82. A central problem of the live-stock industry in several African Territories is that of over-stocking in relation to the carrying capacity of the land at present technical levels. This reflects the fact that for many peoples in primarily pastoral areas, cattle are a major form of savings and are therefore kept even though their productivity may be very low. The United Kingdom representative stated that various approaches were being made to this problem by the territorial Governments concerned. First, there was emphasis on the improvement of marketing facilities, through the construction of abattoirs and canneries, and through the opening up of overseas markets. Secondly, there was extension work among the cattle-owners themselves, in an attempt to persuade them to give priority to quality as opposed to quantity. Agricultural credit organizations in a number of Territories made loans for the purchase of improved breeding stock. This was a complex problem to which there was no simple solution. Advance was needed on a number of fronts at the same time.

83. The Committee considers that the Administering Members should, where appropriate, emphasize the development of the forest industry, bearing in mind that, as pointed out above, the future prospects of demand for forest products are promising, the flexibility and range of the production functions of the industry make it a very suitable sector for investment and nearly all the Territories possess unused or insufficiently utilized forest resources. Some Territories lacking forest resources could with proper planning and investment develop them.

84. The Committee believes that the local inhabitants can achieve fuller utilization of forest resources by adopting improved methods. The main need is for the adaptation of advanced technology and for applied research rather than for basic research. This is not to deny the need for fundamental research, both for the discipline and training it provides and for the possibility it always offers of radical new discoveries; but, in terms of simple cost benefits, efforts on a less exalted plane are likely to be more fruitful.

85. The representative of the United Kingdom informed the Committee that there had been a substantial expansion in timber production in the Borneo Territories (North Borneo and Sarawak) and that large-scale afforestation projects carried out by the Colonial Development Corporation and external private investors in Swaziland were providing the basis both for the local production of wood products (wood pulp and chip board) and the export of processed timber itself. Some members of the Committee disputed the value of this investment to the people of Swaziland because of the participation of external private capital on a profit-making basis and because they considered that in this project there was no real indigenous participation, while other members considered that it was of substantial local benefit. In Dominica, there were plans for major investment in the forest industry. The Committee notes the work being done by Governments in a number of Territories in surveying forest resources, protecting the forest areas, encouraging sound silvicultural practices and in providing services such as access roads and power supplies for forest industries. The Committee considers that policies along this line should be intensified.

86. In this connexion, the Committee wishes to draw attention to a number of observations made in the FAO Report on the State of Food and Agriculture, 1962, which are believed to be pertinent and useful. According to this report, urgent attention is required in regard to minimum input techniques for developing certain types of forest following exploitation of the original stand; inexpensive methods of protection from fire, grazing, etc., in ways that allow for the interests and traditional habits of the local inhabitants; plantation forestry as related to all species of possible interest; suitable logging tools and suitable combinations of different types of logging equipment with manual work and the use of animals adapted to the local environment and labour supply conditions; and methods of low-cost forest road construction and maintenance. Among the recommendations, FAO suggests that engineering studies should be intensified on the use of timber for local housing and non-residential construction; it emphasizes the great need for improved plant layout and the considerable scope which exists for the introduction of modern methods of stock control in saw-milling; the desirability of accommodating on industrial estates many branches of the forest industry that are suitable for operations on a modest scale; the development of satisfactory arrangements for pooling, analysing, transmitting and receiving relevant information from external and internal sources; and the planning of all new ventures from the outset with a view to subsequent expansion.<sup>29</sup>

87. The Committee notes the efforts being made towards the promotion of fisheries development in many Territories with a seashore or with inland waters. For instance, in a number of Territories administered by the United Kingdom, government assistance has been directed mainly towards improving facilities and methods used in production and distribution, operating schemes for loans to fishermen, organizing and developing new enterprises and providing training courses in fishing.

88. The Committee further notes that production in almost all these Territories is normally based on local demand and comes from inland fisheries and, in some cases, from fish ponds as well, the level of the total catch being generally low. Little progress has been made in the expansion of marine fisheries. Modern facilities for freezing, processing and canning are usually lacking. An important exception is American Samoa, which enjoys a favourable balance of trade, largely because of the exports of the tuna-packing industry. The Committee hopes that the Administering Members concerned will provide more technical and financial assistance to these Territories in the exploitation and utilization of fishery resources with a view to accelerating their economic progress. Since fisheries provide food proteins otherwise difficult to obtain, their development would greatly contribute to the improvement of the nutritional standards of the people.

IV. Manufacturing industries

89. From the information before it in 1963, the Committee notes that on the whole industrial production in the Non-Self-Governing Territories has remained at a low level. Most of the Territories are still in a preparatory stage for general industrialization and the development of manufacturing industries has only just begun. However, in several, for example, Kenya, Singapore and especially Hong Kong, manufacturing output has continued to rise.

90. The Committee is aware that in most if not all the Territories, even the more industrialized Territory of Kenya, there exist conditions limiting the growth of manufacturing, such as the paucity of the natural resources known at present, the scarcity of local capital, the shortage of persons with industrial skills, the inadequacy of certain basic overhead facilities and the restricted scope of the local market at the present levels of income.

91. The Committee was informed of the measures which were being taken by the Governments of the Territories to overcome these obstacles to industrial development and considers that further action should be taken to eliminate them as far and as quickly as possible. In order to remove these obstacles, the Administering Members would be required to pursue effective policies and programmes designed to accelerate the rate of industrial growth as one means of assisting the Territories to attain economic viability.

92. The Administering Members recognize the need to establish industries where conditions are suitable.<sup>30</sup> The Committee believes that there are opportunities in the Territories for the development of certain new and additional industries, which could prosper, given the necessary assistance from the Administering Members.

93. The Committee was informed that in a number of Territories, special measures were being taken to promote or encourage manufacturing industries. In Singapore, for example, the main emphasis of the Development Programme is on the encouragement of industry, and a special Economic Development Board has been established for this purpose. In many Territories in the Caribbean and elsewhere, special tax concessions are being given to new industries. In Kenya, Northern Rhodesia and other Territories, government established bodies provide financing for industrial development. Industrial states have been established, and one is planned for Basutoland.

94. The Committee believes that it is necessary for the Administering Members to take measures to avoid or eliminate the undesirable effects of industrialization. It emphasizes, in particular, that the indigenous peoples of the Territories must be associated with all enterprises and must be taught to qualify themselves for an increasing measure of technical and supervisory responsibility.

95. The Committee notes with satisfaction that surveys of the economy of a number of the Territories under United Kingdom administration (including Basutoland, Bechuanaland, Kenya, Mauritius, Nyasaland, Swaziland and Zanzibar) have been conducted in recent years by experts appointed by the United Kingdom Government or the territorial Government concerned, in some cases with the assistance of IBRD, and that in these surveys, particular attention was paid to the problem of industrialization.

96. The Committee considers it desirable to carry out surveys of this kind in other Territories, since expert opinion should be sought in developing industrial policies and programmes, which should be co-ordinated with those for other sections of the economy. It therefore decided to examine that part of the economic surveys of the above-mentioned United Kingdom Territories dealing with industrialization.<sup>31</sup>

97. In the course of the examination, the Committee noted the following:

(a) The information on manufacturing provided by these surveys related mainly or entirely to activity in industrial plants. The scope and range of such activity varied from Territory to Territory. At one extreme, Basutoland had no factories or industrial undertakings. In the remaining Territories, manufacturing was characterized by the predominance of small-scale of production, mainly by private concerns, many of which were owned by overseas investors; the preponderance of industries producing consumer goods for the local market and processing local raw materials of agricultural or mineral origin primarily for export; and the relative simplicity of manufacturing processes. In a few Territories, the manufacture of building materials and services for mechanical repairs generally were incipient industries, their rise being associated respectively with the expansion of building and construction and the increase in machinery, transport equipment and other durable goods.

(b) The manufacturing industry in Kenya had reached a more advanced stage of development than that in other Territories under consideration, as evidenced by the fact that Kenya had more industrial establishments of all kinds (1,038 in 1957, the year for which more complete data are available), employed a larger number of workers (57,000 in 1957) and had attained a higher net output (£17.1 million in 1957). However, in all of these Territories, except the unindustrialized Territory of Basutoland, manufacturing had not been developed sufficiently to affect the scope or the structure of the economy, even in the case of Kenya, where it contributed only about 10 per cent of the Territory's total production.

(c) The experts undertaking the economic surveys of the Territories in question felt that current government policies and programmes could not meet the particular requirements of manufacturing industry, and made a series of recommendations for revising these policies and programmes, as well as for certain industrial projects.

98. The Committee realizes that the above-mentioned recommendations for the Territories concerned were made with a view to the promotion of industrial development, and notes with satisfaction that some of these recommendations are being implemented. Recalling resolution 1817 (XVII), adopted by the General Assembly on 18 December 1962, the Committee urges the United Kingdom Government to take immediate steps to put into effect all the recommendations on industrial development relating to the three High Commission Territories and thus to relieve the economic and social situation in those Territories. In this connexion, the Committee calls upon all the Administering Members to take quick action to resolve the problems associated with industrialization in the Territories under their respective administration.

V. Mining

99. Information before the Committee indicates that mining has been a major economic activity in several Territories, e.g., Brunei, and especially Northern Rhodesia and British Guiana. The economy of Brunei is largely based on oil and in recent years production has steadily declined owing to the exhaustion of known oil reserves.

100. The Copperbelt in Northern Rhodesia is the largest source of copper in the Commonwealth and the fourth largest in the world. It is the most important industry in Northern Rhodesia, and supplies over 90 per cent of the Territory's exports. Since 1957, demand for copper has declined and the expansion in production has led to a fall in prices which continued into 1961, when the Territory produced 62,500 short tons valued at £114 million.

101. British Guiana holds third place among the world's producers of bauxite. The extraction of this mineral accounts for 90 per cent of the total output of the Territory. There was a downward trend from 1956 to 1958 when output rose again, reaching 2.47 million long tons in 1960, roughly equal to the record level reached in 1956, the value of which was £5.5 million. This rise in production resulted from an expanding demand for most grades of bauxite. However, in 1961 production fell to 2.37 million long tons; the value of this output is not available. An alumina plant was opened in 1961 and 116,000 tons of alumina were exported in that year.

102. Other minerals produced in Northern Rhodesia and British Guiana include cobalt, diamonds, gold, lead, manganese and zinc, which are of lesser economic importance compared with bauxite and copper.

103. Mining industries in the Territories possessing mineral resources have been established primarily with a view to large-scale production for export and are in large measure controlled by non-indigenous financial interests. The indigenous population is involved in mining chiefly as a source of unskilled or semi-skilled labour, complementing predominantly non-indigenous managerial, supervisory and technical manpower.

104. Comprehensive data on the labour force employed in mining are usually lacking. The available statistics for Northern Rhodesia, however, show that in 1961, the monthly average number of persons engaged in mining was 44,640, of whom 37,800, or 86 per cent, were Africans; total annual wages and salaries in mining amounted to £27 million, of which £15.9 million, or about 60 per cent, accrued to non-indigenous employees; and the average annual income per man was £2,326 for non-Africans and £293 for Africans.

105. On the basis of this information and since the mining industry in Northern Rhodesia is more advanced than that in any other Territory, the Committee is of the opinion that the contribution of mining to an improvement in the standards of living of the indigenous peoples of the Territories is often relatively small. It wishes to stress once more the pressing need for the Administering Members to continue and expand policies and programmes of technical training for people in the Territories under their administration in order to spread the benefits accruing from modern industries, including mining, among the indigenous people. It notes, however, the contribution made by the industry to the vocational training of indigenous personnel.

106. Among the more important factors determining the economic structure of mining is the method of mining. Mining at depth, for example, involves skilled semi-manual operations and does not lend itself to intensive mechanization in all its phases. Surface mining, on the other hand, affords a wide choice of technological processes, ranging from labour intensive methods to highly mechanized ones. As in the case of deep mining, mechanized mining necessitates the use of skilled manpower.

107. Surface mining on a small scale is usually associated with deposits which are scattered or unreliable and are not, therefore, attractive to big companies: production of gold and diamonds in British Guiana entirely by individuals, for example, is due to the prevalence of such conditions. Mining at depth and large-scale surface mining, on the other hand, require large technical and financial resources which can only be secured by big companies.

108. The bulk of the mineral output of the Territories is in effect accounted for by big companies operating on a large scale: prominent examples are copper in Northern Rhodesia, which is derived from six mines owned by two companies with a total capital investment of £220 million; and bauxite mining in British Guiana, which is controlled by two companies.

109. As stated earlier, mining companies in the Territories are largely non-indigenous interests owned by nationals of the administering countries and other non-residents. These various interests in turn are inter-related, a fact which is largely responsible for the high degree of organization encompassing all phases of major mining activities in the Territories.

110. Except in rare instances, the territorial Government assumes no direct role in the actual exploitation of mineral resources, but plays an important part in preparing the ground for mining development and in promoting it, for example, by undertaking geological and mineral surveys and by furnishing transport and other facilities. Moreover, legal provisions regarding ownership of mineral rights and prospecting also give the Government an efficacious instrument in guiding mining development.

111. The Committee notes that in some cases the Territories possessing mineral resources do not derive from mining as much benefit as might be expected for their economic development, bearing in mind particularly that a considerable share of the proceeds of mining is often devoted to the remuneration of the risk capital obtained from abroad and the mainly non-indigenous management and skilled labour, and that the contribution of the mining companies in the form of royalties, taxes and other benefits is not always as large as might be hoped for.

112. In summary, the Committee recommends that in so far as this is not already being done, the Administering Members should assist the territorial Governments in making accurate surveys of the mineral resources of each Territory, and in preparing plans for the orderly exploitation of the resources, with the following objectives in view:

(a) Conservation of the mineral resources of each Territory so that an adequate quantity of minerals will be available for future industrial development and to meet the needs of future generations;

(b) Stabilization of production;

(c) Efficient exploitation so as not to waste irreplaceable minerals, manpower and capital and so as to yield the greatest benefits to the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories concerned.

(d) Development of as much processing and fabrication of the minerals as possible within each Territory in order to provide the maximum amount of employment and other benefits for the people of the Territory;

(e) Training of the inhabitants of each Territory so that they can serve at all levels in the exploitation and processing of their mineral resources and the provision of opportunities for their increasing participation in the mining industry in terms of capital investment and management.

113. The Committee expresses the hope that the Administering Members concerned will now take measures to these ends.

VI. Labour

114. In many Territories, particularly those in Africa, there exist heterogeneous economies and diverse cultural and ethnic groups. The structure of manpower varies considerably from one group to another, reflecting the economic system or systems with which it is chiefly associated. Non-indigenous manpower, whether permanently or temporarily resident, is almost entirely within the modern sector of the economy. To this sector, in whose development it has played a dominant role, such manpower has provided entrepreneurship and technical and managerial skill, the nature of which varies from Territory to Territory.

115. The great majority of the indigenous manpower, on the one hand, is occupied in the traditional economic systems. Those occupied in the modern economic system are generally at the unskilled level. A basic feature common to the great majority of economically active indigenous persons is the lack of sufficient training which results in a low level of technical skill and a high degree of occupational instability.

116. These persons may be divided into three major groups. The first group includes persons who are permanently employed within the traditional agricultural economy. Although production in traditional agriculture is primarily for subsistence, the need for money income makes it necessary for farmers to produce a marketable surplus. It is not possible to assess the distribution of manpower between production for sale and subsistence production, since output of the same product is often in part commercialized and in part consumed directly, as is the case with food crops generally. Even when certain crops are grown entirely for export, they are usually produced in conjunction with subsistence farming. The pattern becomes more complex when farmers also engage in temporary employment in non-agricultural sectors of the domestic economy or abroad.

117. The second group, which comprises persons permanently separated from the traditional agricultural economy, usually represents a small proportion of the total economically active population and is employed in industry and various other urban occupations.

118. The third group consists of persons domiciled in rural areas but temporarily employed outside traditional farming either in other sectors of the domestic economy or abroad.

119. A substantial proportion of wage earners in the African Territories are probably migrants.

120. The direction and magnitude of inter-territorial migratory flows are better known than in the case of internal movements. Available information indicates that among the main centres of attraction for the purpose of migration for work are the Republic of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia, and that the main centres of supply include Nyasaland and the three High Commission Territories, whose economies depend to a great extent on the earnings of labour employed abroad. One prominent example is Basutoland, from which 83,000 persons, or 43 per cent of the adult male population, are temporarily absent at any one time. The Economic Survey Mission to the High Commission Territories stated in its report, published in 1960, that unless and until the forces responsible for the Territory's poor agricultural showing were reversed, more and more of the Basuto would be forced to seek work in South Africa as the only alternative to poverty at home, and that there was no assurance that work in South Africa would always be available in requisite amounts or on satisfactory terms.

121. The Committee, therefore, cannot place too much emphasis on the need for more effective action by the Administering Members concerned to combat poverty in the Territories by improving the productivity of the indigenous people. It notes with satisfaction that in some cases, special machinery has been created to look after the needs and interests of migrant workers, and that labour officers have been appointed among whose responsibilities it is to ensure that the conditions of work of migrant workers are satisfactory.

122. The Committee welcomes the action taken by the ILO in the field of rural development, the main objective of which is to expand the opportunities for rural peoples to have full, remunerative and productive employment with a view to ensuring for them a decent standard of living and the chance of economic and social progress. The Committee hopes, with the ILO, that some of the latter's activities being undertaken under its Rural Development Programme, initiated in 1962, will soon lead to EPTA and Special Fund projects. The Committee notes that in 1960 the ILO made a study of the more important aspects of the problem of internal movements confronting developing countries and shares the view that there is a need for more intensive studies of particular situations for the purpose of drawing up recommendations for remedial action.

123. As indicated earlier, the mainspring and dominant feature of the modern economy of many of the Territories is, in general, the production of primary products, mainly agricultural and, to a lesser extent, mineral, for export. Available data on the distribution of wage earners by major branches of economic activity also indicate the preponderance of agriculture in contrast to mining, which employs a relatively smaller number of persons in relation to output. This is due in part to the high degree of mechanization in this field. The proportion of the labour force employed in manufacturing industries is usually much lower, a reflection of the early stage of industrialization.

124. In some Territories the demand for work in certain industries exceeds the wage-earning opportunities, and unemployment is giving cause for concern. The Committee notes the efforts made by Governments to solve this problem and the contribution made by the employment offices established in many Territories. In this connexion, the Committee reiterates the view already expressed in its previous reports<sup>32</sup> that there is a need to carry out studies and inquiries which could contribute to the more efficient and scientific use of available manpower resources. Such studies should cover in particular the category of persons referred to in paragraph 118 above.

125. The Committee endorses the opinion of the ILO that an integrated approach should be evolved towards the wide range of action for manpower development and that it should be set in the general context of planned development. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the ILO is giving increasing attention to research, promotional and operational activities concerning different aspects of manpower development; that it has paid particular attention to employment problems; and that it is organizing an Inter-Regional Study Tour on Manpower Assessment and Planning intended for participants from developing countries chosen from among public officials.

126. Although the vast majority of the indigenous people in most Territories are unskilled and semi-skilled wage earners and farmers, there is a small but growing group of entrepreneurs, managers and skilled workers about whom as yet little is known, but who are of vital importance to the economic development of these Territories. The stage of development of indigenous entrepreneurship and skill varies in accordance with the general stage of economic development of the Territory, with the degree of contact through commercial firms and other modern undertakings, and with the general level of education.

127. The majority of managerial and technical posts in East and Central African Territories, for example, are still held by expatriate or domiciled non-Africans. The average earnings of workers show a very substantial discrepancy among different ethnic groups. The Committee wishes to emphasize once again that these conditions urgently require adjustment and that labour policy should aim at promoting full equality of opportunity and treatment in employment. It believes that continuous and self-sustained economic growth on any significant scale is impossible without a broad base of skilled manpower and that the dissemination of skills among the indigenous people is therefore a condition for such growth. It notes, however, that in many other Territories the indigenous people occupy positions at all levels of the economy.

128. The Committee notes with satisfaction the efforts being made by the ILO towards the development of manpower in the industrial sector of the economies of the developing countries. The ILO's concern with industrial development is not limited to questions of the organization of production and technical and vocational training, but also includes the improvement of conditions of work and industrial relations.

129. The structure of the labour force described above explains in part the relatively slow pace of growth of the trade union movement in most Territories. However, the movement has continued to gain in significance, and both the number of unions and their membership have increased in several Territories. One of the factors contributing to the development of trade unionism has been the direct encouragement given to such development by the territorial Governments through their labour departments. These departments promote the education of workers in the principles and techniques of trade union organization and provide training courses for trade union leaders.

130. The strength of the trade unions varies considerably from Territory to Territory. The movement is vigorous in certain Territories, while in others, the development of stable unions is impeded and the possibility of effective collective action is reduced, owing to the existence of more trade unions than the total enrolled membership would normally justify. In a few Territories the movement is at an early stage of development, and in some others trade union organizations do not yet exist.

131. Where migration for employment and settlement has created plural societies, workers of different races belong to the same trade unions. In some Territories, however, trade unions have developed on a racial basis. In Kenya and Northern Rhodesia, for example, European, Asian and African workers are organized separately. The Committee notes, however, that in Kenya the membership of two large trade unions includes workers of all races; and that in Northern Rhodesia, the constitutional provisions of some unions permit multi-racial membership. The Committee wishes to reiterate the view expressed in 1960 as follows:

"While freedom of association necessarily implies the right of members of an association to determine the criteria of membership, the Committee is concerned at the dangers inherent in organization along racial lines. It considers that trade unions should be constituted without regard to race, national origin or political affiliations and should determine their trade union objectives on the basis of the common economic and social interests of all workers."<sup>33</sup>

132. The Committee notes that increasing trade union activity in some Territories has influenced wages and conditions of work, which are being negotiated by collective bargaining procedures. The Committee also notes that in many industries and services where agreements covering conditions of service are not made by direct agreement between the workers' organization and the employer, wages councils and other statutory machinery are still widely used for fixing wages and conditions of employment. The Committee believes that these interim measures, though temporarily useful, should be replaced without undue delay by regular collective bargaining procedures.

133. The extent of government action in fixing minimum wages through labour advisory boards and other similar bodies varies greatly according to the Territory. Minimum wages may be prescribed by law for all occupations or may be determined by law in some industries and by agreement in other industries or occupations. In certain Territories statutory wage levels are prescribed for unskilled workers in defined areas. The Committee welcomes this development as a useful, though preliminary, measure and expresses the hope that this measure will be extended to all areas where collective bargaining procedures do not exist.

134. Wages are usually based on daily or monthly rates, although in some cases they are based on hourly rates. In certain Territories the practice of paying workers on piece rates is wide-spread. The Committee notes with concern that according to the report of the IBRD Economic Survey Mission to Kenya, which visited the Territory in 1961,<sup>34</sup> general wage levels there have not yet become sufficient to support the worker and his family in an urban environment. A similar situation has existed in other Territories.

135. In certain Territories, workers' organizations have taken steps to raise incomes and living standards. For example, there were 116 labour disputes in Northern Rhodesia during 1961, of which sixty-five involved stoppages of work resulting in a loss of 19,460 man-days. The main causes of the strikes were the workers' demands for higher wages and better working conditions.

136. The Committee is of the opinion that the territorial Governments which have not already done so should adopt wage policies designed to provide a worker and his family with a decent standard of living. The trade unions, while expecting higher wages for their members, should continue to emphasize to the workers the need for higher productivity.

137. Housing, medical care and other welfare facilities are provided to workers in various circumstances. Many Territories have legal provisions which require employers either to provide the workers with satisfactory housing or to pay a housing allowance, amounting in some cases to 30 per cent of the wages determined by the employment contract. In some instances provision of housing and food for workers and their families is prescribed by law. This applies particularly to migrant workers and workers under written contracts who are employed far from their homes. In the view of the Committee, labour policies concerning wage levels and welfare facilities, including education, should always make it possible for migrant workers and other workers who come from distant homes to establish their families in the vicinity of employment.

138. Hours of work are regulated by statute in many cases, but negotiation in this respect is to an increasing extent effected by collective agreements. With some differences for the various industries, a working week of forty-eight hours is common in many Territories.

VII. External trade

139. During the period under review, there were no significant changes in the structure of the external trade of the Territories. The export sector of the economy, which is the most powerful determinant of the level of income in most of the Territories, is still very narrowly based. These Territories generally produce only a few primary agricultural and mineral commodities in a raw or very simply processed form for sale in world markets.

140. The instability that results from this narrow foundation is obvious, especially in a period of heavy declines in the prices of exports from the Territories which are mostly primary producers and are therefore particularly affected by market fluctuations in the highly developed industrialized countries.

141. Fluctuations in prices and in the volume of world demand for primary products exported by the Territories have been a major factor in their external trade. Technological changes, as well as changes in production patterns in the highly developed industrialized countries, have led to a constantly diminishing share of imports of primary products in relation to total imports so that even high rates of growth in these countries seem no longer able to raise the demand for primary commodities to a level where total demand would balance potential supply at sufficiently remunerative prices. Since this seems to be an irreversible process, the Committee considers that the Territories should pay utmost attention to the implications involved.

142. Recent experience in the Non-Self-Governing Territories has revealed the same general trend: a great divergence between the volume and the value of exports, the latter having increased only slightly, while the former has risen substantially. Therefore, it would be short-sighted to hope that any new expansion in economic activity in the highly developed areas of the world would bring in its wake a radical change in the prevailing trends in primary commodity prices. In this connexion, the Committee draws the attention of the Administering Members to General Assembly resolution 1785 (XVII) of 8 December 1962, in which the need for international action in the field of primary commodity stabilization was emphasized.

143. The Committee is aware that in many Territories, especially those under United Kingdom administration, marketing boards have succeeded to a very considerable extent in maintaining stable prices to producers in a period of wide fluctuations of world market prices. The Committee feels, nevertheless, that the solution in the long run lies in increased efforts aimed at industrialization and diversification of production patterns in agriculture, in order to achieve a more balanced growth of the various sectors of the economy and to lessen the present degree of dependence on external factors.

144. Just as the commodity structure of the exports of most of the Territories reveals a pattern characteristic of a primary producing economy, so the structure of imports is typical of an under-developed economy whose main requirements from the outside world are manufactured goods.

145. The Committee notes that the recent changes in the structure of imports of the Territories under the United Kingdom administration have had both favourable and less favourable aspects. For instance, imports of machinery to these Territories have recently increased from 9 to 11 per cent of total imports. As an indicator of enhanced economic activity, and particularly as a reflection of increased efforts aimed at speeding up economic development, this should be viewed as an encouraging feature. As for individual Territories, the ratio of imports of capital goods to total imports has increased by over 70 per cent in Hong Kong, by 45 per cent in Singapore, by 33 per cent in Mauritius and by 30 per cent in British Guiana.

146. A less encouraging feature in almost all United Kingdom Territories has been the continued increase in the ratio of imports of food, drink and tobacco to total imports, an indication that these Territories should seek to achieve a substantial degree of agricultural diversification and processing to enable wider import substitution. The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that in certain circumstances there may be advantages in using scarce land largely for the production of cash crops for export rather than for the production of food crops, and that the development of industries leads to an increased demand for foodstuffs.

147. The Committee notes with concern that with the expansion of imports in recent years to satisfy the needs of the increasing populations the value of imports has advanced more rapidly than that of exports, resulting in a deterioration in the balance of trade of most Territories (e.g., Fiji, Mauritius, Zanzibar and several United Kingdom Territories in the Caribbean area), particularly those relying on one or two primary products. The unfavourable terms of trade have also been a contributing factor in the deficit in the balance of trade of these Territories. The unfavourable movement in import and export prices has had an impact on development policy and on money income.

148. The United Kingdom Territories in the years 1959-1961 showed deficits in their balance of payments on current account. These deficits were covered by public and private funds from abroad, although the level of long-term capital inflow was lower in 1961 than in the two previous years, owing to the reduction in private investments. This is an indication that potential private investors were reluctant to make investments in these Territories owing to the uncertain prospects of most primary commodity markets. In certain Territories (e.g., Kenya), political uncertainties even caused an outright flight of private capital.

149. In general, there has been a gradual, if slow, expansion in the external trade of the Territories during recent years. A large part of this trade has continued to be conducted with the respective metropolitan countries and with others in the same currency area. However, the Committee notes with interest that in the United Kingdom Territories, the share of exports to the metropolitan country and the rest of the sterling area has declined a little, while exports to other highly developed industrialized countries have expanded steadily. The directional pattern of imports into these Territories has undergone a similar change.

150. The Committee draws the attention of the Administering Members to the recommendations contained in General Assembly resolution 1785 (XVII) concerning the need for: expansion of the trade of developing countries in primary commodities as well as in semi-manufactured and manufactured goods; the removal by industrialized countries of obstacles, restrictions and discriminatory practices in world trade; and the adaptation of an institutional framework for international co-operation in the field of trade.

151. The Committee notes that the various international organizations dealing with regional economic matters attach great importance to the development of external trade.

152. The Economic Commission for Africa, at its fifth annual session, held in March 1963, adopted a resolution<sup>35</sup> welcoming the decision of the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly to convene the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development. In this resolution, it expressed the hope that the Conference would, among other things, recommend that the gains derived by developing countries from international trade be expanded at a rate commensurate with their development needs and in any event at a rate not less than the rate of growth of developed countries, and that a principle of price parity in world trade should be formally adopted on the analogy of the price support programmes many of the industrialized countries have in their domestic economies.

153. The Commission also decided to study the problem of establishing an African common market as well as the possibility of creating a clearing system within a payment union among African countries.<sup>36</sup>

154. The Caribbean Organization has sought to strengthen its Central Secretariat by recruiting market analysis and trade promotion experts.<sup>37</sup>

155. At its nineteenth session, held in March 1963, the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East adopted a resolution<sup>38</sup> on accelerated measures for regional economic development of trade and industry.

156. In the course of its fourteenth meeting, held in November 1962, the Consultative Committee of the Colombo Plan for Co-operative Economic Development in South and South-East Asia particularly stressed the importance of opportunities for increasing overseas markets for products of developing countries, and of the expansion of trade between developing countries themselves. It also paid special attention to the worsening of the terms of trade for primary producers, a problem which it considered should be tackled through appropriate adjustments in the demand and supply conditions for primary products.<sup>39</sup>

157. The GATT has recently paid special attention to the trade problems in less-developed countries. The contracting parties to GATT agreed in December 1961<sup>40</sup> on a declaration on the promotion of the trade of less-developed countries. Work is being done towards the implementation of this declaration.

158. The Committee notes the conclusions of CICT contained in the report of its tenth session, held in May of 1962,<sup>41</sup> concerning the trade problems of primary producing countries, as well as the action taken on this matter by the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly. The Committee believes that these conclusions and the subsequent action taken are applicable to most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

159. At its tenth session, CICT noted that the prospect for further economic growth and development of the less-developed countries dependent on a narrow range of exports continued to depend heavily on the sustained expansion of their export earnings. It emphasized the importance of national, regional and international action to promote the expansion of their export earnings through creating new or broader markets.

160. CICT reaffirmed the view that the long-term problem should be approached by action on the part of both industrial and primary producing countries, including measures towards structural adjustment in their respective economies to facilitate diversification in primary producing countries.

161. At its thirty-fourth session, the Economic and Social Council<sup>42</sup> stressed the importance of research into measures to stabilize the prices of primary commodities at remunerative levels and thus contribute to satisfactory terms of trade and levels of export income for the primary producing countries.

162. The General Assembly, at its seventeenth session, adopted resolution 1829 (XVII) on 18 December 1962 urging CICT to complete studies on compensatory financing for fluctuations in export receipts of countries exporting primary products and further urging CICT and the Economic and Social Council to accelerate the study of solutions to the long-term trade problems of primary producing countries.

163. The Committee notes that among the functions of FAO, as set forth in its constitution, is that of developing recommendations for the adoption of international policies with respect to agricultural commodity arrangements. In FAO the term "agricultural commodity" includes fish, marine and forestry products. The governing bodies of FAO give close attention to the problems of international trade of these commodities, as well as production and consumption.

164. The specific responsibility for periodic reviews of the world agricultural commodity situation is entrusted to the FAO Committee on Commodity Problems. In the case of major agricultural commodities affected or likely to be affected by special difficulties, commodity study groups open to interested countries are provided for. Special provisions ensure that, in appropriate cases, representation of the interests of Non-Self-Governing Territories is included. At present there are five commodity study groups; two of these are of direct interest to Non-Self-Governing Territories, e.g., the groups on cocoa and the one on coconut and coco-nut products.

165. In the consideration of international commodity arrangements, FAO also deals with matters relating to improvements in production, distribution and marketing. Assistance is also given by FAO to the countries and Territories concerned largely through EPTA to help them with their production and marketing problems.

166. The Committee notes that in many Territories, particularly those in Africa, vigorous efforts are being made to transform the traditional economy into a modern economy, and therefore considers that these Territories should not be regarded primarily as a resource area for the highly developed industrial countries but that they should be developed in the interest of their own economic growth and benefit.

CHAPTER I

ESTABLISHMENT AND ORGANIZATION OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

A. DECLARATION ON THE GRANTING OF INDEPENDENCE TO COLONIAL COUNTRIES AND PEOPLES

1. The victory of the United Nations in the Second World War, which was fought in the name of freedom for all men, gave new hope of freedom and independence to millions of peoples who, for centuries, had been living under foreign rule. The establishment of the United Nations coincided with this period of intense political activity among colonial peoples everywhere, who renewed their just demand for freedom and redoubled their efforts to attain their legitimate aspirations.

2. The Charter of the United Nations, signed in San Francisco on 26 June 1945, gave further encouragement to the colonial peoples seeking their independence. The preamble of the Charter reaffirmed "faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small" and proclaimed the determination "to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom". Among the declared purposes of the United Nations contained in Article 1 of the Charter were the development of "friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples" and "promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion".

3. Under the Charter of the United Nations, Members responsible for the administration of territories whose peoples had not yet attained a full measure of self-government accepted certain obligations. In Article 73, Members administering such territories recognized "the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of these territories are paramount" and accepted "as a sacred trust the obligation to promote to the utmost, within the system of international peace and security established by the present Charter, the well-being of the inhabitants of these territories". The Administering

Members also undertook, among other things, "to ensure, with due respect for the culture of the peoples concerned, their political, economic, social and educational advancement, their just treatment, and their protection against abuses" and "to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions".

4. The international trusteeship system established under Chapters XII and XIII of the Charter laid down among its basic objectives the promotion of "the political, economic, social, and educational advancement of the inhabitants" of the territories that may be placed under the trusteeship system, and "their progressive development towards self-government or independence".

5. During the first fifteen years of the United Nations, a great number of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories attained independence and became Members of the Organization.

6. Even though considerable areas and large numbers of peoples had attained their independence and had taken their rightful place among the community of nations, many countries and peoples still remained under colonial rule, and the world community was seriously concerned about them. It was felt that their progress towards complete emancipation was too slow: a feeling which prompted the General Assembly to adopt various resolutions urging the administering Powers to expedite the process of decolonization. In some of these resolutions (558 (VI) and 752 (VIII)) the General Assembly called on the Administering Authorities of Trust Territories to fix time-tables and targets for the attainment of independence by certain Trust Territories and, in respect of the remaining Trust Territories, to formulate early successive intermediate targets and dates in the fields of political, economic, social and educational development so as to create, as soon as possible, favourable conditions for the attainment of self-government or independence.

