conditions in the Portuguese territories; as to the legal arguments, he reserved the right to revert to them when he had studied the text of the Indian representative's statement.

22. Recalling that Mr. Krishna Menon himself had stated in the Security Council on 21 November 1957 that the fact that a majority of States were of the same opinion did not mean that the opinion was necessarily right^{5/}—from which it could be deduced a posteriori that the minority opinion was not necessarily wrong—he failed to understand why the representative of India now thought it extraordinary that the Portuguese delegation's view should differ from that of other delegations or even of the large majority of Assembly Members.

23. Mr. ROHAL-ILKIV (Czechoslovakia) said he wished to clear up any possible misunderstanding concerning a statement made by the representative of Spain at the 1038th meeting, which had been unexpected, to say the least, seeing that Spain and Czechoslovakia held diametrically opposed views on colonialism. If the representative of Spain considered that the ideas of the Spanish delegation and those of the Czechoslovak delegation coincided, it must be because he misunderstood the Czechoslovak delegation's position. Its attitude was very clear: it was essential to liquidate the colonial system immediately. In the particular case of the Spanish and Portuguese colonies, the Assembly should insist on the information called for under Article 73 e and should require Spain and Portugal to recognize that the territories they administered were not so-called overseas provinces but colonies.

24. Mr. KRIGA (Chad), after extending his delegation's congratulations to the Chairman of the Fourth Committee on his election and to the members of the Special Committee for their report, said that the twelve principles enumerated in section V, part B, of that report gave precise and unequivocal expression to the will of the Members of the United Nations as set out in the Charter and more particularly in Article 73. The principles gave an exact definition of Non-Self-Governing Territories, and his delegation was ready to support any draft resolution fully endorsing them.

25. While it was to be hoped that the debates of the current session would lead to the complete and rapid abolition of the colonial system, Spain and Portugal were still maintaining, particularly in Africa, colonies, which they cynically called provinces, where the most inhuman colonialism was rife. In Angola, for example, there were only 47,000 children in the primary schools out of a total population of 4.5 million inhabitants; 700,000 inhabitants were subjected to forced labour, and the population was living under the threat of internment in concentration camps, torture and even death; the inhabitants were classified as civilized, assimilated and non-civilized. In the whole of the Portuguese possessions there were only 35,000 out of 11 million inhabitants who had the vote, and the administrative system differed from that of the metropolitan country. It was therefore understandable that the Spanish Government and the Portuguese Government found some difficulty in transmitting information on their so-called overseas provinces.

26. Since 1946, 100 million people in nearly thirty Non-Self-Governing Territories had become independent; but 150 million, mainly in Africa, were still awaiting their freedom and were looking towards the United Nations. Yet, if the colonialist Powers had not constantly blocked the decisions of the international Organization, it would now have sufficiently powerful means at its disposal to impose its will, if necessary, on the few countries still imbued with colonialism. The non-self-governing peoples wanted independence and freedom. The United Nations had the overriding duty of rescuing them from the political, economic, social and cultural domination of the colonial system. No constitutional amendment could be an excuse for continuing to exploit the colonial territories; on the contrary, the domination of one people by another people which differed from it in race, language, culture, religion and philosophy was an international matter, of concern to all the Members of the United Nations. Yet up till now the vague notions which had been adopted had allowed colonialism to be maintained.

27. To those who stated, in a Portuguese periodical, that they would never leave Africa unless driven out by force and that they would not consent to the exploitation of blacks by blacks, he would reply that there was not an iota of metropolitan territory in Africa and that Africa was African. He asked the colonial Powers and all those with designs on Africa to heed the voice, growing ever stronger, of the African peoples, who, in complete solidarity, were claiming their freedom; for nothing could hold back the wave of nationalism which was sweeping over the African continent. Consequently, his delegation thought that the Committee should adopt the twelve principles formulated by the Special Committee. The loyal application of those principles would enable the United Nations to follow the political, economic and social evolution of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in fulfilment of its responsibility under the Charter, the aim of which was to ensure the equality, happiness and brotherhood of all mankind.

AGENDA ITEM 38

1. Mr. NOGUEIRA (Portugal) said that, despite the existence of many extremely important and urgent questions on which mankind's very survival depended, it was the question of colonialism which had constantly been in the forefront of the discussions in plenary meeting, and in all the Committees, at the General Assembly's fifteenth session. Although that was particularly true of the debates in the Fourth Committee, there was no definition of what constituted "colonialism" or a "colony". It was, however, important that the Committee should know what it was fighting against, and it was equally important that it should offer a positive alternative to colonialism and imperialism; otherwise the Committee would be adopting a purely negative and destructive attitude.

2. Several representatives had described a "colony" as a territory that was geographically separated from the metropolitan territory and that was inhabited by people of a different race or culture who were socially and economically at a lower stage of development. Such a definition, however, was untenable. The geographical separation of territories was an irrelevant factor because a number of independent States consisted of archipelagos or other combinations of geographically distinct areas. The inadequacy of geographical separation as a criterion had been recognized by the representative of Ireland in the Fourth Committee, and by Mexico in its reply to the Secretary-General (A/AC.100/1, paras. 73-118). Referring to the principles enumerated in section V, part B, of the report of the Special Committee of Six on the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter (A/4526), he noted that the Special Committee itself had stated, in principle IV, that geographical separation was only a prima facie consideration.

3. His delegation also rejected the criterion of racial or cultural differences, because it was opposed to all discrimination based on race or colour. In reality, under principle IV racial and cultural distinctness was regarded merely as a prima facie factor. There was a contradiction inherent in the argument itself, since the Fourth Committee was—quite rightly—unanimous in opposing all racial segregation or discrimination and in striving to bring about international co-operation and solidarity. The assertion that racial or cultural distinctness should necessarily imply a political distinctness ran counter to those aims. His delegation believed that all Americans, Africans, Europeans or Asians were human beings first and foremost, entitled to equal rights and opportunities. The acceptance of any other standpoint would impoverish mankind socially and culturally by preventing the blending of races and cultures, which was the only source of progress. It would surely be generally agreed that there were many independent countries inhabited by a number of races with different cultures and backgrounds; indeed it might be said that all countries were multiracial, since there was no such thing as a pure race and the universal tendency was towards the development of multiracial societies. His delegation therefore agreed with the conclusion in the report that racial and cultural criteria were immaterial in defining a "colony".

4. Lastly, it had been argued that a territory whose economic level was low in comparison with that of any other territory of the same country constituted a colony. The report of the Special Committee of Six, however, referred to that question only briefly, in principle V, and subject to the important reservation that such an economic element must affect the relationship between territories in a manner which arbitrarily placed one territory in a position of subordination to the other. His delegation agreed with that concept, because if there was arbitrariness in such relationship there was economic exploitation, which was one of the elements of colonialism. If there was no arbitrariness in the relationship, however, the economic situation was irrelevant; and that was further substantiated by the fact that in all independent countries, whether geographically united or separated, there were various degrees of economic development. The conclusion therefore was that the economic situation of a territory did not, of itself, indicate whether or not it was a colony.

5. He would not elaborate on the point at length; but in the light of all the considerations put forward in the Fourth Committee and in other Committees, certain conclusions might be reached. A "colony" existed when one people dominated another, when the principle of equality of rights and opportunity was not accepted, when there was economic and financial exploitation, when territories were held for military reasons or to further national power, when a particular religion, creed or culture was imposed on others, and when political and ideological doctrines were imposed on peoples to increase the power and prestige of a country or group of countries.

6. All those aspects had been mentioned by various delegations in connexion with the report of the Special Committee of Six; and he would have expected the report to be debated in the light of such considerations, so as to enable the Fourth Committee to proceed to the general application of the principles enunciated by the Special Committee. His delegation had been astonished and, indeed, appalled at the manner in which the Fourth Committee had proceeded. The report was being used, not for a general and objective investigation, but merely as an instrument against two countries: Spain and Portugal. Apparently it had not occurred to a number of delegations that others might wish to question some of the replies to the Secretary-General besides those from Spain and Portugal. His delegation did not agree that replies from Member Governments should be discussed; but it had doubts on the replies received from certain countries such as, for example, the Soviet Union or the Indian Union. At the present stage, however, he would merely state the position of his own country in respect of the report, and answer some of the arguments that had been advanced by delegations which had tried to apply the report to Portugal.

7. The Portuguese nation was scattered over various continents, but it had been shown that geography alone did not imply any idea of colonialism. Many nations had territories in more than one continent, and the independence of the various component parts had not been questioned. The only difference was that the Portuguese nation had existed in its present form for five centuries. Mr. James Duffy, in his book Portuguese Africa,^{1/} had written (p. 5): "On the southern bank of one of the world's great rivers the Portuguese crown in the sixteenth century attempted a modest program of co-operation and development with a primitive people, which, compared with the policies of many European powers in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, remains, in some of its ideals, a model of diplomatic understanding and restraint." True, there had been wars at various stages, which was a matter of regret, but that had nothing to do with the point under discussion. Principle V of the report of the Special Committee of Six mentioned the historical element as one of the additional elements which might be taken into account.

8. Another accusation which had been made was that the various provinces of Portugal were inhabited by different races. That was indeed so, but the same was true of many nations; indeed, practically all countries were inhabited by more than one race. His delegation could see nothing reprehensible in that state of affairs, and refused to take account of any considerations based on race or colour. Once again, principle IV made allowance for such a situation.

9. It had been indicated that the Portuguese overseas provinces were not at the same economic level as the European territory. That was partly true and partly untrue, since there were some territories overseas where economic growth was faster than in Europe. That again, however, was meaningless in terms of colonialism or self-government, and economic development was referred to in principle V as an additional element. In many countries, even the most highly developed, there were areas which were less advanced; and if it were accepted, as it must be, that geography, race and culture were irrelevant in terms of colonialism, the economic element was certainly not decisive.

10. Many delegations had stressed that up to 1951 the overseas territories had been called colonies and that only in 1951 had the name been changed to "provinces", the implication being that such a change had been made for reasons of expediency. None of the delegations in question, however, had mentioned the fact that the word "provinces" had been used for centuries; in Portuguese general law and customary law the word "province" had been applied to overseas territories for the first time around 1576; since then it had been used repeatedly—in various laws and ordinances, in the Constitutions of 1820, 1832, 1842 and 1911, and in the Constitution of 1933, which was still in force. The word "colony" had been used for a brief period because in 1935, when administrative reforms had been introduced, the drafters of those reforms had considered that the word "colony" had a more dignified connotation, in accordance with Roman law. Public opinion however, especially overseas, had gradually reacted, and when the Constitution had been amended in 1951 and Portuguese Parliament had reverted to the old nomenclature. Thus that particular argument used against Portugal proved nothing.

11. Another line of accusation was that, since the seat of the Government and of the national parliament was in the European territory, the overseas territories were governed from outside. He was surprised that such an argument should have been advanced. It was of course true that the Head of the State, the National Assembly and the Government had their seat at Lisbon, as did also the Supreme Judicial Court, the Supreme Administrative Court and the Council of State. He had repeatedly pointed out in the Fourth Committee that Portugal was not a federation or a confederation; it was a unitary State, and sovereignty was not, therefore, divided or exercised by degrees. That being so, and since the same organs of sovereignty had competence throughout the whole national territory, there was political unity; the nation was one, and where there was the nation there also had to be the State. Precisely for that reason, the Portuguese Constitution did not allow of any discrimination among the various territories; it was impossible to apply one political status to one territory on the international plane and a different political status to another territory. Hence Article 73 did not apply to Portugal, which could not be required to transmit information to the Secretary-General. Portugal's attitude in that respect was very firm.

12. A number of delegations had raised the question of the so-called division of the Portuguese population in the overseas territories into "civilized" and "non-civilized". In fact, the two categories of "civilized" and "non-civilized" were not established by Portuguese law; the Portuguese word had been wrongly translated by various foreign writers, and had been given wide circulation. Incidentally, the representative of Guinea at the 1038th meeting had made the unfounded statement that there was a Portuguese law establishing five categories of inhabitants of Angola—a statement which had been culled from a pamphlet circulated by the

^{1/} Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Press, 1959.

American Committee on Africa. To repeat: there was no such division as "civilized" and "non-civilized". But there was a second factor which had been conveniently disregarded: in five of the eight Portuguese overseas provinces, all the population had full rights in all fields, including the right to vote and to be elected. Since people of many races inhabited those five territories, he failed to understand how certain delegations could dare to affirm that the system was based on racial considerations. With regard to the other three territories, in Portugal, as in all countries, there were still some segments of the population which had not reached an advanced stage of progress. His delegation did not deny that that situation existed, but he did not consider that Portugal should be blamed for it, especially since every effort was being made to remedy it. In the course of the debate the representatives of Mali and India had admitted that some of the populations of those territories did have full rights, including political rights. He was well aware that if it were proved—as it could be—that in the five territories which he had mentioned full political and other rights were enjoyed, that the process of integration there had long ago been completed, that the people voted and were elected, and that they had full representation and were on a footing of absolute equality, the Committee would still not be prepared to accept those facts because they would not suit certain delegations.

13. In that connexion he recalled that figures relating to 1950 had been quoted by certain representatives. Ten years had elapsed, many events had occurred, and the figures in question were no longer valid.

14. During the debate he had wondered at times whether his reply would be ready to delegations or to a pamphlet by Professor Marvin Harris entitled "Portugal's African 'Wards'",^{2/} which was the main source from which delegations had drawn their conclusions. At the 1036th meeting, the representative of Iraq had frankly stated that he was quoting from that pamphlet, but many other delegations had quoted from it without mentioning the fact. The author himself admitted in the pamphlet that it had not been written in a disinterested or unemotional frame of mind. In other words, the pamphlet was biased and partial, and had been based on preconceived ideas. Professor Harris, as a private individual, was entitled to write as he wished; but delegations speaking on behalf of their Governments were not entitled to take such a pamphlet as the sole basis for unfounded accusations against another delegation and another country. There was a wide range of available books on the subject by writers who were also scholars and men of integrity, but all those books had been ignored. Other quotations had been made rather loosely, to say the least. For example, at the 1032nd meeting the representative of Ghana, in quoting from an article written by Mr. Sarmento Rodrigues, a former Portuguese Minister for Overseas Provinces, as the introduction to a book entitled Inquiry on Anti-Colonialism published by the Ministry for Overseas Provinces in 1957, had read passages taken from various paragraphs as though they formed a single, continuous text. Similarly he had quoted from the same book selected passages from a Portuguese writer, Professor da Silva Cunha, in such a way as to convey the impression that the author was advocating a vast international plot against Africa, whereas in fact he had been suggesting that some kind of regional co-operation should be created in order to protect the interests of Africa. Much had also been made of an article contributed by the Prime Minister of Portugal to the review Foreign Affairs.^{3/} That article had been mentioned many times in the Committee; he would not deal with the point at length, but would merely state once again that the Prime Minister had had two purposes in writing the article: to try to define the substance of colonialism, and to show that colonialism was not practised by the Portuguese Government.

15. While on the subject of misquotations, he would refer to a statement made by the representative of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic concerning an exchange of telegrams, between the former Head of the Portuguese State and the Head of another State, from which that representative had concluded that there had been modifications in the frontier "around" Lake Nyasa and that large blocks of territory and people had changed hands. The facts were that on, not around, Lake Nyasa—which was a vast stretch of water 200 to 250 miles long and nearly fifty miles wide—the frontier had never been demarcated and that various problems had arisen with regard to jurisdiction, fisheries and so forth. It had therefore been necessary to demarcate an ideal line on the water. When the work had been completed and the agreement signed, there had, as a matter of normal courtesy, been the exchange of telegrams to which he had referred. No land and no populations had been transferred. He was surprised that the representative of the Byelorussian SSR had made such a baseless accusation, and wondered whether that representative had forgotten the extensive modifications of frontiers and the large-scale transfers of populations forcibly carried out after the Second World War, without United Nations supervision, for the exclusive benefit of a single powerful country.

16. The representative of Iraq had alleged that the Minister for Overseas Provinces had a special position; that there were administrative and economic differences between the European provinces and the overseas provinces, only the latter having governors; and that the overseas provinces were not an integral part of the nation. In fact, the Minister for Overseas Provinces had no kind of special position or competence within the Government; like any other minister, he was responsible to the Prime Minister. The European provinces were in point of fact also headed by governors, while the administrative and economic differences were clearly established in the Constitution. Those differences were to be found in all constitutions, and did not imply any division or fragmentation of sovereignty. The meaning of the economic differentiations was that, by law, no funds from any province could be invested or transferred elsewhere; there was thus no possibility of taking advantage of a particular territory for the benefit of another—in other words, of practising what in the Fourth Committee went by the name of economic exploitation.

17. The representative of Iraq had quoted from the Portuguese Constitution. That representative, however, had omitted any reference to certain other articles of the Constitution, stipulating that sovereignty was vested in the nation, which consisted of all Portuguese citizens; that Portuguese citizens were all those persons who were born in Portuguese territory as defined in article 1 of the Constitution; and that the Portuguese State was a unitary State. Again, article 72 of the Constitution made it clear that the whole nation participated in the political life of the State.

18. Since many delegations had expressed the view that the report of the Special Committee of Six applied only to Spain and Portugal, his delegation felt obliged to state, firstly, that the principles set forth in the report did not apply to his country and, secondly, that his delegation rejected the report. There had been a fundamental contradiction in the Committee's proceedings; the Fourth Committee was opposed to colonialism wherever it might be found, yet the implementation of the Special Committee's report was discriminatory and, apart from Spain and Portugal, it was not known to what other territories it should also apply. He wondered whether it applied to countries which had been independent and recognized as such by the international community but which had been integrated without any supervision by the United Nations. There were other contradictions: some delegations did not vote for certain draft resolutions because of the anti-colonialist declaration to be discussed in plenary meeting, but they had already stated that they would vote for any draft resolutions directed against Spain and Portugal. Again, it was said that the report was a universal guide and that each case should be examined; yet it did not seem to occur to anyone to mention any nations other than Spain and Portugal. From the fact that Portuguese overseas territories had been called colonies for a few years, without any change of structure, members of the Committee had drawn the conclusion that they were colonial territories. First his country was accused of not respecting the individuality and cultural characteristics of the peoples of the overseas territories, then it was reproached because in some provinces integration was not complete. It had been stated that colonialism was a global fact and should be treated on a global scale; but so far there had been no suggestion that the report should also cover what many delegations had described, in plenary meeting, as the worst type of colonialism.

19. He reserved his delegation's right to make further replies and any other statements which might be called for. He wished to say, in conclusion, that delegations had not hesitated to defame his country in the gravest manner. It was an undoubted fact that decisions in the Committee were arrived at before any discussion had taken place; threats were made, and the accusers were also the judges. Though the tendency of the Committee appeared to be towards a system under which all non-concurring voices would be muffled in the hope of their being finally silenced, his delegation refused to be either muffled or silenced.

20. Mr. MORSE (United States of America) said that his delegation's final decision with regard to draft resolution A/C.4/L.649 would depend very much on its final wording.

21. In his view, the Committee was making a mountain out of a molehill where the legal interpretation of Articles 73 and 74 of the Charter was concerned. Since those Articles had already been part of the Charter when Spain and Portugal had become Member States, it followed that those two States thereby assumed the obligations inherent in the legal meaning of the terms used in Articles 73 and 74, obligations which were binding in the absence of any limitation in those Articles. In the latter, the word "territories" was not used in a restrictive sense. Whatever the terms used by an individual country to define its overseas areas, those areas could become a source of world tension. It was obviously one of the purposes of the United Nations that it should be used as a forum where the causes of world tension could be discussed, and an effort should therefore be made to find an amicable solution to the problem of the overseas territories of Spain and Portugal.

22. Those responsible for drafting Article 73 e of the Charter had clearly had two kinds of territory in mind, since they had referred to "the territories... other than those territories to which Chapters XII and XIII apply"; they had thus drawn a distinction between the Trust Territories and a State's other territories beyond its borders. In view of that language, and given the fact that Spain and Portugal had made no reservations at the time when they had become Member States, they were not, in his delegation's view, on very firm legal ground when they claimed that they themselves should decide to which territories Article 73 e referred. He did not question the sovereign right of any country to follow that course, but it was the duty of the United Nations to pass judgement on that State's action in so doing. It was difficult to conclude that it had been the intention of the Special Committee of Six that any overseas area where another country exercised domination over the indigenous inhabitants should be excluded from the scope of its report. He denied the contention that the report was directed solely against Spain and Portugal; it merely so happened that those two countries were not prepared voluntarily to submit information.

23. His delegation would like to see some changes made in the language of draft resolution A/C.4/L.649, with a view to making it more conciliatory. Progress had already been made in that direction, and the wording was far from dictatorial—indeed, he felt that the sponsors should be complimented on their moderate and careful language and their obvious desire to phrase the proposal in such a way as to obtain the widest possible support. He felt that the list of territories might be reconsidered. Whatever modifications were effected, it should be made clear to the subject peoples that the United Nations would hear their voice. The Committee must find a basis upon which all Governments could use the United Nations as a clearing house for the type of information which the Special Committee of Six had contemplated. The real test was whether Member States were ready to apply the principles set out in the Special Committee's report to specific areas in the world.

24. Mr. WEEKS (Liberia) said that his delegation had had recourse to diplomatic procedure and persuasion in its attempt to induce Portugal to submit information under Article 73 e of the Charter. The representative of Portugal was trying to buttress his Government's position by resorting to legal technicalities. In the Liberian delegation's opinion, the Portuguese territories in Africa and elsewhere were in fact colonies in the true sense of the word. Changes had been made in the Portuguese Constitution merely in order to circumvent the Charter.

25. The concept of geographical separation, referred to in principle IV as set out in the Special Committee's report, was self-explanatory, despite the doubts cast upon it by the representative of Portugal. The territories in Africa could not be described as part of the State of Portugal.

26. The Fourth Committee was justified in concentrating on imperialism and colonialism despite the existence of other major problems in the world, since it was the only Committee concerned with human beings—without whom there would be no communities in the world. No definition of the term "imperialism" had been given because there were various kinds of imperialism—social, political, religious or commercial—all of which destroyed the ethnic and social units in the territories in which they were active.

27. The representative of Portugal had referred to economic exploitation as a criterion for deciding whether or not a territory was a colony. Evidence of the existence of exploitation was furnished by the author of a study entitled "Portugal's African 'Wards'", who referred inter alia to the activities of a commission sent to Lourenço Marques in 1893. The commission had been told that nothing could be accomplished without a new labour code because the labour of the Natives was needed for the economy of Europe and the progress of Africa; the Negroes were a race which had never produced the reduments of civilization by their own spontaneous efforts.

28. Mr. NOGUEIRA (Portugal) intervened to ask the name of the author referred to.

29. Mr. WEEKS (Liberia) replied that it was Professor Marvin Harris.

30. Professor Harris's book also contained material relevant to another criterion of colonial status suggested by the representative of Portugal, namely the imposition of an alien creed or ideology. In May 1954 a statute had been passed concerning the inhabitants of Mozambique, Angola and Portuguese Guinea. It established educational qualifications for individuals of the Negro race or their descendants born and habitually resident in those provinces. The process of assimilation implied in that statute constituted conversion to, and the imposition of, ideological principles alien to the customs and ideology of the indigenous inhabitants, who were thus being asked to adopt the habits and customs applied by Portuguese general law. The fact that the legislation in question did not apply to the illiterate Europeans in those territories indicated that that was indeed its purpose.

31. He knew, from personal observation, that in Portugal's African territories there were different classes of citizens, who lived in separate areas. The representative of Portugal could not deny it.

32. Sovereignty was an absolute concept. It belonged to the people of a given territory and their right to own the natural wealth of the territory was not, either, open to doubt.

33. Mr. NIKOI (Ghana) said that he did not find the arguments of the representative of Portugal very convincing. While it was quite true that his delegation had quoted, in its statement at the 1032nd meeting, population figures mentioned in the 1956 revised edition of Lord Hailey's book An African Survey,⁴ it had been forced to resort to those out-of-date figures because Portugal had been refusing to supply more recent ones.

34. A more serious, though implied, charge made by the Portuguese representative concerned quotations from the book entitled Inquiry on Anti-Colonialism, published by the Ministry for Overseas Provinces of the Portuguese Government in 1957. The choice of title for that official publication was, indeed, curious and if one was not conversant with the contents one might have thought that Portugal had embraced anti-colonialism. In actual fact, the Portuguese Government was interested in convincing its allies, and particularly the United States, of the dangers inherent in the anti-colonialist revolution sweeping across Africa. It was true that, in quoting from the book in its earlier statement, his delegation had omitted certain passages; but, as the Committee would see, the omissions had not vitiated the author's argument. After stating quite clearly, in paragraph 3 of the introduction, what the purpose of the book was, the author of the introduction went on, in paragraph 5, to call the Union of South Africa the most important independent country of the continent, closely bound up with Europe; in the same passage he said that Liberia had close links with the United States, that the attitude of the North African countries was not well defined, while the attitude of Ghana appeared to be hardly favourable to Europeans' continued presence in Africa.

35. His intention in quoting from the book had been to indicate a state of mind and a system of approach. In his view, Portugal's African territories were 100 per cent imperialist and colonialist possessions. It might have helped the Committee if the Portuguese representative had addressed himself to the views expressed in the book and had told the Committee whether they still constituted official policy. The author of one of the studies included in the book, Professor da Silva Cunha, argued that in the face of the freedom movement in Africa the colonial Powers should collaborate not only in the elaboration of agreed policies but also in the adjustment of their internal policies, with specific reference to their attitude and methods of action in relation to the indigenous inhabitants; a regional organization, complementary to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), could serve as a basis for common defensive action in Africa, and would help to neutralize the anti-colonialism that still existed in the United States. On page 263 of the book Professor Cunha indicated that such a regional organization should be spearheaded by Portugal, which was a NATO member and which, at the same time, was bound by bilateral treaties to Spain; the collaboration of Spain, which enjoyed high prestige in the Arab world, might counterbalance the disintegrating influences at work in North Africa.

36. In the light of the foregoing, the delegation of Ghana could not be accused of having failed to interpret correctly the intent of Professor Cunha, who had been arguing in favour of a regional organization for stemming the tide of nationalism in Africa. It was open to the Portuguese delegation to deny that fact, but the delegation of Ghana, on the basis of facts and of the statements made by official spokesmen of the Portuguese Government, was forced to conclude that by refusing to co-operate to the extent of submitting information to the United Nations, and by calling loudly for the establishment of a regional organization excluding the new independent African States, Portugal left to the countries directly concerned with the welfare of Africa's inhabitants no alternative but to consider what action they should take in the best interests of all the African States.

37. He reserved the right to revert to the question after he had had time to study in greater detail the statement made by the Portuguese representative.

The PRESIDENT (translated from French): The next item on the agenda is the report of the Fourth Committee on the transmission of information by Members under Article 73 e of the Charter (annex 78).

I call upon Mr. Lisicky, Rapporteur.

Mr. LISICKY (Czechoslovakia), Rapporteur (translated from French): The resolution contained in document A/249 concerns the transmission of statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories, as provided in Chapter XI of the Charter.

In accordance with Article 73 e, Members of the United Nations who have the responsibility of the administration of such territories have agreed to transmit such data regularly to the Secretary-General for information purposes.

The draft resolution before you was carried in the Committee by twenty-three votes to twelve, with three abstentions.

With a view to utilizing the information received by the Secretary-General, the recommendation provides for the establishment of an ad hoc committee with a membership as suggested in paragraph 4 of our conclusions. If this

183. Transmission des renseignements communiqués par les Membres en application de l'Article 73 e de la Charte. Rapport de la Quatrième Commission. Résolution (documents A/249 et A/249/Add.1)

Le PRÉSIDENT: L'ordre du jour appelle la discussion du rapport de la Quatrième Commission sur la transmission des renseignements communiqués par les Membres en application de l'Article 73 e de la Charte (annexe 78).

Je donne la parole à M. Lisicky, Rapporteur.

M. LISICKY (Tchécoslovaquie), Rapporteur: La résolution qui fait l'objet du document A/249 concerne la transmission des renseignements statistiques et autres, de nature technique, relatifs aux territoires non autonomes visés par le Chapitre XI de la Charte.

Les Membres qui ont la responsabilité d'administrer ces territoires ont, en vertu des dispositions de l'Article 73 e de la Charte, accepté de communiquer régulièrement au Secrétaire général, à titre d'information, les renseignements en question.

Le projet de résolution qui vous est soumis a été adopté en commission par vingt-trois voix contre douze, et trois abstentions.

En vue d'utiliser les renseignements reçus par le Secrétaire général, la recommandation prévoit la création d'un comité ad hoc dont la composition est indiquée au point 4 de nos conclusions. L'Assemblée sera donc appelée, si elle approuve meets with approval, the Assembly will thus be called upon to elect the Members to be invited to send representatives to the meeting of the ad hoc committee.

Having said this, I shall limit myself to reading the recommendation from paragraph 4 onwards. The first three paragraphs were carried unanimously in the Committee.

"The General Assembly:

"(4) Invites the Secretary-General to convene, some weeks before the opening of the second session of the General Assembly, an ad hoc committee composed in equal numbers of representatives of the Members transmitting information under Article 73e of the Charter and of representatives of Members elected, by the General Assembly at this session, on the basis of an equitable geographical distribution;

"(5) Invites the Secretary-General to request the Food and Agriculture Organization, the International Labour Organization, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, and the World Health Organization and the International Trade Organization, when constituted, to send representatives in an advisory capacity to the meeting of the ad hoc Committee;

"(6) Invites the ad hoc Committee to examine the Secretary-General's summary and analysis of the information transmitted under Article 73e of the Charter with a view to aiding the General Assembly in its consideration of this information, and with a view to making recommendations to the General Assembly regarding the procedures to be followed in the future and the means of ensuring that the advice, expert knowledge and experience of the specialized agencies are used to the best advantage."

The PRESIDENT (translated from French): I call upon Mr. Blom, representative of the Netherlands.

Mr. BLOM (Netherlands): The Netherlands delegation has stressed in committee that, in the international sphere, no better means exists to promote the well-being of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories, than, first, co-operation of the governments and administrations concerned, which could be established and developed most profitably on a regional basis, and which will allow the peoples themselves to be associated in this work; secondly, by obtaining comparative reports and studies of experts in every field suitable to raising the standards of living of the peoples concerned. Such reports and studies could most successfully be made by expert organizations such as the specialized agencies, whose co-operation in this matter has to be requested and discussed.

la résolution, à procéder à des élections de membres qui feront partie de comité.

Sous le bénéfice de ces observations préliminaires, je me contenterai de lire la recommandation à partir du paragraphe 4. Les trois premiers paragraphes ont été adoptés à l'unanimité par la Commission.

"L'Assemblée générale:

"4) Invite le Secrétaire général à réunir quelques semaines avant l'ouverture de la deuxième session de l'Assemblée générale un comité ad hoc composé d'un nombre égal de représentants des Membres transmettant des renseignements en application de l'Article 73 e de la Charte et de représentants des Membres élus par l'Assemblée générale à cette session, sur la base d'une répartition géographique équitable;

"5) Invite le Secrétaire général à demander à l'Organisation pour l'alimentation et l'agriculture, l'Organisation internationale du Travail, l'Organisation des Nations Unies pour l'éducation, la science et la culture, l'Organisation mondiale de la santé et l'Organisation internationale du commerce, une fois constituées, d'envoyer à titre consultatif des représentants à la réunion du comité ad hoc.

"6) Invite le comité ad hoc à examiner les résumés et analyses faits par le Secrétaire général des renseignements transmis en application de l'Article 73 e de la Charte, en vue d'assister l'Assemblée générale dans son examen de ces renseignements et de faire des recommandations à l'Assemblée générale concernant la procédure à suivre à l'avenir et les moyens d'assurer que les avis, les connaissances techniques et l'expérience des institutions spécialisées soient utilisés au mieux."

Le PRÉSIDENT: Je donne la parole à M. Blom, représentant des Pays-Bas.

M. BLOM (Pays-Bas) (traduit de l'anglais): La délégation des Pays-Bas a attiré l'attention de la Commission sur deux moyens que, dans le domaine international, elle estime les plus propres à favoriser le progrès des populations de territoires qui ne s'administrent pas encore eux-mêmes. Il s'agit: premièrement, d'une collaboration des gouvernements et des autorités administratives intéressés, collaboration qui pourrait être établie et développée avec le plus d'avantages sur une base régionale et qui permettrait aux populations elles-mêmes de participer aux mesures prises; deuxièmement, de rapports et d'études comparatives d'experts dans tous les domaines, propres à favoriser l'amélioration du niveau de vie des peuples intéressés. Il serait bon que ces rapports et ces études soient l'œuvre d'organismes spéciaux comme les institutions spécialisées, dont il convient de demander et de discuter la collaboration en la matière.

The Netherlands delegation is convinced that there is no better way of international co-operation in the interest of the populations concerned than by having drawn up, discussed and published regularly, expert comparative reports on social, health, educational, economic, and whatever other technical subjects are suitable for the purpose.

The draft resolution proposed by the Fourth Committee, as it now stands, and particularly paragraphs 4, 5 and 6, which invite the Secretary-General to convene an ad hoc committee before the next session of the General Assembly to examine the Secretary-General's report on the information transmitted in accordance with Article 73e of the Charter, is, in our opinion, not a desirable procedure. The recommendation of convening this committee has political implications; their conformity with the basic character of Chapter XI of the Charter is subject to grave doubt. Moreover, more important still, the recommendation will not serve the best interests of the populations concerned. We feel that it would be regrettable indeed if international co-operation in the interest of the populations in Non-Self-Governing Territories were endangered by aiming, if only implicitly, at interference with the development of the internal political organization of the territories concerned.

During the debate on the Philippine resolution, the representative of the United States, among others, very eloquently and very convincingly explained why such interference is not in accordance with the Charter. The reasons which he mentioned are equally applicable in this case. Moreover, it would not only be contrary to the Charter, but it would also hamper the peaceful development of the populations, and might well impair good relations.

For these reasons, the Netherlands delegation is not in favour of establishing the ad hoc committee proposed. And may we remind the General Assembly that it has often been rightly stressed that the very able Secretariat should be considered well qualified for the task of reporting to the General Assembly on the information transmitted in accordance with Article 73e of the Charter?

The Netherlands delegation feels quite justified in taking this view, because, as is well known, the Netherlands Government intends to give the overseas territories of our Kingdom full self-government in the near future. We therefore look at this matter from a detached point of view. As stated before, the Netherlands delegation is opposed to paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 of this proposal. The first part of the resolution, however, is very valuable, and we fully agree with its contents.

To give us the opportunity to express this

La délégation des Pays-Bas est convaincue qu'il n'existe pas de meilleur moyen de collaborer, sur le plan international, dans l'intérêt des populations en question, que d'élaborer, de discuter et de publier régulièrement des rapports comparatifs d'experts sur les questions sociales, économiques, d'hygiène et d'enseignement, ainsi que sur toutes autres questions techniques dont l'étude peut aider à la réalisation des fins visées.

Toutefois, le projet de résolution proposé par la Quatrième Commission, sous sa forme actuelle, et notamment les paragraphes 4, 5 et 6 qui invitent le Secrétaire général à réunir un comité ad hoc avant la prochaine session de l'Assemblée générale afin d'examiner le rapport du Secrétaire général sur les renseignements communiqués conformément à l'Article 73 e de la Charte, ne constitue pas, à notre avis, une procédure souhaitable. La recommandation de réunir cette commission comporte des implications politiques dont on peut douter fortement qu'elles soient en harmonie avec l'esprit du Chapitre XI de la Charte. En outre, et ce qui est encore plus important, cette recommandation n'est pas de nature à servir au mieux les intérêts des populations intéressées. Nous estimons qu'il serait éminemment regrettable que la collaboration internationale dans l'intérêt des populations de territoires qui ne s'administrent pas eux-mêmes soit compromise parce qu'elle viserait, même implicitement, à faire intervenir les Nations Unies dans l'organisation politique intérieure des territoires intéressés.

Au cours de la discussion de la résolution de la délégation des Philippines, le représentant des Etats-Unis, entre autres, a démontré avec beaucoup d'éloquence, et d'une manière fort convaincante, qu'une intervention de ce genre ne s'accorderait pas avec la Charte. Les raisons qu'il a données de son opinion valent également pour le cas qui nous occupe. L'ingérence des Nations Unies, non seulement serait contraire à la Charte, mais encore générerait le progrès pacifique des populations et pourrait bien altérer de bonnes relations.

Pour ces motifs, la délégation des Pays-Bas n'est pas favorable à la création du comité ad hoc envisagé. Qu'il lui soit permis de rappeler à l'Assemblée générale que l'on a souvent, et à bon droit, fait observer que le très capable Secrétariat des Nations Unies devrait être considéré comme parfaitement qualifié pour faire rapport à l'Assemblée générale sur les renseignements communiqués conformément à l'Article 73 e de la Charte.

La délégation des Pays-Bas estime que son attitude se justifie parfaitement car, comme on le sait, le Gouvernement des Pays-Bas se propose d'accorder, dans un avenir rapproché, l'autonomie complète à ses territoires d'outre-mer. C'est donc avec détachement qu'il considère la question. Ainsi qu'elle l'a déjà déclaré, la délégation des Pays-Bas est opposée aux paragraphes 4, 5 et 6 de la proposition. Toutefois, elle attache du prix à la première partie de la résolution et approuve sans réserve son contenu.

Pour nous donner l'occasion d'exprimer ce point of view, we would request you, Mr. President, to put this draft resolution to the vote in two parts: first, the preamble and paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of the formal resolution; secondly, paragraphs 4, 5, and 6 of the resolution. We should like to have a roll-call on that second part.

The PRESIDENT (translated from French): I call upon Mr. Garcia Granados, representative of Guatemala.

Mr. GARCÍA GRANADOS (Guatemala) (translated from French): The delegation of Guatemala asks the Assembly to note that in document A/249, paragraph 2, of the resolution, after the words "British Honduras" there is a reference to the Journal of the United Nations, No. 55, 10 December 1946, Supplement No. 4, pages 79 and 80.

The delegation of Guatemala desires to repeat before the Assembly the statement which was inserted in the said Supplement of the Journal of the United Nations on the page mentioned above.

At the time of the discussion, in the Fourth Committee, of the draft resolution now before the Assembly, our representative abstained from voting, and emphasized that he had done so because, in this resolution, the territory of Belize, incorrectly called British Honduras, is mentioned as a British possession.

He added that he wished to prevent his affirmative vote from being interpreted later as the recognition of a de facto situation in this territory, since Guatemala does not and cannot recognize the sovereignty of Great Britain over the territory of Belize.

I must add that the United Kingdom representative stated that his Government had proposed to submit the dispute to the International Court of Justice, but that Guatemala had not yet accepted this proposal. Our representative replied that Guatemala in turn had proposed that the Court should try the case ex aequo et bono in conformity with Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice.

In repeating before the Assembly the various statements made on this subject by our representative in the Fourth Committee, the delegation of Guatemala does not attempt to open a controversy on the substance of the dispute existing with Great Britain. It merely desires to affirm specifically its position in this matter, although, in the same meeting of this Committee and in connexion with the incident already mentioned, the representative of Mexico had declared, and the representative of no country entered any arguments to the contrary, that it must be clearly understood that "the adoption of the resolution in no way implies the recognition of the sovereignty of any Power over any territory whatsoever. It has only the practical significance of indicating which were the de point de vue, nous vous serions obligés, Monsieur le Président, de bien vouloir diviser en deux parties ce projet de résolution en le mettant aux voix; la première partie comprendrait le préambule et les paragraphes 1, 2 et 3 de la résolution; la seconde, les paragraphes 4, 5 et 6. Nous aimerions qu'il soit procédé à un vote par appel nominal sur cette dernière partie.

Le PRÉSIDENT: Je donne la parole à M. Garcia Granados, représentant du Guatemala.

M. GARCÍA GRANADOS (Guatemala): La délégation du Guatemala prie l'Assemblée de vouloir bien observer que, dans le document A/249, au paragraphe 2 de la résolution, il y a une note en bas de page relative au Honduras britannique, laquelle renvoie au Journal des Nations Unies, No 55, du 10 décembre 1946, Supplément No 4, pages 79 et 80.

La délégation du Guatemala désire répéter devant l'Assemblée la déclaration qui fut insérée dans ledit Supplément du Journal des Nations Unies, aux pages déjà mentionnées.

Lors de la discussion, à la Quatrième Commission, du projet de résolution qui est maintenant soumis à l'Assemblée, notre représentant s'abstint de voter et souligna qu'il l'avait fait parce que, dans cette résolution, le territoire de Belize incorrectement appelé Honduras britannique était mentionné comme possession britannique.

Il ajouta qu'il voulait éviter qu'un vote affirmatif de sa part pût plus tard être interprété comme la reconnaissance d'une situation existant de fait dans ce territoire, puisque le Guatemala ne reconnaît pas, ni ne peut reconnaître la souveraineté de la Grande-Bretagne sur le territoire de Belize.

Je dois dire aussi que le représentant du Royaume-Uni prit la parole pour signaler que son Gouvernement a proposé de soumettre le différend à la Cour internationale de Justice, mais que le Guatemala n'a pas encore accepté cette proposition. A quoi notre représentant répondit que le Guatemala, à son tour, a proposé que la Cour puisse juger ex aequo et bono, conformément à l'Article 38 du Statut de la Cour internationale de Justice.

En répétant devant l'Assemblée les diverses déclarations faites sur ce sujet par notre représentant au sein de la Quatrième Commission, la délégation du Guatemala ne prétend pas ouvrir une polémique sur le fond de la controverse existant avec la Grande-Bretagne. Elle veut seulement marquer spécifiquement sa position dans cette affaire, bien que, dans la même séance de ladite Commission et à propos de l'incident déjà cité, le représentant du Mexique ait déclaré, sans que le représentant d'aucun pays n'eût argumenté contre, que l'on doit entendre clairement que "l'adoption de la résolution n'a, en aucune façon, le caractère d'une reconnaissance de la souveraineté d'une Puissance quelconque sur un territoire quelconque. Elle n'a qu'une signification pratique qui est de rappeler quelles sont les facto authorities responsible at present for the administration of the territories in question."

Guatemala desires to live in harmony with all the nations of the world. For this reason she repeats her sincere desire that the dispute existing between her and Great Britain may shortly find a just and friendly solution.

The PRESIDENT (translated from French): I call upon Mr. Thomas, representative of the United Kingdom.

Mr. THOMAS (United Kingdom): I confirm that the view of the representative of Guatemala is correct in that the return of information, under Article 73 of the Charter, carried no implications with regard to sovereignty. It is undoubtedly a fact that the United Kingdom is the administering authority in British Honduras, and therefore we are under an obligation to return the information which is mentioned in the paper before us.

The dispute is a familiar one. It is a boundary dispute arising out of a treaty of 1859, and I share the view of the representative of Guatemala that this matter can be settled quite amicably. I know that His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will be very glad indeed to take up the question through the ordinary diplomatic channels. And I hope that it can be amicably settled.

As you recall, we have announced our willingness to have the matter remitted to the International Court for settlement, and to abide by its judgment. He has asked, however, that it should be treated, not by the ordinary rules of law, but ex aequo et bono. We have seen no reason for departing in such a manner from the rules of law normally applicable to a treaty, but in view of the tone in which the representative of Guatemala approached this matter, for which I thank him very sincerely, I have no doubt that this question can easily be settled.

I turn now to the resolution before us. Like the representative of the Netherlands, I think this resolution consists of a good part and a bad part, or perhaps I should say one good part and a less good part. I very readily accept, on behalf of the United Kingdom delegation, paragraphs 1, 2 and 3. Paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 raise the question of an ad hoc committee to examine the information provided under Article 73e.

There is a preliminary difficulty, in that it is hardly possible for this Assembly to set up an ad hoc committee for the next Assembly. Each Assembly must conduct its own business, and until representatives have assembled and their credentials have been examined, I hardly see autorités de fait qui ont la responsabilité actuelle de l'administration des territoires énumérés".

Le Guatemala veut vivre en bonne harmonie avec toutes les nations du monde. C'est pour cela qu'il réitère son sincère désir que le différend existant actuellement entre lui et la Grande-Bretagne puisse être résolu prochainement sur une base juste et amicale.

Le PRÉSIDENT: Je donne la parole à M. Thomas, représentant du Royaume-Uni.

M. THOMAS (Royaume-Uni) (traduit de l'anglais): En déclarant que la transmission d'informations prévue par l'Article 73 de la Charte n'a aucune incidence sur la souveraineté nationale, le représentant du Guatemala a exprimé une opinion, qui, je tiens à le confirmer, est exacte. C'est un fait incontestable que le Royaume-Uni est l'autorité qui assure l'administration du Honduras britannique. Il s'ensuit que nous avons l'obligation de communiquer les renseignements prévus dans le texte qui nous est soumis.

Cette controverse nous est familière. Il s'agit d'une contestation relative au tracé de la frontière et qui a surgi à la suite d'un traité datant de 1859; je pense comme le représentant du Guatemala que c'est une affaire qui pourrait parfaitement être réglée à l'amiable. Je sais que le Secrétaire d'Etat britannique aux Affaires étrangères sera tout disposé à entamer l'examen de cette question par la voie diplomatique ordinaire et j'espère qu'elle pourra être réglée à l'amiable.

Comme vous le savez, nous avons annoncé que nous étions disposés à nous en remettre à la Cour internationale pour le règlement de cette affaire et à nous incliner devant sa décision. Le représentant du Guatemala, toutefois, a demandé que cette affaire soit traitée, non en appliquant les règles ordinaires du droit, mais ex aequo et bono. Pour notre part, nous ne voyons pas de raisons de nous écarter ainsi des règles du droit normalement applicables à un traité; mais, étant donné le ton que le représentant du Guatemala a donné à son intervention sur ce sujet, et je tiens à lui en exprimer ma sincère gratitude, il ne me paraît pas douteux que cette question pourra être réglée aisément.

Je passe maintenant à la résolution que nous avons à examiner. Comme le représentant des Pays-Bas, je pense que cette résolution se compose d'une partie qui est bonne et d'une partie qui est mauvaise, ou peut-être, devrais-je dire, d'une partie qui est bonne et d'une partie qui l'est moins. J'accepte très volontiers, au nom de la délégation du Royaume-Uni, les paragraphes 1, 2 et 3. Les paragraphes 4, 5 et 6 soulèvent la question d'un comité ad hoc chargé d'examiner les renseignements qui seraient fournis aux termes de l'Article 73 e.

