votes to none, with 18 abstentions, adopted this draft resolution as resolution 2066 (XX). By this resolution, the General Assembly, after noting with deep concern that any step by the administering Power to detach certain islands from the Territory of Mauritius for the purpose of establishing a military base would be in contravention of the Declaration contained in resolution 1514 (XV), and in particular of paragraph 6 of that Declaration, invited the administering Power to take effective measures for the immediate and full implementation of resolution 1514 (XV). It also invited the administering Power to take no action which would dismember the Territory of Mauritius and violate its territorial integrity.

12. Mauritius

The General Assembly considered the question of Mauritius at its twentieth session on the basis of the recommendation on the Territory in the Special Committee's report for 1964 and the additional information in its 1965 report.

The Fourth Committee was informed of two United Kingdom Government decisions affecting the Territory. The first was that Mauritius should become independent probably by the end of 1966. The second, announced early in November 1965, was that a dependency of Mauritius was to form part of a new colony which, according to reports, was to be used for the construction of a military base.

On 26 November 1965 the Fourth Committee approved a draft resolution on the question of Mauritius by a roll-call vote of 77 to none, with 17 abstentions. On 16 December 1965, the General Assembly, by 89

NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

Transmission of Information by Members
under Article 73(e) of the Charter

Report of the Secretary-General

SUMMARY OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED
BY THE UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENT

By letters of 21 June and 1 July 1947 the permanent United Kingdom representative to the United Nations forwarded information transmitted by the United Kingdom Government under Article 73(e) of the Charter in respect of the following Non-Self-Governing Territories:

Barbados	Jamaica
British Honduras	Malayan Union
Brunei	Mauritius
Cyprus	Nyasaland
Gambia	St. Lucia (Windward Islands)
Gibraltar	Sierra Leone
Gilbert & Ellice Islands Colony	Singapore
Hong Kong	Zanzibar Protectorate

The above information is classified under the following main headings:

- I. Area, population, and vital statistics
- II. Occupations, wages and labour organisations
- III. Finance and trade
- IV. Production
- V. Social services
- VI. Communications

1) By virtue of Resolution No. 66 (I) of the General Assembly, this Summary is also being laid before the ad hoc committee on the transmission of information under Article 73(e) of the Charter.

Summaries of the information follow, the territories being arranged in the order suggested by their geographical situations. The summaries are preceded by short descriptions of the territories. These descriptions have been compiled by the secretariat and any other explanation given by the secretariat is so indicated.

As a general rule, the complete information as transmitted by the United Kingdom Government has been given. In some cases certain detailed figures, however, have been summarized, as for example those relating to public finance and to the staffing of various Government departments.

In Non-Self-Governing Territories administered by the United Kingdom, the technical terms colonies, protectorates, and protected states are sometimes used. Some of these territories comprise under the one Governor and Administration a part that is technically a colony and the rest that is technically a protectorate. The distinction is juridical and historical; there is little or no difference in administrative practice. Generally speaking the colony is a small coastal strip which was taken over by the British during the period of their first contact; when later they extended their sway into the hinterland the latter was made a protectorate. All four British West African territories are a case in point. According to Lord Lugard (The Dual Mandate, pp. 35-36), a colony "is annexed territory and an integral part of the king's dominions, acquired either by conquest, settlement or cession, and since all inhabitants born in it have the status of British subjects, herein appears to reside the chief distinction between it and a protectorate." According to Halsbury (Laws of England, 1909, p. 521) "There is no statutory or authoritative definition of the term "protectorate"... Protectorates are not British territory in the strict sense... They are administered under the provisions of Orders in Council issued by virtue of powers conferred upon His Majesty by the Foreign Jurisdiction Act 1890... or otherwise vested in His Majesty."

As regards the Protected States the general rule is that such a state does not cease to be a Sovereign State and its head is still entitled to the immunities and dignity of a sovereign ruler. Relations between the United Kingdom and the Protected State are determined by treaty.

MAURITIUS

Mauritius is an island in the Indian Ocean, distant 115 miles from Reunion, 934 from the Seychelles, 1300 from Natal, and 500 miles from Madagascar. It has an extreme length of 39 miles from north to south, and an extreme breadth of 29 miles from east to west.

The dependencies of Mauritius comprise a large number of islands scattered over the Indian Ocean. The most important is Rodrigues, situated 344 miles from Mauritius. The island is 18 miles long by 7 miles broad. The remaining dependencies are the Oil Islands group, of which the principal island is Diego Garcia, situated about four days sailing from Mauritius.

Chemist - In charge of all chemical investigations dealing with agricultural products and with local industries such as alcohol, tobacco, aloe fibres, pastures, etc, etc, . Lectures at the College of Agriculture. Now in charge of control and distribution of fertilisers.

Assistant Chemist - In charge of the chemical analyses in the Laboratory. Lecturer at the Agricultural College.

Scientific Assistant - Chiefly in charge of all the routine chemical work. Demonstrator at the Agricultural College.

Temporary Officer in charge of research work on the Aloe Fibre Industry.

Plant Pathology Division

Plant Pathologist - Research on major plant diseases occurring in the Island with special reference to sugarcane. Advice to planters concerning outbreak of plant diseases. Control of plant inspection service at the ports. Lecturer Agricultural College.

Assistant Plant Pathologist - Research on major plant diseases especially those of the sugarcane and bacterial diseases. Lecturer Agricultural College.

Plant Inspector - Visit to planters - laboratory work connected with plant diseases, inspection of plant material at the ports.

Entomological Division

Entomologist - Control - Administration, organisation of research work local and abroad. Lecturer in Entomology and Zoology at the College of Agriculture. Sometimes on Entomological mission abroad, searching for parasites, re: the control of various major pests existing in the Island.

Assistant Entomologist - Research on various insects pests re: their control. Assistant lecturer in Entomology and Zoology at the College of Agriculture.

Scientific Assistant - General taxonomy - assists in research work the Entomologist and Assistant Entomologist.

Two Phytalus Officers - Routine work re: control of Phytalus, i.e., surveys, collection and distribution of parasites.

Temporary Scientific Assistant for laboratory work re: breeding and study of the bionomics of various insects and parasites (imported and local ones).

Temporary Phytalus Officer to act in stead of the Phytalus Officer when this Officer is on mission abroad. Laboratory work re: the study of the bionomics of sugarcane borers and other insect pests. Is actually detailed to act as plant Inspector at Customs (2 days per week).

Temporary Assistant - Was initially employed for mass breeding of Trichogramma parasites during the war. Since then the work has been given up; this Officer is now employed on the mounting of insects, general care of collections and card indexing of literature in the division.

Sugar Technology Division

Sugar Technologist - In charge of research work of the division, of the workshop of the Department and of the Yeast Factory. Advisor of Sugar Factories on Sugar Technological problems. Lecturer in Sugar Technology, College of Agriculture.

Assistant Sugar Technologist - Assistant Lecturer in Sugar Technology. Lecturer in Engineering and Surveying, College of Agriculture.

Superintendent Yeast Factory. -

Tobacco Division

Government Officers - Government Tobacco Officer responsible for the operation of the Government Tobacco Station at Richelieu and for the running of the Government Tobacco Warehouse.

Temporary Scientific Assistant - To help in the work of the Government Tobacco Station, Richelieu.

Assistants employed by the Government Tobacco Board to help in the conduct of experiments at Richelieu-3 in number.

Central Board Division

Administrative

Registrar - Preparation of preliminary reports on cases submitted to the Central Board for Adjudication. Calculation of the share of sugar accruing to planters or groups of planters who enter into provisional contracts. Registration of cane contracts. Is responsible for the executive work of the Central Board and is also the Surveyor of the Board.

Technical

Chief Chemist and Assistant Registrar - Principally in charge of the carrying out of sucrose content tests on planters' canes.

Assistant Chemist.

Senior Test Chemist.

Weighbridge Inspector & Investigational Officer - Responsible for the testing, verifying, marking, stamping and control of cane weighbridges; control of weighing of planters' canes. Investigations re: disputes between millers and planters.

Accountant - (vacant) - To calculate the costs of production of cane and sugar.

Clerical

Two Clerks.

One Clerk principally in charge of registration of cane contracts.

Sugarcane Research Station

Senior Chemist, Officer in charge Sugarcane Research Station and Assistant to Director of Agriculture - Research in soil and plant chemistry, organization of research; administration duties.

Assistant Chemist - Research in soil and plant chemistry.

Botanist - Research re: physiology of cane, tests for plant food deficiencies, weed control experiments.

Temporary Scientific Assistant Botanical Division.

Geneticist - Raising and testing of new seedling varieties of sugarcane.

Assistant Geneticist.

Assistant in charge of Cultural Operations - Conduct of demonstration plots on small planters' lands with a view to improving cultural methods and to increase the spread of new varieties of cane.

One Assistant for analysing canes.

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED

UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL

SUMMARY OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM

The permanent representative of the United Kingdom to the United Nations forwarded information transmitted by the United Kingdom Government under Article 73 e of the Charter in respect of the following Non-Self-Governing Territories:

Bahamas
Barbados	Jamaica
Basutoland	Malaya
Bechuanaland	Mauritius
Bermuda	North Borneo
British Honduras	Singapore
Brunei	Swaziland
Gambia	Trinidad

Summaries of the information follow in the above alphabetical order. They are classified under the main headings which are contained in Parts II to IV of the Standard Form for the guidance of Members in the preparation of the information. They are preceded by brief secretarial notes on the geographical location and population of the territories. Unless otherwise stated the information relates to the calendar year 1947.

MAURITIUS

Mauritius is an island in the Indian Ocean, distant 115 miles from Reunion, 934 miles from Seychelles, 1,300 miles from Natal, and 500 miles from Madagascar. It has an extreme length of 39 miles from north to south, and an extreme breadth of 29 miles from east to west.

The dependencies of Mauritius comprise a large number of islands scattered over the Indian Ocean. The most important is Rodrigues, situated 346 miles from Mauritius. The island is 18 miles long and 7 miles broad. The remaining dependencies are the Oil Islands group, of which the principal island is Diego Garcia situated about 4 days sailing from Mauritius.

The total land area of Mauritius and its dependencies is 804 square miles, and in 1946 the total population was estimated to be 428,273, including 271,636 Indians and 11,836 Chinese.

II. SOCIAL CONDITIONS

A. Social problems of race and cultural relations.

The Mauritians of French descent numbering only a few thousand are all of the owning and managerial class. The labour force is composed chiefly of Indo-Mauritians of whom there are some 265,000, who are agricultural workers and peasants rather than town dwellers. The Chinese, wealthy and hard working, are mostly business men and retail traders. The English population consists of members of the Garrison, higher Government officials and business managers. With a population of such diverse origins there are wide differences in the standard of living, the average standard being low, due to insufficient production; housing conditions amongst the poor are faulty. In recent years the expenditure upon public assistance has steadily increased as a result of the gradual breakdown of the Indo-Mauritian family system.

No discrimination is imposed upon the indigenous population, and there has been no necessity for legislation to safeguard their interests.

B. Labour and employment conditions

The policy as regards labour is, by improving industrial relations and conditions, to increase production and to raise the living standard of the workers. It is the aim of the Labour Department to arrange for wage agreements through collective bargaining, and in cases where workers are insufficiently organized, to impose minimum rates of wages. Special problems include the displacement of labour during certain seasons of the year, poor housing accommodation, and the inexperience of both trade union officials and employers as regards trade union procedure and collective bargaining.

Skilled artisans and mechanics received in 1947 average rates ranging from Rs. 73.30 <sup>(1)</sup> to Rs. 101.42 per month, and semi-skilled workers from Rs. 39 to Rs. 76 per month. Daily paid labour in the sugar industry, whether field or factory workers, receives Rs. 2.24 per day from January to June and Rs. 2.40 per day from July to December, in class I; and Rs. 1.40 and Rs. 1.50 for corresponding periods, in Class II.

All workers receive a cost of living allowance of 50 per cent of their basic wage; monthly workers receive a regularity bonus of either 5 per cent or 20 per cent of their basic wage according to their category with an additional end-of-year bonus of half their basic wage, while overtime is paid at 1 1/3 the hourly rate for the first four hours and thereafter at 1 1/2 times.

A maximum of 48 hours per week is worked in all industries.

The legal status of employers' and workers' organizations is based upon the Industrial Associations Ordinance, 1938, as subsequently amended. There are 26 principal organizations in the Territory among which are included teachers' unions, Government employees unions and producers' and owners' associations.

(1) Note by the Secretariat: 1 rupee = 1s. 6d. (sterling)

The regulation of employer/employee relations and the machinery for the settlement of industrial disputes is governed by the Trade Disputes Ordinance of 1947.

Three strikes occurred in 1947, which involved a total loss of 106,289 working days.

The following is the principal labour legislation:

- Labour Ordinance
- Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance
- Apprenticeship Ordinance
- Minimum Wages Ordinance
- Workmen's Compensation Ordinance
- Shop Hours Ordinance
- Factories (Safety of Workers) Ordinance
- Industrial Associations Ordinance
- Trade Disputes Ordinance

In addition to the Labour Department staff, there is a Registrar of Trade Unions, an official chairman of Conciliation Boards and an Industrial Court Magistrate.

It is difficult to obtain reliable data on the incidence of unemployment in the main industry of Mauritius, the sugar industry, since a considerable portion of the agricultural labourers do not depend entirely upon wage earning for their livelihood. There is a degree of unemployment among certain categories of workers, and among certain occupations as well as under-employment in the thickly populated areas.

There is no appreciable migration of labour into, from or within the Territory.

C. Public Health and sanitation

The main functions of the Health Department are the protection of the community from disease, the improvement of social environment through better hygiene and sanitation and the provision of medical relief.

Endemic diseases form the main health problems, and, in particular, malaria, and intestinal diseases are common all over the Island. Wide powers have been given to the health authorities by an Ordinance which came into force in 1946, and a large malaria control organization has been active since the end of that year.

Anaemia is widespread as a result of food deficiencies created by the war, and malaria plays a significant role in aggravating this condition. Efforts are being made to increase the amount of foodstuffs imported and to encourage local production.

The programme of the Health Department includes the recording of accurate vital statistics, and an Ordinance was passed in 1948 providing for compulsory death certificates in certain proclaimed areas. The measures will later be extended to the whole Territory. Health education is provided through courses in hygiene and sanitation in all schools. Talks on public health are broadcast and house-to-house inspections are conducted by sanitary officers.

The expenditure of the Health Department for the financial year 1946-1947 amounted to Rs. 2,574,829. There are no grants-in-aid from the metropolitan government.

There are three general hospitals and five district hospitals, with a total of 1,110 beds. The three general hospitals have radiological facilities and are fully equipped for major surgical work. There is also a leper hospital with 47 beds, and a mental hospital with 680 beds. An orthopedic centre has been established in temporary buildings. There are 33 dispensaries, and two mobile dispensaries have recently been added to serve remote localities.

Ante-natal, maternity and child welfare work, hitherto carried out by two voluntary organizations is now supplemented by a public ante-natal clinic. There is a superintendent of midwives who co-ordinates and supervises the maternity and child welfare services.

The medical staff consists of 83 doctors, 9 dentists, 107 nurses, 238 midwives, 83 medical practitioners and 6 veterinary practitioners.

There are training facilities for nurses, sanitary inspectors and midwives.

The following is a summary of the vital statistics:

a)	Number of deaths	8,680
	Death rate per 100,000 population	2,007.3
b)	Number of births	18,926
	Birth rate per 1,000 population	43.8
c)	Number of deaths under one year of age	2,156
	Infant mortality rate per 1,000 live births	113.9

d) Principal diseases causing high morbidity:

	Number of cases
Malaria	44,603
Anaemia	14,142
Dyspepsia	8,468
Ankylostomiasis	8,215
Ascariasis	7,574

e) Principal diseases causing high mortality:

	Actual Number of deaths	Death rate per 100,000 population
Malaria	1,782	412
Diarrhoea and enteritis	799	185
Anaemia	572	130

Malnutrition is widespread, partly due to malaria and hookworm, but there is insufficient evidence to assess accurately the extent. The local diet is characterized by the fact that a high proportion of calories (25 per cent in 1947) is obtained from sugar. This percentage is even higher for the poorer classes. On the whole there is a caloric deficiency and the diet is low both in protein and vitamin B.

D. Housing conditions and programmes

A fund of Rs. 6,000,000 is available for the reconstruction of estate housing, and a decision on the policy to be adopted by Government in this connection is pending.

E. Welfare and relief

There is no social insurance scheme as yet, but there is a Poor Law system which has recently been brought into line with modern practice. A Public Assistance Committee drawn from all sections of the population, together with the field officers of the Welfare Department, disposes of all applications for relief. About half a million rupees are disbursed annually, and in 1947, Rs. 560,219.24 were disbursed to 7,284 persons. Award of relief is dependent on the means test. The Poor Law Institutions also provide care for cripples, orphans and others. The majority of these institutions are run by Christian sisters, but Hindus and Muslims each have an institution of their own.

In addition to state-aided institutions, and voluntary organizations such as the British Red Cross, Toc H and Societe St. Vincent de Paul, there are two other organizations which play an important role. These are the Maternity and Child Welfare Society with 14 branches and the Oeuvre Pasteur de la Goutte de Lait, which is run by the municipal corporation of Port Louis.

F-G. Crime Statistics and description of penal administration

Information transmitted but not summarized.

H. Information on development programmes

See Section IV, I.

III. Educational Conditions

The educational policy is directed towards building up a happy and useful agricultural community, and to this end the primary school is regarded as a centre to improve the conditions of the town or village in which it lies, and as the local agent of agriculture, health and social welfare services.

Primary education is free. Compulsory education was first introduced in 1945 in four villages on an experimental basis. Fees in secondary schools amount to about £1 per month.

One of the chief educational problems is that of language. Mauritius is polyglot. A creole patois derived from French is the lingua franca. There is, however, a growing demand for the teaching of Indian languages, in Government and aided primary schools. In addition, in communities with either creole or an Indian language as its mother tongue, the place of English and French is a matter of controversy and poses an educational problem hitherto insoluble.

Before the war, the Indo-Mauritian esteem for scholarstic proficiency as the passport to escape from the drudgery of field labour was creating a declasse and unemployable group. This problem, however, has been solved by war-time and post-war full employment and by an aggressive educational policy.

The Education Ordinance of 1944 extended inspection to non-Government secondary schools as a prerequisite to their approval for grants-in-aid, and teachers who have not qualified at the Government Teacher's Training College, have to be approved by the Director of Education. The Village Council is gradually becoming interested in the welfare of the school children and in time it is expected to play a part in the direction and control of the village school. It is now represented through the Civil Commissioner for questions concerning amenities of the school and the composition of its staff.

The educational budget for the current year is 2.4 million rupees. There is provision for building schools under the Ten Year Development Programme in which a total of 5.5 million rupees has been allocated for educational development.

Information on school buildings and other facilities and on the curriculum and languages of instruction was transmitted but is not summarized.

As regards opportunities for higher education, the Royal College and several of the other secondary schools go up to Higher School certificate. There is also a Teachers Training College.

It is estimated that some 130 Mauritians are taking professional studies overseas, mostly in the United Kingdom.

Nineteen scholarships for studies overseas were awarded during 1947, and eleven scholarships to Mauritians who had left the Colony for the United Kingdom. Provisions also exist for awarding scholarships to Mauritian ex-servicemen.

No adult education campaign exists at present, but sectarian night schools do a little in this direction. Sporadic movements exist and receive Government encouragement.

There is an Agricultural College which provides a three-year course in sugar technology, factory engineering, agricultural engineering and chemistry. Facilities exist in the Territory for the training of pharmacists, and an ad hoc Board appointed by the Governor, examines for the local Diploma in Pharmacy which is also a licence to practice.

There are eight Mechanical Engineering Apprenticeships awarded annually, tenable in the workshops of Government Railways. A Committee representing the Department of Labour, employers and trade unions is at present working out a regularised apprenticeship system with a scale of graded remuneration.

A total of 140 educational institutions are under the direct supervision of Government.

There were 49,161 children enrolled in primary schools, of whom 45,188 were in Government and Government-aided schools, and 3,973 in unaided schools. There were 5,784 children enrolled in secondary schools; 2,302 were in Government and aided schools; while 3,482 were in unaided schools. The percentage of enrolment to the number of children of school age was 62 per cent for primary schools (between 5 and 12 years of age) and 8 per cent for secondary schools (between 12 and 19 years of age). There were 1,448 primary and 398 secondary school teachers. In Government-aided primary schools the pupil teacher ratio was 35 to 1, and in the secondary schools it was 14 to 1. In unaided primary schools this ratio was 22 to 1; and in secondary schools it was 15 to 1. Per capita expenditure on education was Rs.32.21, primary education and Rs.75 for secondary education, both in Government-aided schools.

The British Council makes grants to public and school libraries, and maintains a small but representative library of British literature. The local press and broadcasting services are both extremely active. There is a full-time Visual Education Officer, and there are three 16 mm. sound projectors. The Government maintains the Mauritius Institute and Public Library which has now been developed into a teaching museum of high quality.

IV. Economic Conditions

A - C Natural resources and production

The Island has no mineral wealth of importance. The staple industry is the production of sugar, sugar cane plantations cover about 33% of the area of the Island. The 1947 production of sugar was valued at approximately Rs. 100 million. A by product of the sugar industry is alcohol distilled from molasses, valued at Rs. 2½ million annually.

The next industry of importance is the production of hemp (fibre) from the aloe plant. The finished product is valued at Rs. 700,000 annually.

Other products are tea, tobacco, salt and lime.

There are approximately 44,000 acres of pasture land and roughly 15 million litres of milk are produced annually with 20 thousand metric tons of butter.

Cultivation of food crops has so far proved insufficient for local consumption. Local fisheries produce some 2,000 tons of fish annually.

The total area of forest land is about 100,000 acres, and the value of products from the crown forests is estimated at Rs.675,000 annually.

Of a total of 430,907 acres, 214,093 (46.5%) are under sugar cane and mixed farming; 110,326 (23.9%) consist of private and crown lands suitable for agriculture including tea growing; and 106,488 acres (23.1%) consist of crown lands, including natural reserves, productive forests and protected areas.

The principal crop production was as follows:

Crop	Acreage	Total Production metric tons
Sugar	201,000	350,000
Maize	3,873	1,856
Aloe fibre	3,500	940
Manioc	734	2,816
Sweet potatoes	380	1,456
Groundnuts	256	123
Arouilles	183	700

There are 5,000 acres of forest reserves. Exploited areas consist of 50 acres, mostly pine and eucalyptus, and about 175 acres of underwood.

The Fisheries Department has a research station under two marine biologists. Approximately 1,855 metric tons of fish were caught in the coastal fisheries.

Sugar is the chief soil conservation agent, since its roots, which spread rapidly, hold the soil extremely well, and it adds organic matter to the soil in the form of dried leaves, with other crops terracing is sometimes done.

There are four main types of soil, mature and immature soils of lateritic formation, sandy soils and dark grey siliceous soils.

There are two large irrigation schemes operated by Government. Natural drainage is relied on for carrying off excess water.

Agricultural machinery used on estates at the end of 1946 consisted of: 1,827 kilometers of rails, 232 locomotives, 7,940 wagons, 215 lorries and 139 tractors.

Mechanization on the sugar plantations is limited, owing to the shortage of supply; in any case many fields are too rocky to benefit by use of machinery.

dd.

Artificial fertilizer and penmanure or compost are used for sugar and other crops.

The Sugarcane Research Station has carried out plant breeding work since 1930, and at least 90% of the sugar cane now being grown on the island is derived from local varieties.

The agricultural college admits about ten students annually for training as sugar technicians. Provision is made for the best student completing his studies in any one year to proceed overseas to take a degree course.

The Agricultural Department maintains five experimental stations and one dairy. There are many experimental and demonstration plots on the estates. The Sugarcane Research Station has an extension service to advise small planters, in particular, on more up-to-date methods of cultivation. There are instructors for improved cultivation of tobacco, and the Tobacco Board trains a certain number of apprentices each year.

The area of land alienated under freehold is 441,802.50 arpents<sup>1)</sup> The Government holds an area of 82,027.28 arpents, of which 10,435.69 have been leased.

About 25% of the land is cultivated by small planters, mostly Indians.

At the end of the financial year there were 79 credit societies in Mauritius with 4,975 share holders, and total loans during the year amounted to Rs. 918,278. The new Co-operative Societies Ordinance, 1945, was put into operation as from 1 October 1946, and a drive was made in March 1947 for starting consumer societies. Three co-operative stores have been registered, and another five are about to be, while work has been begun on another twelve.

In Rodriguez at the end of the year there were 21 credit societies in operation, with a total of 415 members, and total loans during the year amounted to Rs. 33,514.

There are four power stations, three of which are hydro-electric, with a total energy production of 12,397,800 kWh.

There are 31 sugar factories, 11 distilleries, 1 oil refinery, 5 soap factories, 23 aloe fibre factories and one factory producing sacks for packing sugar. There are 3 tobacco factories, 32 factories producing lime, 10 producing salt, and two producing matches.

Village industries are practically non-existent, but Mauritius is well provided with skilled workers such as carpenters, stonemasons, jewellers, rattanware workers, shoe makers, cabinet makers, and joiners.

D. Standard of living.

No figures are available for the Territorial income. Retail prices include: flour, Rs. 0.38 per kilo; beef, Rs. 1.70 per kilo; grey cotton shirting, Rs. 0.87 per metre; and shoes Rs. 23.50 a pair. Flour, rice and beans are subsidized by Government.

F. Public Finance

Revenue amounted to Rs. 50,511,566 and expenditure to Rs. 52,513,054. The revenue included Rs. 1,949,627 from special revenue, and Rs. 10,796,084 from Imperial Funds for assistance to the Sugar Industry.

Surtax and excess profits taxes were not re-enacted for the current year. Poll tax for companies was increased from 30% to 35%. Income tax in respect of individuals begins at incomes of Rs. 4,000 for which the tax chargeable is Rs. 60 and rises to Rs. 12,900 for incomes of Rs. 50,000. On incomes in excess of Rs. 50,000 a flat rate of 50% is charged, and 60% on incomes in excess of Rs. 100,000.

G. Banking and credit

Information was transmitted on the number of banks.

H. International trade

Total imports amounted to Rs. 110,707,720, including:

Food, drink, tobacco (including Rs. 20,843,891 for grain and flour)	Rs. 42,147,902
Clothing and textiles	Rs. 9,674,542
Drugs, chemicals and fertilizers (including guano)	Rs. 4,088,287
Machinery, metals and vehicles	Rs. 5,440,899

Total exports amounted to Rs. 67,290,675. Only three items were exported:

Sugar	Rs. 66,075,683
Alcoc fibre	Rs. 45,159
Rum	Rs. 1,169,833

The chief direction of imports was as follows:

Countries of origin	Approximate Percentage of trade
United Kingdom	25 %
Australia and New Zealand	22 %
India	13 %
Egypt	8.4 %
Union of South Africa	5.9 %

No commercial agreements were entered into during the year.

I. Development programmes

There is a Ten Year Development Programme for Mauritius, which involves an expenditure of Rs. 102,821,609. General progress was handicapped by the lack of supervisory staff and materials.

Progress during the year included: plant breeding and pest control in the field of agriculture; the purchase of a new training school site for which building plans are being drafted; the establishment of domestic science and handicraft centres; the establishment of a new insecticide unit as part of the malaria control programme; the commencement of construction of the Mare Longue Irrigation and Storage Reservoir; and the establishment of a new Fisheries Experimental Station.

The development programmes will be financed as follows:

Rs. 23,330,000, with an additional Rs. 628,436 for research, from the Colonial Development and Welfare Fund; Rs. 50,000,000 from loan funds; and Rs. 28,863,173 from subventions and reimbursements.

The ten-year allocations of the funds fall under the following main headings:

Agriculture	Rs. 3,500,100
Education (Training College)	Rs. 2,000,000
Health and nutrition	Rs. 6,642,610
Sewerage, irrigation and water supplies	Rs. 34,013,000
Roads and buildings	Rs. 26,850,000
Sugar industry	Rs. 6,000,000
Other purposes	Rs. 5,499,702
Unallocated	Rs. 18,316,197

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES:
SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED
UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER. REPORT OF THE
SECRETARY-GENERAL

Summary of information transmitted by the Government of the United Kingdom<sup>1/</sup>
(Africa)

On 28 June, 6 and 18 July 1949 the Permanent Delegation of the United Kingdom to the United Nations forwarded copies of the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on certain territories, including:

Aden
Kenya
Mauritius
Nyasaland
Swaziland
Uganda

Summaries follow in the above alphabetical order. Unless otherwise stated the information relates to the calendar year 1948. Use has been made of previous information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. Where, in addition, supplemental information has been consulted, this is indicated by footnotes. Where information was not specifically provided on the geography and population of the territories brief notes have been included by the secretariat.

GENERAL INFORMATION

Geography and people

Mauritius is an island of about 720 square miles, situated in the Indian Ocean, 115 miles distant from Réunion, 934 miles from Seychelles, 1300 miles from Natal, and 500 miles from Madagascar. It has an extreme length of 39 miles and an extreme breadth of 29 miles. The northern part of the island is a fairly flat plain which rises gently towards the Central Plateau. There are three mountain ranges with rocky peaks, the highest of which is 2,711 feet and numerous small rivers, the longest being about 25 miles. There are dependent upon Mauritius a number of islands scattered over the Indian Ocean, of which the most important is Rodriguez, 350 miles to the east, a volcanic mountain mass surrounded by a coral reef, 9 1/2 miles by 4 1/4 miles broad. Other dependencies are: Chagos Archipelago, 1,180 miles north-east, Agalega 580 miles; and Cargados Charajos 250 miles north of Mauritius.

The climate is tropical-maritime during summer and sub-tropical in winter. Cyclones, which occur during the summer season (November to May), often cause damage, but equally often, through bringing rain, prove beneficial. The rainfall is between 30 and 50 inches in coastal areas and reaches nearly 200 inches in the highest regions. The mean temperature varies between 67 and 74 degrees Fahrenheit, and the mean relative humidity between 70 and 90 per cent.

There is no indigenous population. The French arrived some 200 years ago, and were followed by immigrants from Africa, Madagascar and, during the last century, from India. Though immigration in bulk from any country has now ceased, the population, which totals at present approximately 447,000, not counting the 15,000 inhabitants of its dependencies, has been increasing at an average rate of 4,330 annually during the last ten years. It has almost tripled in a century.

The population density varies greatly, from about 100 to the square mile in the low-lying district, to more than 1,500 to the square mile on the central plateau. Thirty-seven per cent of the total population live in towns.

/SOCIAL CONDITIONS

SOCIAL CONDITIONS

Social problems of race and cultural relations

The problem of overpopulation is aggravated by the problems of a plural society. The Mauritians of French descent, numbering only a few thousand, are all of the owning and managerial class. The labour force is composed chiefly of Indo-Mauritians (who number about 265,000); they are agricultural workers rather than town dwellers. The Chinese, wealthy and hard-working, are mostly businessmen and retail traders. The English population consists of members of the garrison, higher Government officials and business managers. With a population of such diverse origins there are wide differences in the standard of living, the average standard being low due to insufficient production; housing conditions amongst the poor are unsatisfactory. In recent years the expenditure on public assistance has steadily increased as a result of the gradual breakdown of the Indo-Mauritian family system.

No discrimination is practised; there has been no need for legislation to safeguard the interests of any particular ethnic section of the population.

Labour and employment conditions

The policy as regards labour is, by improving industrial relations and conditions, to increase production and to raise the living standards of the workers. The hope of a rise in production sufficiently steep to outstrip the rise in population and so to undermine the high natality habit, is very slender, since the productive resources of the island are already exploited on an intensive scale. The introduction of new methods has not only increased the production of sugar, the single product on which the Colony is almost entirely dependent, but will eventually reduce the quantity of labour required. The labour force, between one and two hundred thousand strong, is divided into those entirely dependent on wages and those who have some other resources. One of the aims of labour policy is not to increase the number of the former division at the expense of the latter. The Employment Registration Bureaus are making inquiries into possible sources of employment.

The weighted average of basic wages for skilled artisans and mechanics in 1948 ranged from Rs.45.40<sup>1/2</sup> to Rs.120.37, and those for semi-skilled workers from Rs.29.85 to Rs.47.47 per month. Field or factory labourers in the sugar industry received basic wages ranging from Rs.22.65 to Rs.30.00 per month, and daily paid labourers from Rs.0.85 to Rs.1.60.

All workers receive a cost of living allowance of 75 per cent of their basic wage; monthly workers receive a regularity bonus of between 5 and 20 per cent of their basic wage according to their category, with an additional end-of-year bonus, which is 1/12 of the wages actually earned during the calendar year, for skilled and semi-skilled workers, and 15 per cent of the monthly wages for ordinary labour. The monthly worker is also entitled to house allowance, free medical treatment and annual leave.

A maximum of 48 hours per week is worked in all industries except in the distilleries, where 60 hours are worked including overtime.

The legal status of employers' and workers' organizations is based upon the Industrial Associations Ordinance, 1938, as subsequently amended. There are 30 principal organizations in the territory, of which 21 are workers', employees' and Government Servants' unions, 6 employers' associations and 3 associations of self-employed persons. The total number of members is 13,429.

The regulation of employer-employee relations and the machinery for settling industrial disputes are governed by the Trade Disputes Ordinance of 1947, which provides for a Minimum Wage Advisory Board and a Board of Conciliation.

Seven strikes occurred in 1948, which involved a total loss of 8,158 working days.

The following is the principal labour legislation:

Labour Ordinance

Recruitment of Workers Ordinance

Workmen's Compensation Ordinance

Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance

Minimum Wages Ordinance

Factories (Safety of Workers) Ordinance

Shop Hours Ordinance

Apprenticeship Ordinance

Trade Disputes Ordinance

Industrial Associations Ordinance

Industrial Courts Ordinance

Regulations issued under these Ordinances.

In addition to the Labour Department staff there is a Registrar of Trade Unions, an official Chairman of Conciliation Boards and an Industrial Court Magistrate.

/The sugar

The sugar industry employs fifty to sixty thousand workers in the crop season, and forty to fifty thousand in the intercrop season. Since many of these workers possess other resources, such as a plot of land, the intercrop season is felt by the unemployed only through the fall in earnings, which is accentuated by the substitution of machinery for certain work. Unemployment has been reduced through the absorption of fifteen thousand men into the Army Pioneer Corps for service overseas. There are about five thousand unemployed registered. There is probably much underemployment. No demand for labour by new industries has arisen.

There is no appreciable migration of labour into, from, or within, the Territory.

Public health and sanitation

The main functions of the Health Department are to protect the community from disease, to promote higher standards of sanitation and hygiene and to provide for medical relief.

Malaria continues to be the principal disease. A Malaria Control Board has been set up, wide powers have been given to the Health Authorities, and since the end of 1946, a large malaria control organization has been in activity. In December 1948, a two years scheme was put into operation with a view to eradicating malaria by the use of insecticides alone, planned in collaboration with the Colonial Insecticides Committee. Malnutrition is common. One consequence is the prevalence of anemia. A Nutrition Officer is now at work.

Intestinal diseases are also common all over the island. A review was made of the contributing factors, such as water supplies, the handling of food, sewerage disposal, and propaganda on behalf of better hygiene habits among the people is being actively carried out.

A severe outbreak of whooping cough in the second quarter of the year was responsible for 1,729 deaths.

The programme of the Health Department includes the compulsory medical certification of death, antenatal, maternity and child welfare, spreading the knowledge of simple hygiene and sanitation through school lessons and house-to-house inspections, and the functioning of a quarantine service.

Teachers are adequately trained in sanitation and hygiene lessons, and sanitary inspectors are trained locally in practical and theoretical knowledge. Though some populous districts have an excellent water and the supply of other districts from protected catchment areas is satisfactory, quantity and quality of water are variable. Steps are now being taken to make available filtered and chlorinated water to nearly the whole island.

The number of hospitals is as follows:

General hospitals.....	3
District hospitals.....	5
Lepor hospital.....	1
Mental hospital.....	1
Estate hospitals.....	33
Private clinics.....	5

The number of beds is 2,824. There are also 33 dispensaries, 2 mobile dispensaries, 14 antenatal clinics and centres, 1 orthopedic centre and 1 ambulance service. There are training facilities for pharmacists, nurses, midwives, and sanitary inspectors.

The expenditure of the Health Department for the financial year 1947-48 amounted to Rs.3,151,432 as against 2,574,829 in 1946-47.

The following is a summary of the vital statistics:

	1946	1947	1948

Housing conditions and programmes

The housing of the poorer classes was investigated by the Health and Welfare Committee of the Mauritius Economic Commission in 1948. After stating that housing conditions in general are bad, particularly in rural areas, with slum conditions developing in the towns, the Committee considered that improvement in housing was urgently required. Planning on comprehensive lines is going ahead, under the direction of a specialist.

Welfare and relief

There is no social insurance scheme as yet in operation. Direct distribution of outdoor relief is undertaken by 36 Public Assistance Committees, drawn from all sections of the population. During 1948 they disbursed the sum of Rs.546,241.40 among 7,592 recipients. As for indoor relief, free maintenance in public homes, which number 13, is given to orphans, unprotected widows, the aged, the incapacitated and others. The number of inmates during 1948 was 1,300, and the amount spent by the government was Rs.182,664.48. There are also training facilities for the blind.

Three Social Welfare Centres have been added to existing services in rural areas more particularly in order to provide civic education and to vitalize rural community life over as wide a field as possible. These three centres are the forerunners of others which will be financed by the Labour Welfare Fund Committee. Other social welfare activities include Self-Help Centres, a Help the Children Fund and social services for people in their own homes.

Crime statistics and penal administration

The number of cases reported to the police was as follows:

Homicide	7
Other offences against the person	10,702
Praedial larceny	374
Other offences against property	5,593
Other offences	28,579
Total	45,255

There were no death sentences.

/Among

Among the four institutions dealing with convicted persons, there are two prisons for adult persons, one accommodating 760 prisoners, and the other 70 male prisoners and a certain number of female prisoners. The inmates of the other two institutions, namely the Borstal Institution and the Industrial School are selected among juvenile first or minor offenders and from good-conduct inmates of the other prisons. Useful trades are taught.

The Industrial School is run on the lines of an approved school in England. Its daily average population in 1948 was 161.4. The Borstal Institution had 80 inmates at the end of 1948.

Probation of offenders applies to adults and to juveniles. The system is being widened to cover all district courts on completion of the training of new probation officers. District Probation Committees and a Central Probation Committee decide on questions of probation. The probation service, which is placed under the Judicial Department, has proved successful, since the majority of probationers have not committed a new offence. A committee also exists to aid discharged prisoners; it finds employment or other livelihood for them.

EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS

Educational policy and administration

Educational policy is directed towards building up a happy and useful agricultural community, and to this end the primary school is regarded as a centre for improving conditions in the town or village in which it lies, and as the local agency for agriculture, health and social welfare services.

Primary education is free. Compulsory education was first introduced in 1945 in four villages on an experimental basis. Fees in secondary schools amount to about £1 per month.

One of the chief educational problems is that of language due to the fact that Mauritius is a multi-racial community. Although a creole patois derived from French (the lingua franca) or an Indian language is their mother tongue, children in Mauritius primary schools learn English and French. The growing demand for the teaching of Indian languages is also being met.

Before the war, the Indo-Mauritian esteem for scholastic proficiency as the passport to escape from the drudgery of field labour was creating a declassé and unemployable group. This problem,

However, has been solved by war-time and post-war full employment and by an aggressive educational policy.

During 1948 there has been increased demand for schooling, requiring new schools and the training of additional teachers. The Teachers' Training College has turned out 57 new teachers in 1948, and aims at the training of 500 new teachers in the period 1948/52. Three new primary schools were opened during 1948 and two rural schools were rebuilt to accommodate additional pupils.

The educational budget of 1948 amounted to Rs.2,800,000, as compared with Rs.2,400,000 for the budget 1947/48 and Rs.2,465,491 for 1946/47. Approximately Rs.90,000 is for administration, Rs.550,000 for secondary schools, Rs.1,600,000 for primary schools, Rs.300,000 for the training college.

Per capita expenditure on education was for primary education: 35 rupees in Government schools and 33 rupees in Government-Aided schools; for secondary education: 691 rupees in Government schools and 35 rupees in Government-Aided schools.

The British Council makes grants to public and school libraries and maintains a small but representative library of English literature. The local press and broadcasting services are both extremely active. There is a full-time visual education officer, and there are three sixteen millimetre sound projectors. The Government maintains the Mauritius Institute and Public Library.

Higher education and vocational training

A Centre for teaching homecrafts and handicrafts was opened in 1948 and the foundation of another such centre was laid. There are eight mechanical engineering apprenticeships awarded annually and tenable in the workshops of Government railways.

As regards opportunities for higher education, the Royal College and several of the other secondary schools go up to higher school certificate. There is an Agricultural College which provides a three-year course in sugar technology, factory engineering and chemistry. Facilities exist in the Territory for the training of pharmacists, and an ad hoc board, appointed by the Governor, examines for the local diploma in pharmacy, which is also a license to practise.

During 1948, scholarships were awarded from the funds of the British Council, Development and Welfare, and the Colony in: art, biology, education, engineering, law, medicine, sanitation and statistics.

/Scholarships

Scholarships were also awarded to ex-servicemen whose studies had been interrupted during the war. During 1947 thirty scholarships were awarded for studies overseas.

Adult education

No adult education campaign exists at present, but sectarian night schools do a little in this direction. Sporadic movements exist and receive Government encouragement.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Agriculture

The staple industry is sugar production. Sugar cane plantations cover about 33 per cent of the area of the island.

Production of sugar

	Quantity in metric tons	Value in 1000 rupees
1946	291,000	88,600
1948	450,000	145,000

A by-product of the sugar industry is alcohol distilled from molasses, valued at 3.6 million rupees in 1948, against 2.5 million rupees in 1947 and 2.42 million rupees in 1946.

The next industry of importance is hemp production. The finished product is valued at about Rs.700,000 annually. Other products of importance are tea and tobacco.

There are approximately 44,000 acres of pasture land, and approximately 15 million litres of milk are produced annually with 20 metric tons of butter.

Cultivation of food crops has so far proved insufficient for local consumption; its extension is under consideration. Local fisheries produce some 2,000 tons of fish annually.

The total area of forest land is about 100,000 acres, and the value of products from the Crown forests is estimated at Rs.675,000 annually.

The utilized land totals 430,907 acres, of which 214,093 acres, or 46.5 per cent of the island's surface, are under sugar cane and mixed farming; 110,326 acres, or 23.9 per cent, consist of private and Crown lands suitable for agriculture, including tea growing; and 106,488 acres, or 23.1 per cent, consist of Crown lands, including natural reserves, productive forests and protected areas.

/The principal

The principal crop production in 1947 was as follows:

	Area (acres)	Production (metric tons)
Sugar	201,000	400,000
Maize	11,125	7,000
Aloe fibre	3,500	900
Ground nuts	2,555	700
Manioc	2,086	3,700
Sweet potatoes	730	1,300
Arouilles	522	1,300

There are 5,000 acres of forest reserves. Exploited forest land consists of 500 acres, mostly pine and eucalyptus trees, and about 175 acres of underwood.

The Fisheries Department has a research station with 2 marine biologists. In the coastal fisheries, 2,043 metric tons of fish were caught.

Sugar cane is the chief soil conservation agent, since its roots, which spread rapidly, hold the soil extremely well, and it adds organic matter to the soil in the form of dried leaves; with other crops terracing is sometimes done.

A soil survey of the Crown forest areas has been undertaken, and some of the lands surveyed might prove suitable for the cultivation of food crops.

There are two large irrigation schemes operated by the Government. A new reservoir is being constructed to supply irrigation water to the western cane area. Natural drainage is relied on for carrying away excess water.

Agricultural machinery used on estates at the end of 1948 consisted of: 1,900 kilometres of rails, 238 locomotives, 8,150 wagons, about 900 lorries, including 700 lorries working for the sugar industry, and 198 tractors.

Mechanization on the sugar plantations is making steady progress.

Artificial fertilizer and pen-manure or compost are used for all crops.

The Agricultural College admits about 10 students annually for training as sugar technicians. Provision is made for the best student completing his studies in any one year to proceed overseas to take a degree course.

/The Agricultural

The Agricultural Department maintains 5 experimental stations and 1 dairy. There are many experimental and demonstration plots on the estates. The Sugar Cane Research Station, which has carried out plant breeding work since 1930, has bred two new very promising cane varieties with higher yield and sucrose content; its extension service has been brought to full strength and advises small planters, in particular, on more up-to-date methods of cultivation. The Government dairy is now summarizing cross-breeding experiments with the object of up-grading and stabilizing the breed of dairy cows. A Tea Experiment Station is being established.

There are instructors for improved cultivation of tobacco, and the Tobacco Board trains a certain number of apprentices each year.

The area of land alienated under freeholds is 441,802.50 arpents<sup>1/</sup>. The Government holds an area of 82,027.28 arpents, of which 10,435.69 have been leased.

About 25 per cent of the land is cultivated by small planters, mostly Indians.

Industry

The island has no mineral wealth of importance, though salt and lime are produced.

There are 3 hydro-electric power stations, with a total energy production of 15.4 million kilowatt-hours in 1948 as against 12.4 million in 1947.

There are 30 sugar factories producing about 392,000 metric tons, 10 distilleries producing about 10 million litres of alcohol, 1 oil refinery producing about 1,000 metric tons, 5 tea factories producing 280 metric tons, 5 soap factories producing 1,500 metric tons, 25 aloe fibre factories and 1 factory producing sacks for packing sugar. There are also 30 lime producers, 10 salt pans, 1 match factory and 3 manufacture of tobacco.

Village industries are practically non-existent, but Mauritius is well provided with skilled workers such as carpenters, stonemasons, jewellers, rattanware workers, shoe makers, cabinet makers, and joiners.

Communications and transport

- Sea: 203 steam vessels with a tonnage of 627,615 entered port during the year, and 204 steam vessels with a tonnage of 626,270 left port during the same time.
- Railways: There are 106 1/4 miles of main lines; 513,000 metric tons were carried in 1948 compared with 462,753 in 1947.
- Air: No internal services are maintained. There is 1 airfield and 1 seaplane base.
- Roads: The total length of roads is 700 miles; there are 200 miles of tarred roads.
- Motor Vehicles: Private cars number 2,226, taxis, 466; motor cycles, 205; buses, 182; lorries, 704; tractors, 58; and Government vehicles, 208.
- Post Offices: Post and money order offices number 74.
- Telegraphs: There are 31 telegraph offices.
- Telephone: There are 11 main exchanges with 2,956 subscribers, and 3,926 individual installations.
- Radio: There is one broadcasting station and 4,988 radio receiving licenses were issued.

Public finance, banking and credit

In the financial year 1947-48 revenue amounted to Rs.39,856,645 and expenditure to Rs.49,153,495, compared with respectively Rs.50,511,566 and Rs.52,513,054 in 1946-1947.

Poll tax for companies was increased from 30 to 35 per cent in 1947.

Besides 3 private banks, there is the Government Savings Bank with branch offices throughout the Colony, the Mauritius Agricultural Bank, and co-operative credit societies.

At the end of the financial year 1946/7, there were 79 credit societies in Mauritius with 4,975 shareholders, and total loans during the year amounted to Rs.918,278. The new Co-operative Societies Ordinance, 1945, was put into operation as from 1 October 1945, and a drive was made in March 1947 for starting consumer societies. Three co-operative stores have been registered, and 5 are about to be, while work has begun on 12 more.

In Rodriguez at the end of the financial year there were 21 credit societies in operation, with a total of 415 members, and total loans during the year amounted to Rs.33,514.

International trade

Total imports amounted to 136,205,000 in 1948 as against Rs.113,833,412 in 1947.

Imports included:

	1947	1948

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES:
SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED
UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER. REPORT OF THE
SECRETARY-GENERAL

Summary of information transmitted by the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.<sup>1/</sup>
(Supplementary statistics)

On 28, 29 and 30 June, and 5 and 11 July 1950, the permanent representative of the United Kingdom to the United Nations transmitted information in respect of Aden, Basutoland, British Somaliland, Cyprus, Gibraltar, Gold Coast, Kenya, Mauritius, Nigeria, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, St. Helena, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Swaziland, Uganda and Zanzibar.

In accordance with paragraph 4 (b) of General Assembly resolution 218 (III), the Secretary-General has prepared the following summary showing such changes in statistics and such other appreciable changes as have occurred in the year under review, together with relevant statistics for previous years. The summary supplements the full summary of information transmitted during 1949, which is contained in chapter VII of volume II of the Summaries and Analyses of Information transmitted to the Secretary-General during 1949.<sup>2/</sup>

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES:
SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED
UNDER ARTICLE 73 c OF THE CHARTER. REPORT OF THE
SECRETARY-GENERAL

Summary of information transmitted by the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland 1/
(Supplementary statistics).

On 6 and 12 July 1951, the permanent representative of the United Kingdom to the United Nations transmitted information in respect of Aden, Basutoland, Bechuanaland, British Somaliland, Cyprus, Gambia, Gibraltar, Gold Coast, Kenya, Mauritius, Nigeria, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, St. Helena, Sierra Leone, Swaziland and Uganda.

In accordance with paragraph 2 (b) of General Assembly resolution 218 (III), the Secretary-General has prepared the following summary showing such changes in statistics and such other appreciable changes as have occurred in the year under review, together with relevant statistics for previous years. The summary supplements the full summary of information transmitted during 1949, which is contained in chapter VII of volume II of the Summaries and Analyses of Information transmitted to the Secretary-General during 1949.<sup>2/</sup>

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES:
SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF
THE CHARTER. REPORT OF THE
SECRETARY-GENERAL

Summary of information transmitted by the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland 1/

In accordance with paragraph 4 (a) of General Assembly resolution 218 (III), the Secretary-General has prepared the following full summary of information transmitted in 1952 showing the progress made over the past three-year period in respect of economic, social and educational conditions.

The information has been classified under the main sections contained in parts II to IV of the revised Standard Form approved by General Assembly resolution 551 (VI).

The present summary relates to information transmitted in respect of British Somaliland, Gibraltar, Gold Coast, Kenya, Mauritius, Nigeria, Nyasaland, Seychelles and Uganda.

1/ This summary is also submitted to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

General

The economy of Mauritius is dependent on sugar, which accounted for 93.25 per cent of the total exports in 1951. Production has risen from 224,000 tons thirty years ago to a record of 485,000 tons in 1951. An agreement covering the next seven years and governing the quantity and price of sugar to be exported to the United Kingdom was made in 1951 between the Commonwealth Sugar Producers and the United Kingdom Government. The production of the two main subsidiary cash crops, tea and fibre, has also increased; tea production increased sufficiently in 1951 to meet local requirements, with 89,292 pounds over for export, while fibre production provided 1,084,708 sacks for the bagging of sugar.

Meanwhile the population has continued to increase with a direct bearing on imports, especially rice, the staple diet of the majority of the inhabitants.

The total estimated expenditure of the Mauritius Development and Welfare Ten Year Plan is Rs. 108,691,600,<sup>1/</sup> of which Rs. 34,629,470 were spent up to 30 June 1951.

Agriculture and livestock

The Department of Agriculture is composed of fourteen Divisions with a Director and two Deputy Directors in charge of the following staff:

Divisions	1949	1950	1951

The total budgets were as follows:

	1949/50	1950/51	1951/52
	Rs.	Rs.	Rs.
General estimates	887,000	1,009,000	1,121,940

Other expenditures	314,440	2,157,000	--
Total:	1,562,340	4,223,000	5,458,408

Of the Territory's total area of 460,800 acres, 196,500 acres are under sugar-cane and mixed crops; 72,600 acres are forests; 13,500 acres are arable land; 108,700 acres are meadow, grassland and scrub; and 69,500 acres are natural reserves, built-up areas, and waste lands.

There is little danger of serious soil erosion, since most of the cultivated land is under sugar-cane. Several schemes for water conservation were undertaken to increase electricity supply and to increase the area of cultivable land. The setting up of a Natural Resources Board is awaiting the preparation of a land utilization map.

Much of the land is freehold but some is held on lease-hold, either from the Government or private owners. In some cases, land is rented under a /crop-sharing crop-sharing scheme; e.g. metayers on sugar estates grow sugar-cane on estate lands, free of rent but the price paid for the sugar-cane is less than that grown on other lands. Formerly a large amount of land was mortgaged to individuals or to commercial banks, but with the institution of the Agricultural Bank most of the mortgages are now held by this institution, which charges a lower rate of interest.

There are no indigenous inhabitants, so that all the alienated land is held by non-indigenous inhabitants. About 25 per cent of the cultivated land is held by small planters, practically all of whom are Indians.

Three pilot land settlement schemes were drawn up and one was started.

The production of principal crops was as follows:

Principal crops	Area (acres)	Annual Production	Annual Production
		by amount (metric tons)	by value (Rs.)
Sugar	166,024	484,000	210,000,000
Mauritius hemp	wild growth	2,000	3,000,000
Tea	2,205	845,398 lbs.	2,355,000
Tobacco	747	485,688 kgs.	1,400,000

All crops, except tobacco, which are grown for local consumption, increased considerably. The increased output of sugar-cane was due to extra land being brought into cultivation, better methods of cultivation and higher yields. A long-term agreement was made to fix the price of fibre to be bought by the Government, resulting in more stability for the hemp industry. Tea production increased five-fold during the last decade. An important factor in these increases is that there has been no destructive cyclone since 1946.

Livestock figures were as follows:

Livestock	Number	Numbers slaughtered	Animal production by value (Rs.)
Cattle	40,282	7,000	875,000
Goats	53,561	20,000	600,000
Sheep	2,013	250	12,000
Pigs	4,009	2,500	325,000

Livestock is fairly free from diseases of a serious nature. Work was concentrated on improving the local Creole milk breed, which is of European descent, by improved methods of feeding and management resulting in milk yields being increased three-fold or more. Experiments were conducted to make legume hay. Water supply is generally not a serious problem, as animals are stall-fed.

No data are available in regard to agricultural indebtedness, but it is considerable. There are three trading banks and the Mauritius Agricultural Bank, which make advances to agricultural concerns. In addition to these, many small planters of sugar-cane are members of Co-operative Credit Societies while others market their crop through middlemen, who in turn advance funds to the growers for the expenses of current crop production.

There are central boards for the marketing, storage, grading and processing of sugar, hemp and tobacco. The formation of marketing organizations for tea and milk has been discussed, but the producers do not appear to favour such organizations. Primary processing of the main agricultural products is carried out at twenty-seven sugar factories, about forty fibre mills, five tea factories and many flue and air-curing barns for tobacco.

Proceeds from the sale of sugar were paid into a Rehabilitation Fund, which was originally designed for the renewal of factory and transport equipment. Arrangements were made to divert part of these funds for the formation of a mechanical equipment pool, to cultivate planters' lands. A mechanical implement unit was operated by the Food Production Board, to help in food production. These machines were hired out to cultivators on a non-profit making basis.

Research is carried on at the Department's seven experiment stations. The Agricultural College gives a three-year course in tropical agriculture, with an emphasis on sugar-cane cultivation and technology. A one-year course was arranged for junior sugar estate employees.

Agricultural extension work is organized in three sections to deal with sugar-cane, other crops and animal husbandry, respectively.

The Government started two experimental plots and one plantation on a commercial scale, for the improvement of the fibre and tea industries.

/Forestry

Forestry

The Forestry Department was staffed as follows:

Senior staff (European) .....	2
Intermediate staff (local) .....	171
Headquarters (local) .....	16
Subordinate field staff (local)...	1,159

The expenditure for 1951 amounted to Rs. 1,232,422 as compared with Rs. 880,331 in 1950 and Rs. 722,944 in 1949. The revenue for 1951 amounted to Rs. 1,168,034, of which Rs. 1,108,260 were derived from the sale of timber and fuel. In addition, a further sum of Rs. 252,102 was granted from Development and Welfare funds.

No inventory of forest resources was taken. The total area of Crown Forest Estate is approximately 67,000 acres. During 1951 about 4,500 acres of forest were proclaimed as "National Reserve" which are stocked with indigenous species and include the best remnants of the native forests.

The Department continued to exploit and distribute all timber and fuel deriving from Crown Lands. Fuel is sold to the public at fixed rates considerably lower than the current market prices.

The training of personnel was confined to practical instruction given during normal working hours in the field. One Forester was a student at Bangor University in Wales and completed a year's study under the Four Years' Development and Welfare Scholarship.

Fisheries

All the fish available are consumed locally; 1,508 metric tons were caught in 1951, as compared with 1,483 in 1950.

A survey of the grounds in the Mauritius-Seychelles arc of bank was completed under the Development and Welfare Scheme, and a fishing company was formed to exploit fishing on the remote banks.

Power

The electricity services are provided by three private undertakings, mainly for domestic purposes, but there is a steady increase in the demand for /industrial industrial use. In 1951, legislation authorizing the constitution of a Central Electricity Board to take over the control and development of electricity services for the island, was passed by the Council of Government.

The work of increasing the capacity of the General Electric Supply Company to 25 million kilowatt-hour units involved the building of a new dam to increase the water storage; the installation of a new pipeline, about one half mile long, and the installation of a new turbo-alternator of 3,000 kilowatts capacity at the power station. The new dam was completed in 1951 and it was anticipated that the remaining work would be completed in 1952.

Industry

The main produce and export of the Territory is cane sugar. The promotion of industrial development is envisaged under the Development and Welfare Plan, from which an allocation of one million rupees was made to finance non-agricultural industries. Loans were made to companies formed for manufacturing bricks and wall boards. The processing of sugar by-products, especially megasse, was under consideration.

Transport and communications

There was an increase of 75 lorries, 6 buses and 84 taxis, giving totals of 1,114 lorries, 192 buses and 697 taxis.

There are 161 kilometres of main line railway and 15 kilometers of light railway. Twenty-eight more vessels entered Port Louis harbour than in 1950, giving a total of 255, with a tonnage of 720,044.

There are 81 post offices and postal agencies; 51 telegraph and 79 Money Order offices.

A terminal air centre was opened in 1951 and the number of passengers handled amounted to 4,849, as compared with 4,149 in 1950.

There were 1,300 radio sets when Government took over the responsibility for broadcasting in 1944, as compared to 10,771 in 1951. Successful broadcasts were made to Primary Schools, and a number of Village Councils are now equipped with communal receiving sets.

SOCIAL CONDITIONS

General

The population of Mauritius comprises an Indo-Mauritian group, which includes about 70,000 Moslems and constitutes roughly 64 per cent of the total population; a self-contained and self-sufficient Sino-Mauritian community comprising about 3 per cent of the population; a white population, mainly of French origin; a few British officials; and a population of mixed French and African origin known as the "General" population. Although Mauritius became a British colony in 1810, the influence of the French language and culture has remained strong; French and its derivative, Creole, are still the normal medium of conversation among the majority of the population. British influence is propagated by the comparatively few British government officials and the British staff of the large commercial firms. Until recently, the various communities did not mix socially but now a greater awareness that the Territory's problems will have to be solved on an all-community basis, together with the spread of education, the emergence of a professional class drawn from all communities and active work in fields of social welfare, are helping to remove communal barriers.

Status of women

The proportion of men to women has a considerable bearing on the subject; the over-all percentage is 99.2 men to 100 women.

Franchise in Mauritius, which is based on literacy, is open to both men and women over 21. There is no occupation from which a woman is debarred by law. All the conventions regarding the employment of women; e.g. prevention of night work, are observed. Men and women receive the same pay for the same work in government service.

Apart from two women members of the Legislative Council, one elected and one nominated, women serve on the three Town Councils. A woman is the Chairman and 28 others are members of the 37 Public Assistance Committees. Many others serve voluntarily on various welfare committees and cultural societies.

Labour and employment conditions

The staff of the Labour Department under the Labour Commissioner is composed of:

/Inspection of Inspection of labour conditions: 1 Assistant Labour Commissioner, 9 Labour officers.

Settlement of disputes and industrial relations: 1 Assistant Labour Commissioner; 1 Labour officer.

Employment Bureau: 1 Manager, 7 officers, and 8 clerks.

Safety, health and welfare: 1 Assistant Labour Commissioner, 2 Labour officers, one of whom is a woman.

The number of wage earners exclusive of small planters were:

Type	1949	1950	1951
Sugar industry;
Artisans and drivers	4,000	5,732	6,017

Skilled artisans, mechanics	36-117	45-120	53-186
Drivers and attendants	27-50	29-48	47-75
Factory and Sugar Field labourers	49-64	49-66	20-53

All workers receive a cost-of-living allowance of 40 per cent of their basic wages. Factory workers work 45 hours a week and field labourers 36. The number of unemployed varied from 1,798 in January to 1,197 in December as registered in the Department. Normally workers have little difficulty in obtaining additional employment in agriculture. The sugar industry employed on an average 51,564 workers during the 1951 interdrop (January to June) and 62,172 workers during crop time (July to December). The extra number of workers engaged during crop time is normally self-employed as small planters during inter-crop periods. There is no migrant labour.

Registration of employers and workers' organizations is compulsory. There were fifteen trade unions with 20,393 paid-up members. The T.U.C. of Mauritius is affiliated with the International Confederation of the Free Trade Unions, and maintains relations with the British T.U.C. There were no labour disputes in 1951.

The Labour Welfare Fund, which is financed by a levy imposed on the export of sugar, provides workers in the sugar industry with indoor amusement, social welfare centres, a mobile cinema and housing. In addition, the sugar estates provide housing for their labour and maintain a hospital, with maternity wards.

In the heavy engineering trade, the automobile repairs and the printing industry, there are apprenticeship schemes.

There is a comprehensive body of labour legislation, and information is supplied annually to the ILO on the twenty-eight Labour Conventions applied in the Territory.

Co-operative societies

The number and membership of co-operative societies were as follows:

	Number	Membership
Credit Societies:
Unlimited liability	136	6,800
Limited liability	2	--
Thrift Savings Societies	39	--	Savings Rs. 102,068

Consumer Societies	60	7,525	Rs. 3,000,000
Co-operative Wholesale Society	1	56	Rs. 26,323
Co-operative Housing Society	1	--	--
Co-operative Transport Society	1	--	--

The Federation of Co-operative Credit Societies now has 104 societies affiliated with it.

/Standard of living

Standard of living

Consumers' price indices for 1949-1951 were as follows:

Date	Higher income groups				Manual workers
	Rs.100-300	Rs.300-550	Rs.550-1000	Over Rs.1000	Labourers	Artisans

1951-June	309	298	287	267	356	319

Surveys of family expenditure are carried out periodically on inquiry forms, issued by the Central Statistical Office and circulated at random to householders through the trade unions and similar bodies. These sample budgets provide the structure of expenditure and consumption of the various income groups and permit the preparation of "weighting diagrams".

Town and rural planning and housing

Overcrowding is prevalent in urban areas and rents are high. In rural areas labourers not employed on sugar estates usually build their own houses at a cost of between Rs. 300 and Rs. 500. Comprehensive town planning and building legislation was before the Legislative Council. Two experimental demonstration housing projects financed by Labour Welfare Funds were completed in recent years for rural and urban areas. The first rural prefabricated housing scheme will be completed in 1952. Financial assistance for housing takes the form of loans to local authorities from the allocation of Rs. 10,625,000 provided under the Development Plan. Generous financial assistance is also provided by the sugar industry. The Mauritius Agricultural Bank has also provided loans to individuals for the building of houses.

Social security and welfare

Sugar estates are required by law to provide medical treatment and medicines for workers and their families. They are also required to pay certain benefits in cash and kind during sickness. No contributions are paid by the workers.

/Compensation

Compensation for industrial accidents is provided by law. Each year help is given to several thousand manual workers who pay no contribution.

There is a non-contributory Old Age Pension Scheme under which over 12,000 persons were in receipt of pensions, all but 40 per cent receiving the maximum award of Rs. 15 from the age of 65, or if blind from the age of 40. Outdoor relief is paid to about 6,500 persons at any one time; about two thirds of the recipients are women. Both indoor and outdoor relief are a direct charge on Government.

The expenditures in social welfare activities were as follows:

	1949 Rs.	1950 Rs.	1951 Rs.
Outdoor relief	703,841	794,704	1,024,382

Contributions to Maternity and Child Welfare societies	47,900	49,851	41,575
Milk for poor mothers and babies	7,320	7,400	16,162
Provision for meals	6,315	6,806	8,296
Blind School	6,800	6,800	6,800
TOTAL:	1,048,608	2,026,987	3,732,207

Maternity benefits are provided by sugar estates in regard to children born to workers in their camps, of which the total population is 21,541.

The present high birth-rate (49.7 per cent of the population) makes the question of care of expectant mothers and of children a most important one. Midwives of the Maternity and Child Welfare Society were responsible for handling about 2,500 confinements a year, or 10 per cent of all confinements. The Society received a grant from the Development and Welfare Fund to build three more clinics. It has ten branches, which provide twelve weekly clinics. There were three maternity centres on sugar estates. In addition, each of the five social welfare centres employs a midwife and normally provides a weekly doctor's consultation and weighing of babies. One Village Council employs a midwife. The mobile maternity and child welfare clinic performs ante-natal work and arranges hospital bookings where necessary. In Port Louis, there were two public experimental nurseries for working mothers. Children in those two nurseries numbered about 40. Another experimental nursery was sponsored by a Village Council and received 12 children for each of whom the mother paid one rupee a week.

There were two industrial schools for young delinquents of 7 or 8 years of age. For older delinquents there is a Borstal Institution with an average population of 56, where training is given mainly in carpentry, tinsmithing and gardening. As a deterrent to juvenile delinquency, the development of playing fields is fostered in addition to Boy Scout and Girl Guide movements. Delinquent girls, including young prostitutes, are committed to a convent to which a school is attached.

The epidemics of poliomyelitis in 1945, 1948 and 1952 raised a serious problem. Occupational therapy as well as some vocational training are given at an orthopaedic hospital.

A Blind Welfare Committee runs a small hostel and training centre for blind persons in Port Louis at which 17 blind men are received; 23 children and 8 blind women come each day from a local convent. The Development and Welfare Fund provided Rs. 100,000 for the erection and equipment of a school for the blind.

The establishment of social welfare centres and community centres has aided community development.

Prevention of crime and treatment of offenders

Crime statistics were:

	Convictions
Crime	430
Misdemeanours	3,421
Contraventions	22,403

There are 625 male and 79 female juvenile offenders of whom 115 males and 7 females were sent to the Borstal Institution and Industrial School, while 245 males and 20 females were deprived of liberty.

Among adult persons, 1,195 males and 61 females were sent to prison. There was no corporal punishment and no death penalty.

There are four prisons, one of which is a central prison with two hospital wards and one isolation ward, workshops, recreational facilities and a separate /women's women's prison. There is a probation service for both juveniles and for adults.

Public health

The activities of the Medical and Health Department are co-ordinated by the Director assisted by two Deputy Directors with the following staff:

A. Medical and Health Staff	Government	Private
1. Registered physicians	38	61
2. Nurses of Senior Training	7
Nurses under training	2
Nurses in Hospitals as of 8/4/52	93
Dressers in Hospitals as of 8/4/52	145
3. Superintendent of Midwives	1
Midwives	34
4. Sanitary Inspectors	54
5. X-ray technician	1
6. Pharmacists	1	35

In addition to the above there are two pathologists, two dentists, an entomologist, a rehabilitation officer, two physiotherapists and two occupational therapists, thirteen laboratory assistants, clerical staff and over 1,000 subordinate staff; plus the Malaria Organization with one Medical Officer, one Engineer, one Chemist, one Entomologist, nine field officers, fifteen clerks and 950 subordinate staff.

The actual expenditure on medical services for the financial year 1950-51 was Rs. 4,475,201 or 8.21 per cent of the total expenditure. This represented a sum of Rs. 9.41 per head of the 1950 estimated population. In addition, the expenditure under the Development and Welfare Plan amounted to Rs. 1,926,684. Out of this; the assistance received from the metropolitan Government amounted to Rs. 801,668 for engineering works and Rs. 193,168 for research on the Malaria Eradication Scheme. Work on water supplies was carried out by the Public Works Department and amounted to Rs. 1,971,162.

Institutions comprised the following:

Private	Number of institutions	Number of beds
Hospitals (sugar estates)	33	738
Dispensaries (sugar estates)	8	--
Specialized units
Others (private clinics)	5	53

A new orthopaedic hospital of 200 beds will be constructed in the near future. More radiological equipment, including an additional diagnostic plant, one deep X-ray therapy and one superficial therapy unit, one mobile diagnostic set for use in the wards and one mass radiography unit, were received in 1951. A supply of radium amounting to 98 milligrammes was available.

No one can practice medicine, surgery and dentistry in the Island unless he is eligible for registration in the United Kingdom or France. Persons authorized to practise as pharmacists are those possessing diplomas or certificates entitling them to practise as pharmaceutical chemists or chemists and druggists in the United Kingdom, or provided with diplomas as chemists from foreign universities or colleges. Nurses and midwives must be registered.

/There

There are no local facilities for training doctors and dentists. Training for pharmacists, nurses and midwives is available locally. There were 191 nursing students and 36 pupil midwives in training on 1 January 1951. Sanitary inspectors are trained during 18 months on a syllabus similar to that of the Royal Sanitary Institute.

. Vital statistics were:

	1948	1949	1950	1951
Total births	19,039	20,472	23,110	22,968

live births	186.2	91.0	76.3	83.5
Total deaths	10,518	7,384	6,453	7,208
Death rate per 1,000 population	23.8	16.6	13.9	14.9

There was no outbreak of communicable disease and the incidence of enteric fever was low. Malaria was reduced during the year to negligible proportions and no longer presented an economic problem to the Island.

Tuberculosis testing and BCG vaccination with freeze dried vaccine imported from the Pasteur Institute started in May 1951. Measures taken to reduce infant mortality and to preserve maternal health were mainly carried out by the Maternity Society, which has its personnel seconded from the Medical and Health Department and receives a government grant. In 1951 the Government started a mobile ante-natal clinic in charge of a woman doctor.

Provision of sewage facilities for the densely populated district of Plaines Wilhems was under active consideration. In rural areas conservancy services were handed over to Village Councils.

EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS

Education is free in the primary school. It is not free in the post-primary stage, but fees are low, amounting to Rs. 8 to 16 per month in the government colleges and Rs. 15 to 30 in private schools. There is no racial or religious differentiation whatsoever in the provision of education.

The Department, under a Director and Deputy Director, consists of Assistant Directors for Primary and Secondary schools, an Adult Education Officer, a Youth Organizer, a Visual Education Officer, the Primary Schools Inspectorate and a clerical staff. Outside headquarters are the staffs of the Royal College, Royal College School, Teachers' Training College and Girls' Government Secondary School. The teaching cadre consists of 1,668 primary school and 73 secondary school teachers, with 173 teachers in the grant-aided secondary schools, three quarters of whose salaries are paid by the Government.

There are five advisory committees composed of non-officials apart from the Educational Authorities belonging to the different religious sects.

Educational expenditure was:

	1949	1950	1951	1952 (estimated)
Rupees	3,456,028	5,908,301	6,070,237	9,307,312

The recurrent expenditure in 1951 was 10.87 per cent of the Territory's total expenditure. In addition, financial assistance from the Development Programme amounted to Rs. 3,214,500 in 1951.

Entrance to the primary schools is at the age of 5 and most children leave at about the age of 13, though a few stay on three or four years longer. Secondary education is provided for the age-group 12 to 20, although many pupils leave on taking their Cambridge School Certificate Examination at the age of 16 or 17.

One of the chief education problems is that of language owing to the fact that Mauritius is a multi-racial community. In the schools English and French are compulsory and Hindi, Urdu, Tamil and Chinese optional. The population, whatever its origin, speaks a lingua franca of French origin, known as Creole. Although it is not officially encouraged, its use in the classroom as a vehicle of expression is common.

At present 81 scholarships are awarded every year: 55 of these are secondary school entrance scholarships, 14 are free places granted needy students; 5 are senior scholarships and 6 "English" scholarships. Scholarships are open to both boys and girls of all races or religions. There is a post-secondary College of Agriculture which trains technicians for the sugar industry. A number of primary schools are served by homecrafts and handicrafts centres.

There is a Government Teacher-Training College, which has trained a total of 269 teachers in the last four years, including 96 in 1951. During the year /it offered it offered special courses to 80 relief teachers and social welfare workers. In 1951, 114 students were enrolled.

Extension classes in science subjects were given in 1951 at the laboratories of the Royal College, Royal College School and College of Agriculture to 75 students preparing for Inter-B.Sc. courses in physics and biology; for B.Sc. courses in chemistry and professional examinations on pharmacy.

Special schools exist for children handicapped by poliomyelitis, for young delinquents and the blind.

There is in the rural areas an adult literacy movement which is engaged in the teaching of Hindi and of Indian culture in general. The Village Councils are taking a keen interest in adult literacy classes together with classes in dressmaking, knitting, child welfare and kindred domestic subjects for women. Much work is done by unofficial organizations. Reading material in English, French and Hindi is easily obtainable from libraries and bookshops.

/A survey

A survey of the condition and capacity of all government and aided primary schools and of secondary school buildings indicates the need for a building programme involving the construction of 56 new government primary schools; 55 teachers' quarters in rural districts; 3 new government secondary schools with expanded capacity for 1,000 boys and 330 girls; loans to non-government secondary schools, and extensive additions to the Teachers' Training College, at a total estimated cost of over Rs. 16 million.

A Youth Organizer is attached to the Education Department for the organization and supervision of two school camps and the formation of 63 boys' clubs, nine girls' clubs and three mixed clubs, with a total membership of 4,300. The Youth Service extends its advice and help to the Scouts' and Guides' Association whose membership is over 2,000. Youth clubs, scouts and guides are represented on the Youth Advisory Committee, and send their own nominees to the Youth Council. These young people's associations recruit their members from all sections of the community, white and non-white, Indian and Chinese.

There are seven public libraries, two national museums and five cultural and scientific societies.

Three main daily papers are published mostly in French with an average circulation of about 7,000 each. One paper, Le Cerneen, has been published since 1832. In addition, there are five other dailies in French and Chinese, four weeklies in Hindi, English and French, and 14 other periodicals of fortnightly, bi-monthly, quarterly and annual publication.

There are 31 cinemas and two mobile cinema units. Mauritius Broadcasting Service broadcasts 52.5 hours per week.

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES: SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 c OF THE CHARTER. REPORT OF
THE SECRETARY-GENERAL

Summary of information transmitted by the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland 1/

(Human Rights)

In the information transmitted under Article 73 c of the Charter by the United Kingdom Government for the year 1951, data relating to human rights have not been included; instead, in the information transmitted on behalf of each Territory under United Kingdom administration, reference has been made under the heading of Social Conditions, Part III (B), to a "separate statement" on the subject.

By a memorandum dated 5 August 1952, observations of the United Kingdom Government regarding the protection of human rights in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under United Kingdom administration were communicated to the Secretary-General. The text of these observations is herewith reproduced in extenso.

1/ This summary is also submitted to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

Part III (B) of the Standard Form - Human Rights

Legal principles and procedures

Human rights and fundamental freedoms in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under United Kingdom administration are similar to those which have been developed in the United Kingdom itself in the course of its history. These are described in the essay "Human rights and fundamental freedoms in the United Kingdom" on pages 318 to 321 of the Human Rights Year Book for 1946.

Basic legislation and its application

The British concept of human rights and fundamental freedoms is based on a general acceptance of the principles of liberty, an acceptance which is so fundamental that the existence of these rights and freedoms is taken for granted. It follows that the current legislation which can be said to relate to human rights and fundamental freedoms in Non-Self-Governing Territories for which the United Kingdom is responsible, is, as in the United Kingdom itself, principally concerned, not with the establishment of particular theoretical rights and privileges, but with the clarification of means of preserving and operating already existing rights, having regard to those of the rest of the communities involved, in such a way as to enable the rights of the individual to be preserved in the changing context of day to day life. The constitutional instruments of most of the Territories are therefore limited to providing for the establishment of the Legislature and for the office and duties of the Governor, and the fundamental rights are not to be found in these instruments but in the ordinary law of the Territory. It is the Ordinances and the case law of the Territory which afford protection for these rights, and thus the legal position closely resembles that obtaining in the United Kingdom. In many Territories there is specific provision that the basic law shall be the law in force in England on some particular date, subject to subsequent enactments of the Territory. Further, uniformity in the administration of justice and in the maintenance of the rule of law is guaranteed by the existence of an ultimate Court of Appeal for all Territories, composed of the most eminent judges of the United Kingdom.

In certain Territories, some legislation has the effect of introducing concepts of human rights and fundamental freedoms which, though taken for granted in the United Kingdom and other parts of the world, are as yet foreign to the generality of the people of the Territory concerned, and such legislation can be said to initiate a particular rights for that people, e.g. legislation restricting such practices as child marriage.

There is, moreover, a great deal of legislation dealing with the economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories (e.g. relating to the granting of government assistance to schools, the establishment of trade unions, and penal administration) which has the effect of entrenching those human rights generally regarded as appropriate within those fields. This legislation is transmitted regularly to the Secretary-General and may be drawn upon in the compilation of his summaries and analyses, subject to the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter. The most important points of such legislation are mentioned in the relevant sections of the transmissions made in accordance with Article 73 e in respect of individual Territories.

Application

As to the application of this legislation, every Non-Self-Governing Territory under United Kingdom administration is equipped with police and a system of courts whose task it is to apply the legislation in force.

Anti-discrimination legislation

Apart from differential legislation designed to protect the less developed sections of the population (e.g. against economic or cultural submergence by other communities), or to exempt indigenous inhabitants from certain obligations imposed on non-indigenous peoples, such discrimination as exists in the Territories under United Kingdom protection stems from the customs and practices of the individuals and communities concerned. To this the enactment of legislation is not a conclusive answer; the best safeguard against such practices lies in the advancement of the less highly developed communities and in a healthy public opinion which will itself discountenance prejudice. As the previous Secretary of /State for

State for the colonies assured the House of Commons on 1 August 1951, it is the fixed policy of the United Kingdom Government "to encourage the advancement of all communities in the colonial Territories, without discrimination as to race, or colour, and to make every effort within the power of Government to secure equal treatment for all." It was with this object in mind that the United Kingdom Government subscribed to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and has become a party to the European Convention of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms made at Rome on 4 November 1950, which is applicable to the Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories for whose international relations the United Kingdom is responsible, at the request of the Governments of those Territories.<sup>1/</sup>

These Governments are now being consulted as to whether they wish to adhere to this Convention, and a large number have already signified their desire to do so. The effect of any such application will be to establish a code of human rights and freedoms embodying the most important of those ideals which in the past have been regarded as axiomatic and inherent in the constitutions of these Territories.

Summary of General Trends in Territories under United Kingdom Administration

1. Section C of the explanatory preface of the revised Standard Form invites Members to provide a survey of the principles and practical measures showing general trends in the Territories concerned, in order to permit the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to review the progress achieved in the Territories in the fields covered by Article 73 e of the Charter. In response to this request, the United Kingdom has transmitted its published review on the Colonial Territories 1951-52, from which the following details have been summarized.<sup>1/</sup>

I. ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

2. As a result of high prices for most primary products, the Territories, until recently, have been enjoying boom conditions and the position is reflected in greatly increased public revenue. More money has thus been available for economic and social betterment and the territorial development plans have changed shape considerably. On the other hand, much of the new proposed expenditure is required to meet rising costs. The situation is rendered less satisfactory on account of the difficulty in obtaining capital goods, and colonial development is inevitably hampered because the steel and machinery essential for building and transport do not come forward quickly enough. Until the general problems of the sterling area have been solved, it is not possible to make good the requirements from other than sterling sources.

3. The principal factor affecting the economic situation was the external balance of payments difficulties of the sterling area. Import controls continue to be necessary in the Territories for the purpose of conserving hard foreign currencies. The territorial Governments have been asked to take measures which would restrict imports during 1952 from the non-sterling areas to below the 1951 level. The action most generally proposed is a return to the specific licensing of many items previously on open license.

4. The balance of trade between the years 1949 and 1951 was as follows, in million pounds:

	1949	1950	1951 (1st half)	1951 (2nd half)
West Africa	+ 28	+ 58	+ 73	+ 1
East Africa	- 19	+ 2	+ 11	- 2
Malaya	- 15	+128	+117	+ 37
West Indies	- 16	- 12	- 3	- 12

6. Imports into the Territories were affected by world shortages, particularly of iron and steel, semi-manufactures, non-ferrous metals and sulfa-containing chemicals. The prices of many imports rose together with freight rates. World shortages also affected supplies of copper, copper alloy, zinc and aluminum products. Exports of these products from the United Kingdom were restricted but the total imports into the Territories continued to increase.

7. Of the major imports from 1949 to 1951, the following examples are given:<sup>1/</sup>

II. DEVELOPMENT PLANS

8. Almost all territorial governments have by now adopted long-term plans of economic and social development. Many of these have been revised since their initiation to take account of such new factors as rising costs and unforeseen changes in the governments' financial resources. The general tendency is to place more emphasis on productive development.

9. The expenditure provided for in the various plans and approved up to 31 March 1952 totalled approximately £456,000,000. In this total, funds provided from metropolitan sources as colonial development and welfare totalled £78,419,000; of the remainder £156,771,000 is covered by loans and £220,877,000 from local territorial sources.<sup>1/</sup>

10. In the period under review plans were adopted in the Gold Coast and St. Kitts, and draft plans for Antigua, the British Virgin Islands and British Honduras were under consideration. The Gold Coast plan provides for expenditure of £75,000,000, of which about 17 per cent is to be directly applied to increasing productive capacity, 35 per cent is to be devoted to communications, 33 per cent to social services, and 15 per cent to common services and general administration. The plan will be financed partly from loans and ordinary revenue, but mainly from an additional export duty on cocoa.

11. Among the plans which have been revised is that of the Kenya Government. The total estimate expenditure during the ten years ending in 1955 is now £35,489,500 compared with the previously approved programme of £20,751,500. Emphasis is placed on measures designed to improve the agricultural industry and educational and health facilities also have a high priority.

12. Eight new Colonial Development Corporation projects were sanctioned during the year. This brought the total number of projects in operation at the end of March 1952 to 53, involving a total capital commitment of approximately £35,000,000.

13. More definite evidence has been obtained regarding the value of physical assets created each year in the form of machinery, vehicles, public works and plantation, and mining developments. In 1948 and 1949, this gross capital formation (including replacements) amounted to approximately £200,000,000. Provisional figures for 1950 and 1951 suggest that the annual rate is rising and that it passed the £300,000,000 mark in 1951 (no adjustments being made for changes in price levels).

14. Grants-in-aid of administration, and grants to assist Territories in countering exceptional difficulties were again made. Following the Jamaican hurricane, the British Government, after making an immediate grant of £250,000, agreed to provide up to £4,600,000 towards the cost of repairs, re-housing and the restoration of agricultural production. Issues totalling £6,885,200 were made to the Governments of Malaya, North Borneo and Sarawak as further installments of assistance for war damage compensation.<sup>1/</sup>

15. During the year ending March 1952, various territorial governments raised a total of approximately £18,500,000 as loans on the London market, in order to finance their development programmes.<sup>2/</sup>

III. SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

16. The expansion of the public health services over the past 25 years is illustrated by figures of government expenditure. In Nigeria, for example, expenditure on the Medical Department rose from £437,944 in 1928 to £3,614,811 in 1951. A great measure of control has been gained over many of the tropical diseases. On the other hand, stubborn problems remain, such as tuberculosis. The steady increase in the number of doctors and trained auxiliaries has brought about improved efficiency and enabled more and more attention to be paid to preventive medicine. The effects of efficient public health measures are beginning to create new problems. The rate of population increase is becoming a matter of concern from the public health, as well as the social and economic aspects. In the prevention of disease, it has proved possible, in Mauritius, to complete a campaign against the principal insect carrier of malaria. Mauritius has thus emulated the achievement of Cyprus where in a three-year campaign the malaria-carrying mosquito was entirely eradicated. In the case of tuberculosis, increasing use is being made of BCG vaccine. In Jamaica, a campaign was launched in October 1951 to immunize all the Colony's children and young adults within two years. In the Far East, mass BCG vaccination was aided by UNICEF teams, and in Singapore this form of vaccination is now a routine feature of school and rural health work. Other large-scale action with the help of UNICEF has been undertaken in Aden and Trinidad.<sup>1/</sup>

17. The understandable demand for curative services continues to increase and it is not always easy to demonstrate the need for a balanced development between these services and preventive measures. The development of rural health centres is noted in Kenya, Nyasaland, Nigeria, Barbadoes, and elsewhere.<sup>2/</sup>

18. An Applied Nutrition Unit has been established in London in order to help the territorial governments to survey the problems of nutrition and to work out practical nutrition programmes. Various local projects have been developed and assistance in the forms of supplies of milk and supplementary food was again received from UNICEF.<sup>3/</sup>

19. Despite the variations in local conditions, a housing policy with common features is beginning to emerge in many Territories. The main aims are to clear slums and relieve over-crowding, particularly in urban areas, to improve standards in rural areas, to keep in step with the requirements of economic development, and to accomodate the natural increase in population. It is becoming the general aim to work to long-term programmes and fixed minimum standards, to provide permanent dwellings with adequate services and amenities, and to cater for families rather than single workers.<sup>4/</sup>

20. A comprehensive review of community development has been undertaken, particularly with a view to training methods. A community development training course was held in England in June 1951, and in the previous months a conference was held on work by and among women in colonial Territories.
21. A conference of heads of labour departments was held in London in September-October 1951. The need for industrial harmony in carrying out plans of economic development and as a permanent social factor in colonial progress was one of the underlined themes of the conference. A close examination was undertaken of the means of resolving industrial disputes and of encouraging co-operation between worker and employer. The problems of technical training, apprenticeship schemes and trade testing were examined, as well as the general problem of social security.<sup>1/</sup>
22. Provisional figures show that in September 1951 there were some 1,220 trade unions registered in the Territories, with an estimated membership of 737,000. A special review has been undertaken of trade union legislation, the results of which were communicated to colonial governments for their consideration. Trade union courses have been organized, notably in Barbados and Singapore.
23. The increase in the activities of co-operative societies between 1945 and 1950 is shown by the fact that the numbers of registered societies and of members have doubled; paid-up share capital has almost trebled; reserve funds have trebled; the value of produce marketed has increased five-fold; and the turnover in consumer societies eight-fold.<sup>2/</sup>

IV. EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS

24. The universities and university colleges of Hong Kong, Malaya, the Gold Coast, Nigeria, East Africa and the West Indies continued to progress. Large building programmes are nearing completion and the university institutions are developing as important centres of research.

25. Courses began in January 1952 at the two colleges of technology in the Gold Coast and Nigeria.

26. In respect of primary and secondary education and teacher training, in some ways, particularly for the African Territories, the year marked the culmination of a generation of educational development. In Southern Nigeria, in 1920-21, there were 212 government and assisted schools with an enrollment of 30,000 pupils. In Nigeria as a whole today, there are some 9,000 schools with 1,000,000 pupils. Further examples of this increase are given.<sup>1/</sup> The need for a new comprehensive review of educational objectives in Africa had been felt for some time and in 1951 teams visited West, East and Central Africa, studying all aspects of African primary and secondary education. Their findings will be discussed at a conference to be held in 1952.

27. In addition to expansion in teacher training facilities in the Territories, important efforts were made during the year to bring teachers into closer touch with educational thought and practice in the United Kingdom. Secondary school teachers are being attached as working members of the staff to secondary schools in the United Kingdom. Teachers were brought from South East Asia and West Africa for special courses. A Malayan teacher training college was opened near Liverpool, and in January 1952 received its first batch of 150 students, men and women, to begin a five-term course.

28. Mention is made of the work of the Departments of Extra-Mural Studies at the University Colleges of the West Indies, Ibadan and the Gold Coast.<sup>2/</sup> The firm establishment of these Departments has given to adult education in the areas which they serve a direction and leadership which could not perhaps have been achieved in any other way. Here and elsewhere the work had been assisted by peoples' education associations or adult education associations. For the purpose of reviewing the whole position of adult education, a conference was held in August 1951 at Cambridge University, at which colonial students participated.

29. Enrollment at the colonial universities and university colleges totalled 3,417. In the United Kingdom, colonial students numbered 5,154. The Gold Coast

Government launched a scheme for the training of artisans and technicians in the United Kingdom and 30 trainees arrived in January 1952.

30. A newly formed Colonial Office Consultative Committee met in November 1951 in connection with the welfare of colonial students in the United Kingdom. The Committee comprises representatives of the political parties in the United Kingdom, the heads of the main colonial students' unions and representatives of London University and the national union of students, as well as members of the Colonial Office and British Council staff.<sup>1/</sup>

V. PARTICIPATION IN REGIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL AGENCIES

31. The Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East held a Trade Promotion Conference at Singapore in October 1951; a prominent Singapore Chinese businessman was elected Chairman, and commercial interests in Malaya/Borneo and Hong Kong were represented. Meetings were also held of Working Parties on the Mobilisation of Domestic Capital, Cottage and Small-Scale Industries, and Standard International Trade Classification, and of the Committee on Inland Transport, and Sub-Committees on Iron and Steel and Electric Power, to most of which the United Kingdom territories sent delegates. The Fourth Session of the Committee on Industry and Trade, and the Eighth Plenary Session of the Commission were held at Rangoon in January/February 1952; at both the Malaya/Borneo group and Hong Kong were represented by delegations.

32. The Colonial Office was represented on the United Kingdom delegation to the F.A.O. Biennial Conference. Colonial Governments have continued to play an active part in regional meetings, sending representatives to meetings on rice breeding, foot and mouth disease, land use problems and Desert Locust control, among others. Colonial representatives attended a training course held by F.A.O. in the Middle East on agricultural and allied development plans and in the United Kingdom on nematology.

33. Meetings held under the auspices of the I.L.O. at which there was colonial representation included the 34th session of the International Labour Conference in Geneva in June 1951, a Migration Conference in Naples in October, a Regional Technical Conference on Asian Manpower in Bangkok in December, a seminar on labour statistics in New Delhi in November and a seminar on labour inspection in Calcutta in February 1952.

34. The First Session of the Regional Committee of WHO for the Western Pacific, in June 1951, was attended by a United Kingdom delegation headed by the Deputy Chief Medical Officer in the Colonial Office. The United Kingdom delegate to the Second Session held in Manila in September 1951 was the Director of Medical Services, Hong Kong. The First Session of the Regional Committee for Africa was held in Geneva in September and was attended by a United Kingdom delegation again headed by the Deputy Chief Medical Officer in the Colonial Office. In September also, the Directing Council of the Pan-American Sanitary Organisation, acting in its capacity as W.H.O. Regional Committee for the Western Hemisphere, held its Fifth Meeting in Washington; the United Kingdom delegation to this meeting was led by the Medical Adviser to the Development and Welfare Organisation in the West Indies, who was accompanied by advisers from Jamaica and Barbados.

35. The Secretary of State's Deputy Educational Adviser and the State Secretary of Selangor, Federation of Malaya, attended the Sixth Session of the General Conference of U.N.E.S.C.O. at Paris in July-August 1951, as advisers to the United Kingdom delegation. The Second Regional Conference of National Commissions was held in Bangkok in November-December 1951. Member States in South Asia and the South Pacific were invited to participate and the Member for Education, Federation of Malaya, led the United Kingdom delegation of advisers from the Federation of Malaya, Singapore and Hong Kong.

36. The Extraordinary Administrative Radio Conference held in Geneva, from August to December 1951, was attended by a delegation representing the Colonial Ensemble. Advantage has been taken of the introduction of provision for Associate Membership to sponsor the East African (Kenya-Uganda-Tanganyika) and West African (Nigeria-Gold Coast-Sierra Leone-Gambia) groups of territories for Associate Membership of the Union as two group members. The question of sponsoring other groups of territories is under consideration.

VI. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

See Document A/AC.35/L.96

VII. INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

37. The Commonwealth Sugar Agreement was signed in December 1951. The signatories of the agreement are on the one hand the United Kingdom Ministry of Food and on the other the Queensland Sugar Board, the South African Sugar Association, the British West Indies Sugar Association, the Mauritius Sugar Syndicate, and the Colonial Sugar Refining Company Ltd., Fiji. Special clauses provide for the accession of East Africa, British Honduras, and St. Vincent. The agreement covers the period 1950 to 1959 but may be extended for a year at any time during its course.

38. During 1952 the Ministry of Food will purchase the total exportable surplus of the Commonwealth. From 1953 to 1959 inclusive the United Kingdom has undertaken to purchase 1,568,000 tons of sugar (1,118,000 tons from the colonies) at annually negotiated prices designed to give reasonable remuneration to the producers. In addition 75,000 (54,000 tons from the colonies) of sugar will be bought on this basis to supply New Zealand's requirements. The Commonwealth producers on their part have undertaken to plan for the present for aggregate exports which will not exceed 2,375,000 tons a year. The difference between the total production and the total amount which the United Kingdom has undertaken to buy is expected to find a market either in the United Kingdom or Canada at current market prices plus preferences.

39. The price negotiated for each year under the agreement will be a single Commonwealth price applicable to all exporting territories. The agreement contains a formula subject to revision at the request of any party to the agreement for computing each year a price which will reflect changes in the levels of wages and other factors affecting costs since 1950.

40. The International Sugar Council met in June 1951 and considered further the preparation of a revised draft International Sugar Agreement.

/41. A "deficiency

41. A "deficiency materials" agreement was signed during the year by the United States Economic Co-operation Administration with a Northern Rhodesia company, providing for a £3 million sterling advance against the production of copper by the company. In addition a sterling loan of £5 million was made to the Rhodesia Railways for development of the railway system. A dollar advance of $3,300,000 was made to a Jamaica company for bauxite production.

42. A basic agreement for the provision of technical assistance to United Kingdom dependent territories was signed on 25 June 1951 between the United Kingdom Government and the United Nations and Specialized Agencies operating the expanded programme.<sup>1/</sup>

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

The average annual production of sugar, the main product, for the last three years was 452,000 metric tons compared with an average production of about 224,000 tons thirty years ago. Considerable progress was made in the opening up of the Government tea estate where it is intended to plant as much as 500 acres in the next few years. The population has continued to increase and employment and housing are among the main problems to be solved.

Progress continued under the Mauritius Development and Welfare Ten-Year Plan (1946-56). The total estimated expenditure over the 10-year period is about 109 million rupees. No significant change occurred in the direct and indirect means by which the development plan is worked out. The total expenditure at 30 June 1952 amounted to 42,917,937 rupees.

Summary of General Trends in Territories under United Kingdom Administration
(1953 - 1954)

1. In order to permit the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to review the progress achieved in the Territories in the fields covered by Article 73 e of the Charter, section C of the explanatory preface of the revised Standard Form invites Members to provide a survey of the principles and practical measures showing general trends in the Territories under their administration. In response to this request, the United Kingdom has transmitted its published review on the Colonial Territories for the year ending 31 March 1954. Except when otherwise indicated, and subject in certain cases to the addition of more recent official statistics, the following details are taken from this publication.<sup>1/</sup>

I. ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

2. The volume of exports of primary products continued at the level of the three preceding years. This level stands at roughly a third higher than that achieved before the 1939-45 war; taking 1948 = 100, the volume index for 1953 was 125 as against 90 for 1936.

3. Prices declined during 1953 and the value of exports stood at about 9 per cent below 1952 and 26 per cent below 1951. The decrease was mainly accounted for by Malaya, which was hard hit by the fall in rubber and tin prices; by Hong Kong, whose entrepôt trade suffered severely because of restrictions on exports to China, and by East Africa, where output of crops such as cotton and coffee was lower than in the preceding season, due mainly to unfavourable weather, especially to the long drought early in the year.

<sup>1/</sup> United Kingdom: The Colonial Territories 1953-54, Cmd. 9169 London, 1954. The Territories covered in this publication are not identical with those in respect of which information is transmitted under Article 73 e. In particular, the Trust Territories, Malta and Tongo are included and the High Commission Territories of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland are excluded.

4. It may be seen from the table given in Appendix A, where comparison is made between the first six months of 1953 and 1954, that the value of exports increased in 20 Territories from 1.9 per cent in Kenya to 77.9 per cent in British Honduras, while it decreased in 6 Territories from 2.3 per cent in Zanzibar to 24.9 in Hong Kong.

5. The value of imports into the Territories also fell, but just as the rise in imports between 1949 and 1951 lagged behind that of exports, so the fall in imports in the past two years has been less severe than the fall in exports. The table of average value indices of imports in certain Territories given in Appendix B indicates that the fall continued into the first six months of 1954. However, as set out in the table in Appendix C, the comparison of value of imports for the first six months of 1953 and 1954 shows an increase in 15 Territories from 1.9 per cent in Bermuda to 25.7 per cent in Fiji, and a decrease in 10 Territories from 0.4 per cent in the Bahamas to 23.1 per cent in Hong Kong.

6. The Territories as a whole were in deficit on current account in 1953 for the first time since the Korean war. This deficit in the balance of payments was financed by external investment and not by the drawing down of external reserves which continued to rise, although at a slower rate.

Direction of trade

7. The distribution of total imports into United Kingdom Territories according to their origin during the first five months of 1954 was very much the same as during the year 1953.<sup>1/</sup> There was a slight decrease in the proportion of goods imported from the United Kingdom and from other parts of the sterling area. Imports from non-sterling O.E.E.C. countries and from other European, Asian and African countries showed a corresponding increase. The ratio of imports from the United States of America (5.6 per cent) was slightly lower than in 1953 (5.8 per cent) and more significantly lower than in 1952 (6.3 per cent). Imports from Japan which suffered a sharp decline between 1952 and 1953 did not recover during the first five months of 1954, remaining at a monthly average figure of 4.3 million. The measures taken in the beginning of 1954 to relax restrictions on Japanese imports had not had time to make themselves felt.

8. The breakdown of total exports from the same Territories according to their destination shows a fairly similar ratio in the first five months of 1954 and in 1953 as far as the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area is concerned.<sup>1/</sup> Nevertheless, the proportion of exports to non-sterling O.E.E.C. countries increased by one-fifth at the expense of exports to the United States of America and to non-sterling Asian and African countries.

Public finance

9. In spite of the decline in the value of exports, total revenue at just over £390 million was less than £20 million below the record reached in 1952. Compared with 1939, revenue in terms of cash has increased sevenfold. While the public revenues of the Federation of Malaya, North Borneo and Sarawak were reduced by their trade recession, those of most other Territories remained buoyant, but there were signs of a fall in the near future. Although most territorial governments did not add to their reserves, few were compelled to draw from them, except for spending out of specially constituted development reserves. On the other hand, the general upward trend of government expenditure, continued particularly in the maintenance of the expanded social services, and the fall in raw material prices was nowhere accompanied by any significant lowering in the costs of administration. The point in fact was reached in many of the Territories where a current deficit could not be avoided in the near future if present trends in revenue and expenditure continued.

10. The total value of gross capital formation in the Territories was some 5 per cent to 10 per cent higher in 1953 than in 1952. Present incomplete information suggests that the greater part of this increase was accounted for by the rise in public development expenditure, and points to a total gross capital formation of about £410 - 425 million at current prices.

a/ From 1951, when separate data for residential buildings were first obtained, this component has accounted for about 35 per cent of the total of this item.

b/ Enlarged by rehabilitation expenditure of Malaya.

12. Over the five years 1948-52, the approximate geographical distribution of the total gross capital formation was as follows: East and Central Africa (30 per cent); West Africa (15 per cent); Far Eastern Territories (25 per cent); Caribbean Territories (15 per cent); Others (15 per cent). African Territories, with over 80 per cent of the total population, accounted for 45 per cent of the total capital formation.

II. DEVELOPMENT PLANS

13. Expenditure from Colonial Development and Welfare funds during the year totalled approximately £14 million, being the same as in the previous year. Capital expenditure by territorial governments and other public bodies was also maintained. Progress was assisted by the easier supply of capital goods, previously scarce; the main brake on public development in most Territories being shortages of administrative and technical staff. Colonial Development and Welfare commitments on research schemes amounted to some £11.5 million at the end of the year. Fifty-nine new schemes were approved at an estimated cost of £741,000.

14. In addition, financial assistance from the metropolitan Government included the following: £6 million to the Federation of Malaya and Singapore as a further instalment of the assistance promised towards compensation for war damage, for which purpose there were also loan issues of £4 million; a grant of £6 million to the Federation of Malaya towards the cost of the emergency in 1954, to which loans of £4.7 million and £3.5 million by Brunei and Singapore were also made; a grant of £4 million and an interest-free loan of £2 million in respect of emergency expenditure to Kenya, and, a first grant of £500,000 towards a total of £5 million to carry out a five-year plan for African agriculture in that Territory; £3,125,000 to British Guiana for its accelerated development programme; a special allocation of £1.25 million to the Rhodesia University College to meet the bulk of the cost of the first stage in its building programme; £799,000 to Aden as the first instalment of a loan up to £4 million promised to meet expenditure on municipal services in connexion with the construction of the oil refinery; £500,000 to Nyasaland towards its capital programme; £360,000 to the Federation of Malaya as the first instalment of a grant up to £7,290,000 towards the capital cost of expansion of the Federation's armed forces; £175,000 to North Borneo as a further instalment of grant-in-aid expenditure in connexion with post-war reconstruction and rehabilitation; £91,990 to the Falkland Islands towards the cost of the expanded programme of survey work; £70,000 to Grenada for pier development; and £45,000 to St. Helena for public works. To meet the costs of repairing damage caused by earthquakes, fires and floods, the following grants were made; £740,000 to Jamaica; £500,000 to Cyprus; £200,000 to Hong Kong; £20,000 to St. Kitts-Nevis and £13,000 to Montserrat.

15. Contributions to the cost of development were made from territorial revenues; the sums varied from Territory to Territory, but it is reckoned that they amounted to about 50 per cent of the total annual costs. Local resources were also drawn on to finance development through public loans floated in the Territories concerned, loans negotiated by the Federation of Malaya and by North Borneo with the government of Brunei and funds made available on loan from the balances of marketing boards. In this way, the Federation of Malaya, for instance, raised the equivalent of some £14 million; the Gold Coast some £2.4 million, and the Singapore City Council, some £2.3 million.

16. Public loans raised on the London market during the year totalled about £20.5 million as compared with about £22 million in 1952. In addition, the governments of Sierra Leone, Kenya and Aden, and the East African High Commission raised a total of about £2.25 million in their Territories by local reservation of part of their London loans. A sterling loan of £2,390,000 for port development in East Africa was made by the Government of the United States.

17. The following table shows the percentage proportion of contributions to the financing of approved development plans.

Period	Financed from C.D. and W. Funds per cent	Financed from local and loan resources per cent
1949-50	34.0	66.0
1950-51	31.3	68.1
1951-52	17.2	82.8

18. In East Africa, nearly £60 million was spent on development by the governments of Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika between 1946 and the end of 1952, and by March 1956, when their ten-year development programmes come to an end, it is expected that they will have spent at least another 40-50 million pounds. On 1 April 1954, a loan of £2,045,000 was raised by the East Africa High Commission for the development of posts and telecommunications. Only £1,600,000 was offered for public subscription in the United Kingdom, the rest having been taken up for territorial government funds.

19. During the next two years, proposals for the economic development of British Guiana will involve the expenditure of approximately £3 million on transport, communications, and other public works, and over £2.5 million on agriculture and forestry; £2 million on a housing programme, and £1 million for agricultural and industrial credits to be administered by a credit corporation. As mentioned in paragraph 14, the Government of the United Kingdom is providing a grant of £3,125,000 from Colonial Development and Welfare funds and will assist in raising £3,417,000 in loans on the London market. The Credit Corporation was set up to provide financial credit and stimulate and facilitate private investment of local and external capital. A total of $BWI 8.2 million has been allocated to the Corporation for the period of the two-year development plan (1954-55). An Economic Council under the chairmanship of the Governor of British Guiana was also established. Twelve Development Committees were constituted, each consisting of four official and not less than four unofficial members, of whom two are smallholders, tenants or employers, under the chairmanship of the District Commissioner. They are to assist in the making and carrying out of development plans throughout the Colony.

20. A report was submitted on the Draft Development Plan for the Federation of Malaya. By the end of 1952, a start had been made on 213 out of 546 schemes under the Plan. Capital expenditure estimated at M$ 250.7 million had been incurred out of a prospective total (for the six years of the plan) of just over M$ 855 million. Developments in the economic, social and political fields which have taken place since 1950 pointed to a revision of the Plan. The rubber and tin boom, followed by an almost equally sharp recession, has had far-reaching effects. In rubber, the Smallholders' Replanting Scheme has emerged as a critical factor in the future of that important sector of Malaya's greatest industry. The general problem of maintaining the industry's capital and efficiency in the face of lower prices and increased competition from synthetic rubber are shortly to be the subject of an investigation by an independent mission. The programme of resettlement is throwing up problems in social administration at the same time as it involves repercussions on the pattern of national production. The report of the Rice Production Committee and the work of the Department of Agriculture in improving rice varieties and increasing the use of fertilizers have presented new problems and opportunities in connexion with the supply of the nation's staple foodstuff. In the social services, the adoption by the legislature of a national policy for education also necessitates basic revisions in that part of the old development plan. The development of local government must also have repercussions on development planning which had not been foreseen.

21. The total amount of capital approved in 1953 for Colonial Development Corporation projects was about £6 million, of which £1.75 million was required to supplement capital already approved for existing schemes, and £4.25 million for new schemes. Capital sanctioned for projects in operation at the end of March, 1954 was £45 million; total capital sanctioned (including capital sanction for abandoned projects) was £51.75 million.

22. In addition to the Colonial Development Corporation, which is financed from funds of the Government of the United Kingdom, there were at the end of March, 1954, 21 locally-instituted bodies of this kind operating in the Territories. They are operated in a number of ways, but broadly speaking, they consist of two types; corporations directly undertaking projects, often in association with private concerns and usually on large-scale projects, and corporations primarily concerned with financing small local industries.

23. The following are examples of some of these local organizations. The Uganda Development Corporation is participating in the exploitation of copper and cobalt deposits at Kilembe. It is also associated with a company formed in partnership with the Busoga local government and the territorial Government to explore the possibilities of deep-water mormyrus fishing in South Busoga, wherein the Corporation acts as the managing agent. The Corporation is already operating a cement works at Tororo, the Uganda Fish Marketing Corporation, and the Lake Victoria hotel as well as being a partner in the Tororo Exploration Company which is investigating the potentialities of the Sukulu mineral complex. In the Gold Coast, the Industrial Development Corporation is making £150,000 available for the establishment of a local tile factory. Other general development organizations in African Territories are the Agricultural Development Corporation<sup>1/</sup> and Agricultural Loans Board in the Gold Coast; the Eastern, Northern and Western Regional Development Boards and the Regional Production Development Boards, and the Colony Development Board in Nigeria; the Development and Industrial Board in Sierra Leone; the Industrial Loans Board and Land Bank in Northern Rhodesia. There are also development organizations set up for special purposes as, for instance, the Lagos Executive Development Board; the Uganda Electricity Board; the Kafue River Hydro-Electric Authority in Northern Rhodesia and the Tema Development Corporation set up to develop a township at the new port of Tema in the Gold Coast.

24. In the Caribbean region there are the Industrial Development Corporation and the Agricultural Development Corporation in Jamaica; the Industrial Development Fund in Antigua, while, arising from the survey by the International Bank, a Credit Corporation is being established to provide financial assistance for industrial and agricultural development in British Guiana.

25. In the Federation of Malaya, the Rural and Industrial Development Authority is charged with the duty of stimulating and undertaking economic and social developments, while in Fiji, similar objectives are pursued by the Agricultural and Industrial Loans Board and the Fiji Development Fund Board.

26. To take account of changing circumstances, revisions of development plans were completed or were in progress in many Territories. Details of such revisions and of the progress achieved are given in the report on development plans prepared by the Secretariat for submission to the 1954 session of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>1/</sup>

III. SOCIAL CONDITIONS

27. In view of the fact that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories at its sixth session in 1955 will have before it separate reports on a number of aspects of social conditions in the United Kingdom Territories, it has not been thought necessary in this report to deal with certain general trends, as for example, in the field of community development and in regard to certain matters relating to public health administration.

28. Registered trade unions, including 206 employers' associations, numbered 1,437 with a total membership of 950,000 at the end of 1953, as compared with 1,325 unions with a membership of about 865,000 in 1952. As in previous years, special training courses were provided for trade union leaders. Trade union leaders from several Territories came to the United Kingdom for short training courses arranged with the help of the Ministry of Labour and National Service and the Trades Union Congress. A West Indian regional training course was held in Jamaica with the help of a grant from Colonial Development and Welfare funds.

29. Machinery for joint consultation and negotiation continued to be established. Among new organizations set up were a Joint Industrial Council for the building trade in Jamaica, a joint committee to regulate conditions of work for government non-established workers in St. Kitts-Nevis, and two Whitley Councils, one for daily and the other for monthly-paid government employees, in the Federation of Malaya. The advancement of Africans in the Northern Rhodesian mining industry remains one of the most difficult problems of industrial relations. Discussion of the whole problem was initiated by the mining companies with the European Mineworkers' Union, and an official of the Miners' International presided over joint talks between the European and African unions. At the meeting a resolution was passed supporting the claims of Africans for advancement, stressing that equal pay for equal work and responsibility should apply, and proposing the establishment of a joint consultative committee between the two unions.

30. In May 1954, 17 trade unionists from the four West African Territories administered by the United Kingdom attended a three week training course in the Gold Coast which was organized by the Trade Union Information Advisory Centre established at Accra by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. The West African Information Advisory Centre was opened following recommendations made by a West and Central African trade union conference in 1951; the first training course attended by 20 students was organized in January 1954. In addition to organizing training courses, the Centre has published since April 1954 a monthly newspaper, the "West African worker".

31. A Labour Officers' Conference was held in Trinidad in December 1953. A ten-week training course for West Indian trade union officials was held at the University College of the West Indies in 1954. Several Wages Councils were established in the Windward Islands. These are mainly concerned with employment in agriculture. In Trinidad, a Wage Council to cover the wholesale and distributive trade was set up. Labour Advisory Boards were reconstituted in Grenada, St. Vincent and St. Lucia and a Board appointed for the first time in Dominica.

32. In Kenya, the government has passed a Bill implementing the main recommendations of the Carpenter Committee, which was set up in 1953 to investigate African wages and labour conditions and issued its report in March 1954. There will be a 10 shillings-a-month rise to all Africans, and a rise from 6s. to 11s. a month in housing allowances payable to African employees. Other recommendations to be considered are: payment of wages to provide for essential needs, regular employment, proper housing, and old age security. The development of the migrant labour system is condemned by the Committee as prejudicial to Kenya's economy and as causing undesirable social effects in urban areas.

Social security and welfare

33. Almost all Territories have now made statutory provision for the payment of compensation to those injured in the course of their work. During the year a workmen's compensation ordinance came into force in Hong Kong and British Somaliland, while amendments to existing laws were enacted in Cyprus, Nigeria and North Borneo.

34. Contributory schemes of social insurance, including provision of old age pensions, widows' benefit, sickness benefit, maternity benefit, orphans' benefit and death grants, were in preparation in Cyprus. An investigation into needs and possibilities in the field of social security was undertaken in British Guiana. Provision for the payment of non-contributory pensions and allowances without means test to certain classes of persons, was included in the development plan of Brunei. In the Federation of Malaya, the Employers Provident Fund, set up in 1951, overcame initial difficulties, while in Singapore an ordinance was enacted to make provision for a Central Provident Fund.

35. The co-operative movement made satisfactory progress. In Uganda, eight cotton ginneries had been acquired at the end of 1953 for the co-operative marketing unions and the number of societies of all types had risen to over 800. During the present financial year, the co-operative societies in Bugishu (Eastern Uganda) have marketed crops to the value of £1,250,000, mostly coffee, which realized about £950,000. All principal office-bearers in the new Bugishu Co-operative Union, the biggest co-operative organization in Uganda with about 31,000 members, are Africans, and the three senior officials are members of the Uganda Co-operative Development Council. In Kenya the development of co-operative societies among Africans continued to be slow. While the vegetable marketing and other societies among the Kikuyu were at a standstill, the Luo Societies producing clarified butter were reported to be among the most genuine efforts at co-operation in the whole Territory. In the Western Region of Nigeria, a Co-operative Bank was formed with initial capital of £1 million provided by the Nigeria Cocoa Marketing Board. The Cocoa Co-operative Marketing Association had a turnover of £2 million and six copra marketing societies and a union were registered. Six small co-operative rice mills were started and a beginning made with the co-operative processing of rubber. In the Eastern Region a Co-operative Union of Eastern Nigeria and the Cameroons was formed, and with the aid of the Oil Palm Produce Marketing Board marketing societies were started for palm fruit. There are now about 10,000 women members of societies. Societies composed wholly of women number 96, of which the majority are thrift and credit, with six maternity societies and one embroidery society. In Mauritius, with the registration of 10 new societies, the membership of the 275 societies totalled 23,431. In Cyprus, 55 new societies were registered, bringing the total to 734. Loans issued through societies amounted to approximately £2 million.

36. In Jamaica, savings in the thrift and loan societies rose to £105,000 and surpluses were concentrated in the Jamaica Credit Union League. A federation of tomato marketing societies was registered, and loan finance amounting to £100,000 was provided by the government. In Trinidad and Tobago, the credit union movement increased in membership and share capital while the members of rural credit societies increased to 12,800 and loans issued to a total of £310,000.

37. In the Federation of Malaya there were 1,663 societies, of which 590 were rural credit societies with eight banking unions. There were 106 urban thrift and loan societies with 40,000 members and share capital and deposits amounting to £1,166,000. The consumer movement, supplied mainly by the government sponsored Malayan Co-operative Wholesale Society, did good business on estates and mines, and in those Malay village shops which insisted on cash trading. In Singapore, urban thrift and loan societies had a membership of 14,000 and share capital and deposits of £560,000. A Co-operative Central Bank, with membership of 90 societies, was registered in Sarawak. In Hong Kong, 21 new societies were registered bringing the total to 31. Ten more fishermen's credit societies whose activities it is hoped in time to extend to fish marketing and the supply of fishing requirements, were formed. Nearly half of all vegetables produced in the Territory is being handled through co-operative societies and farmers' collecting centres. The training and education of co-operative society members in the Gilbert and Ellice Islands was aided by regular talks by radio.

Prevention of crime and treatment of offenders

38. Problems of the treatment of offenders were kept under review, and the year was marked by the first international African conference on the subject held at Dar es Salaam. The recommendations of the conference emphasized the value of regimes which sought to develop the co-operation and self-discipline of the prisoners by progressively diminishing the supervision to which they are subjected. Other recommendations dealt with the extension of useful and constructive work as an aid to rehabilitation; special institutions for young adults; special courts, remand homes, approved schools and probation for juvenile delinquents; the training of staff; classification of prisoners; the constructive use of discipline; religious and moral welfare; social welfare and education; insane persons and the after-care of discharged prisoners.

39. Modifications of the relevant legislation, in line with many of these recommendations, is being affected in many Territories. The revision of prison rules was undertaken in Hong Kong, Somaliland Protectorate, Trinidad, the Federation of Malaya, and British Honduras, among others. In Kenya, a government-assisted Discharged Prisoners Aid Association was established; an earnings scheme was introduced in the Hong Kong prison, and the appointment in several Territories, for example, Nigeria, of building instructors under whose supervision prison works can be carried out by the prisoners, who at the same time benefit from the technical training.

Public health

40. The expansion of social services which has taken place in recent years as a result of greater earnings and the application of Colonial Development and Welfare Funds, has included, in the health services, advances in medical science. No widespread epidemic occurred during 1953, and the available figures point to an almost universal fall in mortality rates and a general rise in the expectation of life. Sleeping sickness in Africa has been fairly well brought under control; yaws has been mastered in closely settled areas; there has been a noteworthy advance against relapsing fever in Somaliland; and progress has been made almost everywhere in the control of malaria and in the treatment of leprosy. Realization is accorded to the vastness of the task remaining to be done, for example, tuberculosis remains a fatal disease of the first magnitude.

41. Routine public health measures in urban areas are increasingly becoming a function of local municipal authorities. Higher standards are demanded and maintained although, particularly in the older towns, the problems of zoning, slum clearance, re-housing and modernization of sanitary services remain and are complicated by the steady increase of urban populations.

42. Health education in most Territories is still regarded as one of the general functions of health officers and their staffs rather than as a specialized field. In Jamaica and Uganda, however, health education bureaux have been established, while in other Territories, such as Fiji, Hong Kong, Northern Rhodesia, and Antigua, health education activities include lectures, radio broadcasts, press articles, films, posters, school education, and exhibitions.

43. As instances of the health and medical care in employment, it is noted that several large-scale industrial projects, which called for special precautionary measures, have gone ahead without the occurrence of any of the health hazards formerly associated with this type of enterprise in tropical countries. In Aden, the construction of the new oil refinery progressed without any major health incident; the construction of the dam over the Nile at Owen Falls, Jinja, was completed with a singularly low sickness rate among the labour force employed; similarly, the health aspects of the Volta river scheme in the Gold Coast are being provided for, while the Silicosis Bureau at Kitwe in the Copperbelt of Northern Rhodesia, one of the best organized and equipped units of its kind, has added practical research to its statutory functions.

44. Although an increasing number of doctors of local origin are becoming available to serve in their own Territories, there is still an insufficient flow of recruits to the Medical Departments. At the end of 1953 there were 230 scholarship holders and 595 private students from the Territories studying medicine in the United Kingdom. In the Territories, the Universities of Malaya and Hong Kong and the University Colleges of the West Indies, of Ibadan in Nigeria and of East Africa at Makerere, Uganda, were training doctors in considerable numbers. These sources of trained manpower are enabling certain Territories gradually to build up medical services staffed predominantly by their own people, and by taking advantage of facilities for post-graduate studies offered overseas, officers from these services are able to achieve high qualifications in public health or the clinical specialist branches.

45. In the training of subordinate technical staff, advantage is being taken of opportunities for regional co-operation. The smaller Territories in the Caribbean have joined in a West Indian Training scheme which enables them to send students to schools in Jamaica and Trinidad, where more fully developed training centres exist. Five sanitary inspectors from Zanzibar started a course of training at Kongwa in Tanganyika, and one girl from Sarawak completed a two year course of training as a dental nurse in New Zealand. In Fiji, the new Central Medical School was completed and the buildings opened in December.

46. The training of nurses and midwives was progressively developed. Some 1,500 were taking general nursing, mental nursing or midwifery courses in the United Kingdom, while an increasing number are undergoing training in the Territories. In many Territories improvements were made in the training facilities and living accommodation for student nurses, and these have resulted in a much better standard of recruitment, both in quantity and quality.

IV. EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS

47. In all branches of education, the expansion of facilities has continued, the increased provision for the training of teachers being particularly significant. During the academic year of 1953-54, there were 3,364 full-time students at the two universities and four university colleges in the Territories. Progress was made in establishing a fifth university college in the Federation of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland. In the United Kingdom at the end of 1953, there were some 8,000 students from the Territories, of whom 1,965 were scholarship holders, as compared with 6,300 students and 1,443 scholarship holders in 1952.

48. In the field of higher technical education, the Gold Coast College of Technology, Science and Arts went through a year of consolidation. A revised scheme for the Nigerian College of Arts, Science and Technology was approved in July 1954. A federal institution, the College will be sited in three regional branches, at Zaria in the North, Ibadan in the West and Enugu in the East. The College, planned to provide higher education of a non-university character, will extend the scope of higher education beyond the facilities already provided at the University College of Ibadan. The College received a grant of £600,000 from the United Kingdom Colonial Development and Welfare Fund, and Western Nigeria's Regional Government increased its contribution for 1954-55 to the Extra-Mural Department of the University College at Ibadan from £6,000 to £9,000. Nigeria's first Institute of Administration, situated at Zaria in the Northern Region, was opened on 24 April 1954. In addition to providing degree courses of the University of Durham in arts and economics, Fourah Bay College, Sierra Leone, continued its teacher-training activities and provided courses in technical, commercial and extra-mural subjects.

49. In Nairobi, the building of the Royal Technical College of East Africa proceeded rapidly; a bill was enacted by the East Africa High Commission to provide for its administration and the first Principal of the College was appointed in May, 1953. The College and the Mahatma Gandhi Memorial College are to be merged. The Gandhi Memorial funds contributed by people of Indian origin in East Africa and by the Gandhi Memorial Fund of India, will be placed at the disposal of the Royal Technical College for utilization, particularly in the faculties of arts, science and commerce. The College will be administered as a completely multi-racial institution, providing higher education of a technical and technological nature, and also education in arts up to a certain level at which students would be eligible to enter a university. In engineering and commerce, students will be trained up to a standard equivalent to a university degree or to the educational requirements for associate membership of the professional institutes of England.

50. The number of students at the University College of East Africa, at Makerere, Uganda, has doubled over the last four years; there were in June 1954, 487 in residence, of whom 17 were women. The full-time teaching and research staff, including those of the East African Institute of Social Research, numbered 82. An Extra-Mural Department was started towards the end of 1953 with the appointment of a Resident Tutor in Uganda.

51. The Uganda Government has outlined a programme of technical education on which £2 million, out of the total sum of £10 million allocated for African education, will be spent. It is proposed to establish 11 rural trade schools with an annual output of 250 rural craftsmen, and 12 junior secondary technical schools, which will train artisans for industry. These would provide at least 300 artisans annually who have completed a three-year technical course and a further 220 who have also completed a two-year pre-technical general course.

52. In connexion with the establishment of the Rhodesia University College the following arrangements have been agreed to by the British Government and the governments in the Federation: The University is to be built in Salisbury; the College will be granted facilities for teaching and research near the site; and land is to be given to the College for a teaching and experimental farm of about 1,000 acres; the new Salisbury Native Hospital will be made available for the needs of a medical school. The Salisbury Round Table is sponsoring an appeal for donations for the endowment of a Chair of Race Relations, Political Philosophy and allied subjects. The aim will be "to create a centre, not only for the study of the causes of antagonisms in multi-racial communities, and of the measures which might remove or reduce such antagonisms, but also for the wide dissemination of the results of such study."

53. In the larger West African Territories, the main educational feature of recent years has been the movement towards universal primary education. In the Gold Coast, where the final drive towards universal primary education started at the beginning of 1952, very few children in the Colony and Ashanti between the ages of six and ten are not now in school. Over 1,000 trained teachers were produced in 1953 and 298 pupil teachers attended six-week residential courses; in addition, over 8,000 pupil teachers attended non-residential classes. Work was begun on the construction of Kumasi and Takoradi Technical Institution; and the total enrolment at trade and technical schools and institutes was over 1,200. In Nigeria, the Western Regional Government started implementing its policy for free compulsory primary education, which it hoped to introduce in January, 1955, while in the Eastern Region the most noteworthy achievement was the widespread introduction of rating for primary education. In Uganda, effort was concentrated on implementing the recommendations of the de Bunsen Committee, all of which were accepted except the proposals to extend the primary course from six to eight years and to abolish junior schools. In the latter case the present system was continued in deference to strong African opinion. For the implementation of the recommendations, the government has allocated the sum of £8 million from the African Development Fund over the period 1953-60.

A further £2 million had already been allocated towards the development of technical education. In Kenya, of the 188 Kikuyu independent schools closed at the end of 1952, 58 were re-opened, 20 under the management of missionary societies and 38 under District Education Boards, while of the remainder 60 were considered to be redundant. The number of primary schools aided from public funds was increased from 1,294 to 1,570, while intermediate schools were increased from 192 to 248. Development in secondary education continued in accordance with the planned programme, and 150 boys sat the Cambridge School Certificate as compared with 105 in 1952. Two mission secondary schools, for girls, the first in the country, are now well established, and two candidates sat the Cambridge School Certificate in 1952 and five in 1953. The two main events affecting African education in Northern Rhodesia were the final approval of the establishment of a Unified African Teaching Service and the publication of the Report on Higher Education for Africans in Central Africa. The Unified Teaching Service provides for all teachers, whether in the service of government, local authorities or missions, and makes a notable stage in the advancement of the profession. In Somaliland Protectorate, the first senior secondary school was opened and the government girls' school, the only one in the Territory, which was opened at the beginning of 1953, had a successful first year and was received with popular acclaim by the Somali community.

54. Surveys were undertaken of the educational system in Trinidad and the four islands in the Windward group. A report entitled "Education in Trinidad and Tobago" was prepared by a three-man Commission of Experts appointed early in 1954. The Commission submitted 75 recommendations, chiefly in the fields of technical education, agriculture, adult education, teacher training, and finance. Included in its proposals are: (1) a $6,000,000 ten-year building programme to provide 44,683 school places; (2) revision of the school syllabus; (3) establishment of a residential training college for teachers, a second technical institute in Port-of-Spain, community centres, and evening institutes; (4) co-operation on the school level between the Education and Agriculture Departments; and (5) the immediate appointment of a textbook advisory committee.

55. Vacation courses for teachers were well attended in St. Lucia and in British Honduras. A new senior secondary school and two new primary schools were completed in St. Kitts-Nevis, and in Montserrat a new senior secondary school was opened in January.

56. The recovery of education in the war-devastated Territories of South-East Asia and Hong Kong is illustrated by the following figures. In the Federation of Malaya the school population, which was little more than 250,000 at the end of Japanese occupation, stood at about 849,000 in 1953; in Singapore the school enrolment rose from 38,719 in 1945 to 163,000 in 1953 and in Hong Kong, where there were approximately 4,000 children at school in 1945, the total school enrolment in 1953 had increased to 211,000. Similarly, in Sarawak education expenditure in 1953 was nine times as high as in 1947, and over the same period school enrolment rose from 29,000 to over 49,000, while in North Borneo, where the Japanese occupation had caused a relapse in educational work, by May 1946, under the British Military Administration, 102 schools with over 8,500 pupils had been established. By September, 1953 the number had risen to 233 schools with an enrolment of over 24,000 children.

57. The Government of the Federation of Malaya has decided to establish a second teacher training college in the United Kingdom. The first, at Kirby, near Liverpool, was opened in January 1952. When in full operation, these two colleges, together with the newly established training college at Khota Bharu in the Federation will each provide accommodation for 300 teachers taking two-year courses, thus providing an annual output of 450 English-speaking teachers.

58. The revised regulations of the Gilbert and Ellice Islands promulgated in July provide that every child between the ages of 6 and 16 shall attend school. The revised regulations of the Ellice Islands state that it is the duty of every Native between the ages of 16 and 50 years to perform social services for not more than 52 days every year for the health, comfort and direct benefit of himself and the native community of any island on which he may be resident. The construction and maintenance of schools, hospitals, cisterns and wells, village latrines, and roads, bridges and embankments may be performed as Island Social Services.

59. With regard to adult education, another course for students from Overseas Territories in the United Kingdom was held by the Bristol University Extra-Mural Department. The three existing Extra-Mural Departments at the University Colleges at Ibadan, the Gold Coast and the West Indies continued to expand their activities. A Tutor-Organizer is being recruited to begin an Extra-Mural Department in the University of Malaya, while funds were provided for a Director of Extra-Mural Studies at the University College of East Africa and a Tutor for Uganda, financed by the Government of that Territory, is already at work.

V. INTERNATIONAL AND REGIONAL CO-OPERATION

60. An active part was taken in the technical and regional meetings held by FAO by the Territorial Governments which sent representatives to conferences on various subjects including wheat and barley breeding, Mediterranean pasture and fodder development, desert locust control, foot and mouth disease, animal diseases, problems of nutrition, rice breeding and fertilizers, design and improvement of fishing boats and forest grazing.

61. The Territories derived increasing benefit from the FAO's work under the Expanded Technical Assistance programme. Six experts completed missions to various Territories during 1953, while a seventh is still in his post and an eighth started work which would continue through 1954. Five candidates from the Territories started courses of training under Food and Agriculture Organization fellowships, while a sixth completed a fifteen-month course in July.

62. In return, the Territories again gave positive assistance to FAO's activities. The Government of Cyprus acted as host to the Near East Conference on Animal Diseases in June, and the Nigerian Government and the University College at Ibadan provided facilities for a training course in agricultural statistics which was held from July to September and attended by about forty candidates from African Territories. In addition, a number of Territories accepted for training foreign nationals awarded FAO fellowships and scholarships.

63. During the year, close co-operation between the Territorial Governments and the World Health Organization regional authorities was maintained, and a number of technical assistance projects were initiated or implemented, in some cases with the aid of equipment and supplies provided by the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund to complement the technical advice and expert staff furnished by WHO. The projects included malaria, leprosy and yaws campaigns in Nigeria; a malaria campaign, a health survey and health improvement campaign, a venereal disease survey and a tuberculin sensitivity survey in East Africa; a sanitation campaign in the Seychelles; insect control programmes and tuberculosis campaigns in certain of the Caribbean Territories; and schemes for environmental sanitation, nursing and health education and rural health training in the Far Eastern Territories.

64. Increasing attention was focused on the closer association of the Territories with the activities of the International Labour Organisation and on the application in the Territories of international labour standards. Delegations from Hong Kong, the Federation of Malaya and Singapore, including representatives of employers' and workers' organizations, attended the Asian Regional Conference held in September in Tokyo. Tripartite delegations from Hong Kong and Singapore also attended the Asian Maritime Conference in October in Ceylon.

65. A Kenya Government official and a trade unionist from Sierra Leone were awarded ILO fellowships to undertake a six-month study of labour administration and industrial relations in the United Kingdom.

66. Applications for fellowships under the Expanded Technical Assistance Programme were made to enable a Cyprus Government official to study social insurance and an official from a Northern Rhodesian copper-mining company to study personnel management in the United Kingdom. An ILO expert on handicrafts and small-scale industries completed a survey in the Federation of Malaya on behalf of the Rural and Industrial Development Authority. Applications have been made for the services of two experts to advise the Government of Trinidad and Tobago on the practicability of introducing social insurance schemes, and for experts on Training within Industry (T.W.I.) methods to assist the government of Trinidad and Tobago, of the Gold Coast, Gambia and Singapore.

67. At the invitation of the Nigerian Government, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization held a seminar at the University College, Ibadan, from July to August, on the subject of public library services in Africa. The seminar was attended by representatives of the United Kingdom, four Territories and 13 other countries. Other seminars and conferences attended by representatives from the Territories were on audio-visual aids in fundamental education; on teaching about the United Nations and the specialized agencies in the schools of West Africa; on workers' education; on youth leaders and on social science teaching. UNESCO has accepted an invitation from the Caribbean Commission to co-sponsor a technical conference on education and small-scale farming to be held in Trinidad, in October, 1954.

68. One more fundamental education project was associated with UNESCO under the associated projects scheme, bringing the total to 13, and two more applications were submitted under the gift coupon scheme. Under the Expanded Technical Assistance Programme agreement was reached for an American expert to visit Nigeria to study and carry out a survey of problems relating to vernacular languages; a fellowship was awarded to an applicant from the Gold Coast to study librarianship in Scandinavia, and arrangements were made for four UNESCO fellows from foreign countries to study in Jamaica.

69. UNICEF again made valuable contributions, mainly in the form of equipment and supplies, to various programmes initiated by territorial governments in consultation with the Fund and with WHO. In Nigeria, UNICEF made its first contribution of US$93,000 towards the control of leprosy, and allocations of US$75,000 and $150,000 respectively were also made towards the cost of campaigns against malaria and yaws in that Territory. An initial allocation of US$25,000 was approved for an anti-malaria campaign in East Africa, and Mauritius received whooping cough vaccine to the value of US$10,000. British Guiana, British Honduras, Grenada and St. Kitts received allocations of US$18,500, $4,000, $5,600 and $5,500 respectively towards anti-tuberculosis campaigns. Maternity and child welfare schemes were assisted by the allocation to the Federation of Malaya of US$47,000, to Singapore of US$22,000, to Hong Kong of US$7,000 and to Sarawak of US$8,000; in addition, an allocation of US$1,000 was made in connexion with an anti-tuberculosis campaign in Brunei.

70. Under the United Nations Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance, three experts on water resources development were sent to Jamaica and one expert on aero-magnetic surveys was sent to the Federation of Malaya. Other experts are being recruited for housing in the Gold Coast, for training local radio technicians and for a geophysical survey in the Federation of Malaya and for urban surveys in the Gambia. The United Nations Technical Assistance Administration awarded, or recommended for award, 19 fellowships to candidates from the Territories in economic development and public administration, relating to such subjects as public finance, telecommunications, shipping and mining geology.

71. Under the Technical Co-operation scheme of the Colombo plan, 33 candidates from the Federation of Malaya, 9 from Singapore, 6 from North Borneo, 3 from Sarawak and 2 from Brunei received training, chiefly in Australia and New Zealand. Nine experts were sent to the Federation of Malaya, 2 to North Borneo and 2 to Sarawak, mostly by Canada. Most of the experts provided were in connexion with training schemes in the Territories and negotiations were in progress for 41 experts and 41 traineeships and for training equipment. Training facilities are provided by the Federation and by Singapore for candidates from other countries, whose passages and allowances are met out of the United Kingdom contribution to Technical Co-operation funds. An enquiry about training in timber grading and customs and excise administration was received from Nepal; a candidate from Ceylon was receiving training in agricultural credit and banking in Cyprus, and an Indian candidate has been trained in anti-locust work in East Africa.

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES:
SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED
UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER. REPORT OF THE
SECRETARY-GENERAL

General Information

HUMAN RIGHTS IN TERRITORIES UNDER UNITED KINGDOM ADMINISTRATION

By letter of 18 July 1955, the United Kingdom Delegation to the United Nations transmitted the following memorandum concerning Part III (B) of the Standard Form which provides for a description of the manner in which human rights, in accordance with the principles set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, are protected by law.

Legal principles and procedures

Human rights and fundamental freedoms in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under United Kingdom administration are similar to those which have been developed in the United Kingdom itself in the course of its history. These are described in the essay "Human rights and fundamental freedoms in the United Kingdom" on pages 318 to 321 of the Human Rights Yearbook for 1946.<sup>1/</sup>

Basic legislation and its application

The British concept of human rights and fundamental freedoms is based on a general acceptance of the principles of liberty, an acceptance which is so fundamental that the existence of these rights and freedoms is taken for granted. It follows that the current legislation which can be said to relate to human rights and fundamental freedoms in Non-Self-Governing Territories for which the United Kingdom is responsible, is, as in the United Kingdom itself, principally concerned, not with the establishment of particular theoretical rights and privileges, but with the clarification of means of preserving and operating already existing rights, having regard to those of the rest of the communities involved, in such a way as to enable the rights of the individual to be preserved in the changing context of day to day life. The constitutional instruments of most of the Territories are therefore limited to providing for the establishment of the Legislature and for the office and duties of the Governor, and the fundamental rights are not to be found in these instruments but in the ordinary law of the Territory. It is the Ordinances and the case law of the Territory which afford protection for these rights, and thus the legal position closely resembles that obtaining in the United Kingdom. In many Territories there is specific provision that the basic law shall be the law in force in England on some particular date, subject to subsequent enactments of the Territory. Further, uniformity in the administration of justice and in the maintenance of the rule of law is guaranteed by the existence of an ultimate Court of Appeal for all Territories, composed of the most eminent judges of the United Kingdom.

In certain Territories, some legislation has the effect of introducing concepts of human rights and fundamental freedoms which, though taken for granted in the United Kingdom and other parts of the world, are as yet foreign to the generality of the people of the Territory concerned, and such legislation can be said to initiate particular rights for that people, e.g. legislation restricting such practices as child marriage.

There is, moreover, a great deal of legislation dealing with the economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories (e.g. relating to the grant of government assistance to schools, the establishment of trade unions, and penal administration) which has the effect of entrenching those human rights generally regarded as appropriate within those fields. This legislation is transmitted regularly to the Secretary-General and may be drawn upon in the compilation of his summaries and analyses, subject to the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter. The most important points of such legislation are mentioned in the relevant sections of the transmissions made in accordance with Article 73 e in respect of individual territories.

Application

As to the application of this legislation, every Non-Self-Governing Territory under United Kingdom administration is equipped with police and a system of courts whose task it is to apply the legislation in force.

Anti-discrimination legislation

Apart from differential legislation designed to protect the less developed sections of the population (e.g. against economic or cultural submergence by other communities), or to exempt indigenous inhabitants from certain obligations imposed on non-indigenous peoples, such discrimination as exists in the Territories under United Kingdom protection stems from the customs and practices of the individuals and communities concerned. To this the enactment of legislation is not a conclusive answer; the best safeguard against such practices lies in the advancement of the less highly developed communities and in a healthy public opinion which will itself discountenance prejudice. As the Secretary of State for the Colonies assured the House of Commons on the 1st August, 1951, it is the fixed policy of the United Kingdom Government "to encourage the advancement of all communities in the colonial territories without discrimination as to race and colour, and to make every effort within the power of the Government to secure equal treatment for all". On the 14th December, 1954, the Prime Minister of the succeeding administration stated that "the aim of our (United Kingdom Government's) policy in Africa is the advancement in honourable partnership of all communities without discrimination on grounds of race". In addition to positive acts of policy designed to this end, the United Kingdom Government ensure that legislation in the Non-Self-Governing Territories is kept under constant review in order that clauses may be eliminated which might have a discriminatory effect.

It was with such objectives in mind that the United Kingdom Government subscribed to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and have become a party to the "European Convention of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms" made at Rome on the 4th November, 1950, which is applicable to the Non-Self-Governing Territories for whose international relations the United Kingdom is responsible, at the request of their governments. This Convention has now been extended to the great majority of these territories. Its effect is to establish a code of human rights and freedoms embodying the most important of those ideals which, in the past, have been regarded as axiomatic and inherent in the constitutions of the territories.

MAURITIUS

Information for the year ending 31 December 1954 on Mauritius was transmitted to the Secretary-General by the Government of the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland on 29 June 1955. The following is a summary of the information under the headings of the Standard Form for the guidance of Members in the preparation of information to be transmitted under Article 75 e.

AREA

The area, including dependencies, is 809 square miles (2,096 square kilometres).