7. In this climate of upsurge for freedom among colonial peoples, coupled with the anxiety of the United Nations to see the inevitable transformation from dependence to independence effected in a peaceful and orderly manner, the General Assembly, on the proposal of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics contained in a statement of Mr. Khrushchev, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR, made in the General Assembly on 23 September 1960 at the 869th plenary meeting, and in a letter of the same date,<sup>1</sup> included on the agenda of its fifteenth session an item entitled "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples". The memorandum accompanying the letter urged the immediate independence of all colonial countries and peoples. Following a long and momentous debate in the plenary meetings, a draft resolution embodying a Declaration, sponsored by forty-three African and Asian States, was adopted by the General Assembly on 14 December 1960. The text of the resolution (1514 (XV)) is as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"Mindful of the determination proclaimed by the peoples of the world in the Charter of the United Nations to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom,

"Conscious of the need for the creation of conditions of stability and well-being and peaceful and friendly relations based on respect for the principles of equal rights and self-determination of all peoples, and of universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

"Recognizing the passionate yearning for freedom in all dependent peoples and the decisive role of such peoples in the attainment of their independence,

"Aware of the increasing conflicts resulting from the denial of or impediments in the way of the freedom of such peoples, which constitute a serious threat to world peace,

"Considering the important role of the United Nations in assisting the movement for independence in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"Recognizing that the peoples of the world ardently desire the end of colonialism in all its manifestations,

"Convinced that the continued existence of colonialism prevents the development of international economic co-operation, impedes the social, cultural and economic development of dependent peoples and militates against the United Nations ideal of universal peace,

"Affirming that peoples may, for their own ends, freely dispose of their natural wealth and resources without prejudice to any obligations arising out of international economic co-operation, based upon the principle of mutual benefit, and international law,

"Believing that the process of liberation is irresistible and irreversible and that, in order to avoid serious crises, an end must be put to colonialism and all practices of segregation and discrimination associated therewith,

"Welcoming the emergence in recent years of a large number of dependent territories into freedom and independence, and recognizing the increasingly powerful trends towards freedom in such territories which have not yet attained independence,

"Convinced that all peoples have an inalienable right to complete freedom, the exercise of their sovereignty and the integrity of their national territory,

"Solemnly proclaims the necessity of bringing to a speedy and unconditional end colonialism in all its forms and manifestations;

"And to this end

"Declares that:

"1. The subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights, is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations and is an impediment to the promotion of world peace and co-operation.

"2. All peoples have the right to self-determination; by virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.

"3. Inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence.

"4. All armed action or repressive measures of all kinds directed against dependent peoples shall cease

in order to enable them to exercise peacefully and freely their right to complete independence, and the integrity of their national territory shall be respected.

"5. Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, without any distinction as to race, creed or colour, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom.

"6. Any attempt aimed at the partial or total disruption of the national unity and the territorial integrity of a country is incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

"7. All States shall observe faithfully and strictly the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the present Declaration on the basis of equality, non-interference in the internal affairs of all States, and respect for the sovereign rights of all peoples and their territorial integrity."

8. The adoption of this resolution by the General Assembly was regarded as a most constructive achievement and a landmark in the efforts of the United Nations towards the realization of the purposes and objectives of the Charter. The Declaration embodied in the resolution was a declaration of faith, an inspiration to the peoples who were still under colonial rule and an expression of the universal desire to expedite the process of the liberation of colonial peoples.

B. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

9. A year after the adoption by the General Assembly of the historic Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, the USSR brought to the attention of the Assembly the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration. The General Assembly, after considering the question, adopted, on 27 November 1961 (1066th plenary meeting), resolution 1654 (XVI) sponsored by thirty-eight African and Asian States, by 97 votes to none, with 4 abstentions. The text of the resolution is as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples contained in its resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960,

"Bearing in mind the purposes and principles of that Declaration,

"Recalling in particular paragraph 5 of the Declaration providing that:

"Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, without any distinction as to race, creed or colour, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom";

"Noting with regret that, with a few exceptions, the provisions contained in the aforementioned paragraph of the Declaration have not been carried out,

"Noting that, contrary to the provisions of paragraph 4 of the Declaration, armed action and repressive measures continue to be taken in certain areas with increasing ruthlessness against dependent peoples, depriving them of their prerogative to exercise peacefully and freely their right to complete independence,

"Deeply concerned that, contrary to the provisions of paragraph 6 of the Declaration, acts aimed at the partial or total disruption of national unity and territorial integrity are still being carried out in certain countries in the process of decolonization,

"Convinced that further delay in the application of the Declaration is a continuing source of international conflict and disharmony, seriously impedes international co-operation, and is creating an increasingly dangerous situation in many parts of the world which threaten international peace and security,

"Emphasizing that inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence,

"1. Solemnly reiterates and reaffirms the objectives and principles enshrined in the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples contained in its resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960;

"2. Calls upon States concerned to take action without further delay with a view to the faithful application and implementation of the Declaration;

"3. Decides to establish a Special Committee of seventeen members to be nominated by the President of the General Assembly at the present session;

"4. Requests the Special Committee to examine the application of the Declaration, to make suggestions and recommendations on the progress and extent of the implementation of the Declaration, and to report to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session;

"5. Directs the Special Committee to carry out its task by employment of all means which it will have at its disposal within the framework of the procedures and modalities which it shall adopt for the proper discharge of its functions;

"6. Authorizes the Special Committee to meet elsewhere than at United Nations Headquarters, whenever and wherever such meetings may be required for the effective discharge of its functions, in consultation with the appropriate authorities;

"7. Invites the authorities concerned to afford the Special Committee their fullest co-operation in carrying out its tasks;

"8. Requests the Trusteeship Council, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and the specialized agencies concerned to assist the Special Committee in its work within their respective fields;

"9. Requests the Secretary-General to provide the Special Committee with all the facilities and the personnel necessary for the implementation of the present resolution."

10. At the 1094th plenary meeting, on 23 January 1962, the President of the General Assembly announced that, in accordance with operative paragraph 3 of resolution 1654 (XVI), he had nominated the following seventeen countries to be members of the Special Committee:

Australia, Cambodia, Ethiopia, India, Italy, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Syria, Tanganyika, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay, Venezuela and Yugoslavia.

C. OPENING MEETING OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE AND ELECTION OF OFFICERS

11. The first meeting of the Special Committee was held at the Headquarters of the United Nations in New York on 20 February 1962. It was opened by the President of the General Assembly, who stated that it gave him genuine pleasure to preside over the first meeting of the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI). He added that the importance of the occasion was also underlined by the presence of the Acting Secretary-General.

12. The President went on to state that the recent attainment of independence by a number of new States and their entry into the United Nations had greatly facilitated the adoption of the General Assembly's historic Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. Since then, the need for nations which were still under colonial administration to accede to sovereignty had become increasingly urgent. At the same time, it was most desirable that their progress towards sovereignty should proceed along sound and peaceful lines, without upheavals that might provoke resentment and distrust. Accordingly, the Assembly had considered it necessary to ensure the speedy attainment of independence by the nations in question, and had set up the Special Committee for that purpose. The Special Committee's task, which was clearly defined in resolution 1654 (XVI), was a challenging one, which should be carried out without passion and in full co-operation with the administering Powers. He had every hope that, thanks to such co-operation, the Committee would be able to make a significant contribution towards hastening the complete decolonization of the dependent peoples.

13. The Acting Secretary-General said that he was very happy to welcome those present to the first meeting of the Special Committee. The work of the Special Committee in furthering the objectives of the United Nations Charter was of great importance. Although their task was by no means an easy one, he was sure that the members of the Committee, conscious of the heavy responsibilities entrusted to them, would conduct their discussions in a spirit of co-operation, for there was complete unanimity as to the objective in view, namely, the well-being of the inhabitants of the territories concerned.

14. After these statements, the Special Committee elected the following officers by acclamation: Mr. C. S. Jha (India), Chairman, Mr. Sori Coulibaly (Mali), Vice-Chairman, and Mr. Najmuddine Rifai (Syria), Rapporteur.

D. METHODS OF WORK AND PROCEDURE

Introduction

15. Paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) directed the Special Committee "to carry out its task by employment of all means which it will have at its disposal within the framework of the procedures and modalities which it shall adopt for the proper discharge of its functions". The Special Committee held a general discussion of its methods of work and procedure at its first six meetings. At the 6th meeting, the Chairman made a statement<sup>2</sup> summing up the views expressed by the members of the Special Committee. In the context of that statement, further discussions of those questions took place at the 7th and 8th meetings, during which explanations and reservations were made. The general observations by members, together with their additional explanations and reservations, are given in the following paragraphs.

Observations by members of the Special Committee

16. The representative of the United States said that a committee such as the present one could perform a most constructive role and it was important to decide how best it could approach its task.

17. In paragraph 4 of resolution 1654 (XVI) the General Assembly requested the Special Committee to examine the application of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, to make suggestions and recommendations on the progress and extent of the implementation of that Declaration, and to report to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session. In order to examine the implementation of the Declaration, the Committee would need to obtain as much relevant information as possible. He understood that the Secretariat has a considerable amount of such information at its disposal, information culled from standard reference works and information that could be found in earlier reports of such bodies as the Trusteeship Council, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee on South West Africa and the various regional economic commissions. The current reports on conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories submitted by administering Powers would also be useful. In that connexion, his delegation welcomed the recent decision of the United Kingdom to submit political information on the territories under its administration,<sup>3</sup> as was already being done by the Netherlands, Australia and his own country. The administering Powers might also be requested to provide information on specific questions.

18. The Committee could usefully draw on the experience of Member States regarding problems connected with accession to independence and such matters as the mechanics of self-determination. The States which had attained independence since the Second World War might be asked for their views regarding the processes which could usefully be applied in the remaining dependent territories. The experience of the administering Powers in that regard would also be useful.

19. With regard to the suggestions and recommendations to be made by the Committee, he felt that the most constructive approach would be for such suggestions to relate to types of situation rather than to individual cases. The problem varied: some of the remaining dependent territories were large, while others were very small; among the large territories, some were nearing independence—and in such cases it might be appropriate not to interfere—whereas in others it seemed that little or no progress was being made. Hence the approach to the different cases should vary. There was also the question of material assets and of the availability of trained personnel, able to take over the tasks of administration and the maintenance of law and order. The question of political stability had also to be taken into account. There were differences with regard to the composition of the populations of the territories, in some of which there were large indigenous or non-indigenous minorities. Practical steps could be taken to advance the progress towards independence, and the Committee's main task should be to discuss what measures were appropriate in particular types of situations.

20. There were also special problems relating to territories which constituted small enclaves within another country or territory. Other questions which might profitably be discussed were the usefulness of target dates, the question of the provision of indigenous police forces and other necessary personnel, the question of ensuring the viability of a newly independent State, and that of the geographical units to be used as a basis for popular consultations. Another problem concerned the procedure for deciding the constitutional form to be taken by a newly independent State.

21. It had been the view of the United States delegation over a number of years that no United Nations Committee should undertake to hear petitioners against the wishes of the administering Power if the latter had been co-operating with the United Nations. Similarly, his delegation felt that a visiting mission should not be sent to a territory if there was opposition from the administering Power concerned. In the opinion of his delegation that view was clearly reflected in resolution 1654 (XVI).

22. It was also worth recalling that it was under Article 87 of the Charter, which concerned Trust Territories, that the General Assembly was entitled to accept and examine petitions and provide for periodic visits to such territories. Article 73, which applied to the Non-Self-Governing Territories, included no provision for the hearing of petitioners or the dispatch of visiting missions. It was common knowledge that the omission had been deliberate and not accidental. Although he agreed that the climate of thought on those matters had changed since 1945, it was obvious that no United Nations resolution could amend the Charter. Neither the legal obligations of Member States under the Charter nor the powers of the General Assembly and its Committees could be augmented by a simple resolution. His delegation was not inflexibly opposed to the idea of the Special Committee obtaining information from individuals or by way of on-the-spot inquiries. Those matters should be considered as the occasion arose and the agreement of the administering Power—at least where the latter had been co-operating with the United Nations—was an essential part of the process. He agreed with other members in principle that it might be desirable to concentrate on certain areas, bearing in mind the view that the ultimate recommendations of the Committee should deal with types of situations rather than with individual territories.

23. On the basis of its studies the Committee should be able to produce a report of historic significance, which would make an important contribution towards the rapid implementation of resolution 1514 (XV).

24. As far as the procedure of the Committee was concerned, he felt that it would be a mistake for it to engage in controversy and to take decisions on the basis of small majorities. The precedent set in the Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space, in which it had been decided that the aim should be to achieve agreement without voting, might usefully be followed. He was naturally not proposing that unanimity should be required for all decisions.

25. The representative of the United Kingdom recalled the conditions under which his Government had accepted the invitation from the President of the General Assembly to participate in the work of the Committee. The United Kingdom Government had given full co-operation to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and saw no need for any other committee; nevertheless, it was willing to co-operate with the Special Committee, subject to the understanding that it could not accept any form of intervention in the administration of the territories for which it was responsible and that, if there were any attempts so to intervene, the United Kingdom Government would be bound to withdraw its co-operation. He reserved the position of his Government with regard to the consideration of territories individually, which he believed should be by category or area. He also expressed his Government's reservations on the hearing of petitioners and the dispatch of visiting missions, which he believed should not be done without the consent of the administering Power.

26. He wished the Committee to give sympathetic understanding to four propositions in which his Government believed. The first of these was that the United Kingdom exercised sole responsibility for carrying out the advance towards self-government and independence in the territories which it administered. The second was that there was no question in his Government's mind about the general policy to be followed in accordance with the Charter. That was not simply to confer independence without other considerations, but to confer independence on free and stable governments which were able to exercise that independence to the best advantage of the people concerned. The third principle was that this policy was being carried out by his Government with as much speed as circumstances permitted. The fourth principle was that his Government regarded preparation for self-government as all-important. It had taught the principles of good order, equal justice and representative government. He considered that if the Committee failed to pay attention to the question of practical steps in preparation for self-government, it would be doing a grave disservice to the peoples concerned. Independence should be attained rapidly, but administering Powers also had the responsibility of giving the best possible start in independence to the peoples concerned.

27. The representative of Mali said that his delegation would be animated by a spirit of co-operation in approaching the heavy task of decolonization entrusted to the Special Committee by the General Assembly. Mali was deeply engaged in the anti-colonialist and anti-imperialist struggle and, although it would make no concessions where colonialism was concerned, it felt that mere abuse of colonialism would serve no useful purpose and that there was need for definite, practical and constructive steps likely to lead to its liquidation. The adoption of resolution 1514 (XV) had inspired hope all over the world, and particularly in Africa and Asia. The peoples of those Continents, who were still suffering under colonialist oppression, must not be disappointed.

28. The first stage of decolonization was the attainment of political independence, followed by the abolition of under-development, poverty and under-employment. The first step must be to put into practice the right of peoples to self-determination, in accordance with the Charter. In that connexion he drew attention to paragraphs 3 and 5 of resolution 1514 (XV). In accordance with those provisions, the members of the Committee must acquaint themselves with the degree of implementation of that resolution achieved in each of the territories still under foreign domination.

29. Resolution 1654 (XVI) gave the Committee clear and precise instructions. It was the Committee's duty to set about specific and urgent tasks without further delay. Paragraph 5 of the resolution directed the Committee to carry out its task by employment of all means at its disposal. Since the Special Committee had been established by the General Assembly, it could employ the methods used by other Assembly Committees and by the Trusteeship Council.

30. His delegation considered that, in the interest of understanding, it would be well for the Committee at the end of each debate to reach a consensus of opinion. The right to vote would still be exercised with regard to questions of procedure.

31. He felt that the Secretariat was in a position to place at the Committee's disposal a quantity of data concerning the various dependent territories. It would be unreasonable for the Committee to set about its work in an abstract manner, and it would be particularly difficult to lay down general principles applicable to all dependent territories. There were varying situations, and certain territories, such as Angola, Mozambique, Kenya and Southern Rhodesia, constituted a serious threat to international peace and security. His delegation therefore suggested that, after deciding on its method of work, the Committee should draw up a list of priorities.

32. The first work to be undertaken was the investigation of the political situation in the various territories. The Committee should request the Secretariat to circulate all the information it possessed in that respect. The Committee should also call upon the assistance of the specialized agencies, in accordance with paragraph 8 of resolution 1654 (XVI). In addition, the Committee would have available to it the information to be supplied by the administering Powers themselves, in accordance with paragraph 7 of the resolution. Furthermore, the hearing of petitioners had proved a useful source of information both in the Fourth Committee and in the Trusteeship Council. His delegation therefore proposed that the Committee should adopt that system, on the understanding that it should first be verified that the petitioners were genuinely representative of the territories in question. He also urged the sending of visiting missions, in accordance with the practice followed by the Trusteeship Council. The Committee might also draft a questionnaire to be sent to the administering Powers.

33. The Committee's field of action was vast, but his delegation considered that it should begin its work by examining the situation in the dependent territories of Africa. In that part of the continent there were a number of crucial problems which should be solved without delay. In this delegation's view the most effective approach would be to establish a vertical rather than a horizontal programme for the examination of the problem of the still dependent territories, i.e., to establish priorities rather than to seek solutions which would be applicable in all cases and which would place important questions such as those of Angola, Mozambique, the other Portuguese possessions and Southern Rhodesia on the same level as questions such as that of the American Virgin Islands, the importance of which was only relative.

34. One of the most urgent cases was that of Angola and the other Portuguese colonies. The General Assembly had set up a Committee to deal with that subject, but the Special Committee might ask the Chairman of the other Committee for his opinion of the progress being made in that colony. The situation in Kenya and that in Southern Rhodesia were no less tense than that in Angola. The Committee should proceed without delay to the hearing of petitioners from those territories while reserving the right to dispatch a visiting mission there. The dispatch of a mission to Southern Rhodesia appeared to be particularly desirable in the light of the resolution recently adopted by the General Assembly (1745 (XVI)), which had requested the Special Committee to consider whether the Territory of Southern Rhodesia had attained a full measure of self-government. Subsequently the Committee could, on the basis of the information it had gathered, study the implementation of adequate measures of decolonization. Those urgent needs should not cause the Committee to overlook another alarming situation, that of so-called British Guiana, which seriously threatened international peace and security. He hoped that the negotiations scheduled to take place in London in May 1962 would lead to the independence of that Territory.

35. In conclusion, he urged that the Special Committee should immediately take up the specific, serious and urgent cases which threatened international peace and security, in the light of General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1654 (XVI). The awakening of the colonized peoples and their yearning for freedom and independence were incontestable facts which constituted one of the outstanding phenomena of the day. The historic Asian-African conference at Bandung in April 1955 had sounded the tocsin of colonialism. He appealed to those administering Powers which were behind the times, like Portugal, and to those which were seeking a fresh form of colonial domination, to show good will and a spirit of co-operation, so that all might work together to bring about the end of the shameful oppression of some peoples by others. In its desire to ensure the full and objective implementation of the resolutions that had been unanimously adopted by the General Assembly, Mali would do its utmost to that end.

36. With regard to the statement made by the Chairman at the 6th meeting, the representative of Mali stated that the references to consent by the administering Power to the dispatch of visiting missions should not be regarded as conferring a right of veto.

37. The representative of the Soviet Union stated that the General Assembly had entrusted the Committee with an extremely responsible and worthy task, that of assisting in the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. In adopting that Declaration, the General Assembly had solemnly proclaimed the necessity of bringing colonialism in all its forms and manifestations to a speedy and unconditional end. As the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR had stated, the main task was to ensure that the will of the peoples was put into effect, that the demands made in the Declaration did not remain a dead letter, and that the elimination of the colonial régime in any particular country became a reality and was not frustrated by the maintenance of a disguised form of colonialism. It should not be difficult to find common ground on which all members of the Committee could agree regarding the Committee's task and the methods to be used, provided they were guided by the Declaration and by General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI). It was stated in paragraph 5 of the Declaration that all powers should be transferred to the peoples "in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence". Hence, all types of colonial territories without exception were within the competence of the Committee and the task before the Committee was one of enormous dimensions, for there were still some eighty-eight territories under colonial domination, with a total population of roughly 70 million.

38. Resolution 1654 (XVI) requested the Special Committee to examine the application of the Declaration, to make suggestions and recommendations on the progress and extent of the implementation of the Declaration, and to report to the Assembly at its seventeenth session. Thus it had not much time in which to accomplish the urgent tasks awaiting it. If the Committee tried to include all the dependent territories in its report, it was likely to be submerged in a mass of detail and to fail to submit recommendations concerning the most important of those territories. For the purpose of implementing the Declaration, it was necessary for the Committee to consider the most important political questions connected with the termination of the colonial régimes. Therefore it would be reasonable to agree with the proposal of the representative of Mali that priority should be given to countries of the African continent, in which there were still twenty-seven colonial and Trust Territories, with a population of over 50 million. Lack of agreement concerning those territories, in many of which there were acute political problems, was likely to lead to serious conflict of international significance, as had been seen in the case of Angola and Ruanda-Urundi.

39. The Committee's ultimate objective had been clearly defined in the General Assembly's resolutions. It was to co-operate in the steps to be taken for the transfer of all powers to the colonial peoples, so that they might enjoy complete independence and freedom. Sometimes the need for a cautious, gradual approach was being emphasized. The United Kingdom representative had stressed the responsibility of his Government for developments in the territories under United Kingdom administration and the consequent heavy burden laid upon that Government. One of the Committee's tasks was surely to make that burden lighter by leading those territories to complete independence.

40. The Committee should endeavour to ensure that, in all the territories falling within its purview, steps should immediately be taken for the granting of independence. It was the Committee's duty to ensure that the Declaration should not remain a dead letter and to prevent any possible attempts to obstruct the implementation of the General Assembly's decisions. In that connexion, it should be borne in mind that the relevant resolutions emphasized that inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence. Moreover, the territories must be granted true independence, not a fictitious form of independence concealing new forms of colonial domination and oppression. It was necessary to point out that, in their efforts to continue to exercise pressure on a territory which had attained independence and to maintain their position in a new guise, the colonial Powers frequently endeavoured to leave their armed forces in the territory and to establish or retain military bases there. Before granting independence, they tried to impose treaties and agreements restricting the sovereignty of the future independent State. It was therefore essential for the Committee to call upon the administering Powers to liquidate their military bases in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, to withdraw all their armed forces from them and not to conclude, before the proclamation of independence, any treaties or agreements which would in any way limit the sovereignty of the future State.

41. It was for the Special Committee to determine what was necessary for the implementation of the Declaration and to decide on the best methods of work. One of the most useful methods would be to send to the various territories special working groups or visiting missions, as the representative of Mali had suggested, which should complete their work as soon as possible and submit reports to the Committee; another important method would be the consideration of written petitions and the hearing of petitioners on matters connected with the implementation of the Declaration. Those sources would supplement the information obtained from the Administering Members and from the United Nations organs that were called upon, in resolution 1654 (XVI), to assist the Committee. Further, different bodies organized by the General Assembly on certain territories, such as the Sub-Committee on the Situation in Angola, might be requested to inform the Special Committee of their programme of work and target dates so that it might state its own views on the matters concerned and each could help the other in the fulfilment of their missions.

42. In putting forward those suggestions, the Soviet Union delegation confidently assumed that all Member States which had voted in favour of the Declaration, and all those which had not objected to it, would co-operate with the Committee in its efforts to implement the Declaration. It would be an advantage if the Committee could reach decisions commanding general agreement, but if that were to be achieved members would have to refrain from laying down prior conditions. The only basis for discussion was in fact the Declaration and other General Assembly resolutions. That was already an area of agreement; any other course was likely to lead to controversy. If individual members of the Committee were not guided by the Declaration and the General Assembly resolutions but obstructed their implementation, that would prove that in voting for the Declaration they had not really intended it to be implemented. The delegation of the Soviet Union would oppose any such manoeuvres and would urge the Committee to take practical action to implement the Declaration. The effectiveness of the Committee's work would be measured by the extent to which it assisted the process of liberating the dependent peoples from the colonial yoke and eliminated the last vestiges of colonialism in Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Pacific. The Soviet Union delegation hoped that the Committee would be able to submit recommendations for the complete liquidation of colonialism to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session.

43. With regard to the statement made by the Chairman at the 6th meeting, the representative of the Soviet Union stated that, while it was desirable to obtain the consent of the administering Powers before hearing petitioners and sending out visiting missions, it should be understood that that procedure would not be tantamount to giving the administering Powers the right of veto. He felt that the Special Committee would do well to follow the procedures indicated by the Chairman, taking into account the comments made by representatives, particularly the observations of the representative of Poland.

44. The representative of Cambodia said that his country's point of view on colonialism had been made clear at the sessions of the General Assembly and at the conferences held at Bandung and Belgrade: namely, that the Powers which still maintained their rule over other peoples should be persuaded to grant them full independence. The representative of the United Kingdom had mentioned the many territories formerly under United Kingdom administration which had become independent and had said that his Government was taking steps to speed up the emancipation of the territories still under its administration. The United Kingdom was to be congratulated on its liberal colonial policy; the spirit of co-operation shown by its representative augured well for the Committee's work.

45. With regard to the Committee's method of work, his delegation thought that the competent United Nations organs should first collect all the information available on the various Non-Self-Governing Territories in order to have the fullest possible documentation on political, constitutional, economic and social conditions. The Committee could then consider and study those documents, giving priority to those relating to territories which were already advanced and fit for independence. On the basis of such a study, the Committee could ascertain in what circumstances any given territory could accede to independence as rapidly as possible and, if necessary, it could fix a target date for the granting of independence, in agreement with the administering Power concerned. His delegation, which represented a newly independent country, was prepared to co-operate whole-heartedly and to use its own experience in assisting the subject territories to recover their sovereignty in peace and dignity.

46. His delegation was confident that it would not be long before all the dependent peoples were free and every form of colonialism would disappear from the face of the earth. As Prince Norodom Sihanouk, the Chief of State of Cambodia, had said at the Belgrade conference, the struggle against the survival of colonialism would be all the more effective if it was waged in the certainty that final victory was close at hand and that nothing would be gained by bitterness or hatred.

47. The representative of Tanganyika stressed the importance of the Committee's deliberations. It had been encouraging to note that the three major Powers had agreed on the objective, for only if the great Powers co-operated fully and were willing to abide by the consensus of opinion in the Committee could its findings and recommendations have full meaning and serve the required purpose. In the war against the exploitation of man by man, against rule without consent, against degradation on the pretext that some peoples were less endowed mentally than others, ultimate victory was already assured. Nevertheless, there was a need for the Special Committee because the great Powers were somewhat divided in their approach even though they agreed on the objective. The United States representative had approved of the Committee; the United Kingdom representative, while pledging himself to co-operate with the Committee, had indicated that his country would have preferred to be left alone to liquidate its colonial empire, in view of what it had already achieved in that matter. The representative of the Soviet Union had spoken as strongly as ever against colonialism, stressing that unpreparedness should not be used as an excuse for delay.

48. He agreed that the Committee should give the colonial territories in Africa priority in its work. His delegation was not in favour of pressing for immediate independence for all territories, regardless of whether or not that was likely to lead to chaos. At the same time, his delegation did not support the attitude of the United Kingdom, which wanted to take its own time in the matter of granting independence; indeed, his country's own independence would be incomplete as long as others were still subjected to humiliation on the African continent.

49. He thought that the representative of the United Kingdom, which was at the moment the largest colonial Power, had presented a formidable list of achievements. It was true that the United Kingdom had been a champion of decolonization in cases where the population had been mainly African, as in Nigeria and Ghana, or where Europeans had formed the majority, as in New Zealand and Australia, but in colonies with a mixed population the United Kingdom had little to be proud of. For instance, in Kenya the constitutional changes had not been introduced until after the Mau Mau disturbances; in Nyasaland Mr. Hastings Banda had succeeded after a state of emergency involving much loss of life; in Northern Rhodesia bloodshed had been necessary to convince the United Kingdom that the African population were opposed to the Constitution; in Southern Rhodesia the representative of the United Kingdom Government had recently expressed satisfaction that the Constitutional Council and the courts were sufficient to safeguard the interests of the African, while for the European a two-thirds majority was an additional safeguard. The Committee would no doubt have little to say about territories such as Uganda, Trinidad and British Guiana, where the future had been clearly marked out.

50. He had, however, been perturbed by the United Kingdom threat to withdraw its co-operation if the Committee showed signs of "intervention". It would be useful if the United Kingdom representative would define the meaning of that word. If the United Kingdom had promised to give information, it must be aware that such information would be discussed and criticized. It would be unfortunate if, in so doing, the Committee would be going beyond what the United Kingdom could tolerate; he hoped that that situation would never arise. His Government was prepared to go a long way to co-operate with the Committee. All members were agreed on a clear and well-defined principle of decolonization, and as long as that principle was kept in mind any difficulties could easily be solved. All members fully realized the difficult situation facing the colonial Powers such as the United Kingdom.

51. He fully supported the suggestion of the United States representative that all possible information should be obtained from all available sources. He agreed that the Administering Authorities should be asked to give all the information they had; the experience of the colonial Powers and of the ex-colonial peoples should be placed at the Committee's disposal. He also agreed that each territory should be studied individually in all its aspects.

52. He hoped that the Committee and the administering Powers would not adopt a paternalistic attitude. If its intentions were genuine, it should be willing to hear people from the territories express their views. Objections to such a procedure might be raised in certain quarters; it might even be called a violation of the Charter of the United Nations. For that reason he would not call such people petitioners. The important thing was that they should be consulted about their future; the colonial Powers did not necessarily know best. If there were difficulties to be overcome before independence, the dependent peoples would be the first to be convinced of the need for delay. The recent discussions on Ruanda-Urundi had shown the desirability of such consultation. As the representative of a recently independent country, he stressed that there was no greater danger to co-operation between the Administering Authority and the colonized people than secrecy on the part of the former concerning its plans. That was a particularly strong grievance in the case of the Southern Rhodesian Africans.

53. The former Prime Minister of Tanganyika had asked the United Nations to be the judge in colonial matters and had appealed to the colonial Powers to treat their possessions as Trust Territories. If that were done by all the colonial Powers, they would find the Committee co-operative and the opponents of colonialism would willingly assist in reaching an amicable solution to the satisfaction of all. As he had said in discussing the question of Angola, peace and colonialism were rapidly becoming incompatible.

54. With regard to the statement made by the Chairman at the 6th meeting, the representative of Tanganyika stated that his delegation accepted that as a guide without its amounting to a ruling. He appealed to all administering Powers to give the Committee full co-operation in connexion with the hearing of petitioners and the dispatch of visiting groups.

55. The representative of India said that his delegation felt that the establishment of the Committee was of historic significance, for it showed that the end of the colonial era was in sight. The United Nations had a profound interest in the eradication of colonialism since the conditions for lasting peace would not prevail until that had been achieved. It was therefore extremely important for the Committee to function effectively. There appeared to be some differences of opinion on the Committee's specific functions. Since the objective was identical for all concerned, the Committee would have to reconcile those different views, which were not in essential conflict. The Committee represented all points of view, those of the colonial Powers as well as those of former colonies; it had to be assumed that they all had the same ultimate aim, although their views on methods might differ. He agreed that advantage should be taken of the rules of procedure of similar committees, for the Committee could find many precedents in the work of the General Assembly and its Committees.

56. He endorsed the suggestion that the Committee might decide to consider written or oral petitions. It would not, however, be bound to hear every petitioner; it might perhaps set up a small committee to screen the petitions. It had also been suggested that the Committee should not undertake a horizontal study of a large number of territories. His delegation agreed with that view; a programme of priorities should be established and studies of selected territories could be carried out. It seemed to be generally agreed that priority should be given to territories in Africa, which had suffered from colonialism at its worst. The oppression and denial of freedom in Angola and the other Portuguese colonies in Africa constituted one of the most serious challenges to the United Nations. The Committee should devote its efforts to remedying such situations. The suggestion that the Committee might send visiting missions to some of the territories also met with his delegation's approval. No mission would be successful without the co-operation of all concerned, including the administering Powers, and he hoped that that co-operation would be forthcoming.

57. His delegation agreed with the United States representative that it would be advantageous for the Special Committee to arrive at decisions by recording the consensus of opinion. The Committee should as a rule hold open meetings, but it should reserve the right to hold closed meetings should circumstances warrant it. As for the records of the meetings, he would advocate the use of verbatim records with official summary records prepared subsequently by the Secretariat, as was the practice in the Trusteeship Council.

58. His delegation was not prompted by any preconceived notions, nor did it wish to cause embarrassment to any country. Its sole desire was to ensure constructive co-operation and to hasten the implementation of the purposes set out in the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples.

59. With regard to the statement made by the Chairman at the 6th meeting, the representative of India agreed that, on the question of petitioners, the Special Committee should be able to act without the consent of the administering Power but should spare no effort in trying to obtain the latter's co-operation. He also stated that, although the Special Committee might send visiting missions, their success depended on the active co-operation of the administering Power concerned.

60. The representative of Yugoslavia said that the texts of the basic documents of the Committee's work, General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1654 (XVI), were so clear that they left little room for differences of interpretation. The United Kingdom representative had spoken of the responsibility of the administering Powers, and particularly of the United Kingdom, with regard to territories under their administration. Although all members did not share the United Kingdom representative's conception of the absolute responsibility of the Administering Members, they all recognized the special responsibility of the colonialist Powers. That responsibility had increased as a result of the adoption of resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1654 (XVI), for besides being administering Powers they were Members of the United Nations and were bound to comply with the provisions of the resolutions of the General Assembly. In that connexion he drew attention to resolution 1514 (XV), paragraph 5 and resolution 1654 (XVI), paragraph 2.

61. Apart from the responsibility of the administering Powers, there was also the responsibility of the United Nations. In adopting the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, the Assembly had assumed a definite obligation towards the peoples of the dependent territories. Lastly, there was the responsibility of the Special Committee and of each of its members, as defined in paragraphs 4 and 5 of resolution 1654 (XVI). In his delegation's view it would be erroneous, and even dangerous, to ignore or underestimate any of the responsibilities he had mentioned, which were of the highest importance for the achievement of the purposes outlined in the Declaration.

62. He agreed that constructive co-operation in the Committee would be an important condition for its success. He had particularly in mind the co-operation of the Administering Members, both those represented on the Committee and those which were not represented there. He hoped that the Committee would be able to count on their co-operation; in particular, he hoped for the co-operation of the United Kingdom, the greatest colonialist Power in the world today. In the light of the achievements enumerated by the United Kingdom representative, the Committee was entitled to expect more constructive co-operation from that delegation than from certain other colonialist Powers. The basis of such co-operation could only be the spirit and letter of the two relevant General Assembly resolutions, coupled with the determination of all members of the Committee to make concerted efforts with a view to the strict application of the purposes set forth in those resolutions.

63. With regard to the methods and programme of work to be adopted, he agreed with the United States representative, who had mentioned a number of sources of information which might be useful to the Committee. His delegation also supported the suggestion that the Committee should hear petitioners. Moreover, visiting missions might in special cases render useful service. His delegation agreed with the opinion expressed by various speakers that it would be a mistake to attack all the problems at once and to treat all dependent territories on a footing of equality from the point of view of the importance and urgency of their problems. The Committee should draw up a list of priorities and in his view the first priority should be given to "Black" Africa, more especially to the Portuguese territories and to Southern Rhodesia, in connexion with which the General Assembly had recently adopted a resolution (1745 (XVI)).

64. His delegation was ready to give the utmost co-operation and to make constructive efforts which would assist the Committee in carrying out its task as speedily as possible and enable it to present a useful report to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session.

65. With regard to the statement made by the Chairman at the 6th meeting, the representative of Yugoslavia explained that, with regard to visiting missions, the reference in the Chairman's statement to the need for securing the co-operation of the administering Powers concerned merely meant that the Committee would like to have the assistance of those authorities and did not confer any kind of veto power upon the administering Powers.