Une difficulté préliminaire se présente du fait qu'il n'est guère possible pour cette Assemblée de constituer un comité ad hoc pour la prochaine Assemblée. Chaque Assemblée doit décider elle-même de l'organisation de ses propres travaux et aussi longtemps que les représentants how it is possible to set up such a committee. In the few cases where this can be done, it has been specifically provided for, as in the Budgetary and Administrative Committee. I do not think that it would be constitutionally possible to do it in this case.

But I do not wish to base my argument on purely constitutional grounds. There are other objections of a more important character. On 9 February, a resolution was passed by this Assembly at its London session, disposing of the treatment of information under Article 73e of the Charter. It was then decided that this information should be summarized by the Secretary-General in his report, and most of us thought that there the matter was at an end. What would happen under that procedure is that the Secretary-General, with the help of his Secretariat, would examine the information transmitted and prepare a summary. The Secretariat is composed of experts in their particular fields, than whom there are a few persons better qualified to deal with this material. It would be included in the Secretary-General's report. Debate could arise on it, and it would then be transmitted to a committee of the Assembly where it would be examined in minute detail. If the Fourth Committee, supposing it was the Fourth Committee to which it would be transmitted, desired to set up another committee or an ad hoc committee, I suppose it could be done.

I submit that this is the right way to deal with the information, and it was the way decided upon at the London session of the Assembly. I submit, therefore, that we should not introduce new machinery now. The reasons given for establishing the ad hoc committee are as follows: in the first place, that the examination of this information needs experts. But what better experts are there than those already in the Secretariat? They have been carefully chosen for this work, and I am sure that we can all feel confident of their ability to discharge it properly. Think of the members of the ad hoc committee you would choose, if this resolution were adopted, and ask yourselves whether any of them would be likely to do this work better than the Secretariat itself. That disposes, I think, of the argument that some other body of experts is needed.

The second argument which has been advanced, not tonight, but in the Committees, is that this work would have a political character, and that, therefore, it would not be appropriate for the Secretariat to deal with it. The idea that the examination of the information under Article 73e has a political character, is one that the United Kingdom delegation must strenuously resist. The article in question states that the information is to be statistical or other informane se trouvent pas réunis et que leurs pouvoirs n'ont pas été examinés, je ne vois guère comment il serait possible de constituer un tel comité. On a expressément prévu les quelques cas où on peut le faire, par exemple pour la Commission des questions budgétaires et administratives. Je ne pense pas qu'il soit constitutionnellement possible de le faire dans le cas présent.

Cependant je ne désire pas étayer mon argumentation uniquement sur des considérations d'ordre constitutionnel. Il y a d'autres objections qui sont plus importantes. Le 9 février, cette Assemblée a adopté, au cours de sa session de Londres, une résolution qui décidait de la façon dont seraient utilisés les renseignements fournis en vertu de l'Article 73 e de la Charte. Elle a alors décidé que le Secrétaire général résumerait ces renseignements dans son rapport et la plupart d'entre nous pensaient que la question était ainsi réglée. Dans la pratique, cette manière de procéder aurait l'effet suivant: le Secrétaire général, avec l'aide de son Secrétariat, examinerait les renseignements qui lui auraient été communiqués et en ferait un résumé. Le Secrétariat est composé de fonctionnaires qui, dans leurs domaines respectifs, sont des experts spécialisés et dont certains sont parmi les personnes les mieux qualifiées pour s'occuper de cette documentation. Le résumé figurerait dans le rapport du Secrétaire général. Il pourrait faire l'objet d'une discussion, puis il serait transmis à une Commission de l'Assemblée qui l'examinerait en détail; et si la Quatrième Commission — j'imagine que, comme on peut le supposer, il s'agirait de la Quatrième Commission — désirait constituer un autre comité ou un comité ad hoc, je suppose qu'elle pourrait le faire.

Je prétends que c'est la bonne méthode à appliquer à ces renseignements, et que c'est celle que l'Assemblée de Londres a décidé d'adopter. Je propose donc que nous n'instituons aucun nouveau mécanisme maintenant. Les raisons que l'on a invoquées en faveur du comité ad hoc portent, en premier lieu, sur la nécessité de confier à des experts l'examen des renseignements. Où trouverons-nous des experts meilleurs que ceux qui font déjà partie du Secrétariat? Ils ont été soigneusement choisis pour cette tâche, et je suis sûr que nous pouvons tous compter sur leur aptitude à l'accomplir convenablement. Quelles sont les personnes en faveur desquelles nous pourrions être amenés à voter, si cette résolution était adoptée, pour constituer le comité spécial? Pensez-vous réellement que certaines personnes seraient en mesure de faire ce travail mieux que le Secrétariat lui-même? Voilà réfuté, je pense, l'argument suivant lequel il y a lieu de constituer un autre comité d'experts.

Le deuxième argument qui a été invoqué, non pas ce soir, mais dans les Commissions, est que cette tâche aurait un caractère politique et que, par conséquent, il ne conviendrait pas que le Secrétariat s'en occupât. Cette idée que l'examen des renseignements fournis en exécution de l'Article 73e a un caractère politique est une idée contre laquelle la délégation du Royaume-Uni se voit contrainte de s'élever énergiquement. L'Article en question stipule qu'il doit s'agir de tion of a technical nature relating to economic, social, and educational conditions in the territories for which we are responsible.

It is out of the question that the examination of such information could have a political character. That is deliberately excluded by the article, and we must keep it excluded. Many of us have come to feel from our long discussions in the Fourth Committee that if we were to appoint an ad hoc committee a political character would be injected into this work, a political character which is not intended by the authors of the Charter.

We feel it essential, therefore, to come back to the Charter, and for that purpose, we think it would be better that this examination should be conducted, as was intended by the London resolution, by the Secretariat. The result of it will come before the General Assembly in the form of the Secretary-General's report and be referred to a committee. It is open to the Assembly to do whatever it pleases with the information, within the terms of the Charter.

For these reasons, I hope the Assembly will agree to accept paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of the resolution, which fulfil a very useful purpose and are the result of long deliberations in the Committee, and will reject paragraphs 4, 5 and 6.

The PRESIDENT (translated from French): We are not getting along very fast. So far, we have examined only two points of our agenda this afternoon. There are still twenty-four items. In any case, we must give up hope of finishing today, but if we continue at this rate we shall not finish tomorrow either. Many representatives are leaving, and the heads of delegations wish to leave. Consequently, we must make an effort to expedite the debates.

There are now three representatives still on my list: the representatives of Cuba, of the United States of America, and of Argentina.

I should have liked to finish this item before dinner and adjourn the meeting at 9 o'clock. If, however, the speeches of the representatives on my list are going to be long, we shall have to listen to them after dinner.

If the paragraphs of the resolution are adopted, we must elect eight members.

Mr. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) (translated from French): Mr. President, I should like to make my statement now.

Mr. ARCE (Argentina) (translated from French): My remarks will be very brief.

The PRESIDENT (translated from French): We might hear these three speakers before dinner, if their speeches are not long, and waive the interpretation.

Mr. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) (translated from French): The proposal before the données statistiques et d'autres renseignements de caractère technique relatifs aux conditions économiques et sociales et de l'instruction dans les territoires dont les Etats en question sont responsables.

On ne saurait dire que l'examen de ces renseignements puisse avoir un caractère politique. Cette idée a été délibérément exclue par l'Article 73 et doit continuer à l'être. Après nos longues discussions à la Commission, beaucoup d'entre nous en sont venus à penser que si nous constituons un comité spécial, nous donnerions à ce travail un caractère politique, un caractère qui ne correspond pas aux intentions des auteurs de la Charte.

Nous jugeons donc qu'il est indispensable de nous reporter à la Charte et, à cette fin, nous pensons qu'il serait préférable que le Secrétariat effectuât cet examen comme la résolution de Londres le prévoyait; le résultat en sera, alors, soumis à l'Assemblée générale sous la forme d'un rapport du Secrétaire général et renvoyé à une commission. Il sera loisible, à ce moment, à l'Assemblée de donner à ces renseignements la suite qui lui conviendra, en conformité avec les termes de la Charte.

Pour ces motifs, j'espère que l'Assemblée décidera d'accepter les paragraphes 1, 2 et 3 dont l'utilité est réelle et qui sont le résultat de longues délibérations de la Commission, et qu'elle écartera les paragraphes 4, 5 et 6 de la résolution.

Le PRÉSIDENT: Nous n'avancons pas très vite. Nous avons examiné deux points seulement de notre ordre du jour cet après-midi; il en reste vingt-quatre. De toute façon, nous devons renoncer à en terminer aujourd'hui, mais si nous continuons à la même allure, nous n'arriverons pas à terminer demain non plus. De nombreux représentants s'en vont, petit à petit. Les chefs des délégations désirent partir. Par conséquent, nous devons faire un effort pour hâter la fin des discussions.

Au point où nous en sommes, trois représentants restent inscrits sur ma liste: celui de Cuba, celui des Etats-Unis d'Amérique et celui de l'Argentine.

J'aurais voulu essayer de terminer ce point avant le dîner et de suspendre la séance à 21 heures. Cependant, si les discours des représentants inscrits doivent être longs, nous devons les entendre après le dîner.

Si les paragraphes de la résolution sont votés, nous devons élire huit membres.

M. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba): Monsieur le Président, je désirerais pouvoir faire ma déclaration dès maintenant.

M. ARCE (Argentine): La déclaration que j'ai à faire sera très courte.

Le PRÉSIDENT: Peut-être pourrions-nous entendre ces trois orateurs avant le dîner, si leurs discours ne sont pas trop longs et si nous nous passons de l'interprétation.

M. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba): La proposition qui vous est soumise et qui a été approuvée par

Assembly, which was approved by the Committee by a fairly large majority, has made great progress. A short time ago it was alleged, in the sub-committees, that it was unconstitutional and contrary to the Charter. Today, arguments of a minor order are used against it. I should like to contradict them in my turn, for if in the case of the veto Cuba desired to amend the Charter in accordance with the Charter, nevertheless my country does not wish to amend it every day, and in any case, never, save by the methods laid down in the Charter.

The question is very simple: Article 73 of the Charter speaks of the "sacred trust" accepted by the Members of the United Nations which "assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government". This sacred trust gives rise to certain obligations accepted by the Members, inter alia, in accordance with paragraph e, "transmit regularly to the Secretary-General for information purposes, subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations may require, statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social and educational conditions in the territories for which they are respectively responsible other than those territories to which Chapters XII and XIII apply".

Not only have these governments generously accepted obligations spontaneously at San Francisco, but the majority, and perhaps nearly all, have communicated this information.

What have we done with the information? We have filed it among the records of our delegations. We have had this information in our hands and looked at it, but no committee, not even a sub-committee, during the first part of the session of this Assembly, has given this information the attention it deserved; it has remained in our drawers and in our brief-cases.

We must decide whether we shall continue to deal with these documents in this manner. The Fourth Committee is awaiting our decision. In its Sub-Committee 2, it was asked whether we shall limit ourselves to receiving these papers, binding them, burying them in the archives and filing them away on our library shelves. It is clear that we cannot do this. We must deal with them in a manner worthy of them. These reports must fulfil the principles of the Charter which require that the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories—those millions of people whose voices are not heard in this Assembly—be permitted to develop and become self-governing.

As was already stated during the discussions of the Sub-Committee, it would be an insult to the authors of the most generous chapter of the Charter not to utilize the information supplies.

It must be recognized that all the delegations have accepted the obligations of Article 73; they have submitted information; all of them wish la Commission à une assez forte majorité a fait de grands progrès. Il n'y a pas longtemps encore, on l'accusait, dans les sous-commissions, d'être inconstitutionnelle et d'aller contre la Charte. Aujourd'hui, des arguments d'ordre mineur sont employés contre elle; je voudrais les combattre à mon tour, car si, dans le cas du veto, Cuba voulait réformer la Charte d'accord avec la Charte, mon pays ne désire pas la réformer tous les jours et, en tout cas, il ne désire jamais le faire sans employer les méthodes indiquées par la Charte.

La question est très simple: l'Article 73 de la Charte parle de la "mission sacrée" qu'ont les Membres des Nations Unies qui, "assument la responsabilité d'administrer des territoires dont les populations ne s'administrent pas encore complètement elles-mêmes". De cette mission sacrée découlent certaines obligations acceptées par les Membres, entre autres, conformément au paragraphe e, de "communiquer régulièrement au Secrétaire général, à titre d'information, sous réserve des exigences de la sécurité et de considérations d'ordre constitutionnel, des renseignements statistiques et autres de nature technique relatifs aux conditions économiques, sociales et de l'instruction dans les territoires dont ils sont respectivement responsables, autres que ceux auxquels s'appliquent les Chapitres XII et XIII".

Non seulement ces Gouvernements ont généreusement accepté cette obligation d'une façon spontanée à San-Francisco, mais la plupart d'entre eux, et peut-être presque tous, ont communiqué des renseignements.

Qu'avons-nous fait de ces renseignements? Nous les avons dans les archives de nos délégations; ils ont passé entre nos mains; nous les avons feuilletés, mais aucune commission et même aucune sous-commission n'a donné, au cours de la première partie de la session de l'Assemblée, l'accueil qu'ils méritent à ces documents; l'information est restée dans nos tiroirs et dans nos portefeuilles.

Il faudrait savoir si nous allons continuer à traiter ainsi ces documents. La Quatrième Commission s'est demandé ce que nous allions faire. A la Sous-Commission 2 de cette Commission, on a posé la question de savoir si nous allions nous borner à les recevoir, les relier, les enfouir dans les archives, les classer sur les rayons des bibliothèques. Evidemment, nous ne pouvons pas le faire; il faut leur accorder un traitement digne d'eux; il faut que ces rapports servent à remplir les principes contenus dans la Charte, en vertu desquels les populations des territoires non autonomes — ces millions d'hommes dont la voix n'est pas entendue dans cette Assemblée — puissent se développer et devenir autonomes.

Comme cela a déjà été dit lors des délibérations de la Sous-Commission, ce serait une véritable injure pour les auteurs de ce Chapitre où bat le cœur le plus généreux de la Charte, de ne pas utiliser les renseignements fournis.

Il faut le reconnaître, toutes les délégations ont accepté les obligations de l'Article 73; elles ont envoyé des renseignements; toutes sont d'ac-this information to be utilized. The end is the same; but the means which we have evolved during the course of our discussions differ somewhat. As you see, it is simply a matter of procedure,

When this question came up in Sub-Committee 2 of the Fourth Committee, certain doubts and certain difficulties became apparent. We appealed to the organ to which we have always appealed, and which is always ready to help; I refer to the Secretariat. We asked the Secretariat to draft a recommendation to try to overcome the difficulty.

Very objectively, very spontaneously, without hearing the opinions of the Governments, the Secretariat soon submitted its plan to us.

Then the Cuban delegation, which agreed on several items of the plan, amended it slightly, made some additions and adopted the Secretariat's plan as its own. Consequently, the draft before you represents, first, the viewpoint of the Secretariat, and secondly, the viewpoint of the Cuban delegation.

The Secretariat consulted my delegation in this matter. An ad hoc committee must collect and study, before the next meeting, the documents which will be prepared for it by the Secretariat, documents supplied in conformity with Article 73 of the Charter.

This ad hoc committee will meet a few weeks before the General Assembly, in order to prepare a report for the Fourth Committee. Consequently, this committee is not a new body, it is not just a new wheel in the machinery. It will simply act as a rapporteur, a function which is shared by a number of persons, a number of delegations. It is quite simple.

Another delegation, the Chinese, proposed that the Trusteeship Council should deal with this report. Later, the Chinese delegation withdrew its proposal.

All we have before us now is the Secretariat's proposal and the proposal of a number of delegations, including, I believe, the United Kingdom and the United States. This latter proposal would permit the Secretariat itself to deal with the question. We must therefore confine ourselves to examining these two solutions.

Let us first of all consider the advantages and disadvantages of utilizing the Secretariat. The advantages are obvious. The Secretariat has assembled in this particular section, as I was able to ascertain myself, a staff which is particularly competent, very objective, and inspired by a frankly progressive spirit. These are real advantages, and the Secretariat is a good candidate. But there are disadvantages and, on this account, we must rule out the Secretariat.

You are aware of how sensitive governments are with respect to their sovereignty. These territories are administered by sovereign governments, and the reports submitted by these governments will have to be considered, and judged, perhaps in the form of recommendations.

The Secretariat might find itself in a difficult situation; it might be embarrassed, in fact, and cord pour vouloir que ces renseignements soient utilisés. La fin est la même; mais les moyens qui se sont dégagés au cours de nos débats diffèrent quelque peu. Vous le voyez, il ne s'agit ici que d'une question de procédure.

Lorsque cette question a surgi à la Sous-Commission 2 de la Quatrième Commission, certains doutes et certaines difficultés se sont fait jour. Nous avons alors recouru à l'entité à laquelle nous avons toujours fait appel et qui répond toujours généreusement: au Secrétariat; nous lui avons demandé de rédiger un projet de recommandation pour essayer de résoudre la difficulté.

Très objectivement, très spontanément, sans avoir entendu les opinions des Gouvernements, le Secrétariat nous a aussitôt fourni son projet.

Ensuite, la délégation cubaine, qui était d'accord sur plusieurs points du projet, l'a légèrement amendé, y a apporté plusieurs additions et a fait sien le projet du Secrétariat; par conséquent, le projet qui vous est soumis comprend, en premier lieu, le point de vue du Secrétariat et ensuite, le point de vue de la délégation cubaine.

C'est ma délégation que le Secrétariat a consultée en ceci. Il faut qu'un comité adopte, étudie, avant la séance prochaine, les documents que lui préparera le Secrétariat, documents qui auront été fournis sur la base de l'Article 73 de la Charte.

Ce comité ad hoc se réunira quelques semaines avant l'Assemblée générale, afin de fournir un rapport à la Quatrième Commission. Par conséquent, ce comité n'est pas un organisme nouveau, il n'est pas un nouveau rouage. Il fait simplement fonction de rapporteur, fonction qui est répartie entre plusieurs personnes, entre plusieurs délégations. C'est tout à fait simple.

Une autre délégation, celle de la Chine, a proposé le Conseil de tutelle pour s'occuper de ce rapport. Plus tard, la délégation chinoise a retiré sa proposition.

Il ne nous reste maintenant sur table que le projet du Secrétariat, et celui de plusieurs délégations parmi lesquelles, je crois, le Royaume-Uni et les Etats-Unis. Ce dernier projet tendrait à ce que le Secrétariat lui-même traite de la question. Nous devons, par conséquent, nous borner à examiner ces deux solutions.

Voyons d'abord les avantages et les désavantages qu'offre le Secrétariat. Il offre des avantages évidents. Le Secrétariat est constitué, dans cette section spécialement, j'ai pu m'en rendre compte, d'un personnel spécialement compétent, très objectif, et d'un esprit franchement progressif. Ce sont, par conséquent, des avantages réels et le Secrétariat est un bon candidat. Mais il y a des désavantages, et c'est à cause de ces désavantages que nous écartons le Secrétariat.

Vous savez, en effet, combien les Gouvernements sont susceptibles en matière de souveraineté. Ces territoires sont administrés par des Gouvernements souverains, et il s'agit d'examiner, de juger, sous la forme de recommandations peut-être, les rapports fournis par ces Gouvernements.

Le Secrétariat se trouverait peut-être dans une situation difficile; il serait gêné, mal à l'aise, ill at ease, whenever it became necessary to point out to a government that such and such a thing might be done better or that such and such a government administers a territory more progressively than another. Owing to the analyses and classifications which the Secretariat would be obliged to make, it would find itself in an extremely difficult situation with respect to the governments, so difficult in fact, that quite spontaneously, and without hearing the opinion of any government, it has recommended that it should not deal with the question, but that it should rather be left to a committee composed of representatives of governments.

Let us now see the advantages and disadvantages of the committee and consider first of all if such a committee can be set up. It can be set up. To obviate all discussion, it is sufficient to refer to rule 100 of the provisional rules of procedure for the General Assembly, which reads: "The General Assembly may set up such committees and subsidiary organs as it deems necessary for the performance of its functions".

Let us see if there are precedents, for it is obvious that the General Assembly cannot prepare a committee for another General Assembly.

The General Assembly is an entity. It is a constitutive body which subsists from year to year, and indeed we trust that it will have a long life.

Consequently, the General Assembly prepares its own work; this is quite normal and quite possible. It is so normal that the delegations which opposed this plan used this argument and have just approved a recommendation submitted to the General Committee for the establishment of a committee which will draw up a report on the rules of procedure which we shall employ for the second session of the Assembly.

Here again we recall the committee which prepared the General Assembly, although it was created by a constituent assembly such as that of San Francisco. Consequently, it is quite possible, and we have all the necessary precedents.

Now let us consider the advantages and disadvantages.

I can see only one disadvantage—namely, that this committee has not yet been set up and that we are liable to lose many a quarter of an hour before it is elected. Of course, we are all tired by now, and we must perhaps consider this disadvantage. The advantages are, however, very great, for this committee is elected by the Assembly on an equitable basis; it is composed of members of governments. It is perfectly free to use the information supplied by the governments.

This committee will have the advantage of attracting the interest of the nations which are perhaps not directly concerned, thus giving to Chapter XI of the Charter all the importance, all the power which we desire that it should possess. This committee is well balanced with respect to its composition and, it will above all, lorsqu'ils s'agirait de faire remarquer à un Gouvernement que telle ou telle chose pourrait être mieux faite ou que tel ou tel Gouvernement administre d'une manière plus progressiste qu'un autre. Le Secrétariat, par les analyses et par les classements auxquels il serait contraint, se trouverait dans une situation extrêmement pénible à l'égard des Gouvernements, si pénible même, que, d'une façon spontanée et sans avoir entendu l'opinion d'aucun Gouvernement, il a recommandé que ce ne fût pas lui qui traitât cette question, mais plutôt un comité composé des représentants des Gouvernements.

Voyons maintenant les avantages et les désavantages du comité et voyons d'abord si celui-ci peut-être créé. Il peut l'être. Il suffit pour éviter toute autre discussion, de se référer à l'article 100 du règlement intérieur provisoire de l'Assemblée générale qui dit: "L'Assemblée générale peut constituer les commissions et organismes subsidiaires qu'elle juge nécessaires pour l'accomplissement de sa tâche."

Voyons, d'autre part, s'il y a eu des antécédents, car il est bien entendu que l'Assemblée générale ne peut pas préparer un comité pour une autre Assemblée générale.

L'Assemblée générale est une entité; elle forme un corps constitutif qui subsiste d'année en année et nous espérons qu'elle vivra très longtemps.

Par conséquent, c'est l'Assemblée générale qui prépare son propre travail et ceci est tout à fait normal et tout à fait possible. C'est tellement normal que les délégations qui s'opposent à ce projet se servent de cet argument et viennent d'approuver une recommandation présentée au Bureau en vue de créer une commission qui établira, pour la deuxième session de l'Assemblée générale, un rapport sur les règles de procédure que nous utiliserons.

Là aussi, nous nous souviendrons de la commission qui prépara l'Assemblée générale, quoiqu'elle soit née d'une Assemblée constituante comme celle de San-Francisco. Par conséquent, cela est tout à fait possible et il y aura tous les antécédents voulus.

Voyons maintenant le chapitre des avantages et des désavantages.

Je ne vois qu'un désavantage, c'est que ce comité n'est pas encore créé et que nous pouvons perdre quelques quarts d'heure avant qu'il soit élu. Evidemment, actuellement, nous sommes tous fatigués, il faut peut-être considérer ce désavantage; mais les avantages sont très grands, car ce comité est élu par l'Assemblée sur une base équitable; il est composé de membres de Gouvernements; il pourra utiliser avec toute la liberté possible les renseignements qui seront fournis par les Gouvernements.

Ce comité aura l'avantage d'intéresser les nations qui ne sont peut-être pas directement intéressées et ainsi de donner au Chapitre XI de la Charte toute l'importance, toute la force que nous voulons voir lui donner. Ce comité est très équilibré, quant à sa composition, et il aura avant tout le grand avantage de libérer le Secréhave the great advantage of relieving the Secretariat of all kinds of political responsibility. The information will thus be utilized in the most appropriate manner.

When we go to see the director of an undertaking and we are received by the secretary, we are not content. We should prefer to be received by the director himself. The Cuban delegation proposes that it should be the director of the undertaking who receives the information, and not the secretary.

I do not desire to say more in defence of this very sensible scheme, which, will I think, receive an enthusiastic welcome from the Assembly. Nevertheless, as we are constantly discussing questions of procedure, I should like to deal with a few points.

It is quite certain that we shall come to consider whether a subject under discussion is important or not. All the subjects with which we deal here are important. Of course, this thesis can be defended, but we must always revert to rule 78 of the rules of procedure. I see nothing in that rule which might imply that the question now under discussion is important.

Only one sentence might be thus regarded; it is said that questions relating to the trusteeship system must be decided by a two-thirds majority. But the question before us is not one relating to the trusteeship system within the meaning of Chapters XII and XIII of the Charter; it is a question within the meaning of Chapter XI. Rule 78 of the rules of procedure therefore does not apply. To apply the two-thirds majority rule, it would be necessary to have resort to rule 79 and to create a new category. The two-thirds majority would be necessary for the creation of this category.

The question is very important and I must insist on several points. First of all, the committee is only to be set up for one meeting, with a view to preparing the work of the second session of the Assembly. Consequently, the committee is destined from its very inception, to be short-lived. Naturally, if the Assembly, during its second session, considers it advisable, it might confer immortality upon the committee, but only if all the members agree.

On the other hand, this committee could deal only with provisional questions. I invite you to read once again paragraph 6 of the resolution, which is as follows:

"Invites the ad hoc committee to examine the Secretary-General's summary and analysis of the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter with a view to aiding the General Assembly in its consideration of this information, and with a view to making recommendations to the General Assembly regarding the procedures to be followed in the future and the means of ensuring that the advice, expert knowledge and experience of the specialized agencies are used to the best advantage."

This committee will have only a few items to tariat de toutes sortes de responsabilités politiques. Ces renseignements seront utilisés vraiment de la façon la plus convenable.

Lorsque nous allons visiter le directeur d'une entreprise, et lorsque c'est le secrétaire seulement qui nous reçoit, nous ne sommes pas satisfaits; nous préférierions être reçus par le directeur lui-même. La délégation cubaine propose que ce soit le directeur de l'entreprise qui reçoive les renseignements et non pas le secrétaire.

Je ne veux pas en dire plus pour la défense de ce projet très simple et qui recevra, je pense, l'accueil le plus enthousiaste de la part de l'Assemblée. Cependant, comme nous discutons constamment les questions de procédure, je voudrais aborder quelques points.

Nous allons certainement voir surgir la question de savoir s'il s'agit d'un sujet important ou non. Tous les sujets que nous traitons ici sont importants. Evidemment, on pourrait défendre cette thèse, mais il faut se reporter toujours à l'article 78 du règlement intérieur. Je ne vois vraiment rien, dans cet article, qui puisse impliquer que la question dont il s'agit ici est importante.

Une seule phrase de cet article pourrait être considérée ainsi; il est dit que les questions relatives au fonctionnement du régime de tutelle demandent une majorité des deux tiers. Mais il n'y a pas ici une question relative au régime de tutelle visée par les Chapitres XII et XIII de la Charte; il y a une question directement visée par le Chapitre XI. L'article 78 du règlement intérieur n'est donc pas applicable. Si l'on voulait appliquer la règle des deux tiers, il faudrait recourir à l'article 79 et créer une nouvelle catégorie. C'est pour la création de cette catégorie que sera nécessaire la majorité des deux tiers.

La question est très importante. J'insisterai sur plusieurs points. D'abord, il ne s'agit de créer un comité que pour une séance. Cette création sera faite seulement pour préparer le travail de la deuxième session de l'Assemblée. Par conséquent, ce comité est voué, dès sa naissance, à une courte existence. Evidemment, si l'Assemblée, au cours de sa deuxième session, le juge opportun, elle pourra lui donner l'immortalité, mais seulement si tous les Membres sont d'accord.

D'autre part, ce comité ne pourra traiter que des questions provisoires. Je vous invite à relire le paragraphe 6; il est ainsi conçu:

"Invite le comité ad hoc à examiner les résumés et analyses faits par le Secrétaire général des renseignements transmis en application de l'Article 73 e de la Charte, en vue d'assister l'Assemblée générale dans son examen de ces renseignements et de faire des recommandations à l'Assemblée générale concernant la procédure à suivre à l'avenir et les moyens d'assurer que les avis, les connaissances techniques et l'expérience des institutions spécialisées soient utilisés au mieux."

Ce comité aura très peu de matière à traiter deal with, and as a matter of fact, its sole purpose will be to prepare for the General Assembly a procedure to enable the information supplied in accordance with Article 73e to be correctly and usefully dealt with.

I would also remind you that this proposal was submitted first of all by the Secretariat, then by the Cuban delegation, and that in the Sub-Committee it was approved by ten votes to ten, that in the Committee it was adopted by a majority of twenty-one votes to twelve and, lastly that it contemplates the only really recommendable procedure—namely, the establishment of an ad hoc committee.

These are the reasons for which the Cuban delegation asks you to vote in favour of its proposal, which is also that of the General Committee, for the establishment of the only provisional body capable of utilizing to the utmost the valuable information so generously offered by the colonial Powers.

Mr. DULLES (United States of America): We all want this information that is transmitted to be live, valuable information. The question is how to make it so. We believe that the proposal made in the resolution, which calls for transmission of information to the Secretary-General—which is in accordance with the Charter—so that a summary and analysis may be made by the Secretary-General for transmission to the Members before the second session of the Assembly, is the most practical way to handle the matter.

If the Secretary-General and his staff are not competent to do it and require the services of a committee of sixteen people to help them, I think there is something wrong with the Secretariat. I cannot think of any more inefficient way of handling this information than to surround the Secretariat with a special committee of sixteen persons. In my opinion, that will go very far towards burying this information and destroying its usefulness. It can be made useful if we have a trained, competent Secretariat to study the matter.

On the basis of the information transmitted this year, we can judge that this involves a study of reports from eighty different States. If, in addition to the Secretariat, you would appoint a special committee of sixteen to deal with those eighty reports, I just cannot conceive that anything useful will come out for the next General Assembly.

Mr. ARCE (Argentina): The Argentine delegation will abstain from voting on this question for the reasons given in the Committee, which are summarized in the note to paragraph 3 of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT (translated from French): We shall now proceed to vote. The representative of the Netherlands has asked that the vote should be split. We shall therefore vote first of all on paragraphs 1, 2 and 3, by a show of hands, then et, en fait, son but unique sera de préparer pour l'Assemblée générale une procédure pour que les renseignements fournis en vertu de l'Article 73e soient correctement et utilement traités.

Je rappelle aussi que cette proposition a été présentée tout d'abord par le Secrétariat, puis par la délégation cubaine; que, dans la Sous-Commission, elle a été approuvée par dix voix contre dix; que, dans la Commission, elle a été adoptée par une majorité de vingt et une voix contre douze; et que finalement, elle prévoit la seule procédure vraiment recommandable: la création d'un comité ad hoc.

Telles sont les raisons pour lesquelles la délégation cubaine vous demande de voter pour sa proposition, qui est aussi celle du Bureau, créant le seul organisme provisoire capable d'utiliser au maximum les précieuses informations qu'ont si généreusement offert de fournir les Puissances coloniales.

M. DULLES (Etats-Unis d'Amérique) (traduit de l'anglais): Nous voulons tous que les renseignements communiqués soient des renseignements à jour et qui aient de la valeur. Dès lors, la question qui se pose est celle-ci: comment faire pour qu'il en soit ainsi? Nous croyons que la résolution proposée offre les moyens les plus pratiques d'y parvenir; elle prévoit: que les renseignements seront communiqués au Secrétaire général, ce qui est conforme à la Charte, et que le Secrétaire général les résumera et les analysera, et que ce résumé sera transmis aux Etats Membres avant la deuxième session.

Si le Secrétaire général et son personnel ne peuvent s'acquitter de cette tâche, et s'ils ont besoin pour cela des services d'un comité de seize membres, j'estime qu'il y a quelque chose qui ne va pas au Secrétariat. Je ne puis imaginer de plus mauvais moyen de traiter ces renseignements que d'adjoindre au Secrétariat un comité spécial de seize membres. A mon avis, cette manière de procéder aurait pour effet d'ensevelir en grande partie ces renseignements et de leur ôter beaucoup de leur utilité. Or, ils peuvent être utiles si nous avons un Secrétariat expérimenté et compétent qui les étudie.

Les renseignements qui ont été communiqués cette année montrent qu'il va falloir étudier les rapports de quatre-vingts Etats. Si l'on ajoute au Secrétariat un comité spécial de seize membres pour s'occuper de ces quatre-vingts rapports, je ne puis imaginer ce qu'il pourra sortir d'utile de tout cela pour la prochaine Assemblée générale.

M. ARCE (Argentine) (traduit de l'anglais): La délégation de l'Argentine s'abstiendra de voter sur cette question, pour les raisons qu'elle a exposées à la Commission et qui se trouvent résumées dans la note relative au paragraphe 3 de la résolution.

Le PRÉSIDENT: Nous allons procéder au vote. Le représentant des Pays-Bas a demandé la division du vote. Nous allons donc voter tout d'abord sur les paragraphes 1, 2 et 3 ensemble, à main levée, puis sur les paragraphes 4, 5 on paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 by roll-call, as requested.

Decision: The first three paragraphs of the resolution were adopted by forty-one votes to none, with four abstentions.

A vote by roll-call was then taken on paragraphs 4, 5 and 6.

The PRESIDENT (translated from French): The result of the vote is as follows:

Votes for: Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Honduras, India, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Philippine Republic, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Votes against: Australia, Belgium, Denmark, Ecuador, France, Greece, Iceland, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay.

Abstentions: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Czechoslovakia, Guatemala, New Zealand, Turkey.

Decision: Paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 of the resolution were adopted by twenty-eight votes to fifteen, with seven abstentions.

A vote was taken on the whole resolution by a show of hands.

Decision: The resolution was adopted by twenty-seven votes to seven, with thirteen abstentions.

The PRESIDENT (translated from French): I suggest that we elect the eight members of the ad hoc Committee at tonight's meeting. In the intervals, between the votes, we could take the simpler items on the agenda so as not to lose too much time.

The meeting rose at 8 p.m. et 6 par appel nominal, selon la demande qui a été formulée.

Décision: Les trois premiers paragraphes de la résolution sont adoptés par quarante et une voix sans opposition, et quatre abstentions.

Il est procédé au vote par appel nominal sur les paragraphes 4, 5 et 6.

Le PRÉSIDENT: Le résultat du scrutin est le suivant:

Vote pour: Brésil, République socialiste soviétique de Biélorussie, Canada, Chili, Chine, Colombie, Cuba, République Dominicaine, Egypte, Salvador, Ethiopie, Honduras, Inde, Iran, Irak, Liban, Mexique, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, République des Philippines, Pologne, Arabie saoudite, Syrie, République socialiste soviétique d'Ukraine, Union des Républiques socialistes soviétiques, Venezuela, Yougoslavie.

Vote contre: Australie, Belgique, Danemark, Equateur, France, Grèce, Islande, Luxembourg, Pays-Bas, Norvège, Suède, Union Sud-Africaine, Royaume-Uni, Etats-Unis d'Amérique, Uruguay.

S'abstiennent: Afghanistan, Argentine, Bolivie, Tchécoslovaquie, Guatemala, Nouvelle-Zélande, Turquie.

Décision: Les paragraphes 4, 5, et 6 de la résolution sont adoptés par vingt-huit voix contre quinze, et sept abstentions.

Il est procédé au vote à main levée sur l'ensemble du projet.

Décision: Le projet de résolution est adopté dans son ensemble par vingt-sept voix contre sept, et treize abstentions.

Le PRÉSIDENT: Je propose que nous procédions lors de la séance de nuit, à l'élection de huit membres du Comité ad hoc. Nous pourrions procéder à ce vote tout en abordant, dans les intervalles, les points faciles de notre ordre du jour, de façon à ne pas perdre trop de temps.

La séance est levée à 20 heures.

RAPPORT DE LA QUATRIEME COMMISSION

Rapporteur : M. C. Lisicky (Tchécoslovaquie)

La question ci-dessus a été renvoyée par la Quatrième Commission à sa Sous-commission 2. Le rapport de la Sous-commission a été distribué aux Membres de l'Assemblée générale dans les documents A/C.4/68 et A/C.4/68/Corr.1.

La résolution adoptée par la Quatrième Commission (par 23 voix contre 12 et 3 abstentions) n'est pas la même que celle recommandée par la majorité de la Sous-commission par 10 voix contre 4 et 5 abstentions. Le Préambule et les trois premiers alinéas sont ceux recommandés par la Sous-commission; les alinéas suivants 4 à 6 reproduisent un amendement de la délégation de Cuba semblable à celui qu'elle avait proposé à la Sous-commission où il avait été rejeté par 10 voix contre 8, et une abstention.

Les arguments pour et contre cet amendement, qui prévoit la création d'un Comité ad hoc, sont exposés dans le rapport de la Sous-commission. De plus, il y a lieu de noter que lorsque le représentant de la Chine a fait part de son intention de voter en faveur de l'amendement de Cuba, il a demandé qu'il fût fait expressément mention dans le rapport de la Commission que dans la Sous-commission il avait exprimé l'opinion que le Conseil de tutelle était logiquement l'autorité normale pour recevoir et examiner les renseignements communiqués en application du chapitre XI ; et que l'amendement qu'il avait proposé à cet effet n'avait été repoussé à la Sous-commission que par 10 voix contre 9. Le représentant de la Chine maintenait sa position, mais en vue de faciliter les travaux de la Commission il ne représenta pas son amendement.

L'amendement de la délégation de Cuba remplace en ses alinéas 4 à 6 le texte suivant recommandé par la majorité de la Sous-commission.

"4. recommande que le Secrétaire général consulte les institutions spécialisées en vue de formuler des propositions à soumettre à l'Assemblée générale lors de sa deuxième session, pour assurer la meilleure utilisation des conseils, des connaissances techniques et de l'expérience des institutions spécialisées."

Un vote par appel nominal eut lieu à la Quatrième Commission sur l'amendement, qui fut adopté par 21 voix contre 12 et 4 abstentions.

C'est pourquoi la Quatrième Commission recommande à l'Assemblée générale d'adopter la résolution suivante :

"Résolution sur la transmission des renseignements visés à l'Article 73 (e) de la Charte.

L'Assemblée générale a approuvé le 9 février 1946, une résolution relative aux populations non autonomes. Par cette résolution le Secrétaire général avait été invité à inclure dans son rapport annuel sur l'activité de l'Organisation, une déclaration résumant les renseignements qui lui auraient été transmis par les Membres des Nations Unies en application de l'Article 73 (e) de la Charte et relatifs aux conditions économiques, sociales et de l'instruction dans les territoires dont ils sont responsables, autres que ceux auxquels s'appliquent les chapitres XII et XIII.

L'Assemblée générale note que des renseignements ont été transmis par les Gouvernements de l'Australie, sur la situation de la Papouasie; de France, sur la situation de l'Afrique occidentale française, l'Afrique équatoriale française, la Côte française des Somalis, Madagascar et Dépendances, les Etablissements français de l'Océanie, l'Indochine, les Etablissements français de l'Inde, la Nouvelle-Calédonie et Dépendances, Saint-Pierre et Miquelon, le Maroc, la Tunisie, les Nouvelles-Hébrides sous condominium franco-britannique, la Martinique, la Guadeloupe et Dépendances, la Guyane française et la Réunion (sans préjuger le statut futur de ces territoires); de la Nouvelle-Zélande, sur la situation des îles de Cook (sans préjuger de l'interprétation du terme "territoire non autonomes", attendu que les îles de Cook sont une partie intégrante de la Nouvelle-Zélande); du Royaume-Uni, sur la situation de la Barbade, les Bermudes, la Guyane britannique, le Honduras britannique, (1) les îles Fidji, la Gambie, Gibraltar, les îles Sous-le-Vent, l'île Maurice, Sainte Lucie et le protectorat de Zanzibar; et des Etats-Unis d'Amérique, sur la situation de l'Alaska, la partie américaine des Samoa, l'île de Guam, les îles Hawaï, la Zone du Canal de Panama, (2) Porto-Rico et les îles Vierges.

L'Assemblée générale a également pris note que les gouvernements suivants ont fait connaître leur intention de transmettre des renseignements : la Belgique, sur le Congo belge; le Danemark, sur le Groënland; les Pays-Bas, sur les Indes néerlandaises, Surinam et Curaçao; la Nouvelle-Zélande, sur les îles Tokelau; le Royaume-Uni sur Aden (colonie et protectorat), Bahama, le Basutoland, le Protectorat de la Betchouanaland, le Protectorat de la Somalie anglaise, Brunéi, Chypre, Dominique, les îles Falkland, (3) la Côte de l'Or (colonie et protectorat), Grenada, Hong Kong, la Jamaïque, le Kenya (colonie et protectorat), l'Union Malaise, Malte, le Nigéria, la partie nord de Bornéo, la Rhodésie du Nord, le Nyasaland, Sainte Hélène et Dépendances, Saint Vincent, Sarawak, les Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapour, le Souaziland, la Trinité et Tobago, le Protectorat de l'Ouganda; et les territoires du Pacifique occidental sous Haute Commission (la colonie des îles Gilbert et Ellis, le protectorat des îles Salomon, les îles Pitcairn).

- 1) A ce sujet, se référer au Journal des Nations Unies No 55 du 10 décembre 1946, Supplément 4, pages 79 et 80.
 - 2) A ce sujet se référer au document A/200 en date du 26 novembre 1946.
 - 3) Au sujet des Iles Falkland, la délégation de l'Argentine, lors de la vingt-cinquième séance de la Commission, a fait une réserve, ayant pour objet de déclarer que le Gouvernement argentin ne reconnaissait pas la souveraineté britannique sur les Iles Falkland. La délégation du Royaume-Uni a fait une réserve parallèle, ne reconnaissant pas la souveraineté de l'Argentine sur ces îles.

La valeur de la participation des territoires non autonomes à l'activité des institutions spécialisées a été soulignée comme un moyen d'atteindre les buts du Chapitre XI de la Charte.

La procédure à suivre par l'Organisation concernant les renseignements transmis par les Membres au sujet des populations non autonomes, a été examinée avec soin.

Par ces motifs, l'Assemblée générale :

1. Invite les Etats Membres, qui doivent fournir les renseignements, à mettre le Secrétaire général en possession, pour le 30 juin de chaque année, des renseignements les plus récents dont ils disposent.

2. Recommande que les renseignements transmis au cours de l'année 1947 par des Membres des Nations Unies en application de l'Article 73 (e) de la Charte, soient résumés, analysés et classifiés par le Secrétaire général et inclus dans son rapport à la deuxième session de l'Assemblée générale, afin que, à la lumière de l'expérience ainsi acquise, l'Assemblée générale puisse décider si une autre procédure est désirable à l'avenir pour l'utilisation de ces renseignements.

3. Recommande que le Secrétaire général communique aux institutions spécialisées les renseignements transmis, afin que toutes les données intéressantes puissent être mises à la disposition de leurs groupes d'experts et de leurs organes délibérants.

4. Invite le Secrétaire général à réunir quelques semaines avant l'ouverture de la deuxième session de l'Assemblée générale un Comité ad hoc composé d'un nombre égal de représentants des Membres transmettant des renseignements en application de l'Article 73 (e) de la Charte et de représentants des Membres élus par l'Assemblée générale à cette session, sur la base d'une répartition géographique équitable.

5. Invite le Secrétaire général à demander à l'Organisation pour l'Alimentation et l'Agriculture, l'Organisation internationale de Travail, l'Organisation des Nations Unies pour l'Education, la Science et la Culture, l'Organisation Mondiale de la Santé et l'Organisation internationale du Commerce, une fois constituées, d'envoyer à titre consultatif des représentants à la réunion du Comité ad hoc.

6. Invite le Comité ad hoc à examiner les résumés et analyses faits par le Secrétaire général des renseignements transmis en application de l'Article 73 (e) de la Charte, en vue d'assister l'Assemblée générale dans son examen de ces renseignements et de faire des recommandations à l'Assemblée générale concernant la procédure à suivre à l'avenir et les moyens d'assurer que les avis, les connaissances techniques et l'expérience des Institutions spécialisées soient utilisés au mieux."

L'ensemble de cette résolution fut adoptée par la Quatrième Commission par un vote de 23 voix contre 12 et 3 abstentions. Le représentant de la France a réservé formellement la position de son Gouvernement, déclarant qu'il ne pouvait prendre l'engagement au nom du Gouvernement français d'envoyer des représentants à un Comité ad hoc établi en contravention des stipulations de l'Article 73 (e) de la Charte.

Les délégations de l'Australie, de la Belgique et du Royaume-Uni ont également réservé la position de leurs Gouvernements.

Si l'Assemblée générale approuve la convocation de ce Comité ad hoc comme il est dit dans les alinéas 4 et 6 de la Résolution ci-dessus, l'Assemblée générale devrait choisir, lors de la présente session, les huit membres qui seront invités à envoyer des représentants à la réunion du Comité ad hoc.

3. Draft reports of the Fourth Committee to the General Assembly concerning matters discussed in Sub-Committee 2 (documents A/C.4/76, A/C.4/77 and A/C.4/78)

The RAPPEUR introduced the draft reports. He asked the Committee whether it wished to make proposals to the General Assembly on the composition of the ad hoc committee provided in the resolution concerning the transmission of information by Members under item e of Article 73 of the Charter.

Mr. NAGGIAR (France) thought that it was premature to discuss this point, since it was not yet certain that the General Assembly would adopt the resolution. The French Government had not yet decided whether it desired to be represented in this ad hoc committee, and the French delegation had reserved its point of view on its establishment.

He asked, moreover, that the Committee take note of the formal reservations made by his and other delegations on the Philippine proposal as adopted by the Committee.

The Committee decided that the reservations expressed by the representatives of France, the United Kingdom and other countries would be included in the report.

The meeting was adjourned at 2.15 p.m.

3. Projet de rapport de la Quatrième Commission à l'Assemblée générale concernant les questions discutées à la Sous-Commission 2 (documents A/C.4/76, A/C.4/77 et A/C.4/78)

Le RAPPEUR présente les projets de rapport. Il demande à la Commission si elle désire faire des propositions à l'Assemblée générale sur la composition d'une commission ad hoc, prévue dans la résolution concernant la transmission d'informations par les Membres, selon le point e de l'Article 73 de la Charte.