POPULATION

The population comprises an Indo-Mauritian group, which includes 77,000 Moslems; a Sino-Mauritian community; a white population, mainly of French origin, a few British officials, and a population of mixed French and African origin, known as the "general population".

General population	143,056	148,238	157,614
Indo-Mauritian	265,247	335,327	362,145
Chinese	10,882	17,850	19,159
Total	419,185	501,415	538,918

The population of the dependencies was 13,464 in 1944, and 15,085 in 1952.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

The relative prosperity which the island has enjoyed since the end of the war owing to increased sugar production and favourable prices continued in 1954. However, the rapid growth in the population, taken in conjunction with the limited natural resources, gave cause for concern, and great emphasis was laid on the need to foster economic development.

The economy is dependent on sugar, which accounted for 97 per cent of the exports in 1954. Production in 1954, at 498,569 metric tons, while lower than the record 1953 crop, was more than twice the figure of thirty years ago. Under an agreement between Commonwealth sugar producers and the United Kingdom Government, the latter has undertaken to provide a guaranteed market for 357,000 tons of Mauritius sugar each year until the end of 1962, at a price negotiated annually. The agreement has given the sugar industry a stability hitherto unknown. The production of the two main subsidiary crops, tea and aloe fibre, also increased considerably, tea reaching a production of 496 metric tons as compared with 280 tons in 1948.

Imports were valued at Rs. 214.4 million in 1954, as against Rs. 136.2 million in 1948, while exports increased from Rs. 145 million in 1948 to Rs. 267 million in 1954.<sup>1/</sup> Expenditure under the Ten-Year Development Plan amounted by 30 June 1954 to Rs. 74.2 million. A further programme to cover the period 1955-1960 was under consideration during 1954.

AGRICULTURE AND LIVESTOCK

The Department of Agriculture works in co-operation with the Board of Agriculture, Fisheries and Natural Resources. The Board was established in 1954 to advise on all matters of policy; it is representative of every section of the Island's agriculture.

Of the Island's total area of 460,800 acres, 206,350 acres were under cultivation, for the most part in sugar-cane; 88,450 acres were forests, 111,700 acres were scrub and other lands, 45,700 acres were permanent waste lands, and 8,600 acres were built-up areas.

The Territory is well watered. The inland water bodies cover over 2,000 acres capable of storing about 2.3 million cubic feet, the various catchments yielding over twice that quantity of water per annum. An area of about 5,000 acres is irrigated for crop production from Government controlled waterworks.

Crown lands, including Crown forests and "Pas Géométriques"<sup>1/</sup> total 83,000 acres. Roughly 75 per cent of the rest of the land is owned by companies and private estates, the remainder being the property of small-holders. In addition to freehold tenure, land is also held leasehold and on share cropping agreements.

There has been considerable fragmentation of holdings due largely to the system of inheritance, which has hindered the development of more efficient methods of farming. Grouping of estates into companies has checked fragmentation to a certain extent. The rapid growth of population has accentuated the demand for land and forced up its price.

In recent years a pilot settlement scheme was started. There are four settlement areas totalling 578 acres.

The larger sugar plantations account for about 60 per cent of the crop. Some 15,000 peasant owners, often grouped in co-operative societies, cultivate about 20 per cent of the land under cane. The average yield of sugar during the years 1952-54 was 2.85 tons per acre.

The relative insignificance of the acreage under food crops makes the Territory to a large degree dependent on imported food.

The indebtedness of the sugar industry, by way of mortgages, amounts to about Rs. 55 million. Roughly one-third is due to Government; Rs. 25 million is due to the Agricultural Bank, while other mortgages total nearly Rs. 12 million. Loans for agricultural purposes by co-operative credit societies amount to Rs. 5 million.

Assistance is provided by the United Kingdom Government for the disposal of the sugar crop under the International and Commonwealth Agreements. A part of the proceeds from the sale of sugar is paid into a Rehabilitation Fund which provides a mechanical pool for planters. Seeds and planting material are supplied by the Department of Agriculture.

There are central boards for the marketing, storage and grading of sugar, tobacco and fibre. Tea is handled by the producers themselves under the control of the Director of Agriculture.

Research is carried out by the Department and by the Sugar Industry Research Institute established in 1953. Training in tropical agriculture is provided at the College of Agriculture. Field extension services cover the whole Island.

Development is concentrated on the extension of the tea industry, the improvement of land by removal of surface rock, and the increase in the production of foodstuffs.

(1950 census)

Dairy stock	32,100
Herd cattle	5,100
Draught cattle	3,100
Sheep	2,000
Pigs	4,000

The principal livestock products are milk and beef. Meat and milk production is below requirements and is supplemented by imports of cattle from Madagascar and of dried milk. Selective breeding of local Creole milk cattle is carried out by the Department of Agriculture.

FORESTRY

The staff of the Forestry Department comprises 3 senior European officers, 20 intermediate local officers, and 127 local foresters, forest guards and clerical staff. A forester completed a 4-year course in forestry at Bangor University, under a Colonial Development and Welfare scholarship.

Forest lands, including scrub and grass lands, occupy 187,850 acres. A scheme initiated in 1948 for the re-afforestation of Crown forests aims at the creation of 6,200 acres of new plantations by 1957; 3,852 acres had been replanted at the end of 1953, and 931 acres of new plantations were created during 1954.

FISHERIES

The controlled catch was 1,611 metric tons in 1954, as compared with 1,684 metric tons in 1953 and 1,648 in 1952. Mechanization is proving profitable in deep sea fishing, and loans from Development and Welfare funds are being used for the purchase of marine engines. In 1954 a programme of breeding of fresh-water fish was started.

POWER

Electricity is provided by the Central Electricity Board established in 1952, and by the privately owned General Electric Supply Company of Mauritius, Ltd.. The total installed capacity amounted in 1954 to 8,910 kilowatts; the output was about 32 million kwh., as against 15.4 million kwh. in 1948. The Board has under construction a Diesel generating station which will have an installed capacity of 7,000 kilowatts.

INDUSTRY

There are 27 sugar factories, 10 distilleries, 5 tea factories, 1 sack factory, 42 fibre decorticating plants, 2 tobacco factories, 4 soap factories, and a number of other industrial undertakings.

Industrial development is envisaged under the Ten-Year Development and Welfare Plan under which an allocation of Rs.1 million has been made available for long-term loans to pioneer non-agricultural industries. Up to 31 December 1954, loans amounting to Rs.760,000 have been granted.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

Roads

There were 450 km. of roads in 1954, as against 420 km. in 1948. All roads are metalled and about 340 miles are bitumen coated. The number of buses increased from 179 in 1947 to 270 in 1954, the number of taxis from 519 to 916, and the number of private cars from 1,929 in 1947 to 4,962 in 1953.

Railways

There are 132 km. of main line railway. The number of passengers decreased from 3.4 million in 1948 to 1.8 million in 1954. The deficit of the railway, which is a government undertaking, amounted to Rs.2.2 million in 1954, and it was decided to discontinue passenger services gradually.

Air transport

The number of arriving and departing passengers amounted to 7,474 during 1954, as against 5,982 in 1953, 5,546 in 1952, and 3,481 in 1948.

The General Revenue Balance showed a surplus of Rs.29.9 million as at 30 June 1954, against Rs.5.4 million as at 30 June 1948. The Reserve Fund remained unchanged at Rs.12 million.

Taxation

Income tax is levied at 10 cents for every rupee of the first Rs.5,000 of chargeable income, gradually increasing to 75 cents for every rupee of income over Rs.50,000. The rate of tax applicable to companies is 40 per cent of the chargeable income.

Tax on property and a tenants' tax are levied by the four local authorities (one municipality and three town councils).

BANKING AND CREDIT

In addition to the Government Post Office Bank and the Mauritius Agricultural Bank, there are three private banks. Loans from the Agricultural Bank totalled Rs.45.4 million, in 1954, as compared with 27.9 million in 1948. Deposits at the Post Office Savings Bank amounted to Rs.31 million on 31 December 1954, as against Rs.17 million on 30 June 1948.

S O C I A L   C O N D I T I O N S

Until recently, the various communities did not mix socially, but there is now a greater awareness that the Territory's problems will have to be solved on an all-community basis, and this, together with the spread of education, the emergence of a professional class drawn from all communities, and active work in social welfare, helps to remove social barriers.

Women may hold property. They bear responsibility for all their actions except that where a plaint is filed against a married woman, the husband is always joined as co-defendant, under the French system of community of goods of which the husband is the head. Women are not debarred from any occupation by law and all avenues of employment are open to them. In the Government service men and women receive equal pay for equal work. Women serve on many Government boards and committees, and on various welfare committees and cultural societies.

LABOUR AND EMPLOYMENT

There is a Labour Department under a Labour Commissioner. There is also a Labour Advisory Board and a Minimum Wage Board.

The sugar industry employed on an average 48,000 workers during the 1954 intercrop period (January to June), and 58,000 workers during crop time (July to December). The extra workers engaged during crop time are normally self-employed as small planters during the intercrop period. Other secondary industries employed 13,933 workers, and 8,127 were employed by the public services. The number of unemployed varied from 1,818 in January to 1,044 in August.

The indices cover the following main groups of items: food, beverages, tobacco, rent, fuel and light, household goods, clothing, transport, entertainments, dependents and charities, and other services.

The national income for 1953 was assessed at Rs.583 million, or Rs.1,082 per caput.

TCWN AND RURAL PLANNING AND HOUSING

Overcrowding is prevalent in urban areas and rents are high. Urban housing is provided by local government with financial assistance in the form of loans from an allocation of Rs.10.6 million under the Ten-Year Development and Welfare Plan. Housing for workers in the sugar industry is financed by the Sugar Industry Labour Welfare Fund. During 1954, 228 houses were completed by local government and 50 houses were built by the Labour Welfare Fund. A Town and Country Planning Ordinance was enacted and a Town and Country Planning Board established.

SOCIAL PROTECTION AND WELFARE

Public Assistance

The Public Assistance Department is responsible for outdoor and indoor relief, the care of destitute children and old age pensions. A non-contributory old age pension scheme was introduced in 1950; in December 1954, 17,986 persons were in receipt of pensions, as against 12,304 in December 1952.

Outdoor relief was paid to 9,000 persons in 1954, as compared with 7,800 at the end of the preceding year. Indoor relief in orphanages and infirmaries was provided to 639 adults and 210 children. Expenditure on public assistance amounted to Rs.6.8 million in 1954, as compared with Rs.5.8 million in 1953, Rs.4.4 million in 1952, and Rs.0.9 million in 1948.

Social Welfare

The Social Welfare Department was created in 1953 and is responsible for social welfare centres, community centres, probation, and the prevention of juvenile delinquency. Ten social welfare centres and fifteen community centres provide maternity and child welfare services, a simplified form of adult education, and recreational and cultural facilities. Each social welfare centre has a welfare officer and a midwife attached to it. A Blind Welfare Committee runs a small hostel and training centre in Port Louis, which was attended by 24 adults and 2 children in 1954.

There is a central prison, with two hospital wards, workshops, and a separate women's prison. Delinquent youths are sent to the Borstal institution and to the industrial schools, where training in various trades is given. Remission of one-third of their sentences is open to all prisoners sentenced to imprisonment.

PUBLIC HEALTH

There is a Medical and Health Department under a Director of Medical Services.

Doctors are required either to be eligible for registration in the United Kingdom or to hold a state degree in medicine conferred by a medical faculty in France. Training for nurses and midwives is provided at two hospitals. From 1952 to the end of 1954, 39 nurses, 37 midwives and 49 dressers completed their training. There are also facilities for the training of sanitary inspectors and pharmacists.

There were also 8 dispensaries and 33 hospitals with 738 beds on sugar estates, and 5 private clinics with 53 beds. During 1954, an orthopaedic hospital and a nurses' home were under construction.

Vital statistics

Total births	19,039	24,120	23,896	21,926
Birth rate per 1,000 population	43.1	48.1	46.3	41.3

Deaths under 1 year	3,546	1,948	2,235	1,778
Infant mortality per 1,000 living births	186.2	80.8	93.5	81.1

The natural increase in population in 1954 was 13,464; this increase was 4,014 in the General population (including the Chinese), and 9,450 in the Indo-Mauritian population.

The principal causes of death were: (1) diseases of the digestive system, (2) diseases of the respiratory system, (3) infective and parasitic diseases, and (4) diseases of early infancy.

Some protein deficiency occurs. There is anaemia among women in the child-bearing group, and malnutrition among children of the lowest income group.

Malaria has been reduced to a negligible level.

Tuberculin testing and vaccination of school children was continued. Maternity and child welfare work was carried out by the Health Department and by the Maternity and Child Welfare Society. The infant mortality rate fell from an average of 133.0 per 1,000 over the 10-year period preceding 1952 to 81.1 in 1954; the maternal mortality rate fell from 4.13 in 1948 to 1.70 in 1954. The School Medical Service provided for 3 doctors, 4 dentists and 3 nurses. All primary school children received daily rations of sugared milk and cocoa, and vitamins were provided for special cases.

The municipal area of Port Louis has a sewerage system; in all other localities conservancy methods are resorted to. There is a water treatment works at La Marie, which distributes water to some townships and to Government buildings in Port Louis.

EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS

Education is free in Government and aided primary schools. In the post-primary state, fees amount to Rs.10-20 a month in Government colleges and to Rs.15-30 in private schools. Free secondary schooling is made available through scholarships. There is no racial or religious differentiation in schools; a condition which aided schools must accept on receiving a grant is that they do not refuse admission to any child on the grounds of race or religion.

There is a Department of Education under a Director. There are five Advisory Committees, almost exclusively composed of non-officials.

e/ Of this sum, Rs.126,746 was spent on buildings.

Educational system

Entrance to the primary schools is at the age of 5 and most children leave at about the age of 13. Secondary education is provided for the age-group 12 to 20. The curricula tend to be formal and academic, though liberalizing influences are making progress, especially in the secondary schools.

Language is a particular problem in this multi-racial Territory. English and French are compulsory, and Hindu, Urdu, Tamil, Hakka and Chinese are optional in the schools. The population, whatever its origin, speaks a lingua franca of French origin, known as Creole, and although it is not officially encouraged, its use in the classroom as a vehicle of expression is common.

Technical education at post-secondary level is given in the College of Agriculture. A mechanical engineering apprenticeship scheme is run jointly by the Education and Railway Departments, and the Health Department runs training schools for its personnel. A number of primary schools are served by homecraft and handicraft centres.

There is a Government teacher-training college, which has trained 596 teachers in the last six years, including 124 in 1954. Extension classes in science subjects were given in 1954 at the laboratories of the Royal College, Royal College School and College of Agriculture to 106 students preparing for B.Sc. courses.

Special schools exist for children handicapped by poliomyelitis, for the blind, and for young delinquents.

Scholarships awarded in 1954 numbered 124; of these 90 were secondary-school entrance scholarships, 20 were free places granted needy students, 6 were senior scholarships, and 6 were "English" scholarships giving free university education overseas.

ADULT EDUCATION, YOUTH ORGANIZATIONS, AND CULTURAL INSTITUTIONS

There are post-primary and post-secondary classes for young people, and adult literacy classes in English, French, Hindi and Urdu.

A Youth Organizer, assisted by eight youth officers, is responsible for the supervision of 156 boys' and 66 girls' organizations. In addition, there are 33 scout troops, 21 girl guide companies, and 11 Bluebird packs for younger children. International goodwill has been stimulated by exchange visits with a youth delegation from Madagascar and by representation at the World Assembly of Youth held in August 1954 at Singapore.

There are seven public libraries with an annual circulation of about 165,000 volumes. There are two museums, an art gallery, and five scientific and cultural societies.

MASS COMMUNICATIONS

Three main daily papers are published in French and English, with an average circulation of 8,000 each. In addition, there are two French and 3 Chinese dailies and 23 periodicals of weekly, monthly and quarterly publication (20 in English or French, and 3 in Hindi, French and English).

There are two theatres, 37 permanent cinemas, 5 mobile cinema units, 46 film projectors and 27 filmstrip projectors.

During 1954, the Mauritius Broadcasting Station was on the air for an average of 57-1/2 hours per week, which represented an increase of nearly 10 hours over the figure for 1949. The number of radio licences has increased from 2,746 in 1944 to 18,849 in 1954.

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES:
SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED
UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER. REPORT OF
THE SECRETARY-GENERAL

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 218 (III) the Secretary-General submits to the General Assembly at its twelfth session the attached summaries of the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter relating to Indian Ocean Territories<sup>1/</sup> (Comoro Archipelago, Madagascar, Mauritius and Seychelles). These summaries supplement the full summaries submitted to the General Assembly at its eleventh session.

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 933 (X), these summaries are also submitted to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

In accordance with the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter, the Governments of France and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland have transmitted to the Secretary-General information on the Territories listed below in respect of conditions during the calendar year 1955.

The present summary of the information supplements the full summaries issued as United Nations Document A/3107 of 22 December 1955, which forms part of the publication entitled "Non-Self-Governing Territories Summaries of Information transmitted to the Secretary-General during 1955" (United Nations Publication ST/TRI/SER.A/12).

The following shows the dates when the information was transmitted by the Governments concerned. As will be seen, most of the information was not received before 1957; the summaries are included in the present series by reason of the period to which the information applies.

809 square miles (2,096 square kilometres), including dependencies.

POPULATION

The population comprises an Indo-Mauritian group, which included in 1952 76,944 Moslems; a Sino-Mauritian community; a white population, mainly of French origin, a few British officials, and a population of mixed French and African origin, known as the "general population".

	June 1952 (census)	Dec. 1954 (estimate)	Dec. 1955 (estimate)
Indo-Mauritian	335,327	362,145	375,899
General population	148,238	157,614	164,248
Chinese	17,850	19,159	19,785
Total	501,415	538,918	559,932

In addition, according to the 1952 census, the population of the dependencies was 15,085.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

The relative prosperity enjoyed since the end of the war owing to increased sugar production and favourable prices continued in 1955. However, with the rapid growth in the population, the limited natural resources gave cause for concern, and great emphasis continued to be laid on the need to foster economic development.

The economy is dependent on sugar, which in 1955 accounted for about 97 per cent of all exports. Production was 533,000 metric tons, 21,000 tons more than in the previous record year 1953. The tea industry again had a good year and production increased from 1,093,556 lbs. in 1954 to 1,340,026 lbs. in 1955.

The Ten-Year Development Plan 1946-1955 stimulates economic development directly by schemes for the development of natural resources, by research and by the provision of basic services, and indirectly by the expansion of educational and health services. Expenditure under the Plan amounted to Rs. 84.5 million at the end of June 1955, as compared with Rs. 74.2 million at the end of June 1954. Further consideration was given during 1955 to the new development programme to cover the period 1955-1960.

During 1955, 1,133 acres of forest plantations were replanted under the scheme for reafforestation of Crown forests; this compares with 931 acres replanted during 1954. In addition, some 407 acres of plantations from five to twenty years of age were treated under weeding and pruning operations.

FISHERIES

During 1955, the controlled catch was 1,735 metric tons compared with 1,611 metric tons in 1954, and 1,684 metric tons in 1953.

POWER

Work on the construction of the Central Electricity Board's new diesel generating station made good progress. Its total installed capacity at the end of 1955 was 3,000 kw and its output for the year over 4 million kwh, which together with units generated by two other small diesel stations run by the Board brought the total output of thermal units to 5.1 million kwh for 1955.

The Public Works Department in conjunction with the Central Electricity Board has started a new hydro-electric scheme.

INDUSTRY

During 1955, sugar cane was milled in twenty-six factories, compared with twenty-seven in 1954. Alcohol, one of the major by-products of the sugar industry, is produced in eleven distilleries, of which only three operated during 1955. The Government-owned factory which processes raw fibre into cloth for the making of bags for the sugar industry gave cause for concern, since imported bags could be obtained at lower cost. Reorganization of production during 1955 resulted in substantial economies.

Indoor relief in orphanages and infirmaries was provided in 1955 to 659 adults and 215 children, against 639 adults and 210 children in 1954.

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

The 1952 planning committee set up to promote community development in selected areas is now an integral unit of the Social Welfare Department. This Department, together with the Departments of Education, Agriculture, Public Assistance and Co-operative Societies, plays a large part in encouraging and supporting community development projects. Representatives of the departments working as teams held meetings attended by villagers to discuss specific problems. Schemes sponsored included campaigns for better hygiene and cleanliness, the growing of more food, vegetables and fodder. As the result of a pilot scheme in the Northern district, a co-operative store and a Better Living Society were set up.

The Social Welfare Department continued to train local leaders and voluntary workers in the rural areas. Lectures were organized in the social welfare centres, and a social welfare course was attended by staff members and voluntary workers. Youth clubs were set up. Film shows on educational and health topics were given by mobile cinema units.

The Mauritius Women's Institute was established during 1955.

Indian Ocean Territories<sup>1/</sup>

In accordance with the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter, the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland has transmitted to the Secretary-General information on the Territories listed below in respect of conditions during the calendar year 1956.

The present summary of the information supplements the full summaries issued as United Nations document A/3107 of 22 December 1955, which forms part of the publication entitled "Non-Self-Governing Territories Summaries of Information transmitted to the Secretary-General during 1955" (United Nations Publication ST/TRI/SER.A/12).

The following shows the dates when the information was transmitted to the Secretary-General by the Governments concerned.

Territory	Date of transmission
Mauritius	1 November 1957
Seychelles	5 November 1957

---

In addition, according to the 1952 census, the population of the dependencies was 15,085.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

The economy of Mauritius is dependent on sugar, which in 1956 accounted for about 98 per cent of all exports. Production was at a record with 572,000 metric tons. Tea production rose to 697 metric tons but exports were lower, at 152 metric tons, compared with 176 metric tons in the previous year.

The Ten-Year Development and Welfare Plan 1946-1955 was succeeded during the year by the Capital Expenditure Programme 1955-1960. The final progress report on the Ten-Year Plan showed total expenditure of Rs.84.5 million. The new plan provides for the expenditure of Rs.130 million, to be financed from local funds, Colonial Development and Welfare grants, and loans. It also provides for Rs.3.3 million for the agricultural development of Rodrigues, the principal dependency of Mauritius.

In 1956, sugar exports to the United Kingdom amounted to 423,075 long tons, compared with 387,402 long tons in 1955. The "negotiated price" for sugar sold within the Commonwealth under the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement was £40.15s. a long ton; sugar in excess of the guaranteed quota was sold on the open market at varying prices, above the negotiated price.

SOCIAL CONDITIONS

No significant changes were reported during 1956 in general social conditions and in the status of women.

LABOUR AND EMPLOYMENT

The sugar industry employed on an average 60,588 workers during the 1956 crop period (July to December), and 50,019 during the inter-crop period (January to June). Secondary industries employed 14,226 workers, and 10,854 were employed by the public services. The number of unemployed varied from 1,363 during crop time to 3,316 during the inter-crop period; this compares with 1,793 to 3,049 unemployed during the same periods in 1955, and 1,044 to 1,818 in 1954.

GENERAL INFORMATION

Mauritius, an island in the Indian Ocean 550 miles east of Madagascar, has an area of approximately 720 square miles (1,865 square kilometres). Its dependencies comprise a large number of islands. The most important is Rodrigues, with an area of about 42 square miles (109 square kilometres). The Lesser Dependencies (Chagos Archipelago, Agalega, and Cargados Carajos) have a total area of 47.5 square miles (122 square kilometres).

Mauritius is one of the most thickly populated areas in the world. In 1957 it had a population density of 828 per square mile. The natural increase was 17,670, of which 12,813 were Indo-Mauritians. Port Louis, the capital, had a population of 80,200 in 1956, compared with 57,446 in 1944.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

The economy of Mauritius is dependent on sugar, which accounted for an average of 97 per cent of exports during the period 1947 to 1957. Government revenue, the wages of labour and the prosperity of the island are governed by the rhythm of the sugar crop. Sugar production rose from 350,000 tons in 1947 to 561,000 tons in 1957, the latter crop being slightly lower than the record 1956 crop of 572,000 tons.

The fundamental economic problems with which the Government was faced after the Second World War were: the maintenance of a regular market and a fair and stable price for sugar, the development of subsidiary industries, such as the tea industry, dairying and cattle raising, and the creation of a class of peasant proprietors and smallholders engaged in growing food. Another problem was that of associating the population with the work of the Government in economic and social development; it has been the policy since the war to encourage the people's participation by stimulating the growth of local government in the rural areas.

Apart from sugar, the island produces little with which to meet the needs of a fast growing population; there are three other industrial crops grown on a much smaller scale: tea, tobacco and aloe fibre. The staple foodstuffs of the population are largely imported.

Mauritius has enjoyed a relative prosperity since the end of the war. The national income rose from Rs.307 million in 1948 to Rs.621 million in 1956;<sup>2/</sup> however, during the same period the per capita income at constant (1948) prices hardly increased. The rate of population growth, taken in conjunction with the island's national resources has given cause for concern, and emphasis has been laid on the need to foster economic development.

A Ten-Year Development Plan, envisaging an expenditure of Rs.102.8 million, mainly on irrigation, waterworks, roads and buildings, was approved in 1946. Although progress was slow during the first five years, mainly on account of the lack of supervisory staff and the shortage of qualified technicians, the rate of expenditure has been steadily increasing, rising from Rs.5.7 million in 1949/1950 to Rs.16.2 million in 1953/1954. In 1956, the Ten-Year Plan was succeeded by the Capital Expenditure Programme 1955-1960, which provides for an expenditure of Rs.130 million, to be financed from local funds, Colonial Development and Welfare grants, and loans. In 1957, the revision of the Capital Expenditure Programme was entrusted to an Economic Planning Committee of the Executive Council, with a view to framing an expenditure programme covering the period 1957 to 1962.

LAND, AGRICULTURE AND LIVESTOCK

Of the island's total area of 460,800 acres, 206,000 acres were under cultivation in 1957, for the most part in sugar cane; 88,500 acres were forests, 107,800 acres were scrub and other lands, 37,100 acres were permanent waste lands (compared with 45,700 acres in 1954), and 16,900 acres were built-up areas and inland waters. The steadily increasing population pressure is making the proper utilization of land a serious problem. Pilot land-settlement schemes have been undertaken under the development plan and three areas are being developed, the primary object being the establishment of food-producing small-holders' communities provided with security of tenure, essential amenities and guidance.

A Ministry of Agriculture and Lands was established in 1957, following the introduction of the Ministerial system. A representative advisory body, the Board of Agriculture, Fisheries and Natural Resources, has been in existence since 1954. Developments undertaken by the Department of Agriculture since 1947 include expansion of the three existing agricultural stations, the creation of two new ones, and the reorganization of the agricultural extension services. At the experimental stations, trials have been carried out with food and fodder crops and with different varieties of fibre. Since 1949, the Government has sponsored a tea development project, and by the end of 1957, 300 acres had been cleared, drained and planted.

Eighty per cent of the sugar crop is produced by the larger estates; some 15,000 peasant-owners, often grouped in co-operative societies, produce the remaining 20 per cent. The average yield of sugar per acre was 3.2 tons during the years 1955-1957, compared with a yield of 2.85 tons during the previous three-year period. With the exception of some 20,000 tons consumed locally, the whole of the production is exported, mainly to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

Under the terms of the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement of 1951, the United Kingdom Government has undertaken to provide a guaranteed market for 335,000 tons of Mauritius sugar each year until the end of 1962, at a price negotiated annually. In 1957, the negotiated price was £42.3s.0d. per long ton, compared with £31.11s.6d. in 1951. Sugar in excess of the guaranteed quota was sold on the open market at varying prices, often above the negotiated price.

Livestock

Livestock consists of milk cattle and goats, with a small number of sheep and pigs. The number of milk cattle increased from 20,000 in 1947 to 38,000 in 1956.

The Animal Husbandry Extension Service, established in 1951, with the object of improving both the quantity and quality of milk output, covers the whole island and provides farmers with assistance and advice on better methods of management and breeding. At the Stock Breeding Centre, a herd of "creole" milk cows has been built up to be used for selective breeding. New breeds of stock have been introduced for trial. However, total production both of milk and meat is still much below requirements and has to be supplemented by imports of cattle from Madagascar and of dried milk.

FORESTRY

Forest lands, including scrub lands and grazing lands with trees, occupy 187,850 acres; of this the Crown forest estate occupies 67,150 acres. A programme for the replanting of 8,000 acres of Crown forest land was initiated in 1948. At the end of 1957, the total area of new plantations was 7,260 acres. Some 10,000 acres of Crown forest land have been allocated for cultivation under tea; 600 acres have been cleared for immediate requirements; and construction of new access roads has been undertaken.

FISHERIES

Fishing is practised around the coasts of Mauritius, Rodrigues and St. Brandon to supply the local market. The total controlled catch was 1,664 tons in 1957, compared with 1,684 tons in 1953 and 1,455 tons in 1947. The lagoons within the coral reefs are believed to be fished to their maximum capacity for sustained yield and any increase of supplies depends on the development of deep-sea fishing in coastal waters outside the reef. For this, large pinnaces with diesel engines are required.

A scheme was devised and financed from Development and Welfare funds to provide loans to fishermen for the purchase of marine diesel engines. In recent years a number of pinnacle owners have availed themselves of these facilities.

A survey of new fishing grounds up to twenty miles offshore was conducted during 1956 and 1957.

POWER

After the Second World War there was a large demand for electricity for domestic and industrial purposes which could only be satisfied to a limited extent because of the inadequacy of generating resources. During the period under review, the capacity of the main hydroelectric station was increased from 5,000 kilowatts to 8,000 kilowatts, through the construction of a new dam and the installation of a new turbo-alternator. A diesel-generating station at St. Louis, with a total installed capacity of 7,000 kilowatts, was completed in 1956. A major hydroelectric scheme at Eau Bleue and two minor hydroelectric projects have been undertaken.

The control and development of electricity supplies is vested in the government Central Electricity Board, established in 1951. In 1956, the Board acquired the assets of the General Electric Supply Company for the sum of Rs.11,960,000, and thus became the major producer and distributor of electricity in the island.

The Board is responsible for three hydroelectric stations and two diesel-powered plants. There are also several steam-electric installations in sugar factories, with an aggregated rated capacity of 17,000 kw. In 1957, the aggregate power of all electricity generating installations in the Territory amounted to more than 33,000 kw.

INDUSTRY

Apart from the sugar, tobacco and fibre industries, local industries of lesser importance comprise the manufacture of rum and wine, oil and soap, cigarettes, matches, salt, lime and bricks. In the Capital Expenditure Programme 1955-1960, provision was made for loans up to a total of Rs.1.2 million to non-agricultural secondary industries, likely to be of advantage to the Territory.

Provision was also made for the expenditure of Rs.200,000 for grants towards the cost of investigation into the availability of local materials for industrial processes. Exemptions from import duty are granted for machinery for the manufacture of commodities produced locally, and the Income Tax Ordinance was amended to include an "investment allowance" equal to one-tenth of the capital expenditure incurred on construction of new industrial plants.

Roads

There were 736 miles of roads in 1957, compared with 710 miles in 1953, and 700 in 1947. All roads are metalled and about 377 miles are bitumen-coated. Improvement of bus services has resulted in an increase in the number of passengers; in 1957, an average of 100,000 persons travelled daily by bus.

Railways

The railway network has eighty-two miles of track. Passenger services, which operated at a deficit, were discontinued in 1956 and replaced by bus services.

Air transport

In 1946 the Government assumed control over the only airport in Mauritius, which was built during the war and operated by the Royal Naval Air Service. Regular passenger and mail services, introduced in 1947, have greatly speeded up communications with the outside world. Aircraft movements during 1957 totalled 362, compared with 104 in 1947; the number of arriving and departing passengers was 8,674 in 1957, against 2,543 in 1947; the weight of freight and mail carried in 1957 was 106 metric tons and 31.6 metric tons, respectively; this compares with sixteen tons of freight in 1947.

Sea-borne shipping

Port Louis is the only port; ten ocean-going and four small vessels can be accommodated at any one time.

Communications

Postal facilities have been extended to remote areas. The number of post offices and postal agencies increased from sixty-eight in 1947 to seventy-five in 1957; the number of telegraph offices rose from thirty-two to forty-seven during the same period. The number of letters, post cards and printed papers dealt with increased from 4.5 million in 1947 to 6.7 million in 1957.

The Department of Communications, established in 1957, is responsible for the operation of the telephone system, for the maintenance of the telegraph service and for the operation of a ship-to-shore radio station. Mauritius is linked with the outside world by cables and radio installations. There were fourteen telephone exchanges and 7,282 telephones in 1956, compared with eleven exchanges and 5,524 telephones in 1952.

BANKING AND CREDIT

In addition to the Post Office Savings Bank and the Mauritius Agricultural Bank, there are three private banks.

Loans from the Agricultural Bank amounted to Rs.53.6 million in 1957, compared with Rs.10.7 million in 1947. Deposits at the Post Office Savings Bank rose from Rs.16.8 million in 1947 to Rs.27.5 million in 1957.

The United Kingdom is the principal source of supply for manufactured goods such as textiles, apparel, machinery, motor vehicles and hardware. Large quantities of cotton piece goods are imported from India and large supplies of general merchandise from Hong Kong. Imports from Belgium, mainly fertilizers and steel goods, rose from Rs.1.5 million in 1953 to Rs.12.8 million in 1956.

SOCIAL CONDITIONS

Race and cultural relations

The population of Mauritius comprises an Indo-Mauritian group, which includes about 80,000 Moslems and constitutes about 67 per cent of the total population; a Sino-Mauritian community comprising about 3.5 per cent of the population; a European population, mainly of French origin; a few British officials; and a population of mixed French and African origin known as the "general" population. Although Mauritius became a British colony in 1810, English is not yet in general use, though it is more widely spoken and understood than it was some years ago. Creole, a derivative of French, plays the role of a lingua franca. Until recently, each group tended to remain separate and was mainly concerned with its own interests. There are, however, signs of a growing awareness of the need to break down communal and racial barriers and to tackle the Territory's problems on an all-community basis.

Status of Women

In 1949, legislation was enacted providing for far-reaching changes in the law governing the status of married women. A married woman over twenty-one years old may now hold property and bear responsibility for all her actions; except that where a plaint is filed against a married woman, the husband becomes co-defendant, under the French system of community of property. The consent of parents is essential for the marriage of minors under twenty-one, but special legislative arrangements allow Hindu and Muslim girls of eighteen to marry without the consent of their parents.

Women over the age of twenty-one have the right to vote; they are not debarred from any employment and serve on many government boards and committees, and in various welfare and cultural organizations.

LABOUR AND EMPLOYMENT

Legislative and administrative steps to improve industrial relations and the conditions of labour had already been taken before the Second World War. The effect of the war was to speed up and make manifest the latent tendencies of the labour movement. Labour legislation enacted since the end of the war includes: the Factories Ordinance, 1946; the Apprenticeship Ordinance, 1946; the Labour (Amendment) Ordinance, 1947; the Workmen's Compensation (Amendment) Ordinances, 1947, 1950, 1952 and 1954; the Minimum Wages Ordinance, 1950; the Trade Union Ordinance, which replaced the Industrial Associations Ordinance, 1938; and the Trade Disputes Ordinance, 1954, which replaced the Trades Disputes Ordinance, 1947.

Employment situation

There is full employment among agricultural workers during the five months' crop season, but unemployment occurs in certain areas during the remaining period of the year. Efforts are being made to alleviate this situation by the issue of permits to employers to transport labourers to localities where work is available.

Inter-crop period	48,200	51,200
Secondary industries	10,950	16,000
Public services	11,600	11,200

The number of unemployed in 1957 varied from 1,415 in October to 2,169 in July.

About 81 per cent of skilled workers and about 11 per cent of unskilled labourers are on monthly contracts. The remainder of the labour force is employed by the day. Monthly wages of field and factory labourers in the sugar industry (including all allowances) ranged from Rs.36.00 to Rs.47.70 in 1947; in 1956, these wages ranged from Rs.61.30 to Rs.81.20. Monthly workers are entitled to housing accommodation or a housing allowance, to free medical treatment, to annual leave and to one-sixteenth of an acre of land for the planting of vegetables.

In 1957, the most important workers' organizations were: the Amalgamated Labourers' Association, with a membership of 5,161, the General Port and Harbour Workers' Union, with a membership of 1,535, the Artisans and General Workers' Union, with 1,077 members, and the Government Servants and Employees Association, with 1,829 members.

Trade unions normally negotiate directly with employers, and the Government only intervenes after negotiations have broken down. Any party to a dispute may apply for an official conciliation board; if the latter has failed in reaching a settlement, the dispute may be brought before an Arbitration Tribunal. There is an Industrial Court which deals with all cases affecting workers, such as compensation, breach of contract, and unjustified dismissal.

The Department of Co-operation, established in 1947, is under the supervision of the Ministry of Labour. In 1957, the co-operative movement comprised four secondary societies - the Mauritius Co-operative Union, the Co-operative Agricultural Federation, the Co-operative Central Bank, the Mauritius Wholesale Society - and 333 primary societies. These included 164 agricultural credit societies; three fishermen's, seven marketing, four housing, one printing and fourteen transport societies; seventy-four co-operative retail stores, thirty-two thrift and savings societies; one better-living society; and thirty-three school savings banks.

The indices cover the following main groups of items: food, beverages, tobacco, rent, fuel and light, household goods, clothing, transport, entertainments, dependants and charities, and other services.

National income

The national income for 1956 was assessed (at factor cost) at Rs.621 million, compared with Rs.583 million in 1953, and Rs.307 million in 1948. The national income at constant (1948) prices, in millions of rupees, was 307 in 1948, 402 in 1953 and 403 in 1956. Per capita income at constant (1948) prices amounted to Rs.700 in 1948, 778 in 1953 and 709 in 1956.

TOWN AND RURAL PLANNING AND HOUSING

Overcrowding is prevalent in urban areas and rents are high. The main problems are: indiscriminate construction; a high birth rate; the migration to towns; the wage levels of the groups most in need of rehousing; the lack of funds; and the shortage of qualified architects.

Urban housing is provided by local authorities, with government loans at low rates of interest. By the end of 1957, 723 houses had been completed by the four urban councils. In rural areas, the Sugar Industry Labour Welfare Fund Committee has completed its housing programme after constructing 373 houses. The Fund, which is financed by a cess on all sugar exported, also has schemes for lending money to sugar estates to erect houses for their workers. Loans to individuals for the construction of houses are made by the Mauritius Agricultural Bank.

There are three co-operative housing societies. A Town and Country Planning Board was established in 1954, but so far no general planning system has been enforced for lack of technical staff.

SOCIAL SECURITY AND WELFARE

Compensation for industrial accidents is payable under the Workmen's Compensation Ordinance.

A contributory provident fund for retired workers was established by the sugar industry in 1945. A non-contributory old-age pension scheme was introduced in 1950; in December 1957, 19,049 persons were in receipt of pensions, against 12,000 in December 1950.

The Public Assistance Department, set up as an independent service in 1947, is responsible for old-age pensions, outdoor and indoor relief, and the care of destitute children. Legislation does not provide for the relief of able-bodied unemployed; casual grants are made, however, when unemployment is attended by destitution; the number of such cases relieved in 1957 was 599.

Outdoor relief was paid to over 14,900 persons in 1957, compared with 7,800 in 1947. Indoor relief in orphanages and infirmaries was provided in 1957 to 1,036 adults and 252 children, compared with 556 adults and 172 children in 1947.

Expenditure on public assistance amounted to Rs.9.3 million in 1957, against Rs.5.8 million in 1953 and Rs.0.8 million in 1957.

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

The Social Welfare Department, created in 1953, is responsible for the stimulation of social welfare centres, community centres and community development projects, for the administration of the probation service and the prevention of juvenile delinquency. Social welfare centres and community centres are established by the Sugar Industry Labour Welfare Fund, created in 1948. Social welfare centres are managed by representative local committees and run maternity and child welfare services and classes in sewing and other handwork; welfare officers are attached to each centre. By the end of 1957, thirteen welfare centres had been set up in various parts of the island. Community centres are established in areas not served by a social welfare centre; they are run by village councils and are used as meeting places by the villagers for social, recreational and educational activities.

Since 1952, welfare months have been held at social welfare centres to stimulate community activities. Officers of the Agriculture, Health, Education, and Social Welfare Departments give lectures and demonstrations, drawing the people's attention to the problems of the village and suggesting solutions.

The development of women's associations is being encouraged, especially in rural areas. The Mauritius Women's Institute was established in 1955.

PREVENTION OF CRIME AND TREATMENT OF OFFENDERS

There has been no remarkable outbreak of crime during the period under review. More than half of the cases were of a minor character and included such items as breaches of traffic and revenue laws, petty thefts, trivial assaults and disturbances.

There is a central prison, to which a women's prison is attached, a Borstal institution and an industrial school.

The probation system was introduced in 1946, and the first probation hostel for boys was opened in 1954. Probation officers help with the rehabilitation of juveniles released from the industrial school and from Borstal.

PUBLIC HEALTH

During the period under review, health conditions improved, as indicated by the following statistics: the birth rate rose from 38.7 per thousand of the population in 1946 to 43.1 in 1957; the death rate declined from 29.5 in 1946 to 13.0 in 1957; infant mortality was 145.2 per thousand live births in 1946 and 75.1 in 1957; maternal mortality fell from 10.39 per thousand in 1946 to 2.84 in 1957. The main factors responsible for bring about these improvements were the elimination of malaria, the higher standard of environmental hygiene, and the relative prosperity of the Territory.

The outstanding achievement in the field of public health was the virtual elimination of malaria, which up to 1945 occupied the first place amongst the causes of mortality. Anti-malarial measures included engineering works of drainage and canalization and the large-scale use of insecticides. The number of deaths ascribed to malaria declined from 3,534 in 1945 to sixty-one in 1953 and to nil in 1956.

There has equally been a steady decline in the number of deaths caused by infectious and parasitic diseases and by enteric fever.

The tuberculosis infection rate is high. Tuberculin testing and vaccination of school children is being carried out and the notification of tuberculosis cases is now compulsory. In its campaign against tuberculosis the Government was assisted by a survey team sent by the World Health Organization in 1956. Two hundred and ten beds were provided for tuberculosis cases at the eight general hospitals. Deaths from tuberculosis declined from 60.2 per 100,000 of the population in 1948 to 23.68 in 1957.

There is some protein deficiency, anaemia is widespread, and there is a certain amount of malnutrition in the people of the lower income group, particularly in young children.

Maternity and child welfare services are provided by the Health Department and by the Maternity and Child Welfare Society. In 1946, a school dental surgeon was appointed and a school dental clinic established. A school medical service was started in 1953.

In 1955, paid doctors were appointed by the Sugar Industry Labour Welfare Fund Committee to work at the social welfare centres. A rural midwifery scheme was started by the Health Department, and trained midwives were posted at the welfare centres.

Reservoir construction for an increased water supply was completed in 1955. In the rural areas, the conservancy services have been handed over to the village councils, which receive grants-in-aid for their share in the application of sanitation measures.

The Ministry of Health and Social Services, working through the Health Department, is responsible for medical and health services. Doctors are required either to be eligible for registration in the United Kingdom, or to hold a degree in medicine conferred by a medical faculty in France. Training for nurses and midwives, provided at two hospitals, has been raised since 1948 to a standard much higher than that accepted before the war. There are also facilities for the training of pharmacists and sanitary inspectors.

There is a maternity ward in each of the eight general hospitals. There are four travelling dispensaries, one mobile ante-natal clinic and two mobile dental clinics. In addition, there are on sugar estates eight dispensaries and thirty-three hospitals with 649 beds. There are also four private clinics.

EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS

The sharp increase in population since 1946 has come at a time when interest in education has been growing. There is a pressing demand for more school places and an urgent need for more schools and more teachers.

Education is free in government and aided primary schools; in post-primary schools, low fees are paid. Scholarships are awarded for secondary education and for higher education overseas.

There is no racial or religious differentiation in government and aided schools; a condition which aided schools must accept on receiving a grant is that they do not refuse admission to any child on the ground of race or religion.

The structure of the educational organization dates from 1944, when a Department of Education was established. Since 1957, a Ministry of Education and Institutions has been responsible for all educational matters. Legislation was enacted in 1957 replacing the 1944 Education Ordinance. An advisory body, almost exclusively composed of non-officials, assists the Ministry and the Department of Education. Urban, district and village councils take a keen interest in education.

There are four Education Authorities - Roman Catholic, Church of England, Hindu and Muslim - which control primary schools, in part maintained from public funds and in part from the resources of the Authority; teachers at the aided schools are wholly paid from public funds.

New educational buildings constructed since 1955 include twenty-three primary government schools, a government secondary school for girls, and a teacher-training college. In addition, space has been provided by the construction of 384 classrooms at existing government and aided primary schools, and extensions at the two government secondary schools for boys.

Educational system

Entrance to the primary schools is at the age of five and most children leave at about the age of thirteen. Secondary education is mostly in the hands of the religious orders.

Language is a particular problem. English and French are compulsory, and Hindi, Urdu, Tamil, Hakka and Cantonese are optional. Creole, although not officially encouraged, is commonly used in the classroom.

Technical education is limited to a mechanical engineering apprenticeship scheme run jointly by the Education and Railway Departments. There are hmcrcraft and handicraft centres at a number of primary schools. The College of Agriculture provides post-secondary training, mainly for graduates who enter the sugar industry. Students wishing to follow university or other post-secondary courses go overseas, mainly to the United Kingdom, but also to France and India.

There is a government teacher-training college, which has trained 1,155 teachers since 1948, including 253 in 1957.

Special schools exist for children handicapped by poliomyelitis, for the blind and for young delinquents.

Adult education courses provide for post-primary and post-secondary education, with extension classes in science, art, typing, shorthand, bookkeeping and handwork. Grants were made in 1956 to local authorities and other public bodies for the establishment of adult literacy classes.

CULTURAL INSTITUTIONS AND MASS COMMUNICATIONS

The circulation of books in the seven public libraries increased from 165,000 volumes in 1954 to 245,000 in 1957.

The Mauritius Institute comprises two museums, a small art gallery, and five scientific and cultural societies.

Of the eight daily newspapers, five are published in French and English, and three are published in Chinese. There are twenty weekly, monthly and quarterly publications in French or English; three periodicals are published in Hindi, French and English.

There are two theatres, forty-two cinemas (against thirty-one in 1951), six mobile cinema units (against two in 1951), eighty-one film projectors and thirty-eight film strip projectors.

The number of radio licences increased from 2,746 in 1944 to 25,845 in 1957.

IN PURSUANCE OF CHAPTER XI OF THE CHARTER

PART A: INTRODUCTION AND GENERAL SURVEY

I. INTRODUCTION

Origin of the report

1. The end of 1955 marked the completion of ten years of United Nations action in respect of Chapter XI of the Charter, which takes the form of a "Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories" and enshrines the principle that the well-being of dependent peoples constitutes a sacred trust. At its tenth session in that year the General Assembly, in resolution 932 (X) of 8 November, recalled that under resolutions adopted by it from 1946 onwards valuable information indicating the manner and extent of implementation of the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are paramount had been transmitted by the Member States administering the Territories, analysed and summarized by the Secretary-General, and studied each year by the Assembly. It expressed the opinion that an examination of the progress achieved in the Territories since the establishment of the United Nations, based on the information mentioned, would be highly desirable and should make it possible to ascertain the extent to which the peoples concerned were advancing towards the attainment of the goals set in Chapter XI of the Charter.
2. The General Assembly accordingly invited the Secretary-General to submit, after consultation with the specialized agencies which would also be concerned, a report on the main points that might usefully be considered in an examination of the progress made in the Territories. The Secretary-General did so at the eleventh session;<sup>2/</sup> and by resolution 1053 (XI) of 20 February 1957 the Assembly, considering the principal points indicated in his report to form a satisfactory basis, invited him to prepare, in collaboration with the specialized agencies concerned and for submission to the Assembly at its fourteenth session, "a report on the progress that has taken place in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, in those fields on which information has been transmitted, in accordance with the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter, since the establishment of the United Nations".

Structure of the report

3. The present report is the result of those initiatives. It is divided into three main parts. The first part provides, in addition to this introductory section, a general survey of the situation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories as a whole between 1946 and the present, giving among other things, an account of the changes which have taken place in the status of the Territories, including the attainment by a number of them of a full measure of self-government; a general review of the principles and practical measures adopted by the Administering Members to promote progress in the Territories; and a summary of measures of international collaboration for economic, social and educational advancement.

4. The second main part of the report comprises a series of studies in which economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories are examined and analysed in their general and in many particular aspects.

5. The third part of the report consists of a summary of conditions in each of the Territories on which information was being transmitted at the end of the period under review, with particular reference to changes and trends reported during the period.

6. For their contributions to the report the Secretary-General owes a particular debt of gratitude to the specialized agencies - the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the International Labour Organisation, the World Health Organization and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization - which have not only given their close and generous co-operation at all stages of the planning and preparation of the report as a whole but have also provided a major proportion of the specialized studies of subjects falling within their fields of competence which are to be found in the second main part.

Nature, scope and treatment of information

7. The preparation of the progress report has been undertaken within the framework established by the General Assembly in the two resolutions referred to above. The fundamental principles observed were, as set forth by the Secretary-General in his report to the General Assembly at its eleventh session,<sup>3/</sup> that the progress report should (a) be based on information furnished by the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of the Non-Self-Governing Territories; (b) take as guiding principles the general views and recommendations on economic, social and educational policies in the Territories which have been approved by the General Assembly; and (c) while adequately covering each separate Territory, should principally be directed towards the examination of conditions, problems, policies and prospects of general applicability in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

8. Of these three main elements, the nature of the information used as the basis of the report requires explanation in order that both its scope and its limitations may be understood. The General Assembly in resolution 1053 (XI) expressed the opinion that the report should be based on the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter and on the supplemental information supplied to the secretariats of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies by the Administering Members concerned. The nature and scope of this information have evolved since 1946 as a result both of improvements in the collection of statistical and factual data and of developments in United Nations procedures, a brief account of which will serve to define the kinds of information available.

9. Chapter XI of the Charter comprises a series of general and specific undertakings on the part of Members administering Non-Self-Governing Territories. Most of these, as will be shown in the following chapter, are in the nature of declarations of policy or intent in respect of the political, economic, social and educational development of the Territories. They also include, as Article 73 e, the undertaking to transmit regularly to the

Secretary-General for information purposes, subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations may require, statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social and educational conditions in the Territories. In 1946, in the light of views expressed by Member Governments which had notified to the Secretary-General the Non-Self-Governing Territories falling under their jurisdiction and within the scope of Chapter XI, the question of the nature of the information to be transmitted under Article 73 e was discussed at the second part of the first session of the General Assembly. Some Members responsible for Non-Self-Governing Territories considered that the nature of the information to be transmitted was clearly defined and limited by the precise reference of Article 73 e to "statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social and educational conditions". Some other Members considered that, since the Administering Members were no less committed by the terms of Chapter XI as a whole to the political advancement of the Territories than to their economic, social and educational well-being, they were equally obliged to inform the United Nations of the discharge of their responsibilities in the field of political development. A third body of opinion among the Member States, and one which then prevailed and has continued to do so, was that information on the political progress of the Territories would be of great interest and importance and that its transmission, while not mandatory, was greatly to be desired and encouraged.

10. The nature of the information to be transmitted was given more detailed consideration in 1947 by an ad hoc Committee established by the General Assembly by resolution 66 (I). By that time, eight Administering Members had transmitted information on fifty-seven Territories. Criticisms to the effect that the information supplied did not give a sufficiently clear picture of the conditions of life of the peoples of the Territories, and that it varied too widely in form as between the various Administering Members, led to the suggestion that a standard questionnaire might be formulated. An outline of headings under which information should be transmitted was drawn up by the Committee with the assistance of representatives of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the World Health Organization (WHO) and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), and it was adopted by the General Assembly in resolution 142 (II) as a provisional Standard Form for the guidance of the Members concerned.

11. The provisional Standard Form subdivided the social, educational and economic fields into particular aspects of each; in addition, since some of the Administering Members had voluntarily transmitted information of a general nature about their Territories and also information on the development of self-governing institutions, the Form included an optional general section covering geography, history, people, human rights, and government. On this last point, in a separate resolution adopted at the same session - resolution 144 (II) - the General Assembly recorded its view that the voluntary transmission of information on self-governing institutions in the Territories was entirely in conformity with the spirit of Article 73 and should therefore be duly noted and encouraged.

12. By 1948 the first application of the Standard Form had shown an improvement in the information transmitted on economic, social and educational conditions, and all except two of the Administering Members had also included the optional information on some or all of their Territories. By resolution 218 (III) the General Assembly invited those which had not done so nevertheless to supply information on geography, history, people and human rights. In 1949 all of the Administering Authorities transmitted such information, although not yet, in some cases, on all of their Territories; and a number of them continued to send information on the structure of government. The Assembly decided by resolution 327 (IV) that when a revision of the Standard Form was undertaken, the general information on geography, history, people and human rights should cease to be classified under the optional category. The effect of this would be to continue to regard the sending of information in the political field - specifically, on government - as a matter for decision by the Administering Members concerned.

13. An eventual revision of the Standard Form had been contemplated in 1948, when by resolution 221 (III) the General Assembly invited the specialized agencies to examine the relevant sections of the Form as a preliminary step. In 1951, on the basis of a text prepared by the Secretariat in consultation with the specialized agencies, the Assembly by resolution 551 (VI) approved a revised Standard Form.<sup>4/</sup> This version represents a more comprehensive and more detailed guide than did the provisional one. It invites the Administering Members, first, to provide a survey of principles and practical measures showing general trends in the Territories. In a general section it provides for information on geography (including principal natural resources), history, people (including population data and statistics) and, as an optional subject, government (specifying such aspects as constitutional legislation, nationality, structure and powers of government, and local government). The economic section includes public and private investment; agriculture and livestock, including land tenure and use, assistance for agricultural production, research, education and extension services; forestry; fisheries; mineral resources and mining; power; industry; transport and communications; public finance, including the budget and taxation; banking and credit; international trade. Aspects of social conditions listed include problems of race and cultural relations; human rights; the status of women; labour and employment conditions, including employers' and workers' organizations, welfare activities and vocational training; co-operative societies; standards of living; town and rural planning and housing; social security and welfare; prevention of crime and treatment of offenders; public health; and, as a subsequent addition, community development.<sup>5/</sup>

Under educational conditions the Standard Form enumerates such matters as administrative organization, expenditure, the institutional structure and curricula from the pre-primary to the university level, adult education, youth organizations, cultural institutions and mass communications. A particular point is made in the Standard Form of the participation of the inhabitants in the major fields of development. Finally, it contains appendices suggesting the manner of presentation of several categories of statistics.

14. While the Standard Form was designed "for the guidance" of the Members concerned and the General Assembly did not go further than to invite them to take it into account in the preparation of the data to be sent, the information transmitted on the Non-Self-Governing Territories has gradually been brought into closer accord with it. In general, the information has increased in quantity and improved in quality over the years, reflecting in part the evolution of the Territories and the growth of their statistical services. It has also been amplified by other means. The General Assembly has from time to time, and with varying results, addressed specific requests to the Administering Members for more detailed information on such subjects as the use of United Nations technical assistance, the exercise of human rights and the association of Territories with the European Economic Community. Moreover there has been general agreement that relevant territorial, departmental or special reports may, with the consent of the Governments concerned, be used as supplementary sources of information;<sup>6/</sup> since 1948 such publications, communicated or authorized, have gradually been increased so as to cover, in the case of many Territories, official reports on nearly all aspects of development in the economic, social and educational fields. Information made available to the specialized agencies and other international and inter-governmental organizations, and the publications which they have based on it, represent an additional source.

15. The information thus transmitted by the Administering Members since 1946, the supplementary information communicated or otherwise authorized by them, and the information available to and published by the contributing specialized agencies therefore constitute the factual basis of the present report. Account has also been taken of explanations of policy and descriptions of practice given in regard to the Territories by representatives of Administering Members at sessions of the General Assembly and its Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, but only where these have occurred within the context of Chapter XI of the Charter. The accumulated body of information is substantial, especially for approximately the second half of the period under review. Such limitations as exist in the economic, social and educational data on some of the Territories largely reflect differences in practice as between Administering Members, and to some extent as between territorial authorities, in the collection and more particularly the publication of information in such forms as departmental reports and the results of special inquiries and investigations. Outside of these three fields the constitutional obstacles, indicated earlier, to the transmission of information of a political nature have placed important limitations on the kind and volume of data available. Although a majority of the Administering Members have regularly supplied information on a voluntary basis concerning the structure of government in their Territories, the great majority of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and of their population as a whole are those administered by Members who as a matter of principle have not found it possible to transmit information on political development except, in some cases, as it has affected such matters as the participation of the inhabitants in measures of economic, social and educational advancement.

16. The period covered by the report is, in general, the period from 1946 to 1957, the latter being the last year for which complete information on most of the Territories had been transmitted at the time of preparation of the report. In some instances, however, the final year is 1956; in some cases also, in order to explain the background of a given development, reference is made to the period before 1946; and there are a few instances, notably in the special studies contained in the second part of the report, where important information relating to the period since 1957 had become available in official form and was considered to warrant reference. A further point of explanation to be made is that in the territorial reports contained in the third part, only those Territories are included on which information under Article 73 e was transmitted for the year 1956. On the other hand, in the studies comprising the second part of the report references are made where appropriate to conditions, during the period when they were non-self-governing, in some of the Territories which have since passed outside the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter. These references relate only to the former status of the Territories concerned and to the years in which information on them was transmitted under Article 73 e, and are not to be understood as reflecting existing conditions or prejudicing in any way their present status.

Previous summaries, studies and reports

17. In serving the special purposes for which it was initiated by the General Assembly, the present report may usefully be related to the continuing series of publications which represent regular United Nations activity under the auspices of the Assembly and within the framework of Chapter XI of the Charter. These publications, which may be regarded as complementary to the report and which have provided, as mentioned in paragraph 7, its guiding principles, consist in particular of the summaries prepared annually by the Secretary-General of the information transmitted under Article 73 e; studies on economic, social and educational conditions prepared on the basis of that information by the United Nations Secretariat and the specialized agencies concerned; and the reports of the Assembly's Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and its predecessors.

18. The processes of summarization, analysis and discussion of the information transmitted on the Territories reflect, as in the case of the history outlined above of the nature and scope of the information, the evolution of principles and procedures by the General Assembly since 1946. While it was generally recognized from the beginning that the information to be transmitted to the Secretary-General under Article 73 e should be made available to all the Members of the United Nations, their right to examine it formally within the agenda of the General Assembly, and the manner in which that examination should take place, became and has remained a subject of controversy. This situation has resulted from a difference in viewpoint between those Members, on the one hand, who have maintained that the Charter respects the exclusive nature of the rights of the Administering Authorities in the Territories, that it provides for the transmission of technical information only "for information purposes," and that it contemplates no procedure or machinery for the examination of conditions in the Territories; and those Members, on the other hand, who have insisted that the inclusion in the Charter of the obligations entered into by the Administering Members implies a right and even a duty on the part of the United Nations to review the implementation of those obligations and that, for such practical reasons as the large volume and the technical nature of the information transmitted, some form of machinery is needed to assist the General Assembly in examining it.

19. The predominance of the second of these points of view led first to the establishment by the General Assembly in 1946<sup>7/</sup> of an ad hoc Committee and then, in 1948<sup>8/</sup> and 1949<sup>9/</sup> to the setting up of special committees to examine summaries and analyses prepared by the Secretary-General, at the Assembly's request, of the information transmitted. In 1950<sup>10/</sup> a special committee was again established, this time for a period of three years; it was renewed for three years in 1952<sup>11/</sup> and again in 1955<sup>12/</sup> and 1958<sup>13/</sup>. From 1951 it has been known as the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories<sup>14/</sup>. Each of these bodies has been composed of an equal number of Members transmitting information and Members elected by the General Assembly on a wide geographical basis.<sup>15/</sup> Their terms of reference have remained unchanged since 1949: namely, to examine, in the spirit of paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 1 and of Article 55 of the Charter,<sup>16/</sup> summaries and analyses of the information transmitted under Article 73 e, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories; and to submit to the Assembly reports containing such procedural recommendations as the Committee may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories.

20. The summaries and analyses presented by the Secretary-General each year under these arrangements have grown in scope as well as in volume during the period in response to successive requests on the part of the General Assembly. Summaries of the information transmitted have been prepared since 1946; the first analyses, dealing with agriculture, public health, education and labour, were undertaken in 1947. In 1948 the General Assembly decided that the Secretary-General should prepare full summaries and analyses of the information during 1949 and thereafter at three-year intervals, showing the progress made over the three-year period in economic, social and educational matters, with annual supplements in the intervening years. The analyses were extended in 1948 and 1949 to cover economic conditions and social welfare in addition to the subjects mentioned above, and after 1949 they were further developed in accordance with a view expressed by the General Assembly, in establishing a Committee for a three-year term for the first time,<sup>17/</sup> that the value of the Committee's work would be enhanced if, without prejudice to its annual consideration of all three of the fields of economic, social and educational conditions, special attention were given to one of these fields each year. The Assembly therefore invited the Committee to give particular attention to educational conditions in 1950; and for that purpose the Secretary-General laid before it, in addition to studies of aspects of economic and social development, six reports on educational problems in the Territories. Similarly, the Committee gave special attention in 1951 to economic conditions and in 1952 to social conditions, for which the Secretary-General again prepared additional studies. The cycle was repeated in the period 1953-1956 and again in the period 1957-1959. The analyses presented by the Secretary-General have included an increasing number of papers prepared by the specialized agencies contributing, as noted in paragraph 6 above, to the present report. A number of the same agencies, and in addition the United Nations Children's Fund, have also submitted accounts of their own activities in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

21. The procedure which has developed for the examination of the information transmitted under Article 73 e is that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, meeting some months before each regular annual session of the General Assembly, uses the summaries and analyses presented by the Secretary-General as the basis of its examination of economic, social and educational conditions in the Territories. It is assisted in this by representatives of the specialized agencies concerned; and a number of the Administering Members and some of the non-administering Members have made a practice, encouraged by the General Assembly, of including in their delegations as specialist advisers experts in the particular field to which primary attention is being given. The consensus of opinions arising from the exchange of views in the Committee and in the sub-committee which it appoints each year to facilitate its work is embodied in a report, submitted to the General Assembly, to which the analyses presented by the Secretary-General are annexed as an integral part. It is usual for the General Assembly, after discussion in the Fourth Committee, to approve these reports and to invite the Secretary-General to transmit them to the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned, for their consideration. The Administering Members have also been invited<sup>18/</sup> to bring the reports to the attention of the local authorities in the Territories.

22. The summaries of information transmitted and the special studies based upon it - these comprising the opinions expressed by the Committee and the analyses prepared by the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies - are published annually as part of a continuing and related series. A list of the volumes previously published is given below. It should be noted that since 1957 the summaries of information of a supplementary character which appear in two years out of three have been prepared in nine separate fascicles covering respectively the Central, East, South and West African Territories, the Asian Territories, the Caribbean and Western Atlantic Territories, the Indian Ocean Territories, the Pacific Ocean Territories, and other Territories not falling into the geographical groupings. The summaries of information found in the third part of the present report, covering the period since the establishment of the United Nations, supplant the three-year summaries which would otherwise have been due in 1959.

II. THE NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES UNDER THE CHARTER OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories

23. The Charter of the United Nations was drafted and ratified, and the organization which it established came into being, at a time when roughly a quarter of the world's estimated population lived in what were popularly known as colonial or dependent Territories over which sovereignty was exercised by a small number of other countries. Of the approximately 2.3 billion people who inhabited the earth at the end of 1945, the peoples of sovereign States accounted for roughly 1.5 billion. Their numbers were to be increased within a short time to nearly 2 billion, notably through the emergence in Asia of new States whose independence was already fully or largely assured at the time of the founding of the United Nations. Approximately a quarter of a billion people remained, comprising for the most part the inhabitants of colonies, protectorates, overseas possessions and mandated territories in Africa, South-East Asia, the Caribbean area and the Pacific Ocean; and although the precise identities and exact numbers of these non-self-governing peoples were not at once formally established, the segment of mankind which they represented was recognized in general terms as a substantial one, and their political destinies and economic, social and educational well-being became an important preoccupation of the authors of the Charter.

24. This concern of the post-war international community for the interests of the dependent peoples was expressed in Chapter XI of the Charter, which takes the form of a "Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories". It is based on the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of these Territories are to be recognized as paramount, and that the obligation to promote their well-being is in the nature of a sacred trust. The fulfilment of that trust involves, as the General Assembly has stated,<sup>19/</sup> "certain specific obligations, including the obligation to develop self-government and to assist the inhabitants in the progressive development of their free political institutions". These obligations, in the terms of the Declaration which sets them forth, devolve upon those Members of the United Nations which are responsible for the administration of the Territories concerned. The text of the Declaration, which consists of two articles, is as follows:

"Members of the United Nations which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government recognize the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of these territories are paramount, and accept as a sacred trust the obligation to promote to the utmost, within the system of international peace and security established by the present Charter, the well-being of the inhabitants of these territories, and, to this end:

"a. to ensure, with due respect for the culture of the peoples concerned, their political, economic, social, and educational advancement, their just treatment, and their protection against abuses;

"b. to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions, according to the particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples and their varying stages of advancement;

"c. to further international peace and security;

"d. to promote constructive measures of development, to encourage research, and to co-operate with one another and, when and where appropriate, with specialized international bodies with a view to the practical achievement of the social, economic, and scientific purposes set forth in this Article; and

"e. to transmit regularly to the Secretary-General for information purposes, subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations may require, statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social, and educational conditions in the territories for which they are respectively responsible other than those territories to which Chapters XII and XIII apply.

"Article 74

"Members of the United Nations also agree that their policy in respect of the territories to which this Chapter applies, no less than in respect of their metropolitan areas, must be based on the general principle of good-neighbourliness, due account being taken of the interests and well-being of the rest of the world, in social, economic, and commercial matters."

25. Chapters XII and XIII referred to in the Declaration are those which establish, in addition, an International Trusteeship System for the administration and supervision of such Territories as may by agreement with the United Nations be placed under it from among three categories of Territories: those held under mandate of the League of Nations; those detached from enemy States as a result of the Second World War; and those voluntarily placed under the system by States responsible for their administration. Each of the eleven Territories<sup>20/</sup> for which Trusteeship Agreements were eventually approved belonged to one or the other of the first two categories; they accounted for some 20 million of the world's dependent peoples, and left more than 200 million people subject in principle to the provisions of the Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories.

26. The first and longest enumeration of Non-Self-Governing Territories other than those under Trusteeship was established in 1946. The Charter defines the Territories to which the Declaration applies simply as those "whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government" and for whose administration Members of the United Nations "have or assume responsibilities". In the implementation of Chapter XI the General Assembly left to the Members the initiative of identifying, in the first instance, the Territories concerned by means of undertaking the transmission of information in accordance with Article 73 e. At the first part of its first session in 1946 the Assembly<sup>21/</sup> declared itself to be "keenly aware of the problems and political aspirations of the peoples who have not yet attained a full measure of self-government and who are not directly represented here"; drew attention to the fact that the obligations accepted under Chapter XI were already in full force; and requested the Secretary-General to include in his annual report on the work of the Organization a statement summarizing such information as might have been transmitted to him under Article 73 e. In a letter of 29 June 1946<sup>22/</sup> drawing the attention of the Members to this resolution, the Secretary-General invited them inter alia to give their opinions on the factors to be taken into account in determining which were the Non-Self-Governing Territories referred to in Chapter XI and to provide an enumeration of the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their jurisdiction. In their replies, some Members suggested definitions or criteria for a definition; some others expressed the opinion that it would be difficult to arrive at a definition applicable in all circumstances; and some others considered that the determination of the Territories was a matter within the national competence of the State concerned in each case. At the same time, eight Member States began at once to transmit information, or indicated their intention to do so, on a total of seventy-four Territories, as follows:

Australia (1): Papua.

Belgium (1): Belgian Congo.

Denmark (1): Greenland.

France (16): French Equatorial Africa, French establishments in India, French establishments in Oceania, French Guiana, French Somaliland, French West Africa, Guadeloupe and dependencies, Indo-China, Madagascar and dependencies, Martinique, Morocco, New Caledonia and dependencies, New Hebrides under Anglo-French Condominium, Reunion, St. Pierre and Miquelon, Tunisia.

Netherlands (3): Netherlands Indies, Curacao, Surinam.

New Zealand (2): Cook Islands including Niue, Tokelau Islands.

United Kingdom (43): Aden Colony and Protectorate, Bahamas, Barbados, Basutoland, Bechuanaland Protectorate, Bermuda, British Guiana, British Honduras, Brunei, Cyprus, Dominica, Falkland Islands, Fiji, Gambia, Gibraltar, Gilbert and Ellice Islands Colony, Gold Coast Colony and Protectorate, Grenada, Hong Kong, Jamaica, Kenya Colony and Protectorate, Leeward Islands, Malayan Union, Malta, Mauritius, Nigeria, North Borneo, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, Pitcairn Island, St. Helena and dependencies, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Sarawak, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Solomon Islands Protectorate, Swaziland, Trinidad and Tobago, Uganda Protectorate, Zanzibar Protectorate.

United States of America (7): Alaska, American Samoa, Guam, Hawaii, Panama Canal Zone, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands.

27. Subject to reservations made by some of the Members concerned regarding the status of some of their Territories,<sup>23/</sup> and by other Members regarding questions of sovereignty,<sup>24/</sup> this enumeration had the effect of establishing the practical scope of Chapter XI as recognized by the Members administering non-self-governing peoples, and accordingly of indicating the physical dimensions of the sacred trust in terms of human and material resources. The estimated total population in 1946 of the Territories listed was approximately 215 million, of whom more than 115 million were the inhabitants of Territories in South-East Asia and the Pacific Ocean, more than 93 million lived in Africa and adjacent islands and nearly 6 million in the Caribbean area. The Territories varied enormously in size of population (from about 100 on Pitcairn Island to 24 million in Nigeria, 30 million in Indo-China and 73 million in the Netherlands Indies), and also, as the information transmitted on them at that time and in subsequent years showed, in the ethnic origins of their peoples, in the nature and degree of development of their economic resources, and in the rate and stage of their social and economic advancement.

28. The twenty-five Territories belonging to Africa and its adjacent waters included the greater part of the Continent between the Sahara Desert and the Zambesi River and an important sector of the Mediterranean littoral. At that time

<sup>23/</sup> The Government of France transmitted information without prejudice to the future status of the Territories concerned. It pointed out in particular that a law which would take effect on 1 January 1947 would confer on Martinique, Guadeloupe, French Guiana and Reunion the status of Departments of the metropolitan country, and that the juridical position of the other Territories within the French system was also in process of evolution (A/74, annex VIII). The Government of New Zealand stated that the inclusion of the Cook Islands, which were an integral part of New Zealand, was without prejudice to any interpretation of the expression "Non-Self-Governing Territories" (A/74/Add.2).

only four independent States existed in Africa, which otherwise consisted of Trust Territories and a few areas possessing other special status or administered by States not Members of the United Nations. The Non-Self-Governing Territories enumerated as such included - in Nigeria, the eight territorial units of French West Africa, the four units of French Equatorial Africa, and the Belgian Congo - some of the largest agglomerations of African peoples. In the Far East, the greater part of the South-East Asian peninsula and the archipelagoes lying close to it were embraced by the Non-Self-Governing Territories enumerated: they included in particular an estimated total of more than 100 million people in French Indo-China, Malaya and the Netherlands Indies. The Caribbean Territories consisted of most of the smaller islands of that region and parts of the American Continent. In the Pacific Ocean area, most of the islands and island groups of the Pacific, other than those destined to be placed under trusteeship or composing or forming part of independent States, were listed. The remaining Territories were widely dispersed in the Mediterranean, the Atlantic and North America.

29. By the end of the period reviewed in the present report, the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories recognized as such had undergone substantial changes. The number of Territories enumerated had fallen from 74 to 55:<sup>25/</sup> but the change was much more significant in terms of the size of the populations involved. The estimated total population of the 55 remaining Territories, based on 1956 figures, was approximately 113 million, as compared with the total of approximately 215 million in the 74 Territories listed in 1946. In this comparison, moreover, the generally high rate of natural population increase must also be taken into account: the estimated population of the same 55 Territories in 1946 was 91 million. In particular, the total number of Asian and Pacific peoples identified as belonging to Non-Self-Governing Territories was reduced from more than 113 million to less than 14 million.

30. By far the most important factor in these changes in the geographical and human scope of the actual application of Chapter XI was the emergence of a number of the peoples concerned from non-self-governing status to that of independence or, in some cases, to that of a sufficiently full measure of self-government to warrant recognition by the General Assembly, explicitly or otherwise, that the provisions of the Declaration no longer applied to them. From seven Non-Self-Governing Territories, eight independent States which are also Members of the United Nations have emerged, four in Asia and four in Africa: Indonesia from the Netherlands Indies; Cambodia and Laos from French Indo-China; Morocco; Tunisia; Ghana, formerly the Gold Coast and an adjoining Trust Territory; the Federation of Malaya; and Guinea, formerly a territorial component of French West Africa. The two States of Viet-Nam have been constituted from the remaining portion of Indo-China. Four other Territories - Greenland, Puerto Rico, Surinam and Netherlands Antilles Curaçao - were removed from the list with the explicit agreement of the General Assembly upon acceding to forms of self-government in association with the Members which had administered them.

31. In addition, the Members responsible for Malta (the United Kingdom), the Panama Canal Zone (United States of America) and French Guiana, Guadeloupe, Martinique, Reunion, New Caledonia, the French Establishments in India and Oceania, and St. Pierre at Miquelon (France) ceased the transmission of information on these Territories after 1946 and provided explanations of the constitutional or other developments which in their view had necessitated this.

32. The nature and circumstances of these changes in status will be discussed in greater detail in the following section. It may be noted that further changes had been notified or were in prospect at the time of preparation of this report. The admission of Alaska as a State of the United States of America, and the prospect of a similar change of status for Hawaii, had been notified by the Government concerned; the Government of France had notified the cessation, as from 1957 and by reason of constitutional and political changes, of the transmission of information on French West Africa, French Equatorial Africa, French Somaliland, Madagascar and the Comores; and the expectation that Nigeria, the largest of the remaining African Territories, would be granted independence by the United Kingdom on 1 October 1960 had been made known to the United Nations in connexion with the future of the Trust Territory of the Cameroons under United Kingdom administration, which is administered as an integral part of Nigeria.

The attainment of a full measure of self-government

33. The terms of Chapter XI imply that the Territories enumerated in 1946, to which none have been added in the intervening years, represented the sum of Non-Self-Governing Territories for which Members of the United Nations were responsible, and that the number of Territories and peoples which have been removed from the list during the period under review is an index of the extent to which the objectives of the Charter have been fully attained and to which non-self-governing peoples have acceded to "a full measure of self-government".

34. The validity of this index has proved particularly clear in the case of the eight Territories or former component parts of Territories which not only attained independence during the period under review but also obtained admission to the United Nations, an Organization based on the principle of "the sovereign equality of all its Members".<sup>26/</sup> In most of these cases the act of admission to membership has served as a self-evident confirmation of the emergence of the former Territories from the scope of Chapter XI.

35. The experience of the period, including decisions of principle and of practical application on the part of the General Assembly, has also established, however, that "a full measure of self-government" may be attained in conditions other than those of full national independence. Article 73 provides that in the development of self-government due account is to be taken of the political aspirations of the peoples themselves, and also of the particular circumstances of each Territory and its people. While maintaining that the manner in which Territories can become fully self-governing is "primarily through the attainment of independence", the General Assembly has evolved a series of criteria and precedents which envisage the possibility of Territories attaining other separate systems of self-government, including free association on an equal basis with the metropolitan or other countries. In four such cases (Greenland, Puerto Rico, Surinam and Netherlands Antilles), the General Assembly has made a special examination of the constitutional and political development of the Territories - paying particular attention to evidence of the free expression of the wishes of their peoples - and has consequently given its agreement to the cessation of information on them. In the remaining cases, which occurred earlier in the period, cessation took place under circumstances explained by the Members concerned but without any specific formal action on the part of the General Assembly.

36. The degree of participation exercised by the international community in respect of the decision as to whether a given Territory is or is not self-governing within the meaning of Chapter XI has come about in conjunction with the evolution of procedures outlined in the introduction to this report. The problem of defining the Charter expression "territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government" arose in the earliest debates of the General Assembly in regard to Chapter XI. In 1946 it was agreed not to attempt a more concrete definition for the time being; instead, the Assembly formally enumerated<sup>27/</sup> the 74 Territories in respect of which the various Members concerned had begun to transmit information or had undertaken to do so in accordance with Article 73 e.

37. By 1948 the number of Territories on which information was received had fallen to sixty-four.<sup>28/</sup> The apparent omissions were the United Kingdom Territory of Malta, the Panama Canal Zone under United States administration, and the French Territories of French Guiana, Guadeloupe and Martinique in the Caribbean region, Indo-China and the French establishments in India, French Oceania and New Caledonia in the Pacific, Reunion in the Indian Ocean and St. Pierre and Miquelon in the North Atlantic. Although in some cases explanations had been given for these omissions, no provision had been made by which the United Nations would be officially informed of the constitutional changes justifying the discontinuation of the transmission of information. On these grounds the General Assembly in 1948 adopted a resolution<sup>29/</sup> in which, while welcoming any development of self-government, it expressed the opinion that it was essential for the United Nations to be informed of any changes as a result of which the Government concerned thought it unnecessary to transmit information in respect of any given Territory. Accordingly, the Members were invited in any such case to communicate to the Secretary-General any appropriate information including the constitution, legislative act or executive order providing for the Government of the Territory, and the constitutional relationship of the Government of the Territory to the metropolitan country.

38. Replies were received in 1949 from the three Members concerned.<sup>30/</sup> In the case of Malta the United Kingdom recalled that its representatives had informed the General Assembly in 1947 of the fact that there were United Kingdom Territories which, while not yet in full control of their external affairs, were nevertheless fully responsible for the conduct of their internal affairs; these Territories included at that time Burma and Ceylon and, as from 5 September 1947, Malta. The United Kingdom Government took the position that since educational, social and economic conditions in Malta had become the exclusive concern of the Government of Malta it would be inappropriate and indeed impossible for the United Kingdom Government to continue to transmit information on these matters under Article 73 e.

39. The United States Government replied that the case of the Panama Canal Zone fell outside the scope of the General Assembly's resolution, the problem of the status of the Canal Zone in relation to Article 73 e being a subject for further study and consultation on the part of the Governments of the United States and of Panama.

40. Concerning the French Territories on which the transmission of information had ceased, the French Government reiterated its view that the determination of Territories whose peoples had not yet attained a full measure of self-government lay exclusively within the competence of the States which had responsibilities for their administration. The provisions of Article 73 e would normally cease to apply to Territories whose peoples had attained a sufficient degree of culture, prosperity and self-government. The Government then explained the changes in the political status of the Territories concerned which had come about under the French Constitution of 27 October 1946 establishing the French Union between, on the one hand, the Republic and its Overseas Departments and Overseas Territories and, on the other hand, the Associated States and Associated Territories. The intention of the Constitution, it stated, had been to promote the emancipation of the overseas peoples either within the unity of the French Republic or under autonomous régimes within the French Union. The peoples which had taken the path of unity within the Republic received all the civic freedoms, duties and faculties which belonged to the inhabitants of metropolitan France; while the framework of the French Union made it possible for the peoples which had or aspired to their own political life to proceed towards autonomy. These principles had led the French Government to cease in 1947 the transmission of information as regards all the Overseas Departments (Guadeloupe, Guiana, Martinique and Reunion), which had been granted a régime largely identical with that of the departments of metropolitan France, and also as regards certain of the Overseas Territories (New Caledonia, the French Settlements in Oceania and St. Pierre and Miquelon), which had been provided with a regime on the whole closely resembling that of the Overseas Departments or metropolitan France as regards the status of the inhabitants and their means of political representation. In the case of the peoples outside the Republic, the French Government had similarly decided to cease in 1948 the transmission of information on the Associated States of Indo-China (Cambodia, Laos and Viet-Nam) on the grounds of the recognized powers of the Governments of these States, to which freedom of self-government to the extent of independence within the framework of the French Union had been granted by a series of conventions. Information was no longer being sent also on the French Settlements in India, whose inhabitants participated in the institutions of the Republic and enjoyed political rights similar to those of citizens of metropolitan France.

41. The French Government at the same time presented legislative and other texts relative to the status of the various units of the French Union in regard to which information had ceased to be transmitted. These included the Preamble and those other parts of the French Constitution of 1946 establishing the French Union; laws providing for the representation of the Departments and Territories in the French Parliament; decrees determining the composition of the territorial representative assemblies in St. Pierre et Miquelon, New Caledonia, the French Settlements in Oceania and the French Settlements in India; and a number of texts concerning the Associated States, including the constitutions of the Kingdoms of Cambodia and Laos and a joint declaration made on 5 June 1948 by the French High Commissioner in Indo-China and the President of the Provisional Central Government of Viet-Nam.

42. The general points emerging from these statements taken as a whole were (1) that the determination of which Territories are not fully self-governing should be regarded as lying exclusively in each case within the competence of the State responsible for its administration; (2) that the granting of a certain measure of self-government within the constitutional framework of the metropolitan State should be considered to justify the discontinuance of the transmission of information; and (3) that when a Territory becomes responsible for the conduct of its internal affairs, even though it has not full control of its external affairs, the metropolitan State is no longer entitled to transmit information on such internal affairs. These propositions, however, encountered reservations of varying degree on the part of other Members of the United Nations; and although it did not take any formal action on the precise cases in question,<sup>31/</sup> the General Assembly at the end of 1949 adopted a resolution<sup>32/</sup> in which it asserted that "it is within the responsibility of the General Assembly to express its opinion on the principles which may in future guide the Members concerned in enumerating the Territories for which the obligation exists to transmit information

31/ Except in the case of the former Associated States of Indo-China, the United Nations has taken no action since that date in respect of the French Territories concerned, whether within or outside the context of Chapter XI of the Charter. In 1952, however, after the Security Council had considered but failed to recommend the admission to United Nations membership of a number of States including Viet-Nam, Cambodia and Laos, the General Assembly in effect recognized the independence of these States by adopting resolution 620 (VII) on the question of the admission of new Members, in parts C, D and E of which it "determines that Viet-Nam (Cambodia, Laos) is, in its judgement, a peace-loving State within the meaning of Article 4 of the Charter, is able and willing to carry out the obligations of the Charter and should therefore be admitted to membership in the United Nations". Cambodia and Laos were eventually admitted to membership on 14 December 1955 by resolution 995 (X). On 28 February 1957 and again on 25 October 1957 the General Assembly, by resolutions 1017 (XI) and 1144B (XII), reaffirmed its determination that Viet-Nam "is fully qualified for admission to membership in the United Nations." The events resulting in the partitioning of Viet-Nam and the constitution of two separate republics have not been the subject of United Nations action.

under Article 73 e of the Charter", and entrusted its Special Committee<sup>33/</sup> with an examination of "the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government".

43. Before this examination could be undertaken the largest of the Territories listed as Non-Self-Governing passed outside the scope of Chapter XI. In June 1950 the Government of the Netherlands informed the Secretary-General<sup>34/</sup> that it would no longer transmit a report on Indonesia since sovereignty over the former Netherlands Indies, with the exception of Netherlands New Guinea,<sup>35/</sup> had been formally and irrevocably transferred to the Republic of the United States of Indonesia on 27 December 1949 and the provisions of Chapter XI no longer applied to what was now a self-governing and sovereign State. The constitutional developments in Indonesia since the end of the Second World War had in fact been reported upon in the information transmitted by the Netherlands Government; in addition, the political situation had been the subject of separate action by the General Assembly in 1948 and 1949.<sup>36/</sup> On 28 September 1950 Indonesia was admitted to membership in the United Nations<sup>37/</sup> and on 12 December the General Assembly, "noting that the full independence of the Republic of Indonesia has been followed by the admission of that State to membership in the United Nations", took note with satisfaction of the Netherlands Government's communication with reference to the cessation of the transmission of information on Indonesia.<sup>38/</sup> This was the first occasion on which the combination of "full independence" and admission to the United Nations was formally accepted as sufficient indication, without resort to an examination within the context of Chapter XI of the constitutional basis of the new State, that a former Territory had attained a full measure of self-government within the meaning of the Charter.

44. The questions of principle previously raised, however, and in particular the question of the cessation of information on Territories not acceding to national sovereignty, remained to be examined, and the matter was given further point by the Netherlands Government announcing, in the same communication as that relating to Indonesia, that in all probability no further reports on the Netherlands West Indies and Surinam would be submitted after 1950 since both these territories would then have acquired "an autonomous status and a full measure of self-government placing them outside the scope of Chapter XI". It was nevertheless the Government's intention in that case to submit a report pursuant to resolution 222 (III). In the resolution with which it dealt with Indonesia the General Assembly requested its Special Committee to examine such information of this kind as might be transmitted in future and to report on it to the Assembly.

45. Between 1951 and 1953 the General Assembly undertook, with the assistance of the Special Committee and two ad hoc Committees (1952 and 1953) appointed for the purpose, a number of detailed studies of the complex issues involved in the question of the factors indicating full self-government. A first list of factors, adopted by the General Assembly early in 1952<sup>39/</sup> as a basis for further study, asserted among other things by way of introduction that:

"The condition under which the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter cease to apply will be that the inhabitants of the territory have attained, through political advancement, a full measure of self-government. The fulfilment of this condition may be achieved by various means, involving in all cases the expression of the free will of the people. The two principal means are (a) the attainment of independence and (b) the union of the territory on a footing of equal status with other component parts of the metropolitan or other territory or its association on the same conditions with the metropolitan or other country or countries."

In listing factors to be regarded as indicative, although not necessarily in all cases decisively so, of the attainment of one form or another of full self-government, the General Assembly described some elements as essential. It considered that:

"the essential factors to be taken into account in deciding whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory has attained a full measure of self-government are the following:

- "(i) Political advancement: Political advancement of the population sufficient to enable them to decide upon the future destiny of the Territory with due knowledge;
- "(ii) Opinion of the population: The opinion of the population of the Territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, as to the status or change in status which they desire.

"These factors apply both to Non-Self-Governing Territories which have achieved independence and to Non-Self-Governing Territories which have freely united or associated themselves on a footing of equal status with other component parts of the metropolitan or other country or countries. In the latter case, however, the following factors are also essential and should be taken into account:

- "(i) Legislative representation: Representation without discrimination in the central legislative organs on the same basis as other inhabitants and regions;
- "(ii) Citizenship: Citizenship without discrimination on the same basis as other inhabitants."

46. The list of factors underwent two revisions at the end of 1952 and in 1953, and in the resolutions<sup>40/</sup> approving them the General Assembly enunciated the following further points of principle:

(1) Each concrete case should be considered and decided in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and taking into account the right of self-determination of peoples;

(2) The manner in which the Territories can become fully self-governing is primarily through the attainment of independence, although it is recognized that self-government can also be achieved by association with another State or group of States if this is done freely and on the basis of absolute equality;

(3) The validity of any form of association between a Non-Self-Governing Territory and a metropolitan or any other country essentially depends on the freely expressed will of the people at the time of the taking of the decision;

(4) For a Territory to be deemed self-governing in economic, social or educational affairs - these being the fields on which information is required by Article 73 e to be transmitted - it is essential that its people shall have attained a full measure of self-government.

47. The factors to be regarded as indicative of the attainment of independence were those relating to the Territory's international status (full international responsibility for its sovereign acts, eligibility for membership in the United Nations, power to enter into direct relations of every kind with other Governments and with international institutions, and sovereign right to provide for national defence); and those relating to internal self-government (complete freedom of the people to choose their form of government, freedom from control or interference by the government of another State in respect of the internal government, and complete autonomy in respect of economic, social and cultural affairs). The factors indicative of the attainment of other separate systems of self-government were the opinion of the population, freely expressed, as to their status; their freedom to choose between several possibilities, including independence; the nature of the voluntary limitation of sovereignty; geographical, ethnical and cultural considerations; sufficient political advancement to enable the population to decide upon the future destiny of the Territory with due knowledge; the nature of the international status of the Territory; and various aspects of the extent of internal self-government. The factors which would indicate the free association of a Territory on an equal basis with the metropolitan or other country include the questions of freely expressed popular opinion, freedom to modify the association through the democratic expression of the will of the inhabitants, geographical, ethnic and cultural considerations and the adequacy of political advancement. Constitutional considerations would also be involved: whether the constitutional guarantees extend equally to the associated Territory, whether there is any constitutional reservation of powers, and whether the Territory may participate equally in any constitutional changes. Aspects of the status of the Territory to be taken into account are representation in the central legislative organs, effective participation in government, equality of citizenship, and equality of eligibility to all public offices of the central authority. Internal constitutional conditions to be considered include the existence of universal suffrage and free periodic elections, equality of rights and status of individuals and local bodies, and the degree of autonomy in respect of economic, social and cultural affairs, including for example the degree of freedom from economic pressure.

48. The General Assembly recommended that the list of factors should be used for its own purposes and by the Administering Members as a guide in determining whether any Territory, due to changes in its constitutional status, remained or was no longer within the scope of Chapter XI, in order that in the light of the documentation to be provided concerning the constitutional changes, a decision might be taken by the Assembly itself on the continuation or cessation of the transmission of information.

49. In the period from 1953 to 1955 the General Assembly considered and approved the cessation of the transmission of information on four Territories attaining self-government other than by means of independent statehood. These were, in the order in which the decisions were taken, Puerto Rico, Greenland and the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam. In all cases the Administering Members concerned supplied details of the constitutional changes involved and of the circumstances in which those changes had been determined, and supplemented these with oral explanations by qualified authorities including in most cases elected representatives of the populations. In the course of the debates frequent references were made to the factors which had been approved in principle by the General Assembly, and in any event many of the principal issues which preoccupied the Assembly coincided with points included in the list of factors. The disposal of these cases, together with the guiding principles which had emerged from the protracted study of factors, established a pattern of procedure of which one of the underlying aspects was that the General Assembly formally asserted in each case<sup>41/</sup> its competence "to decide whether a Non-Self-Governing Territory has or has not attained a full measure of self-government as referred to in Chapter XI of the Charter", and proceeded to exercise that competence by giving its opinion as to whether or not the transmission of information should appropriately come to an end.

50. In the case of Puerto Rico, the Government of the United States by communications dated 19 January and 30 March 1953 informed the Secretary-General that as a result of the entry into force on 25 July 1952 of a new constitution establishing the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Government of the United States no longer considered it necessary or appropriate to continue to transmit information on Puerto Rico under Article 73 e. The Government of the United States also transmitted to the Secretary-General the text of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico; a copy of a letter dated 17 January 1953 from the Governor of Puerto Rico to the President of the United States; and an explanatory memorandum setting forth the constitutional development of Puerto Rico under United States administration which had culminated in the establishment of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. It was explained that under United States administration, Puerto Rico had, over a fifty-four year period, progressively achieved self-government. A major step had been taken in 1917, when the people of Puerto Rico became American citizens and elected both houses of their legislature. In 1929 Puerto Rico acquired universal adult suffrage and in 1935 the last literacy requirements were removed. In 1945 and 1946 statements were made by the President of the United States committing his Government to the policy that it was "for the dependent peoples themselves to decide what their status shall be".

51. In 1947, the Congress of the United States authorized the people of Puerto Rico to elect their own Governor. In the elections for Governor which took place in 1948, each of the three alternatives - independence, statehood, and association with the United States - was presented by a political party which favoured it. The parties actively campaigned for the support of the electorate and nominated candidates for the legislature and the governorship. The majority of the people of Puerto Rico chose to be freely associated with the United States on the basis of mutual consent, as expressed in the Spanish name "Estado Libre Asociado" in the form of a "commonwealth". Public Law 600 of 1950 was enacted in the United States Congress to provide for the organization of a constitutional government by the people of Puerto Rico. The law expressly recognized the principle of government by consent and declared that it was "adopted in the nature of a compact", and had to be submitted to the voters of Puerto Rico in a referendum for acceptance or rejection. Four political parties took part in the campaign preceding the referendum. On 4 June 1951, 506,185 persons voted in the referendum, 76.5 per cent of them in favour of the new law. On 27 August 1951, delegates representing three political parties were elected to a constitutional convention. The constitution drawn up by it was approved by a referendum based on universal adult suffrage on 3 March 1952. Of the 783,610 qualified voters, 456,471 participated; of these 373,594 or 81.84 per cent voted for the adoption of the constitution and 82,877 or 18.16 per cent against it. By Public Law 447, the United States Congress approved the constitution subject to certain conditions which were subsequently approved by the Puerto Rican Constitutional Convention. On 25 July 1952, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico was proclaimed.<sup>42/</sup>

52. At the request of the General Assembly, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories examined the information in the light of the basic principles of Chapter XI of the Charter. The Committee took note, within "the limits of its terms of reference and without anticipating the disposal of this question by the General Assembly", that the information before it indicated that the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico might be considered as falling outside the scope of Article 73 e. At the eighth session of the General Assembly, when the Fourth Committee examined the information, discussion and inquiry turned particularly on the questions as to whether the people of Puerto Rico had fully exercised the right of self-determination; whether Puerto Rico had indeed achieved a full measure of self-government; the degree to which Puerto Rico was free to determine its own economic and social policies; and whether Puerto Rico was free to change its political and economic relationships with the United States. Further information on each of these points was provided by the representative of the United States. The Fourth Committee recommended to the General Assembly that it should consider it appropriate that the transmission of information on Puerto Rico should cease. When the General Assembly took up the question, an assurance was given on behalf of the President of the United States that "if, at any time, the Legislative Assembly of Puerto Rico adopts a resolution in favour of more complete or even absolute independence, he will immediately thereafter recommend to Congress that such independence be granted."<sup>43/</sup> The resolution adopted by the General Assembly<sup>44/</sup> on 27 November 1953 recognized that the people of Puerto Rico, by expressing their will in a free and democratic way, had achieved a new constitutional status and that they had effectively exercised their right to self-determination; they had been invested with attributes of political sovereignty which clearly identified their status of self-government as that of an autonomous political entity, and in these circumstances the provisions of Chapter XI could no longer be applied to the Commonwealth and the transmission of information should cease. Finally, the Assembly expressed its assurance that due regard would be paid to the will of both the Puerto Rican and American people in the conduct of their relations under the new statute and also in the eventuality that either of the parties to the mutually agreed association might desire any change in the terms of this association.

53. The procedures adopted relating to the cessation of information on Greenland followed the same general lines.<sup>45/</sup> By a communication dated 3 September 1953, the Government of Denmark informed the Secretary-General that, as a result of constitutional amendments adopted on 5 June 1953, Greenland had become an integral part of the Danish realm with a constitutional status equal to that of other parts of the Danish realm. In consequence, the Danish Government regarded its responsibilities under Chapter XI of the Charter as terminated and had therefore decided to cease the transmission of information under Article 73 e. In conformity with the wishes of the General Assembly,<sup>46/</sup> the Government of Denmark also communicated to the Secretary-General extracts from the Constitution and from the minutes of the Greenland Council and an explanatory memorandum giving a review of the political progress of Greenland which had led to its full integration in the Danish realm.

54. It was explained that from the time of its discovery in the tenth century, Greenland had always been connected with the Nordic realms. It had later come under the Danish-Norwegian Crown and remained with Denmark when the two countries separated in 1814. Although Greenland, for cultural and economic reasons, had been excluded from the Danish Constitution adopted in 1849, local government had been instituted in 1850 and had been progressively widened. The policy of Denmark in regard to Greenland, established early in the eighteenth century, was that Greenlanders should enjoy the same fundamental rights as all other peoples. Illiteracy had been practically eliminated in the 1850's and after 1920 more rapid changes took place. In part, the changes were brought about as a result of a change in climate which, after 1920, became warmer. Seal became scarcer and fishing gradually replaced seal hunting, resulting in the introduction of a monetary economy. The experience gained by Greenlanders, in the participation in local government and the changes in their economic life led to further changes in the relationship between Denmark and Greenland. In 1925, under the Administration of Greenland Act, self-government was established for West Greenland through a system of municipal, district and national councils. In other parts of Greenland, participation in the administration of their own affairs was provided through the Hunters' Council in the Thule district and through the establishment in 1946 of colonial councils in East Greenland.

55. By 1950, the objective of the Danish Government's policy was no longer to protect the Greenlanders but to lead them into the Danish Community as equal citizens. Accordingly a number of economic, social and administrative reforms were proposed by the Greenland Commission. On the basis of these proposals further changes were made in West Greenland to bring the local government more in line with the rest of Denmark. In 1951, the Greenland Council emphasized its desire for direct representation in the Danish Parliament. A Constitutional Commission was set up to prepare a draft for a new Constitution, and this was discussed in February-March 1952 in the Greenland Committee of the Parliament in which members appointed by the Greenland National Council took part. In accordance with the wishes expressed by the Greenland delegates, the new Constitution applied equally to all parts of the realm of Denmark, including Greenland, the population of which would be represented in Parliament on equal terms with the population in the rest of Denmark. In September 1952, the Greenland National Council unanimously approved the draft of a new clause in the Constitution, which was subsequently adopted by the legislature and approved by the Danish people in a referendum. The new Constitution entered into force on 5 June 1953.

56. When the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories examined this information, references were made to a number of the factors which had been adopted by the General Assembly. Among the points raised were the extent to which the Danish Government had taken into account the list of factors in deciding to cease transmitting information on Greenland; whether the people of North and Eastern Greenland were equally represented in the Danish Parliament; whether under the new Constitution the Greenland Council had full powers over legislation affecting Greenland; whether there had been freedom of choice and whether a referendum had been held to ascertain the wishes of the people of Greenland to be incorporated in the Danish realm; and whether the Danish Constitution provided for secession. The Committee was informed that the new constitution had come into effect before the list of factors had been adopted by the General Assembly, but that the people of Greenland had freely expressed their wishes and wanted to be incorporated in the Danish realm. No referendum had been held as the elected representatives of the people had been unanimously in favour of integration. Two members of the Greenland Council assured the Committee that the new status of their country was fully in accord with the freely expressed wishes of the people of Greenland. As in the case of Puerto Rico the Committee rendered its views in a resolution by which it expressed the opinion, within the limits of its terms of reference and without anticipating the final disposal of this question by the General Assembly, that the information before it indicated that Greenland might be considered as falling outside the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter and that consequently it was no longer necessary or appropriate to transmit the information under Article 73 e. The General Assembly, in a resolution adopted to the same effect on 22 November 1954,<sup>47/</sup> expressed the opinion that the people of Greenland had, through their duly elected representatives, freely exercised their right of self-determination and that Greenland had freely decided on its integration within the Kingdom of Denmark on an equal constitutional and administrative basis with the other parts of Denmark. The Assembly noted with satisfaction the achievement of self-government by the people of Greenland.

57. The processes by which the General Assembly, in effect, similarly satisfied itself that the peoples of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam had attained a full measure of self-government were for various reasons more protracted; the status of the Territories in fact underwent further evolution after the Netherlands Government notified the United Nations in 1951 of the termination of transmission of information on them, and the General Assembly did not take final action until 1955. In making the notification in 1951 the Government transmitted the constitutional and other legal texts concerned and supplemented them with oral explanations, including those provided by special representatives from the Territories.

58. It was explained<sup>48/</sup> that following a promise of self-government to the overseas Territories made by the Queen of the Netherlands in 1942, in 1946 the Legislative Councils of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam sent a joint mission to seek its fulfilment. As a first step, universal suffrage was introduced for men and women in elections to the Legislative Councils. In 1948, the constitution of the Netherlands was revised to open the way for the establishment of a new relationship between the different parts making up the Kingdom, in which each territory would manage its own affairs and look after their common interests jointly, on an equal footing. As the relationship between the two Territories and the Netherlands could not be finalized until agreement had been reached between the Netherlands and Indonesia, Interim Orders of Government were enacted in 1950 giving the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam control over their internal affairs. Under these orders, there was established in each Territory a central Government consisting of a Governing Council and an appointed Governor. The Governing Council was responsible to parliamentary bodies (Staten) elected by universal adult franchise. The Staten were responsible for the internal affairs of their own Territory; affairs not regarded as domestic or internal affairs but as matters of common interest were enumerated in the Interim Orders. The two Territories were each represented in the Netherlands by a General Representative appointed by their responsible Governments. These representatives took part in an advisory capacity in deliberations affecting their Territories.

59. The General Assembly's Special Committee, to which the information had been referred, was further informed that although the Territories had not as yet an equal footing with the Netherlands, the settlement of the Indonesian question had opened the way to a conference to be held in the Hague in March 1952 between the two Territories and the Netherlands. This conference would decide on the procedure for the co-operation between all parts of the Kingdom on an equal footing relating to common affairs. The people of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, however, considered that they were now responsible for the economic, social and educational conditions in their own Territories and had decided that no further information should be transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. The discussions in the Committee centred on whether the Territories had attained a full measure of self-government. In particular, it was questioned whether self-government in economic, social and educational matters constituted full self-government in the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter. It was also pointed out that all parties had agreed that the final relationship between the two Territories and the Netherlands was still subject to negotiation and possible change. As General Assembly action on the list of factors was still pending and more particularly as the final status of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam were still subject to negotiations at the conference due to take place in 1952, the Committee adopted a resolution taking note of the communications of the Government of the Netherlands and transmitting the information, together with its report and the records of its discussions, to the General Assembly for any necessary action. When at the end of 1951 the question was brought before the General Assembly, a review of the political development of the two Territories was given by the representative of the Netherlands and by the general representative of the Netherlands Antilles in the Netherlands. It was again affirmed that the main problem to be solved at the conference to take place in 1952 was to work out a basis for the co-operation of the partners on an equal footing in matters of common interest to the Kingdom. The General Assembly, expressing appreciation for the full information supplied to it, decided to refer the matter to the Ad Hoc Committee which it had established to study further the question of factors indicating self-government, and to take it up again at the following session in the light of any report prepared by the Ad Hoc Committee on factors and taking into account whatever new arrangements as to common affairs might be developed at the 1952 conference between the Netherlands, the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam.<sup>49/</sup>

60. Delays which occurred both in the completion of the negotiations begun at the Hague in 1952 and in the completion of the study of factors contributed, however, to further postponements of a final decision. At the seventh session which followed, the General Assembly decided<sup>50/</sup> only that its second ad hoc Committee on factors should examine the documents on the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam in the light of the factors which the Assembly had provisionally approved at the same session. When this Committee met in 1953 it considered also a statement by the Netherlands Government that it had based its decision to discontinue the transmission of information on the fact that under Article 73 e this was to be subject to such limitations as security or constitutional considerations might require, and that as a result of the enactment of the Interim Orders of Government there were constitutional objections to continuing the transmission of information from 1951 onwards. Wide differences of opinion prevailed in the Committee, principally between administering and non-administering members, and the matter was referred to the General Assembly without recommendation. At its eighth session late in 1953 the Assembly, which had been informed that the negotiations between representatives of the Netherlands and the Territories, adjourned in 1952, would shortly be resumed, adopted a further resolution<sup>51/</sup> in which it noted with satisfaction the progress made by the Territories towards self-government; but it considered that the new status of the Territories could be rightly appraised only after the negotiations had led to a final result, which it was confident would represent a full measure of self-government. The Assembly also requested the Netherlands Government to resume the transmission of information "until such time as the General Assembly takes a decision that the transmission of information in regard to these Territories should be discontinued."

61. The conference was eventually resumed in the spring of 1954 and negotiations finally led to full agreement on a new charter for the Kingdom of the Netherlands. On 30 March 1955, the Netherlands Government transmitted to the Secretary-General a communication in which it described the constitutional developments leading to the promulgation on 29 December 1954 of a Charter for the Kingdom of the Netherlands comprising the Netherlands, Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, and enclosed a copy of the Charter together with an explanatory memorandum. As a result of the changes brought about in the constitutional position and in the status of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, the Netherlands Government regarded its responsibilities according to Chapter XI of the Charter in respect of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles as having terminated. As provided for in advance by the General Assembly,<sup>52/</sup> the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories examined the information from the Netherlands Government. Representatives of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, who were included in the Netherlands delegation, explained that the Charter was based on the principles that the Netherlands, Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles had freely expressed their will to accept a new constitutional order in the Kingdom of the Netherlands which comprised the three countries; that each of the three countries exercised autonomy in internal affairs; that decisions on Kingdom affairs had to be taken jointly by the three countries on a basis of equality; and that the three countries accorded each other aid and assistance. Except in such matters as defence, foreign affairs and nationality, which were the prerogatives of the Kingdom, the three countries had exclusive authority to take final decisions. Moreover, each country could draw up and amend its own constitution. The Queen was the head of the Kingdom as well as the head of each of the countries, and the Kingdom and each of the countries had a parliamentary system of government. Statutes for the Kingdom were enacted by the Netherlands Parliament which for this special function acted as Parliament of the Kingdom. However, the Parliaments of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, by various means, could influence in varying degrees the decisions of the Netherlands Parliament. As in the previous cases of cessation of information, members of the Committee were concerned particularly to establish whether the opinion of the populations of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam had been freely expressed; whether the populations were free to modify their present status; the extent to which the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam were fully self-governing; and whether they were in fact on an equal footing with the Netherlands. It was explained that the freely elected Parliaments in the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam had unanimously accepted the Charter of the Kingdom of the Netherlands; that the Territories had the right to introduce a bill to amend the Charter or modify the status of the countries; that each of the three Territories was fully self-governing, only matters of international relations and defence being affairs of the Kingdom as a whole; and that owing to the small size of the populations of the two Territories, their representation in the Parliament of the Kingdom had been based not on population but on a provision that they should have two-fifths of the votes.

62. The Committee expressed to the General Assembly the opinion that the transmission of information in respect of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam was no longer necessary or appropriate. At the tenth session of the Assembly, the Prime Ministers and the Presidents of the Parliaments of both Territories participated in the discussions as members of the Netherlands delegation, and gave further assurances that the people of the Territories had freely chosen the new status, which was not one of full sovereignty and independence but one of complete autonomy and equality. Finally, therefore, the General Assembly expressed the opinion that, on the basis of the information before it and as desired by the Government of the Netherlands, cessation of the transmission of information under 73 e of the Charter in respect of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam was appropriate.

63. In the course of this period during which the General Assembly had applied itself, on the one hand, to the study of the factors to be taken as indicative of the attainment by Territories of a full measure of self-government and had had occasion to give detailed attention, on the other hand, to four actual cases which presented controversial aspects because the new status of the Territories concerned fell short of independence, the Assembly felt it desirable that the experience should be used to perfect the methods and procedures to be followed. In a resolution adopted in 1954<sup>53/</sup> it expressed the opinion that communications received from the Members concerned relating to the cessation of the transmission of information should be examined with particular emphasis on the manner in which the right of self-determination had been attained and freely exercised. It considered, moreover, that in order to evaluate as fully as possible the opinion of the population of the Territory concerned as to the status or change in status which they desired, a mission should, if the Assembly deemed it desirable and in agreement with the Administering Member, visit the Territory before or during the time when the population was called upon to make the relevant decision. For this purpose it considered that its Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories might study the means by which it could, at the appropriate time, draw the attention of the Assembly to the forthcoming changes in the status of the Territory concerned. By the end of the period covered by this report, however, the further study of the matter both in the Committee and in the General Assembly had, because of its controversial character, led only to the adoption of a further resolution<sup>54/</sup> by which the Assembly decided that, notwithstanding the request which it had made to the Committee in 1950 to examine communications relating to the cessation of the transmission of information and to report on them to the Assembly, these communications should be referred directly to the Assembly. The latter should examine each case with particular emphasis on the manner in which the right of self-determination had been attained and freely exercised; according to the circumstances, the Assembly should adopt such conclusions as it deemed fit, or refer points for study to the Committee, or "take other measures to reach conclusions in the interests of the inhabitants of the Territory concerned."

64. In the three years following the approval by the General Assembly of the cessation of information on the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, five other former Non-Self-Governing Territories attained full self-government in circumstances which did not lead the General Assembly to examine their cases in the context of Chapter XI; each of them attained independence and was admitted shortly afterwards to membership of the United Nations, in itself an act of recognition of the sovereignty of the State concerned. These former Territories were Morocco (admitted on 12 November 1956);<sup>55/</sup> Tunisia (12 November 1956);<sup>56/</sup> Ghana, formerly the Gold Coast and the Trust Territory of Togoland under United Kingdom administration (8 March 1957);<sup>57/</sup> the Federation of Malaya (17 September 1957);<sup>58/</sup> and Guinea, formerly a territory of French West Africa (12 December 1958).<sup>59/</sup>

65. In 1959 six additional Territories, with a total population estimated at nearly 30 million, were notified by the Members responsible for them as having undergone changes in status which took them beyond the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter. Five of these were reported to have attained internal autonomy and the sixth to have attained statehood within the federal system of the Member State concerned. On 23 March the French Government, reaffirming the position which it had always taken that it was for the Administering State alone to determine which were the Territories whose peoples had not yet attained a full measure of self-government under the terms of the Charter, informed<sup>60/</sup> the Secretary-General that it had decided as from 1957 to cease transmitting information on its remaining Territories in Africa and adjacent waters: French West Africa, French Equatorial Africa, Madagascar, the Comoro Archipelago and French Somaliland. The Government stated that under the French law of 23 June 1956 and the decrees issued in application thereof - the texts of all of which were also transmitted - a series of reforms had been instituted which had had the effect of granting these Territories internal autonomy. This autonomy and the liberal trend of the evolutionary process marked by the enactment of the law of 23 June 1956 (known as the loi-cadre) had been strengthened in 1958 by the establishment of the Community; the texts of the Constitution of 1958 establishing the Community and of the organic laws relating to it were also forwarded. The New Hebrides, the remaining French Territory on which information had been transmitted under Article 73 e, had been excluded from the decision because of its special circumstances as a condominium (in which the United Kingdom shares responsibility with France).

66. On 2 June the Government of the United States of America informed<sup>61/</sup> the Secretary-General that the former Territory of Alaska had become one of the United States under a constitution taking effect on 3 January 1959. In the light of this change in the constitutional position and status of Alaska, the United States Government considered it no longer necessary or appropriate to continue to transmit information under Article 73 e after the period ending on 3 January. In compliance with the terms of resolution 222 (III) of the General Assembly the Government transmitted a memorandum reviewing the constitutional development of Alaska and the texts of the legislative, executive and constitutional instruments concerned.

67. The Secretary-General communicated the documentation transmitted to him on these cases to the fourteenth session of the General Assembly. It is to be noted that by mid-1959 no entirely new Territories had been added to the list since it was first established in 1956: apart from the cases in which the transmission of information was brought to an end, the only changes had been a few relating to the nomenclature of the Territories to administrative adjustments, and, in one case, to the transfer of sovereignty from one Administering Member to another.<sup>62/</sup>

Inquiries addressed by the Secretary-General, following the procedure established in 1946, to the Governments of States admitted to the United Nations after 14 December 1955 elicited in each case the reply that the Member concerned did not administer territories in the category to which Chapter XI of the Charter applied. This situation gave rise in the General Assembly at its eleventh, twelfth and thirteenth sessions to debates centred particularly on the contention of a number of Members that certain overseas areas under the sovereignty of Portugal and Spain, although stated by the Members concerned constitutionally to comprise integral parts of those States, had the attributes of Non-Self-Governing Territories and should have been enumerated as such. These debates had not led by the middle of 1959 to any additions to the list of Territories. At the eleventh session a draft resolution was adopted by the Fourth Committee by which the General Assembly would have decided to set up an ad hoc committee to study the application of the provisions of Chapter XI in the case of Members newly admitted to the United Nations; it was rejected by the Assembly, however, when it failed to secure a two-thirds majority vote. During the twelfth and thirteenth sessions draft resolutions were adopted by the Fourth Committee taking a more general approach to the problem and calling for a study of the question of the transmission of information under Article 73 e in the light of the views of all the Members of the United Nations. Neither of these was adopted by the General Assembly: the first, at the twelfth session, failed for lack of a two-thirds majority, and in the case of the second, at the thirteen session, the Assembly decided not to act upon it.

The Non-Self-Governing Territories in 1946 and 1959

68. The following table sets out in summary form the geographical and human scope of the application of the provisions of the Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories. It lists the Territories originally enumerated, placing them in groups according to geographical regions, gives approximate population figures for 1946, and indicates the status of each Territory or former Territory in 1959 in terms of Chapter XI of the Charter.

III. PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICAL MEASURES ADOPTED BY THE ADMINISTERING MEMBERS TO PROMOTE PROGRESS IN THE NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

General

9. Chapter XI of the Charter may be regarded in itself as a common statement of the policies and principles which the Members of the United Nations responsible for Non-Self-Governing Territories are pledged to apply in the administration of the Territories. They undertake to ensure the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the peoples concerned, their just treatment and their protection against abuses; to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions; and to promote constructive measures of development.

10. These, however, are statements in very broad terms of the objectives to be pursued and the means to be adopted. They do not, as the preceding chapter of the report has indicated, define what is meant by self-government. Nor do they set standards for the level and pace of political, economic, social and educational advancement. While efforts at definition and precision are to be found explicitly or implicitly in some of the resolutions of the General Assembly already referred to and in others which have been adopted from time to time in the form of recommendations or expressions of opinion as to the essential requirements of economic, social and educational progress,<sup>63/</sup> the provisions of Chapter XI have in practice left scope for diversity in methods of administration in the goals sought or actually attained. This diversity has been in part posed by variations in the particular circumstances of the Territories, including in more highly-developed Territories the particular aspirations of the peoples concerned; and to some extent also it has reflected differences in the general policies and the constitutional structures of the Administering Members, since different conceptions of the most desirable ultimate political status of the Territories have produced differences in emphasis and organization, if not in policy, in the economic, social and educational fields as well as in that of political development.

71. Political dependence is by definition the common characteristic of all the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In the extent of this dependence there is, as far as the information made available by the Administering Members allows it to be examined, a great deal of diversity: the political and administrative systems range from a large measure of direct control by representatives of the metropolitan governments to a very large measure of territorial autonomy and of popular participation in the making and carrying out of territorial policies. These variations, however, clearly do not represent a static situation; whatever may be the final status intended or desired, progressive steps leading to a large devolution of powers to the inhabitants through their own political institutions and civil services or those of countries with which the Territories are associated are the common policy of all the Administering Members. The differences in the stages reached by the various Territories in this preparatory phase of their development appear now in all cases to reflect differences not in basic policy but in the pace and methods of its implementation, and these in turn are influenced by such matters, varying in effect between one Territory or group of Territories and another, as the duration and intensity of contact with the outside world and of organization for development in all fields, the nature of the human and material resources available, and the assessment of the capacity of the peoples concerned to take each new step towards self-reliance.

72. There is indeed great physical variation between the Territories, even though they possess, with a few exceptions, some important common traits which provide a broad framework of similarity. For the most part they lie in the tropical zones of the world. The overwhelming majority of the people of all but a few of the Territories consists of indigenous extended families, clans or tribes, still largely accustomed to lives circumscribed by the boundaries of the village or the tribe and to economies dominated by an often difficult struggle to draw from the land and the sea their minimum needs in food, shelter and clothing. Even at the beginning of the period under review most of the Territories had been by-passed by the main currents of technological progress, capital investment and industrialization, except to the extent that these served primarily the interests of non-indigenous enterprise.

73. An official description to which attention was drawn in the early years of United Nations activities in this field made the point that in the United Kingdom Territories - which were and remain the most numerous and most widely scattered - little more than fifty years had passed since the United Kingdom had become responsible for "extensive areas in the tropics and sub-tropics, areas which were largely jungle, scrub, swamp or desert, largely unexplored, and inhabited by peoples whose main problems was to survive their environment."

"The first tasks were the rudimentary ones of establishing an administration, imposing order and the rule of law, and opening out the country by roads and railways. It was necessary to try and telescope within a few generations progress which for the European peoples had meant a thousand years or more of painful effort - and this in peculiarly difficult natural conditions. While Britain was discharging this task the First World War occurred, followed by the far-reaching disastrous economic depression. By the time of the third disaster of the Second World War, the Territories had barely climbed out of the slump. A legacy of distress and social and economic need required urgent attention." 64/

The French authorities, whose experience in general had been similar, laid stress on another element of equally wide-spread applications:

"In nearly all territories France found herself from the beginning at grips with a health problem of extreme gravity. The Native populations were suffering from endemic diseases the spread of which was favoured by the complete absence of preventive and curative medicine. A large number of the people were merely existing. Territories were becoming depopulated." 65/

74. These broad similarities of circumstance and historical background, however, should not be allowed to conceal the diversity to be found among the Non-Self-Governing Territories - a diversity which existed to a still more marked degree in 1946 when they included the Territories which have since attained a full measure of self-government. Even within the three main geographical zones within which most of the Territories lie - Africa, the Caribbean and the

Asia-Pacific area - there were and remain important differences in the ethnic composition of the peoples, in their religions, customs and traditions, in their levels of social and political organization before and during the colonial era, and in the value and state of development of the natural resources of their Territories. Thus, on the one hand, North Africa and South-East Asia originally contained Territories whose populations had a large degree of homogeneity and possessed highly developed cultures and ancient traditions of economic productivity, commerce and self-government and whose aspirations for independence, stimulated by the direct and often revolutionary impact of the Second World War, led them to full sovereignty during the early part of the period under review. Most of the remaining African territories and some of those in the Asia-Pacific area, by contrast, were still at the threshold of modern economic development, education and territorial consciousness. The Caribbean Territories fell into a different category again: many of them were almost entirely islands of early colonization, their populations consisting mainly of the descendants of early European colonists and of the slaves brought from Africa, now at an advanced stage of integration and ahead of the African Territories in some aspects of development. Other Territories such as Alaska and Greenland were of a unique kind. Most of the Territories were largely dependent on agriculture, for which they were unevenly endowed with fertility and rainfall; moreover the greater part of the productive effort was devoted to simple subsistence, and the access of the indigenous people to higher standards of living in a situation of wide-spread poverty depended mainly on the export of cash crops usually produced in the forests or on small individual holdings of land. Non-indigenous minorities were present in all the Territories: in most cases they were small in number, consisting, apart from the officials of the metropolitan governments, of people engaged in commerce, mining and other private enterprise and mission work; but almost everywhere they occupied an economic, social and political level considerably higher than that of the indigenous populations, and in some of the Territories where their numbers were increased by agricultural settlers, mining company staffs and urban artisans and shopkeepers their special and often compartmentalized position in the life and affairs of the Territories was supported by legislation as well as by established practice.

75. The manner in which the Administering Members have applied human and material resources, including those provided under development plans subsidized by the metropolitan countries, to this diversity of conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in order to foster the economic, social and educational advancement of their peoples constitutes in effect the subject matter of the second main part of the present report. For an over-all survey of policies and practical measures in each of these three main fields, reference may be made especially to the general reviews of economic,<sup>66/</sup> social<sup>67/</sup> and educational<sup>68/</sup> conditions. No attempt need be made at this point to describe those policies and measures, except to note their relevance and importance to the attainment by the peoples of the Territories of a full measure of self-government. They indicate, for example, the extent to which the agricultural potential of a given Territory can be and in many cases has been developed in a way which leads to a higher standard of living for the individual farmer and also to the growth of the economy in other ways by creating scope for new economic activities; the consequences of this kind of development in terms both of expanding public revenues and of expanding demand for improved and more complex economic and social services; the opening up of new means of livelihood for the population, especially in the skilled trades, the professions and the government services; and the resulting demand for and provision of wider access to general education and greater facilities for specialized training and higher learning.

76. It is universally recognized that such dynamic processes as these, which are indeed usually accompanied by a progressive transfer of responsibility on both the technical and the political planes to qualified persons and chosen representatives of the population, are an inherent part of the development of self-government. They have in fact been frequently described as prerequisites of self-government, although without precise definition of the standards to be attained. It may be observed that the experience of Territories passing to a full measure of self-government, including those which have become independent

States, offers no clear guide to the approximate levels of economic, social and educational advancement which need to be secured before the people can be recognize as ready to stand by themselves. The information transmitted on these Territories indicates that they made the transition under widely varying circumstances: in general, however, the levels of their economic and social conditions tended to be low when judged by the standards of the more highly developed countries, this was evident from the data available for the years immediately preceding self-government in regard to such indices as national income, public revenue and expenditure, development reserves, the output from secondary, vocational and higher learning institutions and the staffing of the public services. Nevertheless it could be observed in every case that a basic infrastructure of essential services had been laid down and that a certain momentum of development was under way, and that these factors supported to an important even though undefinable degree those other elements - some of the most important of which are beyond the scope of this report<sup>69/</sup> - which helped to bring the peoples concerned to full self-government. In the Territories which remain non-self-governing, the establishment of the same kinds of essential infrastructure and of the dynamics of development, without an attempt to define precisely the standards which must be met before self-government can be attained, but with a desire to achieve the greatest possible degree of social and economic stability in conditions of respect for law and order, may be said to be the general purpose of present economic, social and educational policies.

77. The organization and implementation of programmes in these fields takes place within the broad framework of the general policies by which the Administering Members envisage the discharge of their responsibility to develop self-government in the Territories. Between these general policies there may be found, as mentioned earlier, some differences reflecting particular characteristics of national policies and constitutional systems; and within each policy there may be found variations resulting from the particular circumstances of given Territories. In terms of the numbers of Territories affected, two main approaches are apparent. The first envisages the eventual attainment of independence as the general rule, and full internal self-government as the exception in cases where the small size or particular situation of a Territory and the aspirations of its people require it. The second approach has been expressed in the development of constitutional systems which, without precluding independence, have encouraged the establishment of organic links between the metropolitan and overseas countries and provided for a sharing rather than a transfer of the ultimate attributes of sovereignty. Both of these approaches are governed in part by the principle of freedom of choice on the part of the populations concerned; the constitutional systems providing for organic associations between the metropolitan and overseas peoples have been devised through consultation in various ways with the latter, and the most important such system now in effect embodies a procedure for the attainment of independence.

78. Statements of general policy and explanations of changes in status which have been made in the context of Chapter XI, and which are set forth in the following section, indicate that the Territories administered by the United Kingdom and France respectively constitute the largest groups to which these two main lines of policy have applied. Among other Administering States which have explained their general policies, the Netherlands has also provided an example of an endeavour to evolve, in consultation with the peoples concerned, a special form of association between the metropolitan and former non-self-governing Territories: the manner in which this came to fruition after the independence of Indonesia in the Charter of 1954 for the Kingdom of the Netherlands comprising the Netherlands, Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles has been described in the preceding chapter. United States policy has provided, on a pragmatic basis, for a variety of avenues of self-determination, not precluding independence but represented thus far by the self-governing status of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and the development of Alaska and Hawaii to statehood within the Union. The policies of these and the other members concerned are given in greater detail below.

Statements of general policy

79. The United Kingdom has adhered to the policy by which a number of its former overseas possessions had attained independence before the Charter came into effect: namely, to assist the Territories and their peoples to achieve "responsible self-government within the Commonwealth" - a status and a form of association which have in practice usually amounted to the grant of full national independence where that accords with the wishes of the peoples concerned. In the period under review the former Non-Self-Governing Territories of the Gold Coast (with which Togoland under British administration was united to form Ghana) and the Federation of Malaya have achieved that transition. United Kingdom policy also provides, however, for the attainment of internal self-government as a full measure of self-government if the circumstances of a Territory and the wishes of its people so determine: of this status the only relevant example which has been given among Non-Self-Governing Territories under Chapter XI of the Charter was the small island of Malta, which was reported by the United Kingdom Government to have been granted that status in 1947.

80. An explanation of United Kingdom policy given to the General Assembly in 1952<sup>70/</sup> recalled that during the previous few years successive British Governments had stated and restated that "the central purpose of British colonial policy was to guide colonial territories to responsible self-government, probably within the Commonwealth, in conditions that ensured to the people an orderly social system, the highest possible standard of living and sufficient protection from aggression from any quarter. To that end, the United Kingdom was seeking to build up in each territory the institutions which its circumstances required, and to pursue the economic and social development of the territories as well as their political development."

These principles were reiterated in the same forum in 1958,<sup>71/</sup> when it was declared that United Kingdom policy for the Non-Self-Governing Territories

"aims at the steady and smooth advance of these Territories and their people to nationhood. It aims at helping the people to prepare themselves by education, by experience, by the assumption of responsibility for the great tasks and responsibilities which lie ahead of them."

81. In the 1952 statement it was suggested that the eventual grant of self-government depended, unless chaos were to be the result, on the establishment of a government "capable of preserving a sufficient degree of law and order and economic and social stability." In this association of economic and social development with political advancement, the growth of democratic institutions in the United Kingdom Territories generally followed a common pattern. First, a central legislative body formed of officials only was established. Then a number of prominent local personalities representing all sections of the community were appointed as non-official members and thus gained valuable experience in legislative and administrative matters. The next stage was to give the non-official members a majority in the body concerned and to proceed from a situation in which most of them were appointed to one in which the majority was elected. As a final stage the whole council or assembly was elected on the basis of the broadest suffrage possible and a ministerial system introduced whereby the elected members were placed in charge of departments of government and were answerable to the assembly. That was the prelude to complete self-government.

82. By 1952, it was stated, there were very few United Kingdom Territories which did not possess their own representative institutions in the form of a legislative council or a house of assembly, and there were unofficial majorities in those of twenty-five of the Territories, approximately two-thirds of the total. It was considered not necessary to introduce exactly the same system of parliamentary government in every Territory; in some regions, the interests of the people could best be served by a federal system or some other modification of the general pattern.

83. A further element of United Kingdom policy relates to the part to be played in public affairs by non-indigenous persons who have made their homes in the Territories, especially those in which some degree of settlement has taken place. The Government's approach was described in the 1952 statement as follows:

"In many colonies, comparatively little settlement had taken place, and the metropolitan country was represented only by its administrative and technical services and the commercial firms which were contributing to the development of the country. According to the British philosophy, the 'inhabitants' of a territory were all those people who had made their homes in the country and had given it their loyalty and affection. Their future and the future of their children was bound up with the prosperity and well-being of the country in which they had made their homes. Where some degree of settlement had taken place, the future of a territory depended on the promotion of a real partnership between all the races constituting the population of that territory. The problem of the multi-racial community was, however, a world-wide problem, and the United Nations itself represented an attempt to solve that problem. Different countries in different continents were also grappling with individual problems posed by the coexistence of different races and religions. In some cases, the problem had already been solved and in others it was on the road to solution; elsewhere again, the prospects were less hopeful. The United Kingdom, for its part, was applying what it called the system of partnership, which it believed would enable it to find a solution of the problem of the multi-racial community that would be in keeping with British ideals and traditions."

84. The general policy of France in its Non-Self-Governing Territories has usually been explained, as far as the context of Chapter XI is concerned, by reference to the basic constitutional and legislative texts under which the Territories have been administered. These begin with the Constitution of 1946, the relevant parts of which were included in the information transmitted in that year,<sup>72/</sup> and end with the Constitution of 1958, communicated as part of the documentation explaining the decision of the French Government to terminate the transmission of information on all except one remaining Territory after 1956.<sup>73/</sup>

85. The constitutional and other relevant texts indicate the evolution, with an increasing degree of consultation and ultimately the consent of the peoples concerned expressed through universal suffrage, of the conception and organic structure first of a Union and then of a Community providing various forms of association between the metropolitan and overseas populations. These forms of association comprise complete or partial integration into the French Republic or membership of a Community of States linked with one another by common institutions, the common management of affairs of mutual concern and common citizenship. For independent countries outside the Community a looser association, to be established by means of agreement, is provided for.

86. Neither the French Union nor the Community have precluded independence as an alternative to other forms of self-government. As noted earlier, independence was secured by the former Territories of Indo-China, Morocco and Tunisia during the period of the 1946 Constitution in circumstances with which, in the two latter cases, the United Nations was seized outside the context of Chapter XI. It was also attained by the Republic of Guinea, according to the application of that State for membership,<sup>74/</sup> by exercising the right of self-determination incorporated in the 1958 Constitution through rejecting the latter in the referendum of 28 September 1958. Finally, the Constitution itself provides that a member State of the Community may become independent under prescribed procedures.

87. The preamble of the 1946 Constitution expressed in the following terms the intentions of France with regard to the Overseas Territories in general:

"France shall form with the peoples of her Overseas Territories a Union based upon equality of rights and privileges, without distinction as to race or religion.

"The French Union shall be composed of nations and peoples who shall place in common or co-ordinate their resources and their efforts in order to develop their respective civilizations, further their well-being and ensure their security.

"Faithful to her traditional mission, France shall guide the peoples for whom she has assumed responsibility, towards freedom to govern themselves and toward the democratic administration of their own affairs; rejecting any system of colonization based upon arbitrary power, she shall guarantee to all equal access to public office and the individual or collective exercise of the rights and liberties herein above proclaimed or confirmed."

88. The relevant provisions of the Constitution transmitted in 1946 envisaged the French Union being composed on the one hand of the French Republic, which comprised both metropolitan France and the Overseas Departments and Overseas Territories (the entities formerly known as colonies); and on the other hand of Associated Territories and Associated States. Central organs were provided for the Union, and in addition each Overseas Territory was to have an elected Assembly of its own and was also to elect representatives to the French National Assembly, where the legislative power lay, and to the Council of the Republic. All nationals of the Overseas Territories were to have the status of citizens in the same capacity as French nationals; however, special laws were to determine the conditions under which they might exercise their rights as citizens. In addition all citizens and nationals of Territories within the French Union were to have the status of citizens of the Union.

89. Under these arrangements and the legislation implementing or elaborating them - which were accompanied by intensified economic and social development programmes - a number of the Territories immediately achieved, according to the views expressed by the French Government and as recounted earlier in the present report,<sup>75/</sup> a measure of self-government justifying the cessation of the transmission of information under Chapter XI of the Charter. These were the four Territories which assumed the status of Overseas Departments of France, four of those which had the status of Overseas Territories, and the three component parts of Indo-China, which had become Associated States.

90. The information and documentation submitted by France shows that a further series of reforms affecting the political status of the remaining French Non-Self-Governing Territories was enacted by the Act of 23 June 1956 (known as the loi-cadre) and the decrees giving effect to it. The Act, without prejudice to an expected reform of that part of the 1946 Constitution which related to the French Union, and in order to associate the overseas peoples more closely with the management of their own affairs, provided for "measures of administrative decentralization and deconcentration" in respect of the Overseas Territories. It enabled decrees to be made in order, among other things, to establish a Council of Government in each Territory and to endow each existing Territorial Assembly with enlarged deliberative powers, especially in respect of the organization and management of territorial services; to determine the functions and powers of local government bodies; to reorganize the public services; and to take further measures to raise the standards of living in the Territories, promote their economic and social development and facilitate economic and financial co-operation between them and the metropolitan country. The Act also introduced universal suffrage and instituted common electoral lists where separate lists for French citizens had previously existed.

91. The French Government has stated<sup>76/</sup> that the effect of these reforms has been to grant internal autonomy to the Territories concerned, and that this autonomy and the liberal trend of the evolutionary process have been strengthened by the establishment in 1958 of the Community. By the new Constitution,<sup>77/</sup> the French Republic "offers to the Overseas Territories which express the desire to adhere to them, new institutions based on the common ideal of liberty, equality and fraternity and conceived with a view to their democratic evolution;" and

"The Republic and the peoples of the Overseas Territories who, by an act of free determination, adopt the present Constitution, thereby institute a Community". In this Community, the member States are to enjoy autonomy, administering themselves and democratically and freely managing their own affairs. The Community as a whole has jurisdiction over foreign policy, defence, the monetary system, common economic and financial policy, the policy on strategic raw materials and in addition, except by special agreement, control of justice, higher education, and the general organization of external and common transport and of telecommunications. The President of the French Republic presides over the Community, is represented in each member State, and presides also over the Executive Council, which consists otherwise of the Prime Minister of the Republic, the head of Government of each member State, and the Ministers responsible for the common affairs of the Community. The Community possesses in addition a Senate which deliberates on common economic and financial policy upon referral by the President and examines certain acts, treaties and international agreements when they commit the Community. There is also a Court of Arbitration to rule on litigations among the member States. There is only one citizenship of the Community, and all its citizens are equal before the law.

92. In the case of the Territories covered by the present report, the Constitution provided that the Overseas Territories could either retain the status which they had under the 1946 Constitution as integral parts of the Republic, governing themselves through elected councils functioning under French law, possessing representation in the French Senate and having a representative of the Government of the Republic responsible for the national interests, administrative supervision and respect for the law; or, if they expressed within four months the desire to do so by means of decisions taken by their Territorial Assemblies, they could become either Overseas Departments of the Republic or, whether singly or in groups, member States of the Community.<sup>78/</sup> Thereafter, a change in the status of a member State may be requested either by the Republic or by means of a resolution of the legislature of the State concerned confirmed by a local referendum. The modalities of such a change would be determined by an agreement approved by the Parliament of the Republic and the legislative assembly of the State concerned.

Under the same conditions, a member State of the Community may become independent, whereupon it would cease to belong to the Community. In a chapter of the Constitution separate from that dealing with the Community, provision is made for the Republic or the Community to conclude agreements with States desirous of associating themselves with it in order to develop their civilizations.

93. Although official statements in equivalent detail, including some of recent date, with regard to the policy of Belgium in the Belgian Congo have been published, none has become available for the purposes of this report. It was stated<sup>79/</sup> in the General Assembly on behalf of the Government in 1955 that in subscribing to the Charter and in particular to Chapter XI Belgium had affirmed its willingness to administer the Congo primarily in the interest of the indigenous inhabitants, which corresponded to the policy it had always pursued. Its sovereignty over the Belgian Congo had been universally recognized, and if that sovereignty sometimes assumed different forms in the metropolitan country and in the African Territory, that was due to the fact that the inhabitants of the Congo had not yet achieved a degree of civilization permitting them to participate to the full in public life. However, the economic and social progress they were making - for Belgian policy and achievement in these matters reference should be made to the second part of this report - would call for radical changes in the political structure of the Belgian-Congolese community.

94. The general policy of the United States has been based on support for the aspirations of non-self-governing peoples to govern themselves. It has been anxious at the same time that they should obtain the kind of self-government or independence which would be genuine and lasting, with solid educational, social, economic and political foundations. The process of emancipation should be carried forward as rapidly as possible, but not so rapidly that it created a danger that the emerging nation might not be in a position to preserve its freedom. The application of these principles to the United States Territories, on which political information is voluntarily transmitted,<sup>80/</sup> has produced varying forms of constitutional development.

95. The attainment by Puerto Rico of self-government as a Commonwealth associated with the United States and the steps leading to the entry of Alaska and Hawaii into the Union as States in their own right are referred to elsewhere in this report. They were in each case formally sanctioned by the will of the populations expressed directly through universal suffrage. United States policy for the remaining Territories - American Samoa, Guam and the Virgin Islands - may be exemplified by the following extracts from a statement on the first of these, approved on 27 November 1958 by the Secretary of the Interior.<sup>81/</sup>

"The objectives of the Department of the Interior in the administration of American Samoa are (1) to provide for the orderly and progressive development of the people towards self-government; and (2) to assist the people to attain the maximum self-support...

"It is the policy to support the continuance of the Territorial government with separate legislative, executive, and judicial departments, constituting a system of checks and balances. Within this framework, the political structure of the Government shall be in accord with the desires of the Samoan people in regard to such adaptations as may be desirable by virtue of Samoan customs, traditions, and land ownership. During the period of development of self-government, the people and their resources shall be protected against undesirable exploitation.

"It is also the policy to delegate to, and encourage the acceptance of, increased authority by local Samoan officials, including the District Governors, County Chiefs, and Village Mayors. As the legislative advisory body demonstrates a continual ability to legislate effectively, increasingly greater measures of authority shall be granted to it.

"With respect to organic legislation, it is the policy to support such legislation when the Samoan people desire it and are ready for it. It is the policy to seek the views of the Samoans and consult with them as regards such legislation in order that it will contain adequate protection for the rights of the people, including their historic land rights. In the meantime, the Samoans are encouraged to take such forward steps as may be consistent with organic legislation if and when such legislation is considered desirable.

"It is the policy to respect the Samoan's desire to protect the matai system and to consult fully with the Samoans, through their legally constituted representatives, on any question which may affect the preservation or destruction of the system. It is also the policy to encourage the acceptance of such non-indigenous social concepts as would be beneficial and provide such social regulations and services as may be necessary in the light of local conditions and dictated by precepts of common humanity and governmental responsibility.

"It is the policy to maintain a free public school system for the education of American Samoans and to provide in that school system a curriculum which will (1) prepare students for life in American Samoa, and (2) establish a firm foundation for the political, economic, and social advancement of the people and thus hasten the date when more Samoans can replace state-side employees in their government and Samoa can achieve a greater degree of self-government."

96. The post-war policy of the Netherlands<sup>82/</sup> for its dependencies was announced during the Second World War while both the metropolitan country and its principal overseas territories, those of the East Indies, were under enemy occupation. In 1942 the intention was declared of calling after the war a conference covering the entire Kingdom for consultations on a future structure to be based on the principle of self-reliance and freedom of conduct in internal affairs for each part and readiness to render mutual assistance. This approach was adapted after the war to proposals and negotiations for a Netherlands Indonesian Union uniting the peoples of Indonesia, where a Republic had already been proclaimed, and those of the Netherlands, Surinam and Curaçao.<sup>83/</sup> With Indonesia an independent State, however, the movement towards a form of union became limited to the Netherlands and the two Caribbean Territories and resulted eventually, as described in Chapter II, in the attainment by the latter of autonomy within the Kingdom.