66. The representative of Poland stressed that the general views of his delegation on colonial problems had been expounded in the General Assembly, particularly during the debates on the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples and on the implementation of that Declaration. He would like to think that there was universal agreement on the principal objective, which was to bring about the independence of all dependent territories as rapidly as possible, but he felt that it was right to be realistic regarding the obstacles which had existed in the past and would doubtless continue to exist. The differences of approach to the question of implementing the General Assembly's decision sprang from the basic differences of policy and interest between the colonial Powers and the colonized peoples. It should be recalled that in the past independence had often been won only after a struggle and at the cost of many lives.

67. If the Committee was agreed on the need to bring about the peaceful implementation of the Assembly's Declaration, it must propose concrete measures to the Assembly for facilitating the process, always bearing in mind that the prime consideration must be the interests of the peoples concerned. Both the Declaration and resolution 1654 (XVI) provided the Committee with clear and precise terms of reference; there was no need to discuss whether or not, in a particular territory, immediate steps should be taken to transfer powers to the people, since the Assembly had already passed judgement on that issue. The question was how best to implement the Assembly's decision. The United States representative had rightly observed that there were marked differences between the problems in different territories. For that reason it would not be useful to discuss all the territories at once, but the Committee should, rather, decide what specific measures were called for in the case of specific territories. A general debate on abstract problems concerning the methods of transferring powers would serve no useful purpose.

68. Certain differences of approach had already become evident in the Committee. He agreed with the representative of Tanganyika that it would be helpful if the United Kingdom would abandon its paternalistic attitude toward the territories still under its administration; that attitude seemed to underlie the United Kingdom representative's statement at a previous meeting, in which he had spoken of preparing people for self-government and teaching them principles which had proved of value to the British people. What suited some people did not necessarily suit others, and history had shown that the newly emerging States did not necessarily adopt the systems prevailing in the former metropolitan countries. That was to be expected since they were faced with different problems, including economic and other problems which had been created by the policies of the colonial Powers.

69. He agreed that a list of priorities should be established and that consideration should first be given to the African territories. It was in Africa that the largest remaining dependent territories were to be found; a colonial war was being waged in Angola, and an equally dangerous situation might well arise in Southern Rhodesia. The Committee might begin immediately by considering the situation in Angola, Mozambique, Kenya, Southern Rhodesia and Ruanda-Urundi. He accepted the list of priorities proposed by the representative of Ethiopia, on condition that the Committee could amend it if necessary. By adopting the list forthwith the Committee would be able to embark immediately upon the real task before it. If it worked diligently the Committee might hope to submit the final results of its work to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session and thus belie the somewhat pessimistic prediction of one of the representatives, who seemed to expect the Committee to sit for another ten years or so, or even to become a permanent Committee.

70. In regard to the question of information, the representative of Poland stressed that the possible sources of information were numerous. Resolution 1654 (XVI) made it clear that the Committee might use all methods available; as other representatives had said, it could profitably make use of practices which had been adopted in the Trusteeship Council and other bodies.

71. First there was the material already at the disposal of the Secretariat; in that connexion, it would clearly be an advantage if the territories were considered one by one, since otherwise the work of the Committee would be held up until the Secretariat had collected information on all the dependent territories.

72. Secondly, the help of the Trusteeship Council would be useful, though such help as well should be requested in connexion with each specific territory that the Committee was considering. Other bodies, such as the Sub-Committee on the Situation in Angola, could usefully be invited to co-operate with the Committee as suggested by the Soviet Union representative.

73. Thirdly, the information which could be obtained from administering Powers was extremely important, but that did not mean that the Committee could afford to postpone its work until such information was made available to it. In that connexion, he saw little profit in the proposal that all the States which had recently acceded to independence should be approached for their views. Such States were represented in the Committee and their experience would naturally be of value when specific territories were discussed.

74. Fourthly, he agreed with the representative of Tanganyika that the Committee should make use of any information available to it from representatives of various political groups in the dependent territories. If there was general agreement, he did not think that there would be any procedural difficulty about inviting and hearing petitioners from those territories, which the Committee wanted to investigate thoroughly.

75. Fifthly, his delegation strongly supported the suggestion that visiting missions should be sent to gather information on particular territories, since that method had proved useful in the past practice of the United Nations. He supported the view of the representative of Yugoslavia that it must be clearly understood that the administering Power had no right of veto with respect to the sending of visiting groups by the Committee.

76. He agreed that the procedure of the Committee should be modelled on the procedure of the General Assembly's Main Committees especially that of the Fourth Committee. As the representative of the United States had said, many of the problems before the Committee had already arisen in the Fourth Committee. He agreed also that every effort should be made to reach a consensus of opinion, though, naturally, each delegation would have the right to call for a vote if it disagreed with the general view or if it felt that the Powers immediately concerned were demanding unacceptable conditions. The Committee must not be afraid to admit to disagreements if they did in fact exist. Finally, he agreed with the representative of India that the Committee should be provided with verbatim records, as was the practice in the Trusteeship Council.

77. With regard to the statement made by the Chairman at the meeting, the representative of Poland felt that it should be made clear that the Special Committee was entitled not only to hear petitioners but also to ask them to speak on matters which it wanted to investigate thoroughly. He also agreed that it must be clearly understood that the administering Power had no right of veto with respect to the sending of visiting missions.

78. The representative of Ethiopia hoped that the harmony which existed in the Committee would continue. His delegation's views with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples were determined by three basic considerations. First, it was determined by his country's history, which in the last hundred years had been one of constant struggle against the forces of colonialism, which twice in a generation had attacked his nation. If today independence was a reality, it was not achieved without great struggle, loss of precious human lives and destruction of property. It was not surprising, therefore, that his country's views on the problems before the Committee should be determined by its experience, by its historical heritage in the African continent.

79. The second essential consideration arose from his country's obligations under the Charter of the United Nations. The primary task of the United Nations, was the maintenance of international peace and security, and implicit in this was the duty of the Organization, and of each Member State, to remove the cause of the threat to peace. And in this regard the continued existence of colonialism was a threat to international peace and security. The history of the past decade was replete with examples of full-scale wars, armed struggles and endless heavy sacrifices which had their origin in the system of colonialism. His delegation could not therefore agree with the criticism levelled against some Member States that they had departed from the original purposes of the United Nations and had turned it into an instrument for the supervision of the liquidation of colonialism. His delegation took it as a maxim that indeed colonialism should be liquidated.

80. Thirdly, his delegation believed that Chapter XI of the Charter embodied the obligations of the international community towards the dependent territories and peoples and was an international convention on the policies that should be followed in advancing dependent territories to self-government and independence. His delegation believed that it had a responsibility to assist those Member States which had obligations towards dependent territories, as outlined in the Charter.

81. His delegation believed that by General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) mankind had declared colonialism to be morally and legally indefensible. Mankind and history had pronounced themselves on the moral and legal values of colonialism, and their verdict was indeed incontestable and irreversible. His delegation did not view its role in the Special Committee as being that of a champion of an already triumphant cause. To reopen the question anew and show why colonialism as a system was morally and legally indefensible would be a setback to human progress. The Committee's essential role and function were to carry further and implement the moral and legal values of mankind as manifested in the Charter and in resolution 1514 (XV).

82. Turning to the specific mandate of the Special Committee as outlined in paragraph 4 of resolution 1654 (XVI), he said that that mandate was very positive, inasmuch as the Committee was to formulate precise suggestions on the granting of independence to the last remaining dependent territories in the world. That mandate should be viewed also in the context of Chapter XI of the Charter and Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), which contained principles that had been unanimously accepted by all Members of the Organization. Because of that unanimity on the principles concerned with the mandate of the Committee, he believed that a similar attitude of unanimity should guide and prevail in the deliberations of the Committee and that unless there was a request by a member, voting by division should be avoided as much as possible. He explained that by unanimity he meant a consensus of views. He added, however, that members should retain the right to insist that a vote be taken on any particular point, when necessary.

83. In view of the short time available to the Special Committee, it could not be expected to undertake a case by case study of all the dependent territories. He believed that the Committee should immediately take up as a matter of high priority the problems of the larger dependent territories, especially those in which the people themselves had risen against the colonial system. Those dependent territories were very well known and had already shown serious manifestations of a will to emancipate themselves which, if suppressed, would cause a threat to international peace and security. That should not be construed, however, as neglecting the smaller dependent territories; it simply meant giving immediate attention to the urgent matters. Among the territories to which his delegation attached great importance were Kenya, Mozambique, Angola, Zanzibar, South West Africa, the Rhodesias, Bechuanaland, Swaziland and Basutoland; and possibly Ruanda-Urundi.

84. In explaining why he had not included any of the West African territories, he said that since there were not a great many settlers there, the Africans of West Africa had been able to acquire their independence with—and he used the word cautiously—relative ease. On the other hand, in East Africa there were many settlers, who, unfortunately, had not seen fit to grant to Africans the right to manage their own affairs. As a result, the granting of self-government in that part of Africa had not really been to the Africans but mostly to the settlers. Lately there had been trends such as those in Kenya, where the privileged position of the settlers was dwindling fast. But in other territories, such as the Rhodesias, the picture was different, and he believed it was the duty of the Committee to give urgent consideration to them. His list of territories was therefore based on considerations of urgency and importance. Moreover, as he came from that part of Africa, he had a special attachment to it. He believed that the Special Committee should hear petitioners. However, he felt that effective ways should be devised to avoid being overwhelmed by innumerable petitioners.

85. He also believed that the use of visiting missions should be accepted as a matter of principle which, if the circumstances arose, the Special Committee should be prepared to implement. It was the sincere hope of his Government that the authorities concerned would co-operate in the application of this method of implementing the resolution.

86. With regard to information concerning the various territories, the delegation of Ethiopia believed that the Special Committee should use the information which was already available, but that, in addition, questionnaires should be sent out. To avoid being tied down by a mass of information, the questionnaire should be brief and should be directed to the essential questions already stated in the Declaration, namely, the constitutional progress of the peoples concerned—whether there was, for example, one vote to one man, and what the chances were for the territory to become independent as early as possible. He thought the Committee should be careful not to enter into a discussion of how a particular territory should accede to independence. Each territory had its own way. The test was when the people wanted it, and when they asked for it. That was their right, and when they asked for it, so far as his delegation was concerned, there was no need for further discussion about it.

87. Referring to the statement by the representative of the United Kingdom in which he had emphasized the sole obligation of the United Kingdom with respect to the territories under its jurisdiction, he said that while he accepted that point, it must be amended to include the obligations of all countries as members of the international community towards dependent territories and their peoples. The sacred trust of civilization, which was embodied in the United Nations Charter, entitled all countries to take part in the emancipation of those territories. He could not, therefore, agree that other countries had no responsibility whatsoever, that the territories in question were the exclusive concern of the United Kingdom and that the United Kingdom's co-operation was extended to the Committee on that basis. If that was the case, he would be compelled to assert his point of view on the interpretation of the Charter and the various relevant documents on the subject.

88. That point was of particular importance to his delegation, because there was a case in history which he was afraid might repeat itself elsewhere. There was a particular territory of Africa on the southern tip which had been granted independence. The independence enjoyed by that territory was the independence of the settlers and not the independence of the people themselves. Independence, in the Rhodesias for example, must mean independence for the Africans, for the simple reason that "one man, one vote" meant that every African could vote. This was the practice in all parts of the world and he did not see why it should not take place in the Rhodesias, in Nyasaland, in Kenya—in fact, everywhere in Africa.

89. The representative of Tunisia said that he would not speak of colonialism in general, which had been condemned in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). It was now a matter of implementing that resolution, which, as was noted in the preamble of resolution 1654 (XVI), had not been applied satisfactorily. The Special Committee, established specifically to remedy that state of affairs, would not be able to work successfully unless it first defined its objectives, its tasks and its methods. The Committee's objectives were clearly stated in paragraph 5 of resolution 1514 (XV). Thus all the territories which were still dependent, whether Trust Territories, Non-Self-Governing Territories or others which had not yet acceded to independence, were within its competence. It would perhaps be useful, for the sake of clarity, to draw up a list of all those territories.

90. The whole task of the Committee was set out in paragraph 4 of resolution 1654 (XVI). In view of the little time the Committee had in which to accomplish that task, it was incumbent upon it to organize its methods of work as soon as possible, paragraph 5 of the resolution allowing it full latitude in that respect. Suggestions had already been made as to the various means that could be employed. It would no doubt be useful for the Committee to draw up a list forthwith of all the means available to it, with the idea of using whichever were most suitable in each particular case. For information the Committee could draw on all the available sources, such as the documentation of the United Nations or of the specialized agencies or, as the United States representative had suggested, the experience of newly independent Member States or, again, the documents of the various African conferences. That did not mean that the Committee should transform itself into a mere information committee. It knew what data it needed, and it should embark forthwith upon the study of certain territories, chosen in order of urgency from the list to be prepared. On some particular problems it would be necessary to hear petitioners, and visiting missions could also supply valuable information. With regard to voting procedure, he agreed with the United States representative that it would be desirable to seek unanimous agreement and where possible to avoid taking a formal vote. But it remained the right of every delegation to ask for a vote on some occasions.

91. Above all, it was important to decide first of all whether the Committee would deal with dependent countries in general defining general principles and various types of situations each of which would require a different method, or whether, on the contrary, it would take up the most explosive situations immediately, in order to avoid the upheavals they might bring about. In the latter case, the Committee should certainly begin with the African countries, since that was where the delay in decolonization had created the most tragic situations. It was the Committee's duty to endeavour to prevent violent explosions and to save the peoples who had for so long been subject to foreign domination from further suffering. It was to be hoped that the former links forged by colonialism could rapidly evolve into a new kind of relationship. It was in that hope that President Habib Bourguiba had proposed, on 15 March 1958, that a round-table conference on decolonization should be held. The Special Committee should be imbued with that spirit.

92. The representative of Australia said that his country was participating in the Committee's work both as an Administering Member and as a Member of the United Nations and it therefore had obligations in each of these categories. He hoped that in its work the Committee would not split up into categories of Administering Members on the one hand and non-administering Members on the other but would work as one entity with a common objective. Australia had played a large part in inserting in the Charter the provisions directed towards bringing dependent countries to complete independence. Australia desired to co-operate as a member of the Committee in carrying out its objectives, and hoped that its procedures would develop in a way in which members could feel they were working together and not against one another. He did not think any member of the Committee would question that certain responsibilities devolved upon Administering Members which they could not abdicate. Administering Members might be unable to accept certain recommendations, but they were under an obligation to give them full and careful consideration. Australia's experience hitherto had been that, if an Administering Member were prepared to co-operate with a United Nations body and take full account of the views of other Members, it was possible to work to the advantage of everyone. It should be possible for the Committee to produce for the seventeenth session of the Assembly a historic document indicating what had been done, what was being done, and what could be done. In some territories the difficulties arose not between the administering Power and the indigenous inhabitants, but between indigenous inhabitants themselves. The United Nations could not be indifferent to the outcome of negotiations in such circumstances but the role it could usefully play needed careful consideration. Regarding the Committee's procedure, he agreed with the outline given at a previous meeting by the representative of the United States. The Committee should be ready to use whatever sources of information were available and applicable in the situations it was to consider. Regarding the hearing of petitioners and the dispatch of visiting missions, his delegation felt that the Committee should not rule out any possible source of information. However, there was no need to take an immediate decision in vacuo concerning the particular sources of information it would use in any particular case. That question could be decided as the occasion arose. The Committee should also use the existing machinery of the United Nations where available and should as far as possible avoid duplicating what other bodies were doing. For example, the Assembly had established two committees specifically to deal with Portuguese territories (the Sub-Committee on the Situation in Angola and the Special Committee on Territories under Portuguese Administration). Perhaps the most useful role the Committee could play in respect of those territories would be to ascertain what progress was being made by the two bodies concerned and to take account of what they were doing. He agreed that the procedure for arriving at decisions could usefully be modelled on the procedure used in the Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space. That did not mean that votes would never be taken, but it did mean that the Committee should always endeavour to reach a consensus of opinion. On almost every issue, there would be some countries which for some reason or another took a special position and that fact must be recognized. In the colonial field, as in other matters, it was not simply a matter of counting heads but of enlisting support as far as possible of those countries whose actions were an essential part of giving effect to the decisions of the Committee. The Australian Government could go along with the consensus outlined by the Chairman of the Committee. This was, of course, a consensus and not a decision intended to be something that everyone was bound to accept in every word. It represented a form of words which allowed each member to maintain his position and yet allowed the Committee full freedom to act as it saw fit, as it went along. Some members believed that the Committee had a right to do things, although it might not be desirable for it to do them. Others might take the view that it might be desirable for the Committee to act in a certain way although it might not have an absolute legal right to do so. His delegation hoped that the Committee could deal with these problems as they arose without trying to lay down decisions in advance. It also seemed premature at the present stage to adopt any firm list of territories or an order of priorities. The aim should be to get a maximum area of agreement to make possible progress in a pragmatic way.

93. The representative of Madagascar said that his country, which had been under colonial domination until some three years earlier, was at present developing in complete independence and on excellent terms with France, the former administering Power. It had taken part in a number of conferences in Africa, the most important of which had been those at Monrovia<sup>4</sup> and Lagos.<sup>5</sup> On every occasion it had proclaimed the watchword of the African and Malagasy Union which was "Africa for the Africans". In September 1961, it had held a conference at Tananarive in which twelve Heads of State had participated.<sup>6</sup> The outcome of the conference had been a charter and declarations, the most important of which related to decolonization. In the eyes of his country and of the other members of the Union, the problem of decolonization should be dealt with by means of negotiation, reconciliation, arbitration or any other peaceful means in accordance with the Charter.

94. His delegation agreed with the suggestion that had been made regarding the methods of work to be followed by the Committee. In particular, he associated himself with the view that priority should be given to Africa and that the Committee should concentrate its efforts on the decolonization of that Continent. His delegation was glad to note that the United Kingdom had agreed to provide the Committee with complete information on the territories remaining under its administration. That information would be closely studied together with other information obtained by the Committee from different sources.

95. He agreed that the Committee should without delay draw up a list of countries to which it should for the time being confine its investigation. Such a list was particularly necessary since, as the representative of Mali had rightly pointed out, the Committee should not undertake its work with any preconceived ideas. Every country had its own particular characteristics and should be studied with care and good will. In that connexion, he expressed agreement with the remarks made by the representative of Yugoslavia with regard to the various forms of responsibility: the responsibility of the administering Powers, the responsibility of the United Nations and the responsibility of the Special Committee.

96. With regard to the proposal that visiting missions should be dispatched to the various territories, he agreed that the suggestion should be borne in mind but felt that the Committee should exercise prudence and should decide on each case individually, as the representative of Australia had suggested.

97. In conclusion, he was convinced that the Committee would be of service to humanity by abolishing colonialism in all its forms and that it would be able to appear before the seventeenth session of the General Assembly, conscious that it had carried out the provisions of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples and of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI).

98. The representative of Venezuela recalled that his country's policy on colonial questions had been clearly defined during the debate in the General Assembly at its sixteenth session which had resulted in the adoption of resolution 1654 (XVI). Venezuela was anti-colonialist, for historical reasons and because of the nature of the Latin-American people who, having been under colonial rule until the nineteenth century, appreciated to the full the benefits of independence. His delegation did not think that, in the process of decolonization, one single target date could be set for all dependent territories. The date for the independence of each territory should be decided in relation to the particular circumstances which would enable it to accede to independence in conditions which would ensure its stability and viability as an independent State.

99. With regard to the organization of the Committee's work, it had of course to be based on resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1654 (XVI) and the relevant provisions of the United Nations Charter. The Committee had been set up for a specific purpose: namely, to promote the independence of those peoples which had not yet attained full sovereignty; in other words, to put an end to colonialism in all its forms. The Committee's method of work would have to be established with that specific purpose in mind. It had been encouraging to note that all the previous speakers, the representatives of the administering Powers, those of the recently independent countries and those of the socialist countries, had manifested a sincere desire to co-operate in fulfilling the Committee's task.

100. In his delegation's view there were two fundamental questions to decide in relation to the organization of work: the sources of information and the procedure. The sources of information should include all information available to the Secretariat from the Trusteeship Council, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Sub-Committee on the Situation in Angola and those of the specialized agencies which dealt with colonial territories; information received direct from the administering Powers; information supplied by persons or groups such as "petitioners", in cases in which the Committee might see fit to request such information; and information which might be collected by visiting missions appointed by the Committee in accordance with the provisions of the two basic resolutions and the relevant provisions of the Charter.

101. With regard to procedure, the Committee should first ask the Secretariat for all information available to it, in summarized form, including information submitted direct by the administering Powers. The Committee should not wait for the information to be collected before embarking on its work but should begin immediately to study the most urgent colonial problems, that is, the problems in areas where there were explosive situations which might threaten international peace and security or where the conditions of the colonized peoples were the most precarious, meriting immediate attention. He agreed that a list of priorities should be established, but it should be flexible: the Committee could decide upon the first case to be dealt with, and when that had been completed decide upon the second, and so on. He agreed that the Committee should begin with the African Continent and determine in due course which African territory required first consideration. With regard to the procedure for debate, it would be simplest to adopt the same rules of procedure as those used in other General Assembly committees, with any changes that might be appropriate. He agreed that ideally there should be no need for the Committee to take votes but that its decisions should be adopted by agreement among the members.

102. With regard to the statement made by the Chairman at the 6th meeting, the representative of Venezuela said that that statement should be used as a guide for the work of the Committee. He thought that the hearing of petitioners and the sending of visiting missions were two necessary sources of information. He was not, however, in favour of departing formally from the clear-cut provisions of the Charter and felt that it would be possible to avoid difficulties if the administering Powers, in a spirit of co-operation, agreed to the use of those two sources of information whenever the Committee decided to resort to them.

103. The representative of Uruguay said that his delegation was fully aware of the importance of the Committee's task, particularly in view of the fact that the hopes of some hundred million people were centred upon it. The Committee had a solemn duty to serve those people honestly in accordance with resolution 1054 (XVI). He was glad to note that that appeared to be the unanimous feeling of the Committee. His delegation had stated its view on the general problem of colonialism during the debates of the General Assembly. Nevertheless, since the representatives of the United Kingdom and Poland had touched on the matter incidentally, he wished to state that, as between two possible concepts of colonial enterprise, he would favour the kind which had an authentic sense of mission. He agreed with the representative of Poland that colonization was not justified by the fact of having transplanted institutions from the metropolitan country, even if those included the principle of representative government.

104. From the exchange of views which had taken place, it seemed that there was unanimous agreement on the objectives. The terms of reference were quite clear: the Committee was to implement a General Assembly resolution, and the limits of its competence were settled by the wording of that resolution, whose faithful servant it must be. Under paragraph 5 of that resolution, the Committee enjoyed wide powers to decide on the means it should use to discharge its functions. His delegation felt that any means which would promote the ultimate purpose should be used, the Committee selecting the most appropriate method for each particular case.

105. It was not essential for the Committee to obtain complete information on all the dependent territories before beginning its work. If there was sufficient information available on a particular territory, including information from the administering Power, there was no reason why the Committee should not consider that territory. It would of course be useful to obtain complete information on all territories in order to classify the types of territories, but it should be possible to carry out a preliminary and approximate classification as the basic data such as area, population, economic development, education and political advancement became available.

106. The first matter to be decided was the order of priority. He did not wish to discuss whether certain situations were a threat to international peace and security, for that was a matter within the competence of other organs and introduced a controversial element which should be avoided in the Committee. The elementary feeling of human sympathy would prompt the Committee to give priority to those territories where violence and unrest were rife. His country, which had come into being long before the existence of Chapter IX of the Charter, had had to struggle to attain independence and was anxious to smooth the path for its brothers in Africa.

107. He agreed with the suggestions that the Committee should aim to achieve agreement without voting. His delegation reserved the right, however, to express reservations where necessary, or even to request a vote.

108. The representative of Syria noted with pleasure that the Committee was anxious to press on with its work. He hoped the administering Powers would give it full support, for it would only be successful if the colonial Powers co-operated in good faith. Some of those Powers had been in the habit of turning a deaf ear to General Assembly decisions. There had been cases where United Nations Commissions had been refused access to a territory; he hoped that that experience would not be repeated. It was important to find a solution to the problems of the Portuguese territories and South West Africa. He agreed that priority should be given to territories in Africa and that a time-table should be drawn up; it should, however, be a flexible one. He pledged his delegation's co-operation in the great work of promoting the emancipation of all the peoples of the world.

109. The representative of Italy said that the Committee was a permanent body whose work would not be completed when it submitted its report to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session: colonialism would not disappear so quickly. He felt that an orderly and constructive approach was necessary and that before discussing the question of priorities the Committee should undertake some preparatory work. The Committee should not mark time but on the other hand it should avoid undue haste.

110. With regard to sources of information, he agreed with the members who had expressed the view that every source should be utilized. Naturally the information in the possession of the United Nations, and especially that to be supplied by the Administering Members, should come first. In that connexion he felt that the promise by the United Kingdom to transmit political and constitutional information was very important since the greater part of the territories which the Committee would have to consider were administered by the United Kingdom. The Committee would also have access to the reports of the Trusteeship Council and the specialized agencies. Other information could come from petitioners or visiting missions. Indeed, no source of information should be excluded a priori. He did not think, however, that a lengthy discussion of the principles involved would be helpful; the idea should be accepted and applied in the light of the conditions peculiar to each individual territory.

111. With regard to the question of procedure, he pointed out that the Committee should endeavour to obtain a consensus of opinion wherever possible. He thought that the provisions of Chapters XI, XII and XIII of the United Nations Charter should provide the guiding principles of the Committee's work: in his view the achievement of political independence, fundamental though it was, was not the only and ultimate goal. Accession to independence should not lead to political and economic isolation or to an outbreak of disorders; the Committee should bring happiness and not anarchy to the countries with whose independence it was concerned.

Decisions

112. At its 8th meeting, on 5 March 1962, the Special Committee agreed that, with the explanations and reservations as contained in the records of its 7th and 8th meetings, the statement made by the Chairman at the 6th meeting, on 1 March 1962, summing up the views of the members of the Committee, would form the basis of the Committee's future work. The main points agreed upon are described below.

(a) Rules of procedure. The Special Committee should follow the rules laid down in the rules of procedure of the General Assembly. All members of the Committee agreed that it should endeavour to conduct its work in such a way that it would be able to reach agreement without need for voting. It was understood, however, that voting procedures would be resorted to whenever any member felt that that procedure was necessary in any particular case.

(b) Collection of information. Information relevant to the task of the Committee regarding territories coming under the Committee's consideration should be collected and necessary documentation prepared by the Secretariat in a precise and clear form. In order to assist in the submission of information by the Administering Authorities, the Special Committee should instruct a Sub-Committee to draw up a questionnaire that should be addressed to such authorities.

(c) Written petitions and hearing of petitioners. As additional and supplementary means of acquiring information on territories, the Special Committee might hear petitioners and receive written petitions. It was understood that petitioners would be heard at the discretion of the Committee and not as a matter of course and that the Committee would have the discretion to screen petitions. Suitable machinery should be established for the purpose of screening petitions.

(d) Visiting groups. The sending out of visiting groups to various territories was suggested as one of the means to be employed by the Committee under paragraph 5 of the basic resolution 1654 (XVI). The Committee agreed to consider this matter, if necessary, in respect of particular territories and concrete situations at the appropriate time. The Committee at the same time recognized the limitations to this procedure and the need for securing the co-operation of the administering Powers concerned.

(e) Method of examination of territories. The Special Committee agreed that in its examination of the application of the Declaration in respect of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories and all other territories which have not yet attained independence, priority should be given to the territories in Africa. It was further agreed that an order of priorities should be drawn up in regard to the territories to be considered by the Committee.

(f) Relations with other United Nations bodies. The Special Committee took note of paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) which requested the Trusteeship Council, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and the specialized agencies concerned to assist the Special Committee in its work within their respective fields, and agreed to request them for such assistance as might be necessary in the course of the performance of its task. It was also agreed that suitable liaison should be established with other bodies such as the Sub-Committee on the Situation in Angola, the Special Committee on Territories under Portuguese Administration and the Special Committee for South West Africa. The Chairman was authorized to get in touch with the Chairman of the other Committees with a view to ensuring necessary co-ordination.

E. SUB-COMMITTEE ON THE QUESTIONNAIRE

113. The Special Committee, at its 8th meeting, on 5 March 1962, decided that a sub-committee should draft a questionnaire to be addressed to the administering Powers. The matter was further discussed by the Committee at its 9th meeting, on 7 March 1962, when it decided that the Sub-Committee should be composed of India (Chairman), Mali, Syria and two other members to be nominated by the Chairman. At its 11th meeting, on 13 March 1962, the Chairman informed the Special Committee that he had nominated Uruguay and Yugoslavia. The Sub-Committee held four meetings and formulated the text of a draft questionnaire, which it recommended to the Special Committee for consideration and adoption. The draft questionnaire was considered by the Special Committee at its 27th meeting, on 29 March 1962. At the same meeting, the Special Committee adopted<sup>7</sup> the draft questionnaire with certain amendments.

114. The questionnaire provided that the Secretary-General, in transmitting it to the administering Powers, would indicate the dates by which the replies should be submitted and that those dates would be established by the Chairman of the Special Committee on the basis of the Committee's programme of work.

115. On that basis, the questionnaire was addressed to the following Administering Authorities: United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Portugal and South Africa. Up to the time of the drafting of the present report, no replies had been received from any of these Authorities. The Government of the United Kingdom had provided the United Nations with certain information, including information on political and constitutional developments, on the territories for which it was responsible. However, such information had not been furnished on the basis of the Special Committee's questionnaire.

F. SUB-COMMITTEE ON PETITIONS

Establishment of the Sub-Committee

116. At its 8th meeting, on 5 March 1962, the Special Committee agreed that suitable machinery should be established to deal with petitions. The Special Committee further considered that matter at its 9th meeting, on 7 March 1962 when it decided to establish a Sub-Committee on Petitions, the composition to be left to the Chairman to determine after consultations with the members of the Committee. Accordingly, at its 11th meeting, on 13 March 1962, the Chairman stated that he had appointed the following seven member countries to constitute the Sub-Committee on Petitions: Australia, Ethiopia, India, Madagascar, Poland, Tunisia, Venezuela.

Procedure concerning requests for hearings and written petitions

117. The Special Committee discussed at its 11th and 12th meetings the question of procedure concerning requests for hearings and written petitions. At the conclusion of the discussion (12th meeting), the Chairman summarized the points of agreement on the subject. Stressing that his suggestion was without prejudice to the right of the Committee to decide otherwise in any particular case for exceptional reasons, he proposed the following wording:

"All petitions, either for oral hearings or otherwise, should be examined by the Sub-Committee on Petitions in the first instance. After such examination the Sub-Committee will submit its report to the Committee, which will have the final authority to take decisions.

"Secondly, copies of all petitions for oral hearings should at the same time as they are circulated to the members of the Sub-Committee also be circulated to other members of the Committee, in both cases in the language in which the petition is submitted.

"Thirdly, with regard to other petitions, the Sub-Committee on Petitions should examine the matter of procedure, having regard to the observations made by the members of the Committee this morning and this afternoon, and make suitable recommendations to the Committee for adoption."

Work of the Sub-Committee

118. Election of officers. At its first meeting, on 14 March 1962, the Sub-Committee elected the following officers by acclamation: Mr. Kifle Wodajo (Ethiopia), Chairman; and Mr. Ignacio Silva Sucre (Venezuela), Vice-Chairman.

119. Meetings of the Sub-Committee. During the period covered by the present report, the Sub-Committee held twenty-five meetings and submitted twenty-three reports<sup>8</sup> to the Special Committee. Those reports dealt with the Sub-Committee's consideration of 109 written communications, which included forty-seven requests for hearings.

120. The Sub-Committee also considered the question of procedure concerning the handling of written petitions and requests for hearings on which it was called upon to make recommendations to the Special Committee. It had before it a working paper on a subject prepared by the Secretariat at the request of the Sub-Committee. Discussion of that working paper was opened with a statement by the representative of Poland in which he expressed the view, inter alia, that the Sub-Committee should consider only those communications concerning territories referred to in paragraph 5 of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, namely, Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence. The Sub-Committee was not able to complete its consideration of that question and to make recommendations to the Special Committee.

G. RECORDS OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

121. At its 8th meeting, the Special Committee decided to request the Secretary-General to provide it with verbatim records of its proceedings. In this connexion, reference was made to operative paragraph 9 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI), which requested the Secretary-General "to provide the Special Committee with all the facilities and the personnel necessary for the implementation of the present resolution".

122. The Under-Secretary for Trusteeship and Non-Self-Governing Territories informed the Special Committee at its 9th meeting that, in response to the desire expressed by it, the Secretary-General had decided, for the time being and as an exception to the existing rules, to provide the Committee with verbatim records in English and French for working purposes, whenever the Security Council was not meeting. However, as in the case of other General Assembly Committees, summary records would be the official records of the Special Committee.

123. The Special Committee found that verbatim records of its proceedings were useful and greatly facilitated its work. The Committee therefore hoped that that arrangement would continue.

H. PROGRAMME OF WORK

124. At the 5th meeting, on 1 March 1962, the representative of Ethiopia proposed that the Special Committee should first consider territories in Africa and that it should begin its work with the Rhodesias, Mozambique, Zanzibar, Kenya, Basutoland, Bechuanaland, Swaziland, Angola, South West Africa and Ruanda-Urundi.<sup>9</sup> He also proposed that, after completing that list, the Committee could take up other territories, for example, the Pacific Islands. The representative of Mali proposed the addition of Portuguese Guinea to the list proposed by the representative of Ethiopia.

125. At its 8th meeting, on 5 March, the Special Committee agreed that the territories in Africa should be given priority consideration. It was also agreed at the same meeting that the territories of Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, which form the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, should be considered first, and that the Committee should later decide the order in which to consider the other African territories. In deciding to give priority to African territories, it was understood that, if circumstances warranted, subsequent additions or alterations in the order of priorities could be made.

126. The Special Committee began consideration of the Territory of Southern Rhodesia at its 9th meeting, on 7 March 1962. At its 20th meeting, on 23 March 1962, the Special Committee decided that, on completion of the consideration of Southern Rhodesia, the Committee should consider the remaining territories in the following order: Northern Rhodesia; Nyasaland; Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland; Mozambique and all other Portuguese territories in Africa, except Angola; Angola; Kenya, Zanzibar; and South West Africa.

127. The Special Committee at its 85th meeting, on 25 July 1962, decided that priority consideration should be given to the question of British Guiana.

I. RELATIONS WITH THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL, OTHER COMMITTEES AND THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

128. As stated in paragraph 112 (f) above, the Special Committee at its 8th meeting authorized the Chairman to contact the Chairmen of other United Nations bodies concerned with Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or other territories which have not yet become independent, with a view to ensuring necessary co-ordination.

Special Committee on Territories under Portuguese Administration

129. The Special Committee received a communication dated 2 May 1962<sup>10</sup> from the Chairman of the Special Committee on Territories under Portuguese Administration stating that that Committee was collecting information on conditions prevailing in territories under Portuguese administration in order to formulate, in accordance with resolution 1699 (XVI) its observations, conclusions and recommendations for the consideration of the Special Committee and the General Assembly. It was anticipated that the report of the Special Committee on Territories under Portuguese Administration would be ready for submission to the Special Committee by mid-July. At its 80th meeting, the Chairman of the Special Committee on Territories under Portuguese Administration informed the Special Committee that he expected that the report on those territories would be completed by the end of July and that he would forward an advance copy as soon as it was available.