M. NAGGIAR (France) estime qu'il est prématuré de discuter cette question, puisqu'il n'est encore sûr que l'Assemblée générale adoptera cette résolution. Le Gouvernement français n'a pas encore décidé s'il désire être représenté à cette commission ad hoc, et la délégation française a même réservé son avis sur l'établissement de cette commission.

En outre, il demande que la Commission prenne note des réserves formelles faites par la délégation française et par d'autres délégations, sur la proposition de la République des Philippines telle qu'elle a été adoptée par la Commission.

La Commission décide que ces réserves formelles faites par les représentants de la France, du Royaume-Uni et d'autres pays seront consignées dans le rapport.

La séance est levée à 14 h. 15.

TWENTY-FIFTH MEETING Held at Lake Success, New York, on Wednesday, 11 December 1946, at 11.30 a.m. Chairman: Mr. MACEachen (Uruguay).	VINGT-CINQUIEME SEANCE Tenue à Lake Success, New-York, le mercredi 11 décembre 1946, à 11 h. 30. Président: M. R. MACEachen (Uruguay).

2. Consideration of the Rapporteur's draft report concerning the transmission of information by Members under Article 73(e) of the Charter (documents A/C.4/77 and A/C.4/77/Corr.1)

Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) reiterated his observations made with reference to document A/C.4/76.

Mr. STEIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) shared the view of the Cuban representative and stated that in the case of each recommendation the vote should be recorded.

Mr. NAGGIAR (France) restated the reservation which the French delegation had made with regard to the establishment of an ad hoc committee. He could not undertake that France would be prepared to send a representative to that committee as she considered its establishment a contravention of the provisions of Article 73(e) of the Charter. He requested that the reservation of his delegation should be included in the Rapporteur's report.

Mr. STEIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that any delegation had the right to make a reservation and that it was entitled to its inclusion in the report.

Mr. ANDREWS (Union of South Africa), noting that the number of members absent had been listed in the Rapporteur's draft report concerning South West Africa, suggested that the same procedure should be followed in the document under consideration.

Mr. STEIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) doubted whether it was necessary to list the number of members absent.

An exchange of views followed in which Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), Mr. PRADENAS (Chile), Mr. NAGGIAR (France), Mr. LIU (China) and Mr. THOMAS (United Kingdom) participated.

The CHAIRMAN stated that a decision on that point would affect the previous report. He put the question to a vote.

Decision: By thirty-seven votes to none with four abstentions it was decided not to mention the number of members absent in the report.

Mr. NAGGIAR (France) wished to insert the clause "without prejudice to the future status of these territories" after the enumeration of the French possessions on page 2.

Mr. MENON (India) questioned the use of the term "establishments", suggesting that it should be replaced by "possessions".

Mr. BENSON (Secretary) explained that the term "establishments" was generally accepted.

2. Examen du projet de rapport du Rapporteur relatif à la transmission des renseignements communiqués par les Membres en application de l'Article 73 e) de la Charte (documents A/C.4/77 et A/C.4/77/Corr.1)

M. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) réitère les observations précédentes concernant le document A/C.4/76.

M. STEIN (Union des Républiques socialistes soviétiques) se rallie à l'opinion exprimée par le représentant de Cuba, et déclare que le vote sur chaque recommandation doit être enregistré séparément.

M. NAGGIAR (France) renouvelle la réserve faite par la délégation française au sujet de l'établissement d'un comité spécial. Il ne peut prendre l'engagement, au nom du Gouvernement français, d'envoyer un représentant à ce comité, son pays considérant la création de celui-ci comme allant à l'encontre des dispositions de l'Article 73 e) de la Charte. Il demande que les réserves faites par sa délégation soient insérées dans le rapport du Rapporteur.

M. STEIN (Union des Républiques socialistes soviétiques) estime que toutes les délégations ont le droit de formuler des réserves et d'en demander l'insertion au rapport.

M. ANDREWS (Union Sud-Africaine) prend note que le nombre des absents a fait l'objet d'une mention dans le projet de rapport du Rapporteur relatif au Sud-Ouest Africain, et propose que l'on suive la même procédure dans le document actuellement à l'examen.

M. STEIN (Union des Républiques socialistes soviétiques) exprime des doutes quant à la nécessité de mentionner le nombre des absents.

Un échange de vues s'ensuit auquel prennent part M. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), M. PRADENAS (Chili), M. NAGGIAR (France) M. LIU (Chine) et M. THOMAS (Royaume-Uni).

Le PRÉSIDENT déclare qu'une décision sur ce point concerne également le rapport précédent et met la question aux voix.

Décision: On décide, par trente-sept voix contre zéro et quatre abstentions, de ne pas mentionner les noms des absents dans le rapport.

M. NAGGIAR (France) désire qu'à la suite de l'énumération des possessions françaises qui figure à la page 2, on insère les termes "sans préjudice du statut futur de ces territoires".

M. MENON (Inde) met en doute l'emploi du terme "établissements" et suggère qu'on le remplace par "possessions".

M. BENSON (Secrétariat) explique que le terme "établissements" est généralement accepté.

Mr. DULLES (United States of America) suggested that reference should be made in the report to the statement of the delegation of Panama concerning the Panama Canal zone. He thought that it could best be done in the form of a footnote.

Mr. MENDOZA (Guatemala) requested that reference to his statement concerning the territory of Belice should also appear in the report.

The CHAIRMAN suggested that the reference should cover the statements made by the delegations of Guatemala, Mexico and the United Kingdom.

Mr. FERRER VIEYRA (Argentina) wished to make a reservation concerning the Falkland Islands and in particular Malvina.

The CHAIRMAN proposed that the representative of Argentina should consult with the representative of the United Kingdom with the view of preparing a joint statement for inclusion in the report.

Mr. ALFARO (Panama) agreed with the formula suggested by the United States representative for recording the position of the delegation of Panama.

Mr. PEON DEL VALLE (Mexico) thought that in the case of the statements of the delegations of Guatemala and the United Kingdom it would be sufficient if the report referred to the Journal containing the summary record of the meeting at which the statements had been made.

Mr. FERRER VIEYRA (Argentina) and Mr. THOMAS (United Kingdom) submitted the following joint statement:

"In regard to the Falkland Islands, the Argentine delegation, at the twenty-fifth meeting of the Committee, made a reservation to the effect that the Argentine Government did not recognize British sovereignty in the Falkland Islands. The United Kingdom delegation made a parallel reservation, not recognizing Argentine sovereignty in those islands".

Mr. THOMAS (United Kingdom) pointed to the difficulties inherent in the last paragraph of document A/C.4/77. The creation of an ad hoc committee would involve an expenditure. According to rule 112 of the provisional rules of procedure for the General Assembly, no resolution involving expenditure could be passed until the Administrative and Budgetary Committee had expressed its opinion. Rule 82 stipulated that all elections should be taken by secret ballot. Consequently it would be impossible to follow the procedure outlined in the draft report.

Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) believed that the Committee could elect the members of the ad hoc committee and submit their names for the approval of the General Assembly.

M. DULLES (Etats-Unis d'Amérique) propose que mention soit faite au rapport de la déclaration de la délégation du Panama relative à la zone du Canal de Panama. A son avis, il est préférable de placer cette note au bas de la page.

M. MENDOZA (Guatemala) demande que sa déclaration au sujet du territoire de Bélize figure également au rapport.

Le PRÉSIDENT propose de faire état, dans la même note, des déclarations faites par les délégations du Guatemala, du Mexique et du Royaume-Uni.

M. FERRER VIEYRA (Argentine) désire formuler une réserve concernant les îles Falkland, en particulier celle de Malvina.

Le PRÉSIDENT propose que le représentant de l'Argentine se mette en rapport avec le représentant du Royaume-Uni afin de préparer une déclaration conjointe qui sera incluse dans le rapport.

M. ALFARO (Panama) approuve la formule proposée par le représentant des Etats-Unis concernant la position de la délégation du Panama.

M. PEON DEL VALLE (Mexique) estime qu'en ce qui concerne les déclarations faites par les délégations du Guatemala et du Royaume-Uni, il serait suffisant que la rapport porte la référence du Journal contenant le compte rendu de la séance au cours de laquelle ces déclarations ont été faites.

M. FERRER VIEYRA (Argentine) et M. THOMAS (Royaume-Uni) présentent la déclaration conjointe ainsi conçue:

"Relativement aux îles Falkland, la délégation argentine, au cours de la vingt-cinquième séance de la Commission, a formulé la réserve que le Gouvernement argentin ne reconnaissait pas la souveraineté britannique sur les îles Falkland. La délégation du Royaume-Uni a formulé une réserve parallèle, ne reconnaissant pas la souveraineté de l'Argentine sur ces îles.

M. THOMAS (Royaume-Uni) relève les difficultés devant lesquelles on se trouve dans le dernier paragraphe du document A/C.4/77. La création d'un comité spécial ne manquera pas d'occasionner des frais. Conformément à l'article 112 du règlement provisoire de l'Assemblée générale, on ne peut adopter aucune résolution entraînant des frais avant que la Commission administrative et budgétaire ait donné son avis. L'article 82 stipule que l'on procède à toutes les élections par voie de scrutin secret. En conséquence, il serait impossible de suivre la procédure exposée dans le projet de rapport.

M. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) pense que la Commission a le pouvoir d'élire les membres du comité spécial sous réserve de soumettre leurs noms à l'approbation de l'Assemblée générale.

Mr. NAGGIAR (France) thought that it would be difficult to ascertain the number of States to be elected to membership on the ad hoc committee. Moreover, the problem of election was not urgent and therefore could be left open for the time being.

Mr. THOMAS (United Kingdom) associated himself with the views of the French representative. He proposed that the entire last paragraph after the word "abstentions" should be deleted.

Mr. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) disagreed and suggested a modification of the last paragraph to the effect that the number of States should be defined.

Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) and Mr. BAILEY (Australia) associated themselves with the reservations made by the representatives of France and of the United Kingdom.

The RAPPOREUR was of the opinion that the membership of the ad hoc committee should be composed of eight States.

Mr. NAGGIAR (France) opposed the insertion of a definite figure.

Mr. STEIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) favoured that figure. It rested with the Governments concerned to send or not to send their representatives to the ad hoc committee. He proposed that the discussion should be closed.

Decisions: (1) It was decided that the report should be modified to indicate that, if the General Assembly approved the creation of the committee, it should be invited to elect eight Members to send representatives.

(2) The whole of the Rapporteur's draft report on the transmission of information by Members under Article 73(e) of the Charter was adopted as amended.

M. NAGGIAR (France) considère qu'il sera difficile de déterminer le nombre des États susceptibles d'être représentés au comité spécial. Il ajoute que, la question de l'élection n'étant pas urgente, elle peut être mise de côté pour le moment.

M. THOMAS (Royaume-Uni) se rallie à l'opinion du représentant de la France. Il propose la suppression de tout le dernier paragraphe après le mot "abstentions".

M. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) exprime son désaccord et propose de modifier le dernier paragraphe afin d'y déterminer le nombre des États.

M. RYCKMANS (Belgique) et M. BAILEY (Australie) s'associent aux réserves faites par les représentants de la France et du Royaume-Uni.

Le RAPPOREUR est d'avis que le comité spécial soit composé des représentants de huit États.

M. NAGGIAR (France) s'oppose à l'établissement d'un chiffre défini.

M. STEIN (Union des Républiques socialistes soviétiques) se prononce en faveur de ce chiffre. Il appartient aux Gouvernements d'envoyer ou de ne pas envoyer des représentants à ce comité spécial. Il propose la clôture de la discussion.

Décisions: 1) La Commission décide que le rapport sera modifié de façon à indiquer qu'au cas où l'Assemblée générale approuverait la création du comité, elle devra élire huit États Membres qui y seront représentés.

2) Ainsi amendé, l'ensemble du projet de rapport du Rapporteur, relatif à la transmission des renseignements communiqués par les Membres, en application de l'Article 73 e) de la Charte, est adopté.

334 (IV). Territoires auxquels s'applique le Chapitre XI de la Charte

L'Assemblée générale,

Considérant l'obligation qu'ont acceptée les Etats Membres des Nations Unies qui ont ou qui assument la responsabilité d'administrer des territoires dont les populations ne s'administrent pas encore complètement elles-mêmes, de communiquer les renseignements visés à l'Article 73 e de la Charte,

Considérant la résolution 66 (I)¹⁵ adoptée par l'Assemblée générale le 14 décembre 1946 et où sont énumérés soixante-quatorze territoires qui, d'après les déclarations des gouvernements responsables, relevaient de l'Article 73 e,

Ayant pris acte des renseignements fournis par certains Membres des Nations Unies au sujet des modifications d'ordre constitutionnel qui ont motivé la cessation de la transmission des renseignements visés à l'Article 73 e, en ce qui concerne certains des territoires qui sont énumérés dans la résolution 66 (I),

1. Estime que l'Assemblée générale a compétence pour exprimer un avis sur les principes qui ont guidé ou qui peuvent à l'avenir guider les Etats Membres intéressés dans l'énumération des territoires pour lesquels ils sont tenus de transmettre les renseignements visés à l'Article 73 e de la Charte;

2. Invite tout comité spécial que l'Assemblée générale pourra instituer pour examiner les renseignements transmis en vertu de l'Article 73 e de la Charte, à étudier les facteurs dont il convient de tenir compte pour décider si tel ou tel territoire est ou n'est pas un territoire dont les populations ne s'administrent pas encore complètement elles-mêmes.

Renseignements provenant des territoires non autonomes: rapport de la Quatrième Commission (A/1159); rapport de la Cinquième Commission (A/1166)

115. M. DE MARCHENA (République Dominicaine), Rapporteur de la Quatrième Commission, rappelle que l'Assemblée générale a renvoyé à la Quatrième Commission ce point de l'ordre du jour, qui comporte l'examen du rapport du Secrétaire général (Résumés et analyses des renseignements transmis en vertu de l'Article 73 e de la Charte) et du rapport du Comité spécial chargé de l'examen des renseignements transmis en vertu de l'Article 73 e de la Charte (A/923).

* Voir page 218 de l'avis consultatif de la Cour internationale de Justice (A/960).

116. La Commission a consacré un certain nombre de séances¹ à l'étude des six projets de résolution recommandés par le Comité spécial qui avait étudié la question au cours de l'année 1949. Ces projets de résolution avaient trait à la transmission facultative de certains renseignements classés dans la partie I du schéma relatif aux territoires non autonomes, à l'égalité de traitement en matière d'enseignement, à la langue de l'enseignement, à la lutte contre l'analphabétisme, à la collaboration internationale en matière économique, sociale et culturelle dans les territoires non autonomes et à la création d'un comité spécial chargé de l'examen des renseignements transmis en vertu de l'Article 73 e de la Charte.

117. De sa 123ème à sa 127ème séance, la Quatrième Commission a examiné cinq autres projets de résolution ainsi que divers amendements qui avaient été présentés.

118. Ces projets de résolution comprenaient : un projet de résolution de l'Egypte, autorisant tout comité spécial que l'Assemblée générale pourrait instituer à étudier les facteurs dont il convient de tenir compte pour décider quels sont les territoires qui relèvent du Chapitre XI de la Charte ; un projet de résolution proposé par l'Inde en remplacement du texte du Comité spécial et prévoyant la création d'un comité spécial dont les membres seraient élus par l'Assemblée générale et qui serait chargé de l'examen des renseignements transmis en vertu de l'Article 73 e de la Charte — ce projet a abouti à la résolution mentionnée dans le document A/1159 ; un projet de résolution commun présenté par Cuba, l'Equateur et le Guatemala, invitant le Secrétaire général à compléter les résumés et analyses en publiant régulièrement des données relatives à certains aspects particuliers des progrès réalisés dans les territoires non autonomes ; un projet de résolution commun présenté par le Mexique et les Etats-Unis d'Amérique, aux termes duquel le Comité spécial, sans préjudice de ses autres champs d'activité mentionnés à l'Article 73 e de la Charte, concentrerait son attention sur l'étude d'une seule question chaque année et serait invité à s'attacher en 1950 à la question de l'enseignement ; enfin, un projet de résolution proposé par l'Australie, priant le Secrétaire général de tenir le Comité spécial au courant de la nature de l'assistance technique que les territoires non autonomes reçoivent des organismes internationaux.

119. Les questions que la Commission a examinées à la suite du rapport du Comité spécial concernent très directement les territoires non autonomes et les millions d'habitants qui les peuplent ; M. de Marchena estime que la Commission a accompli à cet égard une tâche fort utile.

120. Le représentant de la République Dominicaine attire particulièrement l'attention de l'Assemblée générale sur les résolutions relatives aux moyens de lutte contre l'analphabétisme, à la collaboration internationale en matière économique, sociale et culturelle dans les territoires non autonomes, à l'assistance technique et au sort du Comité spécial chargé de l'examen des renseignements transmis en vertu de l'Article 73 e de la Charte. Cette dernière résolution est le résultat d'un débat animé, au cours duquel des tendances diverses se sont fait jour touchant la durée du mandat de ce Comité : les uns ayant voulu le fixer à un an, d'autres à trois ans, d'autres enfin ayant suggéré de faire de ce Comité un organe subsidiaire permanent de l'Assemblée générale.

121. M. de Marchena signale également à l'attention de l'Assemblée générale le projet de résolution concernant les territoires auxquels s'applique le Chapitre XI de la Charte, projet qui est l'aboutissement d'un débat sur la compétence qu'a l'Assemblée générale pour décider si un territoire appartient ou non à la catégorie des territoires dont les populations ne s'administrent pas encore complètement elles-mêmes.

122. A la différence de ce qui s'est produit à la Quatrième Commission lors des sessions antérieures, à la présente session, les projets de résolution ont été recommandés à l'Assemblée générale par une majorité importante ; ce fait permet de penser qu'il existe une tendance commune et précise touchant l'application de l'Article 73 e et du Chapitre XI de la Charte et la réalisation des objectifs qui y sont fixés.

123. Le PRÉSIDENT indique que l'Assemblée générale est saisie d'un rapport de la Cinquième Commission (A/1166) sur les incidences financières du projet de résolution IX, dont l'adoption a été recommandée par la Quatrième Commission.

124. M. WINIEWICZ (Pologne) déclare que la délégation polonaise a déjà, au cours des débats de la Quatrième Commission, souligné la nécessité de respecter non seulement la lettre, mais aussi l'esprit, des Chapitres XI et XII de la Charte relatifs aux territoires non autonomes. La majorité de la Quatrième Commission a partagé son point de vue et ceux qui s'efforcent de maintenir la tradition de l'exploitation coloniale sont restés la minorité.

125. L'un des projets de résolution soumis à l'Assemblée générale prévoit l'établissement d'un comité spécial chargé de l'examen des renseignements transmis en vertu de l'Article 73 e de la Charte, et un autre concerne les territoires auxquels s'applique le Chapitre XI de la Charte. Ces textes représentent une étape dans l'application des dispositions de la Charte relatives aux territoires non autonomes. Comme ces dispositions sont insuffisantes, il faut les appliquer avec un grand sens politique pour qu'elles donnent de bons résultats. Pour ces raisons, ces deux résolutions ne peuvent être considérées comme une interprétation définitive de la Charte. La Pologne attend une interprétation plus précise, qui empêchera les Puissances coloniales de réduire à néant, par une attitude de non-coopération, les efforts accomplis par les Nations Unies. La Pologne collaborera avec toutes les nations qui, dans le monde entier, entendent lutter contre le colonialisme.

126. Le comité spécial qui doit être créé en vertu du projet de résolution examinera tous les renseignements transmis sur les conditions économiques, sociales, culturelles et humanitaires des territoires non autonomes. Ce comité coordonnera les efforts des nations qui cherchent à atteindre les idéals fixés par la Charte. Dès que la Charte des Nations Unies a été signée, le sort des populations non autonomes est devenu, pour tous les Membres des Nations Unies, une responsabilité sacrée et cessé de ne relever que de la législation nationale des gouvernements des Puissances coloniales.

127. Le Chapitre XI de la Charte a déchiré le voile qui cachait le sort de plus de 200 millions d'êtres humains. Les Nations Unies sont responsables devant l'opinion mondiale du sort des territoires non autonomes, et, malgré que cette responsabilité ne soit que morale, les Nations Unies doivent blâmer les Puissances coloniales qui négligeraient de tenir compte des intérêts des populations de ces territoires.

128. Les Puissances coloniales n'ont pas suffisamment compris que leur situation s'est considérablement modifiée depuis San-Francisco. Les récents débats de la Quatrième Commission n'ont pas été rassurants quant à l'attitude de ces Puissances. Elles se sont, en effet, une fois de plus montrées peu disposées à transmettre les renseignements nécessaires et certaines d'entre elles ont même fait connaître leur intention de ne plus transmettre de renseignements sur certains de leurs territoires coloniaux. Dans certains cas, elles ont cherché à se dérober derrière le principe de la souveraineté nationale, en particulier lorsqu'on a soulevé le problème des colonies européennes en Amérique latine.

129. A la Chambre des lords britannique, Lord Listowel est allé encore plus loin que le représentant du Royaume-Uni à la Quatrième Commission et il a pratiquement déclaré que son gouvernement estimait qu'il pouvait interpréter comme il l'entendait les dispositions de la Charte. Ce fait n'est pas pour surprendre de la part d'une Puissance coloniale qui a refusé d'arborer le drapeau des Nations Unies dans les Territoires sous tutelle.

130. Le 29 novembre 1949, le Times de Londres a publié un éditorial dans lequel il était dit que, si le Royaume-Uni se conformait aux dispositions de la Charte et aux décisions de l'Assemblée, il se trouverait placé, avec toute son expérience coloniale, dans la position intolérable d'avoir à se soumettre aux directives que lui donnerait un organisme purement politique sur la façon de répondre aux espoirs que les peuples ont mis en lui. Cet article est une nouvelle preuve de la tendance qui prédomine vers une attitude de non-coopération. Le Times indique qu'une des raisons de cette attitude, c'est, par exemple, que le Comité spécial pourrait se servir de renseignements qui n'auraient été donnés qu'à titre d'information pour présenter des résolutions et formuler des critiques sur les nombreux aspects de l'administration coloniale courante.

131. Les nations qui, au sein de l'Assemblée, ont reconnu si souvent la nécessité de respecter la Charte, sont les premières à refuser de se conformer à ses dispositions lorsque le sort des populations non autonomes est en jeu. Cela prouve clairement leur manque de sincérité.

132. L'examen des renseignements fournis, pour insuffisants que soient ces renseignements, décèle une situation dans les territoires non autonomes qui est loin d'être satisfaisante. Ces renseignements ne sont pas rassurants, malgré qu'ils ne représentent, en fait, que de sèches données numériques et des statistiques. Les populations non autonomes continuent à n'être considérées que comme une main-d'œuvre grâce à laquelle les Puissances métropolitaines peuvent se procurer des matières premières. Dans ces territoires, les mesures discriminatoires existent toujours, l'éducation est négligée, la culture locale est supprimée, les institutions autonomes sont considérées comme des centres dangereux d'opposition et des méthodes brutales d'occupation militaire sont appliquées. Le représentant de la Pologne cite, en exemple, la péninsule malaise, dont il a déjà parlé à la Quatrième Commission.

133. Si les renseignements fournis par les Puissances coloniales dissimulent la misère des populations, d'autres sources la font ressortir avec une force convaincante. Des troubles sanglants ont éclaté récemment dans l'un des territoires non autonomes placés, en vertu de la Charte, sous la responsabilité des Nations Unies. Les organisations ouvrières et politiques de la Nigéria ont renoncé à leurs divergences d'opinions pour créer un front unique comprenant tous les partis, et ils ont constitué un comité extraordinaire pour protester contre la fusillade des mineurs qui luttaient pour obtenir un salaire journalier minimum s'élevant à 84 cents environ. Des réunions ont été organisées et des résolutions ont été adoptées pour faire savoir, ainsi que l'a relaté le New York Times, que les habitants de la Nigéria ne pouvaient tolérer cet état de choses. M. Winiewicz n'a pas l'intention d'engager une discussion détaillée sur l'exploitation de la main-d'œuvre indigène par les Puissances coloniales; il se borne à citer un cas pour montrer quelle valeur il convient d'attacher aux renseignements fournis en explication de l'Article 73 e de la Charte, et pour indiquer les événements que l'on éviterait si l'Organisation des Nations Unies pouvait attirer l'attention de l'opinion publique sur certaines situations qui existent dans les territoires non autonomes.

134. Cependant, l'intérêt de l'Organisation des Nations Unies ne doit pas se limiter au bien-être matériel des peuples non autonomes, ni se contenter de noter que ces territoires peuvent devenir un marché sur lequel on écoulera les marchandises pour éviter aux pays capitalistes la calamité des crises économiques. L'Organisation des Nations Unies n'a pas à se préoccuper de savoir si une augmentation des salaires accordée aux indigènes se traduira, pour les Puissances métropolitaines, par un accroissement de la production d'étain ou de caoutchouc. Elle doit se préoccuper davantage du but final prévu par la Charte et qui, aux termes de l'Article 55, reconnaît aux peuples ordinairement assujettis le droit à l'autonomie et à l'indépendance.

135. L'autonomie et l'indépendance nationales peuvent être acquises en vertu de l'Article 77 c de la Charte, qui stipule que les territoires non autonomes peuvent être volontairement placés sous le Régime de tutelle; ou bien encore, l'évolution permettant à un pays non autonome d'obtenir l'indépendance peut prendre une forme différente; de toute façon, le but reste le même. Par conséquent, pour apprécier la situation réelle d'un territoire non autonome, il est essentiel d'avoir à sa disposition tous les renseignements pertinents relatifs au développement des institutions gouvernementales locales.

136. Certaines Puissances coloniales n'ont pas fait preuve à cet égard d'un esprit de collaboration. Elles ont affirmé, et elles continuent d'affirmer, que les Puissances chargées de l'administration ont seules le droit de décider si un territoire est ou non autonome. Elles prétendent que la Charte ne les oblige en aucune façon à fournir des renseignements sur le développement des institutions autonomes parmi les peuples qui dépendent d'elles. Mais on ne peut dire que Malte soit devenue un territoire autonome simplement parce que le Royaume-Uni a refusé de fournir sur ce territoire les renseignements prévus à l'Article 73 e de la Charte.

137. La résolution 66 (I) que l'Assemblée générale a adoptée le 14 décembre 1946 citait soixante-quatorze territoires auxquels devait s'appliquer l'Article 73 e. L'Assemblée générale est le seul organe qui puisse libérer une Puissance coloniale de l'obligation d'envoyer les renseignements sur le statut des peuples non autonomes. Or, pour prendre une telle décision, l'Assemblée doit examiner tous les faits pertinents.

138. Le projet de résolution actuellement en discussion prévoit que cette tâche doit être entreprise par le Comité spécial. La délégation polonaise appuiera donc chaleureusement ce projet de résolution. S'il était adopté, on pourrait espérer que les Puissances coloniales fourniraient les renseignements pertinents ou que, si elles refusaient de le faire, l'Assemblée générale les en blâmerait comme elles le méritent.

139. Le progrès politique n'est qu'un aspect du progrès économique et social des populations autochtones dans les territoires non autonomes. Il ouvre la voie à l'indépendance. Le refus de fournir des renseignements à cet égard impliquerait, pour le moins, le refus de reconnaître le droit à l'autonomie, et cette attitude constituerait une violation de la Charte. C'est la seule interprétation qu'on puisse donner des intentions des auteurs de la Charte, et ces intentions ne peuvent être dénaturées par aucun subterfuge juridique.

140. M. FARRAG (Egypte) dit que sa délégation appuiera tous les projets de résolution soumis par la Quatrième Commission. Il ne parlera que de la résolution VIII qui concerne les territoires auxquels s'applique le Chapitre XI de la Charte.

141. Un certain nombre de questions essentielles intéressent la mission de l'Organisation des Nations Unies et les relations de celle-ci avec les territoires non autonomes ne sont pas de la compétence du Comité spécial. L'une de ces questions est celle de l'application de la résolution 222 (III) relative à la cessation de la transmission des renseignements. Si l'Assemblée générale a adopté cette résolution, c'est parce que le nombre de territoires sur lesquels des renseignements sont communiqués au Secrétaire général a diminué depuis 1946. Mais l'Organisation des Nations Unies n'a pas eu le moyen de vérifier officiellement si cette diminution était due au fait que les territoires intéressés avaient accédé à l'indépendance ou avaient atteint la capacité de s'administrer complètement eux-mêmes, ou si cette diminution était due à d'autres raisons.

142. Le Comité spécial a examiné des communications envoyées au Secrétaire général par deux Puissances administrantes concernant la cessation de la transmission de renseignements concernant certains territoires (A/915 et A/915/Add.1). Ces communications ont fait l'objet d'observations au sein du Comité spécial, lequel a toutefois décidé, à juste titre, qu'il n'était pas habilité à connaître de cette question et qu'il devait la renvoyer à la Quatrième Commission. Il en a été ainsi fait, et la Quatrième Commission a adopté la résolution VIII dont l'Assemblée générale est actuellement saisie.

143. Ce projet de résolution complète la procédure prévue par la résolution 222 (III). Les deux Puissances administrantes intéressées ont donné des raisons différentes du fait qu'elles avaient cessé de communiquer des renseignements en vertu de l'Article 73 e, mais elles se sont trouvées d'accord pour estimer que les Puissances administrantes sont seules compétentes pour décider quels sont les territoires dont les populations ne s'administrent pas encore complètement elles-mêmes. Si l'on acceptait ce point de vue, la résolution 222 (III) perdrait toute efficacité et, en fin de compte, le Chapitre XI deviendrait lettre morte, si bonnes que puissent être les intentions des Puissances administrantes.

144. Il se peut qu'une telle opinion ait été valable avant l'entrée en vigueur de la Charte des Nations Unies. Mais, en son Chapitre XI, la Charte a promulgué un principe nouveau, en vertu duquel les relations entre les territoires non autonomes et les Puissances administrantes ne peuvent pas être du domaine exclusif des lois constitutionnelles nationales des Puissances administrantes. Ceci ressort clairement du texte de l'Article 73, en vertu duquel les Puissances administrantes ont accepté certaines obligations à l'égard des territoires non autonomes et, entre autres, l'obligation de communiquer régulièrement au Secrétaire général des Nations Unies des renseignements relatifs aux conditions économiques, sociales et culturelles dans ces territoires.

146. A la première partie de la première session de l'Assemblée générale, les représentants des Puissances administrantes ont, à plusieurs reprises, reconnu ce principe nouveau dont ils ont souligné l'importance dans leurs déclarations. A cette époque, les idéaux qui ont inspiré les auteurs de la Charte étaient encore présents à la mémoire de tous les représentants et les déclarations qu'ils prononçaient étaient conformes à ces idéaux. Peut-être ne serait-il pas inutile de rappeler les belles paroles prononcées par deux hommes d'Etat éminents, M. Dulles et M. Creech Jones, parlant au nom des Etats-Unis et du Royaume-Uni à la session de l'Assemblée générale de février 1946¹. M. Dulles a dit alors que sa délégation tenait à préciser une fois pour toutes que la déclaration relative aux territoires ne s'administrant pas eux-mêmes intéresse non pas seulement les Puissances coloniales, mais aussi les Nations Unies. M. Creech Jones a déclaré que le Royaume-Uni, parce qu'il agit déjà en harmonie avec les principes définis dans la Charte, se réjouit en toute sincérité de voir enfin figurer au Chapitre XI une convention coloniale internationale que toutes les Puissances coloniales adhérant à l'Organisation des Nations Unies seront tenues de respecter.

147. Cette déclaration contient deux idées : l'idée que le Chapitre XI renferme une convention coloniale internationale et, d'autre part, l'idée que les Puissances coloniales adhérant à l'Organisation des Nations Unies sont tenues de respecter cette convention.

148. Quant à la question de savoir quelle est l'autorité qui a mission de rappeler aux Puissances coloniales qu'elles sont tenues de respecter cette convention coloniale internationale, il est aisé de la résoudre : cette autorité, c'est l'Organisation des Nations Unies et, plus particulièrement, l'Assemblée générale.

149. C'est en exécution de cette mission que l'Assemblée générale a demandé en 1946 aux Etats Membres de dresser la liste des territoires non autonomes dont ils assumaient l'administration. Les Etats Membres ont énuméré alors soixante-quatorze de ces territoires. Aujourd'hui, le nombre des territoires non autonomes sur lesquels des renseignements sont communiqués, n'est plus que de soixante-deux ; aucun renseignement n'est plus transmis sur douze territoires non autonomes. Si cette cessation était due au fait que les territoires en question s'administrent complètement eux-mêmes, il y aurait là de quoi se réjouir. Mais, lorsque cesse la communication de renseignements relatifs à un territoire porté sur la liste des territoires non autonomes, ou qu'aucun renseignement n'est transmis sur certains de ces territoires, l'Assemblée générale a le devoir d'inviter la Puissance administrante intéressée à respecter l'obligation que lui impose l'Article 73 de la Charte.

150. M. Bailey, le représentant de l'Australie, disait en 1946 à la Quatrième Commission, au cours d'un débat sur cette même question, que si, pour un territoire donné, aucun renseignement n'était communiqué, tout membre de l'Assemblée générale aurait le droit de signaler le fait. Tel est exactement le sens du projet de résolution VIII dont l'Assemblée générale est saisie. On peut considérer que la résolution 222 (III) a été la première mesure dans la série de celles qu'il faudra prendre pour assurer l'application du Chapitre XI de la Charte. Le projet de résolution VIII, qui invite les Puissances administrantes à respecter la nouvelle convention coloniale internationale contenue dans le Chapitre XI de la Charte, constitue une mesure nouvelle dans ce sens.

151. La question qui fait l'objet de ce projet de résolution a été discutée en 1946 par la Sous-Commission 2 de la Quatrième Commission¹. On n'en a pas poussé l'examen jusqu'à rédiger une résolution car, à ce moment-là, le besoin ne s'en faisait pas sentir. Mais, depuis lors, des modifications importantes sont intervenues. Le nombre des territoires non autonomes a diminué ; d'autre part, on a prétendu, contrairement aux principes du Chapitre XI de la Charte, que c'est aux seules Puissances administrantes qu'il appartenait de déterminer si un territoire est, ou n'est pas, autonome. Les discussions qui se sont déroulées

Sous-Commission 2 de la Quatrième Commission, en 1946, ont ceci de remarquable que les représentants des Puissances administrantes y ont participé dans un esprit positif de collaboration internationale. C'est ainsi que M. Bailey, que M. Farrag vient de citer, représentait l'Australie, Puissance administrante.

152. Les procès-verbaux montrent que les représentants des Puissances administrantes ont estimé que l'examen de ce problème ne constituait pas un empiètement sur les droits souverains que ces Puissances exercent dans les territoires non autonomes. Ils n'ont pas dit un seul mot qui pût être interprété comme mettant en doute la compétence de l'Assemblée générale et de ses Commissions à ce sujet. M. Farrag constate avec regret que certaines Puissances administrantes refusent actuellement de reconnaître à l'Assemblée générale le droit de demander aux Puissances administrantes de continuer à lui transmettre des renseignements sur les territoires non autonomes, aussi longtemps que ceux-ci n'ont pas accédé à l'autonomie.

153. Au cours des discussions qui ont eu lieu à la Quatrième Commission au sujet du projet de résolution, les représentants de certaines Puissances administrantes ont déclaré que, si ce texte visait à définir l'expression "territoire non autonome", ils n'y objecteraient pas, mais que, s'il avait pour objet de donner à l'Assemblée générale le droit de déterminer si tel ou tel territoire est, ou n'est pas autonome, ils le combattraient.

154. Il est évident que cette attitude est manifestement contradictoire. En effet, s'ils acceptent la définition, ils doivent en accepter également la conséquence logique ; si cette définition s'applique à un territoire particulier, c'est qu'il s'agit d'un territoire non autonome, et la Puissance administrante qui en est responsable ne peut refuser de communiquer les renseignements nécessaires.

155. On a soutenu à la Quatrième Commission que les Puissances administrantes avaient le droit de cesser de transmettre des renseignements en vertu de la réserve suivante, contenue dans l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 : "sous réserve des exigences de la sécurité et de considérations d'ordre constitutionnel".

156. On a prétendu, à ce propos, que les raisons pour lesquelles on avait employé ce membre de phrase avaient été très clairement précisées lors de la Conférence de San-Francisco, qui les aurait acceptées.

157. M. Farrag a consulté les procès-verbaux de la Conférence de San-Francisco à ce sujet, mais n'y a trouvé aucune mention de ces raisons, qui auraient été clairement précisées.

158. Tous les membres de l'Assemblée savent que le Chapitre XI a été élaboré par le Comité 4 de la Commission II de la Conférence des Nations Unies sur l'organisation internationale. Les raisons pour lesquelles on a employé ce membre de phrase ne sont pas indiquées dans les procès-verbaux de ce Comité qui figurent aux pages 565 à 589 du volume X de la Conférence.

159. Le rapport sur les travaux de ce Comité a été soumis à la Commission II de la Conférence des Nations Unies sur l'organisation internationale. Le procès-verbal de la Commission II relatif au Chapitre XI, qui figure aux pages 160 à 187 du volume VIII, ne mentionne pas non plus ces fameuses raisons. Il appartient donc à l'Assemblée générale de déterminer le sens de cette expression.

160. En l'analysant, on s'aperçoit qu'elle contient deux parties: tout d'abord, la transmission de renseignements peut être limitée; deuxièmement, cette limitation peut être imposée par des exigences de sécurité et des considérations d'ordre constitutionnel.

161. Pour ce qui est du premier point, la limitation de la transmission des renseignements ne signifie nullement qu'on doive cesser entièrement de les transmettre. Toute limitation à cet égard doit être une exception à la règle, qui est la transmission des renseignements; cette réserve doit être appliquée avec modération. Si les auteurs de la Charte avaient envisagé la possibilité de la cessation complète de la transmission de renseignements par les Puissances administrantes, ils auraient formulé leur intention à cet égard en termes tout à fait différents.

162. En ce qui concerne le deuxième point, l'Assemblée générale a le droit d'examiner les considérations de sécurité ou d'ordre constitutionnel, afin de déterminer si elles sont fondées. En effet, l'Assemblée générale a déjà statué à ce sujet en adoptant sa résolution 222 (III) par laquelle elle invite les Puissances administrantes à l'informer de toute modification intervenue dans la constitution et le statut de l'un quelconque des territoires non autonomes, en vertu de laquelle la transmission des renseignements a cessé.

163. Il va sans dire que l'Assemblée générale n'entendait pas que les renseignements sur les modifications intervenues dans la constitution ou le statut des territoires intéressés fussent consignés aux archives du Secrétariat, où ils seraient classés définitivement. Il convient d'examiner ces renseignements et, s'il y a lieu, de formuler des observations à leur sujet.

164. M. Farrag demande donc aux Puissances administrantes d'interpréter d'une façon plus large le Chapitre XI. M. Stassen a déclaré à ce sujet à la Commission qui a élaboré la Charte, que celle-ci est une chose vivante; elle doit évoluer, elle doit changer et se développer, elle doit devenir quelque chose de plus grand et de meilleur.

165. Le représentant de la Norvège a fort bien exprimé la même idée, en 1946, en disant que, à son avis, le Chapitre XI pourrait devenir une sorte de Magna Carta de la liberté, qui donnerait une foi nouvelle et un espoir nouveau à des millions de gens qui ont fait d'immenses sacrifices pendant la guerre mais dont les pays ne comptent pas parmi les Nations Unies.

166. M. Farrag espère que l'Assemblée générale adoptera à l'unanimité le projet de résolution. Il demande qu'il soit mis aux voix par appel nominal.

167. M. DE BRUYNE (Belgique) déclare que, afin de préciser l'attitude de sa délégation à l'égard de la résolution VI que, sous référence à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte, la Quatrième Commission a soumise à l'Assemblée pour le rétablissement du Comité spécial, il se voit forcé de rappeler quelques considérations juridiques qu'il a développées devant cette Commission.

168. Par l'alinéa e de l'Article 73, les Etats qui administrent des territoires non autonomes visés par le Chapitre XI de la Charte ont accepté de communiquer au Secrétaire général certains renseignements relatifs aux conditions dans ces territoires. L'alinéa e détermine soigneusement la nature de ces renseignements, ainsi que les matières sur lesquelles ils porteront. Sont seuls prévus les renseignements statistiques et autres de nature technique relatifs aux conditions économiques, sociales et culturelles. Tels sont les renseignements que les Etats ont accepté de communiquer; leur acceptation ne s'étend donc pas à des renseignements d'autre nature ou relatifs à d'autres domaines, tels que le domaine politique. Au surplus, ces renseignements, ils n'ont accepté de les fournir que sous réserve des exigences de la sécurité et de considérations d'ordre constitutionnel.

169. L'acceptation donnée en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 est donc de portée limitée. Notamment, l'alinéa e ne reconnaît à l'Organisation des Nations Unies ou à ses organes aucune faculté de contrôle ni même de vérification. Il ne reconnaît que le pouvoir du Secrétaire général de recevoir les renseignements qui lui sont communiqués, pouvoir qui comprend celui de les classer, de les analyser, en un mot d'en faciliter l'accès aux Membres de l'Organisation des Nations Unies.

170. En particulier, les Etats visés n'ont pas accepté de faire rapport à l'Organisation, de venir se justifier devant elle, de lui rendre des comptes. L'alinéa e stipule d'ailleurs, expressément, que les renseignements sont communiqués "à titre d'information".

171. C'est, du reste, très compréhensible. Il s'agit, en effet, de territoires qui font partie intégrante du sol national des Etats contractants. Ainsi, en ce qui concerne la Belgique, le Congo est exclusivement soumis à la souveraineté de l'Etat belge. C'est spontanément que les Etats ont souscrit au Chapitre XI qui, pour bien marquer sa genèse et son caractère très spécial, a été qualifié de "Déclaration", d'où le contraste que présente le Chapitre XI avec les Chapitres XII et XIII qui concernent des territoires dont la situation est toute différente.

172. Alors que, pour les Territoires sous tutelle, la Charte règle leur statut, prévoit la participation des Nations Unies dans leur organisation et dans la surveillance de leur administration, elle ne contient aucune disposition de cette nature à l'égard des territoires qui font l'objet du Chapitre XI.

173. On a, il est vrai, invoqué l'Article 10 de la Charte, qui permet à l'Assemblée générale de discuter de toutes questions rentrant "dans le cadre de la Charte" et de faire, à ce sujet, des recommandations aux Etats Membres. Mais la fonction de cet Article n'est pas de déterminer l'étendue des obligations de ces Etats. Les recommandations de l'Assemblée ne sauraient restreindre la liberté que l'alinéa e laisse aux Etats; elles ne sauraient leur imposer des contrôles ou d'autres obligations qu'ils n'ont pas acceptés. Pourvu, donc, qu'un Etat respecte les stipulations explicites du Chapitre XI, en particulier de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73, il doit être considéré comme tenant ses promesses, qu'il se conforme ou non aux modalités que recommanderait l'Assemblée. Comme telles, en effet, ces recom-mandations sont sans caractère obligatoire. L'Assemblée ne dispose pas d'ailleurs, en la matière, d'un pouvoir de décision. Notamment, elle ne dispose pas du pouvoir de se prononcer, avec effet obligatoire, sur la manière dont les Etats doivent procéder pour agir régulièrement selon le Chapitre XI ou sur le point de savoir si leur action a, ou n'a pas, été régulière.

174. En outre, l'Assemblée doit se maintenir "dans le cadre de la Charte". Or, elle sort de ses attributions constitutionnelles lorsqu'elle prétend appeler les Etats à accomplir des prestations qui ne sont pas visées par le texte de la Charte. Elle en sort également lorsqu'elle crée des organes subsidiaires investis de pouvoirs qui supposent, de la part des Etats, l'accomplissement de pareilles prestations.

175. Mais c'est surtout par le jeu de l'alinéa 7 de l'Article 2 de la Charte que sont restreintes les compétences de l'Assemblée.

176. Selon cet alinéa, aucune disposition de la Charte n'autorise l'Organisation des Nations Unies à intervenir dans "des affaires qui relèvent essentiellement de la compétence nationale d'un Etat", ni n'oblige les Etats Membres à soumettre des affaires de ce genre à une procédure de règlement aux termes de la Charte.

177. Ce principe est une règle d'interprétation qui domine toutes les dispositions de la Charte, sauf celles qui concernent l'application des mesures de coercition prévues au Chapitre VII. Cette règle s'impose, d'autre part, à tous les organes des Nations Unies, principaux, secondaires ou subsidiaires, car aucun d'eux, cela va de soi, ne saurait avoir plus de pouvoir que l'Organisation elle-même.

178. Il est donc juridiquement impossible d'interpréter l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 — pas plus que toute autre disposition du Chapitre XI — comme permettant une intervention dans des affaires qui relèvent essentiellement de la compétence nationale. La même limitation affecte l'interprétation de l'Article 10.

179. Dès lors que le domaine réservé par l'alinéa 7 de l'Article 2 est en cause, l'Assemblée se voit incapable d'intervenir. Partant, son action, dans ce cas, doit être particulièrement circonspecte; elle ne peut jamais aller jusqu'à l'"intervention". Si l'Assemblée peut se prêter à un débat, où il soit loisible à chacun de s'exprimer, elle ne peut donner aux Etats de directives, sous quelque forme que ce soit.

180. La Charte ne définit pas ce qu'il faut entendre par "affaires qui relèvent essentiellement de la compétence nationale". Bien plus, la Conférence de San-Francisco a repoussé à une forte majorité un amendement belge tendant à conférer aux organes des Nations Unies le pouvoir de décider souverainement qu'une affaire relève ou ne relève pas essentiellement de la compétence nationale.