97. For the Netherlands New Guinea, the remaining Non-Self-Governing Territory administered by the Netherlands and one of the most under-developed, it has been stated that a gradual development of the Territory's potentialities, material as well as social, forms the basis of policy. With this end in view, particular attention has been given to education, exploration and planning and also to the development of village economy and industry.<sup>84/</sup> The eventual determination by the peoples themselves of their own future is also envisaged; and in this connexion a joint statement issued on 6 November 1957 by

The Government of the Netherlands and Australia relating to the New Guinea Territories as a whole (Netherlands New Guinea, the Trust Territory of New Guinea and Papua under Australian administration) serves further to describe the policies of both Administering Members:

"1. The Netherlands and Australian Governments base their policies with regard to the Territories of New Guinea, for which they are responsible, on the interests and inalienable rights of their inhabitants in conformity with the provisions and the spirit of the United Nations Charter.

"2. The Territories of Netherlands New Guinea, the Australian Trust Territory of New Guinea and Papua are geographically and ethnologically related and the future development of their respective populations must benefit from co-operation in policy and administration.

"3. The Australian and Netherlands Governments are therefore pursuing, and will continue to pursue, policies directed towards the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the peoples of their Territories in a manner which recognizes this ethnological and geographical affinity.

"4. At the same time, the two Governments will continue, and strengthen, the co-operation at present existing between their respective administrations in the Territories.

"5. In so doing the two Governments are determined to promote an uninterrupted development of this process until such time as the inhabitants of the Territories concerned will be in a position to determine their own future."

98. For Australia, this joint statement supplements declarations of general policy made separately for the Territory of Papua. The main lines were stated as follows in 1946.<sup>85/</sup>

"The cardinal points of this policy are the fullest possible development of the Territory and the social, economic and political advancement of its inhabitants, both Native and non-Native. Non-Native expansion must, however be governed by the well-being of the Territory as a whole. The basis for the economy will be the working side by side of Native and European industry, with the limit of non-Native expansion determined by the welfare of the Natives generally. The Government is determined to give the Native the opportunity to advance in his own right and not to be merely an instrument for employment by non-Native agriculturists or industrialists. It is the Government's objective, therefore, that facilities be provided for better health, better education, and for a greater sharing by the Natives in the wealth of their country and eventual participation in its Government."

85/ See Non-Self-Governing Territories: Summaries of information transmitted to Secretary-General during 1946 (U.N. Pub. Sales No.: 1947.VI.B.1), pp. 8-9.

99. Papua, like the Netherlands New Guinea, is among the least developed of Non-Self-Governing Territories; basic exploration and the extension of administrative contact and control to the hinterland have been one of the fundamental tasks of the Australian Government throughout the period under review. Information on the development of self-government is transmitted by Australia; reference may be made to the summary of conditions in Papua included elsewhere in the present report.<sup>86/</sup>

100. The policy of New Zealand towards its relatively small numbers of dependent peoples in the Cook, Niue and Tokelau Islands has, in the same way, been to accept responsibility for the economic and social welfare of the populations and for helping them to determine their future. By 1946, representative bodies existed in all three Territories, and economic, social and educational progress have led to the introduction of further constitutional changes. New Zealand also transmits information on constitutional and political matters, and an account of their development may be found elsewhere in the present report.<sup>87/</sup>

101. The manner in which Denmark brought the people of Greenland into the Danish community as equal citizens has been described in Chapter II. This was the consummation of a policy which originally, as stated in 1946, pursued "the sole object of protecting and developing the Greenland population so that in time it may attain an economic and socio-ethical standard which will enable it to live in free communication with the rest of the world." The period of protection ended in 1950; thereafter a series of economic, social and administrative reforms and a constitutional revision led the Greenland people, at their own request, into incorporation in the Danish Realm.

Participation of the inhabitants

102. In the development of self-government, the progressively increasing participation of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in all aspects of the planning and management of their affairs is axiomatic. The aspects of participation that are purely political in character are outside the scope of this report, except to the extent that they have been referred to or are implicit in the statements of general policy set forth above, and except also for the small number of Territories on which information concerning constitutional and political development has been transmitted.

103. To a very large extent, however, the rate and extent of participation by the inhabitants in public affairs, even in its political manifestations, impinges on policies, programmes and achievements in the technical fields of economic, social and educational development. Moreover it appears to be universally recognized by the Administering Members that many forms of progress in all these fields depend, after a certain stage has been reached, upon popular support and understanding being secured by associating leaders of the people with the planning of measures of development and qualified local persons with their implementation. Again, the increasing need for the extension of economic and social services which has been characteristic of all the Territories during the period under review has created a demand for trained personnel which could not, even if this were politically desirable or feasible, be met by recruitment in the metropolitan countries, and for which the only practicable source of supply is the territorial populations.

104. The studies of economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories to be found elsewhere in this report give some account of the nature and extent of participation by the inhabitants in those fields, and reference should be made to them.<sup>88/</sup> It is appropriate at this point to outline policy and practice in general terms, as far as information on them is available; on this basis it can be said that it is the policy of all the Administering Members to encourage and assist the inhabitants of the Territories to play an increasingly active and responsible part in local and territorial development, and that the implementation of this policy is an evolutionary process whose pace depends largely on the capacity of the inhabitants of a given Territory, collectively or individually, to assume the duties and responsibilities involved. The years covered by this report have seen many of the Territories and their peoples attain significant stages in that process, notably through the enlargement of representation in the legislative and executive branches of government and in economic, social and educational agencies and organizations, and through the expansion of the civil services and the filling of increasing numbers of high as well as intermediate posts with qualified local persons.

105. The common pattern of growth of democratic institutions in United Kingdom Territories outlined in the preceding section indicates the development of participation on the political level to the point where the Territory concerned possesses an elected legislature and a ministerial government responsible to it. The conception of participation extends, however, to all walks of life; it has been said<sup>89/</sup> that the United Kingdom looks at the problem of economic development, for example, principally in human terms:

"Our principal aim is to help the people of the Territories, the individual men and women and children, to raise their standards of living and broaden and enrich their lives. We aim to help them to play a steadily larger, more varied and more responsible part in all the fields of economic activity in their countries."

Education is regarded, as by the other Administering Members, as one of the essential means of developing the participation of the people in the affairs of their countries:

"Education above all is the production of leaders - not only leaders in public life, but leaders in administration, in commerce and industry, in the trade unions and co-operative movements and in voluntary service, leaders of women's movements, in fact all kinds of leaders. Without a sufficient number of leaders, the progress of any country cannot go forward as rapidly as the people would like to see it; and therefore the most vital task of all in the development of Non-Self-Governing Territories is helping the people to prepare themselves for leadership and responsibility, for the planning and execution of policy in all the different fields of human activity in those countries."

Participation and leadership are being fostered increasingly among women as well as among men, in recognition of the fact that "no country can go forward effectively and fully unless its women are playing an active part". The growth of women's clubs in Non-Self-Governing Territories, especially in Africa, has stimulated schemes of leadership training for women to equip them to organize voluntary societies, plan programmes of activities and teach a widening range of courses in improved family living, community service and civic responsibilities.

106. In the French Territories, each of the main stages in the devolution of powers to the territorial institutions which have been referred to in the preceding section has similarly represented an important step forward along the line of policy declared in the preamble to the 1946 Constitution: namely, to guide the peoples concerned "towards freedom to govern themselves and towards the democratic administration of their own affairs". In particular, the reorganization which took place under the Act of 23 June 1956 established universal suffrage as the basis of the territorial assemblies; enlarged the powers of these assemblies in internal affairs and created executive councils; and began a reform of the civil services designed among other things to give qualified local persons wider scope for participation.

107. Where information has been transmitted regularly on constitutional and political developments in individual Territories, the same process can be traced in different degrees. In the United States Territories, where the evolving forms of self-government have varied according to the circumstances and desires of the peoples concerned, participation in government has similarly varied in form and extent. It reached its most advanced stage in Puerto Rico, Alaska and Hawaii, representing in the first case the attainment of internal self-government and in the other two equal status with the other States of the Union.<sup>90/</sup> The main lines of the development of participation by the inhabitants of the other United States Territories in their administration are similarly shown by the information transmitted during the period on the structure and powers of the territorial governments. Thus up to 1952 American Samoa possessed a legislature, advisory in character, consisting of an upper house composed of twelve traditional office-holders and a lower house with fifty-four elected members, two chosen by ballot and the rest in traditional Samoan open meetings. Since that year there has been a house of representatives, with eighteen members elected by ballot, and an upper house with fifteen members selected according to custom.<sup>91/</sup> In Guam, United States

Public Law 630, enacted in 1950, provided local autonomy for a twenty-one-member unicameral legislature. Its laws are subject to review by the United States Congress, and the President of the United States may review laws passed over the Governor's veto.<sup>92/</sup> The Organic Act of the United States Virgin Islands was revised in 1954 to give a greater degree of autonomy, economic as well as political, to the inhabitants. The revised Act provided for abolition of the separate municipal executive and legislative systems, unification of the executive department, and a unicameral legislature whose power is subject to the veto of a Governor appointed by the President of the United States.<sup>93/</sup>

108. Australian policy in Papua has been described as being "directed towards the development of local government on democratic lines as the most suitable method of training the indigenous people to take a more responsible part in the government of the Territory".<sup>94/</sup> An instrument of this policy is the Native Local Government Councils Ordinance 1949-1955, which provides for the setting up of councils with power to make rules for the peace, order and welfare of the Papuan people within their jurisdiction. Information transmitted on the structure and powers of the territorial government shows also the establishment in 1951 of a Legislative Council for Papua and the Trust Territory of New Guinea, with an official majority but with elected non-indigenous and appointed indigenous members.<sup>95/</sup>

were created, the members being appointed by the Governor and the majority in each council consisting of Papuans. This policy was later modified and a beginning was made in establishing advisory councils of a more local character for smaller areas. Five such councils were established in 1955, three urban and two rural; the rural councils, with indigenous majorities, were given the task of organizing village government in their areas.<sup>96/</sup>

110. New Zealand's policy in the Cook, Niue and Tokelau Islands is exemplified by the Cook Islands Amendment Act 1957, which gave effect to a recommendation "that immediate political development should be in the direction of giving greater autonomy and responsibility to representative institutions in the Territory itself".<sup>97/</sup> Under the Cook Islands Amendment Act 1946 each of the ten main islands had been given an Island Council consisting of official and elected members. The Territory as a whole had a Legislative Council consisting of ten unofficial members, nine of whom were elected by the Island Councils, and one was the sole European representative in the Raratonga Council, and eleven official members. The Amendment Act of 1957 provided for the establishment of a twenty-six-member Legislative Assembly with twenty-two elected representatives, empowered to legislate on all matters except on certain reserved subjects such as defence and external affairs.<sup>98/</sup> In Niue Island, ordinances are passed by the Island Council, which consists of thirteen Niueans and the Resident Commissioner as president. The sections of the Cook Islands Amendment Act 1957 applicable to Niue increased the membership of the Island Council to sixteen, changed its name to the Niue Island Assembly, and gave it more control over locally raised revenue.<sup>99/</sup> Executive functions in the Tokelau Islands are carried out by appointed Tokelau officials, including magistrates and village mayors, the magistrate of each island being the chief representative of the Government. Magistrates were formerly appointed by general agreement, but since 1953 they have been elected.<sup>100/</sup>

111. The practical application of the intention to bring the Non-Self-Governing Territories to self-government necessitates the development of public services, comprising administrative and technical staffs, whose control is vested to an increasing extent in the Territories themselves and whose personnel must be recruited increasingly from among the local inhabitants. The period under review opened with a good deal of diversity in policies and practices in this respect, but at the close of the period, the principles of local control of the public services and of local recruitment of personnel had been widely applied, and in many Territories systematic programmes for the training and appointment of local persons to posts at all levels of the services had been instituted or proposed.

112. In the early post-war period it was characteristic of many Territories that although numerically the majority of all positions of public employment were occupied by local inhabitants, the senior and to a large extent the intermediate levels were staffed by expatriate officers belonging to the colonial services of the metropolitan countries. Even at that stage it was the declared policy in some Territories - for example those under United Kingdom administration - to open almost all posts to qualified local personnel. The practical effects of this policy, however, were restricted in many cases by the shortage of qualified persons and the absence of the means to produce them in significant numbers; and in some of the multi-racial Territories access to senior posts remained restricted to Europeans. Three important trends followed: (1) the development of local control of the services; (2) the institution and acceleration of "Africanization" programmes and their counterparts in other Territories; and (3) efforts in most Territories to abolish racial distinctions in the public services. In the case of the French Territories, it was the measures of administrative decentralization and reorganization made possible by legislative act in 1956 that opened the way to a significant increase in local participation in administration.

113. The studies of economic, social and educational conditions constituting the second main part of this report indicate some of the problems encountered in the provision of adequate staff for the services in those fields of activity and the measures adopted to overcome them. The studies also examine the extent and methods of local participation in economic development, social programmes and educational affairs.

IV. INTERNATIONAL COLLABORATION FOR THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

Introduction

114. The general principles of international economic and social co-operation are set forth in Article 55 of the Charter, by which the United Nations undertakes to promote higher standards of living, full employment, and conditions of economic and social progress and development; solutions of international economic, social, health and related problems; international cultural and educational co-operation; and universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion. In respect of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, Members of the United Nations also agree, under Article 74, that their policy in respect of the Territories, no less than in respect of their metropolitan areas, must be based on the general principle of good-neighbourliness, due account being taken of the interests and well-being of the rest of the world, in social, economic and commercial matters. Furthermore, Members who administer Non-Self-Governing Territories undertake in Article 73 d to promote constructive measures of development, to encourage research, and to co-operate with one another and, when and where appropriate, with specialized international bodies with a view to the practical achievement of the social, economic and scientific purposes set forth in the Article.

115. The Charter thus envisages collaboration through international organizations in particular, specialized international bodies within the scope of the United Nations, and among the Administering Members themselves. The actions taken by the United Nations and the specialized agencies to promote the economic and social advancement of Non-Self-Governing Territories represent various forms of assistance, ranging from simple fact-finding functions and the preparation of recommendations to the General Assembly and to Member Governments to the provision of material, technical and other assistance.

Scope of international collaboration

116. The Economic and Social Council and its Commissions have from an early date included the examination of conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories in their programmes of work. As a result of a series of initiatives by the Council and the General Assembly,<sup>101/</sup> the studies undertaken by these bodies, including the regional commissions, have included information on Non-Self-Governing Territories wherever appropriate. Such studies of particular relevance to the Non-Self-Governing Territories include the reports prepared for the Council on the world economic situation, the world social situation, international trade, financing of economic development, industrialization and productivity, community development and standards of living. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories has, in its reports on economic, social and educational conditions, taken account of actions by the organs of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. It has also established collaboration with the Trusteeship Council, as the work undertaken through the Trusteeship Council in relation to various Trust Territories has a bearing on its own work concerning conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

117. Also on the initiative of the General Assembly,<sup>102/</sup> those specialized agencies whose fields of competence and activity have a particular importance for the Non-Self-Governing Territories have since 1947 collaborated closely with it, especially through the Committee on Non-Self-Governing Territories, in the examination of conditions in the Territories. FAO, ILO, UNESCO, and WHO participate in the sessions of the Committee not only in an advisory capacity, but also by preparing studies and reports on topics within their respective spheres of competence and informing the Committee of services provided by them to the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

118. These latter services, and those provided by other agencies, have greatly increased in scope and usefulness during the period under review. For example, FAO provides a variety of services with general bearing on the agricultural conditions prevailing in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Such services include promoting and recommending national and international actions with respect to research, improvement of education and administration, conservation, processing, marketing, distribution of agricultural products, agricultural credit, international commodity arrangements and furnishing other technical information and assistance as may be requested by the Governments concerned. Among the FAO projects undertaken in the Non-Self-Governing Territories have been such specific studies as an inquiry into cocoa disease in the Gold Coast in 1948 and a survey of grain storage in British Honduras in 1949, and it has also arranged regional seminars, meetings and training centres on agricultural statistics, fisheries, nutrition, lumber and co-operatives, and the world census of agriculture.

119. ILO has similarly devoted an important part of its activities to labour and related problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the ILO, which have set universal standards for various aspects of labour conditions, contain special provisions relating to such conditions as forced labour, penal sanctions for breaches of contracts of employment, recruiting and long-term contracts, protection of women and children, workmen's compensation for industrial accidents and occupational diseases, working hours, minimum wage-fixing procedures, the right of association, settlement of labour disputes and labour inspection services. The Administering Governments are, in the terms of Article 35 of the ILO Constitution, under the obligation to extend to their dependent territories any labour conventions which they ratify.

120. Through its regular programmes, or under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance or in close co-operation with other specialized agencies, particularly with UNICEF and FAO, WHO provides assistance in the planning and development of health services which it has extended to all but a few of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It maintains regional offices through which the public health services and problems of the Non-Self-Governing Territories can be continuously observed. Its services include the compilation of information, the assessment and survey of particular health problems, the provision of materials, experts and other personnel, and assistance in the training of local medical and health staff, rural health programmes, the control and eradication of communicable diseases and the integration of local health services.

121. The work of UNESCO in the fields of education, natural sciences, social sciences, mass communications and exchange programmes has been extended to Non-Self-Governing Territories through active assistance and advice in matters of fundamental education, the eradication of illiteracy, teacher training, adult education, primary and secondary education, the production of instruction materials, educational research and statistics, educational administration, vocational guidance and the granting of fellowships. It has also helped in encouraging indigenous literature and art. Its International Research Office on Social Implications of Technological Change has given much attention to the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

Participation of Non-Self-Governing Territories in international organizations

122. No formal procedure has been established for the direct participation of representatives of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the General Assembly and its subsidiary organs. From time to time, however, a number of Administering Members have included in their delegations representatives from their Territories, especially on the occasions, mentioned earlier in the report, of the discussion of the cessation of the transmission of information. For its part the General Assembly has encouraged this practice and has particularly invited the appointment of indigenous representatives.<sup>103/</sup>

123. In many of the specialized agencies, a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories play a part ranging from full membership in the main organ on an equal footing with Member States to indirect participation through inclusion in the delegation of the Administering Member. Such specialized agencies performing well defined technical services as the International Telecommunications Union, Universal Postal Union, the World Meteorological Organization or International Tin Council accord full membership to Non-Self-Governing Territories or groups of Territories. Generally, full membership has carried with it the same rights and obligations accorded Member States including the right to vote and to take office, although each of the organizations admitting Non-Self-Governing Territories as full members has established its own qualifications and procedures. Some specialized agencies, while recognizing full membership to the Territories or groups of Territories, attach certain restrictions to such membership. In the

World Meteorological Organization Congress only "Members which are States" are entitled to vote on certain matters, including amendment or interpretation of the Constitution, membership, relations with the United Nations and other inter-governmental organizations, and election of principal officers.

124. Organizations making provision for the participation of Non-Self-Governing Territories as associate rather than full members include WHO, UNESCO and the regional economic commissions of the Economic and Social Council. Associate members in these organizations are accorded most of the rights enjoyed by the regular members but are usually without the right to vote in the main organ. In a number of cases associate members may vote and are eligible to take office in subsidiary bodies within such organizations. In 1952 WHO admitted Tunisia and Morocco as the first Non-Self-Governing Territories to become associate members, which were joined later by the Gold Coast, Nigeria and Sierra Leone. In 1951 the General Conference of UNESCO added to its constitution a provision for the admission as associate members of Territories or groups of Territories not responsible for the conduct of their international relations. A more limited form of participation was provided from 1946 in the case of the ILO by the inclusion of representatives of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the delegations of the Administering Members. In 1954 the Governing Body further agreed that on the recommendation of the responsible Member State, having regard to the political, economic and social development of a given non-metropolitan Territory, the latter might be invited to participate in sessions of the General Conference by means of a tripartite delegation of observers. The Gold Coast, Singapore, Jamaica, Nigeria, Trinidad and Malaya subsequently participated in this way.

International regional co-operation

125. In the principal geographical zones in which most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories lie, the regional organizations established by the United Nations, by some of the specialized agencies and by groups of independent States for economic and social development have created additional means of international collaboration with advantages for many of the Territories.

126. Of the United Nations regional economic commissions, those for Asia and the Far East and for Africa are of most direct interest to the Territories. Their work is directed to the broad objectives of raising the level of economic activity and maintaining and strengthening economic relations within the region concerned as well as with other countries and areas of the world. The Commissions are authorized to make recommendations directly to the Governments of Members and Associate Members in their respective regions, to the specialized agencies and to other inter-governmental bodies; they may also initiate and participate in measures for facilitating concerted actions, investigations and studies of economic and technological problems and developments in their respective areas. The Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East established in 1947 has made available, to countries and territories and to regional and sub-regional groupings, a body of competent technical services and advice to assist the study of economic problems, and direct assistance in such fields as flood control, industrial and mineral resources, trade and finance. The newly established Economic Commission for Africa (1958) has embarked on its first programmes.

127. Membership in each Commission, as is also the case with that for Latin America, is open to United Nations Member States with economic interests in the particular area. Upon application by the Member responsible for its international relations, any Non-Self-Governing Territory or group of Territories may become an associate member. At the end of 1958, Hong Kong, Singapore and British Borneo (i.e., North Borneo, Brunei and Sarawak) were associate members of the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East; and the Federation of Nigeria, Gambia, Kenya, Zanzibar, Sierra Leone, Somaliland Protectorate and Uganda were associate members of the Economic Commission for Africa. Representatives of associate members may participate without vote in all meetings of the Commissions. They are also eligible to be appointed as members of any committee or other subordinate bodies established by the Commissions.

128. Several of the specialized agencies have established their own forms of regional organization, such as offices through which much of their work is carried out on a regional level. In WHO the regional system established by the First World Health Assembly has become one of the distinctive features of the organization's structure. The six regional organizations include those for Africa, South-east Asia, the Western Pacific and the Americas. Each area organization consists of a Regional Committee of the World Health Assembly and a Regional Office. In the Africa region, the early efforts were concentrated upon basic inquiries and surveys, often in co-operation with other international bodies, in order to determine the main problems and needs. On the basis of such findings, WHO has provided experts and fellowships to assist the training of local personnel, and has given assistance to communicable diseases control and eradication programmes, particularly for malaria and yaws, and for the improvement of maternal and child welfare and environmental sanitation. In the Western Pacific area WHO similarly has assisted in programmes for the control and eradication of communicable diseases, the training of local health workers, community development programmes, and the integration of local health services.

129. The regional activities of the ILO since 1946 have been concentrated mainly in Asia and the South East Asia areas. On the basis of recommendations of a preparatory Asian conference in 1947, regional machinery was established consisting of an ILO Regional Conference meeting every two years, an Asian Advisory Committee to the Governing Body and an Asian Field Office. Non-Self-Governing Territories are represented in the Asian Regional Conference either by their own delegations or indirectly as members of the delegations of the metropolitan country. In 1955, the Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories recognized the need for a comprehensive survey of labour and social policy in African Territories; a survey was completed and published in 1958, and this was followed by the establishment in 1959 of an African Field Office and an African Advisory Committee. In the Asian area ILO regional activities have included organization of manpower, vocational training, instructions in co-operatives and handicrafts and many other training courses and workshops. ILO has established a Marine Diesel Training Centre in Rangoon, maintained annual training courses in co-operatives at Mysore and an employment training institute and held regional working parties in the field on such subjects as apprenticeship and vocational training. Trainees from the region have been awarded fellowships to attend ILO training courses held outside the region.

130. Both FAO and UNESCO have area or regional offices providing technical and liaison services. Regional co-operation is effected through regional bodies of a technical nature and through regular and ad hoc conferences, technical meetings, seminars and workshops on general or specific subjects. FAO holds biannual regional conferences in the years in which no General Conference is held; these regional conferences are attended by the Governments responsible for the administration of the Territories in the region concerned and by representatives of the Territories. Among the regional technical bodies which are of particular interest to the Non-Self-Governing Territories are the Indo-Pacific Fisheries Council and the International Rice Commission. FAO activities in Africa have been carried out in close collaboration with other specialized and regional agencies and have covered a wide range of subjects such as plant production, plant diseases, animal products and land tenure. With the increasing number of independent countries and the continued urgent need for improving standards of living by the development of natural resources, FAO activities in Africa are expected to expand further in the immediate future. Under its Programme of Work for 1959, FAO will strengthen its regional activities in order to establish closer relationship and to provide better services to the member countries, by increasing the technical staff out-posted from its Headquarters and by transferring certain activities which are essentially conditioned by the local geographical, cultural and environmental circumstances from Headquarters to the regions.

131. UNESCO maintains regional offices for specific purposes in some areas. Such offices include regional Science Co-operation Offices in Montevideo, Cairo, New Delhi, Jakarta, and in Manila; and International Fundamental Education Centres in Mexico and Egypt. Most of UNESCO's regional activities are in the nature of seminars, conferences and surveys such as a series of regional conferences on free and compulsory education, and seminars on rural adult education and public libraries.

132. Besides the United Nations and the specialized agencies, there are three main inter-governmental regional organizations concerned primarily with Non-Self-Governing Territories. Established by the Administering Members concerned, these are the Caribbean and South Pacific Commissions and the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of Sahara (CCTA). These regional organizations differ from the specialized agencies and regional economic commissions both in the scope of their activities and more particularly in their organization and membership.

133. The Caribbean and South Pacific organizations each consist of a Commission comprising the representatives of the metropolitan governments, a Conference in which representatives of all the Territories participate, and a Research Council consisting of experts from both metropolitan countries and from the Territories. The Commissions are concerned with the improvement of the economic and social well-being of the peoples of the Territories in their respective regions, and have the objectives of promoting scientific, technical, and economic development and facilitating the use of resources and the concerted treatment of mutual problems. The Conferences not only make recommendations to the Commissions, but also provide the representatives of the Territories with an opportunity to consult with each other or to exchange information on common problems. The Research Councils of both Commissions have established a number of technical committees to carry out and to co-ordinate the researches on scientific information in specific fields.

134. The Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara meets annually to review and co-ordinate policies and programmes in the technical fields. It organizes various technical conferences attended by specialists from the metropolitan and territorial governments and these conferences make recommendations to the governments of the Commission. A number of inter-African bureaus have been established to facilitate exchange of information on technical problems. In addition, there are a number of permanent advisory committees and correspondents covering various subjects such as statistics, housing, nutrition, health, cartography and surveys, social sciences and epizootic diseases. The Scientific Council has similar functions to the Research Councils of the Caribbean and South Pacific Commissions.

135. An extraordinary session of the CCTA held in February 1958 in Ghana marked the inauguration of the Foundation for Mutual Assistance in Africa South of the Sahara (FAMA), which was established by Belgium, France, Portugal, the United Kingdom, Ghana, Liberia, the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and the Union of South Africa; the Foundation's objectives are to assist in the supply of experts and advisers to countries in the region, to help in the training of personnel and to supply equipment for training purposes. At its thirteenth session in May 1958 the CCTA paid special attention to the need to maintain and develop technical co-operation and to foster the development of bilateral technical assistance under the auspices of the Foundation for Mutual Assistance.

The Scientific Council discussed in August 1958 proposals for the organization of training courses in the medical, veterinary and agricultural fields and advised on forty requests for technical assistance made by African countries and territories to the Foundation for Mutual Assistance.

136. The specialized agencies, in particular, FAO, ILO, WHO and UNESCO, co-operate actively with these regional bodies both under their regular programmes of work as well as under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, including mutual participation in technical meetings, joint sponsorship of surveys and studies, training courses, seminars and conferences and consultation on the secretariat level.

137. The Colombo Plan for economic development in South and South-east Asia has also rendered much assistance to various Non-Self-Governing Territories as well as independent States in the region. The Development Fund for Overseas Countries and Territories established by the European Economic Community<sup>104/</sup> represents another form of international collaboration with special interest in Africa.

International technical assistance

138. Finally, the use made by the Members administering Non-Self-Governing Territories of the facilities available under the United Nations technical assistance programmes has increased considerably during the period under review. Participation by the Territories in these programmes was encouraged by the General Assembly as early as 1948, when by resolution 220 (III) it drew the attention of the Members concerned to the arrangements for technical assistance which had recently been approved by the Economic and Social Council. Following the establishment of the Expanded Programme, the Assembly in 1950, by resolution 444 (V), invited the Administering Members which needed technical assistance for the economic, social and educational advancement of their Non-Self-Governing Territories to submit their requests.

139. A description of the kinds and amounts of technical assistance accorded to Non-Self-Governing Territories under the United Nations programme is included in the present report in a more appropriate context, as one of the studies of economic, social and educational conditions which follow.<sup>105/</sup>

Indian Ocean Territories

In accordance with the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter, the Governments of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and of Australia have transmitted to the Secretary-General information for the year ending 31 December 1958 on the Territories of Cocos (Keeling) Islands, Mauritius and Seychelles.

Summaries of information of the type which follow are intended to supplement the full summaries issued every three years together with papers on general developments. The last triennial volume of summaries would normally have been published in 1959/1960; the material destined for that volume is now to appear in a report 1/ on the progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories since the beginning of the United Nations. 2/ The present summaries can therefore be considered as a supplement to the progress report. The next triennial summaries will be published in 1962/1963.

The dates on which information for the year 1958 was transmitted to the Secretary-General by the United Kingdom Mission to the United Nations and the Australian Mission to the United Nations follow below:

Territory	Date of Transmission
Cocos (Keeling) Islands	25 September 1959
Mauritius	9 September 1959
Seychelles	3 August 1959

1/ Requested under General Assembly resolution 1053 (XI).

2/ Progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories under the Charter (Sales No. 1960.VI.B.1), volumes I-V, to be published in 1960-1961. See in particular volume V, Territorial Surveys.

MAURITIUS

AREA

809 square miles (2,096 square kilometres) including dependencies.

POPULATION

	June 1952 (census)	1956	1957 (December estimates)	1958
Indo-Mauritians	335,327	389,205	401,871	414,660
General population <sup>a/</sup>	148,238	169,441	173,593	177,396
Sino-Mauritians and Chinese	17,850	20,477	21,157	21,832
	501,415	579,123	596,621	613,888

In addition, according to the 1952 census, the population of the dependencies was 15,085.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

The economy of Mauritius is dependent on sugar, which accounted for 96 per cent of all exports in 1958. Climatic conditions were unfavourable and the 1958 sugar crop produced 525,648 metric tons, compared with 562,003 metric tons in 1957. Tea production rose from 859 tons in 1957 to 873 tons in 1958, of which 352 tons were exported, as compared with 441 tons exported in 1957. The Government is sponsoring a pilot tea development project which is expected to result in improved yields and quality and the establishment of 3,000 acres of new tea by 1960.

A revised Capital Expenditure Programme covering the period 1 July 1957 to 30 June 1962 was approved in June 1958. The total cost of the Programme has been estimated at Rs.210,252,000, <sup>1/</sup> compared with Rs.130 million provided for in the previous Capital Expenditure Programme, 1955-1960.

Food crops	4,500	4,300	4,400	8,020	7,650	...

About 5,000 acres were planted with vegetables.

Livestock

According to a census taken in mid-1956, the number of dairy cattle was 38,000. The number of herd and draught cattle was estimated at 3,700, and there were an estimated 53,500 goats, 2,000 sheep and 4,000 pigs.

Cattle slaughtered for consumption numbered 12,823 in 1956 (of which 6,938 were imported) and 13,347 in 1957 (of which 6,648 were imported).

FORESTRY

A total of 475 acres of new plantations were created during 1958, compared with 560 acres in 1957 and 784 acres in 1956. In addition, some 4,221 acres of plantations, five to twenty years old, were treated culturally under weeding and pruning operations.

Produce of Crown forests and private forests

Charcoal (tons)	957.4	947.9	996.0

FISHERIES

During 1958, the controlled catch was 1,616 metric tons, compared with 1,664 metric tons in 1957 and 1,641 metric tons in 1956.

The survey of new fishing grounds up to twenty miles offshore, started in 1956, was continued during 1957 and 1958.

POWER

Work on the Eau Bleue and the Magenta hydroelectric schemes continued during 1958. Other developments included the extension and reinforcement of the main transmission and distribution lines and of sub-stations.

Electricity output

Number of consumers	36,388	38,363	41,097

The aggregate rated capacity of steam-electric plants in sugar factories was 20,400 KVA in 1957, compared with 17,000 KVA in 1956.

INDUSTRY

The Capital Expenditure Programme, 1957-1962, provides for loans up to a total of Rs.2 million to non-agricultural secondary industries likely to be of advantage to the Territory; this compares with a provision of Rs.1.2 million made in the Capital Expenditure Programme, 1955-1960. Provision has also been made of Rs.2 million for the development of the tourist industry.

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES:
SUMMARIES OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER. REPORT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERALIndian Ocean Territories

1. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 218 (III) the Secretary-General submits to the General Assembly at its sixteenth session the attached summaries of the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter relating to Cocos (Keeling) Islands, Mauritius and Seychelles (Indian Ocean Territories).<sup>1/</sup> These summaries supplement the summaries submitted to the General Assembly at its fourteenth session as part of the report on progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories under the Charter.<sup>2/</sup>
2. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 933 (X), these summaries are also submitted to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

<sup>2/</sup> A/4084 and Add.1 and 4. There is no reference in this report to the Cocos (Keeling) Islands. Information on this Territory was first transmitted in 1956/1957.

INDIAN OCEAN TERRITORIES<sup>1/</sup>

In accordance with the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter, the Governments of Australia and of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland have transmitted to the Secretary-General information for the year ending 31 December 1959 on the Territories of the Cocos (Keeling) Islands, Mauritius and Seychelles.

Summaries of information of the type which follow are intended to supplement the full summaries issued every three years, together with papers on general developments. The last triennial volume of summaries would normally have been published in 1959-1960, but the material destined for that volume is now to appear in a report <sup>2/</sup> on the progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories since the establishment of the United Nations. <sup>3/</sup> The present surveys can therefore be considered as a supplement to the Progress Report. <sup>4/</sup> The next triennial summaries will be published in 1962/1963.

The dates on which information for the year 1959 was transmitted to the Secretary-General by the Australian Mission to the United Nations and the United Kingdom Mission to the United Nations follow below:

Territory	Date of Transmission
Cocos (Keeling) Islands	9 August 1960
Mauritius	7 July 1960
Seychelles	3 June 1960

- <sup>1/</sup> Owing to the smaller number of Territories on which reports were transmitted for 1959, the summaries on the African Territories have been issued in a single fascicle, thereby reducing the number in this series from nine to six. Fascicles containing summaries on Territories in other geographical regions have been renumbered accordingly. The present fascicle was formerly issued as ST/TRI/B.19--/4.
- <sup>2/</sup> Requested under General Assembly resolution 1053 (XI).
- <sup>3/</sup> Progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories under the Charter (Sales No. 60.VI.B.1, vol. 1-5), volumes 1 to 5 to be published shortly. See in particular, vol. 5, Territorial Surveys.
- <sup>4/</sup> There is no reference to the Cocos (Keeling) Islands in the Progress Report. Information on this Territory was transmitted to the Secretary-General for the first time in 1956/1957 (ST/TRI/B.1957/8).

1. The first of these is the fact that the Commission has not yet received any information from the Government of the United Kingdom regarding the proposed extension of the 1955 Convention to cover the whole of the United Kingdom. It is therefore not possible to say whether or not the Commission will be able to recommend the extension of the Convention to cover the whole of the United Kingdom.

MAURITIUS

AREA

809 square miles (2,096 square kilometres) including dependencies.

POPULATION

	June 1952 (census)	1957	1958 (December estimates)	1959
Indo-Mauritians	335,327	401,871	414,660	427,209
General population <sup>a/</sup>	148,238	173,593	177,396	181,474
Sino-Mauritians and Chinese	17,850	21,157	21,832	22,468
	501,415	596,621	613,888	631,151

In addition, according to the 1952 census, the population of the dependencies was 15,085.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

The economy of Mauritius is dependent on sugar, which accounted for 97 per cent of all exports in 1959. A pilot tea development project designed to improve yields and quality is being sponsored by the Government; by the end of 1959 approximately 1,400 acres of new land had been developed under tea of improved varieties. The Government also provided funds for the erection of a tea factory which was completed and put into commission in 1959 with a first stage capacity of 750,000 lbs. of black tea per annum.

The Capital Expenditure Programme covering the period 1 July 1957 to 30 June 1962 was revised in 1959 with the result that the total estimated cost of the Programme has been increased from Rs. 210,252,000 to Rs. 228,124,000. <sup>1/</sup>

AGRICULTURE AND LIVESTOCK

	Principal crops
		Area (acres)			Production (metric tons)
	1957	1958	1959	1957	1958	1959
Sugar	190,500	197,400	200,000	562,000	526,000	580,000
Tea	3,577	3,600	3,900	859	873	906
Tobacco	830	1,000	1,030	438	498	567

Food crops	4,300	2,930	...	7,650	6,810	...

About 5,000 acres were planted with vegetables.

Livestock

According to a census taken in mid-1956, the number of dairy cattle was 38,000. The number of herd and draught cattle was estimated at 3,700, and there were an estimated 53,600 goats, 2,000 sheep and 4,000 pigs.

Cattle slaughtered for consumption numbered 12,823 in 1956 (of which 6,938 were imported), 13,347 in 1957 (of which 6,648 were imported), and 13,348 in 1958 (of which 4,327 were imported).

FORESTRY

A total of 620 acres of new plantations were created during 1959, compared with 475 acres in 1958 and 560 acres in 1957. In addition, 4,089 acres of plantations, five to twenty years old, were treated culturally under weeding and pruning operations, as against 4,221 acres in 1958 and 3,897 acres in 1957.

Produce of Crown forests and private forests

Firewood, solid volume (thousand cu. ft.)	1,429.3	1,459.4	1,531.0
Charcoal (tons)	947.9	996.0	1,373.1

FISHERIES

During 1959, the controlled catch was 1,299 metric tons, compared with 1,616 metric tons in 1958 and 1,664 metric tons in 1957. The reductions since 1957 were due to the partial enforcement of a closed season for large nets and repeated bad weather in 1959.

The survey of new fishing grounds up to twenty miles offshore, started in 1956, was in course of completion during 1959.

POWER

Work on the Eau Bleue and Magenta hydroelectric schemes, and work on the extension and reinforcement of the main transmission and distribution lines and substations, was continued during 1959. La Ferme Power Station was commissioned during the year.

Electricity output
(Hydro- and thermo-electric installations)

Units generated (million kwh)	44.6	48.9	55.9
Number of consumers	38,363	41,097	45,842

There are, in addition, privately owned steam-electric installations in sugar factories; their aggregate rated capacity was 24,300 KVA in 1958, compared with 20,400 KVA in 1957 and 17,000 KVA in 1956.

INDUSTRY

The 1959 review of the Capital Expenditure Programme, 1957-1962, provided for loans up to a total of Rs. 1 million to non-agricultural secondary industries likely to be of advantage to the Territory. Provision was also made of Rs. 2.5 million for the development of the tourist industry, and for expenditure up to Rs. 100,000 for grants towards the cost of investigation into the availability of local materials for industrial processes.

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER OF THE UNITED NATIONS: REPORTS OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL AND OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

1. By communication dated 7 February 1961, the United Kingdom Mission to the United Nations has transmitted the following information for 1959 relating to Part III.B. of the Standard Form (Human Rights).<sup>1/</sup>

"The human rights and fundamental freedoms which are recognized and protected in the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which the United Kingdom is responsible are similar to those which are recognized and protected in the United Kingdom itself. The process of establishing the fundamental freedoms which are enjoyed in the United Kingdom took place, in the main, before the United Kingdom assumed responsibility for the affairs of the Territories on which information is now transmitted; consequently the establishment of these freedoms in the overseas Territories has been a normal and natural part of the function of the administration there. The British concept of human rights and fundamental freedoms, however, is based on a general acceptance of the principles of the liberty of the subject, an acceptance which is so fundamental that the existence of those rights and freedoms is taken for granted. Consequently in most Territories legislation which has a bearing on these matters is not designed to define general rights and privileges in the abstract, but to lay down in concrete terms the means to preserve existing rights in the circumstances of each Territory and community. Constitutional instruments of Territories do not often enumerate general and theoretical rights and freedoms (although this is done where it is generally agreed that it would serve a useful purpose), these are rather to be deduced from the ordinary law of the Territory. In many Territories there is a specific provision that the basic laws shall be the law in force in England on some particular date, subject to subsequent enactments in the Territory. Moreover, uniformity in the administration of justice and the maintenance of the rule of law is encouraged by the existence of an ultimate court of appeal for all Territories (the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council) consisting of some of the most eminent judges of the Commonwealth.

"The fundamental rights and freedoms which are part of the British tradition and which are established and protected usually by this means include the right of the individual to life, liberty and security of person, to recognition as a person and equality before the law, to an effective remedy before the courts against violations of the rights granted to him by the law or constitution of his country, to a fair and public hearing before an impartial judiciary in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any charge against him, to be presumed innocent of a criminal offence until he is proved guilty, to be immune from retrospective penal offences or penalties, to freedom from arbitrary interference with his family, home or correspondence and to remedy against such interference or attacks on his good name, to liberty of movement, to a nationality, to ownership of property, and to freedom of thought, conscience, religion, opinion, expression, assembly and association.

"There is of course, much legislation in Non-Self-Governing Territories in economic, social and educational fields which has the effect of introducing concepts of human rights and fundamental freedoms or of entrenching such rights and freedoms for the benefit of the peoples of the Territories. This legislation is transmitted regularly to the Secretary-General and may be drawn upon in the compilation of his summaries and analyses, subject to the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter. During 1959 there were a number of instances of new legislation having a bearing on human rights and fundamental freedoms, which can be found in the transmissions in respect of individual Territories, since much of it is concerned with economic, social and educational conditions in the Territories."

AFRICAN AND ADJACENT TERRITORIES

Preface

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 218 (III) of 3 November 1948, the Secretary-General submits to the General Assembly, at its seventeenth session,<sup>1/</sup> full summaries of information for the year 1960 on the Non-Self-Governing Territories listed below.

The summaries are based on information transmitted to the Secretary-General by the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations. The last volume of full summaries was incorporated in the ten-year Progress Report (1947-1957).<sup>2/</sup>

Information for the year ending 31 December 1960<sup>3/</sup> was transmitted to the Secretary-General by the United Kingdom Mission to the United Nations on the dates listed below:

AREA

Mauritius, an island in the Indian Ocean, has an area of 720 square miles (1,865 square kilometres). It has a number of dependencies with a total area of 89.5 square miles (231 square kilometres).

POPULATION

	1952 (census)	1957 (estimates)	1960 (estimates)

Vital statistics

	1958	1959	1960
Birth-rate per thousand population . . . . .	40.8	38.5	39.6
Infant mortality per thousand live births . . . . .	67.4	62.5	69.5
Death-rate per thousand population . . . . .	11.8	10.9	11.3

Mauritius is one of the most thickly populated areas of the world. In 1960 it had a population density of 887 per square mile (calculated on the mid-year population of 638,691), compared with 828 in 1957. The population increase was 39 per cent in the last decade and there is a prospect of an even greater increase in the years to come, with no outlets in sight for the surplus population. The effect of this population increase has been described in a 1960 government paper as a "situation of real gravity, which will steadily deteriorate and which can only be remedied if policies, deliberately directed to that end, are framed and enthusiastically pursued".

GOVERNMENT

Public Service

At 31 December 1960, the Public Service comprised 122 overseas officers and 309 local officers. Among the "overseas" officers, nineteen were Mauritians - members of H.M. Overseas Civil Service: they included the Administrative Secretary, the Principal Assistant Secretary, the Deputy Accountant General, the Deputy Director of Agriculture, the Civil Commissioner, the Principal of the Training College, the Police Commissioner, the Director of Public Works, the Registrar General, and a number of other senior officials.

Training facilities

In-service training is undertaken by various government departments, such as police, customs and excise, public works, education, health, etc. Training courses are held each year for members of the general clerical service in such subjects as English, financial procedure, government accounting, the correct application of colonial regulations, etc.

A civil service scholarship scheme has been designed to provide for the further education and training overseas of locally domiciled officers to prepare them for senior posts in the Public Service. In 1960, a total of eighty-three officers were sent overseas on post-election or study leave courses; of these seventy-two attended courses in the United Kingdom, three were trained in Canada, two in the United States of America, two in Australia, one in South Africa, one in India, and two in Kenya.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

The economy of Mauritius is dependent on sugar, which accounted for 96 per cent of all exports in 1958, 97 per cent in 1959, and 90 per cent in 1960. Sugar production fell from the record figure of 580,372 metric tons in 1959 to 235,578 metric tons in 1960, owing to damages caused by two violent cyclones which struck the island during the year.

The island is completely lacking in mineral resources, has no entrepôt trade and, apart from sugar and its by-products, has only small manufacturing enterprises.

During the period under review, the rate of population growth, taken in conjunction with the island's natural resources, continued to give cause for concern and emphasis was laid on the need to foster economic development.

The Territory's Five-Year Development Programme, 1957-1962, which it was estimated would cost over Rs.210 million,<sup>11/</sup> included provision for the development of agriculture, water supplies, electricity, roads, harbours, schools, hospitals and housing schemes. In view of the damage caused by the two cyclones, this programme has been wound up and a new one for the five-year period 1960-1965 was being formulated; it will concentrate to a large extent upon cyclone repair and reconstruction. At the same time it was planned to diversify the economy by the encouragement of secondary industries.

LAND, AGRICULTURE AND LIVE-STOCK

Mauritius covers an area of 460,800 acres, of which 220,000 acres were under cultivation in 1960, compared with 206,000 in 1957. The cultivated area consists of sugar cane (200,000 acres), tea (4,000 acres), tobacco (970 acres), aloe fibre (5,000 acres), food crops and vegetables (10,000 acres). Forests, tree plantations and scrub total 197,000 acres; built up areas, roads and water bodies take up 22,000 acres; grazing and permanent waste lands account for the remaining 22,000 acres.

The proper use of land has become a serious problem because of the steadily increasing population. In recent years, organized settlement has been attempted and a pilot scheme has been started, with the primary object of establishing food-producing small-holders' communities. In 1960, there were seven small settlement areas covering 1,300 acres under cultivation.

Developments undertaken by the Department of Agriculture during the period under review included the promotion of the most efficient use of all available lands suitable for cultivation, the setting up of an agricultural extension service and the development of experimental stations.

The sugar industry is the main source of wealth and employment. About 80 per cent of the sugar crop is produced by the larger plantations; some 15,000 peasant planters, often grouped in co-operative societies, produce the remaining 20 per cent. In 1960, the production of sugar was 1.23 metric tons per acre, compared with 3.09 obtained in 1959 and 2.90 in 1958.

Expansion of the tea industry centres around a government-sponsored pilot project, which is expected to result in improved yields and quality and the establishment of 3,000 acres of plantations by 1962. This project has been brought to a temporary halt because of the devastation of young tea areas by the two cyclones. The reduction in aloe fibre production was also a result of the damage caused by the cyclones.

	1958	1959	1960
Sugar . . . . .	526,000	580,000	235,000
Tea . . . . .	873	906	786
Tobacco . . . . .	498	567	553
Aloe fibre . . . . .	1,576	1,464	973

Live-stock

The live-stock consists of milk cattle and goats, with a small number of sheep and pigs. The number of milk cattle increased from 38,000 in 1956 to about 40,000 in 1960. The number of goats is estimated to be 50,000. Beef and milk production is much below requirements and has to be supplemented by imports of cattle and dried milk.

A Live-stock Extension Service provides farmers with assistance and advice on better methods of management and breeding. During the period under review, progress was made with the selection of high-yielding cows for the foundation breeding stock; several breeding centres and an artificial insemination centre were completed.

FORESTRY

Forest lands, including scrub lands and grazing lands with trees, occupy 187,850 acres; of this the Crown forest estate occupies 67,150 acres. The national reserves of some 4,520 acres are receiving particular attention and sample plots are maintained within them to study the growth of exotics and different methods of treatment.

During the years 1958-1960, a total of 1,405 acres of new plantations were created; in addition about 12,000 acres of plantations were treated under weeding and cleaning operations. Extensive damage was caused to forest plantations by the 1960 cyclones. Some 2,000 acres of pine plantations over 12 years of age were virtually destroyed, together with some 2,500 acres of eucalyptus trees.

FISHERIES

Fishing is practised around the coast of Mauritius, Rodrigues and St. Brandon to supply the local market. The total controlled catch was 1,368 tons in 1960, compared with 1,299 tons in 1959 and 1,616 tons in 1958. The reduction since 1958 was due to the partial enforcement of a closed season for large nets and to repeated bad weather. The 1960 cyclones had a disastrous effect on the fishing industry; 293 fishing boats were destroyed and 630 damaged; large numbers of small fish were swept ashore. A scheme of government long-term loans at a cheap rate of interest was started to allow fishermen to build new boats. A loan of Rs.200,000 to a local fishing company to enable it to purchase a fishing vessel was approved.

A survey of new fishing grounds up to twenty miles off-shore was in the course of completion in 1960.

POWER

During 1958 and 1959, work on new hydroelectric schemes proceeded satisfactorily. The Magenta hydroelectric station was completed and brought into service. During 1960, the development of electricity was greatly hampered by the two cyclones. The damage caused to the electric lines was so wide-spread that development works had to be discontinued and the Central Electricity Board had to concentrate on repairs and reconstruction.

Power generated during 1960 by five hydroelectric and two thermal stations of the Central Electricity Board and six private stations in sugar factories totalled 54.7 million kwh, compared with 55.9 million kwh in 1959 and 48.9 million kwh in 1958. The number of consumers increased from 41,097 in 1958 to 45,842 in 1959 and to 46,181 in 1960.

INDUSTRY

Apart from the sugar, tea, tobacco and fibre industries, local industries of lesser importance include the manufacture of rum and wine, edible oil and soap, cigarettes, salt, lime and bricks. Various small trades include printing shops, tanneries, and mechanical and electrical workshops.

The Development Programme, 1957-1962, provided for loans up to a total of Rs. 1 million to non-agricultural secondary industries likely to be of advantage to the Territory. A further sum of Rs.100,000 was provided for grants towards the cost of investigation of new processes or industries showing promise of development, and Rs. 2.5 million were allocated for the development of the tourist industry.

Exemptions from import duty are granted for machinery for the manufacture of commodities produced locally, and the Income Tax Ordinance includes an "investment allowance" equal to one-tenth of the capital expenditure incurred on construction of new industrial plants.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

There were 744.5 miles of roads in 1960, compared with 736 miles in 1957. All roads are metalled and about 438.5 miles are bitumen coated (compared with 377 miles of bitumenized roads in 1957). The consolidation and improvement of bus services continued during the period under review; 116,000 passengers travelled daily by bus in 1960, compared with 100,000 in 1957. The number of buses increased from 356 in 1956 to 488 in 1959; during the same period the total number of registered motor vehicles increased from 10,882 to 13,291.

The railway network has eighty-two miles of track. Passenger services, which operated at a deficit, were discontinued in 1956. Goods (mainly sugar) transported by rail totalled 536,600 metric tons in 1960, compared with 489,157 metric tons in 1959, and 518,632 metric tons in 1958.

During 1960, work started on the improvement of harbour facilities; the scheme consists of the repair and strengthening of the deep-water quay, and the construction of two lighterage quays, a transit shed and a warehouse. Special cement silos have been built and cement in bulk is now imported regularly from East Africa.

Communications

There were seventy-seven post offices and postal agencies in 1960, compared with seventy-five in 1956. The number of letters, post cards and printed papers increased from 6.7 million in 1957 to 8.8 million in 1960.

The Department of Communications, established in 1957, is responsible for the operation of the telephone and telegraph systems, and for a ship-to-shore radio station. Mauritius is linked with the outside world by cables and radio installations. There were fifteen telephone exchanges and 8,161 telephones in 1959, compared with fourteen exchanges and 7,282 telephones in 1956.

Under the terms of the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement, the United Kingdom has undertaken to provide a guaranteed market for 335,000 long tons of Mauritius sugar each year until the end of 1967, at a price negotiated annually. In 1960 the quota was increased to 353,425 long tons, but owing to a substantially reduced crop the exports fell short of the negotiated price quota by some 50,000 long tons. The negotiated price on 1960 was £44.8s.10d. per long ton, compared with £42.3s.0d. in 1957.

SOCIAL CONDITIONS

The population of Mauritius comprises an Indo-Mauritian group (about 67.8 per cent of the total population), which includes about 340,000 Hindus and 100,000 Moslems; a population of mixed French and African origin known as the "general population" (about 28.5 per cent); a Sino-Mauritian community comprising about 3.5 per cent of the population; a European group, mainly of French origin, and a few British officials. The "general population" is almost entirely Roman Catholic and French-speaking. English, the official language, is not yet in general use, though it is more widely spoken and understood than it was some years ago. Creole, a derivative of French, plays the role of a lingua franca.

Until recently, each group tended to remain separate and was mainly concerned with its own interests. There are, however, signs of a growing awareness of the need to break down communal and racial barriers and to tackle the Territory's problems on an all-community basis.

Status of women

Women over the age of 21 may hold property and bear responsibility for all their actions, except that where a complaint is filed against a married woman, the husband becomes co-defendant under the French system of community of property. The consent of parents is essential for the marriage of minors under 21 years of age, but special legislative arrangements allow Hindu and Muslim girls of 18 to marry without the consent of their parents.

Women over the age of 21 have the right to vote; they are not debarred from any employment and serve on many government boards and committees and in various welfare and cultural organizations. Women have also served as members of the Legislative Council.

LABOUR AND EMPLOYMENT

The sugar industry employed on an average 59,000 workers during the 1960 crop time, and 54,000 workers during the inter-crop period. Secondary industries employed 20,469 workers, and the public services 12,146 workers. This compares with 16,000 and 11,200 respectively in 1957.

The number of registered unemployed in 1960 varied from 1,614 during crop time to 3,562 during the inter-crop period, against 1,415 to 2,169 registered unemployed during the same periods in 1957. A preliminary survey of the problems of unemployment in the Territory was conducted during 1960 by a specialist from the Man-Power Division of the ILO.

In 1960, the most important workers' organizations were: the Plantation Workers' Union, with a membership of 3,362; the Agricultural Workers' Union, with a membership of 3,761; the Government and Other Manual Workers' Union, with 1,428 members; and the Artisans and General Workers' Union, with 1,086 members. The two largest associations of government employees were the Government General Employees' Union, with 1,330 members, and the Government Servants and Other Employees' Association, with 1,170 members.

The co-operative movement is guided by a small government department in conjunction with a secondary-society - the Mauritius Co-operative Union. The movement derives financial support from another secondary society - the Co-operative Central Bank - whilst the interests of agricultural and distributive societies are attended by the Co-operative Agricultural Federation and the Co-operative Wholesale Society, respectively.

In 1960, the co-operative movement comprised four secondary societies and 334 primary societies; the latter included 176 agricultural credit societies; six marketing, three housing, one printing and 19 transport societies; 79 co-operative retail stores, 23 thrift and savings societies; one better-living society, and 26 school savings banks.

The indices cover the following main groups of items: food, beverages, tobacco, rent, fuel and light, household goods, clothing, entertainment, dependants and charities, and other services.

The national income at constant (1948) prices was Rs.403 million in 1957 and Rs.406 million in 1958. The per caput income at constant (1948) prices was Rs.692 in 1958, compared with Rs.709 in 1957.

TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING AND HOUSING

Overcrowding is prevalent in urban areas and rents are high. The main problems are indiscriminate construction, over-population, migration to the towns, low wage levels of the groups most in need of rehousing, lack of funds, and the shortage of qualified architects. Cyclones often result in considerable destruction of houses; in 1960, about 70,000 buildings were destroyed or damaged.

A Central Housing Authority was set up in 1960 to deal with the housing problem, and a scheme was approved for the construction of 20,000 low-cost houses. Urban housing is also provided by local authorities with government loans at low rates of interest. During the decade 1950-1960, 1,143 houses were completed by the four urban councils. In the rural areas the Sugar Industry Labour Welfare Fund has completed 373 houses and 1,500 new houses are planned for the future. The Fund, which is financed by a cess on all sugar exported, also has schemes for lending money to sugar estates to erect houses for their workers. Co-operative building societies completed five houses in 1960, which brought the total of houses built by these societies to thirty-two.

In 1960, a Town and Country Planning Officer arrived in Mauritius and a number of planning areas have been declared under the Town and Country Planning Ordinance.

SOCIAL SECURITY AND WELFARE

Compensation for industrial accidents is payable under the Workmen's Compensation Ordinance.

The sugar industry maintains a contributory provident fund for retired workers. A non-contributory old-age pension scheme for all employed workers was introduced in 1950: in December 1960, 27,572 persons were in receipt of pensions, against 19,049 in December 1957. Legislation does not provide for the relief of able-bodied unemployed; casual grants are made, however, when unemployment is attended by destitution; the number of such cases relieved in 1960 amounted to 472, compared with 880 in 1959.

The Public Assistance Department is responsible for outdoor and indoor relief and for the granting of old age pensions. In 1960, there were twenty-nine public assistance centres and twenty-one sub-centres throughout the island. Outdoor relief was paid to 37,493 persons in 1960, compared with 14,900 persons in 1957. Indoor relief in orphanages and infirmaries was provided in 1960 to 674 adults and 176 children, compared with 1,036 adults and 252 children in 1957.

Expenditure on public assistance amounted to Rs.18.2 million in 1960, against Rs.9.4 million in 1957.

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

The responsibilities of the Social Welfare Department include the stimulation of interest in social welfare centres, community centres and community development projects; administration of the probation service; and prevention of juvenile delinquency.

Social welfare centres and community centres are established by the Sugar Industry Labour Welfare Fund. Social welfare centres, which are managed by representative local committees, run maternity and child welfare services and classes in sewing and other handwork. Welfare officers are attached to each centre and work in close association with voluntary workers. By the end of 1960, fourteen welfare centres had been set up in various parts of the island. Community centres are established in areas not served by social welfare centres; they are run by village councils and are used as meeting places for social, recreational and educational activities.

MAURITIUS

"Welfare months" are held at social welfare centres to stimulate community activities. Officers of the Departments of Agriculture, Health, Education, and Social Welfare give lectures and demonstrations, drawing attention to village problems and suggesting solutions. The development of women's associations is being encouraged, especially in rural areas. There were fifty-four such associations registered at the end of 1960.

PREVENTION OF CRIME AND TREATMENT OF OFFENDERS

A rehabilitation centre for long and short-term offenders was opened in 1958; particular stress is laid on outdoor work, such as gardening, fish farming and animal husbandry; educational facilities are also provided for the prisoners. During 1960, an average of ninety inmates served their sentences at the centre.

The probation system has made satisfactory progress; 345 persons were put on probation in 1960. There is a probation hostel for boys, in which ten boys were in residence at the end of 1960. District probation committees have been set up in each court area, in an effort to associate the community in the rehabilitation of delinquents.

PUBLIC HEALTH

During the period under review, the general health of the population continued to improve. The death-rate declined from 13.0 per thousand of the population in 1957 to 11.8 per thousand in 1958, and to 10.9 per thousand in 1959; infant mortality declined from 75.1 per thousand live births in 1957 to 67.4 per thousand in 1958 and 62.5 per thousand in 1959. In 1960, probably as a result of the disasters caused by two violent cyclones, the death-rate rose to 11.3 per thousand of the population, and infant mortality to 69.5 per thousand of live births.

The main factors responsible for bringing about improvement in health conditions were the progressive elimination of malaria and the higher standard of environmental hygiene. There has equally been a decline in the number of deaths caused by infective and parasitic diseases. Deaths from tuberculosis decreased from 23.68 per 100,000 of the population in 1957 to 15.81 per 100,000 in 1960.

An epidemic of poliomyelitis broke out in 1959 and lasted fourteen weeks, leaving ninety-seven paralysed victims. Sabin vaccine was fed to about 195,000 children in 1959 and to 54,900 children in 1960.

Training for auxiliary medical personnel is available at two hospitals. During the period under review, eighty-six nurses, seventeen midwives and sixty-five dressers completed their training. There are also training facilities for pharmacists and sanitary inspectors.

Medical facilities were expanded; additional wards and out-patient departments were completed at two general hospitals and work was begun on the construction of two health centres and on extensions to the General School of Nursing.

Mauritius continued to receive assistance from WHO; in 1959, a nutrition survey team was sent by WHO to study the nature of the prevailing anaemia. Another team of experts completed its survey on the incidence of tuberculosis.

There were, in addition, four travelling dispensaries, one mobile ante-natal clinic, and four dental clinics. There were eighteen dispensaries and twenty-seven hospitals with 593 beds on sugar estates; there were also five private nursing homes with eighty-nine beds.

EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS

Education is free in government and aided primary schools; in post-primary schools low fees are paid. Scholarships are awarded for secondary education and for higher studies overseas. There is no racial or religious differentiation in government and aided schools; a condition which aided schools must accept on receiving a grant is that they may not refuse admission to any child on the ground of race or religion.

The enactment of the Education (Amendment) Ordinance of 1960 introduced an important change in the organization of education, by placing the Education Department under the direct control of the Minister of Education and Cultural Affairs. The post of the Director of Education was abolished and his duties and powers were transferred to the Minister, assisted by a Permanent Secretary. The Advisory Board on Education is available to the Minister for consultation.

There are four Education Authorities - Roman Catholic, Church of England, Hindu, and Muslim - which control the aided primary schools; these are in part maintained from public funds and in part from the resources of the Authorities; teachers at the aided schools are wholly paid from public funds.

The sharp increase in population has come at a time when interest in education has been increasing. To meet this demand it has been necessary to develop and expand considerably the primary education system. New educational buildings constructed since 1958 include twenty-two government primary schools and a Roman Catholic aided primary school. Additional space has been provided by the construction of 262 classrooms at existing government and aided schools. Extensions to the Royal College at Port Louis and the Teachers' Training College at Beau Bassin have been completed. Many schools were damaged by the two cyclones in 1960 and had to be repaired or replaced.

CULTURAL INSTITUTIONS AND MASS COMMUNICATIONS

There are six public libraries in the main centres. The Mauritius Institute comprises three museums, five scientific and cultural societies and a public library.

Four main daily papers are published, mostly in French, with an average circulation of about 11,000 each. There are, in addition, five Chinese dailies, twenty-four weekly, monthly and quarterly publications in French or English, and four Hindi periodicals.

There are two theatres and thirty-five permanent cinema halls. Ninety-six projectors and twenty-eight film-strip projectors are being used for educational purposes.

During 1960, the Mauritius Broadcasting Station was on the air an average of fifty-six hours a week. The number of radio licences at the end of the year was 39,632, compared with 18,849 in 1954.

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES: SUMMARIES
OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER OF THE UNITED NATIONS

AFRICAN AND ADJACENT TERRITORIES

Mauritius

In accordance with the statement of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland on 27 September 1961, the Government of the United Kingdom has transmitted to the Secretary-General the following political and constitutional information on the Territory of Mauritius.

This information, which was received on 10 April 1962, is herewith submitted to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session.<sup>1/</sup>

POPULATION

Mauritius is a small, densely populated Territory in the Indian Ocean inhabited by people of mixed origin. The estimated population of Mauritius at 31 December 1960 was 648,850. The proportion of the various racial groups is roughly as follows:

	(per cent)
Indian descent . . . . .	67
Chinese descent . . . . .	4
Others (European and African descent) . . . .	29

There are under 1,000 persons of British origin in Mauritius.

STATUS AND PREVIOUS HISTORY

Mauritius is a Territory with a considerable measure of internal self-government. Its present Constitution is based on the result of discussions which took place in July 1961 between the British Government and representatives of the major political parties in Mauritius, including Dr. Ramgoolam, the present Chief Minister. At that time, the Territory already had a majority of elected members in the Legislative and Executive Councils; the former had 40 elected members, up to 12 nominated members and 3 ex-officio members, while the latter consisted of the Governor, who presided, 7 elected and 2 nominated members and 3 ex-officio members. The elected members of the Executive Council, like the nominated and ex-officio members, each had responsibility over one or more departments of government, and thus had a considerable share in the supervision of the administration of the Territory, as well as a full share in policy making.

As a result of the 1961 Constitutional Conference, it was agreed inter alia that the leader of the majority party in the Legislature would be given the title of Chief Minister, and that the Governor would consult the Chief Minister on such matters as the appointment and removal of ministers, the allocation of portfolios and the summoning, proroguing and dissolution of the Legislature.

GOVERNOR

The Governor (at present Sir Colville Deverell) is the Queen's representative and the formal head of the Government. As head of the executive he normally acts on the advice of the Executive Council, special procedure, including a report to the British Government, being required in any case where he does not. His assent is required for laws passed by the Legislative Council, and is normally given.

EXECUTIVE COUNCIL

The Constitution which is now in force provides for an Executive Council consisting of a Chief Minister and 12 other Ministers, under the chairmanship of the Governor. This Council is collectively responsible for the direction and control of the Government of the Territory. The Government appoints as Chief Minister that member of the Legislative Council who is able to command a majority.

The present composition of the Executive Council, under the chairmanship of the Governor, is as follows:

Mr. A. Ecejadhur <sup>a/</sup>	(Minister of Education and Cultural Affairs)
Mr. S. Boolell <sup>a/</sup>	(Minister of Agriculture and Natural Resources)
Mr. J.G. Forget <sup>a/</sup>	(Minister of Health and Reform Institutions)
Mr. F. Laventure <sup>b/</sup>	(Minister of Local Government and Co-operative Development)
Mr. A.R. Mohamed <sup>c/</sup>	(Minister of Housing, Lands and Town and Country Planning)
Mr. A.L. Nairac <sup>b/</sup>	(Minister of Industry, Commerce and External Communications)
Mr. V. Ringadoo <sup>a/</sup>	(Minister of Labour and Social Security)
Mr. H.E. Walter <sup>a/</sup>	(Minister of Works and Internal Communications)
Mr. A.M. Osman <sup>c/</sup>	(Minister of Information, Posts, Telegraphs and Telecommunications)
Mr. M. Lavoipierre	(Attorney-General)
Mr. T.D. Vickers	(Chief Secretary)
Mr. A.F. Bates	(Financial Secretary)

All ministers except the last two named are Mauritians.

LEGISLATURE

The Mauritius Legislature is uni-cameral and consists of a Legislative Council of 55 members, of whom 40 are elected in single member constituencies by universal adult suffrage, 12 are nominated, and 3 are officials. It has power to legislate for all aspects of the internal affairs of the Territory and control its budget and taxation. The Council may be prorogued at any time by the Governor acting on ministerial advice. The Governor's powers to dissolve the Legislature are the same as the conventions applying to the exercise of the power of dissolution by the Queen in the United Kingdom. The Legislative Council may deal with any type of legislation. All members of the Legislature are Mauritians except for two of the official members.

ELECTORAL SYSTEM

This is based on universal adult suffrage. Members of the Legislative Council are elected in single member constituencies, the candidate polling the largest number of votes winning the seat. Elections are held every five years.

The last elections were held in March, 1959, and yielded the following results:

Parties	Candidates	Results	Percentage of votes
Labour Party (led by Dr. S. Ramgoolam) . . . . .	32	23	46.7
Muslim Committee of Action (led by Mr. A.R. Mohamed) . . .	7	5	8.6
Independent Forward Bloc (led by Mr. S. Bissoondoyal) . .	29	6	18.7
Parti Mauricien (led by Mr. J. Koenig) . . . .	22	3	15
Trade Unionist . . . . .	2	2
Independent Labour Party . . . .	7	-	1.5
Independents . . . . .	61	1	9.5
Total	160	40	100

In terms of communities the result was the election of 24 Hindus, 5 Muslims, 11 Europeans and others, and roughly corresponded to the proportions of the electorate into which the population is commonly divided.

JUDICIARY

The laws of Mauritius are mainly based on the old French codes (Civil Code, the Penal Code, the Code of Commerce and the Code of Civil Procedure). However, a number of more recent laws are based on English precedents, such as the Bankruptcy Law, the Company Law, the Law of Evidence, the Law of Criminal Procedure and the Labour Laws. The highest judicial authority is the Supreme Court, which has similar powers, authority and jurisdiction to the High Court of Justice in England. It consists of a Chief Justice and three puisne judges. Appeals lie to the Court of Criminal Appeal (which is constituted by three of the judges of the Supreme Court) and in certain cases to the Privy Council in England.

There is an Intermediate Criminal Court consisting of three senior Magistrates, which has jurisdiction to try criminal cases and power to impose sentence of up to five years penal servitude. In addition, there are a number of district courts which deal with less serious offences, under eleven magistrates.

All the judges, except one puisne judge, and all the magistrates, are of local origin.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

There is a well-established system of local government in Mauritius. The capital (Port Louis) is a municipality; its membership of sixteen is wholly elected. There are town councils in Curepipe, Beau Bassin/Rose Hill and Quatre Bornes; the majority of members of these councils are elected. The franchise for municipal and town council elections is on the basis of universal adult suffrage, and certain taxpayers' qualifications. Rural local government is based on village councils, of which there are more than 100. They consist of 8 members elected on a liberal franchise, with 4 nominated members, and exercise the normal local government functions of road repairs, bridge construction, supervision of markets, water supplies, etc. In addition, there are district councils which co-ordinate and supervise the work of the village councils in their area. These consist of the Civil Commissioner and 13 other members, including 7 Chairmen of village councils representing all the village councils in the district, ex-officio members such as the local medical and education officers, and representatives of important bodies in the area such as presidents of co-operative societies.

GOVERNMENT

Constitution

The present Constitution is based on the result of discussions which took place in July 1961 between the United Kingdom Government and representatives of the major political parties in Mauritius.

The Mauritius Legislature is unicameral and consists of a Legislative Council of fifty-five members, of whom forty are elected in single member constituencies by universal adult suffrage, twelve are nominated, and three are officials. It has power to legislate for all aspects of the internal affairs of the Territory and to control its budget and taxation. All members of the Legislature are Mauritians except for two of the official members.

The electoral system is based on universal adult suffrage. Members of the Legislative Council are elected in single member constituencies, the candidate polling the largest number of votes winning the seat. Elections are held every five years. The last elections, held in March 1959, yielded the following results: Labour Party, 23 seats; Independent Forward Bloc, 6; Muslim Committee of Action, 5; Parti Mauricien, 3; Trade Unionist, 2; Independent, 1.

A Chief Minister was installed in September 1961, as a step towards the achievement of self-government in accordance with the plan for the constitutional advance of the country.

Public Service

At the end of 1961 there were seventy-one pensionable overseas officers in the Public Service, comprising thirty-four local officers who were members of the Overseas Civil Service and thirty-seven other officers. Non-pensionable overseas officers numbered forty-five, and local and other officers totalled 329.

Training facilities

A total of eighty-four officers were sent abroad on post-selection study courses in 1961, to the following countries: United Kingdom, 70; India, 4; Israel, 4; Australia, 3; Canada, 2; and United States and Europe, 1.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

The production of sugar, on which the economy of Mauritius is dependent, was 552,733 metric tons in 1961, compared with 235,578 in 1960 and 580,400 in 1959. The decrease was caused by cyclone damage.

The balance of trade was again adverse in 1961, with exports valued at 92.1 per cent of imports; but the margin was smaller than in 1960, when exports were only 55.7 per cent of imports. In 1959 the balance was favourable, with exports 101 per cent of imports.

The new development programme was formulated, with emphasis on the repair of cyclone damage, the building of cyclone-proof houses, and diversification of the Territory's economy.

The total controlled catch of fish was 1,487 long tons in 1961, compared with 1,368 in 1960 and 1,299 in 1959.

POWER AND INDUSTRY

As a result of the 1960 cyclones, the Central Electricity Board abandoned all new development work during 1961 except that for industrial and commercial supplies of national importance, and applied all available resources to the provision of additional generating capacity and to the reconstruction and strengthening of existing generating networks. A new hydro scheme, Eau Bleue, started producing in April 1961, and by the end of the year had generated more than 4.5 million kwh.

Prolonged drought conditions throughout the first part of the year reduced the annual hydro production to only 30 per cent of total requirements, the shortfall being made up by the St. Louis thermal station.

Power generated in 1961 by five hydroelectric and two thermal stations of the Central Electricity Board and six private stations in sugar factories totalled 63.2 million kwh, compared with 54.7 million kwh in 1960 and 55.9 million kwh in 1959.

Provision was made for loans up to a total of Rs. 27,500,000<sup>1/</sup> to help secondary industries and to meet the cost of an agricultural marketing board.

CULTURAL INSTITUTIONS AND MASS COMMUNICATIONS

The Territory has six public libraries and a British Council library. The Mauritius Institute comprises three museums, five scientific and cultural societies and a public library.

Approximately forty newspapers and periodicals were circulated in the Territory during 1961. Of the single-language publications, those in French had the largest circulation (15,000), followed by Hindi (10,000), Chinese (6,500) and English (700). Of the multi-lingual publications, those in French and English had by far the largest circulation (57,000). Other multi-lingual publications combined French and English with languages such as Creole (5,000), Hindi, Urdu and Tamil (3,000), Arabic (2,000) and Urdu (1,500).

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

POLITICAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL INFORMATION ON AFRICAN AND ADJACENT TERRITORIES UNDER UNITED KINGDOM ADMINISTRATIONNote by the Secretary-General

MAURITIUS

In accordance with the statement of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland on 27 September 1961, the Government of the United Kingdom has transmitted to the Secretary-General the following political and constitutional information on the Territory of Mauritius.

This information, which was received on 13 March 1963, is herewith submitted to the General Assembly at its eighteenth session.<sup>1/</sup>

POPULATION

1. Mauritius is a small, densely populated Territory in the Indian Ocean inhabited by people of mixed origin. The estimated population of Mauritius at 31 December 1960 was 648,850. It was uninhabited as late as the early nineteenth century. The proportion of the various racial groups is roughly as follows:

	(per cent)
Indian descent . . . . .	67
Chinese descent . . . . .	4
"General" population (European and African descent) . . . . .	29

There are fewer than 1,000 persons of British origin in Mauritius.

STATUS AND PREVIOUS HISTORY

2. Mauritius is a Territory with a considerable measure of internal self-government. Its present Constitution is based on the result of discussions which took place in July 1961 between the British Government and representatives of the major political parties in Mauritius, including Dr. Ramgoolam, the present Chief Minister. At that time, the Territory already had a majority of elected members in the Legislative and Executive Councils; the former had forty elected members, up to twelve nominated members and three ex officio members, while the latter consisted of the Governor, who presided, seven elected and two nominated members and three ex officio members. The elected members of the Executive Council, like the nominated and ex officio members, each had responsibility over one or more departments of government, and thus had a considerable share in the supervision of the administration of the Territory, as well as a full share in policy making.

3. As a result of the 1961 Constitutional Conference, it was agreed inter alia that the leader of the majority party in the Legislature would be given the title of Chief Minister, and that the Governor would consult the Chief Minister on such matters as the appointment and removal of ministers, the allocation of portfolios and the summoning, proroguing and dissolution of the Legislature.

CONSTITUTION

Governor

4. The Governor (at present Sir John Rennie) is the Queen's representative and the formal head of the Government. As head of the executive he normally acts on the advice of the Executive Council, special procedure including a report to the British Government, being required in any case where he does not. His assent is required for laws passed by the Legislative Council and is normally given.

Executive Council

5. The Constitution which is now in force provides for an Executive Council consisting of a Chief Minister and twelve other ministers, under the chairmanship of the Governor. This Council is collectively responsible for the direction and control of the Government of the Territory. The Government appoints as Chief Minister that member of the Legislative Council who is able to command a majority.

6. The present composition of the Executive Council, under the chairmanship of the Governor, is as follows:

Dr. S. Ramgoolam <sup>a/</sup>	... Chief Minister and Minister of Finance
Mr. A. Peejadhur <sup>a/</sup>	... Minister of Education and Cultural Affairs
Mr. S. Boolell <sup>a/</sup>	..... Minister of Agriculture and Natural Resources
Mr. J.G. Forget <sup>a/</sup>	..... Minister of Health and Reform Institutions
Mr. F. Laventure <sup>b/</sup>	... Minister of Local Government and Co-operative Development
Mr. A.R. Mohamed <sup>c/</sup>	... Minister of Housing, Lands and Town and Country Planning
Mr. J.M. Patura <sup>b/</sup>	.... Minister of Industry, Commerce and External Communications
Mr. V. Ringadoo <sup>a/</sup>	.... Minister of Labour and Social Security
Mr. H.E. Walter <sup>a/</sup>	.... Minister of Works and Internal Communications
Mr. A.M. Osman <sup>c/</sup>	..... Minister of Information, Posts, Telegraph and Telecommunications
Mr. M. Lavoipierre	... Attorney-General
Mr. T.D. Vickers	..... Chief Secretary
Mr. A.F. Bates	..... Financial Secretary

All ministers except the last two named are Mauritians.

Legislature

7. The Mauritius Legislature is uni-cameral and consists of a Legislative Council of fifty-five members, of whom forty are elected, twelve are nominated and three are officials. It has power to legislate for all aspects of the internal affairs of the Territory and controls its budget and taxation. The Council may be prorogued at any time by the Governor acting on ministerial advice. The Governor's powers to dissolve the Legislature are the same as the conventions applying to the exercise of the power of dissolution by the Queen in the United Kingdom. The Legislative Council may deal with any type of legislation. All members of the Legislature are Mauritians except for two of the official members.

ELECTORAL SYSTEM

8. The electoral system is based on universal adult suffrage. Forty of the members of the Legislative Council are elected in single-member constituencies, the candidate polling the largest number of votes winning the seat. Elections are held every five years.

9. The last elections were held in March 1959 and yielded the following results:

Parties	Candidates	Results	Percentage of votes
Labour Party (leader: Dr. S. Ramgoolam) .....	32	23	46.7
Muslim Committee of Action (leader: Mr. A.R. Mohamed) .....	7	5	8.6
Independent Forward Bloc (leader: Mr. S. Bissoondoyal) ....	29	6	18.7
Parti Mauricien (leader: Mr. J. Koenig) .....	22	3	15.0
Trade Unionist .....	2	2
Independent Labour Party .....	7	-	1.5
Independents .....	61	1	9.5
Total	160	40	100.0

10. In terms of communities the result was the election of twenty-four Hindus, five Muslims, eleven Europeans and others, which corresponds roughly to the proportions of the electorate into which the population is commonly divided.

JUDICIARY

11. The laws of Mauritius are mainly based on old French codes (Civil Code, the Penal Code, the Code of Commerce and the Code of Civil Procedure). However, a number of more recent laws are based on English precedents, such as the Bankruptcy Law, the Company Law, the Law of Evidence, the Law of Criminal Procedure and the Labour Laws. The highest judicial authority is the Supreme Court, which has similar powers, authority and jurisdiction to the High Court of Justice in England. It consists of a Chief Justice and three puisne judges. Appeals lie to the Court of Criminal Appeal (which is constituted by three of the judges of the Supreme Court) and in certain cases to the Privy Council in England.
12. There is an Intermediate Criminal Court consisting of three senior magistrates, which has jurisdiction to try criminal cases and power to impose sentence of up to five years of penal servitude. In addition, there are eleven magistrates who preside over the several district courts which deal with less serious offences.
13. All the judges and all the magistrates are of local origin.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

14. There is a well-established system of local government in Mauritius. The capital (Port Louis) is a municipality; its membership of sixteen is wholly elected. There are town councils in Curepipe, Beau Bassin/Rose Hill and Quatre Bornes; the majority of the members of these councils are elected. The franchise for municipal and town council elections is on the basis of universal adult suffrage, and certain taxpayers' qualifications. Rural local government is based on village councils of which there are more than 100. They consist of not less than seven and not more than nine members elected on a liberal franchise with three members appointed by the Governor, and they exercise the normal local government functions of road repairs, bridge construction, supervision of markets, water supplies etc. In addition, there are district councils which co-ordinate and supervise the work of village councils in their area. These consist of fifteen members, including ten chairmen of village councils elected by and from village councils in the district, and five persons appointed by the Governor.

INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 (e) OF THE CHARTER: REPORT OF
THE AD HOC COMMITTEE

(Item 28 (b) of the Provisional Agenda of the Second Regular Session)

Rapporteur: Dr. Guy PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba)

I. Constitution of the Committee

The General Assembly, by a Resolution adopted on December 14, 1946 during the second part of the first session, appointed an ad hoc Committee on the transmission of information under Article 73 (e) of the Charter. This Committee met at Lake Success from August 28 to September 12, 1947.

The terms of reference of the Committee are laid down in the same Resolution, 66 (I), of the General Assembly. In particular, this Resolution invited the ad hoc Committee:

"to examine the Secretary-General's summary and analysis of the information transmitted under Article 73 (e) of the Charter with a view to aiding the General Assembly in its consideration of this information, and with a view to making recommendations to the General Assembly regarding the procedures to be followed in the future and the means of ensuring that the advice, expert knowledge and experience of the specialized agencies are used to the best advantage."

The Committee was composed of 16 representatives. Eight represented the following Governments transmitting information under Article 73 (e): Australia, Belgium, Denmark, France, Netherlands, New Zealand, United Kingdom and the United States of America. The other eight were representatives of the following Members elected by the General Assembly: Brazil, China, Cuba, Egypt, India, Philippine Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Uruguay. In accordance with Resolution 66 (I), the following specialized agencies sent representatives in an advisory capacity: the Food and Agriculture Organization, the International Labour Organization, the Interim Commission of the World Health Organization and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. The International Civil Aviation Organization was similarly represented at a few meetings in accordance with its agreement with the United Nations.

The officers elected by the Committee were Sir Carl Berendsen (New Zealand), Chairman, Brigadier General Carlos P. Romulo (Philippine Republic), Vice-Chairman, and Dr. Guy Perez Cisneros (Cuba), Rapporteur.

II. Agenda

The Provisional Agenda submitted to the Committee for its approval contained the following items:

1. Examination of the Secretary-General's analyses of the information transmitted by Members under Article 73 (e) of the Charter on education, labour, public health and agriculture.
2. Examination of the Secretary-General's summaries by territories.
3. Examination of the recommendations to be made to the General Assembly regarding:

"the procedures to be followed in the future and the means of ensuring that the advice, expert knowledge and experience of the specialized agencies are used to the best advantage."

On a proposal by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Committee decided by 12 votes to 0 to add the following two items to the Agenda:

1. The examination of the standards of living of the local, European and other populations.
2. The examination of birth and death rates.

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics also proposed an amendment to include the examination of the participation of local populations in local organs of government. A sub-amendment submitted by the representative of the United States of America was adopted by 11 votes to 1 (France), whereby the Soviet Union amendment was adopted in the following terms:

"Such information as may be transmitted on participation of the local populations in local organs of government."

On the same subject the representative of the Philippine Republic proposed to include in the Agenda the analysis of information on political progress; but after the adoption of the Soviet Union proposal as amended by the representative of the United States this proposal was withdrawn.

Furthermore, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics proposed that the analysis of agricultural information should be included in the final Agenda under a new item of analysis of economic information; this proposal was adopted by 10 votes to 0, with 4 abstentions.

Finally, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics proposed the examination of petitions received from peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Soviet Union proposal was rejected by 11 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions.

Thus, the final Agenda included the analyses of information of three new subjects: standards of living, birth and death rates, and the question of the participation of local populations in local organs of government. The Committee did not feel that the material before it would enable a full examination of the new points to be undertaken. In this sense, the Agenda as amended was adopted by 14 votes to 0.

III. Continuation of the possible transmission of information of a political nature

An important debate took place on the question of political information. The provision of the Charter governing the transmission of information to the Secretary-General is as follows:

"to transmit regularly to the Secretary-General for information purposes, subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations may require, statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social, and educational conditions in the territories for which they are responsible other than those territories to which Chapters XII and XIII apply."

/The different

The different points of view expressed may be summarized as follows: the representatives of China, Egypt, India, the Philippine Republic and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics considered that the analysis of the political progress of Non-Self-Governing peoples was a matter which could properly be submitted for consideration by the Committee, as it was held impossible to separate economic and social factors from political considerations; the representatives of Egypt and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics considered that information with regard to promoting self-government should be obligatory in accordance with their interpretation of Article 73 (e) of the Charter.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, France, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay thought that the analysis of information on political matters was outside the terms of reference of the Committee; that the precise definition of such information would, by its very nature, preclude unanimous agreement; and in fact, the Secretariat had not submitted any analysis of such information to the Committee.

Finally, agreement was reached that the responsible Members might, on their own initiative, transmit information concerning the development of self governing institutions to the Secretary-General. It was noted that certain Members had already transmitted such information described by some as political and there would be no objection to its inclusion in the summary of information by the Secretary-General for information purposes.

This agreement of the Committee was expressed in the form of a joint proposal by the representatives of China, Cuba and India and adopted by the Committee by 8 votes to 0, with 3 abstentions. The proposal stated:

"considering that the voluntary transmission of information by some administering powers in regard to the development of self-governing institutions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories" are "entirely in conformity with the spirit of Article 73 of the Charter," and should "be therefore duly noted and encouraged."

The Committee rejected the following four points of a proposal submitted by the Soviet representative:

- requesting the Administering Authority to give detailed data on the participation of the population in the local organs of administration (10 votes against, 5 for);
- requesting the Secretary-General to transmit the information from local organizations, individual persons and groups of the Non-Self Governing Territories (10 votes against, 4 for, 1 abstention);
- considering it necessary to send representatives of the United Nations to the spot each year to familiarize themselves with living conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories (10 votes against, 4 for, 1 abstention);
- authorizing the Committee to examine petitions from the local populations (10 votes against, 4 for, 1 abstention).

During the debate, the opinion was expressed that the implementation of such proposals would be contrary to the principle of the Charter regarding matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the Members.

IV. Examination of the Summaries and Analyses of Information Transmitted

In spite of the fact that the Chairman had on several occasions pointed out that the work of the Committee was concerned essentially with questions of procedure, the debates on the analyses prepared by the Secretary-General ranged further afield, as some members took the view that, in addition to the question of procedure, the Committee was competent also to discuss the question of analyses and summaries of the information supplied in order to aid the General Assembly. The situation in Non-Self-Governing Territories and the problems existing there were the objects of much critical comment on the part of the representatives of China, Egypt, India and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The representatives of Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories replied to these criticisms and in general maintained their position, that many of these criticisms were unfounded and that some of these questions were outside the competence of the Committee. Nevertheless, the representatives of the administering powers made it clear that they would welcome any constructive help in the improvement of existing conditions in their territories.

In the discussion on the analyses the following general considerations emerged: several members of the Committee agreed with the method followed by the Secretary-General in the preparation of the analysis of information by subjects. The debates on the Agenda, however, had already shown that the Committee deemed it necessary to receive all essential information and that analyses should be prepared on subjects other than those dealt with by the Secretariat, which only related to labour, education, public health, and agriculture.

The Committee, while appreciating the action taken by the countries transmitting information under Article 73 (e) in supplying such documentation for the first time, considered that the information transmitted to date did not give a sufficiently clear picture of the conditions of life of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The representatives of countries administering Non-Self-Governing Territories tried to see how these requests could best be met. They remarked that a choice of subjects was necessarily involved in transmitting information, but that fuller and more detailed information could be found in official publications.

Two distinct questions were thus brought out:

1. That of supplemental information which is dealt with in the following section, and
2. That of a fuller and more standardized form which might be used as a basis for the presentation of information transmitted under Article 73 (e); this question was settled when the Committee approved with certain amendments, a standard form for the guidance of Members in the preparation of information to be transmitted. This form, submitted by the representative of the United States, is a detailed outline with regard to the subjects mentioned in Article 73 (e) and including under an optional category questions regarding political and administrative subjects.

/a standard

The representatives of the specialized agencies, at the invitation of the Chairman, took an active part in the examination of the analyses of the information transmitted. Their suggestions led to a number of amendments to the form submitted by the representative of the United States.

The first part of the standard form relates to general information, certain parts of which are of a political and administrative nature; the transmission of this type of information is optional. The other parts refer to economic, social and educational conditions in accordance with the subjects enumerated in Article 73 (e). Recommendations were adopted by the Committee relating to the standard form as a whole. These recommendations were proposed by the representatives of Australia, Egypt, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United Kingdom.

The standard form was finally adopted unanimously by the Committee.

The standard form is headed by a preamble and a draft resolution for submission to the General Assembly. This draft resolution, submitted originally by the Cuban representative, assumed its final form after amendments proposed by the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom.

It is recommended:

1. "That the Governments transmitting information under Article 73 (e) of the Charter be invited to undertake all necessary steps to render the information as complete and up to date as possible in order to facilitate the completion of the Secretary-General's summaries and analyses of this information as described in paragraph 2, and, for this purpose, to ensure that the items mentioned in Sections II, III, and IV of the Annex be covered as far as applicable in the territories concerned."

/2. "That the

2. "That the Secretary-General in submitting annually to the General Assembly his summary and analysis of the information required under Article 73 (e), including the use of supplemental information as recommended in a later resolution should in his analyses follow, as far as practicable, the outline contained in Annex I to this recommendation, and should include summaries of such information as may be transmitted on the participation by local populations in local organs of government."

Finally, the Committee wished to include in its report some parts of a recommendation submitted by the representative of India, which, in its view, reflected its opinion regarding the presentation of information and the method to be followed in its use;

- the functional treatment followed by the Secretary-General in the analysis of information by subjects is useful;
- the Governments transmitting information have undertaken to examine the means by which more complete information may be transmitted in the future;
- the statements containing explanations of the reasons for which information in respect of certain territories enumerated in General Assembly Resolution 66 (I) had not been received, merit the attention of the General Assembly.

The representatives of France and of the United Kingdom had in fact indicated the reasons why information on certain territories had not been transmitted this year; in some cases, it was due to unavoidable delay, owing to the circumstances resulting from the war and the inevitable administrative delays, and the information would be transmitted next year; in other cases, it was due to constitutional changes which, in the view of the responsible governments, meant that certain territories were no longer Non-Self-Governing Territories.

V. Supplemental Information

This question was raised by the representative of India in the following general form: the use by the Secretary-General of official documents other than those transmitted under Article 73 (e) would be of great help to him in carrying out his task.

/The discussions

The discussions brought out the numerous problems which would arise by such use. Finally, two draft resolutions were laid before the Committee, one, by the representative of the United States, and the other by the representative of Cuba; a third version was submitted by the representative of India to which amendments were proposed by the representatives of Denmark, the Netherlands, and the Philippine Republic.

After preliminary discussion, a sub-committee composed of the representatives of Cuba and the United States prepared a working paper which took in the various points raised in the general discussion. This working paper was further amended in the meeting, and its final text contained the following points:

1. The Secretary-General may use official publications of the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, giving appropriate citation of sources.
2. The use of such information is limited to the subjects treated in the information required in Article 73 (e).
3. Its use is subject to consent on the part of the Governments concerned.
4. Not only official governmental publications are considered but also publications issued by inter-governmental or scientific organizations, provided always that the Secretary-General's use be limited to subjects treated in Article 73 (e) and that the responsible governments give prior consent.
5. The Secretary-General is asked to communicate the supplemental information to the specialized agencies.
6. Paragraph 6 of the Draft Recommendation to the General Assembly reads as follows:

"for purposes of comparison the Secretary-General should be authorized, in addition, to include in his summaries and analyses all relevant and comparable official statistical information as is available in the statistical services of the Secretariat and as may be agreed upon between the Secretary-General and Member States, giving appropriate citation of sources."

Points 4 and 6 of the foregoing proposal derived from proposals submitted by the representatives of the Philippine Republic and Denmark respectively. The original text of the Danish proposal read: "the Member States, the territories of which offer a natural basis for comparison with the Non-Self-Governing Territories as to economic, social and educational conditions, be invited on request of the Secretary-General to supply him with such statistical and other information of a technical nature as may serve the purpose of comparison."

The principle contained in the last paragraph of the adopted text - paragraph 6 - was supported by the representatives of Australia, Denmark, France, Netherlands, the United Kingdom, the United States, and Uruguay, who emphasized the advantages of such comparisons on the grounds that economic, social and educational problems were not confined to Non-Self-Governing Territories, and could therefore only be evaluated in the light of world conditions. Such an evaluation might be a considerable benefit to the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The Netherlands representative thought that comparative data from autonomous countries would be of help to the administering powers, especially when comparative tables could be drawn up for adjoining territories in Africa or Asia.

The representatives of China, Cuba and Egypt stated formally that they opposed the consideration and adoption of paragraph 6. They thought that this question was outside the competence of the Committee, and that it would not be possible to deal with it under Article 73 (e). They also considered that it was absolutely impossible to make useful comparisons between sovereign states and Non-Self-Governing Territories simply on the basis of statistics. The benefits that some representatives thought would result from the paragraph originating in the Danish proposal should, according to them, be derived from the work of Committees 2 and 3 of the General Assembly, and of the Economic and Social Council in application of Articles 55 and 60 of the Charter. The representative of Cuba further pointed out that an excess of information would have the same deplorable result as a lack of information.

The Soviet Union representative suggested that the information submitted in accordance with paragraph 6 should contain statistical data on social, educational and health problems in order to make comparisons, on the one hand, between the local and European population in Non-Self-Governing Territories, and on the other, between the peoples of the metropolitan countries of the administering powers and those of their Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The entire resolution, in its final form, was adopted by 12 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions. The representatives of Cuba, Egypt, India, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, reserved their position in regard to certain items, especially paragraph 6. They pointed out that they might return to this question during the debate in the General Assembly.

VI. Use of the advice, expert knowledge and experience of the specialized agencies

The Committee was required to consider paragraph 6 of Resolution 66 (I), in which it was invited by the General Assembly to:

"make recommendations to the General Assembly regarding the procedures to be followed in the future and the means of ensuring that the advice, expert knowledge and experience of the specialized agencies are used to the best advantage."

This part of the recommendation was included in item 5 of the Agenda.

The representative of the International Labour Organization gave one concrete example of the intricate problem which faced the Committee. The interval between June 30, the deadline for transmission of information, and the normal date of the opening of the ordinary session of the General Assembly made it difficult for the specialized agencies to play the part expected of them by the General Assembly.

The Committee concluded that it could not set out in detail the machinery of liaison between the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies, but it wished to give certain general indications to be included in a draft recommendation in which the Secretary-General is invited to enter into relations with the secretariats of the specialized agencies in order to allow them:

1. to assist the Secretary-General of the United Nations in preparing analyses of the information required under Article 73 (e) of the Charter on a functional basis;
2. through the appropriate channels, to make recommendations to the General Assembly with respect to the form and content of this information with a view to incorporating therein the informational needs of the specialized agencies; and
3. through the appropriate channels, to bring to the notice of the General Assembly conclusions, based on this information and supplemental information, as to the conditions, within their respective fields of interest, of Non-Self-Governing Territories generally and particularly as to the services which the specialized agencies might make available to the administering nations in improving these conditions.

This draft resolution originated from proposals submitted by the representatives of Cuba and Denmark. The Committee decided unanimously that the final text should be drafted by a sub-committee consisting of the Rapporteur and the representative of Belgium.

VII. Proposal to establish a special committee

The question arose how, in the future, the examination could be conducted of the Secretary-General's summaries and analyses of the information transmitted under Article 73 (e) of the Charter in order to facilitate the work of the General Assembly.

The representative of India submitted a proposal, the general sense of which was adopted by the representative of the United States, in a form which, in the opinion of the Committee, was preferable in its legal aspects.

After some amendments proposed by the representatives of Australia and Cuba, this final form was adopted by the Committee.

The establishment of a special committee is proposed to the General Assembly. This committee will be composed of Members transmitting information, and an equal number of Members elected by the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly, on as wide a geographical basis as possible.

The committee is to meet as the General Assembly may decide.

The following would be the terms of reference of the special committee:

1. to avail itself of the advice and assistance of the specialized agencies in such manner as it may consider necessary or expedient;
2. to establish liaison with the Economic and Social Council;
3. to invite the Governments to provide such supplemental information as appears desirable within the scope of Article 73 (e).

DRAFT RESOLUTIONS SUBMITTED FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

I

DRAFT RESOLUTION CONCERNING A PROVISIONAL STANDARD FORM FOR THE GUIDANCE OF MEMBERS IN THE PREPARATION OF INFORMATION TO BE TRANSMITTED
UNDER ARTICLE 73 (e) OF THE CHARTER

THE AD HOC COMMITTEE:

NOTES with appreciation the action taken by the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories in transmitting information under Article 73 (e) when preparing these documents for the first time;

CONSIDERS that the information transmitted up to this date does not draw a sufficiently clear picture of the living conditions of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories; and in view of this fact

HOPES that the provisional standard form contained in the Annex of the following proposed resolution will be followed to the fullest extent in the preparation of information in the future, AND RECOMMENDS to the General Assembly the adoption of the following resolution

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY RECOMMENDS:

1. That the Governments transmitting information under Article 73 (e) of the Charter be invited to undertake all necessary steps to render the information as complete and up to date as possible in order to facilitate the completion of the Secretary-General's summaries and analyses of the information as described in paragraph 2, and, for this purpose, to ensure that the items mentioned in Sections II, III and IV of the Annex be covered as far as applicable in the territories concerned. The Assembly also draws attention to Section I of the Annex.

/2. That

2. That the Secretary-General in submitting annually to the General Assembly his summary and analysis of the information required under Article 73 (e), including the use of supplemental information as recommended in a later resolution should in his analyses follow as far as practicable the standard form contained in Annex I to this recommendation, and should include summaries of such information as may be transmitted on the participation by local populations in local organs of government.

II

DRAFT RESOLUTION CONCERNING SUPPLEMENTAL DOCUMENTS

THE AD HOC COMMITTEE

RECOMMENDS to the General Assembly the adoption of the following resolution.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY RECOMMENDS:

1. That, in order to present in the best possible manner the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 (e) of the Charter, the Secretary-General may use official publications of the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, in addition to the information transmitted under Article 73 (e), giving appropriate citation of sources.
2. That the Secretary-General's use of data derived from the official publications mentioned in paragraph 1 shall be limited to the subjects treated in the information required in Article 73 (e).
3. That only such publications shall be used as may be transmitted or notified to the Secretary-General by the administering Member or Members concerned.
4. That for the same end, the Secretary-General may use the documents published by inter-governmental or scientific bodies on matters relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories, subject to the provisions of paragraphs 2 and 3.
5. That, in addition to the information transmitted under Article 73 (e), the above-mentioned supplemental information should be communicated to the appropriate specialized agencies through the intermediary of the Secretary-General.

6. That, for purposes of comparison the Secretary-General should be authorized in addition, to include in his summaries and analyses all relevant and comparable official statistical information as is available in the statistical services of the Secretariat and as may be agreed upon between the Secretary-General and the Member concerned, giving appropriate citation of sources.

DRAFT RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE VOLUNTARY TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION REGARDING THE DEVELOPMENT OF SELF-GOVERNING INSTITUTIONS IN THE NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

THE AD HOC COMMITTEE

CONSIDERING that the voluntary transmission of information by some administering powers in regard to the development of self-governing institutions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and its summarizing by the Secretary-General are entirely in conformity with the spirit of Article 73
of the Charter,

RECOMMENDS to the General Assembly the adoption of the following resolution.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY,

HAVING NOTED that some powers responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories already have voluntarily transmitted information on the development of self-governing institutions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories,

CONSIDERS that the voluntary transmission of such information and its summarizing by the Secretary-General are entirely in conformity with the spirit of Article 73 of the Charter, and be therefore duly noted and encouraged.

IV

DRAFT RESOLUTION CONCERNING COLLABORATION WITH THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

THE AD HOC COMMITTEE

NOTING that the debates of the present committee have clearly indicated the necessity of continued consultations by the Secretary-General with the secretariats of the specialized agencies, in order to enable the Secretary-General to fulfill the functions deriving from Article 73 (e) of the Charter and from Resolution 66 (I) paragraph 6 of the General Assembly dated 14 December 1946, RECOMMENDS to the General Assembly the adoption of the following resolution.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

INVITES the Secretary-General to enter into relations with the secretariats of the specialized agencies in order to allow them:

- (1) to assist the Secretary-General of the United Nations in preparing analyses of the information required under Article 73 (e) of the Charter on a functional basis;
- (2) through the appropriate channels to make recommendations to the General Assembly with respect to the form and content of the information with a view to incorporating therein the informational needs of the specialized agencies; and
- (3) through the appropriate channels, to bring to the notice of the General Assembly conclusions, based on this information and supplemental information, as to the conditions, within their respective fields of interest, of Non-Self-Governing Territories generally and particularly as to the services which the specialized agencies might make available to the administering nations in improving these conditions.

V

THE CREATION OF A SPECIAL COMMITTEE

THE AD HOC COMMITTEE

in pursuance of Resolution No. 66 (i) adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 14 December 1946, RECOMMENDS to the General Assembly the adoption of the following resolution.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY:

- (1) INVITES the Fourth Committee to constitute a special committee to examine the information transmitted under Article 73 (e) of the Charter on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and to submit reports thereon for the consideration of the General Assembly with such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit, and with such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual territories;
- (2) AUTHORIZES for this purpose this special committee -
  - (a) to avail itself of the counsel and assistance of the specialized agencies in such manner as it may consider necessary or expedient;
  - (b) to establish liaison with the Economic and Social Council;
  - (c) to invite the Governments to provide such supplemental information as may be desired within the terms of Article 73 (e); and
- (3) CONSIDERS that the special committee should be composed of the Members of the United Nations transmitting information and an equal number of members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly on as wide a geographical basis as possible, the Members to meet as the General Assembly may decide.

V. Pictorial Material (if available)

Notes Relating to the Standard Form as a Whole

1. In cases where under the provisions of any general convention on any economic, social or educational subject information is transmitted to a central international agency by Member States parties to such convention, the transmission of a copy of such information to the Secretary-General of the United Nations would be considered as applicable in discharge of the obligation under Article 73 (e) in respect of that subject. It is also to be hoped that international bodies requiring information on Non-Self-Governing Territories, including those to which reports are made under international conventions, will co-operate as may be necessary and desired in order that their informational needs may be satisfied through the information, including supplemental data, supplied under Article 73 (e) to the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

/the transmission

2. Wherever relevant information exists in published form, there would be no need for the government to reproduce that information - a chapter and page reference to the publication in question (with communication of the publication itself, where necessary) would suffice.

3. Information already furnished on a previous occasion need not be repeated.

4. Whenever appropriate and possible, statistics should be classified under indigenous and non-indigenous.

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER (2-29 September 1948)

I. Constitution of the Special Committee

During the second regular session, the General Assembly on 3 November 1947 adopted resolution 146 (II) which invited its Fourth Committee to constitute a special committee to examine the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

The terms of reference of the Committee are stated in the aforesaid resolution as follows:

"To examine the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and to submit reports thereon for the consideration of the General Assembly with such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit, and with such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories."

The Committee met in Geneva, from 2 to 17 September 1948, and held meetings in Paris on 23 and 29 September.

The Committee consisted of sixteen Members, comprising the eight Members transmitting information and an equal number of Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly.

Members transmitting information:

Australia, Belgium, Denmark, France, Netherlands, New Zealand, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Elected Members:

China, Colombia, Cuba, Egypt, India, Nicaragua, Sweden, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Under resolution 146 (II) the Special Committee was authorized to avail itself of the counsel and assistance of the specialized agencies. Representatives of the following agencies attended the meetings and took part in the discussions affecting the work of their organizations:

World Health Organization (WHO), International Labour Office (ILO) and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO).

II. Officers

The officers elected by the Committee were:

Chairman: Mr. Cheng Paonan (China);

Vice-Chairman: Mr. B. Gutiérrez (Colombia);

Rapporteur: Mr. H. Lannung (Denmark).

The Drafting Sub-Committee was composed of the representatives of Cuba, France, India, New Zealand, the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The Rapporteur was an ex-officio member without right to vote, and was elected chairman.

III. Agenda

The Committee adopted the provisional agenda without change, with the understanding that item 4, which provided for the appointment of the Drafting Sub-Committee, would be implemented at such time as appeared appropriate after the discussion of items 5 and 6. The full agenda is annexed as appendix A of the present report and may be found on page 12.

IV. Territories enumerated

The representatives of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics called attention to the inclusion in the summaries and analyses prepared by the Secretary-General of information relating to the Republic of Indonesia transmitted by the Netherlands Government. He proposed that the information should not be considered by the Committee, as the Republic of Indonesia had been established as an independent State by the will of its people.

It was stated on behalf of the Secretariat that under the terms of the General Assembly resolutions, the Secretary-General had no option but to summarize and analyse any information transmitted under Article 73 e by Members of the United Nations in relation to economic, social and educational conditions.

The Netherlands representative said that according to the so-called Renville Agreement the sovereignty throughout the whole of the Netherlands Indies, in which the Republic of Indonesia was included, was and would remain with the Netherlands until it was transferred to the United States of Indonesia which would be formed.

Various members contended that it was beyond the competence of the Committee, as resulting from its terms of reference, to exclude from consideration by the Committee any information which had in fact been transmitted under Article 73 e and which was in fact before it in the documents circulated by the Secretary-General. It was further contended by a number of members that in any case the Committee had no power to decide upon the Territories in respect of which information should be transmitted. Some members believed that the question of the Territories in respect of which information should be transmitted, was a matter for the consideration of the General Assembly and the view was also expressed that it was a matter on which the International Court of Justice might be asked for an opinion. The United Kingdom representative said that in the view of his Government, the determination of such Territories for the purposes of Article 73 e lay exclusively with each metropolitan Power in the light of its constitutional relationships with the Territories for whose international relations it was responsible. Any suggestion that the General Assembly should define the Territories within the scope of Article 73 e would involve a decision on constitutional relationships within the domestic jurisdiction of the metropolitan Power concerned which his Government could not accept. Nor could the United Kingdom Government agree that for the purposes of Article 73 e this question should be referred to the International Court of Justice. Certain other members could not accept the view that the determination of such Territories lay exclusively with the metropolitan Power. The representative of India in particular pointed out the obligatory character of the responsibilities of the metropolitan Power under Article 73 e in respect of any Territory inhabited by a people of a different race, culture and language, whose international relations and representation were under the direction of the metropolitan country and which did not enjoy the same basis of self-government as the metropolitan Government, particularly in respect of electoral qualifications and conditions of representation in the metropolitan legislature.

The representative of the United States of America considered that the proposal of the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics raised such far-reaching questions of principle that members should be given time to consider it, and on procedural grounds, with which the representatives of Denmark and New Zealand concurred, would vote against the proposal of the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics if it were put immediately. The representative of India, affirming that his country's sympathies were entirely with Indonesia, also concurred entirely on procedural grounds. The representative of China took the same view.

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics introduced his proposal in a resolution (A/AC.17/W.11) to withdraw from the agenda the discussion of information transmitted by the Government of the Netherlands in respect of the Republic of Indonesia, it being independent by the will of its people.

The representative of the Netherlands moved that this resolution was out of order on the ground that it was outside the competence of the Committee.

The Chairman, by application of the rules of procedure, gave priority to the Netherlands motion and the Committee decided by 8 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions that the USSR proposal was beyond the competence of the Committee.

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated his proposal was in full compliance with the rules of procedure, the functions of this Committee, the terms of Article 73 of the Charter and the resolutions of the General Assembly. In his opinion, the decision taken by the Committee ruling his proposal out of order was without legal foundation.

In another form the question of the Territories in respect of which information should be transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter was raised by the representative of India after the representative of France had stated that he would welcome an examination of this subject. In the working paper introduced by the representative of India (appendix B) it was suggested that steps should be taken to clarify the position so that an Administering Power might recognize the obligatory character of its responsibilities under Article 73 e in respect of Territories the non-self-governing status of which might be determined by the consideration of certain factors enumerated in the working paper.

V. The Secretary-General's summaries and analyses of information

It was stated on behalf of the Secretariat that the work of the Secretary-General had been facilitated by the Standard Form; that the summaries should be regarded as background papers to the analyses; and that the analyses were necessarily of a tentative and preliminary character. The Secretariat needed and looked forward to guidance from the Committee to determine the methods of presentation, as well as the points of emphasis to be employed in the future. Likewise the indication of particular subjects for special studies would be of value. They could be undertaken with the assistance of the specialized agencies where necessary.

Members expressed appreciation of the quantity and quality of the work produced by the Secretariat in the limited time at its disposal. Satisfaction was also expressed with the volume of information transmitted by the Administering Powers and some members expressed appreciation of improvements in this respect. It seemed that the information was more complete, and it was hoped that in each succeeding year the information transmitted would give a clearer picture of conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

General observations on the summaries and analyses were made prior to the debate on the respective functional fields.

The representative of India observed that the information elicited by the Standard Form should be presented in two parts: (a) information on the permanent features of the Territories; (b) information on the changing features.

Topics of considerable importance, such as land tenure, agricultural indebtedness, training facilities for agricultural personnel, and livestock problems, should be treated more fully in the analyses. The specialized agencies could be used to conduct sample surveys in selected areas, with the assistance and co-operation of the Administering Powers to determine the coefficient of error in the statistics.

The representative of Denmark suggested that all restrictions should be removed from the use by the Secretary-General of relevant official statistical data for purposes of evaluation and comparison. This would help to place the information against its proper background, to set up standards for progress and to enable the Non-Self-Governing Territories to learn of the nature of developments in neighbouring countries.

The representative of China supported the views of the representatives of Denmark and India, and envisaged improvement in future years in the collection of the information, which in turn would result in the transmission of more satisfactory information. He was impressed by the many plans of the Administering Authorities to overcome problems in the Territories. There should be regular reports showing the success or failure of these plans. The work of the Special Committee would be of great importance in this matter.

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that Article 73 and the resolutions of the General Assembly concerning information from Non-Self-Governing Territories had laid down the principles underlying the policy of the United Nations with regard to Non-Self-Governing Territories; and that the transmission of information should be considered as one of the means of carrying out this policy. The Committee, in his opinion, should examine the information in substance and prepare appropriate recommendations for the General Assembly. He objected to attempts to limit the scope of the Committee to procedural questions. The information concerning Non-Self-Governing Territories was incomplete and did not give a complete picture of the situation and in particular did not throw light on the question of the progress of the participation of the local populations in local organs of self-government. The Secretary-General should have the right to supplement the information received from official sources by information from private persons and local groups or organizations, and also by sending annually to the Non-Self-Governing Territories representatives of the United Nations to study the situation on the spot.

On behalf of the Secretariat it was observed that the general comments on the analyses fell into three classes:

- (1) Further improvement in the analytical presentation of statistical information;
- (2) Preparation of special studies, of which certain long-range studies might be undertaken in collaboration with the specialized agencies, and
- (3) The drawing of the attention of the Administering Powers to points which they might desire to amplify in future years.

A. ANALYSIS OF INFORMATION ON ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics held that economic and other information transmitted should be examined in relation to the question of the development of self-government which was the responsibility that Members administering Non-Self-Governing Territories had assumed under the Charter. Examination of the analyses showed no evidence of any such progress. The information was incomplete, was not presented in such form as to show progress in self-government, was more concerned with future plans and did not present a clear picture of existing conditions. The policies of the Administering Authorities showed a tendency to control the economy of the Territories for the benefit of the metropolitan countries. There was insufficient training of Native personnel and available training was so little that the Territories would never reach the stage where they could take control of their own affairs and become independent. The objective of colonial policy seemed to be to increase the export of foodstuffs and perpetuate the backward, one-sided economy of Non-Self-Governing Territories. Mechanization of agriculture had been confined to the European plantations; their proprietors owned the best land, while the Natives had been driven into reservations which more appropriately might be called ghettos. Compulsory labour flourished in spite of international conventions against it. In West Africa Natives were compelled to grow certain crops. There was no evidence of intention on the part of the colonial Powers to develop Native industries. A characteristic feature of the Non-Self-Governing Territories was the preservation of a system of cheap labour and the acquisition of large profits by foreign capitalists. The problem of industrialization should be solved by the mobilization and utilization of the resources of the Non-Self-Governing Territories themselves as well as by assistance from more industrially developed States. Such assistance should not be accompanied by demands which might hinder the achievement of independence on the part of Non-Self-Governing Territories and should be realized within the framework of the United Nations.

Representatives of the Administering Powers stated that the Special Committee was not competent to supervise their activities in the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories. They contended that there were no grounds for the allegations of the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and they contrasted his remarks with the objective and constructive comments of the representative of India.

The representative of the United Kingdom denied charges of labour compulsion or that no industries had been set up in Africa. The general shortage of manufactured goods had developed an interest in the industrialization of colonial Territories. A speedy advance had been prevented by the shortage of capital, capital goods and skilled labour. He referred to the Territories where new industries had been established. The objectives of colonial food policy were first to increase production for home consumption and second to increase production of export crops; and in the economic development schemes the corporations created were by law required to safeguard the interests of the indigenous populations.

The representative of Belgium pointed to 246,000 industrial workers in the Belgian Congo and to the development of power stations as sufficient proof of the existence of industrial development. In fact, the textile and cement industries had been established with the help of the Belgian Government in the face of opposition from Belgian industrialists. But the Congo had to export in order to pay for imports. This was a simple law of classic economics.

The representative of France said that the advance in agriculture and nutrition in the French Non-Self-Governing Territories had been remarkable, taking account of conditions which prevailed on the assumption of French administration. Malnutrition, where it existed, was due to population increase, whereas under former conditions the population used to diminish. In both North and West Africa agricultural production had made gigantic strides. A population, in misery when France acquired these Territories, was today relatively prosperous. Where mineral resources existed, rapid progress in industrialization had been made. Forced labour did not exist in the French Union. French capital had produced notable results, and yet labour was protected from domination by monopolies. The flow of foreign capital to these Territories was necessary for their development.

In reference to the analysis on agriculture, it was stated on behalf of the Secretariat that FAO was conducting a World Food Census during the coming year, and that FAO had declared that in certain respects information on agriculture received under Article 73 e would provide the necessary data for the time being. In communicating the Standard Form the Secretary-General would indicate to the Administering Powers the use which would be made of it by FAO. This would have the advantage of avoiding duplication and would enable the Administering Powers to take account of the type of information desired by FAO.

B. ANALYSIS OF INFORMATION ON HEALTH CONDITIONS

Suggestions were made by the representative of India for the improvement of the information relating to public health. In particular, the information needed refinement in regard to infant mortality. Experience in India had shown the necessity for three classifications: (1) infants under 1 year of age; (2) between 1 and 5 years; (3) between 5 and 10 years. Statistics on maternal mortality and on expectancy of life would also be valuable. Information was also needed on the types of special hospitals. Experience in India had shown that a policy which emphasized preventive rather than curative medicine yielded greater results. The United Kingdom programme for the training of indigenous medical personnel was noted with the hope that such programmes would be extended in other Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representative of India emphasized the value of collaboration with WHO which might be asked to undertake studies on the topics mentioned.

He found it gratifying that WHO had already taken steps to make an expert study of the health section of the Standard Form.

The representative of Sweden emphasized the immense task which existed in the fields of child welfare, public health, nutrition and sanitation. He hoped that the resolutions recently passed by the International Children's Emergency Fund extending the Fund's activities to several Non-Self-Governing Territories would be helpful, as well as the work of WHO.

Representatives of the Administering Powers gave details of positive achievements in health work in the Non-Self-Governing Territories where, in many cases, the population had increased and much progress had been made in improving conditions of life. They pointed out that comparisons between health conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and conditions in countries where geographical and other factors were entirely different were unreasonable. It would be more just to consider the actual situations and to find out whether available resources were being used to the best advantage.

The representative of the United States of America also emphasized the importance of information on the training of medical staff. He suggested that a study be made of licensing practices with a view to permitting the use in Non-Self-Governing Territories of doctors in displaced persons camps whose talents were being wasted in the face of wide need for further medical services in many parts of the world. The representative of the United States of America also suggested that a comparative study of the methods used to train indigenous medical assistants might also be useful.

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the information on health was insufficient. It threw very little light on the existing situation, but contained much about future plans which might never be realized. He drew attention to statistics figuring in the information which according to his view showed deficiencies in respect of infant care, hospital facilities, staff and training. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics found the per capita expenditure on health insignificant and cited comparative figures between the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the metropolitan countries.

Representatives of the Administering Powers referred to information showing notable progress in public health, such as a marked decline in infant mortality in certain localities and the successful steps taken against certain tropical diseases.

The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that the figures of per capita expenditure on medical and health services as given in the Secretary-General's summaries and analyses did not take into account the large sums provided in the Public Works Department Estimates for expenditure on services, nor the very large sums provided by the Government of the United Kingdom for medical research, etc.

It was stated on behalf of the Secretariat that, as far as practicable, account would be taken of the points which it was desired should be brought out in future analyses, and of the value of making further use of comparative statistical information.

In particular, note was taken of the topics on which special studies were desired, including the question of the possibility of employing doctors with foreign degrees in Non-Self-Governing Territories. This last was a question on which the assistance of the specialized agencies would be greatly desirable, and in general, the assistance of the specialized agencies would be sought in all technical studies, while the Secretariat would concentrate on supplying the classified information which the agencies might need on the administration of public health policies and on training arrangements.

C. ANALYSIS OF INFORMATION ON LABOUR CONDITIONS

The discussions on these points require to be treated in some detail, since they cover the points on which it was suggested that more ample data is desired in the future information to be transmitted by the Members concerned and in the future analyses to be prepared by the Secretary-General.

Points for clarification which were stressed by the representative of India included such topics as the methods of computing wages, the periods of payment, the extent of payments in cash or in kind, provisions for housing and whether it was rent free. He inquired if employers supplied any social services for their workers such as schools, hospitals and guidance. Further information was also desirable on systems of contract employment, on the recruiting of labour and on regulations controlling these matters. As many Non-Self-Governing Territories were mainly agricultural, another problem of major interest was seasonal unemployment and under-employment and the relationship between owner and cultivator in share-cropping areas. He drew attention to differences in the trade union policies of certain of the Administering Powers and regretted certain features in the Belgian policy such as that limiting the unions to Belgian advisers. In this respect he commended the policy of the United Kingdom. He also reviewed the situation in respect of international labour conventions and deplored the large degree of non-application.

The representative of the ILO cited the report of an expert committee which showed noteworthy progress in the application of ratified conventions to Non-Self-Governing Territories. This question of the application of conventions was being watched through the regular machinery of the organization. He drew attention to the work performed by the ILO, providing technical assistance on labour problems, and expressed the hope that the Administering Powers would make use of this assistance for the benefit of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

Information was provided by representatives of Administering Powers in regard to labour developments and in particular in regard to trade union progress. The representative of the United Kingdom gave illustrations from Malaya and mentioned the extension of wage-fixing machinery in Territories where conditions were not conducive to trade union action. The representative of Belgium informed the Committee of certain details of new legislation introduced in the Congo and pointed to the absence of labour disputes since the introduction of this legislation. Similarly, the representative of France gave details of favourable trade union developments in French Territories and the action taken in application of international labour conventions.

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics deplored the lack of information on wages, on social security, on labour legislation and on female and child labour. He asked how the trade union movement could develop in the Territories when it was under the guidance of Europeans, as for instance in the Belgian Congo. The information dealt with the formal aspects, and not with actual labour conditions. There was no information on forced labour, recruitment and contracts, although these placed Natives at a great disadvantage. There was exploitation of Natives in the mines and an absence of protective social legislation. Wages were low and discriminatory. These conditions had led to serious strikes, and even to public disorder as in the Gold Coast. He spoke of racial discrimination in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He stated that the policy followed by the metropolitan Governments in respect of labour was contrary to the principles of the Charter.

Following this statement representatives of the Administering Powers again emphasized their policies. The representative of France said that any charge of exploitation could not apply to French Territories where racial discrimination was unknown. There had been strikes in some Territories. It was noteworthy, however, that these had been settled peacefully. The representative of the United Kingdom indicated that the legislation for proper trade union activities existed, that progress had been made, but that in some cases suitable leadership was lacking. Regarding the Gold Coast disturbances, he pointed out that the report of the Commission of Inquiry showed that the trade union movement in the Gold Coast had little complaint to make about wages and working conditions.

In the conclusion of the discussion on labour, it was stated on behalf of the Secretariat that the studies asked for by the representative of India would be considered. These studies, however, involved many detailed problems which could only be properly examined with the assistance of the ILO. It was noteworthy that, in regard to migrant labour, an ILO committee had already recommended that periodical reports should be furnished to the Special Committee for its information and it was to be presumed that such reports would soon be forthcoming. The Committee would, no doubt, also be interested in the ratification and application of the important international labour conventions concerning Non-Self-Governing Territories which had been adopted in 1947.

D. ANALYSIS OF INFORMATION ON SOCIAL WELFARE

The Secretary-General had submitted as an analysis an account of penal administration in certain British African Territories, and, as regards other aspects of social welfare, had limited himself to summaries of part of the information transmitted.

The representatives of India and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics complained of the meagre character of the analysis of this information. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics declared that the question of social welfare had not been prepared for discussion.

On behalf of the Secretariat, it was explained that the boundaries of social welfare were difficult to delimit and that, for this reason, the guidance of the Committee had been desired to determine the aspects to be covered. Furthermore, it had been necessary to wait until a suitable candidate could be discovered with expert knowledge in the field of social welfare in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The chief point raised in the Committee related to housing problems. The representative of India in particular asked for information on housing programmes and suggested that an international exhibition of types of houses and of building materials suitable for tropical conditions would be most useful. The representative of the United States of America also pointed out that many interesting experiments were being conducted in this field and that this Committee might well sponsor further work on this subject.

The representative of Belgium pointed out that here was a subject in which the constitutional status of Non-Self-Governing Territories was irrelevant. He referred to the meeting on tropical housing which had been held at Caracas and said that these matters constituted a problem of human needs and not one of political status.

Following this discussion, it was pointed out, on behalf of the Secretariat, that the United Nations was already planning a detailed study of problems of tropical housing covering many of the points to which particular allusion had been made. The Committee would not wish to duplicate this work but it might well be of value if the interest shown in tropical housing by this Committee could be brought to the attention of those studying tropical housing as a whole and if information on housing conditions and experiments in Non-Self-Governing Territories could be used in conjunction with the general studies.

Although no formal decision was taken on this point, it appeared that the Committee as a whole agreed with this course of action.

Other points made in relation to housing included a statement by the representative of the United Kingdom referring to a report containing a summary of housing and town planning in respect of Non-Self-Governing Territories and a statement by the representative of France on the progress of co-operative housing in Morocco and Tunisia.

Another point raised by the representative of India was the suggestion that UNESCO should undertake a study of the impact of Western civilization on non-Western peoples. Here again, it was pointed out that this was not a question limited to Non-Self-Governing Territories and that, in particular, it was a matter constantly under study by the International Institute of African Languages and Cultures.

A third point emphasized by the representative of India was the condition of women in the Non-

Self-Governing Territories, with special reference to non-official women's organizations tackling social, economic and educational problems. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the raising of the status of women was of special concern to welfare workers in Non-Self-Governing Territories, while the representative of France pointed out that international labour conventions concerning the employment of women had been applied to all French Territories.

The representative of Denmark referred to the criticisms levelled at the Administering Authorities. He said that social conditions in Greenland were, of course, not at the same level as in Denmark, due to conditions of the Arctic. Promoting the welfare of the Greenlanders had been the main object of Danish policy, and Denmark had not only derived no economic advantage for more than 100 years but was contributing considerable subsidies every year. Far-reaching plans were in operation, the ultimate aim being to bring Greenland to a high social level and, in general, on an equal footing with the rest of the Kingdom.

Summing up the discussion, the representative of China hoped that neither lack of staff nor budgetary considerations would be allowed to prevent the Secretariat from preparing adequate analyses of social conditions next year, and that where gaps existed in the information, the Administering Authorities would be able to supply more ample details.

E. ANALYSIS OF INFORMATION ON EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS

This discussion followed the same general course as the previous discussions and once again requires treatment in some detail as it indicates the points on which greater attention was suggested for the future.

It was requested by the representative of India that capital expenditure for school buildings should be shown separately from current educational expenditure. Experience in India had shown that capital expenditure was often wasted on the Western type of school buildings. Training of Natives should be undertaken on a wider scale, should not be confined to literary education but expanded to include professional training. It was encouraging to note the acceptance of the principle of Native participation by the United Kingdom and the United States in their use of Natives on advisory educational boards. It was not clear how far France and Belgium sought local advice. The wisdom of the French policy of prohibiting the use of Native languages was questionable; likewise that of Belgium in leaving the educational field exclusively in the hands of the missions. In contrast, the United Kingdom policy in the British West Indies was noted.

The representative of New Zealand said that educational progress should be measured qualitatively, not quantitatively. The problem was one of adjusting two alien cultures. UNESCO could help in the study of this very important question. The experience of New Zealand had shown that building on the Native culture yielded far greater results than the complete substitution of Western culture. The French policy of developing a Native élite raised the question whether to concentrate on a select few, or to spread out on a broad though thin basis. This was another problem which UNESCO could study.

The representative of France explained that the use of French as the language of instruction had been emphasized in the particular case of French Equatorial Africa where an educational system had to be constructed in an area with hundreds of widely different dialects. In some other French Territories, teaching was in French and in the Native language. On this subject the representative of the Netherlands was of the opinion that UNESCO should also study the problem of the language of instruction in education. The French representative also stated that the practical value of developing a Native élite had been shown by their integration into the highest levels of French culture, in administration, and in Parliament. He, together with the representative of Belgium, paid tribute to the work of the missionaries. By their devotion, education had been provided which otherwise the Territories would have been unable to afford.

Other practical points raised were the importance of the film and radio in education (India, New Zealand, France) and the suggestion of the representative of the United States of America that future analyses might show the extent of free and of compulsory education and education in relation to age groups.

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that the information showed that the Natives were still largely ignorant and illiterate and without access to contemporary culture. Educational budgets formed a very small part of total territorial expenditure, and contributions from the metropolitan Governments were negligible. There was racial discrimination in educational expenditure, with per capita expenditure on Natives extremely low. The literacy rate was to be deplored. Enrolment statistics in primary schools were discouraging, but even more depressing in the secondary schools; higher education was a luxury except for the élite in some cases. The number of teachers was inadequate. Most teachers were unqualified and teacher training was not receiving appropriate attention. In many Territories, the Administering Authorities had abdicated in favour of the missions in respect of educational responsibilities. The main emphasis was on primary education which produced good servants and workers. Neither the Press nor radio nor films were being used for mass education. Educational standards had been kept low to assure the privileged position of the metropolitan countries.

These comments led to further remarks by representatives of the Administering Powers.

The representative of the United Kingdom deplored the lack of a single constructive suggestion in the remarks of the USSR representative. His Government had done as well if not better than others would have done in similar circumstances. Difficulties in educational progress were due not to political considerations but to multiplicity of languages, scattered populations, and the terrain. Mass education campaigns were being carried on throughout United Kingdom Territories in Africa with the active participation of Africans as organizers. There was continuing improvement in literacy. In the United Kingdom Territories, many senior posts were held by inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Improvement in education depended on good staffing of the secondary schools and teacher training institutions. It was difficult to obtain European teachers for those purposes because his Government could only offer short term contracts in view of the declared policy of his Government to fill as many posts as possible with suitably qualified indigènes. In reply to the charge of neglect of higher education, the United Kingdom representative referred to the large sums which were being spent on the universities in Africa, Asia and the West Indies, and also to the scholarship schemes for education in the United Kingdom.

Other comments were made by the representatives of France and of Belgium. It was stated that education in the French Territories had not been neglected. Desert conditions and a nomadic population accounted for the low literacy rate and the small number of schools in French Somaliland. In French Equatorial Africa, despite difficulties of dense forests and scattered population, great progress had been made. The representative of Belgium said that his Government considered that it had made the best use of available resources to provide education; the figures were there to show the considerable progress made.

The representative of the United States of America drew attention to the figures on educational expenditures in the American Territories. There was really no disagreement between the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Administering Authorities in respect of the objectives of education. There were weak spots, but the picture was not as gloomy as painted by the USSR representative.

The representative of UNESCO observed that his specialized agency could play an important part through education in preparing the non-self-governing peoples to become self-governing. In connexion with its clearing house on fundamental education the report it had received some time ago on educational methods in the Soviet Union might be of value. The work of the Committee of Experts on literacy might also be useful, as well as the work of another committee on the use of Native languages in education. He referred to the pilot projects in Nyasaland, China, and Haiti; to the UNESCO Mission to the war-devastated areas of the Far East, including Malaya, Singapore, Sarawak and North Borneo; and to the Amazon project.

Once again no formal decision was sought by the Committee. But, as indicated in the resolution adopted, attention was invited on the part of both the Administering Powers and the Secretary-General to the comments made and it was hoped that the specialized agencies concerned would be able to assist materially in the studies advocated.

VI. Information voluntarily transmitted regarding the development of self-governing institutions

Resolution 144 (II), adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1947, noted that some Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories had already voluntarily transmitted information on the development of self-governing institutions in the Territories and considered that the voluntary transmission of such information and its summarizing by the Secretary-General were entirely in conformity with the spirit of Article 73 of the Charter and should therefore be duly noted and encouraged.

Provision for the transmission of information of this character was made in the optional category of the Standard Form. In the information transmitted this year, the optional category had been covered in the case of the information transmitted by Australia, Denmark, New Zealand, the Netherlands and the United States of America, and by France for Morocco and Tunisia. This information was included in the Secretary-General's summaries.

The representative of Colombia emphasized the interest of the American States in the problems of Non-Self-Governing Territories as shown by the discussions at the Bogota Conference. This interest was both humanitarian and economic. It was important that the standard of living in the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be raised and this was the social background to the political problem.

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics declared that Article 73 emphasized that the United Nations should ensure the political, as well as the social, economic and educational advancement of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The question of self-government had been given a special paragraph in the Article and the transmission of information on this subject was obligatory under Article 73. He criticized points in the structure of government in West Africa and the West Indies, with special reference to the representation of the local populations in the Legislative Councils.

In reply to a point of order, the Chairman read the terms of resolution 144 (II) and considered that discussion on details of political institutions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was irrelevant, although criticism in regard to which Members had transmitted information under this resolution would be in order.

The representative of Australia agreed that the Committee was competent to express the hope that the Administering Authorities would transmit political information. He disagreed, however, with the contention that the Administering Authorities could be criticized for not transmitting information.

The representatives of Belgium, France, the United Kingdom and the Netherlands emphasized that they were not prepared to discuss political or constitutional matters affecting the relations between the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the metropolitan countries, either in the Committee or in any other organ of the United Nations, there being no obligation to transmit such information.

The representative of Egypt pointed out that his Government had considered that it was necessary to receive political information. This was a subject, however, which had been fully discussed last year and any further discussion should be within the terms of resolution 144 (II).

The representative of India considered that political information was necessary as showing the means by which the ends of economic, social and educational advancement could be achieved. He regretted that the information transmitted on political developments was meagre or lacking, and also that a special paper had not been prepared by the Secretariat. He appealed to the United Kingdom representative to consider this question in the light of British tradition by which formal arrangements were supplemented by the development of conventions.

In general, it should be noted that during many points in the discussions of the Committee, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics declared that Article 73 e should be interpreted as an integral part of Article 73 and that, therefore, questions of political advancement were within the competence of the Committee. On the other hand, other representatives considered that the Committee's terms of reference limited it to Article 73 e and, therefore, to the consideration of statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social and educational conditions subject to such limitations as security and constitutional considerations might require. The representative of Australia emphasized that, just as Members administering Non-Self-Governing Territories had accepted the declaration of policy in Chapter XI of the Charter, so the non-administering Members had undertaken to accept the obligation to respect the limitations of Article 73. In this he was supported by the representative of the United Kingdom. The representative of Australia further stated that, while the discussion of information transmitted under Article 73 e was within the competence of the General Assembly, Chapter XI recognized the full authority of the Administering Powers and their ability and willingness to carry out the policies of Chapter XI without the need of supervision.

VII. Collaboration with the specialized agencies

The discussion on the item of the agenda covering this subject was limited to a brief statement by the representative of the United States of America, pointing out that this collaboration had been considered frequently in the course of other discussions. This fact is reflected in the report. The Committee attached importance to the establishment of effective collaboration with the specialized agencies, and the representatives of the specialized agencies attending the meeting contributed to the discussions on the matters within their interests. This matter was later emphasized by the representative of India, who referred to documents before the Committee showing work being undertaken under the auspices of the Economic and Social Council or by the specialized agencies which was of great interest to Non-Self-Governing Territories. The work of a special committee would be particularly useful if as a result the needs of these Territories could receive full consideration in the elaboration of programmes of economic and social progress applicable without regard to the question of the status of the various Territories and countries concerned.

VIII. Recommendations to the General Assembly

As the discussions proceeded, it became clear that with the exception of the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics a measure of common agreement was being reached, particularly as regards the recommendations to be made to the General Assembly concerning methods for the transmission and consideration of information. A number of suggestions were embodied in two working papers, one presented by the representative of India and the other by the representative of the United States of America (see appendix B).

In a general discussion, further points emerged, and the Drafting Sub-Committee was appointed with a wide mandate in order to consider all suggestions and to incorporate them in resolutions likely to obtain the assent of the Committee.

The Drafting Sub-Committee discussed these matters and produced texts of draft resolutions based on the following general considerations:

(1) A flexible but equal time-limit for the transmission of information in relation to the expiration of the administrative year in the Territory concerned;

(2) Annual information on the changing features in Non-Self-Governing Territories, such as statistics and progress in development programmes;

(3) Removal of any restrictions on the Secretary-General in his use of such official statistical information for purposes of evaluation and comparison as had been communicated to the United Nations or to the specialized agencies;

(4) Full summaries and analyses every three years, with annual supplements in the intervening years;

(5) Taking account both of the improved character of the information transmitted and of suggestions for its further improvement, the Standard Form to be retained for another year, and to be revised with the advice of the specialized agencies;

(6) The Special Committee having demonstrated its usefulness, to be continued in 1949 without any prejudice as to its future status;

(7) Relevant information under Article 73 e and supplemental information to be placed at the disposal of the Economic and Social Council;

(8) More active assistance by the specialized agencies in the preparation of and comments on the analyses.

The Drafting Sub-Committee produced draft texts of four resolutions covering these points.

The four resolutions had been adopted in the Drafting Sub-Committee with the affirmative votes of all representatives with one exception. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics voted against draft resolution I and abstained on draft resolution II. He abstained from voting on the other two draft resolutions.

In introducing the texts proposed by the Drafting Sub-Committee, the Rapporteur noted the spirit of compromise which had been shown in the Sub-Committee and appealed to the Committee to discuss the Sub-Committee's proposals in this spirit. The representatives of China, Egypt, New Zealand and Sweden, associating themselves with the Rapporteur's remarks, said that although the texts proposed did not fully meet their own wishes on separate points they would support these texts in the belief that they reflected a spirit of conciliation.

The representatives of Australia, Belgium, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom also paid tribute to the spirit in which the Sub-Committee had conducted its work. For their part they were anxious to support these proposals in the same spirit. They indicated, however, certain points on which they would have to move amendments or request a division of the vote so as to make their attitudes clear. These particular points are indicated in the description given below in the discussions of the texts.

The representative of India stated that he had been a party to the compromises which were reflected in the draft resolutions. He wished to note, however, that he remained a strong advocate of the permanence of the Committee and disagreed with any suggestion that the Committee was merely concerned with questions of technique which could be rapidly liquidated. He had also not pressed his suggestions regarding a revision of the Standard Form since the points he had made would be brought to the attention of the Administering Powers and these powers appeared ready to provide further information including information on human rights.

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the draft resolutions interpreted Chapter XI and the functions of the Committee in a restrictive sense. In his opinion, the task of the Committee was to assist the Administering Powers in fulfilling their obligations under the Charter. The first two resolutions excluded information regarding the development of self-governing institutions and the participation of their people in the administration. The sources of information remain limited to official sources and no provision was made for the consideration of petitions or for the making of visits to Non-Self-Governing Territories. The time-limits for the submission of information were further prolonged. He said that the Committee was regarded as if it were a temporary organ whose duties would in fact terminate in 1949, although such a provision would be contrary to resolution 146 (II), which in his opinion provided for the creation of a permanent organ. For the above reasons the draft resolutions could not be supported by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The representative of Colombia expressed a vital interest in the permanent continuation of the Special Committee for the purpose of examining information, protecting the interests of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and promoting better standards of living in these Territories, which had an influence on the economy of independent countries which were also producers of primary products.

DRAFT RESOLUTION ON THE TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

The Sub-Committee submitted a text which it had adopted by 5 votes to 1.

The following amendments moved by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics were considered first:

1. To make the submission of information on the development of organs of self-government in Non-Self-Governing Territories and on the participation of the local population in the work of the local organs of self-government obligatory;

2. To give the special committee the right to consider communications coming from the populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

3. To give the Secretary-General the right to add information received from private persons and local groups or organizations to the information received from official sources;

4. To send annually to the Non-Self-Governing Territories representatives of the United Nations in order to make a survey of the situation on the spot.

On the proposal of the representative of Belgium and in accordance with rule 110 of the rules of procedure, the Committee was first invited to decide whether it was competent to consider the above proposals. At the request of the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, separate votes were taken on each of his amendments.

The Committee decided by the following votes that the amendments submitted by the delegation of the USSR were beyond the competence of the Committee:

Amendment 1: 10 votes in favour of inadmissibility, 3 against, 1 abstention;

Amendment 2: 13 votes in favour of inadmissibility, 2 against;

Amendment 3: 13 votes in favour of inadmissibility, 2 against;

Amendment 4: 12 votes in favour of inadmissibility, 2 against.

The Committee then considered the text as submitted by the Drafting Sub-Committee.

Paragraph 1 concerning the date of transmission of information was adopted unchanged without objections. The Netherlands representative, however, placed on record his doubts as to the feasibility of the time-limit of six months in the case of the Netherlands.

Paragraph 2 concerning the use of the Standard Form was adopted unchanged without objections.

Paragraph 3 concerning supplemental information was adopted by 14 votes to none with 1 abstention. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that he considered this paragraph unduly limited the sources from which the Secretary-General would be entitled to draw.

Paragraphs 4 (a) and 4 (b) concerning the Secretary-General's summaries and analyses were each adopted by 14 votes to 1. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that he was opposed to the proposal that information under the whole Standard Form should be received once every three years and that he was in favour of the transmission of information annually. He was also opposed to the exclusion of information concerning the development of self-government and the participation of the population in local organs of self-government.

Paragraph 4 (c), inviting the Secretary-General to submit annual summaries of information voluntarily transmitted under the optional category of the Standard Form was adopted by 11 votes to 3.