130. By a letter dated 9 August 1962,<sup>11</sup> the Chairman of the Special Committee on Territories under Portuguese Administration transmitted to the Special Committee a mimeographed copy of that Committee's report to the General Assembly.<sup>12</sup>

Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories

131. By a letter dated 19 June 1962<sup>13</sup> the Chairman of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted to the Special Committee an advance copy of the Committee's report to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session.<sup>14</sup>

Trusteeship Council

132. By a letter dated 20 July 1962<sup>15</sup> the President of the Trusteeship Council informed the Chairman of the Special Committee that the Council at its twenty-ninth session had examined conditions in the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands under United States administration, and the Trust Territories of Nauru and New Guinea under Australian administration and that its conclusions and recommendations, as well as the observations of the members representing their individual opinion only, were contained in its report to the Security Council<sup>16</sup> (for the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands) and in its report to the General Assembly (for Nauru and New Guinea).<sup>17</sup>

Special Committee for South West Africa

133. By a letter dated 3 August 1962<sup>18</sup> the Chairman of the Special Committee for South West Africa transmitted the report of the Chairman and the Vice-Chairman on their visit to South Africa and South West Africa.<sup>19</sup> By a letter dated 4 September 1962,<sup>20</sup> the Chairman of the Special Committee for South West Africa transmitted a mimeographed copy of that Committee's report to the General Assembly.<sup>21</sup>

J. MEETINGS HELD IN AFRICA

134. By paragraph 6 of its resolution 1654 (XVI) the General Assembly authorized the Special Committee to meet elsewhere than at United Nations Headquarters, whenever and wherever such meetings might be required for the effective discharge of its functions, in consultation with the appropriate authorities. Availing itself of this provision, the Government of Morocco, by a letter dated 19 April 1962,<sup>22</sup> extended an invitation to the Committee to meet in Tangier and offered all necessary facilities. During the consideration of this invitation, a majority of the members expressed the view that a visit by the Committee to Africa would bring it into closer contact with the territories of Africa which were on its agenda and with their peoples, thus placing it in a more favourable position to get a realistic view of the nature of the problems besetting dependent peoples in their progress towards self-government and independence. Such a visit would also lighten the financial burden assumed by petitioners who might wish to appear before it and enable those who would otherwise have found it impossible to travel to New York to apprise the Committee of their views. In addition, the meetings in Africa would have a psychological impact on the African peoples who placed so much hope on the work of the Committee.

135. Subsequently, the Governments of Ethiopia<sup>23</sup> and Tanganyika<sup>24</sup> also invited the Committee to meet in Addis Ababa and Dar es Salaam, respectively. The Special Committee at its 47th meeting, on 9 May 1962, decided to hold meetings in Tangier, Addis Ababa and Dar es Salaam for a period of three weeks, beginning in Tangier on 21 May 1962.

136. The members of the Special Committee and the secretariat arrived in Tangier on 20 May 1962. The following representatives were present at the meetings held in Africa: Mr. Sori Coulibaly (Mali) as Acting Chairman, Mr. Najmuddine Rifai (Syria) as Rapporteur, Sir James Plimsoll and Mr. Warwick Mayne-Wilson (Australia), Mr. Caimeron Measketh (Cambodia), Mr. Kifle Wodajo (Ethiopia), Mr. Natwar Singh (India), Mr. Vincenzo Tornetta (Italy), Mr. Remi Andriamaharo (Madagascar), Mr. Kazimierz Smiganowski (Poland), Mr. A. Mr. J. A. Sankey (United Kingdom), Mr. Robert O. Blake (United States), Mr. Ignacio Silva Sucre (Venezuela), Mr. Sreten Ilić (Yugoslavia). As the Chairman, Mr. C. S. Jha, was unable to accompany the Committee, Mr. Sori Coulibaly presided over its meetings. The Special Committee was accompanied by a secretariat composed of Mr. M. E. Chacko, Secretary of the Committee, Mr. D. S. Chalyan, Mr. W. T. Mashler and Mr. Y. B. Turkson, Political Affairs Officers, and an additional administrative and technical staff of twenty-four.

137. The Special Committee met at the Palacio del Marchán, Tangier, from 21 to 25 May, at Africa Hall in Addis Ababa from 30 May to 1 June, and at the Msimbazi Community Centre in Dar es Salaam from 5 to 8 June. During its stay in Africa, the Special Committee held eighteen plenary meetings; the Subcommittee on Petitions held seven meetings. The Committee heard seventeen groups of petitioners concerning the territories of Northern Rhodesia, Southern Rhodesia, Bechuanaland, Zanzibar, Kenya, Mozambique and South West Africa. Another petitioner presented evidence concerning dependent territories in southern Africa in general. The Special Committee also completed its consideration of the territories of Basutoland, Bechuanaland, Swaziland and Nyasaland and adopted conclusions and recommendations concerning them,<sup>25</sup> adopted an appeal concerning political prisoners in Zanzibar, addressed to the United Kingdom as administering Power.<sup>26</sup>

138. During its stay in Morocco the Special Committee was received by His Majesty King Hassan II. His Majesty said that it was a great honour for Morocco to have been the meeting place of the Special Committee. It was also a fitting honour as Morocco, under the late King Mohammed V, had been the first African country to show the way in the fight for liberation. Speaking of colonial problems, His Majesty said that the attainment of formal independence was not enough, and that, in order to give real meaning to independence, it was necessary to go through a phase of decolonization. Decolonization meant the ending of all forms of dependence, including dependence on former administering Powers for civil servants. One of the great problems faced by the newly independent African States was the lack of well-organized administrative cadres. For this reason, Morocco had proposed to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) the creation of a pool of African civil servants and cadres to be trained in a common institute. His Majesty suggested that the United Nations might assist UNESCO in implementing the proposed programme.

139. While in Ethiopia the Special Committee was received by His Majesty, Emperor Haile Selassie. The Emperor stressed the importance and significance of the work carried out by the Special Committee under the aegis of the United Nations. His Majesty declared that his country had fought colonialism from its earliest days and that it was dedicated to its complete eradication from Africa and the world at large. The Committee's work had already evoked an affirmative response from colonial peoples, who were following its labours with eagerness and who had paid tribute to it at the recent Emergency Conference of the Pan-African Freedom Movement of East and Central Africa. The Emperor affirmed his own and his Government's sustained support for the Committee's endeavours.

140. In Tanganyika, Mr. Kambona, Minister for Home Affairs, who opened the Committee's first meeting in that country, stated that the establishment of the Special Committee was a milestone in the struggle against colonialism. The people of Tanganyika were solidly behind the Declaration. The patience of Africa's peoples, who had suffered the indignities of the colonial system more than the peoples of any other continent, was exhausted and they were ready to give their lives for freedom and equality. It was essential for world peace and security that the scourge of colonialism should be wiped out and the United Nations should concentrate on practical steps to that end.

141. The Special Committee's visit to Africa was of great value, both in terms of the experience gained by the Committee and the psychological effect on dependent as well as independent nations in that Continent. Its meetings were followed with enthusiasm and profound interest and served to enhance the hopes placed in its work and to reinforce the confidence of the peoples of Africa in the United Nations.

142. The Special Committee wishes to express its appreciation to the Governments of Morocco, Ethiopia, and Tanganyika for their initiative in extending invitations to it, thus making possible the series of meetings in Africa, and extends its sincere thanks for the assistance and hospitality extended to it during its stay in Africa.

K. CONSIDERATION OF INDIVIDUAL TERRITORIES

143. During the period covered by the present report, the Special Committee considered the following territories:

Territory	Meetings
Southern Rhodesia .....	9th, 11th, 13th to 26th, 37th, 44th, 45th, 47th to 49th, 53rd, 71st and 107th.
Northern Rhodesia .....	28th to 43rd, 52nd, 53rd, 65th, 66th and 71st.
Nyasaland .....	61st to 64th and 70th.
Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland .....	49th to 51st, 57th to 60th, 64th, 69th and 70th.
Zanzibar .....	55th, 56th, 67th, 69th to 78th and 104th to 106th.
Mozambique .....	66th, 68th, 71st, 85th, 88th and 91st to 99th.
British Guiana .....	81st to 85th, 89th and 90th.
South West Africa .....	63rd, 71st, 95th, 96th, 99th to 103rd and 115th.
Kenya .....	61st, 68th, 71st, 99th, 106th to 110th and 115th.
Angola .....	113th and 114th.

144. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of each of the above territories and its conclusions and recommendations thereon are given in the separate chapters which follow. These territories include all those listed in paragraphs 126 and 127 above, except the Portuguese territories in Africa (other than Mozambique and Angola) which the Committee was not able to consider because of lack of time. It proposes to consider them as a matter of priority during its next series of meetings.

145. At the 2nd meeting of the Special Committee the representative of the United Kingdom surveyed recent constitutional progress in the advance of British colonial territories to self-government and independence. Subsequently this survey, together with a "Calendar of Constitutional Advance" covering the past twenty months, was incorporated in a letter dated 4 September 1962, addressed to the Chairman by the representative of the United Kingdom.<sup>27</sup> At its 116th meeting the Committee decided to reproduce that document as an annex to its report.<sup>28</sup>

L. FUTURE WORK

146. The General Assembly, in resolution 1654 (XVI) establishing the Special Committee, directed it to carry out its task by the employment of all means at its disposal within the framework of the procedures and modalities which it might adopt for the proper discharge of its functions. The procedures and modalities which the Special Committee adopted in accordance with this directive are described in paragraph 112 above.

147. The Special Committee agreed that it should consider sending out visiting groups, if necessary, in respect of particular territories and concrete situations at the appropriate time. The Committee sent a six-member sub-committee to London to discuss with the United Kingdom Government the question of Southern Rhodesia. This visit proved to be a useful experiment in methods of talks and negotiation on behalf of the Special Committee with an administering Power. The Special Committee proposes to use these methods in future, whenever practicable and necessary.

148. The Special Committee, on the basis of its experience so far, is satisfied that the methods and procedures it has followed are most appropriate and effective in the discharge of its functions.

Consideration of territories

149. Since 20 February 1962, when the Special Committee began its work, it has held 117 meetings and examined the implementation in twelve territories of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, including eleven territories in Africa to which it had decided to give priority consideration. In deciding to give priority consideration to the African territories, the Special Committee has had in mind that it is in Africa that the largest number of people are still living under colonialism, that it is in Africa that the largest colonial territories still exist and that it is in Africa where some of the most difficult problems are encountered. It also believes that its emphasis on Africa at the outset of its work has been in keeping with the urgent demands of the problems existing in the African colonies and the need for taking appropriate and urgent measures to avoid greater difficulties in the future.

150. The Special Committee feels that the wisdom of this decision has been amply borne out by the results of its work. By devoting a number of meetings to a thorough examination of the situation in each of the territories and by providing a forum for representatives of political parties of those territories and for others to present their views, the Committee feels that it has been able to focus world opinion on the state of affairs in those territories and in that way to hasten the implementation of the Declaration. Furthermore, through its observations and recommendations on each of the territories, the Committee has provided the administering Powers with specific lines of action, based on the Declaration itself and the basic objectives of the Charter of the United Nations, which will materially assist in hastening the end of colonial rule in the territories concerned.

151. The Special Committee recognizes that it has by no means completed the task entrusted to it by the General Assembly and that there are many more territories concerning which the implementation of the Declaration remains to be considered. The Declaration applies to Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories and all other territories which have not yet attained independence. The Special Committee having decided to give priority consideration to the territories in Africa, did not find it necessary at the outset of its work to embark on the preparation of a complete list of all the territories coming within the scope of its work, although the drawing up of such a list may be necessary in the future.

Relations with other United Nations bodies

152. The Special Committee is charged with the task of examining the implementation of the Declaration in respect of all dependent territories including Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or other territories which have not yet attained independence. In addition to the Trusteeship Council, one of the principal organs of the United Nations, four other bodies established by the General Assembly are also concerned with territories coming within the scope of the Special Committee's work. These are (1) the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories; (2) the Sub-Committee on the Situation in Angola; (3) the Special Committee on Territories under Portuguese Administration; and (4) the Special Committee for South West Africa. Where a number of committees are working in closely related fields there are always problems of co-ordination. There is also a danger of duplication and consequently of a wastage of effort and funds. In the introduction to his annual report, the Acting Secretary-General has drawn attention to this situation in the following words which will no doubt receive the serious consideration of the General Assembly:

"... in the field of Non-Self-Governing Territories, some four committees and special committees are dealing with matters that might usefully be combined, thus relieving the concerned delegations of otherwise added burdens and at the same time reducing costs and staff requirements. It may perhaps be possible to concentrate all the work in this field under the Special Committee which was set up pursuant to resolution 1654 (XVI)".<sup>29</sup>

M. APPROVAL OF THE REPORT

153. The present report as a whole was adopted by the Special Committee at its 117th meeting, on 19 September 1962.

ANNEXES

ANNEX 1

LETTER DATED 4 SEPTEMBER 1962 FROM THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND ADDRESSED TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

I have on several occasions represented to the Committee that, in fulfilment of the obligation imposed upon us by our terms of reference, we should give a full assessment of progress already made and a review of the stage now reached in the advance of colonial territories to self-government and independence. I have also urged that the Committee should give special attention to the practical measures necessary to prepare for independence.

The Committee has preferred to consider a number of territories one by one, and in a few instances has decided to vote on resolutions which are now included in its draft report to the Assembly. You know the reservations and objections which my delegation has consistently made to this procedure.

It was recently suggested that our views and our contribution and our policy in respect of territories which were or are under British administration might be summarized in a written document. This is not easy to do in short compass since constitutional progress is taking place in all the territories for which the United Kingdom still has responsibilities. The steps taken must vary to meet different needs and circumstances. But the attached Calendar of Constitutional Advance, covering the past twenty months, indicates and summarizes the extent and the pace and the range of progress achieved in this short period and will, I trust, be of assistance to the Committee.

Since 1945 fifteen countries previously under British administration and with a population of over 600 million have achieved self-government and independence. This has, of course, been a continuing and developing process, and it will be seen from the Calendar that in the past twenty months alone the following countries with a population of fifteen million have attained independence: Sierra Leone; The British Cameroons; Tanganyika; Jamaica; Trinidad. Furthermore, the date for Uganda's independence (with a population of six-and-a-half million) has been set for 9 October 1962.

I also take this opportunity of emphasizing again the importance of the methods employed in attaining these results, and, in regard to preparations for self-government, I invite attention to the following extract from the speech I made in the Committee on Friday, 10 August 1962 (99th meeting).

"The aims and, to a large extent, the methods of our general policy have been the same in the three main areas: first in West Africa, comprising Nigeria, Ghana, Sierra Leone and Gambia, with a population approaching fifty million; second, in East Africa, comprising Tanganyika, Uganda, Kenya and Zanzibar, with a population of about twenty-three million; and thirdly, Central Africa, comprising Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, with a population of about eight million.

"With all the striking differences which exist between the varying problems of these diverse territories, we have followed the same main policy and the same system of administration.

"Representative government"

"We created in each of the territories separate governments so that the people should gain experience in the management of their own affairs and so that the transition from bureaucracy to democracy could take place as quickly as possible by progressive and natural stages. With the people we worked out systems of representative government and established parliaments in every territory under our administration.

"Career civil services"

"We created public services owing allegiance not to a party and not to a tribe, but to all people of the country they serve.

"Impartial courts"

"We established impartial courts, free from interference by the Executive, dispensing justice without regard to party or race or politics, without regard to anything except the necessity to administer equal justice.

"Local security forces"

"We created local security forces, military and police forces, so that, when these countries attained independence, they had their own means at their own disposal to maintain law and order without recourse to outside assistance or intervention.

"Education"

"We gave special attention to the problems of education—first, by building up the basic structure of primary and secondary education, and also by giving early access to higher education so that the political and professional leaders of these new countries would be progressively and rapidly enabled to take over the leadership of their own countries. We are proud of our tradition by which one out of every ten students of higher learning in England comes from overseas; two out of every three of them from the Commonwealth. We have in my country a much larger proportion of university places allotted to men and women from Asia and Africa than any other country in the world, and we followed this up by the establishment of one university after another in Africa itself. Not the least of these advances has been in East Africa where, following the fine tradition of Makerere in Uganda, branches of the new university of East Africa have been established in Kenya and Tanganyika too.

"Economic aid"

"On the economic side, it is well to recall that British aid and investment for developing countries since the war amounts to about £3,000 million, and that a higher proportion of our national income has been directed in such aid to under-developed countries even than that provided by the United States.

"National unity"

"While we have given ourselves through recent decades to these tasks, our overriding purpose in all these territories has been to bring people together in constructive effort. We recognize the value of diversity, remembering Lord Acton's famous phrase 'Liberty provokes diversity: diversity preserves liberty'. But, whether it was in Ghana or Nigeria or Sierra Leone or Tanganyika or Uganda or Zanzibar or Kenya, our purpose has been to overcome racial and sectional and tribal differences, and to foster a true national patriotism.

"Often we hear in this Committee the old worn-out phrase, 'Divide and rule'. In fact, the record shows that our purpose throughout has been to unite and to set free."

I have no doubt that both the Committee and the General Assembly will recognize the importance both of these results and of these methods, and I request that this communication and its enclosure should be circulated to members of the Committee and also form a part of our report to the General Assembly.

(Signed) Hugh Foot

This report covers the work of the Special Committee during 1963.

Accept, Sir, etc.

CHAPTER I

ESTABLISHMENT, ORGANIZATION AND ACTIVITIES OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

A. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

1. At its sixteenth session the General Assembly considered an item entitled "The situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples", which referred to the Declaration contained in resolution 1514 (XV), of 14 December 1960.<sup>1</sup> On 27 November 1961 the General Assembly adopted resolution 1654 (XVI) by which it decided to establish a Special Committee of seventeen members to be nominated by the President of the General Assembly. The Special Committee was directed to examine the application of the Declaration, to make suggestions and recommendations on the progress and extent of the implementation of the Declaration and to report to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session.

2. On 23 January 1962, the President informed the General Assembly that pursuant to resolution 1654 (XVI), he had nominated the following seventeen countries to be members of the Special Committee:

Australia, Cambodia, Ethiopia, India, Italy, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Syria, Tanganyika, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay, Venezuela and Yugoslavia.

3. The Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) held 117 meetings during the period 20 February to 19 September 1962. The work accomplished by the Special Committee in 1962 is described in detail in its report to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session (A/5238).

4. At its seventeenth session, the General Assembly, following its consideration, in plenary meetings, of the report of the Special Committee of Seventeen, adopted resolution 1810 (XVII) on 17 December 1962 by which it decided to enlarge the membership of the Special Committee by the addition of seven new members to be nominated by the President of the General Assembly. The text of the resolution, which sets out the terms of reference of the enlarged Special Committee, is reproduced below:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling its resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, containing the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, and its resolution 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961 by which it established a Special Committee of seventeen members on the implementation of the Declaration,

"Conscious of the fact that the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples and the subsequent establishment of the Special Committee have raised great hopes everywhere, in particular among peoples which have not yet attained independence, for the elimination of all forms of colonialism and foreign domination without delay,

"Having considered the report of the Special Committee,

"Noting with profound regret that, in spite of the efforts of the United Nations, the provisions of the Declaration have not been fully implemented in a large number of territories and that, in certain cases, even preliminary measures have not yet been taken to realize its objectives,

"Deeply concerned by the negative attitude and the deliberate refusal of certain administering Powers to co-operate with the Special Committee,

"Reaffirming its conviction that any delay in the implementation of the Declaration constitutes a continuing source of international conflict, seriously impeding international co-operation and creating in many regions of the world increasingly dangerous situations likely to threaten international peace and security,

"1. Expresses its appreciation to the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples for the work it has accomplished;

"2. Takes note with approval of the methods and procedures which the Special Committee has adopted for the discharge of its functions;

"3. Solemnly reiterates and reaffirms the objectives and principles enshrined both in the Declaration contained in resolution 1514 (XV) and in resolution 1654 (XVI);

"4. Deplores the refusal of certain administering Powers to co-operate in the implementation of the Declaration in territories under their administration;

"5. Calls upon the administering Powers concerned to cease forthwith all armed action and repressive measures directed against peoples who have not yet attained independence, particularly against the political activities of their rightful leaders;

"6. Urges all administering Powers to take immediate steps in order that all colonial territories and peoples may accede to independence without delay in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 5 of the Declaration;

"7. Decides to enlarge the membership of the Special Committee established by resolution 1654 (XVI) by the addition of seven new members to be nominated by the President of the General Assembly;

"8. Invites the enlarged Special Committee:

"(a) To continue to seek the most suitable ways and means for the speedy and total application of the Declaration to all territories which have not yet attained independence;

"(b) To propose specific measures for the complete application of the Declaration;

"(c) To submit to the General Assembly in due course, and not later than its eighteenth session, a full report containing its suggestions and recommendations on all the territories mentioned in paragraph 5 of the Declaration;

"(d) To apprise the Security Council of any developments in these territories which may threaten international peace and security;

"9. Requests all Member States, especially the administering Powers, to afford the Special Committee their fullest co-operation;

"10. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to provide the Special Committee with all the facilities and personnel necessary for the implementation of the present resolution."

5. On 20 December 1962, at the 1202nd plenary meeting, the President informed the General Assembly that the additional members of the Special Committee would be announced at a later date. Subsequently, the President of the General Assembly informed the Secretary-General (A/5397) that the following additional Members had accepted his invitation, to serve on the Special Committee: Bulgaria, Chile, Denmark, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast and Sierra Leone. (See resolution 1810 (XVII), note.)

6. In addition to resolution 1810 (XVII), the General Assembly at its seventeenth session adopted a number of other resolutions concerning territories to which the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples applies. These resolutions are dealt with in the appropriate chapters of this report.

B. OPENING OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE'S MEETINGS IN 1963

7. The first meeting of the Special Committee in 1963 (its 118th meeting, on 20 February) was opened by the Secretary-General. In his opening address, the Secretary-General recalled that at its fifteenth session the General Assembly had adopted the historic Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, which was regarded as a landmark in the efforts of the United Nations towards the realization of the high principles and objectives of the Charter. At its sixteenth session the General Assembly had established the Special Committee, and at the Committee's opening meeting, on 20 February 1962, he had emphasized the importance of the task entrusted to it and had expressed the belief that its members would conduct their discussions in a spirit of co-operation, particularly in view of the fact that there was unanimity with regard to the final objective, namely the well-being of the inhabitants of the territories to which the Declaration applied. The report of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session (A/5238) was a testimony to the constructive spirit in which its members had approached their task, and to their untiring efforts.

8. During the past year a number of other bodies had also been dealing with matters concerning dependent territories. In the introduction to his annual report (A/5201/Add.1) he had suggested that all work in that field might usefully be combined and brought under the Special Committee, and he was glad to note that the work performed by the other bodies had now to a great extent been entrusted to the enlarged Special Committee. That decision should avoid duplication of effort on the part of delegations and of the Secretariat.

9. The desire of the Members of the United Nations to bring about the final end of colonialism as speedily as possible by peaceful means was well known. It was generally recognized that the emancipation of all peoples still living in dependent status would not only remove one of the major obstacles to the maintenance of peace but would greatly contribute to the realization of the principles of equality enshrined in the Charter.

10. The Secretary-General earnestly hoped that the endeavours of the Special Committee would be fruitful and that it would play a useful and constructive role in speeding up the process of decolonization. He wished the Committee success in the difficult task it was about to undertake.

C. ELECTION OF OFFICERS

Chairman

11. At its 118th meeting the Special Committee elected Mr. Sori Coulibaly (Mali) Chairman by acclamation.

Vice-Chairmen

12. At its 120th meeting the Special Committee decided to elect two Vice-Chairmen. Following that decision, it elected Mr. Carlos María Valázquez (Uruguay) First Vice-Chairman and Mr. Voeunsai Sonn (Cambodia) Second Vice-Chairman, both by acclamation.

Rapporteur

13. At the same meeting Mr. Najmuddine Rifai (Syria) was elected Rapporteur by acclamation.

14. At the 205th meeting, on 6 September 1963, the Chairman informed the Special Committee that Mr. Rifai had been assigned by his Government to a post in his country and would therefore not be able to continue as Rapporteur. The members of the Committee expressed regret at Mr. Rifai's departure and paid tributes to him for his valuable services, both as the representative of Syria on the Committee and as the Committee's Rapporteur since its beginning in 1962.

15. At the Special Committee's 206th meeting, on 9 September 1963, Mr. K. Natwar Singh (India) was elected Rapporteur by acclamation.

D. SESSIONS AND MEETINGS

16. The Special Committee held 101 meetings during 1963, as follows: First session, 118th-169th meetings, 19 February to 10 May; Second session, 170th-202nd meetings, 10 June to 26 July; Third session, 203rd-218th meetings, 5 September to 21 October.

17. The Sub-Committee on Petitions held 17 meetings (see paras. 21 to 23 below). In addition, the Special Committee established a Working Group (see paras. 25 and 26 below), and Sub-Committees on Southern Rhodesia, Aden and British Guiana (see appendices to chapters III, V and X below).

E. METHODS OF WORK AND PROCEDURES

18. Following extensive discussions at the beginning of the Special Committee's work in 1962, it agreed on its methods of work and procedures. These are described in the Committee's report to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session (A/5238, chap. I, para. 112). In the same report, the Special Committee stated that, on the basis of its experience during the year, it was satisfied that the methods and procedures it had followed were most appropriate and effective in the discharge of its functions (ibid., para. 148).

19. The General Assembly, in paragraph 2 of its resolution 1810 (XVII), took note "with approval of the methods and procedures which the Special Committee has adopted for the discharge of its functions".

20. At its 120th meeting, on 28 February 1963, the Committee decided to continue to follow these methods and procedures in the discharge of its functions.

F. SUB-COMMITTEE ON PETITIONS

21. At its 121st meeting, on 1 March 1963, the Special Committee decided that the Sub-Committee on Petitions should continue to be composed of the same seven members as during 1962, namely, Australia, Ethiopia, India, Madagascar, Poland, Tunisia and Venezuela.

Election of officers

22. The Sub-Committee elected the following officers by acclamation: Mr. Mahmoud Mestiri (Tunisia), Chairman and Mr. Leonardo Díaz González (Venezuela), Vice-Chairman.

Meetings of the Sub-Committee

23. During the period covered by this report, the Sub-Committee on Petitions held 17 meetings (its 26th to 42nd meetings) and submitted 17 reports<sup>2</sup> to the Special Committee. These reports dealt with the Sub-Committee's consideration of 306 written communications, which included 26 requests for hearings.

G. PROGRAMME OF WORK

24. At its 123rd meeting the Special Committee decided to begin its work with the consideration of Territories under Portuguese administration, Southern Rhodesia and South West Africa in that order.

Establishment of the Working Group

25. At the same meeting, the Special Committee decided to establish a Working Group, composed of the officers of the Committee and other representatives to be nominated by the Chairman, to consider and to make recommendations on the list of territories to be considered by the Committee and the order of priority for their consideration. At the 126th meeting, the Chairman informed the Special Committee that he had nominated Bulgaria, Iraq, Italy and Sierra Leone to be members of the Working Group in addition to the officers of the Committee (see paras. 11 to 13 above).

Recommendations of the Working Group

26. During the period covered by this report, the Working Group held nine meetings and submitted six reports<sup>3</sup> in addition to an oral report given by the Chairman at the 179th meeting.

List of territories to which the Declaration applies

27. The first report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.44) to the Special Committee contains the following statements concerning the list of territories to which the Declaration contained in resolution 1514 (XV) applies:

"4. The Working Group noted that General Assembly resolution 1810 (XVII) invites the Special Committee to submit to the General Assembly not later than its eighteenth session 'a full report containing its suggestions and recommendations on all the territories mentioned in paragraph 5 of the Declaration'. It also noted that in order to comply with this request, it would be necessary to have a list of the territories referred to in paragraph 5 of the Declaration, namely, 'Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence'. In the course of its consideration of this question, the Working Group recognized that the drawing up of a complete list of territories would involve detailed consideration by it of various factors requiring additional meetings of the Group. It therefore decided that, as a first step, a preliminary list of territories to which the Declaration applies should be prepared, which should include territories coming under the following categories:

"(a) Trust Territories;

"(b) The Territory of South West Africa;

"(c) Territories which have been declared by the General Assembly as Non-Self-Governing Territories within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter, but on which information is not transmitted under Article 73 e by the administering Powers concerned; and

“(d) Non-Self-Governing Territories on which information is transmitted by the administering Powers concerned.

“5. The preliminary list of territories drawn up by the Working Group in accordance with this decision is annexed to this report.

“6. The representative of Bulgaria reserved the position of his Government with regard to the inclusion of Macau and dependencies and Hong Kong in the list referred to in paragraph 5 above. He stated that his Government regarded these territories as integral parts of the People's Republic of China forcibly occupied in the past by Portugal and the United Kingdom, respectively.

“7. The Working Group further decided that it should consider the list of ‘all other territories which have not yet attained independence’, to be added to the preliminary list, at its future meetings and report to the Special Committee.”

28. At its 141st meeting, on 3 April 1963, the Special Committee approved the preliminary list of territories prepared by the Working Group. The preliminary list of territories approved by the Committee is attached to the present report as annex I.

29. With regard to the list of “all other territories which have not yet attained independence”, the Working Group in its sixth report (A/AC.109/L.86), submitted to the Special Committee on 16 September 1963, stated as follows:

“6. The Working Group also considered its previous decision<sup>4</sup> to consider at a future date the list of ‘all other territories which have not yet attained independence’, to be added to the preliminary list of territories to which the Declaration applies. The Working Group decided to inform the Special Committee that because of lack of time it had been unable to consider this list. It also decided to suggest to the Special Committee that it should consider this question at its meetings next year.”

30. At its 211th meeting, on the same day, the Special Committee approved this suggestion of the Working Group.

Priorities for the consideration of territories

31. The order in which the Special Committee considered various individual territories, following the consideration of territories under Portuguese administration, Southern Rhodesia and South West Africa, to which the Committee itself had decided to give first priority, was determined on the basis of the recommendations contained in the reports of the Working Group referred to in paragraph 26 above.

H. CONSIDERATION OF INDIVIDUAL TERRITORIES

32. During the period covered by this report, the Special Committee considered the following territories:

Number of territories	Territory	Meetings

23-26	Fernando Póo, Ifni, Río Muni and Spanish Sahara .....	206th, and 213th to 215th.

33. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of the territories listed above, and its conclusions and recommendations thereon, are given in the following chapters.

34. In a letter, dated 10 September 1963, addressed to the Chairman of the Special Committee (A/AC.109/54) the representative of the United Kingdom stated that, in the past twelve months, constitutional and political progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under British administration had continued. Enclosed with the letter was a calendar of constitutional advance summarizing the main developments in the past twelve months. At the request of the representative of the United Kingdom, the Special Committee, at its 218th meeting on 21 October 1963, decided to reproduce this letter and its enclosure as an annex to the present report (annex II).

I. RELATIONS WITH OTHER UNITED NATIONS BODIES

The Security Council

35. The General Assembly in its resolution 1810 (XVII) invited the Special Committee to apprise the Security Council of any developments in the territories coming within the scope of its work which might threaten international peace and security.

(a) Territories under Portuguese administration

36. The Special Committee by paragraph 4 of its resolution on the Territories under Portuguese administration, adopted at its 142nd meeting, on 4 April 1963 (see chap. II, para. 251, below), decided "To draw the immediate attention of the Security Council to the present situation with the view to its taking appropriate measures, including sanctions, in terms of paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 1807 (XVII) of 14 December 1962 and paragraph 9 of General Assembly resolution 1819 (XVII) of 18 December 1962, to secure compliance by Portugal with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and of the Security Council". Paragraph 5 of the resolution requested the Secretary-General "to bring this resolution to the immediate attention of the Security Council and to transmit to the Council the records of the debate on this question in the Special Committee".

37. By letter dated 5 April 1963, the Secretary-General brought this resolution and the records of the debate on the question to the attention of the Security Council (S/5276). By letter dated 19 July 1963, the Chairman transmitted to the Security Council the Committee's report on the Territories under Portuguese administration (S/5356).

(b) South West Africa

38. By paragraph 5 of the resolution on South West Africa adopted by the Special Committee at its 169th meeting, on 10 May 1963 (see chap. IV, para. 213, below), it decided "to draw the attention of the Security Council to the critical situation in South West Africa, the continuation of which constitutes a serious threat to international peace and security". In paragraph 6 of that resolution, the Special Committee recommended "to the General Assembly and to the Security Council to invite all Member States to lend their support to the application of the measures advocated in this and the previous resolutions".

39. By letter dated 14 May 1963 the Secretary-General transmitted the text of this resolution to the Security Council (S/5322). By letter dated 26 July 1963, the Chairman transmitted to the Security Council the Special Committee's report on South West Africa (S/5375).

(c) Southern Rhodesia

40. By paragraph 5 of the resolution on Southern Rhodesia adopted by the Special Committee at its 177th meeting, on 20 June 1963 (see chap. III, para. 282, below), the Committee drew "the attention of the Security Council to the deterioration of the explosive situation which prevails in the Non-Self-Governing Territory of Southern Rhodesia".

41. On 21 June 1963 the text of the resolution was transmitted to the Security Council (S/5337). By letter dated 26 June 1963, the Chairman transmitted the Special Committee's report on Southern Rhodesia to the Security Council (S/5378).

The Trusteeship Council

42. In accordance with paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) which requested the Trusteeship Council to assist the Special Committee in its work, the President of the Trusteeship Council, by letter dated 26 June 1963 (A/AC.109/46) addressed to the Chairman of the Special Committee, informed the Committee, that the Council at its thirtieth session had examined conditions in the Trust Territories of the Pacific Islands under United States administration, and of Nauru and New Guinea under Australian administration. The letter stated that the conclusions and recommendations of the Trusteeship Council, as well as the observations of the Members of the Council, representing their individual opinion only, were contained in its report to the Security Council (S/5340) (on the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands) and in its report to the General Assembly (A/5504) (on Nauru and New Guinea).

Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories

43. In paragraph 8 of resolution 1654 (XVI) the General Assembly requested the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to assist the Special Committee in its work. In paragraph 5 of resolution 1700 (XVI) the General Assembly requested the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to transmit to the Special Committee its report to the General Assembly and to provide it with the pertinent material available to it. The question of assistance by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories was also referred to in General Assembly resolution 1847 (XVII), by which the Assembly decided to continue that Committee on the same basis as that established by General Assembly resolution 1700 (XVI), particularly paragraphs 2 to 5 of the resolution, and to review at its eighteenth session the question of continuation of the above-mentioned Committee.

J. FUTURE WORK

44. The General Assembly, in resolution 1810 (XVII), invited the Special Committee to submit to it in due course, and not later than at its eighteenth session, a full report containing its suggestions and recommendations on all the territories mentioned in paragraph 5 of the Declaration, namely, "Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence".

45. The historic Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples contained in resolution 1514 (XV) was adopted by the General Assembly almost three years ago, on 14 December 1960. As was pointed out by the Special Committee in its first report to the General Assembly, the Declaration was a declaration of faith, an inspiration to the people who were still under colonial rule and an expression of the universal desire to expedite the process of the liberation of colonial peoples. While taking note of the progress made since then in the field of decolonization, the Committee is aware that decolonization in parts of Africa and elsewhere is not proceeding at a satisfactory pace. It is especially concerned at the dangerous situations existing in the Territories under Portuguese administration, in South West Africa and in Southern Rhodesia. It should be noted that the refusal of the Administering Members concerned to implement the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, the Security Council and of the Special Committee has helped to aggravate this situation. The Committee notes that this was a matter of particular concern to the Heads of African States and Governments during their recent historic conference at Addis Ababa and that it had led them to adopt important decisions. The Committee hopes that its report will be of some assistance to the General Assembly in its consideration of this question which is one of serious concern to all Member States.

46. The task assigned to the Special Committee by the General Assembly was to continue to seek the most suitable ways and means for the speedy and total application of the Declaration to "Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other territories which have not yet attained independence". Accordingly, the Committee, on the recommendation of its Working Group, approved a preliminary list of territories comprising Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, including the Territory of South West Africa (see paras. 27 and 28 above, and annex I).