181. L'orateur vient de rappeler les règles applicables en la matière. Or, ces règles, la résolution VI, présentée par la Quatrième Commission, ne les respecte pas. Elle vise, en effet, à rétablir pour un long terme une institution, le Comité spécial, dont l'activité antérieure révèle qu'elle tend toujours davantage à s'arroger, à l'égard des territoires visés au Chapitre XI, une fonction similaire à celle que remplit le Conseil de tutelle à l'égard des Territoires sous tutelle. Les Etats sont amenés à s'expliquer devant lui, à rendre compte de la manière dont ils exercent leur souveraineté, même dans des domaines qui relèvent essentiellement de leur compétence nationale. Cette orientation de l'activité du Comité spécial ne fait, d'ailleurs, que refléter la tendance que montre l'Assemblée elle-même. Ainsi, lorsque, en 1946, elle établit le premier Comité spécial, alors modestement dénommé Comité *ad hoc*¹, l'Assemblée limita ses pouvoirs de recommandation à de pures mesures de procédure. Il était question, en effet, de la procédure à suivre pour communiquer les renseignements prévus par l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 et pour assurer l'utile concours des institutions spécialisées. En 1947 déjà, l'Assemblée générale renforçait les directives de 1946². Elle recommandait aux Etats un schéma destiné à leur servir de guide pour la préparation des renseignements. Ce schéma excédait, de plus, ce qui a été assumé par ces Etats, puisque, notamment, il comportait un chapitre visant à l'obtention de données de nature très nettement politique, matière non visée par l'Article 73. L'Assemblée, en même temps, investissait le Comité spécial, qu'elle créait, d'une compétence supplémentaire: celle de faire des suggestions techniques en général. Bien plus, ce faisant, elle n'excluait nullement les questions qui relèvent essentiellement de la compétence nationale des Etats. Ces pouvoirs, l'Assemblée les confirma en 1948³.

182. La résolution qu'on voudrait voir adopter aujourd'hui va plus loin encore. Elle contient, en effet, une clause de portée générale de laquelle il résulte qu'il s'agira désormais d'apprécier, dans l'esprit de l'Article 55 de la Charte, si les Etats conforment ou ne conforment pas leur comportement aux résolutions prises par l'Assemblée dans les domaines économique, social et culturel. A cela s'ajoute que le Comité spécial, qui n'avait jamais été rétabli que pour une année, le serait pour trois ans, s'acheminant ainsi rapidement vers la permanence.

183. Cette progression dans l'ingérence et dans l'intervention ne semble pas devoir s'arrêter là. La résolution prévoit, en effet, que l'Assemblée aura à réexaminer, dès 1952, la teneur du mandat du Comité. Cette précision est délibérée. Elle a donné lieu à un débat au sein de la Quatrième Commission, pleinement consciente de ses implications.

184. La Belgique est fermement résolue à persévérer dans l'observation fidèle des dispositions du Chapitre XI, qu'elle a librement acceptées comme répondant à une mission sacrée. Mais elle n'entend pas aller au-delà; elle n'entend pas, notamment, se plier à des mesures ou à des situations prises ou créées en méconnaissance des limites que comportent ses engagements aux termes de la Charte. En particulier, le territoire du Congo relève de la souveraineté belge. Jamais la Belgique ne consentira à ce qu'il soit traité en Territoire sous tutelle.

Le projet de résolution de la Quatrième Commission apparaît comme une nouvelle phase de l'évolution dénoncée comme contraire aux prévisions de la Charte.

185. La délégation belge se verra donc contrainte de voter contre le projet de résolution et, pour le cas où celui-ci serait adopté, elle doit réserver, dès à présent, l'entière liberté de son gouvernement quant à l'attitude à observer à l'égard de cette mesure.

186. Le PRÉSIDENT annonce que la liste des orateurs sera close à la fin de la séance.

187. M. McNEIL (Royaume-Uni) croit qu'il est nécessaire d'expliquer l'attitude de son gouvernement, non seulement à l'égard des résolutions dont l'Assemblée générale est saisie, mais également à l'égard d'une tendance qui s'est fait jour au cours des dernières années et qui s'est manifestée au plus haut point dans les débats de la Quatrième Commission en 1949.

188. Il s'agit de la tendance à élargir la portée du Chapitre XI, autrement dit, à mettre dans la Charte des obligations et des fonctions qui n'y sont pas.

189. C'est en grande partie grâce à l'initiative du Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni que la Déclaration relative aux territoires non autonomes, qui constitue le Chapitre XI, a été introduite dans la Charte. Cette Déclaration formule les principes qui ont inspiré la politique coloniale du Royaume-Uni bien avant la création de l'Organisation des Nations Unies et que le Royaume-Uni aurait continué d'appliquer même si la Charte n'avait pas été adoptée.

190. Le seul élément de cette Déclaration qui entraîne l'adoption de nouvelles dispositions est l'acceptation de l'obligation précise et limitée de transmettre au Secrétaire général certains renseignements d'ordre technique nettement définis. Bien que ce ne soit pas le Royaume-Uni qui ait eu l'idée de cette obligation, la délégation du Royaume-Uni l'a acceptée parce qu'elle était conforme à la politique de son gouvernement, qui a toujours donné la plus large diffusion possible aux informations sur les travaux qu'il accomplissait dans les territoires d'outre-mer dont il assumait la responsabilité. En outre, le Royaume-Uni, en sa qualité de Membre fondateur de l'Organisation des Nations Unies, a estimé qu'il était souhaitable et qu'il convenait que les renseignements d'ordre économique et social transmis à l'Organisation fussent aussi complets et aussi universels que possible, notamment en raison des grands espoirs que le monde met dans les travaux des institutions spécialisées.

191. C'est donc de bonne foi que la délégation du Royaume-Uni a transmis les renseignements demandés en vertu des dispositions de la Charte, dans la pensée qu'ils seraient utilisés à titre d'information, comme le prévoit la Charte. M. McNeil se demande si la bonne foi que le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni a montrée en transmettant les renseignements a rencontré la même bonne foi chez les autres signataires de la Charte.

192. Lorsque l'on étudie les dix résolutions adoptées par la Quatrième Commission, on a peine à y retrouver l'alinéa e de l'Article 73, tel qu'il figure dans la Charte. M. McNeil y voit, au contraire, la confirmation de la tendance dont il a parlé tout à l'heure et sur laquelle les représentants du Royaume-Uni ont appelé maintes fois l'attention du Comité spécial et de la Quatrième Commission, c'est-à-dire cette tendance à s'écarter à la légère, de plus en plus, des dispositions du Chapitre XI et à fonder les résolutions de l'Assemblée générale sur une hypothèse que les auteurs de la Charte ont délibérément omis de formuler.

193. Il s'agit de cette hypothèse absolument injustifiée selon laquelle, en souscrivant à la Déclaration du Chapitre XI, les Etats Membres administrant des territoires non autonomes ont accepté le principe du contrôle international de l'administration de ces territoires. Certains représentants ont reconnu que l'on s'était, en effet, écarté des dispositions de la Charte. Toutefois, ils ont cherché à expliquer et à justifier cette attitude en invoquant l'esprit de la Charte et en se fondant sur la possibilité du développement d'une interprétation conventionnelle de la Charte.

194. On a essayé, dans d'autres domaines, de modifier les dispositions de la Charte, en recourant à ce que M. Vychinsky a très justement appelé des "moyens détournés". La délégation du Royaume-Uni n'est toujours élevée contre les tentatives qui ont été faites pour modifier la Charte par ces moyens, mais il est à remarquer qu'aucune délégation n'a été plus résolue — et peut-être plus résolue à juste titre — que la délégation de l'URSS dans son opposition contre cette "infiltration" de la Charte. L'exemple le plus frappant et le plus récent est celui de la modification que l'on voulait apporter à la procédure d'admission des nouveaux Membres.

195. L'insistance avec laquelle M. Vychinsky et, avant lui, M. Molotov ont tenu à ce que l'on appliquât la Charte à la lettre dans la question dont M. McNeil vient de parler est une attitude que le représentant du Royaume-Uni approuve entièrement; elle contraste toutefois avec l'attitude que les représentants de l'URSS ont adoptée à la Quatrième Commission, où ils ont essayé à maintes reprises, ainsi que d'autres représentants, de mettre dans les dispositions du Chapitre XI des obligations et des principes qui n'y sont pas, en prétendant qu'ils sont conformes à l'esprit de la Charte. Certes, il est bon de rechercher l'intention des auteurs d'une convention internationale pour les points sur lesquels les dispositions ne sont pas claires, mais la majorité de ceux qui ont invoqué l'esprit de la Charte au sujet de la question en discussion ont invoqué, à l'appui de leur thèse, certaines théories qui ont été délibérément écartées de la Charte à la majorité des voix lors d'un scrutin effectué en bonne et due forme à San-Francisco.

196. Il est inconcevable que l'on puisse interpréter l'esprit de la Charte, ainsi que le font certaines délégations, comme si la Charte englobait des questions que ces délégations auraient voulu qu'elle visât, mais qui, à tort ou à raison, heureusement ou malheureusement, n'ont pu recueillir le nombre de voix nécessaire. La procédure à suivre pour reviser la Charte est bien connue; le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni accepte la Charte telle qu'elle est actuellement. Il s'est conformé, et fera tout son possible pour se conformer à l'avenir, aux exigences de la Charte en ce qui concerne les territoires non autonomes dont il assume la responsabilité.

197. Toutefois, les dix projets de résolution comprennent de nombreux points qui, non seulement dépassent de beaucoup toutes les exigences de la Charte, mais vont également à l'encontre des exigences de la situation qui existe actuellement dans de nombreux territoires non autonomes dont le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni a la responsabilité. Il semble qu'un grand nombre de Membres de l'Organisation des Nations Unies aient une conception entièrement fautive : à moins qu'un territoire ne soit entièrement autonome ou complètement indépendant, sa population ne participe nullement à son gouvernement et à son administration ; dans ce cas, ses affaires seraient gérées directement par la Puissance métropolitaine d'une manière absolument autoritaire.

198. Les représentants du Royaume-Uni se sont efforcés, à maintes reprises, de corriger cette idée fautive, mais leurs efforts n'ont apparemment pas abouti. M. McNeil pense parfois que ceux à qui l'on adresse les informations ne veulent pas prendre note des précisions qu'on leur apporte.

199. Les populations des territoires non autonomes dont s'occupe le Royaume-Uni se voient confier de plus en plus, et à un rythme accéléré, la responsabilité de l'administration de leur territoire. L'exemple le plus frappant et le plus récent est fourni par le rapport du Committee on Constitutional Reform (Comité de réforme constitutionnelle) de la Côte-de-l'Or, présidé par M. Coussey, éminent magistrat africain, juge à la Cour suprême de la Côte-de-l'Or. Ce Comité de trente-huit membres est composé uniquement d'Africains. Tous ceux qui ont lu ce rapport ont été frappés par l'évidente maturité politique de ces habitants de la Côte-de-l'Or. Le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni a accepté le rapport en formulant certaines réserves ; il a estimé que ce rapport constituait un plan de travail exécutable dans le cadre duquel l'évolution constitutionnelle pourrait se poursuivre.

200. Ainsi, grâce à l'évolution rapide de leurs propres institutions, les populations des territoires dont a parlé M. McNeil ont constamment la possibilité d'exprimer en toute liberté leur volonté au sujet des questions qui les touchent le plus. Ces colonies ne sont pas des nations indépendantes et cette situation semble délecter les juristes qui abondent parfois à la Quatrième Commission. Cependant, M. McNeil tient à assurer à l'Assemblée que les populations autochtones sont de plus en plus fières de leurs propres institutions et de leurs traditions, et qu'elles s'y montrent de plus en plus attachées. Au stade actuel de leur développement politique, ces populations ne sont certainement pas plus disposées que n'importe quel peuple indépendant à tolérer une intervention internationale dans leurs affaires intérieures. Le représentant du Royaume-Uni pense que cette thèse a été remarquablement exposée, et d'une façon claire et convaincante, par son collègue, M. Grantley Adams, de la Barbade, qui a représenté le Royaume-Uni aux précédentes sessions de l'Assemblée générale. Ceux qui proposent que les territoires non autonomes fassent l'objet d'un traitement discriminatoire de ce genre sont coupables d'engendrer ce même sentiment d'infériorité que toute politique coloniale éclairée doit précisément viser à faire disparaître.

201. Peu de pays échappent à la critique, et M. McNeil ne prétendra pas que le Royaume-Uni soit du nombre. Au cours des débats, plusieurs Etats Membres ont été sévèrement critiqués à cet égard par d'autres Etats. Cependant, les Puissances administrant des territoires non autonomes se trouvent dans une situation assez particulière par rapport aux autres Etats souverains, étant donné qu'elles assument des responsabilités particulières. Cela les expose peut-être plus à la critique. Certes, elles ont été très abondamment critiquées à la Quatrième Commission, dont les critiques irréflechies sont devenues proverbiales. La délégation du Royaume-Uni estime que, au sein de cette Commission, les représentants de certains Etats qui n'ont pas à affronter les difficultés et les responsabilités des Puissances administrant des territoires non autonomes se sont permis, et ont parfois été autorisés, à dépasser les limites de la critique équitable et impartiale. Les déclarations du genre de celles qui ont fait l'objet des protestations de certains de ses collègues émanent souvent de représentants de pays dont la politique intérieure n'est nullement au-dessus de toute critique, notamment lorsque ces pays ont, eux aussi, la responsabilité du développement progressif de populations autochtones qui, pour autant qu'elles n'ont pas atteint la maturité, sont toujours relativement peu évoluées.

202. Il semble que ces déclarations ne sont que trop souvent inspirées par la passion, et parfois même par la jalousie, au lieu de témoigner de l'objectivité et de l'impartialité auxquelles les Puissances administrantes estiment avoir droit. En tant que Puissance administrant des territoires non autonomes, le Royaume-Uni doute que ces Puissances soient traitées avec équité en ce qui concerne certaines questions intéressant non seulement ces Puissances elles-mêmes, non seulement les populations qu'elles administrent, mais aussi — et cela devient de plus en plus clair — tous les pays jaloux du prestige et de l'autorité de l'Organisation des Nations Unies. Il est évident que certaines déclarations que l'on fait de temps à autre ne tendent nullement à aider les Puissances administrantes à s'acquitter des obligations qu'elles ont assumées envers les populations intéressées, envers elles-mêmes et envers l'Organisation des Nations Unies.

203. Le Royaume-Uni, qui a acquis une expérience unique en créant les organes nécessaires à l'établissement de gouvernements autonomes, n'a pas l'intention de revenir en arrière et d'imposer aux populations des territoires intéressés une politique que ces populations elles-mêmes n'ont pas aidé à formuler et que le Royaume-Uni trouve mal avisée et souvent même trahissant l'incompétence.

204. Sur les dix projets de résolution soumis par la Quatrième Commission, quatre, à savoir les résolutions VI, VII, VIII et X, traitent de l'avenir du Comité spécial et des nouvelles fonctions à lui assigner. En acceptant en 1946, en 1947 et enfin en 1948 la reconduction de ce Comité pour un an seulement, le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni a précisé que, à son avis, les seules fonctions que ce Comité pût utilement exercer, les seules fonctions dont il pût s'acquitter sans entrer en conflit avec le Chapitre XI de la Charte, étaient des fonctions de procédure. Le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni a estimé que le Comité avait, et devait avoir, pour mission de perfectionner la technique de la transmission, en vue d'assurer que "des renseignements statistiques et autres de nature technique relatifs aux conditions économiques, sociales et de l'instruction" dans les territoires non autonomes soient communiqués aux institutions spécialisées, où ils seront examinés par des experts, dans une atmosphère non politique, et où ces experts disposeront d'informations sur les problèmes analogues qui se posent aux Etats Membres. Il n'y a aucune raison de monter en épingle la situation dans les territoires non autonomes. On ne saurait, en effet, considérer les problèmes qui se posent dans ces territoires comme des problèmes isolés. Ils s'intègrent à l'ensemble des problèmes existant dans tous les pays relativement peu développés, quelle que soit la manière dont les juristes définissent le statut politique de ces pays. Il faut que les institutions spécialisées examinent ces problèmes sur le plan mondial, voire sur le plan régional, et qu'elles exposent les résultats de leurs études dans les rapports annuels qu'elles adressent à l'Assemblée générale. Pour ces raisons, M. McNeil ne voit ni la nécessité ni l'opportunité d'établir, pour trois ans, un comité dont les fonctions dépasseraient largement les attributions du Comité de 1949. En conséquence, la délégation du Royaume-Uni votera contre les projets de résolution VI, VII et VIII et elle s'abstiendra de voter sur le projet de résolution X.

205. La délégation du Royaume-Uni se voit également dans l'obligation de voter contre les projets de résolution II et III. Même si l'on fait abstraction de certaines objections d'ordre technique que les membres de la Quatrième Commission connaissent déjà bien, ces deux résolutions invitent les Puissances administrantes à prendre certaines mesures bien définies à l'égard des territoires non autonomes dont elles ont la responsabilité; elles impliquent donc l'existence d'une responsabilité envers la communauté des nations en ce qui concerne l'administration des territoires non autonomes, responsabilité qui n'est prévue ni par le Chapitre XI ni par aucun autre Chapitre de la Charte. Pour toutes ces raisons, la délégation du Royaume-Uni votera contre ces deux projets de résolution, bien que les mesures prises par le Gouvernement britannique soient, en fait, conformes à ces résolutions.

206. Les projets de résolution IV, V et IX traitent essentiellement du rôle que devront jouer les institutions spécialisées et le Secrétaire général lors de l'examen des questions prévues à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte. M. McNeil estime que ces résolutions sont inutiles parce que, dans bien des cas, les mesures qu'elles prévoient sont déjà appliquées et que, dans d'autres cas, ces résolutions n'engendreront que des mesures faisant double emploi et un foisonnement inutile de fonctions et de documents. A la Quatrième Commission, la délégation du Royaume-Uni a déjà formulé des observations détaillées à propos de ces projets de résolution: M. McNeil ne les répètera pas. Il tient à souligner simplement que sa délégation s'abstiendra de voter sur le projet de résolution IV, mais votera contre les projets de résolution V et IX.

207. En ce qui concerne le projet de résolution I, qui invite les Autorités administrantes à transmettre certains renseignements complémentaires sur les territoires non autonomes dont elles assument la responsabilité — renseignements qu'elles ne sont nullement tenues de transmettre aux termes de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte — le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni s'est déjà, à plusieurs occasions, prononcé si clairement sur la question qu'il n'est guère besoin pour M. McNeil de répéter ces arguments. Toutefois, puisque son gouvernement n'est pas tenu de transmettre ces renseignements et puisqu'il n'a pas l'intention de le faire, la délégation du Royaume-Uni votera contre ce projet de résolution, comme elle a déjà voté contre les résolutions analogues dans le passé.

208. Bref, pour les raisons qui ont déjà été exposées en séance plénière aussi bien qu'à la Quatrième Commission, la délégation du Royaume-Uni votera contre tous les projets de résolution, à l'exception des projets de résolution IV et X, sur lesquels elle s'abstiendra de voter. En procédant de la sorte, la délégation du Royaume-Uni réserve entièrement la position de son gouvernement à l'égard de toutes questions pouvant résulter de ces résolutions, au cas où celles-ci seront adoptées par l'Assemblée générale.

209. M. McNeil regrette d'avoir eu à faire une déclaration de ce genre. Mais il a été obligé de la faire, parce que sa délégation doit être aussi jalouse du caractère et du prestige de l'Organisation des Nations Unies qu'elle est jalouse de ses propres responsabilités. Il est heureux de constater que les représentants distingués de plusieurs délégations, conscientes de leurs responsabilités et modestes, ont adopté la même attitude.

La séance est levée à 18 h. 30.

DEUX CENT SOIXANTE-TROISIEME SEANCE PLENIERE

Tenue à Flushing Meadow, New-York, le vendredi 2 décembre 1949, à 10 h. 45.

Président: le général Carlos P. RÓMULO (Philippines).

Renseignements provenant des territoires non autonomes: rapport de la Quatrième Commission (A/1159); rapport de la Cinquième Commission (A/1166) (fin).

1. M. GARREAU (France) rappelle que la délégation française s'est abstenue à la Quatrième Commission sur quatre des résolutions proposées et a voté contre les six autres¹. Elle a, de plus, formulé les réserves les plus expresses quant aux conséquences pouvant résulter de l'adoption des six projets de résolution en question. Ces réserves, elle tient à les renouveler d'une façon explicite devant l'Assemblée générale.

¹ Pour la discussion de ce sujet à la Quatrième Commission, voir les Documents officiels de la quatrième session de l'Assemblée générale, Quatrième Commission, 108ème à 110ème, 113ème à 127ème et 142ème séances.

2. M. Garreau ne reprendra pas la discussion qui a eu lieu à la Quatrième Commission. Tous connaissent l'objection fondamentale que fait la délégation française à cette partie des travaux de la Commission. Il s'agit de l'institution, pour trois ans, du Comité spécial et des pouvoirs exorbitants — le représentant de la France a même dit, et il le répète, des pouvoirs inconstitutionnels — dont on prétend doter ce Comité.

3. La délégation française affirme — et elle s'appuie pour ce faire sur le texte même de la Charte et sur les délibérations de San-Francisco — qu'une innovation telle que la création d'un Comité spécial qui tendrait à devenir permanent et qu'on investissait de véritables pouvoirs de contrôle sur des territoires relevant de la souveraineté française, contredit la volonté des signataires de la Charte et qu'elle ne pourrait, en conséquence, être établie que selon la procédure d'amendement de la Charte.

4. La Charte est un contrat. Ce contrat ne peut, par définition, que contenir la volonté commune de toutes les parties contractantes. Qui peut prétendre que le Chapitre XI exprime la volonté commune des signataires de la Charte — M. Garreau insiste sur le mot "commune" — de placer sous contrôle international les territoires non autonomes?

5. Une telle assertion est évidemment insoutenable et c'est pourquoi, quelque torture que l'on cherche aujourd'hui à infliger aux textes, la France s'en tient aux termes du contrat et dénie à l'Assemblée le droit de les modifier par une simple résolution votée à la majorité. Mais elle tient, d'autre part, à mettre en évidence le respect qu'elle observe, et qu'elle n'a jamais cessé d'observer, des obligations véritablement contenues dans le Chapitre XI.

6. Ces obligations sont de deux sortes: l'une est de forme et lie la France vis-à-vis de l'Organisation des Nations Unies; l'autre est de fond et la lie vis-à-vis des populations des territoires non autonomes.

7. Vis-à-vis de l'Organisation des Nations Unies, la France est tenue de fournir sur les territoires des renseignements non politiques. Elle l'a fait avec sérieux et ponctualité et son esprit de coopération avec l'Organisation internationale ne s'est jamais démenti, dans ce domaine ou dans aucun autre, depuis trois ans.

8. Vis-à-vis des populations, l'obligation que la Charte qualifie à juste titre de sacrée est une obligation qui engage la France tout entière. Elle doit mener ces populations au progrès et tout spécialement au progrès politique. Bien que n'ayant pas de comptes à rendre à l'Assemblée sur ce point, la délégation de la France n'est-elle pas autorisée à dire que la politique française s'inspire fidèlement des principes contenus dans le Chapitre XI de la Charte, s'il n'est pas arrivé qu'elle les ait même devancés?

9. Ainsi, la question est claire: de la part de la France, il y a eu, il y a, il y aura toujours, respect de la Charte, ce qui signifie volonté constante de progrès dans l'Union française et de coopération avec l'Organisation internationale, dans les termes du contrat de San-Francisco. Si ces termes étaient dépassés — et la France estime aujourd'hui qu'ils le sont — la France observerait le même respect vis-à-vis de l'Organisation des Nations Unies, sans pourtant se considérer comme obligée de la suivre sur un terrain qui n'est pas le sien.

10. Tels sont les motifs pour lesquels la délégation française doit renouveler ses plus expresses réserves sur tous ceux des projets de résolution présentement soumis au vote (A/1159) qui tendent à instituer un contrôle international sur les territoires de l'Union française.

11. M. Garreau ne fera de remarques particulières que sur le projet de résolution VIII qui charge le Comité spécial d'étudier les facteurs dont il convient de tenir compte pour décider si tel ou tel territoire est ou n'est pas non autonome.

12. La délégation française s'oppose résolument à ce projet de résolution, non seulement parce qu'il mentionne un Comité spécial que la délégation française estime inconstitutionnel, mais aussi parce que les pouvoirs supplémentaires dont le Comité spécial se trouverait investi sont évidemment d'ordre politique. La violation de l'Article 73 de la Charte est ici si flagrante qu'il est difficile de la considérer comme involontaire. A partir de renseignements d'ordre économique, social et culturel, c'est un véritable comité de contrôle des lois et des constitutions internes que l'on prétend mettre sur pied. Le Comité pourrait dire si telle disposition de la Constitution française concernant les Etats ou territoires de l'Union française lui convient ou ne lui convient pas.

13. On voit bien qu'il ne s'agit plus de la Charte; il s'agit d'un droit nouveau, étranger à la Charte, contraire à la Charte. Ce droit, la délégation de la France ne saurait le reconnaître, non seulement parce qu'elle tient au respect des contrats internationaux, mais aussi parce qu'elle répond ici de 100 millions de citoyens de l'Union française, dont les institutions politiques, générales ou particulières, sont le bien propre et relèvent de leur compétence souveraine.

14. M. Shiva RAO (Inde) avait l'intention de se borner à commenter très brièvement quelques-unes des dix résolutions soumises à l'Assemblée générale. Mais il se trouve qu'il doit prendre la parole immédiatement après certains porte-parole des Puissances administrantes qui ont critiqué de façon sévère, et même exagérée, non seulement les résolutions, mais aussi la Quatrième Commission elle-même. A titre de représentant d'une délégation qui, à la Quatrième Commission, a appuyé tous les projets de résolution lorsqu'ils ont été mis aux voix, et qui se propose d'agir de même à l'Assemblée générale, M. Rao estime de son devoir de relever certaines des critiques exprimées.

15. En ce qui concerne les projets de résolution eux-mêmes, ils semblent avoir un objectif principal. Ils cherchent à améliorer la qualité des renseignements transmis par les Puissances administrantes en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte et à en étendre la portée. Ces résolutions permettraient de rendre efficace et de coordonner la collaboration avec les institutions spécialisées dont il est question à l'alinéa d de cet Article. Les projets de résolution soulignent la nécessité urgente d'accélérer les progrès de l'instruction dans les territoires non autonomes, sans pour cela ralentir les efforts entrepris dans les domaines de l'activité sociale et économique. Enfin, ils s'efforcent de créer, sous les auspices de l'Organisation des Nations Unies, un mécanisme qui permettrait de donner à l'Article 73 tout entier plus de réalité et d'importance pour les millions d'individus qui vivent dans les territoires non autonomes.

16. L'Article 73 contient certains principes généraux que les Puissances administrantes ont nettement acceptés. Ces principes sont, il est vrai, présentés sous forme de déclaration, mais cette déclaration fait partie intégrante de la Charte que tous les Membres de l'Organisation des Nations Unies se sont engagés à respecter. Ces principes sont, tout d'abord, la primauté des intérêts des habitants des territoires non autonomes et l'obligation de favoriser dans toute la mesure du possible leur prospérité; en second lieu, le devoir d'assurer leur progrès politique, économique et social, ainsi que le développement de leur instruction, de les traiter avec équité et de les protéger contre les abus; en troisième lieu, le développement de leur capacité à s'administrer eux-mêmes et de leurs libres institutions politiques; enfin, l'obligation de favoriser des mesures constructives de développement, d'encourager des travaux de recherche et de coopérer avec les institutions spécialisées en vue d'atteindre effectivement les buts sociaux, économiques et scientifiques énoncés à l'Article 73.

17. Le champ d'application de ces principes est très vaste. Mais il y a encore un autre principe: les Puissances administrantes doivent communiquer régulièrement des renseignements relatifs à tous les territoires dont elles sont responsables, à la seule exception des territoires auxquels s'appliquent les Chapitres XII et XIII, relatifs à la Tutelle. Les exigences de la sécurité et certaines considérations d'ordre constitutionnel peuvent entraîner une limitation des renseignements transmis, mais, même dans ce cas, il ne s'agit que d'une limitation et non d'une suppression des renseignements.

18. Le projet de résolution VIII, qui traite de la possibilité de ne plus appliquer l'Article 73 à un territoire qui figurait primitivement dans l'énumération des territoires non autonomes fournie par une Puissance administrante, s'est révélé sujet à controverse; cette observation s'applique particulièrement au paragraphe qui affirme que l'Assemblée générale a compétence pour exprimer un avis sur les principes qui ont guidé, ou qui peuvent à l'avenir guider, les Etats Membres intéressés dans l'énumération des territoires pour lesquels ils sont tenus de transmettre des renseignements. Le nombre des territoires non autonomes est passé en trois ans de soixante-quatorze à soixante-deux, du fait que douze territoires ont cessé d'avoir le statut de territoire non autonome, au sens de l'Article 73. Ce fait, du point de vue de l'Assemblée, n'est pas d'un intérêt négligeable. Comme la délégation de l'Inde l'a déjà souligné à la Quatrième Commission, il ne s'agit pas d'un problème simple et facile à résoudre. Le projet de résolution considéré invite le Comité spécial, dont la création fait l'objet d'une résolution distincte, à étudier les facteurs dont il convient de tenir compte pour arriver à une décision sur ce point. Il ne doit s'agir que d'une simple étude des facteurs, rien de plus; la délégation de l'Inde estime donc qu'une telle entreprise est légitime et mérite d'être tentée, si l'on considère les conséquences incalculables qu'entraînerait l'adoption par les Puissances chargées d'administration de décisions unilatérales. La délégation de l'Inde votera donc en faveur du projet de résolution VIII.

19. Un certain nombre de projets de résolution examinent divers aspects de l'instruction et du développement, dans les territoires non autonomes, d'établissements de formation professionnelle dans les domaines économique et social. Ces projets envisagent de supprimer l'analphabétisme et d'encourager l'usage des langues autochtones. Ils insistent également de façon particulière sur l'étude des problèmes de l'instruction dans les territoires non autonomes. La délégation de l'Inde reconnaît volontiers qu'il est d'un intérêt vital d'encourager par tous les moyens possibles le progrès de l'instruction des populations autochtones des territoires non autonomes; elle appuie donc tous les projets de résolution présentés. Cependant, le représentant de l'Inde tient à répéter un avertissement que sa délégation a donné à la Quatrième Commission: il ne faut pas inviter l'UNESCO à entreprendre, dans les territoires non autonomes, un programme d'action trop ambitieux qu'il lui sera peut-être impossible d'exécuter immédiatement. D'autre part, ainsi qu'il ressort du projet de résolution V sur la collaboration internationale en matière économique, sociale et culturelle, il existe, dans d'autres domaines que celui de l'instruction, un grand nombre de problèmes d'une importance et d'une urgence égales, comme l'érosion du sol, la nutrition, la question de la main-d'œuvre migrante en Afrique, la criminalité juvénile, le développement des services d'assistance sociale, l'habitat dans les régions tropicales, la formation de personnel médical, etc. A la Quatrième Commission, certaines délégations ont été d'avis que les travaux du Comité spécial auraient une efficacité plus grande si ce Comité s'attachait chaque année à l'étude d'une question essentielle, l'instruction devant faire l'objet de la première étude. La délégation de l'Inde partage cet avis et estime qu'il y a là, en tout cas, une expérience qui vaut la peine d'être tentée.

20. La délégation de l'Inde ne peut admettre, comme on l'a affirmé, qu'une étude et une enquête détaillées des divers problèmes mentionnés, faites par les institutions spécialisées, lésaient d'une façon ou d'une autre les droits souverains des Puissances administrantes. Le projet de résolution n'envisage nullement, comme on l'a dit, que les institutions spécialisées procèdent à des études et à des enquêtes séparées dans les territoires non autonomes et il est étonnant que cette critique lui ait été adressée.

21. Comme on l'a déjà dit, il est question, à l'alinéa d de l'Article 73, de deux types de collaboration internationale, grâce auxquels il serait possible d'atteindre effectivement les buts sociaux, économiques et scientifiques énoncés dans l'article. La première méthode de collaboration internationale est la coopération entre les Puissances administrantes elles-mêmes; la deuxième, selon les propres termes de la Charte, est la coopération des Puissances administrantes "quand les circonstances s'y prêteront, avec les organismes internationaux spécialisés". En d'autres termes, c'est aux Puissances administrantes elles-mêmes qu'il appartient, à tout moment, de prendre l'initiative de rechercher l'assistance et la coopération des institutions spécialisées. L'Assemblée générale s'efforce simplement de présenter un certain nombre de suggestions de nature à permettre à cette deuxième méthode de collaboration de devenir de plus en plus fructueuse et efficace. Le projet de résolution mentionne certains problèmes, qui ne présentent peut-être pas tous la même importance et la même urgence dans tous les territoires non autonomes. Il n'y a là aucune ingérence dans les droits souverains des Puissances administrantes. L'Assemblée générale, organe suprême de l'Organisation des Nations Unies, s'est efforcée, chaque année, de rechercher de nouveaux moyens susceptibles de faire de l'Article 73 une réalité pour les populations des territoires non autonomes. Cette année, pour la première fois, l'Assemblée générale a attiré l'attention sur l'Article 55, relatif à la coopération économique et sociale entre les nations; cet article met particulièrement l'accent sur le respect universel et effectif des droits de l'homme et des libertés fondamentales pour tous, sans distinction.

22. Ainsi que la délégation de l'Inde l'a fait remarquer, tant au Comité spécial qu'à la Quatrième Commission, les membres de l'Assemblée générale ont le devoir d'insister sur la nécessité de développer la collaboration internationale par l'intermédiaire des institutions spécialisées, maintenant qu'il apparaît de façon de plus en plus évidente que les Puissances administrantes sont en train d'établir un système de coopération mutuelle en dehors des Nations Unies. L'Assemblée générale a le droit de dire que les principes de l'Article 73 doivent avoir la primauté sur toute autre forme de coopération internationale dans les territoires non autonomes.

23. Pour terminer, le représentant de l'Inde parle de la constitution du Comité spécial. Certaines délégations, y compris celle de l'Inde, ont exprimé l'avis que ce Comité devrait devenir un organe permanent — en fait, un organe subsidiaire des Nations Unies. Cependant, par esprit de compromis, elles n'ont pas insisté et ont accepté la proposition des Etats-Unis qui prévoit un mandat de trois ans pour le Comité, laissant à l'Assemblée générale le soin de décider, au cours de sa session de 1952, s'il convient d'en prolonger l'existence et lui laissant également le soin d'en fixer la composition et d'en définir le mandat. La délégation de l'Inde ne pense pas que l'on puisse, en toute honnêteté, voir dans cette proposition une tentative déguisée faite dans le but de modifier la Charte. Les principales résolutions adoptées par l'Assemblée générale, en la matière, au cours des années précédentes, ont amélioré progressivement la technique de l'étude et de l'utilisation des renseignements communiqués par les Puissances administrantes. En outre, l'Assemblée générale a élaboré un système qu'elle s'est efforcée de développer régulièrement en tenant compte de l'expérience. Elle a institué un Comité spécial qui a démontré son utilité dans la pratique au cours des deux dernières années. C'est pourquoi la Quatrième Commission présente maintenant un certain nombre de projets de résolution de la plus haute importance pour les populations des territoires non autonomes. Etant donné que le schéma est en voie de révision, et que les institutions spécialisées doivent présenter des rapports annuels sur les résultats obtenus ou sur les expériences tentées dans les différents territoires non autonomes, le Comité spécial aura de plus en plus de travail. En 1952, l'Assemblée générale sera à même de décider s'il convient de maintenir ce Comité, et dans quelles conditions.

24. La délégation de l'Inde ne voit là aucune attaque ouverte ou cachée contre la Charte. Les membres de la Quatrième Commission ont constaté avec satisfaction que deux Puissances administrantes au moins — les Etats-Unis et le Danemark — n'ont pas semblé partager les craintes et les inquiétudes des autres Puissances administrantes et ont adopté une attitude positive à l'égard de la plupart des projets de résolution.

25. Le représentant de l'Inde estime qu'il conviendrait de rendre plus vivantes les dispositions de la Charte, afin de permettre à l'Assemblée générale de mieux remplir sa tâche. Il conviendrait également de s'efforcer constamment de rendre plus libérale l'application de la Charte, afin de permettre aux nombreux peuples qui échappent au contrôle direct de l'Organisation des Nations Unies d'arriver à l'indépendance le plus rapidement possible et d'être en mesure de devenir eux-mêmes membres de l'Organisation. Il s'agit là de fonctions légitimes de l'Assemblée générale, auxquelles elle ne saurait renoncer.

26. Revenir sur tout ce qui a déjà été accompli par l'Assemblée générale, comme certaines Puissances administrantes semblent le proposer, aurait les répercussions les plus graves dans les territoires non autonomes. Pour les populations de ces territoires, le Chapitre XI, d'après l'interprétation qu'en a donnée l'Assemblée générale dans les résolutions qu'elle a adoptées au cours des sessions précédentes, est un symbole d'espoir pour l'avenir. L'Assemblée générale doit continuer dans cette voie, avec, si possible, l'appui des Puissances administrantes, si elle veut avoir la confiance des populations qui "ne sont pas directement représentées ici", selon les termes mêmes de la première résolution¹ qu'elle a adoptée, à propos de ce problème essentiel lors de sa première session.

27. M. NORIEGA (Mexique) estime que les travaux de la Quatrième Commission ont été caractérisés, à la présente session, par l'aggravation des divergences de vues entre certaines Puissances administrant des territoires non autonomes et la majorité. Les Puissances administrantes en question ont soutenu la thèse de la souveraineté et ont qualifié d'intervention toute critique ou observation dont elles ont fait l'objet.

28. La majorité de la Commission estime que le développement des peuples qui ne sont pas encore parvenus à l'autonomie doit faire l'objet des préoccupations et engager la responsabilité de toutes les nations.

29. Il est vrai que les Puissances administrantes en question n'ont jamais contesté ce principe, mais elles affirment être seules responsables de son application. Elles qualifient de sentimental et d'ignorant quiconque désire leur donner, de bonne foi, une indication, mais ce sont elles qui pèchent par l'émotivité avec laquelle elles affirment leur autorité et par leur ignorance des éléments sur lesquels se fonde l'opinion de la majorité.

30. La communauté internationale exerce son action dans les territoires coloniaux depuis une centaine d'années, depuis le début de la décadence de l'Empire ottoman, et le partage de l'Afrique a fait l'objet d'une série d'accords internationaux, dont le plus important a été le traité de 1912 relatif au Bassin du Congo. On n'a pas oublié non plus que, par le Traité de Berlin de 1885, les Puissances coloniales ont reconnu qu'elles avaient le devoir sacré de se conformer à certaines obligations humanitaires. Ces principes ont été réaffirmés, en 1919, dans le Traité de Saint-Germain-en-Laye.

31. M. Noriega n'entend pas refaire l'historique des événements contemporains. Nul n'ignore, en effet, que le régime des mandats, de même que le Régime de tutelle, reposent sur l'action collective et la responsabilité internationale.

32. Toutefois, ce n'est pas de la tutelle qu'il s'agit, mais des questions qui font l'objet du Chapitre XI de la Charte. L'Assemblée a approuvé, moins de vingt-quatre heures plus tôt, un document présenté par la délégation des Etats-Unis et la délégation du Royaume-Uni, intitulé: "Eléments essentiels de la paix"¹. Le temps ne permet pas de revenir sur les quatre points de ce document qui peuvent s'appliquer à la politique coloniale ni de dissenter sur les rapports de cette politique avec l'Organisation des Nations Unies; d'ailleurs, les représentants ont certainement étudié le document en question.

33. Les diverses interventions qui ont eu lieu au cours des débats sur cette question ont mis en évidence une crise très délicate, en ce qui concerne le Régime de tutelle et l'application des dispositions du Chapitre XI de la Charte.

34. La délégation mexicaine a pris part avec la plus entière bonne foi aux débats de la Quatrième Commission; elle ne croit pas que les résolutions adoptées par cette Commission contiennent rien qui soit contraire aux dispositions de la Charte, qui constitue une intervention dans les affaires intérieures des Etats ou qui porte atteinte à la souveraineté des Puissances administrantes.

35. M. Noriega dit que, si l'on met en doute l'esprit du Chapitre XI de la Charte, la lettre de ce chapitre constitue une déclaration qui impose aux Puissances administrantes des obligations nettes et positives envers l'Organisation. Au cas où il subsisterait quelque doute sur les attributions ou les pouvoirs de l'Assemblée générale, et notamment de la Quatrième Commission, le représentant du Mexique attire l'attention de l'Assemblée sur la fin de l'Article 74, qui termine le Chapitre XI de la Charte.

36. M. Noriega se demande quel serait le rôle de la Quatrième Commission dans l'examen des renseignements transmis si elle ne devait pas s'assurer que la politique poursuivie par les Puissances coloniales est conforme à l'Article 74 de la Charte.

37. Il espère que les doutes et les objections exprimés par certaines Puissances administrantes à l'égard des travaux de la Quatrième Commission n'empêcheront pas cette dernière de fonctionner normalement à la prochaine session de l'Assemblée générale.

38. Peut-être le mieux serait-il que les Puissances en question consultassent la Cour internationale de Justice pour lui demander de décider si la Quatrième Commission et l'Assemblée générale travaillent conformément à la Charte. Sinon, on ne sortira pas des discussions stériles, qui se sont pas de nature à améliorer le sort des populations auxquelles l'Organisation des Nations Unies porte un si grand intérêt.

39. M. FAHY (Etats-Unis d'Amérique) rappelle que, à la Quatrième Commission, la délégation des Etats-Unis a voté pour chacun des projets de résolution présentés à l'Assemblée générale, sauf les projets de résolution I et VIII. Elle a voté contre le premier et s'est abstenue dans le vote sur le second. M. Fahy tient à expliquer cette abstention.

40. Certains éléments entrant en jeu dans le projet de résolution VIII ont conduit la délégation des Etats-Unis d'Amérique à penser qu'il eût mieux valu que l'Assemblée n'eût pas à se prononcer sur ce projet pour le moment. M. Fahy se demande qui doit décider à quels territoires non autonomes s'applique le Chapitre XI, quel est ou quel devrait être le rôle du Comité spécial en la matière, à supposer qu'il en eût un, et quels sont les territoires non autonomes visés par la Charte. Il y a encore une autre considération. Le Comité spécial n'a pas le droit de demander des renseignements d'ordre politique. Or, comme des considérations politiques entrent en jeu, les Etats-Unis d'Amérique auraient préféré étudier d'avantage la question avant de prendre définitivement position à l'égard du projet de résolution VIII. La délégation des Etats-Unis d'Amérique réservera sa position en s'abstenant dans le vote sur ce projet de résolution.

41. A tous autres égards, la délégation des Etats-Unis d'Amérique maintiendra la position qu'elle a adoptée à la Quatrième Commission.

42. M. FLETCHER-COOKE (Royaume-Uni de Grande-Bretagne et d'Irlande du Nord) fait remarquer que le représentant de l'Egypte a déclaré à la 262ème séance de l'Assemblée générale, que rien, dans les comptes rendus des séances de la conférence de San-Francisco et en particulier dans ceux des séances du Sous-Comité 2 de la Commission IV, ne vient à l'appui de l'affirmation du représentant du Royaume-Uni à la Quatrième Commission, d'après laquelle les mots: "sous réserve des exigences de la sécurité et de considérations d'ordre constitutionnel", dans l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte, avaient été insérés dans cet article, avec l'assentiment de la Commission, sur la demande de Lord Cranborne, qui représentait le Royaume-Uni à cette époque.

43. Il est exact que le procès-verbal des séances ne mentionne pas les raisons pour lesquelles ces mots, proposés par Lord Cranborne et acceptés par la Commission IV, ont été insérés dans l'Article 73. Néanmoins, le fait qu'elles ne figurent pas dans les comptes rendus, qui ne mentionnaient au début que les décisions prises par les comités, ne prouve pas que ces raisons n'aient pas été exposées; les archives du Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni indiquent formellement que ces raisons ont bien été fournies à la Commission qui les a admises.

44. Le PRÉSIDENT met aux voix le projet de résolution I (A/1159).

Par 33 voix contre 9, avec 11 abstentions, la résolution est adoptée.

Par 35 voix contre 5, avec 9 abstentions, la résolution est adoptée.

51. Le PRÉSIDENT met aux voix le projet de résolution VIII (A/1159), en indiquant que le vote par appel nominal a été demandé.

Quatrième session

Point 35 de l'ordre du jour

RENSEIGNEMENTS PROVENANT DES TERRITOIRES NON AUTONOMES

Rapport de la Quatrième Commission

Rapporteur : M. E. DE MARCHENA (République Dominicaine)

1. Ce point de l'ordre du jour, qui comporte l'examen du rapport du Secrétaire général (Résumés et analyses des renseignements transmis en vertu de l'Article 73 e. de la Charte) et du rapport du Comité spécial chargé de l'examen des renseignements transmis en vertu de l'Article 73 e. de la Charte (A/923), a été renvoyé à la Quatrième Commission par l'Assemblée générale, lors de sa 224^{ème} séance, tenue le 22 septembre 1949.

2. La discussion générale a commencé au cours de la 109^{ème} séance de la Quatrième Commission, après une déclaration préliminaire du Rapporteur du Comité spécial; elle s'est poursuivie jusqu'à la 117^{ème} séance.

3. De sa 117^{ème} séance à sa 122^{ème} séance inclusivement, la Commission a examiné les six résolutions dont le Comité spécial avait recommandé l'adoption (A/923, Annexe II).

4. Cinq projets de résolution supplémentaires et un certain nombre d'amendements ont été présentés; la Commission les a examinés de sa 123^{ème} à sa 127^{ème} séance inclusivement. Ces projets de résolution comprenaient :

- I. Un projet de résolution de l'Egypte autorisant tout comité spécial que l'Assemblée pourrait instituer à étudier les facteurs dont il convient de tenir compte pour décider quels sont les territoires qui relèvent du Chapitre XI de la Charte.
- II. Un projet de résolution proposé par l'Inde pour remplacer le texte du Comité spécial et prévoyant la création d'un comité spécial qui serait constitué par l'Assemblée générale.
- III. Un projet de résolution commun présenté par Cuba, l'Equateur et le Guatemala, invitant le Secrétaire général à compléter les résumés et analyses en publiant régulièrement des données relatives à certains aspects particuliers des progrès réalisés dans les territoires non autonomes.
- IV. Un projet de résolution commun présenté par le Mexique et les Etats-Unis d'Amérique, aux termes duquel le Comité spécial concentrerait son attention sur l'étude d'une seule question chaque année, et invitant ce comité à s'attacher, en 1950, à la question de l'instruction.

- V. Un projet de résolution présenté par l'Australie, priant le Secrétaire général de tenir le Comité spécial au courant de la nature de l'assistance technique que les Territoires autonomes reçoivent de temps à autre des organismes internationaux.