Paragraph 5 concerning the distribution of the Secretary-General's documents was adopted unchanged without objection.

Paragraph 6 concerning the communication of comments in relation to the Standard Form was adopted in its first part without objection. The second part requesting information on other than the "Government" section of the optional category of the Standard Form was adopted by 11 votes to 2 with 2 abstentions, and subject to slight verbal changes.

The United Kingdom representative in voting against the second part of paragraph 6 explained that since his Government was not prepared to submit any information under the optional part of the Standard Form he could not agree to any invitation to Administering Powers to do so. His Government was, however, prepared to include in Part II of the Standard Form such information as regards geography, history, people, and human rights as it deemed necessary for a proper understanding of the information transmitted under Article 73 e, but he wished to make it clear to the Committee that this did not represent any departure from his Government's policy of confining the information transmitted to the subjects enumerated in Article 73 e. The Government of the United Kingdom was not prepared to have anything to do with Part I of the Standard Form as such.

Resolution I as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 14 votes to 1.

DRAFT RESOLUTION CONCERNING A SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

The Sub-Committee submitted a text which it had adopted by 5 votes to none with 1 abstention.

Before the Committee voted on the text and the proposed amendments it was informed in accordance with rule 142 of the rules of procedure of the General Assembly that the estimated expenditure for a special committee as recommended by the resolution to meet for two weeks at headquarters would be $10,500, and that a provision for this sum had been included in the estimates submitted by the Secretary-General to the General Assembly.

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that paragraph 1, providing for the temporary character of the committee was not within the competence of the Committee, since resolution 146 (II) set no time-limit on the existence of the Committee. He moved that paragraph 1 of the resolution was outside the competence of the Committee. This proposal regarding the inadmissibility of paragraph 1 of resolution II was rejected by 11 votes to 1 with 2 abstentions.

The representative of Nicaragua moved an amendment to paragraph 1 which provided that the Committee should be "composed of all the Members of the United Nations administering Non-Self-Governing Territories and of an equal number of other Members elected."

He explained that the original wording providing for the membership of those countries transmitting information was vague since it was not certain which Members would transmit information in the future.

After the representatives of Belgium and France had pointed out the far-reaching implications of this amendment involving possibly the definition of the term "Non-Self-Governing Territories" various other suggestions were made for a change in drafting and the amendment was amended with the consent of the representative of Nicaragua to read that the Committee should be "composed of all the Members of the United Nations which have hitherto transmitted information in accordance with Article 73 e and of an equal number of other Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly, on as wide a geographical basis as possible."

This amendment was adopted by 6 votes to 4 with 4 abstentions and paragraph 1 as amended was adopted by 14 votes to 1.

The United Kingdom representative in voting for paragraph 1 drew attention to the remarks he had made at the 15th meeting to the effect that while voting for the appointment of a special committee in 1949, his Government considered that it should confine itself to the task of completing a technique for the collection and transmission of information under Article 73 e so that the appointment of a further committee would be unnecessary.

Paragraph 2 concerning the functions of the special committee was voted in three parts: the first providing for the examination of the summaries and analyses and the papers submitted by the specialized agencies was adopted by 14 votes to 1; the second concerning the procedural recommendations which the special committee might make by 13 votes to none with 2 abstentions, and the third concerning recommendations in functional fields generally by 11 votes to 1 with 3 abstentions. The paragraph as a whole was adopted by 11 votes to 1 with 3 abstentions.

Paragraphs 3 and 4 were adopted without discussion or objection.

The resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 11 votes to 1 with 3 abstentions.

DRAFT RESOLUTION CONCERNING LIAISON BETWEEN THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AND THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 E OF THE CHARTER

The Sub-Committee submitted a text which it had adopted by 5 votes to none with 1 abstention.

Paragraph 1 (a) and (b) concerning interchange of information was adopted in two votes by 15 votes to none and 13 votes to 1 with 1 abstention.

On the second paragraph the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics abstained since he had not yet sufficient information on the schemes of technical assistance to which reference was made.

The resolution as a whole was adopted by 14 votes to none with 1 abstention.

DRAFT RESOLUTION ON CO-OPERATION WITH THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

The Sub-Committee submitted a text which it had adopted by 5 votes to none with 1 abstention.

Paragraph 1, which noted the activities of the respective specialized agencies in respect of Non-Self-Governing Territories, was adopted with a slight editorial change by 14 votes to none with 1 abstention.

Paragraph 2, which invited the Secretary-General to continue to seek their advice and assistance, was adopted unchanged without objection.

Paragraph 3, which invited the specialized agencies to revise the Standard Form, was the subject of a French amendment which invited "the secretariats of the specialized agencies". This amendment was rejected by 9 votes to 1, with 5 abstentions. The original text was retained by 14 votes to none with 1 abstention.

Paragraph 4, inviting the specialized agencies to submit information to the General Assembly and any special committee which it might appoint, on their work in Non-Self-Governing Territories, evoked much discussion. A motion by the representative of the United Kingdom to delete this paragraph was lost by 7 votes to 5 with 3 abstentions. Thereafter, several verbal changes to the Sub-Committee text were suggested instead of consideration of the formal United Kingdom amendment which provided as follows:

"Also invites the specialized agencies, if they do not already do so, to include in their annual reports to the General Assembly on their activities and programmes of operation, information about any work of an economic, social and educational nature which they may have undertaken in Non-Self-Governing Territories at the request of the responsible administering Member, and also to submit such reports to any special committee which the General Assembly may appoint."

Agreement was reached on a new text proposed by the United Kingdom representative (which is given in appendix C) by a vote of 14 to none with 1 abstention.

Resolution IV as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 14 votes to none with 1 abstention.

Appendix A

AGENDA OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

1. Opening of meeting.
2. Election of Chairman, Vice-Chairman and Rapporteur.
3. Adoption of provisional agenda.
4. Appointment of Drafting Sub-Committee for items 9 and 10 of the agenda.
5. General questions arising out of the Secretary-General's summaries and analyses of information transmitted during 1948:
  - (a) Experience in the use of the Standard Form and of supplementary information in virtue of General Assembly resolutions 142 (II) and 143 (II);
  - (b) Territories enumerated;
  - (c) Date and receipt of information;
  - (d) Other questions.
6. The Secretary-General's summaries and analyses of information transmitted during 1948 relating to:
  - (a) Economic conditions
    - (i) Agriculture,
    - (ii) Aspects of general economic development;
  - (b) Social conditions
    - (i) Health,
    - (ii) Labour,
    - (iii) Social welfare;
  - (c) Educational conditions.
7. The Secretary-General's summaries of any information voluntarily transmitted regarding the development of self-governing institutions in virtue of General Assembly resolution 144 (II).
8. Collaboration of the specialized agencies in virtue of General Assembly resolution 145 (II).
9. Substantive recommendations, if any, to be submitted to the General Assembly:
  - (a) Drafting Sub-Committee's text on questions arising out of items 5-8 of the agenda;
  - (b) Proposals, if any, on other points.
10. Procedural recommendations, if any, to be submitted to the General Assembly:
  - (a) Drafting Sub-Committee's text on questions arising out of items 5-8 of the agenda;
  - (b) Proposals, if any, on other points.
11. Approval of the report to be submitted by the Special Committee to the General Assembly.

WORKING PAPER SUBMITTED BY THE REPRESENTATIVE OF INDIA

The following propositions are put forward by the Indian delegation as a basis for discussion.

(I) A. The experience of this year's session of the Special Committee has proved the impracticability (a) of the Secretary-General producing analyses and summaries of the reports of the Administering Powers on Non-Self-Governing Territories within a time sufficient to enable members of the Special Committee to study the documents; and (b) of the Special Committee discussing the reports and making useful recommendations thereon to the General Assembly.

B. Therefore it is suggested that June 30 need not be the uniform date for the submission of the reports. An elastic time-limit may be prescribed, say of six months after the expiry of the latest administrative year of each Administering Power.

C. It is also suggested that there should be two meetings of the Special Committee in a year: the first in the middle of the year, to review the material received by the Secretary-General, to note what action, if any, has been taken in pursuance of the resolutions of the latest session of the General Assembly, and generally to give directions for the preparation of the analyses and summaries to be placed before the next session of the special committee. For the speedy and efficient dispatch of business, the mid-year session of the Special Committee may break up into sub-committees to consider reports either (a) on a regional basis, or (b) on a subject-wise division of the agenda.

(II) A. To make the annual summaries and analyses fuller and more instructive, it is suggested that apart from the reports submitted by the Administering Powers, the Secretary-General may, in his discretion, utilize the reports of the specialized agencies and documents issued officially by Members of the United Nations.

B. It is further suggested that in the annual summaries of reports there should be included a brief reference to the relevant statistics of the previous two years. This would enable the Special Committee to take a more balanced and comprehensive view of the conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

(III) The Special Committee should be established on a permanent basis with a membership of 24. It will be elected by the General Assembly on the principle of equitable geographical distribution. There will be no places on the committee reserved for the Administering Powers as such, but doubtless they will be adequately represented in the committee by the process just specified. The larger number of 24 is suggested in order to enable the committee to break up into sub-committees as proposed in I.C.

(IV) It is suggested that, wherever reference has been made to expenditure on social services or on economic programmes of development, a sub-clause should be inserted to secure information from the Administering Powers on the following points: (a) proportion of the total revenue of the Territory spent on each specified item; (b) the manner of financing expenditure, whether by grants-in-aid of taxation or cesses, etc.; (c) the rate of taxation, whether state or local; (d) where provision for social service exists for the exclusive benefit of certain classes of the population, separate mention of the details of the provision (schools, hospitals, etc., for members of the same race as the Administering Power).

(V) Article 73 e of the Charter imposes on Administering Powers the obligation to transmit information to the Secretary-General in respect of matters specified therein. In view of such information being withheld by a certain Administering Power on the plea that the term "non-self-governing people" needs to be legally defined, it is suggested that steps should be taken to clarify the position so that an Administering Power may recognize the obligatory character of its responsibility under 73 e in respect of any Territory inhabited by a people of a different race, culture, and language from its own in the metropolitan country, whose international relations and representation are under the control and direction of such a metropolitan country and which does not enjoy the same basis of self-government as the metropolitan Government, particularly in respect of electoral qualifications and conditions of representation in the metropolitan legislature.

WORKING PAPER SUBMITTED BY THE UNITED STATES REPRESENTATIVE

This working paper is presented by the United States representative in the Special Committee as a possible basis for the deliberations of that Committee on the above items of the agenda, on the assumption that the General Assembly will wish to provide in future years for a special committee to consider the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

Experience in the use of the Standard Form

While no outline designed to elicit information on so wide a variety of Territories as are included within the scope of Chapter XI can be completely satisfactory, it is believed that the use of the Standard Form during 1948 has produced the desired information in a more satisfactory form than the systems of 1946 and 1947. It is suggested, therefore, that no attempt should be made to revise the Standard Form itself until the Administering Members have had more experience in its use and until the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies have been able to give to the Special Committee a well-considered opinion on the adequacy of the Standard Form for the purposes of fulfilling their tasks under General Assembly resolutions.

It is submitted, however, that the volume of the information and the brief period within which it must be received, summarized, analysed, and made available for the meetings of the Special Committee have created serious problems which will require a practical solution if the work of the Special Committee is to be facilitated and if the assistance of the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies is to be used to the best advantage.

Problems

The Secretary-General, under the present system, receives on 30 June of each year (or later) information, covering a one-year period, on sixty-three Territories (1947), which he has been requested to summarize and analyse within the two months preceding the meeting of the Special Committee. This time schedule creates almost insuperable difficulties, especially when it is considered that in the period since its acceptance, the transmittal or notification to the Secretary-General of supplemental documents and the use of the Standard Form have increased the volume of information to be summarized and analysed, and, moreover, that not all Administering Members have found it possible to meet every year the 30 June date for the transmittal of such information. Indirectly, the work of the Special Committee is affected by this unsatisfactory situation; the summaries and analyses on which its discussions are based are inevitably prepared in haste; and since the Secretary-General cannot be expected to circulate these papers much in advance of the meetings, members of the Committee must inevitably assemble with little advance preparation.

The specialized agencies are likewise handicapped in the fulfilment of the tasks assigned to them by rigid limitations of time and by the bulk of the material. There are, moreover, two further complications: the Secretary-General of the United Nations, who has been asked to communicate the information transmitted to him to the specialized agencies and to seek their collaboration in the preparation, between 30 June and the first week in September, of the analyses, himself receives, in many cases, only one or two copies of the information; and the specialized agencies, which he is to consult and with which he is requested to collaborate, are located not only in New York, Washington, and Montreal, but also in Paris and Geneva.

The Special Committee, under the procedures presently laid down, convenes each year without the members having been able to examine, much in advance, the materials laid before them. Yet, in two weeks' time, the Special Committee is expected not only to discuss information on some sixty-three Territories but to formulate recommendations thereon which will win the respect of Governments and thus contribute to the improvement of the standards of life of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

Suggestions

The following suggestions are, therefore, put forward in the hope that they may assist the Special Committee in arriving at recommendations which will increase its effectiveness and the effectiveness of the Secretariat and the specialized agencies:

1

That for the uniform date of 30 June for the receipt of information, there should be substituted an invitation to each Member transmitting information in any given reporting period to do so within eight months following the expiration of the administrative year of that Member.

DISCUSSION. On the basis of information presently available to the United States representative, the schedule for the receipt of information under this proposed new system would be as follows:

Administrative year	Due date of information
1 January-31 December:
Belgium, Denmark, France, Netherlands, } United Kingdom .....	31 August
1 April-31 March:
Australia, New Zealand .....	30 November
1 July-30 June:
United States .....	28 February

Under this proposed new time schedule, the Secretary-General would receive, for example, on 31 August and 30 November 1949, and on 28 February 1950, information which would be considered by the Committee in September 1950. The Secretary-General would thus be able to distribute, over a period of nearly a year, tasks which are now concentrated in a two months' period. The fact that the bulk of the information (that transmitted by Administering Members using the calendar year) would be received earliest in each reporting period would be of additional assistance to the Secretary-General. This spacing of the receipt of the information and the longer interval between its transmittal to the Secretary-General and its consideration by the Special Committee should give the specialized agencies a reasonable length of time in which to make their contributions to the Secretary-General's analyses and otherwise to assist the Special Committee in its work. The proposed new time schedule would also give some Administering Members that additional period for the preparation of information which experience suggests is necessary and would, at the same time, remedy the inequities of the present uniform date which gives some Administering Members a longer interval for this task than others.

It will be noted that if Suggestion 1 is accepted, the Committee would have before it each year information which, on the whole, would be less current than is the case with the present 30 June date. It is suggested, however, that in view of the rather complete break-down in the present system, this objection to Suggestion 1 may be more theoretical than real. It would seem to be more important that the information transmitted should be adequately considered than that it should be the most current information. It will be noted, also, that if Suggestion 1 is accepted, the Special Committee will have no new information to consider in September 1949. If the Committee should approve Suggestion 1, it would therefore be desirable for it to give some consideration at this session to an agenda for the 1949 session.

That the Secretary-General should be requested to circulate the summaries of the information as early as possible and the analyses of the information not later than two months prior to the opening of each session of the Special Committee.

DISCUSSION. The adoption of this suggestion should remedy one of the principal defects of the present system—the inability of members of the Special Committee to examine much in advance the documents to be considered by the Committee. If Suggestion 1 is accepted, the request to the Secretary-General with respect to the analyses contained in Suggestion 2 would seem to be reasonable.

3

That each member of the Special Committee and each specialized agency should receive, from the Administering Member concerned, through the Secretary-General, at least one copy of the information on each Territory to be considered at the next meeting of the Committee.

DISCUSSION. If the specialized agencies which are concerned with conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories are to make a contribution to the analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e, and generally to the work of the Special Committee, it is obviously necessary that they receive copies of the information. It would be highly desirable, also, for the members of the Special Committee to have copies of the information and such a request does not seem unreasonable in view of the small number of additional copies which would be required.

4

That with respect to the frequency of the future use of the Standard Form, the relative merits of the following alternatives to the procedure now in effect should be given consideration by the Committee at this session:

Alternative A

That full information on the basis of the Standard Form should be prepared every five (or three) years—the next instalment of information prepared on this basis to be received by the Secretary-General on 31 August 1953 (or 1951), 30 November 1953 (or 1951), 28 February 1954 (or 1952), and to be considered by the Special Committee in September 1954 (or 1952); that in each intervening year, there should be received, by the Secretary-General, in accordance also with the schedule proposed in Suggestion 1, information, in the nature of a supplemental report, on topics in the Standard Form for which some change can be reported during the year.<sup>1</sup>

DISCUSSION. The procedure approved by the General Assembly last year involves the use of the Standard Form in full, each year, with the qualification, inter alia, of a note to the effect that "information already furnished on a previous occasion need not be repeated".

Some such qualification was necessary in view of the fact that the Standard Form, which contains some topics on which the information would remain relatively constant year after year, and some on which new information could be provided only at rather infrequent intervals, is clearly not appropriate for full use each year. Yet the qualification accepted by the Special Committee and the General Assembly is subject to rather diverse interpretations; and, what is more serious, the failure of the Special Committee and the General Assembly to provide for full use of the Standard Form at intervals may give rise, in future years, to the situation that the Special Committee receives, each year, partial information without an adequate frame of reference.

The approval by the Committee of Alternative A would give Administering Members more precise guidance on the use of the Standard Form, would provide complete information on each Territory at reasonable intervals, and would preserve, at the same time, whatever advantages there may be in the yearly receipt of information.

The approval of Alternative A, however, would leave unresolved the fundamental difficulty faced by the Special Committee; namely, how to provide for an adequate examination of information on so large a number of Territories each year. It is suggested, therefore, that consideration should be given to the merits of two other possible procedures.

Alternative B

That full information on the basis of the Standard Form should be transmitted each year on approximately one-half of the Territories—such information to cover, normally, a two-year period; that the information should be received in accordance with the schedule of dates proposed in Suggestion 1 above; and that the Special Committee should thus examine, at each session, only the information placed before it at that session.

DISCUSSION. If the Committee should accept Alternative B, it would examine information from thirty-one or thirty-two Territories each year, assuming, for the purpose of discussion, that the number of Territories for which information is transmitted remains sixty-three, as in 1947. Information on each Territory, after a necessary transition period, would cover a two years' span. Alternative B would have this principal advantage over Alternative A: that it would enable the Secretary-General, the specialized agencies, and the Special Committee to give more careful consideration to the information transmitted. Its principal disadvantage in relation to Alternative A would be that it would involve the use of the Standard Form in full every two years instead of every five (or three) years. One further possible disadvantage would be the difficulty of making a division of the Territories into two groups which would not be arbitrary.

If the Committee should approve Alternative B, it might invite the Administering Members to make suggestions, at this session, on the best method of dividing the Territories into two groups. The Committee, as already noted, will not have any new information to consider in September 1949, if Suggestion 1 is accepted. However, after a transitional period of reports on the basis of one year for half of the Territories (to be considered by the Committee in September 1950), the Committee would have before it, in September 1951, information covering a two-year period for the other half of the Territories, and, thereafter, for all Territories. The following table indicates, in very general terms, the method by which Alternative B could be put into operation:

September 1950 committee meeting,
one-year information:

31 Territories

Period covered by information	Date of receipt of information
1 Jan. 1948-31 Dec. 1948	31 Aug. 1949
1 Apr. 1948-31 Mar. 1949	30 Nov. 1949
1 July 1948-30 June 1949 <sup>a</sup>	28 Feb. 1950

September 1951 committee meeting,
two-year information:

32 Territories

Period covered by information	Date of receipt of information
1 Jan. 1948-31 Dec. 1949	31 Aug. 1950
1 July 1948-30 June 1950 <sup>a</sup>	28 Feb. 1950

Alternative C

That the Territories should be roughly divided into three regional geographical groups (for example, (1) Western Hemisphere; (2) Pacific and Far East; (3) Africa, Near East, and Mediterranean); that full information on the basis of the Standard Form should be transmitted by the Administering Members concerned for one group of Territories each year; that such information should normally cover, in the case of each Territory, the immediately preceding three-year period; that the information prepared should be received by the Secretary-General in accordance with the schedule of dates proposed in Suggestion 1; that the Special Committee should examine and make recommendations upon the information from one such group of Territories each year; that the Committee should invite the Administering Members to suggest, in the first instance, the order in which the information on the three regions should be received by the Secretary-General and considered by the Committee.

DISCUSSION. The principal advantages of Alternative C would be that it would reduce, in relation to Alternatives A and B, the number of Territories on which information would be considered by the Secretary-General, the specialized agencies, and the Special Committee each year, while at the same time providing a somewhat more logical basis for the division of the Territories than might be possible under Alternative B. At least, within each broad regional division, there would be a group of Territories the problems of which would be basically similar. This circumstance should improve the quality of the Special Committee's work. In relation to Alternative B, Alternative C would have the further advantage that the Standard Form would be used in full at three-year intervals. While the three-year interval for the use of the Standard Form in full might, perhaps, be less satisfactory theoretically than the five-year interval suggested in Alternative A, it would seem more practicable than the two-year interval of Alternative B. In relation to Alternative B, however, Alternative C would have the relative disadvantages that information on any one Territory would be considered by the Committee only once in three years, instead of once in two years, and that the process of putting the three-year system into operation would present more complications than the inauguration of the two-year system.

If the Committee should approve Alternative C, it would be desirable for the Committee to make a decision at this meeting on the three regions, on the schedule for the consideration of the information from the three regions and upon the best method for putting this system into operation. The appendix to this paper,<sup>3</sup> prepared on the basis of a list of Territories on which information was transmitted in 1947, attempts to indicate, in a general way and with no attempt at precision, geographic or otherwise, how such a division of Territories might work out in practice. With respect to putting the system into operation, it is pointed out that if Suggestion 1 is adopted, the Committee will have no new information to consider in September 1949. However, after a transitional period of one-year reports for the first group of Territories (to be considered by the Committee in September 1950), and by two-year reports for the second group (to be considered by the Committee in September 1951), the Committee would have information covering three years for the third group of Territories in 1952 and, thereafter, for all three groups. The following table attempts to illustrate, in general, how the system would work out, on the assumption (which is made purely for purposes of illustration) that the Committee might wish to examine information from Western Hemisphere Territories in September 1950, Pacific and Far Eastern Territories in September 1951, and African, Near Eastern, and Mediterranean Territories in September 1952.

September 1950 committee meeting,
one-year information:

Western Hemisphere

Period covered by information	Date of receipt of information
1 July 1948-30 June 1949 <sup>a</sup>	28 Feb. 1950

two-year information:

Pacific and Far East

Period covered by information	Date of receipt of information
1 Jan. 1948-31 Dec. 1949	31 Aug. 1950
1 July 1948-30 June 1950 <sup>a</sup>	28 Feb. 1951

September 1952 committee meeting,
three-year information:

Africa, Near East, Mediterranean

Period covered by information	Date of receipt of information
1 Jan. 1948-31 Dec. 1950	31 Aug. 1951

Alternative D

That information for all Territories on only one of each of the principal sections of the Standard Form (Sections II, III, IV) should be transmitted and considered each year.

DISCUSSION. This suggestion would involve the transmission by the Administering Members and the consideration by the Committee of information on economic conditions in all Territories one year, social conditions in another, and educational conditions in a third year. Such a scheme would, like Alternatives B and C, reduce the amount of information which the Committee would have to consider at any given session and would facilitate the making of valuable recommendations in the various functional fields covered by the sections of the Standard Form.

The transmission of information on the topics in Section I being optional in any event, the time for the transmission of such voluntary information would necessarily have to be left to the discretion of the Administering Members.

The procedure for putting Alternative D into operation would be essentially the same as that outlined for Alternative C.

RESOLUTIONS SUBMITTED FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

I

DRAFT RESOLUTION ON THE TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

The Special Committee on information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter submits the following resolution for the consideration of the General Assembly:

The General Assembly,

Considering that, in the light of experience, resolution 66 (I) adopted by the General Assembly on 14 December 1946<sup>5</sup> and resolutions 142 (II) and 143 (II) adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1947<sup>6</sup> require adaptation and amplification,

1. Invites the Members transmitting information under Article 73 e of the Charter to send to the Secretary-General the most recent information which is at their disposal, as early as possible and at the latest within a maximum period of six months following the expiration of the administrative year in the Non-Self-Governing Territories concerned;

2. Recommends that the Members, in transmitting information on the basis of the Standard Form, should notify such changes in statistics and such other appreciable changes, including the progress achieved in accordance with development programmes, as have occurred in the previous year and as affect the matters covered by Article 73 e of the Charter, bearing in mind that information already furnished on a previous occasion need not be repeated but that reference may be made to the appropriate sources;

3. Invites the Secretary-General to extend the use of supplemental information in future years and considers that, in order to provide a means of assessing the information transmitted under Article 73 e, the Secretary-General should be authorized to include in his summaries and analyses all relevant and comparable official statistical information within the categories referred to in Article 73 e of the Charter which has been communicated to the United Nations or to the specialized agencies;

4. Invites the Secretary-General to prepare for the General Assembly, and for any special committee which the General Assembly may appoint:

(a) Full summaries and analyses of the information transmitted during 1949 and thereafter at three-year intervals, showing the progress made over the three-year period in respect of economic, social and educational conditions;

(b) In the intervening years annual supplements, showing such changes in statistics and such other appreciable changes, including information on the progress achieved in accordance with development programmes, as have occurred in the previous year, together with relevant statistics for the previous two years, as well as analyses of different aspects of economic, social and educational conditions to which attention may have been drawn in previous years;

(c) Annual summaries of any material which the Members may have voluntarily transmitted under the optional category of the Standard Form;

5. Invites the Secretary-General to distribute the documents referred to above as far as practicable in accordance with the attached schedule;

6. Decides that the Standard Form for the guidance of Members in the preparation of information should be retained for the coming year, but that the Secretary-General in communicating this form to the Members concerned should inform them of the comments made in the Special Committee in connexion with the contents of this form and the information received, should endeavour as far as practicable to take account of these comments in the preparation of his summaries and analyses and should invite the Members concerned which have not hitherto provided general information forming the optional category of the Standard Form nevertheless to supply such information in relation to the geography, history, people of, and human rights in, the Territories concerned.

Schedule

Information received before 1 June: summaries to be communicated by the Secretary-General before 15 July.

Information received in the month of June: summaries to be communicated before 31 July.

DRAFT RESOLUTION CONCERNING A SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

The Special Committee submits the following resolution for the consideration of the General Assembly:

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter which was constituted by resolution 146 (II)<sup>7</sup> adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1947,

1. Considers that, without prejudice as to the future, a special committee similar to that of this year should be constituted to meet in 1949, composed of all the Members of the United Nations which have hitherto transmitted information in accordance with Article 73 e and of an equal number of other Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly, on as wide a geographical basis as possible;

2. Invites this special committee to examine the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies, and to submit a report thereon for the consideration of the General Assembly with such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories;

3. Considers that the special committee should meet in 1949, not later than three weeks before the opening of the regular session of the General Assembly, at a place to be determined by the Secretary-General, and should conclude its work not later than one week before the opening of the session;

4. Invites the Fourth Committee to take the necessary action in accordance with this resolution, on behalf of the General Assembly.

DRAFT RESOLUTION CONCERNING LIAISON BETWEEN THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL AND THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

The Special Committee submits the following resolution for the consideration of the General Assembly:

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter which was constituted by resolution 146 (II) adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1947, and which was authorized to establish liaison with the Economic and Social Council,

1. Invites the Secretary-General to:

a) Inform any special committee which the General Assembly may appoint of decisions taken by the Economic and Social Council and of studies undertaken under its auspices which include within their scope economic and social conditions affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories;

b) Place at the disposal of the Economic and Social Council all relevant information transmitted under Article 73 e and all relevant supplemental information required for the work of the Economic and Social Council;

2. Draws the attention of the Member Governments responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories to the schemes of technical assistance approved by the Economic and Social Council, and invites the Secretary-General to inform any special committee which the General Assembly may appoint of the extent and nature of any such technical assistance rendered to Non-Self-Governing Territories at the request of Administering Members.

DRAFT RESOLUTION ON CO-OPERATION WITH THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES IN RELATION TO ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

The Special Committee submits the following resolution for the consideration of the General Assembly:

The General Assembly,

Having considered the report of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter which was constituted by resolution 146 (II) adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1947, and which was authorized to avail itself of the counsel and assistance of the specialized agencies,

1. Has noted the resolution adopted by the World Health Assembly<sup>8</sup> and welcomes the measures being taken by the World Health Organization to examine the section of the Standard Form relating to public health and sanitation, and in other ways to provide technical assistance in the preparation and consideration of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter;

Has also noted the information supplied by the International Labour Office<sup>9</sup> with particular reference to the ratification and application of international labour conventions concerning Non-Self-Governing Territories and to the study which is being undertaken in regard to migrant labour problems;

Has also noted the explanations furnished by the representative of UNESCO<sup>10</sup> on the services which UNESCO is providing in Non-Self-Governing Territories with the consent of the Members responsible for the administration of these Territories;

2. Invites the Secretary-General to keep in close touch with the secretariats of the specialized agencies with a view to seeking their counsel and assistance in preparation of his analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter;

3. Invites the specialized agencies to examine the relevant sections of the Standard Form with which they are specially concerned with a view to the revision of this form;

4. Invites the specialized agencies to inform any special committee which the General Assembly may appoint of the progress of any work undertaken by them which includes within its scope economic, social and educational conditions affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories.

5. Further invites the appropriate specialized agencies to make such comments on the analyses prepared by the Secretary-General as they may feel will be helpful to the consideration of these analyses.

ANNEX

SUMMARY RECORD OF THE 21ST MEETING OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION TRANSMITTED, UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER, HELD AT PARIS ON WEDNESDAY, 29 SEPTEMBER 1948, AT 11 A.M.

PRESENT

Chairman: Mr. Cheng Paonan (China);

Rapporteur: Mr. H. Lannung (Denmark);

Members: Mr. J. D. Forsyth (Australia), M. P. Ryckmans (Belgium), Mr. Pérez Cisneros (Cuba), Taha Bey el Sayed Nasr (Egypt), M. R. Garreau (France), Mr. B. Shiva Rao (India), Mr. J. W. de Stoppelaar (Netherlands), Mr. J. S. Reid (New Zealand), Mr. Sven Grafstrom (Sweden), Mr. A. G. Kulagenkov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), Mr. J. Fletcher-Cooke (United Kingdom), Mr. B. Gerig (United States of America).

Specialized agencies:

Mr. Cortesao (UNESCO).

Secretariat:

Mr. Victor Hoo, Assistant Secretary-General, Mr. Wilfrid Benson, Committee Secretary.

Adoption of the report

The RAPPOREUR, in submitting an amended version of the report, reminded the Committee that the first series of amendments proposed by the Soviet representative had been received in Geneva. Many of these amendments had already been covered and the Committee had been faced with the choice between rewriting the report, which would have either upset its balance or called for a large number of counter statements, and including only such amendments as were concrete and could be included without a revision of the conception of the whole report. It had been agreed to accept the latter course but not to close the discussion so that full consideration could be given to Soviet amendments which were concrete and within the framework of the report. Some such amendments had been accepted at the time, others had been proposed in Paris and had, in consultation with the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, been included in abbreviated form in the report. The report had not been drastically revised; in approximate figures out of the original draft of 1,200 lines, 1,100 remained unchanged, 100 had undergone slight changes, and 150 new lines had been added not all of which by any means represented amendments introduced by the Soviet representative. The Rapporteur also gave figures showing how divergent views had been given space in the revised report. His conclusion was that the report remained balanced; the only new substantive thought introduced, regarding the per capita expenditure on health services, was balanced by a counter statement by the United Kingdom representative.

He asked the Committee for a decision as to whether addenda 3 and 4 should be included in the report to be forwarded to the General Assembly. Personally he was opposed to the inclusion, since the addenda contained no substantive points of general interest to the General Assembly.

Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) supported the Rapporteur regarding the exclusion of addenda 3 and 4. This point of view was also supported by Mr. FLETCHER-COOKE (United Kingdom).

Mr. GERIG (United States of America), associating himself with the views expressed by the representatives of Belgium and the United Kingdom, asked for a drafting amendment in document A/AC.17/W.13/Rev.1, page 3, paragraph 2,<sup>1</sup> at the end of the first sentence, to have the words inserted "if it were put immediately".

Decision. The Committee agreed without opposition not to include addenda 3 and 4 (A/AC.17/W.13/Add.3 and Add.4) in its report to the General Assembly.

Decision. The Committee agreed without opposition to approve the amendment submitted by the representative of the United States of America.

The CHAIRMAN stated that no further amendments were in order and that there could be no substantive discussion, since the business before the Committee was the adoption of the report.

Mr. FLETCHER-COOKE (United Kingdom) pointed out that in Geneva, at least one representative had stated that undue weight was being given to the views of the Soviet representative. He felt that the report still gave undue weight to the Soviet representative's views, but was prepared to vote for it, provided it was understood that the United Kingdom Government did not associate itself with the views expressed by the Soviet representative, with which views it disagreed entirely. His Government had complete confidence in the Rapporteur, who had carried out a difficult task in very trying circumstances, and, since abstention might indicate a lack of confidence, he would vote in favour of the report.

Mr. FORSYTH (Australia), expressing his confidence in the Rapporteur, announced he would vote in favour of the report, such a vote having no bearing on any point of substance covered in the report, since the opinions of the various representatives had already been registered in their votes on the four resolutions passed. The sense of his vote would be that the report was a true and proper description of the Committee's work, without necessarily committing representatives to any particular views contained in it.

Mr. KULAGENKOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that he had confined himself to a number of modifications and clarifications to the wording of some of his statements in the report which had been completely distorted. He had also given a brief summary of interventions which had been omitted. These corrections, however, had been distorted in their turn or some of the most important points omitted. Thus, in the part concerning economic conditions there was no mention of the concluding proposal: "The USSR representative stressed that their political dependence was the fundamental obstacle in the economic development of Non-Self-Governing Territories". Page 20 of the mimeographed English text continued to allege that the USSR representative had abstained from voting in the Drafting Sub-Committee on draft resolution II, whereas he had, in fact, voted against the draft. A distorted version was given of his correction to the second part of his statement during the discussion of the draft resolutions. What he had said was that the Committee was regarded as if it were a temporary organ whose duties were limited to 1949, although this conception was in contradiction with the tasks incumbent on the Committee in virtue of resolution 146 (II). These tasks required that the work of the Committee should not be limited in point of time and the resolution in question had not provided any such limitation. There were also inaccuracies and omissions. Other interventions to which no amendments had been made were likewise inaccurate.

Regarding the report as a whole, he stated that he could not approve the text because certain important aspects of the Committee's discussions were not mentioned while the presentation of certain others was not objective. Moreover, the report threw no light on the Committee's work from the point of view of the fulfilment of the tasks before it. Finally, the principal decisions adopted by the Committee and contained in the report were in contradiction with the spirit and the obligations of Chapter XI and the resolutions of the General Assembly.

In view of these considerations, the Soviet delegation reserved its right to make all necessary comments at later stages in the examination of the report.

Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) pointed out that the Soviet representative's remarks made his own position difficult. He had been prepared to vote in favour of the report since he regarded it as a fair and honest summary of all representatives' views. He had refrained from submitting amendments or correcting the summaries of his own statements, in the hope that a compromise report would be satisfactory to all members, and that others would make a similar sacrifice. The Soviet representative had moved a whole series of amendments, some of which had been adopted immediately, others discussed at length. The report in its present form included a modified version of all the Soviet representative's statements, but an unamended version of the statements of other representatives. He had consented to this procedure in the hope of attaining unanimity. If the Soviet representative now voted against the report, his own sacrifice would have been useless. However, he was prepared to vote in favour of the report in order to express his confidence in the Rapporteur, but he wished it recorded that if he had known that the Soviet representative would vote against the report, he himself would have voted in favour of the original report without the amendments submitted by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. GARREAU (France), associating himself with the Belgian representative's views, pointed out that the Soviet representative's amendments had greatly changed the report, and that if the Soviet representative abstained, he himself would have to abstain as well.

The Soviet representative's interpretation of the Charter and the General Assembly resolutions was unacceptable. The Soviet representative had tried to make the Committee depart from its terms of reference. The Powers responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories could not admit this illegal extension of the provisions of the Charter.

Mr. KULAGENKOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that he had repeatedly pointed out the incorrect interpretation of the Charter and the resolutions of the General Assembly, which was leading to a departure from the implementation of the obligations imposed by the Charter and the resolutions; he had also pointed out the attempts to reduce the rôle of the Committee to the performance of procedural functions. The statement by the French representative was a clear illustration of these tendencies.

He said that he had put forward amendments in regard to his own statements. This was the right of each member of the Committee, irrespective of whether he approved of the report or not. All the Soviet amendments were in the nature of clarifications of some of his statements which had been presented in a distorted form.

Mr. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) felt the Committee was faced with two attitudes, both of which were quite reasonable. Some representatives were ready to accept a report which faithfully reflected the work of the Committee, even though their own statements might not always be exactly reported. The Soviet representative's view was also understandable, since he felt that his own views were not faithfully reported. However, since the report had to be adopted, the solution open to the Committee was to approve it as a whole, and to add, as an annex, the summary record of today's meeting which would explain the votes of all representatives.

Mr. GARREAU (France) pointed out that the Cuban representative had not been present during the Committee's previous discussions in Geneva, and was not aware of all the amendments originally introduced by the Soviet representative, some of which had later been withdrawn. However, the report had lacked proper balance. Any attempt to go beyond the terms of reference of the Committee had to be opposed. The report should not reflect statements which were outside the terms of reference of the Committee and which implied interference in the domestic jurisdiction of the Administering Powers. Such a course, if adopted, might justifiably lead to the Administering Powers refusing participation in any discussions of this character. This, in turn, would make the work of the Committee as a whole impossible.

The RAPPOREUR pointed out that special efforts had been made to meet the wishes of the Soviet representative. He sincerely believed that the amendments which the Soviet representative had today mentioned as containing inaccuracies had been dealt with to the best of the Rapporteur's ability and with the apparent agreement of the Soviet representative.

Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) supported the suggestion of the representative of Cuba.

Mr. FLETCHER-COOKE (United Kingdom) pointed out that the Committee had tried to obtain a unanimous report, and had wasted time and money since adjourning in Geneva in trying to meet the views of the Soviet representative. Every member, with the exception of the Soviet representative, could have voted in favour of the original report. He was tempted to ask now for a vote on the original report, which would at least assure the favourable vote of the French representative, but would refrain from doing so, if it were recorded that the United Kingdom representative was greatly disappointed at the time that had been wasted both for the Rapporteur and the Committee as a whole. Provided his statement was included in the record, he was still prepared to vote for the report as it stood.

Mr. GARREAU (France) was willing to vote in favour of the report, if the Cuban representative's suggestion were adopted, and his own statement became part of the report's annex.

Mr. GERIG (United States of America) associated himself with the views expressed by the United Kingdom representative. He would have been able to vote for the original report, which he considered as good as, or better than, the present, but he had hoped to reach unanimity as had other representatives.

Mr. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) repeated his suggestion. It was the Committee's duty to adopt the report. Since there would undoubtedly, at least, be one abstention, the summary record, if included as an annex to the report, would make it clear to the Fourth Committee why such an abstention had occurred. The abstention would not be due to any error in the report, but rather to instructions on principle received by the delegation concerned.

The RAPPOREUR, in answer to the Chairman, thought that it was not entirely essential to include the summary record, but left the decision to the Committee.

Mr. KULAGENKOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that he had also been ready in Geneva to complete the consideration of the report and had not proposed the holding of a meeting in Paris or the present meeting. He had considered and he continued to consider the report unacceptable. The Soviet proposals on its substance had not been adopted. He again stressed his right to clarify and correct the report in regard to his own statements, particularly as such corrections were essential by reason of translation difficulties. It was strange to assert that the consideration of these clarifications was a waste of time.

He opposed the attempts of the representative of France to distract the Special Committee from fulfilment of its tasks which were to examine the substance of the information and to prepare appropriate recommendations for the General Assembly.

TAHA Bey EL SAYED NASR (Egypt), expressing his thanks to the Rapporteur, announced that he would vote in favour of the report, and asked that the report be put to a vote.

The CHAIRMAN, speaking on behalf of China, favoured the adoption of the report. The inclusion of the annex did not seem necessary if even so the report would still fail to assure unanimity.

Mr. GARREAU (France) said that he could not vote in favour of the report unless he knew that the summary record would be attached to the report as an annex.

Mr. FLETCHER-COOKE (United Kingdom) said that he presumed that the annex would contain the summary record of today's meeting and that if the Cuban representative's proposal were carried, the Committee would then vote on the report plus the annex.

Decision. The Cuban representative's proposal to attach the summary record of the current meeting as an annex to the Rapporteur's report was carried by 10 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

The CHAIRMAN invited the members to submit any corrections they might wish to make to the summary record within a period of 24 hours after the receipt of the text.

Decision. The Rapporteur's report, with the summary record of the current meeting to be attached as annex, was adopted by 13 votes to 1.

Adjournment

Mr. RYCKMANS (Belgium) and Mr. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) expressed the Committee's thanks to the Chairman and to the Rapporteur.

The CHAIRMAN and the RAPPORTEUR, in their replies, thanked the members and the Secretariat for their assistance.

The meeting adjourned at 12.25 p.m.

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

(25 August—12 September 1949)

I. Constitution of the Special Committee

1. The General Assembly, by resolution 219 (III) adopted on 3 November 1948 during the first part of the third regular session, constituted a Special Committee to examine the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

2. The terms of reference of the Committee are set forth in the resolution as follows:

"To examine the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies, and to submit a report thereon for the consideration of the General Assembly, with such procedural recommendations as the special committee may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual territories."

3. The Committee consisted of sixteen Members, comprising the eight Members transmitting information and an equal number of other Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly.

Members transmitting information:

Australia, Belgium, Denmark, France, Netherlands, New Zealand, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

Elected Members:

Brazil, China, Dominican Republic, Egypt, India, Sweden, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Venezuela.

4. The Committee met at Lake Success, New York, from 25 August to 12 September 1949.

5. By resolution 221 (III) of 3 November 1948, the specialized agencies were invited to examine the relevant sections of the Standard Form with which they are specially concerned, with a view to a revision of this Form; to inform the Special Committee of the progress of any work undertaken by them which includes within its scope economic, social and educational conditions affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories; and to make such comments on the analyses prepared by the Secretary-General as they may feel will be helpful to the consideration of these analyses.

6. Representatives of the following specialized agencies took part in the discussions affecting the work of their organizations: World Health Organization (WHO), International Labour Organisation (ILO), United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), and the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO).

II. Officers

7. The officers elected by the Committee were:

Mr. Benjamin Gerig (United States of America), Chairman

Mr. B. Shiva Rao (India), Vice-Chairman

Mr. Enrique de Marchena (Dominican Republic), Rapporteur

III. Agenda

8. The Committee adopted the provisional agenda without change, as set forth in annex I. The representatives of the United Kingdom and France, while not opposing the adoption of the agenda, reserved the right to make reservations regarding certain items when they came up for consideration.

IV. Cessation of information

9. In view of the fact that certain Governments had ceased to transmit information on certain territories in 1947 and 1948, the General Assembly adopted resolution 222 (III) in which it considered that it was essential for the United Nations to be informed of any change in the constitutional position and status of any such territory as a result of which the responsible Government concerned thought it unnecessary to transmit information in respect of that territory under Article 73 e of the Charter. The General Assembly requested the Members concerned to communicate to the Secretary-General such information as may be appropriate in this matter, including the constitution, legislative act or executive order providing for the government of the territory and the constitutional relationship of the territory to the Government of the metropolitan country.

10. Communications from the Governments of France, the United Kingdom, and the United States of America explaining their position in not transmitting information in respect of certain territories were placed before the Special Committee for its information.

11. In the Special Committee, the representative of Egypt called attention to the communication from the French Government, which stated that under Article 73 of the Charter the determination of which territories are non-self-governing lay exclusively within the competence of the States responsible for their administration. He said that this might have been true in international law before the coming into force of the United Nations Charter; but a new concept of international law had been created which might be described as the theory of international accountability. Under this theory, the United Nations could not be divested of its responsibilities for any Non-Self-Governing Territory merely because the metropolitan Power had ceased to transmit information regarding it. Cessation of the transmission of information could be permitted only if the territory concerned had attained self-government. However, the issue was not one within the competence of the Special Committee, and therefore the matter should be referred to the Fourth Committee and the General Assembly.

12. The representative of India referred to the communication of the United Kingdom Government to the Secretary-General and, in particular to the statement that "there were British territories which, while not yet in full control of their external affairs, were nevertheless fully responsible for the conduct of their internal affairs". He asked whether a territory not yet in full control of its external affairs could be said to enjoy full self-government under the terms of Article 73. However, the question at what stage of development a Non-Self-Governing Territory was no longer non-self-governing involved legal and constitutional considerations beyond the competence of the Special Committee.

13. The representative of China referred to that part of the reply of the United States of America which, in explaining the reason why information was not at present transmitted on the Panama Canal Zone, stated that, in the opinion of the Government of Panama, the Panama Canal Zone could not be considered a Non-Self-Governing Territory and that sovereignty over it rested with the Republic of Panama. He drew attention to the fact that information had been transmitted by the Government of the United Kingdom under Hong Kong concerning the Kowloon Territory and the New Territories, although the sovereignty over these territories was vested in the Republic of China. Therefore, if the fact that the sovereignty over a territory was not in a given Administering authority was sufficient reason for not transmitting information in respect of that territory, the Committee should take note of this in respect of the Kowloon Territory and the New Territories.

14. The representative of the United States of America explained that the transmission of information on the Panama Canal Zone had been suspended pending consultations between the two Governments concerned.

15. The representative of the United Kingdom reserved his Government's position on the point raised by the representative of China regarding Kowloon Territory and the New Territories.

16. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics considered that the decision on the part of the United Kingdom and French Governments not to transmit information in respect of a number of territories was arbitrary and illegal under the terms of Chapter XI of the Charter and the resolutions of the General Assembly relating thereto. General Assembly resolution 218 (III) recommended that the Members should transmit information on appreciable changes; the cessation of information was undoubtedly such a change. The representative of the USSR submitted the following proposal:

"The cessation of the transmission of information on any Non-Self-Governing Territory cannot take place until the Special Committee on Information (transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter) has considered all the data concerning the changes in the status of the given territory and has placed before the General Assembly a recommendation regarding the suspension of the application of Article 73 e as regards these territories."

17. Members expressed the opinion that this proposal was beyond the competence of the Special Committee, and that the question could be discussed only by the Fourth Committee and the General Assembly. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the United Kingdom Government did not accept the principle of international accountability as applying to Non-Self-Governing Territories under Chapter XI of the Charter; the metropolitan Powers solely were competent to judge in respect of which territories information should be transmitted; and the question of the constitutional relationship between the metropolitan Powers and the territories under their jurisdiction was a matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the metropolitan Powers concerned. The representatives of Australia, Belgium and France associated themselves with the views of the representative of the United Kingdom and said that the matter was beyond the competence of the Special Committee.

18. The representative of New Zealand, in support of this contention, remarked that his Government, desiring to fulfil its obligations under the Charter in the broadest sense, had submitted information regarding the Cook Islands even though it was uncertain whether it was a Non-Self-Governing Territory, as the term had not been defined in the Charter.

19. The representatives of the Dominican Republic and Venezuela, while not accepting the view that the Administering Authorities solely had the right to decide at what stage they could cease to transmit information regarding territories under their administration, agreed that the matter was outside the competence of the Special Committee.

20. On the motion of the representative of France, the Committee decided, by 13 votes to one with 2 abstentions, that it was not competent to consider the proposal of the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

V. Territories enumerated

21. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics referred to the summaries and analyses and other documentation before the Committee and pointed out that information therein relating to the Indonesian Republic had been included. During the 1948 session of the Special Committee, the representative of the USSR had stressed that information on Indonesia should not be discussed by the Committee for the reason that the Republic of Indonesia had become an independent State by the will of its people. It was still the view of the USSR that information on the Republic of Indonesia should be excluded from the documents before the Committee. He introduced the following proposal:

"The Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter resolves to withdraw from discussion by the Committee the information relating to the Indonesian Republic transmitted by the Government of the Netherlands, on the ground that the Indonesian Republic is an independent State."

22. The representative of the Netherlands recalled that, in the 1948 Special Committee, his Government had explained that information on the whole of Indonesia had been transmitted because the territory was still under the sovereignty of the Netherlands, and since it was still true that sovereignty over the whole of Indonesia was in the hands of the Netherlands Government under the van Roijen-Rum Agreement, it was quite in order to transmit information in accordance with Article 73 e. He stated that it was the sole responsibility of the Administering Authority to decide what territories fell within the scope of Article 73 e.

23. The representatives of Australia, Belgium, France and the United Kingdom repeated the view expressed in 1948 that the Secretary-General had no choice but to summarize and analyse any information transmitted in virtue of Article 73 e, and that the Committee also had no option but to consider the information before it. They also considered that the Committee was not competent to decide what were the constitutional relations between a territory and the metropolitan Government.

24. The representative of Venezuela said that his delegation held that the question did not come within the competence of the Committee. One of the major organs of the United Nations had taken up the case some time ago, while the parties concerned had undertaken negotiations at The Hague in order to reach agreement on the future of Indonesia. At the same time, he stressed that his country strongly desired that the Non-Self-Governing Territories would attain their political aspirations and take charge of their own destinies through the exercise of their free will.

25. The representative of the Dominican Republic supported this contention. He added that as the Indonesian question was before the Security Council, it could not, in virtue of Article 12 of the Charter, be considered by the Special Committee or any other organ of the General Assembly.

26. The representatives of China and India could not agree that the Committee was incompetent to discuss the question whether any of the information before it was in fact in respect of a territory that is non-self-governing. If the Committee decided that any territory did not come under the category of non-self-governing, then the information transmitted in respect of that territory was outside the scope of the Committee's jurisdiction and could not be considered.

27. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the fact that the Committee was fully empowered to consider a proposal such as that submitted by him was evident from a number of documents, in particular from paragraph 2 of resolution 218 (III) which recommended that Member Governments should notify any appreciable changes. Moreover, the achievement of independence by the Indonesian Republic was recorded in a series of international agreements, notably in the Linggadjati Agreement of 1947.

28. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the appreciable changes mentioned in paragraph 2 of resolution 218 (III) did not refer to political changes. It was clearly beyond the competence of the Committee to decide what territories or which of the information transmitted should be included in the summaries and analyses prepared by the Secretary-General.

29. The Committee decided, by 12 votes to 4, that it was not competent to receive and deal with the proposal of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

VI. Revision of the Standard Form

30. The General Assembly, in resolution 221 (III), invited the specialized agencies to examine the relevant sections of the Standard Form with which they are specially concerned, with a view to the revision of this Form. In the discussion of this question, the representative of the United States of America advised against revision this year on the ground that the territorial officers were just beginning to become familiar with the Standard Form, and changes now would create some confusion. The representative of the United Kingdom associated himself with this view. The representative of UNESCO stated that his specialized agency had prepared somewhat detailed suggestions for revision of the section on education, but its submission to the Secretary-General need not be interpreted as pressing for revision this year. The representative of WHO explained that his organization had appointed three experts to examine the health section of the Standard Form and that therefore consideration of the question of revision next year might be thought appropriate. The Secretary of the Committee stated that the secretariats of the FAO and the United Nations had collaborated in formulating some possible modifications of the section of the Standard Form relating to agriculture.

31. The representative of the United Kingdom referred to certain portions of the working paper on this subject and said he could not agree that any section of Part I of the Standard Form was not optional; or that provision should be made in the Standard Form to cover information from the Administering Members regarding the decisions or studies of the United Nations affecting the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The United Kingdom Government would report to the appropriate organs concerning these matters, and would not agree to supply such information under Article 73 e.

32. The Committee agreed not to take any action in respect of the revision of the Standard Form, which would therefore remain open for consideration next year.

VII. Information voluntarily transmitted

33. The Standard Form for the guidance of Members in the preparation of information to be transmitted contains an optional part with the following headings: geography, history, people, government and human rights. The Secretary-General had summarized information which the Administering Members had voluntarily transmitted under this optional category in virtue of General Assembly resolutions 144 (II) and 218 (III).

34. In the course of the discussion, the representative of India expressed appreciation of the fact that more information had been voluntarily transmitted, referring in particular to the liberal attitude of the United States of America and of Denmark, and observed that this trend should be further noted and encouraged. He proposed the following resolution:

"The General Assembly,

"Having noted with appreciation that more Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories have voluntarily transmitted information on the geography, history, people, government, and human rights of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, than in the previous year, including in some cases information on the development of self-governing institutions,

"Recalling the statement made in resolution 144 (II) that the voluntary transmission of such information and its summarizing by the Secretary-General are entirely in conformity with the spirit of Article 73 of the Charter and should be therefore duly noted and encouraged,

"Invites such of the Members as have not done so to include all such information in their reports to the Secretary-General."

35. Later, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics introduced the following proposal as an amendment to the Indian text:

"The Special Committee on Information transmitted [under Article 73 e of the Charter] on Non-Self-Governing Territories recommends to the General Assembly that the transmission of information on the development of organs of self-government in Non-Self-Governing Territories be made obligatory as well as information regarding the degree of participation of the indigenous inhabitants in local organs of self-government."

36. The representative of France raised the question of the competence of the Special Committee to consider this question. In the discussion which followed, some representatives argued that information voluntarily transmitted was before the Committee for its information only and could not be discussed, and that draft resolutions relating to it could not be considered by the Committee. Other representatives argued that in view of resolutions 144 (II) and 218 (III) of the General Assembly, the Special Committee was competent to consider this information and to recommend resolutions to the General Assembly concerning it.

37. The representative of Brazil stated that, although the Administering Members were under no obligation to supply information on the political advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the submission of such information was desirable and should therefore be encouraged.

38. The Committee voted twice on its competence in this matter. On the motion of the representative of France that the Committee was not competent, the result was 4 votes in favour, 4 against, with one abstention. This negative phrasing of the question led to a request for reconsideration, and the Committee took another vote with the result that 7 members voted in favour of the competence of the Committee and 4 against.

39. The amendment proposed by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was rejected by 12 votes to 2.

40. Following amendments moved by the representatives of China and the United States of America the representative of India revised his draft resolution, and the Committee adopted the revised draft resolution by 5 votes to 3, with 8 abstentions. The text appears as resolution A in annex II.

41. In the course of the discussion, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government had not supplied information under the optional part of the Standard Form, although certain data had been supplied by way of introduction and as necessary to the understanding of the information on economic, social and educational conditions. The United Kingdom would follow the same course in the future, adhering strictly to its obligations under Article 73 e of the Charter.

42. The representative of France reserved the position of his Government to decide whether or not to transmit optional information in the future in view of the action taken by the Committee.

VIII. The Secretary-General's summaries and analyses of information

43. The discussions on the summaries and analyses of information are treated in some detail since they cover points on which it was suggested that more ample data are desired in the future information to be transmitted by the Members concerned, and in the future analyses to be prepared by the Secretary-General, as well as points concerning the relationship of the specialized agencies to this work.

44. The representative of the United States of America stated that the information showed that progress in agriculture was hampered by insufficient scientific research and the lack of personnel. In both of these respects, the Governments of the United Kingdom and France were to be congratulated on the establishment of research centres. He suggested a study of the facilities for agricultural education and extension services for farmers in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The analysis on public health showed that in the training of medical assistants there was a tendency to stress the necessity for a high standard of preliminary education. In Guam, the United States had found that, even with limited educational background, the Natives could be trained as medical and dental assistants with sufficient technical knowledge to provide these services to their villages. The analysis of information on social welfare problems was informative. He noted with satisfaction the widespread recognition of the need to solve social welfare problems. He was disappointed, however, by the lack in the analyses of comparative data from independent countries. He commented on the planning in the field of social welfare being carried out by the Governments of Belgium and the United Kingdom. He agreed with the contention expressed in the United Kingdom information that it was necessary to help the indigenous society to form a broader conception of its own responsibilities. The United States territories of Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands planned and administered their own social welfare programmes through departments headed by and staffed with local personnel. It should also be emphasized that the Federal Social Security Act applied in its entirety to Hawaii and Alaska and that some provisions extended to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. The primary needs in the social welfare field were additional finances and acceleration of training programmes. He suggested a study of the methods used in training indigenous welfare workers and of the causes, prevention and treatment of juvenile delinquency. In respect of the analysis of information on education, he thought a more detailed study of higher education and technical education and of mass education programmes should be made.

45. The representative of Belgium observed that the lack of comparison with independent countries was a serious gap in the documentation before the Committee; that the agricultural problems outlined in the papers were common to many under-developed areas and were not peculiar to the Non-Self-Governing Territories as such; that they were technical questions, and for these reasons they could better be studied by the specialized agencies than by a committee in the nature of the Special Committee. No useful work could be done if social and economic problems were examined only so far as they concerned Non-Self-Governing Territories. In the field of public health, the shortage of personnel and medical equipment was due as much to the impossibility of providing technical training of local personnel as to the inadequate financial resources of the territories in question. The problem was one of increasing the productivity of labour and raising the national income. This problem also was common to all under-developed countries whether they were independent or non-self-governing, and, therefore, should also be studied on a world-wide basis. Here again, it was the specialized agencies which were competent to study the problem and to draw up a general plan which might permit a reasonable distribution of medical personnel among the countries needing them.

46. The representative of the United Kingdom drew the attention of the Committee to paragraph 3 of General Assembly resolution 218 (III) which authorized the Secretary-General to include relevant comparable official statistical information in the summaries and analyses. The analysis on agriculture contained no comparative information. The omission of comparative data seriously reduced the value of the summaries and analyses. As regards the analysis of public health, he drew attention to certain misinterpretations of the situation in United Kingdom territories. It was also to be noted that shortage of medical personnel existed in many independent countries, including the United Kingdom. He agreed that it was essential to train indigenous personnel to assist in the public health programmes and mentioned Cyprus as an example where teams of indigenous personnel had conducted a successful campaign against malaria. He was of the same view as the representative of Belgium that the specialized agencies should undertake studies in the technical fields and that such studies should not be limited to the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

47. The representative of India did not agree that the specialized agencies should have responsibility for an exclusive study of functional fields in respect of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He felt that to the specialized agencies should be entrusted the task of drawing comparisons and that they might supplement the information before the Committee by submitting their comments on the summaries and analyses prepared by the Secretary-General. The information on vital statistics was unsatisfactory. It would be of value to invite WHO to assist in the improvement of the statistical work in all the Non-Self-Governing Territories. There was also a paucity of information on the description of the public health systems and no analysis on the topic of nutrition. He would like WHO to study the diseases of malnutrition in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and the training and use of indigenous personnel.

48. The labour analysis did not contain information on the fixing and payment of wages, nor on the questions whether workers in seasonal industries received unemployment pay during the off-season, whether wage levels had risen in proportion to the cost of living, and whether workers were obliged to incur debts. He drew attention to the intensive recruitment of labour in certain parts of Africa which attracted too large a proportion of the male population to labour centres, whereas it was necessary to retain enough men in the tribes and villages to perpetuate the race and to perform local work. More light was needed on these two problems and it was his view that the ILO should study them. It was encouraging to note the growth in trade unions and that there was more labour legislation on the statute books; but it would be interesting to ascertain how many factories were inspected, the qualifications of the inspectors, the punishment for violations, and the actual number of prosecutions.

49. In the analysis on social welfare problems, he was concerned with the omission of information on housing conditions and programmes. He requested that these topics be included in the next analysis.

50. He observed that the information on agriculture showed there was a shortage of food and that it was due to insufficient production, primitive methods and pests. He desired more information on the shift from cash to food crops and on the extent to which modern techniques such as mechanical equipment and fertilizers were being used in agriculture. He was interested in the problems of soil erosion and land reclamation and would like to see FAO invited to gather more information on these two questions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. There was a need for better statistical methods and there was a shortage of agricultural research workers. In view of this shortage and the time needed to train the indigenous inhabitants, he would like FAO to consider whether a bureau of specialists could be built up of Europeans and non-Europeans to be available for service to the Non-Self-Governing Territories. There were a number of retired officials of experience in India who might be willing to work elsewhere. Extension work in agriculture might better be done by non-Europeans who were accustomed to climatic and other conditions similar to those existing in the majority of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

51. The representative of Egypt, agreeing with the representative of India on the subject of migrant labour, recalled that the ILO had undertaken a study of migrant labour and hoped that the Committee would be informed of the result of that work.

52. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that summaries and analyses were inadequate because the information transmitted by the Administering Members was incomplete and omitted data on many important points. There was almost no information on the development of self-government or on the degree of participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the local organs of government. The information on economic, social and educational conditions was far too general to be satisfactory.

53. Reference to labour legislation did not specify its nature and no information was supplied on questions such as the relative position of indigenous and European workers. Reference to unemployment contained no statistical data or explanations of the living conditions of the unemployed. Information was lacking on the financial position of commercial companies in the territories, their profits and the taxes they paid. Nor was it specified how the indigenous population was treated in matters regarding taxation.

54. Where information had been transmitted, it was so often incomplete as to be almost meaningless. For instance, in the summary of information on British Honduras, reference was made to scholarships, but it was not stated who received the scholarships, how many were granted and what type of educational institutions were intended. A similar example was provided in the summary of information on Bechuanaland. The statement concerning land showed that large areas had been granted in perpetuity to the British South Africa Company, and that only 104,864 square miles of land had been left to the indigenous population, while the remaining 169,653 square miles, including the best land in the territory, had been alienated. But this information had been presented in a manner calculated to cause confusion.

55. The information on racial discrimination was equally incomplete and vague. The summary of the information transmitted on Kenya admitted that there was no legal protection from racial discrimination and made the unsatisfactory statement that discriminatory laws had recently been repealed wherever possible. A number of the Administering Members had failed to transmit information of any kind on this subject.

56. There was a lack of information on the causes of labour disputes, which were mentioned vaguely as unrest in the case of Madagascar; yet the Standard Form required the supply of data on labour disputes. The wages of European workers were disproportionately higher than those of indigenous workers, and labour conflicts were most often caused by dissatisfaction over low wages and living conditions.

57. The Administering Members were not abiding by their obligations under Article 73 of the Charter. In the economic field they, and in particular the United Kingdom, France and Belgium in respect of their African dependencies, pursued a policy of exploitation unrelated to the interests of the indigenous population. They maintained existing backward economic systems, and kept the indigenous peoples in a state of poverty, ignorance and savagery. Vast lands were leased out to monopolistic companies, which exploited them for such agricultural and industrial purposes as were likely to yield maximum profits. In this connexion, the representative of the USSR quoted production figures from the Secretary-General's summaries on Kenya, Northern Rhodesia and the Gold Coast, and import-export figures for Northern Rhodesia and the Belgian Congo.

58. In the field of agriculture, this policy of exploitation was causing a rapid deterioration of land. Emphasis was placed on cash crops in preference to food crops, with the result that living standards were lowered and economic progress retarded. In this respect reference was made to the Bahamas and to the Gold Coast.

59. Medical services in the Non-Self-Governing Territories were inadequate; the mortality rate, particularly among children, was very high, as was the incidence of social diseases. In the case of some territories there was no record of vital statistics, indicative of lack of interest on the part of the Administering Authority for the welfare of the population. The number of doctors and hospitals was negligible in all the territories.

60. In education, statistics showed very low literacy percentages in a number of territories and complete illiteracy of the indigenous population in the rest. Comparing the amounts per head spent on the elementary education of local and European children, it became clear that there was gross discrimination against the indigenous population. The proportion of indigenous secondary school students showed that facilities made available to the indigenous inhabitants were virtually non-existent. There was hardly any reference to indigenous inhabitants who had received a higher education.

61. The representative of the USSR doubted if it could be claimed that the Administering Authorities provided justice for the populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, or protected them against abuses. In the light of the inadequate information, it could justifiably be said that a policy of discrimination against the indigenous inhabitants was practised.

62. One of the obligations undertaken by the Administering Authorities was to develop self-government and to assist the people in the progressive development of free political institutions. With a few minor exceptions, Members had not transmitted information on the development of organs of self-government, nor had they informed the Committee how the indigenous inhabitants were being prepared for self-government. From the facts transmitted on economic, social and educational conditions it was clear that the indigenous inhabitants were not being prepared for self-government, as required by the Charter, but on the contrary were deprived of the control of their land and kept in conditions of ignorance and semi-starvation.

63. In reply to the statements of the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that the principles declared in Chapter XI of the Charter were observed by the Government of the United Kingdom long before the creation of the United Nations and that the United Kingdom was proud of its colonial record. There was no "iron curtain" around their territories. He denied that Chapter XI contained anything requiring the United Kingdom to account to the United Nations for the administration of its territories. For this reason, he was not called upon to defend the colonial policy of his Government but wished merely to correct certain misapprehensions. Chapter XI was merely a statement of policy. The sole obligation of the Administering Authorities toward the United Nations was contained in Article 73 e and consisted of the transmission regularly of information on the social, economic and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. This information was sent for information purposes only, and was never intended to be the subject-matter of discussion or an excuse for propaganda attacks. The remarks of the representative of the USSR were full of contradictions. On the one hand, the Administering Authorities were accused of maintaining the tribal organization, on the other of breaking up the system of peasant proprietorship. In one breath they were accused both of doing nothing for the development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and of developing the mineral resources of these territories. It was charged that they taxed the indigenous inhabitants too heavily and also that too much attention was being given to the development of mineral resources, from which a large part of the territories' revenue must come. Foreign companies were accused of making too big profits, and yet the Administering Authorities were criticized that the prices obtained for raw materials exported from these territories were too low.

64. There were several misstatements of fact in the remarks of the representative of the USSR. For example, all the cocoa exported from the Gold Coast was produced on the initiative of the indigenous inhabitants, who owned their own land. They were not forced to do this, but found it profitable to do so. In Kenya not only did Europeans pay an education tax, but they also paid fees for their children's education. It was also clear from the information transmitted and summarized by the Secretariat that a very large number of ILO Conventions were in force in Kenya, including the Convention relating to minimum wage fixing.

65. The representative of the USSR had said that the Administering Authorities had done nothing in the territories for which they were responsible to implement the principles of Chapter XI. He had not said they had not done enough. He said they had done nothing. The United Kingdom was satisfied that, having regard to the many difficulties with which it was faced, and the comparatively short time that it had had to overcome them, it had done at least as well as any other nation would have done.

66. During the debate on the adoption of the report, the representative of France stated that the declaration made by the representative of the USSR was nothing but a tissue of inaccuracies and statements contrary to the truth, obviously not based on the information analysed and summarized by the Secretary-General, and that in consequence the representative of France had thought it unnecessary to discuss statements so entirely without objectivity.

67. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics replied that the representative of the United Kingdom either had misunderstood or misheard some of his observations. It was to be regretted that the representative of the United Kingdom had not undertaken to refute the facts presented by the representative of the USSR with other facts. The representative of the USSR stated that his arguments had been based solely on the information prepared by the Secretariat, and to accuse him of serious mistakes was to implicate the Secretariat. If, as the representative of the United Kingdom claimed, there was more complete information, why did he not refer to it in his reply.

68. With reference to the statement made by the representative of France during the debate on the adoption of the report, the representative of the USSR said that his remarks in reply to the intervention of the representative of the United Kingdom were equally applicable to the remarks of the representative of France.

69. The representative of Australia thought the Committee might consider whether it would take any further steps to assist the specialized agencies in correlating their activities with those of the Committee. The relationship had been outlined in general terms and it would be difficult to make it more specific, but the attempt should be made.

70. He referred to the activities of the South Pacific Commission, the scope of which included a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories in that region, and stated that it had established a programme of work including a survey of facilities for professional and technical training; a study of the best techniques for teaching reading and writing; a study of the types of buildings best suited to various climatic zones; and the use of visual aids in education. Projects of this type should be encouraged by the Special Committee. He regarded this Committee as an intermediary between the specialized agencies and the General Assembly, and desired to see the specialized agencies use the Committee as such. The Special Committee could draw the attention of the Economic and Social Council to the needs of Non-Self-Governing Territories in relation to the technical assistance programme, and the specialized agencies could be requested to inform the Secretary-General of the technical assistance given to the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

71. The representative of New Zealand also referred to the South Pacific Commission and observed that in the information concerning agriculture there was no mention of its important research work which was being performed on a regional basis.

72. The representative of China stated that the analysis on public health showed that, while there had been some improvement, there was still a lack of trained personnel and medical equipment, and that there was no information on the extent to which this situation was being remedied by the use of doctors from displaced persons camps and on the possibility of employing doctors with foreign degrees in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He considered that as a whole the information transmitted on educational conditions was insufficient; that the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be enabled to study in their mother tongue; that the information did not give sufficient details of the number of hours devoted to the study of the vernacular and the proportion of time so spent in the whole of the curriculum or of the proportion of teachers from among the inhabitants of the territories.

73. The representative of Egypt stated that there was nothing in Article 73 which required comparison of that information with relevant information from independent countries. This was a function of the Economic and Social Council which could not be discharged by the Special Committee. It would be better to send United Nations missions to all countries, independent and non-self-governing, to make comparisons on the spot.

74. In respect of the analysis of educational information, he drew attention to the following points. There were certain Non-Self-Governing Territories where primary education had not yet been made compulsory; in certain other territories that obligation was not strictly observed; in Kenya and Northern Rhodesia, primary education was compulsory for Europeans only. The statistics of the number of persons receiving an education did not reflect the actual situation. The statistics showed a high percentage of children of school-going age who received an elementary education, but an examination of the figures showed that only a small number received secondary and higher education. He hoped that the Administering Members would do more in the field of education and that it would be expanded to include higher education and technical training. He recalled that the representative of the Netherlands in the Special Committee last year had proposed that the UNESCO should study the problem of the language of instruction in elementary education. The representative of Egypt stated that he had taken all his higher education in Arabic and that the French Government could find Arabic teachers in Syria, Lebanon and Egypt who could be employed to teach in the Arabic language in Morocco and Tunisia.

75. The representative of China said that, in the analysis of education, it was stated that in French Equatorial Africa the policy was to use French as the sole language of instruction and to prohibit teaching in the local dialects in all public and private schools.

76. The representative of France stated that the question of education in the vernacular had been raised and discussed last year. The policy of the French Government was to teach the vernacular on the same footing as French in those territories where a lingua franca existed, as, for example, in the teaching in Arabic in North Africa; and in Indochina local languages had been encouraged. In territories such as French Equatorial Africa where the dialects often varied from village to village, it was necessary to use a common language of instruction, and French had been chosen as that language. In French West Africa, the situation was even worse, with a larger number of dialects. The choice of French as the language of instruction was solely for practical reasons, and education in the indigenous language was not prohibited. He also drew attention to the dangers that education would not foster equal opportunities if pupils were segregated on a linguistic basis.

77. The representative of Venezuela described education as the cornerstone of any sincere effort to further the progress of the indigenous populations. His delegation warmly supported all measures directed towards the establishment of compulsory education. He drew attention to situations in which the disproportion in the education of boys and girls should be corrected and to the importance of obtaining the widest possible participation by indigenous teachers. He recognized the difficulties of selecting a language of instruction. Nevertheless, particularly in primary and secondary schools, the widest possible use should be made of the home language of the pupils.

78. Finally, the representative of the Dominican Republic stressed the importance of international collaboration in programmes of agricultural development and said his Government would like to co-operate and give assistance in this field, especially after the opening of the Agricultural Institute now being built in his country. He drew attention to the need to improve social conditions and standards of living in the Non-Self-Governing Territories while developing agriculture. In the field of public health, he felt that in the utilization of comparative data his country could provide an interesting example. The Special Committee should recommend the study by WHO of the establishment of universal standards which would make it possible for the public health services in the Non-Self-Governing Territories to be improved. In regard to education, programmes to combat illiteracy should be put into effect in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The information revealed the lack of any definite plans in this connexion and also showed the low degree of school attendance. He believed UNESCO should be invited to prepare for submission to the General Assembly a general plan for a uniform campaign against illiteracy in all Non-Self-Governing Territories, which could be presented to the Administering Authorities for their consideration.

79. The representatives of the specialized agencies took part in these discussions and described the work of their respective organizations. They expressed appreciation of the information contained in the summaries and analyses, and declared the intention of the respective agencies to collaborate with the United Nations as provided in the agreements and in the resolutions of the General Assembly. The representatives of WHO and UNESCO indicated that if further invitations were addressed to their agencies, the character of the work asked of them should be defined as clearly as possible.

IX. Special resolutions concerning education

80. After the discussions in relation to the analysis on education, to which the Committee attributed considerable importance, the representative of Egypt introduced a draft resolution on the subject of the prevention of discrimination in education and the language of instruction. He explained that it was based on Chapter XI of the Charter and on the indications contained in the Secretary-General's analysis. The Egyptian draft resolution follows:

"The Committee recommends the General Assembly to invite the Administering Powers to take the necessary steps to remove any discrimination in education between the Natives of the Territories under their administration and the European communities there; and to invite the Administering Powers to make the language of the inhabitants of the territories under their administration the language of public instruction at least in elementary, primary and secondary schools."

81. The United Kingdom representative stated that, if the reference to discrimination in the field of education referred to deliberate discrimination, he categorically denied that this existed.

In all its territories, the United Kingdom provided educational facilities for all communities to the full extent of the resources available. As regards instruction in the vernacular, educational experts did not agree among themselves on this question, but it was the United Kingdom's policy to encourage the use of the vernaculars and to give instruction in them whenever possible.

82. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics asked that the last paragraph of the draft resolution be amended to read as follows:

"And to invite the Administering Powers to make the language of the indigenous inhabitants of the territories under their administration the language of instruction in private and State elementary, primary and secondary schools."

83. After a discussion which revealed some divergencies of opinion among members of the Committee, on the motion of the representative of India a drafting sub-committee comprised of the representatives of China, Egypt, France, and New Zealand was constituted to prepare a revised text.

84. The following revised text was prepared by the sub-committee for the consideration of the Special Committee:

"1. The General Assembly

"Invites the Administering Members to take the necessary steps to establish equal treatment in matters related to education between inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration, whether they be indigenous or not.

"2. The General Assembly,

"Recognizing the importance of preserving and developing the languages of the indigenous peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and

"Noting the appreciable steps already taken in this connexion by the Administering Members,

"Invites the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to undertake in collaboration with the Administering Members a study of the whole question including the extent to which such languages can be used as a vehicle of instruction in schools."

85. On the submission of the above text, the representative of the United States of America proposed to amend the phrase in paragraph 1 "the necessary steps" to read "where necessary, steps". This amendment was adopted by 14 votes to one.

86. The Committee decided, by 14 votes to none, to adopt paragraph 1 as a separate resolution; it then adopted, by 9 votes to 2, with 4 abstentions, paragraph 1 as a whole as amended.

The full text as amended appears as resolution B in annex II.

87. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics proposed the deletion of the second paragraph of the second draft resolution which reads "Noting the appreciable steps already taken in this connexion by the Administering Members". This amendment was rejected by 11 votes to one.

88. The representative of Belgium proposed to replace the text of the third paragraph of the second draft resolution by the following:

"Invites the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to undertake a general study on the question of using as the vehicular language of instruction languages of limited scope."

The Committee rejected this amendment by 4 votes to 4.

The representative of the United States of America proposed the addition of the following words at the end of the third paragraph: "taking account in such a study of the experience of other States in this matter".

The Committee adopted this amendment by 11 votes to one, with one abstention.

89. The representative of New Zealand proposed the addition of the following new final paragraph:

"Expressed the hope that, in accordance with the obligation accepted under Article 73 d of the Charter, the Administering Members will collaborate with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in the conduct of such a study."

The Committee adopted this amendment by 9 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

The separate paragraphs of the second draft resolution were then voted on separately.

Paragraph 1, as amended, was adopted by 13 votes to none.

Paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 were adopted by 12 votes to one, with one abstention.

The second draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 12 votes to 2 with one abstention.

The full text as amended appears as resolution C in annex II.

91. The following draft resolution on the eradication of illiteracy was introduced by the representative of the Dominican Republic:

"The General Assembly,

"Recognizing that one of the fundamental problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories is illiteracy,

"Noting that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization has agreed to co-operate with the United Nations in giving effect to the principles and obligations set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter with regard to matters affecting the well-being and development of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"Noting that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization's plans for an expanded programme of technical assistance to under-developed countries include the offer of advice and assistance on fundamental educational services generally, including the conducting of literacy campaigns, the holding of seminars and experimental or demonstration projects in fundamental educational services generally,

"Considering that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization is a specialized agency qualified to study plans and to recommend the most appropriate action for the promotion of systematic campaigns against illiteracy in collaboration with the Members concerned,

"(a) Invites the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to communicate to the General Assembly in 1950 information on the measures of suppressing illiteracy which would be of service in Non-Self-Governing Territories and on the extent to which its services in campaigns against illiteracy have been provided at the request of the Members concerned for any of the Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"(b) Recommends that the Administering Members co-operate with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, when and where appropriate, with a view to the practical achievement of the eradication of illiteracy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"(c) Invites the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to take account in its studies of the experience of other States in this matter,

"(d) Invites the Secretary-General to collaborate with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in any necessary studies, on the basis of the information transmitted under Article 73 c, of any relevant supplemental information, and of any relevant studies undertaken by the Trusteeship Council with regard to Trust Territories."

92. The following changes were accepted and incorporated into his text by the representative of the Dominican Republic:

In paragraph (a) after the word "communicate" insert "to the Administering Members and". This change was suggested by the representative of Venezuela.

In paragraph (a) after the words "Territories and" insert "to include in its annual report to the General Assembly information". This addition was suggested by the representative of the United Kingdom.

In paragraph (b) after the words "Administering Members" insert "continue to"; and in paragraph (c) substitute the word "various" for the word "other". These changes were suggested by the representative of the United States of America.

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics proposed the deletion of paragraph (c). The Committee rejected this amendment by 13 votes to one.

93. The Committee proceeded to vote on the draft resolution paragraph by paragraph with the following results:

Paragraph 1 of the preamble was adopted by 14 votes to none.

Paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of the preamble were adopted by 13 votes to none.

The following decisions were taken in respect of the substantive paragraphs of the draft resolution:

The representative of the United Kingdom asked that there should be a separate vote on the words "which would be of service in Non-Self-Governing Territories" in paragraph (a). The Committee decided to retain them by 10 votes to 2 with 4 abstentions.

Paragraph (a) was adopted by 13 votes to one.

Paragraph (b) was adopted by 14 votes to none.

Paragraph (c) was adopted by 14 votes to one.

Paragraph (d) was adopted by 13 votes to none.

X. Resolution concerning international collaboration

94. The Secretariat had prepared working papers relating to the analyses of information and the future work of the Secretariat, and to the work of the specialized agencies. The representative of India referring to these documents and in view of the discussions on the Secretary-General's analyses, introduced a draft resolution concerning international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

95. He expressed the opinion that it was essential for the Committee to take positive action in order to avoid overburdening the local authorities with more inquiries than they could reasonably be expected to answer and should, in consultation with the specialized agencies, select those problems in each functional field which appear to require the most urgent attention.

96. The representative of India continued by stating that the Administering Members, as urged in Article 73 d of the Charter, had undertaken to co-operate with one another. There was evidence that this was taking place to an increasing extent and the Committee, in order to avoid duplication of effort, should have before it concrete data concerning that co-operation. However, it should also be noted that the angle of approach of the Administering Authorities was very different from that of the United Nations and its specialized agencies. Their main emphasis was placed on the role of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in world recovery. The view of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, on the other hand, was that the interests of the inhabitants were paramount; thus the co-operation of Administering Authorities among themselves in no way obviated the need for investigation by the specialized agencies into economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee should recommend to the General Assembly that it should ask the specialized agencies to look into those problems which appear to call most urgently for attention.

97. The draft resolution introduced by the representative of India follows:

"The Special Committee,

"Having considered the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter,

"Having regard to the provisions of General Assembly resolutions 220 (III) and 221 (III) concerning respectively liaison with the Economic and Social Council and the collaboration of the specialized agencies in regard to Article 73 e of the Charter,

"Having noted aspects of the programmes of the Economic and Social Council and of the specialized agencies which include within their scope economic, social and educational conditions affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"1. Emphasizes the importance of promoting the technical training of the indigenous inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and requests the Administering Members to co-operate when and where appropriate with specialized international bodies with a view to the provision of adequate training facilities for indigenous students in the fields of agriculture, education, labour, public health and social welfare;

"2. Requests the appropriate international bodies to take full account of conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in work undertaken by them in connexion with the world census of agriculture, the study of soil erosion, the training of public health personnel, the study of diseases arising out of malnutrition, the application of International Labour Conventions to Non-Self-Governing Territories, the problem of migrant labour in Africa, the development of social welfare services, the prevention and treatment of juvenile delinquency, the study of the most appropriate means of improving housing in tropical regions, and the problems of higher education;

"3. Invites the specialized agencies concerned to communicate to the General Assembly in 1950 information on the progress of the work indicated in the previous paragraph which would be of service in Non-Self-Governing Territories, including information on the extent to which their services have been provided at the request of the Members concerned for any of the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

"4. Invites the specialized agencies to take account in their studies of the experience of various States in respect of the problems enumerated above;

"5. Invites the Secretary-General to bring to the attention of the Administering Members and the specialized agencies concerned the comments made during the discussions in the Special Committee in relation to agriculture, education, labour, public health and social welfare;

"6. Invites the Secretary-General to collaborate with the specialized agencies in any necessary studies on the basis of information transmitted under Article 73 e, of any relevant supplemental information, and of any relevant studies undertaken by the Trusteeship Council with regard to Trust Territories;

"7. Further invites the Secretary-General, in his analyses of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories to be submitted to the General Assembly in 1950, to select such aspects of economic, social and educational problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories as appropriately provide opportunities for international collaboration in the improvement of such conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories."

98. In connexion with the term "indigenous inhabitants" used in the draft resolution, the representative of China asked whether the representative of India agreed with his understanding that this term was intended to include local inhabitants of Chinese origin such as those in Singapore. The representative of India concurred in this understanding.

99. The representative of the United Kingdom invited the author of the draft resolution to reconsider the phrase "the provision of" in paragraph 1 on the ground that it invaded the realm of policy, which was the sole responsibility of the Administering Authorities. He said that paragraph 2 amounted to duplication of the work of the specialized agencies; and paragraph 3 was open to the objection of principle that it would require the specialized agencies to report to the General Assembly on technical information limited to the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

100. The representative of Belgium queried the phrase "diseases arising out of malnutrition", in paragraph 2, since the essential problem was to improve nutrition.

101. The representative of New Zealand considered paragraph 1 inappropriate in view of the provisions of Article 73 d of the Charter; the obligation to co-operate with specialized international bodies was one undertaken by the Administering Members. The studies mentioned in paragraph 2 appeared to him to constitute an ill-digested list. He could not see why paragraph 3 limited the information to services provided by the specialized agencies at the request of the Administering Members.

102. Referring to paragraph 7, the representative of France stated that the international collaboration mentioned therein should be clarified as relating to collaboration within the framework of the United Nations.

103. Following these comments, the representative of India submitted a revised draft affecting the substantive parts of his resolution as follows (changes in the text are italicized):

"The Special Committee,

"1. Emphasizes the importance of promoting the technical training of the indigenous inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and requests the Administering Members to co-operate when and where appropriate with specialized international bodies with a view to examining the possibility of providing adequate training facilities for indigenous students in the fields of economic development, agriculture, education, labour, public health and social welfare;

"2. Requests the appropriate international bodies to take full account of conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in work undertaken by them in connexion with economic development, the world census of agriculture, the study of soil erosion, the training of public health personnel, the study of problems of nutrition, the application of International Labour Conventions, the problem of migrant labour in Africa, the development of social welfare services, the prevention and treatment of juvenile delinquency, the study of the most appropriate means of improving housing in tropical regions, and the problems of higher education;

"3. (Unchanged)

"4. (Unchanged)

"5. (Unchanged)

"6. Invites the Secretary-General to collaborate with the specialized agencies in any necessary studies on the basis of information transmitted under Article 73 e, of any relevant supplemental information, and of any relevant studies undertaken by the Economic and Social Council and by the Trusteeship Council with regard to Trust Territories;

"7. Further invites the Secretary-General, in his analyses of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories to be submitted to the General Assembly in 1950, to select such aspects of economic, social and educational problems as appropriately provide opportunities for possible co-operation with the specialized international bodies, as provided in Article 73 d of the Charter, with a view to the improvement of economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories."

104. The representative of France moved an amendment to insert in paragraph 3 after the word "communicate" the phrase "in their general annual reports". The purpose of this amendment was to avoid duplication of reports, and the amendment was adopted by 8 votes to 4.

105. All the paragraphs to paragraph 3 inclusive were adopted by 11 votes to one; paragraph 4 was adopted by 13 votes to one; paragraphs 5, 6 and 7 together were adopted by 12 votes to none.

The draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 13 votes to none. The text as adopted appears as resolution E in annex II.

XI. The future of the Special Committee

106. The terms of reference of the Special Committee empowered it to include in its report to the General Assembly such procedural recommendations as it might deem fit, and the agenda approved by the Committee provided for the consideration of the future of the Committee. Although some representatives questioned whether this point was strictly within its terms of reference, no motion relating to competence was moved and accordingly the Committee discussed what recommendation it should make.

107. Three views were advocated: (a) to constitute a permanent Committee; (b) to constitute a Committee for a period of two to three years; (c) to constitute the Committee for the year 1950.

108. The representative of Brazil, after pointing out that the general feeling in the Fourth Committee of the third session of the General Assembly, as indicated by the result of the vote, was in favour of the permanence of the Committee, remarked that the commitment assumed by the Administering Authorities in Chapter XI of the Charter, as well as the obligation of the Secretary-General to prepare a summary and analysis, had a permanent character. Moreover, the effectiveness of the work of a technical body such as the Special Committee would improve considerably if it had a permanent character and a three-year period membership. Therefore, nothing short of a permanent committee could perform effectively the functions assigned to the United Nations in the field of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

109. The representative of India endorsed the views expressed by the representative of Brazil, adding that the very existence of the Special Committee had produced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories a very favourable psychological effect, in that the Committee constituted a guarantee that the Administering Authorities were seriously discharging their obligations under Article 73 of the Charter. It also had an appreciable influence on the Administering Authorities in their administration of the territories, because it was reasonable to believe that they took account of the criticisms and suggestions made in the course of the discussion in the Special Committee. Therefore, the establishment of a permanent committee was absolutely essential. However, it should not be regarded as a forum for propaganda against this or that Administering Power, but rather as a place where objective and technical views could be exchanged.

110. The representative of Venezuela associated himself with these views.

111. The representative of Egypt stated that he was in favour of the establishment of a permanent committee since the Committee had proved its usefulness in this and in the past sessions. It should be continued in order to do more useful work in the future. In his opinion, the discontinuance of the Committee would transform Chapter XI of the Charter into a dead letter.

112. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that, in view of the suggestion to establish the Committee on a permanent basis, it seemed necessary to review the fundamentals on which Article 73 e of the Charter was based. In his view, Article 73 e was perfectly clear. Resolutions 9 (I) and 66 (I) adopted by the General Assembly recognized the limitations of Article 73 e and referred simply to the methods of transmitting information. It was within the rights of the General Assembly to establish a committee to perfect the techniques of the transmission of information and nothing more. The United Kingdom had always been of the view that the proper function of the Committee was limited to procedural matters, and did not extend to substantive recommendations. He also stated that it would be improper for the General Assembly to attempt to rewrite the Charter by resolution so as to provide machinery not contemplated in the terms of Chapter XI of the Charter, because the question of an organ in relation to Chapter XI had been duly considered and deliberately rejected in San Francisco. There was nothing in the Charter which demanded an accounting for the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The real intent of the Charter was manifest by a reading of Chapters XII and XIII on the one hand and Chapter XI on the other. The two former provided special machinery for the administration of Trust Territories; the latter clearly provided no machinery for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was the deliberate intent of the framers of the Charter that there should be a distinction between Chapter XI relating to the Non-Self-Governing Territories and Chapters XII and XIII. Finally, any suggestions as to policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories would be an interference in matters which were within the exclusive domestic jurisdiction of the Administering Authorities and Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter precluded this.

113. The representative of Sweden declared that, while the exchange of experiences concerning conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories had been useful, the Committee had shown a tendency to trespass outside its competence and to consider itself a policy-making body. There was nothing in the Charter which justified this action by the Committee; therefore, he did not think the time had arrived to establish the Committee on a permanent basis and he would favour its extension for one year on the same basis as last year.

114. The representatives of France and Belgium associated themselves with the point of view of the representative of the United Kingdom, adding that the Administering Powers had accepted their obligations under Chapter XI within the letter and spirit of its provisions. The representative of France added, however, that he considered that the Committee had not completed its work relating to the procedure to be adopted for the treatment of the information transmitted to the Secretary-General under Article 73 e of the Charter, and that he therefore saw no objection to the Committee meeting once again next year in order to continue its consideration of this matter.

115. The Committee had before it three draft resolutions reflecting the different points of view, and a suggestion advanced by the representative of Australia:

(a) A joint draft resolution of the representatives of China, Egypt, India and Venezuela to establish the Committee on a permanent basis was as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the report of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter which was constituted by resolution 219 (III) adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1948,

"1. Considers that a Committee should be established, composed of all the Members of the United Nations which have hitherto transmitted information in accordance with Article 73 e and of an equal number of other Members elected for terms of three years by the General Assembly, on as wide a geographical basis as possible;

"2. Invites the Committee to examine the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e, including any comments thereon or other relevant papers prepared by the specialized agencies, and to submit a report thereon for the consideration of the General Assembly with such procedural recommendations as the Committee may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual territories;

"3. Considers that the Committee should meet at least once a year at a place (or places) and time (or times) to be determined by the Secretary-General."

116. The authors of the above draft resolution contended that, since chapter XI was a permanent part of the Charter and that there would be need for a Committee as long as there were Non-Self-Governing Territories under Chapter XI, the Committee ought to be continued on an indeterminate basis. They also argued that the General Assembly had the authority under Article 22 of the Charter to set up the Special Committee as a subsidiary body.

117. The representative of Venezuela, speaking on behalf of his colleagues associated with him in this draft resolution and on his own behalf, stated that paragraphs a, b, c and d of Article 73 contained specific obligations; that in accepting the Charter the Administering Authorities had also accepted these specific obligations, and that the purpose of Article 73 was to enable the General Assembly to know how and to what extent these obligations were being complied with. The framers of the Charter at San Francisco unquestionably did not desire that the information which was transmitted under Article 73 e should be hidden away in the archives of the Secretariat. Besides, Article 10 of the Charter authorized the General Assembly to discuss any question or any matter within the scope of the Charter. Information transmitted under Article 73 e certainly came within the matters which the General Assembly could consider. When the Interim Committee was established, it too was considered a violation of the Charter; but in his view, subsidiary organs were provided for in the Charter and helped to further international collaboration.

118. The representative of China stated that, while the competence of the Committee was limited in many ways, its deliberations were always to be guided by the specific objectives set forth in Article 73 of the Charter. The contention that the establishment of a permanent committee would be a violation of the sovereign rights of Administering Powers or would amount to rewriting the Charter was far from being in line with the intention of the sponsors of the proposal, whose only aim was to give full effect to the Charter. Conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories should not be written off as a purely technical matter and the special character of the territories concerned was sufficient to provide the Committee with a raison d'être. He pointed out that no provisions in the Charter precluded the establishment of a permanent committee and that resolution 219 (III) specifically provided for substantive recommendations besides procedural recommendations by the Committee.

119. The representative of India defended the joint draft resolution, and while admitting that Article 73 of the Charter did not specifically provide for the establishment of a permanent committee, he was opposed to the narrow interpretation placed on Article 73 e by the representative of the United Kingdom. The General Assembly had adopted resolutions in matters not explicitly covered by the Charter, but the Administering Powers had not expressed opposition to these resolutions. He strongly denied that any of these resolutions were attempts to amend the Charter. On the contrary, he considered them healthy conventions, which have been a characteristic of British constitutional practice particularly in the Dominions. In his opinion, the reconstitution of the Committee for one year would be unsatisfactory, and the discontinuance of the Committee at the end of next year, if it were limited to one year, would produce very unfavourable psychological reactions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

120. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that his delegation gave general support to the proposal for a permanent committee, the existence of which would work for the effective realization of the aims and purposes of the Charter, and in particular, of Article 73.

121. (b) The representative of the United States of America, in introducing his draft resolution to establish the Committee for a further period of three years beginning in 1950, stated that it was not being offered as a political compromise, but as a practical approach to the work of the Committee. The United States considered that the Committee's record of achievement so far was not such as to justify proceeding now to its establishment on a permanent basis: a further trial period was desirable and therefore a three-year programme was suggested. Since the Committee was seized of three types of information, economic, social and educational, it seemed practicable to devote one year to each of these technical fields in order to facilitate an objective and scientific examination of the information. It had been demonstrated that one year was not sufficient to obtain the full benefits of the collaboration of the specialized agencies. The proposal to establish the Committee for a period of three years would also avoid the discussion each year of the future of the Committee, and would also permit the elected members of the Committee to become more familiar with its work.

122. The text of the United States draft resolution was as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the work of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter which was constituted by resolution 219 (III) adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1948, and

"Taking into account the possibilities of further constructive work by such a committee,

"1. Considers that, without prejudice as to the future, a Special Committee, similar to that of this year, should be constituted by the General Assembly for a three-year period, such Committee to be composed of all the Members of the United Nations transmitting information in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter and of an equal number of other Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly on as wide a geographical basis as possible;

"2. Invites this Special Committee, when so established, to examine the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies, and to submit a report thereon for the consideration of the General Assembly, with such procedural recommendations as the Special Committee may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally, but not with respect to individual territories;

"3. Considers that the Special Committee should meet in 1950, 1951 and 1952, not later than three weeks before the opening of the regular session of the General Assembly, at a place to be determined by the Secretary-General, and should conclude its work not later than one week before the opening of the session."

123. The representative of the Netherlands expressed the opinion that, if a Committee were set up for a period of three years, difficulties might arise in case one of the Members during that period ceased to transmit information. For that reason, the Netherlands delegation considered it necessary that, in the resolution by which such a Committee would be appointed, provisions should be made for changing the composition of the Committee in such an event. He expressed the view that it would be preferable to appoint a committee for a period of one year. He would favour a resolution similar to that adopted last year.

124. (c) The representative of Belgium proposed an amendment to the United States draft resolution recommending that the General Assembly extend for one year the Special Committee created in 1949 with the same terms of reference and the same membership of Administering and non-administering Authorities.

125. The representative of France had also introduced an amendment, which he later withdrew, to the United States draft resolution to limit the duration of the Special Committee to one year instead of three. He explained the withdrawal in view of the formula contained in the text of the Belgian amendment.

126. The text of the Belgian amendment was as follows:

"For paragraphs numbered 1, 2 and 3 in the United States resolution substitute the following:

"Considering that the further work of the General Assembly should benefit from the experience gained by the Members of the Committee during the present session;

"Decides to renew for the year 1950 the terms of reference of the Special Committee constituted by resolution 219 (III)."

127. (d) The representative of Australia, commenting on the discussion summarized above, observed that while the question of the future of the Committee was included in the agenda, the Special Committee, unlike the Interim Committee, had not been requested by the General Assembly to make any recommendations concerning its future. While he did not dispute the competence of the Committee to consider this question, it did not seem appropriate to make a specific recommendation relating thereto. If there were unanimous agreement in the Committee on the question, that would be a practical reason to make it known to the General Assembly; but there were so many conflicting points of view and diverse arguments produced in favour of each, that it did not seem that the vote of the Committee would be of much value to the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly where the question would be considered again. More dignified and appropriate would be a decision to include in the report to the General Assembly the resolutions proposed and the reasons in support of each one. In this way, the final decision would be in the hands of the General Assembly. Therefore, he urged the Committee to consider carefully the implications of a formal vote in this matter and moved that the Committee should not take a vote on any of the draft resolutions. His delegation was not in a position at the present time to give support to any of them.

128. The representative of New Zealand agreed with the representative of Australia that the question should be settled by the General Assembly itself. While considering the interpretation by the representative of the United Kingdom to be unassailable, he did not wish to take a narrow view of the situation. His Government, although opposed to the Committee becoming a permanent body, would agree to a short extension of its existence.

129. In the discussion which followed, it was pointed out that the rules of procedure did not allow for a decision not to take a vote unless the proponents of the draft resolutions were willing to withdraw them. Since they were not withdrawn, they were put to the vote in the following order: first, the joint draft resolution, then the Belgian amendment, and finally the United States draft resolution.

The Committee, by 8 votes to 6, rejected the joint draft resolution of China, Egypt, India and Venezuela.

By 8 votes to 6, the Committee rejected the Belgian amendment to the United States draft resolution.

130. Thereupon, the representatives of Brazil, Egypt, India and Venezuela stated that they would vote for the United States draft resolution, reserving, however, the right to reconsider the situation in the General Assembly.

131. The representative of China said that he would vote in its favour on the ground that the first paragraph contained the words "without prejudice as to the future".

132. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, recalling that the Soviet delegation had always maintained that the Special Committee should be established on a permanent basis in order to facilitate the effective realization of the aims and purposes of the Charter in respect of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, stated he would vote in favour of the United States draft resolution, reserving, however, the right to advocate in the General Assembly the establishment of a permanent committee.

133. The representative of France reminded those representatives who had reserved their rights to raise in the General Assembly the question of a permanent committee that such a committee would be in violation of the Charter, and, particularly, of Chapter XI. It was not sufficient to point to the resolutions of the General Assembly as the legal basis for the committee inasmuch as certain resolutions might be in violation of the provisions of the Charter itself. Therefore, he reserved the rights of the French Government in respect of any such committee.

134. On a motion of the representative of Brazil, the United States draft resolution was put to a vote by roll call. The Committee voted 8 in favour, 4 against and 4 abstentions, as follows:

In favour: Brazil, China, Denmark, Egypt, India, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United States of America, Venezuela.

Against: Belgium, France, Netherlands, United Kingdom.

Abstaining: Australia, Dominican Republic, New Zealand, Sweden.

135. The representative of the Dominican Republic stated that he had abstained because his delegation, while agreeing with the principle of permanency, believed the most constructive policy was to accept a resolution supported by the largest possible majority. Therefore, his delegation was reserving for the General Assembly its position in the matter.

The text appears as resolution F in annex II.

XII. Resolution concerning technical assistance on a regional basis

136. A final question brought before the Special Committee was contained in the following draft resolution introduced by the representative of Australia:

"The General Assembly,

"Noting the provisions of Economic and Social Council resolution 222 (IX) which authorizes the Secretary-General, in consultation with the specialized agencies concerned, to enter into negotiations with appropriate officers of inter-governmental regional organizations engaged in development of technical assistance programmes with a view to ensuring desirable co-ordination for the carrying out of technical assistance activities, and

"Noting that many of the questions affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories are appropriately handled on a regional basis,

"Requests the specialized agencies to inform the Secretary-General of the nature of technical assistance accorded to Non-Self-Governing Territories with particular reference to regional action."

137. The representative of Australia explained that his proposal was intended to supplement the Indian resolution on international collaboration, and to draw attention to the important regional action which might be undertaken by the specialized agencies in respect of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The specialized agencies had said that definite requests should be made in regard to their services to the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and this resolution was intended as a step in that direction.

138. The representative of India welcomed the resolution and said it broke new ground in linking up the inter-governmental organizations with the specialized agencies. He requested the representative of Australia to add the words "and of the results of such assistance" at the end of the last paragraph of the draft resolution.

139. The representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom said they did not understand the purport of the resolution; that it had wide implications, and that opportunity should be afforded to study its effects on the questions of relations between inter-governmental organizations and the specialized agencies on the one hand, and with the United Nations on the other.

140. The representative of New Zealand did not see how the specialized agencies could report on such matters to the Secretary-General.

141. The representative of India replied that there were some matters in regard to which the results would be clear, and they could report on those. The resolution was important as a link between the two types of international collaboration covered in Article 73 d of the Charter.

142. The representative of Australia said that he would be prepared to modify the last paragraph to provide that "the Secretary-General in his reports to the Economic and Social Council should include information" on the nature of the technical assistance rendered. However, in view of the observations made he did not ask for a vote on his draft resolution, but gave notice that his delegation might introduce a similar proposal in the General Assembly which would allow more time for its consideration.

Note: Following consideration and revision at its 19th and 20th meetings, the report was adopted by the Special Committee by 13 votes to one, with 2 abstentions.

ANNEX I

Agenda of the Special Committee

1. Opening of the meeting.
2. Election of the Chairman, Vice-Chairman and Rapporteur.
3. Adoption of the provisional agenda.
4. Questions preparatory to the consideration of the Secretary-General's summaries and analyses of information transmitted during 1949:
  - (a) Date of receipt of information;
  - (b) Territories enumerated;
  - (c) Information concerning the cessation of transmission of information in virtue of General Assembly resolution 222 (III);
  - (d) Other questions.
5. The Secretary-General's summaries and analyses of information transmitted during 1949 and comments furnished by the specialized agencies in relation to:

  - (a) Economic questions;
  - (b) Social questions.

11. Consideration of the drafting sub-committee's text concerning:

- (a) Substantive recommendations, if any, to be submitted to the General Assembly;
- (b) Procedural recommendations, if any, to be submitted to the General Assembly.

12. Approval of the report to be submitted by the Special Committee to the General Assembly.

ANNEX II

Resolutions submitted for the consideration of the General Assembly

The Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter submits the following resolutions<sup>1</sup> for the consideration of the General Assembly:

- A. Draft resolution on the voluntary transmission of information under Part I of the Standard Form (as provided for in resolution 142 (II))

The General Assembly,

Having noted with appreciation that more Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories have voluntarily transmitted information on the geography, history, people, government and human rights of the Non-Self-Governing Territories than in the previous year, including in some cases information on the development of self-governing institutions,

Recalling the statement made in resolution 144 (II), adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1947, that the voluntary transmission of such information and its summarizing by the Secretary-General are entirely in conformity with the spirit of Article 73 of the Charter and should be therefore duly noted and encouraged,

Expresses the hope that such of the Members as have not done so may voluntarily include such information in their reports to the Secretary-General.

- B. Draft resolution on equal treatment in matters relating to education

The General Assembly

Invites the Administering Members to take steps, where necessary, to establish equal treatment in matters related to education between inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration, whether they be indigenous or not.

- C. Draft resolution on the language of instruction

The General Assembly,

Recognizing the importance of preserving and developing the languages of the indigenous peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and

Noting the appreciable steps already taken in this connexion by the Administering Members,

1. Invites the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to undertake a study of the whole question including the extent to which such languages can be used as a vehicle of instruction in schools, and taking account in such a study of the experience of other States in this matter;

2. Expresses the hope that, in accordance with the obligation accepted under Article 73 d of the Charter, the Administering Members will collaborate with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in the conduct of such a study.

- D. Draft resolution on the eradication of illiteracy

The Assembly General,

Recognizing that one of the fundamental problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories is illiteracy,

Noting that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization has agreed to co-operate with the United Nations in giving effect to the principles and obligations set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter with regard to matters affecting the well-being and development of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories,

Noting that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization's plans for an expanded programme of technical assistance to under-developed countries include the offer of advice and assistance on fundamental educational services generally, including the conducting of literacy campaigns, the holding of seminars and experimental or demonstration projects in fundamental education,

Considering that the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization is a specialized agency qualified to study plans and to recommend the most appropriate action for the promotion in collaboration with the Members concerned of systematic campaigns against illiteracy,

1. Invites the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to communicate in 1950 to the Administering Members and to the General Assembly at its regular session information on measures for suppressing illiteracy which would be of service in Non-Self-Governing Territories, and to include in its annual reports to the United Nations information on the extent to which its services in campaigns against illiteracy have been provided for any of the Non-Self-Governing Territories at the request of the Members concerned;

2. Recommends that the Administering Members continue to co-operate with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, when and where appropriate, with a view to the practical achievement of the eradication of illiteracy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

3. Invites the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to take account in its studies of the experience of various States in this matter;

4. Invites the Secretary-General to collaborate with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in any necessary studies, taking as a basis the information transmitted under Article 73 e, together with any relevant supplemental information and any relevant studies undertaken by the Trusteeship Council with regard to Trust Territories.

E. Draft resolution on international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories

The General Assembly,

Having considered the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter,

Having regard to the provisions of General Assembly resolutions 220 (III) and 221 (III) concerning respectively liaison with the Economic and Social Council and the collaboration of the specialized agencies in regard to Article 73 e of the Charter,

Having noted aspects of the programmes of the Economic and Social Council and of the specialized agencies which include within their scope economic, social and educational conditions affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories,

1. Emphasizes the importance of promoting the technical training of the indigenous inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and requests the Administering Members to co-operate when and where appropriate with specialized international bodies with a view to examining the possibility of providing adequate training facilities for indigenous students in the fields of economic development, agriculture, education, labour, public health and social welfare;

2. Requests the appropriate international bodies to take full account of conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in work undertaken by them in connexion with economic development, the world census of agriculture, the study of soil erosion, the training of public health personnel, the study of problems of nutrition, the application of International Labour Conventions, the problem of migrant labour in Africa, the development of social welfare services, the prevention and treatment of juvenile delinquency, the study of the most appropriate means of improving housing in tropical regions, and the problems of higher education;

3. Invites the specialized agencies concerned to communicate in their annual report to the United Nations in 1950 information on the progress of the work indicated in the previous paragraph which would be of service in Non-Self-Governing Territories, including information on the extent to which their services have been provided for any of the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

4. Invites the specialized agencies to take account in their studies of the experience of various States in respect of the problems enumerated above;

5. Invites the Secretary-General to bring to the attention of the Administering Members and the specialized agencies concerned the comments made during the discussions in the Special Committee in relation to agriculture, education, labour, public health and social welfare;

6. Invites the Secretary-General to collaborate with the specialized agencies in any necessary studies, taking as a basis the information transmitted under Article 73 e together with any relevant supplemental information and any relevant studies undertaken by the Economic and Social Council and by the Trusteeship Council with regard to Trust Territories;

7. Further invites the Secretary-General, in his analyses of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories to be submitted to the General Assembly in 1950, to select such aspects of economic, social and educational problems as appropriately provide opportunities for possible co-operation with the specialized international bodies, as provided in Article 73 d of the Charter, with a view to the improvement of economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

F. Draft resolution on the establishment of a Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter

The General Assembly,

Having considered the work of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter which was constituted by resolution 219 (III) adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1948, and

Taking into account the possibilities of further constructive work by such a Committee,

1. Considers that, without prejudice as to the future, a Special Committee, similar to that of this year, should be constituted by the General Assembly for a three-year period, such Committee to be composed of all the Members of the United Nations transmitting information in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter and of an equal number of other Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly on as wide a geographical basis as possible;

2. Invites this Special Committee, when so established, to examine the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies, and to submit a report thereon for the consideration of the General Assembly, with such procedural recommendations as the Special Committee may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally, but not with respect to individual territories;

3. Considers that the Special Committee should meet in 1950, 1951 and 1952, not later than three weeks before the opening of the regular session of the General Assembly, at a place to be determined by the Secretary-General, and should conclude its work not later than one week before the opening of the session.

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER (A/1303)

PART ONE

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

I. Constitution of the Special Committee

1. The General Assembly, by resolution 332 (IV) adopted on 2 December 1949 during the fourth regular session, constituted a Special Committee for a three-year period to examine the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies.

2. The terms of reference of the Committee are set forth in the resolution as follows :

"... to examine, in the spirit of paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 1 and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories" and

"to submit to the regular sessions of the General Assembly in 1950, 1951 and 1952 reports containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories".

3. The Committee consisted of sixteen members, comprising the eight Member States transmitting information and an equal number of other Member States elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly. Of the non-administering Member States, two were elected for a term of one year, two for two years, and four for three years. The following are the members of the 1950 Special Committee :

Members transmitting information

Australia
Belgium
Denmark
France
Netherlands
New Zealand
United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland
United States of America

Elected members

Brazil
Egypt
India
Mexico
Philippines
Sweden
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
Venezuela

4. The Committee met at Lake Success, New York, and held 29 meetings from 18 August to 12 September 1950. All the above-named members of the Committee were represented except the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

5. The representatives of the following specialized agencies took an active part in the discussions of the Committee: the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and the World Health Organization (WHO).

II. Officers

6. The officers elected by the Committee were:

Mr. B. Shiva Rao (India), Chairman;
Mr. C. Gonzalez (Venezuela), Vice-Chairman;
Mr. A. I. Spits (Netherlands), Rapporteur.

7. A Sub-Committee to draft a special report on education was appointed at the ninth meeting of the Committee. It was composed of the representatives of Australia, Brazil, India, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States. The representative of the Netherlands, in his capacity of Rapporteur, was an ex officio member without the right to vote and was elected Chairman of the Sub-Committee. The representative of UNESCO also participated in the work of the Sub-Committee.

III. Agenda

8. The Committee adopted the provisional agenda, subject to the inclusion of "teacher training" as a specific subject for consideration under the item dealing with education, and the reversal of order of the original items 5 and 6. The revised agenda is set forth in Annex I.

IV. Preliminary statements

9. At the opening meeting of the Committee, after the adoption of the agenda, the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom made general statements concerning their participation in this year's work of the Committee.

10. The representative of Belgium said that he had been instructed to read a letter to the Committee and to request its reproduction in full in the record. The text of the pertinent part of the letter is as follows:

"The Belgian Government has never concealed its conviction that the Special Committee, by reason of the powers conferred upon it and the manner in which it conducts its work, exceeds the limits of the competence conferred by the Charter on United Nations bodies. In that respect, the Belgian Government has clearly reserved its legal position in the past. It did so, in particular, in the General Assembly on 1 December 1949. It wishes to do so again now, at the opening of the present session of the Special Committee, and is agreeable to continuing its participation in the work of the Committee only for reason of conciliation and good will. Such participation must in no way be interpreted as implying any abandonment on the part of Belgium of its legal position under the Charter as conceived in San Francisco. This reservation is general in scope and applies to any hypothesis, in particular to a possible reference of the question to the International Court of Justice. Whatever may be the attitude of its representatives, as expressed by their vote or otherwise, Belgium's participation does not imply any agreement, express or tacit, which might restrict its rights and affect its full freedom of action, whatever the circumstances."

11. The representative of France stated that his Government had decided to take part in the work of the Committee in a spirit of conciliation, realizing that the Committee could do useful work, but that the reservations of a constitutional nature which his Government had made at the fourth session of the General Assembly nevertheless were to be considered in force and effect.

12. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that in a sense the 1950 Special Committee was making a new start, since the General Assembly had decided in 1949 to set up the Committee for a three-year period. He recalled the reservation made by the United Kingdom representative in the General Assembly in 1949 and stated that, in the interval, his Government had given the most serious consideration to the matter and decided that as a loyal Member of the United Nations it should, and would, continue to co-operate in the Committee's work as fully as possible. This decision was in accordance with the general policy recently indicated by the United Kingdom representative in the Security Council when he had stated that the United Nations was the only present basis for a possible world community other than some centrally controlled world despotism at variance with all the purposes and principles inscribed in the Charter. The Special Committee could play a most useful part in the development of the "United Nations way" if its members showed a true spirit of co-operation and if it acknowledged the limits imposed by the Charter. While the United Kingdom Government intended to participate fully in the work of the Committee, it was still unable to accept the view expressed in the past by certain non-administering Members that the Charter gave the United Nations the right to supervise the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories or to make metropolitan Governments accountable to the United Nations in respect of such Territories. The participation of his delegation in the Special Committee was to be regarded as subject to the general reservation that there was nothing in Chapter XI of the Charter to justify the claims of those who wished to establish the doctrine of international accountability in respect of Non-Self-Governing Territories which were not Trust Territories. Subject to this reservation, his delegation hoped that the Special Committee would conduct its discussions with a view to facilitating the constructive interchange of ideas and experience, and his delegation would participate to the full in such an exchange.

13. Commenting on the above statements, the representatives of India, the Philippines and the United States expressed their confidence in the work of the Special Committee and observed that the position of the Administering Members was fully safeguarded by the terms of Chapter XI of the Charter.

14. The Special Committee noted that the Government of Denmark had invited the Assistant Secretary-General, Dr. Victor Hoo, and the Director of the Division of Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, Mr. Wilfrid Benson, to visit Greenland, a Non-Self-Governing Territory under its administration. This visit had taken place between 15 June and 8 July 1950. The representative of Egypt, in commending this action, expressed the hope that other Administering Members would follow the example of the Government of Denmark.

V. The Secretary-General's summaries of statistical information

15. In the course of the discussion which took place on the Secretary-General's summaries of statistical information, members expressed satisfaction with the documentation which had been prepared for the Committee by the Secretary-General, and with the increased volume of information which had been transmitted by the Administering Members. Nevertheless, some representatives drew attention to a number of economic and social problems on which it was desired to receive further information or to which greater attention should be paid in the Secretary-General's summaries and analyses.

16. The extended use of supplemental information and the improvement in the use of relevant and comparable statistical information were noted. The view was expressed that the availability of comparable information enabled the Committee to approach its task of objectively and scientifically assessing the information before it.

17. Nevertheless, the representative of Egypt noted that the document prepared by the Secretariat on the training of indigenous medical personnel (A/AC.35/L.5) contained information on a number of sovereign States, although the function of the Committee was to examine information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. While he did not wish to criticize the valuable work of the Secretariat, he pointed out that General Assembly resolution 218 (III) invited the Secretary-General to include relevant and comparable official statistical information. The document in question contained a description of conditions in the sovereign States concerned, and some of the information cited was out of date. It had never been the intention of the General Assembly that the internal affairs of sovereign States should be discussed. Such information should not be included without the consent of the Member concerned. Accordingly, he introduced a resolution which would have invited the Secretary-General to secure, before the use of comparable information on sovereign States, the consent of the Member State to which the information related.

18. Several members of the Committee expressed the view that the question of the use of comparable information from independent countries should be interpreted in the light of paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 143 (II) and paragraph 3 of General Assembly resolution 218 (III). These resolutions were not necessarily inconsistent and should be considered together. The representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States considered that information which had been communicated to the United Nations or to the specialized agencies was available for use by the Secretary-General under the terms of paragraph 3 of resolution 218 (III), which was wider than and replaced paragraph 6 of resolution 143 (II). The representative of the United Kingdom, however, suggested that it might be desirable in future to indicate that such comparable information was being used to provide a means of assessing information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

19. At a later stage in the proceedings of the Committee, the representative of Egypt, in view of the short time available for the completion of the Committee's work, withdrew the draft resolution he had submitted, while reserving his right to reintroduce it on another occasion.

20. It was noted that the Government of the Dominican Republic had transmitted information concerning the operations of the University of Santo Domingo, in the belief that it would be useful to the Committee in its consideration of the question of education. This was regarded as a commendable response to General Assembly resolution 218 (III), which invites the Secretary-General to extend the use of supplemental information, including all relevant and comparable information within the categories enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, which has been communicated to the United Nations or the specialized agencies. It was hoped that other delegations would follow this constructive example.

21. The representative of the Philippines indicated that there were three ways in which comparisons could be made: first, among the Non-Self-Governing Territories themselves; second, between conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and in the metropolitan country; and third, between Non-Self-Governing Territories and non-administering Members. In his view, the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, as well as the Administering Members, would benefit from the three types of comparison.

22. In response to numerous requests for additional information, a number of the Administering Members called attention to the fact that much of this information was regularly transmitted to the Secretary-General, but necessarily could not be placed before the Committee in the form of summaries by the Secretary-General. It was generally recognized that this was a problem in the Committee's procedure which could not readily be overcome, since the documents placed before the Committee had to be selective.

23. In the information transmitted under Article 73 e the Government of Belgium supplied pictorial information on the Belgian Congo, and during the session of the Committee photographs were made available by the representatives of Australia, Denmark and the United Kingdom showing aspects of economic and social life in some of their territories. The opinion was expressed in the Committee that such pictorial material was of real value, and it was hoped that in future years it would be supplied more generally.

VI. Education in Non-Self-Governing Territories

24. The work of the Special Committee in 1950 was outlined in General Assembly resolution 333 (IV) in the following terms:

"... without prejudice to the consideration of the other two functional fields, to give special attention to the problems of education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, with particular attention to development of training in the economic and social fields".

The resolution also invited members of the Special Committee to make special preparations in this field for the 1950 session, with a view to facilitating the constructive interchange of ideas and experience on such educational problems.

25. In response to this invitation, educational advisers were attached to the delegations of Australia, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States. After the conclusion of its discussions on education, the Committee adopted unanimously a resolution introduced by the representative of the Philippines, expressing its appreciation of the valuable contribution made by the educational experts to the work of the Special Committee during the discussion of educational problems.

26. The Secretariat had prepared documents dealing with the eradication of illiteracy (A/AC.35/L.11), equal treatment in matters relating to education (A/AC.35/L.17), participation of the inhabitants in the formulation of educational policy and in the administration of education (A/AC.35/L.18), higher education (A/AC.35/L.7 and Corr.1) and teacher training (A/AC.35/L.13), and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization had prepared papers on the eradication of illiteracy (E/AC.35/L.11/Add.1) and the language of instruction (A/AC.35/L.15).

27. The Committee discussed this information from its third to its eleventh meeting. The representatives of the Administering Members provided considerable further information on the development of education in the territories under their administration. The representatives of a number of the non-administering Members outlined the manner in which problems of education were being treated in their own countries in cases where these problems were similar to those arising in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Apart from this interchange of experience, there was a substantial interchange of ideas on problems and objectives, in which most of the members of the Committee took part.

28. It has not been thought necessary to deal in detail with these discussions in this first part of the report of the Special Committee. At its ninth meeting, in view of the importance of its discussions on education, the Special Committee established an Education Sub-Committee with broad terms of reference to prepare a special report on education for the consideration of the full Committee. The membership of this Sub-Committee has been given above in section II.

29. The Sub-Committee's report was presented to the Special Committee at its nineteenth meeting and discussed from its twenty-first to its twenty-fifth meeting. It was revised by the Committee in some particulars, and the text as revised (A/1303/Add.1) forms the second part of the report of the Special Committee.

30. Following the examination of this report by the Committee, a joint resolution was proposed by the representatives of India, the Netherlands, the Philippines and the United States. By this resolution, the General Assembly was, in particular, invited to approve the special report on education, and the Secretary-General was invited to communicate it to the Administering Members and to UNESCO. After amendments had been accepted, moved by the representative of Australia to bring the resolution into harmony with the final conclusions of the report prepared by the Sub-Committee, the resolution was adopted unanimously. It invited the General Assembly to approve the special report as a brief but considered indication of the importance of educational advancement and the problems still to be faced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and the Secretary-General was invited to communicate the report to the Administering Members and to UNESCO.

31. At a later stage, the Special Committee agreed unanimously that the discussion of its report by the General Assembly would be facilitated if the resolution adopted were expanded to cover the general work performed by the Special Committee in 1950, so that the General Assembly would be invited, in addition to taking note of the report of the Special Committee and approving the special report on education, to approve the arrangements proposed by the Special Committee for its work in 1951. This resolution as finally adopted is set forth in annex II.

32. In the course of the discussions on education, the representative of the Philippines invited the attention of the Special Committee to resolutions 137 (II) and 324 (IV) of the General Assembly, resolutions 170 (VII) and 203 (VIII) of the Economic and Social Council, and resolution 36 (III) of the Trusteeship Council, which relate to the teaching of the purposes and principles, structure and activities of the United Nations and the specialized agencies in schools and other educational institutions. He felt that teaching about the United Nations, with emphasis on Chapter XI of the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, should be encouraged in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and might be included in the school curricula. The efforts already being made by the Administering Members were appreciated, and while realizing that the control of education was largely local, he thought that the Administering Members should continue to promote in the Non-Self-Governing Territories the teaching and dissemination of information about the United Nations. He suggested that the Administering Members might transmit information on these matters.

33. It was pointed out by the representatives of some of the Administering Members that, in response to the relevant resolutions mentioned above, they transmitted annually to the Economic and Social Council and to the General Assembly a general report on their activities in regard to teaching about the United Nations; that this report included reference to their activities in the Non-Self-Governing Territories; and that it would be a duplication of effort to report again on this same matter in the information transmitted to the Secretary-General under Article 73 e of the Charter.

VII. Training in the economic and social fields

34. General Assembly resolution 333 (IV), in inviting the Special Committee to give special attention to the problems of education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, requested that particular attention should be given to the development of training in the economic and social fields. Accordingly, the Secretary-General placed before the Committee documents relating to the training of indigenous medical personnel, of social workers, of agricultural technicians, and of labour and trade union officers.

35. An extended general debate took place on these documents, in the course of which the representatives of the Administering Members submitted statistical data and additional current information to supplement the documents under consideration by the Committee. The Committee did not formulate any conclusions or adopt any resolutions relating to the documents, but the chief points of debate which emerged from the discussion are set forth in the following sub-headings.

Training of medical personnel

36. The representative of the World Health Organization stated that the information before the Committee had shown that, in the majority of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the facilities for training medical personnel were limited and inadequate in comparison to the immensity of the need. An expert committee of WHO had studied the problems raised by professional and technical training. One of the conclusions reached was that personnel should receive training under conditions similar to those in which they would have to work. In order to develop existing facilities, as well as to establish new ones, it might be possible to pool the resources of several territories, or of several Administering Members. In any co-ordinated action designed to solve this problem WHO would be glad to co-operate.

37. The representative of India felt somewhat discouraged by the picture which had emerged from an assessment of the available training facilities, as it appeared impossible to provide, within the foreseeable future, the required number of medical personnel for the territories. He suggested that the Administering Members should make greater efforts to train medical personnel, laying greater stress in their programmes on preventive medicine.

38. The representative of France replied that far greater progress had been made than had been indicated. He outlined the training facilities which were available in the territories under French administration. He felt that the Committee should appraise the situation in terms of the efforts made and the results achieved.

39. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the development of the medical faculties in the colonial university colleges would lead in the near future to a considerable increase in the supply of doctors. He indicated various measures that were being taken in the teaching of hygiene and the control of malaria, which showed the great concern of his Government with preventive medicine.

Training of social workers

40. The representative of the United States stated that due regard should be paid to the conditions peculiar to the Non-Self-Governing Territories and to the needs of their inhabitants, and that therefore the latter should participate to a considerable extent in any programme for the training of social workers.

41. The representative of the United Kingdom explained that this type of work was performed largely by missions and voluntary organizations, and that it was a policy of his Government to encourage and assist them without encroaching on their activities. The United Kingdom was, however, training candidates from the indigenous inhabitants as fast as they could be found to fill senior posts in this field, and many territories now had separate departments of social welfare.

42. The representative of India was pleased that the information showed how much importance the Administering Members attached to the training of social workers; and that they had accepted the principle that it was better to train indigenous social workers than to wait until European candidates could be found. He suggested that they should consider the possibility of employing war veterans in this field as far as possible, indicating that his Government had found that these veterans made valuable social workers. He expressed the hope that the training of Native personnel would receive greater attention from the Administering Members.

43. The representative of the Philippines drew the attention of the Committee to the advantages to be derived from reserving a certain number of United Nations fellowships to enable young people who had completed their studies to supplement their training and to acquire wider experience in this field. He hoped that these opportunities would be brought to the attention of the administrative and educational services in the territories to enable qualified candidates to obtain these fellowships with a minimum of delay. It was not his intention, however, that the Administering Members should lessen their own efforts to train social workers by reason of any fellowships obtained through the United Nations.

44. The representative of France explained that in territories under French administration social services were often closely linked and sometimes completely merged with sanitation services, and that many of the medical institutions also trained social workers. Therefore, the efforts being made by his Government could not be fully appreciated without considering these and a number of similar official and private services, such as the Pasteur Institutes, the Red Cross, and l'Aide à l'Enfance (Children's Aid).

Training of agricultural technicians

45. The representative of the Food and Agriculture Organization confirmed the conclusions set forth in the document dealing with this question which the Secretary-General had presented. The vital role played by agriculture in the economic life of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the importance of agricultural education to the masses of the peoples should be stressed. To combine elementary agricultural education with general elementary education was one way to reduce the gap in knowledge and outlook between the technician and the non-technician. The test of the success of any agricultural training would be provided by evidence of a desire on the part of the trainee to return to agriculture. Since this field offered few rewards and little prestige, students could be attracted only by a strong personal link maintained during training. It was therefore important to locate and organize training in such a way that the trainee spent part of each year in field work in contact with farmers.

46. The representative of the United States stated that since science could play a major role in the task of increasing food production, the training of agricultural technicians was most important in order to extend scientific knowledge to the family working on the land. He described the agricultural extension work carried out in certain of the Non-Self-Governing Territories administered by the United States, such as the adult demonstration work, the work of the boys' and girls' clubs known as the 4-H Clubs, and the school garden programmes. In illustration of this work, films were shown to members of the Committee through arrangements with the representative of the United States. This action was greatly appreciated by the Committee.

47. The representative of India felt that the general picture of agricultural training facilities was not satisfactory. There was a real shortage of staff, which hampered the development of agriculture in the French and United Kingdom territories. Likewise, the number of agricultural schools and veterinary training centres was inadequate, and it appeared as though many of the new institutions of higher education did not give sufficient recognition to the need for an expansion in agricultural training. One reason for the small number of students attracted to agriculture was the fact that Government service was their only prospect, with a future financially much less rewarding than that offered by medicine and other fields.

48. The representative of France pointed out that the shortage of staff referred to in the Ten-Year Plan of Development for the French Overseas Territories must be considered in relation to existing conditions. The plan provided for an expansion in all fields of education and would be continuously adjusted with due regard for the rapid population growth.

49. The representative of the Philippines suggested that FAO should study the problem of the lack of balance in agricultural production in the territories to see whether it arose from pressures exerted on the agricultural patterns by the predominant economic interests of the Administering Members. He was also interested in the effects of land tenure systems on agricultural development in the territories.

50. The representative of the United Kingdom agreed with the principle that training should be given not only to government agricultural technicians, but also to the people who lived on the land, in order to preserve and stimulate their interest in agriculture. He doubted whether the influence of the ordinary village primary school could be sufficiently strong to keep the children on the land in the face of other influences drawing them away from it. The need for an expansion in agricultural training facilities was fully recognized, but the fact was that there was a lack of candidates to fill vacancies in the existing agricultural training schools. It was difficult to persuade the indigenous inhabitants to remain on the land or to influence their children to take up a farming career. Neither was the land tenure system a decisive factor, because the migration from the land to the towns was just as serious in those areas where a good land tenure system existed. The situation involved factors of health, education, agriculture and world economics, all of which were interdependent. As regards any lack of balance in agricultural production, while private interests in certain cases might exercise considerable influence, the metropolitan country as such could not correctly be charged with retarding more diversified developments.

Training of labour and trade union officers

51. The representative of the International Labour Organisation informed the Committee that, in its programme of work, the ILO was giving high priority to the problem of training skilled labour, foremen and supervisors in industry and agriculture. In respect of the training of labour officers, the ILO attached the greatest importance to the establishment, whether in metropolitan countries or in Non-Self-Governing Territories, of labour inspection services staffed by adequate trained personnel. The functions of those services and the standards required of their staffs had been defined by International Labour Conventions in 1947. The United Kingdom had ratified the Convention concerning labour inspectorates in non-metropolitan territories, and Belgium, France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom had announced that they accepted in principle the ideas underlying this and other related Conventions.

52. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that, although there were not many official programmes for training experts in the territories administered by the United Kingdom, labour officers from those territories were in fact receiving training in the United Kingdom which was practically equivalent to that given in Great Britain in the courses organized by the Ministry of Labour.

53. The representative of India welcomed the assistance which the Trade Union Congress of the United Kingdom had given in the development of trade unions in certain of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He considered useful a system which would permit the exchange of labour officers not only between two neighbouring colonies, but also between a Non-Self-Governing Territory and a sovereign State in which labour conditions were similar. He drew attention to the conclusions of the 1950 Asian Regional Conference of the ILO, which had considered the question of labour inspection, and invited the attention of the Administering Members to the recommendation that the fullest consideration should be given to the possibility of making arrangements to establish one or more regional centres for the training of labour inspectors.

54. The representative of France observed that trade union action and Government action were closely linked in the territories of the French Union, particularly in the field of labour inspection. The trade union movement was highly developed in those territories. He pointed out that the Governments of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom had exchanged information on labour conditions in the territories which they administered, and that two African conferences had recently been held to study questions of that kind.

55. The representative of the Philippines stated that the information revealed the existence of two different trends. On the one hand, certain territories, particularly those under French and British administration, appeared to stress the local recruitment of labour officers. On the other hand, existing trade union movements in other territories were being encouraged to affiliate with the trade union organizations of the metropolitan countries. Precautions should be taken to prevent the working-class movement from lagging behind or from taking a dangerous drift. Therefore, the Administering Members should make every effort to encourage the training of trade union officers for the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

56. The representative of Belgium referred to the fact that in the Belgian Congo the Labour Inspection Service had recently been reorganized and the staff increased on the principles laid down in the International Labour Conventions. The information to be transmitted in respect of 1950 would make it possible to assess the progress made.

VIII. Information relating to the other functional fields

57. The Special Committee decided to consider together item 6 of its agenda, the Secretary-General's summaries of information on the progress achieved in accordance with development programmes, and item 7, the Secretary-General's analyses of information relating to other functional fields. It had before it documents prepared by the Secretary-General in relation to development programmes, agricultural and economic conditions, public health, labour and social welfare. A general discussion ensued, during which members of the Committee made observations relating to the aforementioned subjects.

58. The representative of FAO informed the Committee that in 1949, in order to assist and encourage Governments in planning and carrying out agricultural development programmes, a series of regional conferences to study the question had been organized, and representatives of Non-Self-Governing Territories had occasionally attended. The question of agricultural prices raised in the document prepared by the Secretariat was of primary importance for the agricultural production and economic position of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in relation to the world.

59. The representative of India indicated several questions which deserved consideration and on which further information was desirable. Among these he listed land tenure, which was closely linked with the question of raising the standard of living of rural populations; the allocation of crops, since prices varied for each crop and the growers' profit depended on the choice; and agricultural debt and credit associations. He was also interested in knowing the benefits that the people of the Non-Self-Governing Territories had derived from the participation of colonial territories in the European Recovery Programme. He was glad to note that the Administering Members had taken measures to improve health conditions, water supply, and housing. He stressed the need for improvement in vital statistics, and inquired whether the WHO had undertaken any studies with a view to estimating any margin of error affecting the figures compiled. He emphasized the need for studies on malnutrition and occupational diseases. He thought that the WHO might supply information on the results of studies on preventive action against blindness. He would like to see steps taken in the various territories to provide employment for seasonal workers who were regularly unemployed for prolonged periods, particularly in the agricultural areas. The speedy development of a system of rural industrial co-operatives would be useful.

60. It was stated by the representative of the United Kingdom that considerable information was transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter, and that much of it answered the questions raised by the representative of India. However, the Secretariat had to be selective in the information which was summarized, in order to keep the papers prepared for the Committee within reasonable limits. He drew the Committee's attention to the unspectacular but important work of improving health conditions, housing, water supply and working conditions which was going forward in many of the territories. He also referred to the measures being taken to deal with malnutrition, with occupational diseases and with blindness.

61. The representative of France drew attention to an example of collective ownership of agricultural land in some of the territories administered by France. Under it, companies had made agreements with the Government to furnish to a specific region all the materials necessary for the cultivation of a particular crop. The companies were responsible for transporting and exporting the crops. He thought it would be advantageous to extend the system to other parts of Africa. The French programme of development was ambitious. Much remained to be done, and while there was a desire by everyone for speed, the present state of insecurity throughout the world was a factor to be considered in relation to the pace of the development programmes. He was pleased to observe the international solidarity which existed in respect of the programmes of economic development. In regard to preventive medicine, excellent results had been obtained in the territories under French administration; he referred in particular to French Equatorial Africa, where sleeping-sickness, malaria and other diseases were being brought under control. Substantial progress had also been made in providing housing. The Committee should study more closely the information before it for the purpose of assessing the efforts made and the results obtained. Only in this way could it be determined to what extent the Administering Members were fulfilling the responsibilities which they had undertaken.

62. The action of the Administering Members in developing integrated plans for the promotion of the welfare of the inhabitants, as evidenced by the documents before the Committee, constituted, in the view of the representative of the United States, a most impressive record. The old idea according to which each territory must pay for itself had been abandoned. In keeping with the spirit of Chapter XI of the Charter, the metropolitan Powers were now contributing, through development programmes, funds to help the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to obtain schools, scholarships, doctors, roads, aid for agriculture and industry, and many other benefits. He drew the attention of the Committee to the information relating to research work on the fisheries resources of the South Pacific. It would be useful if there were a fuller interchange of experience on such problems.

63. Referring to the Asian Regional Conference of 1950, the representative of ILO stated that land tenure and the conditions of labour for farmers in under-developed areas had been given thorough consideration. The Conference had invited ILO to prepare a study of unemployment and under-employment in agriculture in Asia.

64. The representative of WHO stated that that organization was prepared to assist any of the Non-Self-Governing Territories when requested by the responsible Members. As had been pointed out by the representative of India, it was most important to expand the application of preventive medicine in the territories. WHO was giving continuous attention to the problem of prevention of blindness.

65. The representative of the Philippines drew attention to the problems arising out of the system of small land holdings which prevented the introduction of modern methods of agriculture, and of the practice of bringing large tracts of land under cultivation through the system of land grants to private individuals or corporations, leading to a maldistribution of the land. He was also interested in information with respect to the financing of development plans, which would indicate the presence or absence of private financing. It was desirable that the profits of private firms should be ploughed back for the further development of the territories. In regard to labour conditions, the question whether discrimination in wages was practised against Native workers was of fundamental importance. He hoped that despite all difficulties, social welfare services in the territories would be extended.

66. The representative of Brazil reviewed the economic conditions in the African territories under the administration of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom. He noted that, with regard to the Belgian Congo, the proposed development plan emphasized the economic aspects. He paid a tribute to the sense of duty shown by the Belgian senators in the report of the Senatorial Commission on the Belgian Congo. The broad outlines of the Ten-Year Plan were designed to improve conditions and were proof that Belgium would spare no effort in executing its mission of services in the heart of Africa. The achievement of economic and social stability in the Belgian Congo lay in the creation of a domestic market so that in times of depression, when foreign trade decreased, the home market would have sufficient force to keep small and large concerns going by becoming better producers and larger consumers and at the same time becoming better tax-payers.

67. He noted with great satisfaction that penal sanctions for breaches of labour contracts had been abolished in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under French administration. The French action was praiseworthy, since these measures had to be put into effect over the protests of many colonists. Most of the funds set aside in the French development programmes were earmarked for North Africa. For Tunisia and Morocco, more than half of the total of 1,000 million dollars would be available. That was a tremendous sum considering the resources of France. In the economic and social development programmes, an appreciable share of available funds had been set aside for public health, education and housing.

68. In respect of the territories administered by the United Kingdom, he referred to the document entitled "The Colonial Territories 1949-1950" which made it clear that the central purpose of United Kingdom colonial policy was to guide the territories to responsible self-government under conditions that assured a fair standard of living. He described what the United Kingdom had done in the fields of public health and education, and noted that capital was being provided for roads and railroads, for power for new industries, and for the development of agriculture and mineral resources. Private enterprise, as well as the metropolitan and the territorial Governments, was providing the necessary funds. The representative of Brazil recalled that the total sum furnished or promised to the territories under the administration of the United Kingdom by the British Treasury between January 1944 and July 1949 had amounted to £160 million. Of that sum, £120 million had been made available through the Colonial Development and Welfare Acts. The United Kingdom, like France, had been compelled to put its programmes into effect at an unfavourable time, when there had been a scarcity of raw materials, capital goods and skilled staff. The rise in prices of material and equipment had required a revision in the plans, as a result of which the sum to be spent had been increased from £17,500,000 a year to £120 million. It would be easy to realize the magnitude of the credits granted now by the United Kingdom for current economic and social development programmes if one recalled that the Colonial Development Act of 1929 had authorized for that purpose less than £9 million to be spent over a period of eleven years. The United Kingdom had come to recognize that the more backward a people was, the more inadequate and vulnerable its economy and the more dependent it was on outside aid to overcome its difficulties.

69. He realized that progress could be achieved only by taking steps in the economic, social and political fields simultaneously. Two conclusions could be drawn: first, that it was an error to subordinate the development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to the commercial and industrial needs of the metropolitan country; and, secondly, any effort to achieve progress would encounter grave difficulties and might fail altogether unless the support of the local population was enlisted. It was therefore for the Administering Members to prove to the indigenous people that they were working for their welfare. A number of reforms would be required to achieve this, particularly with respect to racial and labour discrimination.

70. The representatives of the Administering Members concerned expressed their appreciation for these remarks, and answered questions contained in the intervention of the representative of Brazil.

71. The representative of Belgium pointed out that some of the suggestions of the Senatorial Mission to which reference had been made had already been acted upon and that others were being considered by the Administration.

72. The representative of the United Kingdom emphasized that his Government was fully aware of the need for diversifying the economies of its Non-Self-Governing Territories, always having regard to climatic and other physical circumstances. He also recalled that it was the declared policy of his Government to remove any vestiges of racial discrimination.

IX. Revision of the Standard Form

73. The Special Committee had before it a working paper prepared by the Secretariat on the revision of the Standard Form; the paper contained the suggestions submitted by the specialized agencies, as well as those arrived at by consultation with the Department of Economic Affairs and the Department of Social Affairs of the Secretariat. FAO, WHO and UNESCO had submitted detailed suggestions, while ILO, which had not proposed any change, had sent a letter containing suggestions which could be taken into account in the forthcoming revision of the Standard Form.