47. However, because of lack of time, the Committee was unable to consider "all other territories which have not yet attained independence" to be added to the preliminary list and thus to complete the list of territories coming within the scope of its work. The Committee decided to do this at its meetings in 1964, subject to any further directives which the General Assembly might wish to provide at its eighteenth session (see paras. 29 and 30 above).

48. As stated in paragraph 32 above, the Special Committee, in the course of its work in 1963, examined the implementation of the Declaration in respect of twenty-six territories. However, for lack of time, the Special Committee was not able to complete its consideration of five of them, namely, Gibraltar, Fernando Póo, Ifni, Río Muni and Spanish Sahara (see chap. XIII, paras. 110-113, and chap. XII, para 97). It is proposed to complete consideration of these territories as a matter of priority in 1964.

49. The Special Committee recognizes that it has not completed the task assigned to it by the General Assembly, although it has met almost continuously from February to October 1963. It will be realized that in view of the importance of its task, the Committee had to give thorough consideration to the situation in each of the territories examined by it. In many cases the Committee heard and questioned petitioners, and, in the cases of Southern Rhodesia, Aden and British Guiana, it was necessary to establish Sub-Committees. Moreover, the Committee has had to reopen its discussions on particular territories on account of the non-implementation by the administering Powers of the General Assembly's resolutions in regard to those territories. All these were time-consuming processes.

50. However, in relation to the territories already considered by the Special Committee, it is appropriate to point out the following:

(a) The Committee has considered all the territories in the continent of Africa included in the preliminary list it had approved. As already pointed out in the Committee's report to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session, it is in Africa that the largest number of people are still living under colonial régimes, it is in Africa that the largest colonial territories still exist and it is in Africa that some of the most difficult colonial problems are encountered;

(b) Although the Committee was able to consider only twenty-six of the sixty-four territories included in the preliminary list, these territories together have an area of 2,377,229 square miles (6,167,315 square kilometres) and a population of almost 37 million, while the remaining territories together have an area of 225,747 square miles (584,586 square kilometres) and a population of almost 8 million.

51. With regard to the territories which still remain to be considered by the Special Committee, it is the Committee's intention to consider them as a matter of priority in 1964. In order to facilitate such consideration, the Secretariat has been asked to prepare the necessary documentation giving background information on the territories included in the preliminary list which have not yet been considered by the Special Committee and make them available to its members as soon as possible.

52. The Special Committee, in the performance of the task assigned to it by the General Assembly, continued to follow the methods and procedures it adopted in 1962 and which the General Assembly took note of with approval in resolution 1810 (XVII). As in the previous year, the Committee found that these methods and procedures were most appropriate and effective in the discharge of its functions.

53. One of the procedures approved by the General Assembly is the sending out of visiting groups, if necessary, in respect of particular territories and concrete situations at the appropriate time. In accordance with this, the Special Committee, during 1963, established three sub-committees, as follows:

(i) A Sub-Committee on Southern Rhodesia, composed of six members to visit London and to have discussions with the United Kingdom Government concerning Southern Rhodesia. This Sub-Committee visited London from 20 to 26 April 1963 and had discussions with the Ministers of the United Kingdom Government concerning the situation in Southern Rhodesia in the context of the resolutions on Southern Rhodesia adopted by the General Assembly.<sup>5</sup>

(ii) A Sub-Committee on Aden, composed of five members, to visit Aden and, if necessary, other neighbouring countries to ascertain the views of the population concerning the situation in that territory and to hold talks with the administering Power. This was the first occasion on which the Special Committee had authorized a group of its members to visit one of the territories with which it was concerned. However, the Sub-Committee was unable to visit the Territory because of the refusal of the United Kingdom to co-operate with it in such a visit. The Sub-Committee therefore visited neighbouring countries during the period 25 May to 7 June 1963 and heard over fifty petitioners concerning Aden.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>5</sup> For the report of the Sub-Committee on Southern Rhodesia, see chap. III, appendix.

(iii) A Sub-Committee on British Guiana, composed of five members to seek together with the interested parties the most suitable ways and means of enabling the Territory to accede to independence without delay. The Sub-Committee was authorized by the Special Committee to proceed to any place it considered appropriate for the successful performance of its work. The Sub-Committee considered that the most effective way of carrying out its task was to visit British Guiana and to hold talks with the leaders of the Territory there. However, the United Kingdom Government refused to agree to a visit to British Guiana by the Sub-Committee, although the leaders of the two major political parties had expressed themselves in favour of such a visit. Consequently, it was necessary for the Sub-Committee to invite the leaders to come to New York.<sup>7</sup>

54. The Special Committee wishes to express its appreciation to the United Kingdom for the opportunity afforded to the Sub-Committee on Southern Rhodesia to discuss the question of Southern Rhodesia with the responsible Ministers and for the courteous reception afforded to it. However, it notes with regret that the refusal of the United Kingdom Government to agree to the visit by a group of the Special Committee to Aden and British Guiana. In both cases the refusal of the United Kingdom Government was based on its position that the presence of a visiting mission in a territory constitutes an interference in the affairs of that territory and that it could not share its responsibilities with the United Nations. The majority view in the Committee has been unable to accept the argument that a visiting mission, whose function is to ascertain the views of the population concerning a territory's future or is one of good offices in bringing together the different political elements in a territory and thus to assist them in achieving their independence, amounts to interference in the internal affairs of a territory. Nor can it accept the assertion that by agreeing to such a visit, the administering Power is sharing its responsibility for the internal administration of the territory: the United Nations has responsibilities with regard to Non-Self-Governing Territories deriving from the provisions of the Charter concerning these territories and from the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples adopted by the General Assembly.

55. The Special Committee wishes to point out that by refusing access to a visiting group of the Committee to a territory coming within the scope of its work, the administering Power concerned is denying it one of the most effective means of carrying out the task assigned to it by the General Assembly, namely the examination of the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples.

56. The Special Committee therefore expresses the hope that all administering Powers will co-operate fully with the Committee in its work in future and in particular will enable visiting groups to go to territories where such visits are considered necessary and useful by the Special Committee.

57. In this connexion, the Committee wishes to draw the attention of the General Assembly to the need for making the necessary budgetary provisions to cover the expenses arising from its activities, including the expenses of visiting missions. It will be recognized that decisions concerning visiting missions are taken by the Special Committee in the course of its examination of the conditions in each territory. For that reason, it is not possible to provide in advance exact details of the expenditures that may arise on this account.

58. It may be recalled that, in connexion with the adoption of resolution 1810 (XVII), the Secretary-General had proposed that an amount of $150,000 be provided in the 1963 budget estimates to meet expenditures arising from the activities of the Special Committee. However, on the recommendation of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, the Fifth Committee recommended to the General Assembly that, in the absence of any specific details to serve as a basis for firm cost estimates, the Committee was unable to comment on the figure of $150,000 submitted by the Secretary-General and that, therefore, any expenditure resulting from the adoption of a draft resolution should be incurred solely under the terms of the resolution relating to unforeseen and extraordinary expenses with the prior concurrence of the Advisory Committee.

59. The Special Committee, taking into account the importance of the tasks still to be carried out, recommends to the Secretary-General and to the General Assembly to make adequate provisions in order to facilitate the implementation of the Committee's mandate. The Committee requests them particularly to make provisions in the 1964 budget to cover the expenses of the activities of the Committee, including the cost of sub-committees or visiting groups.

60. In view of the valuable experience gained by the Committee during the last two years of its work and taking into account the fact that it was not possible to consider the situation in all the territories covered by the Declaration contained in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), the Special Committee considers that it would be desirable that its mandate should be continued.

Annex II

LETTER DATED 10 SEPTEMBER 1963 ADDRESSED TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE FROM THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

Your Excellency will recall that, in a letter dated 4 September 1962, the representative of the United Kingdom on the Special Committee addressed a letter to the then Chairman, Ambassador C. S. Jha, describing in outline developments in Non-Self-Governing Territories under British administration from December 1960 until August 1962. This letter, and the calendar of constitutional advance enclosed with it, was circulated as a document of the Special Committee (A/AC.109/26), and was included in the report of the Special Committee to the General Assembly (A/5238) as annex I.

In the past twelve months, constitutional and political progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under British administration has continued; Uganda, with a population of 6.5 million, attained its independence on 9 October 1962 and is now a Member of the United Nations, and dates for independence have been set for Singapore, North Borneo, Sarawak, Kenya, Zanzibar and Malta, with a combined population of over 12 million, in the next few months.

In this connexion, I enclose with this letter a calendar of constitutional advance summarizing the main developments in the past twelve months, which my delegation hopes will be of assistance both to the Special Committee and to the General Assembly. I have the honour to request that this communication and its enclosure should be circulated to members of the Committee, and also form a part of our report to the General Assembly.

(Signed) C. E. KING

CHAPTER I

ESTABLISHMENT, ORGANIZATION AND ACTIVITIES OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

A. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

1. The General Assembly, at its fifteenth session, by resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, adopted the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

2. At its sixteenth session the General Assembly, following its consideration of the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, adopted resolution 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961 by which it decided to establish a Special Committee of seventeen members. The Special Committee was directed to examine the application of the Declaration, to make suggestions and recommendations on the progress and extent of the implementation of the Declaration and to report to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session. The seventeen members of the Special Committee were: Australia, Cambodia, Ethiopia, India, Italy, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Syria, Tanganyika (now the United Republic of Tanzania), Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

3. At its seventeenth session the General Assembly, following its consideration of the report of the Special Committee of Seventeen (A/5238), adopted resolution 1810 (XVII) of 17 December 1962 by which it enlarged the membership of the Special Committee by the addition of seven new members and invited the enlarged Special Committee to continue to seek the most suitable ways and means for the speedy and total application of the Declaration to all territories which have not yet attained independence. The new members added to the Special Committee were:

Bulgaria	Iraq
Chile	Ivory Coast
Denmark	Sierra Leone
Iran

4. At its eighteenth session the General Assembly, following its consideration of the report of the Special Committee of Twenty-Four (A/5446/Rev.1) adopted resolution 1956 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963 by which it requested the Special Committee to continue to seek the best ways and means for the immediate and total application of the Declaration to all territories which have not yet attained independence and to report to the General Assembly not later than at its nineteenth session. The text of resolution 1956 (XVIII) is reproduced below:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples contained in its resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, and resolutions 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961 and 1810 (XVII) of 17 December 1962 by which the General Assembly established the Special Committee on the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples,

"Having considered the report of the Special Committee,

"Taking into consideration the observations of the Special Committee regarding the list of territories to be examined by it,

"Noting with deep regret that, three years after the adoption of the Declaration, many territories are still under foreign domination and that, in some cases, not even preliminary measures have been taken towards the application of the Declaration,

"Deploing the negative attitude of certain administering Powers and their partial or complete refusal to co-operate with the Special Committee in the implementation of the Declaration,

"Deploing further the assistance given to some administering Powers by certain States, which enables those Powers to persist in their refusal to apply the Declaration,

"Having adopted resolutions on Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, Territories under Portuguese administration, Aden, Malta, Fiji, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland and British Guiana,

"1. Reaffirms its resolutions 1514 (XV), 1654 (XVI) and 1810 (XVII);

"2. Notes with appreciation the work accomplished by the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and endorses its methods and procedures;

"3. Approves the report of the Special Committee and calls upon the administering Powers to implement the conclusions and recommendations contained therein;

"4. Requests the Special Committee to continue to seek the best ways and means for the immediate and total application of the Declaration to all territories which have not yet attained independence, and to report to the General Assembly not later than at its nineteenth session;

"5. Deeply regrets the refusal of certain administering Powers to co-operate with the Special Committee and their continued disregard of the resolutions of the General Assembly;

"6. Invites the Special Committee to apprise the Security Council of any developments in any territory examined by it which may threaten international peace and security;

"7. Requests all States to refrain from any action which may jeopardize the implementation of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly and the Special Committee for the application of the Declaration;

"8. Further requests the administering Powers to give their full co-operation to the Special Committee and to facilitate the task of the sub-committees and visiting groups instructed by the Special Committee to go to the territories under its mandate;

"9. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to provide the Special Committee with all the facilities and personnel necessary for the implementation of the present resolution."

5. By resolutions adopted at its seventeenth and eighteenth sessions, the General Assembly also entrusted to the Special Committee the following additional functions previously performed by other Committees concerned with the dependent Territories which had been dissolved:

(a) By resolution 1805 (XVII) of 14 December 1962, the General Assembly requested the Special Committee to discharge, mutatis mutandis, the tasks assigned to the Special Committee for South West Africa by resolution 1702 (XVI), taking into consideration the special responsibilities of the United Nations with regard to the Territory of South West Africa. By resolution 1806 (XVII) of 14 December 1962, the General Assembly decided to dissolve the Special Committee for South West Africa. By resolution 1899 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963, the General Assembly requested the Special Committee to continue its efforts with a view to discharging the tasks assigned to it by resolution 1805 (XVII).

(b) By resolution 1807 (XVII) of 14 December 1962, the General Assembly requested the Special Committee to give high priority to an examination of the situation in the Territories under Portuguese administration. By resolution 1809 (XVII) of 14 December 1962, the General Assembly decided to dissolve the Special Committee on Territories under Portuguese administration.

(c) By resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, the General Assembly decided to dissolve the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. By the same resolution, the General Assembly invited Member States which have or which assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government to transmit or continue to transmit to the Secretary-General information as prescribed under Article 73 e of the Charter, as well as the fullest possible information on political and constitutional development. It requested the Special Committee to study this information and take it fully into account in examining the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples in each of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and to undertake any special study and prepare any special report it may consider necessary in addition to its activities under General Assembly resolutions 1654 (XVI) and 1810 (XVII).

6. With the dissolution of the Committee on Information, the Special Committee is now the only body responsible for matters relating to dependent territories, with the exception of the Trusteeship Council, which is responsible for the three remaining Trust Territories.

7. This report covers the work of the Special Committee for the period 25 February to 15 December 1964, during which it held 101 plenary meetings and its Working Group and Sub-Committees held over 140 meetings.

B. OPENING OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE'S MEETINGS IN 1964

Opening statement by the Secretary-General

8. The first meeting of the Special Committee in 1964 (219th meeting), held on 25 February, was opened by the Secretary-General. In his opening address, the Secretary-General recalled that, during the first two years, the Special Committee had concerned itself mainly with decolonization in Africa, for it was in that continent, as the Committee had noted in its report, that the largest colonial Territories and some of the most difficult colonial problems still existed. In 1964, the Committee would no doubt give special attention to recent developments in the Territories which it had considered in 1963: South West Africa, Southern Rhodesia, the three Territories of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, the Territories under Portuguese administration, particularly Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, Spanish Sahara, Ifni, Fernando Póo, Río Muni, Gambia, Gibraltar, Malta, British Guiana, Aden and Fiji. While some of those Territories were well on their way to independence, others still presented problems which the Committee would have to examine.

9. Although in the past two years a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories had acceded to independence and were now Members of the United Nations, there were still some sixty dependent Territories, many of which, though small in area and population, nevertheless came within the purview of the Declaration on decolonization. Those small Territories included many groups of sparsely populated islands scattered in the Atlantic, Pacific and Indian Oceans. During its 1964 session the Committee would be faced with problems which it had not so far been called upon to solve; it would have to seek the most effective ways of enabling those small Territories to attain the objectives of resolution 1514 (XV). The task would not be an easy one but there could be no doubt that the experience gained by the members of the Committee would prove helpful in the forthcoming deliberations.

10. At its eighteenth session, the General Assembly, by resolution 1970 (XVIII), had dissolved the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and had entrusted some of its former functions to the Special Committee. By virtue of that decision, the Special Committee had become the only body other than the Trusteeship Council concerned with matters relating to dependent Territories. He had issued a note (A/AC.109/L.97) setting out the implications of the dissolution of the Committee on Information and had requested the Special Committee to express its views on the manner in which it proposed to carry out the functions devolving upon it.

11. He was convinced that the Special Committee would approach with its usual objectivity the many problems with which it would have to deal during the present session and that it would have the co-operation of the Administering Powers concerned.

Election of officers

12. At its 219th meeting, following the opening statement of the Secretary-General, the Special Committee decided to re-elect the following officers who were elected in 1963: Mr. Sori Coulibaly (Mali), Chairman; Mr. Carlos Maria Velázquez (Uruguay), First Vice-Chairman; Mr. Voeunsai Sonn (Cambodia), Second Vice-Chairman; Mr. K. Natwar Singh (India), Rapporteur.

Statement by the Chairman

13. The Chairman thanked the Secretary-General for having opened the meeting of the Special Committee and said that the Secretary-General had always shown great interest in the work of the Committee and the latter could count on his co-operation and understanding.

14. The problem of decolonization was now one of the major tasks of the United Nations and the means required to carry out that task would doubtless be made available to the Committee in accordance with the wish expressed by the General Assembly.

15. In adopting resolution 1514 (XV) and subsequently resolution 1654 (XVI) establishing the Special Committee, the United Nations General Assembly had sought to express its firm determination rapidly to put an end to colonialism in all its manifestations. Nevertheless, three years after the adoption of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, despite the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly at its sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth sessions, despite the recommendations of the Special Committee, despite the debates in the Security Council and despite the struggle, often armed, which had been waged by the subject peoples, many territories were still under foreign domination. The stubborn contempt shown by the colonial Powers for the aspirations and legitimate rights of the colonial peoples and the failure of those Powers to heed United Nations resolutions constituted grave threats to international peace and security.

16. As the Special Committee was not a permanent organ of the United Nations, the process of decolonization must of necessity be accelerated. If the Special Committee was to perform the task entrusted to it by the General Assembly, the colonial Powers would have to reconsider their attitude towards it. The Assembly's resolution 1956 (XVIII) expressly requested the administering Powers to give their full co-operation to the Special Committee and to facilitate the task of its sub-committees and visiting groups. In the majority of cases, both in Territories where an explosive situation existed and in the small, sparsely populated Territories, the Special Committee could help the administering Powers in overcoming many difficulties to the extent that the real and sincere objectives of those Powers was to lead the peoples under their administration to independence. The Special Committee's activities should not be regarded by the colonial Powers as interference by the Committee in what they considered to be their domestic affairs. Under the provisions of the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the international community could not remain indifferent to the tragic fate of millions of people deprived of their inalienable rights. He therefore appealed again to the colonial Powers to co-operate sincerely with the Special Committee, so that the latter might be in a position to submit to the General Assembly at its nineteenth session a complete report, including recommendations regarding the accession to independence of every colonial Territory in conformity with the wishes of the populations concerned. The crises which had occurred recently in certain newly independent States were attributable in certain cases to the existence of unsuitable structures inherited from the former colonialist régime, while in other cases they were the culmination of practical problems created and left unresolved by the former administering Powers. However, just as the older nations had experienced and overcome similar crises, the young States which were currently undergoing them would also succeed in finding ways and means of surmounting them.

17. The exercise of sovereignty was an inalienable right of all peoples, and no conditions should be attached to it. All peoples should enjoy full sovereignty and determine themselves the conditions of their national existence.

18. The struggle against colonialism had become a permanent watchword of all Governments which believed in justice and regarded human dignity as a universal concept. In that respect, the Special Committee was not alone in its endeavours. At the second ordinary session of the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity, which was then meeting in Lagos, the liquidation of colonialism was one of the key items on the agenda. The decisions which would be taken there would no doubt contribute to the speedy achievement of the aims of the Special Committee.

19. Although the pace at which the colonial Territories were attaining independence was very slow, owing to the obstinacy of the colonial Powers, the Committee must not be discouraged, but must on the contrary plan its work so as to press the attack on the last remnants of colonialism and submit to the General Assembly at its nineteenth session a report covering all the Territories mentioned in paragraph 5 of resolution 1514 (XV).

20. He also drew the Committee's attention to General Assembly resolutions 1899 (XVIII) and 1970 (XVIII), which had entrusted new responsibilities to the Committee, and to the statements which had been made at the eighteenth session of the General Assembly during the debate on the 1963 report.

21. He welcomed those representatives who were newcomers to the Committee and expressed the hope that the latter's work would be conducted in an atmosphere of courtesy, mutual understanding and co-operation.

C. ORGANIZATION OF WORK

22. The Special Committee discussed the organization of its work at its 219th to 222nd meetings, at which general statements were made by members.

Statements by members

23. The representative of Cambodia said that in considering how its work should be organized, the Committee should bear in mind resolution 1956 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963, in which the General Assembly requested "the Special Committee to continue to seek the best ways and means for the immediate and total application of the Declaration to all territories which have not yet attained independence", and resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, in which the Assembly, while deciding to dissolve the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, requested "the Special Committee to study this information and take it fully into account in examining the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples in each of the Non-Self-Governing Territories".

24. The working methods and procedures which the Special Committee had adopted in 1962 and which had been approved by the General Assembly in resolutions 1810 (XVII) and 1956 (XVIII) could be followed. In that connexion, however, he wished to remind the Committee that it was agreed that decisions should be reached as far as possible without having recourse to voting, but that the Committee could always decide to resort to a vote if, in a particular case, a representative felt that course to be necessary.

25. The documentation to be submitted by the Secretariat concerning the territories which the Committee planned to consider would contain, not only political and constitutional information, but also—owing to the dissolution of the Committee of Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories—all the other information supplied by the administering Powers under Article 73, paragraph 3, of the Charter.

26. He proposed that the Sub-Committee on Petitions should be kept in being. The question of the freedom of access of all petitioners to United Nations Headquarters would have to be studied with the Secretariat, in the light of the discussion on that subject in the Fourth Committee during the eighteenth session of the General Assembly. On the other hand, the recourse to visiting missions was commendable. The Secretary-General's report on financial implications (A/C.5/999) and the thirty-first report of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (A/5628) had allowed for the possible dispatch in 1964 of a certain number of those visiting missions to Non-Self-Governing Territories. Needless to say, the co-operation of the administering Powers would be necessary for that purpose.

27. The order of priority for consideration of the Territories could be determined, in consultation with the Committee, by a working group similar to the one set up in 1963. The Committee might also establish study groups to consider the smaller Territories. Lastly, the principle that any administering Power which was not a member of the Committee must be invited to take part in the discussion of the Territories for which it was responsible should be generally applied.

28. In 1963 the Committee had completed consideration of twenty-six Territories. It still had to consider thirty-five Territories and to complete consideration of five others. He suggested that they might be grouped as follows: Group A, Territories in Africa and adjacent Territories and Territories in Asia; group B, Caribbean Territories and Western Atlantic Territories; group C, Pacific Territories. The Trust Territories could be considered after the meeting of the Trusteeship Council in June 1964. With regard to the Territories which had been considered in 1963, a preliminary discussion could be held within the context of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly at its eighteenth session, and in the light of the important events which had taken place since then. They could be considered in detail a little later, after the new Territories were taken up. The task of completing the list of Territories with respect to which the Special Committee was competent, as defined in operative paragraph 5 of resolution 1514 (XV), might be entrusted to a working group.

29. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed the hope that the Special Committee would, at the current session, find specific and effective solutions for the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, so that the colonial régimes which still existed in some parts of the world might be speedily and completely liquidated.

30. The national liberation movements had affected all the Territories enslaved by colonialism. As the result of a heroic struggle, more than 50 million human beings had shaken off the yoke of the colonial system since 1960. New States, established on the ruins of former empires, now played an active part in international political life. In a desire to determine their own destinies, they were not content with political independence, but were seeking to achieve economic autonomy. The decisions taken by the United Nations had played, and continued to play, an important role in that process. The Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples provided considerable moral backing for the peoples fighting for independence and freedom; it implied that the United Nations recognized the legitimacy and justice of their struggle and condemned the action of the colonial Powers to suppress it.

31. Over 50 million other human beings were still under the yoke of colonialism. The colonial Powers continued stubbornly to oppose the implementation of the Declaration in Angola, Southern Rhodesia, Mozambique, British Guiana, South West Africa, Aden and a number of other Territories. There were also many other Territories in Africa, Asia, Latin America, and in the Pacific, Atlantic and Indian Oceans, which were still in colonial status. The colonialists flouted the decisions taken by the General Assembly and the Security Council for the application of the Declaration because of their desire to maintain their military, strategic, political and economic interests and to perpetuate their exploitation of the colonial peoples. Colonialism was unwilling to recognize the historical factors which prompted the awakening of the peoples of colonies and semi-colonies, or the naturalness of that process; it was unwilling to abandon—to use the expression of Karl Marx, the founder of scientific communism—its zoological outlook, and contended that nature itself made masters and slaves, exploiters and exploited. Colonialism was unwilling to retire from the arena of history, and therefore resorted to the use of armed forces, bases, and economic and political pressure. When the colonialists were obliged to withdraw from a colony, they sought to keep roots in the country by all possible means, using every kind of device and stratagem—imposing elections whenever, as in British Guiana, it served their purpose, but refusing them when, as in Malta, elections were not to their advantage; creating artificial federations; stirring up tribal wars; encouraging separatist movements; instigating territorial or border disputes; creating problems where none existed; and so forth.

32. If the total liquidation of the colonial system was to be achieved, the United Nations, and all States which truly desired the end of colonialism, must redouble their efforts. The main task of the Special Committee in 1964 must be to devise specific measures to ensure that the Declaration on the granting of independence would be fully and speedily implemented in all colonial territories, without exception, before 1965, which would be International Co-operation Year. To that end the Special Committee should lay down for each Territory precise time-limits, which should be as short as possible, for the liquidation of the colonial régime notwithstanding the argument, which was sure to be advanced by the administering Powers, that the people were “not yet ready” or were “incapable” of governing themselves. Such an argument was daily disproved in the countries which had recently become independent, where the process of staffing every sphere of public and cultural life with indigenous personnel was tens of times more rapid than under colonial rule.

33. The Soviet Government considered that the Committee of Twenty-Four should concentrate primarily on examining the manner in which the colonial Powers had carried out the decisions of the General Assembly and the Security Council regarding the granting of independence to the Portuguese colonies (Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea), Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, British Guiana, Aden and other colonial Territories. The Soviet Union agreed with the Secretary-General that the Committee should give special attention to developments in the colonial Territories since its 1963 session, bearing in mind the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly at its eighteenth session. It should invite the colonial Powers to state unequivocally what specific measures they proposed to take in the immediate future to give effect to United Nations decisions, and in the light of those statements it should consider what functions it had to perform as a result of the abolition of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. The colonial Powers should submit to the Committee, not information regarding individual minor reforms that they intended to carry out in the Territories under their administration, but information on the specific measures which they had taken or proposed to take in the immediate future in order to grant independence to their colonial possessions. It was the Committee's duty to call upon the colonial Powers to submit reports on the implementation of the aforementioned decisions and, where necessary, to dispatch special missions to the Territories in order to verify facts of the situation prevailing there. It should also, if the circumstances warranted, refer to the Security Council, for its consideration, questions relating to non-compliance with United Nations decisions on the granting of independence to particular colonies.

34. He drew the Special Committee's particular attention to the question of Southern Rhodesia. The tense situation existing there constituted a threat to peace in Africa. Scorning the interests of the African population, and despite the appeals of the United Nations and world public opinion, the United Kingdom had transferred to a handful of white racists the armed forces of the former Central African Federation, thus aggravating a situation already fraught with danger. The Special Committee must do all in its power to thwart the machinations of the United Kingdom, which was awaiting the propitious moment to declare Southern Rhodesia independent. In his view, consideration of that Territory should be given priority in the Committee's work.

35. He recalled that at the eighteenth session of the General Assembly it had been suggested that the Committee should postpone consideration of the question of the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence in the case of Territories which were the subject of litigation between certain States. The Soviet Union considered that any delay by the Committee in dealing with those Territories would be exploited by the colonialists, who would find in it a pretext for postponing indefinitely the granting of independence to their peoples.

36. Turning to the problem of small colonial Territories, he noted that the General Assembly had devoted considerable attention to them at its eighteenth session. In the opinion of the Soviet Union, the numerically smaller peoples had as much right to freedom as any others. The principles enunciated in the Declaration must be applied equally to all Territories, including the small colonial possessions scattered about in the Pacific, Atlantic and Indian Oceans and in other regions of the world. It seemed a sound idea, therefore, that the Committee of Twenty-Four should set up sub-committees and send them, in particular, to the small colonial Territories to examine the situation there and to make contacts with the people and their representatives. The membership of the sub-committees should consist of the representatives of countries which had demonstrated their interest in the speedy application of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. It was to be hoped, moreover, that the Committee would receive the full co-operation of the administering Powers, in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1566 (XVIII), in which the Assembly requested the administering Powers “to give their full co-operation to the Special Committee and to facilitate the task of the sub-committees and visiting groups instructed by the Special Committee to go to the territories under its mandate”. It was likewise to be hoped that there would be no repetition of the experience that had brought shame on the colonial Powers in 1963, when members of United Nations bodies duly authorized by the Special Committee had been denied admittance to colonial Territories and treated like criminals, as had been the case with the members of the Subcommittee on Aden.

37. His delegation, like many others, attached great importance to the Committee's mission of studying the problem of foreign monopolies in South West Africa and their possible effects on the development of that Territory. It should be remembered that the international companies operating there were closely linked to similar companies established in other parts of southern Africa and frequently were merely branches of larger monopolistic groups which had their headquarters outside the African continent. It was important, therefore, that the Committee's approach to that study should be as broad as possible in order to evaluate properly the effects of those monopolies on the political, economic and social development of the colonial Territories and on the situation of the indigenous inhabitants.

38. The Special Committee had a great and responsible task to perform in compliance with the decisions and with the terms of reference conferred on it more than a year previously, under which it was to submit to the General Assembly a full report on the implementation of the Declaration in all colonial Territories. The Committee could perform that task only if all its members were fully aware of their responsibilities. The Soviet Union wished to state, for its own part, that its policy fully conformed to the principles and objectives of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples; it was not content to support them in theory but applied them actively. As Mr. Khrushchev has said on 22 December 1963, the peoples fighting for their independence could rely firmly on the support of the Soviet Union.

39. The representative of Syria said that the Committee should consider the situation even in those Territories which it had already dealt with at its two preceding sessions, and particularly the Territory of Aden. If priority could not be given to the question of Aden, it should be considered after that of Southern Rhodesia, for the people of Aden and the people of Yemen were suffering from the existing situation and the atrocities committed by the United Kingdom imperialists.

40. The representative of Yugoslavia said that the struggle of colonial peoples for freedom and independence would always receive the support of the peoples of Yugoslavia. The Special Committee was resuming its work in an atmosphere of relative relaxation of international tension and there was reason to hope that many international problems could be solved more rapidly. Mankind could then turn to the problems of raising the standard of living throughout the world. International peace and security were frequently threatened by the outdated policies of the colonialists. The implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) could, therefore, greatly contribute to the creation of conditions for a lasting peace based on freedom and equality.

41. During the eighteenth session of the General Assembly, two countries, Kenya and Zanzibar, had achieved independence, and it was to be hoped that the Organization would welcome other new Members during the current year. In 1963 the Committee had considered twenty-six Territories and made recommendations concerning them, but in spite of its efforts, thirty-five Territories still remained on the preliminary list of those to be studied.

42. The experience of the past two years showed that the Committee must devote particular attention to its methods of work. In his statement at the preceding meeting, the Secretary-General had pointed out that particular attention must be given to the latest developments in some of the Territories which had already been considered by the Committee and in which the situation had deteriorated. The Chairman of the Committee had emphasized that fact at the same meeting. He had also emphasized that three years after the adoption of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples and in spite of many resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council, no essential progress had been made in applying them in certain cases. The Yugoslav delegation shared those views. It also felt that the Declaration should be applied irrespective of the size or population of a Territory. Furthermore, in some Territories, such as Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, the Territories under Portuguese administration, Aden, British Guiana and others, the situation required the Committee's constant attention. All necessary measures must be taken to prevent the aggravation of any explosive situation which threatened international peace and security. Provision should therefore be made for the possibility of considering those Territories if the need arose.

43. The situation in Southern Rhodesia was particularly tense. According to the latest press reports, there had been an intensification of the repressive measures taken against the leaders of progressive movements, coinciding with the talks held by Mr. Winston Field in London. The white minority might proclaim their own independence at any moment, and it was the responsibility of the administering Power to prevent such an eventuality. The situation in Aden was such that it required renewed consideration as soon as possible in order to recommend new measures for a final solution. Under General Assembly resolution 1949 (XVIII), it was the Committee's duty to act. As to the smaller Territories, they could not be considered individually, owing to their number and the shortage of available time. They might be grouped according to their geographical position. The working group might make proposals on that subject and on the methods for studying the situation in those Territories.

44. The representative of Iraq said that perhaps more than in the two previous years the Special Committee was pressed for time, because the General Assembly had reaffirmed its desire for the Committee to report to it on all the Territories that had not yet achieved their independence. A determined effort was therefore required in the current year to discharge the request of the General Assembly.

45. The Committee had two concrete proposals before it. One, put forward by the Soviet Union representative, was that it should take up as a matter of priority the question of Southern Rhodesia. His delegation supported that proposal because the situation in Southern Rhodesia had reached the danger point and the question of that Territory's independence was now imminent. The other proposal, which had been made by the Syrian representative, was that the Committee should take up the question of Aden after that of Southern Rhodesia. The situation in Aden was fraught with danger; what was more, the General Assembly had requested the Committee, in a specific resolution, to examine the question again in 1964 and to report on it at the Assembly's nineteenth session. The procedure would therefore be to take up Southern Rhodesia first, at the next meeting if possible, and then Aden.

46. The Working Group might meet when the Committee was not in session in order to consider the following matters: the agenda and the programme of work for Territories other than Southern Rhodesia and Aden; the method of work including the possible grouping of Territories or the setting up of sub-committees; and the preparation of a complete list of all Territories coming under the Committee's mandate. The Working Group might consider all aspects of the organization of work, especially in the light of General Assembly resolution 1556 (XVIII), and submit a report to the Committee.

47. The representative of Venezuela recalled that during the first year of its existence the Committee had adopted working methods which had been approved by the General Assembly in resolution 1810 (XVII). Furthermore, since in the same resolution the Assembly had invited the Committee to submit to it a report containing its recommendations on all the Territories mentioned in paragraph 5 of the Declaration on the granting of independence, the Committee had, in 1963, approved a preliminary list of the Territories to which the Declaration applied. In view of the satisfactory results of the methods it had followed during its first session, the Committee had decided to adopt the same methods in 1963. Now, as it began its work for the 1964 session, it had before it three different tasks, which it would have to carry out by different methods.

48. To begin with, the Committee must continue its efforts with regard to the Territories which it had already studied during the last two years and for which it had proposed specific steps to enable the Declaration to be applied rapidly and completely. There was no point in starting another long debate about them; the Committee should rather observe the development of the situation in those Territories, as the General Assembly had specified, and, should the need arise, consider what action was necessary. For that task it need only set up a sub-committee which would observe the situation in those Territories and bring it to the attention of the Committee when that became necessary. It was obvious that that group of Territories did not include those which, by special request of the General Assembly, were to be examined again by the Committee, as in the case of Aden.

49. The Committee's second task was to complete its study of the Territories included on its preliminary list. So far it had studied only twenty-six of them, and among those there were five which had not been given a complete study. The Committee had promised to give priority to those five Territories (A/5446/Rev.1, chapter I, paragraph 48). With regard to the Territories which it had not yet started to study, it had expressed its intention to consider them without delay (Ibid., paragraph 51). For the study of those Territories the Committee would have to revise the methods it had followed hitherto. As had been seen, the difficulties which the Committee had encountered in the cases it had studied so far had arisen, not from the application of resolution 1514 (XV), but from the more or less inflexible attitude of the Administering Powers. In the case of most of the Territories that had been studied, the measures recommended could be based on operative paragraph 5 or 6 of the Declaration, but in the case of others there were special reasons which made it necessary for the Committee to make a special study in order to draw up a satisfactory formula within the framework of the Declaration. Any proposal along those lines would have the support of the Venezuelan delegation.