PROJET DE RESOLUTION RELATIF AUX TERRITOIRES AUXQUELS S'APPLIQUE
LE CHAPITRE XI DE LA CHARTE

63. Le représentant de l'Egypte a proposé le projet de résolution suivant relatif aux territoires auxquels s'applique le Chapitre XI de la Charte :

"L'Assemblée générale,

"Considérant l'obligation qu'ont acceptée les Etats Membres des Nations Unies qui ont ou qui assument la responsabilité d'administrer des territoires dont les populations ne s'administrent pas encore

complètement elles-mêmes, de communiquer les renseignements visés à l'Article 73 e de la Charte,

Considérant la résolution 66 (I) adoptée par l'Assemblée générale le 14 décembre 1946 et où sont énumérés soixante-quatorze territoires qui, d'après les déclarations des gouvernements responsables, relevaient de l'Article 73 e.,

Ayant pris acte des renseignements fournis par certains Membres des Nations Unies au sujet des modifications d'ordre constitutionnel qui ont motivé la cessation de la transmission des renseignements visés à l'Article 73 e, en ce qui concerne certains des territoires qui sont énumérés dans la résolution 66 (I),

Estime qu'il appartient à l'Assemblée générale d'exprimer son avis sur les principes qui ont guidé ou qui peuvent à l'avenir guider les Etats Membres intéressés dans l'énumération des territoires pour lesquels ils sont tenus de transmettre les renseignements visés à l'Article 73 e de la Charte,

Invite tout comité spécial que l'Assemblée générale pourra instituer pour examiner les renseignements transmis en vertu de l'Article 73 e de la Charte, à étudier les facteurs dont il convient de tenir compte pour décider si tel ou tel territoire est ou n'est pas un territoire dont les populations ne s'administrent pas encore complètement elles-mêmes."

64. Le représentant de l'Egypte a accepté la proposition du représentant de la Thaïlande tendant à remplacer le membre de phrase "il appartient à l'Assemblée générale" figurant au quatrième paragraphe par "l'Assemblée générale a compétence pour".

65. S'efforçant de concilier les deux points de vue exposés au cours de la discussion, le représentant de l'Uruguay a proposé un amendement suivant lequel l'Assemblée générale ferait connaître son opinion sur la signification du terme "Territoires non autonomes" et que le Comité spécial examinerait chaque année la liste des territoires à propos desquels le Secrétaire général aurait reçu les renseignements visés à l'Article 73 e. Toutefois le Comité a rejeté l'amendement.

66. Le Comité a adopté alors le projet de résolution proposé par l'Egypte; le vote par appel nominal a donné les résultats suivants : 30 voix pour, 10 contre et 7 abstentions.

Ont voté pour : Afghanistan, Arabie saoudite, Birmanie, Brésil, Chine, Colombie, Cuba, Equateur, Egypte, Ethiopie, Guatemala, Inde, Irak, Iran, Israël, Liban, Libéria, Mexique, Pakistan, Philippines, Pologne, République socialiste soviétique de Biélorussie, République socialiste soviétique d'Ukraine, Syrie, Thaïlande, Tchécoslovaquie, Union des Républiques socialistes soviétiques, Venezuela, Yémen, Yougoslavie.

Ont voté contre: Australie, Belgique, Canada, Cuba, France, Norvège, Nouvelle-Zélande, Royaume-Uni, Suède, Union Sud-Africaine.

Se sont abstenus: Argentine, Chili, Danemark, Etats-Unis d'Amérique, République Dominicaine, Grèce, Uruguay.

~~XXXXXXXXXXXX~~

77. La Quatrième Commission recommande donc à l'Assemblée générale d'adopter les projets de résolution ci-après :

RESOLUTION VIII

TERRITOIRES AUXQUELS S'APPLIQUE
LE CHAPITRE XI DE LA CHARTE

L'Assemblée générale,

Considérant l'obligation qu'ont acceptée les Etats Membres des Nations Unies qui ont ou qui assument la responsabilité d'administrer des territoires dont les populations ne s'administrent pas encore complètement elles-mêmes, de communiquer les renseignements visés à l'Article 73 e de la Charte,

Considérant la résolution 66 (I) adoptée par l'Assemblée générale le 14 décembre 1946 et où sont énumérés soixante-quatorze territoires qui, d'après les déclarations des Gouvernements responsables, relevaient de l'Article 73 e ,

Ayant pris acte des renseignements fournis par certains Membres des Nations Unies au sujet des modifications d'ordre constitutionnel qui ont motivé la cessation de la transmission des renseignements visés à l'Article 73 e , en ce qui concerne certains des territoires qui sont énumérés dans la résolution 66 (I),

1. Estime que l'Assemblée générale a compétence pour exprimer un avis sur les principes qui ont guidé ou qui peuvent à l'avenir guider les Etats Membres intéressés dans l'énumération des territoires pour lesquels ils sont tenus de transmettre les renseignements visés à l'Article 73 e de la Charte;

2. Invite tout comité spécial que l'Assemblée générale pourra instituer pour examiner les renseignements transmis en vertu de l'Article 73 e de la Charte, à étudier les facteurs dont il convient de tenir compte pour décider si tel ou tel territoire est ou n'est pas un territoire dont les populations ne s'administrent pas encore complètement elles-mêmes.

CENT NEUVIEME SEANCE

Tenue à Lake Success, New-York, le jeudi 27 octobre 1949, à 15 heures.

Président: M. H. LANNUNG (Danemark).

Renseignements provenant des territoires non autonomes (suite)

1. Le PRÉSIDENT ouvre la discussion générale sur la question des renseignements provenant des territoires non autonomes; il invite la Commission à examiner simultanément les résumés et analyses préparés par le Secrétariat et le rapport du Comité spécial (A/923). Les six projets de résolution qui figurent à la fin de ce dernier document sont également en discussion et les membres de la Commission peuvent y apporter des amendements; un premier amendement (A/C.4/L.2) a déjà été présenté par la délégation de Cuba. Les six projets de résolution seront discutés et mis aux voix séparément.
2. M. DE MARCHENA (République Dominicaine), Rapporteur du Comité spécial, présente le rapport de ce comité (A/923). Ce document a été distribué aux délégations il y a un mois déjà et contient non seulement les recommandations formulées par le Comité spécial mais aussi un aperçu général des discussions qui ont eu lieu au Comité.
3. M. de Marchena rappelle que le Comité spécial qui s'est réuni cette année est le troisième organe de cette nature, chacun ayant été créé en vertu d'une résolution de l'Assemblée générale. Le dernier en date a été constitué par elle lors de sa troisième session (résolution 219 (III)) à Paris. Il s'est réuni à Lake Success du 25 août au 12 septembre 1949 et a tenu vingt séances. La tâche du Comité a été grandement facilitée par une série de documents spécialement préparés par le Secrétariat à son intention. Il semble que la Quatrième Commission veuille appeler l'attention du Conseil de tutelle sur l'avantage qu'il y aurait à disposer de documents analogues en ce qui concerne les Territoires sous tutelle.
4. Le rapport du Comité spécial fait état des diverses opinions qui ont été exprimées au sujet des renseignements fournis, mais il mentionne également que certaines questions soulevées au cours des débats ont été considérées par le Comité lui-même comme n'étant pas de sa compétence. Ce qui importe avant tout, néanmoins, c'est d'appeler l'attention sur les six projets de résolution que le Comité a approuvés et qu'il soumet à l'Assemblée générale. Le premier projet de résolution, relatif à la transmission spontanée de renseignements figurant dans la première partie du schéma, contient une recommandation de procédure. Les quatre projets suivants appartiennent plutôt à la catégorie des suggestions de fond concernant des questions techniques en général, et ils insistent particulièrement sur les activités des institutions spécialisées et sur le rôle que ces dernières peuvent jouer, en collaboration avec les Puissances administrantes, dans le développement des territoires non autonomes. La dernière résolution concerne également une question de procédure mais elle est très importante parce qu'elle prévoit la création d'un comité spécial avec un mandat de trois ans.
5. M. de Marchena croit que la tendance générale est de considérer qu'au sujet des questions relatives aux territoires non autonomes ou aux Territoires sous tutelle, les membres des différents organes des Nations Unies sont divisés en deux groupes, à savoir les Puissances administrantes d'une part et les autres pays d'autre part. Ce fait n'est pas rigoureusement exact, ainsi que l'ont prouvé les dernières sessions du Conseil de tutelle et plus particulièrement la dernière session du Comité spécial; bien que les membres autres que les Autorités administrantes aient souvent tendance à aller plus loin que ces dernières lorsqu'il s'agit de responsabilités administratives, on peut constater que les quatre projets de résolution concernant des questions de fond ont été adoptés par une très forte majorité, ce qui montre que la plupart des membres du Comité spécial font preuve d'esprit de collaboration, conformément à la Charte, dans l'intérêt des populations des territoires non autonomes. Les projets de résolution que le Comité spécial de l'an dernier avait présentés à l'Assemblée générale ont été adoptés sans modifications de fond. Les projets de résolution que présente cette année le Comité spécial sont conçus dans le même esprit de collaboration internationale que les projets de résolution antérieurs; aussi méritent-ils d'être étudiés avec soin.
6. M. de Marchena rappelle que le Comité spécial a adopté son rapport par 13 voix contre une, avec 2 abstentions. Les travaux du Comité ont révélé un mouvement continu d'idées et représentent une phase intéressante des travaux relatifs aux territoires non autonomes.
7. M. FARRAG (Egypte) félicite le Secrétariat pour l'excellent travail qu'il a accompli et rend hommage à M. Gerig pour la manière dont il a assumé la présidence du Comité spécial. Il constate avec satisfaction que les renseignements transmis en 1948 se sont révélés plus instructifs que ceux dont on a disposé l'année précédente. Il espère que la qualité des renseignements sera encore meilleure l'an prochain; il fait observer à ce propos que certains renseignements sont parvenus après la date limite qui avait été fixée; de tels retards risquent de mettre le Comité spécial et le Secrétariat dans une situation difficile, et de les empêcher d'examiner certains points d'une manière aussi approfondie qu'ils le désireraient. Aux termes de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte, les Autorités administrantes sont tenues de transmettre des renseignements uniquement dans les domaines économique et social et dans le domaine de l'enseignement. Aussi M. Farrag note-t-il avec plaisir que certaines Autorités administrantes ont néanmoins spontanément transmis des renseignements de caractère politique. Il espère que les autres Autorités administrantes feront de même à l'avenir.
8. L'analyse des renseignements concernant le travail (A/920) révèle que la migration de la main-d'œuvre en Afrique a atteint un tel degré qu'elle menace de désorganiser la vie coutumière locale et de nuire à la perpétuation de la race. La situation en matière d'emploi telle qu'elle est reflétée dans les renseignements transmis, se caractérise par un accroissement des besoins en main-d'œuvre, dans de nombreux territoires, et par la satisfaction de cette demande, dans de vastes régions d'Afrique, par un système de migration de main-d'œuvre qui affectent profondément l'économie des régions rurales (A/920). Notamment, la migration en provenance de territoires administrés par le Royaume-Uni constitue un apport substantiel dans les mines sud-africaines (A/920). Le représentant de l'Egypte est certain que la situation préoccupe les Autorités administrantes, mais il considère qu'il faut avant tout prendre des mesures très énergiques; l'Organisation internationale du Travail a étudié la question de la main-d'œuvre migrante en 1947. Il souhaite que le Secrétariat prenne contact avec cette organisation et fasse connaître les résultats de ses travaux.

9. M. Farrag déclare qu'il votera pour les six projets de résolution contenus dans le rapport du Comité spécial. Il rappelle que ces textes ont été beaucoup étudiés et remaniés, notamment les projets de résolution B et C pour lesquels un comité de rédaction a été constitué; les projets de résolution sont le résultat heureux de l'esprit de collaboration et de conciliation dont ont fait preuve les membres du Comité. M. Farrag rappelle que, l'an dernier, certains membres de la Quatrième Commission, poussés par le seul désir de favoriser le développement des populations des territoires non autonomes d'une manière directe, ont reproché au Comité spécial de n'avoir formulé que des recommandations de procédure; cette méthode est néanmoins logique, car c'est seulement après avoir pris des dispositions sur la procédure que le Comité pourra véritablement traiter les questions de fond; on constate d'ailleurs qu'au nombre des projets de résolution présentés par le Comité spécial à l'issue de sa dernière session figurent quatre projets concernant des problèmes de fond. Le seul but est de favoriser l'amélioration des conditions qui règnent dans les territoires non autonomes et l'application sincère des recommandations du Comité aidera à atteindre les objectifs formulés dans le Chapitre XI de la Charte. M. Farrag espère que la Quatrième Commission adoptera ces projets de résolution par une forte majorité, sinon à l'unanimité, et que les représentants qui s'y sont opposés au Comité spécial sauront voter en leur faveur à l'Assemblée générale.

10. Par ailleurs, le Comité spécial a estimé qu'il n'était pas compétent pour examiner certaines questions et plus particulièrement la question de la cessation de la transmission de renseignements, qui fait l'objet de rapports du Secrétaire général (A/915 et A/915/Add.1). Ces rapports font état des raisons qu'ont invoquées le Royaume-Uni et la France pour justifier le fait qu'ils ont cessé de transmettre des renseignements sur certains territoires. Le Gouvernement français rappelle notamment, à ce propos, que la détermination des territoires non autonomes relève exclusivement de la compétence des Etats qui ont la responsabilité d'administrer lesdits territoires. Ce principe était peut-être vrai avant la mise en vigueur de la Charte des Nations Unies, mais celle-ci prévoit que les relations entre les territoires non autonomes et les métropoles qui les administrent ne concernent plus exclusivement les territoires et les pays intéressés, mais intéressent également la communauté internationale, ainsi qu'en témoigne l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte. Les Autorités administrantes elles-mêmes ont maintes fois souligné ce principe alors que l'Organisation était au début de son existence et que la Charte était nouvelle, ce qui ne les empêche pas maintenant de contester la validité de ce même principe. Quelle autorité sinon l'Organisation des Nations Unies elle-même pourrait donc veiller à ce que les Autorités administrantes respectent les dispositions du Chapitre XI de la Charte? En 1946, l'Assemblée générale a invité les Autorités administrantes à établir une liste des territoires non autonomes au sujet desquels elles devraient transmettre des renseignements. La liste qui fut constituée comptait 74 territoires; les Autorités administrantes ne sauraient donc cesser de transmettre des renseignements sur certains de ces territoires sans commettre une violation de la Charte, à moins cependant que les territoires en question n'aient acquis leur autonomie.

11. Les Autorités administrantes ont avancé certains arguments pour justifier leur action. Elles ont prétendu que les déclarations relatives aux territoires non autonomes avaient un caractère unilatéral. Faut-il entendre par là que les Autorités administrantes se réservent le droit de se dégager quand il leur plaît des obligations qu'elles ont assumées? On ne saurait admettre que les obligations stipulées au Chapitre XI soient considérées comme unilatérales; encore le seraient-elles qu'elles auraient force exécutoire, conformément au droit international. On ne peut néanmoins les interpréter comme étant unilatérales pour peu que l'on se souvienne des débats, des consultations, des compromis et des suggestions diverses dont ont fait l'objet les termes du Chapitre XI lors de son élaboration à la Conférence de San-Francisco. Le représentant du Royaume-Uni lui-même déclarait à l'époque que ce chapitre constituait une convention coloniale internationale qu'il faut accepter au nom des populations des territoires non autonomes. Les Autorités administrantes ont également prétendu que le Chapitre XI avait été accepté comme une obligation morale. Or aucune disposition de ce chapitre ne peut être interprétée dans ce sens; cet argument est invoqué dans la seule intention d'affaiblir le caractère obligatoire des dispositions du chapitre. Les Autorités administrantes déclarent aussi que le Chapitre XI a un caractère provisoire, alors qu'à San-Francisco il a été considéré comme devant rester en vigueur aussi longtemps qu'il y aurait des territoires non autonomes. M. Stassen, représentant des Etats-Unis, avait lui-même déclaré à l'époque que ce chapitre était appelé à évoluer et qu'il resterait une réalité vivante. Les Autorités administrantes prétendent par ailleurs que le Comité spécial et l'Assemblée générale ont tenté d'amender en fait les dispositions de la Charte, ce qui est inexact car le Comité spécial n'a fait que mettre à exécution une résolution de l'Assemblée générale dont le but est d'assurer l'application de la Charte. Elles ont également dit que les renseignements visés à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 ne devaient être transmis qu'à titre d'information et ne sauraient, par conséquent, être examinés ni commentés; il est évident que les auteurs de la Charte n'ont jamais envisagé que l'on interprète cette disposition dans ce sens. Le représentant de l'Australie a lui-même déclaré au moment de l'élaboration du Chapitre XI qu'une telle disposition représentait un progrès et qu'elle provoquerait une émulation salutaire entre les Autorités administrantes. II serait donc tout à fait illogique et déloyal de se contenter de recevoir ces renseignements sans les examiner. La seule restriction à l'utilisation de ces renseignements consiste à veiller à ce qu'ils ne soient pas utilisés à des fins de propagande politique.

12. En conclusion, la transmission des renseignements en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte au sujet des 74 territoires non autonomes doit être continuée jusqu'au moment où ces territoires s'administreront eux-mêmes.

13. Il est évident que le fait d'incorporer un territoire non autonome à la métropole ne peut relever le Membre de l'Organisation des Nations Unies responsable de l'administration de ce territoire de l'obligation de transmettre des renseignements en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 au sujet de ce territoire.

14. Le représentant du Royaume-Uni a déclaré qu'il lui était impossible de transmettre des renseignements sur l'île de Malte, parce que les questions économiques, sociales et de l'instruction relèvent actuellement de la compétence du gouvernement de l'île. Le représentant de l'Égypte pense que cette raison n'est pas suffisante pour justifier la cessation de la transmission de renseignements. Par ailleurs, la résolution 222 (III) de l'Assemblée générale invite les Membres responsables de l'administration de territoires non autonomes à informer l'Organisation des Nations Unies "de toute modification intervenue dans la constitution et le statut de l'un quelconque de ces territoires". Le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni ne s'est pas conformé à cette exigence.

15. Certaines délégations ont soutenu que le Chapitre XI de la Charte ne concerne que les Membres responsables de l'administration de territoires non autonomes. Cette allégation est sans fondement et le représentant de l'Égypte est persuadé que la Quatrième Commission confirmera que le Chapitre XI intéresse l'ensemble des Membres de l'Organisation des Nations Unies. Deux cent millions d'autochtones mettent leur espoir en l'Organisation et M. Farrag est certain qu'elle ne les décevra pas. Le devoir de l'Assemblée générale est de veiller à ce que les dispositions de la Charte soient appliquées aussi bien lorsqu'elles sont en faveur du plus faible que du plus fort.

16. En ce qui concerne l'établissement de comparaisons entre les renseignements transmis en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 et ceux de même nature provenant de pays indépendants que l'Assemblée générale a demandé au Secrétaire général par sa résolution 218 (III) du 3 novembre 1948, M. Farrag a quelques doutes sur les avantages que présentera le résultat de ces comparaisons pour la population des territoires non autonomes. D'ordinaire, les statistiques provenant de ces territoires sont incomplètes et inexactes, contrairement aux données établies par les pays indépendants. Il est donc impossible de procéder à des comparaisons qui aient quelque valeur.

17. Afin de pallier cette difficulté, la délégation de l'Égypte suggère que l'Assemblée générale envoie une mission chargée de visiter certains territoires non autonomes ainsi que des États indépendants de la même région pour établir des comparaisons. Il est évident qu'il faudra obtenir à l'avance le consentement des pays indépendants qui seront certainement heureux de se prêter à cette visite. Ce projet nécessitera la dépense de quelques milliers de dollars, mais il semble que cela en vaille bien la peine.

18. Le représentant de l'Égypte sera heureux d'entendre les vues des autres représentants au sujet de cette proposition.

19. M. SHIVA RAO (Inde) désire s'associer aux éloges que le représentant de l'Égypte a adressés au Secrétariat pour le travail qu'il a accompli à l'intention du Comité spécial. Abordant la question des renseignements transmis en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte, le représentant de l'Inde estime que le rapport du Comité spécial est très complet et ne demande aucun commentaire détaillé. Toutefois, il désire attirer l'attention de la Commission sur quelques points particuliers.

20. Le premier de ces points est la question de la cessation de la transmission de renseignements. Le représentant de l'Égypte a fait un excellent historique de la question. M. Shiva Rao rappelle aux membres de la Commission que l'Assemblée générale, par sa résolution 222 (III), a invité les Membres responsables de l'administration des territoires non autonomes à informer l'Organisation des Nations Unies de toute modification intervenue dans la constitution et le statut des territoires non autonomes pour lesquels il n'est plus transmis de renseignements. La délégation de l'Inde a estimé que cette question ne relevait pas de la compétence du Comité spécial, mais devait être examinée par la Quatrième Commission.

21. Une fois qu'un territoire a été inscrit sur la liste des territoires non autonomes, il garde cette qualité jusqu'au moment où il répond aux conditions requises pour devenir Membre de l'Organisation des Nations Unies.

22. Il convient de noter que le nombre des territoires inscrits sur la liste diminue d'année en année et est passé de 74 à 62. Cette question est extrêmement importante, notamment en raison du fait que les gouvernements des Puissances administrantes ont déclaré qu'il était de leur compétence exclusive de déterminer les territoires auxquels s'applique l'alinéa e de l'Article 73. Si ces gouvernements continuent à prendre des décisions unilatérales à l'égard de ces territoires, il est à craindre qu'une telle situation n'influe sur les fonctions dont l'Assemblée générale doit s'acquitter aux termes du Chapitre XI de la Charte.

23. Afin que la Quatrième Commission puisse examiner cette question à la prochaine session, M. Shiva Rao suggère que le Secrétariat prépare une étude préliminaire à l'intention du Comité spécial sur le statut constitutionnel des territoires au sujet desquels on a cessé de transmettre des renseignements.

24. Le représentant de l'Inde attire l'attention de la Commission sur la discussion qui a eu lieu au sein du Comité spécial sur la question de savoir si le Gouvernement des Pays-Bas était en droit de transmettre des renseignements sur l'Indonésie en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73. La délégation de l'Inde estime que l'Indonésie s'administre elle-même et que les renseignements communiqués par les Pays-Bas ne devraient pas être inclus dans le recueil des résumés et analyses des renseignements transmis au Secrétaire général. M. Shiva Rao saisit cette occasion pour signaler l'inquiétude que cause à sa délégation le fait que la Conférence de la table ronde à La Haye n'est encore arrivée à aucune conclusion.

25. Le représentant de l'Inde aborde la question de la transmission spontanée de certains renseignements, question qui fait l'objet du chapitre VII du rapport du Comité spécial. Il note avec satisfaction l'attitude libérale adoptée par les Etats-Unis et le Danemark à cet égard et constate qu'un nombre plus élevé de Membres responsables de l'administration de territoires non autonomes ont, en 1948, transmis de leur propre initiative des renseignements sur les points figurant dans la partie facultative du Schéma. Il y a lieu d'encourager cette tendance.

26. La délégation de l'Inde tient à appeler l'attention de la Commission sur un point qu'elle juge assez important. L'Assemblée générale a adopté, ou envisage d'adopter, plusieurs conventions internationales. La Troisième Commission a examiné la question des obligations qui incombent à cet égard aux Puissances responsables de l'administration des territoires non autonomes. Il semblerait souhaitable que l'Assemblée générale recommandât aux Membres intéressés de transmettre, suivant de nouvelles directives, des renseignements sur l'application de ces conventions internationales dans les territoires dont ils ont la charge.

27. En ce qui concerne la collaboration internationale en matière économique, sociale et culturelle dans les territoires non autonomes, M. Shiva Rao fait observer que le paragraphe d de l'Article 73 de la Charte mentionne deux formes de collaboration : celle qui doit exister entre les Membres responsables de l'administration des territoires non autonomes, en dehors de l'Organisation des Nations Unies, et la collaboration avec les institutions spécialisées de l'Organisation des Nations Unies.

28. Les Puissances administrantes ont organisé des conférences en vue d'examiner certains problèmes d'intérêt commun. Elles envisagent de développer et de donner un caractère permanent à cette forme de collaboration. Celle-ci est tout à fait conforme aux dispositions du paragraphe d de l'Article 73 de la Charte. Toutefois, il semble qu'elle ait pour but de rechercher principalement les bénéfices que pourraient en retirer les Membres intéressés eux-mêmes et, incidemment seulement, ceux que pourraient en retirer les populations des territoires non autonomes. Or le premier paragraphe de l'Article 73 reconnaît le principe de la primauté des intérêts de ces populations. Par conséquent, il est indispensable d'encourager l'autre forme de collaboration, c'est-à-dire celle avec les institutions spécialisées, afin de veiller tout particulièrement aux intérêts des populations autochtones.

29. La délégation de l'Inde considère, ainsi qu'elle l'a énoncé dans le projet de résolution qu'elle présenta au Comité spécial et reproduit au rapport, qu'il est urgent que les institutions spécialisées procèdent à ces enquêtes et fassent des recherches en vue d'assister les populations des territoires non autonomes. Les représentants des institutions spécialisées devraient aussi à l'avenir participer plus activement aux travaux du Comité spécial.

30. En ce qui concerne l'avenir du Comité spécial, M. Shiva Rao rappelle que sa délégation a demandé l'établissement d'un comité permanent, en raison des conséquences malheureuses que pourrait avoir sa dissolution pour les populations des territoires non autonomes et parce qu'elle estime que les discussions qui ont lieu au sein du Comité spécial aident les Membres responsables de l'administration de ces territoires à améliorer les conditions de vie de leurs populations. La délégation de l'Inde a constaté avec regret que ces Membres ne partageaient pas ce point de vue. Il a donc été proposé, dans le projet de résolution adopté par le Comité spécial, de constituer un comité pour une période de trois ans.

31. La délégation de l'Inde a l'intention de présenter ultérieurement des modifications à ce projet de résolution. Elle désirerait, notamment, que les membres du Comité spécial soient élus, non par la Quatrième Commission, mais par l'Assemblée générale elle-même.

32. M. MUGHIR (Syrie) fait observer que le premier problème à résoudre lorsqu'on étudie la question des territoires non autonomes est de savoir si l'Organisation des Nations Unies a compétence pour se prononcer sur le développement et le sort de ces territoires. Une interprétation superficielle du Chapitre XI de la Charte peut laisser croire que l'Organisation doit se borner à recevoir des renseignements de caractère technique sur les conditions économiques, sociales et de l'instruction dans les territoires non autonomes, et qu'elle ne peut ni solliciter ni étudier des renseignements sur les conditions politiques. Une telle interprétation ne saurait être acceptée par la communauté internationale actuelle. Le Comité spécial n'est pas une simple agence de renseignements. Le progrès et le bien-être de l'humanité, le respect des droits de l'homme et l'obtention par tous les peuples de leur souveraineté nationale et de leur indépendance sont devenus des questions qui affectent et qui intéressent l'ensemble de cette communauté.

33. Aux termes du Chapitre XI de la Charte, les Puissances qui assument la responsabilité d'administrer des territoires non autonomes ont solennellement reconnu le principe de la primauté des intérêts des habitants de ces territoires. Elles ont accepté de respecter un certain nombre de principes pour favoriser le progrès politique, économique et social, ainsi que le développement de l'instruction dans les territoires qu'elles administrent. La Charte dispose que ces Puissances doivent communiquer au Secrétaire général des renseignements de nature technique relatifs aux conditions économiques, sociales et de l'instruction dans les territoires dont elles sont respectivement responsables. Cela revient à dire que, si l'Organisation des Nations Unies estime que l'administration des territoires non autonomes est satisfaisante, elle se contente de recevoir les renseignements prévus ; mais, si ces renseignements révèlent que l'administration des territoires non autonomes n'est pas ce qu'elle devrait être, l'Organisation des Nations Unies doit exprimer son opinion et donner les conseils nécessaires.

34. Le représentant de la Syrie tient à souligner que sa délégation se rend parfaitement compte des difficultés auxquelles doivent faire face les Puissances qui administrent des territoires non autonomes ; le fait d'étudier et de critiquer les conditions qui règnent dans ces territoires ne signifie pas que l'on doute de la bonne foi des Puissances administrantes. Bien que la Syrie ait eu à souffrir de la politique et des méthodes coloniales, elle gardera une attitude objective dans l'exposé de ses observations.

35. Le représentant de la Syrie estime que les renseignements communiqués au Secrétaire général ne sont pas suffisants pour permettre une analyse circonstanciée de l'administration et du développement des territoires non autonomes. Le cas du Maroc permet d'illustrer parfaitement cette observation.

36. Les renseignements transmis par la France au sujet du Maroc (A/909/Add.1) ne fournissent aucun détail sur les modifications réalisées ou envisagées dans la vie politique de ce pays. Au contraire, les quelques renseignements communiqués révèlent que l'administration du Maroc n'a subi aucun changement depuis l'occupation du pays par les troupes françaises et la conclusion du Traité de Fès, en 1912. En fait, le Résident général a pour mission principale de veiller à l'exécution de ce Traité. Il en résulte qu'aucun effort n'a été fait pour introduire au Maroc un système parlementaire quelconque; il n'y a pas d'assemblée législative élue; les chambres consultatives n'ont, en effet, rien de commun avec un organe législatif; ces chambres consultatives ne représentent que des intérêts économiques, et non pas des intérêts politiques. Le système judiciaire marocain n'est ni libéral, ni approprié aux conditions actuelles; on peut même supposer qu'il permet toutes sortes de corruptions et d'abus.

37. Au point de vue de la liberté individuelle, les renseignements transmis indiquent que "aucune arrestation ne peut être effectuée qu'en vertu d'un mandat régulièrement délivré par l'autorité compétente". On peut se demander à ce sujet quelle est l'autorité compétente? Le Maroc n'a pas de code pénal. Des sources sûres permettent d'affirmer que l'on peut être arrêté et emprisonné pendant des mois sans jugement.

38. Les journaux de langue arabe doivent être autorisés par arrêté viziriel, alors qu'il n'y a aucun contrôle pour les journaux français. Ceci explique sans doute le très petit nombre de journaux de langue arabe, nombre qui, d'ailleurs, n'est pas indiqué dans les renseignements communiqués au Secrétaire général.

39. Les renseignements indiquent que "la création d'une association est soumise au principe du dépôt préalable des statuts comme en France". On est heureux de constater que les autorités françaises appliquent au Maroc les mêmes lois que dans la métropole; si le peuple marocain jouit des mêmes libertés et des mêmes institutions démocratiques que le peuple français, on peut être certain que le Maroc connaîtra bientôt son indépendance. Cependant, avant de pouvoir tirer une telle conclusion, on aimerait savoir si la loi de 1901 relative à la liberté d'association est appliquée dans les territoires administrés par la France.

40. M. LAPIE (France) soulève une question d'ordre. Il fait remarquer que le représentant de la Syrie a entrepris un débat d'ordre politique qui n'est pas de la compétence de la Commission.

41. M. MUGHIR (Syrie) poursuit et expose que, dans le domaine de l'enseignement, le rapport du Gouvernement français indique que 20 pour 100 des enfants marocains fréquentent les écoles. Toutefois, un document officiel, intitulé "Conjoncture économique marocaine de 1947", indique que le nombre d'enfants âgés de 5 à 14 ans s'élève à 1.865.645; les renseignements transmis en 1948 indiquent que le nombre d'enfants fréquentant les écoles s'élève à 128.107. On constate ainsi que seulement un sur quatorze et non pas un sur cinq des enfants fréquentent les écoles. Les renseignements transmis sont très incomplets sur la question de l'enseignement supérieur; ils sont muets, notamment, au sujet des deux universités musulmanes. Ces dernières ne semblent pas être en faveur auprès de la Puissance administrante et elles ne reçoivent aucune subvention gouvernementale.

42. Les autorités françaises semblent être très fières de diffuser la langue française comme langue de culture, de façon à conduire plus promptement l'élite marocaine à la connaissance du monde contemporain. La langue et la culture françaises sont aimées et admirées dans le monde entier; néanmoins, les Arabes du Moyen-Orient qui sont appelés à entrer en relations avec les Marocains ont ressenti les conséquences tragiques de cette diffusion de la langue française au Maroc; les Marocains parlent maintenant un mélange de français et d'arabe; ils ne peuvent plus comprendre les Arabes du Moyen-Orient, ni se faire comprendre d'eux. En perdant leur propre langue, les Marocains ont perdu en même temps tout attachement à leur culture et à leur histoire.

43. La situation en Tunisie n'est ni plus brillante, ni plus encourageante. Les renseignements transmis au sujet des conditions économiques, notamment, sont très peu détaillés et parfois difficiles à interpréter.

44. Au Maroc comme en Tunisie, la répartition des terres semble avoir été effectuée en dépit de toute équité et sans justification aucune.

45. Les renseignements relatifs aux conditions de la main-d'œuvre et de l'emploi sont insuffisants, pour le Maroc comme pour la Tunisie. Ces renseignements donnent l'impression qu'il n'y a pour ainsi dire pas de conflits collectifs du travail dans ces deux pays. Ils passent sous silence les fréquents conflits dans l'industrie minière, notamment dans les industries du fer et du phosphate. Ils n'expliquent pas comment ont été réglées les grèves, notamment celles des dockers, des fonctionnaires et de l'industrie du charbon, qui ont eu lieu au Maroc en 1948. De nombreux grévistes ont été emprisonnés et certains ont été abattus par la police.

46. Le représentant de la Syrie tient à faire remarquer qu'il a évoqué le cas du Maroc et de la Tunisie à titre d'exemple et qu'il ne faut pas en conclure que la situation est meilleure dans les autres territoires non autonomes. Il ajoute que ses critiques ont pour seul but d'aider et de guider les Puissances administrantes; la délégation de la Syrie ne cherche nullement à faire de la propagande politique et elle n'a aucun motif caché.

47. La délégation de la Syrie est parfaitement consciente du fait que certains territoires non autonomes ont atteint un stade très satisfaisant de développement. A ce propos, il faut féliciter le Gouvernement des Etats-Unis de la façon dont il administre les territoires dont il est responsable.

48. La délégation de la Syrie tient à manifester son inquiétude au sujet de la cessation de la transmission de renseignements. Certains territoires, bien que ne s'administrant pas eux-mêmes, n'ont pas été inclus dans la liste des territoires non autonomes. C'est le cas, par exemple, pour l'Algérie. Ce pays arabe, qui est occupé par la France depuis le milieu du XIXème siècle, n'a aucun espoir d'obtenir sa liberté et son indépendance. Bien que, sur une population totale de 7.235.684 habitants il y ait 6.247.432 Arabes, l'Algérie, dit-on, ne peut pas être classée dans la catégorie des territoires non autonomes. La raison, en vérité surprenante, est que ce pays a été annexé à la République française.

49. La délégation de la Syrie s'oppose à la conception selon laquelle les Puissances intéressées ont seules le droit de déterminer quels sont les territoires non autonomes. Elle se réserve le droit de reprendre la parole sur ce point au cours de la discussion.

50. Le PRÉSIDENT appelle l'attention des membres de la Commission sur la nécessité d'épuiser l'ordre du jour avant la fin du mois de novembre.

51. M. PEREZ CÍSNEROS (Cuba) pose une question relative à l'emploi de la langue espagnole. Le document intitulé Territoires non autonomes; Résumés et analyses des renseignements transmis au Secrétaire général au cours de l'année 1948 a été publié en anglais et en français, mais non en espagnol; ceci est contraire aux dispositions de la résolution 262 (III) de l'Assemblée générale. Dans le même ordre d'idée, la délégation de Cuba aimerait savoir quelles sont les intentions du Secrétaire général en ce qui concerne les documents annuels dont il est fait mention à l'alinéa b) du paragraphe 4 de la résolution 218 (III). D'autre part, la délégation de Cuba tient à signaler que la Commission américaine des territoires non autonomes créée par la neuvième Conférence internationale américaine tenue à Bogota, a demandé au Secrétaire général de lui communiquer les documents relatifs aux territoires non autonomes; elle a reçu des documents rédigés en anglais et en français, mais non en espagnol.

52. M. BENSON (Secrétariat) fait observer que le document mentionné par le représentant de Cuba est un résumé des renseignements transmis en 1948, c'est-à-dire avant l'adoption de la résolution 262 (III). La question de la publication de ce document en espagnol est encore à l'examen au service compétent du Secrétariat. La question n'a pas encore été tranchée non plus de savoir sous quelle forme seront présentés les documents mentionnés dans la résolution 218 (III). Toute suggestion à ce sujet sera vivement appréciée par le Secrétariat. Il est évidemment regrettable que le Secrétariat n'ait pas été en mesure d'adresser à la Commission américaine des territoires non autonomes des documents rédigés en langue espagnole; par suite de l'adoption de la résolution 262 (III), la situation sera différente à l'avenir.

La séance est levée à 17 h. 30.

CENT TREIZIEME SEANCE

Tenue à Lake Success, New-York, le mercredi 2 novembre 1949, à 11 heures.

Président: M. H. LANNUNG (Danemark).

Renseignements provenant des territoires non autonomes (suite)

1. Le PRÉSIDENT annonce que la Commission va poursuivre l'examen des renseignements provenant des territoires non autonomes.

2. M. WINIEWICZ (Pologne) fait remarquer que, lorsqu'on examine les renseignements transmis en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73, il ne faut pas s'inspirer seulement de cet article et qu'il convient de tenir compte des dispositions du Chapitre XI de la Charte dans son ensemble. Ce chapitre a pour objet de lutter contre les survivances de l'impérialisme colonial, régime qui est fondé sur ce principe que les populations des territoires coloniaux ne sont pas les égales des populations des Puissances coloniales. Les temps ont changé, la surface du globe occupée par les colonies a diminué, mais les vestiges de ce régime subsistent.

3. L'Article 73, par lequel débute le Chapitre XI, pose en principe que ce sont les intérêts des habitants des territoires non autonomes qui ont la primauté et non ceux des nations impérialistes. Aux termes de l'alinéa a de cet Article, les Etats Membres des Nations Unies qui ont assumé la responsabilité d'administrer ces territoires s'engagent à respecter la culture des populations. La tendance à remplacer cette culture par celle des Puissances coloniales se manifeste encore; c'est un obstacle au développement de l'instruction et au progrès social des populations qui ne s'administrent pas elles-mêmes et, par conséquent, à leur progrès politique. L'alinéa b de l'Article 73 vise à assurer le développement progressif de la capacité des populations de s'administrer elles-mêmes et l'alinéa c indique que ce développement doit servir les intérêts de la paix et de la sécurité internationales, qui pourraient être compromis par l'oppression de nations, notamment de celles qui sont en état de s'administrer elles-mêmes ou de mener une existence nationale indépendante. L'alinéa d du même Article insiste sur le devoir, qui incombe aux Puissances coloniales, de favoriser des mesures constructives de développement, pour servir non pas leurs intérêts égoïstes, mais les buts généraux énoncés dans l'Article.

4. Il est vrai que la Charte ne prévoit pas d'intervention directe pour assurer l'exécution de ces dispositions. Cependant, l'Organisation des Nations Unies est en mesure d'attirer l'attention de l'opinion publique sur des situations contraires aux dispositions de la Charte; l'Article 73 marque donc un progrès important en affirmant la responsabilité des Puissances coloniales envers l'ensemble des Nations Unies.

5. La délégation polonaise connaît bien les arguments qu'invoquent les Puissances coloniales lorsqu'elles cherchent à se dérober à cette responsabilité. Le New York Times a publié dernièrement un article constatant que les Puissances coloniales soutiennent que le Comité spécial chargé de l'examen des renseignements transmis en vertu de l'Article 73 e de la Charte a outrepassé les pouvoirs qu'il tenait de la Charte en faisant des remarques souvent défavorables au sujet des méthodes que ces Puissances suivent à l'égard des populations autochtones et en recommandant certaines modifications. En outre, poursuit ce journal, ces Puissances font valoir que les renseignements qu'elles fournissent sur les conditions régnant dans les territoires qu'elles administrent sont à la disposition, sous forme de publication, de quiconque désire en prendre connaissance.

6. La délégation polonaise se réserve le droit de définir plus tard son attitude à l'égard du Comité spécial. Toutefois, elle croit devoir faire remarquer que, aux termes de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte, il est évident que les Puissances coloniales sont tenues de transmettre des renseignements statistiques et autres sur les territoires qu'elles administrent; l'Assemblée générale a donc le droit de se faire donner les éléments d'information nécessaires pour juger de la valeur de ces renseignements, afin de veiller à la prospérité des populations non autonomes et à leur accession ultérieure à l'autonomie.

7. Cette dernière tâche aurait été plus facile à accomplir si les résumés et analyses des renseignements n'avaient pas porté sur les domaines particuliers et limités de l'enseignement, du travail, de l'assistance sociale, etc., et s'ils avaient contenu des indications plus complètes, notamment au sujet de la participation de la population autochtone aux organes du gouvernement local autonome. Il serait souhaitable qu'avant de formuler des conclusions quelconques, la Quatrième Commission examine les renseignements fournis en se plaçant d'un point de vue plus général et en tenant compte de certaines tendances qui semblent différencier certaines régions par rapport à d'autres. Les réponses données à des questions portant sur des sujets très différents prouvent que des intérêts de groupe et de race font obstacle à la réalisation des buts énoncés au Chapitre XI de la Charte.

8. Par exemple, l'analyse des renseignements concernant l'instruction (A/919) qu'a fournie le Secrétaire général montre qu'il existe au Kenya une différence notable entre les facilités offertes aux enfants européens et celles qui sont données aux enfants africains. Le représentant du Royaume-Uni au Comité spécial a parlé de la participation financière appréciable fournie par la communauté européenne pour l'instruction de ses enfants. Or la population africaine, qui est exploitée, n'est pas en mesure d'apporter une participation de ce genre, et il n'est que juste d'exiger que ceux qui l'exploitent fassent davantage pour instruire les exploités.

9. De même, le résumé des renseignements sur la Tunisie (A/909/Add.1) qu'a publié le Secrétaire général met en évidence l'existence d'une fâcheuse discrimination en ce qui concerne les facilités offertes, dans le domaine de l'instruction, aux différentes races qui cohabitent ce pays. La faible proportion des enfants musulmans qui fréquentent les écoles primaires et secondaires, par rapport à celle des enfants français et juifs, fait obstacle au développement de l'instruction de la population musulmane et l'empêche, par conséquent, de parvenir à l'autonomie. En ce qui concerne le Maroc, la situation qui y règne dans le domaine de l'instruction est obscure, mais les faits cités dans le résumé du Secrétaire général permettent de conclure à l'existence d'inégalités raciales analogues.

10. A propos du régime de l'instruction dans les territoires non autonomes, M. Winiewicz tient à souligner que ce régime devrait se fonder, dans toute la mesure du possible, sur la culture intellectuelle indigène. Les Puissances coloniales ne devraient jamais oublier que cette culture est, dans bien des cas, plus ancienne et plus riche que la leur. La discrimination dont elle fait l'objet se manifeste souvent parce qu'on tente de contre-carrer des aspirations intellectuelles qui pourraient être de nature à faciliter l'avènement de l'indépendance nationale.

11. L'analyse du Secrétaire général relative à la santé publique (A/921) montre que les Puissances coloniales prêtent, dans ce domaine, à des critiques du même genre. C'est ainsi qu'au Congo belge, le degré le plus élevé dans la formation professionnelle médicale auquel peuvent aspirer les élèves est celui d'assistant médical, et il n'y a que bien peu d'élèves dans les deux écoles de médecine dont fait mention le résumé du Secrétaire général. Dans le territoire du Bassoutoland, administré par le Royaume-Uni, on a pris des dispositions en vue de permettre à un petit nombre d'étudiants de recevoir une formation médicale dans l'Union Sud-Africaine; cependant, étant donné la politique suivie par ce pays, il est douteux que de telles dispositions puissent être généralisées. De l'avis de la délégation polonaise, il faut que les facilités offertes aux habitants des territoires non autonomes en vue de la formation professionnelle médicale soient suffisantes pour faire face à tous les besoins en personnel médical.

12. L'analyse des renseignements relatifs à la main-d'œuvre (A/920) qu'a fait effectuer le Secrétaire général ne donne malheureusement que peu de renseignements sur les écarts entre les salaires ou sur la discrimination raciale dans les territoires non autonomes africains; elle passe également sous silence la question du montant des salaires. M. Winiewicz cite des passages tirés de résumés de renseignements ayant trait à des territoires particuliers, en vue d'illustrer la disproportion entre les salaires payés aux travailleurs européens et ceux que touchent les Africains. Il fait remarquer qu'il est difficile de ne pas en conclure que, si on maintient les salaires à des niveaux bas et si l'on a recours à des mesures discriminatoires, c'est en vue d'empêcher les populations autochtones de prendre conscience des intérêts de classe et de s'opposer à ce que se développe chez elles un sentiment national.

13. Bien que l'analyse du Secrétaire général ne donne qu'un aperçu superficiel des questions économiques fondamentales, elle signale que, pendant la guerre, la production est restée stationnaire dans bien des territoires, grand elle n'a pas baissé, et que ce phénomène ne se limite pas aux territoires directement touchés par la guerre. Dans l'analyse de certains aspects de l'évolution économique générale (A/C.28/W.5), la pénurie de main-d'œuvre qualifiée est présentée comme un des facteurs qui retardent l'industrialisation des territoires non autonomes. Il serait évidemment possible de faire disparaître cette pénurie en propageant l'instruction et en payant des salaires plus élevés aux travailleurs autochtones, mais de telles mesures seraient contraires à la tradition coloniale et certaines régions voient même se poser la question du chômage.

14. Il ressort clairement du tableau XIII, à la page 590 du volume contenant les renseignements sur les territoires non autonomes¹, que les échanges desdits territoires s'effectuent presque exclusivement avec les pays métropolitains. Le récent accroissement des échanges entre les pays dépendant de Puissances européennes et les Etats-Unis constitue une exception frappante à cette règle générale. Selon le *Rapport sur l'économie mondiale pour 1948*², l'Afrique (Egypte et Union Sud-Africaine non comprises) a importé des Etats-Unis, en 1937, des marchandises d'une valeur totale de 49.700.000 dollars; le chiffre correspondant pour 1948 est de 257 millions de dollars. Pendant la même période, les exportations à destination des Etats-Unis sont passées de 64.200.000 dollars à 242.200.000 dollars.

15. On a parfois accusé les adversaires du régime colonial d'inconséquence, parce que, tout en critiquant le retard du développement économique des territoires non autonomes, ils attaquaient les progrès économiques déjà réalisés. Cependant, leur attitude n'est pas dénuée de logique, car le développement économique qui a pu s'effectuer a favorisé les intérêts des seules Puissances coloniales.