74. Members of the Special Committee agreed that the heavy work this year would not permit them to consider this problem in the detail which it required, and the consensus of opinion was that the revision should be postponed until next year, particularly as the Administering Members would not be transmitting full information on their territories until 1952. It was convenient, therefore, for the revision to be made in 1951.

75. The representative of the United States suggested that a sub-committee might be appointed to consider a further working paper on the Standard Form, which the Secretariat would prepare, and to make recommendations on the various suggestions which had been submitted. The sub-committee might meet several days before the next session of the Special Committee.

76. The representative of the United Kingdom supported the proposal to postpone consideration of the question of the revision of the Standard Form. He considered that it would be better to refer the various suggestions to the Administering Members as a preliminary step so that they could present their comments and suggestions. He considered that it would be inadvisable to make the Standard Form over elaborate, not because the Administering Members were seeking to keep anything back, but because it would be quite impossible for colonial secretariats to prepare detailed information covering a very large number of points within the time limits prescribed.

77. The representative of India agreed that it was not desirable to overload the Standard Form. Nevertheless, the information should enable the Secretary-General to prepare the documentation necessary to facilitate the Committee's work. It was not sufficient for the Special Committee to have a considerable amount of information at its disposal; that information must also enable it to draw conclusions as to the fundamental policy followed by the Administering Members. He pointed out that there was a mass of information apart from that which was transmitted under the Standard Form, which might enable the Committee to form a clear idea of the basic trends of policy.

78. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the Special Committee should bear in mind that the Standard Form was designed to guide the Administering Members to select material for transmission under Article 73 e, and that it was not an obligatory questionnaire.

79. The representative of the United States agreed that it might be advisable to focus attention in the new Standard Form on varying trends, rather than on the accumulation of additional detailed material.

80. The representative of India said he was aware that there was no obligation on the part of the Administering Members to adhere to the Standard Form. He felt that the revision of the Standard Form was not a matter merely of simplification, but of rationalization.

81. The representative of the United States introduced the following draft resolution:

"The Special Committee,

" 1. Having decided that a revision of the Standard Form should be made in time to be used as a guide for preparing the information to be transmitted for 1952,

" 2. Considering that such revision, while taking account of suggestions made by the Committee and various specialized agencies, should be drawn up in a manner which will facilitate the preparation of papers by the Secretary-General, based on this information, showing the broad economic, social and educational trends of development in the territories concerned,

" 3. Considering also that an undue elaboration of the Standard Form would not facilitate the purposes of the Special Committee and the General Assembly and should therefore be avoided,

" 4. Appoints a Sub-Committee consisting of — members to meet in 1951 to undertake the task of revision in time for the consideration of the Committee at its 1951 session, and

" 5. Requests the Secretary-General for this purpose to prepare a working paper for the use of the Sub-Committee, taking into account the wishes of the Committee as expressed in this resolution."

82. The representative of Australia proposed an amendment to paragraph 1, to substitute for the last phrase following the word "guide" the phrase "for the preparation by the Administering Members of the information to be transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter in respect of 1952 and subsequent years". This amendment was unanimously adopted by the Committee.

83. The representative of Belgium favoured a meeting of the sub-committee just before the session of the Special Committee, and therefore proposed the following amendment to paragraph 4 of the draft resolution: after the words "in 1951" insert "in the week immediately preceding the meeting of the Special Committee in order..."

84. The representative of the United States accepted the Belgian amendment to paragraph 4 of his draft resolution.

85. The representative of France had also proposed an amendment to paragraph 4 as follows: for the words "in 1951" read "in 1950 or 1951". However, in view of the reasons which had been given for the meeting of the sub-committee immediately before the Special Committee, the representative of France withdrew his amendment in favour of the Belgian amendment.

86. The representative of India felt that the sub-committee should meet sufficiently in advance of the next session of the Special Committee to permit consideration of its recommendations by the administrations of all the members of the Special Committee, before the Special Committee itself examined the proposed revision. He also pointed out that important items had been deferred this year and that their discussion and the discussion of economic problems indicated that next year's session of the Special Committee would necessarily be long.

87. He therefore proposed an amendment to paragraph 4 of the draft resolution by adding the following:

"at a time which will enable it to prepare a revised version of the Standard Form for consideration by all members of the Special Committee before the opening of the 1951 session of the Special Committee".

The Committee rejected the Indian amendment by a vote of 6 in favour and 6 against.

88. After a brief discussion, it was agreed that the subcommittee should consist of six members, namely, Brazil, France, India, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States. The Committee thereupon unanimously adopted the United States draft resolution as amended. The following is the final text of the resolution:

"The Special Committee,

"Having decided that a revision of the Standard Form should be made in time to be used as a guide for the preparation by the Administering Members of the information to be transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter in respect of 1952 and subsequent years,

"Considering that such revision, while taking account of suggestions made by the Committee and various specialized agencies, should be drawn up in a manner which will facilitate the preparation of papers by the Secretary-General, based on this information, showing the broad economic, social and educational trends of development in the territories concerned,

"Considering also that an undue elaboration of the Standard Form would not facilitate the purposes of the Special Committee and the General Assembly and should therefore be avoided,

"1. Appoints a Sub-Committee consisting of the following six members: Brazil, France, India, the Philippines, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America to meet in 1951 in the week immediately preceding the meeting of the Special Committee, in order to undertake the task of revision in time for the consideration of the Committee at its 1951 session, and

"2. Requests the Secretary-General for this purpose to prepare a working paper for the use of the Sub-Committee, taking into account the wishes of the Committee as expressed in this resolution."

X. The Secretary-General's summaries of information voluntarily transmitted

89. General Assembly resolution 218 (III), in paragraph 4 (c), invited the Secretary-General to prepare "annual summaries of any material which the Members may have voluntarily transmitted under the optional category of the Standard Form". Accordingly, a document had been prepared summarizing such information transmitted by the Governments of Australia, Denmark, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United States. The discussion of this item on the agenda was taken simultaneously with the discussion of the revision of the Standard Form. Members of the Committee expressed their appreciation of the action taken by the above Governments, and the hope that all Administering Members would find it possible to supply information under the optional category.

90. The representative of the Philippines drew attention to the importance of information on the observance of human rights. In general, he expressed appreciation of the voluntary contribution by the Administering Members concerned of a considerable volume of information under the optional category, and considered that in view of the postponement of the revision of the Standard Form, the Committee should encourage those Members to submit even more detailed data and should request the other Administering Members to furnish such information for discussion at the next session. He suggested that information on the observance of human rights in the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be treated as part of the information on social rather than political conditions.

91. The representative of France said that his Government was prepared to submit the fullest possible information in its next report to the Secretary-General, and referred in particular to data on the teaching of United Nations activities and the subject of human rights. He nevertheless pointed out that the submission of political information had in the past led to unjustified attacks on the Administering Members concerned. The French Administration was under no obligation to submit information on political conditions under Article 73 e and, since questions of sovereignty were involved, it no longer transmitted such information.

92. The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that, although a part of the Standard Form was regarded as optional, this did not imply that the remaining parts were obligatory. The United Kingdom had included some data invited in the optional part in the remaining parts when it considered it necessary for a proper understanding of the other information transmitted. Furthermore, all information within the categories specified in Article 73 e relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories under the administration of the United Kingdom could be found either in the data submitted under Article 73 e, or in various other reports to the United Nations. These latter included data on the observance of human rights and the teaching of United Nations activities. The Secretariat was at liberty to extract from those reports all the facts that it required for its documentation within the categories specified in Article 73 e.

93. The representative of Belgium stated that, as in the past, his Government would continue to consider the Standard Form as a document intended to serve it as a guide in the communication of information. With regard to supplementary information, he stated that the solution of the problems involved in this information should be sought on a universal basis; this would mean a study of the position of all peoples who in fact were not fully self-governing.

94. The representative of India considered that the distinction between the optional part of the Standard Form and the remainder was illogical and arbitrary.

95. The representative of the United States alluded to new legislation inviting Puerto Rico to draft its own Constitution, and stated that further details would be included in the information transmitted in 1951.

XI. International collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions, and information on technical assistance

96. The Special Committee decided to consider together items 9 and 10 of its agenda, relating to the above two subjects and to the collaboration of the specialized agencies and the work of the Economic and Social Council relevant to conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It had before it documents prepared by the Secretary-General and special reports prepared by FAO, UNESCO and WHO containing information on the progress of their work, which would be of service in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The information supplied by the ILO was contained in its general annual report to the United Nations. The discussions in the Special Committee extended from the twenty-fifth to the twenty-seventh meeting.

97. The representatives of the specialized agencies provided further information on the work being performed by these agencies which would be of service to the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and mentioned occasions when representatives of the Non-Self-Governing Territories had attended conferences and other meetings; they also referred to the fellowship and scholarship programmes which were open to the inhabitants of those territories.

98. Representatives of the non-administering Members emphasized the importance of the fullest possible collaboration of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the meetings of the specialized agencies and their participation in the fellowship and scholarship programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. Representatives of the Administering Members agreed with these remarks and furnished information on the wide extent to which, in both forms, the participation of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in international collaboration was being promoted. The representative of the United Kingdom explained that, having regard to the large number of scholarships and fellowships offered by the United Kingdom Government itself for the peoples of its Non-Self-Governing Territories and for which suitably qualified persons were not always available, the United Kingdom Government had not considered it appropriate to apply for too great a proportion of the fellowships and scholarships offered by the United Nations and the specialized agencies, as this would have been to the detriment of other under-developed countries less fortunately placed.

99. The representative of India also drew attention to the value of the Special Committee's receiving information on the recommendations reached by the Conference of Soil Scientists of the Caribbean Area, and the plans for the world census of agriculture. He hoped that further details would be available for the 1951 session of the Committee on fellowships and scholarships. He would also welcome more details concerning the state of the Press and on the importation of books, newspapers and other educational materials. In conclusion, he drew attention to resolution 321 (XI) adopted by the Economic and Social Council on 15 August 1950, concerning international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories, and at a later stage moved a resolution which is described below.

100. The representative of Brazil, while noting with satisfaction that the number of fellowships and scholarships accorded to the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories had been increased, considered that a still greater proportion should be so granted by the United Nations and the specialized agencies. He too drew attention to the importance of the resolution adopted by the Economic and Social Council on 15 August 1950. He hoped that full advantage of all facilities would be taken by the Administering Members, and that all routine delays would be reduced to a minimum.

101. The representative of the Philippines emphasized the importance of collaboration between the specialized agencies and the United Nations on the basis of a complete exchange of all relevant information and of frequent consultations. He noted that some of the specialized agencies had made available suggestions in connexion with the proposed revision of the Standard Form, and hoped that the Special Committee would take full account of these suggestions. He considered that the specialized agencies could also supplement the information furnished by them to the Special Committee. In this connexion, he cited as of outstanding interest to the Special Committee the declaration made by a number of experts of UNESCO on the question of race. This document and its conclusions were of equal significance to that of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and were of particular interest to the Special Committee and to other bodies of the United Nations when questions of race discrimination came under consideration.

102. Following the discussions, the representative of India introduced the following draft resolution for consideration by the General Assembly :

"The General Assembly

" 1. Takes note with approval of resolution 321 (XI) adopted by the Economic and Social Council on 15 August 1950 with reference to international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories;

" 2. Invites the Administering Members which need technical assistance for the educational advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which they are responsible to submit their requests to the appropriate organizations, as indicated in the case of Trust Territories in Africa in resolution 320 (XI) adopted by the Economic and Social Council on 15 August 1950 on higher education in Trust Territories in Africa, and having regard to the special report prepared on education in Non-Self-Governing Territories."

103. In response to questions, the representative of India explained that the first paragraph referred to resolution 321 (XI) of the Economic and Social Council, which had been adopted on the basis of General Assembly resolutions 220 (III), 221 (III) and 331 (IV) emanating from the Special Committee, and which referred to international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The second paragraph of his resolution referred to resolution 320 (XI) of the Economic and Social Council, which invited the Administering Authorities needing technical assistance for the educational advancement of the African Trust Territories to submit their requests to the appropriate organizations. He considered that it would be of value to extend this invitation to the Administering Members in respect of their Non-Self-Governing Territories.

104. The representative of Belgium expressed doubts regarding the need for an additional resolution on technical assistance, in view of the series of resolutions on this subject adopted by various organs of the United Nations. He considered, too, that reference to the resolution regarding higher education in the Trust Territories was inappropriate in a draft on technical assistance for Non-Self-Governing Territories.

105. As regards the second paragraph of the draft resolution, it was suggested by the representative of the United States that reference to the Trust Territories should be deleted, and the text widened to include technical assistance for economic and social, as well as educational advancement.

106. The representative of the United Kingdom was in sympathy with the spirit motivating the Indian proposal, but agreed with the representative of Belgium that reference to the Trust Territories in Africa was not the concern of the Special Committee. He added that it might not be appropriate for the Special Committee to suggest that the General Assembly should note with approval a resolution adopted by one of the principal organs of the United Nations. He thought, too, that some confusion might result in the General Assembly, since, presumably, the report of the Economic and Social Council would be referred, in relation to its economic questions, to the Second Committee, whereas the report of the Special Committee would come before the Fourth Committee.

107. The representative of New Zealand thought that it was desirable to adopt a resolution along the lines suggested, and that if duplication of work were likely to arise in the General Assembly, a joint agreement could be reached between the two Committees concerned. He suggested, however, that the text should be brought into closer harmony with resolution 321 (XI) of the Economic and Social Council.

108. The representative of Brazil announced that he would abstain on any vote taken, as he considered that if during the General Assembly it was felt that the Second Committee was not devoting sufficient attention to the resolution of the Economic and Social Council, the proposal could then be reintroduced.

109. The representative of Venezuela supported the resolution, as he considered that it advanced further the principles contained in the previous resolutions.

110. Following further discussion on the manner in which any duplication of work between Committees of the General Assembly could be avoided, the representative of India accepted amendments proposed by the representatives of the United States and of New Zealand.

111. The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by 12 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. The text is given in annex II.

XII. General assembly resolution 334 (IV) : Territories to which Chapter XI of the Charter applies

112. The representative of Egypt stated that this was a very complex question requiring further study and additional documentation, for which there was insufficient time at this session. He proposed that it be deferred. In this view he was supported by the representatives of Denmark, France, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States. It was agreed that this item should be put on the agenda of the next session of the Special Committee.

XIII. Future work of the Special Committee

113. General Assembly resolution 333 (IV), which invited the Special Committee at its 1950 session to give special attention to the problems of education, contains in the second paragraph of its preamble the consideration that "the value of the work of the Committee would be enhanced if, without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, special attention were given to one field each year".

114. In the light of the above text and of the success which the Special Committee believed had accompanied the special attention paid to education this year, considerable thought was given to the choice of subjects to be studied intensively by the Special Committee in 1951. At its twenty-second meeting, the Special Committee reached agreement that at its 1951 session it should pay special attention to economic conditions and development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, without prejudice to the consideration of the other two functional fields. At its twenty-seventh meeting, the Special Committee discussed a number of indications of the treatment to be accorded the general study of economic conditions and development and instructed the Secretariat to prepare a list of subjects on the basis of the indications given. At its twenty-eighth meeting, the Special Committee examined the list prepared by the Secretariat.

115. The discussions at the twenty-second and twenty-seventh meetings showed the importance attached by the Special Committee to economic conditions and development in Non-Self-Governing Territories and the problems which would have to be faced if the Special Committee was to be able to engage in an effective discussion in 1951.

116. At the first of these two meetings, the representative of the United States expressed the opinion that under resolution 333 (IV) the Special Committee was required to turn its attention to one of the other two functional fields in 1951. After hearing other interventions, he proposed the decision which was approved by the Committee that the field chosen should be economics. Previously, the representative of Brazil, considering the question of economic development as being too vast for useful consideration by the Special Committee at one session, suggested that particular attention should be paid to problems of the rural economy. The representative of the Philippines, while agreeing with the representative of Brazil, pointed out that this year the Special Committee had not been able to include in its report on education any conclusions relating to technical training. He considered that these problems should be the subject of special examination, as well as the question he had raised concerning the diffusion of information about the United Nations.

117. At the twenty-seventh meeting of the Special Committee, the representative of the United States made a number of suggestions as to the topics which might be considered for inclusion in the agenda for 1951 under the general heading of economic development.

118. The representative of Denmark recommended that the Committee's deliberations should not be academic, but should aim at practical results, in order that it might render a real contribution to the economic and social development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He thought that the Committee's deliberations during the next session should have particular regard to the programme of technical assistance to under-developed areas elaborated by the United States, and to the United Nations programme of technical assistance, in such a way that the problems should be discussed by the Committee in the light of these programmes. Every effort should be made to accelerate economic progress and social reform in all countries.

119. The representative of the Philippines welcomed the suggestions made by the United States and gave further indications of the particular items which might be studied.

120. The representative of India, in expressing his appreciation of the suggestions made, considered that questions of under-employment and seasonal unemployment in agricultural countries should also be studied. Nevertheless, the Committee should not include in its agenda more subjects than it could effectively handle. A superficial study in the economic field would be worse than useless. He added that the Special Committee would have to allocate time during its next session for a brief discussion of progress in the educational field following its work of the present session.

121. The representative of Brazil added that the question of the factors determining the nature of a Non-Self-Governing Territory and that of the revision of the Standard Form would also form important items in the agenda for next year. The Special Committee should limit its studies in the economic field. He suggested that the practical starting-point would be the question of the rural economy.

122. The representative of France supported the proposal of the Brazilian representative. The general economic problem was too vast in scope, and problems of the rural economy were more urgent than industrial problems in most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

123. In the course of both the twenty-second and the twenty-seventh meetings, it was pointed out on behalf of the Secretariat that in fact the Special Committee was examining not only the future work of the Special Committee, but also the year's programme for the Secretariat in providing satisfactory documents for the Committee. It was therefore necessary to take full account of the general work programmes of the United Nations as a whole, including the programmes of the specialized agencies, together with the administrative problems which might arise and the necessity of conforming strictly to the agreements between the United Nations and the specialized agencies. It was also pointed out on behalf of the Secretariat that the programme of work for the Special Committee was governed not only by General Assembly resolution 333 (IV), but by resolutions 218 (III) and 331 (IV). The first of these two latter resolutions provided a three-year cycle in the general review of the work coming before the Special Committee. The second invited the Secretary-General, in his analyses of information, to select such aspects of economic, social and educational problems as would provide opportunities for possible co-operation with the specialized international bodies. It was urged that a high degree of selectivity should be left to the Secretary-General; the exercise of such a selectivity would be governed by the terms of the General Assembly resolutions and the indications given by the Special Committee.

124. At its twenty-eighth meeting, the Committee had before it a note prepared at its request by the Secretariat, containing a list of topics in the economic field for consideration by the Special Committee in 1951. This list was accompanied by an explanatory statement referring in particular to the assistance which should be sought in the prosecution of the necessary studies and the possibility that extra expenditure would be incurred.

125. The representatives of Brazil, France and the United States found the list satisfactory. The representative of the United Kingdom did not wish to comment on any of the detailed subjects included in the list, but expressed the opinion that it was somewhat long. The four representatives indicated that they could not agree that the programme of work should call for any additional expenditure. However, the representative of Egypt did not think that the Committee should be too restrictive on the question of the financial implications of the programme of work.

126. It was observed by the representative of Brazil that the list did not include anything on labour conditions. The representative of France also drew attention to this omission. Agreeing that this was important, the representative of the United States suggested the inclusion of an item on "Programmes for training of workers in agriculture and industry". The Committee agreed to this suggestion.

127. The representative of Brazil inquired to what extent the International Labour Organisation could assist in the preparation of documents on the subject of labour. The representative of ILO replied that, although that Organisation was studying this particular subject of training of workers in agriculture and industry, it would be for its Governing Body to determine to what extent it could assist, and he was therefore not in a position to make any commitment, although he could give every assurance of its willingness co-operate.

128. The representative of the Philippines suggested that fisheries should be presumed to be included in the topics and that handicrafts should be specifically mentioned under the programmes of industrial development

129. The representative of India stated that it was to be presumed that information relating to forestry, irrigation and hydro-electric production would be included in the studies.

130. The representative of Australia suggested the inclusion of the subject of research programmes.

131. The following is the list of topics agreed on by the Committee:

1. Major economic problems of Non-Self-Governing Territories

- (a) Economic objectives as declared by the Administering Members,
- (b) Development programmes and their progress,
- (c) Difficulties encountered in the execution of development programmes.

2. Rural economy

- (a) Export and subsistence production,
- (b) Credit facilities,
- (c) Co-operative organization,
- (d) Other forms of assistance for marketing, the use of equipment, the provision of seeds and fertilizers, the improvement of stock,
- (e) Rural health and welfare,
- (f) General aspects of land distribution,
- (g) International programmes for the exchange of information, technical assistance and economic aid:
  - (i) United Nations and the specialized agencies,
  - (ii) Regional organizations,
  - (iii) Bilateral arrangements.
- (h) Research programmes.

3. General programmes of industrial development

- (a) Processing of agricultural products,
- (b) Handicrafts and other rural industries,
- (c) Mines,
- (d) Manufactures.

4. Transport and communications

- (a) Roads,
- (b) Railways,
- (c) Maritime and inland waterways,
- (d) Air.

5. Social factors in economic development

- (a) Relationship of health and social services to economic development,
- (b) General organization of public health services,
- (c) Collaboration of the inhabitants,
- (d) Indications given by the Administering Members of improvements in standards of living resulting from economic development,
- (e) Problems of social adjustment consequent upon economic change,
- (f) Programmes for the training of workers in agriculture and industry.

XIV. Time and place of meeting of the 1951 session of the Special Committee

132. The representative of the Philippines reminded the Committee that it was necessary to indicate its wishes in regard to the time of meeting next year. After a brief discussion, in which the heavy work before the Special Committee was emphasized, but stress was also laid on the need to avoid overloading the work programme of the United Nations, the feeling was expressed that a slightly longer session would be necessary in 1951, and it was agreed, at the suggestion of the representative of the United States, that the Committee should meet some time during the second week in August, leaving it to the Secretary-General to decide the exact date.

133. As regards the place of meeting, the representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that this should be left to the discretion of the Secretary-General, who would bear in mind that the Special Committee should meet at or near the place of meeting of the General Assembly.

ANNEX I

Agenda of the Special Committee

- 1. Opening of the meeting.
- 2. Election of the Chairman, Vice-Chairman and Rapporteur.
- 3. Adoption of the provisional agenda.
- 4. The Secretary-General's summaries of statistical information transmitted during 1950.
- 5. Education in Non-Self-Governing Territories : The Secretary-General's analysis of information and reports of the specialized agencies :
  - (a) Eradication of illiteracy,
  - (b) Language of instruction,
  - (c) Equal treatment in matters relating to education,
  - (d) Participation of the inhabitants in the formulation of educational policy and in the administration of education,
  - (e) Higher education,
  - (f) Teacher training,

- (g) Training of indigenous medical personnel,
  - (h) Training of social workers,
  - (i) Training of agricultural technicians,
  - (j) Training of labour and trade union officers,
  - (k) Other questions relating to education.
- 6. The Secretary-General's summaries of information on the progress achieved in accordance with development programmes.
- 7. The Secretary-General's analyses of information relating to other functional fields :
  - (a) Agricultural and economic conditions,
  - (b) Public health,
  - (c) Labour,
  - (d) Social welfare.
- 8. Revision of the Standard Form.

9. International collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories :

- (a) Collaboration of the specialized agencies,
- (b) Work of the Economic and Social Council.

10. Information on technical assistance accorded to Non-Self-Governing Territories.

11. The Secretary-General's summaries of information voluntarily transmitted under the optional category of the Standard Form.

12. General Assembly resolution 334 (IV) : examination of factors to be taken into account in deciding whether any territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government.

13. Future work of the Special Committee.

14. Approval of the report to be submitted by the Special Committee to the General Assembly.

ANNEX II

Resolutions submitted for the consideration of the General Assembly

The Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter submits the following resolutions for the consideration of the General Assembly :

A. Draft resolution concerning technical assistance to Non-Self-Governing Territories

The General Assembly,

Having before it the report of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter,

1. Takes note with appreciation of resolution 321 (XI) adopted by the Economic and Social Council on 15 August with reference to international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories;

2. Invites the attention of Administering Members which need technical assistance for the economic, social and educational advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which they are responsible to the existence of facilities which are available for such advancement, as indicated in the above resolution.

B. Draft resolution on the work of the Special Committee in 1950

The General Assembly

1. Takes note of the report of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on the work of its 1950 session;

2. Approves the special report on education as a brief but considered indication of the importance of educational advancement and the problem still to be faced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

3. Invites the Secretary-General to communicate this report to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories and to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization for their consideration;

4. Approves the arrangements proposed by the Special Committee for its work in 1951.

PART TWO

REPORT OF THE SUB-COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES (A/1303/Add. 1)<sup>1</sup>

I. Introduction

1. Resolution 333 (IV), adopted by the General Assembly on 2 December 1949, invited the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to give special attention to the problems of education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In resolution 328 (IV), attention was drawn to the principle of equal treatment in matters relating to education among the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Resolution 329 (IV) invited the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to undertake an over-all study of the question of the language of instruction in Non-Self-Governing Territories. Resolution 330 (IV) asked for the communication of information on measures for suppressing illiteracy and recommended that the Administering Members continue to co-operate with UNESCO with a view to the eradication of illiteracy in Non-Self-Governing Territories. Resolution 331 (IV), concerning international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, drew attention to the importance of promoting the technical training of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and, among other problems, to the question of higher education.

2. In approaching the subject of education, the Committee had in mind the following general international principles.

3. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights was proclaimed by the General Assembly in 1948 "as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations" (resolution 217 (III)). In article 2, it is stated that everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in the Declaration, and that no distinction shall be made "on the basis of the political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether it be independent, trust, non-self-governing or under any other limitation of sovereignty".

Article 26, paragraph 1, of the Declaration, states :

"Everyone has the right to education. Education shall be free, at least in the elementary and fundamental stages. Elementary education shall be compulsory. Technical and professional education shall be made generally available and higher education shall be equally accessible to all on the basis of merit."

The Constitution of UNESCO provides, in paragraph 1 of article 1, that :

"The purpose of the Organization is to contribute to peace and security by promoting collaboration among the nations through education, science and culture in order to further universal respect for justice, for the rule of law and for the human rights and fundamental freedoms which are affirmed for the peoples of the world, without distinction of race, sex, language or religion, by the Charter of the United Nations."

4. In accordance with resolution 333 (IV), item 5 of the Special Committee's agenda for 1950 contained the following sub-items relating to the Secretary-General's analysis of information and to the reports of UNESCO concerning problems of education in Non-Self-Governing Territories:

- (a) Eradication of illiteracy,
- (b) Language of instruction,
- (c) Equal treatment in matters relating to education,
- (d) Participation of the inhabitants in the formulation of educational policy and the administration of education,
- (e) Higher education,
- (f) Teacher training.

5. Attention was drawn, in committee, to other matters substantially affecting the progress of education, such as the remuneration of teachers, the development of occupational training, the use of visual and auditory aids in education, the content of education, school curricula, and the nature of text books and their production.

6. The Secretariat had prepared the following documents for the consideration of the Special Committee:

- (a) Eradication of illiteracy (A/AC.35/L.11),
- (b) Equal treatment in matters relating to education (A/AC.35/L.17),
- (c) Participation of the inhabitants in the formulation of educational policy and in the administration of education (A/AC.35/L.18),

<sup>1</sup> This special report on education was adopted after some revision by the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter, on 7 September 1950. It was drafted for the consideration of the Special Committee by an Education Sub-Committee comprising the representatives of Australia (Mr. W. C. Groves), Brazil (Mr. José Jobim), India (Mr. B. Shiva Rao), the Philippines (Mr. Salvador P. López), the United Kingdom (Mr. W. E. F. Ward) and the United States (Dr. Ambrose Caliver). The representative of the Netherlands (Mr. A. I. Spits), in his capacity of Rapporteur, was an ex-officio member without the right to vote and was elected Chairman of the Sub-Committee. The representative of UNESCO (Mr. M. Destombes) also participated in the work of the Sub-Committee.

(d) Higher education (A/AC.35/L.7 and Corr.1),

(e) Teacher training (A/AC.35/L.13).

7. The following documents prepared by UNESCO were also before the Special Committee:

(a) Comments on the problems of eradication of illiteracy in Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/AC.35/L.11/Add.1);

(b) Preliminary survey on the eradication of illiteracy (A/AC.35/L.16),

(c) Language of instruction (A/AC.35/L.15).

8. In addition, the Secretariat had prepared a number of documents dealing with the training of technicians; statistical summaries of the information transmitted during 1950 giving figures on educational developments in the Non-Self-Governing Territories; and summaries of the progress achieved in accordance with development plans, containing an account of the educational sections of these plans and of the expenditure which had been undertaken since the inauguration of the plans.

9. A further document submitted by UNESCO summarized the progress of work undertaken, which includes within its scope educational conditions affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/AC.35/L.12).

10. In its approach to the above problems, the Special Committee was guided by:

(a) Paragraph 2 of General Assembly resolution 333 (IV), by which members of the Special Committee were invited to make special preparations in the field of education for the 1950 session, "with a view to facilitating the constructive interchange of ideas and experience"; and

(b) Paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 332 (IV), which invites the Special Committee to submit to the regular sessions of the General Assembly in 1950, 1951 and 1952 "reports containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally, but not with respect to individual territories".

11. The Special Committee considered that the summary records of its discussions on educational problems and the documents indicated by reference numbers as enumerated above should be regarded as annexed to its present report.

II. General

12. It is thought appropriate to preface comments on the various educational problems considered by the Special Committee by recording its view that:

(a) A realization of the need for education is widespread and strong. Even though there are resistances to be overcome and the content and purposes of education are not always well understood, the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories require assurance that all practical steps are being taken as rapidly as possible to provide them with adequate means of education.

(b) Education in its broadest sense is a necessary basis for progress in economic, social, cultural and political knowledge and responsibility.

(c) There would be an inadequacy and even a folly in regarding general literacy or universal school attendance or any other fundamental objective of programmes of instruction as an end in itself.

(d) Nevertheless, the extension of schooling and the raising both of literacy rates and of the standard expressed by the term "literacy" are pre-requisites for the raising of general conditions in all fields.

(e) The administrative solution of the problems of education in Non-Self-Governing Territories, as elsewhere, must be solidly based on the economic resources, cultural aspirations and general conditions of the peoples.

(f) The existence of limitations imposed by reasons of finance on necessary developments in all aspects of economic and social life is recognized. Yet it is hoped that a still wider recognition of the essential importance of education will result in devoting the maximum available resources to its furtherance.

(g) The separate questions treated below are closely connected with one another and with the above general considerations.

III. Eradication of illiteracy

13. The information transmitted shows that there is the widest range of literacy levels in Non-Self-Governing Territories. In certain territories with a small population, there is almost complete literacy. In Alaska, Guam and a number of the Caribbean territories, the general literacy rate exceeds 70 per cent of the total population. In some of the other territories, such as Cyprus, Fiji, the Federation of Malaya and Singapore, Jamaica, Puerto Rico and Trinidad, the literacy percentage has risen by approximately 10 per cent or more in the course of the last ten or fifteen years.

14. Nevertheless, the above situations are not typical of the majority of Non-Self-Governing Territories, in some of which the increase in literacy rates has been far less. Indeed, such situations are not typical of the world as a whole.

15. Moreover, in considering them, it is necessary to recognize that the interpretation of the term "literacy" varies greatly. The question of a standardization of the meaning attributed either to "literacy" or to "illiteracy" has not yet been solved. It was suggested in the Special Committee that, in respect of the information on Non-Self-Governing Territories, a greater degree of uniformity might be possible if the total population over ten years of age was taken as the basic figure for any calculation of literacy percentages of those able to read and write. On the other hand, while some international uniformity in the meaning attached to the term "illiteracy" is practicable, there are likely to be different standards and conceptions of the term "literacy" which vary according to the general educational development of a country. These are points which demand careful expert consideration. Any solution achieved through the studies of UNESCO is awaited with interest, and is regarded by the Special Committee as of urgent importance.

16. Apart from such figures, the progress made or in prospect may be indicated by the number of children receiving some school education. In many territories, these numbers have increased substantially over the last few years. Although in some instances these increases would be balanced by the increasing child population of the territories, the extension of primary education remains on the whole significant and must be considered as one of the principal means for the eradication of illiteracy.

17. Nevertheless, even if primary education could rapidly become general, free and compulsory, the problem of illiteracy would not be completely solved. The experience of advanced countries, where children who have had a long and regular period of school attendance may relapse into illiteracy, shows that the ability to read and write is only a means by which, given the proper incentives, knowledge may be acquired and put to use.

18. Further, as a means of creating those incentives, school teaching of a European type may often fail. This is particularly the case in the initial stages of the blending of cultures. Two examples are supplied from the island of New Guinea. In Netherlands New Guinea, after orthodox teaching methods such as had been successfully followed in Indonesia had failed, a distinctive type of educational centre was established, which has no age limit for the pupils and which gives particular attention to agriculture, the Malay language and indigenous arts, rather than to reading and writing. This is proving an essential preliminary to the introduction of the usual school programme. In the case of Papua, an intensive course to enable Australian teachers to adapt themselves to local requirements and to learn special techniques before teaching in Papua has proved a necessity. Another approach which is being tried in Papua is to set up an Area Education Centre where an educationist with training in social anthropology and linguistics determines the type of instruction most useful to the population, as touching on every facet of the life of the people. Such experiments are important, and it is hoped that detailed information on their progress will be supplied in future, for any false step in the introduction of school instruction is liable to bring about a reaction of disappointment which will imperil the wider programme of education.

19. With all necessary precautions, however, it is still true to say that the development of schools, of teachers and of school instruction remains the basis for the eradication of illiteracy.

20. In the information transmitted, it was shown that some territories, faced with an ever-increasing number of children of school age, are considering a reduction in the primary school period as a means of making elementary school teaching available to more children. The comments of UNESCO sound a note of caution in regard to any such solution. It is thought, however, that information supplied under Article 73 e on any experiments of this nature would be of a high value to other countries faced with similar problems.

21. The comments of UNESCO also point to the success of an experiment among American Indians of the United States, whereby it was found that special schools organized for children of the twelve- to eighteen-year age group would give quicker results than normal school instruction for young children. This is an interesting educational point which merits further consideration. Nevertheless, account must be taken of economic and social factors. In many countries of an agricultural or pastoral character, it may be difficult for parents to spare their young children the time to attend school, and impossible for them to spare such time to the older children and adolescents. It may be assumed that this situation will change as the general development of the community progresses.

22. In a number of territories where school attendance is increasing but not yet general, plans have been made for providing, within a set period of years, either for an elementary course for all children of certain age groups or for a substantial increase in school numbers. The experience gained in such established programmes, including the unexpected problems which may be encountered, might be of interest to less advanced territories as they reach the stage where a long-term programme becomes profitable. It may be hoped that detailed information will continue to be provided under Article 73 e on the progress of these scheduled school expansions.

23. In some territories, there are, and there may remain even with greatly increased educational facilities, wide discrepancies between the literacy rates for boys and girls and between the numbers enrolled in the schools. The local and traditional difficulties which hinder the development of girls' education are appreciated. It is nevertheless necessary to emphasize, as has so often been done before, that the education of a woman may lead to the education of the family and that, in any event, the development of an educational system which would tend to reduce the gap between the cultural advances of the sexes would be highly desirable.

24. The Special Committee was also informed of a number of examples of mass literacy campaigns. There is evidence to show that the majority of preliterate adults can be taught to read and write. In some cases, the success of literacy campaigns has been spectacular and the devotion and imagination with which they have been conducted are admirable. Any such campaign needs the most careful organization, is dependent on favourable local circumstances fully understood by the organizers, and can be sustained only by a complex continuation programme, including the preparation and publication of reading materials in the local languages. In this latter regard, it will be of value if the Administering Members will continue to transmit, under Article 73 e, detailed information on the work of the literacy bureaux which have been firmly established in order to provide current literature in the vernacular for areas in which mass literacy campaigns have been conducted; and will indicate to what extent, if any, budgetary considerations limit the continuation programmes. It will also be of value if UNESCO will make available to those interested further information on certain particular methods of instruction, such as the global method and the project for literacy education undertaken in the United States in 1949.

25. In general, high appreciation was expressed in the Special Committee of the purpose and value of literacy campaigns. Often they are most effective when they form part of a wider communal social betterment project. They in no sense form a substitute for a school programme, although the latter, if it is not confined to the class-room, but is linked with the social education of the whole community, may in itself promote the development of the impetus towards learning among adults.

26. Whatever the means employed, the eradication of illiteracy must be regarded as one of the most critical and difficult problems facing the present-day world. It cannot be separated from other problems which are part of the general question of education, for it is a symptom of the evil which results from the isolation and poverty of many parts of the world. As such, it is not confined to Non-Self-Governing Territories.

27. General Assembly resolution 330 (IV) invited UNESCO to communicate to the Administering Members "full information on measures for suppressing illiteracy which could be applied with satisfactory results in Non-Self-Governing Territories, and to communicate annually to the United Nations an account of these measures and of the extent to which its services in campaigns against illiteracy have been provided for any of the Non-Self-Governing Territories at the request of the Members concerned".

28. The Special Committee had been informed of the work of UNESCO in this field and of its intention to convene in 1951 a meeting of experts, one of the working groups of which will study the fight against illiteracy. The Special Committee expresses the hope that this meeting will be of substantial assistance to the Administering Members in their efforts against illiteracy, that the Secretary-General will be able to collaborate in any necessary studies in respect of information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, and that information will continue to be supplied to the United Nations on the measures taken and on the services which UNESCO has been able to provide for any of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

29. In stating this, the Special Committee is aware that its composition and terms of reference make it in no sense a replica of UNESCO. Its task is to examine the information transmitted on Non-Self-Governing Territories with a view to facilitating, in the field of education, as indeed in other fields, within the limits of its own competence, the fulfilment of the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter. Nevertheless, its continued and continuing interest in the collaboration which may be established between the Administering Members and UNESCO in the interests of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories is natural and inevitable.

30. The Special Committee therefore records its view that :

(a) The eradication of illiteracy is a problem of the utmost urgency in the majority of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

(b) UNESCO should, in order that the campaign against illiteracy may be pursued effectively, seek to define the term "literacy" and suggest a uniform method for presenting statistics of percentages of illiteracy.

(c) In order to eradicate illiteracy, facilities for primary education should be developed as rapidly as possible, so that all children of all races will receive sufficient schooling to endow them with a desire for further education and to equip them with the means of satisfying that desire.

(d) The content and methods of education — the school curricula, the character of text books and all other aids to education — should be designed to achieve the above end and be planned in the light of the cultural heritage, the economic and social circumstances, and the progressive development of the free political institutions of the peoples concerned.

(e) The greatest effort should be made to ensure that girls, as well as boys, receive the full benefit of education, and that any inequalities at present existing in the development of educational facilities should be corrected.

(f) The speedy provision of an adequate supply of suitable reading material for schoolchildren and newly literate adults is of the greatest urgency.

(g) The eradication of illiteracy should also be pursued through special schemes for the teaching of adults and, in general, it should be recognized that the education of children themselves will be hindered so long as the adult population is not fully converted to a belief in the need for and the purposes of education.

IV. Languages of instruction

31. General Assembly resolution 329 (IV), in commending the promotion of the use of indigenous languages in Non-Self-Governing Territories, invited UNESCO to undertake "an over-all study of the question, more particularly the measures which might be taken with a view to the speediest use of indigenous languages as vehicles of instruction in schools, taking into consideration the desires of the inhabitants and taking account in such a study of the experience of other States in this matter".

32. The General Conference of UNESCO, held in Florence in 1950, adopted a resolution authorizing the Director-General to undertake such a study. The meeting of experts which is to be convened by UNESCO in 1951 will study the use of vernacular or national languages and that of a second language for teaching purposes; it will also study the psychological and social aspects of bilingualism and multilingualism in education. UNESCO had prepared for the Special Committee a preliminary survey on the problem, which contained a number of valuable considerations. Nevertheless, the progress of the study in the international field of this important and difficult question since the adoption by the General Assembly of its resolution in 1949 has not enabled the Special Committee to do more than exchange preliminary observations and general ideas.

33. In the view of the Special Committee, the choice of the basic language of instruction in Non-Self-Governing Territories should take into account the following two considerations :

(a) The necessity of ensuring that the populations of the territories shall have access to world culture and civilization;

(b) The necessity of not depriving them of their own cultural heritage.

34. The two aims are not always compatible. As stated in the preliminary survey prepared by UNESCO :

"... before making a decision on the use of indigenous languages in education, considerable local study and research may be required, and ... this would in most cases be greatly facilitated by a knowledge of similar work in other countries. Often a linguistic study covering the language problems of a fairly wide area will have to be undertaken. An estimate of the educational and psychological pros and cons of teaching in the vernacular may also have to be made on the basis of a sound knowledge of the area and in the light of recent educational research. A study of the social forces at work will usually be required, from which it may be possible to judge the social effects of using the indigenous language at all, or some, levels of education. In addition, economic and political considerations will have to be carefully weighed."

35. In most cases, traditions have already been established and basic decisions taken. It is no longer a question of initiating a new policy, but that of deciding in what manner a policy may have to be adapted to new circumstances.

36. It is necessary in each case to determine whether the language in question is a real language, or a dialect spoken by a small minority only of the indigenous population, and to solve the many questions of training teachers and providing teaching material if the language has a limited currency.

37. The point was made in the Special Committee that it has sometimes been necessary, as a country's education developed, for a choice to be made between various local languages as to which was destined to become the national language or the lingua franca. Efforts in this direction had been made by the Administering Members. Although they had achieved some success, in many cases controversy had arisen, affording no solution to the problem of the choice of an indigenous language.

38. Some difference has been noted in the experience of the Administering Members on the extent to which early education in the indigenous language places the student at a disadvantage if he proceeds later to studies in a language with wider currency. In some cases, it is thought that preliminary education in the vernacular has proved a rapidly diminishing scholastic disadvantage as the student progresses towards the university level. A conflicting point of view is that a student who has been educated for four or five years, at least in a rudimentary indigenous dialect, remains at a disadvantage in comparison with the student who has received his primary education in the language in which his studies are conducted at the secondary school and at the university level. This is a question on which the experts to be convened by UNESCO might be asked to give the results of their experience.

39. The language of instruction involves important technical and psychological problems wherever there are local indigenous languages or dialects. There is a second situation in territories where a widespread and well-developed traditional language of culture is to be found besides the language used by the Administering Member. The assistance of UNESCO would, in particular, be of value if, in the case of any developed language spoken widely throughout a region containing Non-Self-Governing Territories, information could be obtained from all education authorities with experience in the matter as to the existence of sufficient text books and the efficiency of the language in the various branches of scientific instruction.

40. The technical and psychological problems, in regard to which much national experience exists, provide material for international discussion among experts. Accordingly, in general, it is considered that at present, for a full interchange of ideas and experience on the problem of the language of instruction, the Special Committee should await further progress in the studies which UNESCO can undertake with the collaboration both of the Members responsible for the administration of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and of its Members with similar problems within their national frontiers.

41. The Special Committee therefore records its view that:

(a) The first approach to the inculcation of literacy should wherever possible be through the mother tongue.

(b) The peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories whose languages differ from those of the authorities responsible for their administration should neither be deprived of their own cultural heritage nor denied access to world culture.

(c) In cases where an indigenous language is already sufficiently developed to be a vehicle of world culture, there is a strong presumption that by the use of that language at all levels of instruction the cultural heritage and the world needs of the peoples concerned may be satisfied.

(d) In cases where an indigenous language has local currency only, a language of wider currency should be introduced in instruction by means which will keep psychological strains to a minimum but provide the opportunity for students eventually to take their place in any educational course for which their capacities would normally qualify them.

(e) The views of the qualified leaders of the peoples should be of predominating importance in deciding particular problems relating to the use of languages in instruction.

V. Equal treatment

42. The problem of the choice of language in instruction, important and difficult as it is, loses many of its elements of conflict where there is a general conviction that the educational system does not favour any section of the population at the expense of others.

43. General Assembly resolution 328 (IV) invited the Administering Members to take steps, where necessary, to establish equal treatment in matters relating to education between the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration, whether they are indigenous or not. The Special Committee considers the resolution to stress equality of opportunity for different ethnic and religious groups of the school population, in order that every child, regardless of race, religion, language or social status, may acquire both a knowledge of his own culture and a sympathetic understanding of the culture of others. It does not necessarily mean that a common educational programme should in all cases be provided for all groups in a community of different racial or religious composition.

44. Resolution 328 (IV) continued by inviting the Administering Members, in cases where, for exceptional reasons, educational facilities of a separate character are provided for the different communities, to include in the information transmitted full data on the costs and methods of financing the separate groups of educational institutions. The document prepared by the Secretariat accordingly outlined the general organization of education and the financial systems in Territories where different school organizations are provided for different sections of the population. Representatives of the Administering Members pointed out that for various reasons the resulting figures on the per capita cost, for example of African and European education, are often misleading.

45. Some cases were cited before the Special Committee to show that the presentation of the budgetary amounts spent by an administration on various types of education may not give the true financial picture.

46. Even so, some of the representatives of the non-administering Members on the Special Committee expressed the opinion that the financial picture showed that wide disparities still exist in some territories between the opportunities made available to pupils of different groups.

47. There was, however, a strong belief that the principle of equal treatment in education has so many ramifications that its consideration can be adequate only within a picture of the whole cultural organization and the complete social context of any territory. Respect should be paid to the wishes of any community for the establishment of particular educational facilities for its children, but subject to the overriding consideration that the general welfare of all the communities concerned is not thereby prejudiced, and that there is an equitable allocation of public funds amongst the different types of school. In this connexion, approval was expressed of the tendency in some territories to set a ceiling on the expenditure from general public funds for the schools for any particular section of the community in enjoyment of favourable economic circumstances. By such a method, as public expenditure on other forms of education increases, discrepancies will be narrowed, and while real freedom will be granted to each group desirous of separate school facilities for the maintenance of its cultural heritage, greater equality of opportunity among all groups of the population will gradually develop.

48. It was also felt that such differentiation in school facilities and programmes should not militate against the development of mutual sympathy and a feeling of common citizenship among the inhabitants of a territory.

49. As regards the information transmitted under Article 73 e, although it is recognized that the costs for the administration of financing separate groups of educational institutions may not always give a complete picture, they provide some guide to the extent to which equality of opportunity is being promoted. This information is therefore of real importance, and it is to be hoped that it will be supplied in all necessary detail in the coming years.

50. The Special Committee therefore records its view that :

(a) In the field of education no principle is more important than that of equality of opportunity for all racial, religious and cultural groups of the population.

(b) Respect should be paid to the wishes of any group desiring to establish particular educational facilities for its members, but this should be subject to the overriding consideration that the general welfare of the whole community is not thereby prejudiced and that the practical operation of any system of differentiation does not lead to discrimination against any group.

(c) While the programmes and organization of different types of school may properly be designed to meet the needs of different groups of pupils, it should be accepted as a general principle that no school should exclude pupils on grounds of race, religion or social status.

(d) Differentiation in school facilities and programmes should not militate against the development of mutual sympathy and a feeling of common citizenship among the inhabitants of a territory.

(e) Where separate systems exist, each group in the community should be given a fair share of the public funds used for educational purposes.

VI. Participation of the inhabitants

51. The technical information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter is important in relation to the principle recognized in Chapter XI that the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are paramount, and in relation to the basic purposes declared in that chapter.

52. In educational policy, this principle can be made effective only if the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are fully associated in the formulation of educational policy and in the administration of the educational systems. Of the two aspects of this doctrine, effective participation in the formulation of policy is by far the more important and significant. It exists only where the wishes of the inhabitants are the deciding factor in the determination of educational objectives and programmes.

53. In respect of certain territories the Administering Members concerned felt that the participation of the inhabitants in the formulation of educational policy would be premature, as education has not yet reached a level to make such participation practicable. On the other hand, from the information transmitted by other Administering Members, it appears that in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories administered by them, provision has been made, often in great detail, for the association in varying degrees of the inhabitants of those Territories in the machinery by which educational policies and administration are directed. While these efforts are appreciated, the question of primary importance is the effectiveness of that association in the moulding and directing of educational policy, including the allocation of public funds for educational purposes.

54. The development of central educational councils, the exercise of executive or advisory authority by district or school boards, the work of parent-teacher associations, and the control of local legislative bodies over educational expenditure and programmes are important factors not only in the growth of the school system, but also in the expansion of general interest in the problems of education. By these means also, members of the teaching profession will be enabled to share in the formulation of educational policy, and the appropriateness of decisions which may have to be taken with a view to meeting particular local needs will be established with increased responsibility and clarity.

55. It would be difficult to over-estimate the importance of this participation. The more effective it is, the more confidence the indigenous people are likely to have in the educational policy. To the extent that any inequality of opportunity exists, the more active participation of the peoples in the formulation of policy and in educational administration will help to eliminate it.

56. The Special Committee therefore records its view that:

(a) The indigenous population is directly concerned in all questions affecting education.

(b) No educational system can be completely effective unless the people have control over educational policies.

(c) The form of this participation is less important than its spirit and effectiveness.

(d) While the Administering Member has a responsibility to put its experience at the service of the makers of educational policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, it is in general local representative opinion, constitutionally and regularly expressed, which should determine all decisions taken in respect of educational policies and programmes.

VII. Higher education

57. Education is interdependent at all levels. The vicious circle of educational inadequacies can be broken only by simultaneous action at many different points.

Higher educational facilities must therefore be developed simultaneously with those for primary and secondary schools. Moreover, the character of indigenous leadership in the field of education and in all other fields will largely be determined by the development of institutions of higher education.

58. The older institutions of higher education in Alaska, Hawaii, Hong Kong, Morocco, Puerto Rico and Tunisia have grown in respect of the number of students enrolled and of the courses offered. New institutions of higher education have been established or existing institutions have been raised to a level of or approaching university standard in the Gold Coast and Nigeria, in French West Africa, in Uganda, in Madagascar, in Singapore and in Jamaica. These institutions are designed to serve the needs of the regions in which they are situated. Plans are being completed for the establishment of two such institutions in the Belgian Congo. The number of students from some of the Non-Self-Governing Territories who enter institutions of higher education in the metropolitan countries or in foreign countries has rapidly increased in recent years. These developments are commendable and it is hoped that they will continue. Of significance is the fact that a substantial number of such students seeking higher education in the metropolitan countries are students who support themselves. This establishes the fact that there is both a widening desire among the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories for higher education and a lack of adequate facilities in the territories.

59. In order that universities may be unhampered in their efforts to search for truth, to disseminate knowledge, to be responsive to the needs of the community and to transmit its culture, they should have the greatest possible measure of freedom consistent with the public interest.

60. There are, however, points of policy to which attention may be legitimately directed, particularly as government influence in the allocation of scholarships and in the fixing of conditions of service in various fields of government employment is and should properly be an important factor in university life.

61. The institutions of higher education should be encouraged, even more than is usually the case at present, to direct their attention to the development of those studies which are most basic to conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Two particularly important examples of these are agriculture and animal husbandry, but the Committee also wishes to draw attention to other subjects such as medicine, technology, business administration, law and journalism.

62. Every effort should be made to extend the provision of higher education for women.

63. Consideration should be given to the manner in which institutions of higher education provide services to other than residential students. The extension of, for example, special courses for young people who are already in employment, and of extra-mural education for the people in general, would bring the institutions of higher education into close connexion with the general life of the territories and make them an increasingly vital influence in the growth of local responsibility in all fields.

64. Equally of value would be the creation, which is already taking place, of technological colleges giving instruction in technical subjects on the university level and in an atmosphere of liberal education.

65. In suitable circumstances, action should be taken to encourage and provide for the establishment of community colleges for young persons who have completed secondary education and for adults who wish to improve their techniques and gain a wider conception of education. Such colleges would offer a simpler course than is provided by university or technological institutions, but would conduct their teaching on technical subjects in accordance with the general conception of the relationship of the individual to society and the value of education in general.

66. The Special Committee notes the availability to students of Non-Self-Governing Territories of fellowships and scholarships for study abroad provided by the Administering Members and various overseas institutions. Though of great value, these fellowships and scholarships must not be regarded as an adequate substitute for appropriate higher education within the territories themselves. The hope is expressed that facilities of this character will be extended.

67. The Special Committee also notes the fellowships and scholarships offered by the United Nations and the specialized agencies, which are intended to furnish opportunity for broader experience to those who have already attained a sufficient academic standard. While the number which is available at present is small, the Special Committee expresses the hope that efforts will be made to increase their number in order to provide additional facilities for the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. These fellowship and scholarships represent an opportunity not only of providing breadth of experience to the selected candidates, but also of raising the whole status of learning and training in the territories from which these candidates come. The Special Committee hopes that the Administering Members will make the fullest use of these facilities and that routine delays in the notification of possibilities and the examination of candidatures will be reduced to a minimum.

68. In general, the demand of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories for higher education should be fostered. All who can profit by it should have equal opportunity for access to higher education without distinctions of an arbitrary character, in order that a spirit of service to the community may be created as a basis for responsible citizenship. Such education should not necessarily follow the patterns which have developed in the metropolitan countries.

69. The Special Committee therefore records its view that :

(a) While the pressing need of education at all levels is apparent, both the principles of the Charter and the practical problems of the implementation of educational programmes make of outstanding importance the expansion of opportunities for higher education.

(b) Consideration should be given to the provision of educational programmes of an intermediate level such as the community college.

(c) Of great significance are the expanding institutions of higher education within the Non-Self-Governing Territories, since, apart from the immediate services they can provide, it is through them that local needs and aspirations may be translated into practical and responsible citizenship.

(d) These institutions should be given every liberty to develop within their local circumstances; and while they should not be required to follow precedents suited to circumstances other than those of the territories, care should be taken that the highest possible standards are maintained.

(e) Yet isolation would be a grievous evil; it is to be hoped that some students, especially qualified graduate students of sufficient maturity, will continue to go metropolitan and foreign institutions.

(f) Advantage should be taken of fellowship and scholarship programmes sponsored by the United Nations and the specialized agencies, not only in order to provide practical experience to people of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, but also to foster broad contacts with the modern world which the territories will require for their progressive development.

VIII. Teacher training

70. The information before the Special Committee shows the large increase which will be required in the number of teachers in the Non-Self-Governing Territories if the educational programmes of the Administering Members are to be pursued successfully. Equally it shows the substantial improvement which must be effected in professional skills and status if the teachers available are to rise to their opportunities and responsibilities.

71. The developments which are taking place or being planned for the expansion of facilities for teacher training are noteworthy. Yet many institutions will for many years remain understaffed, or staffed by teachers with neither the requisite general educational background nor specialized training in the techniques of teaching.

72. The estimated needs, for example, under the French plan for the modernization and equipment of the Overseas Territories require an increase in the primary teaching staff alone of from the 1949 figure of 12,500 teachers to 50,000 teachers by 1956. To take a single United Kingdom Territory, in Kenya the primary school expansions planned will require an increase in the number of teachers from the 1949 total of 3,148 to a total of 8,905 by 1957. The problems of improving standards of training are also reflected in much of the information transmitted by the Administering Members. In many cases it is indicated that the existing quality of teachers in the Non-Self-Governing Territories is entirely insufficient for the calls which are being made on the teaching profession.

73. From all this it is evident that, however ambitious may be the programmes for the development of education and however much money is provided for the building of schools, the problem of the provision of capable teachers is of first importance.

74. Close and fruitful contact between teacher and pupil in circumstances consonant with the life of the community is essential, and this spirit should be inculcated in the teacher-training institutions. The aim should be to produce teachers who have not only unimpeachable professional qualifications, but also a high degree of mental discipline, moral integrity and social responsibility. The training institutions should therefore not be directed merely to the passing of examinations, but should be responsive to the needs of the community.

75. The tendency described in the information on a number of territories to bring teacher-training into harmony with the general economic and social circumstances of the community is highly to be commended. Although it should not be invariably expected that the teacher should in addition be, for example, a kind of agricultural adviser or public health assistant, if his training is such as will interest him in the life of the community, his influence and status will be improved together with the quality of his teaching.

76. Teaching, however, is a career as well as a vocation. As a career, teaching needs to be made more attractive. Remuneration has in some cases been improved, and in some cases it is reported that the profession attracts a sufficiency of recruits. But, in general, in the Non-Self-Governing Territories as elsewhere, the salaries of teachers are low. Since it is not solely through the raising of salaries that the status of the profession can be enhanced, every effort should be made to encourage the conception that the teaching profession merits the highest recognition. The development of teachers' associations, not only for negotiations on the service conditions of teachers, but also for the discussion of general educational problems, will encourage among the whole community an informed interest in and a feeling of responsibility for educational advancement and respect for the teaching profession. Vacation and extension courses for teachers will also serve to prevent intellectual stagnation. The parent-teacher association can help to establish the teacher as an effective influence in the local community and to widen his own interests. All these methods are being used. They should be intensified with particular attention to the position of the regular working teacher in the field.

77. All this has a close relationship to the subject previously treated of the participation of the inhabitants in the direction of educational policy and management. Given such effective participation, the teacher will be brought into closer association with the community and should have an opportunity of correcting any narrow tendency on his part to regard education as merely the accumulation of information.

78. The special Committee therefore records its view that :

(a) The development of the technically skilled and socially conscious teacher is essential to the educational advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

(b) Teacher-training institutions should be of high quality and directed by those having deep sympathy with and knowledge of indigenous life.

(c) Such training institutions should have a wider aim than the mere inculcation of routines of instructional methods; they should endeavour to produce teachers with a basic knowledge of the purpose of their teaching.

(d) Teacher-training institutions should therefore be in close and fruitful contact with the general life of the communities, with other institutions of higher education and with practising teachers.

(e) Even so, the teaching profession cannot attract candidates of the type required unless more attention is given to the needs of the profession, in terms of conditions of service and of the place given to its members in public life.

IX. Collaboration with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization

79. The Special Committee expresses the hope that the Administering Members will continue their close collaboration with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization in the solution of the problems of education in those Territories for whose administration they are responsible, making use of the experience, studies and conclusions of that Organization and of similar experience and studies of Member States in this field.

X. Conclusion

80. This report is the result of the interchange of ideas and experience on the problems of education in Non-Self-Governing Territories which the General Assembly in resolution 333 (IV) invited the Special Committee to undertake.

81. The Committee is aware that, in the final analysis, the solution of these problems is the responsibility of the Administering Members. Accordingly, the Special Committee submits the report to the General Assembly with the recommendation that :

It should be communicated to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee also recommends the communication of the report to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization as a brief but considered indication of the importance of educational advancement and the problems still to be faced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

Part One

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

I. Constitution of the Special Committee

1. The General Assembly, by resolution 332 (IV), adopted on 2 December 1949 during the fourth regular session, constituted a Special Committee for a three-year period to examine the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies.

2. The terms of reference of the Committee are set forth in the resolution as follows :

“ ... to examine, in the spirit of paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 1 and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.”

3. The Committee consisted of sixteen members, comprising the eight Member States transmitting information and an equal number of other Member States elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly. Of the non-administering Members, four were elected for a term of three years, two for two years and two to fill the vacancies created by the expiration of the terms of office of Sweden and Venezuela. The following was the membership of the Special Committee in 1951 :

Members transmitting information

Australia
Belgium
Denmark
France
Netherlands
New Zealand
United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland
United States of America

Elected members

Brazil
Cuba
Egypt
India
Mexico
Pakistan
Philippines
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

4. The Committee met in Geneva, and held twenty-two meetings from 2 to 27 October 1951.

5. The representatives of the following specialized agencies took part in the discussions of the Committee : the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and the World Health Organization (WHO).

II. Officers

6. The officers elected by the Committee were :

Dr. W. J. A. Kernkamp (Netherlands), Chairman,
Dr. José D. Ingles (Philippines), Vice-Chairman,
Mr. M. Ziaud-Din (Pakistan), Rapporteur.

III. Sub-Committees

7. The Sub-Committee appointed by the Special Committee to meet in 1951 in order to undertake the task of revision of the Standard Form, was composed of the representatives of Brazil, France, India, the Philippines, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America. The representative of the Philippines, Mr. José D. Ingles, was elected Chairman of the Sub-Committee. The representatives of the ILO, FAO, WHO and UNESCO also participated in the work of the Sub-Committee.

8. A Sub-Committee was appointed at the thirty-sixth meeting of the Committee to prepare a special report on economic conditions and development in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was composed of the representatives of Brazil, France, India, the Philippines, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America. The representative of the United Kingdom, Mr. W. A. C. Mathieson, was elected Chairman of the Sub-Committee. The representatives of FAO and ILO also participated in the work of the Sub-Committee.

9. At the forty-fourth meeting, the Committee appointed a Sub-Committee to prepare a report on the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government. It was composed of the representatives of Belgium, Cuba, Denmark, Egypt, the Philippines and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. The representative of Cuba, Mr. G. Perez Cisneros, was elected Chairman, and the representative of Denmark, Mr. H. Lannung, Rapporteur of the Sub-Committee.

IV. Agenda

10. The Committee adopted the provisional agenda subject to a re-arrangement in the order of the items. The agenda as adopted is set out in Annex I.

V. Economic Conditions and Development in Non-Self-Governing Territories

11. General Assembly resolution 333 (IV) contains, in the second paragraph of its preamble, the consideration that "... the value of the work of the Committee would be enhanced if, without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, special attention were given to one field each year".

In the light of the above text and of the success which it believed had accompanied the special attention paid to education, the Special Committee in 1950 agreed that, at its 1951 session, it should pay special attention to economic conditions and development in Non-Self-Governing Territories, without prejudice to the consideration of the other two functional fields. It had further agreed on a list of topics which would form the basis of discussion within that general study.

12. In resolution 445 (V), the General Assembly had approved the arrangements proposed by the Special Committee for its work in 1951, and had invited "the specialized agencies concerned, with a view to the preparation of studies, based on the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter and relevant supplemental information, in respect of economic conditions and development to be considered by the Special Committee in 1951, to collaborate with the Secretary-General in the study of problems of the prices of tropical export crops and arrangement for their marketing, migrant labour in Africa, the development of co-operative societies in peasant communities and the economic value of preventive medicine."

13. In consequence, in addition to the summaries and analyses prepared by the Secretary-General, the Special Committee had before it reports prepared by ILO, FAO and UNESCO dealing with subjects within their respective fields.

14. Following the precedent set in 1950, economic advisers were attached to the delegations of France, India, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

15. The Committee discussed this item of its agenda from its thirty-first to its thirty-eighth meeting. General statements embracing this item as well as other related items on the agenda were made by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Cuba, Denmark, Egypt, France, India, Mexico, the Netherlands, Pakistan, the Philippines, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and may be found in the summary records of the thirty-first to thirty-fifth meetings.

16. This debate provided an opportunity for a general review of the economic policies, practices and progress of economic development achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, for the exposition of views by Members, and also for a more detailed discussion of the subjects of rural economy, industrial development, fisheries, forestry and agricultural research.

17. In his general statement, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed the opinion that, on the basis of the facts which he had quoted, taken from the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter for the years 1950 and 1951, and also from the legislation of a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories, the inescapable conclusion must be drawn that the countries which bore responsibility for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories had failed to carry out the requirements of the United Nations Charter in respect of such Territories, and that they had condemned the indigenous populations of those Territories to an existence characterized by starvation and abject poverty under conditions of total lack of rights and utter ignorance. The Administering Authorities were not promoting the political progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and had failed to discharge their obligations concerning development towards self-government; they had also failed to take into satisfactory account the natural political aspirations of the indigenous populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories; nor had they helped those populations to achieve the progressive development of their own political institutions. The Administering Authorities had also failed to promote the economic, social and educational advancement of the indigenous populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which they were responsible; they had failed to take the necessary measures to ensure that the native cultures of the indigenous populations were respected throughout the Territories in question, and to provide just treatment for those peoples and protect them from abuses.

18. Replies to these criticisms were made by the representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States of America and certain other representatives, rejecting the allegations and charges made by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics as being in part a distortion of the actual facts and generally without foundation. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics replied that no fact which he had cited in his statement had been taken from other than official documents.

19. A Sub-Committee was established at the thirty-sixth meeting, with broad terms of reference to prepare a special report on economic conditions and development for the consideration of the full Committee. The membership of this Sub-Committee has been given above in paragraph 8.

20. The Sub-Committee's report was discussed by the Committee at its forty-fifth meeting. Statements were made by the representatives of Belgium, Denmark, France, the Philippines, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, in the course of which a few minor amendments were made. The statements of the representatives concerned are given in the summary record of the forty-fifth meeting. The report, as amended, was approved by the Committee by 15 votes to one. The approved text constitutes part three of the Special Committee's Report.

21. Following the examination of this report, a joint draft resolution was proposed by the representatives of the Philippines and the United Kingdom and adopted by the Committee by 15 votes to one. The resolution is set forth in Annex II.

VI. Revision of the Standard Form

22. During its thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth meetings, the Committee discussed the second report of the Sub-Committee on the Revision of the Standard Form, the membership of which is given above in paragraph 7.

23. During the discussion, statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, Egypt, France, India, Mexico, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Pakistan, the Philippines, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and some further amendments were adopted and incorporated in the revised text. The statements of the representatives concerned are given in the summary records of the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth meetings.

24. Statements in explanation of their votes and reserving the position of their governments in regard to the transmission of information not related to statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social and educational conditions, as well as transmission of information on the application of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in the Territories under their administration, were made by the representatives of Australia, Belgium and France. These statements are given in the summary record of the thirty-ninth meeting.

25. The Committee adopted by 11 votes to one, with 3 abstentions, a joint draft resolution proposed by the representatives of India, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

26. The text of this resolution, together with the Standard Form as revised, which form Part Two of the Report of the Special Committee, were approved at the Committee's thirty-ninth meeting by 12 votes to one, with 2 abstentions.

VII. Social Factors in Economic Development

27. Preliminary analyses on certain social factors were submitted in order to bring to the attention of the Committee some of the factors closely related to economic development, as well as to serve as a link between the special study undertaken this year and that to be undertaken by the Committee in 1952.

28. Documents submitted by the Secretary-General consisted of one on the organization of rural health services (A/AC.35/L.42); another on education for rural welfare (A/AC.35/L.43); an analysis of labour statistics (A/AC.35/L.53); vital statistics (A/AC.35/L.57); and settlement policies (A/AC.35/L.61).

29. In that connexion, the International Labour Organisation had prepared two documents, one on migrant labour in non-metropolitan Territories (A/AC.35/L.40) and the other on action undertaken by the Organisation in relation to programmes for the training of workers (A/AC.35/L.52).

30. The Committee discussed these subjects during its fortieth and forty-first meetings, and statements were made by the representatives of Belgium, Cuba, France, India, Mexico, the Netherlands, Pakistan, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, as well as by the representatives of the Secretary-General, ILO and WHO. These statements are given in the summary records of those meetings.

31. In addition to being based on, and in amplification of, the above-mentioned documents, the discussion brought out the desire of the Committee for fuller treatment of social conditions and problems of social development in Non-Self-Governing Territories in its 1952 session. Most of the statements reflected a desire for more detailed studies of the subjects on which preliminary analyses had been prepared this year, including the methodology of studies of standards of living. Further indications of which particular aspects of social conditions should be given special attention were left for decision when the Committee came to discuss its future work.

VIII. Education in Non-Self-Governing Territories

32. General Assembly resolution 445 (V) noted "the intention of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to place before the Special Committee for its consideration at its 1951 session documents relating to the use of the indigenous or national languages for teaching purposes and the eradication of illiteracy".

33. Accordingly, in addition to analyses prepared by the Secretary-General of the information concerning education transmitted in 1951 (A/AC.35/L.43 and L.47), UNESCO submitted two interim reports, the first dealing with the use of vernacular languages in education (A/AC.35/L.62) and the second on measures for suppressing illiteracy which could be applied in Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/AC.35/L.63).

34. The discussion of this item was opened by the representative of UNESCO, who reviewed the activities of his organization in relation to the particular aspects of education before the Committee (see summary record of the forty-first meeting). Statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, Egypt, France, India, Mexico, the Netherlands, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, and by the representative of the Secretary-General; they are contained in the summary records of the forty-second meeting.

35. In response to a query addressed to them, representatives of certain Administering Members gave an account of actions taken by their governments in regard to the Special Report on Education approved by the General Assembly in 1950. Their statements are contained in the summary record of the forty-second meeting.

36. In view of the importance attached to the whole question of education, the desire was expressed that further discussion of the progress achieved in this field should take place at the 1952 session.

IX. Information on Technical Assistance accorded to Non-Self-Governing Territories by the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies

37. In resolution 444 (V), the General Assembly recommended "that the Administering Members include yearly in the statistical information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter as full a report as possible on all applications made in behalf of their respective Non-Self-Governing Territories and on the manner in which technical assistance received from the United Nations and the specialized agencies has been integrated into long-range development programmes in such Territories".

38. The Secretary-General had prepared a document (A/AC.35/L.59) setting out the technical assistance rendered or to be rendered in Non-Self-Governing Territories by the United Nations and the specialized agencies from July 1950 to May 1951, together with the texts of the Basic Agreement between the United Nations and its specialized agencies and the United Kingdom for the provision of technical assistance to Trust, Non-Self-Governing and other Territories for whose international relations that Government is responsible; as also the Agreement for technical co-operation between the Governments of the United States of America and of the United Kingdom in respect of the same above-mentioned Territories.

39. Following an opening statement by the representative of the Secretary-General, statements were made by the representatives of Brazil, France, India, the Philippines, the United Kingdom, the United States of America, ILO and FAO, and are given in the summary records of the forty-third meeting.

40. During the discussion, the representatives of Brazil and the United States of America drew the attention of the Committee to the provisions in the Basic Agreement between the United Nations and its specialized agencies and the United Kingdom by which supplementary agreements relating to technical assistance would be concluded directly with the agencies concerned by the Non-Self-Governing Territories under United Kingdom administration.

X. Information on Human Rights in Non-Self-Governing Territories

41. By resolution 446 (V), the General Assembly had invited "the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories to include, in the information to be transmitted to the Secretary-General in 1951 under Article 73 e of the Charter, a summary of the extent to which the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is implemented in Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration"; and had further, requested "the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to include in its report to the General Assembly at its sixth session such recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to the application in Non-Self-Governing Territories of the principles contained in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights".

42. The Committee had before it a report on the application of human rights in Non-Self-Governing Territories administered by the United States of America (A/1823/Add.1), and a document prepared by the Secretary-General on information transmitted on human rights in Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/AC.35/L.60).

43. Statements were made by the representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Cuba, Denmark, France, India, Mexico, Pakistan, the Philippines, the United Kingdom, and the United States of America. The points of view and the attitudes of those Governments in relation to the transmission of information on the application of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights are given in the summary records of the forty-third and forty-fourth meetings.

44. A draft resolution on information concerning human rights in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was proposed by the representatives of Mexico and the Philippines (A/AC.35/L.70) and was later replaced by a revised draft resolution proposed by the representatives of Brazil, Cuba, Egypt, India, Mexico and the Philippines (A/AC.35/L.73). An amendment consisting of an additional paragraph to this revised draft resolution was proposed by the representative of the United States of America (A/AC.35/L.72). This amendment read as follows:

"Hopes that, in the provision of such information, a significant step forward will be taken in the furtherance in all countries of the principles set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights."

45. Before voting on the amendment as set out above, the representative of the United Kingdom asked for a separate vote on the words "in the provision of such information". The Committee decided by 9 votes to 6, with one abstention, to retain these words in the amendment, and adopted the amendment as a whole by 9 votes to 2, with 5 abstentions.

46. The revised draft resolution as amended was adopted by 10 votes to 5, with one abstention.

47. Statements in explanation of their votes were made by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Cuba, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, and the United Kingdom. These statements are given in the summary record of the forty-fourth meeting.

48. The text of the resolution as adopted (A/AC.35/L.75) is given below :

" The Special Committee,

" Taking note of General Assembly resolution 446 (V) of 12 December 1950,

" Noting, further, that with a few exceptions, the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories have not included in the information submitted to the Secretary-General in 1951 under Article 73 e of the Charter, a summary of the extent to which the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is implemented in their Non-Self-Governing Territories .

" Expresses its appreciation to those Administering Members which have complied with the General Assembly's resolution ;

" Requests all the Administering Members concerned to transmit the necessary information on the observance of human rights in their Non-Self-Governing Territories to the Secretary-General in 1952, in accordance with Part III, B. 1, of the Revised Standard Form, and taking into account the discussions held in the Special Committee on the subject at its forty-third and forty-fourth meetings on 19 and 22 October 1951 ;

" Decides to inform the General Assembly that it will consider the formulation of recommendations relating to the application in Non-Self-Governing Territories of the principles contained in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as part of its special consideration of social advancement in Non-Self-Governing Territories at its next session ;

" Hopes that, in the provision of such information, a significant step forward will be taken in the furtherance in all countries of the principles set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights."

XI. Territories to which Chapter XI of the Charter applies

49. In resolution 334 (IV), the General Assembly had invited " any special committee which the General Assembly may appoint on information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to examine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government "

50. The Special Committee in 1950 had agreed that this item should be put on the agenda of its next session.

51. The Secretary-General had compiled background data on the factors relating to the application of Chapter XI of the Charter (A/AC.35/L.30 and L.30/Add.1) to assist the Committee in its deliberations of this question.

52. During the general discussion of this item, statements were made by the representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Cuba, Denmark, Egypt, France, India, Pakistan, the Philippines, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America. Their statements are included in the summary record of the forty-fourth meeting.

53. The Special Committee, in a spirit of seeking understanding rather than marking controversies, did not attempt to enter into the practical problems of who should determine whether a Territory is or is not a Non-Self-Governing Territory.

54. On a proposal by the representative of India, a Sub-Committee was appointed to prepare a report for the consideration of the Committee in its examination of the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government. The membership of this Sub-Committee is given in paragraph 9 above

55. The draft report of the Sub-Committee was submitted to the Committee at its forty-seventh meeting. General statements on the draft report were made by the representatives of Belgium, Denmark, the Philippines and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. In the discussion on the detailed aspects of the draft report, various amendments were adopted, including an alternative text to section VI proposed by the representatives of Belgium, Denmark and the United Kingdom, which was adopted by roll-call, by 8 votes to 7, with one abstention. The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Denmark, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States of America voted in favour of the inclusion of this text, while the representatives of Brazil, Cuba, Egypt, Mexico, Pakistan, the Philippines and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics voted against. The representative of India abstained.

56. The alternative text to the first paragraph of section VI proposed by the representatives of Cuba, Egypt and the Philippines, though not adopted by the Committee, is given as a footnote in Part Four <sup>1</sup> of the report of the Special Committee.

57. The draft report, as amended and revised, was approved by the Committee by 10 votes to one, with 5 abstentions.

58. The representatives of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Cuba, Egypt, France, India, Mexico, New Zealand,

Pakistan, the Philippines, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics made statements in explanation of their votes, both reserving the position of their governments in any subsequent discussion of this subject in the General Assembly as well as their governments' attitude to the whole question under discussion. Those statements are given in the summary record of the forty-seventh meeting.

59. The text of this report as approved forms Part Four of the Committee's report to the General Assembly.

XII. Cessation of the Transmission of Information under Article 73 e of the Charter

60. In its resolution 222 (III), the General Assembly had considered that, "having regard to the provision of Chapter XI of the Charter, it is essential that the United Nations be informed of any change in the constitutional position and status of any such Territory as a result of which the responsible Government concerned thinks it unnecessary to transmit information in respect of that Territory under Article 73 e of the Charter; and had requested "the Members concerned to communicate to the Secretary-General, within a maximum period of six months, such information as may be appropriate pursuant to the preceding paragraph, including the constitution, legislative act or executive order providing for the government of the Territory and the constitutional relationship of the Territory to the Government of the metropolitan country".

61. In conformity with these provisions, the Netherlands Government transmitted to the Secretary-General an "Explanatory note of the Netherlands Government on the termination of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter as regards Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles", a copy of the principal relevant articles of the Netherlands Constitution as amended in 1948, and a copy of the principal relevant articles of the Interim Order and Constitution of the Netherlands Antilles (A/AC.35/L.55 and L.55/Corr.1).

62. The discussion of this item was initiated by the representative of the Netherlands in a statement amplifying the information transmitted by his Government in compliance with the request contained in resolution 222 (III) and stating the position of his Government in respect to any subsequent action taken on it by the Special Committee and the General Assembly. His statement is given in the summary record of the forty-fifth meeting.

63. Statements were made by the representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Cuba, Denmark, India, Mexico, Pakistan, the Philippines and the United States of America. These statements are given in the summary record of the forty-sixth meeting.

64. In the course of their statements and subsequently, various representatives asked questions related to the information contained in document A/AC.35/L.55; those questions were answered by a special representative in the Netherlands delegation. The Committee later expressed its appreciation of the able and frank manner in which this special representative had answered the questions put to him.

65. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics introduced a draft resolution proposing that the Committee should decide that no cessation of the transmission of information concerning any Non-Self-Governing Territory could take place until the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter had considered all the data concerning the changes in the status of the given territory, and had presented to the General Assembly a recommendation that Article 73 e cease to apply to the territory in question (A/AC.35/L.77). The representatives of Cuba, India, the Netherlands and the United States of America, in their statements, raised the question of the competence of the Committee to consider this draft resolution. These statements are given in the summary record of the forty-ninth meeting. The Committee decided by 13 votes to one, with one abstention, that it was not competent. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed the opinion that this decision of the Committee was incorrect.

66. The representative of Cuba submitted a draft resolution by which the Special Committee would decide not to continue consideration of the communication and annexed note of the Netherlands Government—which it had begun—until it had been informed of the decision of the General Assembly regarding the factors which should be taken into consideration in order to decide whether a territory does or does not fall within the category of territories whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government. In order to facilitate a solution which would receive a unanimous vote, however, he withdrew his draft resolution in favour of a text submitted by the representatives of Denmark, India, the Philippines and the United States of America.

67. This joint draft resolution was introduced by the representative of Denmark. In the subsequent discussion, statements were made by the representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Cuba, Denmark, Egypt, India, Mexico, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the Philippines, the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; those statements may be found in the summary record of the forty-ninth meeting.

68. An amendment proposed by the representative of Mexico to add certain words to paragraph 6 of the joint draft resolution was later changed, in agreement with the representative of India, to the words "for any necessary action". The Committee adopted this amendment by 7 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions.

69. Paragraphs 1 to 4 of the joint draft resolution were adopted by 14 votes to one, and paragraph 5 by 9 votes to 2, with 4 abstentions.

70. A separate vote on the two parts of paragraph 6 was requested by the representative of Belgium. The first part of this paragraph, reading "Takes note of the communication of the Government of the Netherlands with reference to the cessation of the transmission of information on these territories and transmits this information [to the General Assembly] ", was adopted by 14 votes to none. The remaining part of the paragraph, reading : "... together with its report on General Assembly resolution 334 (IV) and the summary records relating to these questions to the General Assembly for any necessary action ", was adopted by 9 votes to 4, with 2 abstentions. The paragraph as a whole was adopted by 9 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions.

71 The joint draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by 10 votes to one, with 4 abstentions. The representative of the United Kingdom made a statement in explanation of his abstention, with which the representatives of Belgium and France associated themselves.

72. The text of the resolution as adopted (A/AC.35/L.79) is as follows :

" The Special Committee,

" Having regard to resolution 222 (III) requesting Members concerned to communicate information regarding any change in the constitutional position and status of a Non-Self-Governing Territory,

" Considering that it has received from the Secretary-General a copy of the communication dated 31 August 1951 from the Netherlands Government (document A/AC.35/L.55), which states that, in the opinion of that Government, the Territories of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles have now ceased to be Non-Self-Governing Territories within the meaning of Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations, and that consequently the Netherlands Government has decided to terminate the transmission of information under Article 73 e concerning the Territories to the Secretary-General.

" Having regard to resolution 448 (V), by which the General Assembly requested the Special Committee to examine such information as may be transmitted and report thereon to the General Assembly,

" Having noted the information made available by the Government of the Netherlands relating to Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles,

" Having been informed that a conference among representatives of the Netherlands, Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles on an equal footing is to be held in March 1952 to decide upon a system of co-operation for the common affairs of the three countries and the establishment of a new constitutional order to replace the present interim arrangement,

" Takes note of the communication of the Government of the Netherlands with reference to the cessation of the transmission of information on these territories, and transmits this information, together with its report on General Assembly resolution 334 (IV) and the summary records relating to these questions, to the General Assembly, for any necessary action."

XIII. The Secretary-General's Summaries and Analyses of Information

73. In addition to the summaries of statistical information, the Committee had before it for its consideration of general substantive questions additional to those treated under previous items, a preliminary analysis of juvenile delinquency (A/AC.35/L.36), a summary of vital statistics (A/AC.35/L.57), and a note on settlement policies prepared by the Secretary-General (A/AC.35/L.61).

74. Statements were made by the representatives of Denmark, India, the Philippines and the United Kingdom, and are given in the summary record of the forty-eighth meeting.

75. The representative of Denmark drew the attention of the Committee to the difficulty encountered in making adequate comparisons between conditions prevailing in Non-Self-Governing Territories and neighbouring countries with the same basic conditions, owing to the provisions of General Assembly resolution 447 (V), and expressed the hope that this resolution would be repealed in the near future.

76. The representative of the Philippines suggested that, owing to the dual aspects of economic and social conditions involved in the subject of land settlement policies, document A/AC.35/L.61 should be submitted to the Committee in its 1952 session. The Committee concurred with this suggestion.

XIV. The Secretary-General's Summaries of Information voluntarily transmitted

77. General Assembly resolution 218 (III), in paragraph 44 (c), invited the Secretary-General to prepare " annual summaries of any material which the Members may have voluntarily transmitted under the optional category of the Standard Form ". Accordingly, the Secretary-General had prepared a document summarizing such information transmitted by the Governments of Australia, Denmark, the Netherlands and the United States of America.

78. The representative of India expressed appreciation of the action taken by those Administering Members which had voluntarily transmitted information in accordance with the terms of that resolution.

79. The representative of New Zealand pointed out that the absence in the document before the Committee of information under the optional category of the Standard Form normally transmitted by his Government was due solely to a delay in transmission, and that the information would be transmitted to the Secretary-General in the near future for incorporation in an addendum to the report by the Secretary-General on " Summary of information voluntarily transmitted " (A/1835).

XV. Questions of Procedure

80. The Committee had before it the following documents prepared by the Secretary-General : an " Introductory note on the work of the Special Committee "

(A/AC.35/L.31), "Date of receipt of information" (A/AC.35/L.54), and "Relations with governments" (A/AC.35/L.58). The first report of the Sub-Committee on the Revision of the Standard Form (A/AC.35/L.66) was also submitted for the consideration of the Committee.

81. The representative of the United Kingdom submitted a suggestion, contained in document A/AC.35/L.66, that, in order to relieve the administrations of certain of the smaller Territories under United Kingdom administration of the burden of preparing information annually, transmission of information under Article 73 e should be made every third year in the case of twenty-two of these Territories. A number of representatives recognized the burden which may be imposed upon the Administering Authorities in the smaller Territories by the annual preparation of information. On the other hand, they pointed out that information on these Territories was of great value to the Special Committee, since the importance of the problems of principle involved could not be decided by the question of actual size. The point was also made that any change would involve amendments to General Assembly resolutions and might be interpreted as signifying that the General Assembly attached less importance to the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter than was indicated by decisions taken in and after 1946. The statements made on the subject by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Cuba, France, India, the Philippines, the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics can be found in the summary record of the forty-eighth meeting.

82. As a result of the discussion and in view of the attitude taken by certain representatives in regard to the suggestion made by his Government, the representative of the United Kingdom withdrew the suggestion from further consideration by the Committee at that time, and reserved the position of his Government in any subsequent consideration of the subject by the General Assembly.

XVI. International Collaboration in regard to Economic, Social and Educational Conditions

83. In resolution 445 (V), the General Assembly had confirmed "its recognition of the importance of international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories as expressed in resolution 331 (IV)". In this latter resolution, the General Assembly had invited the specialized agencies to communicate annually to the United Nations information on the progress of work undertaken by them which would be of service in Non-Self-Governing Territories. In response to this invitation, FAO submitted a document on its activities affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories, such as assistance in the improvement of government services, bringing governments together to discuss common problems, and collaboration with other United Nations agencies and with other inter-governmental bodies (A/AC.35/L.51); similarly, UNESCO submitted a report on its activities of possible interest to Powers responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/AC.35/L.64).

84. The Secretary-General prepared documents dealing with United Nations relations with governments (A/AC.35/L.58), and with specialized agencies (A/AC.35/L.35), together with a summary of international collaboration in regard to economic and social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/AC.35/L.65 and L.65/Add.1).

85. Following an introductory statement by the representative of the Secretary-General, statements were made by the representatives of Australia, India, Mexico and UNESCO. These statements are given in the summary record of the forty-ninth meeting.

86. At the conclusion of the discussion, the Chairman expressed appreciation of the collaboration of the specialized agencies in the work of the Committee. The representatives of Cuba, India and Mexico expressed their special appreciation of the activities of UNESCO in relation to Non-Self-Governing Territories, and in particular, in the field of race relations.

XVII. Future Work of the Special Committee

87. The Committee had before it a working paper prepared by the Secretary-General (A/AC.35/L.71) setting out a preliminary plan of studies for 1952 on social conditions and development.

88. The Committee also had before it a proposal submitted by the representative of the United States of America specifying topics which might be considered by the Special Committee during its 1952 session. As an additional subject for consideration to be inserted in both the plan of studies prepared by the Secretary-General and the list of topics submitted by the representative of the United States of America, the representative of India proposed "Race relations—problems and solutions", together with detailed indications of various aspects coming under this head. To the latter the representative of Cuba proposed certain additional items. Furthermore, the representative of the Philippines proposed "Problems of human rights" as an addition to the list of topics. He pointed out that the Special Committee had already decided to give attention to this question in its social studies for 1952.

89. In the general discussion which ensued, statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Cuba, Denmark, France, India, New Zealand, the Philippines, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The representatives of the Secretary-General and WHO also participated in the discussions. The various points of view expressed by representatives are given in the summary record of the fiftieth meeting.

90. The Committee decided that, in regard to the choice of topics to be treated under the general subject of social conditions and development and in regard to any suggestion for a provisional agenda of the Committee for 1952, the Secretary-General should prepare plans, taking full account of the discussions on this item in particular, and the general trend of discussions during the whole session of the Committee.

91. Various comments were made on the length of the session of the Special Committee in 1952, leading to expressions of opinion from some members that a session of three, or at most four weeks should suffice.

Others, however, thought it best to maintain the present practice. Since General Assembly resolution 332 (IV) invited the Secretary-General to fix the date or dates of meetings of the Committee, it was agreed that it was sufficient for the Secretary-General, in taking the decision required of him, to note the wishes which had been expressed in the Committee on this subject.

Annex I

RESOLUTIONS SUBMITTED FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter submits the following draft resolutions for the consideration of the General Assembly :

- A. Draft resolution on revision of the Standard Form (see Part Two of this Report).<sup>2</sup>
- B. Draft resolution on economic conditions and problems of economic development in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

"The General Assembly,

"Noting the report prepared by the Special Committee on economic conditions and problems of development in Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"1. Approves the report of the Special Committee as a brief but considered indication of economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the problems of economic development ;

"2. Invites the Secretary-General to communicate this report for their consideration to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned."

Part Two

REPORT ON REVISION OF THE STANDARD FORM

Introduction

In 1950, the Special Committee, by a resolution, appointed "a Sub-Committee<sup>1</sup> consisting of "the following six members: Brazil, France, India, the Philippines, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America", to meet in 1951, "in the week immediately preceding the meeting of the Special Committee, in order" to undertake the task of revision in time for the consideration of the Committee at its 1951 session; and "requested the Secretary-General for this purpose to prepare a working paper for the use of the Sub-Committee, taking into account the wishes of the Committee as expressed in this resolution".

Accordingly, the Sub-Committee met in Geneva from 27 September to 2 October 1951. It had before it the working papers prepared by the Secretariat (A/AC.35/SC.1/L.2 and L.3) and a compilation of amendments submitted by the delegations of France, the United Kingdom and the United States of America; by FAO and UNESCO, as well as suggestions put forward by the Secretariat (A/AC.35/SC.1/L.7).

The Sub-Committee held five meetings under the chairmanship of the representative of the Philippines and unanimously adopted a revised text of the Standard Form as amended for consideration of the Special Committee (A/AC.35/L.67).

The Committee discussed the revised text during its thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth meetings. During the discussion, some further amendments were adopted and incorporated in the revised text.

The following draft resolution, proposed by the representatives of India, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, was adopted by 11 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions, and is submitted for the consideration of the General Assembly:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering the importance of the advancement of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories as set forth in the Declaration contained in Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations,

"Considering that the information transmitted by the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories is of increasing interest to the General Assembly,

"Noting that this information, which has been compiled in accordance with the Standard Form for the guidance of Members contained in resolution 142 (II) adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1947, together with the supplemental information placed at the disposal of the Secretary-General, is becoming of increased value,

"Considering, nevertheless, that this Standard Form requires adaptation in the light of experience,

"1. Decides that the Standard Form at present contained in resolution 142 (II) should be replaced by the annexed text;

"2. Invites the Members responsible for the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter to undertake all necessary steps to render information as complete and up to date as possible and for this purpose to take into account the sections of the revised Standard Form."

STANDARD FORM

for the guidance of Members in the preparation of information to be transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter

EXPLANATORY PREFACE

Section A

1. Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations is a Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories. Under Article 73 e, which forms part of the Chapter, Members of the United Nations which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government accept the obligation :

“to transmit regularly to the Secretary-General for information purposes, subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations may require, statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social and educational conditions in the territories for which they are respectively responsible other than those territories to which Chapters XII and XIII apply.”

2. The General Assembly of the United Nations, by resolution 142 (II) adopted on 3 November 1947, approved a “Standard Form” for the guidance of Members in the preparation of information to be transmitted under Article 73 e. In 1948, by resolution 218 (III) adopted on 3 November, it amplified its previous resolution and, in particular, while asking for the transmission of the most recent information available, recommended that Members should notify such changes in statistics and such other appreciable changes, including the progress of development programmes, as have occurred in the previous year and as affect the matters covered by Article 73 e of the Charter, bearing in mind that information already furnished need not be repeated if reference is made to the appropriate sources. By the same resolution, the Secretary-General was invited to prepare full summaries and analyses of the information transmitted during 1949 and thereafter at three-year intervals and, in the intervening years, annual supplements showing such changes in statistics and such other appreciable changes as have occurred in the previous year.

3. In 1951, the General Assembly approved a revision of the Standard Form on the recommendation of the Special Committee on Information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

4. The present edition is the Standard Form so revised.

Section B

1. The points covered by the Standard Form in some cases relate to invariable conditions in the Territory, such as its area and geography. In these cases, there would be no purpose in repeating information already provided. The same comment is applicable to such features as the natural resources and principal features of the economy of a territory, although here it would be of value if changes ascertained through, for example, geological surveys or the introduction of new crops were specifically mentioned.

2. A second type of information which is requested relates to long-term government policies and administrative organization. It is suggested that, in these cases, the information need normally be provided once every three years (e.g., in respect of the information transmitted in 1952 on conditions during the previous calendar or administrative year). On the other hand, it is desirable that, when information has been given on basic government policies, reference to such information should be specific each year, even if no change has occurred.

3. A third type of information will be found for the most part to consist of the supply of relevant statistics for the year under consideration, and should be supplied in all detail each year.

4. In respect of the statistics requested on some of the subjects, recommended patterns are given in the Appendices. This presentation is followed in order that those Territories which deem it practicable may follow the patterns suggested, while other Territories may consider themselves free to provide the information as dictated by their existing resources or practices.

5. Wherever relevant to the conditions in the Territories, statistics should be classified so as to show the conditions and participation of the indigenous and non-indigenous populations, (e.g., staff, land distribution, school facilities). Information in particular is requested where, by law or administrative practice, there are any distinctions resulting from race or religion.

6. In cases where, under the provisions of any general convention on any economic, social or educational subject, information is transmitted to a central international agency by Member States parties to such convention, and information which coincides with that requested in the Standard Form is transmitted periodically to international organizations operating under the ægis of the United Nations in accordance with standing arrangements, the transmission of a copy of such information to the Secretary-General of the United Nations would be acceptable in discharge of the obligation under Article 73 e in respect of that subject. Wherever relevant information exists in published form, there would be no need for the government to reproduce that information ; a chapter and page reference to the publication in question (with communication of the publication itself, where necessary) would suffice.

Section C

1. In order to permit the Special Committee to review the progress achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, in the fields covered by Article 73 e of the Charter, Members are invited to provide a survey of the principles and practical measures showing general trends in the Territories concerned, such as :

- (a) Advancement in the economic, social and educational fields, including the participation of the inhabitants in the common examination of problems in those fields ;
- (b) Participation of the Territories in regional and functional commissions of the Economic and Social Council, in organs of the specialized agencies, and in regional commissions or conferences, including research organizations ;
- (c) Use of technical assistance of the United Nations and the specialized agencies or from other international sources, including the manner in which such technical assistance has been integrated into long-range development programmes in the Territories ;
- (d) Action for the adoption, ratification or implementation of international agreements of particular concern to the Territories.

Appendices

Reference is made to section B, paragraph 4, of the Explanatory Preface, which reads as follows :

“ In respect of the statistics requested on some of the subjects, recommended patterns are given in the Appendices. This presentation is followed in order that those Territories which deem it practicable may follow the pattern suggested, while other Territories may consider themselves free to provide the information as dictated by their existing resources or practices.”

On the other hand, when statistics are being collated in accordance with agreed international standard classifications, their presentation according to these standards would be preferable to the simpler forms suggested in the Appendices.

Part Three

REPORT ON ECONOMIC CONDITIONS AND PROBLEMS OF DEVELOPMENT

INTRODUCTION

1. At its 1950 session, the Special Committee gave chief attention to the consideration of educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It prepared a special report on education,<sup>1</sup> which was approved by the General Assembly in resolution 445 (V) as a brief but considered indication of the importance of educational advancement and the problems still to be faced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. By the same resolution, the Secretary-General was invited to communicate the report to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories and to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization for their consideration.

2. The Committee, in 1950, also decided that, in 1951, it would direct its attention primarily to economic conditions and problems of development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and for this purpose approved a list of topics as a broad indication of the subjects to be covered.<sup>2</sup>

3. During its 1951 session, therefore, the Committee's principal preoccupation was the problem of economic development in Non-Self-Governing Territories. On the basis of the information transmitted by the Administering Members on conditions and development programmes in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration, together with supplementary information placed at the disposal of the Secretary-General by the governments concerned, the Secretariat of the United Nations laid before the Special Committee, at its 1951 session, studies on a number of economic problems; FAO and the International Labour Office submitted reports on a number of subjects within their particular competence.<sup>3</sup>

4. The Special Committee is interested in the progress of economic developments in the Non-Self-Governing Territories as a basic aspect of human development. The raising of the economic, social and educational standards of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories is the sine qua non as well as the objective of all such development and is an essential concomitant of their advance towards self-government. Accordingly, the Committee also considered a number of reports laid before it, relating to the social aspects of development; those included studies prepared by the International Labour Office.<sup>4</sup> Further attention to the social aspects of development will be paid by the Special Committee during its 1952 session, but, throughout its discussions on economic conditions and development, these aspects were kept closely in mind.

5. Following the practice successfully adopted in 1950, the Special Committee in 1951 first engaged in a series of discussions on various aspects of economic conditions, together with consideration of the documents prepared by the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies; it then appointed a Sub-Committee to prepare a report containing conclusions which might be drawn in the light of the Committee's discussions.

6. The Sub-Committee was composed of the following members: Brazil, France, India, Philippines, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America. Mr. W. A. C. Mathieson (United Kingdom) was elected chairman. The representatives of the Food and Agriculture Organization and of the International Labour Organisation also participated in the work of the Sub-Committee.

7. The report of the Sub-Committee was reviewed by the full Committee and, as amended, was adopted by fifteen votes to one.

8. It is submitted to the General Assembly, following the instructions contained in paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 332 (IV), which invites the Special Committee to submit reports containing "such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories".

9. The Special Committee considers that the Summary Records of its discussions on economic conditions and problems of development and the documents listed in the appendices should be regarded as annexed to its present report and should be read in conjunction with it.

10. Article 1 of the Charter lays down as among the Purposes of the United Nations :

“ 3. To achieve international co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion ; and

“ 4. To be a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations in the attainment of these common ends.”

11. Article 55 of the Charter, which prefaces Chapter IX, on economic and social co-operation, states :

“ With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the United Nations shall promote :

“ a. higher standards of living, full employment, and conditions of economic and social progress and development ;

“ b. solutions of international economic, social, health, and related problems ; and international cultural and educational co-operation ; and

“ c. universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.”

12. Article 73 of the Charter, which constitutes the principal Article of the Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories, provides that “ Members of the United Nations which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government . . . accept . . . the obligation to promote to the utmost, within the system of international peace and security established by the present Charter, the well-being of the inhabitants of these Territories, and to this end :

“ a. to ensure, with due respect for the culture of the peoples concerned, their political, economic, social and educational advancement, their just treatment, and their protection against abuses ;

“ d. to promote constructive measures of development, to encourage research, and to co-operate with one another and, when and where appropriate with specialized international bodies with a view to the practical achievement of the social, economic, and scientific purposes set forth in this Article.”

13. These international undertakings are cited as determining the basic approach of the Special Committee to its examination of information on economic conditions in the Territories. The Committee noted with satisfaction that declarations of policy made by the Administering Members and the information given by them on the objectives which are being pursued in the economic development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are in harmony with the international undertakings. As applied to the separate Territories, the declarations of policy are expressed as concrete programmes of development. It is the view of the Committee that the international undertakings cited above should continue to be a stimulant to the promotion of such concrete measures and the gauge by which their efficacy may be measured.

14. In these development programmes, as well as by virtue of the principles of Articles 1 and 73 of the Charter, the point of primary importance is that of the interests of the inhabitants. Every effort should be made, within the framework of the Charter, to reconcile these interests with the interests of the world as a whole. The emphasis, however, placed by the Special Committee is dictated by the terms of Article 73 of the Charter, in which Members recognize that the interests of the inhabitants are paramount. This means that, in general, investments should be channelled and improvements made through those activities which will bring benefits to the Territories and their peoples and not merely contribute towards those developments which, though useful or necessary to the rest of the world, are only of secondary interest to the Territories.

15. With their economies still mainly oriented towards the production of primary commodities, the Non-Self-Governing Territories find themselves in a position similar to that of all under-developed countries whose terms of trade are adversely affected by the wide fluctuations in and disparities between the prices of their exports and of the goods they import. The Special Committee, in considering this problem, took note of two resolutions of the Economic and Social Council. In resolution 341 A (XII) the Council had considered that continued progress in creating conditions of economic stability and in improving standards of living requires increases in the production of food, raw materials and manufactured goods and that in the under-developed countries, progress towards these objectives is limited, inter alia, by the vulnerability of their terms of foreign trade. It recommended “ that all Members of the United Nations, during the period of general inflationary pressure, take measures, direct or indirect, to regulate at equitable levels and relationships, the prices of essential goods moving in international trade, including capital goods, essential consumers’ goods and raw materials ”. The Council further recommended that the equitable regulation of prices should be maintained as long as strong inflationary pressures persist “ in order to minimize changes in the purchasing power, in terms of imports, in current earnings from exports as well as of monetary assets ”. In its resolution 367 (XIII), the Council reiterated this point of view.

16. There has been a marked improvement in the terms of trade of the raw-material-producing countries. Some recent declines, however, in the price of raw materials may invalidate these gains, particularly in conjunction with the current rise in the price of imported manufactured goods and in transport and insurance charges. Thus, the problem of the vulnerability of the economies of the under-developed countries, which include most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, to a decline in the demand for their products and to a fall in the prices of these products in the world markets calls for appropriate national and international measures. These will include measures to adjust, establish and maintain appropriate relations between prices of raw materials, on the one hand, and essential manufactured goods on the other, in order to ensure greater economic stability. The Special Committee notes in this connexion that the Economic and Social Council, in its resolution 341 A (XII), had asked that the Group of Experts, which was to analyse ways of reducing the international impact of recessions, should formulate recommendations concerning such measures in its report which is expected to be before the Council at its fourteenth session.

17. The Special Committee is of the view that, in furthering the policies recommended in the resolutions of the Council referred to above, Administering Members should seek and receive the co-operation of all countries in accordance with the principle of good-neighbourliness laid down in Article 74 of the Charter.

18. In stating this, the Special Committee recognizes that the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the Administering Members are linked together by a special bond of mutual economic interests. The Administering Member is frequently the main customer for the Territory's products and the main supplier of the Territory's needs. Moreover the Administering Member is a powerful agent in stimulating economic progress, since it influences the Territory's trade and the nature of its production through economic assistance, co-ordinated research, and the provision of technical and administrative staff.

19. International and national economic difficulties have in recent years reacted unfavourably on the economic development of the majority of the Territories. In the general interest, many of the Territories themselves have made very significant contributions towards meeting and solving some of these difficulties. At the same time, it should be stressed that a recognition of the common interests of the members of any group of communities must, so long as one community is the predominant partner, be constantly under review if the principle of the paramountcy of the interests of the inhabitants of the dependent community is to have meaning. The Special Committee feels it necessary to emphasize here that efforts for the economic development of Non-Self-Governing Territories should in no way be relaxed simply because events have supervened which demand the use of resources for purposes other than those of development. Economic development should not be allowed to become a casualty of defence programmes. To the extent that the rate of development of Non-Self-Governing Territories can be maintained or accelerated, their inhabitants will be afforded opportunities of improving their standards of living, thereby increasing the resources and prosperity of the whole community of nations.

20. The Special Committee also attaches particular importance to the problem of the determination of standards of living in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In this connexion, it had before it a document indicating the information available to the Secretary-General and giving a brief account of the few studies of recent date which throw light on the standards of living of the indigenous peoples. The Committee notes that continuing and valuable studies have been undertaken in respect of certain Territories. In general, however, the Committee is of the opinion that further studies are required to permit a clearer picture to emerge of the relationship of constructive measures of development to, and their effects on, living conditions. The Committee feels that the study of economic conditions will remain incomplete until more detailed and reliable information can be gathered on the broad trends of both rural and urban living standards. In expressing this point of view, the Committee is aware of the difficulties faced by the Administering Members both in the development of adequate statistical services in the Territories and in the adjustment of familiar methods of calculation to meet the conditions peculiar to the Territories. It notes that these problems have been taken into consideration by the Economic and Social Council in regard to the related question of the volume and distribution of national income in under-developed countries in general. It welcomes the initiative of that Council in deciding, by resolution 369 (XIII), to request the Secretary-General and the International Monetary Fund, with other specialized agencies concerned, to continue to give attention to the matter and, in particular, to encourage the preparation of basic statistical series in both developed and under-developed countries in a manner which would take into account the existing differences in the economic and social structures. The Committee notes, further, that the General Assembly, in resolution 403 (V), had requested the Secretary-General and the specialized agencies concerned to give the most favourable consideration possible to requests for technical assistance made in connexion with national income studies in the under-developed countries.

21. The Committee also wishes to call attention to the fact that several studies relating to standards of living are now being undertaken by the United Nations Secretariat as part of the work programme of the Social Commission,<sup>5</sup> and requests the Secretary-General to continue to bear in mind the needs of Non-Self-Governing Territories when preparing studies relating to standards of living and, wherever appropriate, to include material which will be helpful to those Territories.

22. With this emphasis on the need for improving and expanding statistical services and methods, and having in view the particularly advanced statistical services available in the metropolitan countries, the Committee at the same time looks to the administrations to undertake further field studies of living conditions generally in their Territories, and of the particular conditions of groups of the inhabitants. If sufficient information of this kind could be made available, it should form the basis of an important part of the Special Committee's own studies in 1952.

23. In outlining these general considerations, the Special Committee is aware of the many difficulties to be overcome in economic development: lack of knowledge of resources, poverty of natural resources in some regions, ill-health and under-nourishment, educational deficiencies and shortages and deficiencies in technical skills. Many Territories have also suffered from an unbalanced export economy and the lack of development of the internal market, together with the devastation and dislocation caused by war. The Committee also recognizes the progress which has been made in overcoming these difficulties, and is conscious that the creative energies of the indigenous peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are being released by their increasing participation in economic and social reforms and in the direction of their own affairs.

24. The Special Committee is also aware of a consideration on which the General Assembly based resolution 400 (V) concerning the financing of economic development of under-developed countries. This resolution states in part "that a more rapid economic development of under-developed countries, in particular an increase of their production, is essential for raising the level of productive employment and the living standards of their populations, for the growth of the world economy as a whole and for the maintenance of international peace and security." As regards the more rapid economic development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, this is the particular concern of the Administering Members in view of their special responsibilities towards the Territories.

DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMMES

25. In general contrast with the previous situation, the Administering Members no longer expect the Non-Self-Governing Territories to be able to provide for their own economic development solely out of their own resources and out of private investments from abroad. By various means, considerable sums of money have been made available to the Non-Self-Governing Territories through a policy of planned investment—i.e. by direct grants from the metropolitan countries, by loans on the local, metropolitan or international market, or by other forms of controlled investment. The different systems which have been followed in financing development programmes make it difficult to compare the contributions made by the various metropolitan countries. It is, however, to be noted that, at a time when many of the metropolitan countries are faced with particularly grave economic and financial problems, their taxpayers have contributed to the progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

26. The general aims of economic development have been expressed in various ways by the Administering Members. A typical example of a statement of policy is that recently made by the United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies:

"On the economic side our aim is to seek to build in every one of the territories a stable economy by developing its agricultural, mineral and industrial resources, by improving methods of production, by safeguarding the natural wealth of the country and instilling 'good husbandry' in all economic activities and, most important by diversifying these activities so that development is not lopsided and consequently dependent upon a few basic products."

27. Nevertheless, in view of the basic needs of the Territories, the sums thus far made available to them have often proved insufficient to start a chain reaction of economic development, except where a Territory was already well on the road to economic advancement.

28. In this connexion, two points have to be noted. First, it may often be desirable to concentrate development programmes in those areas where quick, substantial results may be anticipated. Secondly, the capital provided by the metropolitan governments should largely be directed towards the provision of non-self-liquidating projects designed to strengthen the basis of the economy of the Territories, or towards the undertaking of pilot schemes to test the feasibility of new forms of economic development.

29. Much of the economic expansion which has taken place relates to the development of the established export products of the Territories, notably in the case of crops and minerals in short supply on the world markets, even though food supplies seem to have improved both quantitatively and qualitatively during the past few years. Similarly, although certain patterns of trade show a tendency to change, the principal channels of trade remain much the same as before the Second World War and still to a large extent run between the metropolitan countries and the Territories under their administration.

30. Although economic expansion of this nature may be conducive to the interests of the inhabitants, the dependence of any Territory on a very few limited articles of export and for its supplies of manufactured goods on a few sources (mainly those of the metropolitan country), can and does bring hardships upon the indigenous peoples in times of stress and strain, especially during periods of economic crisis in the metropolitan areas. Therefore, the expansion of established exports should be accompanied by the development of new export products, the expansion of the local processing of these exports, the production of more and better food for local consumption, the development of suitable industries and the expansion of trade opportunities suited to the economic and geographic situation of each Territory.

31. The Special Committee is convinced that a lack of economic balance resulting from an undue reliance on a few major exports will have to be remedied by diversification which will not only result in more balanced agriculture, but will also introduce measures of industry as a stabilizing element. Up to the present time, however, this policy of diversification has not perhaps been pursued with sufficient vigour and has, in some instances, to a large extent sought to meet metropolitan needs rather than primarily to benefit the local economy. On the other hand, Territories should not be prevented from obtaining the benefits to be derived from producing those commodities for which they are best suited.

32. The Committee is of the opinion that, while the objectives of many of the basic programmes are sound, too much attention cannot be paid to the question of the ultimate economic structure and the position in that structure of the indigenous inhabitants. It recognizes that, in many cases, the basis for rapid economic expansion has been established and that in some cases there has been a consequent rise in the standards of living of the indigenous inhabitants connected with the new economic enterprises. On the whole, however—at least as regards Africa—the essential problem still remains that of so modifying the indigenous production as to ensure it an adequate place in the various schemes of economic development.

33. For this purpose, the association of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the planning of economic programmes, in the general supervision of their execution and in the management of separate undertakings is of outstanding importance. Without this association at all stages, many economic development programmes may fail to achieve their objectives. In other cases, these programmes will tend to perpetuate the dependence of the Territory on external direction. The planning and approval of schemes of economic development is often undertaken by the Territories themselves, and the inhabitants of the Territories are widely consulted. The development of co-operative organizations and of thrift and provident societies which may be directed towards co-operative methods of organization will be of great value in translating this first participation of the inhabitants into participation in the actual new economic life. Furthermore, the aims of economic development cannot be divorced from those of political development and the rapid establishment of a measure of self-government.

34. With the beginning of industrial development in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, a start has already been made in introducing a multi-racial, social, economic and cultural pattern of existence. If the continued participation by immigrant groups guiding and helping in the development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories on a permanent basis is envisaged, then association of the indigenous people in industrial, commercial, agricultural and banking concerns as collaborators, co-partners, shareholders, etc., must be actively sponsored wherever possible. The Special Committee nevertheless does not wish to imply by this statement that it has taken any stand on the question of the future place of immigrant communities in the Territories.

35. In addition to action taken by the metropolitan country and the governments of the separate Territories, in appropriate cases assistance should be sought through international collaboration in overcoming the difficulties which exist owing to shortages of capital, machinery and supplies, technical knowledge and skilled staff. Such action will be in conformity with the principles of Article 73 d of the Charter and the declared objectives of the Administering Members.

36. Note is taken, in this connexion, of the Agreement entered into on 21 June 1951, between the United Kingdom on the one hand and the United Nations and the specialized agencies on the other, for the provision of technical assistance to the Trust, Non-Self-Governing and other Territories for whose international relations the United Kingdom Government is responsible. The following provisions in this Agreement are noteworthy :

(1) The right of the governments of the Territories concerned, acting with the authority of the Government of the United Kingdom, to enter into supplementary agreements with the international organizations ;

(2) The direction to experts provided to any Territory to make every effort to instruct the local technical staff in the methods, techniques and practices of their work and the principles upon which these methods, techniques and practices are based ;

(3) The undertaking by the international institutions concerned to give sympathetic consideration to candidates nominated by the Government of the United Kingdom in the awarding of fellowships and scholarships.

37. In general, programmes of technical assistance through the United Nations should be encouraged in order to further advancement of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. To this end, the indigenous inhabitants themselves should be encouraged to participate to the largest possible extent in these programmes with a view to their increased participation in the direction of the economic life of their countries and in the solution of their special problems. It would be misleading to expect that the immediate material contribution to economic development will be great. The sums made available by the Administering Members for technical assistance and research in any of the major Non-Self-Governing Territories and the staffs employed on this work in these Territories are far larger than the total resources for technical assistance at the disposal of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. Nevertheless, by facilitating access to international assistance, a psychological reaction may be encouraged through the indication thereby given that the principle of equal rights for all peoples applies to the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

38. In considering the question of financing the economic development of Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Special Committee was aware of the action taken by the Economic and Social Council in August 1951. It noted in particular that, with the object of expanding the flow of capital for financing development projects in under-developed countries and increasing the capacity of the latter to absorb development capital, the Economic and Social Council, by resolution 368 (XIII), inter alia, recommended "that governments of under-developed countries review the adequacy of the national institutions and techniques for maximizing the availability of their domestic capital for and the flow of foreign capital into essential national development programmes". It also recommended "that governments of under-developed countries, as part of their over-all development programmes, take measures to increase their capacity to absorb foreign capital, such as the institution of expanded programmes of mass education, vocational technical training and agricultural extension services, training of scientists and administrators, meaningful measures of land reform and reform of agricultural credit systems, and measures to increase social mobility".

39. The information supplied by the Administering Members indicates that action along these lines has been taken in respect of the financing of development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and the Special Committee considers that such action will contribute greatly to the economic development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

40. The Special Committee also noted the recommendations of the Council contained in its resolution 368 (XIII) designed to achieve an expansion and steadier flow of private foreign capital by the removal of existing deterrents, and by providing adequate assurances with respect to the treatment to be accorded to foreign investors. The importance of such measures was emphasized in the Special Committee, which learned with interest of the steps already taken in a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

41. Finally, the Special Committee noted the request to Member States by the Economic and Social Council to submit proposals on the financing of economic development to the Council at its fifteenth session. The Special Committee hopes that the Administering Members, in presenting such proposals, will pay particular attention to the problem of financing the economic development of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

GENERAL ASPECTS OF ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

42. In succeeding sections, the Special Committee treats separately various aspects of agricultural and industrial development. It wishes at the outset, however, to point out that this treatment does not indicate any failure to realize that the economic development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories must be regarded in all aspects as a single policy designed to further the general and balanced advancement of the Territories in the interests of their peoples. The Special Committee emphasizes that industrial development should be conceived as inseparable from and, in fact, complementary to the programmes for the promotion of agricultural development, a point which it will develop further in the later sections of this report. It would like also to stress that the establishment of better health and living conditions must be regarded, in the case of peoples suffering from poverty, malnutrition and ignorance, as the primary objective of economic development, but equally that improvements in these fields cannot be allowed to wait upon economic development, since in large measure they are a precondition of its success.

PROBLEMS OF BASIC EQUIPMENT

43. Before considering economic development in detail, the Special Committee draws attention to the fact that, apart from a few areas in which the export trade is highly organized, the basic equipment of the Non-Self-Governing Territories is inadequate to meet the requirements of modern economic development or to provide for any substantial expansion in existing production and internal trade. At the end of the Second World War there was considerable destruction in some Territories, and generally throughout the Non-Self-Governing Territories much of the limited material equipment available needed replacement and modernization. The situation was aggravated by world shortages of staffs and materials and by currency difficulties which prevented a number of Territories from securing the necessary foreign currency for the renewal of their equipment.

44. Responsibility for remedying this situation is accepted by the governments as largely resting with them. Accordingly, the various programmes of development in the public sector are to a considerable extent programmes for the replacement, modernization and expansion of basic equipment and public services.

45. The principal requisites in this respect are the following:

(1) The development of transport and communications, including not only the reconditioning and extension of existing facilities, but also the modernization of the various forms of transport and communications, with emphasis on the growth of internal trade.

(2) The development of power resources, particularly hydro-electric power, since water is among the outstanding sources of power in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

(3) The development of water supplies for agriculture, industry and domestic purposes.

(4) The provision of basic social services in order to promote better educational, health and general living conditions and that sense of social stability and equality of opportunity which contributes to the establishment of equilibrium in society.

(5) The development of agricultural and industrial research and the establishment of extension services, experimental stations and other means of spreading among the peoples concerned a practical knowledge of new and improved methods of production.

46. Two cautionary notes must be sounded. First, pursuit of efficiency in all fields of endeavour is necessary, but such efficiency will fail in its purposes if it introduces new elements of social disorganization. The rapid introduction of modern conditions must be accompanied by measures to promote or maintain social stability, as a means of harmonizing the fundamental traditions of the peoples with the changing needs of modern times.

47. Secondly, the Special Committee considers it particularly important to avoid the introduction of economic enterprises or techniques which tend to encourage or to perpetuate discrimination on grounds of race or creed. In considering the introduction of any economic enterprise in a Non-Self-Governing Territory or the adaptation of any existing enterprise, consideration must be given, from the outset, to the question whether it will not contribute to greater harmony between the various members of the community as a whole.

AGRICULTURE, FORESTRY AND FISHERIES

48. The economic development of the large majority of the Non-Self-Governing Territories depends essentially on the proper use of their animal and vegetable resources (crops, livestock, forestry, fisheries). Accordingly, improvements in agriculture, in the broadest interpretation of the word, constitute an important step towards general economic and social development by raising the standards of living of the local populations and by providing the necessary foundations for other types of development.

49. In the African Territories south of the Sahara, the present situation is dominated by the need to secure better living conditions and to adapt the indigenous agricultural economy to the situations created by changes in the distribution of population, better control over animal and plant diseases, and the introduction of commercial crops. In many areas, in spite of plans for the maintenance or rehabilitation of soil fertility, the land has deteriorated, and the introduction of new methods of production which do not reverse this trend may be disastrous. Increased mechanization in suitable cases, the use of manures and chemical fertilizers, the improvement of plant-breeding and of livestock are obvious means of advance, and the information supplied by the Administering Members indicates that measures in this direction are being widely taken. While it is vital not to ignore the fact that many indigenous methods of cultivation have been successfully developed over the centuries with a view to the best use of the soil and cannot be lightly discarded, the adaptation of these methods in the light of modern knowledge must be pursued. Even in these cases, the point made regarding the inter-connexion between agricultural and industrial development requires repetition. For example, the mechanization of specific agricultural processes may in certain circumstances disrupt indigenous systems designed to safeguard the fertility of the soil; but the introduction into the agricultural communities concerned of modern methods of land clearance, transport, house-building and crop-processing, with the accompanying facilities for the maintenance of machinery, may release much energy for better agriculture in accordance with proved methods.

50. In this connexion, the Committee would like to emphasize that, wherever possible, the growing of crops which have great export value—such as tea, cotton, sisal, coffee, rubber, etc.—by the indigenous peoples should be encouraged so as to associate them more fully in the processes of agricultural development and in economic expansion programmes.

51. In the Territories of North Africa and the Mediterranean, with their rapidly increasing populations, the major problems of agricultural development are the control of water resources for irrigation purposes, the bringing of new areas into cultivation and the introduction of modern methods of cultivation, involving the extension of present efforts to secure more stable conditions for the semi-nomadic populations. Information was provided to the Special Committee on the progress of plans designed to increase food production in order to feed a population growing at considerable rates, to promote industries which will enable the Territories to satisfy more of their needs in manufactured goods, and to create a more favourable balance of trade.

52. In the Caribbean Territories, economic development largely depends on the production and marketing of the chief export crops. The diversification of crops is being sought in order to obviate the risks inherent in economies dependent on a few basic exports. In this region in particular, however, the consideration is relevant that conditions for concentration on particular crops are exceedingly favourable, so that the dense agricultural populations could not be supported if any drastic change were to take place for the establishment of an agricultural economy based principally on production for local consumption. The information provided showed that efforts are being made to promote new systems of cultivation and of management or ownership combining the benefits of specialized estate export agriculture and peasant-farming both for export and for local consumption. The experiments which have been made in these directions deserve full support, and their results should be made widely known.

53. In the Territories of South-East Asia, the prices for the chief agricultural exports have been relatively high. On the other hand, the local food situation remains difficult, and the importation of rice from neighbouring countries cannot be expected on the scale possible in the past. It is important that every effort should be made to diversify agricultural production by the development of new secondary crops for export and by increasing food production for local consumption. Government efforts to increase and improve rice production by peasant producers are of high value. The Special Committee also considers that further action should be taken to promote the wider participation of the peasant populations in the production of rubber and other commodities in which, with government aid in research, the control of pests and diseases, the provision of high-yielding planting materials and marketing schemes, the peasant is less vulnerable to the effects of fluctuating world demands than producers on large-scale estates.

54. Regarding problems of agriculture in general, the Special Committee agrees that one of the primary objectives of development should be to supply the peoples with a more ample and better-balanced diet. Taking account of the low state of nutrition among many of the agricultural populations, it regards as of deep interest programmes for increased food production, the expansion of mixed farming and other efforts to improve agricultural production for home and local consumption. Where new export crops are introduced, their ultimate effects should be considered in this context from the start. Existing world shortages and high prices have stimulated the production of export crops. As a result, it is increasingly important to examine closely the effects of any such new agricultural production on soil fertility and on the basic food requirements of the peoples. Export crops which assist the local diet have, of course, double advantages; export crops, which, although immediately profitable, have little effect on local diets or on the diversification of the local economy, should have at least good prospects of long-term profitability before they can be recommended.

55. In regard to the introduction of mechanization and improved agricultural techniques, the Special Committee considers as of special interest the information provided by the Administering Members on the promotion of better rural conditions through the co-ordinated efforts of various departments of the governments working in co-operation with the local authorities to foster the pooling of agricultural machinery, the use of artificial fertilizers and, often more usefully, of animal and compost manure, and the operation of agricultural modernization teams. Much of this work is a process of education, and, once again, the Special Committee draws attention to the close connexion between programmes of economic development and policies of social and educational advancement and of co-operation between the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and their administrations.

56. One of the basic reasons for the low standard of living in some Non-Self-Governing Territories, as elsewhere, is the inadequate extent of the areas at present under cultivation. One of the solutions to the problem is the maximum utilization of water resources. The Special Committee noted the recommendations made by the General Assembly in resolution 402 (V), under which the Economic and Social Council was asked to consider various measures designed to facilitate and encourage the development of arid land. The Secretary-General was requested to prepare a report on the practical measures adopted for the study of the problems of arid zones, and on the technical and financial means employed by the specialized agencies for this purpose. The Special Committee also noted that the Economic and Social Council, in resolution 346 (XII), requested the Secretary-General to take into consideration the entire field of water control and utilization as related to the problems of arid zones. The Special Committee considers that the activities of the United Nations in this field would be of benefit to the economic development of Non-Self-Governing Territories, as well as to other countries.

57. An essential part of agricultural policy is the establishment and implementation of a sound and comprehensive forest policy. In the Non-Self-Governing Territories, policies have been adopted for the conservation of forests and for the development and exploitation of forest resources. Great efforts are being made to implement these policies. It has been represented, however, that forestry policy is insufficiently connected with general policies of soil and water conservation. An accompanying difficulty is that of persuading local inhabitants of the essential role to be played by the forests in the maintenance of favourable agricultural and soil conditions, so as to prevent the damage caused to existing resources by such practices as the excessive burning of bush and unrestricted grazing.

58. The Special Committee agreed on the need for close co-ordination between forest conservation and utilization policies on the one hand and soil and water conservation policies on the other. It would seem that, if this is done and if forestry services are expanded, the impoverishment of the natural resources observed in some areas can be checked, and the important work which is being undertaken for the maintenance and exploitation of forest resources and the creation of favourable conditions of general agricultural development will be successfully performed.

59. The Special Committee also draws attention to the development of fisheries. In addition to the important export industries, which exist in some Territories and which are being promoted both through improved fishing methods and through the processing of the catch, the expansion of fisheries is of great promise for the improvement of local nutrition.

60. The lack of proteins in the diets of the inhabitants of many Non-Self-Governing Territories could be remedied by an increase in the consumption of fish. Many programmes of research, survey and experimentation are already being undertaken. Included among these programmes are the measures taken to develop fish-farming. Whatever form may be taken in the development of fisheries, the assistance of the administrations is of outstanding importance, with a view to improving present fishing processes, to training fishermen, to providing the necessary shore facilities, and to developing the fish trade. The development under healthy conditions of communities of fishermen involves many problems both of an economic and of a social character. Interesting experiments for their solution are taking place in several of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

61. There is a pressing need in the government services concerned with agricultural development, the improvement of livestock, forestry policy and the development of fisheries, for more trained technicians and more trained subordinate staff. These professions have not usually secured in the Territories adequate social and economic recognition; nor has the basic training required as yet figured sufficiently prominently in the programmes of some of the new institutions of higher education. In many Territories, vigorous agricultural extension programmes have been organized in rural communities. In general, however, the broad educational task of arousing and sustaining interest in the improvement of agricultural conditions has to make more rapid headway if the main social and economic basis for the development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories is to be solidly established, and if the tendency that leads farmer's children with a certain degree of education to seek employment in the towns as a means of escape from existing rural conditions is to be checked.

62. In concluding this examination of problems involved in improving and expanding the production of the animal and vegetable resources of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Special Committee reiterates its view that all forms of development are interdependent. As a particular and relevant illustration of that point of view, it notes that agricultural development itself depends on the development of a degree of industrialization suited to local circumstances. In many Territories the stage has been reached where better farming needs the assistance that local industries and trade can give it by supplementing the agricultural economy, providing essential supplies, expanding the processing of agricultural produce and in some cases absorbing surplus population.

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT

63. Although in many localities there is happily no problem of rural indebtedness, an urgent need for the provision of credit at reasonable rates is emerging in those areas where cash agriculture is replacing subsistence agriculture; and it has increased in areas already within the cash economy. The first sources of credit have usually been the purchasers of produce, shop-keepers, and money-lenders charging high rates of interest or obtaining control over the land and the workers on it. Even within local communities, the development of a class of comparatively prosperous land-owners has led to indebtedness, with some of the features of debt bondage.

64. The Special Committee considers that the effective intervention in the field of rural credit on the part of the administrations has often become a matter of urgent necessity. In some Territories, considerable progress has already been made; but, even in these Territories, improved farm practices, the use of better tools and the intensification of agricultural production generally depend in large measure on expanded credit facilities.

65. Means are usually provided by which the needs of the larger agricultural producers can be met on a commercial basis, but the best way should be determined of co-ordinating all credit agencies to eliminate duplication and to ensure the integration of the credit system.

66. For the small borrower, a co-ordinated system of local societies is necessary through which the credit needs of the peasants, the terms of cash and other loans and the manner of repayment can be controlled with the assistance of those who are members of the local community. The savings which can accrue from peasant sources are already in certain instances highly significant, and would be an appreciable contribution to the accumulation of local capital. With full co-operation and assistance on the part of the indigenous peoples, land banks can also serve a useful purpose in the provision of agricultural credit.

67. The Special Committee considers that a further means by which administrations can intervene, to the advantage of indigenous farmers in particular, is by taking measures to control the rates of interest on agricultural loans and to legislate effectively against usury. The Committee welcomes, both in this particular connexion and in respect of the whole question of agricultural credit, the step taken by the Economic and Social Council, in its resolution 370 (XIII) on land reform, recommending that governments establish or expand national and local institutions for providing agricultural credit at reasonable rates of interest and take legislative or administrative measures to assist in the reduction of agricultural indebtedness.

CO-OPERATIVES

68. The development of co-operative societies will be of great benefit in the provision of credit facilities. Co-operative societies, moreover, in providing for the marketing of the produce of their members, in obtaining the use of agricultural supplies, and in encouraging various forms of better living, should contribute largely to the economic and social progress of the inhabitants. The Special Committee also wishes to emphasize the value of the experience which can be provided through co-operative societies in business management and in the free discussion of local problems.

69. In most Non-Self-Governing Territories, co-operative activity cannot develop without the active promotion and support of the administrations. The lines upon which action should be taken to develop co-operation will depend upon the particular conditions and needs of the various Territories. The Special Committee, however, draws attention to the resolution concerning national action regarding the co-operative movement which was adopted by the Asian Regional Conference of the International Labour Organisation in 1950. A number of points of importance in the development of the co-operative movement mentioned in this resolution should be of value not only to the Asian governments, but also to governments responsible for the administration of Territories where the traditional way of rural life is rapidly being changed by new economic influences.

70. Sound co-operative legislation is a basic requirement. It should be simple and flexible. It should deal solely with the co-operative societies and should govern all types of such societies. It should provide for open membership, democratic control, the limitation of interest on capital and the allocation of any surpluses to common purposes or for distribution among members. The Administering Members provided information on the progress already achieved. The Special Committee is convinced of the wide importance of the measures taken or contemplated. It does not consider that progress need be slow in cases where the full classical conception of co-operative organization cannot be at once achieved and where a wider measure of government intervention is required than is desirable in countries where the members of co-operative societies have a long experience of business traditions. But it does consider that a constant objective in co-operative policy should be the increasing application of principles of full democratic management. Furthermore, it considers that the co-operative societies should from the outset be open for membership to all races and creeds, so long as safeguards exist to prevent their domination by any particular interests.

71. The functions of the administrations in Territories where the co-operative movement is not strongly established are thus of considerable importance. The expansion of co-operative societies in Territories in which they have subsequently taken the strongest hold was not spontaneous, but the painstaking result of administrative policy and government financial and technical support.

72. This means that considerable responsibility rests on the administrative agency primarily concerned with the guidance of the co-operative movement. The Special Committee considers that, as a general rule, this agency should rank in status with the other principal services of the government. In this connexion, the Special Committee noted with interest the tendency to broaden the duties of the agencies concerned beyond the accomplishment of tasks of legal and business supervision to that of the promotion of interest and training in co-operation. It also noted the information on the training of persons to direct and manage co-operative institutions. In many Territories, this may be effected through courses and lectures. Regional courses or regional institutions may, in some cases, be feasible. Of considerable assistance will be co-operative services established within the universities, courses in co-operation operated by the extension services and extra-mural courses directed by the administrations or universities.

73. The Special Committee is deeply interested in the information provided on government assistance for general promotional work, collaboration in improving facilities for the administrative structure of co-operative societies, and the provision of technical advice and financial privileges. It holds that, even though a limited economic outlook as to the value of the co-operative movement would in itself justify such action, of greater importance are the prospects provided by the co-operative movement for a broadening of concepts of communal responsibilities. The co-operative movement may and should act as a source of inspiration for the creation of new forces of human energy.

MARKETING OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

74. Successful marketing of the principal export crops of the Territories often requires the establishment of effective organizations grouping the chief producers of each Territory. Considerable progress in this respect has been made both through associations of producers and through government marketing boards.

75. The importance of such arrangements is enhanced by a number of factors: the production of an export crop in any Territory, although perhaps vital to the welfare of the Territory, may represent a small percentage of world production, so that the Territory has only a limited bargaining power; secondly, the small peasants may require protection against excessive charges by middlemen; thirdly, there may be little encouragement to the peasant to care about the quality of his produce, its proper treatment and presentation; and fourthly, physical facilities for marketing, transport and storage are often inadequate. Finally, marketing organizations are important instruments of public policy by virtue of the action they can take to limit fluctuations in the prices paid to producers, and to prevent destitution in times of low prices and inflation in times of high prices.

76. From the information supplied by the Administering Members, it appears that a number of existing boards have already done much to meet these aims. They have accumulated surpluses, the effect of which is to provide guarantees against the effects of rapid fluctuations in prices in the next few years, and the use of further surpluses has become a matter of general interest. Their success has been such that the Special Committee considers it to be important that, as has already been provided in a number of cases, the effective control over the boards should be exercised by the people directly concerned, through the representation on them of the local producers and of local general interests.

77. While attention has been widely paid to the improved marketing of export products, marketing for internal consumption is less advanced. The efforts which are being made to promote internal trade in many of the Territories underline the importance of the provision of improved facilities, the encouragement of marketing societies, and general regulatory and promotional action by the administrations to improve marketing conditions and to secure a better return to the primary producers. The Special Committee considers that the co-operative movement should, with the necessary guidance, play a significant part in the development of internal distribution.

DISTRIBUTION AND TENURE OF LAND

78. In the large majority of Non-Self-Governing Territories, land is the main source of livelihood. It is more than that. It is the basis of the structure of society. Land is thus not only a form of wealth, the use and treatment of which can be dictated purely by economic considerations. Land legislation and policy, if they are to be just and equitable—even practicable—have to take into account all the social and political aspects of the problem and make due provision for them. The Special Committee has already stated that economic development depends essentially on the proper use of the animal and vegetable resources of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. This means that development depends on the proper utilization of land. But in deciding upon the proper utilization of land, even more than in connexion with other aspects of development, an understanding of and respect for the human feelings involved is essential.

79. The Special Committee considered two main aspects of problems of land: land distribution as between large-scale estates and small farming units, and the evolution of indigenous systems of land distribution and tenure under the impact of modern economic conditions.

80. With regard to the first aspect, which also was related to the question of land alienation, the Committee noted that, in some of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the grants made of land or of rights over the produce of the land in the early days of foreign penetration were on an inordinate scale and were obtained at a time when there was little understanding of and respect for indigenous land systems. In a great many cases, however, these grants did not involve the eviction of the indigenous occupiers, but were rather in the nature of monopolies for the collection and sale of produce. Moreover, the administrations have now reduced the extent of many of the areas previously alienated in this way. Their present declared policies are to ensure that any future grants will be based on the economic and social interests of the indigenous inhabitants. In many Territories, the present areas of land alienated to non-indigenous interests constitute a small percentage of the total land areas. In some of the Territories, however, the areas of alienated land remain considerable. In others, where the percentage of alienated to total land may be small, this percentage does not reveal the real situation in terms of the quality of the land. The fact that some of the alienated land may be among the best in the Territory concerned appears to be partly due to the work of reclamation and improvement undertaken by means of the capital, skill and enterprise of the land-holders. Nevertheless, the Committee considers the question of land distribution one of fundamental importance for the development and welfare of the Territories and for the establishment of good relations amongst all their population groups.

81. The principal features of the present situation taken into account by the Special Committee are the following. There are many estates and areas comprising estates which have reached a high level of agricultural efficiency, and which contribute to the prosperity of the Territories. To seek to break up such estates would not contribute to economic prosperity and, unless there is real land hunger in the regions, would serve no immediate social purpose. On the other hand, in some cases large areas of land are still held by non-indigenous interests and are not being exploited to any substantially beneficial extent. There are also cases of estate cultivation, particularly in areas of dense peasant population, the existence of which may create social tension between classes or races.

82. The problems of land alienation and any latent conflict between estate and peasant cultivation affect only some of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and in them conditions vary widely. The Special Committee limits itself, as required by its terms of reference, to the following observations of a general character.

83. The maintenance of efficient estate cultivation is in many cases essential as a contribution to economic life; new sparsely inhabited areas may in some cases best be opened up by the encouragement of estate cultivation; the estate owners and managers should be given the guarantees needed to stimulate their enterprise, provided efficiency is maintained and satisfactory standards provided for wage-earners and tenants. A policy of estate development must be conditioned by the important social and political factors to which reference has been made above.

84. Where estates are not efficiently operated, administrations should redeem them or take steps to ensure more efficient operation; where the local agricultural populations have a need for land which cannot otherwise be satisfied or where the establishment of a healthy creative rural population depends on the acquisition of estate lands, the administrations should take suitable and equitable steps to purchase and make available the necessary land. Unless the benefits of estate management and organization can be transferred to the peasant producers, the replacement of estate by peasant agriculture will often be contrary to the general good; where circumstances make estate ownership no longer desirable, the administrations should plan to promote systems which, through co-operative organization, proportional benefits, the organization of supervised peasant holdings and the like, promise the maintenance of economic units of farm production coupled with social stability and satisfaction.

85. The second main aspect of this problem—namely, the evolution of indigenous or of peasant systems of land distribution and tenure—also demands positive and comprehensive policies on the part of the administrations.

86. In many areas, population pressure, the need to produce more food for local consumption, the increasing opportunities to secure money by the sale of cash crops, the availability of new equipment and agricultural techniques, have all made inadequate many indigenous methods of land cultivation and have produced changes which require new methods of land tenure and use. The evolution of existing systems under the growing pressure of economic conditions and concepts is in places accompanied by confusion and stress. More knowledge of indigenous systems of tenure is necessary. There is, however, an immediate requirement for guidance and direction by the administrations in influencing changes which are taking place. These changes should be directed towards the improved use of the land and a deepening of a sense of duty towards the land by which land ownership is interpreted as a matter of collective responsibility as well as of individual rights.

87. The Special Committee realizes that the development of the rural economy should, as far as possible, be based on existing systems of land tenure and on the social concepts attached to these systems. Their evolution should aim at the consolidation of unduly small land plots and the prevention of fragmentation, security of tenure dependent on the maintenance of good cultivation, the prevention of excessive indebtedness, reasonable compensation for improvements, the modification of systems of inheritance in order to assure the continuity of good cultivation, ensuring a satisfactory standard of living for the rural communities, and reasonable conditions which will attract the investment of capital. In this connexion, the Special Committee noted the conclusions reached by the African Conference on the Indigenous Rural Economy held in Jos (Nigeria) in November 1949, and considers that those conclusions should be of deep interest to other regions.

88. The schemes which have been inaugurated for the operation or supervision of estates by or under lease from the public authorities for peasant settlement under supervision and guidance, and, in general, for linking questions of land tenure and distribution with questions of improved agriculture and living standards merit the continuous consideration of the administrations.

89. The Special Committee also draws attention to interesting developments in some Territories to co-ordinate the treatment of problems of the tenure and utilization of land. The part played by administrative services often originated in specific operations for the control of pests and diseases, for the improvement of particular crops, or for the regulation of land questions in accordance with legal concepts. The co-ordination of this work in the light of a general land and agriculture policy is highly desirable, and in any institutions created for this purpose the local inhabitants should be associated to an ever-increasing extent at all levels.

90. In considering the problems of land, the Special Committee was guided in particular by two declarations contained in resolution 401 (V) adopted by the General Assembly in 1950. The General Assembly had declared that "... Agrarian conditions which persist in many under-developed countries constitute a barrier to their economic development because such conditions are a major cause of low agricultural productivity and low standards of living for the populations of those countries and territories", and expressed the conviction that "immediate steps should be undertaken to study the extent to which existing agrarian conditions hamper the economic development of under-developed countries as well as to assist governments, at their request, in the utilization of the facilities available in the United Nations and the specialized agencies for the improvement of such conditions".

91. The Special Committee welcomes the decision of the Economic and Social Council, in resolution 370 (XIII), to keep the question of land reform continually under review by means of periodic analyses of information to be obtained by means of a questionnaire. The Special Committee hopes that the Administering Members will be able to furnish to the United Nations detailed information for Non-Self-Governing Territories by appropriate means.

92. The Special Committee has also noted the various other recommendations to governments contained in resolution 370 (XIII) of the Economic and Social Council and draws them to the attention of the Administering Members as constituting guides for action in applying land-reform measures in Non-Self-Governing Territories as well as to independent countries.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT

93. The majority of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are likely to remain primarily agricultural in their basic economy. But there are few Territories in which an increased degree of industrial development would not benefit their general economy. Moreover, as already indicated, the promotion of industrial development is in many Territories essential in the interests of agricultural production. There are Territories with dense populations where rural poverty exists, since there is no outlet in industry for surplus rural labour. There are Territories which are basically dependent on the export of a single crop or a few minerals, and for which some security against the effects of fluctuations in world prices can be achieved through a well-balanced industrial development.