50. Thirdly, the General Assembly had entrusted the Committee with the functions hitherto performed by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee must do the work requested of it in General Assembly resolution 1700 (XVIII), and for that task the note by the Secretary-General appearing in document A/AC.109/L.97 would appear to be very helpful. The Committee would not have time to study the documentation transmitted to it on the Non-Self-Governing Territories and its best course would be to entrust that task to a small group, which would subsequently report to it on the steps to be taken. Furthermore, under General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) on the question of South West Africa the Committee was requested to consider the implications of the activities of the mining industry and of the other international companies having interests in South West Africa. There again its best course would be to entrust the study of that question to a small group which would subsequently report to the Committee.

51. The representative of Poland said that his country, by virtue of its historical traditions as well as by the very nature of its being a socialist State, was opposed to any form of racial oppression and to colonialism. Poland regarded decolonization as one of the major problems of the day, together with that of disarmament and that of economic development. Colonialism was indeed retrograde and was a source of tension and conflict. The situation prevailing in the colonial world, in particular in the southern part of the African continent, confirmed the wisdom of resolution 1514 (XV) and of the subsequent General Assembly resolutions to the effect that the perpetuation of colonial domination was an ever-growing danger to international peace and co-operation. As could be seen from the joint programme proclaimed at Addis Ababa in May 1963 by the Heads of African States, the situation was fraught with real danger, for in the modern world peace was indivisible. That was why Poland was so vitally interested in the speedy liquidation of colonialism. The Declaration on the granting of independence had strengthened the fight of the peoples against colonialism. During the three years that had elapsed since its adoption, many countries had attained independence and had been admitted to the United Nations. Nevertheless the results attained were but partial results. There were still colonies in Africa, Asia, the Western Atlantic, the Pacific Ocean and the Indian Ocean. As was stated in resolution 1556 (XVIII), in some cases not even preliminary measures had been taken towards the application of the Declaration.

52. The principal cause of that slow progress in decolonization was the negative attitude of the colonial Powers, which was not justified either on moral or on legal grounds. The process of national liberation had ceased to be an internal concern of the colonial Powers, and had become a great international problem. The administering Powers were in duty bound to fulfil the obligations that they had assumed under the Charter and which had been reaffirmed in numerous resolutions. Moreover, in granting independence to the colonial countries the administering Powers would bring full freedom to their own peoples, for no one who continued to subjugate others could be truly free. The Polish people regarded the liberation of colonial peoples as an act of justice, whatever might be the political and economic system chosen by the newly independent States. It could not agree with any argument in favour of postponing the independence of those peoples, in particular the claim that the dependent peoples were not yet ready for independence. Its attitude was in keeping with the provisions of paragraph 3 of resolution 1514 (XV). The argument that some peoples were not ready for independence was refuted by the fact that former colonial peoples were now participating in many international activities, in the United Nations and elsewhere. Only independence could release all the creative forces of nations. It was certain that the efforts of the colonial Powers to impede the process of decolonization would fail, but that did not make the tasks to be performed by the Committee any less important.

53. During its 1964 session the Committee should adopt firm decisions outlining concrete measures designed to accelerate the implementation of the Declaration. The Polish delegation would give priority to the following steps among those to be taken by the Administering Powers: immediate cessation of all military activities and repression directed against dependent peoples struggling for freedom and independence; amnesty for all political prisoners; the granting to the colonial peoples of all democratic rights and freedoms, including the right to vote according to the principle of "one man, one vote"; the holding of free general elections for the purpose of setting up representative governmental bodies and the transfer of all powers to those democratically elected institutions. It must be borne in mind that the Declaration envisaged the immediate transfer of powers to the peoples of all the Territories mentioned in paragraph 5. The time had come to fix dates for the granting of independence, in consultation with the peoples concerned and, where possible, with the Administering Powers. The twentieth anniversary of the establishment of the United Nations should be commemorated by the final liquidation of colonialism.

54. It was essential for the Committee to find effective means for the implementation of the recommendations, which had been approved by the General Assembly, regarding the territories it had examined in 1962 and 1963. Many of those recommendations, which referred to important and urgent colonial problems, had not been put into effect. The Committee should have recourse to the Security Council in all cases of persistent non-implementation of General Assembly resolutions on the part of the Administering Powers, for that attitude of non-compliance threatened international peace and security.

55. The Polish delegation unreservedly endorsed the Secretary-General's observation that, in the light of the resolutions adopted by the Assembly at its eighteenth session, the Committee should give special attention to recent developments in the Territories which it had considered in 1963 (A/AC.109/SR.219). The Committee should give priority to the Territories whose situation called for urgent examination; it should study first Southern Rhodesia, then Aden and subsequently British Guiana, South West Africa and the Territories under Portuguese administration. It could then turn its attention to the Territories which it had not yet studied. It should also carry out the task entrusted to it in connexion with the activities of foreign mining countries and other international monopolies, which were powerful tools of the colonialist system.

56. In view of its heavy agenda the Committee might think it advisable to set up sub-committees to deal with certain Territories or groups of Territories. The information furnished by the Administering Powers was often one-sided and out of date. The Committee itself should therefore obtain information on the implementation of the Declaration and the methods of work followed during the past two years should be completely applied. The Committee's greatest concern should be to ascertain the wishes of the indigenous peoples. For that purpose it should make direct contact with petitioners, local leaders and so forth and dispatch visiting missions to the Territories concerned. General Assembly resolution 1956 (XVIII) expressly requested the Administering Powers to facilitate the task of the sub-committees and visiting groups set up by the Special Committee. It was to be hoped that they would respond to that appeal and reconsider their attitude towards the Committee.

57. The representative of Ethiopia recalled that the General Assembly's request, in resolution 1956 (XVIII), that the Special Committee should report to the nineteenth session, meant that the Committee should work hard and formulate immediate recommendations for the attainment of independence by each of the Territories it considered. The twentieth anniversary of the establishment of the United Nations, which was not far off, should provide an opportunity for all Members to consider to what extent the Charter has been put into effect so far. Under the Charter, the Members of the United Nations which had assumed responsibilities for the administration of Territories whose peoples had not yet attained a full measure of self-government were bound to recognize the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of those Territories were paramount and had accepted a sacred trust where they were concerned.

58. Since the end of the eighteenth session of the General Assembly grave developments had occurred in certain African colonial Territories; the situation in Southern Rhodesia, for example, had deteriorated in recent weeks. It had now reached an extremely critical point and the Committee should therefore begin immediately to examine it. While recognizing that Southern Rhodesia and Aden should be the first Territories to be considered, his delegation felt that the situation in Angola, Mozambique, South West Africa, Portuguese Guinea, the so-called High Commission Territories, Malta, British Guiana, Gambia and other colonies should be studied without delay.

59. The representative of the United States of America said that in his delegation's view the work of the Special Committee was very important. He agreed with the statement by the representative of Iran in the General Assembly in 1961 (1071st meeting, para. 93) that the United Nations should tirelessly pursue its ideal of a world in which no people would be ruled by any other. In a speech in the United States Senate on 2 July 1957, the late John F. Kennedy, then a Senator, had said that the most important single force in the world was neither communism nor capitalism, neither the H-Bomb nor guided missiles; it was man's desire to be free. The most important test of American foreign policy was what the United States did to further man's desire to be free. The United States Government subscribed to those great principles. Its foreign policy was directed towards helping to end colonialism by enabling dependent peoples to choose for themselves, freely and by democratic processes, the type of government they wished to run their affairs.

60. That was the essence of the Committee's task: to help to find ways and means of expediting the attainment of self-determination by the peoples still under colonial rule. That would be achieved, not merely by debates but by making practical recommendations that would command the respect of the peoples of the Territories concerned, of the Administering Powers and of the General Assembly. As President Johnson had said in addressing the last session of the General Assembly (1284th meeting), there was need for a peaceful revolution in the world through the recommitment of all Member States to the basic principles of human welfare and human dignity.

61. Every effort should be made to establish effective communication between those who sought self-determination and those who resisted. The Committee should seek the co-operation of the Administering Powers, and it was to be expected that such co-operation would be obtained. Most of the Administering Powers were working in good faith to carry out their responsibilities under the Charter. For example, they reported annually on the administration of their Territories with regard to social and economic development and in many cases voluntarily submitted information on political development.

62. The United States delegation considered that the question of setting up sub-committees to examine the affairs of Territories within designated regions should be given more thorough study. It was not convinced that such a procedure would accelerate the Committee's work. Moreover, it wondered whether that type of procedure fell within the concept of the General Assembly in establishing the Committee. It was inclined to think that Territories which were within the Committee's jurisdiction, particularly those about which little was known, should be considered by the whole Committee. Up to the present the General Assembly had approved the Committee's report without much discussion, the confidence thus shown in the Committee was based on its representative character. It was therefore doubtful whether the bulk of the work should be done by sub-committees and merely reviewed by the Committee as a whole. He did not suggest that sub-committees should not be set up to deal with important procedural questions, as was done by the Working Group and the Sub-Committee on Petitions. As for visiting groups, they could be valuable tools but they could do little without the co-operation of the Administering Power. If the Administering Power refused to accept a visiting group, his delegation would not support the idea of sending such a group.

63. One of the most important questions that would come before the Committee was the largely unexplored constitutional area which lay between sovereign independence and colonial dependency, namely the very small dependencies which were remnants of the colonial period. It would be for their inhabitants to choose what type of self-determination they wanted and the Committee should not decide their range of selection in advance. Association with another State might bring the blessings normally associated with independence and in addition an economic viability which might not otherwise be obtainable. The achievement of classical independence might not be practicable in a number of the cases which fell within the Committee's jurisdiction. That possibility was recognized in General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV), which stated that a Non-Self-Governing Territory could be said to have reached a full measure of self-government by emergence as a sovereign independent State, free association with an independent State or integration with an independent State. Some of the former Territories of Africa had selected integration rather than independence. As the representative of Chile had said at the eighteenth session of the General Assembly (1267th meeting), those peoples should be given not liberty to live in poverty and uncertainty in a world of super-States but true freedom based on progress and the dignity of man.

64. The representative of Iran noted with satisfaction that the chief concern of all members of the Special Committee was to make the best possible use of the relatively short time available in which to carry out a very heavy agenda. The application of the rapid and effective procedure suggested by the representative of Cambodia and a stricter organization of meetings might enable the Committee during its current session to examine the Territories on the list drawn up in 1963. Thus it would be able to submit to the next session of the General Assembly a comprehensive report on the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV) to the Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories.

65. The preliminary list drawn up in 1963 had enumerated sixty-four Territories to which the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples was applicable. Since that list had been drawn up Kenya and Zanzibar had achieved independence and the Committee had examined the situation in twenty-six Territories, most of them in Africa, with a total population of some 37 million. Most of the thirty-five remaining Territories were small Territories or small islands scattered about the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, whose total population did not exceed 10 million. The implementation of resolution 1514 (XV) where those small Territories were concerned should be given special attention by the Committee, as had been pointed out by the delegations of Ceylon and Chile in the General Assembly. In the opinion of the Iranian delegation the Working Group should examine that problem and submit suggestions on the subject. The situation in those Territories could be examined by a number of sub-committees each of which would concern itself with one group of Territories and would report to the Committee, or alternatively the Committee itself could proceed directly to the examination of groups of Territories on the basis of geographical areas. He endorsed the suggestion by the representative of Cambodia that those Territories should be classified into three groups corresponding to the classification already established by the Committee.

66. Since it was in the African Territories that the most difficult colonial problems arose, the Committee should carefully and continually watch the evolution of the situation there and take suitable measures whenever new events so required. That continuing watch over the situation could be entrusted either to the Working Group or to a sub-committee specially established for that purpose. In regard to South West Africa, the Committee had been requested, under resolution 1899 (XVIII), to consider, in co-operation with the Secretary-General and the agencies of the United Nations, the implications of the activities of the mining industry and of the other international companies having interests in South West Africa, in order to assess their economic and political influence and their mode of operation. The Iranian delegation suggested that the Secretary-General should be invited forthwith to prepare, with the aid of all the resources available to him, as complete as possible a report on that subject, which the Committee could use as a basic document.

67. As to the way in which the Committee should fulfil the new functions devolving upon it as a result of the dissolution of the Committee on Information, the Iranian delegation supported the suggestion made by the Secretary-General in paragraph 8 of his note (A/AC.109/L.97).

68. He hoped that the Administering Powers would modify their attitude with regard to the Committee, and that they would help it to discharge its task by letting visiting groups go to the colonial Territories under those Powers' administration and by conforming with the relevant General Assembly resolutions, especially resolution 1956 (XVIII). The Iranian delegation also thought that priority should be given to the question of Southern Rhodesia and to that of Aden.

69. The representative of Australia speaking as a representative both of an Administering Power and of a Member State, hoped that no differences of view would arise in the Special Committee primarily because of the fact that some of its members were Administering Powers and the others were not. The obligations and objectives laid down by the Charter were the outcome of many countries' work, and Australia, for instance, had helped to work out the Charter provisions designed to secure complete independence for the countries which at that time had been dependent. It was ready to co-operate, at the current new session, with the other members of the Committee for the attainment of the Charter objectives common to all Members.

70. The Committee's responsibility was a heavy one, since through its voice it was the voice of the United Nations itself which reached the population of the Territories under the Committee's mandate. In discharging its task, the Committee should not forget that it was those populations themselves which should make their voice heard for the purpose of determining their own future. While it was not for the Committee to decide the fate of those peoples, it could greatly influence their choice of a form of government or political association. They were not necessarily bound to adopt the form of democracy which to the members of the Committee might seem the best. The Australian delegation did not consider that the United Nations was entitled to compel a people to adopt a given form of government if that people did not wish to do so.

71. Given both the ethnic and the geographic diversity of the populations which were still dependent, it seemed to the Australian delegation that the problems of each of those peoples should be approached in a different way, according to the people concerned. Account should be taken of their varying historical pasts. It must be realized that Africa was not Asia, that Asia was not the Pacific, that each people in those areas was simply itself and that each group of persons having its own history and its own problems must evolve its own solutions. Accordingly, it was the Committee's duty to ensure that the solutions contemplated corresponded to the particular circumstances of each group of population concerned; it would therefore need to take as a basis the information previously supplied to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. That information was valuable since it had bearing, not only on the political aspects of development, but on the economic and social spheres by which political independence was governed. The Soviet Union representative had observed that it was important for the colonial territories to accede to economic as well as to political independence. Progress towards independence should certainly be based so far as possible on economic and social progress, without, however, the latter becoming a determining factor. The Trusteeship Council would also constitute, for the Committee, an important source of information. But whereas the Trusteeship Council had over the years adopted detailed resolutions, the Committee could avoid that procedure and expedite its work by registering, as often as possible, consensuses of opinion.

72. With regard to the smaller Territories, he thought it would be well to study them by groups, as that might facilitate objective consideration. It would be unrealistic not to recognize that many such Territories had problems peculiar to them, deriving, for example from a Territory's small size, its position and the small numbers of its population. It must be conceded that certain functions could not be discharged by small national groups, whereas with larger groups it might be otherwise. Thus in the case of Gambia the maximum degree of independence could be attained only if there were some degree of interdependence. In that eventuality, every restriction on absolute independence likewise involved restriction of the independence of the other Territory or Territories concerned, for there could be no association without the abandonment of certain rights by all the groups which had opted for that formula.

73. It was therefore difficult to define what true independence was, and to determine the moment at which the desired self-government was secured. The Committee would probably have to define the way in which the self-determination of peoples could be expressed. The Australian delegation thought it could best be expressed through a parliament elected by universal adult suffrage. Given all those difficulties, he considered that the Committee should never forget that there could be no uniform solution for the very varied problems presented by the smaller Territories.

74. As for the basic question of relations between races in the Territories administered by his country, he pointed out that, in those Territories, Australia had eliminated every form of racial discrimination. In Papua and New Guinea, the populations of all races worked together, and in equal freedom, to frame the common destiny of the country which they regarded as their motherland. In the political sphere, they were in process of electing, with no distinction of race, creed or colour and on the basis of a single electoral list, a parliament in which the majority would be an indigenous one. That showed that the administering Power had constantly concerned itself with the populations as human beings and not as members of a given race. Australia thought that that was the angle from which the Committee should work.

75. The representative of Italy said that, because of the short time available to the Special Committee, it was to be feared that the latter would be unable to examine in detail all the Territories under its mandate. It should however make as complete an inventory as possible of the current problems of decolonization, in order that the General Assembly should have, at its nineteenth session, the necessary information enabling it to decide on a further course of action towards the application of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples.

76. The first problem before the Committee was to establish a list of priorities; it should decide whether to deal first of all with the Territories which had never been considered, or whether it would be better to deal with important problems which had already been examined by the General Assembly and the Special Committee but had not yet been solved and constituted serious obstacles to complete decolonization. The report of the Special Committee to the General Assembly had emphasized that the Territories still to be examined would have priority in 1964. In the Italian delegation's view, the Committee should, while beginning the consideration of new Territories, deal with those examined at previous sessions and follow their political and constitutional evolution.

77. As for the procedure to be adopted during the session, it might be well to study all the Territories in plenary meeting, as had been done at the first two sessions. However, given the special nature of the Territories that remained to be examined, there might be a certain value in the establishment of sub-committees. It might for example be decided to regard as small Territories those whose population was less than 500,000 and to entrust their consideration to sub-committees, while larger and more populated Territories would be studied directly in plenary meeting. The sub-committees would have the task of making a preliminary study of the situation in a group of territories and would submit a report to the Committee. Each sub-committee should be asked to study a group of Territories which belonged to a given geographical region, in which similar political and economic conditions prevailed, and which, perhaps, were administered by the same Power. Each sub-committee would be given a specific time-limit in which to complete its task and report to the Committee. He thought that, if the method of work he proposed were followed, the Committee could finish its business before the next session of the General Assembly.

78. The representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland said that it had been customary in the past for the United Kingdom delegation to make a general statement on its colonial policy at the outset of its work. He did not believe that it was necessary or appropriate for him to do so in any detail at the current session, particularly as the basic features of United Kingdom policies, both towards the Special Committee and towards the British Territories remained the same. Nevertheless, in view of the somewhat distorted picture painted by the representative of the Soviet Union at the previous meeting, he would like to recall one or two salient features. In the first place, the policy of the United Kingdom Government rested squarely on Article 73 of the Charter. Although that Article was no longer quoted or referred to as often as in former years, it remained fundamental to any consideration of colonial questions by the Organization. Subsequent resolutions of the General Assembly including resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1541 (XV), significant though these were, could not supersede it or diminish its effect.

79. The two main points which emerged from Article 73, and which were the basis of his Government's policy were, first, that the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were paramount, and secondly that the responsibility for their political, economic, social and educational advancement was that of the Administering Power concerned. That was a grave responsibility and one which was fully accepted by his Government; but it was a responsibility towards the people of the Territories concerned and not towards some other country or group of countries.

80. Thus the United Kingdom Government accepted, as a sacred trust, the obligation to promote to the utmost the well-being of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. But the process of bringing Territories to self-government, and the speed at which that could be achieved, varied with factors such as their size and geographical position, their natural resources and stage of economic development. Those factors were crucial and it served no useful purpose to pretend that they did not exist or that reference to them constituted an attempt to raise obstacles to independence. It was such factors as those that had determined that Ceylon should become independent before Malaya, Malaya before Nigeria and so on. Those formerly dependent Territories had attained independence before resolution 1514 (XV) had been passed; others had done so since, and would continue to do so.

81. In his statement at the previous meeting, the representative of the Soviet Union had noted that some 50 million of the 100 million people under colonial rule at the time of the adoption of the Declaration in 1960 had now achieved their independence. He thanked the representative of the Soviet Union for his unexpected tribute to the success of British colonial policy, for he was sure that it would not have escaped his notice that most of the Territories which had achieved independence since the adoption of the Declaration had been British ones.

82. There was nothing surprising in the fact that the process of advancement to self-government and independence was a gradual one. In view of the responsibilities embodied in the Charter it could not be otherwise. The United Kingdom Government had no interest in retaining those responsibilities for longer than was necessary. But, on the other hand, it would not be rushed into taking hasty decisions which would be harmful to the interests of the peoples concerned.

83. The representative of the Soviet Union had once again stated that preparations for independence were unnecessary. The Soviet representative liked to have it both ways. If a Territory was not yet independent, he attacked measures taken by the administering Powers to train indigenous personnel for administrative posts and to promote economic development as means designed to delay their independence; on the other hand, after a Territory had become independent, he attacked the continued presence of expatriate officers and the provision of economic and technical assistance as neo-colonialism.

84. The representative of the Soviet Union had noted that suggestions had been made in the General Assembly that the Committee might postpone discussion of Territories in dispute between individual countries and had rejected this because, he said, the interests of the indigenous inhabitants might suffer. While agreeing with him that the interests of the indigenous inhabitants must be paramount, the United Kingdom delegation also believed that, in the case of some Territories, those interests might be better served if discussion of the Territory in question was, in fact, postponed. He would also like to remind the representative of the Soviet Union that the course he proposed might, in certain instances, prove to be rather embarrassing to the Soviet Union, as in the case of the island Territories in the Pacific, acquired by the Soviet Union after the last war.

85. His delegation was rather surprised that the representative of the Soviet Union should have raised the question of what he described as "unequal and devious treaties" and would like to reply to him with a quotation:

"In raising questions of this kind, do you intend to raise all the questions of unequal treaties and have a general statement? Has it even entered your heads what the consequences would be? Can you seriously believe that this will do any good?"

That quotation, which the Soviet representative no doubt recognized, was from the newspaper People's Daily published in Peking on 8 March 1963, and referred to certain treaties under which China was forced to cede vast areas to Russia. The representative of Yugoslavia, in his statement, had recalled that his country had fought for centuries for its freedom and independence against the domination of more powerful neighbours; and it was salutary to be reminded that imperial rule had not been confined to domination over the seas, but could be extended over land as well.

86. With regard to the question of methods and procedures, and the organization of the Committee's work, his delegation considered that the methods and procedures followed by the Committee in previous years had, in general, proved satisfactory, and that the Committee should not lightly consider changing methods which had been tested and found to be suited to needs of the Committee. He recalled that the Committee had originally agreed that it should endeavour to conduct its work in such a way that it would be able to reach agreement without the need for voting.

87. On the question of petitions and the hearing of petitioners, his delegation wished to reaffirm its objection in principle to such procedures, which it believed were only applicable to petitions and petitioners from Trust Territories. However, he did not wish to repeat that reservation in regard to each request for a hearing, and would like the present statement to be taken as covering any requests which would be considered in the course of the Committee's work in 1964.

88. With regard to the way in which the Committee should tackle its task in 1964, including the order of priority for the various Territories on the list, his delegation understood from the course of preliminary discussions with various members of the Committee, before the formal meetings began, that there was a general desire, reflecting to a large extent the views expressed in the General Assembly, to take up new Territories, particularly those in the Caribbean and Pacific areas, which had not previously been considered by the Committee; and that after the Committee had disposed of those Territories, it might then review developments in those Territories which it had already considered in 1963. As there was a considerable body of feeling in the Committee which would prefer to break new ground rather than retrace old paths, he thought it would be of great assistance to the Committee if, before taking any decision on the order of priority, it requested the Working Group to consider the whole list of Territories and make recommendations.

89. However, to judge from the views that had been expressed at the previous meeting, a number of delegations had already reached rather different conclusions about the order of priority. The representative of the Soviet Union had proposed that, before taking up any of the new Territories, the Committee should review developments in all the Territories previously considered by the Committee, and had mentioned a number of them by name, including Southern Rhodesia. The United Kingdom delegation had to state frankly that it did not consider that to be a profitable course for the Committee to follow or one that would allow it to make significant progress with its work. In particular, it did not see any reason to accept the suggestion that the situation in Southern Rhodesia required the Committee's urgent attention. There had been no change in the position over the constitutional future of Southern Rhodesia which would warrant such urgent attention; the question remained a matter for negotiation between the United Kingdom and Southern Rhodesian Governments; and no decisions on that had been taken by his Government. Needless to say, his delegation's position on the competence of the Committee to discuss Southern Rhodesia, which was well known to members of the Committee, remained unchanged from previous years.

90. In any case, he would have thought that it was quite sufficient for the present for a decision to be taken on the first Territory to be discussed, and that that would give time to the Working Group to make recommendations about the second and subsequent items, after due consideration of the various factors involved. However, a proposal had been made at the previous meeting in a cursory fashion by the representative of Syria, that the Committee should also, and without delay, decide that the second Territory to be discussed should be Aden.

91. The situation in Aden was quiet; all but three of the persons detained after the bomb incident had been released; and the person accused of throwing the bomb had been formally charged and was in custody awaiting trial. Daily life in Aden was proceeding normally; local political parties and trade union movements were functioning freely.

92. His delegation wished to co-operate with the Committee. That was why they had agreed to serve on the Committee, to provide it with information on the basic political structure and on the recent constitutional developments in the British Territories. His delegation had taken careful note of the views and suggestions which had been put forward by members of the Committee, and had co-operated in various other ways; for example, his Government had on two occasions received sub-committees of the Committee in London at the highest level, and Mr. Amachree, the Under-Secretary of the Department of Trusteeship and Non-Self-Governing Territories had recently visited a number of British Territories in Africa at the invitation of the British Government.

93. His delegation had made it clear from the outset that they extended that co-operation in the confidence that they would find ready understanding of what they were hoping to achieve in the British Territories, and a general recognition of what they had already done. Unfortunately, that confidence had not been reciprocated in the past by all members of the Committee. If the Committee had no confidence whatsoever in the bona fides of any of the administering Powers, and if it was dedicated to the proposition that all colonial rule, irrespective of the administering Power or of the Territory concerned, was based on violence, injustice and exploitation, then clearly the prospects of fruitful co-operation between the administering Powers and the other members of the Committee were not good.

94. The views of the Committee, and particularly those of its Chairman, were carefully considered by the United Kingdom Government, and he felt bound to say that some of the statements that had been made so far at that session were not likely to commend themselves to his Government. Nevertheless, his delegation would continue to co-operate with the Committee, on the same basis as before, and as a full, equal and voluntary member of it. The objective of his delegation, and that of most members of the Committee, was the promotion of the interests of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and members should work together with that consideration always uppermost in their mind.

95. The representative of Tunisia said that the Special Committee should evaluate the application of its previous work and take a new approach to its activities in the light of General Assembly resolutions 1956 (XVIII) and 1970 (XVIII). Although he recognized that visiting missions were an extremely useful means of learning more about the situation in the various Territories, they should not be brought into being, even though the necessary funds were available, unless the circumstances so required. Recalling that some visiting missions had in the past been unable to fulfil their purpose because of the attitude of the administering Powers, he expressed the hope that those Powers would be able to overcome their reluctance and would heed the appeals that had been addressed to them by the General Assembly at its eighteenth session. He referred in particular to resolution 1956 (XVIII) in which the administering Powers had been requested to facilitate the task of the Sub-Committees and visiting groups instructed by the Special Committee to go to the Territories under its mandate. If organized with the assistance of the administering Powers, visits of that kind could not constitute interference in the internal affairs of those Powers. Furthermore, in order to be nearer to the petitioners and spare them travel which was costly and which sometimes involved risks, the Committee might give thought to holding its final session away from Headquarters. The time and place of that session should be decided on fairly far in advance so that those who might be able to provide the Committee with information and facilitate its task could do so.

96. It was important that the Committee should be able in 1964 to deal with all the Territories coming within the scope of resolution 1514 (XV). The Working Group should therefore draw up as complete a list of those Territories as possible without delay, and in so doing should take into account its previous work, the information furnished by the administering Powers and the petitions received by the Secretariat. In order to save time for the Committee, the Working Group might examine all the small Territories and report to the Committee on its recommendations and conclusions. The administering Powers and any other delegation which for special reasons might be interested in that work should, of course, be invited either to become part of the Working Group or to apprise the Group of its views.

97. With regard to the Territories which the Committee had considered in 1963, it was important to determine to what extent the resolutions, whether passed by the General Assembly or the Security Council, had been complied with and whether the process of their liberation was making satisfactory progress. Priorities would have to be established in the light of the General Assembly resolutions and the happenings in the Territories in question.

98. He was in favour of immediate attention being given to the situation in Southern Rhodesia and Aden and in any other Territory where events were running counter to the implementation of the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV).

99. The representative of Tanganyika congratulated the Chairman on his opening statement and assured him that Tanganyika would relentlessly pursue its efforts for the abolition of colonialism and racialism. Unambiguous statements, such as those which had been made by the representative of the Soviet Union and certain other representatives, gave new hope to the millions of persons whom the colonialists continued to terrorize in Southern Rhodesia, Angola, Mozambique, Portuguese Guinea, South West Africa and elsewhere. He hoped that before the end of 1964 the colonial Powers would match their words with deeds by abolishing the shameful colonial system.

100. He felt that the Special Committee should give priority to its consideration of the questions of Southern Rhodesia and Aden. The Working Group could in the meantime establish priorities for the consideration of the other Territories. With regard to South West Africa, it must be plain to everybody that the racist Government of South Africa was increasing its repression and exploitation of the indigenous population.

101. The representative of Syria said that the colonial Powers were trying to postpone the inevitable demise of colonialism by aggravating the situation in the dependent Territories. Since the adoption of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), some progress had been made but the majority of the colonial Territories had still not attained their goal of independence. His delegation supported the idea of establishing sub-committees and sending visiting missions to the Territories concerned. It could agree with the United States delegation that visiting missions should be sent only if the agreement of the administering Power was obtained. Opposition by the administering Power would be contrary to the provisions of the Charter and should not prevent the Special Committee from fulfilling its mandate. If necessary, petitioners from the Territories could be heard in neighbouring countries.

102. The arguments put forward by the United Kingdom representative at the preceding meeting were unconvincing. The proposal that the Territory of Aden should be discussed after Southern Rhodesia was not the idea of the Syrian delegation alone but had been supported by the majority of delegations in the Committee. The United Kingdom delegation had not given any valid reasons to support its opposition to the discussion of Aden. It seemed that the conscience of the United Kingdom Government was not clear on that score. The General Assembly had given the Committee a definite mandate to discuss Aden; moreover, the Territory had been discussed at the eighteenth session of the General Assembly. The continued existence in Aden of an unconstitutional régime preventing free expression and the attainment of independence was a matter which called for consideration by the Committee. The United Kingdom could not hope by its attitude to alter the ethnic composition of the population of Aden. That Territory was an integral part of Yemen, from which it had been separated by unequal treaties.

103. The representative of Mali said that while the Special Committee had made a notable contribution to the process of decolonization, many tasks still awaited it. In tackling those tasks, the Committee should follow a flexible procedure suited to the changing methods and forms adopted by colonialism. His delegation supported the remarks made by the Cambodian representative on the organization of work. A complete list should be made of all the dependent Territories, divided into geographical groups, and the Committee should give priority to the Territories it had not yet considered. The situation in the other Territories could be kept under review by sub-committees and brought to the attention of the Committee if necessary.

104. His delegation supported the idea of appointing study groups to consider Territories in different geographical areas, provided that the groups were open to all members of the Committee who wished to participate in their work. Whenever possible, the groups should work in the Territories concerned or in neighbouring countries, with the agreement of the Governments of the countries concerned. The success of previous visits to the Territories and the difficulties encountered by petitioners who wanted to come to New York showed the desirability of such visits. In that connexion, it was essential to have the full co-operation of the administering Powers. Petitioners who were able to come to New York should be heard and questioned by the Committee and then put into contact with the study groups dealing with their Territories. The recommendations of the study groups would be analysed at plenary meetings of the Committee, at which proposals would be drawn up for submission to the General Assembly.

105. The representative of Sierra Leone noted that in the past the response of some of the administering Powers to the spirit and letter of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) had been disappointing. He appealed for co-operation during the present session of the Special Committee. The conscience of mankind was offended by the spectacle of the conditions prevailing in the Territories which were not yet independent, and the situation in Southern Rhodesia, in particular, was a travesty of democracy. Full and complete independence should be granted to all the Territories.

Decisions

106. At the 220th meeting, the Special Committee decided that the Working Group, composed of the officers of the Special Committee (Mali, Uruguay, Cambodia and India) and the representatives of Bulgaria, Iraq, Italy and Sierra Leone, established in 1963 (A/5446/Rev.1, chapter I, paragraph 25) should be continued in 1964 with the same membership.

107. At the same meeting, the Special Committee decided that the Sub-Committee on Petitions established in 1962 and continued in 1963 should be further continued in 1964 with the same membership, namely Australia, Ethiopia, India, Madagascar, Poland, Tunisia and Venezuela.

111. On the recommendation of the Working Group the Special Committee also decided to entrust to Sub-Committee I the task of considering, in co-operation with the Secretary-General and the agencies of the United Nations, the implications of the activities of the mining industry and the other international companies having interests in South West Africa, in order to assess their economic and political influence and their mode of operation, and of reporting to the Special Committee. This study was requested by the General Assembly in paragraph 8 of its resolution 1899 (XVIII).

128. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of the above Territories and its conclusions and recommendations thereon are given in chapters III to XX and XXIII to XXV of this report.

129. Nyasaland was not considered by the Special Committee since it acceded to independence as Malawi on 6 July 1964.<sup>9</sup>

130. Because of lack of time, Sub-Committee II was unable to consider two of the sixteen Territories referred to it. Statements concerning these two Territories, namely Brunei and Hong Kong, made in the Special Committee, are given in chapters XXI and XXII respectively.

131. Of the sixteen Territories referred to Sub-Committee III one, namely British Honduras, was not considered by it because of lack of time. Information on this Territory is contained in chapter XXVI.

F. CONSIDERATION OF OTHER QUESTIONS

132. The General Assembly, in paragraph 8 of its resolution 1899 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963, requested the Special Committee to consider, in co-operation with the Secretary-General and the agencies of the United Nations, the implications of the activities of the mining industry and the other international companies having interests in South West Africa, in order to assess their economic and political influence and their mode of operation, and to report on these questions to the General Assembly at its nineteenth session.

133. The Special Committee, at its 234th meeting on 25 March 1964, decided to request Sub-Committee I to consider this question and to report to it.

134. After considering the report of Sub-Committee I, the Special Committee, at its 306th meeting on 10 November 1964, adopted its report on this question to the General Assembly. This report has been submitted to the General Assembly in a separate document (A/5840).

135. The Special Committee, in its resolution on Territories under Portuguese administration (A/AC.109/90) adopted on 3 July 1964, requested Sub-Committee I of the Special Committee, with the assistance of the Secretary-General, to study the activities of foreign economic and other interests, which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence in the Territories under Portuguese administration. The Special Committee expects to complete this study in 1965.<sup>10</sup>

136. The General Assembly, by resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, decided to dissolve the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and entrusted its functions to the Special Committee. In this connexion, the Special Committee considered an item on Information on Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of this item are contained in chapter II of this report.

List of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable

137. The Special Committee, in its report to the General Assembly at its eighteenth session, drew the Assembly's attention to a preliminary list which it had prepared, of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable. At the same time the Assembly was informed that, because of lack of time, it was unable to consider the list of "all other Territories which have not yet attained independence" and that the question would be considered during 1964.<sup>11</sup>

138. The Working Group of the Special Committee devoted a number of meetings to the consideration of this question. It was, however, not able to make recommendations on specific Territories to be included in the list.

139. In its fourteenth report,<sup>12</sup> the Working Group informed the Special Committee of its consideration of this question and recommended that the Special Committee take due note of the following two documents:

(1) Letter dated 12 November 1964 from the Permanent Representative of Somalia, requesting the Special Committee to include the question of French Somaliland on the agenda of its current session (A/AC.109/107);

(2) Declaration adopted by the Conference of Non-Aligned Countries which has been circulated as a document of the General Assembly (A/5763).