16. La délégation polonaise n'est pas dupe des efforts que l'on déploie pour présenter la question des populations non autonomes comme s'il ne s'agissait que de tribus arriérées de la brousse. Or beaucoup de territoires non autonomes sont habités par des populations à culture intellectuelle très développée, qui mériteraient d'ores et déjà d'être admises dans l'Organisation des Nations Unies. Sans la chute de l'Empire colonial italien, la Libye, la Somalie italienne et l'Erythrée seraient encore rangées parmi les territoires non autonomes et soumises à une Puissance coloniale. Il existe encore en Amérique latine des territoires qui ne sont pas autonomes, bien qu'il soit évident qu'ils devraient être rattachés à des voisins entièrement indépendants. Il en est de même en Asie. La délégation polonaise estime qu'il faut étudier séparément le cas de chacun des territoires intéressés.

17. En attendant, il est indispensable que la mentalité colonialiste change au plus tôt, ne serait-ce que parce que l'alinéa c de l'Article 77 de la Charte prévoit que des territoires pourront être volontairement placés sous le Régime de tutelle et tomber de ce fait sous le coup des dispositions du Chapitre XII de la Charte. Il ne faut pas en conclure que le Régime de tutelle est la seule voie menant à l'autonomie et à l'indépendance; toutefois, il est indispensable de veiller à ce que la désintégration d'une Puissance coloniale n'entraîne pas l'assujettissement des populations non autonomes à une autre forme d'impérialisme.

18. Il est regrettable que la question soit mal comprise. Malte fournit à cet égard un exemple significatif. Le Royaume-Uni a cessé de communiquer des renseignements sur cette île, sous prétexte qu'elle serait devenue autonome. Pourtant, selon un article publié le 10 octobre 1949 dans la New Republic, les Maltais auraient adressés au Colonial Office un ultimatum dans lequel ils menaçaient d'organiser un référendum en vue d'autoriser le gouvernement de l'île à solliciter l'aide des Etats-Unis. En échange de cette aide, les Maltais auraient l'intention d'offrir aux Etats-Unis des bases militaires et même, le cas échéant, toute l'île, comme une sorte de protectorat. Ce n'est pas ainsi, dit le représentant de la Pologne, que l'on accède à l'indépendance.

19. C'est pour des raisons de ce genre que les termes du Chapitre XI de la Charte ont acquis une importance encore plus grande qu'à San-Francisco.

20. Certains Etats Membres de l'Organisation des Nations Unies ont soutenu à maintes reprises qu'il fallait organiser la collaboration et l'entraide internationales au moyen des seules institutions spécialisées. Toutefois, la question n'est nullement d'ordre technique. Elle est, essentiellement et fatalement, de caractère politique. L'Assemblée générale peut inviter les institutions spécialisées à assurer certains services techniques déterminés, mais elle ne saurait se dérober à la responsabilité de veiller à ce que lesdits services soient fournis au bénéfice des populations des territoires non autonomes, et non dans l'intérêt de certains groupes de pays. La délégation polonaise tient, une fois de plus, à se déclarer solidaire des éléments qui défendent les intérêts des populations non autonomes.

21. Le monde traverse une période de changements révolutionnaires. En Asie, le joug colonial se relâche de plus en plus, et cela malgré les efforts des Puissances coloniales, qui cherchent à surmonter leur crise monétaire intérieure en augmentant les exportations de caoutchouc et d'étain que produisent les peuples non autonomes. Les éléments rétrogrades espèrent retarder le développement historique en recourant, au besoin, à la violence. Il suffit de citer à ce propos la situation existant en Malaisie, où 120.000 soldats britanniques s'efforcent de réprimer la lutte pour l'indépendance. Une situation analogue existe en Indonésie et au Viet-nam. Cependant, rien ne pourra empêcher le succès final de cette lutte.

22. Certains rétrogrades espèrent conserver les territoires non autonomes en qualité de bases militaires. C'est ainsi que Lord Tweedsmuir déclare dans les African Transcripts parus en mai 1946 qu'avec un peu de temps et de patience, le Royaume-Uni pourra constituer une armée africaine de premier ordre; il importe peu de savoir qui en assumera les frais; l'essentiel, c'est que le Ministère de la guerre britannique exerce son autorité sur cette armée. Il ajoute que les deux tiers de l'Empire britannique se trouvent sur le continent africain, qui prend de ce fait une importance stratégique vitale.

23. Pour justifier ce désir de conserver les bases coloniales, on prétend que ces pays risquent de se trouver dans un état de chaos. Mais ce que les rétrogrades redoutent en réalité, c'est de perdre les profits économiques qu'ils retirent des territoires intéressés, les capitaux qu'ils y ont investis et les avantages stratégiques dont ils bénéficient.

24. Au contraire, le Congrès national indien d'Afrique orientale a adopté en septembre 1946 une résolution déclarant que le Congrès estime d'une importance vitale d'assurer un accord complet entre les communautés africaines, arabes et indiennes, et qu'il faut prendre des mesures d'ordre pratique afin de créer une organisation chargée de veiller au développement général des populations intéressées.

25. Le rapport du Comité spécial (A/923) reflète l'attitude intenable qu'ont adoptée certains membres de ce Comité. On a affirmé, en effet, que le Comité spécial devait se borner à examiner des questions de procédure et que la Charte ne comportait nullement l'obligation de rendre des comptes au sujet des territoires non autonomes.

26. M. Winiewicz ne tient pas, pour le moment, à examiner les propositions détaillées du Comité spécial, mais il ne peut s'empêcher d'attirer l'attention de la Commission sur un point qui mérite d'être examiné à la lumière des renseignements fournis par les gouvernements eux-mêmes. La situation présente ne contribuera guère à améliorer les conditions sociales et politiques. Il faut qu'un changement intervienne. Il est du devoir de la Quatrième Commission et de l'Assemblée générale de déclarer, en termes énergiques, que la mise en application rapide du Chapitre XI de la Charte constitue un élément essentiel de la paix du monde.

27. La délégation polonaise demande qu'on reconnaisse en toute sincérité que les travaux de la Quatrième Commission intéressent des êtres humains qui ont le même droit à la liberté que ceux de toutes les autres nations. Leur indépendance est le but final qu'il s'agit d'atteindre.

28. M. KHADRA (Arabie saoudite) déclare que sa délégation s'intéresse vivement au sort des territoires non autonomes. Cet intérêt se fonde, en premier lieu, sur des considérations de principe. Sa délégation, comme beaucoup d'autres d'ailleurs, attend avec impatience le jour où tous les territoires non autonomes auront atteint à l'indépendance souveraine.

29. Le XXème siècle a vu pénétrer en Asie et en Afrique une force des plus dynamiques qui s'était manifestée en Europe au cours des deux siècles derniers. Cette force, c'est le nationalisme. Rien ne pourra réprimer ou retarder l'éveil du sentiment national parmi les populations autochtones. Certaines d'entre elles ont développé leur conscience nationale plus tôt que d'autres, grâce aux progrès matériels et scientifiques qu'elles ont accomplis; mais il ne s'agit là que d'une question de temps.

30. Nombre de représentants viennent de pays d'Asie et d'Afrique qui, encore récemment, tombaient sous le coup du Chapitre XI. Les pays qui ont eu le bonheur d'obtenir leur indépendance au cours des quelques dernières années espèrent que le même sort attend les autres territoires non autonomes d'Afrique et d'Asie. A en croire certains rapports, des mouvements nationaux se développent rapidement et revêtent une importance de plus en plus marquée dans nombre de territoires d'Afrique, et notamment dans la Côte-de-l'Or britannique et la Nigéria.

31. En deuxième lieu, la délégation de l'Arabie saoudite s'intéresse à la question parce que la communauté des nations suit, plus attentivement que jamais, la situation des territoires non autonomes. L'on ne saurait tolérer que les peuples du monde continuent à être divisés en deux catégories différentes, en peuples dominants et en peuples dominés; il faut qu'ils fassent tous partie d'une seule et même catégorie et qu'ils jouissent tous de droits égaux: Il ne fait pas de doute que le jour où tous les peuples intéressés auront assuré leur indépendance, on aura supprimé une cause dangereuse de rivalité entre Puissances coloniales.

32. L'Article 73 du Chapitre XI de la Charte des Nations Unies proclame la primauté des intérêts des habitants des territoires non autonomes, mais il semble qu'il existe une certaine confusion quant à la question de savoir ce qu'il faut et ce qu'il ne faut pas croire. D'une part, il y a les principes élevés de la Charte; mais, d'autre part, il y a les faits et les actes des Puissances administrantes. Cependant, il n'y a pas lieu de désespérer. La logique veut que l'on redouble d'efforts pour atteindre les objectifs fixés par la Charte.

33. Il y a enfin une troisième raison qui pousse la délégation de l'Arabie saoudite à s'intéresser à la question; c'est que, sur les 200 millions d'hommes habitant les territoires qu'on qualifie de non autonomes, 20 millions au moins sont des Arabes. Il n'est que naturel que ces Arabes recherchent l'assistance des pays qui professent leur religion et dont la situation est plus favorable que la leur. Il est du devoir des Etats arabes d'élever leur voix à l'Organisation des Nations Unies.

34. Pour justifier leur refus de retirer leurs forces des territoires intéressés, les Puissances coloniales invoquent notamment des considérations de stratégie et de sécurité. Mais si ce critère venait à être adopté, le chemin de l'indépendance serait bien long.

35. Un autre argument, qui a beaucoup de poids auprès des Puissances coloniales, est celui de l'intérêt matériel. M. Khadra se demande, cependant, si les intérêts des populations autochtones présentent autant d'importance aux yeux des Puissances métropolitaines. Pourtant, la Charte proclame, en termes clairs et nets, la primauté des intérêts des populations non autonomes; on ne saurait donc sacrifier leurs intérêts au bien-être matériel des Puissances administrantes.

36. La Quatrième Commission se trouve maintenant aux prises avec la question de savoir si les renseignements prévus continueront ou non à être fournis. Il faut certainement regretter qu'après avoir reçu au cours des années précédentes des renseignements sur soixante-quatorze territoires non autonomes, le nombre de ces territoires ait été réduit cette année à soixante-deux. Si les Puissances qui administrent des territoires non autonomes sont fières des résultats qu'elles ont obtenus, elles devraient s'efforcer de fournir tous les faits et tous les chiffres pertinents, au lieu de se réfugier derrière l'épais barrage des considérations d'ordre juridique. L'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte et la résolution 9 (I) de l'Assemblée générale enjoignent aux Puissances administrantes de fournir au Secrétariat tous les renseignements que celui-ci leur aura demandés. D'autre part, la résolution 218 (III), que l'Assemblée générale a adoptée le 3 novembre 1948, demande d'une façon encore plus catégorique la transmission de ces renseignements. Le refus de fournir ces informations constitue, selon M. Khadra, une infraction au principe de la liberté de l'information auquel ont souscrit toutes les Puissances administrantes. Il ne voit pas comment les représentants de ces Puissances peuvent prendre, à la Quatrième Commission, une attitude différente de celle qu'ils ont adoptée à la Troisième.

37. Il ne partage pas l'opinion selon laquelle il faut laisser aux Puissances administrantes le soin de définir les territoires tombant sous le coup de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte. Ce serait là une méthode parfaitement arbitraire et qui ne saurait se justifier. La délégation de l'Arabie saoudite estime que, tant qu'un territoire n'a pas atteint son indépendance, rien ne doit empêcher la libre transmission des informations. M. Khadra espère qu'à l'avenir les renseignements fournis sur ces territoires auront un caractère plus complet, plus détaillé et plus précis.

38. Il ne voit aucune raison de demander que des informations soient fournies sur la République d'Indonésie. Plusieurs pays, y compris les Etats arabes, en ont reconnu l'indépendance; ceci étant, il n'y a pas lieu de s'attendre à ce que des renseignements continuent à être transmis à son sujet.

39. En ce qui concerne le Comité spécial, la délégation de l'Arabie saoudite tient à ce que celui-ci soit institué à titre permanent. En effet, le Comité spécial, non seulement facile, en les hâtant, les travaux de la Quatrième Commission, mais encore il réunit et il coordonne les renseignements reçus et il formule les recommandations appropriées en les soumettant sous forme de résolution. La délégation de l'Arabie saoudite espère donc qu'à l'expiration de la période de trois ans pendant laquelle ce Comité doit fonctionner, l'Assemblée générale fera le nécessaire pour lui assurer une existence permanente.

40. M. Khadra tient à formuler quelques observations à propos de la situation politique, sociale et économique des territoires non autonomes, ainsi que sur l'état dans lequel se trouve l'agriculture de ces pays. Il a le regret de constater que, dans le domaine de l'instruction publique, la population autochtone et sa culture continuent à faire l'objet de mesures discriminatoires. Il est évident que ces mesures sont contraires aux dispositions très précises de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73.

41. Le progrès politique des populations autochtones et le transfert du pouvoir entre les mains des autorités locales continuent à être extrêmement lents dans bon nombre de territoires. M. Khadra espère qu'à l'avenir il sera porté remède à cette situation et qu'on initiera les populations autochtones à l'art de se gouverner elles-mêmes.
42. Un autre fait fâcheux qui apparaît dans les rapports, c'est l'importance des biens que possèdent dans les territoires non autonomes les ressortissants des pays chargés de l'administration. Dans ces territoires les investissements ont été effectués, en grande partie, sinon en totalité, par des sociétés et trusts étrangers, de sorte que les autochtones ne participent pas à l'exploitation des ressources de leur pays. M. Khadra estime que l'on devrait prêter plus d'attention à cette situation afin d'éviter qu'elle prenne des proportions dangereuses.
43. La délégation de l'Arabie saoudite désire que les territoires non autonomes progressent plus rapidement; elle pense donc que la collaboration des institutions spécialisées avec les Autorités administrantes est une excellente chose. M. Khadra espère qu'à l'avenir les institutions spécialisées exerceront une surveillance de plus en plus active sur la situation de ces territoires et feront part de leurs constatations à l'Assemblée générale.
44. De même, la délégation de l'Arabie saoudite approuve la collaboration qui s'est établie sur le plan international entre les Puissances administrantes, à condition que cette collaboration serve les intérêts des populations autochtones.
45. Bien que les six projets de résolution adoptés par la Commission spéciale (A/923, annexe II) soient imparfaits, la délégation de l'Arabie saoudite les appuiera. M. Khadra comprend qu'il est difficile de rassembler une majorité pour l'adoption de ces résolutions et c'est dans un esprit de compromis que sa délégation votera en faveur des textes présentés.
46. En conclusion, M. Khadra déclare que rien ne détournera sa délégation de son intention de travailler à la réalisation des idéals qui viennent d'être indiqués, jusqu'à ce que les territoires non autonomes soient à même de participer à la communauté de nations sur le même plan que les autres pays.
47. M. D'AQUINO (Brésil) déclare que le Brésil est très fier d'appartenir au Comité spécial, puisque c'est à cet organe qu'appartient la tâche de veiller à la stricte application du Chapitre XI de la Charte des Nations Unies. Le système de tutelle a créé, comme cela est bien connu, un régime de surveillance de l'administration des Territoires sous tutelle. Le Chapitre XI de la Charte n'affecte pas les responsabilités souveraines des Puissances qui ont assumé l'administration des territoires non autonomes. On peut dire, cependant, que le Chapitre XI institue une responsabilité envers la communauté internationale puisque des données officielles sont fournies à titre d'information aux Nations Unies, données qui permettent de discuter les problèmes qu'elles mettent en évidence. M. d'Aquino rappelle que, en 1946, parlant à l'oc-casation d'une séance plénière de l'Assemblée générale, M. Creech Jones, après avoir rappelé la précieuse contribution offerte par les peuples non autonomes pour l'extermination du nazisme, a déclaré: "En conséquence il nous appartient d'aider ces populations à atteindre un haut degré de prospérité et de progrès social, et à parvenir, dans le plus court délai possible, au stade où elles pourront se gouverner elles-mêmes. Telle est la mission que s'est assignée le Royaume-Uni, mission qui sera facilitée par la mise en œuvre du système prévu par les Chapitres XI, XII et XIII de la Charte et les buts qui y sont définis. Nous avons pour but de diriger ces populations dans la voie qui pourra les amener au point où elles seront à même de jouer pleinement, sur un pied d'égalité avec les autres pays, leur rôle dans la vie plus riche de l'humanité"¹. Deux années plus tard, à la Conférence africaine, le même Secrétaire d'Etat aux colonies du Royaume-Uni, en se référant à l'ancienne politique coloniale britannique en Afrique, reconnaissait qu'elle était périmée, conçue dans les conditions du "laissez-faire", très souvent négligente en ce qui concerne les devoirs sociaux et souvent oublieuse des droits de l'homme. Le système contenait des éléments antiéconomiques et abusifs; il était spéculatif et coûteux pour ceux qui prétendaient en profiter. A cette même occasion, M. Creech Jones signalait que l'attitude actuelle du Royaume-Uni était moins criarde et moins exubérante qu'au commencement de ce siècle. Nous voyons plus clairement, disait-il, la place et les besoins des peuples dans le monde où nous vivons, et l'impérative importance de construire des amitiés et de connaître les droits authentiques des peuples des autres territoires. Notre politique économique continue à être vraie dans ses bases essentielles, mais elle est devenue flexible et adaptable aux conditions de la nouvelle situation. La science et l'économie, ainsi que la politique, ont modifié l'Afrique pendant ces derniers cinquante ans et notre conception de politique s'est transformée aussi.

48. Il est clair qu'au XXème siècle le colonialisme classique est devenu périmé. Les responsabilités que les Puissances coloniales ont assumées aux termes du Chapitre XI de la Charte sont liées à celles qui sont énoncées aux Chapitres XII et XIII. M. d'Aquino rappelle à ce sujet qu'en 1947 l'Inde avait soumis un projet de résolution invitant les Puissances coloniales à étendre le Régime de tutelle aux autres territoires non autonomes², et que ce projet, adopté par la Quatrième Commission par 25 voix contre 23, avec 3 abstentions, a obtenu à l'Assemblée générale 24 voix contre 23 avec 3 abstentions. La résolution de l'Inde s'inspirait d'une idée que Sir Hubert Murray avait déjà eue en 1924, quand il a déclaré que l'application des principes du système des mandats devrait être étendue aux colonies et aux territoires coloniaux.

49. Aux termes de l'Article 73 de la Charte, les Puissances coloniales se sont engagées à favoriser dans toute la mesure possible la prospérité des populations autochtones.

50. Le résumé que le Secrétariat a établi des informations transmises par les Puissances coloniales montre qu'au cours des trois dernières années la production et les exportations se sont accrues. Les territoires sont mieux outillés, bien que le progrès ait été limité en ce domaine par les difficultés financières, par les besoins de la reconstruction de l'Europe, par l'insuffisance de la production industrielle et par la pénurie de devises étrangères.

51. Les territoires non autonomes exportent surtout des produits agricoles: arachides, huile de palme, cacao, café, sucre, caoutchouc, tabac, thé, sisal, bois, copra, bananes et fruits divers. La plupart de ces exportations ont notablement augmenté depuis quelques années. En ce qui concerne les produits minéraux, l'extraction s'est accrue nettement dans les territoires non autonomes et, dans beaucoup d'entre eux, ces produits constituent la majeure partie des exportations. Le développement économique des territoires non autonomes s'accélère, notamment en Afrique; ce continent n'a pas encore été touché par l'agitation communiste qui menace la structure politique de beaucoup de territoires d'Asie. Bien qu'en Afrique l'industrialisation soit encore à un stade peu avancé, des problèmes sérieux se posent déjà dans le domaine social et sanitaire. Le mouvement des travailleurs vers les centres miniers et urbains, la dépopulation des villages, l'absence prolongée des hommes, les maladies vénériennes et autres conditions particulières aux grands centres de population qui sont la conséquence du développement industriel, ont créé de graves difficultés aux Puissances administrantes. L'industrialisation de l'Afrique se trouve retardée par le manque de charbon, par l'insuffisance de la production d'énergie électrique, par le manque de travailleurs spécialisés, par le gaspillage de la main-d'œuvre non spécialisée et par l'insuffisance des moyens de transport.

52. En tant que représentant d'un pays immense, dont les deux tiers sont situés dans les tropiques, M. d'Aquino comprend parfaitement les difficultés presque insurmontables que présente la colonisation des régions tropicales. Le Brésil n'a pas encore terminé l'œuvre de colonisation entreprise dans son hinterland. Il suit donc avec un très grand intérêt les efforts que font les Puissances administrantes pour développer les ressources du continent africain.

53. Au cours de la discussion générale du rapport du Conseil de tutelle, M. d'Aquino a déjà eu l'occasion de déclarer que les Nations Unies ne pouvaient admettre la thèse selon laquelle des programmes ayant pour principal objectif d'approvisionner les industries du territoire métropolitain — comme, par exemple, le programme de culture de l'arachide au Tanganyika — sont de nature à contribuer au progrès économique des Territoires sous tutelle. La même observation s'applique aux projets d'exploitation des ressources minérales des colonies. Les exportations aux Etats-Unis de l'étain provenant des Etats malais et du manganèse de la Côte-de-l'Or sont une source appréciable de dollars pour le Royaume-Uni. La production de minéraux des colonies représente 100 millions de livres sterling sur un total d'un milliard pour l'ensemble de la production du Commonwealth, dans laquelle le Royaume-Uni et le Canada entrent pour 700 millions de livres sterling. En Rhodésie du Nord, le nombre d'Africains du sexe masculin qui travaillent dans les mines est sur le point d'atteindre le maximum. Près des deux tiers des hommes ont quitté les régions rurales où, cependant, leur travail est indispensable pour produire les denrées alimentaires dont la population africaine a besoin.

54. M. d'Aquino croit que la nouvelle orientation imprimée au développement agricole de l'Afrique produira des résultats vraiment bien-faisants pour les populations autochtones dont le niveau de nutrition est tellement bas. Le représentant du Brésil cite une étude publiée dans la Colonial Review, où le Dr H. C. Trowell, en examinant les problèmes de la nutrition du travailleur africain, a dit que l'Afrique continue à aller au travail avec le ventre vide, et jamais, dans aucun endroit au monde, à aucun moment de l'histoire humaine, un bon travail n'a pu être obtenu de cette façon. M. d'Aquino ajoute qu'à la Chambre des communes s'est déroulé récemment un débat fort intéressant sur l'Afrique. Le Secrétaire d'Etat aux colonies a posé ainsi le problème africain: comment augmenter la production économique de manière à la rendre susceptible de suivre la demande correspondant à un meilleur niveau social pour le peuple et la demande additionnelle en vue de l'abolition de la famine et de l'alimentation suffisante d'une population croissante? De l'avis du Secrétaire d'Etat, il faut, pour le résoudre, attaquer le problème de tous les côtés: production sur une grande échelle quand elle est possible et en même temps encouragement au petit producteur afin qu'il puisse, non seulement se nourrir et conserver sa santé, mais aussi disposer d'un surplus pour l'alimentation de la population en général. Le Secrétaire d'Etat aux colonies, au cours de son intervention, a attiré l'attention sur le fait que, pour chaque livre sterling dépensée par le budget britannique du Development and Welfare, les gouvernements coloniaux fournissent au moins deux autres livres, provenant de nouvelles recettes et d'emprunts, et ceci en plus des dépenses normales.

55. Les documents présentés par le Secrétariat ne précisent pas le montant des investissements en dollars effectués dans les colonies. On sait que l'exploitation de la bauxite en Guyane britannique est entre les mains de capitalistes américains et que les Américains ont engagé de gros capitaux dans les entreprises d'exploitation de bois et de manganèse en Afrique occidentale ainsi que dans d'autres entreprises de Malaisie et de la Rhodésie du Sud. Les gouvernements coloniaux peuvent, en vertu du Colonial Loans Act, emprunter auprès de la Banque internationale pour la reconstruction et le développement, et la Colonial Development Corporation a déjà obtenu un prêt de 10 millions de dollars. D'après les études préparées par le Secrétariat, les plans établis pour le développement des territoires français prévoient des achats d'outillage mécanique et autre matériel s'élevant à plus de 190 millions de dollars.

56. Il ne faut pas oublier qu'au titre du Plan Marshall, les Etats-Unis ont apporté aux pays de l'Europe occidentale une aide financière dépassant 8 milliards de dollars. Une partie de cette somme a été employée pour développer des colonies. Ce fait a incité la délégation du Brésil à attirer l'attention de la Deuxième Commission sur le danger de voir certaines Puissances coloniales transformer le programme d'assistance technique en une annexe du Plan Marshall¹.

57. M. d'Aquino rend hommage au Royaume-Uni, qui a réalisé des progrès dans l'établissement de constitutions pour les territoires non autonomes, notamment dans l'hémisphère occidental et en Afrique. Au cours du débat sur l'union administrative entre le Togo sous administration britannique et la Côte-de-l'Or, le représentant du Royaume-Uni a annoncé que la réforme constitutionnelle envisagée pour la colonie serait également appliquée au Territoire sous tutelle. Il a ajouté que le Secrétaire d'Etat aux colonies avait approuvé le rapport de la Commission présidée par le juge Coussey¹, qui avait été chargée d'étudier la question. Cette Commission était entièrement composée d'Africains; le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni mérite d'être félicité de l'heureux résultat de cette remarquable expérience.
58. En 1948, le représentant de la France à la Quatrième Commission a déclaré que les territoires non autonomes sous administration française avaient fait des progrès dans la voie de l'indépendance et qu'un conseil suprême de l'Union française serait créé prochainement². M. d'Aquino fait remarquer que ce conseil, qui constituerait l'un des principaux organes de l'Union française, n'a pas encore été établi et que les renseignements communiqués au sujet du Maroc et de la Tunisie, deux des Etats qui seraient représentés au Conseil, passent sous silence cette importante question.
59. Les problèmes d'ordre constitutionnel qui se posent à l'égard des territoires non autonomes que le Royaume-Uni administre sont difficiles à résoudre. Le problème de l'Afrique, en particulier, paraît presque insoluble. C'est ainsi, par exemple, que la création de la fédération centrale africaine peut avoir une série de conséquences extrêmement graves; la manière avisée, ferme et courageuse dont le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni a défendu, à Londres, les intérêts des populations autochtones a été publiquement reconnue dans une résolution adoptée par les autochtones de Mufulira.
60. L'Union française constitue à plusieurs égards une amélioration sensible par rapport à la centralisation excessive qui caractérisait l'Empire colonial français. M. d'Aquino exprime sa confiance en la réalisation du plan de développement politique, économique, social et culturel prévu pour les dix années à venir. Il importe toutefois que ce plan, qui vise également à accroître la production agricole, tienne toujours compte des intérêts des populations en cause.
61. M. d'Aquino félicite les Autorités administrantes des excellents renseignements qu'elles ont communiqués au Secrétaire général conformément à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte.
62. Il rend également hommage au travail accompli par les fonctionnaires des différents services coloniaux, hommes et femmes, qui, en dépit de grands dangers et de difficultés considérables, se sont appliqués avec dévouement à élever le niveau de civilisation de populations se trouvant encore souvent au stade de la barbarie.
63. Il rappelle que la délégation brésilienne a voté pour la résolution 222 (III) de l'Assemblée générale. Il fait observer à ce propos que, selon le Times de Londres, le Gouvernement de l'Union Sud-Africaine tente d'obtenir que les territoires britanniques du Bassoutoland et du Souaziland, ainsi que le protectorat du Betchouanaland, soient incorporés à son propre territoire.
64. Si le Royaume-Uni accédait à cette demande, l'Assemblée générale aurait l'occasion de discuter la question en s'appuyant sur la résolution 222 (III). Cependant, d'après le New York Times, tout en admettant que l'incorporation se défend du point de vue géographique et économique, le Royaume-Uni aurait exigé que les habitants des territoires, noirs comme blancs, fussent consultés. M. d'Aquino tient à déclarer qu'il approuve l'attitude du Royaume-Uni.
65. Il fait observer que les Etats-Unis et le Danemark sont les seuls qui aient répondu de manière complète à la partie facultative du Schéma. Il constate avec satisfaction qu'au cours de l'année écoulée, un plus grand nombre de renseignements ont été communiqués spontanément. La délégation brésilienne estime qu'il y a lieu d'encourager cette tendance; c'est pourquoi elle s'est prononcée au Comité spécial en faveur du projet de résolution présenté à cet effet par la délégation de l'Inde (A/923, annexe II, projet de résolution A). La communauté des nations doit être à même de suivre les progrès réalisés dans le domaine politique par les populations dont il s'agit.
66. La Quatrième Commission devra se prononcer sur l'avenir du Comité spécial pour l'examen des renseignements transmis en vertu de l'Article 73 e de la Charte. Etant donné le caractère permanent des obligations assumées par les Autorités administrantes et de l'obligation de préparer des résumés et des études qui incombent au Secrétaire général, la délégation brésilienne estime qu'il devrait y avoir, pour examiner ces résumés et ces études, un comité permanent dont les membres seraient nommés par l'Assemblée générale pour une période de trois ans. Malheureusement, un projet de résolution assurant au Comité une existence permanente n'a pas réuni la majorité des voix au Comité spécial, qui lui a préféré un projet de résolution des Etats-Unis (A/923, annexe II, projet de résolution F) renouvelant le mandat du Comité pour trois ans. La délégation du Brésil estime que le Comité a réussi, en dépit de nombreuses difficultés, à accomplir d'une manière satisfaisante la tâche extrêmement importante qui lui avait été confiée. De grands progrès ont été réalisés depuis 1945. Peu à peu, on a établi le mécanisme par lequel l'Organisation des Nations Unies peut remplir les fonctions prévues au Chapitre XI, que l'on ne saurait séparer des Chapitres XII et XIII.
67. La délégation du Brésil appuie les divers projets de résolution soumis à l'Assemblée générale par le Comité spécial et contenus dans son rapport. Elle votera pour la résolution des Etats-Unis renouvelant le mandat du Comité pour une période de trois ans, à moins que la Quatrième Commission ne décide qu'il soit possible d'assurer à ce Comité une existence permanente, ainsi que l'ont proposé la Chine, l'Égypte, l'Inde et le Venezuela, avec l'appui du Brésil.

68. Le PRÉSIDENT annonce qu'en l'absence d'objection, la date limite pour la présentation des projets de résolution sera fixée au vendredi 4 novembre, à 11 heures.

En l'absence de toute objection, il en est ainsi décidé.

La séance est levée à 13 h. 10.

CENT QUATORZIEME SEANCE

Tenue à Lake Success, New-York, le jeudi 3 novembre 1949, à 11 heures.

Président: M. H. LANNUNG (Danemark).

Renseignements provenant des territoires non autonomes (suite)

1. M. LIU (Chine) déclare que la délégation chinoise s'associe aux félicitations qui ont été adressées au Rapporteur du Comité spécial pour son rapport et au Secrétariat pour la contribution qu'il a apportée aux travaux du Comité.

2. La délégation chinoise s'intéresse très vivement au statut des territoires non autonomes et à la prospérité de leurs habitants. La politique de la Chine consiste essentiellement à soutenir le faible contre le fort, et ce principe a été adopté par le parti qui a créé la République chinoise. L'ironie est que la Chine, dont la politique étrangère est inspirée par des mobiles altruistes, ait été depuis un siècle et plus la victime de l'exploitation étrangère, et qu'aujourd'hui encore son indépendance politique et son intégrité territoriale se trouvent gravement menacées.

3. Il est naturel qu'après avoir subi tant de vicissitudes, la Chine porte un intérêt tout particulier à la prospérité des peuples qui n'ont pas encore acquis leur indépendance.

4. Quant au fait que des renseignements ne sont plus transmis relativement aux territoires non autonomes, la délégation chinoise n'approuve pas les Puissances administrantes lorsqu'elles prétendent que les pays métropolitains sont seuls juges de la question de savoir si des renseignements sur les territoires doivent, ou non, être transmis à l'Organisation des Nations Unies. M. Liu estime que c'est seulement lorsqu'un territoire sera devenu autonome que l'autorité qui l'administrait n'aura plus d'informations à fournir. L'attitude de la délégation chinoise est dictée par le principe de la responsabilité envers la communauté des nations, sur lequel est fondé le Chapitre XI de la Charte; elle appuiera donc en principe le projet de résolution soumis par la délégation de l'Egypte (A/C.4/L.37).

5. Si la délégation chinoise a voté au Comité spécial en faveur du projet de résolution des Etats-Unis tendant à prolonger les fonctions du Comité pour une période de trois ans (A/923, annexe II, projet de résolution F), c'est seulement parce que ce texte contenait l'expression "sans préjuger l'avenir". M. Liu estime que le Comité spécial devrait avoir un caractère permanent, et il regrette que le projet conjoint de résolution, à la rédaction duquel il a participé, n'ait pas été adopté par le Comité. Il n'est nullement d'avis de limiter la compétence du Comité aux questions de procédure; une telle interprétation est du reste contraire aux dispositions de la résolution 219 (III) de l'Assemblée générale, qui prévoit que le Comité spécial dont elle définit le mandat doit faire des suggestions de fond.

6. Si le Comité spécial devenait un organisme permanent, les Puissances administrantes continueraient à bénéficier de ses observations et de ses critiques, et cette mesure apporterait d'autre part un encouragement aux populations des territoires non autonomes.

7. La délégation de l'Inde a présenté un projet de résolution (A/C.4/L.39) qui va un peu plus loin que la proposition des Etats-Unis et qui correspond donc beaucoup mieux aux vues de la délégation chinoise. M. Liu votera donc en principe pour le projet de résolution de l'Inde, mais, si la majorité de la Commission se montrait favorable au maintien du Comité spécial sur une base permanente, M. Liu appuierait une résolution à cet effet.

8. M. GALAGAN (République socialiste soviétique d'Ukraine) déclare qu'à divers points de vue, les renseignements relatifs aux territoires non autonomes transmis en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte ne sont point satisfaisants.

9. Les Membres des Nations Unies qui assument la responsabilité d'administrer des territoires non autonomes se sont engagés, aux termes de l'Article 73 de la Charte, à tenir compte des aspirations politiques des populations et à développer leur capacité de s'administrer elles-mêmes; les renseignements transmis par les Puissances administrantes auraient donc dû comprendre, pour une large part, des informations relatives au progrès politique des autochtones. Mais ces Puissances prétendent que l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte ne les oblige pas à transmettre ce genre d'informations; cette interprétation est incorrecte et il s'agit là d'une manœuvre en vue d'empêcher l'Assemblée générale de contrôler l'application des dispositions énoncées à l'Article 73. Si l'on tient compte de l'esprit dans lequel cet Article a été rédigé, il est clair que les Puissances administrantes sont tenues de fournir, entre autres, des informations sur le développement de la capacité des populations de s'administrer elles-mêmes. L'Assemblée générale doit examiner les renseignements reçus avec le dessein d'assurer le progrès politique des habitants de ces territoires.

10. Les informations relatives aux conditions sociales, économiques et culturelles dans les territoires non autonomes ne sont pas satisfaisantes; elles sont trop superficielles et trop générales. Les renseignements donnés sur le niveau de vie des autochtones ne permettent pas, en beaucoup de cas, de se faire une opinion sur la situation matérielle des populations.

11. En tant que source de matières premières nécessaires à l'armement et en tant que bases navales et aériennes, certains territoires non autonomes occupent dans les dispositifs stratégiques des Puissances coloniales une place importante. L'emploi de ces territoires à de telles fins est contraire à l'alinéa c de l'Article 73 de la Charte et il n'en est pas fait mention dans les renseignements transmis. En subordonnant les régimes économiques de leurs colonies, et aussi ceux d'autres pays, aux intérêts des groupes bellicistes qui préparent une nouvelle guerre, les Etats-Unis et le Royaume-Uni violent les dispositions de la Charte et négligent les intérêts des peuples non autonomes.

12. Les décisions prises unilatéralement de ne plus transmettre d'informations sur les territoires non autonomes sont inacceptables. Seul le Comité spécial peut prendre la décision de suspendre l'envoi des renseignements et une telle décision doit être fondée sur les informations données par les Puissances administrantes relativement aux institutions administratives autonomes créées dans le territoire dont il s'agit et à la participation des autochtones à l'administration dudit territoire.

13. Il résulte clairement des maigres informations qu'elles ont transmises que les Puissances administrantes ne se conforment pas aux dispositions du Chapitre XI de la Charte et qu'elles continuent de pratiquer les vieilles méthodes de l'administration coloniale.

14. Sous l'administration des Etats-Unis, Porto-Rico ne cultive plus que la canne à sucre, ce qui porte préjudice aux intérêts de la population autochtone. Ce territoire n'a d'échanges commerciaux qu'avec les Etats-Unis et dans des conditions très défavorables. Le chômage et la sous-alimentation sont très fréquents, et la population, qui était réputée pour sa forte santé, a maintenant l'un des taux de mortalité les plus élevés du monde. Cette population ne possède aucun droit politique et les représentants qu'elle envoie au Congrès des Etats-Unis ne peuvent prendre la parole, même sur les questions qui intéressent directement Porto-Rico, que si une décision unanime du Congrès les y autorise. L'Assemblée législative ne peut pas prendre des dispositions conformes aux intérêts véritables du territoire, car les projets de loi dont elle établit le texte peuvent faire l'objet d'un veto du Gouverneur et, en dernier ressort, d'un veto du Président des Etats-Unis. On s'est efforcé de détruire la civilisation nationale du territoire en interdisant l'emploi dans les écoles de l'espagnol, la langue du pays.

15. La situation dans les territoires administrés par le Royaume-Uni n'est guère meilleure. A la Chambre des communes, M. Driberg, membre du parti travailliste, a déclaré, le 4 février 1949, que la Jamaïque, souvent décrite dans les guides comme un paradis tropical, est un taudis tropical.

16. Dans la plupart des territoires britanniques, l'année 1948 a été marquée par une baisse de salaires et un accroissement du chômage et, d'autre part, par une hausse très nette du coût de la vie. C'est ainsi qu'à Bornéo l'indice du coût de la vie s'est élevé en 1948 à 320, sur la base de 100 correspondant à l'année 1938. Dans beaucoup de territoires britanniques, une discrimination est pratiquée, en matière de salaires, contre la population autochtone. Dans la Rhodésie du Nord, par exemple, le travailleur africain reçoit, pour le même travail, un salaire treize ou qua-

torze fois moindre que celui du travailleur européen. Une discrimination est également pratiquée contre la population autochtone dans le domaine de l'enseignement. Ainsi, dans le Kenya, les crédits affectés à l'enseignement sont respectivement de 171.000 livres sterling pour la population européenne, relativement peu nombreuse, et de 157.276 livres sterling seulement pour la population africaine.

17. La sous-alimentation favorise le développement des maladies; le taux de la mortalité, notamment celui de la mortalité infantile, est très élevé. Il n'y a pas assez de médecins ni assez d'hôpitaux et les crédits affectés à la santé publique sont tout à fait insuffisants.

18. Tous ces faits démontrent que les Puissances administrantes suivent une politique absolument contraire aux dispositions du Chapitre XI de la Charte. La délégation ukrainienne estime que l'Assemblée générale ne peut pas se contenter d'observer passivement cette situation; l'Assemblée doit déclarer aux Puissances administrantes que la primauté appartient aux intérêts de la population autochtone des territoires non autonomes et non aux intérêts égoïstes de ces Puissances, lesquels ne sont nullement conformes aux desseins des Nations Unies.

19. M. MENDOZA (Guatemala) dit que la position de sa délégation à l'égard du problème colonial a toujours été claire et nette. Depuis la Conférence de San-Francisco, le Guatemala s'est toujours préoccupé du sort des populations des territoires non autonomes et a appuyé avec enthousiasme toute proposition tendant à favoriser le progrès politique, social et culturel de ces populations et le développement de leur instruction, ainsi qu'à abolir le régime colonial qu'il considère comme un anachronisme. Il est absurde qu'au milieu du XXème siècle 200 millions d'être humains soient encore dans un état de dépendance politique.

20. Pour défendre le régime colonial, on a prétendu qu'il constituait la première étape vers l'indépendance, une sorte d'école où les populations arriérées pouvaient apprendre l'art de s'administrer elles-mêmes. De l'aveu général, le régime colonial est beaucoup plus humain et beaucoup plus libéral qu'il n'était autrefois, mais il est inexact de le représenter comme une école où les populations peuvent apprendre à s'administrer elles-mêmes. C'est une école dont les élèves ne seront jamais autorisés à passer l'examen de sortie; les Puissances coloniales estimeront toujours que les territoires sous leur dépendance ont besoin de leurs soins maternels. Cependant, il est un signe de maturité auquel on ne saurait se tromper: la rébellion armée que la Puissance métropolitaine est dans l'impossibilité de réprimer.

21. La leçon des événements qui se sont passés sur le continent américain empêche aussi le représentant du Guatemala d'admettre la théorie selon laquelle le régime colonial préparerait les populations à l'indépendance. La colonisation espagnole, bien qu'elle fût marquée, à maints égards, d'un esprit bienveillant et paternel, n'a rien fait pour enseigner aux populations à s'administrer elles-mêmes ni pour les aider à devenir indépendantes. L'Espagne s'est montrée sourde aux avertissements qui lui étaient donnés de la désagrégation de son empire. L'Amérique est devenue indépendante au cours du XIXème siècle, non pas avec le consentement de l'Espagne, mais par sa propre volonté d'être libre, et personne ne saurait dire que les Républiques de l'Amérique latine n'ont pas réussi. Ces peuples jeunes et vigoureux donnent au monde l'exemple de la solidarité, de la coopération et de la paix. L'Union panaméricaine, dont la fondation remonte à 1826, est une institution dont toute l'Amérique est fière.

22. Les considérations qui précèdent ne sont nullement hors de propos dans les discussions de la Quatrième Commission, puisqu'elles illustrent le fait que l'indépendance politique est un élément indispensable du progrès réel des peuples. Au début du XIX^{ème} siècle, il y avait des territoires qui étaient aussi arriérés que les colonies espagnoles; ces territoires, les Puissances métropolitaines ne les considèrent toujours pas comme ayant atteint la capacité de s'administrer eux-mêmes.

23. L'insuffisance du développement économique de ces territoires est présentée aussi comme un obstacle. Toutefois, le régime économique colonial est le plus grand obstacle à la réalisation des aspirations d'un peuple à l'indépendance. Tant que les peuples ne renversent pas cet obstacle, ils ne sauront jamais s'ils sont capables de se gouverner eux-mêmes.

24. Quand les colonies espagnoles ont conquis leur liberté, il n'existait pas d'organisations internationales pour s'intéresser à leur sort et certaines Puissances ont essayé de profiter de la situation en concluant des traités qui imposaient de lourdes charges aux nouveaux États. Dans le monde contemporain il n'y a aucune raison pour que 200 millions d'êtres humains, assurés de la sympathie et de l'appui de la majorité des nations, demeurent dans un état de sujétion.

25. Le Guatemala, qui souffre encore de certaines conséquences du régime colonial, se préoccupe vivement du sort des peuples qui sont sous la domination d'autres nations et en particulier du sort des peuples d'Amérique qui sont sous la dépendance d'empires lointains. Cette préoccupation, toutes les Républiques américaines la partagent. La résolution XXXIII de la neuvième Conférence internationale américaine, tenue à Bogota en 1948, renferme la condamnation solennelle du régime colonial et exprime l'espoir qu'il disparaîtra du continent américain. Cette résolution a été adoptée sans opposition, avec seulement 3 abstentions, et les pays qui se sont abstenus ne combattaient pas son principe.

26. Il a été dit à la Conférence de Bogota que le régime colonial était un anachronisme incompatible avec l'idéal et les principes américains de liberté, d'unité et de solidarité; on a dit qu'il portait préjudice à l'économie du continent et que l'Amérique ne serait pas entièrement libre tant que des parties de son sol demeureraient dans la sujétion. On a attiré l'attention sur le fait que l'existence de colonies constituait une menace pour la sécurité du continent, comme l'a prouvé ce qui s'est passé à la Martinique lors de la deuxième guerre mondiale. En 1940, une Convention pour l'administration provisoire des colonies et possessions européennes en Amérique a été élaborée à La Havane pour la mise sous contrôle de tout territoire colonial susceptible d'être transformé en base ennemie. Cette Convention est toujours en vigueur.

27. A Bogota, les Républiques américaines ont rangé les territoires non autonomes de l'Amérique en deux catégories: colonies et territoires occu-

pés. La première catégorie comprend tous les territoires non autonomes administrés par une Puissance métropolitaine dont les titres sont reconnus en droit international; la seconde comprend les territoires qui sont aux mains de l'étranger pour des raisons de fait. Bélize, connu sous le nom de Honduras britannique, et les îles Malouines, connues sous le nom d'îles Falkland, ont été rangés dans les territoires occupés. A propos de ces territoires, M. Mendoza se voit obligé de rappeler, malgré la remarque du représentant du Royaume-Uni selon laquelle ce serait un rite immanquable à la Quatrième Commission, que Bélize est un territoire guatémaltèque, illégalement occupé par la Grande-Bretagne et qu'il fait l'objet, depuis plus de cent ans, d'une controverse entre le Guatemala et le Royaume-Uni.

28. M. Mendoza ne veut pas entrer dans les détails relatifs aux antécédents historiques et juridiques de cette vieille controverse; il désire toutefois affirmer une fois de plus la position du Guatemala à ce sujet et déclarer que son gouvernement s'est constamment efforcé de parvenir à une solution équitable et pacifique du différend, mais que jusqu'à présent il n'a pas rencontré auprès du Gouvernement de Londres des dispositions semblables.

29. Le représentant du Royaume-Uni peut bien répondre que son gouvernement a, dès 1946, manifesté sa bonne volonté en proposant de saisir de la question la Cour internationale de Justice; il peut affirmer également que, si la Cour n'est pas parvenue à une décision, c'est faute par le Gouvernement du Guatemala d'avoir présenté sa thèse devant ce tribunal, et ajouter que ceci provient du peu de crédit que mérite la propre cause de ce gouvernement.

30. Le Gouvernement du Guatemala apprécie vivement les bonnes intentions du Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni et se rend compte du sacrifice que s'impose une grande Puissance en se soumettant au jugement d'un tribunal international. Toutefois, l'intention du Royaume-Uni est de restreindre la question à une appréciation purement juridique et à l'interprétation d'un traité que le Gouvernement du Guatemala, faute par le Royaume-Uni de s'acquitter d'une de ses clauses importantes, s'est vu obligé de dénoncer en le déclarant nul et non avenue.