94. The Non-Self-Governing Territories produce 50 per cent of the world production of bauxite, but do not manufacture aluminium. They produce 54 per cent of the world production of cocoa, but do not manufacture cocoa powder or butter. Eighteen Territories produce 3,500,000 tons of cane-sugar, but refine only a small proportion of this production. Territories rich in limestone and in clay import large quantities of building material. In many Territories growing cotton on a large scale, the cotton-growers wear imported cotton goods.

95. The local processing of primary products is already a marked feature of industrial development in many of the Territories and thus illustrates the spreading recognition of the value of diversifying the economy of the Territories in the field of industry as well as of agriculture. The problems which have arisen in the consideration of this question are problems of pace and methods rather than of objectives.

96. The Special Committee emphasizes that a greater degree of industrialization is essential and that this industrialization, in an age of electric and motor power, need not be confined to the large urban concentrations typical of the industrial development of a hundred years ago. The technical means can be made available for rural, village and home industries which will bring industrialization to the countryside instead of draining the countryside of its vital forces.

97. In this connexion, the Committee notes that, over a period of time, it may often be easier to raise capital for a number of small local enterprises than for single large plants located in larger towns. In rural areas and provincial centres, sources of capital may exist which it may not be possible to attract into investment unless the investment takes the form of local enterprise which is a part of the daily experience of the local population. Village and cottage industries are valuable examples of this type of development and in addition, provide opportunities for increased employment without the displacement of population associated with large industrial concentrations. Moreover, in small plants, a larger proportion of investment can be used for actual productive equipment. In contrast to the small manufacturing plant, large-scale industry needs capital-consuming services such as workers' houses, power plants, administrative offices and large storage facilities.

98. The Committee believes that a number of points should be noted regarding the pattern of industrialization to be achieved in the Territories. Since agriculture is of such prominence, the processing of agricultural products should be given a conspicuous place in programmes of industrialization, as is already being done in certain Territories. Wherever possible, efforts should be directed towards the development of processes for making use of by-products and waste, which are sometimes of even greater commercial value than the primary agricultural product, and which otherwise may simply be discarded or lost. Finally, in many cases, an industrial pattern should be encouraged which will not only make use of local agricultural products in such enterprises as canning, processing and weaving, but also support urgently needed improvement in agricultural productivity through the manufacture of agricultural tools and simple agricultural equipment, and the maintenance and repair of agricultural machinery.

99. As regards the means to be employed for the promotion of industrial expansion, the Special Committee welcomes the creation of governmental or mixed agencies for this purpose. Favourable attention should also be paid to the measures taken in some Non-Self-Governing Territories to foster local industries by fiscal and similar concessions to private companies introducing new industries or expanding existing industries.

100. The development of industries in the Non-Self-Governing Territories is often hampered by the lack of local skilled labour, and the advantages of such development to the Territories are limited by a lack of experience in business management and the higher techniques of industry. Programmes for the rapid training of workers in industry were found practicable among the largely untrained workers who entered war enterprises during the Second World War. In some cases, these techniques are applicable to the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. At the same time, training in higher skills should be encouraged through long-range programmes of apprenticeship and industrial training.

101. Economic development of this type requires the resourceful encouragement of measures of labour policy and general social policy, such as the development of trade unionism, the establishment of an adequate wage policy, the general protection of wage-earners, the prevention of discrimination in employment, and the creation of a healthy social mentality in new centres of population.

102. In the light of its general approach to problems of economic conditions and development, the Special Committee considers that the international and national responsibilities assumed by the Administering Members for the economic and social advancement of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and the nature of the trade relations which have been established between the metropolitan countries and the Non-Self-Governing Territories, are special considerations which call for the adoption of policies designed to diversify local economies by the promotion of healthy and balanced industrial development in the Territories.

MINING POLICY

103. The contribution of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to the world production of a number of minerals is considerable. From the standpoint of the Territories, the mining products exported in many instances form a high proportion of the total value of exports and, in addition, contribute largely to the local revenues by taxes, duties and royalties. Recent measures taken to promote European economic co-operation and the increase in the demand for certain minerals are stimulating mining exploration and production. Thus, while agriculture is the economic foundation of most Non-Self-Governing Territories and although many of the Territories are poor in minerals, or have mineral resources which are relatively inaccessible, in many others the mines are the chief and most tangible assets.

104. The Special Committee considered the subject of the development and use of the mineral resources of Non-Self-Governing Territories, as it considered other subjects, from the point of view of the interests of the inhabitants. Its chief interest lay in the extent to which mining policy is directed primarily towards the advancement of the economic and social welfare of the peoples of the Territories.

105. The policies of the Administering Members have established the paramount rights of the State over all mineral resources, and its responsibility to regulate the exploitation of these resources. These policies are exemplified by varying methods and to a varying degree in different Territories. As mineral resources are of a wasting character, such control is necessary to regulate the rate and conditions of mineral extraction and to ensure efficient management. It also makes it possible to take account of long-term economic objectives, so that a broad secondary economy may be built around a mining economy. In this connexion, it may be noted that not infrequently the improvement of basic services (such as transport) is required for the exploitation of mineral resources and that mining may thus have important ancillary advantages to the economy as a whole.

106. The Special Committee considers that—in particular in relation to mining development—the administrations have an immediate responsibility for directing the course of developments in accordance with the interests of the peoples.

107. The Committee recognizes that the fiscal policy applied to mining operations must be determined by circumstances. The administrations, in the interests of the local community, should seek to obtain the maximum direct financial benefits. On the other hand, their fiscal policy should stimulate rather than discourage mining, taking account of the direct benefits which the community derives from the mines.

108. The Special Committee recognizes, also, that the establishment of a profit-making mine is a highly speculative enterprise, and that, in general, the average return on capital invested cannot be regarded as excessive. It emphasizes, nevertheless, that, in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the profits derived from mining operations, less local taxes, duties and royalties, usually leave the Territories and that most of the basic equipment required must be obtained from external sources. So far as is practicable, therefore, the administrations should seek to encourage the re-investment of profits in the Territories and the provision of local supplies for the mining undertakings.

109. To a large extent, the share of the indigenous inhabitants from mining operations consists of the wages paid to the mine workers, the proceeds of taxes, duties and royalties, and the internal markets created, notably for the supply of foodstuffs. To a greater extent than in other economic activities, the indigenous inhabitants do not share in the ownership, management, or technical work in the mines. The Special Committee recognizes that mining operations require substantial capital and that, consequently, increased participation in ownership on the part of the indigenous inhabitants depends upon the accumulation of local capital. On the other hand, it considers that the objective of enabling the indigenous inhabitants to acquire the qualifications which they now lack in business and technical skills should be vigorously pursued in order to bring the local inhabitants into the operation and management of mines at all levels, and to ensure that a higher proportion of mining wages and salaries is retained in the Territories.

110. The Special Committee noted that, although most mines are operated by private interests, in some cases the administrations were undertaking such operations by government enterprise or by government participation in semi-public corporations. The Special Committee considers that, in these cases, a larger opportunity is offered for setting social standards in mining operations and for linking the mining developments with educational and technical training programmes which will enable the inhabitants to take a larger part in the management of the mines and in skilled employment.

111. With regard to conditions of employment, the Special Committee emphasizes that, while satisfactory conditions of employment and remuneration are essential in all forms of labour, mining employment is of such a nature as to require particularly high standards in order to provide for the workers full opportunities of healthy social organization in trade union relations and in community living. If sufficiently high standards cannot be attained, the question may arise of the value of the continuance of these undertakings.

RESEARCH

112. In its examination of the obstacles to rapid economic development, the Committee was much impressed by the vital contribution to be expected from research. A single scientific discovery could do more to revolutionize the economic prospects of some Territories than the expenditure of vast capital sums. Expenditure on research on the part of the Administering Members is therefore to be encouraged, and the expansion of research services is regarded by the Committee as an important aspect of economic development.

113. To quote one example only, the importance of increased supplies of locally produced food has already been indicated in this report. Agricultural research can promote this by developing high-yielding strains of planting material, by conquering plant diseases and by devising means of protecting stored foodstuffs against pests. Similarly, successful war against the tse-tse fly, and the protection of man and animal against it, would open up new prospects for meat production in Africa, with notable improvement in the diet of the population.

114. The Committee did not consider it necessary in this report to enumerate the research institutions in or serving the Non-Self-Governing Territories, on which information was placed at its disposal, or to describe the notable successes recorded in recent years. It is desirable, however, to note a few trends which are regarded as important. Scientific knowledge is indivisible, and this is recognized both in the close links established between scientific workers in the metropolitan countries and their counterparts in the Territories themselves and in the efforts being made to organize research on a regional basis. This can be illustrated by the creation of the French Overseas Scientific Research Centre and the proposal to establish in France a National Institute for Tropical Agriculture, by the activities of institutions and councils in the United Kingdom under the direction of the British Colonial Research Council, and by the co-ordinated work undertaken by the National Institute for Agricultural Research in the Belgian Congo. Similar developments are reflected in the establishment, for example, of an East-African Veterinary Research Institute, which has close links with the Inter-governmental Bureau for Epizootic Diseases, in Nairobi, which disseminates information throughout Africa on the latest methods for combating such diseases.

115. International co-operation for the interchange of the findings of research and information on the various research programmes has also developed through the specialized agencies, the regional Caribbean and South Pacific Commissions and the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa south of the Sahara and inter-governmental arrangements such as, for example, the collaboration now taking place between the Australian Government and the Governments of India and Pakistan.

116. The Special Committee considers that the continuation and broadening of co-operation of this type are highly desirable.

117. Finally, it records the view that not only research and experimentation needed in the social services, but also the work of scientific and technological research, may remain sterile unless full account is taken of social and human factors which will influence the application of research findings to actual conditions.

CONCLUDING NOTE

118. In its 1950 Report on Education in Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Special Committee had recorded that its composition and terms of reference make it in no sense a replica of UNESCO. It had stated that its task was to examine the information transmitted on Non-Self-Governing Territories with a view to facilitating in the field of education, as indeed in other fields within the limits of its own competence, the fulfilment of the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter.

119. This year, the Special Committee should similarly record that, throughout its consideration of economic conditions and the problems of economic development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, it took into account the relevant recommendations and the action taken by various organs of the United Nations and by the specialized agencies, and in particular FAO. The task of the Committee is to examine the information on Non-Self-Governing Territories with a view to the fulfilment of the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter, taking into account its own work programme and the general programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

120. The Special Committee emphasizes that the particular work undertaken through the Trusteeship Council in relation to conditions in the various Trust Territories has a close bearing on the Special Committee's general work concerning conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It expresses the hope that, with due regard to the different constitutional situations involved, its present report will prove of interest in the consideration of particular problems in the Trust Territories, just as the discussions in the Trusteeship Council and solutions reached for specific problems in the Trust Territories will be of interest in the general consideration of economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In particular, the Special Committee draws attention to the work being undertaken by the Committee on Rural Economic Development of the Trusteeship Council.

121. The Special Committee has already referred to a number of the recommendations made by the Economic and Social Council. There are two other resolutions which are of broader scope but also of interest to the work of the Special Committee.

122. By resolution 371 B (XIII), on full employment, the Economic and Social Council requested the Secretary-General to amend his questionnaire on full employment so as to take into consideration any special problems facing the under-developed countries. In this connexion, the Special Committee has noted that, in the past, information has in several instances been supplied in respect of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Special Committee urges that all available information on the subject should be transmitted by appropriate means.

123. The Special Committee also took account of resolution 367 B (XIII), concerning economic conditions in Africa. By this resolution, the Economic and Social Council noted that the Secretary-General's Review of the Economic Conditions in Africa<sup>6</sup> was based in part on information made available to the Special Committee. It recognized that the Trusteeship Council and the Special Committee provide opportunities within the United Nations for discussing the economic and social problems of the Territories of Africa. At the same time, the Council decided that the continued study and analysis of the economic problems of Africa by the Council would help in the task of raising both the level of economic activity and the standard of living in the area, as well as in strengthening the economic relations of these countries and Territories among themselves and with other countries of the world. The Special Committee would be interested in the studies undertaken as a consequence of this resolution. It also believes that the Economic and Social Council will continue to bear in mind the consideration by the Special Committee of problems of economic development and will take account of the terms of its present report.

124. Similar considerations apply to the work of the specialized agencies, and, in particular, of those agencies which are largely interested in economic conditions and development. Moreover, as has been already indicated, the Special Committee is interested in the work of the regional organizations for international co-operation, and expresses the hope that its own work will be valuable to them.

125. In conclusion, the Special Committee believes it desirable to re-emphasize that the attention paid this year to economic conditions and problems of economic development has been directed primarily to the improvement of the living conditions of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and to their economic, social and political progress. Material benefits to the advantage of only a limited group of peoples always breed discontent. If the advantage is to be found only outside the community concerned, such discontent will be bitter and justified. In the Non-Self-Governing Territories, it is the proud responsibility of the Administering Members to seek a broader natural basis for prosperity, creative initiative and contentment. In an attempt to assist them in this task, and in appreciation of the initiative of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Special Committee has drawn up this report.

Part Four

REPORT ON FACTORS WHICH SHOULD BE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT IN DECIDING WHETHER A TERRITORY IS OR IS NOT A TERRITORY WHOSE PEOPLE HAVE NOT YET ATTAINED A FULL MEASURE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT

I.

1. Resolution 334 (IV), adopted by the General Assembly on 2 December 1949, reads as follows :

“ The General Assembly,

“ Having regard to the obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter accepted by the Members which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government,

“ Having regard to resolution 66 (I), adopted by the General Assembly on 14 December 1946, in which seventy-four territories were enumerated, in accordance with the declarations of the responsible governments, as falling within the scope of Article 73 e,

“ Having noted the information supplied by certain Members concerning the constitutional changes which have led to the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e in respect of certain territories which were enumerated in resolution 66 (I),

“ 1. Considers that it is within the responsibility of the General Assembly to express its opinion on the principles which have guided or which may in future guide the Members concerned in enumerating the territories for which the obligation exists to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter ;

“ 2. Invites any special committee which the General Assembly may appoint on information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter to examine the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether any territory is or is not a territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government.”

II.

2. In 1950, the Secretary-General prepared a working paper for the Special Committee which was based on the Official Records of the United Nations and was intended to furnish a chronological summary of the points raised on the issues involved in the determination of a Non-Self-

Governing Territory from the San Francisco Conference to the fourth session of the General Assembly in 1949.<sup>1</sup>

3. In view of lack of time and the complexities of the problems involved, the Special Committee did not examine this problem in detail in 1950, but asked for the inclusion of the subject in the agenda of its 1951 session. The Secretary-General was requested, in addition to the information he had provided in 1950, to present any outstanding relevant material which might usefully increase the background information for the future consideration of the problem. Reference, in particular, was made to commentaries on the United Nations Charter published by acknowledged legal authorities.

4. Document A/AC.35/L.30, accordingly, consists of the documents prepared in 1950, with the addition of citations from the commentaries made by various experts on the interpretation of the Charter of the United Nations.

III.

5. The Special Committee held a general discussion on the examination of factors to be taken into account in deciding whether any Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government. At the conclusion of the general discussion, the Special Committee appointed a sub-committee to prepare a report for its consideration.

6. The Sub-Committee held four meetings and drew up a brief statement for the consideration of the Special Committee. The Committee approved this statement, with amendments, to form a part of its report to the General Assembly. The Committee also transmits to the Assembly document A/AC.35/L.30 and any addenda which may later be circulated.

IV.

7. Chapter XI of the Charter is not only a declaration of high principles ; it also enshrines certain obligations the importance of which has been recognized universally.

8. The inclusion of Chapter XI in the Charter requires that, in relation to it, all Members will respect the Charter as a whole, including the powers and functions of the United Nations organs and the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations. The Special Committee has approached the task assigned to it by the General Assembly with these considerations in mind.

V.

9. The term "Non-Self-Governing Territories" is defined in so far as Article 73 refers to peoples who have not yet attained a full measure of self-government. The Special Committee is not invited by the General Assembly to seek any more detailed definition. It does not consider that it would be possible to reach such a definition by general agreement, at least at the present stage. There is, however, general agreement that the phrase of fundamental importance in Chapter XI of the Charter as governing the territories covered by that Chapter is provided by the words "a full measure of self-government". In this connexion, it is appropriate to note that Article 76 of the Charter speaks of "self-government or independence" when referring to the basic objectives of the International Trusteeship System.

10. In the same spirit of seeking understanding rather than marking controversies, the Special Committee has not attempted to enter into the practical problem of who should determine whether a territory is or is not a Non-Self-Governing Territory.

VI.

11. The Special Committee is of the opinion that there are numerous elements which should be taken into consideration in reaching a decision whether or not a particular territory would come within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter. It does not consider that any single factor or any particular combination of factors can be regarded as prominent or decisive in every case, except that the will of the people of the Territory concerned, properly and freely expressed, would in all cases be the paramount factor in deciding whether a relationship between the Administering Authority and a Non-Self-Governing Territory has evolved to a stage where that Territory could be said to have "attained a full measure of self-government". The Committee wishes to stress its belief that such factors should be regarded as a guide to conclusions rather than determining such conclusions. It does not believe it necessary to attempt to give a relative importance to any one or more of the proposed factors, nor that a list drawn up at a given time can be regarded as embracing all the factors which might subsequently be relevant. The pattern of relationship is changing rapidly, and progress may be achieved in the direction of advance through self-government either to independence or to full participation in government in assimilation with the former Administering Authority or some other State. Different factors will apply in considering the status of Territories advancing along these different lines. Some of these factors exclude each other, the majority applying only in the case of self-government or independence, while others—such as the factors mentioned in section B 2 below—apply only in the case of association with or incorporation in the metropolitan country or another State. The Committee therefore holds that, if these factors are considered reasonable, their applicability and interpretation will be governed by the good faith and considered judgment of those responsible for applying them.<sup>2</sup>

12. Certain members expressed the following opinion and stated that their consideration of the factors set forth below was conditioned by that opinion: namely, that certain of the factors imply a degree of political evolution greater than that which may be necessary even for independence or for recognition in accordance with international law.

13. Other members maintained that the Special Committee had no competence to consider the ideas presented in the foregoing paragraph; and others that the opinions contained in that paragraph were immaterial to the question before the Committee.

VII.

14. The Special Committee confined itself to an examination of suggestions which had been made in the documents before it, in the Special Committee, and in the Sub-Committee. As a result, a number of factors have been listed below which should be taken into account in determining whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government. It must be stressed, however, that this list cannot be regarded as exhaustive.

A. General

(1) Geographical considerations: Does the Territory form an integral part of the metropolitan country? If not, to what extent are its relations with the metropolitan country affected by separation by land or sea or other natural obstacles?

<sup>2</sup> The following text to take the place of this paragraph was proposed by the delegations of Cuba, Egypt and the Philippines:

"The Special Committee is of the opinion that there are a number of elements which should be taken into consideration in order to lead to a decision on the applicability of Chapter XI of the Charter to any given territory. It does not consider that any one or any combination of these factors need be regarded as predominant or decisive in themselves, except that the will of the people of the territory concerned, properly and freely expressed, would in all cases be the paramount factor in deciding whether a relationship between the Administering Authority and a Non-Self-Governing Territory has evolved to a stage where that Territory could be said to have 'attained a full measure of self-government'. The applicability and interpretation of the factors will be governed by the good faith and considered judgment of those responsible for such action."

(2) Constitutional matters: Is the Territory an integral part of the metropolitan country or of another State, by virtue (a) of the latter's constitution or (b) of a treaty or bilateral agreement affecting the status of the Territory?

(3) Ethnic and cultural considerations: To what extent are the peoples of the Territory of different race, language or religion, or have a distinct cultural heritage, interests or aspirations, distinguishing them from the peoples of the metropolitan country?

(4) Opinion of the population: Is it the opinion of the population of the Territory, freely expressed by informed and democratic process, that they have attained a full measure of self-government?

B. Status

(1) Independence or eligibility for membership of the United Nations: Has the Territory been granted independence or reached such a stage in its development as to be considered eligible for membership of the United Nations?

(2) Association with the metropolitan country: Is the association with the metropolitan country a result of the freely expressed will of the people of the Territory?

Is sovereignty vested in the metropolitan country or in a legal entity established as a result of the association with the metropolitan country?

Are the inhabitants of the Territory represented without discrimination in the metropolitan legislature on the same basis—e.g., by universal adult suffrage, by equality of representation—as the inhabitants of the metropolitan country?

Do the inhabitants of the Territory possess metropolitan citizenship without discrimination?

Does the association with the metropolitan country accord the inhabitants and local bodies of the Territory the same rights and the same status as the inhabitants and local bodies of the metropolitan country?

Are the officials in the Territory appointed or elected on the same basis as those in the metropolitan country?

C. Internal Self-government

(1) Territorial government: To what extent is the internal government of the Territory (legislature, executive, judiciary) under the control of the metropolitan country?

(2) Suffrage: Is there universal and equal suffrage? Are the elections direct, periodic and by secret ballot? Is there freedom of choice of electoral candidates?

(3) Territorial fiscal, budgetary and tariff control: Are the Territorial fiscal policies, taxes, customs duties and budget approved under Territorial control or on the same basis as in the metropolitan country?

(4) Chief executive: Is the chief executive appointed by the metropolitan country or chosen by processes in the Territory? In the former case, what is the extent of his powers in the administrative and financial field as well as in legislative or judiciary matters; what are the composition, types and powers of the council or councils which assist him?

(5) Legislature: What are the composition and powers of the Territorial legislature?

(6) Judiciary: Are there available in the Territory appellate jurisdictions equivalent to those available in the metropolitan country or are they the same as in the metropolitan country? Are there guarantees of the independence of the judiciary?

(7) Military service: Is liability to military service determined by the Territorial authorities?

(8) Principal officers: Are the chiefs of the permanent executive departments of the government appointed by the metropolitan country or appointed or elected by the Territory? To what extent are the higher ranks in the administrative services of the government filled by the indigenous inhabitants of the Territory?

D. Other Internal Conditions

(1) General development: Is the stage of economic, social and educational development of the peoples of the Territory such as to permit them to exercise effectively their powers of self-government?

(2) Trade unions: What is the degree of freedom from external control enjoyed by the Territorial trade unions?

E. International Co-operation

(1) Participation in international relations: Has the Territory the power to enter into direct relations with other countries or with international institutions? Is it entitled to negotiate, sign and ratify international conventions?

(2) Membership of international organizations: Of which international organizations is the Territory a member or an associate member? Is representation assured by delegates appointed or selected by the metropolitan country or by the Territorial government?

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

I. Constitution of the Committee

1. The General Assembly, by resolution 332 (IV) adopted on 2 December 1949 during the fourth session, constituted a Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories for a three-year period to examine the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies.

2. The terms of reference of the Committee are set forth in the resolution as follows:

"... to examine, in the spirit of paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 1 and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories".

3. The Committee consisted of sixteen Members, comprising the eight Members transmitting information and an equal number of other Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly. The following was the membership of the Committee in 1952:

Members transmitting information	Elected Members
Australia	Brazil
Belgium	Cuba
Denmark	Ecuador
France	Egypt
Netherlands	India
New Zealand	Indonesia
United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland	Pakistan
United States of America	Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

4. The Committee met in New York, and held twenty-one meetings from 11 September to 7 October 1952.

5. The representatives of the following specialized agencies took part in the discussions of the Committee: International Labour Organisation (ILO); Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO); United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO); World Health Organization (WHO).

II. Officers

6. The officers elected by the Committee were:
Mr. Muhammad Asad (Pakistan), Chairman,
Dr. Carlos Blanco (Cuba), Vice-Chairman,
Mr. T. P. Davin (New Zealand), Rapporteur.

III. Sub-Committee

7. A Sub-Committee was appointed at the fifty-eighth meeting of the Committee to prepare a special report on basic social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was composed of the representatives of Egypt, France, India, Indonesia, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. The representative of India, Mr. Shiva Rao, was elected Chairman of the Sub-Committee. The Rapporteur of the Committee as well as the representatives of ILO, WHO and UNESCO also participated in the work of the Sub-Committee.

IV. Agenda

8. The agenda as adopted by the Committee, together with reference to the relevant documents and summary records of the discussions of each item, is set out in annex I.

V. Economic conditions

9. The General Assembly, in resolution 564 (VI) of 18 January 1952, approved the special report of the Committee, prepared in 1951 as a brief but considered indication of economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the problems of economic development, and invited the Secretary-General to communicate the report for their consideration to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned.

10. In the light of the above, the Committee had for its consideration questions arising out of the special report on economic conditions and development as well as statistical summaries of agricultural and industrial production prepared by the Secretary-General. Studies on other economic aspects were not laid before the Committee in view of the intention to pay special attention at the present session to social conditions, on which numerous studies had been prepared.

11. The Committee discussed this item of its agenda from its fifty-third to its fifty-fifth meeting. Following preliminary observations by the representative of India on the growing value of the Committee's work in general and of its special reports in particular, which he held should be made available to administrative officers in the Territories, the representative of FAO gave a brief review of the work programme of his organization as it applied to Non-Self-Governing Territories.

12. In the course of subsequent discussions the representatives of Egypt, India, Indonesia and Pakistan, supported by those of Brazil and Ecuador, emphasized that the Committee should be informed by the Administering Members of the action taken and progress achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the light of General Assembly resolutions and the recommendations in the special reports of the Committee. It was pointed out that such information could be appropriately conveyed under section C of the explanatory preface of the revised Standard Form which invited Administering Members to provide a survey of the principles and practical measures showing general trends in the Territories concerned. It would be principally through such information that appraisal could be made of the extent to which the principles of Article 73 were being followed especially in regard to the paramountcy of the interests of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories and of their progress towards self-government.

13. In their replies, the representatives of Australia, France, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States of America reaffirmed that the policies and practices of their Governments in administering their dependent territories were based on the principles contained in Article 73 of the Charter. It was asserted, however, that the administration of the Non-Self-Governing Territories was the responsibility solely of the Administering Members. The recommendations contained in General Assembly resolutions and the general principles enunciated in the special reports of the Committee could serve as useful guides to possible solutions for particular problems. The progress achieved in the functional fields and the extent to which account was taken of such resolutions and recommendations were reflected in the information transmitted regularly under Article 73 e of the Charter.

14. The representative of New Zealand stated that the 1950 special report on education<sup>1</sup> and the 1951 special report on economic conditions and problems of development<sup>2</sup> had been transmitted to the proper authorities, who had studied them thoroughly. In his reply to the criticisms made regarding action taken on the special reports, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that, while the special report on education had been submitted, in the first place, to the Advisory Committee on Education in the Colonies, no such central body of experts existed to advise the Secretary of State for the Colonies on economic matters. The special report on economic conditions and problems of development had, therefore, been sent direct to all Territorial governments with a request to take it into consideration in framing their economic policies, in agreement with the legislative authorities concerned.

15. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that the Committee should consider whether or not the Administering Members were fulfilling their obligations under the Charter towards the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories whose interests they had accepted as paramount. Although the information transmitted was inadequate, the facts led to the inevitable conclusion that conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories were highly unsatisfactory and characterized by economic exploitation, racial discrimination, low standards of living and lack of health and educational facilities. He criticized the fiscal and trade policies of the Administering Members and cited figures from official information transmitted relating, in particular, to Malaya, Sarawak, North Borneo, the Gold Coast, Kenya and the Belgian Congo in support of his contention that the wealth of these Territories was being drained for the benefit of the metropolitan countries. He stated that the obligations assumed by the Administering Members were not being fulfilled, and associated himself with the view that the Committee should know what steps had been taken to implement the Charter provisions as well as the Assembly resolutions and the recommendations contained in the special reports of the Committee.

16. In replying to these statements, the representative of the United States of America pointed out that they were evidently not in agreement with the views of the majority of the Committee. Indeed, the divergence was clearly brought out in the Committee's report on economic conditions and problems of development, which noted in paragraph 25 that, "... at a time when many of the metropolitan countries are faced with particularly grave economic and financial problems, their taxpayers have contributed to the progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories". The representatives of France and of the United Kingdom also stated that the charges made by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics were unfounded and based on arbitrarily selected data.

17. Information was requested by the representatives of Egypt, India and Indonesia on several aspects of economic development as shown by the general policies of the metropolitan countries and in the internal conditions of some of the Territories. The representative of Egypt asked whether there were not indications that the economic development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories had suffered as a result of defence programmes and of currency policies. The representative of Indonesia thought it difficult to judge how far economic progress had really bettered the position of the indigenous inhabitants and felt that more information was required on the participation of the peoples of the Territories in new economic enterprises. The representative of India considered it important to note the disequilibrium which had resulted in certain Non-Self-Governing Territories from restrictions on imports from areas other than the sterling area. In reply, the Administering Members gave further details of economic progress made in their Territories; some Members provided information showing that contrary to the allegations that the Non-Self-Governing Territories had been exploited by the metropolitan governments, substantial economic assistance had been provided. Moreover, the Committee, in its report on economic conditions, had recognized that "By various means, considerable sums of money have been made available to the Non-Self-Governing Territories through a policy of planned investment—i.e., by direct grants from metropolitan countries, by loans on the local, metropolitan or international market or by other forms of controlled investment".

18. In reply to questions from the representatives of India and Indonesia as to the effects on Non-Self-Governing Territories of measures taken by the United Kingdom to strengthen its balance of payments, the representative of the United Kingdom explained that members of the Commonwealth and other independent countries belonged to the sterling area voluntarily with full recognition of the advantages and disadvantages involved. The financial controls and restrictive measures in force in some of the Territories under United Kingdom administration had been adopted by the Territorial Governments concerned and not imposed by the United Kingdom.

19. In the course of the discussions, the representative of India suggested several other economic topics which he considered could serve as subjects for study in the future work of the Committee.

VI. Social conditions

20. General Assembly resolution 333 (IV) of 2 December 1949 contains, in the second paragraph of its preamble, the consideration that "... the value of the work of the Committee would be enhanced if, without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, special attention were given to one field each year".

21. Thus, at its first and second sessions, the Committee had paid special attention to education and to economic conditions and problems of development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories respectively. At its session in 1951, the Committee had decided that at its third session special attention would be devoted to basic social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, without prejudice to the consideration of the other two functional fields. It had further agreed on a list of topics which would form the basis of discussion within that general study.

22. Following approval by the General Assembly (resolution 565 (VI) of 18 January 1952) of the arrangements proposed by the Committee for its work in 1952, the Secretary-General had prepared analyses of information on the various aspects of social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Documents dealing with subjects within their respective fields were also submitted by ILO and WHO.

23. Following the precedent set at previous sessions of the Committee, advisers on social affairs, including public health, were attached to the delegations of Denmark, Egypt, France, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

24. The Committee discussed the item of its agenda entitled "Basic social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories" from its fifty-fifth to its sixty-third meetings. Statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Cuba, Denmark, Egypt, France, India, Indonesia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Pakistan, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

25. The debate provided an opportunity for a general review of basic social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the policies and programmes followed by the Administering Members and also for a more detailed discussion of the problems of race relations and other aspects of human rights in the Territories, public health, community, family and child welfare, migrant labour and general labour conditions and policies and standards of living.

26. In the course of the general debate, it was agreed that the purpose of the development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories was the advancement of the peoples of those Territories and that this problem could only be effectively solved with the full participation and co-operation of the peoples at all levels. Attention was drawn to the recent trend towards the emphasis of creative and preventive social programmes and towards the formulation of integrated social policies. The interdependence of economic development and social progress was stressed and it was pointed out that while economic development itself brings new problems of a social character it was not possible to finance social services without the development of the territorial resources and, in particular, increased agricultural production.

27. Some representatives expressed the view that many Territories, through no fault of their own, could not afford the social services they needed and that it was just such Territories which stood in greater need of outside financial and technical assistance. It was recognized that such assistance was, in fact, being afforded to many of their Territories by the metropolitan countries concerned. The representative of Egypt, while appreciating the efforts made by the Administering Members, expressed the view that opinions differed as to whether such efforts are sufficient or whether they are not counterbalanced by the advantages which are derived from the Territories. The Committee concluded its discussion of this subject with expressions of hope that increased international assistance would be made available to help the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to achieve a higher standard of living.

28. A number of criticisms were expressed or questions asked by the representatives of Brazil, Cuba, Egypt, India, Indonesia and Pakistan concerning specific problems in some of the Territories. Replies were made by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, France, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

29. Following the procedures of previous sessions of the Committee, a Sub-Committee was established at the fifty-eighth meeting with broad terms of reference in order to prepare a special report on social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories for the consideration of the full Committee. The membership of this Sub-Committee has been given above in paragraph 7.

30. The Sub-Committee's report was discussed by the Committee at its sixty-ninth and seventieth meetings. Before the report was examined in detail, general statements were made by the representatives of India, the United Kingdom, the United States of America, France and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

31. The representative of France, supporting views expressed by the representatives of India, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, considered that the report represented considerable work on the part of the Sub-Committee. But, in his opinion, the report failed to reflect adequately many of the points of view expressed during the previous discussions in the Committee. In particular, he wished to stress again that the problem of racial discrimination was of a world-wide nature and should not be treated in its restricted relationship to Non-Self-Governing Territories. His Government was willing to accept the study of human rights only when carried out by the competent bodies of the United Nations. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics criticized in detail the whole trend of the report as not representing an accurate picture of the social conditions existing in the Territories. He quoted instances from the report in support of his criticisms.

32. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics pointed out that social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories were unsatisfactory, that the policy of the Administering Authorities in social and other matters was subordinated, not to the interests of the indigenous population of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, but to the political and economic interests of the metropolitan countries. The indigenous population was not only mercilessly exploited, but was subjected to various kinds of restrictions and discrimination in political, economic and other matters and also in respect of health and education. Public health was in a bad state, and consequently there was an enormous incidence of sickness and epidemic disease in the Territories and a high death rate, particularly among children.

33. The representative of the United States of America, referring to certain critical references by the representative of the USSR to health conditions in Hawaii, pointed out that health was not a major problem in that Territory. On the contrary, the infant mortality rate of 23.8 per thousand and the death rate of only 6 per thousand, compared very favorably, as he was sure the representatives of WHO would agree, with the situation in other countries. He also drew attention to the fact that there were 570 doctors in Hawaii, representing an increase of 142 since 1949, and 1,728 nurses for a population of 470,000.

34. In the course of the Committee's detailed examination of the report a few minor amendments were made to the text. An amendment proposed by the representative of the United Kingdom was to insert, before the last sentence of paragraph 30 of the report, the following sentence: "At the same time care must be taken that such legislation is not so far in advance of public opinion as to be unenforceable and thus bring the law itself into disrepute". After discussion, the representative of the United Kingdom withdrew this proposal in a spirit of conciliation.

35. The Committee approved the report, as amended, by 11 votes to 1, with two abstentions. The approved text constitutes part two of the present report to the General Assembly.

36. Following the approval of the report, a joint draft resolution was proposed by the representatives of India and New Zealand, in which the General Assembly would approve the report on social conditions and would invite the Secretary-General to communicate it to the Administering Members, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council, and to the specialized agencies concerned. The draft resolution was adopted by 13 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions. The text is set forth in annex II (draft resolution A).

VII. Racial discrimination

37. A joint draft resolution on the subject of racial discrimination was proposed by the representatives of Egypt, India, Indonesia and Pakistan. In submitting their draft resolution, the sponsors stated that in the light of the provisions in the Charter the Committee should mark its recognition of the importance of the problem of race relations. The draft resolution would give formal expression to the views of the Committee as recorded in the report on social conditions.

38. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics submitted two amendments to that draft resolution, and said that, in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, racial discrimination against the indigenous population was extremely widespread in political, economic, social, educational and other matters. The Administering Powers had not only failed to secure the participation of members of the indigenous population in the government of the Territories but were creating difficulties to impede the appointment of indigenous inhabitants to positions in the organs of administration. The most repulsive form of racial discrimination — racial segregation — was widely practised in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In many of them there were "ghettos" and "reservations" for the indigenous inhabitants. There was racial discrimination against the indigenous population in other matters, too — in matters of health, education, criminal law, the penitentiary system, etc. In many Non-Self-Governing Territories, corporal punishment was applied to the indigenous inhabitants. A number of the members of the Committee were unable to accept the views expressed by the Soviet representative on these matters.

39. Speaking against adoption of the draft resolution, the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom said that there was no need for formal action by the Committee since this would result in duplicating its views on the subject of racial discrimination which had already been adequately expressed in the report on social conditions. Such a resolution would have the disadvantage of concentrating attention on a problem which was of worldwide significance and which was not related to Non-Self-Governing Territories only. Moreover, the problem was at present under consideration by other organs of the United Nations. The representative of Belgium added that his Government considered the question of race relations touching the field of political questions was a matter within its domestic jurisdiction; he would accordingly abstain from taking part in the discussion of the draft resolution as well as in the voting.

40. The amendments and voting on the joint draft resolution were as follows:

Paragraph 1 of the preamble: adopted by 14 votes to none, with no abstentions.

Paragraph 2 of the preamble: adopted by 11 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions.

Paragraph 3 of the preamble: The representative of the United Kingdom proposed that paragraph 3 should indicate that the expression "the inhabitants" in Article 73 of the Charter referred to all the inhabitants as defined in paragraph 8 of the special report on social conditions. He therefore suggested that paragraph 3 should be amended by the substitution of the words "the indigenous" by "sections of the" before the word "inhabitants". This amendment was rejected by 5 votes to 3, with 7 abstentions. The original text as proposed was adopted by 11 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

Paragraph 1 of the operative part: The text as proposed was adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

Paragraph 2 of the operative part: The representative of the United Kingdom proposed the deletion of the word "all" in the last line but one and the substitution in its place of the word "any" before the words "discriminatory provisions or practices". This amendment was adopted by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. The revised text was adopted by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

Paragraph 3 of the operative part: The representative of Denmark proposed that, in view of paragraphs 1, 2 and 5, the words "where laws are in existence" should be substituted for the word "laws" and the word "these" inserted before the words "should similarly be examined". This amendment, and the paragraph as amended, were each adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

Paragraph 4 of the operative part: This paragraph was adopted by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention. In explanation of his abstention, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government was in favour of the principle involved but that its immediate application would encounter certain practical difficulties.

Paragraph 5 of the operative part: The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics proposed to insert after the word "population" the words "they should not be used to camouflage racial discrimination and". This amendment was rejected by 9 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions. The original text was adopted by 11 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

Paragraph 6 of the operative part: This paragraph read "Recommends that the constitutions or organic laws of any Territory be amended to the effect that the principle of non-discrimination should be embodied in the revised text:". The vote on this paragraph was 6 votes in favour, 7 against and 2 abstentions. The paragraph was accordingly deleted.

Paragraph 7 of the operative part of the text (now paragraph 6): The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics proposed that the word "commends" should be replaced by the words "recommends to the Administering Members to take". The amendment was rejected by 8 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions. The original text of the paragraph was adopted by 15 votes to none, with no abstentions.

41. A roll call vote was requested on the draft resolution as a whole, as amended. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Brazil, Cuba, Denmark, Ecuador, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Netherlands, New Zealand, Pakistan, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

Against: None.

Abstaining: Australia, France.

42. The draft resolution was accordingly adopted by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions. The text as adopted is set out in annex II (draft resolution B).

43. Explanations of their votes were given by the representatives of Australia, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. The representative of Australia stated that, while fully supporting the principles enunciated against racial discrimination, he had abstained from voting because he considered the resolution duplicated what was already set out in the report on social conditions; the problem of racial discrimination was not confined to the Non-Self-Governing Territories; the whole question was under study by other United Nations organs and, lastly, it was not proper for this Committee to recommend to Member States the examination of their legislation with a view to its alteration. The representative of the Netherlands stated that, while he had voted for the resolution, he associated himself with the remarks made by the representative of Australia and regretted the adoption of the resolution as it weakened the effect of the report on social conditions. The representative of the United Kingdom had voted for the resolution but without prejudice to the position of his Government, as stated on 18 August 1950, with regard to the competence of the Committee and without prejudice to the proposal of further amendments by the United Kingdom delegation to the General Assembly.

VIII. Educational conditions

44. At the forty-second meeting, held during its second session, the Committee had expressed the desire that further discussion of the progress achieved in the field of education in Non-Self-Governing Territories should take place at its third session in 1952.

45. Accordingly, the Committee had before it a summary of information concerning education prepared by the Secretary-General and any questions arising out of the special report on education approved by the General Assembly in 1950, as well as reports submitted by UNESCO on the use of indigenous or national languages and on measures for eradicating illiteracy.

46. In discussing the use of vernacular languages, the representative of Egypt, at the sixty-third meeting, expressed disappointment that the report of UNESCO paid chief attention to problems arising in cases where a vernacular was not highly developed or widely used. He referred to the statement in the report that "If the mother tongue is adequate in all respects to serve as the vehicle of university and higher education it should be so used", and urged that more regard should be paid to this recommendation. In particular, he made a strong appeal to the French Government to give more emphasis to the teaching and use of Arabic as a medium of instruction in the educational system of Morocco and Tunisia.

47. The representative of France assured the Committee that Arabic was being fostered in French North Africa and stated that his Government encouraged the use of the vernacular wherever it was sufficiently developed. The use of the vernacular for school instruction, however, could not be made a general rule applicable to all Territories irrespective of the circumstances prevailing in each Territory. The representatives of the United Kingdom and the Netherlands supported this view and gave examples from their Territories showing the difficulties experienced in the use of vernacular languages in multi-lingual areas.

48. The representative of India said that no general rule regarding the use of vernacular languages in education could be presented without qualification to take into account local factors and that in some specific instances, as, for example, in the present transitional period in India, the use of a lingua franca might have certain advantages. But he agreed that the tendency was in favour of the fuller use of the national language of the people. He pointed out that over and above eradicating illiteracy it was necessary to prevent the lapse into illiteracy. For this purpose it was essential that adequate and suitable follow-up material should be provided. He emphasized that the essence of education was an awakening of the mind and cited experience in his own country, where general elections had provided an impetus to the desire for literacy. He inquired of the representative of UNESCO whether it could be confirmed that social and political development as well as the contents of teaching material had the effect of stimulating interest in education. He noted with appreciation the progress made in various aspects of education and drew the attention of the Committee to the importance of educating women and girls and to the wide differences existing between the percentages of enrolment of school-aged children of different ethnic groups in various territories. He deplored the fact that the achievement of universal primary education was in one instance made conditional on the ability of the Native Authorities to finance it.

49. The representative of the United Kingdom, commenting on an observation by the representative of India on the need to provide free and compulsory education, stated that this was the ideal aimed at in the educational policy of Territories under the administration of his Government. He instanced, however, the many difficulties that had to be overcome before this ideal could be achieved. Turning to the UNESCO report, prepared by its Committee of Experts on the Standardization of Education Statistics, in which an attempt had also been made to define literacy, he pointed out that his Government, while agreeing in general with much of its findings, could do no more than recommend to governments the international standards for their guidance in preparation of their statistics. As regards the provision of education, resolution 32, adopted by UNESCO at its 14th General Conference, recognized that financial aspects had to be taken into consideration. In the Territories under United Kingdom administration, the per capita expenditure alone was not a sufficient criterion of the advancement made. Much educational progress had been due to contributions made by the missions and by the different ethnic communities in the Territories concerned. It was the policy of the United Kingdom Government to develop in its dependent Territories the whole educational system rather than one particular aspect and to give due regard to the traditions of the local inhabitants. He agreed with the representative of India on the importance of preventing a lapse into illiteracy of those who had received a modicum of education. To this end, literature bureaux had been set up in East and Central Africa to publish books, both for use in schools and for reading, in vernacular languages, as well as to encourage the talents of local authors. Education in Africa had recently been the subject of study of two missions and the main lines of policy laid down ten years ago had come under re-examination. A conference was being held in the United Kingdom to consider the matter further and the report of the Conference, he felt, would no doubt be of interest to the members of the Committee.

50. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics observed that the Administering Authorities were not fulfilling their obligations in matters of education and that, consequently, there was mass illiteracy among the indigenous population. In support of his views, he quoted extensive data drawn from the information transmitted by Administering Members.

51. The representative of UNESCO replied to various points raised during the discussions and, in particular, to those raised by the representative of India. He confirmed the importance of the contents of teaching material and cited instances to show that whenever living conditions had been improved the desire for education was stimulated. Referring to some of the difficulties experienced by the Administering Members in promoting education in their dependent Territories, he emphasized that education did not consist only of learning to read and write. He indicated the importance of the spoken word and recommended the wider use of audio-visual teaching media. With regard to the material difficulties encountered, he cited examples of low-cost school buildings he had seen in certain underdeveloped countries which might be adopted in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Experience had shown that at least four years of instruction were necessary for the retention of permanent literacy, and he agreed as to the importance of providing follow-up material. In general, he did not feel that there were any insurmountable obstacles which would prevent any vernacular from being adopted as a medium of instruction.

IX. International collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, including information on technical assistance accorded to Non-Self-Governing Territories

52. In resolution 445 (V), the General Assembly confirmed "its recognition of the importance of international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories as expressed in resolution 331 (IV)", and invited the specialized agencies to communicate annually to the United Nations information on the progress of work undertaken by them which would be of service in Non-Self-Governing Territories. In resolution 444 (V), the Administering Members needing technical assistance for the economic, social and educational advancement of their Non-Self-Governing Territories were invited to submit their requests, and also to include in the information transmitted by them a report on the manner in which technical assistance received from the United Nations and the specialized agencies had been integrated into long-range development programmes in the Territories. Furthermore, the General Assembly, in resolution 336 (IV), requested "the Secretary-General to keep the Special Committee informed of the nature of the technical assistance which is accorded from time to time to Non-Self-Governing Territories by specialized international bodies".

53. In the light of the above, the Secretary-General had prepared documents setting out details of international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions and of technical assistance accorded to Non-Self-Governing Territories by the United Nations and the specialized agencies, while memoranda concerning activities in their respective fields of interest to Non-Self-Governing Territories were submitted by WHO and UNESCO.

54. The Committee discussed these questions as a specific item on its agenda at its sixty-fourth and sixty-fifth meetings. In addition, points relating to international collaboration and technical assistance were made during the Committee's other discussions on economic, social and educational conditions.

55. The representative of Indonesia stressed the importance which the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council had attached to the provision of technical assistance to Non-Self-Governing Territories. He questioned whether full advantage had yet been taken of existing possibilities. He recognized the value of the provision of fellowships and scholarships, but urged also that the necessary measures should be taken to send to the Territories international experts capable of demonstrating on the spot methods suited to the development of the Territories. He also commended the growing practice of providing for the attendance of representatives of the Non-Self-Governing Territories at regional seminars.

56. In these views he was supported by the representatives of Egypt and of India.

57. The representative of India also drew attention to the importance of close working collaboration between the United Nations and the inter-governmental regional commissions. Recognizing that these commissions had no organic connexion with the United Nations, he stressed that provision was made in their constitutions for co-operation with the United Nations. The presence of observers from the specialized agencies at meetings convened by the regional commissions, although useful, hardly represented a wide measure of co-operation. The technical conferences held among experts of the Administering Members were in accordance with Article 73 d of the Charter but there was an obligation on the Committee to stress the importance of another aspect of international collaboration, namely, between the United Nations and its specialized agencies on the one hand and the metropolitan countries and their dependent territories on the other. It was also important that, where United Nations fellowships and scholarships had been granted, due care should be taken to assure that the knowledge gained would benefit the local populations.

58. Statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Belgium, France, the United Kingdom, and the United States of America as to the positions taken by their Governments in regard to technical assistance from the United Nations and its specialized agencies and the point was made that such assistance was available on a relatively modest scale and should be viewed in the total perspective of the greater technical facilities of the Administering Members which were made available to the Territories and of the other programmes of technical assistance of a regional or bilateral character. The United Nations had emphasized the need of experts to be briefed on local conditions and, in their opinion, this was where persons already serving in the Territories had advantage over international experts. They assured the Committee that there had been no reluctance on their part to apply for such assistance, and gave details of the assistance received under the regular and expanded programmes of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies. Particular reference was made by representatives of some of the Administering Members to the participation of inhabitants of the various Territories in the programme of United Nations fellowships and scholarships and of the value of this programme to the individuals concerned and to the Territories.

59. The representative of Belgium stated that technical assistance provided by United Nations bodies was but a small part of the total received by the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He cited figures to show how total expenditures of United Nations technical assistance compared with expenditures from Belgian and Belgian Congo sources. Thus, the Belgian Congo received more technical assistance than many independent countries could afford. In order that a general view of the problem might be obtained, the Secretary-General should be asked by the Committee to draw up a list of all types of assistance given to these Territories from all sources, for example, by the Administering Members, by regional organizations and by the United States plan known as the Point Four Programme.

60. The representative of Australia described the functions of the South Pacific Commission and the work undertaken by it, while the representative of the United Kingdom commented on the organization and work of the Caribbean Commission and the Commission for Co-operation in Technical Matters in Africa South of the Sahara as well as the purposes and achievements of the Colombo plan for South and Southeast Asia. They pointed out that the regional commissions were essentially consultative and advisory bodies established by the Administering Members in the various regions to assist them in carrying out their international responsibilities.

61. Various forms of national technical assistance accorded to the Territories under their administration were illustrated by the representatives of Australia, the United Kingdom and the United States of America. The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that the picture of technical assistance to Non-Self-Governing Territories was very incomplete without the inclusion of national technical assistance. The representative of the United States of America instanced as a noteworthy development the cases in which technical assistance was being promoted within some Non-Self-Governing Territories for the benefit of other territories and countries, making a particular reference in this regard to Puerto Rico.

62. The representative of the United Kingdom also referred to the part played by the Overseas Territories Committee of the Organization for European Economic Co-operation and its sub-committees in stimulating technical co-operation for economic development in dependent territories. He emphasized that the United Kingdom encouraged the participation of local inhabitants, and expressed appreciation of the United States Point Four Programme.

X. The Secretary-General's summaries and analyses of information

63. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 218 (III), full summaries of the information transmitted during 1952 had been prepared by the Secretary-General. In the majority of cases the information had been prepared on the basis of the Standard Form as revised in 1951; in other cases it was indicated that the time element had prevented the use of the revised Form for this year.

64. The Committee discussed this item of its agenda at its sixty-sixth meeting.

65. Arising from the fact that information had been transmitted by the Netherlands on Netherlands New Guinea (Irian), formal reservations on behalf of their respective Governments regarding sovereignty over this Territory were made by the representatives of Indonesia and the Netherlands. After the Chairman had stated that the question of sovereignty was outside the competence of the Committee, he, as the representative of Pakistan, expressed the hope that the differences existing between the two Governments in question would be settled by negotiation in an amicable manner. The representatives of India, Egypt, the United Kingdom and Ecuador associated themselves with this expression of hope and good wishes.

66. During the discussion of the agenda item, opinions were expressed regarding the interpretation of Article 73 of the Charter in general and of the obligations set out in sub-paragraph e of that Article in particular: the competence of the General Assembly to decide as to the Territories on which information should be transmitted and the treatment such information should be accorded by the Committee.

67. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics pointed out that Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations placed extensive obligations upon countries responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The list of Territories in respect of which the Administering Powers were under obligation to submit information had been confirmed by the General Assembly at its first session. That list therefore could be changed only by the General Assembly, and the Administering Powers were not entitled unilaterally to decide the question whether information should or should not be submitted in respect of those Territories. Furthermore, such information must be examined, and conclusions and recommendations with regard to those Territories could be submitted to the General Assembly. He repeated that the information transmitted was inadequate, especially in regard to budgets, revenues and expenditures, and criticized the delay in transmitting information on certain Territories, such as Alaska; he also observed that the Netherlands Government was violating its obligations by failing to submit information on Surinam and Curaçao. The representative of Egypt agreed that an Administering Member had not the right to decide unilaterally as to the Territories on which information should or should not be transmitted.

68. In statements expressing opinions opposed to those voiced by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom asserted that decisions as to the Territories on which information should be transmitted rested solely with the Administering Members concerned; that General Assembly resolution 66 (I) merely listed the Non-Self-Governing Territories as enumerated by the Administering Members; that the information transmitted was, in the words of Article 73 e of the Charter, transmitted "for information purposes" and that the Committee could make substantive recommendations relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories. In addition, the representative of Belgium stated that Belgium had accepted as a sacred trust the obligation to promote the economic, social and educational progress of the peoples under its administration and had exerted every effort to fulfil its trust faithfully. The same responsibility fell upon all States administering populations which had not attained the same degree of civilization as themselves, whether in overseas territories or within their continental frontiers.

69. The representative of Ecuador reserved the position of his delegation on the scope and contents of Chapter XI of the Charter and of Article 73 e in particular, and especially on the question of Non-Self-Governing Territories lying within the continent of America.

XI. Future of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories

70. Paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 332 (IV), which constituted the present Committee, provided that "the General Assembly will . . . examine in 1952 the question whether the Special Committee should be renewed for a further period, together with the questions of the composition and terms of reference of any such future Special Committee".

71. The Committee discussed at its sixty-seventh and sixty-eighth meetings, the question of the future of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. In general, four views were expressed; the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom were not in favour of the renewal of the Committee in its present form. The representatives of Brazil, Ecuador, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Pakistan, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics supported the principal of establishing the Committee on a permanent basis. The representative of the United States of America, supported by Denmark, Australia, and the Netherlands, proposed the continuation of the Committee for a further three-year period, while the representative of Cuba, supported by the representative of Ecuador, should the Committee not be established on a permanent basis, favoured continuation for a four-year term.

72. The representative of Belgium felt that, resulting from the present composition of the Committee and from the special angle from which technical problems of a general character, such as migrant labour, malaria, locusts were considered, the Committee's work was useless and sterile. Members of the Committee were not experts in all fields; such experts sat in international conferences convened for the most part by the Administering Members themselves. The fact that the Committee had not been given the right to make comparisons with conditions in independent countries faced with similar problems was seriously jeopardizing the value of its conclusions. The representative of Belgium felt that the discussions should take place in some other body to which experts from Member States with common problems should be convened.

73. The representative of the United Kingdom referred to the previous declarations made on behalf of his Government concerning the lack of constitutional provision in the Charter for the creation of the present Committee particularly as the information transmitted under Article 73 e was supplied for information purposes. He stated that the legal responsibilities of the United Nations were discharged when the Secretary-General had received the statistical and other technical information submitted by the Administering Members.

Although the United Kingdom had in the past years collaborated in the technical discussions in the Committee, he did not consider that these discussions had brought results which, even if the constitutional objections were set aside, justified the renewal of the Committee.

74. The representative of France pointed out that his Government had participated in the Committee to the best of its ability in a spirit of goodwill and faith in international co-operation, but the harmonious atmosphere which had prevailed at previous sessions of the Committee had broken down at the present session. In measuring facts against idealistic standards, the Committee was getting away from reality. His delegation had no alternative but to vote against the renewal of the Committee and to reserve the position of his Government.

75. In support of the view that the Committee should be established on a permanent basis, the representatives of the non-Administering Members stressed the obligations and moral accountability of the Administering Members. The representative of India reviewed the origins of the Committee dating back to resolution 9 (I) of 1946 in which the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to include in his annual report on the work of the Organization, as provided for in Article 98 of the Charter, summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. Seeking to deal with the information so transmitted, the General Assembly had set up an Ad Hoc Committee. In subsequent years, not only had this machinery been re-established but additional special responsibilities had been assigned to the Committee relating to technical assistance, human rights, factors to be taken into account in deciding whether or not a territory is self-governing and cessation of information. The Committee not only served a useful purpose but had made some valuable contributions. As long as Non-Self-Governing Territories existed and the Charter of the United Nations and the resolutions of the General Assembly remained in force, some machinery was needed to assist the General Assembly in discharging its responsibilities towards the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

76. The Committee as composed at present not only had the advantage of saving the time spent on discussion in the General Assembly and its Fourth Committee but its members had now become familiar with the work, and a proper atmosphere had been established and maintained. The inspiration that the millions of peoples from Non-Self-Governing Territories had found in the Charter of the United Nations made it impossible to do away with the Committee without grave and adverse psychological repercussions. The Committee had a responsibility towards the peoples in the Non-Self-Governing Territories which no specialized agency or any other organ of the United Nations could fulfil.

77. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in analysing relevant provisions of the Charter concluded that since the Administering Members had accepted obligations toward the Non-Self-Governing Territories the General Assembly had to ascertain to what extent these obligations had been fulfilled. Conditions remained unsatisfactory in the Non-Self-Governing Territories as he had mentioned before, especially in regard to race relations, low standards of living and the rise of criminality rate and many other problems. The obligations of the Administering Members to transmit information was of a permanent character and the Committee whose function it was to examine such information should therefore be established on a permanent basis.

78. The representative of the United States of America agreed that the Committee had made some useful contributions in its work, and taking into consideration that wide differences existed as to whether or not the Committee should be renewed, submitted a draft resolution advocating that the Committee should be continued on the same basis for a further trial period of three years. In this view he was supported by the representatives of Australia, Denmark and the Netherlands with the latter expressing preference, however, for the creation of a committee of experts.

79. Commenting on the statements made by the representatives of the United Kingdom, Belgium and France, the representatives of Brazil and Cuba expressed their belief that the Committee had performed useful work and that to this work a substantial contribution had been made by the non-Administering Members. The representative of India added that the representatives of countries which had recently achieved self-government had a special contribution to make for they were in a position to compare present conditions with those which existed when their countries had been non-self-governing.

80. A draft resolution proposed by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics which recommended to the General Assembly the establishment of the Committee on Information on a permanent basis was rejected by 8 votes to 7, with 1 abstention.

81. Following the suggestion made by the representative of Cuba, the representative of Egypt proposed an amendment to the United States draft resolution to extend the term of the Committee for a period of four years instead of three years. The amendment was rejected on equality of votes, by 8 votes to 8.

82. A brief discussion took place on the meaning of the second paragraph of the United States draft resolution by which the Fourth Committee would be instructed "to fill such vacancies as may occur among the non-Administering Members of the Committee". It was asked whether this year the Fourth Committee, acting on behalf of the General Assembly, would be required to elect four or eight non-Administering Members. It was recalled that the intention of the General Assembly, as expressed in resolutions 332 (IV), had been to elect members for a period of three years, but in order to provide for a measure of continuity in the membership, arrangements had been made at the first election for two of the elected members to serve for a term of two years, and two for a term of one year only. Since the General Assembly would not be creating a new committee but renewing the existing Committee, all members would continue to serve their third term; the vacancies to be filled this year would be in respect of the four members elected in 1949, i.e., Brazil, Egypt, India and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, which would of course be eligible for re-election.

83. The draft resolution proposed by the representative of the United States was adopted by 13 votes to 3, with no abstentions. The text is set forth in annex II (draft resolution C).

84. In voting for the draft resolution, the representatives of Ecuador, Egypt, India, Indonesia and Pakistan expressed their appreciation of the action of the United States of America in sponsoring a constructive proposal. However, they reserved the positions of their respective Governments to vote according to the situation arising in the Fourth Committee and the General Assembly.

85. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that he had voted against the draft resolution recommending to the General Assembly that the Committee should be renewed for a further period of three years, but he felt it would be valuable if the verbatim texts of the speeches of the representatives of India and Belgium could be circulated as a basis for further study of this question before its discussion by the General Assembly.

86. It was generally agreed that the programme of work of the Committee would include paying special attention to one functional field each year, without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, and that special attention would be paid to education in 1953.

XII. Association of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee

87. By resolution 566 (VI), the General Assembly invited the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to examine the possibility of associating the Non-Self-Governing Territories more closely in its work and to report the results of its examination of this problem to the General Assembly at its seventh regular session.

88. A memorandum for the consideration of the Committee had been prepared by the Secretary-General analysing briefly the forms of association and setting forth the provisions existing in the constitutions of certain international bodies whereby Non-Self-Governing Territories are or may be associated with the work of those bodies in a capacity separate from the delegations of the Members responsible for their international relations.

89. The Committee examined this question at its sixty-seventh to seventy-first meetings.

90. A draft resolution was presented jointly by the representatives of Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, India and Pakistan for the consideration of the Committee. The text of the draft resolution was as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling that it has been found both possible and useful to associate Non-Self-Governing Territories with the work of technical organs of the United Nations, including specialized agencies,

"Recognizing that direct participation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the discussions of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories can be of further assistance in promoting the progress of those Territories and their peoples towards the goals set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations,

"1. Authorizes the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to accept on the proposal of the Administering Member concerned the participation in its work of representatives of Governments of Non-Self-Governing Territories where the inhabitants have attained a wide measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies;

"2. Invites the Administering Members to avail themselves of the opportunity thus created for still more effective co-operation regarding the study of economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

"3. Invites the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to report to the General Assembly on arrangements that may have been made for the association of Non-Self-Governing Territories with the work of the Committee in accordance with the present resolution."

91. Recommending the adoption of their joint draft resolution, the representatives of Brazil, Cuba, Egypt, India and Pakistan recognized that there might be some technical difficulties in drawing up conditions of associate membership, but they felt that there could be no opposition to the principle involved since the proposals were entirely in accord with resolution 566 (VI) in which the General Assembly had considered that "the direct association of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies is an effective means of promoting progress of the peoples of those Territories towards a position of equality with Member States of the United Nations". Such participation would be of benefit both to the Committee and to the representatives of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. There would be no question of dual representation since the draft resolution invited the Administering Members themselves to nominate the representatives who would be associated with the work of the Committee.

92. In response to inquiries, it was elicited from the sponsors of the joint draft resolution that, under this proposal, representatives of the Non-Self-Governing Territories would not vote, would sit apart from the Administering Members and would express their own points of view; these representatives should be representatives of the local governments of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

93. The representative of India thought that the technical difficulties could be solved. He suggested that perhaps those Territories which had originally been listed as Non-Self-Governing Territories, but on which information was no longer transmitted, might have prior claim to associate membership. Next in line, he proposed, should come those Territories which had achieved a measure of self-government wide enough to include a development of representative institutions and, in particular, legislatures with an elected element therein. There were strong reasons which made it desirable that the Non-Self-Governing Territories should have more direct participation which would enable them to acquire additional experience. He thought that such associate membership could be limited to four Territories at each session of the Committee, selected according to equitable geographical representation having regard to the nature of the work the Committee planned to take up at the session concerned.

94. There was a need to classify the Non-Self-Governing Territories according to the stage of development reached, dividing them into: (a) Territories on which no further information is transmitted; (b) Territories which have some measure of self-government; and (c) those which are still in an elementary state of evolution. This was a matter to which the Committee should devote further study.

95. As a tentative measure to associate the Non-Self-Governing Territories more closely with the work of the Committee, the representative of India suggested that all resolutions and reports adopted by the General Assembly relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories should be sent to certain representative organizations in the Territories and especially to local legislatures in those Territories with elected members, and that the reactions of the recipients should be included in the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

96. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that the joint draft resolution did not provide for adequate representation of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, since such representation would be subject to selection by the Administering Members and only from those Territories which had attained "a wide measure" of self-government. Furthermore, as can be seen from the attitude taken by the Administering Members towards the work of the Committee and its continuation in the future, it was certain that no resolution inviting them to secure the closer association of Non-Self-Governing Territories would have any results. For this last reason he could not support the joint draft resolution unless it were amended in order to provide an effective opportunity for the association of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He, therefore, proposed an amendment to replace paragraph 1 of the operative part of the joint draft resolution by the following text:

"Authorizes the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to invite the participation in its work, without the right to vote, of representatives of social, cultural and educational organizations, as well as of representative organs of local self-government if such exist in Non-Self-Governing Territories."

97. The representative of the United States of America stated that the joint draft resolution raised serious implications. In general, his Government considered it desirable that a close association between dependent areas and the work of the United Nations should be maintained so that the inhabitants of these Territories might gain a wider understanding and appreciation of the principles and objectives of the Charter and of the work of the United Nations. However, the United States was unable to support any action which would create any form of representation in the Committee for Non-Self-Governing Territories or their inhabitants distinct from that of the Members of the United Nations responsible for their administration, and he felt that there was no need for associate membership in the Committee. The United States felt that the most practicable way of providing for a closer association of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee was to continue and intensify the practice which had been followed in the past by some Administering Members of attaching to their delegations suitably qualified persons from the Territories. The United States had made it a practice to include in its delegations to international conferences, before even those held under the auspices of the United Nations, local inhabitants from the territories under its administration and only unforeseen events had prevented the inclusion of such representatives at the present session of the Committee. In view of these considerations, the United States proposed the following draft resolution:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling that in resolution 566 (VI), adopted on 18 January 1952, the General Assembly invited the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to examine the possibilities of associating the Non-Self-Governing Territories more closely in its work and to report the results of its examination of this problem to the General Assembly at its seventh regular session in connexion with the Assembly's consideration of the Committee's future,

"Having received the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"Recognizing that each Member of the United Nations has the unrestricted right to determine the composition of its delegations,

"1. Notes that the Members administering Non-Self-Governing Territories have from time to time attached qualified persons from these Territories to their delegations to the Committee;

"2. Is of the opinion that such action represents the most practical and satisfactory means of providing closer participation of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee;

"3. Expresses the hope that Administering Members will find it appropriate to continue and to extend the practice of associating suitably qualified persons from their Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee as part of their delegations or in any other manner which they deem desirable."

98. In opposition to the joint draft resolution proposed by the representatives of Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, India and Pakistan, the representatives of Australia, Belgium, France and the United Kingdom stated that their Governments considered associate membership in the Committee as a form of dual representation and the Charter conditions required for membership in the United Nations precluded the creation of associate membership in a committee of the General Assembly. From a legal point of view, their Governments could not accept a proposal which ignored the unity of authority which was an essential to democratic government.

99. The representative of Belgium made it clear that his Government had voted against the resolution inviting the Committee to examine the question of closer association of Non-Self-Governing Territories with the work of the Committee when it was put to the vote at the last session of the General Assembly, as it considered such participation impossible, fruitless and nefarious. Constitutionally, he said, it was inadmissible to have present in the Committee, parallel representatives, one representing the Administering Member and the other the Territory for which the Administering Member alone was responsible. Moreover, he pointed out that, in practice, territorial officials had already been present in the Committee as members of the delegations of their Administering Members.

100. The representative of the United Kingdom also recalled that in the General Assembly last year his Government had initially supported an examination of the possibility of associating Non-Self-Governing Territories with the work of the Committee. After some examination of the question, however, it had decided to abstain in the plenary meeting of the Assembly, in view of the constitutional difficulties which had become apparent.

101. The representative of France indicated that, for similar technical reasons, he would abstain from voting on the United States draft resolution which in his view, however, had the advantage of reconciling an actual practical interest with the respect for principles.

102. The representative of Denmark stated that his Government was in agreement with the principle enunciated in the joint draft resolution that methods should be sought to achieve closer association of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories with the work of the Committee. However, he did not agree with the methods proposed in that resolution. The policy of the Danish Government was to include on its delegations such specialists as it considered would be useful, and his Government would therefore support the draft resolution proposed by the United States. The representative of Australia also indicated that he would vote in favour of the United States draft resolution.

103. The representative of India proposed that, in submitting the results of its examination of this problem, the Committee should recommend to the General Assembly the need for further study of the question.

104. Commenting on this proposal, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government had devoted considerable study to the problem; it had reached certain defined conclusions and he saw no need for the General Assembly to recommend any further study.

105. The Committee then voted on the texts before it.

106. The amendment proposed by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to replace operative paragraph 1 of the joint draft resolution was rejected by 11 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions.

107. Explaining their votes, the representatives of Cuba, Brazil, India and Pakistan stated that in their opinion the proposed amendment went beyond the problem that the Committee had been asked to examine in virtue of General Assembly resolution 566 (VI).

108. The joint draft resolution submitted by the representatives of Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, India and Pakistan was also rejected by 8 votes to 7, with one abstention.

109. The Committee then voted on the draft resolution submitted by the representative of the United States of America, paragraph by paragraph, with the following results:

Paragraph 1 of the preamble: adopted by 10 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

Paragraph 2 of the preamble: adopted by 11 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

Paragraph 3 of the preamble: adopted by 14 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

Paragraph 1 of the operative part: adopted by 7 votes to 3, with 6 abstentions.

Paragraph 2 of the operative part: The representative of the United States of America proposed to replace the words "the most" by "a" and to delete the words "and satisfactory". The paragraph, as amended, was rejected by 8 votes to 6, with 2 abstentions.

Paragraph 3 of the operative part: adopted by 6 votes to 4, with 6 abstentions.

A roll-call vote was requested by the representative of New Zealand on the draft resolution as a whole. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Australia, Denmark, the Netherlands, New Zealand, United States of America.

Against: Belgium, Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Pakistan, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Abstaining: Brazil, France, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

The draft resolution was accordingly rejected by 8 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions.

II. Resolutions submitted for the consideration of the General Assembly

The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories submits the following draft resolutions for the consideration of the General Assembly.

A. DRAFT RESOLUTION ON SOCIAL CONDITIONS IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

The General Assembly,

Noting the report prepared by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories,

1. Approves the report of the Committee as a brief but considered indication of social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories and the problems of social development;

2. Invites the Secretary-General to communicate the report for their consideration to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned.

B. DRAFT RESOLUTION ON RACE DISCRIMINATION IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

The General Assembly,

Having regard to the principles of the Charter and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights emphasizing the necessity of promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedom for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

Having regard to the principle recognized in Chapter XI of the Charter that the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are paramount,

Recognizing that there is a fundamental distinction between discriminatory laws and practices on the one hand, and protective measures designed to safeguard the rights of the indigenous inhabitants on the other hand,

1. Recommends to the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories the abolition of discriminatory laws and practices contrary to the principles of the Charter and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, in all Non-Self-Governing Territories in which such laws and practices may still exist;

2. Recommends that the Administering Members should examine all laws, statutes and ordinances, as well as their application to the Non-Self-Governing Territories, with a view to the abolition of any discriminatory provisions or practices;

3. Recommends that where laws are in existence distinguishing between citizens and non-citizens primarily on racial grounds these should similarly be examined;

4. Recommends that all public facilities should be open to all inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories without distinction of race;

5. Recommends that where laws are in existence providing particular measures of protection for sections of the population, they should frequently be examined in order to ascertain whether their protective aspect is still predominant, and whether provision should be made for exemption from them in particular circumstances;

6. Recognizes that the establishment of improved race relations largely depends on the development of educational policies and commends all measures designed to improve understanding among all pupils in all schools of the needs and problems of the community as a whole.

C. DRAFT RESOLUTION ON THE FUTURE OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

The General Assembly

Having established a Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories by resolution 332 (IV) adopted on 2 December 1949,

Recognizing the value of the work performed by this Committee,

Recalling its decision set out in resolution 332 (IV) of 2 December 1949 to "examine in 1952 the question whether the Special Committee should be renewed for a further period, together with the questions of the composition and terms of reference of any such future Special Committee",

Having re-examined the terms of reference of the Committee and the provisions for its composition as set forth in resolution 332 (IV) and the provisions relating to the work of the Committee set out in resolution 333 (IV),

1. Decides to continue the Committee for a further three-year period on the same basis;

2. Instructs the Fourth Committee, acting on behalf of the General Assembly, to fill such vacancies as may occur among the non-Administering Members of the Committee.

Part Two

REPORT ON SOCIAL CONDITIONS

I. Introduction

1. At its 1950 session, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories gave chief attention to the consideration of educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In 1951, its attention was principally directed to the consideration of economic conditions and problems of development. In both years the Committee prepared special reports,<sup>1</sup> which were later approved by the General Assembly, as brief but considered indications of educational advancement and economic conditions and their problems in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

2. The present report on social conditions complements the two previous reports. Together, the three reports represent the considered views of the Committee on the economic, social and educational problems of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories in general. They derive from the information transmitted by the Members responsible for the administration of the Territories, supplemental information placed at the disposal of the Secretariat by the Members concerned, and the discussions on this information which have taken place in the Committee.<sup>2</sup>

3. On previous occasions, the Committee has drawn attention to the international obligations and the national declarations of policy which have guided it in its approach to the examination of information on the Territories. These principles merit repetition.

4. Article 1 of the Charter lays down as among the Purposes of the United Nations:

"3. To achieve international co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion; and

"4. To be a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations in the attainment of these common ends".

5. Article 55 of the Charter, which prefaces Chapter IX, on economic and social co-operation, states:

"With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the United Nations shall promote:

"a. higher standards of living, full employment, and conditions of economic and social progress and development;

"b. solutions of international economic, social, health, and related problems; and international cultural and educational co-operation; and

"c. universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion".

6. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the General Assembly in 1948 as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, provides that everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in the Declaration, and that no distinction shall be made "on the basis of the political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether it be independent, trust, non-self-governing or under any other limitation of sovereignty".

7. Article 73 of the Charter, which constitutes the principal article of the Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories, provides that "Members of the United Nations which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government recognize the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of those territories are paramount, and accept as a sacred trust the obligation to promote to the utmost, within the system of international peace and security established by the present Charter, the well-being of the inhabitants of these territories, and, to this end:

"a. to ensure, with due respect for the culture of the peoples concerned, their political, economic, social and educational advancement, their just treatment, and their protection against abuses;

"b. to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions, according to the particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples and their varying stages of advancement;

"c. to further international peace and security;

"d. to promote constructive measures of development, to encourage research, and to co-operate with one another and, when and where appropriate, with specialized international bodies with a view to the practical achievement of the social, economic, and scientific purposes set forth in this Article".

<sup>2</sup> Under Article 73 e of the Charter, Administering Members undertake: "to transmit regularly to the Secretary-General for information purposes, subject to such limitation as security and constitutional considerations may require, statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social and educational conditions in the territories for which they are respectively responsible other than those territories to which Chapters XII and XIII apply".

8. These principles and the declarations of policy made by the Administering Members emphasize as of primary importance in the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories the interests of the inhabitants which are recognized as paramount by the terms of Article 73 of the Charter. In speaking of the inhabitants, the Committee has in mind all peoples resident in a Territory who consider their future and the future of their children to be bound up with the welfare and progress of the Territory and all its inhabitants.

9. A last general point is that in the present report, as in its reports on education and on economic development, the Committee has taken account both of the development programmes undertaken by the Administering Members and of the general programmes of the United Nations and of its specialized agencies. The responsibilities which Members have assumed in the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories and the principle contained in the Charter of equality among all peoples indicate that economic and social co-operation should be promoted for the benefit of the peoples of these Territories, just as such co-operation should be provided for the peoples of sovereign States.

II. General social problems and policies

10. The living conditions of many of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, despite the efforts of the Administering Members concerned, urgently call for improvement.

11. The first basic problem has been, and still is, that of health, and the first efforts of the administrations have been directed towards improving health conditions. But, while much has been done to combat epidemic and endemic diseases and to reduce infant mortality, the creation of a more healthy population, capable of increased production and better living, still remains the ultimate objective of all development policies and the essential condition for economic and social expansion. In the advance towards better health, of primary importance are better nutrition, more adequate sanitation and housing, and health education fostering a community pride in better living.

12. Programmes of social advancement have not only to overcome problems of ill-health and poverty of a long-standing character, but also, and often at the same time, problems of social adjustment emerging with economic change. The opening of new channels of communication, the development of trade, urbanization, the change from a subsistence to a cash economy and economic progress in general have tended to disrupt established forms of social organization. New foundations are required on which the individual can build a new expression of his responsibility to his family and his community.

13. Better production is an indispensable condition for raising standards of living. The emphasis placed on economic development in many of the programmes elaborated in the Non-Self-Governing Territories is therefore understandable. Yet there can be no increase in production without a sufficiency of healthy and competent workers, forming part of communities providing adequate social satisfactions. Accordingly, the economic advancement of the Territories requires improvements in the health, social and educational conditions of the inhabitants. Economic and social development are interdependent and it would be unrealistic to attempt to build a sound economy while neglecting the social aspects of the problem. Failure to appreciate the social implications of economic development may not only distort the proper purposes of such development but may also make it impossible.

14. A large number of the Non-Self-Governing Territories lack the financial resources which would permit the expansion in the social services which their people require. Assistance to them is provided from the resources of the metropolitan countries. As the Committee stated in 1951, "the Administering Members no longer expect the Non-Self-Governing Territories to be able to provide for their economic development solely out of their own resources and out of private investments from abroad". Still more strongly must this apply to social development. Even so, the total resources available for the improvement of the life of the peoples in many cases are inadequate.

15. In these circumstances, it is not only desirable for reasons of social policy to obtain the widest possible collaboration of the peoples, both in the planning and in the execution of programmes of social advancement; it is also an economic necessity. The Committee is doing no more than paraphrasing authoritative statements made on many occasions in declaring that no programme for the improvement of the life of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories can have any hope of success unless it has the consent and wholehearted support of the peoples, obtained by the stimulation of their own aspirations and their realization of their own needs.

16. In emphasizing the collaboration of the peoples as an essential condition both in the initiation and in the execution of measures of social advancement, the Committee does not suggest that action in this field should wait upon the slow erosion of ancient habits or that policies should be limited merely to exhortation and advice. Tradition plays an important part in determining the rate and form of economic and social advancement and no one is immune from its influence. Nevertheless, all communities, particularly at crucial stages in their development, welcome the impetus which can be provided by those whom they trust. For this purpose, discussion and consent are necessary. No social or economic policy can be successful without the prior consent of the inhabitants, and the most democratic and efficient way of obtaining that consent is to seek the collaboration of the people in the formulation of policy, as well as in its execution. The Committee was encouraged by much of the information supplied to it on progress in this direction, showing that in some Territories representatives of the inhabitants are already in charge of their own social affairs. It hopes for a rapid attainment of this desirable result in all Non-Self-Governing Territories.

17. In succeeding sections this report will treat certain particular aspects of social advancement. A recurrent theme to be traced through them all is this desirability of obtaining popular participation at all levels. There are two other general trends which may be noted, which are closely connected with the question of participation.

18. In the first place, the marked tendency of recent social programmes to turn away from limited curative measures and to seek popular collaboration in positive programmes of prevention, and at the same time the demand for a better life on the part of the peoples, contain the promise of progress in many reforms which it would be impracticable to impose from above. In the social field, emphasis should be placed on the equal importance of curative and preventive measures; and in the general field of social welfare there are many measures which can be described as curative and which are of essential urgency before a constructive policy of prevention can be developed. The problem is not a choice between two policies but the integration into a single programme of the two aspects of prevention and cure. Even so, it is of value to emphasize the importance of prevention, since in the planning of policy the immediate evils to be overcome may be so obvious as to tend to direct interest primarily to remedial action rather than to the removal of the basic causes.

19. The second general point is that, apart from the basic needs of better health and better education, the social problems of greatest urgency may differ considerably, but, whatever may be the concentration on any specific problem, the result is likely to be and should be the development of an integrated general social policy. Diversification of methods and unevenness of development are inevitable and may even be desirable where the inhabitants themselves formulate policies to meet the problems which they regard of the greatest urgency. At the same time, this diversification and variety should not conceal the necessity for long-range plans aiming at a co-ordination of all efforts of social progress.

20. Finally, in this general section reference again should be made to the necessity for outside assistance. Assistance is provided by the metropolitan countries in a number of ways, of which the principal are operational or advisory services, the grant of sums for capital expenditure and the provision of facilities for education and training. The Committee received information on the extent to which metropolitan assistance is provided, and considered that, combined with policies of encouraging the participation of the inhabitants, such assistance is essential. By comparison, the total resources for technical assistance at the disposal of the international institutions are meagre and their extension to Non-Self-Governing Territories is in its early stages. It is hoped that, in future, more assistance will be available to the Non-Self-Governing Territories from international sources and that international assistance and co-operation can be used to support the major policy trends in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the most appropriate methods of self-help elaborated by the inhabitants themselves through the development of their own institutions.

III. Race relations

21. The Committee learnt with interest of the statement on the nature of race and race differences which was drafted in 1951 by a number of experts in physical anthropology and human genetics convened by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. It records the following conclusions reached by these experts on what the majority of specialists consider as being scientifically established:

"(1) In matters of race, the only characteristics which anthropologists have so far been able to use effectively as a basis for classification are physical (anatomical and physiological).

"(2) Available scientific knowledge provides no basis for believing that the groups of mankind differ in their innate capacity for intellectual and emotional development.

"(3) Some biological differences between human beings within a single race may be as great as, or greater than, the same biological differences between races.

"(4) Vast social changes have occurred that have not been connected in any way with changes in racial type. Historical and sociological studies thus support the view that genetic differences are of little significance in determining the social and cultural differences between different groups of men.

"(5) There is no evidence that race mixture produces disadvantageous results from a biological point of view. The social results of race mixture, whether for good or ill, can generally be traced to social factors".

22. The vital importance of improving race relations among all peoples should be evident to all who wish for the maintenance of world peace. In most Non-Self-Governing Territories, the fact that the bulk of the inhabitants are of an ethnic origin and have a cultural heritage different from that of the peoples of the countries responsible for their administration and at present filling most of the senior offices in the Territories makes of even greater importance collaboration among the races in these Territories. The declarations of the Administering Members on their policies in this respect are often categorical and forceful in their condemnation of practices of race discrimination and in their encouragement of racial harmony.

23. At the same time there are many practical problems to be faced, particularly in cases where permanent immigration by peoples of different races and cultures has taken place. Prejudices of like against unlike unfortunately exist widely. The evils of prejudice, however, may be greater and the responsibility to seek their removal is certainly greater where the economic and social advantages lie with those sections of the population which are of the same race as the peoples in charge of administration.

24. Effective means of reaching the objective of eliminating race prejudice and of effectively establishing race equality should be sought in the field of legislation, of administrative practice, and of education and the promotion and encouragement of enlightened public opinion.

25. In the field of legislation, two principal problems were considered in the Committee: the abolition of any existing laws which tend to perpetuate race cleavages, and the adoption of laws consecrating the principle of race equality or directed against particular instances of race prejudice.

26. The existing laws may be classified as differential or concessionary, protective and discriminatory.

27. By differential or concessionary legislation is meant those laws which in any Territory reflect the different religious, traditional and cultural aspirations of different communities and originate with and are maintained by the will of the particular communities concerned. Such laws are not only necessary but beneficial in their effect on race relations, always provided that they represent the will of the inhabitants.

28. Protective legislation for indigenous peoples vulnerable, for example, to pressures from more powerful or richer communities living alongside them may also be necessary and beneficial. Nevertheless, such protective legislation needs frequent reconsideration, since with the evolution of society its purposes may become unnecessary and it may degenerate into discrimination particularly in the case of those members of the protected community who have come to share the general life of other elements in society.

29. Lastly, discriminatory laws, imposing disabilities on persons by reason of race, are contrary to the principles of the Charter and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The Committee recognizes that in many Non-Self-Governing Territories such legislation no longer exists, that its abolition is being effected or contemplated in some other Territories either by general repeal or by provision of exemption of certain persons or groups. It is true that considerations of public order, public health, social education and the like are advanced in favour of the retention of particular measures. The Committee nevertheless expresses the opinion that the abolition of such discrimination is highly desirable, as a matter of urgency, particularly as, with the increased pace of economic and social development and the increased contact between the races, forms of discrimination which were perhaps minor in their effects on a largely immobile and isolated community may rapidly become sources of real hardship and legitimately bitter grievance.

30. Many instances can be cited, both from independent countries and from Non-Self-Governing Territories, of legislation directed against discrimination in the form either of provisions in the basic laws or of prohibitions and penalties provided against particular acts of discrimination. It is recognized that without strong public opinion legislation cannot effect much. Yet, any effective programme directed against race prejudice must be many-pronged. Where all citizens are promised equality of status and opportunity under the protection of the law, especially where the citizen has the legal right to challenge any executive action or legislative measure which impairs his equal status and opportunity, where particular aspects of discrimination in services and facilities are illegal, legislation plays a most potent part in the moulding of public opinion. The Committee regards legislation, strengthened in this case as in all other cases by the backing of public opinion, as an important means of breaking down prejudice.

31. Administrative practice can also do much in this regard. The administrations, in seeking the collaboration of the inhabitants in the formulation and execution of measures of social advancement, need to offer equality of opportunity to the peoples whose assistance they are soliciting. In so far as restrictions and discriminations result from administrative practices, a review of conditions will need to take into account not only existing circumstances but also ultimate objectives, since the practices may be translated into physical arrangements of buildings and public facilities, or into habits which perpetuate race divisions.

32. Of particular importance in the development of administrative practice and in the enlistment of popular support is the possibility of access for members of the indigenous population to all ranks in the public service, with the allied questions of facilities for training, opportunities for promotion and equality of remuneration. Although the principle of non-discrimination in public employment is generally accepted in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and although in a number of Territories the number of inhabitants in the senior services of government is rapidly increasing, there are Territories where the principle is still theoretical or where in practice little progress has been made. There is little sense in speaking of the collaboration of the inhabitants in modern social advancement unless in fact as well as theory among those inhabitants can be found those who can participate, with adequate training, in the higher executive ranks of the administration. Many difficulties will arise in the transitional stages, as, for example, the question of the total remuneration to be paid to officers recruited locally and those recruited from abroad, the members of the regular service and those engaged as experts on short-term assignments. These difficulties are appreciated. It is thought, however, that they can be solved in the light of common sense if qualified indigenous officers are not prejudiced by reason of their origin.

33. The Administering Authorities have less control over conditions in private employment. As a result of economic, social and educational conditions, employment opportunities in the higher ranks are restricted in the case of indigenous peoples, particularly where philosophies prevail determining the appropriate type of employment for various races. Where conditions of employment are determined through machinery established for collective negotiation, the administrations may have to consider whether practical situations do not result which are contrary to public policy. In particular, a dual trade union movement may perpetuate entrenched positions of privilege if binding collective agreements are reached for trade unionists of one race only; non-discriminatory legislation for the regulation of conditions of employment by agreement within an industry may have discriminatory effects in practice. On the other hand, equality of opportunity in the higher grades of employment may remain only theoretical unless there are sufficient facilities for training, while equality may mean a lowering of remuneration if the general level of social and educational conditions does not rise concurrently with the training in industrial skills.

34. A difficult dilemma sometimes faces the administrations in their attitudes towards associations such as trade unions, co-operative societies and mutual-aid societies which are based on the voluntary agreement of the members. The tendency is that any special privileges granted to such associations are being extended without regard to race. In some few cases, this equality has not yet been established. At the same time, it is to be noted that for associations the members of which are inexperienced in the businesses conducted, special provisions may exist of considerable value in the development of movements, which will in future permit the operation of free and efficient organizations. A problem of policy is the selection of the time and methods by which systems designed for inexperienced associations should give place to provisions for more advanced systems.

35. Regulations establishing different conditions for different races in various social aspects of everyday life, as for example by limiting residential rights or travel within a Territory, remain in existence where there are marked differences between the customs and actual living conditions of different races. Such regulations, as in the case of discriminatory legislation, require frequent review, having in mind the difference of principle between regulations which may impose special conditions on certain groups in special circumstances and regulations which prohibit the enjoyment of the highest conditions by any member of a particular race, whatever may be his economic and cultural standards.

36. In all these questions education in its broadest sense is the core of the solution.

37. On the question of school facilities the Committee, in 1950, recorded its views that:

“(a) In the field of education no principle is more important than that of equality of opportunity for all racial, religious and cultural groups of the population.

“(b) Respect should be paid to the wishes of any group desiring to establish particular educational facilities for its members, but this should be subject to the overriding consideration that the general welfare of the whole community is not thereby prejudiced and that the practical operation of any system of differentiation does not lead to discrimination against any group.

“(c) While the programmes and organization of different types of schools may properly be designed to meet the needs of different groups of pupils, it should be accepted as a general principle that no school should exclude pupils on grounds of race, religion or social status.

“(d) Differentiation in school facilities and programmes should not militate against the development of mutual sympathy and a feeling of common citizenship among the inhabitants of a Territory.

“(e) Where separate systems exist, each group in the community should be given a fair share of the public funds used for educational purposes”.

38. Another aspect of the problem relates to the content of education. Extended school facilities, the encouragement of cultural organization, of libraries and of literature and the arts may intensify race prejudices if used to propagate the merits of one single culture. Accordingly, action has been taken in many Territories to ensure that the curricula followed and the textbooks used in schools include reference to local conditions and that pride in local culture is fostered in cultural organizations with a view to encouraging in all groups a recognition of the cultural contribution of each to the general life of the community and an understanding of the local and universal interdependence of human beings. This means, in a multi-racial society, not only that the children of each community should be made familiar with the circumstances of other communities, but also that this should be done without inculcating condescension on the part of any group towards another group.

39. In addition to the programmes of the administrations, much good work has been done in education in its widest sense through group activities of all kinds fostered by private organizations in which members of all races collaborate on a footing of equality. Every encouragement should be given to the programmes these organizations foster.

40. Finally, recognizing that much has yet to be learnt of the techniques of overcoming prejudice, the Committee noted with interest the activities which are being undertaken by UNESCO, and in particular its publications, intended for use by teachers and leaders of adult education, presenting the scientific facts about the nature of race and race differences. These should prove useful in connexion with the campaign against race prejudice and discrimination. The Committee is also in favour of the publication of any conclusions reached in research into the social machinery which in some countries enables differing racial groups to live together peacefully and harmoniously.

IV. Rights of women

41. The Committee was informed of resolution 445 C (XIV) adopted on 28 May 1952 by the Economic and Social Council concerning the deprivation of certain essential rights of women. This resolution includes the following paragraphs:

“The Economic and Social Council,

“1. Invites all States, including States which have or assume responsibility for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to take immediately all necessary measures with a view to abolishing progressively in the countries and territories under their administration all customs which violate the physical integrity of women, and which thereby violate the dignity and worth of the human person as proclaimed in the Charter and in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;

“3. Invites the General Assembly to request the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to take paragraph 1 above into account in its examination of the information transmitted under heading C of part III of the Standard Form for the guidance of Members in the preparation of information to be transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter adopted by the General Assembly on 7 December 1951 under resolution 551 (VI)”.

42. The resolution of the Economic and Social Council will undoubtedly receive the attention of the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories where such customs may exist. Information on the status of women has been provided by the Administering Members for a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee will take into account any information received on the problems referred to in the Council's resolution, which may be transmitted in accordance with the Standard Form.

V. Public health

43. The Committee wishes to express its appreciation of the assistance rendered to it by the World Health Organization in its examination of public health problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It had also the advantage of the presence of public health specialists in the delegations of France and the United States of America, and of considerable technical information furnished by the Administering Members. It did not, however, consider problems of public health from a specialist angle. The Committee in no way duplicates the work of WHO or that of any other specialized agency within the particular competence of that agency. Its function is to examine the information transmitted on Non-Self-Governing Territories with a view to facilitating in the various functional fields and within the limits of its own competence the fulfilment of the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter. In performing this function, it may hope to be of assistance to the various specialized agencies in drawing attention to problems of the co-ordination of general economic, social and educational policies to which the work of these agencies in their specialized fields must be subordinated. The views, therefore, which it expresses in this section relate to general aspects of public health policy and not to specific questions of medical techniques.

44. Vital statistics are the best barometer of the state of health in any Territory and figure among the first requirements for the planning of economic and social policy. Information on the total population at periodic dates by means of censuses has become established in most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories outside Africa; considerable progress has been made in some African Territories, even though recent results indicate the very approximate character of the data obtained from previous methods. Statistics of births and deaths in recent years covering all or most of the population are available in respect of forty Territories. In the collection of vital statistics, however, even in areas where extensive civil registration is fully established, there is still much need for ensuring the accuracy of the results. The Committee recognized in particular the importance of accurate statistics on infant mortality rates.

45. The difficulties in census work in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are common to those of many other countries. They are due to the characteristics of the country and of its peoples, to general difficulties of administration, and to the fact that certain working problems have not yet been solved. Nevertheless, considerable progress has been made in recent years in cases where full censuses have not been possible, as by the comparison of intensive local sample censuses with general non-censal counts, experimental censuses in small areas, sample censuses covering representative portions of the population, or the complete enumeration of populations by household enumerations.

46. It is hoped that there will be a wide international interchange of experience on these matters, in order that the most accurate means of obtaining trustworthy information can be placed at the disposal of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

47. As regards the general public health programmes in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the information at the disposal of the Committee showed the considerable efforts which have been made in establishing an inventory of needs and in research, in providing a basic public health organization to meet the many immediate needs, in controlling tropical diseases, in public health education, and in the local training of public health staff. In the realm of public health, regional and international co-operation has advanced perhaps further than in any other field. The general results so far achieved in improving health conditions and extending services to the majority of the peoples, though considerable, are admittedly insufficient.

48. Nutrition is the bedrock of health, and no sweeping prophylactic campaigns against disease and no maternal or child welfare activities are likely to be sufficient unless they are accompanied by the necessary measures for improvement in nutrition. Of no less value are health education and the spreading of information in regard to health, without which no measure can succeed. In the international sphere the co-ordinated assistance of the various specialized agencies concerned should be of great value in seconding the efforts of the Administering Members and in extending experience in the use of new methods.

49. The importance of environmental hygiene has often been emphasized. All that the Committee feels it should add is that it will be best to concentrate on the familiar and tried measures of sanitation suitable to the stage of development of each Territory. Here once again should be emphasized the vital importance of obtaining the enlightened consent of the populations concerned in the measures, which will be all the more effective if they anticipate the wishes of the inhabitants.

50. Administrative policy in public health, in seeking the maximum result at a minimum cost, has to consider (a) the relationship between the metropolitan and the territorial services; (b) the relationships between the territorial services and other government services and non-governmental institutions; (c) the means of reaching the remote areas and of encouraging there the desire for and the means of a more healthy life; (d) the widest possible use of modern methods by which a significant number of serious endemic and epidemic diseases can be brought under effective control; and (e) the basic organization of the various public health departments so as to co-ordinate curative and preventive services, research and training, as well as to provide effective central control with the necessary decentralization of operations and a mobilization of the people's interest. An essential principle which should govern the administrative planning of public health work is the co-ordination of health and economic and social policy, both through the influence of health considerations on economic planning and on education and through the understanding of economic, social and psychological considerations by officers of the public health departments.

51. Of particular significance are the very widespread developments to bring medical and health facilities to rural and distant communities in forms which can be understood and financially supported. These may be brought about by very different means, such as the rural health unit, the task of which is as much educational as medical, and the mobile unit directed mainly at the cure and prevention of the most important epidemic and endemic diseases. In both cases the question of the maximum returns for the minimum resources has to be solved. Here again a greater consistency even of medical effort is often achieved where the unit, stationary and long-term or mobile and temporary, has the support of the other instruments of social and educational policy, as well as means of obtaining local co-operation through the normal administrations or through indigenous systems of mutual aid. Once again therefore, the Committee returns to its emphasis on the importance of the participation of the inhabitants in all aspects of social policy.

52. There is general agreement on the need for far greater emphasis on prevention in the field of public health, even though the urgent need for many curative services remains. The information provided to the Committee indicates that Administering Members are well aware of this situation. The administrative structure of the public health departments can do something towards the proper co-ordination of cure and prevention, having regard to local needs. On the one hand, there is the development of some departments towards the broad functions of a ministry of public health and, on the other, steps taken within the departments to relieve the principal officers of some of their administrative responsibilities. The other form of co-ordination, between the central headquarters and its outposts, differs widely in local circumstances. There is, in many areas, a process of delegation to smaller administrative units in order to find the most effective agency for particular types of health work; in other areas the process is rather one of consolidation of units too small to bear the health responsibilities imposed upon them. The Committee considers that the information provided by the Administering Members should continue to be studied by the Secretariat, in conjunction with WHO, in order to assist in the planning of public health programmes and in order to indicate the various ways in which public health may be co-ordinated in general policies of economic and social advancement.

53. In all this, administrative and structural developments in or affecting the public health services seem to be giving public health a wider connotation and a more effective place in the local or national atmosphere. This process is encouraged where more of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories find their place in the senior ranks of the services and where the simpler functions of public health enlist the support of those in the villages who are influential in everyday life. If, as appears from the examination of general principles of social policy, many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories cannot afford the costly paraphernalia which they need, and if results in general social policy will be effective only by support at the grass-roots, public health administration may similarly find the means of increasing immeasurably its role in social policy and national life by its increasing adaptation to local circumstances. The Committee will return to this point in its comments on community development.

54. One of the general difficulties is the shortage of trained personnel, particularly officers familiar with local conditions. Information was furnished to the Committee on the extension of medical training in some of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and on the increased opportunities provided for professional training in the metropolitan countries. Nevertheless, these facilities are far less than are required to supply the needs of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In these circumstances, the training of medical auxiliaries is of urgent importance. It would be of value if information could be prepared on such technical problems as the minimum educational requirements which have been found necessary for medical auxiliaries of various grades, the types of training which have been most effective, the co-ordination of the services of the medical auxiliaries with the work of the regular professional officers, and in general, the place of auxiliary personnel in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and in countries with similar problems in the extension of public health facilities.

55. Finally, the Committee wishes to emphasize that, now that wide programmes of public health are recognized as essential to economic and social progress, specialists in all branches of medicine need to understand not only the economic and social programmes of which their work forms part, but also the general developments of which they must be both the servants and agents. Equally, it is necessary for all those concerned with the advancement of the Territories to secure the integration of public health policies and services within the general development of the peoples. The Committee believes that this broad outlook on public health exists widely and should bring with it a recognition of the need for better health conditions for all the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories without discrimination.

VI. Social welfare and development

56. The term social welfare and the scope of social welfare services vary with the different traditions which the Administering Members have developed in the metropolitan countries. Another factor contributing to variety of policy is that social welfare organization is recent and has concentrated on problems of particular local urgency. The Committee has not to enter into the resulting differences of detail. It notes the very substantial expansion in the social welfare services in some Territories, but holds that in this field ever increased attention is required to further developments in these and in other Territories.

57. As the Committee has already stated, the marked tendency of recent social programmes is to seek popular collaboration in positive policies of prevention. The task of the social welfare services is therefore educative and directed to long-term objectives. At the same time, and particularly in areas of recent urban growth, a number of services which may be described as curative are urgently necessary, and in general the need to adapt social welfare programmes to local circumstances makes all the more important the co-ordination of common efforts and the exchange of experience on problems and techniques.

58. The greater part of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are agricultural. In the development of social welfare, economic handicaps are encountered due to the relatively low incomes of the rural population; geographical and administrative handicaps result from the dispersion of the population and the difficulties of communications; and there is the educational handicap due not only to insufficient school facilities, but also to lack of knowledge of the means of social betterment among the people.

59. In these circumstances, the programmes of community development, of assistance to peasant settlers, and of the general extension of social services in the rural areas are all the more important. In many cases, village work for economic betterment carried out by the people themselves is one of the most effective forms of social welfare. Better material conditions will result, but any such results should be judged not so much in material terms as by the extent to which an interest has been fostered in the communities in their own advancement through methods of self-help and mutual co-operation.

60. Community development programmes and multi-purpose rural welfare centres follow a variety of techniques and concentrate on varying problems. The degree of administrative direction also necessarily varies, but the Committee commends those instances given it where the main objective is to train the people for leadership and to stimulate local initiative. It considers that where possible full use should be made of voluntary associations already in existence or formed in the course of the educational action in order to avoid too bureaucratic an approach. At the same time, these principles of village action make highly desirable co-ordination through appropriate administrative machinery.

61. The same considerations arise in peasant settlement schemes, although administrative control may necessarily be greater in the early stages. Settlement schemes are in many areas an economic necessity if standards of living are to be improved or even maintained. But the essential objectives of land settlement policies are social as well as economic, and the full integration of social measures in the schemes themselves is a necessity. The Committee accordingly emphasizes that such schemes should be only undertaken with the full understanding and co-operation of the peasants concerned, that from the start provision will be required for basic social amenities and that the development of the community spirit of responsibility should be sought at all stages.

62. Family and child welfare is the core of social welfare. This includes not only the provision through the government administration or the community itself of basic social services ensuring the health and economic security of the family unit, but also a wide educational action concerned with the welfare of the child and the parents.

63. The Committee learnt with interest of programmes for the improvement of the nutrition of children and of the progress of various school feeding schemes. While recognizing that some of these schemes may be costly if they are to operate effectively, and that the claims made for them must be adjusted to other pressing needs, it considers that these are types of activities of particular value both in rural and urban areas.

64. In urban centres, the main preoccupation of governments or local administrations in meeting the needs of expanding urban populations is in the first instance the equipment of growing urban centres with the essential public utilities, the provision of adequate housing and the institution of essential public health and educational services. The development of more specific social welfare services will depend largely on the ability to encourage local initiative and voluntary effort. However, there is an increasing recognition of the importance and urgency of developing, through governmental and municipal assistance, services which not only meet emergency needs, but, more important, will foster the growth of a community consciousness and the establishment of family life and a sense of family responsibility in the towns.

65. Of outstanding importance is the provision of low-cost but adequate housing and sanitation. The Committee is aware that, as in other countries undergoing similar economic and social change, slum conditions are prevalent in many urban areas and that the new arrivals, who have many adjustments to make to fit them in their new environment, have little chance of social progress in these conditions. There are many technical problems on which a wider exchange of experience would be of the utmost value to housing authorities unable to afford expensive slum-clearance schemes without building houses which are too costly for the people for whom they are intended.

66. Information was furnished to the Committee on a number of low-cost housing schemes which have recently been developed in some of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It is doubtful whether these schemes, however beneficial they may be, can fully solve the problem, particularly in areas where the drift to the towns is proceeding at an ever-increasing rate. It is believed that aided self-help in the matter of housing, whether provided through co-operatives or housing societies or with necessary safeguards to private individuals, can do more to reduce the money costs and to achieve higher standards than any other combination of finance and technology. It is recognized that aided self-help on a large scale requires considerable organization and control. Nevertheless, in addition to the material results which it can give, its rewards in terms of a sense of achievement and the development of a greater spirit of co-operation are substantial.

67. Although housing problems are mainly local and the methods of solving problems in one locality may not be entirely applicable to another, this is no justification for the present lack of broad lines of social policy in determining responsibility for the provision of workers' housing and related facilities. While home ownership by workers should be the ultimate aim of policy, the main problem of housing relates to the low income groups who may rarely be able to own their houses even with substantial assistance. In view of the urgent housing needs, it is understandable that in some cases the employers have assumed responsibility for the housing of their workers and it may be often necessary to increase the legal obligations of employers for providing satisfactory accommodation for their workers. The Committee, nevertheless, considers that this should be a transitional policy followed only in cases of real necessity. The social disadvantages of placing the right to accommodation in the hands of employers are well known.

68. While the development of a sense of self-reliance and group responsibility is essential, the evolution of the new urban agglomerations into progressive communities also requires concrete and effective programmes of action by all the agencies concerned, government, municipal or voluntary. Such programmes may require a greater diversification of social services and a more complex organization than in the rural environment. They may need also a greater degree of administrative action, with the consequent need for staff of different levels and types acquainted with social welfare theory and trained for various fields of social welfare work and practice.

69. In this connexion, the Committee particularly stresses the problem of juvenile delinquency, and has noted with interest the steps taken in a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The village, even in transition, is usually able to prevent or control juvenile delinquency. In the towns, with family ties loosened, a number of the more adventurous young people, capable of becoming good citizens, require the assistance and supervision of trained social workers.

70. The initiation of social security measures in some of the Non-Self-Governing Territories has been noted. It is clear that in a number of cases, particularly in the large towns, the present assistance services must be actively developed towards more comprehensive social security or social insurance programmes. The Committee, however, refrains from commenting in any detail on this question, since once again the appropriate measures will have to be adjusted to the actual environment. There is clearly need for the protection of the destitute who have lost the support of the traditional society. Particularly where family bonds have weakened, there is a strong case for the introduction of old-age pensions, not only by reason of a need, which must otherwise be met by charity or public relief, but also because such pensions may help to strengthen family ties by giving old persons an economic place in the households of their children. Broader forms of social security are of course to be welcomed, but the Committee recognizes that they may be of less urgent necessity than general measures of urban improvement.

71. Both in rural and urban development, emphasis has been placed on the growth of forms of popular collaboration. These may be traditional associations or mutual aid societies supported or even sponsored by the administrations. The Committee, however, particularly wishes to emphasize the importance of co-operative societies. In 1951, in its report on economic conditions, it expressed its views on co-operative development. From that report it would repeat the following concluding passage:

"The Special Committee is deeply interested in the information provided on government assistance for general promotional work, collaboration in improving facilities for the administrative structure of co-operative societies, and the provision of technical advice and financial privileges. It holds that, even though a limited economic outlook as to the value of the co-operative movement would in itself justify such action, of greater importance are the prospects provided by the co-operative movement for a broadening of concepts of communal responsibilities. The co-operative movement may and should act as a source of inspiration for the creation of new forces of human energy".

72. The emphasis placed in this section on the collaboration of the inhabitants and the development of methods of self-help does not mean that many more trained social workers are not required. Fully-trained senior officers are essential. In addition to the need of training for senior posts in the territorial welfare organizations, there is still in Non-Self-Governing Territories the problem of the adequate preparation of junior social workers, performing subordinate or auxiliary tasks, and also the problem of training the local leaders and voluntary workers. The demand for this type of personnel will undoubtedly grow steadily. Only few Territories can afford now, or in the future, an extensive welfare administration employing professionally trained staff on all levels of organization. Most Territories where the need for vigorous welfare action is particularly great, will have to rely on a simple organization, based to a great extent on voluntary effort, and also on a simpler training ensuring maximum efficiency with the minimum of formal qualifications.

VII. Labour conditions

73. In a number of Territories the main means of livelihood is by peasant production largely for subsistence needs. Yet, even in areas where this peasant economy predominates, the producer is often dependent on occasional employment in order to satisfy his needs. The Committee considers that, even where only a minority of the workers is in the service of an employer at any one time, the establishment of conditions of employment which not only are just but which also foster social progress is one of the imperatives of public policy. This is all the more true since in the majority of the Non-Self-Governing Territories the employer and the circumstances of employment are alien to the worker and his traditions.

74. In 1947, the International Labour Conference adopted five Conventions concerning workers in the Territories for which its members are responsible. The following year the General Assembly, by resolution 221 (III), noted information on the ratification and application of Conventions concerning Non-Self-Governing Territories. The 1947 Conventions have been ratified by the United Kingdom, Belgium, Denmark, France and the Netherlands have announced that they accept in principle the ideas underlined in the five Conventions. The Committee expresses the hope that all Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories will at an early date ratify the Conventions relevant to labour conditions in their Territories.

75. Resolution 221 (III) also referred to the study by the International Labour Office of problems of migrant labour, by which male workers seek distant employment for comparatively long periods leaving their families in the villages. The Committee learnt with appreciation of the report of the Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories which met in December 1951. The details the report enumerates for the protection of migrant workers in employment do not require comment. Their consideration by the Administering Members, within principles of labour policy agreed internationally, is to be commended. From the standpoint of general social development, it would seem that neither in the places of employment where men may remain for many years without family resources, nor in the villages where families may live without their young husbands and fathers, can satisfactory progress be expected. Accordingly, attention is drawn to the broad measures of economic and social policy, for which consideration is asked by the Committee of the International Labour Office, in order to promote advancement in rural areas and to counteract the disequilibrium resulting from the present practices of this form of migration.

76. The reports approved in past years by the General Assembly on educational and economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories are designed for similar purposes, and the information before the Committee shows that many of the Administering Members concerned have adopted plans with the same objectives. The Committee recognizes that numerous measures have been taken by the territorial governments for the protection of workers under the migrant labour system. It considers, however, that those forms of migrant labour which lead to the comparatively long absences of men from their families are socially undesirable and bring about serious social problems, both in the village communities and in the labour centres. The hope is expressed that the labour aspects of these problems will be considered by the International Labour Conference at an early date, and that as a result of economic and social development, the need for the engagement of large bodies of migrant workers divorced from family ties will rapidly diminish.

77. The Committee has already expressed its views condemning discriminations in employment. Recognizing the many complex problems affecting conditions of employment in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, it limits its further comments to certain generalizations on questions of wages and trade union development.

78. Wage rates in most Non-Self-Governing Territories are low, and in some Territories there are wide differences between the wages paid to the indigenous worker and those received by persons of different race. Frequently this situation is explained by different standards of efficiency and responsibility, or by the fact that the indigenous wage earner may only be partly dependent on employment and that his subsistence may be provided by the employers. For the building of a sound social economy, however, the worker in wage-earning employment must receive a sufficient remuneration for the support of himself and of his family in the circumstances of his employment. Otherwise, it may legitimately be asked what has the development of a wage economy offered peoples who, however poor, could lead a family life within their own social traditions.

79. It is recognized that if the raising of wages is an urgent necessity, it must be accompanied by increased productivity and that, at present, labour, cheap in terms of wages, is expensive in terms of output. Inquiries into the relationship of wages to productivity have been undertaken or are contemplated. The Committee considers that every care should be taken to see that such inquiries are sufficiently broad, taking account of the educational, health and general social improvements which are necessary before examining techniques of the adjustment of wages to productivity. The Committee learnt of some few inquiries undertaken in this field. They could be, with value, extended on a broader occupational and geographical basis. The Committee is nevertheless convinced that the general result will be to confirm the contention of this report that general social advancement is a necessary and integrated aspect of economic development, and that the inefficient worker as a general rule needs the physician or teacher rather than the efficiency expert.

80. The emphasis which the Committee has placed on the collaboration of the inhabitants and the evolution of institutions directed by themselves for their social advancement is an indication of the importance it must attach to trade union development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee noted that this development is very uneven. It realizes that the differences are often an inevitable result of conditions of employment in the Territories or of the over-all development that has been attained. It considers that the Administering Members and metropolitan and international trade union organizations should be encouraged to continue and extend their efforts to foster trade unions and to provide training for trade union officers. Within the Territories, as often happens, the functions of the trade unions should be developed so that they may play an effective part in the social and economic developments resulting from the employments in which the workers are engaged. In this, the trade unions will become an element not only in better employment conditions and relations but also in general social advancement.

VIII. Standards of living

81. With certain exceptions, Non-Self-Governing Territories belong to those sections of the world community in which the standards of living of the populations are extremely low. The scanty statistical data available for these Territories corroborate this view. They also show a very uneven distribution of personal income among the various population groups in many of the Territories, although they often fail to permit a correct assessment of elements in this income that are not readily translated into terms of currency.

82. In 1951, the Committee drew attention to the importance of the problem of the determination of standards of living in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It expressed the opinion that the study of economic conditions, which it was then undertaking, will remain incomplete until more detailed and reliable information can be gathered on the broad trends of both rural and urban living standards. Economic development should be in the interests of the inhabitants. Increases in terms of trade remain meaningless unless they can also be expressed in relation to changes in the levels of living and standards of the inhabitants.

83. Recent information indicates that in some Territories new inquiries are being undertaken and new methods introduced for the purpose of providing valid data on changes in the real income of various groups, which will make it possible to assess more scientifically the effects of economic development on living conditions.

84. To determine with fair accuracy the incomes and consumption levels of the population and to compare these levels with standards which are desirable and possible, on-the-spot surveys of families of various income groups are indispensable.

85. In a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories, cost-of-living indices are periodically calculated. When related to the income variations they help to determine the effects of changing economic conditions on standards of living and to reveal the changes taking place in real income. In general, the importance of calculating and keeping up to date cost of living indices on the one hand, and indices of the income of wage-earners and independent primary producers on the other, is being increasingly recognized in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In only a few instances, however, have such data been calculated for all the different sections of the population, whose needs and incomes vary appreciably.

86. The Committee is greatly interested in these studies and trusts that they will permit a fuller picture to be obtained of what is actually happening to typical families in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in their present changing circumstances. At the same time, the Committee emphasizes that there are many elements in the sum of social needs which cannot be reflected in even the most accurate statistical information. It recognizes also that material rises in the standards of living may even lead to discontentment and disequilibrium, unless satisfaction is also offered to social aspirations.

87. Inevitably, therefore, the Committee returns to its major theme. The objective of economic development is the improvement of the living conditions of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Such improvements must include provision for the satisfaction of all kinds of material needs at present insufficiently met. But these material satisfactions will be themselves insufficient or even a cause of further disintegration unless they take place within a social structure acceptable to the peoples.

IX. International co-operation and assistance

88. Information was furnished to the Committee on the assistance provided to Non-Self-Governing Territories and to their social evolution by, for example, operational or advisory services organized directly by the metropolitan country or regionally, grants and loans for capital expenditure, and the provision of facilities for education and training. However, there is an important place for international co-operation and assistance. As stated in paragraph 20, it is hoped that more such assistance will be available, and international co-operation further developed in support of the major policy trends in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

89. International co-operation and assistance, including regional activities on similar lines, takes various forms, such as studies, seminars, conferences, the provision of experts, grants of fellowships and scholarships, and the initiation of pilot projects. All may be useful, but essentially what is demanded is that which will contribute to the positive programmes of the administrations to meet the needs experienced in the Territories, rather than inquiries into the same well-known problems with the probable result of reaching the same theoretical conclusions.

90. The choice of experts needs careful scrutiny. The Administering Members, in training their young officers for service in the Territories, attempt to explain the basic cultural problems of the Territories where they will serve. It cannot be expected that experts in various particular technical fields can similarly receive a similar training. Nevertheless, an important part of their work should take the form of a preliminary briefing in the broad aspects of social policy which they must respect in their treatment of any particular technical problem. The Committee was glad to learn that attention to this necessity is paid by the international institutions.

91. So far as possible, experts should be sought from among those familiar with conditions comparable with those of the Territories in which they will work. To that end, regional co-operation is of great value, and the Committee appreciates the useful functions of regional bodies in making the services of experts available.

92. Operational staff working under the experts should be recruited locally. A primary duty of the experts will be to train their local staff. This is usefully provided in the following provision contained in the basic agreement between the United Nations and specialized agencies and the United Kingdom for the provision of technical assistance to Trust, Non-Self-Governing and other Territories for whose international relations that Government is responsible:

"Such experts shall, in the course of their work, make every effort to instruct any local technical staff of the government of the Territory concerned who may be associated with them, in the methods, techniques and practices of that work and in the principles upon which these are based, and the government of the Territory concerned shall, wherever practicable, attach technical staff to the experts for this purpose".

93. Questions of salaries and allowances have considerable psychological importance. Experts engaged for their exceptional qualifications and asked to leave important work with which they are associated will receive remuneration far above local standards. Obviously, if an expert succeeds in increasing the living standards of a large group of peoples, his remuneration is more than justified by the results. The conclusion, therefore, is not against the proper payment for specialist services, but insistence on the belief that in the recruiting of experts quality rather than numbers is the outstanding necessity.

94. The fields in which the United Nations, alone or in association with the specialized agencies, provides social welfare technical assistance services include but are not limited to the following: social development policies; research in social fields as an aid in policy formulation, such as surveys and statistics; the organization, administration and training of staff for social welfare services; population and migration questions in relation to economic and social development; town and rural planning and housing; organization and operation of community, family and child welfare services, including rural welfare services; measures for social defence, such as the care and rehabilitation of juvenile delinquents and adult offenders; rehabilitation services for handicapped persons; social aspects of public health programmes; industrial relations; industrial welfare; employment services, including vocational training; standards of living; co-operatives. Of special significance is the substantial body of experience and information on community organization and development which the Secretary-General is assembling and the technical assistance on community organization and development which is available from the Technical Assistance Administration. The United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund provides a wide range of supplies for child welfare projects in co-operation with the various governments, as, for example, in campaigns against malaria, tuberculosis, yaws and kwashiorkor, and in the development of maternal and child welfare services. The specialized agencies provide a wide range of services in the fields of health and nutrition, education and the social sciences and labour organization and welfare. The complementary aspect of technical assistance is the provision of fellowships and scholarships for

I. Constitution of the Committee

1. The General Assembly, by resolution 646 (VII) adopted on 10 December 1952, during the seventh session, decided to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis as set forth in resolution 332 (IV) for a further three-year period with the provisions relating to its work as set out in resolution 333 (IV).

2. The terms of reference of the Committee set forth in resolution 332 (IV) are as follows:

"... to examine, in the spirit of paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 1 and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

"... to submit to the regular sessions of the General Assembly ... reports containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories".

3. With regard to the provisions relating to its work set out in resolution 333 (IV), the General Assembly considered:

"that the value of the work of the Committee would be enhanced if, without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, special attention were given to one field each year".

4. The Committee consisted of sixteen Members, comprising the eight Member States transmitting information and an equal number of other Member States elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly. The following was the membership of the Committee in 1953:

Members transmitting information	Elected Members
Australia	Brazil
Belgium	China
Denmark	Cuba
France	Ecuador
Netherlands	India
New Zealand	Indonesia
United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland	Iraq
United States of America	Pakistan

5. The Committee met in New York, and held seventeen meetings from 18 August to 8 September 1953.

6. The representatives of the following specialized agencies took part in the discussions of the Committee: the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and the World Health Organization (WHO).

II. Officers

7. The officers elected by the Committee were:

Mr. A. H. Loomes (Australia), Chairman,

Mr. Sergio Armando Frazao (Brazil), Vice-Chairman,

Mrs. Lakshmi N. Menon (India), Rapporteur.

III. Sub-Committee

8. A Sub-Committee was appointed at the 79th meeting of the Committee to prepare a special report on educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was composed of the representatives of Brazil, China, France, India, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. The representative of Brazil, Mr. S. A. Frazao, was elected Chairman. The representatives of UNESCO and ILO participated in the work of the Sub-Committee. The Sub-Committee held six meetings from 27 August to 3 September 1953.

IV. Agenda

9. The agenda as adopted by the Committee, together with references to the relevant documents and to the summary records of the discussions of each item, is set out in annex I.

V. Preliminary statements

10. At the opening meeting of the Committee, the representatives of France and of the United Kingdom made formal statements defining the constitutional position of their respective Governments in regard to their continued participation in the work of the Committee. Summaries of these statements are given in the records of the 73rd meeting. A communication addressed to the Chairman of the Committee by the acting permanent representative of Belgium to the United Nations was read to the Committee. The representatives of Indonesia and the Netherlands made statements relating to the transmission of information on Netherlands New Guinea (Irian).

11. The communication from the Belgian delegation, which is given in extenso in document A/AC.35/L.142, concluded with the statement that, in the circumstances and so long as the situation described in the communication remained unchanged, the participation of the Belgian delegation in the discussions seemed to it to be devoid of purpose.

12. The representative of Indonesia objected to the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter by the Netherlands Government with respect to Netherlands New Guinea (Irian). In the view of his Government, that Territory was not a Non-Self-Governing Territory, but formed part of Indonesia.

13. The representative of the Netherlands stated that his Government was responsible for the administration of Netherlands New Guinea by virtue of the right of sovereignty it exercised over that Territory under article 2 of the Act of Sovereignty Transfer of 27 December 1949. In consequence, the Netherlands Government had transmitted information in accordance with the obligation imposed by Article 73 e of the United Nations Charter.

14. In the course of subsequent general statements, the representatives of China, India, Brazil, Indonesia and Pakistan stated the views of their respective delegations in support of the legality of the Committee and the value of its work.

VI. Educational conditions

15. In accordance with the provisions of its work as set forth in resolution 333 (IV) and confirmed by resolution 646 (VII), the Committee at its present session devoted special attention to the subject of educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

16. The Committee had before it documents prepared by the Secretary-General dealing both with a review of the aspects of education to which special attention had been given during the first session of the Committee in 1950, as well as with other aspects of education not previously treated in detail. In addition, the Committee had before it for reference the special report on education prepared in 1950. Documents dealing with subjects within their respective fields were also submitted by UNESCO and ILO.

17. Special advisers on educational affairs were attached to the delegations of France, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

18. An exhibition of educational books, arranged for the Committee by UNESCO, presented examples of textbooks, reading material and educational booklets used in primary schools and adult education courses in many Non-Self-Governing Territories, as well as in a number of States members of UNESCO.

19. The Committee discussed educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, item 4 of its agenda, from its 73rd to 83rd meetings. Statements in the general debate and in the discussion of item 4 (a) were made by the representatives of Australia, Brazil, China, Denmark, France, India, Indonesia, Iraq, the Netherlands, Pakistan, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, and by the representative of UNESCO.

20. General Assembly resolution 645 (VII) had invited the Committee to consider the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter in the light of the views expressed in the special reports on educational, economic and social conditions. The debate accordingly provided the opportunity for a general review of basic educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the policies and programmes of the Administering Members in the light of the views expressed by the Committee in 1950 and approved by the General Assembly in resolution 445 (V).

21. Subsequently, the Committee examined particular points connected with compulsory education, the education of girls, vocational education, the financing of education, the use of indigenous languages in education, and community development and the general co-ordination of educational and social policy. The representatives of Australia, Brazil, China, Cuba, Ecuador, France, India, Indonesia, Iraq, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America took part in discussions on these points, together with the representatives of UNESCO and ILO.

22. A number of questions were asked on educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and criticism was expressed of certain situations by the representatives of Brazil, China, Cuba, India, Indonesia and Iraq. Replies were made to these points and further information was given on the current situation and on educational programmes by the representatives of France, the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

23. While it was generally agreed that most of the technical problems of education were common to all countries, it was considered by some Members that certain aspects had particular application to Non-Self-Governing Territories. In the main, these concerned the objectives of educational policy and practice, the type and content of the education provided and the attitude adopted toward the indigenous culture.

24. Following the procedures of previous sessions of the Committee, a Sub-Committee was established at the 79th meeting in order to prepare a special report on educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories for the consideration of the full Committee. The membership of this Sub-Committee has been given above in paragraph 8.

25. The report prepared by the Sub-Committee was considered by the full Committee during its 88th and 89th meetings. The representative of Brazil, as Chairman of the Sub-Committee, introduced the report, and statements were made by the representatives of France, India, Iraq, the United Kingdom and the United States of America. Subject to modifications proposed by the representatives of Iraq and the United States of America and accepted without dissent, the report was unanimously approved and forms part two of the present report.

26. Following approval of the report, a joint draft resolution was proposed by the representatives of Brazil, China, France, India, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. According to this draft resolution, the General Assembly would approve the report on educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories as a supplement to the report approved in 1950, and invite the Secretary-General to communicate it to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned, for their consideration. The draft resolution was approved unanimously. Its text is given in annex II.

VII. Cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter

27. In resolution 222 (III) adopted on 3 November 1948, the General Assembly had considered that, "having regard to the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter, it is essential that the United Nations be informed of any change in the constitutional position and status of any such Territory as a result of which the responsible Government concerned thinks it unnecessary to transmit information in respect of that Territory under Article 73 e of the Charter;" and had requested "the Members concerned to communicate to the Secretary-General, within a maximum period of six months, such information as may be appropriate pursuant to the preceding paragraph, including the constitution, legislative act or executive order providing for the government of the Territory and the constitutional relationship of the Territory to the Government of the metropolitan country". Furthermore, in resolution 448 (V), the General Assembly had requested the Committee "to examine such information as may be transmitted in future to the Secretary-General in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 222 (III), and to report thereon to the General Assembly".

28. In conformity with the terms of resolution 222 (III), the Government of the United States of America had transmitted to the Secretary-General communications dated 19 January and 20 March 1953, enclosing the text of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico; a memorandum by the Government of the United States of America concerning the cessation of transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter with regard to the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico; and a copy of a letter dated 17 January 1953, from the Governor of Puerto Rico to the President of the United States of America.

29. The discussion of the item was initiated at the 81st meeting of the Committee by the representative of the United States of America, who made a statement amplifying the information contained in the communications referred to above.

30. The representative of the United States of America began by summarizing the four main events which had led to the establishment of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. First, the fact that, in the general elections held in 1948, the Puerto Rican people had, by an overwhelming majority, voted to become a Commonwealth associated with the United States of America. Second, the adoption by the United States Congress of legislation in the form of a compact, to give effect to that vote and authorizing the Puerto Rican people to draft their own Constitution. Third, the adoption of a Constitution for Puerto Rico by a Constitutional Convention and its ratification by the people in a referendum; and, finally, the approval of the compact and the Constitution by both the Congress of the United States and the people of Puerto Rico.

31. The Resident Commissioner of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, alternate representative of the United States of America on the Committee, then outlined in detail the political progress of Puerto Rico from the time of its first association with the United States in 1899 until the attainment of full internal self-government in political, economic, social and cultural affairs in 1952. This political development, he stated, indicated that the Puerto Rican people had worked out a free, democratic and fully self-governing way of life in harmony with their geographical, demographic, economic and cultural circumstances. He referred to the economic, social and educational conditions of the Commonwealth and the development programmes being carried out in those fields, as well as to the part played by the Puerto Rican people in the two world wars and in the United Nations action in Korea. He concluded by pointing out that the steps leading to the compact and Constitution had been initiated by Puerto Ricans and were based on the free decisions of the electorate.

32. In the discussion that followed, statements were made that gave expression to several divergent points of view.

33. The representatives of Brazil, Ecuador and China held that, in accordance with the request of the General Assembly conveyed in resolution 448 (V), the Committee was competent to examine the information before it and to report its findings to the General Assembly.

34. After reviewing the legal basis of the Committee's competence to deal with all matters relating to the cessation of the transmission of information, the representative of Brazil stated that, after examining the documentation before it, the Committee should express an opinion either in favour of or against cessation of information or, if it considered the documentation inadequate, it might inform the General Assembly that it could not reach a satisfactory conclusion. To fail to express an opinion and simply to pass on the question to the General Assembly without comment would be tantamount to an admission of incompetency. After a study of the documentation, he had concluded that Puerto Rico had achieved a degree of internal self-government which fully satisfied the requirements of the Charter; that the Puerto Rican people themselves had freely expressed their right of self-determination in choosing their present status and that Puerto Rico should therefore no longer be included in the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories. He suggested that the Committee should adopt a resolution which, after setting out the reasons on which its findings were based, would recognize that Article 73 e no longer applied to Puerto Rico, in view of the degree of self-government reached by the Puerto Rican people, and that the purposes of Chapter XI had thus been attained.

35. The representative of Ecuador made a detailed analysis of the status of Puerto Rico in relation to objectives set out in Chapter XI of the Charter. As a result, he stated that Puerto Rico had achieved a full measure of self-government; that no more information need be transmitted under Article 73 e and suggested the submission of a draft resolution for the consideration of the General Assembly expressing approval of the action taken by the Government of the United States of America.

36. In a statement supporting the point of view expressed by the representative of Brazil, the representative of China recalled the terms of the relevant resolutions pertinent to the question, as well as the list of factors set out in the report of the 1953 Ad Hoc Committee on Factors (A/2428). In the light of the foregoing, he analysed the present status of Puerto Rico and concluded that the Territory had achieved almost complete self-government, the most important element in this respect being the freely expressed will of the people. He thought, therefore, that the Committee should comply with the provisions of resolution 448 (V) and submit its views to the General Assembly.

37. The representatives of Iraq and Pakistan, however, expressed the opinion that, irrespective of the competence or ability of the Committee to examine the information and make any pronouncement thereon, it was preferable not to discuss the substance of the question but to refer it without comment to the General Assembly for necessary action.

38. The representative of India made a detailed analysis of the status of Puerto Rico in the light of the factors laid down in the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors. As a result, she concluded that the present status of Puerto Rico did not completely comply with any of the elements of an independent or fully self-governing State as set out for the three categories treated in that report. She appreciated, however, the importance of the fact that the people of Puerto Rico had freely expressed their will in deciding in favour of their present status. As to the procedural aspect of the question, she expressed the view that the Committee should not prejudice the matter since the General Assembly had not yet given its opinion on the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Factors, but should refer the question to the Assembly, following the same procedure as had previously been adopted in the case of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles.

39. In an attempt to reconcile the divergent points of view, the representative of New Zealand submitted a draft resolution, the text of which read as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that resolution 222 (III), adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1948, while welcoming any development of self-government in Non-Self-Governing Territories, considers that it is essential that the United Nations be informed of any change in the constitutional status of any such Territory as a result of which the responsible Government concerned thinks it unnecessary to transmit information in respect of that Territory under Article 73 e of the Charter.

"Having received the communications dated 19 January and 20 March 1953 informing the United Nations of the establishment of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico as a result of the entry into force on 25 July 1952 of the Constitution of Puerto Rico, stating that with the establishment of the Commonwealth the people of Puerto Rico had achieved a full measure of self-government, and announcing the consequent decision by the Government of the United States to cease transmitting information on Puerto Rico under Article 73 e of the Charter,

"Takes note of the communications and documentation transmitted by the United States pursuant to resolution 222 (III) with respect to the attainment of self-government by Puerto Rico."

40. The representative of the Netherlands expressed support for the draft resolution, adding that in his opinion the information before the Committee was sufficient to indicate clearly the self-governing status of Puerto Rico and that the Government of the United States of America was no longer in a position to report on conditions in the Territory.

41. The representative of Pakistan stated that, although he would prefer to pass on the question without comment to the General Assembly, he would also support the draft resolution provided the expression of his views was included in the report of the Committee.

42. The representative of Brazil, recalling the views he had expressed in his previous intervention, felt that he could not support the draft resolution as it contained no expression by the Committee of either approval or disapproval of the communications and documentation submitted by the Government of the United States of America.

43. The representative of India agreed with the views expressed by the representative of Brazil in that the Committee was fully competent to examine the documentation before it and to decide whether the Government of the United States was entitled to cease transmitting information on Puerto Rico under Article 73 e. The Committee as a whole, however, had made no such examination and until there had been a full discussion of the item under consideration she felt unable to support the draft resolution in its present form.

44. Subsequently, the representatives of Brazil, Ecuador, and India proposed amendments to the draft resolution submitted by the representative of New Zealand.

45. The Committee voted on the draft resolution and the amendments thereto with the following results:

46. The substitution, in the superscription of the draft resolution, of "The General Assembly" by "The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories" was adopted by 8 votes to 2, with 5 abstentions.

47. The first paragraph of the preamble of the draft resolution, and its second paragraph as amended by the substitution of the words "in consequence of these constitutional changes the Government of the United States of America would cease to transmit information" for "with the establishment of the Commonwealth the people of Puerto Rico had achieved a full measure of self-government, and announcing the consequent decision by the Government of the United States to cease transmitting information on Puerto Rico", were adopted unanimously.

48. A new third paragraph of the preamble reading:

"Considering that the question of cessation of information on Puerto Rico has been included as item 34 in the provisional agenda of the eighth regular session of the General Assembly," was adopted by 10 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

49. A new fourth paragraph of the preamble reading:

"Bearing in mind paragraph 2 of resolution 448 (V), in which the General Assembly requested the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to examine such information as may be transmitted and to report thereon to the General Assembly," was adopted unanimously.

50. A new fifth paragraph of the preamble reading:

"Having examined the documentation transmitted in the light of the basic principles of Chapter XI of the Charter," was adopted by 5 votes to one, with 9 abstentions.

51. In the operative part, the substitution of the single paragraph of the draft resolution by a new paragraph 1 reading:

"1. Takes note that the people of Puerto Rico, after expressing their will in a free and democratic way, have achieved a new constitutional status;"

was adopted by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

52. New paragraphs 2, 3 and 4, reading:

"2. Considers that, when deciding in favour of its commonwealth status, the people of Puerto Rico voted in favour of their new constitutional status;"

"3. Expresses the opinion that it stems from the documentation provided that the association of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico with the United States of America constitutes a mutually agreed association;"

"4. Takes note that the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico states that its people have attained internal self-government;"

were each adopted by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

53. A new paragraph 5, reading:

"5. Notes with satisfaction the political advancement achieved by the people of Puerto Rico;"

was adopted by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

54. A new paragraph 6 proposed in the amendment read as follows:

"6. Takes note—in the limits of its terms of reference, and without anticipating the disposal of this question by the General Assembly—that the information before it indicates that the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico may be considered as falling outside the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter;"

At the request of the representative of the United Kingdom, a separate vote was taken on the deletion of the words "in the limits of its terms of reference, and without anticipating the disposal of this question by the General Assembly". As the result of a tie vote of 6 in favour, 6 against and 3 abstentions, the words were first deleted. At the request of the representative of Iraq, the remainder of new paragraph 6 was voted on by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Australia, Brazil, China, Cuba, Ecuador, France, Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom, the United States of America.

Against: Iraq.

Abstentions: Denmark, India, Indonesia, Pakistan.

On a motion for reconsideration of the voting on the deletion of the words quoted above, proposed by the representative of the United States, the words were reinstated by 8 votes to one, with 6 abstentions. The new paragraph 6 as proposed in the amendments was then adopted by 10 votes to one, with 4 abstentions, in a roll-call vote as follows:

In favour: Australia, Brazil, China, Cuba, Ecuador, France, India, Netherlands, the United Kingdom, the United States of America.

Against: Iraq.

Abstentions: Denmark, Indonesia, New Zealand, Pakistan.

55. A new paragraph 7 proposed in the amendments read as follows:

"7. Takes note of the opinion of the former Administering Authority that it is no longer necessary or appropriate to transmit information on Puerto Rico under Article 73 e of the Charter."

By 5 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions, it was first decided to retain the word "former" but it was subsequently unanimously decided to substitute for the words "former Administering Authority" the words "United States Government", and the paragraph as thus amended was adopted by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

56. The draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

57. Following the adoption of the resolution, statements in explanation of their votes were made by several representatives.

58. The representative of Pakistan stated that in view of his earlier statements it would have been logical for him to have voted against the draft resolution. Out of regard, however, for the delegations which had submitted the draft resolution and the amendments thereto, and in order to show his appreciation for the laudable work carried out by the United States in Puerto Rico, he had abstained.

59. Having previously drawn the attention of the Committee to the fact that there had not been a full examination of the subject by the Committee, the representative of India stated that she had abstained in the vote on the fifth paragraph of the preamble as proposed in the amendments. In the circumstances, she would have preferred the question passed on to the General Assembly without comment. She had voted in favour of operative paragraphs 6 and 7, as well as of the resolution as a whole, since it did not prejudice any decision that might be taken by the General Assembly. Her affirmative vote should not, however, be interpreted as binding on future action by her delegation and she reserved the right for it to make known its views when the question came before the General Assembly.

60. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his delegation had not judged it necessary or appropriate to study the documentation nor had it participated in the discussion on their substance. He noted with satisfaction the great progress made in Puerto Rico and recognized without hesitation that the Puerto Rican people themselves were fully exercising the powers and functions which they had been granted. For his delegation, it was sufficient to know that the Government of the United States of America had, in the circumstances, decided to cease transmitting information under Article 73 e on the Territory. Furthermore, the people concerned had declared themselves satisfied with their present status. It was unfortunate that the resolution adopted contained a conclusion of the Committee rather than submitting a recommendation for consideration of the General Assembly. In adopting the resolution, the Committee had to a certain extent gone beyond its terms of reference, and he drew attention to the fact that in the past, and notably in the case of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, the only resolutions the Committee had adopted in its own name were those concerning procedure or the organization of its work. Since the majority of the Committee had appeared ready to discard the usual procedure and thus assume the heavy responsibility of urging the Committee to an independent decision, his delegation had not opposed the questionable passages of the draft resolution but had abstained in the vote on these passages while voting in favour of the resolution as a whole. Nevertheless, this affirmative vote should not be taken as indicating that, in the opinion of the United Kingdom delegation, the Committee was competent to examine the Constitution of Puerto Rico or that the United Nations had a determining voice in deciding whether or not the United States Government should continue to transmit information under Article 73 e on that Territory.

61. The representative of France observed that the resolution posed questions of principle and questions of fact. As to questions of principle, he recalled that the only obligation incumbent on Administering Members under the Charter was that contained in Article 73 e to transmit information, limited to certain considerations. Paragraph 7 of Article 2 of the Charter precluded the United Nations from interfering in the domestic affairs of Member States. Thus, in the case of the cessation of information on a Non-Self-Governing Territory, Administering Members were only required to transmit, for the information of the Secretary-General, documentation concerning the circumstances in which they had decided to cease transmitting information, in conformity with resolution 222 (III). The Government of the United States had acted correctly in submitting documentation concerning the constitutional changes in the status of Puerto Rico and in amplifying this with additional information, but there could be no doubt in the opinion of the French delegation that the Committee was not entitled to examine the conditions in which the Government of the United States had been led to take its decision, still less to discuss and adopt a resolution thereon. It could even be said that the Committee had gone beyond the limits of its competence since, according to the provisions of resolution 448 (V), it was invited only to study the documentation and to report thereon. This was, however, a point of secondary importance since, in his opinion, resolution 448 (V) was itself unacceptable in the sense that it was outside the scope of the Charter. In these circumstances it would have been logical for him to abstain in the vote on the resolution as a whole had there not existed questions of fact. These were, that after having taken note of the precise documentation correctly submitted by the United States Government, the French delegation had come to the conclusion that not only was that Government entitled, in conformity with the spirit and letter of the Charter, to cease transmitting information on Puerto Rico, but further that in the existing circumstances it was physically and constitutionally impossible for it to do otherwise. It was thus difficult for the French delegation to ignore this evident fact—one, moreover, which marked an important step in the history of Non-Self-Governing Territories. In order to show its faith in the Government of the United States, which had followed a generous and wise policy, as well as to express to the Puerto Rican people the sincere interest with which his delegation had watched the progress achieved by the Territory, and in spite of his objections in principle, he voted in favour of the resolution, though he would have preferred the original draft resolution submitted by New Zealand. His scruples had been further overcome by the fact that the United States Government had not considered that the resolution infringed its constitutional sovereignty, and had itself supported it. In conclusion, and in order to avoid any misunderstanding, the representative of France wished to state formally that by his affirmative vote, the French delegation in no way recognized the principle of the competence of the General Assembly or any of its organs to examine cases of such nature and to deal with them. In this respect, he recalled that, on 19 November 1952, in the Fourth Committee he had stated formally that, in the view of the French Government, the competence of the Administering Members in respect of the Territories for which they were responsible could not be affected, reduced or subjected to any control by virtue of any decision of the General Assembly. Besides these reservations of principle in connexion with the specific case of the cessation of the transmission of information, he thought it necessary to recall those more general reservations which had been voiced at the opening of the present session in the name of the French Government.