140. In the same report the Working Group also informed the Special Committee that it had decided to continue consideration of the question and to report to the Special Committee.

141. The fourteenth report of the Working Group was considered by the Special Committee at its 317th meeting. After discussion, the Special Committee approved the report as a whole by a roll-call vote of 15 to 3 (United Kingdom, United States and Australia) with 6 abstentions (Chile, Denmark, Iran, Italy, Madagascar and Venezuela).<sup>13</sup>

142. The Special Committee, in approving the report, took due note of the two documents referred to above and agreed to the Working Group continuing consideration of the question of preparing the list of "all other territories which have not yet attained independence".

G. RELATIONS WITH OTHER UNITED NATIONS BODIES

The Security Council

143. The General Assembly, in its resolution 1956 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963, invited the Special Committee to apprise the Security Council of any developments in any Territory examined by it which may threaten international peace and security.

(a) Southern Rhodesia

144. By operative paragraph 9 of its resolution of 23 March 1964 (A/AC.109/61) the Special Committee drew "the immediate attention of the Security Council to the explosive situation in Southern Rhodesia, which constitutes a serious threat to international peace and security". The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 26 March 1964 (S/5626).

145. By operative paragraph 4 of its resolution of 26 June 1964 (A/AC.109/83 and Corr.1), the Special Committee drew "the immediate attention of the Security Council to the report submitted by the Sub-Committee on 17 June 1964 and particularly to the conclusions and recommendations contained therein". The text of this resolution and the report of the Sub-Committee were transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 30 June 1964 (S/5789).

146. In a statement of consensus adopted on 27 October 1964, the Special Committee drew "once again... the attention of the Security Council to the question of Southern Rhodesia". The report of the Special Committee concerning Southern Rhodesia, in which this statement of consensus is contained (chapter III, paragraph 617) was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 22 December 1964.

(b) Aden

147. By operative paragraph 3 of its resolution of 11 May 1964 (A/AC.109/74) the Special Committee

<sup>13</sup> Prior to the vote on the report as a whole, the Special Committee voted on a United States amendment to paragraph 4 and took a separate vote on paragraph 5. For details of the voting and reservations made by individual delegations, see A/AC.109/SR.317.

called "the attention of the Security Council to the dangerous situation prevailing in the area as a result of recent British military actions against the people of the Territory". The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 12 May 1964 (S/5693).

(c) South West Africa

148. By operative paragraph 6 of its resolution of 21 May 1964 (A/AC.109/77 and Corr.1), the Special Committee drew "the attention of the Security Council to the critical situation in South West Africa, the continuation of which constitutes a serious threat to international peace and security and a clear violation of the Charter of the United Nations". The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 27 May 1964 (S/5722).

(d) Territories under Portuguese administration

149. By operative paragraph 4 of its resolution of 3 July 1964 (A/AC.109/90), the Special Committee drew "the immediate attention of the Security Council to the deteriorating situation in the Territories under Portuguese administration with the view to its taking appropriate measures to secure compliance by Portugal with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council". The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 7 July 1964 (S/5803).

The Trusteeship Council

150. In accordance with paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) which requested the Trusteeship Council to assist the Special Committee in its work, the President of the Trusteeship Council, in a letter dated 1 July 1964 (A/AC.109/89) addressed to the Chairman, informed the Special Committee that the Council at its thirty-first session examined conditions in the Trust Territories of the Pacific Islands under United States administration, and of Nauru and New Guinea under Australian administration. The letter stated that the conclusions and recommendations of the Trusteeship Council, as well as the observations of the members of the Trusteeship Council representing their individual opinions only, were contained in its report to the Security Council on the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands (S/5783) and in its report to the General Assembly on Nauru and New Guinea.<sup>14</sup>

The specialized agencies

151. Collaboration of the specialized agencies with the Special Committee has been established by the presence of representatives of the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the World Health Organization (WHO) and the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) at meetings of the Special Committee.

H. REVIEW OF WORK<sup>15</sup>

152. By resolution 1956 (XVIII), the General Assembly requested the Special Committee to continue to seek the best ways and means for the immediate and total application of the Declaration to all territories which have not yet attained independence and to report to the Assembly not later than at its nineteenth session. By the same resolution, the General Assembly requested the administering Powers to give their full co-operation to the Special Committee.

153. During the debates at the eighteenth session of the General Assembly, which led to the adoption of resolution 1956 (XVIII), several delegations expressed concern at the delay in the implementation of the Declaration which, as had been pointed out by the Special Committee in an earlier report, was an expression of the universal desire to expedite the process of the liberation of colonial peoples. The hope was expressed by some that full implementation of the Declaration might be achieved by 1965, the twentieth year of the United Nations, which has been designated as International Co-operation Year. The attention of the Special Committee was also drawn by many delegations to the need for it to give particular consideration to the small, island, colonial territories which had not been previously examined and to recommend ways and means for the speedy implementation of the Declaration in this regard.

154. The Special Committee wishes to report to the General Assembly that, in the course of its work in 1964, it examined the implementation of the Declaration in respect of fifty-five territories. These include several small territories to which the Committee's attention was drawn at the eighteenth session and which had never before been considered individually. However, the Special Committee recognizes, that, in spite of its having met almost continuously from February to December 1964, it has not been able to complete the task entrusted to it by the General Assembly.

155. The Special Committee noted with satisfaction the attainment of independence during the year by three of the Territories which had been the subject of consideration by the General Assembly and by the Special Committee, namely Nyasaland (Malawi), Malta, and Northern Rhodesia (Zambia). However, the serious concern, previously expressed in General Assembly resolution 1956 (XVIII), regarding the delay in the total application of the Declaration continued to be felt. This has also been reflected in important resolutions and declarations concerning decolonization in general and in relation to individual territories by the Assembly of Heads of African States and Governments at its first ordinary session in July 1964, and by the Second Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries in October 1964.

156. At the outset of its work, the Special Committee considered that its examination of the Territories would be facilitated by full information on the steps taken by the administering Powers to implement the Declaration. Accordingly, the Chairman on behalf of the Special Committee wrote identical letters to the Permanent Representatives of Australia, France, New Zealand, Portugal, South Africa, Spain, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America requesting information on the constitutional progress that had been made in the Territories under their administration since the adoption of the Declaration and on the measures which have been taken, or were being contemplated, to implement the Declaration. With the exception of the Government of South Africa, from which no response has been received, and the Government of Portugal, whose response was negative in character, the administering Powers submitted information or indicated their readiness to furnish information at the appropriate time in statements to the Committee.<sup>10</sup> This information was taken into account by the Special Committee in its consideration of the Territories concerned.

157. By letter dated 20 October 1964 addressed to the Chairman of the Special Committee the representative of the United Kingdom transmitted to the Committee a calendar of constitutional advance summarizing the main developments in the Territories for which the United Kingdom Government was responsible covering the period September 1963 to October 1964. At its 319th meeting the Special Committee decided to reproduce the letter of the representative of the United Kingdom and the enclosed calendar of constitutional advance as an annex to the present report (annex I).

158. As in previous years, the Special Committee gave extensive consideration to the larger Territories in Africa as well as to Aden and British Guiana which represent some of the most difficult colonial problems.

159. The question of Southern Rhodesia was thus the subject of priority consideration and of several resolutions adopted by the Committee. While the United Kingdom Government continued to participate in the work of the Committee and received the Sub-Committee on Southern Rhodesia in London for discussions, it maintained its initial position that it had not the competence to implement the various resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee on the question. At the same time, the United Kingdom Government reaffirmed its intention of granting independence to Southern Rhodesia only on a basis acceptable to the people of the Territory as a whole, and recently announced measures it would take if the present Southern Rhodesia Government resorted to a unilateral declaration of independence. No progress has, however, been made by the United Kingdom Government towards the basic objectives of the resolutions of the General Assembly and Special Committee; namely, the establishment of complete democratic freedom and equality of political rights, and the convening of a fully representative conference to devise constitutional arrangements, on the basis of universal adult suffrage, for independence at the earliest possible date. In view of the continuing deterioration of the already explosive situation in the Territory to which it has drawn the attention of the Security Council, the Special Committee is convinced of the urgent need to take effective steps to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly and Special Committee.

160. As regards the Territories under Portuguese administration, the Government of Portugal persisted in its refusal to implement the measures called for in the resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly and it continued to disregard its obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter. Further, it again rejected the invitation of the Special Committee to co-operate with it in its consideration of the Territories. On the basis of its previously-expressed position regarding the status of these Territories, that Government recently carried out certain changes which, however, only affect representation in local legislative and administrative organs, the competence of which is rigidly circumscribed, and participation of territorial representatives in certain central bodies, the role of which is purely consultative. Thus these changes did not effect any modification of the constitutional relationship between Portugal and the Territories. Nor do they represent any progress in the direction laid down in the resolutions. Further, the Portuguese Government has not taken any steps to discontinue its acts of repression or to establish conditions for the free functioning of political parties in the Territories. In the view of the Special Committee, this grave situation requires consideration, by the Security Council, of appropriate measures to secure compliance by Portugal with the resolutions. Meanwhile, the Special Committee has initiated a study of the activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the application of the Declaration in these Territories and their accession to independence.

161. With regard to South West Africa, the Government of South Africa maintained its refusal to co-operate in the work of the Special Committee. In flagrant disregard of the resolutions of the General Assembly concerning South West Africa, the South African Government intensified the application of apartheid policies in the Territory. It also declared its intention to proceed with the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Enquiry into South West Africa Affairs 1962-1963, the ultimate effect of which would be the partition and disintegration of the Territory, and its absorption into South Africa. Further, the South African Government refused to permit the establishment in the Territory of an office of a United Nations Technical Assistance Representative. Some of the responsibility for South Africa's continued violation of the United Nations Charter and the Mandate, as well as the resolutions of the General Assembly, must rest with those States which have failed to take the measures envisaged in paragraph 7 of General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII). Those States which also condone and acquiesce in the support given to South Africa by their nationals who own and operate mining and other international companies in the Territory bear an additional share of the responsibility. In this connexion, the Special Committee has submitted a separate report in accordance with paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) on the implications of the activities of the mining industry and other international companies having interests in South West Africa. The Special Committee has drawn the attention of the Security Council to the critical situation in the Territory which continues to be a serious threat to international peace and security.

162. The non-implementation of the Declaration in certain other Territories and the conditions of grave tension consequently prevailing in them were also a matter of serious concern to the Special Committee. In Aden, the maintenance by the United Kingdom Government of a state of emergency and the carrying out of military operations caused a deterioration in the situation and led to increased tension in the area. However, the United Kingdom Government refused to agree to a visit to the Territory by the Sub-Committee on Aden and, moreover, declined to receive it in London for discussions with a view to implementing the resolutions of the General Assembly and Special Committee concerning the Territory. Consequently, the Sub-Committee was denied the opportunity to discharge effectively the tasks entrusted to it. The Constitutional Conference held in June and July 1964, from which representatives of several important sections of the population were excluded, was not in keeping with the resolutions on Aden; nor were the subsequent elections, which were held on the basis of a restricted franchise and in an atmosphere characterized by constraint and restriction of political freedom. In this connexion, it may be recalled that the establishment of an effective United Nations presence before and after these elections as requested by the General Assembly in its resolution 1949 (XVII) has also not been possible. In order to resolve the present dangerous situation and to ensure the prompt application of the Declaration, immediate measures require to be taken by the United Kingdom Government to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee concerning the Territory.

163. Again, as regards British Guiana, the United Kingdom Government declined to permit a visit to the Territory by the Sub-Committee of Good Offices established by the Special Committee and failed to take the necessary measures to grant immediate independence to the Territory. Meanwhile, the conditions of disharmony, unrest and conflict in the Territory persisted. While noting that it is the intention of the United Kingdom Government to convene a constitutional conference as soon as possible after the elections to decide on a date for independence, the Special Committee considers that the solution to the problems of the Territory lies in the complete and immediate implementation of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and Special Committee.

164. Another important question affecting the implementation of the Declaration, which engaged the attention of the Special Committee, related to the smaller Territories in the Atlantic and Pacific Ocean areas and in the Caribbean. The Special Committee is convinced that the provisions of the Declaration are fully applicable to these Territories and that appropriate measures to this end should be taken without delay, in accordance with the freely expressed wishes of the people. At the same time, as was apparent during the Committee's consideration of these Territories, the task of formulating concrete recommendations for the total application of the Declaration was sometimes hampered by the lack of adequate information on the political, economic and social situation in the Territories concerned and as to the opinions, wishes and aspirations of the people. This consideration is of particular significance in view of the problems arising from the small size and population, geographical location and limited natural resources of many of these Territories.

165. For this reason, the Special Committee wishes to lay special stress on the importance of sending out visiting groups. Visiting missions would be of invaluable assistance to the Special Committee in obtaining first-hand information on the political, economic and social situation in the Territories concerned, in ascertaining the views of the people as regards their future and, where necessary, in bringing together through the use of good offices different political elements and thus to help them in attaining the goals laid down in the Declaration. As pointed out in the last report of the Special Committee, the carrying out of such functions by visiting missions does not amount to interference in the internal affairs of a Territory, nor does it detract from the responsibility of the administering Power for the internal administration of that Territory. On the contrary, it flows from the responsibilities of the United Nations deriving from the provisions of the Charter and from the Declaration. The Special Committee, therefore, wishes to reiterate that, by refusing access to a visiting group established by the Special Committee to a Territory to which the Declaration is applicable, the administering Power concerned is denying the Special Committee one of the most effective means of discharging the tasks assigned to it by the General Assembly.

166. Another question affecting the implementation of the Declaration, which the Special Committee had to deal with, was that raised by disputes regarding sovereignty over certain Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Special Committee is convinced that the Declaration is fully applicable to such Territories and believes that such disputes can be peacefully resolved through negotiation, in keeping with the provisions of the Declaration and bearing in mind the interests of the peoples.

I. FUTURE WORK

167. In the light of the considerations set out above and taking into account the tasks still to be carried out, the Special Committee is of the opinion that the General Assembly should provide for the further examination during 1965 of the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration in the Territories already considered by the Special Committee as well as in those Territories that have not yet been considered. To that end, and in view of the valuable experience gained by the Special Committee during the last three years, the Special Committee considers that it would be desirable that its mandate be continued.

168. In this connexion, the Special Committee recommends to the Secretary-General and to the General Assembly to make the necessary provisions in order to facilitate the work of the Special Committee. In particular, provision should be made in the 1965 budget to cover the expenses of the activities of the Special Committee, including the cost of sub-committees or visiting groups, and for United Nations supervision of elections and other forms of consultation of the wishes of the inhabitants of colonial territories. In its conclusions and recommendations on specific territories contained in the various chapters of the report, the Special Committee has made reference to the need for visits to several of the Territories considered by it.

169. In its report on the Cook Islands, Niue and Tokelau Islands under New Zealand administration, the Special Committee has recommended that the people of these Territories should be enabled to express their wishes in accordance with the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) through well-established democratic processes under United Nations supervision. At the general elections, scheduled to take place in the Cook Islands in early 1965, the chief issue will be the future status of the Territory. If the General Assembly approved that these elections be supervised by the United Nations, it would be necessary to make the necessary arrangements for such supervision as a matter of urgency.

170. The administering Powers should once again be requested to afford the Special Committee their fullest co-operation and, in particular, to facilitate visits to Territories, as the Committee may consider necessary, by Sub-Committees and visiting groups. The Special Committee also recommends that the General Assembly should urge the administering Powers concerned to co-operate with the United Nations with a view to the establishment of United Nations presence, as called for in the relevant resolutions, in South West Africa and Aden as well as in such other territories as the General Assembly may consider necessary and desirable.

171. With regard to the Territories to which the Declaration is applicable, which have not yet been considered by the Special Committee, it is the intention of the Committee to consider them next year as a matter of priority. The Special Committee would also review the situation in the Territories already considered by it in the light of the resolutions that might be adopted by the General Assembly at its nineteenth session and taking into account further developments in each of these territories.

J. APPROVAL OF THE REPORT

172. This report as a whole was adopted by the Special Committee at its 319th meeting, on 15 December 1964.

CHAPTER II

INFORMATION ON NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER AND RELATED QUESTIONS

1. By its resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, the General Assembly dissolved the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and transferred certain of its functions, notably in regard to the study of information transmitted in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter, to the Special Committee of Twenty-Four.

2. In a note (A/AC.109/L.97) of 14 February 1964, the Secretary-General drew the attention of the Special Committee to resolution 1970 (XVIII) and made suggestions concerning the procedures which the Committee might wish to follow. This note was considered by the Special Committee at its 219th and 220th meetings.

3. In compliance with the provisions of operative paragraph 5 of resolution 1970 (XVIII) and in accordance with the procedures suggested by the Secretary-General, the latest information transmitted by the Administering Members under Article 73 e of the Charter was used in the preparation of working papers on each Territory for the Special Committee. This information was taken into account by the Committee in its examination of the Territories concerned and is reflected in the chapter of the Committee's report dealing with each Territory.

4. At its 315th meeting on 17 November 1964 the Special Committee resumed its consideration of the Secretary-General's note, together with a report by the Secretary-General (A/AC.109/L.155) on the information which had been transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter up to 30 September 1964 and on the action which had been taken in implementation of resolution 1970 (XVIII).

5. In the course of the debate the representatives of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America drew attention to further information which had been transmitted after 30 September 1964.

6. The representative of India said that the Committee had, in his opinion, adequately and completely discharged the responsibilities entrusted to it by making use of the information transmitted under Article 73 e in its working papers on the various Territories which would be included in its report to the General Assembly. The debates clearly indicated that the Committee had paid close attention to this information and the resolutions which it had adopted reflected the interest which it had taken in the economic, social and educational problems of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

7. He regretted that the Government of Portugal had again failed to transmit any information in pursuance of Article 73 e of the Charter and of the resolutions of the General Assembly concerning the transmission of information by Administering Members. The Special Committee had once again to take note of the disregard by the Portuguese Government of the requests and resolutions of the United Nations. He hoped that the Government of Portugal would change its attitude and co-operate with the United Nations.

8. The representative of India also hoped that all Administering Members, which were required to do so, would transmit full and complete information on all the Territories under their administration which were declared by the United Nations to be Non-Self-Governing Territories.

9. At the 315th meeting, the Special Committee approved the Secretary-General's note and took note of the report, both of which it decided to include in its report to the General Assembly. These documents are reproduced as appendices I and II below.

APPENDIX I

Functions entrusted to the Special Committee relating to information on Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter

Note by the Secretary-General

1. The General Assembly, at its eighteenth session, by resolution 1970 (XVIII) adopted on 16 December 1963, decided to dissolve the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. In the same resolution, the General Assembly:

"4. Invites Member States which have or which assume responsibilities for the administration of Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government to transmit or continue to transmit to the Secretary-General information as prescribed under Article 73 e of the Charter, as well as the fullest possible information on political and constitutional development;

"5. Requests the Special Committee to study this information and take it fully into account in examining the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples in each of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and to undertake any special study and prepare any special report it may consider necessary in addition to its activities under General Assembly resolutions 1654 (XVI) and 1810 (XVII);

"6. Requests the Secretary-General to continue to provide the Special Committee with all the facilities and personnel necessary for the implementation of the present resolution."

2. The attention of the Special Committee is drawn to the following points, which it may wish to take into account in carrying out the additional functions entrusted to it by resolution 1970 (XVIII).

I. TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION BY ADMINISTERING MEMBERS

3. Operative paragraph 4 of resolution 1970 (XVIII) invites the Administering Members to transmit or continue to transmit to the Secretary-General information as prescribed under Article 73 e of the Charter, as well as the fullest possible information on political and constitutional development.

4. According to previous General Assembly resolutions,<sup>a</sup> Members transmitting information under Article 73 e of the Charter are required to send to the Secretary-General annually the most recent information at their disposal, as early as possible and at the latest within a maximum period of six months following the expiration of the administrative year in the Non-Self-Governing Territories concerned.

5. The Secretary-General proposes to submit to the Special Committee each year a report giving the dates on which information under Article 73 e as well as information on political and constitutional developments is transmitted by the Administering Members concerned.

6. The Special Committee may wish to consider at an appropriate time in the course of its work during the year, the question of fulfilment by all Administering Members concerned of their obligation under Article 73 e. For this purpose, it may wish to include in its agenda an item entitled "Transmission of information under Article 73 e: Report of the Secretary-General".

II. STUDY OF THE INFORMATION TRANSMITTED BY ADMINISTERING MEMBERS

7. In operative paragraph 5 of resolution 1970 (XVIII), the Special Committee is invited to study the information transmitted and to take it fully into account in examining the situation in each Territory with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples.

8. Under the procedures established by the Special Committee, the Secretariat is required to submit to it working papers giving information on each of the Territories coming within the scope of its work. In the past, these working papers contained information mainly on political and constitutional developments, although information on economic matters was also included in some cases. Since the Special Committee is now called upon to study the information transmitted by the Administering Members and to take it fully into account in examining the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration in each of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the working papers on individual Territories will be expanded to include, in a concise form, information on economic, social and educational conditions transmitted by the Administering Members.

9. In addition, information transmitted by the Administering Members, in its original form, will be made available on request to the Members. It will also be made available to the specialized agencies as necessary.

10. If the above procedure in regard to the treatment of the information is approved by the Special Committee, it is suggested that preparation of full summaries<sup>b</sup> of the Article 73 e information be discontinued.

III. SPECIAL STUDIES AND SPECIAL REPORTS

11. General Assembly resolution 1970 (XVIII) also invites the Special Committee to undertake, in respect of the information transmitted by the Administering Members, any special study and prepare any special report which it may consider necessary in addition to its activities with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. The Special Committee may wish to consider the need for special studies or reports in respect of Non-Self-Governing Territories in general or in respect of individual Territories, as and when necessary.

IV. COLLABORATION OF UNITED NATIONS ORGANS AND THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

12. Under Article 73 of the Charter, Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, undertake:

"to promote constructive measures of development, to encourage research, and to co-operate with one another and, when and where appropriate, with specialized international bodies with a view to the practical achievement of the social, economic and scientific purposes set forth in this Article".

The paragraphs which follow describe in outline the collaboration between United Nations organs and the specialized agencies.

A. Economic and Social Council

13. From an early date liaison was established with the Economic and Social Council in connexion with information relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories, and an interchange of information between the Council and the Committee set up by the General Assembly to examine the information transmitted under Article 73 e was formalized in resolution 220 (III) of 3 November 1948. It subsequently became the practice to inform the former Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories of relevant studies and decisions taken by the Economic and Social Council and for the Assembly to transmit to the Council the Committee's special reports on economic, social and educational conditions.

B. Specialized agencies

14. The agreements between the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation, the Food and Agriculture Organization and the United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organization which came into effect on 14 December 1946, and the agreement between the United Nations and the World Health Organization, which came into effect on 10 July 1948, each contain an article whereby the agency "agrees to co-operate with the United Nations in giving effect to the principles and obligations set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter with regard to matters affecting the well-being and development of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories".

15. Since 1946, the General Assembly has adopted a number of resolutions inviting the collaboration of the specialized agencies in regard to the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. In resolution 66 (I), for instance, the General Assembly invited ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO to send representatives in an advisory capacity to the meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee which met in 1947.

16. In 1947 and 1948, a general pattern was established providing for the collaboration of the specialized agencies in the work relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories. In resolution 145 (II) of 3 November 1947, the General Assembly invited the Secretary-General to enter into relations with the secretariats of the specialized agencies in order to provide for the continued assistance of the specialized agencies in dealing with the information transmitted under Article 73 e.

17. Since 1948, representatives of ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO have continued to participate in the work of the former Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

18. As a further step in ensuring that the advice, expert knowledge and experience of the specialized agencies would be used to the best advantage, the General Assembly also invited them to communicate to the United Nations information within their fields of competence. Under resolution 221 (III) of 3 November 1948, for example, the General Assembly invited the specialized agencies to inform any special committee, which the General Assembly may appoint, of the progress of any work undertaken by them which includes within its scope economic, social and educational conditions affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories. In resolution 330 (IV), the General Assembly requested UNESCO to inform it annually of measures taken towards the elimination of illiteracy in the Territories. Again, under resolution 331 (IV) of 2 December 1949, the General Assembly requested the appropriate international bodies to take full account of conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in work undertaken by them in the economic, social and educational fields, and invited the specialized agencies concerned to communicate annually to the United Nations information on the progress of the work in these fields which would be of service in Non-Self-Governing Territories, including information on the extent to which their services have been provided for any of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

<sup>a</sup> Resolutions 66 (I) of 14 December 1946, 142 (II) of 3 November 1947 and 218 (III) of 3 November 1948.

C. Technical assistance

19. In 1948, by resolution 220 (III), the General Assembly drew the attention of the Administering Members to the arrangements for technical assistance approved by the Economic and Social Council, and invited the Secretary-General "to inform any special committee which the General Assembly may appoint of the extent and nature of such technical assistance rendered to the Non-Self-Governing Territories at the request of the Administering Members".

20. Following the establishment of the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, the Secretary-General was requested, in resolution 336 (IV) of 2 December 1949, to keep the Committee on Information informed of the nature of the technical assistance which was accorded to Non-Self-Governing Territories by specialized international bodies.

21. The various reports called for in the resolutions mentioned in paragraphs 13 to 20 above were in the past considered by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories which reported on them to the General Assembly. The Special Committee may wish to continue the collaboration with the Economic and Social Council and the specialized agencies, as envisaged in these resolutions, to consider any reports received by it on matters covered by these resolutions, and to report to the General Assembly as necessary.

22. It may be recalled in this connexion that a number of activities undertaken by the Economic and Social Council and the specialized agencies are of special interest to Non-Self-Governing Territories, including, for instance, those relating to industrialization, training of personnel for administration and other duties, housing and urban development as well as activities in connexion with the United Nations Development Decade, the promotion of agrarian reform, literacy campaigns and the supply of food, the world campaign for universal literacy and the world campaign against hunger, disease and ignorance. The Special Committee may therefore wish to invite the Economic and Social Council and the specialized agencies concerned to continue to give particular attention to the needs of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in connexion with these and other activities in the economic, social and educational fields, and to extend their assistance to the Non-Self-Governing Territories in all possible ways.

APPENDIX II

Information on Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted Under Article 73 e of the Charter and related questions Report of the Secretary-General

Introduction

1. At its eighteenth session, the General Assembly, by resolution 1970 (XVIII), adopted on 16 December 1963, decided to dissolve the Committee on Information from Non-

Self-Governing Territories. In the same resolution, it requested the Special Committee of Twenty-Four to study the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the United Nations Charter. The relevant operative paragraphs of resolution 170 (XVIII) read as follows:

"4. Invites Member States which have or which assume responsibilities for the administration of Territories whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government to transmit or continue to transmit to the Secretary-General information as prescribed under Article 73 e of the Charter, as well as the fullest possible information on political and constitutional development;

"5. Requests the Special Committee to study this information and take it fully into account in examining the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples in each of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and to undertake any special study and prepare any special report it may consider necessary in addition to its activities under General Assembly resolutions 1654 (XVI) and 1810 (XVII);"

2. In a note (A/AC.109/L.97) of 14 February 1964, the Secretary-General drew the attention of the Special Committee to resolution 1970 (XVIII) and made suggestions concerning the procedures which the Special Committee might wish to follow in discharging the additional functions devolving upon it as a result of the dissolution of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

3. In his statement at the 219th meeting of the Special Committee, the Secretary-General referred to the above note and requested the Committee to express its views on the manner in which it proposed to carry out these additional functions. During the ensuing discussion on the organization of the Special Committee's work, some representatives referred to the note and endorsed suggestions contained therein.

4. This report deals, under separate headings, with each of the topics contained in the Secretary-General's note and also gives the dates on which information was transmitted by Administering Members as stipulated in Article 73 e of the Charter.

TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

5. Member States transmitting information under Article 73 e of the Charter are required to send to the Secretary-General annually the most recent information at their disposal, as early as possible and at the latest within a maximum period of six months following the expiration of the administrative year in the Non-Self-Governing Territories concerned.

6. The administrative year varies in different Territories. In Territories administered by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, France and Spain it corresponds with the calendar year, but in Territories administered by New Zealand it extends from 1 April to 31 March, while in the case of Territories administered by Australia and the United States of America it extends from 1 July to 30 June. The table at the end of this report shows the dates on which the information called for in Article 73 e was transmitted to the Secretary-General during the period 1 January 1963 to 30 September 1964. The Territories included in the table are those listed in the report of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to the General Assembly at its eighteenth session.<sup>a</sup>

7. The information transmitted under Article 73 e follows in general the standard form approved by the General Assembly and includes information on geography, history, population, economic, social and educational conditions. In the case of territories under the administration of Australia, New Zealand and the United States of America, the annual reports of the Territories, which also included information on constitutional matters, were transmitted. Additional information on political and constitutional developments in Territories under United Kingdom administration was also transmitted in 1963.<sup>b</sup>

STUDY OF THE INFORMATION

8. In compliance with the provisions of operative paragraph 5 of resolution 1970 (XVIII) and in accordance with the procedure suggested in paragraphs 8 and 10 of the Secretary-General's note (A/AC.109/L.97), the information transmitted by Administering Members under Article 73 c of the Charter was used in the preparation of working papers on each Territory for the Special Committee. Since it is the practice of the Special Committee to take into account the latest information available on each Territory at the date of its examination, and since the Committee is in session during a large part of the year, this procedure enabled the Special Committee to take into account information which was transmitted during 1963 and 1964.

SPECIAL STUDIES AND SPECIAL REPORTS

9. Up to 30 September 1964, the Special Committee had not made any special studies or prepared any special reports which involved the use of information transmitted under Article 73 c.

COLLABORATION OF UNITED NATIONS ORGANS AND THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

10. It was the practice for the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to transmit to the Economic and Social Council any special reports on economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories prepared by it and to receive information on any studies or decisions by the Council which were relevant to the Committee's work. Up to 30 September 1964, the Special Committee had not completed any study of this nature, although a study on the implications of the mining industry and of other international companies having interests in South West Africa was being prepared by Sub-Committee I. Likewise, although many of the items discussed by the Council at its thirty-seventh session were of concern to developing countries in general, none was specifically related to matters under consideration by the Special Committee.

11. Collaboration of the specialized agencies with the Special Committee has been established by the presence of representatives of the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), the World Health Organization (WHO) and the Food and Agricultural Organization (FAO) at meetings of the Special Committee.

12. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 330 (IV) of 2 December 1949, UNESCO transmitted the text of its annual report for 1963-1964 on measures taken towards the elimination of illiteracy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The report on this subject for the period 1962-1963 is contained in document A/AC.35/L.373.

13. Since the subject matter does not relate to any specific item on the agenda of the Special Committee, the report by UNESCO for the period 1963-1964 has not been circulated pending a decision by the Special Committee on the procedures for dealing with reports of this nature.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

14. In resolutions 220 (III) of 3 November 1948 and 336 (IV) of 2 December 1949, the General Assembly requested that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories be kept informed of technical assistance rendered to these Territories by the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

15. Details of the technical assistance rendered to Non-Self-Governing Territories during 1963 under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance are available in the annual report of the Technical Assistance Board to the Technical Assistance Committee (E/3871/Rev.1). It was stated in the report that the total cost of projects in operation under the Expanded Programme in 1963 amounted to $39,498,502, of which $1,311,144 was expended on projects in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The cost of regional projects, many of which were of interest to Non-Self-Governing Territories, amounted to $1,426,035 in the case of Africa, $1,063,733 in the case of Asia and the Far East, $1,503,883 for the Americas and $542,992 for the Middle East. Inter-regional projects accounted for $2,039,904.

16. Technical assistance to Non-Self-Governing Territories by specialized agencies under regular and other programmes, including the malaria eradication programme of WHO, amounted to $580,837 in 1963. Detailed information on the assistance furnished to the three Territories of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, which are the object of special concern in the light of General Assembly resolution 1954 (VIII) of 11 December 1963, is set out in document A/AC.109/98.

17. Apart from the Expanded Programme and the regular programmes of technical assistance referred to above, there are special programmes established by the General Assembly specifically for the purpose of providing training for inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The first of these was established by General Assembly resolution 845 (IX) of 22 November 1954, whereby the General Assembly invited Member States to extend to the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories offers of facilities for study and training not only at university level but also, and in the first place, at the post-primary, technical and vocational levels. Other programmes were established under General Assembly resolutions 1808 (XVII) of 14 December 1962 and 1973 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, for the training of indigenous people of Territories under Portuguese administration, and under resolutions 1705 (XVI) of 19 December 1961 and 1901 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963 for the training of South West Africans.

18. The special programmes referred to in the preceding paragraph are the subject of separate items on the provisional agenda of the General Assembly at its nineteenth session, when reports by the Secretary-General on the implementation of the several resolutions will be examined.

CHAPTER XIV

MAURITIUS, SEYCHELLES AND ST. HELENA

A. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORIES

1. MauritiusIntroduction

1. Mauritius, an island of volcanic origin, lies in the Indian Ocean about 500 miles east of Madagascar. It has an area of 720 square miles (1,865 square kilometres), excluding its four dependencies, which have an aggregate area of 89 square miles (231 square kilometres). The northern part of Mauritius is a flat plain rising to a fertile central plateau. Bordering the plateau are three main mountain ranges with rocky peaks, the highest of which is 2,711 feet (831 metres). There are many short, swift rivers with waterfalls, some of them used to generate hydro-electric power.

2. At 30 June 1962, the date of the latest census, the population of Mauritius totalled 680,305 bringing population density to an average of 945 per square mile. Over-population and the continued high rate of population increase are a major problem on the island. Approximately 67 per cent of the population is Indo-Mauritian; 29 per cent is referred to as the "general population", consisting of a mixed population of French and African origin, and Europeans (approximately 10,000) mainly of French origin; and 4 per cent is Sino-Mauritian or Chinese.

3. Port Louis, with an estimated population of 89,900 in December 1960, is the capital of Mauritius. Other main towns are Curepipe, Beau Bassin/Rose Hill, and Quatre Bornes.

4. The most important of the dependencies is Rodrigues, a mountainous island of volcanic origin with an estimated population of 17,467 inhabitants, situated 350 miles to the east of Mauritius. The other three dependencies, which had a total estimated population of 1,900 in 1960, are the Chagos Archipelago, 1,180 miles north-east of Mauritius, Agalega, 580 miles north of Mauritius, and Cargados Carajos, 250 miles north of Mauritius.

Status

5. Mauritius is a Colony and has been under British control since 1810. The Island of Mauritius was reportedly first settled in 1638, when a small Dutch settlement was established. The settlement was abandoned in 1710 and France claimed the island in 1715, introducing a new settlement beginning in 1722. Mauritius was later captured by a British expedition in 1810.

6. A Council of Government was first established in the Territory in 1825, and in 1886 the first Legislative Council with elected members was established.

Constitution

7. The present Constitution of Mauritius, set out in the Mauritius (Constitution) Orders in Council 1958 to 1962, embodies the first of two stages of constitutional change proposed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies at a conference held in London during June and July 1961 (see paragraphs 20-28 below). Its main provisions are set out below.

8. Governor. The Governor is the Queen's representative and the formal head of the Government. Except as otherwise specifically provided, he is required to seek and act on the advice of the Executive Council. His assent is required for laws passed by the Legislative Council.

9. Executive Council. The Executive Council, presided over by the Governor, consists of thirteen ministers: the Chief Minister, who is the leader of the majority party in the Legislative Council, nine other ministers appointed by the Governor from the elected or nominated members of the Legislative Council; and three ex officio ministers (Chief Secretary, Attorney-General and Financial Secretary). In the present Executive Council, all ministers except the Chief Secretary and the Financial Secretary are Mauritians. Six of the appointed ministers, including the Chief Minister, are members of the Labour Party, two are members of the Muslim Committee Action, one is a member of the Independent Forward Bloc and one is a nominated member of the Legislative Council. The ministers are responsible for the administration of specified departments or subjects and accept the rules of collective responsibility.