31. Telles sont quelques-unes des raisons pour lesquelles le Guatemala ne peut accepter la juridiction de la Cour aux conditions que désire le Royaume-Uni; mais le Gouvernement du Guatemala a proposé à son tour que ce tribunal soit autorisé à juger ex aequo et bono en prenant en considération tous les aspects de la question controversée et pas seulement tous ses aspects purement juridiques. Cette proposition a été repoussée par le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni.

32. En dépit du passé, le Gouvernement du Guatemala tient à affirmer qu'il continue à entretenir le plus ferme espoir que le Guatemala et le Royaume-Uni pourront parvenir à une formule équitable d'accord à l'amiable sur cette importante question, à la solution de laquelle le Guatemala porte le plus vif intérêt.

33. En ce qui concerne les îles Falkland, M. Mendoza dira simplement que le Guatemala appuie en tous points les revendications de l'Argentine sur ces îles. La résolution adoptée à Bogota a créé la Commission américaine pour les territoires non autonomes, qui est chargée de recueillir des informations sur les territoires non autonomes américains, d'étudier le problème et de suggérer des solutions pacifiques et pratiques. Cette Commission a travaillé pendant cinq mois et a présenté un rapport volumineux qu'examinent actuellement les gouvernements des Etats américains.

34. La délégation du Guatemala se déclare favorable à toute proposition destinée à améliorer la situation actuelle dans les territoires non autonomes, comme à toute mesure de nature à contribuer à faire sortir les peuples de ces territoires de l'état de sujétion où ils se trouvent pour en faire des citoyens libres, s'administrant eux-mêmes et maîtres de leur propre destinée.

35. M. SHAHBAN (Pakistan) fait remarquer que l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte limite à certaines catégories bien définies les renseignements qui doivent être transmis au Secrétaire général; par conséquent, l'Organisation des Nations Unies se heurte constamment à la question de savoir si les Puissances administrantes sont tenues de fournir des renseignements relatifs au développement politique des territoires non autonomes.

36. Alors qu'un certain nombre d'Etats ont répondu volontiers à l'invitation qui leur était faite, dans la résolution 144 (II) de l'Assemblée générale, de présenter spontanément de tels renseignements, d'autres ont continué à prétendre que leurs obligations se limitaient à l'exécution des dispositions de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73.

37. Cependant, l'Article 73, considéré dans son ensemble, indique clairement que les Puissances métropolitaines ont accepté comme une mission sacrée l'obligation de favoriser la prospérité des territoires non autonomes et, à cette fin, de favoriser le développement de leur capacité de s'administrer eux-mêmes. Aussi la délégation du Pakistan espère-t-elle que les Etats Membres de l'Organisation des Nations Unies qui, jusqu'à présent, se sont montrés peu disposés à accepter d'autres obligations que celles que leur impose, selon leur interprétation, l'alinéa e de l'Article 73, répondront à l'invitation contenue dans la résolution 144 (II). Sans leur collaboration, l'Organisation des Nations Unies ne peut avoir une connaissance suffisante des progrès politiques réalisés dans les territoires non autonomes et n'est pas en mesure d'évaluer les progrès réalisés dans les domaines économique, social et de l'instruction.

38. On a constamment souligné que les renseignements demandés en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte étaient transmis uniquement à titre d'information. Toutefois, il est évident que de tels renseignements doivent être étudiés et examinés de façon à permettre à l'Organisation des Nations Unies d'aider, dans toute la mesure du possible, les gouvernements métropolitains à favoriser l'évolution vers l'indépendance des territoires non autonomes.

39. La délégation du Pakistan n'a pas l'intention de suggérer que l'Organisation des Nations Unies intervienne dans l'administration intérieure des territoires non autonomes, ni que les renseignements fournis soient utilisés pour servir la propagande d'un parti. Cependant, il est incontestable que, dans l'intérêt des 200 millions d'habitants des territoires non autonomes comme dans l'intérêt des Puissances administrantes, l'Organisation des Nations Unies doit être en mesure d'accorder l'aide la plus large possible. Elle ne peut y parvenir que si elle reçoit les renseignements nécessaires.

40. Le rapport du Comité spécial (A/923) et le rapport annuel du Secrétaire général indiquent qu'en 1947 et 1948 certains gouvernements ont cessé de transmettre des renseignements sur un certain nombre de territoires, sous prétexte que ces territoires n'appartenaient plus à la catégorie des territoires non autonomes en vertu de prétendues modifications constitutionnelles.

41. Tout en accueillant avec satisfaction tout progrès réalisé dans le sens de l'autonomie, la résolution 222 (III) de l'Assemblée générale, en date du 3 novembre 1948, invite les Membres intéressés à transmettre au Secrétaire général, dans un délai maximum de six mois, tous renseignements utiles, y compris les textes constitutionnels, législatifs ou réglementaires, concernant le gouvernement du territoire et les textes relatifs aux liens constitutionnels entre le territoire et le gouvernement métropolitain.

42. Il est regrettable que cette résolution soit restée lettre morte et que certains Etats aient pris des mesures unilatérales en vue de cesser de transmettre des renseignements sur un certain nombre de territoires.

43. Le représentant du Royaume-Uni a affirmé qu'il appartient aux seules Puissances métropolitaines de décider sur quels territoires il convient de fournir des renseignements et que le gouvernement intéressé est seul compétent en ce qui concerne la question des rapports constitutionnels entre le gouvernement métropolitain et les territoires relevant de sa juridiction.

44. Précédemment, le représentant du Royaume-Uni est même allé jusqu'à déclarer que ni l'Assemblée générale ni la Cour internationale de Justice n'avaient à se faire entendre en la matière. Toutefois, une telle attitude n'est pas de nature à donner des résultats. Nul ne peut contester le droit exclusif qu'ont les gouvernements métropolitains d'administrer les territoires non autonomes, mais le refus de transmettre des renseignements sur le progrès de certains territoires dans la voie de l'autonomie ne peut qu'engendrer la méfiance et provoquer des débats inutiles.

45. En ce qui concerne les résumés et analyses des renseignements transmis, préparés par le Secrétaire général², la délégation du Pakistan tient à s'associer à la délégation de l'Inde pour demander que les prochains rapports contiennent des renseignements sur la mise en vigueur des lois relatives au travail. Elle estime également qu'il conviendrait de prendre des mesures en vue d'accroître la production des produits alimentaires par l'emploi de méthodes modernes et la destruction des insectes et des plantes nuisibles. En outre, la délégation du Pakistan tient à s'associer aux représentants de la Chine, de l'Egypte, du Venezuela et de la République Dominicaine pour demander que des améliorations soient envisagées dans le domaine de l'hygiène et de l'instruction. D'une manière générale, le représentant du Pakistan accepte les projets de résolution proposés par le Comité spécial dans son rapport, mais il se réserve le droit de présenter des observations définitives, s'il en a à formuler, lorsque ces résolutions seront examinées en détail.

46. En conclusion, M. Shahban exprime l'espoir que des difficultés d'ordre financier et politique n'empêcheront pas, comme dans le passé, le Comité spécial de devenir un organisme permanent servant à la mise en œuvre des dispositions du Chapitre XI, qui a lui-même un caractère permanent. Les membres de la Quatrième Commission ne peuvent examiner minutieusement la très grande quantité de renseignements transmis, ni faire les recommandations appropriées. Comme l'a souligné le représentant du Venezuela, la création d'un Comité spécial ayant un caractère permanent ne constitue pas davantage une violation de la Charte que la création de la Commission intérimaire. En conséquence, la délégation du Pakistan appuiera sans réserves tout projet de résolution tendant à rendre permanent le Comité spécial, plutôt que des résolutions qui ne feraient qu'en prolonger le mandat.

47. M. MARTIN (Royaume-Uni) annonce que le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni réserve sa position en ce qui concerne les arguments exposés par le représentant du Guatemala à propos du Honduras britannique et des îles Falkland.

48. M. CARPIO (Philippines) tient à mettre au point certaines questions soulevées au cours de la discussion.

49. Il a pris connaissance avec intérêt du rapport du Comité spécial et a suivi attentivement les interventions de ses collègues. Trois manières de voir se sont manifestées au sujet des territoires non autonomes. Les tenants de la première tendent au radicalisme. Ils ont formulé d'amères critiques, tant à la Quatrième Commission qu'à l'Assemblée générale et, sauf erreur, au Comité spécial. Personnellement, M. Carpio ne partage pas cette manière de voir, qu'il juge dangereuse pour les buts de l'Organisation des Nations Unies.

50. Le deuxième groupe, dont les conceptions sont diamétralement opposées à celles du premier, manifeste des tendances réactionnaires; ses membres ont pris l'habitude d'invoquer la Charte de manière à favoriser leurs propres intérêts. A les en croire, le seul objet de la Charte serait de contribuer à perpétuer le régime colonial.

51. La délégation des Philippines préfère se ranger dans le troisième groupe, qui envisage la question des territoires non autonomes d'un point de vue objectif. Pour pouvoir faire preuve d'objectivité, il importe tout d'abord de se rendre nettement compte des obligations que la Charte impose aux Puissances administrantes. Il convient ensuite de déterminer les pouvoirs de l'Assemblée générale en la matière. En dernier lieu, il faut que la Commission et l'Assemblée générale étudient les moyens propres à mettre en œuvre ces pouvoirs.

52. Le Chapitre XI de la Charte ne contient que deux courts Articles, les Articles 73 et 74. Le nœud de la question est la manière dont il convient d'interpréter l'Article 73. Des membres de la Commission ont soutenu, en diverses occasions, que l'Article 73 n'imposait aux Puissances administrantes d'autres obligations que celles énoncées dans l'alinéa e de cet Article.

53. M. Carpio se demande si cette interprétation peut être considérée comme inspirée par le sens des réalités ou même comme exacte. Si les Puissances administrantes ne doivent avoir d'autre obligation que de fournir des renseignements sur les territoires non autonomes, le Chapitre XI est sans intérêt. L'idée d'interpréter la Charte de cette manière n'a jamais pu venir à l'esprit des hommes éminents qui ont rédigé la Charte à San-Francisco.

54. Une lecture attentive de l'Article 73 démontre que ses alinéas a, b, c et d imposent plusieurs obligations aux Autorités administrantes.

55. Quant à l'alinéa e, il mérite d'être mentionné à part. De l'avis de la délégation des Philippines, il est faux que cet alinéa soit le seul à imposer une obligation. Il se borne à faire mention de l'obligation, pour les Puissances administrantes, de fournir des renseignements sur les territoires dont ils ont la charge. La majorité est donc d'avis que l'Article en question implique plusieurs obligations bien définies.

56. Il reste toujours à trancher la question de savoir quels sont les pouvoirs de l'Assemblée générale en ce qui concerne la mise en œuvre des dispositions du Chapitre XI. L'Article 10 de la Charte stipule que l'Assemblée générale peut discuter toutes questions ou affaires rentrant dans le cadre de la Charte, sous réserve des dispositions de l'Article 12. Il est clair que l'Article 73 tombe sous le coup de cette disposition. En conséquence, le représentant du Guatemala était fondé à traiter de la question du Honduras britannique et de celle des îles Falkland. La discussion en cours porte sur les territoires non autonomes; cette expression s'applique incontestablement aux deux régions qu'a mentionnées le représentant du Guatemala.

57. La plupart des difficultés auxquelles se heurtent la Commission et l'Assemblée générale proviennent du fait qu'il n'a pas été prévu de mécanisme en vue de la mise en œuvre des dispositions du Chapitre XI.

58. Les Puissances administrantes sont responsables aux yeux de toutes les nations, mais ceci n'implique pas qu'en vertu du Chapitre XI, des territoires non autonomes aient été placés sous le contrôle direct de l'Organisation des Nations Unies. Toutefois, les idées formulées dans les Chapitres XI, XII et XIII sont si neuves qu'on a pu qualifier ces chapitres de "Charte internationale de l'administration coloniale".

59. L'Assemblée générale a créé un Comité spécial, ce qui représente déjà un progrès. Il se peut, en effet, que ce Comité constitue la première partie du mécanisme nécessaire pour mettre en œuvre l'Article 73.

60. Les auteurs de la Charte, à San-Francisco, étaient inspirés par de nobles sentiments et par des idéaux élevés; ils ont voulu convaincre le monde qu'ils avaient pour buts principaux d'établir une paix durable et d'abolir les injustices. C'est à cela qu'ils visaient en rédigeant les Chapitres XI, XII et XIII de la Charte. C'est alors que, pour la première fois dans l'histoire, l'idée de la tutelle a été envisagée.

61. Les Puissances administrantes n'ont pas consenti jusqu'ici à conformer leurs actes à l'esprit de l'Article 73. Il s'agit cependant d'une question urgente; à l'heure actuelle, plus de 200 millions d'habitants vivent dans les territoires non autonomes, et le sort de 15 ou 16 millions d'entre eux seulement est de la compétence du Conseil de tutelle. Aussi la délégation des Philippines estime-t-elle que le Chapitre XI a d'autant plus d'importance.

62. Les projets de résolution présentés par le Comité spécial ne satisfont pas absolument M. Carpio; toutefois, étant donné que ces projets de résolution représentent, malgré tout, un certain progrès, la délégation des Philippines les appuiera, tout en se réservant le droit de proposer tout amendement qu'elle pourra juger utile.

63. M. TEDÍN URIBURU (Argentine) remercie le représentant du Guatemala de sa déclaration très claire à propos de la question des territoires non autonomes de l'Amérique latine; il constate que le point de vue qu'il a exposé est conforme à la politique du Gouvernement de l'Argentine, telle que l'a exposée le représentant de ce pays à la Commission américaine pour les territoires non autonomes à La Havane.

La séance est levée à 13 heures.

Renseignements provenant des territoires non autonomes (suite)

1. Le PRÉSIDENT invite la Commission à poursuivre la discussion générale sur la question des renseignements provenant des territoires non autonomes.

2. M. ZARUBINE (Union des Républiques socialistes soviétiques) fait observer qu'au cours des travaux du Comité spécial, plusieurs membres du Comité ont attiré l'attention sur le fait que certains gouvernements ne remplissent pas les obligations qu'ils ont assumées en vertu du Chapitre XI de la Charte en ce qui concerne la transmission de renseignements sur les territoires non autonomes qu'ils administrent. Ainsi, quelques gouvernements, notamment ceux de la France et du Royaume-Uni, ont décidé de ne plus transmettre de renseignements pour un certain nombre de territoires.

3. Le représentant de l'URSS a déclaré au Comité spécial que cette décision était arbitraire et illégale; il a présenté une proposition tendant à empêcher la cessation de la transmission de renseignements tant que le Comité spécial n'aurait pas examiné toutes les données concernant les modifications du statut du territoire en question, et n'aurait pas présenté à l'Assemblée générale une recommandation visant à suspendre l'application à ce territoire des dispositions de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte. Il est regrettable que le Comité spécial n'ait pas adopté cette proposition.

4. La délégation de l'URSS est d'avis que la Quatrième Commission doit examiner la question de la cessation de la transmission de renseignements et prendre des mesures énergiques en vue de faire respecter les dispositions de la Charte.

5. M. Zarubine attire l'attention de la Commission sur le fait que les renseignements transmis par les Puissances administrantes sont nettement insuffisants et ne donnent pas une idée exacte de la situation qui règne dans les territoires non autonomes. Par ailleurs, ces renseignements tendent à semer la confusion en ce qu'ils ne mentionnent aucun cas concret ni aucune donnée statistique. Les Puissances administrantes n'ont transmis aucun renseignement sur le développement des organes locaux de gouvernement et n'indiquent pas de quelle manière on développe la capacité des populations indigènes de s'administrer elles-mêmes. L'on peut conclure des renseignements transmis que les Puissances administrantes ne remplissent pas leurs obligations et ne contribuent pas au progrès politique, économique et social des populations des territoires non autonomes.

6. En ce qui concerne les conditions sociales, le chapitre II, section B, paragraphe 5, du Schema demande aux Puissances administrantes de transmettre le résumé des lois et règlements principaux en vigueur pour la protection des travailleurs ainsi qu'une brève description des mesures prises pour assurer l'application de ces lois et règlements. Les renseignements transmis énumèrent bien diverses lois et dispositions, mais ne fournissent aucune indication sur ce qu'elles représentent en réalité. Ainsi, on ne compare jamais la situation juridique des ouvriers autochtones à celle des ouvriers européens. On n'y trouve non plus aucune donnée statistique concernant le chômage.

7. Le même manque de précision se remarque en ce qui concerne les renseignements sur les conditions économiques. On observe également qu'un grand nombre de renseignements font défaut, notamment au sujet des sociétés industrielles qui ont effectué des investissements, des bénéfices que ces sociétés réalisent grâce à l'exploitation éhontée de la population autochtone, et de la participation de celle-ci à la vie économique du territoire.

8. Les Puissances administrantes maintiennent leur politique d'exploitation sans se soucier des intérêts des populations qu'elles administrent. De larges portions de la population africaine sous administration britannique, française et belge vivent encore sous un système tribal périmé, que l'on maintient en vigueur afin de condamner la population à ne faire aucun progrès et à végéter misérablement.

9. Ces Puissances freinent l'évolution dans le domaine agricole. Les meilleures terres sont exploitées par des compagnies qui ne s'y livrent qu'aux cultures les plus rémunératrices, sans se soucier des intérêts de la population autochtone. Ainsi, à la Barbade, la culture de la canne à sucre en grandes plantations couvre une superficie de 77.063 acres alors que les autochtones ne disposent que de 17.283 acres. La même situation se retrouve dans de nombreux territoires non autonomes. Cette politique agricole des Puissances administrantes a pour conséquence d'appauvrir le sol, d'entraîner une pénurie de produits alimentaires et de faire empirer les conditions de vie de la population autochtone, qui est vouée à la misère et à la faim.

10. Le résumé des renseignements transmis par le Gouvernement belge (A/910) donne des renseignements édifiants au sujet du niveau des salaires des ouvriers au Congo belge. A Léopoldville, un maçon autochtone gagne de 12 à 65 francs par jour et un menuisier de 23 à 66 francs. Le niveau des salaires étant moins élevé dans les autres régions du Congo, on peut considérer que le salaire d'un ouvrier autochtone non qualifié ne dépasse pas 12 francs par jour. Si l'on compare ce salaire au salaire d'un ouvrier européen, on constate que l'Européen reçoit trente-deux fois plus que l'ouvrier autochtone. En outre, l'Européen est logé et transporté gratuitement; il reçoit également des soins médicaux gratuits. La même situation se présente dans d'autres territoires non autonomes, où l'on observe également une discrimination raciale dans le domaine des salaires. On a constaté, par exemple, quatre-vingt sept conflits ouvriers au Kenya, dont la cause est l'insuffisance des salaires. D'autre part, le chômage sévit et les ouvriers autochtones ne bénéficient d'aucunes mesures de sécurité sociale.

11. Les services de santé publique sont également déficients. Par exemple, à Madagascar on ne compte que 356 médecins pour 2.146.000 cas de maladies environ, dont 314.000 cas de syphilis. Les taux de mortalité sont trois fois plus élevés dans les territoires non autonomes que dans les métropoles. Le nombre des médecins est dérisoire par rapport à la population et à l'importance de la mortalité. Le caractère incomplet des statistiques démographiques témoigne du fait que les Puissances administrantes ne se soucient pas du bien-être social et de la santé publique des populations autochtones. Elles ne remplissent donc pas les obligations qu'elles ont assumées en vertu de l'Article 73 de la Charte.

12. La situation de l'enseignement n'est guère plus brillante. Il ressort de l'analyse des renseignements transmis que de larges couches de la population sont illettrées. Par exemple, en Somalie, 1 pour 100 de la population sait lire et écrire, en Ouganda, 30 pour 100, et en Côte-de-l'Or, 20 pour 100. Au Sierra-Leone, on constate une régression: en 1946, 30 pour 100 de la population savait lire et écrire, alors qu'en 1948 le taux ne s'élève plus qu'à 28 pour 100. De l'avis du représentant de l'URSS, il conviendrait de vérifier les critères employés en cette matière par les Puissances administrantes. En effet, ces dernières considèrent qu'une personne sait lire et écrire après deux ans d'école; le représentant de l'URSS estime que deux ans d'école ne suffisent pas. Il ressort des renseignements transmis qu'une discrimination raciale flagrante est pratiquée dans le domaine de l'enseignement par les Puissances administrantes. Il est dépensé pour l'instruction d'un enfant européen beaucoup plus d'argent que pour l'instruction d'un enfant indigène. Par exemple, au Kenya, l'on dépense 0,04 livre sterling pour un écolier indigène, alors que l'instruction d'un écolier européen coûte 5,84 livres sterling, soit cent quarante-cinq fois plus; en Rhodésie du Nord, elle coûte vingt-quatre fois plus et, au Nyassaland, quatre-vingt fois plus. Ces chiffres, ainsi que le tableau qui figure au document A/919, montrent que les crédits alloués par les Puissances administrantes pour l'enseignement des autochtones sont tellement infimes qu'on peut à peine parler de l'existence d'un système d'enseignement. Le représentant de l'URSS estime qu'il y aura lieu de vérifier sérieusement les pourcentages donnés, qui ne semblent pas toujours correspondre à la réalité.

13. En ce qui concerne l'enseignement secondaire, il résulte de l'examen des renseignements transmis que les Puissances administrantes ne prennent aucune mesure pour assurer le développement de cet enseignement et condamnent ainsi la population à l'ignorance, afin de la priver de la possibilité de participer activement à la vie politique, économique et sociale du territoire. A Madagascar, par exemple, sur une population de 4 millions d'habitants, 2.065 élèves seulement fréquentent les établissements secondaires; en Nigéria, sur une population de 21 millions d'habitants, 8.750 élèves seulement sont inscrits dans les écoles secondaires.

14. Le représentant de l'URSS souligne que, même en se fondant sur les renseignements insuffisants dont dispose la Quatrième Commission, on peut affirmer que les Puissances administrantes pratiquent une politique de discrimination à l'égard des populations autochtones et qu'elles ne remplissent pas les obligations découlant de l'alinéa b de l'Article 73 de la Charte, aux termes duquel elles doivent s'administrer elles-mêmes, en tenant compte de leurs aspirations politiques, et les aider dans le développement progressif de leurs libres institutions politiques. Enfin, elles ne transmettent pas de renseignements sur le degré de participation des populations autochtones aux organes locaux de gouvernements. Mais il ressort des autres renseignements transmis en matière économique, sociale et de l'éducation que les Puissances administrantes ne préparent pas les populations autochtones à s'administrer elles-mêmes, mais les maintiennent dans un état de sauvagerie et d'ignorance qui les voue à une existence de misère.

15. La délégation de l'URSS estime que la Quatrième Commission doit prendre des mesures énergiques pour que les dispositions de la Charte soient respectées par les Puissances administrantes.

16. En terminant, M. Zaroubine déclare que l'URSS soutiendra toute proposition tendant à créer un comité spécial permanent, qui contribuerait à assurer l'application des dispositions de la Charte, en particulier celles de l'Article 73.

17. M. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) déclare que sa délégation, ainsi que les délégations des autres Etats de l'Amérique latine qui ont participé à la conférence tenue à La Havane par la Commission américaine des territoires non autonomes, s'intéresse vivement à la question des renseignements provenant des territoires non autonomes. Cette conférence, à laquelle ont participé treize Etats de l'Amérique latine, a étudié le problème colonial en se fondant principalement sur les données fournies par le Secrétaire général de l'Organisation des Nations Unies, notamment les résumés et analyses des renseignements transmis au cours de l'année 1948¹.

18. Les membres de cette Conférence ont déplore, ainsi que le représentant de Cuba l'a indiqué précédemment, le fait de ne pouvoir disposer d'une traduction espagnole de ce document. C'est pourquoi les délégations de Cuba, de l'Equateur et du Guatemala ont précisé, au quatrième paragraphe du projet de résolution qu'elles ont présenté (A/C.4/L.40), que l'Assemblée générale devrait veiller à ce que les résumés et analyses soient publiés à l'avenir dans les trois langues de travail.
19. Par ailleurs, les délégations de Cuba, de l'Equateur et du Guatemala ont remarqué qu'il manquait dans la majorité des renseignements transmis des données essentielles dont il faut tenir compte lors de l'examen de la situation régnant dans un territoire. Il s'agit des renseignements d'ordre géographique et historique. Il faut reconnaître que dans le Schéma adopté en 1947, on a classé ces renseignements dans la partie facultative; il n'en est pas moins vrai qu'ils sont indispensables et ne devraient donc pas être facultatifs.
20. Ces trois délégations se sont posé une autre question. M. Pérez Cisneros pense qu'il est inutile de rappeler aux membres de la Commission que les articles de la Déclaration universelle des droits de l'homme s'appliquent à tous les Etats, ainsi qu'aux territoires non autonomes, et que maints articles traitent des droits de l'homme dans les domaines économique, social et culturel, qui sont précisément les trois domaines prévus à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte. Dans ces conditions, il est difficile de comprendre pourquoi les renseignements sur les droits de l'homme sont facultatifs. On constate cependant dans le résumé des renseignements volontairement transmis sur la partie facultative du Schéma (A/AC.28/W.8) que les renseignements relatifs aux droits de l'homme n'ont été communiqués que pour un nombre très réduit de territoires non autonomes.
21. C'est afin de ne plus voir les renseignements généraux relatifs à la géographie, l'histoire, la démographie et les droits de l'homme classés dans la partie facultative du Schéma que la délégation de Cuba a présenté un amendement (A/C.4/L.2, paragraphe 1) au projet de résolution relatif à la transmission spontanée des renseignements figurant dans la première partie du Schéma (A/923, annexe 11, projet de résolution A). Par cet amendement, la délégation de Cuba exprime en outre l'espoir que les Membres qui n'en ont pas pris l'initiative ajouteront de leur propre mouvement les renseignements qui donnent, en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte, des indications détaillées sur l'administration des territoires non autonomes. La délégation de Cuba reconnaît que les renseignements fournis en 1948 ont été plus nombreux qu'en 1947. Toutefois, elle a constaté en ce qui concerne certains aspects de la question, notamment l'hygiène publique dans les territoires non autonomes d'Amérique, que la documentation était trop vague. Ce manque de précision a empêché la Commission américaine des territoires non autonomes de se faire une idée exacte de la situation. Par ailleurs, la délégation de Cuba a constaté avec étonnement que la population des Caraïbes de descendance française recevait l'enseignement primaire exclusivement en anglais. Le représentant de Cuba reprendra cette question en détail à l'occasion de l'examen du projet de résolution relatif aux langues de l'enseignement (A/923, annexe II, projet de résolution C).
22. M. Pérez Cisneros aborde la question de la cessation de la transmission de renseignements. La délégation de Cuba partage entièrement l'opinion de la délégation de l'Egypte; il est difficile d'admettre la thèse selon laquelle la détermination des territoires dont la population ne s'administre pas encore complètement elle-même relève de la compétence exclusive des Etats qui ont ou qui assument la responsabilité de les administrer. Le Comité spécial a décidé à une importante majorité qu'il n'était pas compétent pour prendre une décision sur cette question. Il appartient maintenant à la Quatrième Commission de prendre une initiative à ce sujet et de présenter un projet de résolution à l'Assemblée générale. La délégation de l'Egypte a soumis à la Commission un projet de résolution (A/C.4/L.37) qui traite la question de façon fort satisfaisante. La délégation de Cuba pense qu'il est possible de présenter certains amendements de rédaction, mais elle approuve entièrement la substance du projet de résolution égyptien.
23. M. Pérez Cisneros explique ensuite les raisons qui ont incité sa délégation à présenter un amendement (A/C.4/L.42, paragraphe 2) au projet de résolution relatif à l'égalité de traitement en matière d'enseignement (A/923, annexe II, projet de résolution B). Les Puissances qui administrent des territoires non autonomes ont fourni des explications plus ou moins satisfaisantes sur leur politique en matière d'enseignement dans ces territoires. Il serait bon que ces Puissances donnent des arguments plus détaillés et concrets pour justifier la discrimination qui est pratiquée dans ce domaine. C'est pour obtenir de telles explications précises que la délégation de Cuba propose de compléter le projet de résolution par l'addition d'un second paragraphe.
24. Le projet de résolution relatif à la lutte contre l'analphabétisme (A/923, annexe II, projet de résolution I) est également l'objet d'un amendement de la délégation de Cuba (A/C.4/L.2, paragraphe 3). Cet amendement porte sur le paragraphe 1 du dispositif; il consiste essentiellement à remplacer les mots "en 1950" par les mots "chaque année". En effet, s'il est essentiel que les plans généraux élaborés par les Puissances administrantes soient communiqués à l'Assemblée générale dans le meilleur délai possible, il n'en est pas de même des renseignements que l'UNESCO est invitée à communiquer aux Puissances administrantes et du rapport qu'elle doit adresser à l'Assemblée générale sur les résultats de la lutte contre l'analphabétisme. L'action de l'UNESCO dans ce domaine doit être continue; il n'est pas logique que les termes du projet de résolution la limitent à l'avenir immédiat.
25. Le projet de résolution relatif à la collaboration internationale en matière économique, sociale et culturelle dans les territoires non autonomes (A/923, annexe II, projet de résolution E) est l'objet d'un amendement identique de la délégation de Cuba (A/C.4/L.2, paragraphe 4). Comme dans le cas précédent, il n'est pas judicieux de préciser que les institutions spécialisées communiqueront des renseignements à l'Assemblée générale en 1950. Il semble préférable de prévoir que ces renseignements seront communiqués chaque année. M. Pérez Cisneros se demande si le Comité spécial a eu des raisons particulières pour proposer la communication de renseignements en 1950 seulement; si une justification valable n'est pas donnée à la Commission, la délégation de Cuba maintiendra son amendement.

26. Le projet de résolution concernant la création d'un Comité spécial chargé de l'examen des renseignements transmis en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte (A/923, annexe II, projet de résolution F) ne fait l'objet d'aucun amendement de la part de la délégation de Cuba. Cette dernière approuve ce projet et lui donnera son appui. Elle aurait cependant préféré voir triompher la tendance selon laquelle le Comité spécial devrait être un organisme permanent. La délégation de Cuba a été en faveur de cette idée depuis la création de l'Organisation des Nations Unies; c'est même elle qui a pris, en 1946, l'initiative de la création d'un organisme chargé de l'examen des renseignements transmis en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte. Il faut espérer, que lorsque le mandat du Comité spécial expirera, en 1952, toutes les délégations seront d'accord pour le renouveler sans limitation de durée.

27. La délégation de Cuba regrette de constater que quelques Puissances administrantes seulement transmettent des renseignements sur les conditions politiques dans les territoires non autonomes. Elle tient à rendre hommage aux Puissances qui transmettent spontanément de tels renseignements.

28. La délégation de Cuba est de celles qui estiment que le système colonial est en voie de disparition depuis la fin de la première guerre mondiale. Ce phénomène est conforme aux aspirations des peuples du monde. La Commission américaine des territoires non autonomes s'est prononcée en faveur de l'élimination de tout système colonial, car la communauté des nations n'admet plus aujourd'hui l'existence de Puissances métropolitaines et de colonies qui en dépendent absolument dans tous les domaines. Il semble que cette question ait été acceptée par les Puissances qui administrent des territoires non autonomes lorsqu'elles ont voté pour l'adoption du Chapitre XI de la Charte. Ces Puissances feraient preuve de générosité et d'esprit de coopération si elles acceptaient de transmettre spontanément des renseignements d'ordre politique.

29. M. Pérez Cisneros appelle l'attention sur le dernier paragraphe du projet de résolution présenté en commun par les délégations de Cuba, de l'Equateur et du Guatemala (A/C.4/L.40). Aux termes de ce paragraphe, le Secrétaire général est invité à compléter les résumés et analyses ainsi que les documents annuels complémentaires en publiant régulièrement des données relatives à certains aspects des progrès réalisés dans les territoires non autonomes.

30. Les renseignements transmis en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte, obligatoirement ou spontanément, sont si nombreux et portent sur un si grand nombre de domaines qu'il serait bon que certaines données fassent l'objet de publications spéciales. Une telle procédure permettrait à la Quatrième Commission d'accomplir sa tâche de façon plus rapide et plus efficace, car il lui est difficile, dans les conditions actuelles, d'étudier et d'analyser tous les renseignements transmis.

31. M. Pérez Cisneros aimerait connaître l'opinion du Secrétariat sur ce point; il voudrait notamment savoir si le Secrétariat pourrait donner suite sans de trop grandes difficultés matérielles aux dispositions du dernier paragraphe du projet de résolution commun.

32. M. BENSON (Secrétariat) fait observer tout d'abord qu'il est difficile au Secrétariat de publier in extenso tous les renseignements transmis par les Puissances administrant des territoires non autonomes; le document qui en résulterait aurait un tel volume qu'il serait impossible au Comité spécial, et à plus forte raison à la Quatrième Commission, de l'étudier avec profit. C'est pour cette raison que le Secrétaire général publie des résumés et analyses des renseignements transmis et qu'il publiera à l'avenir des documents annuels complémentaires.

33. Le Secrétariat a déjà étudié la question de publier dans les documents séparés des études techniques relatives à certains aspects des progrès réalisés dans les territoires non autonomes. Il a même préparé un tel document à titre d'expérience. Ce document n'a pas été publié, car il ne constitue qu'un essai à l'usage du Secrétariat.

34. M. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) estime que le document préparé à titre expérimental par le Secrétariat pourrait intéresser les membres de la Quatrième Commission, en dépit de ses imperfections éventuelles. Il demande donc s'il serait possible que ce document soit porté à la connaissance des membres de la Commission, car il permettrait à ces derniers de se rendre compte de l'intérêt réel de la proposition faite dans le dernier paragraphe du projet de résolution présenté par les délégations de Cuba, de l'Equateur et du Guatemala.

35. M. BENSON (Secrétariat) déclare que le document mentionné sera communiqué pour information à tous les membres de la Quatrième Commission; il tient cependant à faire toutes réserves sur la présentation et la nature de ce document, qui n'a été préparé, répète-t-il, qu'à titre d'expérience.

36. M. GHORRA (Liban) déclare que sa délégation a toujours considéré la question en cours d'examen sans idée préconçue et avec objectivité. Ainsi que l'a fait remarquer le représentant des Philippines à la séance précédente, trois tendances distinctes se sont manifestées parmi les membres de la Commission; les uns ont adopté une attitude radicale, les autres une attitude conservatrice et réactionnaire, alors que d'autres encore, au nombre desquels se trouve la délégation du Liban, estiment qu'il faut avant tout respecter les principes de la Charte et veiller à l'application des dispositions qu'elle contient. M. Ghorra pense, en effet, que la Quatrième Commission ne doit pas devenir une tribune de propagande, ni servir uniquement à critiquer ou à féliciter les Puissances administrantes pour l'œuvre qu'elles ont accomplie; la Quatrième Commission doit, au contraire, participer à l'élaboration des mesures propres à entraîner la réalisation des objectifs fixés par le Chapitre XI de la Charte et à favoriser la collaboration entre les Puissances administrantes et les autres Membres de l'Organisation.

37. La délégation du Liban ne saurait partager le point de vue de certains représentants qui interprètent l'Article 73 de la Charte d'une manière trop restrictive, en le réduisant pratiquement aux seules dispositions de l'alinéa e, qui n'est en réalité qu'une fraction de l'Article en question. Pareille interprétation aboutirait au classement des renseignements transmis par les Puissances administrantes dans les archives de l'Organisation à seules fins de références. S'il devait en être ainsi, pourquoi transmettre ces renseignements aux Membres de l'Organisation et réunir la Quatrième Commission en les lui soumettant pour examen? M. Ghorra ne croit pas, personnellement, qu'il faille réduire le rôle du Secrétaire général à celui d'un simple messenger, et que les représentants puissent se contenter de lire les documents en question comme on lit un article de journal.

38. Les Puissances administrantes ont volontairement accepté d'assumer les obligations prévues à l'Article 73 et se sont engagées, notamment, à reconnaître le principe de la primauté des intérêts des habitants des territoires non autonomes. Le devoir de la Quatrième Commission est donc d'examiner les renseignements qui ont été transmis, de formuler à leur sujet les critiques qu'elle juge opportunes et de prévoir ensuite les mesures propres à assurer l'application des dispositions de la Charte et le respect des principes qui y sont énoncés; c'est ainsi que l'on pourra rehausser le prestige de l'Organisation, encourager la collaboration entre les Puissances administrantes et les autres Etats Membres, et réaffermir, chez les populations des territoires non autonomes, la foi en l'Organisation des Nations Unies.

39. Le représentant du Liban a constaté, à la lecture des résumés et des analyses qu'a préparés le Secrétaire général, que les Puissances administrantes ont pris, au cours des dernières années, des mesures en vue d'améliorer la situation sociale dans de nombreux territoires et d'y développer l'enseignement. Il est évidemment difficile d'affirmer que cette tendance générale est la conséquence immédiate des critiques et des recommandations formulées par la Commission, auxquelles les Puissances administrantes s'efforceraient de se conformer, mais il est certain que les travaux accomplis par l'Organisation constituent un stimulant utile. L'Assemblée générale est allée de l'avant et il faut espérer que les Puissances administrantes feront de même. Il conviendrait d'affirmer progressivement l'autorité de l'Organisation et de créer une atmosphère de confiance qui favoriserait la collaboration entre les Puissances administrantes et l'Organisation des Nations Unies.

40. M. Ghorra rappelle, à ce propos, que certains des pays qui assument l'administration des territoires non autonomes ont délibérément cessé de transmettre des renseignements sur certains de ces territoires ou sur certaines questions qui les concernent, et il espère que ces pays reviseront leur position. On constate par ailleurs que dans maints territoires, ce sont des missions ou des institutions religieuses qui s'occupent des questions de bien-être social et d'enseignement et que l'activité des gouvernements est très réduite, alors que c'est à ces derniers qu'appartient en fait la responsabilité d'élaborer des programmes et de prendre des mesures dans ces domaines.

41. Le représentant du Liban appelle également l'attention sur le fait que l'enseignement des langues vernaculaires est souvent négligé et relégué au second plan, ce qui est difficilement admissible, notamment dans le cas de la langue arabe, qui est une langue de civilisation et se trouve ainsi réduite à jouer un rôle qui ne correspond pas à sa valeur. M. Ghorra est tout à fait partisan de l'enseignement des langues étrangères dans les territoires non autonomes, mais il ne faut pas que cet enseignement se fasse au détriment des langues vernaculaires. Il considère, par ailleurs, que les renseignements concernant l'Indonésie ne sont pas à leur place dans la documentation relative aux territoires non autonomes; il rappelle, à cette occasion, que le Liban a été l'un des premiers pays à reconnaître l'indépendance des Etats-Unis d'Indonésie. M. Ghorra exprime l'espoir que ce nouvel Etat sera bientôt accueilli parmi les membres des Nations Unies.

42. La délégation du Liban considère qu'il faut donner au Comité spécial un statut permanent, car les obligations que contient l'Article 73 de la Charte ont un caractère durable. Elle est disposée à voter en faveur de tout projet de résolution conçu dans ce sens. S'il n'en est pas présenté, elle votera pour le projet de résolution des Etats-Unis (A/923, annexe II, projet de résolution F) qui prévoit un mandat de trois ans pour le Comité spécial, mais elle s'opposera à toute résolution qui serait plus restrictive que cette dernière.

43. La délégation du Liban appuie également, en principe, les six résolutions qui figurent en annexe au rapport du Comité spécial, au sujet desquelles elle formulera des observations en temps utile.

44. M. ASTAPENKO (République socialiste soviétique de Biélorussie) rappelle qu'en vertu des dispositions du Chapitre XI de la Charte, les Etats Membres de l'Organisation qui assument l'administration de territoires non autonomes doivent veiller, autant que possible, à assurer le bien-être des populations de ces territoires. C'est à cette fin qu'il est prévu, à l'Article 73 de la Charte, que ces pays s'engagent à favoriser les progrès politique, économique et social de ces populations, ainsi que le développement de leur instruction, et à développer leur capacité de s'administrer elles-mêmes, en tenant compte de leurs aspirations politiques et en les aidant dans le développement progressif de leurs libres institutions politiques. Par ailleurs, les Puissances administrantes sont tenues d'informer l'Organisation des dispositions qu'elles prennent en vue de s'acquitter des obligations qu'elles ont contractées dans ces différents domaines. Or, certaines de ces Puissances semblent ne pas vouloir tenir compte du caractère obligatoire de la transmission de renseignements sur les territoires non autonomes; le Royaume-Uni a refusé de fournir des renseignements sur l'île de Malte, et la France a décidé de ne pas en transmettre au sujet de la Guadeloupe, de la Martinique, de la Guyane, de la Nouvelle-Calédonie, des possessions françaises du Pacifique, etc.

45. Ces Puissances nient ainsi le droit des Nations Unies, et plus particulièrement du Comité spécial, d'examiner le fond des renseignements transmis, et cela en vue d'empêcher l'Organisation de surveiller la mise en œuvre des principes et des dispositions de la Charte. Il est évident que les Nations Unies ne sauraient tolérer de tels actes, à la fois incompatibles avec la Charte et préjudiciables aux intérêts des populations intéressées. Le fait de réduire le rôle que joue l'Organisation en ce qui concerne les territoires non autonomes ne saurait que nuire à la qualité des renseignements qu'elle doit recevoir, renseignements qui sont déjà insuffisants et incomplets. A ce sujet, M. Astapenko souligne l'absence totale de renseignements sur les mesures prises par les Puissances administrantes en vue de préparer les populations des territoires à l'autonomie, et sur la participation des autochtones à la vie publique. On ne peut se faire une idée précise de la situation réelle qui règne dans les territoires non autonomes car les renseignements ne contiennent pas suffisamment de détails.

46. Il est aisé de constater néanmoins, d'après la documentation pourtant insuffisante et incomplète dont on dispose, que les Puissances administrantes se livrent à une exploitation éhontée des territoires dont elles ont la charge et ne s'acquittent pas des obligations qu'elles ont contractées aux termes de la Charte, notamment en ce qui concerne le développement économique de ces territoires. Ainsi, ces régions deviennent de plus en plus dépendantes des métropoles, dont la politique entrave leur développement économique propre en les maintenant dans une situation précaire, tant du point de vue des conditions de vie des habitants que du point de vue culturel. Le représentant de l'URSS a cité un certain nombre d'exemples qui suffisent à illustrer cet état de choses.

47. L'économie des territoires non autonomes est ainsi déformée, car ceux-ci ne servent en fait qu'à fournir des matières premières aux métropoles. La situation des travailleurs autochtones est difficile; l'ouvrier autochtone perçoit un salaire trente-deux fois inférieur à celui de l'ouvrier européen au Congo belge, et onze fois inférieur en Rhodésie du Nord. En Somalie française, les dockers et les ouvriers non spécialisés perçoivent un salaire mensuel équivalant à 16 dollars. Il faut ajouter à cela qu'il n'existe nulle part de services de sécurité sociale, et que les maladies les plus meurtrières sévissent parmi les populations des territoires. A ce propos, M. Astapenko souligne que les Puissances administrantes ne se préoccupent pas de la question de la santé publique; à Aden, par exemple, il existe un médecin pour 350.000 personnes.

48. Abordant la question de l'instruction publique, M. Astapenko fait observer que des masses considérables de la population des territoires sont encore illettrées; en Somalie britannique, 1 pour 100 de la population sait lire et écrire; en Afrique Occidentale française, 5 pour 100 seulement des enfants d'âge scolaire fréquentent les écoles et, au Maroc, la proportion est de 20 pour 100. On est ainsi contraint d'admettre qu'il existe une discrimination en matière d'enseignement, si l'on sait qu'en 1947 les crédits prévus au Kenya pour l'enseignement destiné aux Européens étaient quarante fois supérieurs aux crédits pour l'enseignement destiné aux autochtones. En Ouganda, les crédits représentaient un dixième de livres sterling par habitant autochtone et plusieurs livres par habitant européen.

49. Il est donc clair que les Puissances administrantes ne s'acquittent pas des obligations qu'elles ont assumées et ne favorisent pas le progrès des territoires non autonomes. La délégation de la Biélorussie estime que les Puissances administrantes devraient transmettre des renseignements complets, sans oublier notamment de donner des détails sur les mesures qu'elles prennent pour préparer les populations intéressées à l'autonomie et les faire participer à la vie politique des territoires.

50. Le PRÉSIDENT déclare que, si les membres de la Commission ne s'y opposent pas, le représentant de la France sera autorisé à prendre la parole à la prochaine séance pour faire une déclaration rentrant dans le cadre de la discussion générale. Le même droit sera accordé au représentant des Etats-Unis, qui en a fait la demande.

51. Le Président signale que toute délégation pourra évidemment exercer son droit de réponse, conformément aux dispositions du règlement intérieur.

52. Il propose d'aborder l'examen des projets de résolution présentés par le Comité spécial.

53. M. FARRAG (Egypte) propose l'ajournement de la séance.

Il en est ainsi décidé.

La séance est levée à 17 heures.

CENT SEIZIEME SEANCE

Tenue à Lake Success, New-York, le vendredi 4 novembre 1949, à 10 h. 45.

Président: M. H. LANNUNG (Danemark).

Renseignements provenant des territoires non autonomes (suite)

1. M. LAPIE (France) déclare qu'il désire préciser la position prise par le Gouvernement français à l'égard de la question des territoires non autonomes et du rapport du Comité spécial (A/923). Il rappelle que la position de la France a été exposée au sein du Comité spécial, où sa délégation a voté pour tous les projets de résolution figurant à l'annexe II du rapport à l'exception de celui qui prévoit la prolongation du mandat du Comité spécial pour une nouvelle période de trois ans.
2. M. Lapie indique que sa déclaration porte sur deux sujets différents: le premier concerne la prolongation de l'existence du Comité spécial et le second la décision du Gouvernement français de ne plus transmettre de renseignements sur certains territoires non autonomes.
3. Avant de traiter ces questions, il désire répondre à certaines critiques dont la France a fait l'objet. A son avis, les critiques ont été à la fois peu nombreuses et sans grand fondement. Parmi tous les membres de la Commission, quatre seulement ont formulé des critiques précises. Toutes les autres critiques ont été vagues ou ont revêtu un caractère de propagande.
4. M. Lapie a été heureux de constater que certains représentants ont joint des éloges à leurs critiques. Ceci est particulièrement vrai dans le cas de la déclaration du représentant du Brésil, qui a eu le courage de souligner aussi bien le bon côté que le mauvais côté de l'administration française. Tout en accueillant avec plaisir un appui de cet ordre, sa délégation désire préciser que la France ne recherche pas les louanges, mais simplement la reconnaissance de l'œuvre qu'elle a accomplie.
5. Toutes les Puissances administrantes ont fait l'objet de critiques. Il semble que, de l'avis de certaines délégations, notamment celle de l'URSS, le fait d'être une Puissance administrante est blâmable en soi. M. Lapie se demande si l'URSS n'administre pas elle-même certains territoires. Si tel était le cas, il serait intéressant d'entendre l'écho des opinions des populations libérées au lieu de se trouver en face du silence des opprimés.