62. The representative of Australia stated that, in the opinion of his delegation, the Government of the United States of America had correctly followed the procedure laid down and had taken a decision the validity of which was incontestable. He recalled that his delegation had abstained in the vote on both resolution 222 (III) and resolution 448 (V) since they imposed on Administering Members obligations outside the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter. The Committee was not entitled to discuss political conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the representative of Australia invited it to follow the example of his delegation in interpreting the word "examine" in resolution 448 (V) in a restricted sense. He pointed out that when the Committee was renewed only resolutions 332 (IV) and 333 (IV) were mentioned in connexion with the terms of reference and provisions of work of the Committee. These considerations had influenced the voting of his delegation. Thus he had abstained on the new fifth paragraph of the preamble as proposed in the amendments as well as in the vote on the amendment changing the superscription of the draft resolution, since he supported the contention of the representative of the United Kingdom that the Committee was not competent to adopt a resolution on this subject and that it was only entitled to formulate a recommendation for consideration of the General Assembly.

63. The representative of Indonesia stated that she had abstained in the vote on the draft resolution as a whole and reserved the position of her delegation when the question came before the General Assembly.

64. The representative of the United States of America stated that the sole aim of his Government in submitting the documentation on this subject was to assist the United Nations in every way possible to carry out its functions. At the same time, the United States did not recognize in this connexion any authority other than that of its own Government and the Government of Puerto Rico. In fact, his delegation would have abstained in the vote on the draft resolution had it not wished, by casting an affirmative vote, to pay homage to the part played by the Committee and, in particular, by the representatives of Brazil and of Ecuador.

65. The representative of Denmark held the view, in the same manner as did the representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Australia, that the Charter in no way authorized the United Nations to intervene in the constitutional affairs of any State. He had voted in favour of the draft resolution because it contained conclusions which his delegation could support and he wished to associate himself with the congratulations extended to the Government of the United States.

66. The representative of Brazil was of the opinion that the final decision in regard to the cessation of the transmission of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories rested with the United Nations. He appreciated the reasons which had led the Administering Members to reserve their rights in this connexion, but he was convinced that when concrete cases were under discussion it would always be possible to reconcile the points of view and to arrive at conclusions satisfactory to all concerned.

67. The text of the resolution as adopted is as follows:

"The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"Considering that resolution 222 (III), adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1948, while welcoming any development of self-government in Non-Self-Governing Territories, considers that it is essential that the United Nations be informed of any change in the constitutional status of any such Territory as a result of which the responsible Government concerned thinks it unnecessary to transmit in- formation in respect of that Territory under Article 73 e of the Charter,

"Having received the communications dated 19 January and 20 March 1953 informing the United Nations of the establishment of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico as a result of the entry into force on 25 July 1952 of the Constitution of Puerto Rico, stating that in consequence of these constitutional changes the Government of the United States would cease to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter,

"Considering that the question of cessation of information on Puerto Rico has been included as item 34 in the provisional agenda of the eighth regular session of the General Assembly,

"Bearing in mind paragraph 2 of resolution 448 (V), in which the General Assembly requested the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to examine such information as may be transmitted and to report thereon to the General Assembly,

"Having examined the documentation transmitted in the light of the basic principles of Chapter XI of the Charter,

"1. Takes note that the people of Puerto Rico, after expressing their will in a free and democratic way, have achieved a new constitutional status;

"2. Considers that, when deciding in favour of its Commonwealth status, the people of Puerto Rico voted in favour of their new constitutional status;

"3. Expresses the opinion that it stems from the documentation provided that the association of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico with the United States of America constitutes a mutually agreed association;

"4. Takes note that the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico states that its people have attained internal self-government.

"5. Notes with satisfaction the political advancement achieved by the people of Puerto Rico;

"6. Takes note—in the limits of its terms of reference, and without anticipating the disposal of this question by the General Assembly—that the information before it indicates that the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico may be considered as falling outside the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter;

"7. Takes note of the opinion of the United States Government that it is no longer necessary or appropriate to transmit information on Puerto Rico under Article 73 e of the Charter."

VIII. Social conditions

68. In conformity with resolution 333 (IV) setting out its work and with resolution 643 (VII) approving the special report of the Committee in 1952 as a brief but considered indication of social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories and of the problems of social development, the Committee had before it information on social conditions prepared by the Secretary-General and questions arising out of the special report approved by the General Assembly in 1952.

69. The Committee discussed this item at its 85th meeting. Statements were made by the representatives of India, Iraq, the United Kingdom and France, while the representative of WHO gave a review of the activities and work programme of that organization as they applied in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

70. The representative of India pointed out that the movement of people from rural to urban areas had led to a tragic aggravation of the social problems of most Territories. Furthermore, the information revealed that drastic reductions had been made in the expenditures on social development. Racial discrimination was still prevalent in many Non-Self-Governing Territories, while the status of women was still an inferior one and corporal punishment was still practised, particularly in many Territories under United Kingdom administration.

71. The representative of Iraq recognized the importance of the financial aspect of the problem of social development. He acknowledged that the Administering Members, and more particularly the United Kingdom and France, had contributed considerable amounts of money to the development of their Territories, but he stressed the fact that these States were in a position to dispose of the resources of their Territories. He drew the attention of the Committee to the lack and insufficiency of the statistical data available to the Committee.

72. The representative of the United Kingdom referred to the Committee's report of 1952 on social development. He gave various examples of how the social problems dealt with in that report had been treated in a practical manner in different Territories under United Kingdom administration, including such questions as the training of medical personnel, housing programmes, especially the aided-self-help schemes, and the development of trade unions.

73. The representative of France gave a review of the progress of social conditions which had been carried out in French Territories and answered some of the criticisms made by the representative of Iraq in respect to social conditions in Morocco and Tunisia, with particular reference to the wages of agricultural workers in Morocco and membership of trade unions, which he stated was open to Moroccans.

IX. Economic conditions

74. Both in accordance with the provisions of its work set out in resolution 333 (IV) and with resolution 564 (VI) wherein the General Assembly approved the special report of the Committee in 1951 on economic conditions and problems of economic development in Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee had before it the Secretary-General's summaries and analyses of information concerning economic conditions and the consideration of any questions arising out of the special report adopted by the General Assembly in 1951.

75. The Committee discussed this item at its 85th and 86th meetings. Statements were made by the representatives of India, Pakistan, the United Kingdom, Brazil, Iraq and France.

76. The representatives of Pakistan, India and Brazil expressed their concern about the effects that the fall in the world market prices of raw materials was having on the economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

77. The representatives of the United Kingdom and France gave an account of the various solutions which had been devised in order to meet such a situation. These included the establishment of reserve funds sustained by increases in direct and indirect taxation and the operations of marketing boards.

78. The representatives of India, Brazil and Iraq held the view that the economic policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was not directed primarily to the benefit of the indigenous inhabitants. They referred to such problems as trade relations between metropolitan countries and their Territories; industrial production versus production of consumer goods; reinvestment of profits in the Territories; the part played by the indigenous inhabitants in the economic activities of the Territories; and questions of land distribution.

79. The representatives of France and the United Kingdom answered some of these criticisms by pointing out that capital investment in Non-Self-Governing Territories entailed many risks and often did not yield immediate returns. They stressed the fact that the Territories benefited from the development of their resources since profits largely remained in the Territories through the medium of capital formation, salaries, wages and local purchases. The representative of the United Kingdom emphasized the fact that in most of the Territories under the administration of his Government the major part of the agricultural production was in the hands of indigenous producers, while the representative of France cited the various advantages derived by the Non-Self-Governing Territories from their connexion with the metropolitan country. In order to illustrate these statements, particular references were made to economic conditions in the Federation of Malaya, Northern Rhodesia, Morocco and Tunisia.

X. The Secretary-General's summaries and analyses of information

80. The Committee had before it statistical summaries and analyses of the information transmitted under Article 73 e relating to 1952, together with relevant statistics for the previous two years prepared by the Secretary-General in accordance with paragraph 4 (b) of resolution 218 (III).

81. The Committee discussed this item of its agenda at its 86th meeting. The representatives of the United Kingdom, India and the United States of America commented briefly on the form and content of the summaries of information. The representative of India remarked on the difficulty experienced by delegations when there was delay in the receipt of information, with a consequent delay in distribution of the relevant documents. The representative of the United States of America pointed out that delay was sometimes unavoidable and often outside the control of the Administering Member concerned.

82. In the course of the discussion, stress was laid on the value of information showing the general trends in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, as requested in section C of the Explanatory Preface of the Standard Form.

XI. International collaboration in respect of economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, including information on technical assistance

83. The General Assembly, in resolution 445 (V), confirmed "its recognition of the importance of international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories as expressed in resolution 331 (VI)," which latter resolution invited the specialized agencies to communicate annually to the United Nations information on the progress of work undertaken by them which would be of service in Non-Self-Governing Territories. In resolution 444 (V), the Administering Members needing technical assistance for the economic, social and educational advancement of their Non-Self-Governing Territories were invited to submit their requests and also to include in the information transmitted by them a report on technical assistance received from the United Nations and the specialized agencies. Furthermore, in resolution 336 (IV) the General Assembly requested "the Secretary-General to keep the Committee informed of the nature of the technical assistance which is accorded from time to time to Non-Self-Governing Territories by specialized international bodies".

84. In the light of the above, the Secretary-General had prepared documents setting out details of international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions and of technical assistance accorded to Non-Self-Governing Territories by the United Nations and the specialized agencies, while memoranda concerning activities in their respective fields of interest to Non-Self-Governing Territories were submitted by FAO, UNESCO and WHO.

85. The Committee discussed these questions as a specific item of its agenda at its 86th and 87th meetings. In addition, reference to international collaboration and technical assistance were made during the Committee's other discussions on economic, social and educational conditions.

86. Statements were made by the representatives of Australia, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States of America. The representatives of ILO and UNESCO also made statements, in which they outlined the collaboration of their respective organizations with Administering Members in the carrying out of programmes of work in the Territories and gave details of the technical assistance sought and accorded to various Territories.

87. In general, the representatives of the six Administering Members gave accounts of the collaboration existing between them and the Territories under their administration, with each other and with specialized agencies, in regional commissions and conferences, as well as of the technical assistance being afforded to their Territories from both metropolitan and international sources.

XII. Voluntary transmission of information

88. In resolution 327 (IV), the General Assembly recalled the statement made in resolution 144 (II) that the voluntary transmission of information on the development of self-governing institutions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and its summarizing by the Secretary-General were entirely in conformity with the spirit of Article 73 of the Charter and therefore should be duly noted and encouraged, and expressed the hope that such of the Members as had not done so might voluntarily include details on the government of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the information transmitted by them under Article 73 e. In addition, in resolution 637 B (VII), the General Assembly recommended "States Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories voluntarily to include in the information transmitted by them under Article 73 e of the Charter details regarding the extent to which the right of peoples and nations to self-determination is exercised by the peoples of those Territories, and in particular regarding their political progress and the measures taken to develop their capacity for self-administration, to satisfy their political aspirations and to promote the progressive development of their free political institutions"; and decided to place the resolution on the agenda of the Committee at its present session.

89. The Committee considered this item at its 87th meeting. The representative of Pakistan stated that the information requested should be voluntarily transmitted and that in resolution 637 (VII) the General Assembly had expressed a recommendation to this end. The Administering Members had declared that their policy was to lead the peoples of their Non-Self-Governing Territories towards self-government. All that was desired was information on the steps being taken by them to achieve this objective.

XIII. Participation of representatives from Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee

90. In resolution 647 (VII), the General Assembly, recalling resolution 566 (VI) and recognizing that direct participation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories could be of further assistance in promoting the progress of those Territories and their peoples towards the goals set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter, invited the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to study further the question of the direct participation, in its discussions on economic, social and educational conditions, of representatives of those Territories the inhabitants of which had attained a wide measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies and to include recommendations on this question in its report to the General Assembly at its eighth session.

91. In order to bring up to date information submitted to the Committee at its previous session, relating to existing forms of association and provisions in constitutions of international bodies, the Secretary-General had prepared a memorandum drawing the attention of the Committee to such changes as had occurred in connexion with associate membership and constitutional provisions of certain international bodies during the intervening period.

92. The Committee discussed this item at its 87th and 88th meetings.

93. A joint draft resolution was submitted by Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, India and Pakistan, which read as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"Whereas the direct participation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies has been recognized as an effective means of promoting the progress of the population of these Territories towards a status of equality with the Members States of the United Nations,

"Whereas it has been recognized that the direct participation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories can be of further assistance in promoting the progress of these Territories and their peoples towards the goals set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations,

"Whereas the Administering Powers have been invited to make possible the association of qualified indigenous representatives in the work of the Committee,

"Considering the technical difficulties advanced by the Administering Powers on the question of accepting the collaboration of Non-Self-Governing Territories as "associate members" in the work of the Committee,

"Considering that the principle of unity of representation must be maintained,

"Noting that the Member States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories have from time to time attached indigenous persons from the Territories to their delegations,

"Considering that this practice should be stimulated and developed in a regular manner,

"1. Invites the Member States which administer Non-Self-Governing Territories to attach to their delegations—as members of the delegations, but duly qualified to act as spokesman of their local governments—indigenous representatives from Non-Self-Governing Territories, the inhabitants of which have attained a large measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies;

"2. Invites those Administering Powers to accredit such spokesmen for the Territories, taking into account the provisions of the preceding paragraph, when informing the Secretary-General of the composition of their delegations."

94. The sponsors, in presenting the joint draft resolution, emphasized that they were motivated by a desire to meet, as far as possible, the main objections of the Administering Members, more particularly in respect to the principle of unity of representation. Furthermore, they wished to reach a conclusion in this matter, in a manner that would be satisfactory from all points of view. The representative of Iraq expressed his support for the joint draft resolution, although he did not find it far-reaching enough to achieve the results desired by his delegation.

95. The representative of France, while commending the spirit of compromise and conciliation which had inspired the sponsors of the joint draft resolution, expressed strong doubts regarding the possibility of its implementation in practice. He pointed out that his delegation could not countenance the possibility that indigenous representatives from the Non-Self-Governing Territories might express before the Committee views not in accordance with the lines of policy laid down by his Government. The reference to "Territories, the inhabitants of which have attained a large measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies" had broad and controversial implications which were in contradiction to the terms of reference of the Committee. Serious difficulties were also likely to arise in regard to the designation of such representatives since it was not clear who could assume this responsibility. For these and other reasons, he suggested that a more practical solution would be the appointment of indigenous experts as members of the delegations of Administering Members and to this end he proposed the following amendments to the joint draft resolution:

"1. Paragraph 1 of the operative part to be amended to read:

"Invites the Member States which administer Non-Self-Governing Territories to attach to their delegations to the Committee on Information as members of the delegations indigenous experts possessing suitable qualifications in economics, social affairs and education.

"2. Paragraph 2 of the operative part to be deleted."

96. The representative of the United States of America commended the sponsors of the joint draft resolution on the spirit that had motivated them, and especially in having incorporated the principle of unity of representation. He proposed a number of amendments, the incorporation of which would make the joint draft resolution more acceptable to his delegation.

97. The representative of the United Kingdom, while recognizing the value of the participation of representatives from the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee, expressed doubts as to the feasibility of such a policy. He instanced the case of the Territories under United Kingdom administration, which were numerous and widely scattered over the world. Moreover, the qualified indigenous representatives in the Territories were carrying out important tasks which rarely allowed them to be absent for any length of time. His delegation would accept the invitation conveyed in the joint draft resolution in the spirit in which it had been extended, reserving nevertheless the full right of his Government to make appointments to its delegations as it wished.

98. The Committee voted on the joint draft resolution and the amendments thereto with the following results:

Preamble

99. First paragraph. The sponsors of the joint draft resolution having accepted the United States amendments to substitute "association" for "participation" and "considered" for "recognized", this paragraph, as amended, was adopted by 9 votes to 3, with 3 abstentions.

100. Second paragraph. The sponsors having accepted the United States amendment to substitute "association" for "participation", this paragraph as amended, was adopted by 10 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

101. Third paragraph. The sponsors having accepted the United States amendment to substitute "representative inhabitants of the Territories" for "indigenous representatives", this paragraph, as amended, was adopted by 12 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

102. Fourth and fifth paragraphs. These were adopted unanimously.

103. Sixth paragraph. The sponsors having accepted the United States amendment to substitute "representative inhabitants" for "indigenous persons", this paragraph, as amended, was adopted unanimously.

104. Seventh paragraph. The sponsors having agreed to delete the words "in a regular manner", the United States withdrew its amendment to this paragraph, which was adopted unanimously, as amended by the sponsors.

105. Operative paragraph 1. The French amendment was rejected by 8 votes to 7.

106. The representative of the United Kingdom made an oral amendment to change the wording of the latter part of the paragraph so as to read "indigenous representatives specially qualified to speak on these matters as they relate to these Territories" in place of "specially qualified indigenous representatives to speak for the Territories on these matters," the sponsors' revision of their original wording. This amendment was adopted by 12 votes to one, with 2 abstentions.

107. The representative of the United States of America proposed the insertion, after the words "their delegations", of the words "without prejudice to the principle of unity of representation", which was adopted by 12 votes to one, with 2 abstentions. A further amendment proposed by the representative of Brazil to alter this amendment to read "without prejudice to the principle stated in the fifth paragraph of the preamble" was adopted by 12 votes to one, with 2 abstentions. The paragraph, as thus amended, was adopted by 12 votes to one, with 2 abstentions.

108. Operative paragraph 2. The French amendment to delete this paragraph was adopted by 8 votes to 7.

109. The joint draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 12 votes to one, with 2 abstentions. The resolution, as adopted, is set out in annex II.

110. Statements in explanation of their votes were made by the representatives of Australia, France, the Netherlands, Pakistan, India, the United Kingdom, New Zealand and Brazil.

XIV. Future work of the Committee

111. In accordance with the provisions of its work set out in resolution 333 (IV), the Committee, at its second session in 1951, had devoted special attention to economic conditions and problems of development in Non-Self-Governing Territories. In conformity with indications expressed by the Committee that it would devote special attention to the same field at its fifth session in 1954, the Secretary-General prepared a note setting out a provisional list of subjects in the economic field which might merit study by the Committee and serve as the basis of work of the Secretariat.

112. The Committee discussed its future programme of work at its 87th and 88th meetings. Statements were made by the representatives of Iraq, India, Brazil, the United Kingdom and France.

113. The Committee agreed that, in regard to the choice of subjects to be treated in the general field of economic conditions and in regard to any suggestions for a provisional agenda of the fifth session of the Committee in 1954, the Secretary-General should prepare studies, taking account of the suggestions put forward by the representatives of India, Brazil and the United Kingdom in the discussion of this item in particular, as well as of the general trend of discussions on other items during this session of the Committee, and in regard to the subjects treated in the 1951 special report on economic conditions.

Resolutions submitted for the consideration of the General Assembly

The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories submits the following draft resolutions for the consideration of the General Assembly:

A. DRAFT RESOLUTION ON EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

The General Assembly,

Considering that, by resolution 445 (V) adopted on 12 December 1950, it approved the special report on education drawn up in 1950 as a brief but considered indication of the importance of educational advancement and of the problems still to be faced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories,

Noting the further report prepared in 1953 by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on educational conditions in these Territories,

1. Approves this further report of the Committee as a supplement to the report approved in 1950;

2. Invites the Secretary-General to communicate it to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned for their consideration.

B. DRAFT RESOLUTION ON THE ASSOCIATION OF REPRESENTATIVES FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES IN THE WORK OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

The General Assembly,

Whereas the direct association of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies has been considered as an effective means of promoting the progress of the populations of these Territories towards a status of equality with the Member States of the United Nations,

Whereas it has been recognized that the direct association of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories can be of further assistance in promoting the progress of these Territories and their peoples towards the goals set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations,

Whereas the Administering Members have been invited to make possible the association of qualified representative inhabitants of the Territories in the work of the Committee,

Considering the technical difficulties advanced by the Administering Members on the question of accepting the collaboration of Non-Self-Governing Territories as "associate members" in the work of the Committee,

Considering that the principle of unity of representation must be maintained,

Noting that the Member States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories have from time to time attached representative inhabitants of the Territories to their delegations,

Considering that this practice should be stimulated and developed,

Invites the Member States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories, the inhabitants of which have attained a large measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies, to attach to their delegations, without prejudice to the principle stated in the fifth paragraph of the preamble, indigenous representatives specially qualified to speak on these matters as they relate to these Territories.

REPORT ON EDUCATION IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

I. Introduction

1. In 1950, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories prepared a special report on education.<sup>1</sup> The General Assembly, by resolution 445 (V) adopted on 12 December 1950, approved the report as a brief but considered indication of the importance of educational advancement and of the problems still to be faced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and invited the Secretary-General to communicate it to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories and to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization for their consideration.

2. In 1953, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories is once again called upon to pay particular attention to problems of education. It has approached this task on the basis of the information transmitted by the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories and in the light of the views expressed by the Committee in its 1950 report.

II. General

3. The Committee in 1950 prefaced its comments on the various educational problems considered by the following general principles:

"(a) A realization of the need for education is widespread and strong. Even though there are resistances to be overcome and the content and purposes of education are not always well understood, the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories require assurance that all practical steps are being taken as rapidly as possible to provide them with adequate means of education;

"(b) Education in its broadest sense is a necessary basis for progress in economic, social, cultural and political knowledge and responsibility;

"(c) There would be an inadequacy and even a folly in regarding general literacy or universal school attendance or any other fundamental objective of programmes of instruction as an end in itself;

"(d) Nevertheless, the extension of schooling and the raising both of literacy rates and of the standard expressed by the term 'literacy' are prerequisites for the raising of general conditions in all fields;

"(e) The administrative solution of the problems of education in Non-Self-Governing Territories, as elsewhere, must be solidly based on the economic resources, cultural aspirations and general conditions of the peoples;

"(f) The existence of limitations imposed by reasons of finance on necessary developments in all aspects of economic and social life is recognized. Yet it is hoped that a still wider recognition of the essential importance of education will result in devoting the maximum available resources to its furtherance."

4. Having regard to the above principles, the Committee in 1950 expressed more detailed but still general views on the eradication of illiteracy, the language of instruction in education, equal treatment, the participation of the inhabitants in educational policy, administration, higher education and teacher training. It marked the relationship of its work with that of UNESCO in the following passage:<sup>2</sup>

"The Special Committee had been informed of the work of UNESCO in this field and of its intention to convene, in 1951, a meeting of experts, one of the working groups of which will study the fight against illiteracy. The Special Committee expresses the hope that this meeting will be of substantial assistance to the Administering Members in their efforts against illiteracy, that the Secretary-General will be able to collaborate in any necessary studies in respect of information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, and that information will continue to be supplied to the United Nations on the measures taken and on the services which UNESCO has been able to provide for any of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

"In stating this, the Special Committee is aware that its composition and terms of reference make it in no sense a replica of UNESCO. Its task is to examine the information transmitted on Non-Self-Governing Territories with a view to facilitating, in the field of education, as indeed in other fields, within the limits of its own competence, the fulfilment of the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter. Nevertheless, its continued and continuing interest in the collaboration which may be established between the Administering Members and UNESCO in the interests of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories is natural and inevitable."

5. Even though the period of time which has elapsed since the last report on education is so brief, there are indications in the information before the Committee that the importance of educational advancement has been increasingly stressed in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and also that there has been an appreciable increase in the educational facilities available in many of them.

6. Available information on progress in school enrolment in fifty-nine Non-Self-Governing Territories shows that between 1945-1946 and 1951 the number of children enrolled in schools increased from over five million to over seven million.

7. The advance in university education during recent years is another test of progress. In 1952, in Territories under United Kingdom administration, there were 3,234 full time students in the new or restored territorial university institutions while, on 1 January 1953, over 6,000 students were attending such institutions in the United Kingdom and in the Irish Republic compared with under 4,000 on 1 January 1950. The increase in enrolment at French metropolitan universities by students from overseas Territories has also been marked, the number reaching by mid-1952 a total of 2,012, comprising indigenous and non-indigenous students from North Africa and 1,760 from the other overseas Territories. Higher education in the Territories has expanded at the same time. In North Africa, for instance, the institutes of higher studies have now a total enrolment of 3,392 students, and that of French West Africa a total of 297 students. In the Territories under United States administration, there are over 20,000 students in university institutions.

8. The expenditure on the various forms of education has generally increased both absolutely and as a percentage of general expenditure. In seven African Territories under United Kingdom administration (Gold Coast, Kenya, Nigeria, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, Sierra Leone, Uganda), 1946 recurrent expenditure on African education amounting to £2,100,000 increased to £6,100,000 by the latest year available (1950, 1951 or 1952). In French Equatorial Africa, the recurrent budget for education for 1952 was 1,495 million metropolitan francs and in French West Africa the budget of the various Territories, excluding grants from the metropolitan country, was 7,420 million metropolitan francs. In Madagascar, the budget for education rose from 1,373 million metropolitan francs in 1951 to 1,955 million in 1952. In Morocco and Tunisia, the budgets for recurrent expenditures, excluding capital outlay, amount in 1953 to 7,814 million and 6,131 million metropolitan francs respectively. In the Belgian Congo, the corresponding 1948 budget figure of 188 million francs was reported to have increased to 482 million francs by 1952. Expressed in the terms of local currencies, 20,500 thousands of units were spent on education in the Federation of Malaya and Singapore in 1948 and 92,872 in 1951; in Jamaica, 780 in 1948 and 1,578 in 1950.

9. Figures such as the above must be read in conjunction with many other facts which show how much remains to be done. The figures on the increase in school enrolment have to be balanced by the situation in many parts of Africa where less than one-tenth of the children are attending school; they do not show that there and elsewhere a large proportion of the children enrolled fail, or are unable, to remain at school for anything approaching the minimum period required for the laying of the first foundation of a literate education. There are, in general, fewer girls than boys in primary schools and still fewer in secondary schools. Again, while the proportion of government revenue spent on education is from 15 to 20 per cent or more of territorial revenue in a number of Territories, it falls far below 10 per cent in many others. In general, the opportunities for school attendance are far below the demands and the needs of the peoples of the Territories.

10. When the wider aspects of education are considered, the call for accelerated action is all the more striking. Not only is there too little education, with too few schools and too short a period of schooling, but in most cases the quality of education is open to criticism. The need for education has increased, the problems have become even more complex, and the whole process of aiding the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to attain self-government is hindered by inadequacies in their education. Even though the Administering Members have, in their various Territories, done much to introduce and to develop education, sometimes with spectacular results, the education which is being provided does not yet satisfy the needs of the peoples either in quantity or in quality.

11. On previous occasions, the Committee drew attention to the international principles and to the national declarations of policy which guided it in its work. The former include Articles 1, 55 and 73 of the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. In the present commentary on education in Non-Self-Governing Territories, it is of value to repeat Article 26, paragraph 2 of the Declaration, which reads as follows:

"Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality and to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. It shall promote understanding, tolerance and friendship among all nations, racial or religious groups, and shall further the activities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace."

12. In the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the objectives of education should be (a) to develop moral and civic consciousness and responsibility among the peoples, and to enable them to take an increasing share of responsibility in the conduct of their own affairs; (b) to raise the standards of living of the people by helping them to improve their economic productivity and standards of health; (c) to promote the social progress of the Territories, taking into account the basic cultural values and the aspirations of the peoples concerned; (d) to secure the extension of the intellectual development of the peoples so as to provide for them access to all levels of culture. Education is thus an integral part of general progress, reaching the adults as well as the children and aiming at the highest possible development of the individual in the changing society of which he forms part. In the Non-Self-Governing Territories, this process will include familiarity and training to use the tools of economic, social and political advance so that a full measure of self-government can be attained.

III. Equality of opportunity

13. The Committee, in 1950, stated that in the field of education no principle is more important than that of equality of opportunity for all racial, religious and cultural groups of the population. It went on to present certain consequential considerations in relation to circumstances where different school systems are established for the different groups in the population. In 1952, when the Committee considered social conditions, it drew attention to the 1950 views in connexion with the problem of race relations. It added that another aspect of the race problem relates to the content of education and to the need to encourage in all groups a recognition of the cultural contribution of each to the general life of the community and an understanding of the local and universal interdependence of human beings.

14. The Committee considers that the betterment of human relations in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and access to equal opportunities in education for all children are points of such fundamental importance that it should continue to focus attention on them. It notes that even in the brief period since 1950 there has been a tendency, in some of the Territories inhabited by plural communities, to create a national school system, while a second tendency is for the institutions of higher education to seek pupils from all groups, even in regions where at the lower stages of education separate school systems are maintained. These are favourable developments, if the cultural needs of the various groups are respected. Even so, there remain wide differences in the educational facilities open to children of different groups in some of the Territories under consideration; compulsory education in certain Territories in Africa is applied to all but African children; there is a wide diversity in the sums spent on the education of each child according to the category assigned to him by law; there are systems where the provision for the culture of a particular group of children is such that modern education is difficult to link with traditional values.

15. All these are situations in which the United Nations must be closely interested, in virtue of its own principles and in the light of the evolution in race relations which is taking place in the world today and which vitally affects many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Through education for all there is a need to emphasize basic human dignity and to help in the understanding of those cultures that have come newly into contact with one another. Too often western civilization has brought with it an implied disapproval of indigenous traditions; too often indigenous aspirations have sought the externals of western civilization. The consequence may be that the resulting amalgam of cultures, if of potential value, is acquired at the expense of self-confidence or of tolerance, both of which are required in the exercise of a self-government contributory to world peace.

IV. Language of instruction

16. The General Assembly, by resolution 329 (IV) adopted on 2 December 1949, invited the Administering Members (a) to promote the use of the indigenous languages in the Territories under their administration; (b) to make these languages where and whenever possible the languages of instruction in elementary, primary and secondary schools without prejudice to the use of any other language; (c) to include in their reports to the Secretary-General information on the scope and results of such steps. It further invited the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to undertake an over-all study of the question, more particularly the measures which might be taken with a view to the speediest use of indigenous languages as vehicles of instruction in schools, taking into consideration the desires of the inhabitants and the experience of other States in this matter.

17. In 1950, in its special report on education, the Committee recorded its view on this subject. Since then, UNESCO has further studied the problem of the use of vernacular languages as vehicles of instruction, both in school and out of school, and the related problem of teaching in languages other than the vernacular and has reported to the Committee.

18. UNESCO experts now accept that there is nothing in the structure of any language which precludes it from becoming a vehicle of modern civilization. They accept as axiomatic, on psychological, sociological and educational grounds, that the best medium for teaching a child is his mother tongue. Consequently, they recommend that every effort should be made to provide education in the mother tongue to as late a stage in education as possible. However, they recognize that it is not always possible to use the mother tongue in school and that there is no one solution to the question of the choice of the language of instruction. Many obstacles of a political, linguistic, educational, socio-cultural, economic, financial and practical nature may impede or condition the use of the mother tongue (The Use of Vernacular Languages in Education).

19. The conclusions reached by UNESCO confirm and elaborate the views expressed by this Committee in 1950. The opinion of UNESCO is that, having reviewed the problem in general in 1947 and in subsequent years, its programme has now moved to a more particular study of special aspects of second language teaching and of the methodology of teaching reading and writing.

20. The Committee notes with appreciation the work accomplished under the auspices of UNESCO, and expresses its continued interest in the further study of the practical problems and the solutions with a view to their implementation in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

V. Other developments since 1950

21. A number of the details of educational changes since 1950 were supplied to the Committee in the studies prepared by the Secretariat, which were based on the information supplied by the Administering Members and which will be contained in the final publication on education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. As will be readily recognized, the interval is too short in respect of developments in the minds of men for the changes to indicate more than the promise of favourable trends or the shadow of possible difficulties. The Committee suggests that when education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories is again made the major item of attention, a broader review might be undertaken covering the whole of post-war developments in regard to progress in the eradication of illiteracy, the development of higher education, teacher-training, school enrolment and similar problems in the light of the views expressed by the Committee and endorsed by the General Assembly in 1950.

22. These subjects should not be considered solely or principally as measured by statistics, but as indicative of the quantity and the quality of education. In this connexion, the United Nations will be also interested in the introduction of systems of education that have succeeded in the metropolitan or in other countries, such as extension and extra-mural university services, workers' educational associations, centres of popular education, community schools and folk high schools of the Danish type. These can serve the Territories by providing an impetus for popular education which may readily be accepted by the people as being of the highest quality.

VI. Extension of primary education

23. This year the Committee would in addition address itself particularly to a few strategic problems in education. The first of these is the extension of primary education towards the goal of universal and free schooling adequate in length and quality as the basis for a literate population.

24. All countries are vitally concerned with the improvement of the education of their citizens. Where not all children receive a basic education, the establishment of universal primary education is normally one of the major objectives of national policy.

25. In many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the obvious immediate problem is not that of establishing an obligation for the children to attend school but of providing school facilities and of overcoming the difficulties which prevent children from taking full advantage of these opportunities. Accordingly, in order that the existing educational facilities may be most effectively used in the extension of education to the whole population, an important priority is that education should be provided free of charge so that no children are debarred from school by reason of poverty. At the same time the principle of compulsory education is also of major importance. It is indicative not only of an obligation on the pupils to attend school but on society as a whole to provide the facilities for education and the means of using these facilities.

26. As indicated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and as repeatedly stated in national declarations of policy, free and compulsory primary education is the objective sought. It should figure as the objective in the plans for practical action. In some of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, compulsory primary school attendance has already been established in law and practice and is firmly implanted in the minds of the people. In others, compulsory school attendance laws have been adopted for particular localities or for groups of pupils, and within these limitations appears to be generally effective. Elsewhere, there may be school attendance laws but existing difficulties prevent their full implementation. Yet again, target dates have been fixed with a view to the achievement of general primary education or of the attainment of definite stages in the advance towards that aim.

27. In these developments, even where the population shows eagerness for education and the school enrolment is relatively high, at least in the junior grades, it has been found that efforts to ensure regular attendance and continuity meet with considerable obstacles. It may be most practical to proceed by steps towards regularly assigned objectives, as by providing: (a) compulsory regular attendance for those enrolled in schools; (b) minimum and maximum ages for admission to the various grades; (c) compulsory enrolment and attendance in regions where there are sufficient school facilities and staff; and (d) universal compulsory education.

28. In this programme of the extension of primary school education, of particular importance are the twin problems of wastage and retardation. By wastage is meant the loss of pupils who leave before completing a school course, and by retardation the cases where through general causes pupils repeat classes or take longer to complete a course than the number of years prescribed for it. Another problem exists in the numerous cases where the school course available to the pupils in itself is insufficient to lay the first foundations of education.

29. The information before the Committee is not precise enough to indicate the actual situation in a number of Territories. It does suggest, however, that, even where the gross school enrolment of children of school age is not inconsiderable, an appreciable proportion of the children cease to attend in their second year and so on until those attending the final year are but a feeble percentage of those originally enrolled. Even more, there are Territories where the large majority of the schools provide courses of no more than one or two years in duration and the average child is unlikely in existing circumstances to have the opportunity to attend any other school.

30. The causes of these complex difficulties are manifold: financial, economic, social and educational. It is not the task of this Committee to enter into an examination of these causes. The Committee, however, wishes to record its conviction that a more comprehensive and more scientific study of the causes of wastage and retardation and of the means of remedying these factors in educational inefficiency should be undertaken. In the various regions the territorial educational authorities and the departments of education in the local universities could usefully contribute to territorial and case studies of the situation while, on the international plane, the studies, conferences and missions of UNESCO should offer opportunities for further enlightenment on the problem.

31. The Committee noted the consideration which is being given to the question of international assistance in the field of free and compulsory education. In particular, it appreciates the statement made by the regional conference on free and compulsory education in south Asia and the Pacific, which was held in Bombay in December 1952, that, while the development of free and compulsory education is primarily the responsibility of sovereign States and of Powers administering Non-Self-Governing Territories, it is also of international concern and calls for co-operative action both financial and technical. It concurs too, with the view of that conference that free and compulsory education is fundamental to all plans for economic development and should be given the requisite priority in the planning of such development. The Committee notes, in this connexion, that the General Assembly, notably by resolution 444 (V), adopted on 12 December 1950, has already invited the Administering Members which need technical assistance for the economic, social and educational advancement of their Non-Self-Governing Territories to submit their requests.

32. Finally, in emphasizing the importance of the expansion of the educational system by way of the establishment of compulsory free primary education, the Committee does not wish to leave the impression that the efforts of the governments should be directed to the solution of the resulting problems without sufficient regard to the other aspects of education. In particular, in meeting the strong and legitimate public demand for increased primary education, care must be taken to expand existing teacher-training schools and provision for secondary education, without which primary education cannot be fully developed as an integral part of the economic, social and political advancement of the peoples of the Territories.

VII. Teacher-training

33. The speedy extension of efficient primary education and the establishment of compulsory free primary education depend very largely on the rapid production of a sufficient number of qualified teachers. The quality of education must be determined to a large extent by the quality of the teaching profession. The cost of teachers' salaries is often more than half the total annual recurrent expenses on education.

34. The Committee, in 1950, expressed its general views on the importance of teacher-training and emphasized the need for technically skilled and socially conscious teachers; it pointed out that the teacher-training institutions should be of high quality and directed by those having deep sympathy with and knowledge of indigenous life. The Committee wishes to emphasize the importance of its 1950 views as an essential part of the programme of the extension of primary education.

VIII. Women's education

35. In most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories the education of women lags behind that of men. This applies particularly to many of the African Territories. In the Territories south of the Sahara, girls constitute approximately 24 per cent of the total African enrolment in primary schools. In post-primary schools the situation is worse. Girls constitute some 13 per cent of the total enrolment in African secondary schools; many such schools for girls as exist do not provide a full secondary course; most of the teacher-training institutions prepare primary school teachers by means of courses that themselves are only on a post-primary level. Where the schools are co-educational, fewer girls than boys join the first classes and the wastage among them is often higher than among the boys. Vocational training for girls is extremely limited. In general, girls' education is considerably poorer in quantity and quality than that of boys.

36. What has to be recorded as a hopeful sign is that a belief often held by the indigenous population that the inferior situation in respect of the education of women is inevitable no longer persists. The educational authorities have expressed their concern at the backwardness of women's education in general. They have indicated their recognition of the fact that the whole process of national improvement will be delayed until a great drive is made to reach the women and girls. Policies of undue caution in promoting girls' education have fallen into disfavour. Among the populations there is a growing belief in, and demand for, education for girls and often an active interest is taken by the women in all forms of education, while a general tendency to ignore the claims of women to share in the benefits of education shows many signs of abatement.

37. The solution of the problem of the education of women is part of the problem of the social and cultural evolution of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and requires comprehensive action, administrative, economic, or social, for the protection of women and the change of their status.

38. In the educational field, the following are examples of measures that should be taken: (a) increasing adoption of free education for girls with the liberal provision of scholarships, including places reserved for girls only; (b) the inclusion of girls in any schemes of compulsory primary education—in this connexion it may be remarked that there is often a stronger case for compulsory education among girls in view of the greater reluctance to send girls to school; (c) the increase in the number of primary girls' schools or the development of co-educational methods to meet the particular needs of girls and to attract girls to the co-educational schools; (d) the development of technical training in fields particularly suited to women; (e) the encouragement of the recruiting of girls for teaching, with improvements in the training of women teachers;

(f) further consideration of the status and remuneration of the woman teacher, including the encouragement of the employment of married women teachers; and (g) the organization or extension of educational opportunities for adult women. The curricula in all grades of schools should have regard to the aspirations of girls and the needs of women. But by this is not meant that a special type of education limited to the women in the home is desirable. Schools which girls attend should offer education in its broadest sense. This will include courses of particular interest to girls, as schools which boys attend will include courses of particular interest to boys.

39. The provision of special inducements to attract and keep girls at school is justified, indeed necessary where, as is often now the case, school development is bringing education to boys in more rapidly increasing numbers than to girls. Otherwise, a major effect of educational development may be to increase the stress that exists in the adaptation of the indigenous society to new needs, since the disproportion between the educated men and women will continuously increase.

40. At its seventh session in 1953, the Commission on the Status of Women adopted a resolution welcoming information on the status of women in Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories and inviting the Secretary-General to provide the Commission with information on fellowships and other assistance available to governments through the United Nations or the specialized agencies for the training of persons interested in improving the status of women. The question of women's educational opportunities was the principal topic discussed at the XVth International Conference on Public Education convened in 1952. These are examples of the international recognition of the importance of women's education and of specialist discussions on the means of overcoming the problems involved. This Committee commends these efforts and expresses the hope of far more rapid progress in the education of women in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

IX. Vocational training

41. The increased emphasis on economic development has directed attention to the need for more adequate facilities for producing trained workers of both sexes in many fields and at various levels of skill. Although finance remains a limiting factor, there has been increased expenditure on the development of vocational and technical education in recent years, and older methods of vocational training have been replaced by systems which seem to promise more fruitful results.

42. In this connexion, the Committee wishes to point out that technical education must be part of a general system of education. The pupil who is to be trained as a competent artisan will require an adequate basic standard of general education, followed by three years of technical training and by continued training of a practical character while in his first years of employment. This represents a new stimulus for a minimum eight-year general school course. The general educational requirements for those who seek to become qualified artisans by the apprenticeship method are similar. At the secondary level, technical schools provide intermediate and technical training for industrial and commercial positions. The general education which is linked with the technical courses in these schools is at the secondary level. The training in the higher ranks of technical skill should reach a level comparable with that of university education.

43. On the other hand, in the process of economic development at present taking place in Non-Self-Governing Territories, many classes of workers can receive training on the job or in specially organized courses of short duration and do not require to become the master of a trade in the way in which the apprentice or the graduate of a technical institute is master of his trade. In this connexion, the Committee notes that, whereas attention in most cases is primarily directed to providing vocational training for the young, the practical benefits to be derived from training policies directed to improving and up-grading the skill of workers already in employment appear to have received less consideration.

44. The direct relationship between the vocational training requirements and the man-power needs of the Territories necessitates close liaison between industry and commerce on the one hand and institutions of vocational training on the other. It may be of value to establish standing machinery for consultation between the authorities responsible for vocational training and the industrial and commercial interests concerned, including trade union organizations as well as employers. In a wider concept, account should be taken of training needs in the planning of economic development and as that development progresses.

45. The Committee noted with interest the work undertaken by the International Labour Office in studying problems of technical and vocational training. It also noted that technical assistance for training programmes has been the most substantial part of the technical assistance programme conducted by ILO and that such assistance is open to the Non-Self-Governing Territories on the request of the governments of Members. The Committee hopes that use will be made of the services of ILO in appropriate cases.

46. A further form of international collaboration which calls for attention has been provided and may be further provided in the various regions. The Committee was, for example, informed of the use of the Vocational School of Puerto Rico by trainees from other parts of the Caribbean, and of proposals and developments that are taking place in the South Pacific. The impossibility for small island Territories to provide extensive training at home makes such regional co-operation of substantial economic value, and the educational value of closer contacts between peoples of the same region also merits commendation.

X. Financing of education

47. How more money can be obtained for improving education and how the best results can accrue from the money spent are and will remain stubborn problems. The expenses are mainly of a recurrent character. In the planning of development and in the annual allocation of credits, the systematic maintenance and expansion of educational expenditure are thus generally more important than capital expenditure in times of boom, however valuable such expenditure may be and however essential as a part of the planning of economic development. As regards the problem of seeking the best results from educational expenditure, the value should be stressed of contributions from the population in civic services by voluntary efforts both as assistance in solving financial problems and also in broadening the popular support for education.

48. The Standard Form for the guidance of Members in the preparation of information to be transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter asks that information should be provided on a number of details of education costs. The Committee this year had before it an analysis of figures showing the sources of finance and the classification of expenditure for education. It considers that, when the General Assembly next comes to pay particular attention to education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, more detailed information should be prepared showing, for example, the proportions of the territorial budgets allocated to the various forms of education, the assistance provided by the metropolitan governments and the territorial distribution of costs between the various organs of government and the various voluntary agencies. In many cases, information of this nature is already available. Such figures will need interpretation in the light of all relevant circumstances. A study of the figures, however, will be of value as indicative of various ways in which revenue has been raised for education, its allocation to different forms of education and the various methods of obtaining the best results from the sums spent. This is all the more important as the present trend is towards the assumption of the whole cost of education by public funds.

XI. Community education

49. The Committee, in its 1950 report on education, recorded the view that "education in its broadest sense is a necessary basis for progress in economic, social, cultural and political knowledge and responsibility" and that the extension of schooling and the raising of both literacy rates and the standard expressed by the term "literacy" are prerequisites for the raising of general conditions in all fields. At its 1952 session, in its report on social conditions, the Committee expressed the opinion that in the major problems of social development education in its broadest sense is the core of the solution. The Committee held that new foundations are required on which the individual can build a new expression of his responsibility to his family and his community, and that in working towards this aim, the whole-hearted support of the peoples, obtained by the stimulation of their own aspirations and their realization of their own needs is indispensable.

50. To this process have contributed greatly the various forms of informal education which are being used in community developments and mass education with the participation of the whole local population. Community development policy is essentially concerned with the human aspects of social development. Its objectives do not differ from those of public policies in general, the ultimate aim of which is the transformation of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories into a modern society, adequately equipped with corresponding economic institutions, social services and cultural attributes. Its specific feature is the emphasis placed on the participation of the inhabitants in the policies and activities aiming at social, economic and cultural advancement.

51. While remarkable results have been achieved in a number of communities, the obstacles that hinder the expansion of the various movements from the local to the national scale have in many cases not been overcome. In this expansion, the educational component of community development comes to the forefront. The aim of community development, merging with that of the general educational policy, is to provide means and channels through which new interests and aspirations can be geared to the local cultural foundations and collective purposes, so as to lead to the emergence and consolidation of constructive social forces. Thus, community education requires the combination of all agents in social development; the public health and social welfare officer as well as the educationalist; the traditional leaders as well as the youth; women as well as men. It requires the assistance of expanding social institutions, improving literacy and the confidence of the people in their evolution towards the full exercise of self-government.

52. Community education calls for the fundamental education of adults as well as for school education of children: for all types of informal education as well as the formal education of the school or of the adult class. It has a great importance in preventing the emergence of a dangerous cleavage between the educated youth and the uneducated older generation. The formal education of young people and the formal or informal education of adults must be regarded as complementary aspects of one general process of education.

53. In this general process the school should be a central feature, and if it is, it may well find itself able to overcome some problems which, without the participation of the community, may have appeared to be financially insoluble. In this spirit, the school should seek an affirmative answer to questions such as the following: (a) Does the school help the people to identify their own problems? (b) Does it help the people to understand their resources for solving their own problems? (c) Does it help the people to learn how to use and to increase their resources to solve their problems? (d) Does it enable the people to work together in their common objectives and their common purposes? (e) Does it help the people to accomplish their tasks on their own responsibility and on their own initiative? (f) Does it help the community to establish social institutions that will continue to enable the community to meet their problems?

XII. Final note

54. The conditions with which this report is concerned are those in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. There are other areas in which social, economic and educational conditions are backward, while in some of the Non-Self-Governing Territories conditions are comparatively advanced. The Committee, however, is concerned exclusively with Non-Self-Governing Territories in respect of which Members of the United Nations have recognized the principle that the interests of the inhabitants are paramount and have accepted as a sacred trust the obligation to promote the well-being of these inhabitants to the utmost.

55. It is in this spirit that the report has been prepared. It is intended to supplement the report on education in Non-Self-Governing Territories approved in 1950. It also supplements the reports on economic and social conditions approved by the General Assembly in 1951 and 1952 respectively. It should be regarded not as isolated comments on the 1953 problems of education but as part of the general views on economic, social and educational conditions that the General Assembly has decided should be brought before the Members responsible for Non-Self-Governing Territories for their consideration.

I. Constitution of the Committee

1. The General Assembly, by resolution 646 (VII) adopted on 10 December 1952, during the seventh session, decided to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis as set forth in resolution 332 (IV) for a further three-year period with the provisions relating to its work as set out in resolution 333 (IV).

2. The terms of reference of the Committee set forth in resolution 332 (IV) are as follows:

"... to examine, in the spirit of paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 1 and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

"... to submit to the regular sessions of the General Assembly... reports containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories."

3. With regard to the provisions relating to its work set out in resolution 333 (IV), the General Assembly considered:

"that the value of the work of the Committee would be enhanced if, without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, special attention were given to one field each year."

4. The Committee consisted of sixteen members, comprising the eight Member States transmitting information and an equal number of other Member States elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly. The membership of the Committee in 1954 was as follows:

Members transmitting information	Elected members
Australia	Brazil
Belgium	Burma
Denmark	China
France	Ecuador
Netherlands	Guatemala
New Zealand	India
United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland	Indonesia
United States of America	Iraq

All members were present with the exception of Belgium.

5. The Committee met in New York, and held seventeen meetings from 20 August to 13 September 1954.

6. The representatives of the following specialized agencies took part in the discussions of the Committee: the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), and the World Health Organization (WHO).

II. Officers

7. The officers elected by the Committee were:

Mr. Awni Khalidy (Iraq), Chairman,
Mr. Sergio Armando Frazao (Brazil), Vice-Chairman,
Mr. J. V. Scott (New Zealand), Rapporteur.

III. Sub-Committee

8. A sub-committee was appointed at the 95th meeting of the Committee to prepare a special report on economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was composed of the representatives of Brazil, France, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America. The representative of Brazil, Mr. S. A. Frazao, was elected Chairman. The representatives of FAO and ILO participated in the work of the Sub-Committee. It held nine meetings from 31 August to 10 September 1954, and submitted its report at the 105th meeting of the Committee.

IV. Agenda

9. The representative of Brazil inquired the reason for the change in the revised provisional agenda of the wording of item 9 (b) from "Netherlands Antilles and Surinam" to "Other communications". The representative of the Netherlands replied that the final result of the negotiations now in progress between his Government and those of the two Territories concerned would be communicated to the Secretary-General in accordance with the terms of paragraph 4 of General Assembly resolution 747 (VIII) of 27 November 1953. Until this final result was reached there was thus no useful communication his Government could submit as a subject for discussion by the Committee.

10. The agenda as adopted by the Committee, together with references to the relevant documents and to the summary records of the discussions of each item, is set out in annex I.

V. Preliminary statements

11. At the opening meeting of the Committee, the representatives of France and of the United Kingdom reaffirmed statements made at previous sessions of the Committee defining the constitutional positions of their respective Governments in regard to their continued participation in the work of the Committee.

12. In the course of subsequent interventions, the representatives of Brazil, Burma, China, India and Iraq, referring to those formal declarations, stated the views of their respective delegations in support of the legality of the Committee and the value of its work, and expressed their regret at the continued absence of Belgium.

13. The representatives of Guatemala and of the United Kingdom reserved the positions of their respective Governments with regard to the question of sovereignty over British Honduras (Belize Territory).

14. The representative of Indonesia objected to the transmission of information on that part of New Guinea (West Irian) over which her Government claimed sovereignty. The representative of the Netherlands stated that his country's sovereignty over Netherlands New Guinea was beyond question and, since his Government was responsible for the administration of that Territory, it was obliged to transmit information in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter.

VI. Economic conditions

15. In accordance with the provisions of its work as set forth in resolution 333 (IV) and confirmed by resolution 646 (VII), the Committee at its present session devoted special attention to the subject of economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

16. The Committee had before it documents prepared by the Secretary-General dealing both with a review of the aspects of economic affairs to which special attention had been given during the second session of the Committee held in 1951, as well as with other economic subjects not previously treated in detail. In addition, the Committee's special report on economic conditions and problems of development<sup>1</sup> prepared in 1951 was available for reference. Documents dealing with economic subjects within its field of competence were submitted by FAO.

17. Specialist advisers on economic affairs were included in the delegations of Brazil, Denmark, France, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, in response to General Assembly resolution 745 (VIII).

18. The Committee discussed economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, item 4 of its agenda, from its 91st to 98th meetings. Statements in the general debate and in the discussion of item 4 (a) were made by the representatives of Australia, Brazil, Burma, China, Ecuador, France, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Iraq, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, and by the representative of FAO.

19. General Assembly resolution 645 (VII) had invited the Committee to consider the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter in the light of the views expressed in the special reports on educational,<sup>2</sup> economic<sup>3</sup> and social<sup>4</sup> conditions. Accordingly, the debate provided the opportunity for a general review of basic economic conditions and development programmes in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the policies and activities of the Administering Members in the light of the general observations expressed by the Committee in 1951 which were incorporated in the special report on economic conditions approved by the General Assembly in resolution 564 (VI).

20. Following the general debate, the Committee examined particular aspects of economic conditions such as land distribution; soil conservation; agricultural credit and co-operative institutions; livestock; fisheries; the adequacy of government services to agriculture in the Territories; industrial power and mining development; the relative progress of production for local consumption and for export; standards of living; and the structure of budget expenditure and revenue, including that of tax revenue. The representatives of Australia, Brazil, Burma, China, Ecuador, France, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Iraq, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America took part in the discussions on these subjects.

21. During the examination of the information before the Committee in the form of the documents prepared by the Secretariat and by FAO, further information was elicited and attention was drawn to various aspects of economic policy and conditions. Stress was laid by some members of the Committee upon the need for economic development to be directed principally to raising the standards of living of the inhabitants of the Territories; the inadequacy of information essential to allow the Committee to evaluate fully the true economic situation in the Territories and to appraise the economic advancement of their peoples; the necessity for more surveys on which to base development programmes and to assess the real needs and objectives of economic policy; the vital importance of the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the formulation of economic policy and in the execution of programmes of development; the need for capital investment in basic projects though not necessarily in undertakings promising high or quick monetary returns; the importance of land, its tenure, utilization and conservation; the policies and activities of the produce marketing boards; the balance between production for home consumption and for export, and between agriculture and industry, and the interrelationship of economic, social, educational and political factors. In some cases the representatives of the Administering Members replied to most of the queries raised and supplemented the documents with additional and more up-to-date information.

22. Following the procedures of previous sessions of the Committee, a Sub-Committee was established, the details of which are given in paragraph 8 above.

23. Introducing its report at the 105th meeting, the Chairman of the Sub-Committee expressed appreciation of the work of the Secretariat in its preparation. The Committee considered this report at its 106th meeting. General statements were made by the representatives of Australia, China, France, the United Kingdom and the United States of America. Following the acceptance of minor modifications in the text, and subject to reservations on certain paragraphs expressed by the representatives of Australia and Indonesia, the report was approved and forms part two of the present report.

VII. Social conditions

24. In conformity with General Assembly resolution 333 (IV) setting out its pattern of work, the Committee, at its 98th and 99th meetings, turned its attention to social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. In the interest of economy and owing to the fact that information on social conditions had been included in the summaries of information for each of the Territories, no special paper had been prepared by the Secretariat except for a document in which the proposed studies for 1955 were set out. A report on its activities in the Territories was submitted by WHO (A/AC.35/L.170).

25. Statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Burma, China, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, New Zealand, the United Kingdom, and the United States of America. The representatives of WHO, ILO and UNESCO reviewed the activities and work programmes of their respective organizations as these applied to the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

26. The representative of Indonesia believed that social advancement would be achieved more rapidly if women were guaranteed the same rights as men and she inquired what steps the Administering Members had taken to put into effect the Economic and Social Council's resolution 445C (XIV) in which they had been invited to take immediately all necessary measures to abolish progressively all customs which violated the physical integrity of women. The representative of Indonesia, like the United States representative, also believed that progress had been made in some Territories in which the public health budget, for example, had been increased. She was not sure, however, from the bare fact of increased expenditure, to what extent the health of the indigenous inhabitants as a whole had been improved.

27. The representative of the United Kingdom emphasized the importance of nutrition and informed the Committee of the Field Research Station in the Gambia and the Human Nutrition Research Unit in London, both established under the auspices of the Medical Research Council. The Unit furnished the services concerned in the various Territories with needed information and advice. It also published memoranda drawn up by nutritional experts on questions of importance to local governments. The Committee's attention was drawn to a Colonial Office memorandum published in November 1953 and entitled Housing in British African Territories (Colonial No. 303), which stated that local governments should do everything possible to encourage house-ownership by the provision of material or financial aid where the territorial budget was not large enough to permit more extensive measures. Such schemes were the aided self-help schemes in which the government gave special aid to people willing to construct their own homes or to finance their construction. He also drew attention to the extent of the work accomplished in the social field by voluntary organizations, as for example, infant and child feeding centres established in Singapore after the Second World War, and the Voluntary Boys' Clubs organized in Lagos.

28. The representative of Guatemala stressed the fact that although the data contained in the various documents before the Committee were of interest, yet it would be better for purposes of comparison if the statistics submitted by the Administering Members were improved and made fuller and more uniform. In particular, it would thus be much easier to interpret the data on public health, and more especially, on the differences noted between urban and rural districts.

29. The representative of India pointed out that the concentration by members of the Committee on general social problems did not indicate that they had failed to recognize particular cases in which progress had been achieved, for example in overcoming malaria in Cyprus, British Guiana, Mauritius and Malaya and the effective tuberculosis control campaigns in Territories under United Kingdom and French administration. Recent advances in medical science, however, should be applied more rapidly in certain of the smaller island Territories. Turning to the question of race relations, he drew the attention of the Committee to a report of a Select Committee of the Bermuda House of Assembly appointed to consider problems of race relations to which reference was made in document A/2657/Add.2, page 14. That Committee had observed, among other things, that racial policy in the Territory should take into account generally accepted conditions in the country of origin of most visitors to Bermuda. This principle had appeared to the representative of India to be undesirable. On the other hand, he considered more encouraging the so-called "Moffat resolutions" passed in the Legislative Council of Northern Rhodesia concerning racial equality of opportunity, and a speech on multi-racial unity by the leader of the Asian members in the Kenya legislature.

VIII. Educational conditions

30. Following its discussion of social conditions, the Committee turned its attention in similar manner to certain aspects of educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee had before it a summary prepared by the Secretariat giving the principal indications of educational progress in the Territories during 1953, in the light of the 1953 special report on education<sup>5</sup> approved by the General Assembly in resolution 743 (VIII). An annual report on measures for suppressing illiteracy (A/AC.35/L.173) and a general account of its activities of interest to Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/AC.35/L.178) were submitted by UNESCO.

31. At the 99th, 100th and 101st meetings, statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Brazil, Burma, China, Ecuador, France, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States of America. The representative of UNESCO gave additional details of the work programme of his organization, with particular reference to Non-Self-Governing Territories.

32. The representative of France, after giving examples of the educational progress in Territories under French administration, dealt with the problem of adapting education to the economic needs of each Territory and of providing employment opportunities for the increasingly large number of qualified students. In this respect, vocational training, especially agricultural training, played an important part. His Government had realized, too, that not only should the younger generation be equipped to meet the conditions consequent on the expanding economy of their homelands, but that adults had to be given the opportunity to participate profitably. Accordingly, intensive training centres as well as adult courses had been established. In a later intervention, the French representative discussed youth movements and sports as two methods of educational and cultural advancement for the people, especially in providing opportunity for giving impetus to community development.

33. The representative of India noted from the documentation before the Committee and from UNESCO reports that the Territories had received considerable technical and other assistance for educational purposes from several sources. In particular, he instanced the substantial sums that had been raised both in India as well as from the Indian community in East Africa towards the construction of the Gandhi Memorial Institute recently opened in Kenya. Furthermore, he referred to the fact that his Government intended to found an institute of African studies in collaboration with the University of Delhi, and had granted a total of 29 scholarships for the current academic year to students from Non-Self-Governing Territories. Turning to the question of scholarships in particular, he recalled resolution 743 (VIII) which, inter alia, recommended that Administering Members should make as much use as possible of offers made to them by other Member States for the purpose of facilitating the educational advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories by such means as the award of fellowships, scholarships and internships to qualified students from those Territories. He reminded the Committee that in pursuance of resolutions 55/ (VI) and 753 (VIII), a programme had been established for such awards to inhabitants of Trust Territories, and in fact, several Member States had already offered scholarships for the current academic year. The Committee might well follow this example and adopt a similar scheme for the Non-Self-Governing Territories. To this end, the Indian delegation jointly with that of Burma wished to submit a draft resolution, the revised text of which (A/AC.35/L.179/Rev.1) was as follows:

"The General Assembly

"Noting resolution 743 (VIII) by which the Administering Members were recommended to make the greatest possible use of offers that might be made to them by other Member States through the Secretary-General or through the specialized agencies concerned or in other appropriate ways, for the purpose of facilitating the educational advancement of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories by such means as making available fellowships, scholarships and internships to qualified students from these Territories,

"Noting the view expressed by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories in 1953 that the attainment of self-government by Non-Self-Governing Territories is, inter alia, hindered by inadequacies in their peoples' education,

"Considering that facilities for study and training at all levels of education, with all the efforts made by the Administering Members in the direction of their improvement, are not yet adequate in most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"1. Recommends that the Administering Members make the greatest possible use of offers of facilities in all levels of education and training, including the field of fundamental education, that may be made by Member States of the United Nations;

"2. Invites Member States to extend generously their offers of facilities not only for study and training of university standard but, in the first place, for study on post-primary level as well as technical and vocational training of immediate practical value;

"3. Invites Member States offering facilities, in cases where the languages of instruction differ from the languages of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, to consider the possibility of extending the duration of the facilities offered by a preliminary period of language training and other adjustment to the country of study or training;

"4. Invites Member States to transmit the details of such offers to the Administering Members and the Secretary-General;

"5. Requests the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to establish a simple procedure which would permit such offers and applications to be made through the Secretary-General as well as through the Administering Members concerned, it being understood that upon the receipt of applications the Secretary-General will transmit them to the Administering Members and to the offering States concerned;

"6. Invites the Administering Members to give appropriate publicity in Territories under their administration to offers of study and training facilities and take such other measures as will ensure that the greatest possible advantage is taken of the offers;

"7. Requests the Secretary-General to include in the United Nations information material, details of all such offers and of the procedures to be followed in submitting applications."

34. In the course of his intervention, the representative of the United States of America stated that the 1953 Committee's special report on education had proved a valuable adjunct to the basic 1950 special report and had received the serious consideration of interested departments of his Government, which had commended it to the attention of the appropriate authorities in the Territories under United States administration. The general views expressed in the report were in harmony with United States educational objectives in those Territories and any problems which might arise in giving effect to them would accordingly be due only to practical difficulties of administration. He went on to review some of the shortcomings and the progress made in various Territories as revealed by the educational statistics in the summaries of information before the Committee. He informed the Committee that the United States Office of Education had suggested that when special attention was next paid to educational conditions in the Territories particular consideration should be given to teacher training and the financing of education. With regard to the joint draft resolution, he indicated his delegation's tentative approval.

35. The representative of Guatemala agreed with the United States contention that the financing of education, including the metropolitan share of such expenditure in the respective Non-Self-Governing Territories, required further study. Likewise, fundamental education and mass information media merited particular attention. He referred to the useful background studies prepared by UNESCO on fundamental education, which should be viewed as a complement to school education and as a means of facilitating economic and social progress by accelerating adult education. Conditions in his country made it possible for him to suggest solutions for those educational problems which it shared with many Non-Self-Governing Territories and it strongly advocated the use of such mass information media as broadcasting in indigenous languages. Another method successfully applied in his country and in Mexico was the use of cultural missions to remote areas. He also commended the 1950 and 1953 special reports on education and suggested that when special attention was again given to educational conditions particular consideration should be given to the progress achieved towards the objectives set forth in paragraph 2 of resolution 743 (VIII). He noted that UNESCO's co-operation was available for the solution of all technical problems and suggested that such co-operation might take one or more of the following forms: the establishment in the Territories of bodies analogous to the national committees in metropolitan States members of UNESCO, in order to bring the Territories into more direct contact with UNESCO; the use of international or national UNESCO training centres; and an international conference, to be convened by the United Nations and UNESCO, on educational progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including the participation of the appropriate authorities in those Territories.

36. In the course of their several interventions, the representative of Brazil referred to the importance of an adequate period of school education and to the potential field of employment that must be borne in mind in the preparation of any educational programme. The representative of Australia gave some supplementary information on the educational progress in Papua and on the implementation of the provisions of the basic Education Ordinance, 1952, of that Territory and the contiguous Trust Territory of New Guinea. A preliminary examination of the joint draft resolution seemed to indicate that its intention was to bring the procedure for the award of scholarships and fellowships in the Non-Self-Governing Territories into line with that applicable to Trust Territories, and his delegation reserved its final opinion on the proposal. A similar view and reservation were expressed by the representative of France. In commenting on the educational documentation submitted by the Secretariat and by UNESCO, the representative of China noted that the latter's Contact Letter in Fundamental Education went to only fourteen addresses in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representatives of the Netherlands and of New Zealand gave supplementary information relating to educational conditions in Netherlands New Guinea and the Cook Islands respectively.

37. The representative of the United Kingdom referred to the educational progress in general that had taken place in Territories under United Kingdom administration. In particular, he mentioned the proposed establishment of a university college in Central Africa and the scheme for training Malayan teachers at their own college in the United Kingdom. In commenting on the suggestion of the representative of Guatemala regarding the convening of an educational conference on a global basis, he stated that his Government's experience had been that such conferences were most successful if limited in scope and geographical area.

38. The representative of Burma stressed the importance of higher education, and in order to help relieve the heavy financial burden which its provision entailed, his delegation had joined with that of India in submitting their joint draft resolution. Support for the draft resolution was expressed by the representative of Indonesia, who also emphasized the need to improve vocational training and the great importance her delegation attached to the education of girls.

39. The representative of Ecuador proposed an oral amendment to the effect that the words "including the field of fundamental education" should be inserted after the word "training" in operative paragraph 1 of the joint draft resolution. That amendment was accepted by the co-sponsors and incorporated in their revised draft.

40. At its 102nd meeting, the Committee considered the revised joint draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.179/Rev.1) and the amendments thereto submitted by the United Kingdom (A/AC.35/L.181) and by Guatemala (A/AC.35/L.180).

41. The amendments proposed by the United Kingdom would:

1. Delete the second paragraph of the preamble.
2. Delete paragraph 1 of the operative part.
3. In paragraph 4 of the operative part, delete "to the Secretary-General" and replace by "to the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration and the appropriate specialized agencies".
4. Replace the original paragraph 5 by the following:

"Invites the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration and the specialized agencies to incorporate such offers in the procedures evolved by them for the offer and award of educational facilities, in such a way as to comply with the wish of the offering State that offers made in response to this resolution should be taken up by inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories."

5. In paragraph 7 of the operative part, insert between "the Secretary-General" and "to include" the following words: "in consultation with the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration and the appropriate specialized agencies".

42. Since the revised text of the second paragraph of the preamble was acceptable to his delegation, the representative of the United Kingdom withdrew his first amendment. Similarly, on the proposal of the sponsors of the joint draft resolution to transfer operative paragraph 1 and place it after operative paragraph 4, he withdrew his second amendment.

43. In connexion with the remaining United Kingdom amendments, the representative of the Secretary-General, at the request of some members of the Committee, explained that the procedure implied in these amendments would not fit in the normal services and administrative procedures established by the Technical Assistance Administration. He added that if the resolution were addressed to the Secretary-General rather than to the Technical Assistance Administration or to particular agencies, the Secretary-General could subsequently decide on the most suitable procedure.

44. The Committee adopted the three remaining

United Kingdom amendments each by 7 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions.

45. In view of the adoption of the United Kingdom amendments, the representative of Guatemala withdrew his amendments.

46. The Committee adopted the revised joint draft resolution, as a whole, as amended, by 10 votes to none, with 5 abstentions. The text of the resolution as adopted is given in annex II.

IX. Cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter

(a) GREENLAND

47. In resolution 222 (III), adopted on 3 November 1948, the General Assembly had considered that, "having regard to the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter, it is essential that the United Nations be informed of any change in the constitutional position and status of any such Territory as a result of which the responsible Government concerned thinks it unnecessary to transmit information in respect of that Territory under Article 73 e of the Charter"; and had requested "the Members concerned to communicate to the Secretary-General, within a maximum period of six months, such information as may be appropriate pursuant to the preceding paragraph, including the constitution, legislative act or executive order providing for the government of the Territory and the constitutional relationship of the Territory to the Government of the metropolitan country". Furthermore, in resolution 448 (V), the General Assembly had requested the Committee "to examine such information as may be transmitted in future to the Secretary-General in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 222 (III), and report thereon to the General Assembly".

48. In conformity with the terms of resolution 222 (III), the Government of Denmark had transmitted to the Secretary-General a communication (A/AC.35/L.155 and Corr.1) dated 3 September 1953, in which it conveyed its decision to cease the transmission of information on Greenland and enclosed a memorandum giving the background of the constitutional development in Greenland together with a translation of the Danish Constitution of 5 June 1953, and of the records of the meetings of the Greenland Council at which the constitutional changes were discussed and unanimously adopted. A subsequent communication (A/AC.35/L.168) dated 14 September 1953, informed the Secretary-General that as a consequence of the adoption of the Danish Constitution of 5 June 1953, by which Greenland became an integral part of the Danish Realm, the basis for Denmark's membership on the Committee as an Administering Member had ceased to exist and that Denmark intended to withdraw from the Committee after the conclusion of its fifth session.

49. The discussion of this item was opened at the 101st meeting by the representative of Denmark who introduced the relevant documentation and the three Greenland representatives, namely two members elected by the Greenland Council who are also members of the Danish Parliament, and the Governor of Greenland, all of whom were included in the Danish delegation.

50. At the 102nd meeting, the representative of Denmark gave a comprehensive review of the historical facts which had caused Greenland to be one of the Territories on which information had been transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter, and of the constitutional changes which had recently been enacted and which had led the Danish Government to decide to cease transmitting further information. He pointed out that Greenland had never been a colony in the classical sense of the word and since its discovery a thousand years previously had always been connected with one of the Nordic realms, being a part of Denmark at the time the Charter of the United Nations was signed. Nevertheless, it was then felt that Greenland came within the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter. He went on to give a detailed historical review of the political relationship that had evolved between Denmark and Greenland. He gave an account of how climatic changes had affected the economic life of the inhabitants, and of how cultural and educational influences, as well as material considerations such as communications, had brought the Territory to a stage where a new relationship was called for. Accordingly, a new policy was adopted, the aim of which was to integrate Greenland as a part of the Danish Realm. This policy was adopted by the Danish Government in strict adherence to the wishes freely expressed by the people of Greenland through their chosen representatives. Isolation had been discontinued, economic differences between Greenland and other parts of Denmark had disappeared and politically this development had led to the consequence that, when in 1953 the Constitution of Denmark had been changed on certain points, one of those points was the inclusion of Greenland in the Realm with the same rights and privileges as any other part thereof. A resolution recommending that constitutional change had been unanimously adopted by the Greenland Council. Greenland was now represented in the Danish Parliament by two representatives elected by direct secret ballot and by an electorate composed in exactly the same way as in other parts of Denmark. Thus, by full integration into the Danish Realm, according to the freely expressed wishes of its people, Greenland had ceased to be a Non-Self-Governing Territory and Denmark an Administering Member of the Committee.

51. The representative of India, after associating himself with the Chairman's welcome to the Greenland representatives, pointed out that his Government's policy with regard to the cessation of the transmission of information was consistent in all cases. He went on to analyse the information provided by Denmark in the light of the third part of the list of factors<sup>6</sup> and came to the conclusion that for the most part they were amply covered, especially with regard to the wishes of the people being freely expressed. He suggested that new and more comprehensive procedures were needed to deal with decisions by governments that Article 73 e no longer applied to formerly dependent territories. The Committee should consider the establishment of suitable machinery, perhaps an ad hoc committee to consider each new case. In particular, he suggested that in a similar manner as a parliamentary mission usually visits a United Kingdom territory on its attainment of self-government, the United Nations might send a mission to visit any Territory about to achieve self-government. He hoped such a visit would be received by the government concerned, not as indicating a desire to supervise or to criticize, but as a means of dispelling any shadow of doubt regarding the correctness of the action taken and as a gesture of congratulation on the stage reached by the Territory in its international democratic evolution. He would be glad to learn the reaction of the Danish delegation to this suggestion.

52. In reply to an inquiry by the representative of India as to whether any communications contesting the validity of the change in Greenland's status had been received at the United Nations, the representative of the Secretary-General replied in the negative.

53. The representatives of Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, in the course of their interventions, associated themselves with the Chairman's welcome to the Greenland representatives on the Danish delegation and extended their congratulations to the people of Greenland and the Danish Government on the attainment of self-government by Greenland. They reaffirmed their opinion that the decision to cease transmitting information under Article 73 e was one alone for the Administering Member concerned to take. In this particular instance, all that was called for from the Committee was to take note of the decision of the Danish Government and to congratulate the people of Greenland on their new status.

54. The representatives of Brazil, Burma, Ecuador, Guatemala, Indonesia and Iraq also prefaced their interventions with expressions of welcome to the representatives of the Greenland people and extended their appreciation of the action taken by the Government of Denmark in furnishing the Committee with full information on the changed status of that Territory. Questions and explanations regarding various aspects of Greenland's new status were addressed by each of these representatives to the representative of Denmark.

55. The representative of Burma asked if a referendum had been held to ascertain whether the people of Greenland wished to be incorporated in the Danish Realm, and to what extent the question of distance affected the relationship between the two countries.

56. The representative of Guatemala wished to know if the people of Greenland had realized that the change in status meant incorporation into the Kingdom of Denmark and whether the Constitution provided for the right of secession.

57. The representative of Indonesia asked whether the powers of the Greenland Council in relation to Danish bills for measures affecting the Territory were limited to discussion and recommendation, and whether a bill affecting Greenland which had not been tabled before, or had been rejected by, the Greenland Council was ever referred to the Danish Parliament for enactment. She also wished to know whether the Greenland Council was empowered to consider matters other than those referred to it by the Danish Parliament or Government. She asked by what procedure the Greenland people had expressed their wishes, whether by referendum or by new elections.

58. The representative of Iraq requested further information on the action taken by the Danish Government to extend to the people of North and East Greenland the right to elect representatives to the Danish Parliament, and on the extent to which the Danish Government, in deciding to cease the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter, had taken into account the list of factors annexed to General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII). He also inquired whether commonwealth status, such as that devised for Puerto Rico, had been considered when deciding on the relationship of Greenland with Denmark.

59. The two members of the Greenland Council each addressed the Committee and gave ample assurances that the new status of their country was fully in accord with the freely expressed wishes of the people of Greenland. They had always been well treated by Denmark in regard to both their economic and cultural life, and they welcomed incorporation into the Danish Realm.

60. In reply to specific questions as well as to other points raised in the course of the discussions, answers were given by the representative of Denmark. With regard to the question of secession, there was no provision in the Danish Constitution for any province to secede. As to the distance between the two countries, he pointed out that Greenland was only six hours flying time from Copenhagen, and that all Nordic people regarded water as a connecting, and not a dividing, element. With regard to the question of suffrage for North and East Greenland, he stated that those two areas had their own elected bodies and their interests were also looked after by the members from West Greenland. With respect to the question of whether the factors annexed to resolution 742 (VIII) had been considered, he pointed out that that resolution had been adopted six months after the new Danish Constitution had come into effect. With regard to the factor relating to freedom of choice, that had been exercised by the people of Greenland through the Greenland Council, a freely elected body, which had asked for incorporation. No referendum had been held and even if one had been held the only choice would have been between incorporation or remaining as a Non-Self-Governing Territory. He replied in detail to the inquiries regarding the powers of the Greenland Council and reminded the Committee that Greenland was represented in the Danish Parliament by two representatives who fully safeguarded the interests of Greenland. With regard to the suggestion of a mission from the United Nations to visit Greenland, he stated that adequate information had been submitted and that while all visitors were welcome in Greenland he thought a United Nations mission might be misunderstood by the Greenlanders and asked the representative of India not to press that point.

61. The representative of Brazil recalled that it was for the United Nations, through the Committee, to express a preliminary opinion on the degree of political maturity reached by people of Non-Self-Governing Territories. That was why the Brazilian delegation agreed with the Indian delegation on the necessity of laying down a procedure enabling the Committee to discharge its functions under General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII). In no circumstances, however, must the Committee renounce or curtail its competence. Then noting with satisfaction the Danish Government's statement, in its letter of 3 September 1953 addressed to the Secretary-General, that "the Danish Government regard their responsibilities according to Chapter XI of the Charter as terminated", the representative of Brazil stated his concept that the administration of a Non-Self-Governing Territory was in the nature of a responsibility exercised on behalf of an international community, and that that was the underlying idea of Chapter XI. He hoped he was voicing not only the opinions of his own delegation but also those of the majority of the members of the Committee, and in this belief, his delegation had joined with those of Guatemala and India in proposing for adoption by the Committee a draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.183), the text of which was as follows:

"The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"Considering that resolution 222 (III), adopted by the General Assembly on 3 November 1948, while welcoming any development of self-government in Non-Self-Governing Territories, considers that it is essential that the United Nations be informed of any change in the constitutional status of any such Territory as a result of which the responsible government concerned thinks it unnecessary to transmit information in respect of that Territory under Article 73 e of the Charter,

"Having received from the Government of Denmark a communication, dated 3 September 1953, informing the Secretary-General that as a result of the constitutional amendment adopted on 5 June 1953 Greenland has become an integral part of the Danish Realm with a constitutional status equal to other parts of Denmark and that the Danish Government regard their responsibilities under Chapter XI of the Charter in respect of Greenland as terminated and have, therefore, decided to bring to an end the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter,

"Considering that resolution 742 (VIII) adopted by the General Assembly on 27 November 1953 instructs the Committee to study any documentation transmitted under resolution 222 (III) in the light of the list of factors approved by resolution 742 (VIII) and other relevant considerations,

"Considering that the question of the cessation of information in respect of Greenland has been included as item 32 (a) of the provisional agenda of the ninth regular session of the General Assembly,

"Bearing in mind paragraph 2 of resolution 448 (V) in which the General Assembly requested the Committee to examine such information as may be transmitted and to report thereon to the General Assembly,

"Having examined the documentation transmitted by the Government of Denmark in the light of the basic principles of Chapter XI of the Charter and of the provisions of General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII), and having considered the verbal explanations provided by the representatives of the Government of Denmark,

"1. Commends the action of the Member State concerned in including in its delegation representatives elected by the Greenland Council for the purpose of furnishing information on constitutional changes in Greenland for the enlightenment of the Committee;

"2. Takes note that when deciding on their new constitutional status, through their duly elected representatives, the people of Greenland have freely exercised their right to self-determination;

"3. Expresses the opinion that from the documentation and the explanations provided, Greenland freely decided on its integration within the Kingdom of Denmark, on an equal constitutional and administrative basis with the other parts of the Kingdom;

"4. Notes with satisfaction the political advancement achieved by the people of Greenland;

"5. Takes note of the opinion of the Government of Denmark that due to the new constitutional status of Greenland the Government of Denmark regards 'their responsibilities according to Chapter XI of the Charter as terminated' and consequently the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter in respect of Greenland should be brought to an end;

"6. Expresses the opinion—within the limits of its terms of reference and without anticipating the final disposal of this question by the General Assembly—that the information before it indicates that Greenland may be considered as falling outside the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter and that, consequently, it is no longer necessary or appropriate to transmit the information under Article 73 e."

62. At the request of the representative of Indonesia, operative paragraph 6 was voted on separately and adopted by 10 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

63. The Committee then voted on the draft resolution as a whole, which was adopted unanimously.

64. After the representatives of Burma and Indonesia had reserved the attitude of their delegations when the subject came up for consideration in the General Assembly, the Chairman remarked that such a right was automatically reserved to all delegations.

65. Statements in explanation of their votes and their interpretation of the resolution were made by the representatives of Australia, Denmark, France, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, in which they reaffirmed their reservations both in regard to resolution 742 (VIII) as well as to the question of the competence of Administering Members to decide when to cease the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter.

(b) OTHER COMMUNICATIONS

66. At the 103rd meeting, the representative of India drew the attention of the Committee to the obligations incumbent on the Netherlands Government contained in General Assembly resolution 747 (VIII). He requested that the reassurances given by the representative of the Netherlands to the effect that the final result of the negotiations now in progress between the Governments of the Netherlands, the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam would be communicated to the Secretary-General in accordance with paragraph 4 of the above-mentioned resolution, should be conveyed to the General Assembly. Referring to paragraph 6 of the same resolution, the representative of India noted that no information had been transmitted in compliance with the request contained therein to the Netherlands Government to transmit regularly to the Secretary-General information under Article 73 e of the Charter in regard to the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam until such time as the General Assembly took a decision that such information should be discontinued. The representative of Iraq associated himself with these views.

67. In reply, the representative of the Netherlands stated that when resolution 747 (VIII) had been adopted on 27 November 1953, the Netherlands representative had expressed his regret that paragraph 6 had been included in the text of the resolution, in the following words:

"... the Netherlands Government cannot possibly act in a way which would be contrary to its own laws and Constitution; nor is it prepared to take steps which would be at variance with the opinion and the wishes of the Governments and Parliaments of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, whose interests are at stake in this controversy."

The representative of the Netherlands went on to say that the above-quoted statement made ten months previously had today not lost its validity. In fact, the autonomy attained by these parts of the Netherlands Realm would have been violated if the Netherlands Government had attempted to comply with the request made in paragraph 6 of resolution 747 (VIII). With due respect to the views expressed by some members of the Committee, his Government could not do otherwise than persist in its attitude defined in 1951 after the Interim Regulations for the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam had come into force. His Government felt itself even more justified in adopting that attitude since Article 73 e of the Charter itself recognized the limitations on the transmission of information which might be required by constitutional considerations.

X. The Secretary-General's summaries and analyses of information

68. In accordance with paragraph 4 (b) of resolution 218 (III), the Secretary-General had prepared statistical summaries and analyses of the information transmitted under Article 73 e relating to 1953, together with relevant statistics for the previous two years.

69. Much of the information contained in the summaries had been referred to during the discussions of economic, social and educational conditions in the Territories. At the 103rd meeting, the Committee discussed the summaries and analyses of information as an item of its agenda.

70. In reply to comments and questions raised by the representative of India regarding the date of receipt of information, the representatives of Australia and the United Kingdom gave explanations as to the reasons for the delay in transmitting information on certain of the Territories under the administration of their respective Governments.

XI. International collaboration in respect of economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, including information on technical assistance

71. The General Assembly, in resolution 445 (V), confirmed "its recognition of the importance of international collaboration in regard to economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories as expressed in resolution 331 (IV)" which latter resolution invited the specialized agencies to communicate annually to the United Nations information on the progress of the work undertaken by them which would be of service to Non-Self-Governing Territories. In resolution 444 (V), the Administering Members needing technical assistance for the economic, social and educational advancement of their Non-Self-Governing Territories were invited to submit their requests and also to include in the information transmitted by them a report on technical assistance received from the United Nations and the specialized agencies. Furthermore, in resolution 336 (IV) the General Assembly requested "the Secretary-General to keep the Special Committee informed of the nature of the technical assistance which is accorded from time to time to Non-Self-Governing Territories by specialized international bodies".

72. Accordingly, the Secretary-General submitted a document (A/AC.35/L.164) setting out details of international collaboration for economic, social and educational advancement and of technical assistance to Non-Self-Governing Territories by the United Nations and the specialized agencies, while reports on their activities in the Territories were prepared by the World Health Organization and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, and an account of technical assistance services rendered to Non-Self-Governing Territories was submitted by the Food and Agriculture Organization.

73. The Secretary of the Committee drew attention to a number of resolutions relevant to conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories adopted at the eighteenth session of the Economic and Social Council, which related respectively to the questions of political rights of women, the nationality of married women, and equal pay for equal work. By Economic and Social Council resolution 547 H (XVIII), the General Assembly is requested to take appropriate measures to abolish, in collaboration with States, including Non-Self-Governing Territories, discriminatory laws and practices against women, where such customs and ancient practices still exist, and requests the General Assembly to recommend that special efforts be made through fundamental education in private and public schools and various media of communications to inform public opinion in all areas, including Non-Self-Governing Territories, concerning the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and existing decrees and legislation which affect the status of women.

74. The representative of the ILO informed the Committee of certain projects in the future work of his organization relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories and mentioned as an example the provision of assistance to the Government of Barbados, with respect to its labour legislation, and the Governments of Jamaica and Trinidad in matters of social security measures. Commenting on the question of the application of social security conventions to non-metropolitan Territories, he noted that the International Labour Office Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions in 1949 observed that more progress could be made with respect to the application of the social security conventions in non-metropolitan Territories.

75. The representative of UNESCO reminded the Committee of the provisions whereby Territories could acquire associate membership and drew attention to action already taken by the United Kingdom to ensure the direct participation of some of its Territories and groups of Territories in the work of UNESCO as associate members.

76. The representative of Australia referred to the Colombo Plan in which his Government collaborated. He also drew the attention of the Committee to the work being done by the South Pacific Commission which benefited some 18 Territories with about 3 million inhabitants. This work, he felt, was giving effect to Article 73 d of the United Nations Charter, and might be characterized as positive action in international collaboration.

77. The representative of the United Kingdom then drew the attention of the Committee to the growing collaboration within the last three years between his Government and the United Nations with respect to the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance and cited figures in support of this view, indicating the extent to which the Territories under United Kingdom administration had benefited from experts and fellowships. He also pointed out that United Kingdom Territories had provided training facilities for nationals of other countries in 1952 and in greater numbers in 1953. Reference was also made by the representative of the United Kingdom to the work of the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara, which provided a valuable forum for experts dealing with the problems of Africa.

XII. Control and limitation of documentation

78. In its resolution 789 (VIII), the General Assembly, having recalled its resolution 593 (VI) on the control and limitation of documentation, noted the action taken by the Secretary-General, inter alia, by his instruction of 20 August 1953, to ensure a more effective control of documentation; considered that the reduction in the number and volume of certain categories of documents could be carried out in full only with the co-operation of Member States and expressed the wish that Member States should co-operate in giving effect to the resolution. In its operative part, the resolution invited all organs of the United Nations to scrutinize their existing documentation and effect such reduction therein as might be feasible, and to co-operate with the Secretary-General in his efforts to reduce the volume and at the same time to improve the quality of the documentation of the United Nations.

79. At its 104th meeting, the Committee considered this item of its agenda and heard short statements from the representatives of Australia and India, to the effect that, at present, they had no suggestions to submit for the control and limitation of the documentation before the Committee, and asked that the Secretariat should keep the question under review.

80. The representative of the Secretary-General replied that, in accordance with instructions of the Secretary-General, the question was kept constantly under review. He pointed out that the work procedures adopted by the Committee, whereby full summaries of information were prepared only every third year, preceded by some years a similar procedure recently adopted by the Trusteeship Council.

XIII. Representation on the Committee and participation of indigenous representatives

81. In resolution 647 (VII), the General Assembly, recalling resolution 566 (VI) and recognizing that direct participation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee could be of further assistance in promoting the progress of those Territories, invited the Committee to study further this question of the direct participation of representatives of the more advanced Territories. Following further study during the eighth session of the General Assembly, resolution 744 (VIII), having recalled some of the considerations set forth in previous resolutions, referred to the technical difficulties advanced by the Administering Members on the question of accepting the Territories as "associate members" and stated that the principle of unity of representation had to be maintained. Member States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories the inhabitants of which had attained a large measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies were invited to attach to their delegations, without prejudice to the principle of unity of representation, indigenous representatives specially qualified to speak on those matters. The Committee was again requested to continue the study of means of securing a progressive increase in the participation in its work of duly qualified representatives of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. At the same session, the General Assembly also adopted resolution 745 (VIII), by which it noted in particular that the work of the Committee had been materially assisted by the action of Members including certain non-administering Members, which associated with their delegations persons with special qualifications in the functional fields studied by the Committee. The resolution commended the action of those Members and expressed the hope that others which had not found it possible to do so, would find it appropriate to associate with their delegations persons specially qualified in the functional fields within the Committee's purview.

82. In order to bring up to date information, submitted to the Committee at previous sessions, relating to existing forms of association and provisions in constitutions of international bodies, the Secretary-General had prepared documentation setting out such changes as had occurred in connexion with associate membership and constitutional provisions of certain international bodies during the intervening period, as well as dealing with questions of representation on the Committee.

83. The Committee took up this item of its agenda at its 104th meeting. The representative of Guatemala analysed the provisions of General Assembly resolution 647 (VII) in comparison with those of resolution 744 (VIII), which his delegation had criticised at the time of adoption as signifying a backward step. He therefore welcomed the draft resolution proposed by the delegation of India (A/AC.35/L.182), which aimed at rectifying the position with regard to the association of indigenous representatives in the work of the Committee.

84. The representative of India recalled the views expressed by his delegation at previous discussions of this subject and gave examples of the various ways in which the associate membership of Non-Self-Governing Territories in such bodies as the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East and several of the specialized agencies had taken place since 1952. Turning to the draft resolution submitted by his delegation, he elaborated on the provisions contained therein. In view of the importance of the subject and of the short time left at the present session of the Committee for adequate consideration, he suggested the postponement of any discussion until the next session of the Committee when the item should be placed early on the agenda.

85. The representative of Brazil supported the suggestion for postponing consideration of the draft resolution.

86. After an assurance given by the Chairman that postponement of discussion until the next session could be considered as complying with the General Assembly's request to continue study of this question, the Committee concurred.

87. The text of the draft resolution proposed by India (A/AC.35/L.182) is as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling the view expressed in its resolution 744 (VIII) of 27 November 1953 that the direct association of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies has been considered as an effective means of promoting the progress of the populations of these Territories,

"Recalling further the hope expressed in its resolution 745 (VIII) of 27 November 1953 that those Members which have not hitherto found it possible to do so, will find it appropriate to associate with their delegations persons specially qualified in the functional fields within the Committee's purview,

"Considering that Member States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories, the inhabitants of which have attained a large measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies, were invited by the former resolution to attach to their delegations, without prejudice to the maintenance of the principle of unity of representation, indigenous representatives specially qualified to speak on these matters as they relate to these Territories.

"Considering that the participation of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee might be of greater assistance if provided in a form other than by association with the delegation of Administering Members,

"Invites the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to study the best means by which, in addition to the progressive increase in the Administering Members, the participation of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Committee could be ensured."

XIV. Future work of the Committee

88. In the course of its discussion of social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories during its 98th and 99th meetings, the Committee also discussed its future programme of work, including the date of its next session.

89. The representative of the United States of America noted that the 1952 Committee's special report on social conditions contained comparatively little information on housing and he suggested that this subject merited close attention in 1955. He expressed the hope that the Eighth Report of the International Labour Organisation to the United Nations, 1954, which contained conclusions of the ILO Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories at its meeting in Lisbon, in December 1953, would be made available to the Committee.

90. With regard to the future activities of his organization in relation to the Committee's programme, the representative of the ILO recalled that a suggestion had been made that the ILO should prepare papers, first, on the question of technical and vocational training in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and, secondly, on aspects of methods of wage payment and the use of cost-of-living indices in adapting wages to workers' living costs. He assumed that his office would do its best to prepare these papers for the Committee. Regarding the problems of migrant labour and trade union development, the former topic was to be discussed by the ILO at its 1955 Conference, while the second topic had been put forward by the Committee of Experts for inclusion in the agenda of its next meeting. It was, however, unlikely that either of these studies would be sufficiently advanced for them to make a useful contribution in time for the next session except in a very general manner.

91. The representative of Guatemala considered that the studies currently being made by UNESCO on the integration of certain ethnic groups in modern society would be extremely valuable to the Committee. He suggested that the Committee reconsider in 1955 the question of technical assistance in the field of public health. In referring to the question of social security, he expressed the wish that more information on this matter should be available for discussion at the next session of the Committee. He also felt that the Committee might usefully consider the question of the extent to which the Administering Members had ratified ILO labour conventions in relation to the Territories under their administration. Finally, the representative of Guatemala wished to know of the part played by private initiative in the social field, particularly in housing.

92. The representative of the United Kingdom hoped that it would be possible to include in the programme of studies for 1955 (A/AC.35/L.171) under the heading "B". Social effects of urbanization and industrialization" the work of the voluntary organizations to which he had already referred. He also thought that the Committee should give special attention to the question of housing on which subject the Secretariat might perhaps draw up a separate document. He further observed that the subjects grouped under the heading "C. Community development (administrative organization)", were all very important and he hoped they would be fully treated.

93. The Secretary told the Committee that in accordance with the recommendation made by the Fifth Committee and adopted by the General Assembly, the Secretariat should limit the preparation of studies to those which were deemed essential. In the circumstances he felt he could not undertake the preparation of a major report on housing problems for the 1955 session as was suggested by the representative of the United Kingdom. However, the ILO would be asked to furnish the Committee with its report in workers' housing. He agreed with the representative of the United Kingdom that the work of voluntary organizations was an important matter but the relevant information was very often not given in the reports submitted to the Secretariat, as they dealt principally with government services. He assured the representative of India that the Secretariat would endeavour to publish its documents in good time for the next session.

94. Members of the Committee then commented on the proposed change in date for its next session. It had been suggested by some delegations that the present date left members too little time to report to their Governments and to receive instructions from them before the opening of the General Assembly and that a date in April or May would be more convenient. The Secretary explained that as far as the Secretariat was concerned, work could be adjusted to meet the requirements of a spring session.

95. The representative of Australia said that his Government had no objection to the proposed change of date for the next session of the Committee.

96. Similarly, the representatives of Indonesia and of China saw no objection to the proposed change of date and welcomed the Secretariat's suggestion that a report should be prepared on major developments in public health in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

97. The representative of France said that his delegation was not opposed to a change in the date of the next session, but that it maintained its reservations with regard to the constitutionality of the Committee. He agreed with the representative of the United Kingdom that special attention should be given by the Committee in 1955 to items under "B" and "C" in the proposed programme of studies.

98. Following the consideration of part one of its report and the approval of the special report on economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee unanimously adopted a draft resolution and an amendment thereto (A/AC.35/L.186 and Add.1), submitted by the representative of New Zealand, concerning the work of the Committee. According to the draft resolution the General Assembly would approve the report on economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and would invite the Secretary-General to communicate it to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned for their consideration. The draft resolution also takes note of this general report of the Committee and provides for the approval of the programme of work proposed for the 1955 session of the Committee. The text of the draft resolution, as adopted, is given in annex II.

Resolutions submitted for the consideration of the General Assembly

The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories submits the following draft resolutions for the consideration of the General Assembly:

A. DRAFT RESOLUTION ON EDUCATIONAL ADVANCEMENT IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

The General Assembly,

Noting resolution 743 (VIII) by which the Administering Members were recommended to make the greatest possible use of offers that might be made to them by other Member States through the Secretary-General or through the specialized agencies concerned or in other appropriate ways, for the purpose of facilitating the educational advancement of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories by such means as making available fellowships, scholarships and internships to qualified students from these Territories,

Noting the view expressed by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories in 1953 that the attainment of self-government by Non-Self-Governing Territories is, inter alia, hindered by inadequacies in their people's education,

Considering that facilities for study and training at all levels of education, with all the efforts made by the Administering Members in the direction of their improvement, are not yet adequate in most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories,

1. Invites Member States to extend generously their offers of facilities not only for study and training of university standard but, in the first place, for study on post-primary level as well as technical and vocational training of immediate practical value;

2. Invites Member States offering facilities, in cases where the languages of instruction differ from the languages of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to consider the possibility of extending the duration of the facilities offered by a preliminary period of language training and other adjustment to the country of study or training;

3. Invites Member States to transmit the details of such offers to the Administering Members and to the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration and the appropriate specialized agencies;

4. Recommends that the Administering Members make the greatest possible use of facilities in all levels of education and training, including the field of fundamental education, that may be made by Member States of the United Nations;

5. Invites the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration and the specialized agencies to incorporate such offers in the procedures evolved by them for the offer and award of educational facilities, in such a way as to comply with the wish of the offering State that offers made in response to this resolution should be taken up by inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories;

6. Invites the Administering Members to give appropriate publicity in Territories under their administration to offers of study and training facilities and take such other measures as will ensure that the greatest possible advantage is taken of the offers;

7. Requests the Secretary-General, in consultation with the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration and the appropriate specialized agencies, to include in the United Nations information material, details of all such offers and of the procedures to be followed in submitting applications.

B. DRAFT RESOLUTION ON WORK OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

The General Assembly

1. Takes note of the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the work of its 1954 session;

2. Approves the special report on economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories as a supplement to the report approved in 1951;

3. Invites the Secretary-General to communicate this report to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned for their consideration;

4. Expresses its agreement with the suggestion that the Secretary-General should convene the sixth session of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories for the spring of 1955;

5. Invites the Committee to submit a report to the tenth regular session of the General Assembly paying particular regard to social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories as indicated in particular in the information transmitted to the Secretary-General in 1954;

6. Decides that notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 4 (a) of General Assembly resolution 218 (III) the full summaries and analyses of the information transmitted during 1955 shall be submitted to the General Assembly in 1956.

Part Two

REPORT ON ECONOMIC CONDITIONS IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES<sup>1</sup>

I. Introduction

1. In 1951, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories prepared a special report on economic conditions and problems of economic development in Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>2</sup> The General Assembly, by its resolution 564 (VI) adopted on 18 January 1952, approved the report and invited the Secretary-General to communicate it for their consideration to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned.

2. In 1954, in accordance with the programme of work laid down in General Assembly resolution 333 (IV), the Committee has again been called upon to pay particular attention to economic conditions and development. It has approached this task on the basis of the information transmitted by the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories and in the light of the views expressed in its report of 1951.

3. In considering the economic progress achieved since 1951, the Committee took into account resolution 645 (VII) by which the General Assembly, on 10 December 1952, expressed the hope that the Administering Members would furnish "as complete information as possible on any action taken to bring the reports of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to the attention of the authorities responsible in the Territories for the implementation of educational, economic and social policy, and on any problems which may arise in giving effect to the general views expressed in these reports", and invited the Committee "to consider the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter in the light of the views expressed in the special reports on educational, economic and social conditions".

<sup>1</sup> This report was drafted by a Sub-Committee of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories composed of the representatives of Brazil, France, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America. In the work of this Sub-Committee participated the Rapporteur, Mr. J. V. Scott of New Zealand, and representatives of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation. The members of the delegations who served on the Sub-Committee were: Brazil, Mr. Sergio Armando Frazao, Chairman, and Mr. Wander Batalha Lima; France, Mr. François Mourruau, Mr. Edouard Colin and Mr. Jean Prada; Guatemala, Mr. Emilio Arenales; India, Mr. Avtar Singh; Indonesia, Miss Laili Roesad; Netherlands, Mr. Ch. J. Grader; United Kingdom, Mr. B. O. B. Gidden and Mr. J. Leyden; United States, Mr. Emerson Ross and Mr. Claude G. Ross.

4. A considerable volume of information relating to economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was laid before the Committee. For the most part, this information conforms with the details which the revised Standard Form requests of the Administering Members. Nevertheless, some representatives on the Committee consider that the information requested of the Members and transmitted by them does not provide a picture of the economy of the Non-Self-Governing Territories sufficient to enable it to make a dynamic analysis of their economic development. The lacunae, in so far as they relate to the transmission of information, may be filled in various ways, as by additions to the revised Standard Form or by an indication of the information desired of the Administering Members. The lacunae also result, however, from absence of the means of obtaining the information. Planning and programming for economic development require adequate and up-to-date statistics concerning the various sectors of the economy. It seems desirable, therefore, that special attention should be given to the improvement of the statistical services in the Territories. Consideration should also be given to the utilization of more sample surveys based upon scientific sampling methods, as a means of periodically obtaining statistics on special questions.

5. The Committee wishes to record its appreciation of the assistance it received from the representatives of the Administering Members attending the Committee (Australia, Denmark, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States of America) and from the specialists and technicians in economic development attached to some of the delegations (those of Brazil, Denmark, France, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America) in evaluating the information at its disposal.

II. Principles of policy

6. The 1951 report cites paragraphs of Articles 1, 55 and 73 of the Charter of the United Nations as determining the Committee's approach to its examination of information on economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. This year, the Committee wishes once again to refer to these Articles, and to emphasize that, as international undertakings, they should continue to stimulate the promotion of development programmes in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and to offer a gauge by which the efficacy of these programmes may be measured. It has therefore noted with appreciation statements by representatives of Administering Members that the principles of the 1951 report and the views expressed therein have served as a guide in the planning and implementation of economic programmes in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

7. The Committee also considers it useful to reiterate its statement of 1951 that, in the economic development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the point of primary importance is that of the interests of the inhabitants. This was stated in the 1951 report (para. 14) with reference to the development programmes of the Administering Members:

"In these development programmes, as well as by virtue of the principles of Articles 1 and 73 of the Charter, the point of primary importance is that of the interests of the inhabitants. Every effort should be made, within the framework of the Charter, to reconcile these interests with the interests of the world as a whole. The emphasis, however, placed by the Special Committee is dictated by the terms of Article 73 of the Charter, in which Members recognize that the interests of the inhabitants are paramount. This means that, in general, investments should be channelled and improvements made through those activities which will bring benefits to the Territories and their peoples and not merely contribute towards those developments which, though useful or necessary to the rest of the world, are only of secondary interest to the Territories."

8. The Committee recognizes that consideration and respect for the wishes and interests of the inhabitants in regard to the objectives and forms of economic development are of first importance. Without this, development is likely to lead to social disillusionment and to prove an economic failure. As was recognized by several representatives, including representatives of the Administering Members, it is not sufficient to raise the output of a country by increased production. There must be increased productivity among the peoples; this may require changes in the social structure which can be achieved only with their consent and co-operation.

9. A sound economic policy must be part of a general pattern, of which social and educational policies are other essential parts. As a result the people, living in healthy surroundings, protected against disease, adequately fed and housed, with their moral and intellectual needs provided for, can adapt to their own purposes modern techniques of production. This will lead to the best use of the natural resources of their lands for the purpose of advancement in all fields of personal and community life.

10. Thus, economic policy being a part of general policy, sustained economic progress can best be achieved through the attainment by the peoples of the Territories of a full share in the formulation of economic policies, and in the planning and implementation of programmes of economic development. The assumption by the peoples of direct responsibility for the formulation and execution of development programmes will correspondingly make a fundamental contribution to their capacity for self-government.

11. The Committee of Experts, which in 1953 sought an international definition and measurement of standards and levels of living, expressed the opinion that in practically all countries sections of the population live under conditions which are generally considered unsatisfactory and which ought to be improved. The Committee continued "Human needs and wants, however, range from common biological needs—as for food, water and protection against cold—to culturally-defined motivations and wants which may differ from society to society or from individual to individual. Into the picture enters the whole field of desires and values for which man may be striving: desires for particular types of food, drink, housing and clothing appealing to the taste; for access to educational, cultural and recreational facilities; for opportunity to do the kind of work that is satisfying to the individual; for satisfactory working conditions; for security safeguards covering the risks of illness, unemployment and old age, etc."<sup>3</sup>

12. All these needs and wants must be taken into account in any realistic economic policy. In the Non-Self-Governing Territories a further feature of importance having regard to the relations of the Territories with the metropolitan countries, to the situation in the Territories themselves and to their relations with the world economy is the need to attain a dynamic equilibrium which, in seeking to improve the benefits accruing to all the economies concerned, will better the economic conditions of all the inhabitants.

13. The report of 1951 stressed accordingly (a) the fundamental interests of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories through the satisfaction of their needs and wants; (b) the reasonable interests of the metropolitan economies; and (c) the far-reaching interests of the world economy as a whole. This involves the translation into terms of economic policy of Article 73 c of the Charter by which the Members concerned undertake "to further international peace and security" in their administration of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

14. In considering the complex problems faced in seeking these ends, the Committee has been mainly concerned with government policy, with the passage of legislation, with administration through government agencies and with government investments. This does not mean that it ignores the importance of the role to be played by the initiative of the local or family group or by private enterprise. Circumstances differ greatly in different Territories according to their degree of evolution and according to the extent and value of their natural resources. Generally, however, one of the main purposes of public action is to stimulate the initiative of individuals and to create an atmosphere favourable to the extension of the efforts of men and women who, by their own individual and collective activity, will contribute to the public good, while the effectiveness of government activities is reflected by the impact of these activities upon the over-all rate of development and by the enthusiasm of the individual and collective effort that is encouraged.

15. Without minimizing the importance of government plans and of particular public projects in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and indeed recognizing that the impetus to economic development must in many cases, if not in most, be provided through the governments, the Committee considers that it would be useful if more information on development in the private sector of the economies could be included in future information transmitted by the Administering Members. Primarily this would involve fuller information on activities of private production, trade, finance, including the flow of external private investment, the development and use of local capital, the level of local trade and production and indications of the expansion of the exchange or money economy. In examining information of this type and in assessing the value of economic development through private enterprise, primary consideration should be given, as in the case of development through public enterprise, to the contribution which is thereby provided in favour of the interests of the inhabitants.

16. In this connexion, the Committee believes that it should follow a precedent established in 1953. The General Assembly, in then approving the report prepared by this Committee on educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories,<sup>4</sup> briefly outlined the objectives of education in the Territories and affirmed that the process of education should be designed to familiarize the inhabitants with and train them in the use of the tools of economic, social and political progress with a view to the attainment of full self-government (resolution 743 (VIII)). The Committee in this report on economic conditions considers that it would be of value similarly to emphasize the objectives of economic policy in these Territories. These objectives, in essentials, concern the same principles as those enumerated in respect of education. Their formulation may serve as an even stronger affirmation than that made in 1951 of the primacy of the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the economic development of the resources of the Territories.

17. Bearing in mind the principles of Chapter XI of the Charter and, in particular, the declarations contained in Article 73 a and Article 73 b to the effect that the Administering Members will take steps "to ensure, with due respect for the culture of the peoples concerned, their political, economic, social, and educational advancement, their just treatment, and their protection against abuses;" and "to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions, according to the particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples and their varying stages of advancement", the Committee affirms that the fundamental aim of economic policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories must be to develop these Territories in the interest of all sectors of the population, to raise the standard of living by increasing individual real purchasing power, and to increase the total wealth of each Territory in order to make possible a higher standard of social services and administration. There emerge from this fundamental aim the following concrete objectives:

(a) To remove the obstacles to economic development by modifying where necessary the basic structure of the economy;

(b) To stimulate economic growth through which the standards of living of the peoples will be raised and an increase obtained in their national output and improvement in their productivity;

(c) To establish and improve the capital equipment of the Territories so as to provide a firm basis for future development;

(d) To promote those types of economic activity, whether primary or industrial production, in which the Territories are best fitted to engage, having regard to the balance of their economies and the advantages of external trade;

(e) To secure the equitable distribution amongst the peoples of the material benefits of the economy as expressed in the national income;

(f) To create a firm economic basis for political, social and educational programmes taking into account the basic cultural values and aspirations of the peoples;

(g) To conserve and develop the natural resources of the Territories for the benefit of the peoples;

(h) To create conditions conducive to standards of health and of social welfare which will help to develop moral and civic consciousness and responsibility so as to enable the people to take an increasing share in the conduct of their own affairs;

(i) To work towards fully developed economies capable of taking their appropriate place in the world economy.

III. General development

18. Although generalizations about the Non-Self-Governing Territories are subject to many exceptions, it may be said that since this Committee last paid special attention to economic conditions in 1951, the main features of the territorial economies have been a continued evolution towards a monetary economy in many areas where a subsistence or barter economy was predominant, a continued preponderance of agriculture and an undue dependence on one main export crop or mineral, the prices of which have experienced wide fluctuations in the world market. External trade of the Territories still to a large extent is directed towards the metropolitan country and the development needs of the Territories often require higher payments for imports than can be met by exports. As regards the first point, however, the Committee was informed that in the large increase of external trade to and from African Territories under United Kingdom administration, only 36 per cent of exports went to the United Kingdom and only 34 per cent of imports were received from the United Kingdom. As for the second point, the Committee was informed that French West Africa imported 36 per cent in terms of value more than it exported in 1951, but in 1953 only 12 per cent more than it exported.

19. International trade in general has reached a new high level. This has profited the Non-Self-Governing Territories, although in a number of instances exports have expanded without a corresponding increase of production and sale for local consumption. At the same time the prices of a number of primary products have declined with the result that many essential imports remain relatively high in price in relation to the territorial resources. Yet, on the whole, the changes in world economic conditions may be expected to react favourably on the economic development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, particularly if markets and sources of supply are broadened through a development of freer trade and greater convertibility of currencies.

20. A few figures suggest the increased extent to which the Non-Self-Governing Territories are in a more favourable position to profit by new opportunities owing to the extent of this initial progress.

21. Production of electric power in thirteen Non-Self-Governing Territories<sup>5</sup> increased from 1,000 million kwh. in 1938 to 1,850 million kwh. in 1947<sup>6</sup> and to over 4,000 million kwh. in 1953.<sup>7</sup>

22. The increase in the local production of cement provides a further example of basic improvements. The imports of cement into United Kingdom Territories rose from 1,386,000 tons in 1950 to 1,800,000 tons in 1953. But there was also a marked stimulation of local production, as in Jamaica, where a factory, opened in 1952, has a planned minimum output of 100,000 tons; and as is expected of a factory to open in Trinidad this year. Uganda, Kenya, Northern Rhodesia and Malaya are other Territories where cement production is becoming of comparable importance. In Kenya, for example, a new cement works with a capacity of 100,000 tons of cement a year went into production in January 1953. In the Belgian Congo, the local industry is expanding and it may be expected that it will shortly reach an output of 440,000 tons a year. In Morocco, production rose from 350,000 to 420,000 tons between 1950 and 1952. In Tunisia, the increase in these three years was from 169,000 to 208,000 tons.

23. A number of figures were also made available indicating how in many Territories the supplies received by consumers have increased. Some degree of retrogression is suggested in the import figures for 1953. Nevertheless, it is significant, to take a single example, that in 1938 the United Kingdom exported to British East and West Africa, the West Indies and Malaya—or more significantly these Territories were in a position to purchase from the United Kingdom—63,000 bicycles in 1938; 383,000 in 1948; 554,000 in 1950 and 586,000 bicycles in 1953.

24. These are indications of progress achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. But there are still many factors which are unfavourable or disturbing. It has been calculated that with hardly any exception the Non-Self-Governing Territories are among the sixty-nine countries that may be classified as under-developed in contrast with the thirteen developed countries of the world and the nineteen countries in an intermediary stage of development. Labour shortages and inadequacies, a low volume of capital, inadequate transportation system, a small domestic market, limited availability of capital goods and limited bargaining power are characteristic of most Territories. Agencies established for the valuable purpose of stabilizing the prices received by primary producers and giving them increased bargaining powers have accumulated large reserves part of which could be used for new economic enterprises and the improvement of levels of living.

25. Although economic development is desirable in itself, it can only be considered as truly satisfactory to the extent that it improves the standard of living and well-being of the indigenous populations. The Administering Members have provided the Committee with information of an encouraging character on this point. However, some of the representatives of the non-administering Members on the Committee consider that it is not clear to what extent the local peoples have directly benefited from the development plans.

26. Moreover, rapid economic development, unless it is very carefully controlled, may lead to social upheavals and class conflicts. In some of the Non-Self-Governing Territories where various economic classes tend to follow racial lines, these conflicts are aggravated when members of different racial communities tend to monopolize particular economic functions. This means that a disproportionate amount of the benefits resulting from economic development accrues to the immigrant communities wherever they substantially make up the land-owning, managerial or merchant class. A multi-racial society, commendable as it may be, cannot achieve its ideals unless its economic basis is such that no particular group has reserved to itself a privileged position. Some representatives on the Committee thought that this was particularly true where the privileged group is of the same origin as that which exercises authority in matters of governmental control.

27. The Committee observes that immigration has brought capital and skills to many Non-Self-Governing Territories. The presence of immigrants trained in modern techniques and dedicated to the advancement of the Territories as their future home may be of the highest value in solving economic problems. In subscribing to the principles of Chapter XI of the Charter, the Administering Members have declared that the interests of the inhabitants are paramount, meaning thereby, as was indicated in paragraph 8 of the Committee's 1952 report on social conditions,<sup>8</sup> the interests of "all peoples resident in a Territory who consider their future and the future of their children to be bound up with the welfare and progress of the Territory and all its inhabitants".

28. Some representatives also felt that there is room for doubt whether development programmes in all cases profited all the inhabitants rather than some of them, or even interests outside the Territories, whether in the metropolitan countries or elsewhere. As far as private investment is concerned, it was pointed out that, in general, investment in Non-Self-Governing Territories has proved less profitable than that in countries which are already developed industrially, and that this is today one of the main deterrents to capital investment in under-developed countries in general. Moreover, it is precisely in Non-Self-Governing Territories where investment has proved most profitable to the metropolitan investor that the standard of living of all the inhabitants has risen most. Nevertheless, it is felt that a fully satisfactory answer to these doubts can be provided only if it is possible to ascertain (a) the per capita income and the distribution of the national income among the different sections of the population; (b) the proportionate increase in the standard of living of different sections of the population; (c) the general level of savings and their distribution among the different sections of the population.

29. Yet, all these queries do not invalidate, indeed they confirm, a general appreciation that the economic progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories is accepted as a pressing responsibility incumbent on the Administering Members by virtue both of international and of national declarations of policy.

IV. Development plans

30. As was noted in the 1951 report, the Administering Members in most cases do not expect the Territories under their charge to be able to provide for their own development solely out of their own revenues or with the assistance of private investment that can be attracted from abroad. By various means, these Members have made available considerable sums of money to the Non-Self-Governing Territories in order to supplement local resources and to stimulate economic development.

31. Since 1951, the policy of planned governmental investment has been continued. Difficulties have arisen owing to shortages and to rises in the cost of materials, labour, technical and supervisory staff and to fluctuations in the funds available for development. Taking a long-range view, however, these disturbing factors in the implementation of development plans should not be considered a justification for a decrease in the pace of this implementation, since they are in themselves the characteristics of a degree of under-development that must be corrected. Indeed, it may be noted that on the whole the development process has been extended over wider fields and at a quickening rate in most Territories.

32. The financial contributions of the metropolitan countries to the development plans are clearly beneficial when directed towards the basic sectors of the economy. However, the degree and the character of the benefits can only be ascertained by a dynamic analysis of the processes of investment and development. Many of the figures before the Committee show an increase in the flow of investments and a rise in the level of production at a given time and in specified sectors. They do not permit any clear conclusions as to whether the total interests of the local economies are being adequately met or whether situations of artificial competition are being created. Furthermore, at the beginning of the period under review the situation of certain commodities on the world market stimulated many investments in sectors of primary production. The resulting high returns may have been advantageous to the Territories through the increased attraction of new capital. But this factor in itself makes it all the more important that the grants or the low-interest loans provided by the Administering Members through their development plans should be directed towards a broadening of the basis of the whole economy.

33. This appears to have been the general policy. In any event, the sums allocated have been substantial. In the Territories under the administration of the United Kingdom the total value of development plans, including money from United Kingdom funds, local resources and loans, is equivalent to more than 1,300 million dollars. In 1953, almost twice as much was spent on development as in 1950. Development of the French overseas territories is financed to the extent of 70 per cent by French public funds, representing an annual appropriation equivalent to 400 million dollars. Other Administering Members report substantially increased grants from metropolitan sources to development programmes in the territories administered by them.

34. Various revisions have been carried out in most plans with a view to the elimination of schemes which have proved unprofitable, the establishment of priorities which experience has suggested as required by local developments or world economic changes.

35. Among the particular development problems brought into prominence by these revisions are the following: (a) the relative emphasis which should be given to economic as compared with social development; (b) the relative emphasis which should be given to economic diversification as compared with production for export; (c) the relative emphasis which should be given to the orientation of trade towards world, regional and local markets as contrasted with the expansion of the traditional trade with the metropolitan country; (d) the relative emphasis which should be placed on immediate production, as contrasted to basic facilities for long-term development.

36. Broadly speaking, in comparison with arrangements made under the original plans, there is now a tendency to allocate a greater proportion of the resources to schemes of economic development likely to be productive of increased revenue, in preference to schemes aiming at social improvement only. Within the general range of economic development, there is also an increased tendency to favour projects which will give an economic return on investments at a comparatively early date.

37. The burden of poverty lies heavy on many of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It is therefore important to plan primarily with a view to alleviating poverty by improving productivity. The increased emphasis on economic development is largely justified on these grounds. It confirms the views the Committee already expressed in 1951 that it may often be desirable to concentrate development programmes in areas where quick substantial results may be anticipated, and that the capital provided by the metropolitan Governments should largely be directed towards the provision of projects designed to strengthen the basis of the economy of the Territories or towards the undertaking of pilot schemes to test the feasibility of any forms of development.

38. Nevertheless, as is inherent in the whole policy of development and as has been indicated in detail in the separate development plans, many urgent social reforms are essential parts of the economic programmes, since populations deficient in health, education and welfare may be unable to increase their productivity unless a vigorous policy is pursued for the expansion of social and educational services and the improvement of social and educational standards. As has already been said in this report, a sound economic policy must be part of a general pattern of development. The attention which the Committee is directing this year to problems of economic development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories should not be regarded as over-emphasizing one form of development at the expense of another.

39. In certain cases the implementation of development plans has to a large extent become part of the normal expansion of the economic and social services of the government and the funds provided for these plans have been incorporated in the territorial budgets covering general expenditure. This is justified in cases where the original purpose of the plans has been achieved inasmuch as a marked impetus has been given to the economic and social progress of the Territories. In more typical cases, however, the Committee would rather commend the general value of following the principle of adopting a specific plan for development. In many instances the continued formulation of long-term policy by this means is likely to prove of practical utility by encouraging the Territories to aim at and to secure the attainment of the objectives defined in the plan.

40. A brief indication has been given of amounts invested in development plans. While in a few Territories the local resources are increasing at a rate that permits substantial investments in new basic equipment, in many of the Territories increasing costs and falling or fluctuating export prices are making it difficult to complete some of the existing development programmes or to provide for their reasonable expansion. Even though, therefore, the sums provided for development are being increased annually, still more assistance may be required from the Administering Members, while at the same time efforts will need to be made to increase the rate of investments. More might be done in this field by encouraging a higher rate of investment in local enterprise by public corporations operating in the Territories and by territorial savings banks and produce boards; by seeking larger amounts of private investment funds from external sources; by further examination of the possibility of obtaining funds from public lending institutions including the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development; by encouraging the local reinvestment of a high proportion of the profits derived from capital invested by private enterprises; and by exploring the possibilities of effectively using surplus agricultural commodities as a source of capital for development. Fiscal arrangements have been made in certain cases to encourage private capital. The French Government pointed out, for example, that Parliament had recently enacted a law authorizing local territorial assemblies to conclude long-term contracts with companies making essential investments in the Territories, guaranteeing no increase in taxation on the activities of these companies for a period up to fifteen years. Without expressing any opinion on this particular measure, it is an indication of the type of device that may be helpful in encouraging investments in the Territories. The development of such efforts will strengthen the internal economy of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and may result in a chain reaction of production and investment leading towards general economic advancement.

41. There are other reasons which make important the policy of encouraging local investment. The recognition of local aspirations and local responsibilities will be enhanced, and any feeling that may exist of dependence on undue external financial or general economic control should be diminished.

42. This leads to the concluding point on which the Committee insists in this section of its report. It is a point already made in 1951, already repeated in the present report, but one of such vital importance that insistence can never be excessive. It is the necessity, recognized by the Administering Members, of obtaining the widest possible collaboration of the inhabitants at all levels of the population.

43. In its 1951 report (para. 33) the Committee declared that "the association of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the planning of economic programmes, in the general supervision of their execution and in the management of separate undertakings is of outstanding importance. Without this association at all stages, many economic development programmes may fail to achieve their objectives. In other cases, these programmes will tend to perpetuate the dependence of the Territory on external direction". Information on instances of participation of the indigenous inhabitants was provided to the Committee this year. In most Territories where there are territorial assemblies or councils of representatives of the indigenous population, these organs participate in the examination of proposed plans and often in the approval of these plans and in the voting of the local appropriations required by them. Below this level, there is often a development authority or development board or council responsible for recommendation or executive action in the carrying out of the development programme. In Territories under United Kingdom and French administration, the organs of local government, composed of indigenous representatives, often play a major part, with the technical and advisory assistance of central government departments, in supervising the execution of local programmes. Indigenous participation is also effected through statutory boards and organizations established in many Territories for the management of particular projects, the development of particular crops or for general developmental purposes.

44. Information provided by the Administering Members indicates that, apart from the immense social and educational advantages of popular participation in economic planning, such participation leads to a greater sense of realism in the drafting of the plans and greater flexibility in their execution. This may at first sight seem to be a point of limited and solely utilitarian interest but, on consideration, it may rather be thought that it is part of a fundamental philosophy affecting the whole range of development in Non-Self-Governing Territories and the relations between administration and peoples.

V. Rural economy

45. Almost all of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are predominantly agricultural. Though economic policy should aim at broadening the basis of the territorial economy so as to permit a wider measure of development in all fields, economic and social progress will in most cases continue to depend essentially on the direction and speed with which improvements are made in the rural economy, including the economic security and well-being of rural families.

46. In tracing the progress of rural development and the factors associated with it, the Committee gave special attention to various economic incentives, public services and institutional measures that have particular applicability to agricultural as distinguished from industrial development. The fact that the course of agricultural development rests, for the most part, upon the decisions and actions of large numbers of independent producing units has an important bearing upon the role that Governments must play in the rural development process. Likewise, account must be taken of the geographic dispersion of these rural producing units, the wide variations in the quantity and quality of productive resources at their disposal, and their deficiencies in knowledge of the elements of good resource management and agricultural husbandry. Finally, the Committee has endeavoured to take full cognizance of the dual character of agricultural enterprises, particularly the fact that many rural families consume a high proportion of the products they produce, and look upon agriculture more as a way of life than as a foundation for economic and social advancement.

47. Appropriately, therefore, the Committee gave considerable attention to the character and extent of farmer participation in the planning and execution of rural development programmes. Similar considerations led to an examination of the adequacy of governmental services for agriculture and the types of rural institutions and organizations that should be promoted and strengthened. These aspects of rural development must, of necessity, be considered against the background of commodity prices, consumer demand and economic prospects.

48. In recent years, agricultural exports have expanded and the movement of prices for primary commodities has on the whole improved the commercial position of the exporting Territories and provided favourable possibilities of improved returns to the producers. This situation, however satisfactory in immediate terms, raises problems of the correct direction of agricultural production, notably the relative emphasis on production for local consumption on the one hand, and on production for export on the other. Attention should be paid, to a greater extent than may have been possible in the past, to the selective expansion of agricultural production, taking account of differences in agricultural resources and of internal and export marketing possibilities.

49. The demand for primary products by export markets has been strong enough to provoke the danger that too many resources will be devoted to its satisfaction so that supplies for local consumption may be jeopardized. In some cases, a deeper realization that production for local consumption and production for export are closely linked seems called for; adequate food production is essential to enable a part of the economy to specialize in production for export, while local demand depends greatly on the purchasing power generated by export sales. This situation, typical of a number of agricultural countries, needs particular consideration in Non-Self-Governing Territories which are affected by the influence of traditional relations as regards the nature and direction of their trade.

50. Information furnished by Administering Members indicated their realization that a positive and constructive policy concerned concurrently with agricultural production and agricultural trade has to be applied. The objective described is to provide for the local production of sufficient food crops to permit adequate nutrition, so that other agricultural land can be used for export purposes through the cultivation of the crops most suited to local conditions and world markets. Particular attention was drawn to the emphasis placed in many Non-Self-Governing Territories on expansion of rice production and to the success of governmental efforts once local populations accepted the value of rice as a food crop. This example is in particular to be commended, since rice contributes to meeting the nutritional needs of the local populations, while its cultivation can be organized in so many ways suited to local conditions.

51. Nevertheless, examination of the main factors influencing production indicates that in general the balance of immediate interest tends to favour export production, notwithstanding increases in the domestic demand for crops used essentially for local consumption or for a proportion of crops cultivated primarily for export. The market for many agricultural exports has generally been very buoyant since the war, whereas many local food prices have not been accorded any special protection and even in certain cases have been subjected to price ceilings. Marketing and transport facilities are far more developed for export crops than for produce for local consumption. General trading conditions have intensified the general trend. In the post-war period, the metropolitan countries were renewing and increasing their imports of crops from the Non-Self-Governing Territories. More recently, export crops have been of particular value as dollar earners and dollar savers. Capital has always been most readily available for investment in the export industries. Research and extension services have tended to concentrate on export crops. These are matters of business reality, applicable to conditions in many parts of the world. To refer to them in considering economic policy in Non-Self-Governing Territories is necessary because a broader view of policy is demanded for these Territories than solely commercial and business considerations are likely to provide; government development policies should accordingly furnish any necessary corrective to an excessive reliance on export crops.

52. In considering the implications of recent trends in agricultural production, and especially the growing imbalance in production for export as compared with production for local needs, the Committee stressed the importance of encouraging greater agricultural diversification in areas where natural conditions are favourable and particularly stressed the need for selectivity in future production plans. One of the key elements in achieving a more selective expansion of production is the introduction of greater flexibility into the farming system. To do so, producers must have reliable sources of economic and technical information, including information on the markets and prospects for the various commodities. Another requirement of a flexible farming system is the availability of sufficient production capital to enable producers to acquire the necessary production requisites for operating a more diversified cropping and livestock pattern. A related aspect of this problem is the nature of the debt burden that producers must bear. Large debts, coupled with rigid repayment schedules and high interest rates, tend to freeze the pattern of production. Producers, faced with such burdens, are generally reluctant or unable to modify their cropping plans because the penalties for failure are too great. Frequently, loan conditions imposed upon them specifically prohibit changes in the cropping system.

53. The role that agricultural credit co-operatives can play in helping to achieve a selective expansion of production is discussed in a subsequent chapter of this report. However, the Committee wishes to call particular attention to the value of programmes of supervised agricultural credit in helping to promote flexible and well-managed farming systems. Through programmes of supervised agricultural credit, it is possible to link effectively the uses of production credit with farm and home planning and with accepted land management practices. Credits are, in effect, made available for specific improvements or production adjustments based upon predetermined plans. Under such a system, agricultural credit becomes the incentive and one of the important tools in promoting agricultural adjustments and rural development.

54. The question of agricultural policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in relation to the need for more food crops suggests another consideration. While it is highly desirable that wherever possible the Territories should produce sufficient and more varied food crops for their own consumption, the situation, at present and in the foreseeable future in a number of Territories even with favourable agricultural conditions, is that local production is and may remain insufficient for this purpose and it is unlikely that the peoples will be able to afford to import the necessary adjuncts to local diets.

55. At the same time, agricultural surpluses, particularly wheat, rice, sugar, vegetable oils, dairy products, and some dried fruits, are arising in some countries of advanced agricultural production. The problem of surpluses is being studied by a number of Governments and by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations. While its examination is not a function of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee suggests in the interests of the Territories that the recent accumulation of stocks of these agricultural commodities should not lead to any relaxation of efforts in the Territories towards the achievement of an expanding agricultural economy. Such expansion should take place both in the production of export commodities and in the commodities consumed locally. But as has been suggested previously, this expansion in the future should be more selective with respect to the relative emphasis placed upon various commodities in accordance with changing local demands and outside markets.

56. Another feature of the surplus commodity situation is worthy of special attention. Most of the stocks of surplus commodities are still under government control. These governments, as well as the traditional importing countries, wish to achieve an orderly disposal of excess stocks so as to avoid undue pressure on commodity prices and other serious economic repercussions. Of the various measures being considered by several governments, one is of particular applicability to most Non-Self-Governing Territories, namely the planned sales on concessional terms or grants of surplus commodities for the specific purpose of aiding in economic development. Such grants or concessional sales would, of course, need to carry guarantees from the receiving Territories that such commodities will be so utilized that no harmful interference with normal production and trade will result.

57. The Committee believes that with further study, the Administering Members can formulate numerous specific proposals for the effective utilization of such grants-in-aid for economic and social development purposes in the Territories. School feeding programmes, workers' canteens on public works projects, supplementary feeding in hospitals, relief and nutrition programmes, are obvious uses that might be made of such surpluses as are made available. But it is urged that consideration of this matter be extended into the less obvious schemes of utilizing surpluses for economic development, such as measures for controlling inflationary tendencies in areas where local incomes are increasing rapidly because of the sudden injection of development capital, or in meeting the consumption needs of rural families who are involved in resettlement projects; or as incentives for the adoption of better land management practices. Properly planned and organized, it should be possible to utilize agricultural surpluses in these Territories without prejudicing the expansion of local food production. Such arrangements, furthermore, should help to reduce the direct and indirect costs of economic expansion in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

58. Agricultural policy in general depends upon a programme for the protection and improvement of the soil, the control and regularization of water supplies, the development and diversification of agricultural production and animal husbandry, the improvement of agricultural techniques and assistance to, and protection of, the agricultural producer, economically and socially.

59. The Committee considers that the conservation of the natural resources of the Territories is among the essential objectives of agricultural policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Soil exhaustion and erosion are major problems in most Non-Self-Governing Territories, and the dangers are being increasingly recognized. In recent years, the practice of soil conservation has been extended. In some Territories it has become one of the main activities of the Departments of Agriculture; in others, special bodies have been established to undertake research and to devise means of control; in others this work has not advanced beyond the initial stages, and comprehensive programmes for the conservation of the soil remain impeded by insufficiency of funds, inadequacy of staff, and the absence of any sense of urgency. Once again, it should be stated that the situation is not confined to Non-Self-Governing Territories. But the responsibility which rests on the Administering Members suggests that the technical assistance they can offer the Territories for which they are responsible includes active measures to meet the needs of soil conservation and to provide for water and irrigation policies. Examples were given to the Committee, showing cases where effective steps had been taken to prevent the degradation and erosion of the soil and to introduce improved farming practices involving joint efforts on a large scale on the part of all concerned. These favourable examples show that soil conservation is recognized to be bound up with the whole question of improved husbandry and the proper use of land, so that, for success, the requirement is recognized of comprehensive planning for the management of whole agricultural areas, possibly involving sweeping social and economic changes.

60. Legislation authorizing the planning and enforcement of conservation measures has been enacted in a number of Territories. While such legislation may be essential as a basis for government action, reliance principally on legislation and its enforcement by sanctions proves ineffective. Broad based soil conservation programmes succeed only when the co-operative effort of neighbours and of communities is encouraged. Such encouragement requires the guidance of expert knowledge to prepare the groundwork by survey and investigation, to determine programmes for each region, and to furnish or help furnish field assistance and agricultural education. In addition, in some Non-Self-Governing Territories the study of the economic, social and political structure of the community which is to take part in any soil conservation scheme has become a prominent feature of government planning. The Committee warmly commends all efforts that are made, as a result of such a comprehensive approach, to use fully the local organizations of self-government and of community effort in seeking better land management and farming practices.

61. Similar considerations are valid in respect of the improvement of livestock, the maintenance and development of forests and the control and development of water supplies.

62. It is indeed a commonplace that the agricultural development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories depends to a large extent both on an increase and on a diversification in agricultural production. Thus while avoiding the disadvantages and dangers of a one-crop economy, the improvement of levels of living may be reached. This increase and diversification require common efforts by the population without discrimination. In 1951, the Committee emphasized that wherever possible the growing of crops of high export value by the indigenous peoples should be encouraged so as to associate the peoples more fully in the processes of agricultural development and in the general economic expansion that such crops might bring to the Territories. Some information was provided to the Committee on the increased extent to which indigenous peoples were undertaking the cultivation of coffee and other export crops which previously had largely been in the hands of immigrant cultivators. This process is to be commended and it is hoped that all assistance will be given to indigenous producers entering upon the production of export crops, by agricultural training and advice, the selection of seeds, the control of disease, arrangements for markets, etc. Similarly, where the policy is to extend and diversify the production of food crops for local consumption, particular attention should be paid to expanding and improving the cultivation practised by the local populations or to associating them in the introduction of new food crops.

63. The Committee, in its deliberations, necessarily returned repeatedly to questions connected with land ownership, control and utilization.

64. In 1951 it recognized that land not only has an economic aspect, but in the large majority of Non-Self-Governing Territories is the basis of the structure of society; and that land legislation and policy, if they are to be just and equitable, even practicable, must take into account and make due provision for all the social and political aspects of land problems. The Committee also declared in 1951 that the question of land alienation could not be considered solely economic, but was of fundamental importance for the development and welfare of the Territories and for the establishment of good relations among all their population groups. The history of the last few years confirms the vital importance of land and the need to consider it in all its aspects.

65. As regards the opening up of land hitherto unused, the information provided shows that new land areas can often be better opened up by the Government or by organized agencies having the necessary capital and skill at their disposal than by the unco-ordinated efforts of individuals. In other cases, Governments have organized development in a form which permits the continuation of indigenous social patterns in land use, but which facilitates the application of improved techniques and permits greater co-ordination. Similar conclusions are pertinent in cases where the alienated land has been redeemed for redistribution. In the conditions of many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the breaking up of estates and their replacement by individual peasant cultivation would not permit the improved use of the land or the development of a satisfactory social structure unless special assistance is provided. By group farming or co-operative methods, by administrative control and by education, various systems are being attempted with a view to a combination of individual and public effort.

66. The resulting systems usually fall into one of the following forms:

(a) Association of the Government with a non-indigenous company or settler, for assistance in the lease of land, for the provision of credit and basic equipment, for advice in cultivation and conservation methods, and for marketing facilities;

(b) Association of the Government directly with the local inhabitants in the development of the land and their organized settlement in appropriately sized plots and villages, encouraging the formation of co-operative societies and providing facilities to meet the social and educational needs of the people; or

(c) Association of the Government with an operating agency in partnership with the local inhabitants, whereby the Government is responsible for the basic capital equipment, the agency is responsible for the management of the scheme and the farmer is responsible for the labour required, in return for a means of livelihood and the right of usufruct or even, in some cases, of ownership, over the land he cultivates.

67. The Committee recognizes that circumstances of time and place must to some extent determine the system chosen, although some representatives expressed a preference for methods associating the Government directly with the local inhabitants or settlers. A similar comment applies to questions of land tenure. Many difficulties in the improved use of land are caused by excessive fragmentation of plots, and by various customs limiting the proper rotation of crops and the improvement of livestock. Yet, in the various systems of tenure in the Non-Self-Governing Territories there are many advantages or disadvantages. The preference for any one form or the degree of modification to be sought in prevalent forms can hardly be laid down in general terms. Good farming or bad farming is to be found under many different conditions of tenure.

68. In 1951, the Committee pointed out that in some cases large areas of land were still held by non-indigenous interests and were not being exploited to any substantial beneficial extent, and recommended remedial action. Information before the Committee this year provided some cases of the resumption of such land by the Governments and its reassignment with a view to the promotion of indigenous interests. The policy of redemption and the methods followed in bringing the land into better use are to be commended. In the absence, however, of more data, it is not possible to conclude whether many of the situations of idle alienated land noted in 1951 have been remedied. The Committee continues to regard the matter with great concern.

69. The Committee also spoke in its 1951 report (para. 81) of "cases of estate cultivation, particularly in areas of dense peasant population, the existence of which may create social tension between classes or races". The alleviation of tensions such as these is one of the major problems confronting the Administering Members in some Territories, and the Committee notes with satisfaction the intensive study which is being given to these problems. They arise in a specially acute form where immigrant settlement and population increases have led to land hunger. In these circumstances it is of the greatest importance to mitigate the inter-class, intertribal, and other social conflicts which may result. The opinion was expressed in the Committee that the reservation of land by law or custom to any one group of settlers on the basis of race is irreconcilable with the principle of equal rights in economic and social practice contained in Article 55 of the Charter of the United Nations. In this connexion, one suggestion was made that, where non-indigenous settlement has led to situations of antagonism centred in the land situation, it may become necessary to seek a solution on the basis of the provision of compensation to the settlers by the Administering Members in return for their withdrawal from agricultural settlement. In any event a reasonable solution should be found by peaceful means.

70. The Committee recognizes that outstanding efforts are being made to find solutions compatible with the welfare of the inhabitants. It noted with interest and hope that basic policies are being examined anew with a view to the establishment of programmes of general social and economic advance in the distribution and use of land.

71. The Committee noted with appreciation the increased attention being paid to the development of fisheries in Non-Self-Governing Territories, even while regretting that it had been thought necessary to abandon some of the projects that were in operation or were being planned in 1951. The great lack of proteins in the diets of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories remains, and is likely to increase with the rising population unless new sources of supply are rapidly found. Studies suggest that, even with present fishing methods, sea fisheries could in general be expanded to two or three times the present production, and there is a vast field of development possible in inland fisheries, particularly in respect of fish farming.

72. However, exploitation of the great potential of fisheries and fish farming to obtain increased animal protein supplies requires continued research, surveys, experiments and training programmes and development of fishing and processing techniques as well as financial assistance of fishermen and arrangements for marketing.

73. The Committee, in reporting on fisheries in 1951, emphasized the importance of the assistance which should be provided. It pointed out that the development of communities of fishermen under healthy conditions involved many problems both of an economic and of a social character. Information before the Committee this year confirms this opinion. A policy for the development of fisheries must involve the protection and encouragement of fishing communities in their economic and social relationships. The recommendation is therefore made, not only that the specialist services provided in the development of fisheries should be extended, but that at the same time steps be taken to improve social and economic conditions among fishermen and their families.

74. The Committee is interested in (a) the extent to which by developing fisheries the nutritional standards of the inhabitants are being improved, (b) the degree of participation of the inhabitants in the fishing industry, (c) the rate of development of the fishing industry both for local consumption and for export, and (d) the effects of the development of fisheries on the national income and levels of living of the local populations practising fishing as an industry.

75. At the 6th session of the Conference of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, Member Governments concluded that:

"Although the possibilities of increasing production depend ultimately on the efforts of farmers themselves, the principal responsibility for creating conditions in which farmers will be able and willing to expand production clearly rests on governments. This responsibility must be accepted."<sup>9</sup>

76. The principle enunciated in this statement is as applicable to Non-Self-Governing Territories as to other countries. Moreover, since the vast majority of the peoples in the Non-Self-Governing Territories engage in some form of agricultural production, the adequacy of these services is of primary importance to their economies.

77. A variety of services is essential to the development and efficient functioning of agriculture. In more advanced countries some of these services are supplied through commercial, co-operative and other non-governmental channels, while others are the responsibility of the Government. In many newly developing countries the need for such services is more acute, but there is a shortage of well-trained personnel and the funds allocated to agriculture are seriously inadequate.

78. Of the various agricultural services urgently needed in Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee places agricultural extension or advisory services in the highest priority group, along with applied agricultural research oriented toward the particular conditions and problems of the Territories. Effective agricultural extension services are necessary to help bridge the gap between the scientist and the primary producer, and to promote individual and community planning and action. In addition to the shortage of trained extension workers, recent inquiries have revealed that certain common deficiencies exist in the extension organization and programmes of many of the Territories where such services are organized. Too frequently, extension work is not adequately integrated among the subject-matter fields. Loosely organized administration and insufficient technical staff services to support the field workers have been noted in many Territories. Very few extension programmes provide for adequate services dealing with the economics of agriculture, such as farm management, price and market information, maintenance of farm records, and the economics of farm planning and organization. Such services are essential to enable producers to introduce greater flexibility into their farming systems in accordance with changing demand and prices of agricultural commodities. The Committee urges all Administering Members to give urgent attention to their agricultural extension activities. In Territories where such services have not yet been organized, it is hoped preparations will be made for the early introduction of such work. Territories with established advisory or extension services are urged to take all necessary measures to improve any administrative organization or subject-matter deficiencies that may exist. In all Territories further steps should be taken to make fuller use of volunteer services in extension work. As soon as feasible, home economics and rural youth activities should be made an integral part of all extension programmes. Institutions are needed to develop research adapted to local conditions, to bring to the farmer research results and the experience of other farmers, and to train extension workers, teachers and research workers for the various services requiring technical training in agriculture.

79. Many other services needed are mainly dependent on the Governments. These include the supply of improved seed and stock, the development and distribution of fertilizers and pesticides, the introduction or improvement of agricultural tools, the adaptation of the use of machinery to local agricultural circumstances, the development of marketing facilities and the provision of adequate sources of credit. Within the development plans, the Governments may have to undertake extensive services for land resettlement or redistribution, irrigation, flood control and drainage, the development of forestry programmes and the expansion of utilities, transportation and other facilities that make maximum agricultural development possible. Emergency aid programmes may also be necessary, particularly in Territories subject to hurricane, flood or drought. Another type of service that should be rendered to agriculture is the development of incentives to increase production. Finally, some regulatory inspection and control services will always remain the function of the Governments.

80. In considering the adequacy of the basic agricultural services now provided in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, it is obvious that there can be no ideal or theoretical level of adequacy which may be applied indiscriminately. Nevertheless, on the basis of the information supplied showing direct expenditure on government services for agriculture and on agricultural education the proportion of expenditure provided by the Governments seems exceedingly small for Territories which are, and are likely to remain, predominantly agricultural. Such expenditures may not be truly representative of the quality and extent of the services provided, but by and large they seem to suggest that a low priority is attached to agricultural services and agricultural education, even though agriculture is a basic means of livelihood of the bulk of the population. In this connexion, the Committee draws attention to the comment it made in its report on education in 1950,<sup>10</sup> asking that more attention should be paid in the institutions of higher education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories to agriculture and animal husbandry. There may be good and sufficient reasons for this situation in each particular case, but the general picture suggests that a public education programme needs to be developed in which the high importance of agriculture production is given a rightful place.

81. Progress must be on many fronts. Too much reliance may be placed on the introduction of machinery or on the use of chemical fertilizers or pesticides, or on capital investment in large land development projects; there may be an undue inclination to rely on the mere passage of rules and regulations to change farming conditions without due attention being given to making the conditions of farming more favourable to the farmers. It is the function of government not only to provide well-balanced services with due regard to the welfare of all population groups but also to utilize local initiative and effort. The contribution that may be made by associations of agricultural producers acting co-operatively can hardly be over-stressed. Further reference to information provided by Administering Members on the importance they attach to these movements is made later in this report. But in connexion with this general statement on the rural economy, it is necessary to note, as of vital importance in the formulation of general programmes and in the application of particular schemes, that popular support and understanding, coupled with technical advice and direction, should be sought as the most effective means of agricultural reform and development.

82. This consideration applies also to the organization for markets for agricultural products. Increased agricultural production should be accompanied by measures which will enable the producers to receive an equitable share in the profits resulting from their labours. Reference has been made to certain criticisms directed against the surpluses accumulated by marketing boards. Where these and similar agencies permit the local producers to secure improved sales on the basis of more regular and better production, they are of considerable benefit to the Territories; the Committee noted with appreciation the information provided on the progress of a number of these agencies in which the local producers are represented to a predominant extent, and recommended that this policy should be further promoted.

VI. Industrial development

83. While most Non-Self-Governing Territories are predominantly agricultural in their natural resources, far more action is required to diversify their economies by developing and expanding industrial production. Territories chiefly of an urban character, such as Hong Kong and Singapore, must largely rely on the expansion of their manufactures for the improvement of the living standards of their people. The varied resources and the growing markets of the mining districts in, for example, parts of the Belgian Congo, Nigeria and Northern Rhodesia offer promising opportunities for the establishment of industries. In areas primarily of agricultural production industries are needed to assist the course of agricultural development, to relieve the pressure on land, to provide for the preservation and processing of agricultural products, to broaden the territorial economies and to correct conditions of under-employment.

84. The predominantly agricultural character of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in general should not be considered as incapable of change. While industrialization in the broad sense is impossible unless agriculture is modernized, agricultural progress will be frustrated unless there are industrial openings to absorb the manpower released from agriculture and unless the supplies and services essential to modern agriculture can be obtained at least in part locally. Any opposition that may be directed against industrial development where economically possible and desirable would be contrary to the objectives of attaining world economic development and stability and improving economic standards of living in the Territories. Industrial development will expand the markets for agricultural produce and even for imported manufactured goods suited to the changing needs of the Territories. It will be to the advantage of the Territories and should also in many cases result in increases in the goods they can buy from abroad.

85. In its 1951 report (para. 94) the Committee stated that:

"The Non-Self-Governing Territories produce 50 per cent of the world production of bauxite, but do not manufacture aluminium. They produce 54 per cent of the world production of cocoa, but do not manufacture cocoa powder or butter. Eighteen Territories produce 3,500,000 tons of cane-sugar, but refine only a small proportion of this production. Territories rich in limestone and in clay import large quantities of building material. In many Territories growing cotton on a large scale, the cotton-growers wear imported cotton goods."

86. The period since 1951 is too short to have brought about substantial changes in the general situation. Information was, however, furnished the Committee showing noteworthy increases in some forms of industry, such as textiles, building materials and the processing of vegetable oils. Of great potential significance is the development of public power projects which has taken place in some areas where the use of power will permit perhaps both the establishment of heavy industry in the industrial centres and the extension of light industries to rural areas. Even so, the level of industrial developments is generally low in Africa and in parts of other regions, and many of the particular industrial projects by their size and nature seem unlikely to change the general situation substantially.

87. The expansions that have taken place and the principles of the development plans, nevertheless, indicate that the mercantilist practices of colonial trade have in general been abandoned. The Committee welcomes the steps taken by the Administering Members to establish or to encourage the establishment of industrial enterprises as a part of the diversification of the territorial economy. Even though costs in the first instance may be high and there may be a number of cases of failure, the advantages accruing to the Territories in general, warrant the taking of risks and will often rapidly compensate for initial investments.

88. Industrialization should not be regarded as an end in itself but as one of the means of raising the levels of living of all the inhabitants. Where conditions are suitable, it should assist in raising these levels. It may, however, be limited in many Territories owing to the lack of resources or of a sufficiently varied range of raw materials, to the need for importing costly fuels, to the insufficiency of water supplies and to lack of markets, etc.

89. In order to accelerate industrial development, far more capital needs to be attracted, provision needs to be made for better nutrition, better housing and higher levels of remuneration than may be customary in the agricultural economy, and technical skills need to be fostered by adequate training and opportunities for employment when training is completed. A new industrial rhythm of life needs to replace the rural rhythm. Information was given the Committee showing action taken to provide family housing, improved nutrition, to train workers in all grades of employment and in general to establish a modern labour force. While not entering on this occasion into the examination of social problems, the Committee notes in this connexion that migrant labour systems, involving in most cases the employment of rural workers and the absence from their rural homes of a high proportion of the able-bodied men, do not provide a sound basis for industrial training and employment.

90. In 1951, the Committee recommended that the processing of agricultural products should be given a conspicuous place in programmes of industrialization and that wherever possible efforts should be directed toward the development of processes for making use of by-products and waste. It held that in many cases an industrial pattern should be encouraged which would not only make use of local agricultural products in such enterprises as canning, processing and weaving, but also support urgently needed improvements in agricultural productivity through the manufacture of agricultural tools and equipment and the maintenance and repair of agricultural machinery. The Committee was informed that these points were given prominence by the Administering Members in their industrial programmes. Attention is given to the processing for export of primary products, the manufacture of goods for which there is an expanding local demand and where possible the establishment of light manufactures for export. In brief it is emphasized that industry should develop alongside the progress of agricultural production and that its objectives should correspond with the needs of the local populations.

91. As regards the governmental machinery to be used, the information provided to the Committee showed that in many Territories governmental or mixed agencies of government authorities and private enterprises are active in financing or initiating industrial expansion. In the Territories under United Kingdom administration there were by the end of March 1954, apart from the Colonial Development Corporation and the Overseas Food Corporation which are financed from United Kingdom Government funds, twenty-one locally instituted development corporations, either directly undertaking projects, or primarily interested in the financing of local industries. The Committee was provided with some details showing the wide range of activities of the Rural and Industrial Development Authority of Malaya and the Uganda Development Corporation and the initiative and enterprise shown by the Africans, Indians and Europeans who are directing its operations. In Territories under French administration, note was taken in particular of the operations in French West Africa of the Fonds d'équipement rural et de développement économique et social; of the development in French Equatorial Africa promoted by the Cotton and Textile Research Institute and the French Textile Development Company; and of the large-scale operations of the governmental or mixed corporations in North Africa. In this connexion the Committee emphasizes the value of semi-public agencies of the type of the sociétés d'économie mixte, which by associating private with public funds as well as individual initiative with government action make it possible to provide the maximum safeguards for the interests of the Territories while helping to hasten the local formation of capital.

92. The operation of many governmental agencies sometimes extends over a broad range of economic and social activities. Having regard to the points previously made that industrialization is only one aspect of the policy of economic diversification and that economic and social progress are part of a single process of modernization, the Committee emphasizes its support for the conception that these agencies should be vested with broad functions, and hopes that those operating on narrower scales will be adapted to the needs of general policies. A second point of cardinal importance is that programmes should operate as far as practicable through the devolution of responsibility to territorial and local authorities representative of the inhabitants. A third point is the practical value, where the agencies work in conjunction with private operators, of associating these operators in the risks of the particular enterprise rather than using them on a commission or similar basis.

93. However much government investment through general development plans and through these agencies is expanded, a main objective, if industrial expansion is to be launched with reasonable chances of success, must be to attract private capital from overseas. The export trade of the important primary produce can usually secure all the capital it needs. It may be expected that the growing of food for local consumption will receive direct government assistance. But industrial undertakings will require new forms of investment, which should be appropriately encouraged. The Committee noted with interest the continuation and extension of policies by which fiscal and similar concessions were being made to private companies introducing new industries or expanding existing industries. The value of offering such concessions is a matter of business common sense. The possibility of making offers that will be recognized as advantageous to all parties and the creation thereby of a favourable atmosphere for investment will be determined to no small extent by the degree to which the concessions meet with the approval of the population and the real economic interests of the Territory. In general the rate of savings in the Non-Self-Governing Territories is far too low to permit the financing of industrial development by the inhabitants but in some cases the possibilities of capital savings in the Territories are increasing. The tendency to invest in land and other capital goods to the exclusion of industrial undertakings has to be overcome. Here again, the financial policy of the Territories should be designed to be consciously favourable to the investors for the savings that are so urgently needed.

94. This year the Committee did not enter into any new examination of questions of mining policy. It confines its comments to a confirmation of the 1951 report, when it formulated a number of views and general recommendations concerning the exploitation of the mineral resources, having regard to the economic and social welfare of the inhabitants. In particular it commended steps taken to develop a broad secondary economy around the mining economy, to obtain the use by the mines of local supplies and to encourage the reinvestment of profits in the Territories. Noting that, to a greater extent than in other economic activities, the indigenous inhabitants do not share in the ownership, management or technical work in the mines, it advocated, in paragraph 109 of its 1951 report, that "the objective of enabling the indigenous inhabitants to acquire the qualifications which they now lack in business and technical skills should be vigorously pursued in order to bring the local inhabitants into the operation and management of mines at all levels, and to ensure that a higher proportion of mining wages and salaries is retained in the Territories".

VII. Fiscal and customs systems

95. The fiscal systems of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are to some extent determined by their stages of economic development. The existence of generally low levels of development imposes severe limitations on the ability of governments to introduce modern fiscal systems, embracing accepted principles of taxation. If a measure of an equitable fiscal system is the proportion of revenue obtained from direct progressive taxation, it must be concluded that in most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories much needs to be done before such a system is achieved. At the present time most of these Territories derive the major share of their revenue from indirect taxation.

96. It would be useful to continue the study of national income and of the different branches of production in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, with a view to a more equitable distribution of the burden of taxation and possibly also to an increase in the tax yield.

97. A more efficient system of controlling the collection of income tax could no doubt secure a better yield in some cases. The yield is still extremely low in many Territories, not only on account of the paucity of taxable income but also on account of the difficulty of ascertaining the existence of taxable incomes and of preparing taxpayers' lists.

98. In the Territories where a proportionate tax is imposed on the incomes of individuals and corporations, the introduction of a progressive tax might usefully be considered in so far as such a system will not be an impediment to economic development.

99. The Committee recognizes that, despite its unpopularity and sometimes discriminatory character, the head tax still imposed in many African Territories cannot be abolished forthwith without the substitution of another form of taxation ensuring some contribution by all the groups of the population towards the public expenditure of the Territory concerned. The Committee recommends that steps should be taken for the suppression of this tax.

100. The educational value of the personal tax is heightened if, instead of being paid to the central government, it is levied by the local authorities of administrative subdivisions. The taxpayer is more easily reconciled to the payment of a tax if he sees that it is used to defray public expenditure of direct advantage to himself, such as expenditure connected with the building of schools, dispensaries, roads, etc. All sections of the population gradually come to play a part in the administration of public finance, first at the level of administrative subdivisions and later at the level of the Territory as a whole. The Committee notes with satisfaction that in Territories with local representative assemblies all sections of the population are already called upon to take important decisions on fiscal matters.

101. The Committee is of the opinion that the indigenous personal tax is not economically useful as a stimulus to production, which should be provided by the incentive of equitable remuneration. The Committee is glad to note the development of a trend towards the adaptation of tax rates not only to the resources of different groups of the population, but also to the resources of economic categories within such groups. The personal tax, when levied in this way, does not have the defect of apportioning the tax burden without regard to the taxpayers' ability to pay.

102. Indirect taxes, which are ultimately taxes on consumption, represent a heavier burden on the population as a whole than other forms of taxation. The governments of the Non-Self-Governing Territories tend, however, to make greater use of them than of direct taxes, because they yield substantial returns, are simple to levy and to administer, and are not so obvious to the taxpayer.

103. Touching consumption as they do, entry duties affect all inhabitants regardless of their ability to pay, except in cases where essential commodities or commodities for the special consumption by certain sections of the population are the subject of special treatment. While a detailed study would be needed to ascertain the extent to which such special treatment is granted in each Territory, the Committee is pleased to find that provisions of this kind exist in a number of Territories. It would like to see periodic tariff reviews leading to a reduction in the duties on essential commodities such as foodstuffs and textiles.

104. The customs system should not be governed by fiscal considerations alone, but should increasingly become an instrument of economic policy. As has been stated above, custom tariffs have an appreciable effect on the cost of living, while, by placing heavier duties on luxury articles an economy in foreign exchange or savings may be achieved which can be channelled towards development expenditure of benefit to the community.

105. As regards customs duties, the Committee notes that policies are followed which favour the metropolitan country.

106. In addition, exchange control policies are combined with the customs policies mainly with a view to improving the balance of payments, but with the ultimate effect that the Territories' purchases are channelled in directions primarily benefiting the currency area to which they belong. Where the balance of advantage lies in each case would require detailed investigation. Nevertheless, although the Committee notes that the Territories may share to some extent in the prosperity of the currency area, it is of the opinion that any such policies should also take into consideration the basic principle of free trade as it is enunciated in international instruments. The Committee also feels that in some cases the inhabitants of the Territories, as a result of customs and currency measures and the absence of competition, may be obliged to pay whatever higher prices may be in effect in the countries of the currency area.

107. Article I, paragraph 2, of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade states that the provisions relating to general most-favoured-nation treatment shall not require the elimination of any preferences in respect of import duties or charges in force between a number of metropolitan countries and their Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee cites the statement that in principle relations among all countries "in the field of trade and economic endeavour should be conducted with a view to raising standards of living, ensuring full employment and a large and steadily growing volume of real income and effective demand, developing the full use of the resources of the world and expanding the production and exchange of goods".<sup>11</sup> These aims can be achieved, in particular, by "the substantial reduction of tariffs and other barriers to trade" and by "the elimination of discriminatory treatment in international commerce".<sup>11</sup> Furthermore, Article 74 of the United Nations Charter, which states that the policy of the Administering Members, in respect of the Non-Self-Governing Territories no less than in respect of their metropolitan areas, should be based on the general principle of good-neighbourliness in social, economic and commercial matters, stipulates that due account must be taken of the interests and well-being of the rest of the world. In this connexion, the Committee notes with interest that many Non-Self-Governing Territories in Africa are under an international system which prohibits all commercial discrimination.

VIII. External trade

108. Most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories have an economy predominantly dependent on export. As their exports are generally limited to one or several primary commodities, the economy of these Territories is exposed to the serious consequences of considerable fluctuations in the prices of these commodities. As revenue from export varies considerably, this leads to some differences in the income of the inhabitants and the budgetary revenue of the governments.

109. Whatever measures are taken to reduce this instability and whatever may be the effect of the action taken by the agencies created in some of the Territories for this purpose, such as marketing boards and caisses de compensation, they may not overcome the instability sufficiently to bring about an appreciable improvement in the living conditions of the inhabitants. Moreover, this instability may tend to make governments hesitate to undertake new economic and social expenditure lest they should be unable to keep up the rate of such expenditure during subsequent years. It is even more difficult for governments to draw up long-term development plans to be supported from the revenue of the Territories themselves, if such revenue is largely dependent upon earnings from exports.

110. The Committee referred to this problem in its 1951 report, when it took note of the recommendations of the Economic and Social Council concerning the stability of the prices of basic commodities. This question has since been re-examined by the Economic and Social Council. The most recent decision taken by the Council was at the eighteenth session, in July-August 1954; by resolution 557 F (XVIII) the Council decided to set up immediately a Commission on International Commodity Trade, in accordance with resolution 512 A (XVII) of the Council. One of the main tasks entrusted to the Commission is to examine measures designed to avoid excessive fluctuations in the prices of and the volume of trade in primary commodities. The Commission will consider measures aiming at the maintenance of a just and equitable relationship between the prices of primary commodities and the prices of manufactured goods in international trade.

111. In this connexion, the Committee has already noted the operations of marketing boards and similar bodies. Furthermore, the Committee takes note of the recent signature of the International Tin Agreement and appreciates the aims of the 1953 International Sugar Agreement. These agreements are particularly designed to ensure markets at equitable and stable prices for countries which are producers and exporters of the commodities concerned, thus providing adequate returns to the producers and making it possible for them to maintain fair standards of labour conditions and wages.

112. The question of the exports of Non-Self-Governing Territories raises the problem of the preference given on the markets of the Administering Members to certain products of the Territories. The latter clearly find it advantageous for their production to be supported by an assured outlet on the metropolitan market. Such a policy may, however, have some drawbacks. It is for the Non-Self-Governing Territories to judge whether these drawbacks are adequately offset by the advantage of a stable metropolitan market and the financial assistance given in certain cases by the Administering Members during periods of falling prices. Some long-term agreements providing for mass purchases of the Territories' products by the Administering Members have proved beneficial, particularly when the Administering Members have accepted the principle of a periodic review of the terms of these contracts, in the light of conditions on the international markets and the trend of the prices of the imports paid for by these exports.

113. The same problem of trade policy arises with regard to imports. There is no fundamental objection to the Territories obtaining most of their supplies from the Administering Members, or from the same currency area provided that this trend is not forced and that prices in effect in the metropolitan country are not too high. The import policy of the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be based on world prices, in order to benefit from international competition.

IX. Standards of living

114. The Committee in its 1951 economic report, and again in 1952 in its consideration of social conditions; drew attention to the importance of the problem of the determination of standards of living in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and to the need to ascertain the actual effects of economic development on the living conditions of the indigenous peoples. This year it received new information from recent inquiries into the cost of living, family budgets and general living conditions. It appreciates that valuable inquiries into these subjects have been and are being made by the services of the Administering Members, or through the co-operation of institutions of research in an appreciable number of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

115. As is generally recognized, where most people live largely within a subsistence economy, attempts to present a reflection of living conditions in monetary terms and statistical data may be confusing and artificial without interpretation. A number of figures indicate little more than changes in price levels and variations in cash incomes; in some cases it is not clear whether figures of consumption merely show that more articles are bought from the neighbourhood store or trader and reflect a decline in the growing of home food or in the making of domestic articles rather than increased consumption. It would be useful if more direct inquiries could be undertaken. Representatives of the Administering Members furnished interesting information on this subject, showing the results of their own experience. It has been found that sample inquiries of a simple nature may give good results. To supplement or verify such inquiries it has proved of value to measure the amount of goods actually consumed or services hired, without regard to the method of purchase or origin of income. Another rough and ready guide is often provided by a Territory's imports of selected articles of use that are neither basic necessities nor luxuries, i.e., bicycles, sewing machines, radios, clocks and watches, etc. In a still more general way the extent to which the percentage expenditure on food declines may indicate a rise in the standards of living and at the same time figures showing an increased variety in the food consumed may also be an indication of higher standards.

116. The Committee, though interested essentially in the per capita level of living, only briefly touched on the subject of statistical methods. It noted the Report on International Definition and Measurement of Standards and Levels of Living, prepared by the 1953 United Nations Committee of Experts.<sup>12</sup> The experts had advocated the use of the component approach to such measurements, which, avoiding the use of any single monetary index or other synthetic index, provides for consideration of a wide range of economic and social conditions in the determination of standards and levels of living as affected by economic development. This report is now being examined by a number of authorities, and it is not appropriate for this Committee to join in any technical examination of the complex proposals in question. But the Committee, in considering information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, has in a way applied what may be described as a component approach to the question of standards of living through its analyses of economic, social and educational conditions. These studies, spaced over three years, cover practically all the area of facts which may be regarded as components of the levels of living and contain much statistical and descriptive material relating to these components.

117. The Committee in 1955 will pay special attention to social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It is hoped that by its next meeting there will have been further technical consideration of the proposals of the experts. At that time, accordingly, it should be possible for the Committee to discuss further the applicability of the component approach to conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and its relevance to its own programmes of work.

X. Co-operative societies and community development

118. In 1951, the Committee noted that effective intervention in the field of rural credit on the part of the governments had often become an urgent necessity. Many groups of the inhabitants, who live mainly on the food they produce or within a narrow range of local exchanges, have become earners of a cash income and may incur cash debts. The Committee accordingly emphasizes the need for a co-ordinated system of rural societies through which the credit needs of the peasants, the terms of loans and the manner of repayment can be satisfied and kept within reasonable bonds through the assistance of the local community. While the information brought before the Committee this year indicates effective action in a number of Territories to prevent indebtedness and to provide credit facilities suited to the changing agricultural systems, some representatives considered that it shows far too little is being done in this respect in many cases. Where banking institutions operate, even those founded as agricultural banks, the practices followed are frequently those of ordinary banking policy. The loans may be provided on terms reasonably advantageous to the borrower, only if securities are furnished that may not exist in the peasant communities, or on the security of the proceeds of the harvest, which may lead to a perpetuation of peasant indebtedness and adversely affect market prices. The Committee was accordingly interested in the measures of which it was informed that are being taken in some Territories to provide rural credit to farmers of good local repute even though they cannot offer as guarantees the formal securities normally required in banking practice. The Committee recommends that more vigorous action should be taken on these lines.

119. In the development of rural credit the co-operative movement has been widely supported by the governments of a number of Territories. The Committee, commending these instances, paid attention also to the broad functions which the co-operative movement can play in the transition from a subsistence to a money economy and in the further transition of local trade towards a marketing economy for export or other large-scale sale. In this connexion, it is appreciated that the co-operative movement can only operate to the full if developed among peoples with high educational standards and long traditions of business principles and practice. At the same time, co-operative principles broadly interpreted are proving of outstanding value in the traditional circumstances of a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories. Representatives of the Administering Members declared for example that the development of co-operative societies is a vital factor in social progress and that to prepare a people for the transition to modern economy, co-operative organization is essential.

120. In regard to this development, the Committee drew attention in its 1951 report (para. 69) to the resolution adopted in 1950 by the Asian Regional Conference of the International Labour Organisation; and this year expressed its continued interest in the valuable work of the ILO in its assistance to the co-operative movement in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

121. In line with the ILO resolution of 1950 the Committee stressed the need for simple, flexible co-operative legislation dealing solely with co-operative societies and governing all types of such societies. It also commended action taken to establish departments or agencies of the government primarily concerned with the guidance of the co-operative movement and the promotion of co-operative activities. The information furnished the Committee this year indicated that further progress has been made particularly in the Territories under Australian, French, Netherlands and United Kingdom administrations. The number of credit, consumer and marketing co-operatives in the Territories under United Kingdom administration has more than doubled since 1945. In Papua the societies increased from 80 societies with 12,000 members in 1950 to 100 societies with 17,000 members in 1953. In the Territories of tropical Africa under French administration a new triple programme is being developed to reform the agricultural credit institutions so as to provide credit for all persons offering satisfactory guarantees, to transform the indigenous provident societies under administrative management into mutual rural production societies managed by boards comprising, together with nominated technical members, elective representatives of the producers.

122. Another point made in 1951 was that, if a wider measure of government intervention may be required than is desirable in countries with a long experience in business traditions, a constant objective in co-operative policy should be the increasing application of co-operative principles of democratic management. In a number of cases where rural production is undergoing vital changes, the community spirit of collective work can be, as was indicated by the Administering Members, translated into forms of co-operative organization if government encouragement, assistance and control are forthcoming. Examples of this are provided in particular in respect of community fishing enterprises, communal forestry, housing schemes and in general production during the period of the enlargement of the exchange sector of the economy.

123. At the same time, the government should not press new co-operative movements to accept regulatory standards beyond their capacity. Co-operatives may fail if required to accept the full range of obligations suited to undertakings in advanced business communities.

124. The Committee will in 1955 again take up points connected with general community development programmes. This year, in commending the role that co-operative organizations of all types may play in the economic development of Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee does not intend to overlook other community development activities intended to help the people themselves initiate and carry out schemes for their own betterment. Methods and organization necessarily vary from one Territory to another according to local conditions, but the information before the Committee suggests that the general principle of community development is proving of considerable value in a number of Territories.

125. The Committee was gratified to learn that notable progress had been made in some Territories in the organization of community development councils and other types of local planning bodies which enable the inhabitants of the Territories to participate in the formulation of development plans. The Committee urges that such organizations be extended and that particular attention be given to the organization and servicing of community agricultural planning councils in all areas where agriculture is of economic significance. These agricultural planning councils should be composed of a representative cross-section of the rural families in the community. They should be encouraged to undertake the systematic study of the agricultural problems of their communities and to recommend remedial actions to be taken by farmers themselves as well as those requiring community-wide co-operation or assistance from government. Such studies of agricultural problems should be initiated immediately even though much of the desired scientific information concerning land resources may be lacking. Experience has demonstrated that such community planning councils can, from their own observations and experience, prepare practical and useful resource inventories, land-use classifications, problem-area maps and descriptions, and simplified land-productivity ratings. They also can formulate recommendations on good land-management practices applicable to the particular conditions of their communities, develop integrated community agricultural programmes, examine and propose improvements in local markets and marketing facilities, promote standardization and improvement of the quality of local produce and numerous other actions that can be taken in the community by rural families with little or no outside financing. Aside from their value in speeding up the process of rural development, such planning councils provide one of the best media yet discovered for the promotion of adult education in the rural environment.

XI. International co-operation

126. In its special reports on economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee has endeavoured to take account of action by the organs of the United Nations and the specialized agencies which are relevant to the problems before it. Similarly it has consistently supported the doctrine that the Economic and Social Council and the organs of the specialized agencies should have regard to the circumstances and needs of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in considering world or regional problems common to these Territories and to other countries. This year it is not necessary to do more than refer to these concepts of international responsibility in the belief that Article 73 d and Article 74 of the Charter contain in broad but clear terms an indication of the general forms of international co-operation applicable to the Territories.

127. Information laid before the Committee this year provides particulars of the technical assistance furnished to the Non-Self-Governing Territories for economic development and the operations of particular value to the Non-Self-Governing Territories undertaken by the specialized agencies and regional inter-governmental organizations. This information was welcomed by the Committee. It suggests that in accordance with the Standard Form, the Administering Members themselves may be able in future to provide more information on the participation of Territories in regional and functional commissions of the Economic and Social Council, in organs of the specialized agencies and in regional commissions or conferences. Information supplied by them would also be of value on the use of technical assistance programmes of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, or from other international sources, and on the manner in which such technical assistance has been integrated into long-range programmes in the Territories. It is believed that such information will indicate that the Administering Members are taking many steps to promote to the full the application of Article 73 d of the Charter by furthering constructive measures of development, by encouraging research and by co-operating with one another and with the specialized international bodies with a view to the practical achievement of the purposes of Article 73.

I. Constitution of the Committee

1. The General Assembly, by resolution 646 (VII) adopted on 10 December 1952, during the seventh session, decided to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis as set forth in resolution 332 (IV) for a further three-year period with the provisions relating to its work as set out in resolution 333 (IV).

2. The terms of reference of the Committee set forth in resolution 332 (IV) are as follows:

"...to examine, in the spirit of paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 1 and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

"...to submit to the regular sessions of the General Assembly ... reports containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories".

3. With regard to the provisions relating to its work set out in resolution 333 (IV), the General Assembly considered:

"that the value of the work of the Committee would be enhanced if without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, special attention were given to one field each year".

4. The Committee consisted of fourteen members, comprising the seven Member States transmitting information and an equal number of other Member States elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly.<sup>1</sup> The membership of the Committee in 1955 was as follows:

Members transmitting information

Australia
Belgium
France
Netherlands
New Zealand
United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland
United States of America

Elected members

Brazil
Burma
China
Guatemala
India
Iraq
Peru

<sup>1</sup> Denmark formally withdrew from the Committee at the conclusion of its 1954 session as a result of Greenland having attained a constitutional status equal to other parts of Denmark. As a consequence of Denmark's withdrawal and the expiration of the terms of office of Ecuador and Indonesia, Peru was elected by the General Assembly, at its ninth session in 1954, to fill one vacancy only, thereby preserving the balance in membership as between Administering and non-Administering Members.

All members were present with the exception of Belgium.

5. The Committee met in New York, and held twenty-four meetings from 15 April to 13 May 1955.

6. The representatives of the following specialized agencies took part in the discussions of the Committee: the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), and the World Health Organization (WHO).

II. Officers

7. The officers elected by the Committee were:

Mr. J. V. Scott (New Zealand), Chairman,
Mr. Sergio Armando Frazao (Brazil), Vice-Chairman, and
Mr. Riki Jaipal (India), Rapporteur.

III. Sub-Committee

8. A sub-committee was appointed at the 114th meeting of the Committee to prepare a special report on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was composed of the representatives of Australia, Burma, China, France, Guatemala, India, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America. The representative of Guatemala, Mr. Emilio Arenales, was elected Chairman and the representative of Australia, Mr. Allan Henry Loomes, Vice-Chairman. The Sub-Committee set up a working group on public health comprising representatives of France, Guatemala, India and the United Kingdom, together with the representatives of FAO and WHO. Sir Eric Pridie (United Kingdom) was chairman of the working group. The Sub-Committee held ten meetings from 26 April to 6 May 1955 and submitted its report at the 127th meeting of the Committee.

IV. Agenda

9. The agenda as adopted by the Committee, together with references to the relevant documents and to the summary records of the discussions of each item, is set out in annex I.

V. Preliminary statements

10. At the opening meeting of the Committee, the representative of France reaffirmed statements made at previous sessions of the Committee defining the constitutional position of the French Government in regard to the limitations on the competence of the Committee.

11. In the course of a subsequent intervention, the representative of India, referring to this formal declaration, stated the views of his delegation in support of the legality of the Committee and the value of its work, and expressed regret at the continued absence of Belgium.

12. The representatives of Guatemala and of the United Kingdom reserved the positions of their respective Governments with regard to the question of sovereignty over British Honduras (Belize Territory).

VI. Social conditions

13. In accordance with the provisions of its work as set forth in resolution 333 (IV) and resolution 846 (IX), the Committee at its present session devoted special attention to the subject of social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

14. The Committee had before it documents prepared by the Secretary-General dealing both with a review of general developments since the 1952 special report on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories as well as with other social and public health subjects not previously treated in detail. A number of studies prepared by ILO, UNESCO, WHO and FAO and WHO jointly were also submitted to the Committee.

15. Specialist advisers on social affairs were included in the delegations of France, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, in response to resolution 745 (VIII). The specialist adviser on the United States delegation was an inhabitant of the United States Virgin Islands.

16. The Committee discussed social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, item 6 of its agenda, from its 109th to 122nd meetings.

17. Statements in the general debate on developments considered in the light of the 1952 report on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories (item 6 (a) of the agenda) were made by the representatives of Australia, Brazil, Burma, China, France, Guatemala, India, Iraq, Netherlands, New Zealand and the United Kingdom and by the representatives of ILO and UNESCO. General Assembly resolution 645 (VII) had invited the Committee to consider the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter in the light of the views expressed in the special reports on education, economic and social conditions. Accordingly, the debate provided an opportunity for a general review of progress achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the policies and activities of the Administering Members within the framework of general observations expressed by the Committee in 1952.

18. Following the general debate, the Committee examined particular aspects of social conditions: namely, social effects of urbanization and industrialization; community development; race relations; employment problems and living standards as well as a number of public health aspects including trends and factors in relation to mortality; principal communicable diseases; major developments in public health administration; training of medical personnel; environmental sanitation and nutrition and health. The representatives of Australia, Brazil, Burma, China, France, Guatemala, India, Iraq, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States of America took part in the discussion on these subjects. Statements were also made by the representatives of FAO, ILO and WHO.

19. During the examination of the information before the Committee in the form of the documents prepared by the Secretariat and by the specialized agencies, further information was offered and attention was drawn to various aspects of social policy and conditions.

20. A number of representatives stressed the importance of education in improving social conditions; the great value of community development schemes; mass-education programmes, co-operative endeavours and self-help projects; the need for energetic efforts to eradicate discriminatory laws and practices in all fields of activity; the ratification and application of ILO Conventions to Non-Self-Governing Territories; and the usefulness of collective bargaining and other forms of trade unionism for improving the position of labour. Some representatives expressed an interest in the component approach as a means for measuring standards and levels of living among the inhabitants of the Territories, but noted that many obstacles were presented owing to the unavailability of certain basic statistical data.

21. In the public health field, representatives referred to the inadequacy of mortality and morbidity data; the decreases in mortality rates in many Territories; the progress made in the control of epidemic and endemic diseases, some of which continue to demand vigorous efforts in combating them; the general rise in public health expenditure which has resulted in a corresponding increase of medical and technical personnel; the still relatively small percentage of physicians in relation to the total population of most of the Territories; the increasing delegation of responsibility for health services to local authorities; the growing health services for the rural population; the broadening of medical training facilities within many Territories and in the metropolitan countries, in some cases with the co-operation of international agencies; the serious malnutrition in a number of Territories and the necessity for further remedial action; and finally, the vital importance of advancing the economic and social conditions of the inhabitants of the Territories without which health conditions could not be appreciably improved.

22. Representatives of the Administering Members replied to queries raised and supplemented the documents with additional and more up-to-date information.

23. A few representatives referred to the valuable assistance which could be provided by non-governmental organizations generally in the matter of improving social conditions, and particularly in connexion with community development activities and establishing better race relations. The representative of Burma drew the attention of the Committee to letters from the Friends World Committee for Consultation and other non-governmental organizations which had been informally circulated to the members of the Committee. He continued that it was difficult to decide the exact form in which the Committee could consider statements from these organizations, but wished to note the interest shown in its work by them. In this connexion, the Committee wished to note with appreciation the work of non-governmental organizations in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

24. Following the procedures of previous sessions of the Committee, a sub-committee was established, the details of which are given in paragraph 8 above.

25. Introducing its report at the 127th meeting, the Chairman of the Sub-Committee expressed appreciation for the co-operation of other members of the Sub-Committee, of the Secretariat and of the representatives of the specialized agencies. The Committee considered this report at the same meeting. Statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Brazil, Burma, France, Guatemala, Iraq and the United Kingdom, who reserved the right of their delegations to comment on the substance of the Committee's report in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly. Following the acceptance of minor corrections in the text, the report was approved unanimously and forms part two of the present report.

26. The representatives of Australia and Guatemala introduced a draft resolution by which the General Assembly would approve the report on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories which would be considered as a supplement to the 1952 report, and the Secretary-General would be invited to communicate the report for consideration to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned. The draft resolution was adopted unanimously at the 127th meeting. The text is given in annex II.

VII. Educational conditions

27. Following its discussion of social conditions, the Committee, at its 121st, 122nd and 123rd meetings, considered educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee had before it a report on technical and vocational training policies in the Non-Self-Governing Territories prepared by the ILO (A/AC.35/L.197), a statement prepared by the Secretariat on procedures adopted and offers of assistance received from Member States in respect of General Assembly resolution 845 (IX) on educational advancement in Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/AC.35/L.200), and an annual report<sup>2</sup> on measures for the eradication of illiteracy prepared by UNESCO (A/AC.35/L.208 and Add.1).

28. Statements were made by Australia, Brazil, Burma, China, France, India, Iraq, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America. The representatives of ILO and UNESCO provided further information respectively concerning technical and vocational training policies and measures for the eradication of illiteracy in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

29. The representative of France noted that, as regards French overseas Territories, France had increased its efforts in the social field; 76,000 million francs were being used in this effort under the New Plan including 19,000 million francs for education and 34,000 million francs for housing.

30. The representative of the United Kingdom, in reviewing some of the main developments during the year in various United Kingdom Territories, stated that there were approximately 4,000 students attending the three territorial universities and four university colleges. Additional students were enrolled in universities in the United Kingdom and facilities in the Territories themselves were undergoing expansion. In regard to primary and secondary education, including teacher training, advances were noted in several Territories, particularly in the Federation of Malaya, and in Nigeria, the Gold Coast and other African Territories. In these and in other Territories, the number of pupils and teachers had risen and school facilities had been expanded. Progress had been made in the education of women and girls and the technical side of education had been considerably developed.

31. The representative of Burma, in referring to General Assembly resolution 845 (IX), expressed his gratification with the steps that had been taken toward its implementation and informed the Committee that the Government of Burma intended to offer educational facilities in Burma to candidates from Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories, five at the university level and more at technical and agricultural institutes. The representative of Burma hoped that, in conformity with resolution 845 (IX), Administering Members receiving offers of educational facilities on behalf of the inhabitants of their Territories, would also make available such facilities from their own resources. While he appreciated the necessity for giving priority to study at the university level, he considered that educational conditions in the Territories called for the offering of facilities at lower educational levels. That view was supported in the Report of the Commission for Higher Education for Africans in Central Africa, to which reference was made in document A/AC.35/L.193. He hoped that at its 1956 session, the Committee would give special attention to the question of secondary education as well as the recruitment and training of teachers. The Committee should also examine the question of the publication of literature in the vernacular languages.

32. The representative of the Netherlands recalled that at previous sessions of the Committee, his delegation had pointed out that the educational policy in Netherlands New Guinea stressed the improvement of the quality of teachers and schools more than the mere extension of educational facilities. In most areas educational facilities were adequate but a shortage of qualified teachers was a problem. His Government believed that in Netherlands New Guinea, formal education had to be supplemented in such ways as would assist the inhabitants in adapting themselves to new ways of life. In this respect, a high priority was given to the training of teachers. During the post-war period, the entire educational system had required revision. Much work had been done in the fields of legislation and preliminary research. During the past year, considerable attention had been given to teacher training, training methods and new textbooks and in various ways the quality of the educational system had been improved. Consequently, no appreciable increase in the number of pupils or of schools could be reported for 1954. Later figures were likely to present a more encouraging picture.

33. The representative of the United States observed that the encouragement of education was a sound step in the direction of self-government. Since January 1950, several thousand students from Non-Self-Governing Territories had studied in the United States, and about 150 students had been awarded United States scholarships and grants of aid. Educational programmes were being developed for many African Territories and Puerto Rico was a focal point for Caribbean area students who had been extended assistance.

34. The representative of India drew attention to the high percentage of illiteracy among the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories and the need for its eradication. Moreover, education policy in the Territories required continuous review in order to meet the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter. A certain balance in policy was necessary, for unequal stress on primary, secondary or higher education might create fresh disturbances. In this connexion, he commended the ILO report on technical and vocational training policies (A/AC.35/L.197). There was a need to improve teacher salaries, reduce costs on school buildings, at the same time integrating school construction in rural areas with community development activities. The Government of India had recently increased the number of scholarships awarded to students from the Territories, 121 being reserved for the year 1955-56.

35. The representative of Australia, in providing supplementary information on educational conditions in Papua, informed the Committee that a special Technical Industrial Training Division was now responsible for technical and vocational training throughout the Territory and a centre near Port Moresby provided various types of vocational and technical training. Moreover, progress was observed in implementation of the 1952 Native Apprenticeship Act and in-service training was also made available. Other programmes provided home economics courses and handicraft training for boys and girls. In the general educational field, past progress had been maintained. A temporary decline in the output of teachers was expected to be reversed shortly. The number of administration schools had increased by four during 1953-54, and a further six had been opened by the end of January 1955.

36. The representative of Iraq, in congratulating Burma on its offer of assistance, associated himself with the proposals of the Burmese delegation regarding the Committee's work in 1956 in the field of education. He recalled that the problem of financing education was of particular importance in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and that the Committee, in 1956, would have to study higher education and its financing. Although education abroad presented great advantages, it should be regarded as a transitional stage and financial difficulties in the Territories must be overcome so that cultural centres, which would render possible the formation of an intellectual class, could be established. The representative of Iraq was gratified to learn of the action taken by the French Government to promote the teaching of medicine in the Territories, and was also pleased with the United Kingdom's view that higher educational institutions should be established in the Territories.

37. The representative of France pointed out that education in overseas Territories had the double objective of educating the masses and training leaders. At the start, educational development had been retarded by the need to improve sanitary and economic conditions, by the lack of a traditional system of education and by the opposition of the masses, but nevertheless progress had been great during the last forty years. In reviewing the educational system, he said that the former trend of assimilation had been supplanted by a more flexible approach designed to adapt educational policy to regional requirements and the different stages of development of the indigenous peoples. In view of the multiplicity of vernacular languages, French had been adopted as the basic language of instruction, but wherever it was possible and in particular where there was a local language in extensive use, this language was used in support of the introduction of education at the elementary levels. The French Administration also endeavoured to train women leaders and prepare girls for their future careers as mothers and wives. The various forms of education had progressed in an unequal manner, the development of primary education being slower than secondary education, owing to particular difficulties arising from the extension of higher standards of primary education. Particular emphasis was being placed on technical and vocational education, and a number of training centres, technical schools and higher institutions for technical training had been established. With respect to higher education, he referred to the Institute of Higher Studies in Dakar and to developments in Madagascar. In addition, the number of metropolitan scholarships for African students was steadily increasing. Detailed statistical information on educational progress in French overseas Territories was provided to the Committee.

38. The representative of China observed that the problem of education was closely related to community development and to the standard of living; hence, notwithstanding the efforts of the administering Powers, many indigenous children were illiterate and did not attend school. He hoped that in 1956 the Administering Members would supply to the Committee complete and accurate information with respect to primary education, and to secondary training, without which the indigenous inhabitants would have no access to higher education. The Administering Members should also provide information on the financing of the various educational fields, the financial problems involved, the contribution of missions and of local communities to educational expenditure. As regards professional training, he considered it essential that employment should be found for persons who had received such training. Finally, he thought attention should be given to teachers' salaries in order that candidates would be attracted to the teaching profession.

39. The representative of Brazil, referring to his previous intervention on public health, supported the proposal of the representative of Iraq to include in the 1956 agenda the problem of financing higher education, and requested the Rapporteur to refer to this proposal in the Committee's report.

40. The Committee's attention was drawn to a communication from the Government of the United States (A/AC.35/L.200/Add.1) on General Assembly resolution 845 (IX). The communication indicated the course taken by the United States Government to assist Non-Self-Governing Territories in the field of education and vocational training, and the United States Government declared its acceptance of the procedure proposed by the Secretary-General to implement resolution 845 (IX). From 1950 to 1955, one hundred and fifty-one persons from Non-Self-Governing Territories had received training in the United States.

41. The communication also referred to the United States scholarship programme for students of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the role of international collaboration in the educational development of the Territories.

VIII. Information on technical assistance

42. At its 108th meeting, the Committee gave some consideration to technical assistance in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In pursuance of General Assembly resolution 220 (III), information was submitted to the Committee at its fifth session on decisions taken by the Economic and Social Council and on studies undertaken under its auspices which include within their scope conditions affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories. This year, the Committee had before it document A/AC.35/L.201 providing summary information on technical assistance projects for the Non-Self-Governing Territories in operation in 1954 and approved for 1955, and on the activities of the United Nations Children's Fund within these Territories.

43. The representative of the United Kingdom drew the Committee's attention to the collaboration between his Government and the Governments of the United Kingdom Territories on the one hand, and the United Nations and the specialized agencies on the other, with respect to the programmes of technical assistance provided by the latter, and cited figures to show a substantial increase in the volume of technical assistance received by the Territories in 1954. However, funds available under these programmes were limited and the United Kingdom sought assistance only when territorial or United Kingdom resources were unable to provide it. He said that no unwelcome competition existed between regional commissions and specialized agencies. He then went on to give examples of the type of assistance granted and pointed out that the United Kingdom itself supplied the largest number of experts, 308 in 1953, while the United Kingdom Territories provided many training facilities to nationals outside the British Commonwealth. Reference was also made by the representative of the United Kingdom to the work of the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara as providing a valuable mechanism for the pooling of experience in the technical fields of activity in Africa.

44. The representative of Australia informed the Committee that in respect to Papua the bulk of technical assistance was made available by the Administering Authority which called upon international resources only when it was unable to provide such assistance. He also drew the attention of the Committee to the work being done by the South Pacific Commission in relation to Papua in literacy, industrial development, rice growing and public health as well as the assistance provided by the Australian Commonwealth Scientific and Industrial Research Organisation in the form of a land resources survey and the assistance extended by WHO and other specialized agencies. Contacts with the specialized agencies on these matters had been maintained.

45. The representative of the Netherlands then outlined the types of United Nations technical assistance projects and UNICEF aid made available to Netherlands New Guinea, particularly WHO and UNICEF projects which sought to improve conditions of health. The Netherlands Government's participation was chiefly in the provision of finance, personnel, material, supplies and equipment. He also drew attention to the useful work being carried out by the South Pacific Commission in infant care, literacy, nutrition and fisheries and to the collaboration which existed between Netherlands and Australian authorities on problems common to their respective Territories. Scientific institutions and other governmental and non-governmental organizations in the Netherlands had contributed to the development of Netherlands New Guinea. For example, as the result of studies made by a government commission of agrarian experts, a number of experimental projects had been started, including one in mechanized rice farming.

46. The representative of the United States stated that considerable technical assistance was being provided directly to United States Territories by his Government. However, valuable assistance had been furnished to the United States Territories by the United Nations and the specialized agencies as well as by regional commissions which were playing an increasingly important role in the international technical assistance field. The United States was convinced that international technical assistance was a most effective form of international co-operation and would contribute to the development of self-government in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The more advanced Territories could also contribute effectively to technical assistance programmes.

47. The representative of France informed the Committee that the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance to French-administered Territories supplemented in a most useful way the efforts of the French Government in this field. He went on to relate the types of technical assistance provided by WHO, FAO and UNICEF to French Territories in Africa, e.g., supplementary feeding, malaria control and other preventive measures. The assistance was supplemented by a scholarship programme for the inhabitants. The French Government had provided matching funds for a number of projects.

48. Statements were also made by the representatives of Brazil, China, Guatemala, India, Iraq and Peru as well as by WHO.

49. The representative of Iraq observed that international assistance granted to the Non-Self-Governing Territories, although encouraging, was as yet on a small scale and he expressed the hope that the Committee would be supplied with information on other forms of international and regional assistance extended to the Territories under Article 73 d of the Charter.

50. The representative of India, in referring to statements made by representatives of the Administering Members, expressed the view that the problems of Non-Self-Governing Territories demanded attention by both intergovernmental bodies and international organizations. He felt that while the percentage of allocation of funds under United Nations Technical Assistance Programmes had increased, the figures were not impressive in relation to the needs of the Territories. The possibility of organizing campaigns on a regional basis also merited consideration. As regards the assistance provided by various regional inter-governmental bodies, full account should be taken of the work of international organizations, the full co-operation of which should be sought by the Administering Members.

51. The representative of Brazil hoped that in the future the Administering Members would provide more comprehensive information on economic and social development in their respective territories, and the extent to which technical assistance had been integrated into long-range development programmes in conformity with section C, sub-paragraph 1 (c) of the Standard Form. He stressed that his delegation had always held the view that the Administering Members should provide the bulk of assistance to the Territories, using international technical assistance as a supplement only to their own efforts in this field. Otherwise there would be acute competition with under-developed States for the limited funds available.

52. The representative of Peru also expressed the view that international technical assistance was properly regarded as a supplement to national efforts but should be considered jointly in order to appraise development in the Territories. He thought that in future the Secretariat report should indicate the contribution of Administering Members, and he stressed the need for closer co-operation between regional commissions and the United Nations and specialized agencies. It would be helpful to know the contributions, if any, made to UNICEF and to the United Nations Technical Assistance Programme by the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

53. The representative of Guatemala stressed the fact that in view of the requirements of other under-developed countries, the main responsibility for providing assistance in the Non-Self-Governing Territories lay with the Administering Members. It was, therefore, important to measure assistance granted by international organizations in relation to the over-all efforts of the Administering Members in this field.

54. The representative of China considered that the development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories made imperative the need not only for technical assistance provided by international organizations and by Administering Members, but also the participation of the indigenous inhabitants themselves.

55. In reply to points raised by some representatives, the United Kingdom representative suggested that the contribution of international technical assistance to the development of the Territories would be placed in better perspective when the Committee considered the items on social, economic and educational conditions. There was, moreover, a satisfactory working relationship in the United Kingdom Territories between inter-governmental bodies and United Nations agencies providing technical assistance.

IX. Economic conditions

56. At the 109th and 110th meetings, the Committee discussed certain aspects of economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, largely confining itself to questions arising out of the 1954 report on economic conditions prepared by the Committee and contained in document A/2729.

57. Statements were made by the representatives of Brazil, China, France, India, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States.

58. The representatives of France, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States stated that the Committee's 1954 report on economic conditions had been transmitted to the appropriate authorities in the Non-Self-Governing Territories for their consideration.

59. The representative of India, while aware that the recommendations contained in the Committee's report had only recently been communicated to the Governments concerned, nevertheless hoped that the need to make the Non-Self-Governing Territories as self-sufficient as possible, individually or regionally, would be borne fully in mind. In this connexion, it was inevitable that stress should be laid on agricultural development and consequently attention should be given to more intensive use of the land and greater diversification of production. The representative of India believed that greater financial aid should be directed towards economic development in all the Territories rather than to meet emergency conditions in a few Territories only.

60. The representative of China considered that in drawing up economic development programmes, many Territories were hampered by fluctuating prices, supply and transportation difficulties, a skilled labour shortage, limited financial resources and inadequate surveys. Further means of financing economic development, for example, the reinvestment of profits earned by foreign firms, should be explored. The participation of the inhabitants in development plans was also an important consideration.

61. The representative of the United Kingdom then reviewed the operation of the Colonial Development and Welfare Act which represented the main channel through which the United Kingdom provided assistance to the Territories under its administration. Total expenditure by Territorial Governments on development programmes had increased from about £57 million in 1950 to about £110 million in 1953. The Colonial Development and Welfare Act supplied 13 per cent of the latter amount. While development programmes as a whole give priority to economic projects, almost 50 per cent of the funds provided under the Act had been devoted to education and other social services. Recent legislation, together with a carry-over of funds, made a total of £120 million available to Territorial Governments for the period 1955 to 1960. However, it was important to note that a large proportion of funds expended on development plans was derived from territorial revenues and other local resources.

X. General questions relating to summaries and analyses of information

62. At its 1954 session the attention of the Committee was drawn to General Assembly resolution 789 (VIII) on the control and limitation of documentation. Having regard to previous action taken with a view to the reduction of reports prepared for the Committee and the General Assembly, members of the Committee had no suggestions to make at that time, but the Secretariat was asked to keep the question under review. At the present session, in the course of the 122nd and 123rd meetings, the Committee discussed the appropriateness of discontinuing the publication of the volumes containing the Secretary-General's summaries of information from Non-Self-Governing Territories for the years intervening between the three-yearly publication of full summaries.

63. In reply to questions asked by the representative of Australia, the representative of the Secretary-General informed the Committee that information of this character prepared in the two years intervening between the three-yearly preparation of full summaries was partly of a statistical nature and that this statistical information was available in part in a number of annual publications of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. The remaining information was not so readily available. It appeared that the present publication was being used widely by Governments and non-governmental organizations, libraries, universities, etc.

64. Statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Brazil, Burma, China, France, India, Iraq and the United States of America. The representatives of Brazil, Burma, India and Iraq expressed the opinion that the publication of this information, as information specifically supplied on Non-Self-Governing Territories in the terms of Article 73 e of the Charter, was highly desirable and indeed necessary in terms of the provisions of General Assembly resolutions. The representative of the United States said that his Government, while recommending economy wherever possible, considered that the present publication should be continued. The representative of France, in drawing attention to the fact that the Departments of the French Government were giving wide publicity to United Nations documentation relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories, proposed that the Committee leave the matter to the Secretary-General. He pointed out that his delegation favoured the widest possible dissemination of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representative of Brazil emphasized that there was no objection to the suggestion that the matter be left to the discretion of the Secretary-General, but the opinions expressed in the Committee should be brought to his attention. The representative of Australia expressed his appreciation of the light thrown by this discussion on the question as being of assistance to the Secretary-General and the Fifth Committee in reaching an appropriate decision.

XI. Cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter

COMMUNICATION FROM THE NETHERLANDS GOVERNMENT REGARDING SURINAM AND THE NETHERLANDS ANTILLES

65. In resolution 747 (VIII) adopted on 27 November 1953, the General Assembly, in the preamble, took note "of the statement<sup>3</sup> of the representative of the Netherlands that the negotiations between representatives of the Netherlands, the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam, which were adjourned in the year 1952 will shortly be resumed", and in the first five paragraphs of the operative part, (1) noted "with satisfaction the progress made by the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam toward self-government;" (2) considered "that the new status of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam can only be rightly appraised after the said negotiations have led to a final result and this has been embodied in constitutional provisions;" (3) expressed "to the Netherlands Government its confidence that, as a result of the negotiations, a new status will be attained by the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam representing a full measure of self-government in fulfilment of the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter;" (4) invited "the Government of the Netherlands to communicate to the Secretary-General the result of these negotiations as well as the provisions mentioned in paragraph 2 above;" and (5) invited "the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to examine these communications in connexion with the information already transmitted and to report thereon to the General Assembly."

66. In pursuance of the terms of resolution 747 (VIII) the Government of the Netherlands had transmitted to the Secretary-General a communication (A/AC.35/L.206) dated 30 March 1955 in which it related the constitutional developments leading to the promulgation on 29 December 1954 of a Charter for the Kingdom of the Netherlands comprising the Netherlands, Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, and enclosed a copy of the Charter together with an explanatory memorandum. As a result of the changes brought about in the constitutional position and in the status of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, the Netherlands Government regarded its responsibilities according to Chapter XI of the Charter in respect to Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles as having terminated.

67. The Committee discussed this item of the agenda at its 125th and 126th meetings. At the 125th meeting, the representative of the Netherlands introduced the relevant documentation and the two representatives of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles respectively who were included in the Netherlands delegation. The two representatives then reviewed the constitutional changes which had been enacted, and explained the main provisions of the Charter for the Kingdom of the Netherlands. The Charter was based on the principles that the Netherlands, Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles had expressed freely their will to accept a new constitutional order in the Kingdom of the Netherlands which comprised the aforementioned three countries; that the three countries each exercised autonomy in internal affairs; that decisions on Kingdom affairs had to be taken jointly by the three countries on a basis of equality; and that the three countries accorded each other aid and assistance. Except in matters of defence, foreign affairs, nationality and a few other subjects, which were the prerogatives of the Kingdom, the three countries had exclusive authority to take final decisions. Moreover, each country could draw up and amend its own constitution. The Queen was head of the Kingdom as well as the head of each of the countries, and the parliamentary system was the system of government for the Kingdom and each of the countries. Statutes for the Kingdom were enacted by the Netherlands Parliament which for this special function acted as Parliament of the Kingdom. However, the Parliaments of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, by various means, could influence in varying degrees the decisions of the Netherlands Parliament. In view of the Netherlands no longer being the Administering Member in respect of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, but an equal partner in the Kingdom of the Netherlands, the Netherlands had neither the right nor the power to transmit information on these countries as provided for in Article 73 e of the United Nations Charter. Publications on Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles were presented to the Committee by way of explanation of certain salient features of the two countries but not as an obligation under Article 73 e of the Charter.

68. Following the presentation of information by the Netherlands representatives, the representatives of Brazil, Burma, China, Guatemala and India addressed a number of questions to them regarding various aspects of the constitutional changes in respect to Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles which had resulted from the promulgation of the Charter for the Kingdom of the Netherlands.

69. The representative of Guatemala wished to know: (1) whether in the election of parliaments by universal suffrage, illiterate persons were permitted to vote, and whether public or secret balloting prevailed; (2) in what way the Governor in Surinam and in the Netherlands Antilles derived his powers as indicated in article 2 of the Charter; (3) the reasons for making separate provisions for legislative and administrative measures in Surinam and in the Netherlands Antilles as distinct from those prevailing in the Netherlands as indicated in article 50 of the Charter; (4) whether the inhabitants of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles had been consulted with respect to the new constitutional status which now prevailed; (5) the method of nomination of judges in Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles and whether these countries had themselves requested that the judges be appointed by the Queen; (6) whether the three-fifths majority rule of the Second Chamber of Parliament of the Kingdom applied equally to the Netherlands Parliament; (7) whether the representatives of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles in the Parliament of the Netherlands Kingdom had the right to vote and whether there was any limitation on their numbers; (8) whether the Kingdom of the Netherlands would have similar responsibilities to those of the Netherlands Government in transmitting information in pursuance of Article 73 e of the Charter. The representative of Guatemala was interested to know the extent to which Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles were on a footing of equality with the Netherlands.

70. The representative of Brazil asked (9) whether there was any legislation providing for the powers of the Governor in Surinam and in the Netherlands Antilles as indicated in article 2 of the Charter; (10) what body had the legal competence to decide upon the inconsistency of laws in relationship to the Charter and whether the Queen had the power to make null and void any laws which were inconsistent.

71. The representative of India requested information as to: (11) whether the elections of November 1954 were held in the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam or in the former only; (12) whether the provisions of the Charter were placed before the electorate prior to the holding of elections.

72. The representative of China asked (13) whether Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles could freely regulate their currency and (14) whether the Queen could raise local recruits in the two countries without the consent of the two respective Governments.

73. The representative of Burma asked: (15) how equality of partnership of the three countries was reflected in article 12 of the Charter under which Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles were in a minority in all organs of the Kingdom; (16) whether Ministers Plenipotentiary were elected or nominated; and (17) whether there were any provisions in the Charter permitting Surinam to amend its constitution and sever its relations with the Kingdom of the Netherlands.

74. In reply to specific questions, as well as to other points raised in the course of discussions, answers were given by the Netherlands representatives from Surinam and Netherlands Antilles.

(1) With respect to the voting rights of illiterate persons, there were no provisions prohibiting them from exercising the right to vote and, in any case, illiteracy was not a problem in the two countries. Balloting was secret. (2) The Governor in Surinam and in the Netherlands Antilles represented the Queen as constitutional head of the Government of the countries and the executive power of the Kingdom. The post was not a political one which would in any way duplicate the powers of the prime ministers of the respective countries, but was primarily a symbolic post. (3) Paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 50 of the Charter contain different provisions, because the Charter has left in force and applicable to the Kingdom as a whole various articles of the Netherlands Constitution, among them the provision that the Parliament of the Netherlands can also act as Parliament of the Kingdom under special conditions (articles 15 to 19 of the Charter). As a result of this construction differing provisions were necessary. (4) As to whether the inhabitants of the countries had been consulted with respect to the constitutional changes, the parliaments had been elected by universal suffrage and there had been no opposition in the parliaments with respect to the constitutional changes. (5) The Government of the Kingdom of the Netherlands and not the Netherlands Government itself was responsible for the appointment of judges. This provision had been made in response to the wish of the two countries themselves, in order to safeguard the independence of judges in these small communities. As far as the judicial branch was concerned, local laws as well as the Charter protected judges from any local influence which might arise. (6) Laws of the Netherlands were not binding upon Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, but only those which were passed by the Parliament of the Kingdom. (7) The delegates specified in article 17 of the Charter did not have the right to vote. Surinam and the Antilles had preferred to have the right to send an indefinite number of delegates to the Parliament of the Kingdom and the right that measures opposed by them could only be passed by a three-fifths majority, rather than having voting rights for their delegates who could easily be outvoted. They considered this provision more favourable to them than voting rights would have been. The number of delegates attending the Parliament of the Kingdom was therefore of no consequence. (8) There could be no question of transmitting information under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations by the Kingdom in regard to one of the equal parts jointly making up the Kingdom. The transmission of information on Surinam or the Netherlands Antilles would be as unthinkable as the transmission of such information on the Netherlands. (9) The powers of the governor in Surinam and in the Netherlands Antilles were specified in the constitutions of these countries which were adapted to the Charter. (10) The Government of the Kingdom as a whole was the body competent to decide upon inconsistency of laws in relationship to the Charter. (11) Elections were held in the Netherlands Antilles in November 1954 and at a later date in Surinam. (12) It was not deemed necessary to hold special elections on this issue since all political parties had supported the constitutional changes. (13) Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles were free to regulate their respective currencies. The Surinam and Netherlands Antilles guilders had twice the value of the Netherlands guilder. (14) The Government of the Kingdom could not raise local recruits in Surinam or in the Netherlands Antilles. As indicated in article 31 of the Charter, this could only be done pursuant to local legislation. (15) The representatives from the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam clarified those points regarding the equality of partnership of the three countries. (16) Ministers Plenipotentiary were appointed by their respective Governments. (17) The countries had the right individually to amend their respective constitutions and could in joint consultation modify the relationship existing between the three parts of the Kingdom. The representatives referred to the statement made by Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands to the effect that no political partnership could endure unless supported by voluntary acceptance and fidelity of the overwhelming majority of the citizens, and that it would be contrary to established policy to prevent a partner from leaving the Kingdom if it so wished.

75. A number of representatives extended their thanks to the Netherlands representatives for their comprehensive information and replies to questions.

76. The representative of the United States expressed the view that there was no doubt in the mind of his Government that Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles had achieved full self-government.

77. The representative of Australia stated that the Committee should take note of the statements made by the Netherlands Government to the effect that, in view of the constitutional changes which had been brought about in respect to Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, information could no longer be transmitted in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter for only that Government was competent to take such decisions. Moreover, the Netherlands Government had furnished the United Nations with ample evidence to show that the new constitutional arrangements had the full consent of the inhabitants of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles.

78. The representative of France associated himself with the views expressed by the representative of Australia and emphasized that since Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles were fully self-governing and equal partners in the new Kingdom of the Netherlands, there was no further justification for the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter. He stated that the Committee should not discuss this matter, but merely take note of the information supplied by the Netherlands delegation.

79. The representatives of Brazil, China, Guatemala, India, Iraq, and Peru, while expressing appreciation for the comprehensive information provided by the Netherlands representatives, stated various reasons why further consideration in respect of this item might be deferred until all the Governments concerned had had an opportunity to examine more fully the information provided by the Netherlands Government. It was suggested that the Committee should adjourn and meet again sometime prior to the convening of the General Assembly in September in order to continue consideration of this item. The representative of Iraq, while agreeing to this, thought that it might be better to leave the matter to the General Assembly.

80. The representative of the Netherlands, although regretting that the Committee would not take a decision at this stage, did not object to a postponement until a later date.

81. The representative of Australia noted that a number of representatives could not reach any conclusions at this time and he would agree to a postponement of a decision. He was, however, opposed to any suggestion that the question be deferred, without prior decision by the Committee, to the General Assembly.

82. The Chairman put to the vote the question whether the Committee favoured postponing further consideration of this item during the present session. By a show of hands, 7 were in favour, none against and 5 abstained. It was further decided that the Committee would meet at a time prior to the convening of the tenth session of the General Assembly, the precise dates to be fixed by the Chairman in consultation with the Secretary-General.

XII. Procedures for the consideration of communications relating to the cessation of the transmission of information

83. General Assembly resolution 850 (IX) invited the Committee to include in its present report any proposals it considered desirable on the implementation of the resolution which aimed at perfecting the methods and procedures to be followed in connexion with cases of the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e.

84. The question was briefly discussed at the 129th meeting of the Committee. The representative of Brazil observed that in many aspects procedures had already been evolved in dealing with this question. In particular the Committee's competence to consider such communications had been recognized; the three Governments concerned in specific instances of the cessation of information, the United States, Denmark and the Netherlands, had complied with the terms of General Assembly resolution 222 (III) and provided detailed information on the constitutional changes effected; these three Governments had also included in their delegations persons from the Territories able to give information on the changes from a territorial point of view; a procedure of exposition, question and answer, had also developed in the Committee; the Committee had adopted in the first two cases resolutions indicating certain tentative conclusions within the limits of its terms of reference and without anticipating the final disposal of the questions by the General Assembly. Within these procedures the one point of detail which seemed to require further consideration was whether a time limit should be suggested within which communications received from the Governments should be considered by the Committee. It must be kept in mind that some questions may have to be referred by the delegations to their Governments. The General Assembly resolution, however, had wider implications for the consideration of which the Committee had insufficient time at its present session. The representative of Brazil therefore suggested that this should be explained in the report to the General Assembly so that further consideration of the submission of any proposals deemed desirable in terms of resolution 850 (IX) might be deferred to the Committee's session in 1956. The representative of Guatemala associated himself with this motion which was approved by the Committee.

XIII. Renewal of the Committee; and representation on the Committee and participation of indigenous representatives

85. In the course of its discussions, the Committee decided to consider as a single item the three items of the agenda relating to: Future studies; Renewal of the Committee; and Representation on the Committee and participation of indigenous representatives.

86. Resolution 646 (VII), adopted by the General Assembly on 10 December 1952, in operative paragraph 1, decided "to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis for a further three-year period", and in operative paragraph 3, decided "that, at its regular session in 1955, the General Assembly will examine the question whether the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories should be renewed for a further period, together with the questions of the composition and terms of reference of any such future committee".

87. At its 123rd, 124th, 127th and 128th meetings the Committee discussed the question of its renewal and, in conjunction therewith, future studies of the Committee and the question of representation on the Committee and participation of indigenous representatives.

88. The representative of India introduced, on behalf of his delegation and those of Burma and Iraq, a joint draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.209), the text of which was as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"Having considered the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories which was constituted by resolution 332 (IV) adopted by the General Assembly on 2 December 1949,

"Recognizing the value of further constructive work by the Committee in the interests of the advancement of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories and the attainment of the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter,

"1. Decides to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories;

"2. Decides that as provided in resolution 332 (IV) and 646 (VII), the Committee should be composed of those Members of the United Nations transmitting information in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter and of an equal number of non-administering Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly on as wide a geographical basis as possible;

"3. Invites the Members of the Committee to continue to attach to their delegations persons specially qualified in the functional fields within the Committee's purview;

"4. Invites the Members administering Non-Self-Governing Territories to attach to their delegations indigenous persons specially qualified to speak on economic, social and educational policies in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

"5. Authorizes the Committee, with the consent of an Administering Member, to admit as observers persons appointed by the Governments of Non-Self-Governing Territories concerned, the inhabitants of which have attained a large measure of responsi- bility for economic, social and educational policies as adopted within their Territories;

"6. Instructs the Committee to examine in the spirit of paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 1 and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolution adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

"7. Instructs the Committee to submit to the regular sessions of the General Assembly reports containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally or where common to Territories in a single regional group but not with respect to individual territories;

"8. Considers that the Committee should, without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, give special attention to educational, economic and social conditions in turn and should consider the information transmitted in respect of these questions in the light of the reports approved by the General Assembly on such conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories."

89. The representative of India observed that the work of the Committee in the past had accelerated economic, social, cultural and educational advancement in the Territories. Some Administering Members had also volunteered to submit political information. The future of the Committee should be assured by establishing it on a permanent basis. Recent developments in the colonial world, in addition to the fact that the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly would require some organ such as the present Committee, made it necessary to consider the establishment of a permanent Committee. The representative of India then outlined his views in respect to each of the paragraphs contained in the draft resolution.

90. The representative of Iraq observed that conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories would always be a subject of international discussion and this made necessary the need for a Committee of this kind. He felt that the Committee had achieved positive results in the past and, for his part, he would be prepared to accept a reasonable solution which did not imperil the principle of safeguarding the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories. He reviewed briefly the position of his Government with respect to the paragraphs contained in the resolution which, in his view, was based largely on General Assembly resolutions. However, he thought the sponsors of the draft resolution were prepared to accept amendments, provided there was no compromise of principle.

91. The representative of Burma considered that the question of the renewal of the Committee was one of principle rather than of procedure. He believed that Administering and non-administering Members alike supported the Committee as an instrument for promoting the welfare of non-self-governing peoples in conformity with the spirit which prevailed at the time the Charter was drawn up at San Francisco. The sponsors of the draft resolution preferred the establishment of a permanent Committee. They were prepared, however, to accept a compromise solution which would provide for the continuation of the Committee.

92. The representative of the United States of America voiced approval for the renewal of the Committee. The question of self-government was a continuous and evolving one. While on the one hand, considerable progress was evident in the implementation of Chapter XI of the Charter, there were forces which were depriving a far greater number of people of self-government.

93. With a view to effecting a compromise between the various views of representatives of the Committee, the representative of Brazil introduced a working paper containing amendments to the three-Power draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.211), the text of which was as follows:

"1. Delete the 2nd paragraph of the preamble and insert the following in place thereof:

"Taking note of the opinions expressed by Member States on the value of the technical work of the Committee, on the contribution made by its Reports to fuller understanding of problems of Non-Self-Governing Territories and on the useful guidance they may provide to the solution of these problems;"

"2. Insert the following as the 3rd paragraph of the preamble:

"Considering that the Committee should continue the constructive work carried on under its present terms of reference in the interests of the advancement of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories and the attainment of the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter;"

"3. Delete the 1st paragraph of the operative part and replace it by the following:

"1. Decides to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis for a further period of three years and to confirm its terms of reference as set forth in Resolution 332 (IV);"

"4. Delete paragraph 3 of the operative part and replace it by the following:

"3. Invites the Members of the Committee to continue to attach to their Delegations technical advisers specially qualified in the functional fields within the Committee's purview;"

"5. Insert the following as the 4th paragraph of the operative part:

"4. Expresses its appreciation of the presence of those technical advisers on the Delegations and notes with satisfaction that due to the supplementary information provided by these experts to the discussion, the quality of the work of the Committee had been improved;"

"6. Delete paragraph 4 and insert the following, which will become paragraph 5:

"5. Also notes with satisfaction that certain of the Members administering Non-Self-Governing Territories have attached to their Delegations indigenous persons specially qualified to speak on economic, social and educational policies in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the useful contributions that they have made to the work of the Committee;"

"7. Insert the following as paragraph 6:

"6. Expresses the hope that the Administering Members will increasingly follow the practice referred to in the preceding paragraph;"

"8. Delete the original paragraph 5 and replace it by the following, which will become paragraph 7:

"7. Considers that the Administering Members may consider it useful to appoint persons as observers on behalf of the governments of Non-Self-Governing Territories the inhabitants of which have attained a large measure of responsibility for economic, social and educational policies in their territories."

"9. Insert the following as paragraph 8.

"8. Authorizes the Committee, when requested by the Administering Member concerned, to admit, in the capacity of observers, the persons referred to in the preceding paragraph;"

"10. Renumber original paragraph 6 as paragraph 9.

"11. Renumber the original paragraph 7 as paragraph 10 and delete the following words from it: 'or where common to territories in a single regional group'.

"12. Insert the following as paragraph 11:

"11. Authorizes the Committee, in the spirit of resolution 847 (IX), and in order to clarify its reports and improve their scientific and technical character, to make appropriate references in its functional studies to groups or categories of territories having similar problems or features in common as a result of such factors as their stage of advancement, their economic and social structure or their geographic location."

"13. Renumber the original paragraph 8 as paragraph 12."

94. The representative of Brazil considered that the Committee's work was indispensable in promoting the advancement of Non-Self-Governing Territories and should therefore be renewed. The working paper which he had introduced represented an attempt to reconcile outstanding differences. The Administering Members as well as non-Administering Members had expressed views in the past to the effect that the technical work of the Committee had been useful. The representative of Brazil then explained the underlying reasons for the suggestions he had introduced in the working paper.

95. The representative of the United States of America supported the proposals contained in the Brazilian working paper as constituting a satisfactory basis for compromise. For his part, he would support any proposals which would continue the Committee's existence and obtain the continued co-operation of the two principal Administering Members represented on the Committee.

96. The representative of Peru favoured the continuation of the Committee for an indefinite period. The Committee was indispensable for the consideration of information furnished under Article 73 e and also to the promotion of international co-operation in the economic, social and educational fields in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He, therefore, supported the proposals contained in the Brazilian working paper. With reference to paragraph 5 of the joint draft resolution, the representative of Peru was of the opinion that the Committee should be authorized, with the consent of the Administering Members, to admit as observers indigenous persons appointed not by governments of Non-Self-Governing Territories, but by the local authorities of those Territories so indicated. With reference to paragraph 6 of the draft resolution, he would suggest the insertion of "prepared by the Secretariat on the basis" after the words "summaries and analyses".

97. The representatives of Australia, China, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States then indicated their views with respect to the three-Power draft resolution and the Brazilian working paper before the Committee.

98. The representative of China submitted a number of arguments for and against the renewal of the Committee. On the one hand, there were the basic distinctions between Chapter XI and Chapters XII and XIII of the Charter in respect to submission of political information; doubts expressed as to the usefulness of the Committee's work; differences in opinion with respect to the application of Article 73 e of the Charter and restrictions placed upon the Secretary-General in the comparison of information transmitted. On the other hand, various provisions of the Charter; the views expressed on the usefulness of the Committee's work; the progress shown in the development of non-self-governing peoples; and the psychological effect on public opinion if the Committee were not renewed, constituted arguments for renewal of the Committee. The representative of China was of the opinion that the issues involved in the development of non-self-governing peoples were so important as to demand the casting aside of the various arguments referred to above. He urged that the Committee should be renewed for a further three-year period.

99. The representatives of Australia, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, in varying degrees, were unable to accept the joint draft resolution in its present form, or as amended by the Brazilian working paper.

100. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government remained opposed in principle to the existence of the Committee for which it saw no justification under Article 73 and which had not made any real contribution in the fields within its jurisdiction. The United Kingdom representative then referred to the provisions of the joint draft resolution to which his Government took exception. Paragraph 5 was unacceptable because, among other things, it would bring about a duality of representation if adopted. Paragraph 7 was similarly unacceptable since the inclusion of the middle phrase relating to Territories in a single regional group represented a fundamental change in the Committee's terms of reference.

101. The representative of Australia stated that his Government had participated fully in the work of the Committee. However, its expectations of the co-operation it would find in the Committee had not been entirely fulfilled; for example too much accent had been placed on political functions and too little on the technical functions of the Committee. There were, indeed, strong constitutional grounds for opposing the right of discussion of any questions relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories in the Committee and in the General Assembly. He then indicated his views in respect to the terms of the draft resolution and the Brazilian working paper. He was opposed to the re-establishment of the Committee on a permanent basis. He was also opposed to the inclusion of paragraph 5 partly on the grounds that the principle of unity of representation of Administering Members should not be violated and equally because the paragraph was made unnecessary by the existence of paragraph 4. Moreover, he expressed disapproval of consideration of problems and recommendations involving regional groups of Territories, since it was unlikely that this approach would help the Committee in its work, and might have the effect of singling out Territories or groups of Territories administered by one country.

102. The representative of the United States, in pursuance of the view of his Government that it was of major importance to secure the continuation of the Committee with the participation of the Administering Members, considered that the discussion indicated that the best course was to provide that the Committee should be renewed on the present basis.

103. The representative of the Netherlands for his part was also not opposed to a renewal of the Committee along its present lines, but not along those which had been proposed in the joint draft resolution. The representative of the Netherlands indicated that, in particular, renewal of the Committee for an indefinite period and the inclusion of paragraph 5 of the draft resolution were unacceptable. Moreover, the Netherlands representative was also opposed to any reference in paragraph 7 involving the consideration of problems and recommendations concerning regional groups of Territories. The inclusion of such a reference would give rise to endless confusion and discussion as to the precise delineation of regional groups.

104. The representatives of China and the United States then introduced amendments to the three-Power draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.215), the text of which was as follows:

"1. In substantive paragraph (1) of the three-Power draft add, at the end of the paragraph, the words: 'on the same basis for a further three-year period'.

"2. Delete paragraph 5.

"3. In paragraph 7, delete the words: 'or where common Territories in a single regional group'."

105. Further statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Brazil, Burma, France, Guatemala, India, Iraq, Peru and the United States.

106. The representative of India, in defending the draft resolution, was of the opinion that its provisions subscribed fully to the spirit of Article 73. With reference to paragraph 5, he thought it useful that observers from the more advanced territories should participate in the work of the Committee, since they could contribute considerably to its deliberations. He would suggest a small amendment in the first line of paragraph 5 of the draft resolution so that it would read: "Authorizes the Committee, with the consent of the Administering Members concerned,".

107. The representative of Iraq viewed the draft resolution and the Brazilian working paper as being expressions of moderation. With reference to the draft amendments introduced by China and the United States, he could accept the first amendment but would have to abstain on the second and third amendments.

108. The representative of Brazil referred to statements made by Administering Members in past meetings of the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly in order to illustrate their endorsement of many of the points reflected in the draft resolution, and in the Brazilian working paper. He was prepared to agree to the renewal of the Committee for a further three-year period as a means of reconciling the divergent views in the Committee.

109. The representative of the United States expressed the fear that while the Brazilian working paper would have been acceptable to his delegation, its approval might have the effect of bringing about the withdrawal of some of the Administering Members from the Committee.

110. The representative of France recalled the desire of his Government to fulfil the obligations contained in Chapter XI of the Charter toward the Territories under its administration, but that it was unwilling to go beyond the terms of the Charter to which it had originally subscribed.

111. The representative of Guatemala, although favouring the draft resolution as it stood, would have accepted as a measure of conciliation, the Brazilian proposals had the Administering Members also accepted them. He had abstained from discussing the substance of the question because he realized the difficulty of obtaining a resolution which would meet the approval of all Members. He would, however, agree to the renewal of the Committee and the extension of its terms of reference.

112. By a vote of 4 in favour, 2 against and 5 abstentions, the Committee decided to take an immediate vote on the joint draft resolution and amendments proposed by China and the United States.

113. The representative of India requested that a vote be taken paragraph by paragraph.

114. The representative of Peru requested that the first amendment proposed by China and the United States be voted on separately, first on the phrase "on the same basis" and on the phrase "for a further three-year period".

115. The vote on the joint draft resolution as amended by the representatives of China and the United States was as follows:

Paragraph 1 of the preamble was approved by a vote of 11 in favour, none against and 2 abstentions;

Paragraph 2 of the preamble was approved by a vote of 8 in favour, none against, and 5 abstentions;

In operative paragraph 1 the addition of the words "on the same basis" was approved by a vote of 8 in favour, none against, and 5 abstentions;

In operative paragraph 1 the addition of the words "for a further three-year period" was approved by a vote of 9 in favour, none against, and 4 abstentions;

Operative paragraph 1, as amended, was approved by a vote of 10 in favour, none against, and 3 abstentions;

Operative paragraph 2 was approved by a vote of 11 in favour, none against, and 2 abstentions;

Operative paragraph 3 was approved by a vote of 10 in favour, none against, and 3 abstentions;

Operative paragraph 4 was approved by a vote of 9 in favour, one against, and 3 abstentions;

The deletion of operative paragraph 5 from the draft resolution of Burma, India and Iraq, was approved by a vote of 6 in favour, one against, and 6 abstentions;

Operative paragraph 6 was approved by a vote of 10 in favour, none against, and 3 abstentions;

The deletion of the words "or where common to Territories in a single regional group" from operative paragraph 7 was approved by a vote of 6 in favour, none against, and 7 abstentions;

Operative paragraph 7, as amended, was approved by a vote of 8 in favour, none against, and 5 abstentions;

Operative paragraph 8 was approved by a vote of 10 in favour, none against, and 3 abstentions.

116. The draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was approved by a vote of 9 in favour, none against, and 4 abstentions.

117. The text of the resolution as adopted by the Committee is given in annex II.

118. The representatives of Brazil, Burma, China, France, Guatemala, India, Netherlands, and New Zealand gave explanations of their votes on the resolution.

119. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government was opposed to the further extension of the Committee. His abstention should not be construed as indicating any change in the attitude of his Government in respect to the Committee if renewed by the General Assembly at its next session.

120. The representative of France associated himself with the views expressed by the representative of the United Kingdom and considered that paragraph 4 was discriminatory as between indigenous and non-indigenous persons.

121. The representative of India voted in favour of the first amendment, abstained from the second and third amendments and voted for the resolution as a whole, as amended. He reserved the position of his Government in respect to any future action to be taken in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly.

122. The representative of Burma abstained and reserved the position of his Government in respect to any future action to be taken in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly.

123. The representative of Guatemala abstained on the first part of the first amendment, voted in favour of the second part of the first amendment, abstained on the second and third amendments and voted in favour of the resolution as a whole. He reserved the position of his Government in respect to any future action to be taken in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly.

124. The representative of the Netherlands voted in favour of the resolution as amended and reserved the position of his Government in respect to any future action to be taken in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly.

125. The representative of China, in co-sponsoring the amendments to the draft resolution, had been motivated by a desire to achieve agreement on the renewal of the Committee without prejudice, however, to his position in respect to "indigenous participation" and "regional aspects".

126. The representative of Brazil voted in favour of the resolution as amended. His vote should not be construed as favouring all those paragraphs of the resolution as amended but simply as a vote in favour of the renewal of the Committee.

127. The representative of New Zealand voted for the resolution as amended as well as for each of the amendments. He also expressed the view that the work of the Committee was useful.

XIV. Future studies relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories: (a) Functional fields; (b) Regional aspects

128. In accordance with General Assembly resolutions 218 (III) and 846 (IX), full summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e should be provided to the General Assembly in 1956, and under the system established by resolution 333 (IV), 1956 would be a year in which special attention would be paid to educational conditions. Following indications expressed in the Committee, the Secretariat had prepared a note (A/AC.35/L.213) setting out a provisional list of subjects in the field of education, which would form the basis for the work programme of special studies in 1956. It was understood that the Secretary-General would have wide latitude in planning these studies in which he would seek the collaboration of the specialized agencies concerned.

129. General Assembly resolution 847 (IX) requested the Committee to consider matters relevant to the examination of information on problems common to regional groups of Non-Self-Governing Territories. Information was furnished the Committee on the methods followed in the preparation of summaries and analyses, and it was noted that in the studies for 1956 the information would continue to be treated and classified according to the principal topics, the Administering Member concerned, or the geographical group of Territories, as might be most appropriate in each case.

130. In addition, the Committee, in accordance with the provisions of resolution 847 (IX), was asked to study points arising out of any regional treatment of information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

131. The account given in the present report of the discussions and votes on the draft resolution relating to the renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories outlines the consideration given by the Committee to those questions. In the original text moved by the representatives of Burma, India and Iraq, it was provided that the Committee would be authorized to submit such substantive recommendations as it might deem desirable relating to functional fields generally "or where common to Territories in a single regional group" but not with respect to individual Territories. In the working paper submitted by the representative of Brazil, the possibility was suggested of amendments which would have deleted the reference to problems in a single regional group and have added a new paragraph authorizing the Committee, in the spirit of resolution 847 (IX), and in order to clarify its reports and improve their scientific and technical character, to make appropriate references in its functional studies to groups or categories of Territories having similar problems or features in common as a result of such factors as their stage of advancement, their economic and social structure or their geographic location.

132. As indicated above, the Committee voted on an amendment moved by China and the United States of America and by 6 votes to none with 7 abstentions voted to delete the words "or where common to Territories in a single regional group", which figured in the original three-Power draft resolution.

XV. Amplification or amendment of the Standard Form for the transmission of information

133. During the preliminary discussions on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, suggestions were made by the representatives of Burma, China and Iraq that the Standard Form for the guidance of Members in the transmission of information under Article 73 e should be amended to provide for the furnishing of information on various aspects of community development. This question was considered in the Sub-Committee on social conditions, but, since the problem of any amendment of the Standard Form constituted a separate item on the agenda, the matter was referred back to the Committee without any specific recommendation.

134. At the 129th meeting of the Committee, the representative of Guatemala suggested that, since many valuable experiments in relation to community development were being carried out in many Non-Self-Governing Territories and should receive far wider attention, annual information should be requested regarding them under the Standard Form, and the General Assembly should accordingly so amend the Standard Form. In particular, he considered that such information should relate to the central administrative structure for community development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the administrative planning on the local level, action taken for the training of community development officers and local leaders and the facilities offered to acquaint the people and those engaged in social activities in general with the objectives and methods of the community development movement. The representatives of Brazil, Burma, China and India expressed their agreement that the amplification of the Standard Form in this sense should be considered by the General Assembly. The representatives of Australia, France and the United Kingdom reserved their right to comment on any amendment of the Standard Form that might be proposed in the General Assembly. No decision was taken by the Committee, as no formal proposal was put forward. The representative of India drew the attention of the Committee in this connexion to the current discussions in the Social Commission regarding community development, and suggested that they should be borne in mind in drafting any amendments.

Resolutions submitted for the consideration of the General Assembly

The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories submits the following draft resolutions for the consideration of the General Assembly:

A. DRAFT RESOLUTION ON SOCIAL CONDITIONS IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

The General Assembly,

Considering that, by resolution 643 (VII) adopted on 10 December 1952, it approved the report on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories,

Noting the further report prepared in 1955 by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on social conditions in these Territories,

1. Approves this further report as a supplement to the report approved in 1952;

2. Invites the Secretary-General to communicate the report, for their consideration, to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned.

B. DRAFT RESOLUTION ON RENEWAL OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

The General Assembly,

Having considered the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories which was constituted by resolution 332 (IV) adopted by the General Assembly on 2 December 1949,

Recognizing the value of further constructive work by the Committee in the interests of the advancement of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories and the attainment of the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter,

1. Decides to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis for a further three-year period;

2. Decides that as provided in resolution 332 (IV) and 646 (VII), the Committee should be composed of those Members of the United Nations transmitting information in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter and of an equal number of non-administering Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly on as wide a geographical basis as possible;

3. Invites the Members of the Committee to continue to attach to their delegations persons specially qualified in the functional fields within the Committee's purview;

4. Invites the Members administering Non-Self-Governing Territories to attach to their delegations indigenous persons specially qualified to speak on economic, social and educational policies in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

5. Instructs the Committee to examine, in the spirit of paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 1 and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports of information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

6. Instructs the Committee to submit to the regular sessions of the General Assembly reports containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories;

7. Considers that the Committee should, without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, give special attention to educational, economic and social conditions in turn and should consider the information transmitted in respect of these questions in the light of the reports approved by the General Assembly on such conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The officers of the Sub-Committee were: Chairman: Mr. E. Arenales (Guatemala) and Vice-Chairman: Mr. A. H. Loomes (Australia).

The Sub-Committee set up a working group to draft sections on public health; this working group was presided over by Sir Eric Pridie (United Kingdom) and comprised Médecin-Colonel Bernard (France); Mr. E. Arenales (Guatemala); Mr. R. Jaipal (India) and the representatives of FAO and WHO.

mittee examines summaries and analyses of information on economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It is invited to submit to the General Assembly reports "containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories". (resolution 332 (IV)).

2. In 1952, the Committee prepared a special report on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>2</sup> The General Assembly, by resolution 643 (VII), adopted on 10 December 1952, approved the report as a brief but considered indication of social conditions in the Territories and of the problems of social development. It invited the Secretary-General to communicate it for their consideration to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council, and to specialized agencies of the United Nations. The report was so communicated. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories was informed that, as a general practice, the Administering Members concerned have transmitted the report to the territorial authorities in the Territories for which the Member is responsible.

3. The General Assembly in 1952 also adopted resolution 644 (VII) concerning racial discrimination in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The principles contained in the resolution had been examined in the report on social conditions. Their enumeration was designed to show still more clearly the General Assembly's desire to indicate how situations of racial discrimination contrary to the principles of the Charter and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights may be met by appropriate measures of reform.

4. In 1955, in accordance with the programme of work laid down in General Assembly resolution 333 (IV), the Committee was again called upon to pay particular attention to social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It has undertaken the examination of some of the main social problems arising with the development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and some of the principal programmes of social advancement, on the basis of the information transmitted by the Members responsible for the administration of the Territories and in the light of the views expressed by the Committee and the General Assembly in 1952. In so doing, the Committee took into account resolution 645 (VII) by which the General Assembly expressed the hope that the Administering Members would furnish information on any action taken to bring the Committee's report to the attention of the authorities responsible in the Territories for the implementation of educational, economic and social policy, and also information on any problems which may arise in giving effect to the general views expressed in the reports.

5. The Committee had before it reports prepared by the United Nations Secretariat on various aspects of social conditions based on the information transmitted to the Secretary-General. It also had a number of studies prepared by specialized agencies. These documents are listed in the annex to this report, and, together with the summary records of its discussions on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, should be regarded as essential to a fuller understanding of the present report.

6. In connexion with these discussions, the Committee wishes to record its appreciation of the assistance it received in the form of supplementary information and explanations on conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories from the representatives of Australia, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States of America. By resolution 745 (VIII), the General Assembly commended the action of Members which had included specialist advisers in their delegations to the Committee, and expressed the hope that the practice of appointing specialist advisers would be extended. The Committee on this occasion had the advantage of such advisers attached to the delegations of France, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, and notes the valuable assistance that it received from them. Finally, similar help was received from representatives of the non-Administering Members who provided information on policies and programmes of which they had had experience and which threw light on comparable problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

II. Principles of policy

7. In its previous reports on economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee referred to Articles 1, 55 and 73 of the Charter of the United Nations. It considers that once again these Articles should be noted. They are the principles which should govern any United Nations discussions of conditions in these Territories. As it stated in 1952, these principles, and also the declarations of national policy of the Administering Members, emphasize, as of primary importance in the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, the interests of the inhabitants which are recognized as paramount by Article 73 of the Charter.

8. The Committee in 1952 went on to express the opinion that, in speaking of the inhabitants, it had in mind all peoples resident in a Territory who considered their future and the future of their children to be bound up with the welfare and the progress of the Territory and the welfare and progress of all the inhabitants. The contention has sometimes been advanced that the provisions of Article 73 of the Charter are directed to those inhabitants who at various times have been called the Native or the indigenous inhabitants in contradistinction to more recent immigrant stock. The terms of the Charter speak of inhabitants without qualification, but the Committee is concerned mainly with the welfare of those inhabitants who form a less advanced sector of the population which requires special attention in approaching the solution to problems of social advancement.

9. The Committee considers that social advancement and all other aspects of the advancement of Non-Self-Governing Territories must be regarded as interrelated and as requiring co-ordinated measures towards the attainment of the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter and in particular, the objectives contained in Articles 73 a and b.

10. For practical reasons also, it is necessary to accept a broad definition of social development, since this development, if not thought of in isolation, requires the support of economic foundations and the stimulus of territorial objectives.

11. The Committee sees considerable merit in the broad definition of social development which is indicated in the following passage recording informal discussions undertaken in England in 1954:<sup>3</sup>

"By Social Development we mean nothing less than the whole process of change and advancement in a territory, considered in terms of the progressive well-being of society and of the individual. It may be objected that this concept is so general and so fundamental to all the tasks of any government that it is incapable of short definition; but we nevertheless consider it important that the term should be used in order to keep constantly before the eyes of administrations and departments the need to foster a common objective and to co-ordinate their activities with that objective in view. This need applies equally to all departments charged with developmental functions and not merely to those whose operations are economic rather than social in the narrower sense. On the other hand, we cannot emphasize too strongly that social development is not just the sum of developmental activities carried out by those agencies usually grouped under the heading 'Social Services'. It covers and informs the economic, social, political and cultural fields."

12. The Committee said much the same in commenting on economic conditions in 1954. It claimed that a sound economic policy must be part of a general pattern, of which social and educational policies are other essential parts. The people living in healthy surroundings, protected against disease, adequately fed and housed, with their moral and intellectual needs provided for, will be able to adapt to their own purposes modern techniques of production, and sustained progress can best be achieved through the attainment by the peoples of the Territories of a full share in the formulation of policies and in the planning and implementation of programmes of development.

13. The direct action taken by public authorities to provide social assistance may conjure up among the peoples the illusion that Government will provide for all needs and bear all reproaches when the needs are not satisfied. For this reason again, it is essential to associate the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the efforts of the administrations to encourage leadership and to seek the collaboration of the leaders and the support of the people in the development of social policy and the implementation of social programmes. "To bring to every community a vision of the better way of life which, by their own efforts, they could build for themselves" points to an attitude which all concerned with social policy should encourage to the fullest possible extent.

14. Furthermore, social policy must be based on a recognition of the importance of human individuality and the dignity of man expressing his individuality in the service of the social communities. Social progress cannot be considered as no more than an accumulation of material factors; it depends more vitally on individual reactions to external influence; in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories it depends on the reaction of those who are losing their attachments to traditional life and habits and are more and more meeting the influences from the outside world. Social development is not only determined by increased goods and by improved public services. It must take full account of spiritual needs.

15. In many instances, these spiritual needs are at present made all the more acute by a weakening of the sense of solidarity of the group. Cultural contacts have brought new ideas. They have also brought about a loss of old ideals. Man in a changing society finds that certain of his traditional loyalties may become unwanted burdens as he seeks the broader loyalties of modern life. Although the development of modern governmental authorities offers new opportunities, it is also a challenge to traditions, and the normal problems of bringing into operation new forms of local government have been complicated by the innate conflict between the old and new ideas.

16. In these phases, of chief importance will be the family, the measures that can be taken for the maintenance of its loyalties, and for its adaptation to changed conditions. There can be no success in fostering or in preserving individual self-reliance unless there is a strengthening and deepening of human relations within the family and the extension of the consequent loyalty to broader groups provided by the local community, local clubs and societies, and centres of territorial life. In the process the primary importance of the family as the basic social unit in a stable and progressive community cannot be over-stressed. The family does not live in isolation. In conditions that have passed or are passing, the family or the extended family produced all that was needed, or all that could be produced for living needs. It provided a form of social assistance for the sick, the old and the orphaned. With alternative and more attractive means of livelihood, family obligations in the traditional sense may disintegrate; or the principal and most enterprising earners in the family may find themselves overburdened with obligations resulting from a family relationship which has lost its basic characteristics. The family accordingly needs to be strengthened as a vital part of the new society, so that a new community feeling can develop based on a sense of belonging. This will engender a new code of behaviour involving feelings of obligation, personal values and codes of conduct.

17. In the evolution of social policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the first call for public effort laid stress on the development of the Territories' resources, on the provision of economic equipment, and on the expansion of productivity. With economic development, with its successes as with its failures, social problems assume pre-eminent importance. Social programmes have to be adopted and applied, intended not only to overcome long-standing problems of ill-health and poverty but also problems of social adjustment emerging with economic change. The opening of communications, the development of industry and trade, the adoption of a cash economy and general economic progress have tended to disrupt established forms of social organization and traditional responsibilities and ideals. They have called, and still call, for a number of remedial methods. Public welfare services are required to cover such matters as family, child and youth welfare, the care of homeless and delinquent children, the relief of distress and provision for old age. Much has been done in a number of the Territories. Very much more needs to be done and increasing recognition is needed for the importance of extending social security measures and social medicine.

18. The objectives of particular programmes of social policy may often be, or appear to be, short-term, so that they are within the understanding and reach of the people. This concept must be subject to the consideration that the cure of immediate and obvious evils may be of limited importance if steps are not also taken to remove the basic causes of the evils. Policy needs to be based not on a choice between cure and prevention but on the integration of these two as complementary aspects of a single programme.

19. In recent years, and to a noteworthy extent even since the Committee's report of 1952, there have been a number of trends of policy gaining force in several of the Territories where active policies of social development are being pursued. These may be summarized as the fuller participation of the people in social programmes, the extension of measures for the prevention of social evils, the extension of efforts to the rural populations, increased co-ordination in social policies and as between social and other aspects of public policy, provision for training of qualified social workers and the development in those fields of international and regional co-operation.

20. In these processes wide use needs to be made of the services of non-governmental organizations. They have in many cases preceded the government in the field of remedial action; they have contributed and have much to contribute in constructive prevention. It is essential that governmental social development services, central and local, should work in closest co-operation with these organizations. In particular, it may be of service in appropriate cases to establish or encourage the establishment of councils of social services whereby the interests of non-governmental organizations can be made known and their effective co-operation secured. In some Territories, such councils have been found to be effective.

21. In non-governmental organizations, as in the government services, the consent and whole-hearted support of the inhabitants of the Territories must be sought through the stimulation of their own aspirations and through their education as to the means by which they can realize these aspirations. In many different forms this thought has been expressed before and will be expressed again. It should be a constant and vital feature of any social planning that aims at more than furnishing palliatives for immediate evils or perpetuating a paternalism that will prevent the development of local and territorial initiative.

22. With the appeal to the inventiveness and enterprise of the inhabitants and with the assistance of varied social organizations, it should be the objective to develop an integrated general policy. In this policy diversification of methods and emphases may be inevitable, for the inhabitants will be formulating policies to meet the problems which they themselves regard as of chief urgency. This diversification in social effort and the varied character of the immediate projects that will be adopted, do not detract from the necessity for long-range plans aiming at the co-ordination of all social projects in a programme, integrated with economic action designed to improve living conditions and allied to educational action designed to increase the individual strength of the inhabitants and their common sense of civic responsibility.

23. As discussions have developed in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly and in the present Committee, on economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the objectives of these aspects of policy have been indicated.

24. In 1953, the following objectives of education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories were included in resolution 743 (VIII):

(a) To develop moral and civic consciousness and responsibility among the peoples, and to enable them to take an increasing share of responsibility in the conduct of their own affairs;

(b) To raise the standards of living of the peoples by helping them to improve their economic productivity and standards of health;

(c) To promote the social progress of the Territories, taking into account the basic cultural values and the aspirations of the peoples concerned;

(d) To secure the extension of the intellectual development of the peoples so as to provide for them access to all levels of culture.

25. In 1954, this Committee in its report to the General Assembly (paragraph 17) affirmed that the fundamental aim of economic policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories must be to develop these Territories in the interest of all sectors of the population, to raise the standard of living by increasing individual purchasing power, and to increase the total wealth of each Territory in order to make possible a higher standard of social services and administration. From this fundamental aim the Committee enumerated the following concrete objectives:

(a) To remove the obstacles to economic development by modifying where necessary the basic structure of the economy;

(b) To stimulate economic growth through which the standards of living of the peoples will be raised and an increase obtained in their national output and improvement in their productivity;

(c) To establish and improve the capital equipment of the Territories so as to provide a firm basis for future development;

(d) To promote those types of economic activity, whether primary or industrial production, in which the Territories are best fitted to engage, having regard to the balance of their economies and the advantages of external trade;

(e) To secure the equitable distribution amongst the peoples of the material benefits of the economy as expressed in the national income;

(f) To create a firm economic basis for political, social and educational programmes taking into account the basic cultural values and aspirations of the peoples;

(g) To conserve and develop the natural resources of the Territories for the benefit of the peoples;

(h) To create conditions conducive to standards of health and of social welfare which will help to develop moral and civic consciousness and responsibility so as to enable the people to take an increasing share in the conduct of their own affairs;

(i) To work towards fully developed economies capable of taking their appropriate place in the world economy.

26. The Committee this year considers it useful to follow a similar course and to enumerate the principal aims of social policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It holds that social policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be designed:

(a) To study, alleviate and remedy the social problems which now face all communities, having particular regard to the problems arising from the contact of cultures and economic, political and social changes;

(b) To watch trends and policies in all aspects of development in order to anticipate and guide so far as is possible their effects in the best interests of the individual and the community;

(c) To develop programmes of social policy, to establish and encourage the establishment of social organizations which will take account of the basic cultural values and aspirations of the peoples concerned;

(d) To seek means by which the moral and civic consciousness and responsibility of the peoples will be developed so that they will take an increasing share in the conduct of their own affairs and, to an increasing extent, form and direct their own social programmes in harmony with universal ideals of human betterment and their own cultural characteristics;

(e) To stimulate or encourage initiative in the organization of, or participation in, schemes of community development or other forms of community effort, as effective instruments toward the progressive well-being of society and of the individual;

(f) To develop the family so that as a basic social unit it will contribute effectively to the welfare of its members and to meeting the needs of the local and territorial community;

(g) To provide for the enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health, considered as a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity, so as to promote general physical and mental development;

(h) To improve living conditions in the broadest fields of family and community life and to assist the peoples in the attainment of higher standards of living;

(i) To encourage a balanced progress of all sections of the community;

(j) To achieve an integrated society on the basis of the free contributions of each section of the community;

(k) To co-ordinate all programmes of social policy in order to achieve the above purposes.

III. Urbanization and industrialization

27. The social effects of urbanization and industrialization are of vital concern in the numerous Territories where industrial development is taking place at an almost unprecedented rate. In the early days of the industrial revolution in western Europe and America, technical progress seemed much more important than the improvement of living conditions. The resulting social problems, the slums, the insanitary conditions, above all the loneliness and soullessness of life in the big towns still leave their legacies of problems. In those Non-Self-Governing Territories where similar processes are taking place at a rapid pace, the social effects of changes are of particularly vital concern for the future and the well-being of the Territories. This is not only on account of the numbers of people directly involved, but primarily because of the way in which these processes affect, or are likely to affect, the whole society, rural as well as urban. In the towns, economic and other factors introduced by the expansion of the modern economic system attain their maximum development, leading to the concentration of influences which must either substantially assist or impede the progress and modernization of the whole country.

28. The chief causes for the attraction to urban centres are furnished by economic and psychological factors. The towns provide facilities for production and trade; they create a demand for man-power all the more potent when the interior fails to provide a prosperous agricultural life. Drawn by these economic attractions, the people hope to find in the towns the advantages of the material civilization of the West. They are tempted to consider the social institutions of the town as more important than those of their village, to emancipate themselves from village responsibilities without accepting urban duties. Although in numbers the rural masses still predominate, urbanization and industrialization are the stronger factors in social change in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

29. The important feature, which contributes to the gravity and dimension of the urban problems, is the speed at which industrialization and urbanization are taking place. Changes which took 150 years to develop in the West are now taking place within the lifetime of a single generation. Towns are springing up almost overnight and the older towns are expanding at a rate which renders difficult any orderly process of town planning. Moreover, in most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories of Africa these changes are happening in societies still based on a primitive agricultural economy and bound by tribal law and custom.

30. The towns act as a magnet. They tend to draw the most enterprising elements from the rural areas. Sometimes as a result, agricultural production declines which may lead to shortages and high costs of living in the towns. Another effect may be a disintegration of the traditional structure in the countryside. At the same time in the towns the people lose contact with their own society and are deprived of the feeling of group solidarity. The disintegration of divided families and of family and other social groups is one of the consequences. The economic unit formerly represented by the rural family can no longer be maintained. The parental authority is undermined first by the mere fact of separation and then by the economic independence afforded the young by their earnings. The traditional concept of marriage is also shaken. Marital unions, concluded outside the customary social framework and no longer assured by economic safeguards, are unstable, particularly as the status of women in society is deeply affected by the numerical disproportion between the sexes.

31. The word "detrribalization" is often used to describe the phenomenon of assimilation to urban conditions in Africa. If the rejection of ties with the customary community is taken as the criterion, very few town dwellers may be regarded as entirely "detrribalized". But the new generations grow up in ignorance of village traditions, and those who receive a school education acquire ideas which often conflict with the beliefs and customs of their family environment.

32. In this development, a factor of considerable importance is an incomplete and partial assimilation of the people who migrate to the towns to industrial employment and urban ways of life. In the early stages of industrialization, industries have been largely manned by migrant workers who come to earn cash for particular purposes and then return to their rural areas. Gradually the need for goods and services which can be obtained for money has spread, and more and more men leave their villages for work in the towns, and stay for longer periods. These workers, even though they become more familiar with urban life, have not only no training in industrial skills but as unskilled manual workers are not adapted to the rhythm of industrial life. Some receive training and fit themselves with success into the new conditions. Others remain in the towns, deprived of the support of traditional life, insufficiently paid for urban needs and faced with numerous material difficulties with respect to housing, food, transportation and social amenities.

33. But the core of the social problem lies essentially in the changes which occur in the traditional family structure and the effects of these changes upon the behaviour of the individual. The disintegration of the traditional family system, with the breakdown of kinship solidarity, is a regular accompaniment of the transition to the urban environment, in which the very conditions of employment and residence militate against the reconstitution and continuation of the rural forms of family life. The old kinship obligations are easily renounced while the formation of new stable family bonds has to compete with preferences for individual independence and comfort. The weakness of the family bond and loose family structure which tend to become the dominant features of life among the transient town-dwellers contribute to the social amorphousness of the urban agglomerations and impedes the development of a stable urban society. Integrated and interdependent units, based on kinship, break down into small and independent units. The transition to the new form, in which the family should be the firm basis on which broader relations can be established, finds a major obstacle not only in the social, but also in the material conditions of the urban situation, particularly where wage policies are based on the assumption that the families of the workers normally support themselves by the land in the rural areas. With the resulting predominance of males and the young average age of town-dwellers, the tendency towards improvised and flexible patterns of social relationships further affects the family relationship and the lack of stable family and organized family life hinders the emergence of public opinion which would set norms of behaviour between sexes, within the family, and within the community. The woman in particular is vulnerable to the changes imposed by urbanization. She is no longer supported by traditional customs and yet she has not found other recourses and may be left to every type of degradation and temptation, save where religion strengthens the network of tradition.

34. Another factor impeding the social evolution of the towns is the lack of cohesion and a community sense resulting from the heterogeneous composition of the populations. This is a feature common to such disparate urban groupings as traditional indigenous towns, which in some parts of Africa existed before the arrival of Europeans and which still remain immune from modern urban problems, and the large urban Territories in Asia which present problems of social administration demanding all the machinery of modern urban life. Different racial, ethnic or tribal groups live apart from each other, each in its own world, with little contact or interaction between them. The largest sections of the population, represented mostly by indigenous inhabitants of different tribal or ethnic origins follow interests and ways of life, derived from their non-urban parent cultures, in many cases sharply variant from each other. They are for the most part in the town but not of it.

35. The social effects of these changes, in their numerous ramifications and manifestations, are still imperfectly known. Much systematic social research may be needed to trace all the relevant implications of the industrial impact and of urban expansion upon the indigenous societies and to forecast the consequences of this impact for their future growth and to provide for future policy.

36. The Committee was informed that the study of the effects of industrialization has been on UNESCO's programme since 1950, and that a particular project has been undertaken with the co-operation of the International African Institute into conditions in Stanleyville in the Belgian Congo. Other activities of UNESCO in this field include the holding of a Conference of Social Scientists on the Social Impact of Industrialization and Urban Conditions in Africa, which met in 1954 at Abidjan (Ivory Coast), the establishment in co-operation with the International Social Science Council of the International Research Office on Social Implications of Technological Change and the publication of the manual Cultural Patterns and Technical Change, prepared by the World Federation for Mental Health. The Committee learned with interest of these studies and hopes that UNESCO, in collaboration with other organizations where appropriate, will expand its activities in this field and also hopes that national organizations engaged in social or sociological research will develop their studies in this field in collaboration with UNESCO.

37. This account of the problems that have arisen in some urban areas, and tend to arise in others, while it is not a description of particular situations, should not be read as dictated by pessimism. On the contrary, in many areas the migration from rural to urban centres and a change to urban life has been taking place for generations more to the profit than loss of the rural and urban communities and the Territories as a whole. If the movement is new, strange and dangerous, it is part of the adventure of change from which families and nations no less than individuals may benefit. Difficulties have been mentioned here, not in any idealization of past conditions but as a spur to constructive social efforts in what may prove to be the key situations to future progress and prosperity.

38. Whatever are the more specific problems of these highly diversified urban formations, the ultimate and all-embracing goal of social policy is the creation of conditions which will hasten and facilitate the evolution of the impermanent and badly integrated urban structures of the present transitional stage into stable and progressive urban communities. Imaginative social planning is required, giving full consideration to the needs of the family, planning new towns as whole social units in which the welfare of the community is regarded as of chief importance, and adapting existing towns to meet the challenge of modern conditions and to solve the problems caused by rapid development.

39. The attainment of these goals requires a close integration of the economic and social policy of development programmes in respect where feasible of whole Territories or regions. Evolution in the social pattern requires changes in the economic pattern; the economic pattern should be modified to promote social evolution. A substantial increase should be sought therefore, in the general productivity of the country through a greater output not only in industry but more particularly in the basic industry of agriculture. Another objective is the stabilization of the dual form of existence based on the old rural and the new urban. This stabilization makes of urgent necessity a modernization of the rural community in its economic, social and cultural life paralleling the progress achieved by the urban communities. Without such modernization, the attraction of the cities will continue to depopulate, in a chaotic and disorderly way, the stagnant rural areas, with a resulting decline in agricultural production and rising prices in the overcrowded towns. No less essential is the family and the restoration of its functional adequacy and institutional efficacy both in town and country. Among the other major factors needing careful attention is that of the professional adaptation of the rural migrant to the exigencies of modern production and the requirements of industrial employment. Lack of this adaptation contributes to the perpetuation of the migrant labour system and the growth of masses of people uprooted from their rural surroundings and attached only loosely to the urban residence and the new occupational structure.

40. Moreover, the process of industrialization should not be regarded as inevitably necessitating urbanization on the scale of the industrial revolution of the nineteenth century. In an age of new forms of power the technical means can be made available for rural and village industries which will bring industrialization to the countryside instead of training labour from the countryside.

41. This point was made by the Committee in 1951 in a report on economic conditions and problems of development in Non-Self-Governing Territories. In particular, the Committee noted that:<sup>4</sup>

"It may often be easier to raise capital for a number of small local enterprises than for single large plants located in larger towns. In rural areas and provincial centres, sources of capital may exist which it may not be possible to attract into investment unless the investment takes the form of local enterprise which is a part of the daily experience of the local population. Village and cottage industries are valuable examples of this type of development and in addition, provide opportunities for increased employment without the displacement of population associated with large industrial concentrations. Moreover, in small plants, a larger proportion of investment can be used for actual productive equipment. In contrast to the small manufacturing plant, large-scale industry needs capital-consuming services such as workers' houses, power plants, administrative offices and large storage facilities."

42. Urban welfare policies, directed towards the improvement of living conditions, have developed from action taken to deal with particular problems, frequently with each problem considered separately, according to its urgency. The first preoccupations of the administrations in meeting the needs of new or rapidly expanding towns have been to provide the basic public utilities and public health and educational services. Action in these fields has been accompanied or soon followed by the provision of some improved housing, the establishment of machinery for the relief of distress, the care of the homeless child, and the treatment of delinquency. While these problems are inseparable from urban conditions and remain a primary public responsibility, a broader concept of urban welfare is being accepted which stresses the long-term aims of social planning based on the recognition that the improvement of urban living conditions and the progressive evolution of urban society to modern forms, is not only a matter for direct administrative action, but also calls for profound changes in the traditional social structure and the reorganization of the changing society on a new basis.

43. Once again, this aspect of policy calls for emphasis on the basic importance of the family as the basic social unit. In so strengthening the family and adapting it to its new role the most important factors are, on the spiritual side, sound ethical education; and on the material side, good housing, secure employment and sufficient wages to keep the whole family. With these to assist, the family will be able to become part of the larger communities and to have an interest in the urban and national life. Local friendships, loyalties and interests will gradually grow and the formation of various clubs and societies will be a result and a contribution to a sense of community and shared interests. The smaller the community, the greater the sense of "belonging". Hence the importance of residential neighbourhoods, with their own schools, clubs, clinics, councils, etc., which break down an urban area into a number of smaller communities.

44. Where there are racial, religious, language, economic or social differences among the inhabitants of a town, the obstacles to the development of a sense of community can be tackled by trying to remove the differences by developing the points of contact. Hence the importance of inter-racial clubs and societies with common interests or purposes, mixed universities, and other educational and cultural institutions. Still more important are social service groups and welfare associations where persons of different races work together and where a feeling of fellowship among different kinds of people grows and persists.

45. In 1952 this Committee discussed a number of points relating to the provision of suitable low-cost housing in the towns. This year it had before it the conclusion on economic and social aspects of workers' housing with particular reference to responsibilities for its provision reached by the ILO Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories, and also noted the responsibility for the study of broader aspects of housing and town and country planning assigned to the United Nations. The present Committee did not therefore engage in any further examination of the details of housing policies which may be most relevant to urban conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It emphasizes, however, the basic social importance of rapid action to provide suitable housing particularly in the towns. It also has learned with appreciation that the Governing Body of the International Labour Office has authorized the Director-General:

(a) To communicate the suggestions of the Committee of Experts to the Governments of the States Members concerned, requesting them to draw the attention of the Governments of the non-metropolitan territories to them;

(b) To work out in close collaboration with the international and regional organizations concerned, making appropriate use of the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance of the United Nations and the specialized agencies as far as possible, arrangements to ensure the fullest co-operation in giving to the Governments the maximum practical assistance in carrying out the Committee's suggestions.

46. In the general evolution of social services in towns in which the development of self-reliance and community loyalty among the inhabitants is a basic objective, concrete and co-ordinated programmes of action are needed on the part of the Government, municipal and non-official agencies concerned. Such programmes may require to be far more diversified than necessary in rural conditions. They will also need a more complex administrative organization with staff trained on a wide variety of forms of social action.

47. In the information provided to the Committee the variety of social measures required in the larger towns was exemplified by the development of the work of the social services in Territories in Africa south of the Sahara under French administration. The extension of the social services to overseas Territories had been provided for by French legislation of November 1943. When local services were set up, their commitments proved to be so heavy and the problems facing them so serious and urgent that programmes of collective action became essential, particularly in the African towns. However, once the most pressing welfare needs were met, it became possible to direct attention to the prevention of social problems and to adjust the individual and the family to changed living conditions by educational action. In particular these services are developing principles which will guide their programmes for the replacement of the traditional customary assistance and for the social education of women and children in order to provide for their adaptation to new social forms. To achieve these ends the social services are directing their efforts towards general assistance and mass social education combined with specialized instruction in many fields. Assistance and social education for the detribalized are provided through social centres where home craft training activities for children and premises for meetings and cinema shows are available. Other activities which are being undertaken in some of the larger towns include the operation of community restaurants, child welfare centres, and municipal stores.

48. Examples of action taken within the social development programmes to establish remedial services and to take the first steps in measures of social security were supplied by a number of the Governments. Some indications of action in Territories under United Kingdom administration, for instance, show that in a number of Territories legislation based on United Kingdom legislation has been adopted for dealing with children and young persons deprived of a normal home life. The treatment of delinquency has been the concern in all Territories, and there are now few areas in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under United Kingdom administration without legislation for juvenile courts or alternatives to imprisonment for the treatment of young offenders. Recently a work party has been appointed to examine the treatment of young offenders. As regards the relief of distress, many of the Territories, including all the major Caribbean Territories, have public assistance legislation and non-contributory old age pension schemes. Social security measures on a broader scale are being studied in several Territories. Information was also provided on measures taken in French Territories relating to abandoned or delinquent children; measures such as investigation into the question of child delinquency; provision of children's homes; the setting up of a probationary system and centres for the rehabilitation of delinquent children.

49. Many of the above measures cited merely by way of example apply throughout various Territories. They have been mentioned in the present section, since the conditions with which they attempt to deal are of chief urgency in urban conditions under the impact of industrialization.

IV. Community development

50. Community development is a form of social development which in recent years has been the subject of much consideration among those responsible for the advancement of Non-Self-Governing Territories and which in some Territories has made striking progress in practice. In concept, it is neither a substitute for the expansion of government social services—however much its specific projects may improve these services—nor is it a form of public action outside the scope of government planning and assistance. Community development is not a political movement but it is a phase in providing for the economic, social, cultural and political development of peoples, which is designed to promote better living for the whole community by stimulating the active participation and initiative of all members of the community. In its operations, the enterprise of unofficial groups is sought, and at the same time government services, territorial and municipal, are associated with local initiative and over-all assistance is provided by the specialized advice of those with training in the particular techniques that are called into play.

51. The concept of mass education corresponds closely to that of community development, or mass education may be regarded as a phase of community development. Starting from the need to supplement the educational structure and to provide for those who have had no effective schooling when young, it similarly embraces all forms of betterment that can be carried out with local resources and skills and with suitable assistance and stimulation. The co-operative movement operating for multiple purposes; agricultural extension services seeking the stimulation of local rural groups; rural reconstruction teams; the system of community colleges by which any type of education is provided which any group of people in the community may reasonably request; and various forms of rural welfare societies may have many of the characteristics of community development. Their principal aim is not so much to remedy any particular situation or to promote public works for any immediate need as to start a chain reaction of discussion, organization, action, achievement and renewed discussion of the next phase in development. The connexion is also close between community development and the evolution of democratic local government. Community development, moreover, while originally considered as predominantly a rural movement, may also apply to the towns, particularly in their early phases of development if the organization of municipal services is little advanced and is not being pressed for by an articulate public opinion.

52. In law and practice and in the varying circumstances of the different Territories, particular provisions may have to be made for the various movements in which the concept of community development can be found. In this report it is not necessary to draw distinctions among the large number of developments which are contributing to the general stream of evolution. Nor is it helpful here to suggest in what particular circumstances it may be desirable to lay chief stress on educational, economic, health or other social projects. In all cases the general purpose will be to provide for a joint effort by government and people in which the initiative of the people will be encouraged until they themselves are in a position to take over control of the movement. This does not mean that community development should be discussed as if the term were synonymous with all forms of social development and welfare. On the contrary, the Committee sees community development as a marked advance upon mere ameliorative measures. In the sense that it emphasizes the role of the people themselves in promoting better living for the whole community, community development represents a new emphasis in the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories. In addition to its social aims it provides training in local government.

53. The results of community development programmes are in some areas spectacular. The people's capacity for participation and the development of leadership has outstripped official expectations, indicating the latent strength of local skills and loyalties that can be released under the impetus of those who can gain the support and strengthen the self-confidence of the local societies. In all such programmes a vital role is played by the local village worker. His personality, leadership and training often determine the success or failure of a project and, what may be of more importance, whether the completion of a project marks the end of community effort in that area or serves as an introduction to new measures and the assumption of greater responsibilities. With a successful leader and with the increasing challenge to the villages to accept and work out new responsibilities, even in areas regarded as backward and isolated, the community development movement has proved capable of bringing to life forceful and enterprising elements in the population.

54. It is imperative that community development should not be conceived as consisting merely of a series of isolated projects with the injection of self-help or as more intensive administration in selected areas along familiar and traditional lines. Undue emphasis on particular projects tends to confuse the issue, for, under the concept of community development, the execution of projects is not an end in itself but a contribution to the initiation of new projects and the growth of new ideas. Furthermore, unless organized as a broad movement of the people with the necessary adjustments and adaptation of the whole administrative structure to the needs and impetus of the movement, community development may easily fail as a policy. Yet, the concept of community development as a popular movement extending throughout society as a territorial policy raises many problems. The relation of local progress through local action to the changes in the wider society, the kind and degree of the assistance to be provided by the government administration and the part to be played in the action by the government agencies and voluntary efforts need to be under constant examination.

55. One of the principal points to be emphasized in considering conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories is the need for planning community development so that it will extend to more and more parts of each Territory. Although the system must take roots in the villages and in small groups of villages, isolated local movements may become sterile once the first initiative is lost. Local progress through local action should, therefore, be linked to changes in the wider society and the kind and degree of assistance to be provided by the central administration must also have in mind the development of a civic consciousness.

56. As a popular movement, community development calls for the informed participation of the inhabitants, the co-operation of government services among themselves and with the inhabitants, the active assistance of leaders of public opinion and branches of the administration that do not form part of the specific development machinery and the creation of a corps of workers with special responsibilities for community development. All this points to the need for education and training in many different forms. The community development staff will require at the various levels professional training or special instruction in village tasks. The members of the general public who form part of the local community councils or teams will require initial training followed by refresher courses and frequent encouragement such as may be provided by visits to projects in their vicinity. The officers of the administration and the public representatives at higher than village level need to be imbued with a spirit of community development in their approach to their public duties.

57. Even with a territorial movement providing an adequate administrative structure and suitable training for leaders of all types, it will remain necessary for community development policy and movements to be constantly surveyed with a view to ascertaining their place in the general evolution of the peoples concerned. While the search for community improvement will be unending, the community development movement should bring into play personal and mass attitudes so that the communities themselves, through their public or private organs of expression and action, will continue and expand the specific projects first stimulated from without in the initial stages of the movement. It may be expected that, once the emerging societies have reached a certain stage in their evolution towards self-expression and self-government, their activities whether directed through government machinery, central or local, or through private societies, will cease to depend on persistent stimulation from without. They will tend to rely increasingly on the functioning of services established as a part of the framework of their local institutions.

58. While dependence of community development upon the participation of the people has been frequently stressed, it seems that not enough emphasis has been placed on the fact that the value of this participation will often be determined by the nature of the general administrative structure. In many cases in the Non-Self-Governing Territories profound changes will be required in the dominant administrative practice. As community development progresses, the responsibility for particular aspects of its programmes should be transferred to the local government units and, ultimately, the result should be to induce the local government, supported by the people, to carry out and extend those services which were first brought to execution by the community development movement.

59. These two aspects of the community development movement—its extension in depth in the local government structure and its extension in area over the whole territory concerned—are of particular importance in the formulation of general policies for Non-Self-Governing Territories. There is here a radical departure from previous social welfare concepts and a realization of the integration of all forms of betterment as having economic, social and cultural objectives, together with a realization of the importance of seeking for the inhabitants of the Territories a means of self-expression in all these fields.

60. Community development is under active consideration by a number of countries and interesting accounts of the progress of community development in their countries were given by the representatives of Burma, China and India. It is also under consideration by the United Nations and specialized agencies as applicable to conditions in many independent countries, in several of which community development programmes are at present in course of implementation. This Committee is not directly concerned with conditions in these countries but needs, in the technical sphere, to take full account of the inquiries which are being conducted on a universal basis and of the technical information which is, through them, elucidated. Accordingly, it has noted, in particular, the following basic elements which are being submitted by the Secretary-General to the Social Commission of the United Nations as necessary for successful community development programmes.<sup>5</sup>

(a) Activities undertaken must correspond to the basic needs of the community; the first projects should be initiated in response to the expressed needs of people;

(b) While local improvements may be achieved through unrelated efforts in each substantive field, full and balanced community development requires concerted action and the establishment of multi-purpose programmes;

(c) Changed attitudes in people are more important than the material achievements of community projects;

(d) Community development aims at increased and better participation of the people in community affairs, revitalization of existing forms of local government and transition towards effective local administration where it is not yet functioning;

(e) The identification, encouragement and training of local leadership should be a basic objective in any programme;

(f) Greater reliance on the participation of women and youth in community projects invigorates development programmes, establishes them on a wide basis and secures long-range expansion;

(g) To be fully effective, communities' self-help projects require both intensive and extensive assistance by the government;

(h) Implementation of a community development programme on a national scale requires: adoption of consistent policies, specific administrative arrangements, recruitment and training of personnel, mobilization of local and national resources and organization of research, experimentation and evaluation;

(i) The resources of voluntary non-governmental organizations should be fully utilized in community development programmes at the local, national and international level;

(j) Economic and social progress at the local level necessitates parallel development on a wider national scale.

61. The Committee has also noted that a number of studies have been undertaken or are being planned by the United Nations and the specialized agencies on community development programmes and projects in various countries, including some of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It will be pleased to receive, in due course, further information on these studies, and understands that in their execution account will be taken of the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter as well as of the principles of social policy to which this Committee draws attention.

62. The Committee received much interesting information on community development programmes in a number of the Territories under United Kingdom and under French administration.

63. For the Territories under United Kingdom administration, the concept of community development was endorsed officially by the metropolitan Government in 1948, although before that time programmes had been undertaken in some of the Territories and to a large extent the doctrine as it grew up has been based on experience in the field. Since 1948, in a number of Territories under United Kingdom administration community development projects and activities, carried out on a limited scale or on an experimental basis, have been integrated into this new concept of social policy expanded into national-scale programmes. Indicative of the trend was a conference on community development held in 1953 in the Federation of Malaya, which recommended that "Government should announce at the earliest opportunity that community development was an integral part of Government policy". The United Kingdom view is that no hard and fast line can be drawn between urban and rural communities. Community development is the central feature of social work in the urban Territory of Singapore, and in Hong Kong considerable progress is being made in the development of co-operation between the governmental and voluntary agencies in accordance with principles of community development. In general, the specific schemes that are undertaken emphasize the paramount importance of strengthening family life and of providing for the needs of children and young persons. In many of the Territories mentioned, the imagination of the people has been captured and it is becoming increasingly possible to transfer responsibility to the local government units. At the same time, experience has proved that local action cannot be successful unless machinery is created for consultation at the highest territorial level where social development policy should be formulated.

64. In respect of Territories under French administration, the Committee was informed that social policy has been based on the adaptation of programmes to the particular communities concerned, assistance to enable the inhabitants to become aware of their own capacity and to find their own place in societies, the correction of social maladjustments, and priority to the educational functions of social policy. In the last few years a large-scale educational action of this nature has been undertaken, notably in French West Africa and French Equatorial Africa. In Morocco, the numerous agricultural modernization units (secteurs de modernisation du paysannat) are entrusted with the task of promoting the social evolution of the population, while at the same time, fostering agricultural development. Also, the system of the rural administrative djemmas is being expanded: at present, there are over 1,000 djemmas. They are empowered to debate all economic and social questions affecting the community they represent. In Madagascar, a re-organization of the village structure with a council responsible for the village administration and its adaptation to modern forms, has been effected. In the towns, the social services have been operated largely through social centres and it is now felt that more intense efforts are needed in the rural areas in order to check the drift from the land.

65. In addition, the Committee was informed that apart from the territory-wide community development programmes, in a number of areas pilot projects are being undertaken as a first step toward the elaboration of a wider policy. In particular, it noted the pilot projects sponsored by the South Pacific Commission and in operation in American Samoa, Cook Islands and the Netherlands New Guinea. The Committee notes with interest that a conference on community development is to be held under the auspices of the South Pacific Commission in 1956.

66. Mention has already been made of a number of other movements which are pursuing aims similar to that of community development. Among examples given to the Committee were the work of the extension services of the Department of Agriculture in American Samoa and the development of the community college system in Guam. The Committee, however, paid principal attention to the progress of the co-operative movement, in forms such as co-operative societies and rural progress societies. Information was provided showing the expansion and development of this movement in a number of Territories including Alaska, American Samoa, Guam, Papua and Territories under French, Netherlands and United Kingdom administration. It is noteworthy not only that in many cases the co-operative movement is steadily growing in membership and scale of operations but also that the fundamental principles of co-operation are being more widely applied and the economic and social aims of the movement developed in unison.

67. The Committee has already indicated its interest in these movements in its previous reports. In 1954 in particular, it examined the relationship of co-operative societies to community development. It held that, while the co-operative movement can only operate to the full among peoples with high educational standards and long traditions of business practice, co-operative principles broadly interpreted are of outstanding value in the traditional circumstances of a number of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee also stated that the development of co-operative societies is a vital factor in social progress and that co-operative organization is essential in preparing a people for the transition to a modern economy. In considering social conditions, the Committee must again stress the importance of the co-operative movement. Working under the impetus of communal initiative, societies of the co-operative type provide invaluable services in promoting many aspects of better living, and stimulate in narrower fields the spirit of popular co-operation which is the vital essence of all programmes of community development. Their social and educational purposes are of great significance. There are many successful examples of cases where these purposes have been promoted by societies of a multi-purpose character and by other societies actively interested in measures of a social character such as the provision of housing or of medical assistance.

68. There are, however, many areas where the community development movement is not to be found and where co-operative organizations and educational institutions have not developed in such a way as to reflect the broader objectives of the community development approach. The territorial or local government and voluntary agencies may be undertaking similar social and economic activities with considerable resources as in the Belgian Congo. But there can hardly be said to be a movement in which the emphasis is on techniques for arousing and stimulating the initiative of the population in order to promote better living for the whole community through the exercise and expansion of that initiative. In some of these cases, where the strain of new conditions is relatively slight as in some Pacific Islands, the local organs of expression and action may be sufficient to perform or stimulate the services provided by community development projects; in others, as in parts of Africa, the initiative and direction of social and economic services are still primarily furnished from outside the community.

69. In commending the policy of community development as capable of wide application in the circumstances of many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee recognizes that the objectives of community development do not differ from those of general public policies, the aim of which is to encourage the evolution of the inhabitants of the Territories into modern societies adequately equipped with economic institutions, social services, cultural facilities, and organs of self-government. The chief novelty of the policy lies in the emphasis placed on the participation of the inhabitants within a general movement aiming at their social, economic and cultural advancement. As thus conceived, the community development policy and movement offer opportunities in close harmony with the principles of the Charter.

V. Labour

70. In the 1952 report note was taken of the five Conventions adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1947, which are specially concerned with conditions in non-metropolitan Territories. The Committee recorded ratifications by the United Kingdom and expressed the hope that all Members concerned would at an early date ratify the relevant Conventions.

The present position as regards the ratification of these particular Conventions by Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories is as follows:

(a) The Social Policy (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention has been ratified by Belgium, France, New Zealand and the United Kingdom;

(b) The Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention has been ratified by Belgium, France, New Zealand and the United Kingdom;

(c) The Labour Inspectorates (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention has been ratified by Australia, Belgium, France and the United Kingdom;

(d) The Labour Standards (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention has been ratified by the United Kingdom;

(e) The Contracts of Employment (Indigenous Workers) Convention has been ratified by the United Kingdom.

71. The Committee is pleased to note the marked progress in the ratification of these International Labour Conventions since 1952.

72. The Committee is also interested in the progress made in the implementation of these and other Conventions through the adoption of legislation in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the implementation of this legislation. The information provided from the ILO was encouraging. The Committee was also informed of the progress of the French Overseas Labour Code and of the statements of the French Government that this legislation has resulted in many beneficial changes in labour conditions, has improved the situation regarding wages and productivity and has done much to improve industrial relations. The statement of the French Government is noted that the Overseas Labour Code is to be regarded as a measure of social progress in the fullest sense of the term, that it is applicable to all workers without distinction as to race, religion, sex, nationality or status and that it constitutes an important step in social progress.

73. Other interesting information on the development of labour legislation was provided in respect of the Territories under the administration of other Members and the North African Territories under French administration.

74. The Committee also wishes to comment briefly on questions of remuneration. Any attempt to assess the adequacy of wage levels in the Non-Self-Governing Territories to meet any particular standard or to permit comparisons of real wages among a number of Territories would not give satisfactory results since the basic elements of information do not exist. As regards the principles of wage rates, one advance that is taking shape deserves commendation. It is the recognition of the fallacy of the theory that, where a migrant worker possesses land for the partial support of his family, the wage to be paid to him when he is absent in employment need be sufficient only for his maintenance as if he were a single unmarried worker. The Committee believes that in fixing wages account should be taken of the needs of the family unit and not merely those of a bachelor. It holds that any transition to the concept of a family minimum wage should be made as rapidly as is possible in the light of local conditions.

75. The Committee has consistently emphasized that in the development programmes of Non-Self-Governing Territories the point of primary importance is that of the interests of the inhabitants. Similarly, the International Labour Conference, in adopting the Convention on social policy in non-metropolitan Territories has laid down that the improvement of standards of living should be regarded as the primary objective in the planning of economic development in the Territories concerned. The Convention further provides that measures should be taken to secure the independent producers and wage earners conditions which would give them scope to improve living standards by their own efforts, as well as measures to ensure the maintenance of minimum standards of living as ascertained by means of official inquiries into living conditions. Articles 14 to 17 relate to the remuneration of workers and it is noted with interest that the ILO Committee on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories, which will be meeting towards the end of the year, will be further discussing wage systems and policies in the Territories.

76. The Committee also noted the statement of the International Labour Office that the problem of incentives in employment needs further study, that training of all kinds and at all levels needs to be speeded up and that the present systems of payment by results should be examined and developed. In 1952 the present Committee stated that the raising of wages must be accompanied by increased productivity. It welcomed inquiries into the relationship of wages to productivity but emphasized that care should be taken to see that such inquiries are sufficiently broad, taking account of the educational, health and general social improvements which are necessary before examination of the techniques of the adjustment of wages to productivity. The evolution of social policy in the last four years reinforces the views expressed in 1952. Labour efficiency is interconnected with social advancement and is one factor in the general stimulation of the desire for social progress.

77. In this stimulation, the part that is being played and may be played by trade union organizations is now widely recognized. In some respects, the past economy and structure of many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories did not favour the development of trade unionism. With the development of modern forms of economic enterprise and the consequent changes in the economic and social structure of the Territories, the need for trade union organization has become more apparent and it is now government policy in many Territories to foster responsible trade unionism as the best means of promoting industrial harmony.

78. Information was supplied to the Committee showing the marked increase in trade union membership and the strength of the spirit of collective bargaining in a number of Territories under French, United Kingdom and United States administration, and showing the initial stages of a trade union movement in Netherlands New Guinea. The laws in these Territories largely follow the metropolitan patterns and permit trade union activities without discrimination. In some cases, there are differences both in the legal provisions and the practical situations and in others the practical situations between European and indigenous workers. The Committee recognizes that differences in the extent to which trade unions can usefully operate as instruments of industrial conciliation may be wide according to the education, economic position and social experience of the trade unionists. It believes, however, that such differences point towards the need for trade union education rather than differential legislation. From French and United Kingdom Territories examples were available of the assistance given in the training of trade union leaders. The Committee considers that the work in this field being performed by the Governments, metropolitan trade unions and international organizations by contributing to the training, assistance and encouragement of workers' movements in the Non-Self-Governing Territories deserves commendation.

VI. Living conditions

79. On many occasions in the past the Committee has emphasized the importance of the problem of the determination of standards of living in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the need of ascertaining the actual effects of development on the living conditions of the inhabitants of the Territories. In 1954, the Committee took note of the report on international definition and measurement of standards and levels of living prepared by a Committee of Experts of the United Nations.<sup>6</sup> The experts had elaborated a component approach to considering conditions of living in which would be included those elements, economic and non-economic, which go to make up the life pattern of the individual and which contribute to his well-being or ill-being so that the entire range of considerations which affect a person's sense of happiness would be covered. The component approach has to a certain extent been applied in the Committee's work. In particular, its studies of economic, social and educational conditions cover practically all the factors which may be regarded as components of levels of living. The Committee is therefore greatly interested in the proposals of the experts and the applicability of the component approach to conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

80. This year the Committee noted that further discussions and inquiries are taking place on the international level on the component approach to the study of standards and levels of living. In the circumstances of many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories a full application of this approach encounters difficulties owing to the inadequacy or unavailability of a number of forms of statistical data, the diversity of social and economic conditions and the lack of appropriate social research. The first priority task is to provide adequate basic statistics, especially agricultural and vital statistics and also valuable would be family living studies and community studies, as well as social and cultural analyses oriented toward the study of changing standards and levels of living among the various groups of the population. Such studies may contribute usefully to the initiation and extension of community development programmes and within the framework of community development it may be possible to obtain valuable data on family living conditions. However, in the Non-Self-Governing Territories the administrations may have to give priority to the meeting of immediate social problems; and these highly desirable studies might suitably be undertaken by research institutions and by departments of the local universities and institutions of higher education.