6. Le représentant de la France désire donner quelques précisions au sujet de la déclaration du représentant du Brésil selon laquelle la France aurait freiné l'évolution des territoires non autonomes vers l'indépendance. A cet égard, il rappelle que la Constitution française prévoit la création de l'Union française et de son Conseil suprême. L'Union française est, à l'heure actuelle, en cours d'organisation. Une telle entreprise demande du temps et de la patience, mais M. Lapie est persuadé qu'elle portera ses fruits en temps voulu. Le Conseil suprême a été créé par une loi promulguée en février 1949.

7. Certaines critiques précises ont été faites sur l'instruction en Tunisie. M. Lapie désire citer quelques chiffres à cet égard. En 1938, il y avait 1.907 instituteurs en Tunisie; depuis, ce nombre a augmenté et l'on compte, en 1949, 2.749 instituteurs dont 1.104 sont Tunisiens. Durant la même période, le nombre de professeurs de l'enseignement secondaire s'est accru et a passé de 356 à 668, dont 404 sont Tunisiens. Le représentant de la France se demande comment l'on peut dire qu'il n'y a eu aucun progrès dans le domaine de l'instruction lorsque l'effectif du corps enseignant a doublé au cours des dix dernières années. Il désire souligner, en même temps, que l'enseignement est donné dans les écoles en arabe et en français.

8. En ce qui concerne les critiques sur l'administration du Maroc, M. Lapie estime qu'elles ont pour mobile la propagande. En réalité, les crédits consacrés à l'enseignement représentent, au Maroc, 15 pour 100 du budget total et ont doublé en dix années, entre 1938 et 1949. Par une autre déclaration, on a prétendu que 100.000 enfants seulement fréquentaient les écoles marocaines, alors que le chiffre exact était en 1947 de 150.000, dont 110.000 mahométans, soit dix fois plus qu'en 1920. Le nombre des professeurs a augmenté en conséquence.

9. M. Lapie indique que sa délégation regrette que le représentant de la Syrie ait accusé la France de chercher à faire disparaître la culture musulmane au Maroc. Il est notoire que des groupes de savants ont été envoyés au Maroc aux fins d'étudier et de recommander des méthodes propres à préserver et à favoriser l'expansion de la culture musulmane. Il existe au Maroc l'Institut des études islamiques qui se compose de treize Facultés où se donnent des cours sur des sujets extrêmement variés. Dans ces conditions, le représentant de la France estime que les critiques du représentant de la Syrie sont injustifiées.

10. Pour expliquer les raisons qui ont poussé la délégation de la France à voter contre la proposition tendant à prolonger de trois ans l'existence du Comité spécial, M. Lapie désire remonter à l'origine de la question. Par sa résolution 66 (I), l'Assemblée générale a créé en 1946 le Comité pour un an, connu sous le nom de Comité ad hoc; l'année suivante, par sa résolution 146 (II), l'Assemblée générale a prolongé l'existence du Comité pour une autre année et a changé son nom en celui de Comité spécial. Le Comité a été prorogé de même en 1948 par la résolution 219 (III). Aujourd'hui, il est proposé de prolonger l'existence du Comité, non pas pour un an mais pour trois ans. Il est évident que l'on essaie, de cette manière, de créer un organe dont les fonctions doubleraient celles du Conseil de tutelle. La délégation de la France estime qu'aucune des dispositions de la Charte ne justifie cette mesure et elle a donc refusé de l'approuver.

11. Se référant à l'exposé que le représentant des Philippines a fait à la 114ème séance, M. Lapie signale que si les auteurs de la Charte avaient envisagé de créer un organe parallèle au Conseil de tutelle, ils l'auraient certainement fait. Par conséquent, la déclaration affirmant qu'une telle intention est contenue implicitement dans l'esprit de la Charte n'a aucun fondement réel. Il est exact que la question a été soulevée à la Conférence de San-Francisco, mais elle a été rejetée et la Charte a été rédigée dans sa forme actuelle. La France a participé à ces discussions et a appuyé la majorité qui a décidé de ne pas créer un tel organe. En étudiant la question en détail, on constaterait que la création du Comité spécial proposée constitue en fait une violation des dispositions de la Charte.

12. Cela ne veut pas dire qu'un Comité spécial ne puisse jamais être institué mais, pour le créer, il serait indispensable de modifier la Charte. Le Chapitre XVIII expose le mécanisme prévu pour reviser la Charte; il s'agit donc de savoir si on désire recourir à ce mécanisme.

13. M. Lapie reconnaît que le Comité spécial pourrait jouer un rôle utile pour les questions de procédure. Mais cela demande à être étudié avec soin. Les changements ne doivent pas être trop rapides. La délégation de la France estime, pour cette raison, qu'il faudrait prolonger les pouvoirs du Comité spécial pour un an, mais non pour trois ans.

14. On a demandé pourquoi la France avait cessé de transmettre des renseignements au sujet d'un certain nombre de territoires non autonomes qu'elle administre. On trouvera la réponse à cette question dans la Constitution française et dans la réserve relative à des considérations d'ordre constitutionnel qui est formellement exprimée à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte. Tout en étant entièrement disposé à répondre aux observations qui ont été faites, le représentant de la France souligne que son pays ne se considère pas le moins du monde comme étant en position d'inculpé. La délégation de la France estime que tous les membres de la Commission collaborent à une tâche commune, c'est-à-dire qu'ils s'efforcent ensemble d'améliorer le sort d'une partie du genre humain.

15. La conception de l'Union française est quelque chose de nouveau dans l'histoire; elle peut paraître déconcertante au premier abord, et peut-être est-il nécessaire de donner quelques explications.

16. M. Lapie signale les mots "sous réserve des exigences de la sécurité et de considération d'ordre constitutionnel", qui figurent à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte. Aux termes de la Constitution française, les anciens territoires coloniaux et le territoire de la métropole sont unis dans l'Union française. Il n'existe qu'une seule Constitution qui vaut pour la métropole, les départements d'outre-mer, les territoires d'outre-mer, les Territoires sous tutelle et les Etats associés. On ne saurait dire que la France contrevient aux dispositions de la Charte lorsqu'en certains cas elle se prévaut d'une réserve qui figure effectivement dans la Charte.

17. Le représentant de la France rappelle que, dans une lettre en date du 29 avril 1949 adressée au Secrétaire général (A/915), le Ministre des affaires étrangères de la France a exposé en détail les raisons qui ont incité le Gouvernement français à cesser de transmettre des renseignements pour un certain nombre de territoires. L'Union française, animée de l'esprit même qui a inspiré la Charte, a pour but d'émanciper les peuples qu'elle unit. Cette Union fait place aux territoires qui ont accédé à l'autonomie. Il n'est donc pas nécessaire de continuer à transmettre des renseignements en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 à partir du moment où l'évolution d'un territoire donné a fait des progrès suffisants.

18. En tout cas, la France affirme qu'en vertu de sa propre Constitution, et conformément aux réserves formulées dans la Charte, elle est seule juge du degré d'émancipation atteint par les populations qu'elle administre.

19. M. Lapie répond au représentant du Guatemala qui, comparant le régime colonial à une école d'indépendance politique, a prétendu à la 114ème séance que c'était une école dans laquelle les élèves n'étaient jamais reçus à l'examen de sortie; il fait observer à ce sujet que, pour ce qui concerne la France, un certain nombre de territoires qui, avant la guerre, étaient considérés comme des colonies, sont devenus des Etats indépendants, en vertu d'accords conclus avec la France. Quant à la question de savoir quels sont les critères dont il est tenu compte pour la délivrance des diplômes d'indépendance, c'est l'avis de la France que le seul critère qu'il soit possible d'appliquer est celui de l'esprit démocratique et de la maturité civique, lesquels s'obtiennent par l'enseignement et l'exercice de la responsabilité politique. La France a développé l'enseignement dans ces territoires; elle a très largement accordé le droit de vote, et étendra encore ce droit au fur et à mesure des progrès de l'instruction. Les autorités française elles-mêmes ont été étonnées de la rapidité avec laquelle l'idée de démocratie a pris racine en Afrique. C'est là un fait qui permet de bien augurer de l'avenir.

20. La création de l'Union française a été une tâche ardue. La France demeure fidèle à l'esprit de la Charte. Si elle s'autorise des exceptions prévues à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73, ce n'est pas pour contrevenir à la Charte, c'est au contraire pour l'appliquer, mais la France tient à ce que cette application se fasse de la façon qu'elle estime la meilleure. La Charte des Nations Unies et la Constitution de l'Union française ont été signées en même temps, avec les mêmes espoirs et pour les mêmes fins. L'idée de l'Union française a vu le jour à Alger, en pleine guerre, au moment même où l'idée de l'Organisation naissait de la Charte de l'Atlantique. L'une et l'autre se proposent le même but, à savoir la liberté et un niveau de vie élevé pour toute l'humanité. La France n'a d'autre souci que de servir l'humanité.

21. M. FAHY (Etats-Unis d'Amérique) déclare que la population de Porto-Rico sera vivement blessée par le tableau déformé que le représentant de la RSS d'Ukraine a fait de son pays à la 114ème séance. Le représentant des Etats-Unis ne tient pas à imposer à la Commission l'audition de tous les progrès réalisés par le peuple de Porto-Rico, et encore moins de l'aide apportée à ce dernier par le Gouvernement des Etats-Unis; il estime toutefois qu'il importe de signaler un certain nombre de faits.

22. Le 2 janvier 1949, M. Luis Muñoz Marín, premier Gouverneur élu de Porto-Rico — qui est né dans l'île et y a fait ses études — a prêté serment. Pour autant que M. Fahy le sache, Porto-Rico est le seul territoire non autonome qui élise son administrateur suprême au suffrage universel. Le territoire élit deux assemblées législatives. Vingt pour cent de son budget sont consacrés à l'instruction, qui est gratuite et obligatoire. Le représentant de la RSS d'Ukraine a prétendu que le Commissaire à l'instruction publique de Porto-Rico était nommé par le Président des Etats-Unis; c'est une indication qu'il a sans doute trouvée dans les renseignements présentés pour l'année 1947. Mais il ressort clairement des renseignements présentés l'année suivante que c'est désormais le Gouverneur de Porto-Rico qui procède à cette nomination; la population de l'île fixe et applique elle-même ses propres principes en matière d'enseignement.

23. M. Fahy a peine à comprendre sur quoi se fondent les allégations du représentant de la RSS d'Ukraine selon lesquelles la culture propre de Porto-Rico serait en voie de disparition. C'est l'espagnol qui est la langue d'enseignement dans les écoles primaires. Le territoire possède trois établissements d'enseignement supérieur (dont une université où étaient inscrits, pendant l'année scolaire 1947-1948, 10.000 étudiants, chiffre jamais atteint encore), qui s'emploient tout spécialement à former des fonctionnaires afin de hâter l'évolution du pays vers la capacité de s'administrer lui-même. L'école des arts industriels de Porto-Rico reçoit des étudiants qui proviennent de toute la région des Antilles.

24. Le représentant de la RSS d'Ukraine a décrit Porto-Rico comme un territoire de monoculture entièrement tributaire du marché des Etats-Unis et livré à l'hégémonie des Etats-Unis. Comme c'est le cas pour le reste de la région des Antilles, l'économie de Porto-Rico est essentiellement agricole. Mais la proportion de la population employée dans l'agriculture n'a cessé de diminuer depuis le début du siècle et, maintenant qu'ont été créées plus de cinquante industries nouvelles, ce pourcentage est inférieur à 40 pour 100. Le représentant de la RSS d'Ukraine a prétendu que Porto-Rico n'avait d'échanges commerciaux qu'avec les Etats-Unis. Or, en 1948, les importations de ce pays provenaient de cinquante-trois pays différents et les exportations de produits finis ou de denrées agricoles originaires de l'île se répartissaient entre trente-cinq pays.

25. Le représentant de la RSS d'Ukraine a fait état des ravages de la tuberculose à Porto-Rico. Il est vrai que la population souffre beaucoup de cette maladie mais il importe de ne pas oublier que son traitement, dans les régions tropicales, pose des problèmes particuliers. Les services sanitaires de Porto-Rico ont entrepris, sur toute l'étendue du territoire, une campagne au cours de laquelle seront vaccinés contre la tuberculose tous les enfants du pays; c'est l'une des premières fois qu'une campagne antituberculeuse de cette envergure est entreprise à l'aide du vaccin BCG.

26. M. FAHY ne se propose pas de rappeler la part que le Gouvernement des Etats-Unis a prise au progrès de Porto-Rico, mais il tient à assurer la Commission que son Gouvernement continuera à donner à la population de l'île toute l'assistance en son pouvoir.

27. M. CARPIO (Philippines), répondant au représentant de la France, rappelle qu'au cours de son intervention précédente, consacrée à l'interprétation juridique du Chapitre XI de la Charte, il a fait ressortir, en premier lieu, que l'Article 73 impose aux Puissances coloniales un certain nombre d'obligation ayant priorité sur celles qui sont énumérées à l'alinéa e dudit Article, et c'est là une affirmation qui n'a pas été démentie; en second lieu, qu'aux termes de l'Article 10 de la Charte, l'Assemblée générale a le droit de discuter des questions visées à l'Article 73 et de formuler des recommandations sur ces questions, et, en troisième lieu que, si le Conseil de tutelle est l'organe habilité à connaître des questions relatives aux Chapitres XII et XIII de la Charte et à formuler des recommandations à leur sujet, aucune disposition ne prévoit quel est l'organe compétent pour les questions se rapportant au Chapitre XI. Le représentant des Philippines avait indiqué alors que l'Assemblée générale devrait prendre des mesures pour combler cette lacune.

28. Mais le représentant de la France a prétendu qu'une telle décision rendrait nécessaire une révision de la Charte et serait contraire à l'esprit qui animait les auteurs de celle-ci. M. Carpio ne doute pas que le représentant de la France, qui est également un juriste, admettra que, quand il y a droit, il doit y avoir aussi moyen d'exercer ce droit; pour cette raison, puisque l'Assemblée générale dispose de certains droits en vertu de l'Article 73 de la Charte, elle doit également avoir le pouvoir d'exercer ces droits.

29. Le représentant des Philippines demande au représentant de la France de répondre à trois questions. Il voudrait savoir d'abord si le représentant de la France reconnaît l'existence des obligations découlant de l'Article 73 que M. Carpio a énumérées dans son intervention précédente, ou si le représentant de la France estime que les obligations des Puissances coloniales sont limitées à celles dont il est question à l'alinéa e de cet Article. En second lieu, il voudrait savoir si le représentant de la France reconnaît qu'en vertu des dispositions de l'Article 73, considérées en liaison avec celles de l'Article 10, l'Assemblée générale et la Quatrième Commission sont compétentes pour procéder à des examens et pour formuler des recommandations en vue de garantir le respect des obligations imposées par la Charte. Troisièmement, il voudrait savoir si le représentant de la France reconnaît ou non qu'il est nécessaire d'établir une procédure propre à assurer le respect des obligations énumérées à l'Article 73.

30. M. MUGHIR (Syrie) répond au représentant de la France qui a laissé entendre que le représentant de la Syrie n'avait pas lu le rapport du Gouvernement français relatif à l'instruction dans les territoires non autonomes administrés par la France. Non seulement il a lu ce rapport, mais il a également étudié quantité de renseignements provenant de sources marocaines et tunisiennes.

31. Le représentant de la France a parlé de la contribution apportée par son pays aux travaux des Instituts islamiques du Maroc et de la Tunisie. Or, ces Instituts existaient bien avant la conquête de l'Afrique du Nord par la France. D'autre part, ils n'ont jamais reçu aucune aide financière des autorités françaises.

32. Lorsque les Français ont occupé l'Afrique du Nord, ils ont trouvé un système cohérent d'administration ayant à sa tête un chef temporel et spirituel, situation dont parle dans ses ouvrages l'écrivain français Lyautey. Le représentant de la France n'a pas indiqué l'existence, au Maroc, d'une assemblée législative élue au suffrage universel; il n'a pas davantage laissé entrevoir que la création d'une telle assemblée pût être envisagée. Il n'existe, dans le territoire, aucune séparation entre le pouvoir exécutif et le pouvoir judiciaire. La liberté de déplacement est limitée comme l'est la liberté d'association. Il existe également une censure sévère de la presse. En mars 1948, il y avait plus de 1.200 publications arabes interdites. Les Marocains n'ont pas le droit de créer des syndicats ouvriers. Leurs biens peuvent être expropriés pour de multiples raisons. La situation économique a empiré sous l'occupation française; l'accroissement rapide du déficit budgétaire en témoigne. Les salaires n'ont pas augmenté en proportion du coût de la vie.

33. M. FARRAG (Egypte) dit que les arguments avancés par le représentant de la France pour justifier la décision de son gouvernement de ne plus transmettre des renseignements sur un certain nombre de territoires ne sont pas nouveaux. La délégation française s'est servie d'arguments semblables au cours de la première session de l'Assemblée générale, lorsque la France a essayé d'annexer les Territoires sous mandat du Togo et du Cameroun. Cette tentative a fort heureusement échoué et le représentant de la France a finalement été obligé d'admettre qu'aucune Puissance n'avait le droit de s'emparer des territoires placés sous son administration après la guerre de 1914-1918. Les restrictions imposées par les considérations d'ordre constitutionnel mentionnées à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte s'appliquent, de toute évidence, aux constitutions qui existaient avant l'adoption de la Charte des Nations Unies. La nouvelle constitution dont parle le représentant de la France a été adoptée en 1946.

34. M. ZARUBINE (Union des Républiques socialistes soviétiques) rappelle que le représentant de la France, lorsqu'il s'est efforcé de réfuter les faits avancés par un certain nombre de représentants, a accusé d'autres délégations de faire de la propagande. Cette manière de faire est un stratagème auquel les Puissances coloniales ont coutume de recourir pour éviter de donner une réponse directe aux critiques qui leur sont adressées. Pour sa part, la délégation de l'URSS a fondé ses observations exclusivement sur les faits contenus dans les renseignements transmis au Secrétaire général par les Puissances administrantes; en toute justice, elle ne peut donc être accusée de faire de la propagande.

35. Le représentant de la France n'a pas essayé de nier les faits cités qui sont une preuve évidente de l'absence de droits politiques dans les territoires non autonomes, de leur exploitation et de leur terrible pauvreté. Il est impossible de modifier les faits et les Puissances coloniales préfèrent s'en tenir à des généralités destinées à cacher à l'opinion publique mondiale les conditions qui existent dans les territoires non autonomes.

36. Le Gouvernement français a pris, unilatéralement, la décision de ne plus transmettre de renseignements sur certains territoires. Cependant, sans aucun doute, les Puissances administrantes doivent continuer à transmettre les renseignements exigés par l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte. La Quatrième Commission a le devoir de veiller à ce que les renseignements requis soient transmis, et de rappeler aux Puissances coloniales l'obligation qu'elles ont contractée de favoriser la prospérité des territoires non autonomes.

37. M. GALAGAN (République socialiste soviétique d'Ukraine) dit que, si le représentant des Etats-Unis a affirmé que la description des conditions existant à Porto-Rico faite par le représentant de la RSS d'Ukraine est inexacte, il n'a démenti aucun des faits avancés dans le discours de M. Galagan.

38. Le représentant des Etats-Unis n'a pas démenti que le Président de son pays pouvait user de son veto à l'égard des lois adoptées par l'Assemblée législative de Porto-Rico. Il n'a pas davantage démenti que le représentant de Porto-Rico au Congrès n'avait pas le droit de voter, ni même celui de prendre la parole, sauf quand le Congrès l'y autorisait à l'unanimité.

39. Le représentant des Etats-Unis s'est efforcé de contester les faits exposés par M. Galagan à propos de la situation économique de Porto-Rico. Cependant, les renseignements transmis en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 indiquent clairement que Porto-Rico n'est qu'une dépendance des Etats-Unis, que ses ressources sont exploitées dans l'intérêt des Etats-Unis alors que les habitants de Porto-Rico souffrent de la faim. Le représentant des Etats-Unis n'a pas nié l'existence d'un chômage généralisé ni celle d'un mouvement important d'émigration vers les Etats-Unis. Les émigrants de Porto-Rico vivent dans la misère et la délégation de la RSS d'Ukraine a reçu des lettres de certains d'entre eux qui se plaignent des conditions dans lesquelles ils vivent.

40. Le représentant de la RSS d'Ukraine mentionne également l'existence à Porto-Rico d'une loi relative à la limitation des naissances et indique qu'on pratique dans ce pays la stérilisation des mères.

41. Le représentant des Etats-Unis s'est également élevé contre l'accusation selon laquelle son gouvernement s'efforcerait de détruire la culture de Porto-Rico. Il n'a cependant pas démenti le fait que le Président des Etats-Unis a récemment usé de son veto à propos d'une loi relative à l'enseignement de l'espagnol dans les écoles de Porto-Rico.

42. Il est évident que les Puissances coloniales n'ont pas l'intention de se conformer aux obligations stipulées dans le Chapitre XI de la Charte. L'Assemblée générale ne doit pas permettre que des accusations faisant état d'une prétendue propagande l'empêchent d'exiger que les obligations découlant de ce Chapitre soient strictement remplies.

La séance est levée à 13 h. 30.

CENT VINGT-QUATRIEME SEANCE

Tenue à Lake Success, New-York, le lundi 14 novembre 1949, à 10 h. 45.

Président: M. H. LANNUNG (Danemark).

Renseignements provenant des territoires non autonomes (suite)

1. Le PRÉSIDENT invite la Commission à examiner le projet de résolution présenté par la délégation de l'Égypte, relatif aux territoires auxquels s'applique le Chapitre XI de la Charte (A/C.4/L.37).

2. M. FARRAG (Égypte) ne veut pas passer en revue les différentes étapes des travaux qui ont abouti à l'adoption du Chapitre XI de la Charte à San-Francisco, ni interpréter les dispositions de ce chapitre; il tient cependant à souligner que le projet de résolution présenté par sa délégation a un fondement solide étant donné qu'il est conforme à la fois à l'esprit et à la lettre de ce chapitre.

3. Il rappelle qu'à la session de l'Assemblée générale tenue en février 1946 le représentant des États-Unis, M. John Foster Dulles, a précisé que la déclaration relative aux territoires non autonomes ne concerne pas seulement les Puissances administrantes, mais bien l'ensemble des Nations Unies¹. M. Arthur Creech Jones, représentant du Royaume-Uni, a ajouté qu'il se réjouissait de voir enfin, dans le Chapitre XI, une convention coloniale internationale que toutes les Puissances qui ont adhéré à la Charte des Nations Unies seront dans l'obligation de respecter².

4. Étant donné de telles déclarations, M. Farrag estime qu'il est du devoir des Nations Unies, et plus particulièrement de l'Assemblée générale, d'inviter les Puissances administrantes à respecter cette convention, qui prévoit, entre autres, la transmission régulière de renseignements sur les territoires non autonomes.

5. Selon la résolution 66 (I), adoptée par l'Assemblée générale le 14 décembre 1946, le nombre des territoires non autonomes énumérés par les Puissances administrantes s'élevait à soixante-quatorze. En 1949, le nombre des territoires pour lesquels des renseignements ont été transmis est tombé à soixante-deux. M. Farrag pense que l'Assemblée générale a le droit de savoir si la diminution du nombre des territoires pour lesquels des renseignements ont été transmis est due à une modification quelconque intervenue dans la constitution et le statut de certains territoires. C'est à cette fin que l'Assemblée générale a adopté, en 1948, la résolution 222 (III). Le projet de résolution présenté par la délégation égyptienne a pour objet de compléter la procédure établie par la résolution 222 (III) et de permettre à l'Assemblée générale de s'acquitter des responsabilités qui lui incombent au sujet de la transmission par les Puissances administrantes des renseignements prévus à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte.

6. On a prétendu que l'Assemblée générale ne saurait adopter un projet de résolution tel que celui qui est présenté par la délégation égyptienne, car cela serait une atteinte aux droits souverains des Puissances administrantes. Cet argument n'est pas nouveau; il a déjà été soulevé devant la Quatrième Commission. M. Farrag rappelle que cette question a déjà fait l'objet de longues discussions en 1946, lorsqu'on a cherché à définir d'une manière plus précise l'expression "territoire non autonome". Il se réfère à ce sujet aux comptes rendus analytiques de la Sous-Commission II de la Quatrième Commission¹ et au document A/C.4/52 qui a été soumis à la Quatrième Commission en 1946². Les opinions exprimées à cette époque révèlent que les Puissances administrantes n'avaient pas soulevé la question de la compétence et n'avaient pas estimé que leurs droits souverains étaient menacés.

7. En ce qui concerne le projet de résolution présenté par la délégation égyptienne, M. Farrag estime que son contenu ne saurait donner lieu à des objections. Le préambule est fondé sur la Charte et est conforme à la résolution 222 (III). Le dispositif se borne à réaffirmer certaines prérogatives de l'Assemblée générale.

8. Le premier paragraphe du dispositif a trait à l'énumération des territoires non autonomes pour lesquels les Puissances administrantes doivent transmettre des renseignements, et dont le nombre est passé depuis 1946 de soixante-quatorze à soixante-deux. La délégation égyptienne estime qu'il y a lieu de se féliciter si certains de ces territoires sont arrivés à l'indépendance ou à l'autonomie. Toutefois, aussi longtemps qu'il existera des territoires qui ne s'administrent pas eux-mêmes, les obligations des Puissances administrantes subsisteront et l'Assemblée générale devra s'assurer que ces obligations sont respectées. Il est indispensable qu'il y ait coopération entre les Puissances administrantes et les autres Membres des Nations Unies; c'est pourquoi le projet de résolution de l'Egypte devrait être accueilli favorablement. En ce qui concerne le deuxième paragraphe du dispositif, M. Farrag estime que le Comité spécial est l'organe le plus approprié pour étudier les facteurs dont il convient de tenir compte et pour fournir un avis à l'Assemblée générale sur ce point.

9. M. DUARTE (Brésil) estime que les principes qui ont inspiré le projet de résolution égyptien sont conformes à l'esprit du Chapitre XI de la Charte. Le paragraphe 7 de l'Article 2 de la Charte a été interprété de façons tellement diverses qu'il est devenu presque impossible pour les Nations Unies de définir exactement l'expression "territoire non autonome".

10. Les mêmes interprétations ont été données en 1946 lorsqu'on a envisagé la constitution du Comité ad hoc. On a prétendu que la Charte ne prévoyait aucun mécanisme pour la mise en vigueur des dispositions du Chapitre XI, que la constitution du Comité ad hoc porterait atteinte à la souveraineté nationale de certains Etats et équivaldrait à une tentative d'amendement de l'Article 2 de la Charte. En dépit de cette opposition, le Comité a néanmoins été créé.

11. L'expérience a montré que le mot "intervenir", au paragraphe 7 de l'Article 2 de la Charte, ne doit pas s'entendre dans un sens étroit et technique lorsqu'il s'agit des responsabilités des Puissances administrantes. Dans le cas actuel, la Commission traite de questions qui ne relèvent pas essentiellement de la compétence nationale des Puissances administrantes; il n'est donc pas nécessaire d'analyser en détail les arguments d'ordre juridique et politique qui pourraient être avancés en faveur des principes estimables qui ont inspiré le projet de résolution de l'Egypte.

12. La délégation du Brésil votera en faveur de ce projet de résolution et elle espère qu'il recevra l'appui de la majorité des membres de la Commission. Etant donné l'importance de ce projet de résolution, M. Duarte demande que le vote ait lieu par appel nominal.

13. M. KHADRA (Arabie saoudite) appuie le projet de résolution de l'Egypte, car sa délégation estime qu'il est conçu dans l'esprit et selon la lettre de la Charte et qu'il servira les intérêts primordiaux des populations des territoires non autonomes.

14. Etant donné le ton mesuré et la nature conciliante de ce projet de résolution, M. Khadra espère que les Etats Membres qui administrent des territoires non autonomes seront mus par un sincère esprit de conciliation et voteront en faveur de ce projet.

15. M. Khadra estime que l'on évitera de nouveaux débats acerbes si l'on adopte le projet de résolution égyptien, parce qu'il donne le moyen d'établir des critères pour décider dans quelles circonstances les Puissances administrantes pourront cesser de transmettre des renseignements concernant les territoires dont elles ont la responsabilité. M. Khadra craint que, si ce projet de résolution n'est pas adopté, l'on n'entende les mêmes récriminations à la cinquième session de l'Assemblée générale et l'on ne risque d'aboutir à une impasse sérieuse.

16. Les Puissances administrantes ont peut-être des raisons qu'elles considèrent valables pour cesser de transmettre des renseignements sur un certain nombre de territoires, mais il est également possible que les Etats Membres qui n'administrent pas de territoires non autonomes réfutent ces raisons. M. Khadra pense que le projet de résolution égyptien propose une bonne solution pour établir des critères permettant de déterminer si un territoire est, ou n'est pas, non autonome. D'autre part, ce projet de résolution n'impose pas aux Puissances administrantes d'obligations autres que celles qu'elles ont acceptées lorsqu'elles ont ratifié la Charte.

17. M. Khadra espère que les délégations qui ne considèrent pas ce projet de résolution comme suffisamment énergique ne nuiront pas aux intérêts des populations des territoires non autonomes en ne votant pas en sa faveur.

18. M. Shiva RAO (Inde) déclare que plusieurs membres sont préoccupés par la décision unilatérale que certaines Puissances administrantes ont prise de cesser de transmettre des renseignements sur plusieurs territoires non autonomes énumérés dans la résolution 66 (I) de l'Assemblée générale.

19. Il tient à appeler l'attention de la Commission sur la résolution 222 (III) de l'Assemblée générale, qui se borne à demander aux Puissances administrantes d'exposer les raisons pour lesquelles elles cessent de transmettre des renseignements sur ces territoires. L'Assemblée générale s'est demandée si une telle décision de la part des Puissances administrantes était due au fait que les territoires intéressés avaient acquis l'indépendance ou l'autonomie, ou s'il s'agissait d'une simple omission ou si les Puissances avaient obéi à d'autres raisons encore. Le projet de résolution présenté par la délégation égyptienne ne met en doute ni le bien-fondé ni l'opportunité des décisions prises par les Puissances administrantes; son but est d'élucider la question en allant plus avant que la résolution 222 (III) de l'Assemblée générale.

² Ibid., Quatrième Commission, première partie, pages 273 à 275.

20. Le premier paragraphe du dispositif du projet de résolution établit clairement que l'Assemblée générale a le devoir d'exprimer son avis quant aux obligations contractées par les Puissances administrantes aux termes de l'Article 73 de la Charte. Le deuxième paragraphe invite le Comité spécial à étudier les facteurs dont il faut tenir compte pour décider si un territoire s'administre lui-même ou non.

21. Les Puissances administrantes elles-mêmes ne sont pas d'accord sur les critères qu'il faut appliquer pour prendre une telle décision. M. Rao se reporte aux déclarations du Royaume-Uni et de la France qui figurent dans le document A/915. Toutefois, les Puissances administrantes estiment que ce n'est pas à l'Assemblée générale, mais à la Puissance administrante intéressée qu'il appartient de déterminer si un territoire a cessé d'être un territoire non autonome. Il conviendrait donc que le Secrétaire préparât un document de travail sur la question, dont le Comité spécial pourrait s'inspirer lorsqu'il étudierait les facteurs dont il y a lieu de tenir compte.

22. Pour les raisons qui viennent d'être exposées, la délégation de l'Inde votera en faveur du projet de résolution de l'Egypte.

23. M. MARTURET (Venezuela) déclare que, de l'avis de sa délégation, la question des renseignements transmis en vertu de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte a une importance capitale.

24. Il rappelle qu'en 1946 les territoires au sujet desquels des renseignements ont été transmis étaient au nombre de soixante-quatorze; toutefois, par la suite, les Puissances administrantes n'ont plus transmis de renseignements que pour soixante-deux territoires.

25. La délégation du Venezuela estime que pour savoir comment il conviendra de mettre en œuvre les dispositions du Chapitre XI, l'Assemblée générale devrait déterminer nettement ce qu'il faut entendre par "territoire non autonome". L'expérience a montré que l'expression "non autonome" n'est pas suffisamment précise. Elle a donné lieu à des interprétations divergentes qui ont rendu difficile la tâche de l'Assemblée générale en ce qui concerne la mise en œuvre de l'Article 73. Aussi M. Marturet estime-t-il que tout effort de l'Assemblée générale en vue de clarifier la situation se justifierait. Le projet de résolution de l'Egypte est, à son avis, un pas dans la bonne voie, étant donné qu'il pourrait servir de base pour définir ultérieurement ce qu'il faut entendre par "territoire non autonome".

26. Ce projet de résolution établit nettement que l'Assemblée générale a le devoir de formuler une opinion quant aux principes sur lesquels se sont fondés les Etats Membres intéressés lorsqu'ils ont énuméré les territoires non autonomes au sujet desquels ils sont tenus de communiquer des renseignements. Il est évident que l'on ne saurait considérer l'énoncé de ces principes comme une ingérence dans les affaires qui relèvent de la compétence nationale des Puissances administrantes.

27. La délégation du Venezuela a déjà exprimé l'avis que le Comité spécial n'était pas compétent pour traiter la question de la transmission de renseignements sur les territoires non autonomes, mais elle considère que l'Assemblée générale est pleinement compétente pour le faire. S'il existait un organe spécial des Nations Unies chargé de déterminer la nature des liens qui doivent exister entre une Puissance administrante et un territoire non autonome, on pourrait interpréter ce fait comme constituant une ingérence dans les affaires intérieures de cette Puissance. On ne saurait en dire autant, néanmoins, si cet organe spécial se bornait à effectuer certaines études de nature juridique, politique, économique ou sociale qui serviraient à déterminer s'il convient de classer tel ou tel territoire comme territoire non autonome ou non.

28. M. Marturet considère donc que la majorité des membres devraient pouvoir accepter le projet de résolution de l'Egypte; sa délégation, pour sa part, votera en faveur de ce texte.

29. M. FLETCHER-COOKE (Royaume-Uni) rappelle qu'en présentant son projet de résolution le représentant de l'Egypte a déclaré que les Puissances administrantes étaient liées par les dispositions du Chapitre XI, puisqu'elles ont signé la Charte. Toutefois, M. Fletcher-Cooke tient à faire remarquer que les Puissances qui n'administrent pas de territoires non autonomes sont également liées par ces dispositions. Ni celles-ci, ni les Puissances administrantes ne peuvent rien ajouter ni rien supprimer dans ce Chapitre, si ce n'est conformément à la procédure de révision de la Charte qui a été adoptée.

30. Il sait bien qu'en présentant son projet de résolution, le représentant de l'Egypte ne pensait pas uniquement ni même principalement aux territoires dont le Royaume-Uni assume l'administration. Toutefois, M. Fletcher-Cooke croit utile de préciser la position de son Gouvernement, étant donné que le projet de résolution donne à penser que l'on s'est mépris sur les raisons pour lesquelles le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni a cessé de transmettre des informations sur Malte.

31. Lorsqu'il a cessé de transmettre des renseignements sur Malte, le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni n'a pas allégué que ce territoire avait atteint une complète autonomie au sens du Chapitre XI de la Charte. Toutefois, au cours de l'évolution d'un territoire non autonome vers l'autonomie, il y a souvent un stade, comme c'est le cas pour Malte, où la responsabilité de la gestion des affaires économiques et sociales et de l'enseignement, questions qui sont mentionnées à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte, n'incombe plus à la Puissance administrante intéressée, mais est confiée par la Constitution au gouvernement du territoire, bien que celui-ci n'ait pas encore atteint une entière autonomie. Lorsqu'on en est à ce point, les considérations d'ordre constitutionnel mentionnées à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte peuvent empêcher le gouvernement métropolitain de transmettre des renseignements sur ces questions car celles-ci ne sont plus de son ressort. Les mots "sous réserve . . . des considérations d'ordre constitutionnel" ont été insérés, à San-Francisco, dans le projet de texte de l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 sur l'initiative du représentant du Royaume-Uni, précisément pour prévoir une telle situation, et ce membre de phrase a été accepté avec l'addition des mots "des exigences de la sécurité et" qui avaient été proposés par le représentant des Etats-Unis. Etant donné qu'aux termes de la Constitution de 1947 Malte administre elle-même ses affaires intérieures, y compris celles qui sont énumérées à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73, le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni ne s'occupe plus de ces questions, pour des raisons d'ordre constitutionnel, et ne peut donc pas communiquer de renseignements à leur sujet. Il n'y a pas de doute que seule la Puissance administrante est à même de se prononcer sur la question des exigences de la sécurité et sur la nature de ses liens constitutionnels avec chacun des territoires dont elle est responsable. Ainsi que le représentant du Royaume-Uni l'a précisé au cours de la discussion de la résolution 222 (III) à la troisième session de l'Assemblée générale, le Royaume-Uni est disposé à aviser le Secrétaire général chaque fois que l'un des territoires qu'il administre atteindra un stade de développement constitutionnel où le Gouvernement du Royaume-Uni cessera d'être responsable des domaines énumérés dans l'alinéa e de l'Article 73, situation qui aura pour conséquence l'impossibilité constitutionnelle de transmettre les renseignements exigés par cet Article. Il s'agit donc simplement de faire savoir au Secrétaire général que cet état de choses existe; mais la Charte ne contient pas de dispositions confiant à l'Assemblée générale le soin de déterminer quels sont les effets des deux limitations mentionnées — exigences de la sécurité et considérations d'ordre constitutionnel — sur l'obligation de transmettre des renseignements incombant à un Etat Membre.

32. Il ne sera donc pas d'une grande utilité de chercher à déterminer ce qu'est un territoire non autonome, étant donné que ce facteur n'est pas nécessairement décisif. Au cas où le Comité spécial serait chargé de procéder à une étude de cette question, M. Fletcher-Cooke se verrait dans l'obligation de réserver la position de son Gouvernement quant à sa participation à ces travaux.

33. M. SHAHBAN (Pakistan) déclare que le projet de résolution de l'Egypte correspond tout à fait à l'opinion de sa délégation; celle-ci se prononcera donc sans réserve en sa faveur.

34. La délégation du Pakistan a peine à comprendre que l'on puisse élever des objections contre la proposition de l'Egypte, qui est entièrement conforme aux dispositions de la Charte. Le fait de cesser, par une décision unilatérale, de transmettre des renseignements sur un territoire pour la raison que ce territoire n'appartient plus à la catégorie des territoires non autonomes, peut donner lieu à des malentendus et faire naître des suspicions. Si un territoire acquiert son autonomie ou même une autonomie partielle, comme c'est le cas pour Malte, et si le gouvernement métropolitain intéressé en informe l'Organisation des Nations Unies en lui exposant toute la situation, l'Organisation acceptera volontiers de réduire le nombre des territoires au sujet desquels des renseignements doivent être communiquée.

35. M. GARREAU (France), tout en appréciant l'esprit dans lequel la délégation de l'Egypte a présenté son projet de résolution, se croit tenu de souligner qu'il est avant tout nécessaire de définir de façon satisfaisante ce qu'est, aux termes du Chapitre XI de la Charte, un territoire non autonome. Si la Puissance administrante peut décider de transmettre des renseignements sur un territoire, elle peut tout aussi bien décider, de son propre chef, qu'elle cessera de le faire. A San-Francisco, l'expression "territoire non autonome" n'a pas été définie; c'est une omission sur laquelle la France a constamment attiré l'attention au cours des trois dernières années. Si l'on adoptait le projet de résolution de l'Egypte sans formuler auparavant cette définition, ce serait mettre la charrue avant les bœufs.

36. La liste des territoires non autonomes qui intéressent l'Assemblée générale n'est pas complète, en ce sens qu'elle ne comprend pas tous les territoires auxquels les dispositions du Chapitre XI de la Charte peuvent s'appliquer. Il est donc injuste de considérer ce Chapitre comme ne s'appliquant qu'aux Puissances qui en ont loyalement observé les dispositions. Il s'applique à tous les Etats Membres de l'Organisation des Nations Unies.

37. La délégation de la France a élevé des objections de principe contre le projet de résolution soumis par les délégations du Mexique et des Etats-Unis qui a été adopté à la séance précédente. Le dispositif du projet de résolution de l'Egypte appelle les mêmes objections; aussi, tout en formulant de nouveau des réserves quant à la position du Gouvernement français à l'égard du Comité spécial lui-même, dont elle conteste la légalité, la délégation de la France votera contre le projet de résolution égyptien.

38. M. DE BRUYNE (Belgique) déclare que la délégation belge se trouve dans une situation privilégiée pour exprimer son avis sur le projet de résolution de l'Egypte; en effet, la Belgique a librement décidé que le Congo belge est le seul territoire non autonome sur lequel elle exerce des droits souverains et elle s'est engagée à fournir les renseignements prévus à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte. La délégation belge estime que toutes les populations moins évoluées du globe ont droit à ce que les Membres de l'Organisation des Nations Unies déclarent accepter à leur égard la mission sacrée que la Belgique a acceptée vis-à-vis du Congo belge.

39. Comme le représentant de la France l'a fait remarquer, la définition des populations non autonomes n'a pas encore été formulée. Certaines populations non autonomes vivent sur des territoires, d'autres dans des réserves; les régions où elles habitent sont, en certains cas, englobées dans les frontières d'un Etat ou bien contiguës à celles-ci, alors que dans d'autres cas elles en sont séparées par la mer.

40. De l'avis de la délégation belge, certains des arguments qui ont été présentés à ce sujet au cours des séances de la semaine précédente ne sont pas valables. Du point de vue juridique, que la région habitée par ces populations non autonomes soit englobée dans les frontières d'un Etat ou qu'elle leur soit extérieure, l'Etat plus évolué a certains droits sur cette région. Le Congo belge fait partie du territoire belge et il est soumis aux lois belges, tout comme certaines réserves sont soumises à la souveraineté d'autres Etats.

41. A propos d'une intervention de la délégation belge, le représentant du Mexique a dit que, dans son pays, la politique suivie à l'égard des populations moins évoluées est soumise au contrôle de l'opinion publique et du Parlement. Il en est exactement de même en Belgique et les annales parlementaires viennent prouver le souci humanitaire avec lequel tous les partis politiques belges suivent l'évolution des populations non autonomes.

42. Le Congo belge a connu deux statuts politiques: celui d'Etat indépendant et celui de colonie. Lorsqu'il était Etat indépendant, il était soumis à un monarque souverain et administré par une poignée de blancs; il avait son propre drapeau et un conseil colonial indépendant du Parlement belge. C'était en fait un Etat autoritaire. Si le Congo avait gardé son statut indépendant, il aurait ressemblé à bien des Etats représentés à l'Organisation des Nations Unies. Il aurait eu son propre délégué, qui aurait répudié toute immixtion, étrangère ou internationale, dans ses affaires intérieures. Du point de vue de la publicité internationale, la Commission admettra sans doute que le sort des populations du Congo est mieux assuré par le régime actuel que par celui qui l'a précédé.

43. A une séance précédente, le représentant de l'Uruguay a déclaré que, depuis la Conférence de San-Francisco, la politique coloniale a été soumise au jugement de la conscience universelle. La délégation belge ne juge certainement pas cela fâcheux, mais elle estime que ce contrôle moral de l'opinion publique devrait venir s'ajouter à un contrôle légal exercé par des institutions parlementaires.

44. Il pourrait être avantageux pour toutes les nations et pour les populations non autonomes d'avoir des renseignements officiels sur les mesures prises par certains Etats pour protéger et développer les langues, par exemple, celles des Indiens de l'Amérique centrale, de l'Amérique du Sud et du Nord, des Négritos des Philippines, etc. Il serait utile que tous les Membres de l'Organisation des Nations Unies reçoivent des statistiques sur le progrès de l'enseignement et, notamment, sur la formation économique et sociale des indigènes moins évolués dans tous les pays. Les projets de résolution adoptés au cours des tout derniers jours permettent de se rendre compte que si l'on prenait des mesures du même ordre dans tous les domaines sur lesquels la transmission de renseignements est prévue à l'alinéa e de l'Article 73 de la Charte, la prospérité des populations non autonomes s'en trouverait grandement favorisée. La délégation belge espère que le projet de résolution de l'Egypte a été inspiré par le désir d'étendre le bénéfice du Chapitre XI de la Charte au plus grand nombre possible de populations non autonomes.

45. La Commission ne doit pas se dissimuler qu'il existe, chez ses membres, une méfiance profonde, méfiance de la part des Puissances non administrantes à l'égard des unhappy few, et méfiance de la part des Puissances administrantes à l'égard d'une majorité qui rejette délibérément les garanties constitutionnelles explicitement prévues au Chapitre XI de la Charte.

46. En ce qui concerne le texte du projet de résolution égyptien, la délégation belge aurait préféré une référence plus courte au texte de l'Article 73 car, dans sa rédaction actuelle, la résolution égyptienne paraît préjuger l'interprétation de cet Article. Elle aurait préféré que le préambule comportât un considérant de plus, ainsi libellé: "Considérant que la résolution 66 (I), notant une situation de fait, ne peut interpréter au sens restrictif l'Article 73 relativement aux Membres des Nations Unies qui ont ou qui assument la responsabilité d'administrer des territoires non autonomes". Toutefois, les principales objections qu'élève la délégation belge au projet de résolution portent sur la rédaction du dernier paragraphe du dispositif. Dans ce paragraphe le membre de phrase "dont il convient de tenir compte" présente un caractère impersonnel, et on ne voit pas clairement si c'est à l'Assemblée générale ou à chacun des Etats qu'il appartient de tenir compte des facteurs dont il est question.

47. Comme elle l'a déjà indiqué à plusieurs reprises, la délégation belge estime que l'Assemblée générale n'est pas compétente pour exprimer une opinion ayant un effet obligatoire sur la manière dont les Puissances administrantes doivent se conformer aux dispositions du Chapitre XI. Par conséquent, même si l'Assemblée générale arrivait à définir ce qu'est un territoire non autonome, soit par la voie empirique, soit par toute autre méthode, elle n'aurait toujours aucun pouvoir pour décider si la définition s'applique à tel ou tel territoire. Toute décision de ce genre appartient aux seuls Etats Membres.