10. The Executive Council is the principal instrument of policy in the Territory, being responsible for the direction and control of the Government. Except in specified matters, including external affairs, defence, internal security and public service appointments, the Governor is required to consult the Council and normally to act in accordance with its advice. He is authorized to act against the advice of the Executive Council if he has obtained the prior approval of the United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies, or in cases of urgent necessity, provided he reports his action to the Secretary of State.

11. Legislative Council. The Legislative Council is composed of a Speaker appointed by the Governor from outside the Council and fifty-five members, of whom forty are elected by universal adult suffrage, three are ex officio (Chief Secretary, Attorney-General and Financial Secretary), and twelve, the maximum allowed under the Constitution, are nominated by the Governor. The normal life of the Legislative Council is five years.

12. The Legislative Council has power to legislate for all aspects of the internal affairs of the Territory, including its budget and taxation, subject to the proviso that the Council may not proceed on any Bill imposing or increasing a tax or increasing expenditure from revenue or other territorial funds except on the recommendation of the Governor or with his consent. All laws passed by the Legislative Council are subject to the assent of the Governor. The Governor's assent to certain types of bills is subject to his receipt of prior instructions from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, or, in cases of urgent necessity, subject to report to the Secretary of State. Such bills include those affecting the currency of the Territory, those imposing differential duties, those affecting the control of naval, military or air forces, those inconsistent with United Kingdom treaty obligations, and those of an extraordinary nature and import which might prejudice United Kingdom prerogatives, the property rights of British subjects not residing in the Territory, or trade, transport or communications of any part of the dominions or any territory under United Kingdom protection. The Governor, if he considers it expedient in the interest of public order, public faith or good government, may declare in effect a bill or motion introduced in the Legislative Council if it fails to pass or be carried; he is required in such cases to report to the Secretary of State, and to forward any objection to his action made by any member of the Legislature. Any law or motion thus declared in effect by the Governor is subject to revocation by the Secretary of State. Any law passed by the Legislative Council and assented to by the Governor is subject to disallowance by Her Majesty acting through a Secretary of State.

Electoral system

13. Universal adult suffrage was introduced under the 1958 Constitution. The forty elective members of the Legislative Council are elected in single-member constituencies, the candidate polling the largest number of votes winning the seat. Elections are normally held every five years.

14. New elections were held in October 1963, after the dissolution of the old Legislative Council by the Governor (see paragraph 30 below). The results of these elections were as follows:

		Previous membership of the Legislative Council
Mauritius Labour Party.....	19	23
Parti Mauricien .....	8	3
Independent Forward Bloc.....	7	6
Muslim Committee of Action.....	4	5
Independents .....	2	1
Trade Unionists .....	—	2
TOTAL	40	40

Judiciary

15. The laws of Mauritius are mainly based on old French codes (Civil Code, the Penal Code, the Code of Commerce and the Code of Civil Procedure).

However, a number of more recent laws are based on English precedents, such as the Bankruptcy Law, the Company Law, the Law of Evidence, the Law of Criminal Procedure and the Labour Laws. The highest judicial authority is the Supreme Court, which has similar powers, authority and jurisdiction as the High Court of Justice in England. It consists of a Chief Justice and three puisne judges. Appeals lie to the Court of Criminal Appeal (which is constituted by three of the judges of the Supreme Court) and in certain cases to the Privy Council in England.

16. There is an Intermediate Criminal Court consisting of three senior magistrates, which has jurisdiction to try criminal cases and power to impose sentences of up to five years of penal servitude. In addition, there are eleven magistrates who preside over the several district courts which deal with less serious offences.

17. All the judges and all the magistrates are of local origin.

Public Service

18. Appointments to the Public Service are made by the Governor at his discretion. He is advised by a Public Service Commission, but is not bound by its advice. At the end of 1962, there were 66 pensionable overseas officers in the Public Service, comprising 19 local officers who were members of the Overseas Civil Service, and 47 other officers. Non-pensionable overseas officers numbered 31, and local and other officers totalled 338. Non-overseas local and other officers of all categories, excluding daily-paid staff, numbered 10,585.

Local government

19. There is a well-established system of local government in Mauritius. The capital is a municipality with a wholly elected membership of sixteen. In the three other main towns, there are town councils with a majority of elected members. The franchise for municipal and town council elections is on the basis of universal adult suffrage, and certain taxpayers' qualifications. Rural local government is based on village councils consisting of 7 to 9 elected members with 3 members appointed by the Governor. There are more than 100 village councils, which undertake such functions as road repairs, construction of bridges and markets, improvement of water supplies, etc., with funds provided by the central Government. District councils co-ordinate and supervise the work of village councils in their area. These consist of 15 members, including 10 chairmen of village councils elected by and from village councils in the district, and 5 persons appointed by the Governor. In 1962, government servants ceased to be members of village councils while the civil commissioners changed their role from member of district councils to that of adviser. Local government elections were held in the Territory in December 1963.

Recent political and constitutional developments

20. A two-stage plan for the constitutional advance of Mauritius towards full internal self-government was proposed by the United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies at a Conference held in London from 26 June to 7 July 1961. The Conference was attended by the main political parties in the Territory, namely, the Mauritius Labour Party, the Independent Forward Bloc, the Muslim Committee of Action, and the Parti

Mauricien, as well as by two independent nominated members of the Mauritius Legislative Council.

21. According to the first stage of the plan, which was brought into effect in 1961 and 1962, the leader of the majority party in the Legislature would have the title of Chief Minister. He would be consulted by the Governor on such matters as the appointment and removal of ministers, the allocation of portfolios, and the summoning, proroguing and dissolution of the Legislative Council. While not in general bound to accept the Chief Minister's advice, the Governor would act on his advice in the appointment or removal of ministers belonging to the Chief Minister's party. The number of unofficial ministers in the Executive Council would be increased to ten, and the Colonial Secretary would be re-styled Chief Secretary.

22. Under the proposed second stage, the Executive Council would be called the Council of Ministers, and the Chief Minister would be given the title of Premier. The Chief Secretary would be the only official member of the Council; he would also become Minister for Home Affairs and an unofficial Deputy Minister for Home Affairs would be appointed. Provision would be made for the post of Attorney-General to be filled by either an official or unofficial minister. If the former, while ceasing to be a member of the Council, he would be available to attend meetings as an adviser. If the post were filled by an unofficial minister, a new official post of Director of Public Prosecutions would be created, with sole responsibility for the initiation, conduct and discontinuance of prosecutions.

23. The Legislature, to be renamed the Legislative Assembly, would contain forty elected members as before, but the maximum number of nominated members would be increased from twelve to fifteen; it was contemplated that two or three of these appointments should be held in reserve. The Financial Secretary and, if an official, the Attorney-General, would cease to be members of the Legislative Assembly.

24. The Speaker would be elected by the Legislative Assembly from among its members rather than appointed by the Governor from outside of the Legislature as at present. Provision for the election of the Speaker was not to become effective until the retirement of the present Speaker, who is not required to vacate his office by reason of the dissolution of the Legislature.

25. In the second stage of the plan, the existing Public Service and Police Service Commissions and a proposed Judicial and Legal Service Commission would remain advisory to the Governor, who would, however, be required to consult the Premier in respect of the appointment of the senior administrative officer in a ministry and heads of departments. Later, during the life of the Legislative Assembly following the next general election, the commissions would become executive. At that time, while the Governor would continue to appoint the chairman and members of each commission in his discretion, he would be required to consult the Premier in respect of these appointments.

26. Under the constitutional proposals, external affairs, defence and internal security would remain within the responsibility of the Governor, but he would consult with the Premier on these matters. Operational control of the police and special forces would continue to be the responsibility of the Commissioner of Police under the authority of the Governor. The proposed constitution would also include provision for safeguarding human rights and fundamental freedoms and for the redress of infringements of these rights and freedoms in the courts.

27. According to a communiqué issued at the end of the Conference, the proposals were unacceptable to the Independent Forward Bloc and the Parti Mauricien. The Mauritius Labour Party considered that the proposals did not provide the measure of advance which they were fully justified in claiming, and the Muslim Committee of Action did not consider that they adequately safeguarded the interests of the Moslem community. These two parties nevertheless reluctantly accepted the proposals as a compromise. The communiqué stated that the Secretary of State for the Colonies had informed the Conference that, while it was clear that unanimous agreement could not be reached, in his view a sufficient measure of acceptance had been indicated to justify his recommending the adoption of his proposals.

28. The second stage of the plan was to be implemented after the next general elections, if the constitutional proposals were then approved by the new Legislative Council and recommended to the Secretary of State for the Colonies by the Chief Minister. The new Legislative Assembly was to meet on 3 March 1964.

29. In July 1963, the Chief Minister, Dr. S. Ramgoolam, stated that his country should achieve independence by the middle of 1964.

30. On 14 September 1963, the Legislative Council which had been in existence since 1959, was dissolved by the Governor. In the elections which took place on 21 October 1963, the Labour Party headed by Dr. Ramgoolam was returned to power as the party receiving the highest percentage of votes. It was supported in the Council by the Muslim Committee of Action.

Political parties

31. The main political parties in the Territory are now the Mauritius Labour Party, whose leader, Dr. S. Ramgoolam, is the Chief Minister; the Parti Mauricien, headed by Mr. J. Koenig; the Independent Forward Bloc, under the leadership of Mr. S. Bissoon-doyal; and the Muslim Committee of Action, headed by Mr. A. R. Mohamed. Two other parties which had contested seats in the 1959 general elections are the Trade Unionist Party and the Independent Labour Party.

Economic conditions

32. The sugar industry dominates the whole economy of Mauritius. Sugar cane covers 90 per cent of the total area under cultivation and the yield represents 96 per cent of all arable production and accounts for about 97 per cent of the Territory's exports. The Territory is dependent on imports for most of its local food requirements, although some maize, vegetables and fruit, livestock, fish, tobacco and tea are produced locally, tea yielding a small surplus for export. Aloe fibre for making sacks is also produced. Mauritius is completely lacking in mineral resources. Its main industries are the processing of local crops, namely, cane-milling factories, alcohol distilleries, tea, fibre and sack factories. There are also small manufacturing enterprises producing wine, oil and soap, cigarettes, aerated beverages, dairy produce, salt, lime and bricks, and various small trades, including printing, tanneries and mechanical and electrical workshops. Efforts are being made to develop a tourist industry.

33. Domestic exports amount to about Rs.300 million<sup>1</sup> a year. Imports, valued at over Rs.286 million in 1959, rose to over Rs.331 million in 1960 and to over Rs.323 and Rs.322 million in 1961 and 1962, respectively, establishing a recurrent unfavourable balance of trade in recent years. Over 90 per cent of the Territory's exports go to the United Kingdom and other preferential tariff countries, more than 80 per cent to the United Kingdom alone. About 70 per cent of the Territory's imports come from the United Kingdom and other preferential tariff countries, the percentage of imports from the United Kingdom itself having been reduced from 36.9 per cent in 1959 to 29.9 per cent in 1962.

34. The Territory has enjoyed relative prosperity since the Second World War, owing largely to increased sugar production and favourable prices under the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement, which runs to the end of 1968. From 1953 to 1961 the gross national product increased by 24.6 per cent, from Rs.566 million to Rs.705 million, though temporary setbacks have been experienced. In 1960, two cyclones inflicted severe damage on the island. Sugar production fell from a record high of 580,372 metric tons in 1959 to 235,578 metric tons in 1960, resulting in a reduction of exports to Rs.184,985,942 and a drop in the gross national product to Rs.559 million. Another cyclone which struck the island in February 1962 reduced the sugar crop from an estimated record high of 650,000 metric tons to 532,000 metric tons.

35. Ordinary recurrent revenue of the Territory, derived mainly from import, excise and export duties and income tax, increased from Rs.15.6 million in 1938/39 to Rs.55 million in 1949/50 and Rs.154.5 million in 1961/62. Recurrent expenditure for the same years amounted to Rs.16.4 million, Rs.50 million and Rs.156 million, respectively. For the financial years 1960/61 and 1961/62, capital revenue amounted to almost Rs.36 million and Rs.39 million respectively for the two years. The bulk of the capital revenue for the two years combined was derived from loans (Rs.24.5 million), transfers from the recurrent budget (Rs.19.5 million), grants (Rs.16.1 million) and capital receipts connected with Colonial Development and Welfare schemes (about Rs.12.9 million). At 30 June 1962, the Territory had a public debt of Rs.152,150,916, of which Rs.18,667,283 was covered by an accumulated sinking fund.

36. A five-year development programme for the period 1957-1962, initially estimated to cost some Rs.210,252,000, had to be wound up because of the cyclone damage to the Territory in 1960, and a new five-year programme was formulated covering the period 1960-1965. The new development programme places emphasis on cyclone repair and reconstruction and the construction of cyclone-proof houses, as well as some measure of diversification of the economy by the encouragement of secondary industries. Projected sources for financing the programme, to a total of Rs.326.9 million are: local resources (Rs.158.5 million); loans and grants from the United Kingdom for a low-cost cyclone housing programme (Rs.72.2 million); other loans and grants from the United Kingdom Colonial Services Vote and Colonial Development and Welfare funds (Rs.45.9 million); external sources (Rs.50 million); and miscellaneous grants (Rs.0.3 million).

37. A loan of $7 million was granted to Mauritius by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD) in September 1963. The loan was to be used to finance the construction of a 12,000-kilowatt diesel power station at Port Louis and an expansion and improvement of the transmission and distribution system, thus increasing the Territory's public power supplies by nearly one third.

Social conditions

38. Labour. The main labour force in Mauritius is made up of the sugar plantation workers, whose number reaches its maximum from July to December during the harvest season. Approximately 67,000 workers were employed on the plantations in September 1962. There were at the end of June 1962, 69 trade unions consisting of 32 associations of employees in private employment, 24 of government servants, 11 of employers and 2 registered federations. The membership of the Plantation Workers' Union then stood at 13,956 and that of the Agricultural Workers' Union at 4,596.

39. The Ministry of Labour and Social Security is responsible for implementing labour laws and for advising on all matters involving the rights and welfare of workers. Through its Employment Service Division, the Ministry registers unemployed workers, provides information on employment opportunities and a full placing service, collects and analyses statistics, in co-ordination with the Central Statistical Office, relating to employment information, and promotes vocational training schemes. The Ministry prosecutes labour law breakers before the Industrial Court. Labour laws are kept constantly under review to give effect to International Labour Conventions which have been applied to the Territory.

40. Public health. Medical and health services, which until April 1962 had been administered by a Director of Medical Services, are now the responsibility of the Ministry of Health and Reform Institutions. There were eight general hospitals (1,566 beds) and 42 dispensaries (32 of which were in the rural areas) run by the Government in 1962, while private institutions included 25 sugar estate hospitals (500 beds), 18 dispensaries and 5 nursing homes and clinics (89 beds). In addition, the Government provided or subsidized the following facilities: 9 maternity and child welfare centres, 18 social welfare centres, a mental hospital, an emergency tuberculosis hospital, a leprosarium, a chest clinic, 7 maternity wards in hospitals as well as 10 mobile clinics for medical, dental and ante-natal care. Medical and health staff in the Territory were as follows:

	Government	Private
Registered medical practitioners.....	98	64
Dentists .....	6	25
Nurses of senior training.....	11	—
Nurses in hospitals.....	259	—
Dressers in hospitals.....	287	—
Midwives .....	74	—
Sanitary inspectors .....	64	—
X-ray technicians .....	14	—
Pharmacists .....	3	51

41. Assistance by the World Health Organization (WHO) is provided for the eradication of malaria and tuberculosis from the Territory. In 1962, 226 cases of malaria were reported, none of which was mortal (in 1945 there were 3,534 deaths). There were sixty-four deaths from tuberculosis in 1962, compared with seventy-five in 1961 and ninety-three in 1960. The normal death rate in the Territory is .93 per cent. Infant mortality is 6 per cent. Government expenditure on medical and health services in the financial year 1961/62 was Rs.17,426,996 or 11.17 per cent of the Territory's budget.

Educational conditions

42. The primary school age population in the Territory has been estimated at 137,000, out of a total population of about 700,000. The educational system provides for a primary course of six years, and the number of children attending primary schools in 1962 was 125,667, of whom 22,942 were in Standard VI, the final year of primary schooling.

43. Secondary education is almost exclusively of the grammar school type, leading to university courses. Secondary schools offer either a five-year course leading to the Cambridge School Certificate or a seven-year course up to the Cambridge Higher School Certificate level. The four government secondary schools can meet only part of the demand. In October 1962, there were 1,750 pupils in these schools. (The previous year the number of applications for admission was seven times the number of places available.) A number of private schools—offering either the five-year or the seven-year course—are subsidized and are known as "approved secondary schools". They numbered thirteen in 1962 and had an enrolment of 4,688. The number of unaided secondary schools was eighty-eight, with an enrolment of 20,423 during the same year.

44. In addition to the "academic" education provided by the schools referred to above, the Technical Institute offers technical and commercial courses of three or five years' duration and had an enrolment of 147 in 1961. The government central schools, one for boys and one for girls, provide a three-year course in ordinary academic subjects, with a bias for practical subjects such as woodwork and metal-work for boys and domestic science for girls. There were eighty boys and seventy-eight girls on roll in 1961. There was a total enrolment of 319 in these three institutions in 1962. In the same year, 575 students were in the Teachers' Training College.

45. The institution for higher education in the Territory is the College of Agriculture where sixty-seven boys were enrolled in 1961.

46. The Government of Mauritius awards annually six scholarships to Form VI students (four boys and two girls) for university education in the United Kingdom or other approved countries. In addition, twenty awards were made by Commonwealth countries under the Commonwealth Scholarship Plan.

47. Under the Education (Amendment) Ordinance 1960, the progress and development of the educational system of the Territory is the direct responsibility of the Minister of Education and Cultural Affairs. Expenditure on education during the financial year 1961/62 amounted to Rs.23.53 million, of which Rs.20.66 million was recurrent and Rs.2.87 million was capital expenditure. Recurrent expenditure represented nearly 14 per cent of total government expenditure of a recurrent nature.

Statements by members of the Committee

103. The representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland described the geography and reviewed the history of Mauritius. He said the island had been uninhabited until the seventeenth century. By the middle of the nineteenth century the population was 300,000 and it had more than doubled in the last century. Two thirds were of Indian descent or origin. The island's central economic problem was the pressure of its rapidly expanding population of 700,000 on the limited area of productive land available out of a total area of 720 square miles. The Mauritius Government was very conscious of the need for maximum utilization of all available resources and was anxious to encourage the diversification of agriculture, which was concentrated in sugar production. It had introduced a five-year tea development programme in 1961 which aimed at planting a further 2,500 acres of tea by mid-1965. Land had been leased to individual planters under a government-sponsored scheme and the Mauritius Agricultural Bank had started granting loans for tea plantations on Crown lands. While in 1953 Mauritius had produced only 900,000 pounds of tea and had imported more tea than it had exported, by 1963 annual production had risen to over 3.25 million pounds, of which about two thirds had been exported. There was also scope for increasing the production of vegetables and other food-crops, and the Mauritius Government planned to establish a marketing organization to encourage producers. Improvements were also planned in the cattle industry in order to increase the output of milk and other animal products.

104. The Government of Mauritius had submitted a request to the United Nations Special Fund for assistance in a land and water resources survey, which would be considered by the Governing Council of the Fund within the next few months. If the project could be successfully carried out, the data collected would enable the Government to plan maximum use of its natural resources based on total control of the land and water resources and to prepare a follow-up programme of soil and water conservation, reforestation of watersheds, replanning of existing farms, and resettlement of fragmented holdings.

105. The Mauritius Government was doing everything in its power to encourage the establishment of manufacturing and processing industries; it had made income-tax concessions to new industries and revised the customs tariffs in order to give preferential treatment to selected industries. Those incentives had already produced results, both in a marked increase in the number of products manufactured locally and in the establishment of a modern sawmill, brewery and milk-

B. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEEIntroduction*

100. At its 245th meeting on 20 April 1964, the Special Committee heard general statements on these Territories.

101. At its 299th, 300th, and 302nd to 304th meetings between 2 and 9 November 1964, the Special Committee considered the report of Sub-Committee I on Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, which appears as an annex to this chapter.

processing factory. One of the principal instruments at the Government's disposal for stimulating the diversification of the economy was the newly created Development Bank, which would make funds available for investment in productive enterprises, particularly in the field of secondary industry and tourism.

106. Under the current development programme a major effort was being made to strengthen the island's physical infra-structure in a number of important sectors. New harbour installations were being constructed at Port Louis, the island's only port, to improve the existing facilities; plans had been made for the further development of the international airport at Plaisance, including the extension of the runway to enable it to handle heavy jet aircraft; the construction of a new double carriage-way trunk-road between Port Louis and Phoenix had been completed and a big programme was under way to improve roads and bridges in other parts of the island; and IBRD had made a $7 million loan to Mauritius in September 1963 for an electric power project which would increase the island's public power supply by nearly one third.

107. Mauritius had financed the greater part of its development in recent years from its own resources, but an important contribution had also been made by the British Government in grants and loans under the Colonial Development and Welfare Acts and in other assistance towards reconstruction after the 1960 cyclones. In all, the United Kingdom Government was contributing about one third of the total cost of the 1960-1965 development programme, which envisaged a total expenditure of approximately $26.5 million.

108. In the social sphere, the United Kingdom representative noted that housing was a very important problem, particularly in view of the destruction wrought by the disastrous cyclones of recent years. The Mauritius Government had in January 1961 established a Central Housing Authority, which had let contracts for the construction of 6,000 houses in urban areas and 3,000 houses in rural areas, of which 5,471 had been completed by mid-1963. The Government's scheme for the construction of a new Central Hospital for the North with an attached nursing school was now in the architectural planning stage and would add 550 beds to the more than 1,500 beds in the existing eight hospitals.

109. In the field of social security, Mauritius had had an extensive system of public assistance for many years and an advanced system of non-contributory pensions for all. Since January 1962, a family allowance scheme had been in force. In the field of education, the current development programme provided for the expenditure of over £1 million on the improvement of primary and secondary educational facilities. Primary education was virtually universal.

110. Reviewing political and constitutional developments since the first general elections in 1959, he said that, as a result of the second general elections held on the basis of universal suffrage in October 1963, the Labour Party had won nineteen seats, the Parti Mauricien eight, the Independent Forward Bloc seven, the Muslim Committee of Action four, and the independents two. In accordance with the provisions of the 1961 constitutional review talks, the Legislative Council had requested the introduction of the second stage of constitutional advance towards internal self-government (see paragraphs 20-28 above). The necessary changes had accordingly been brought into force on 12 March 1964. The Executive Council had now become the Council of Ministers with Dr. Ramgoolam, the leader of the Labour Party, which was the majority party in the Legislature, as Premier. The Legislative Council had become the Legislative Assembly.

111. An important feature of the new Constitution was that the Council of Ministers was not a majority-party government but rather an all-party government including representatives of the other parties or elements which had accepted the principle of collective responsibility. The present Government had six ministers, including the Premier, from the Labour Party, three from the Parti Mauricien, two from the Independent Forward Bloc, two from the Muslim Committee of Action and one independent.

112. As a result of the changes, Mauritius had made substantial progress towards full internal self-government. The willingness of the political parties to co-operate in the implementation of the new Constitution and their agreement to serve in an all-party Government were encouraging signs for the future. In a communiqué issued after the constitutional review talks in 1961, the Mauritius political parties had accepted that the next step after the introduction of the second stage should be to continue the advance towards internal self-government and had agreed to discuss that question during the year beginning October 1965. With regard to the future status of Mauritius, paragraph 5 of the communiqué had stated that it was not possible at that stage to suggest what should be the precise status of Mauritius after the attainment of full internal self-government; while it was the general wish that Mauritius should remain within the Commonwealth, whether that should be achieved as an independent State or in some form of special association either with the United Kingdom or with other independent Commonwealth countries were matters which should be considered in the next few years in the light of constitutional progress generally. That remained the position.

113. Turning to Seychelles and St. Helena, the United Kingdom representative said the Territories had much in common. Both were isolated in the ocean and had a very small population—43,000 in the Seychelles and 4,700 in St. Helena. Neither Territory was inhabited before the arrival of the first Europeans. Both had been carrying out important development programmes with assistance from the United Kingdom Government. Since 1945, the Seychelles Government had received $4.2 million in direct grants under the Colonial Development and Welfare Acts to finance over 100 development schemes of various kinds. Under a new over-all development plan for the two-year period ending 31 March 1966 expenditure would reach over $2.1 million, of which $1.5 million would take the form of grants from the United Kingdom Government, the rest being locally raised loans. The bulk of the grants would be devoted to natural resources, public works and communications, and social services. The Seychelles Government had for some years been implementing an important land settlement scheme for the local population under which small-holders leased from the Government, at an economic rate, plots of land averaging five acres on which they grew export and food crops for local consumption. It was hoped that that scheme would eventually result in the production of a significant quantity of such crops.

114. In order to encourage diversification of agricultural production, tea-growing had recently been introduced in Seychelles and a government loan was being made available for the erection of a factory. Strong efforts were also being made to promote the tourist industry and the Seychelles tax laws provided for development loans as an encouragement to the hotel industry and to fishing, processing and manufacturing industries.

115. In the case of St. Helena, development grants totalling well over $750,000 had been made in the last five years and a further $420,000 had been made available to meet development costs in the two-year period, April 1964 to March 1966. Development since 1959 had been concentrated on agriculture and road improvement, in addition to electricity distribution, housing and education.

116. The constitutional arrangements in Seychelles and St. Helena were not elaborate but were designed to suit the basic requirements of efficient administration and popular representation. The main executive organ in each case was the Executive Council, presided over by the Governor, and consisting of twelve members in the case of Seychelles—six being Seychellois—and six in the case of St. Helena, three of whom were islanders. In addition to the Executive Council, Seychelles had a Legislative Council of twelve members, five of whom were elected, and St. Helena had an Advisory Council of sixteen members, eight of whom were elected. The Governor presided over the Council in each case. Elections had been held in both Territories last year.

117. With regard to the future of the two Territories, he emphasized that the United Kingdom Government was fully conscious of its obligations under Article 73 of the United Nations Charter. In both Territories, general elections had been held within the last nine months and there was complete freedom of expression and a general acceptance of the present constitutional position. The inhabitants had no desire to sever their links with the United Kingdom. The exact form which those relationships of friendship and co-operation should take in the future and the way in which they might find expression in the constitution of each Territory were matters which would be worked out between the United Kingdom Government and the inhabitants of the Territories through the normal processes of consultation and discussion.

118. The representative of Madagascar said that Madagascar, which was a neighbour of Mauritius, had no territorial ambitions in regard to that Territory and was pleased to note that inter-racial relations on the island were excellent. In the opinion of his country, the population of Mauritius enjoyed a degree of self-government which he could wish for many other African countries. Political, social and economic conditions in the Territory were excellent and the people had many times had occasion freely to express their views on the form of progress they desired for their country. He was therefore firmly convinced that Mauritius was being administered according to the principles underlying the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960). He hoped that the political advancement of the Territory would, as in the past, continue in wisdom and tranquillity and that the people would, when the time arrived, freely express their desires in regard to the final constitution which they wished their country to have. He therefore supported the report on the Territory of Mauritius.

119. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the provisions of the Declaration were applicable to all Territories irrespective of size and location. The Committee should devote special attention to small Territories, which found it more difficult than larger ones to throw off the colonial yoke. No matter how grievous was the lot of the large colonial Territories, no matter how savagely the colonizers treated the peoples of those Territories, their prospects, viewed against the background of historical development in the modern age, looked more hopeful. They had the advantage that, by uniting, they could throw off age-old oppression and colonial slavery. The numerically small peoples did not enjoy that advantage, and it was therefore the duty of the United Nations and of all opponents of colonialism to speak up in defence of the human rights of peoples and to give all possible support to their aspirations for freedom. All peoples, large and small, irrespective of their stage of development, had the same right to freedom and independence and the same right to decide on their internal structure and their path of development. The attempts of the colonialist Powers to preserve their domination over those peoples and their refusal to implement the provisions of the Declaration were a violation of the fundamental rights and freedoms of colonial peoples and of the provisions of international law. By adopting the Declaration, the United Nations had recognized that the fight of colonial peoples for freedom and independence, including armed struggle if necessary, was legitimate and justified and that the attempts of the colonialist Powers to preserve their domination was unlawful and criminal.

120. In considering the application of the Declaration to small Territories, the Committee should proceed from certain premises.

121. First, there must be unconditional respect for the principle, embodied in the Declaration, that all peoples had the right to self-determination and independence, irrespective of the size and population of any colonial Territory, irrespective of the degree of development or backwardness of a particular Territory. The decision on the question of the future status of any colonial Territory must be approached on the basis of that principle.

122. If any nation or nationality was denied the right to vote freely—through universal and equal elections or through a popular consultation, plebiscite or referendum—and to decide, without the slightest coercion, on the forms of its future existence as a State, then the unification of that nation or nationality with another State, no matter in what form—whether association, integration, federation or some other form—could only be regarded as annexation: i.e., as seizure by brute force. The question of the future state status of any Territory, the forms of its future state structure and the lines of its development must be decided by the people themselves without the slightest coercion. That was the only way consistent with the letter and spirit of the Declaration to decide the question of the future status of any Territory, even a small Territory.

123. The situation varied from one small colonial Territory to another. There were some territories, such as Hong Kong and Macao, which, although under colonial occupation, were unquestionably an integral part of another independent State. Territories which had been thus torn from the mother country should be returned to it; their immemorial lands had been returned to India and Dahomey for example. Other Territories might wish to unite, or associate themselves, with a neighbouring ethnically related population in a unitary or federal State, or again, might prefer complete independence. In any event, the decision whether to form a federation or association with any State should be taken by the population of the Territory concerned and not by the colonial Power. To that end the Committee should prepare and recommend to the General Assembly measures designed to verify that the peoples of small Territories were really given full freedom to determine their own future, whether through elections held on the basis of universal suffrage or through a national referendum. Such elections or referendum should be conducted under United Nations supervision.

124. A second premise, of extreme importance to the free and unimpeded expression of the people's will in small colonial Territories, was complete and unrestricted freedom of activity for all democratic organizations in the Territory concerned. Freedom of meeting and assembly, freedom of the Press and of speech for all democratic elements in the country should be guaranteed. All laws and regulations permitting national or racial discrimination should be repealed; all bans and restrictions on the activity of political parties, trade unions and other social organizations of the indigenous population should be rescinded. All political prisoners should be released immediately. Political exiles who had worked for self-determination and independence should be allowed to return to their own Territory and engage in political activity there without restriction. Unless such measures were taken, statements by the representatives of individual colonial Powers concerning their Government's readiness to implement the Declaration were empty and meaningless from the standpoint of the principles embodied in the Declaration and in the United Nations Charter.

125. A third and essential premise for the unhampered expression of the will of the population of colonial Territories regarding the future status of such Territories was the withdrawal of all the administering Powers' troops and military personnel and the elimination of all foreign military bases from those Territories.

126. The Soviet delegation could not agree with the view held by certain delegations that the question of military bases maintained by colonial Powers in the Territories under their control was one that should be settled after a Territory had acceded to independence. It rejected out of hand the "theory" advanced by the Australian representative that the presence of foreign bases in colonial Territories was not an obstacle to the complete liberation of peoples from colonial rule. Experience constantly showed that the presence of such bases in any foreign territory not only constituted centres of aggression against freedom-loving and peace-loving peoples but threatened the future independent development of young States. The United Kingdom was using its base in Aden to combat the national liberation movement in the Arab and African States and to suppress that movement in South Arabia itself. It should also be remembered that the people of colonial Territories were denied any opportunity to state their views on the question of foreign bases and, when they attained independence, often received, into the bargain, foreign military bases, which laid a heavy burden on a country and restricted its sovereignty. Hence any attempts on the part of the colonial Powers to retain their bases in the Territories under their control, to justify or to explain the retention of those bases, were nothing more or less than an endeavour to restrict in advance the sovereign rights of those Territories' peoples.

127. It had been asserted in the debate in the General Assembly that small colonial Territories would not be viable unless they maintained some kind of link with the metropolitan country. Views had even been expressed that the best thing that could happen to such small Territories would be to merge with the former colonial Powers; in other words, the idea had been that the metropolitan countries should simply absorb their former colonies. The Committee could not concur in such views. The people of the small Territories would be able to solve the problems of economic development for themselves. If they were to do so, however, not only must the domestic resources of the small Territories be mobilized, but the privileges of the metropolitan countries and of their nationals and enterprises must be abolished. The wealth of the Territories must be used for the well-being of the Territories' peoples, and all land alienated on any pretext whatever must be returned to the peoples. In addition, the United Nations could examine that question on the basis of requests for assistance submitted by the peoples concerned, and not on the basis of decisions taken by particular United Nations organs over the heads of those peoples. That question required further study. The United Nations would, of course, have to pay particular attention to the question of organizing economic and other assistance to such Territories, and would have to devise forms of assistance that would afford a secure opportunity for self-supporting economic and political development under conditions of equality and freedom.

C. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE I

128. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics thought that the Sub-Committee's report recorded the position of the USSR adequately, though not fully, particularly in view of the statement made by the Soviet delegation at the 3rd meeting of the Sub-Committee on 28 April 1964—a statement which the United Kingdom, despite the clumsy endeavours of its representatives, had not been able to refute.

129. Since the Territories in question had been studied, several important events had occurred. As was known, Mauritius and the Seychelles were in the Indian Ocean; that Ocean had lately become the object of attention in military circles in the Western countries which, owing to the liquidation of the colonial régimes in large colonial Territories, had been compelled to change their policy on their island colonial possessions in favour of using them as military bases. The Soviet delegation had already stated that those Territories and St. Helena, and their dependencies, were being used by the Western Powers for military purposes. The United States and the United Kingdom were now reaching agreement to establish joint military bases in the British possessions in the Indian Ocean. Talks were at present proceeding between the military commands of the two countries in the greatest secrecy, since, as The Daily Telegraph had written, the two States were afraid of an anti-colonial storm in the United Nations.

130. It was now known that a plot was being hatched not only against the peoples of those colonial Territories but against the peoples of States in the Indian Ocean area. On 11 October 1964, The Washington Post had written that the Chiefs of Staff of the United Kingdom and the United States were examining the recommendations of an Anglo-American naval mission which had selected the Island of Diego Garcia in the Chagos Archipelago, which was a dependency of Mauritius, and the Aldabra Islands, which were administered with the Seychelles, and had also studied the possibility of establishing bases on islands close to the Arabian Peninsula and the shores of India. The Daily Telegraph had indicated that Mr. McCloskey, the representative of the State Department, had confirmed those plans. The Washington Post had written, on 29 August, that the State Department had spoken in favour of an American presence in the Indian Ocean—a presence which in its view would be a politically stabilizing factor and would facilitate action by British and United States forces in South and South-East Asia. Some British officials, according to the 11 October issue of the same newspaper, thought that the bases in the Indian Ocean could if necessary take the place of those in Aden; while according to some reports, it was also planned to station "landing forces" there for operations against the national liberation movement in the area.

131. The plans to establish military bases in the Indian Ocean were part and parcel of the military plans of the Western Powers, which were striving to retain footholds in various parts of the globe. The Washington Post had reported on 29 August that island bases had long figured as an aim in the plans of some United States naval strategists because political unrest affected the rights to bases in other countries. It was frankly admitted that the only bases which could be relied upon in the long term were bases which could not become an object of nationalist agitation. It was certain that the United States wished to participate in colonial policy in that region too; but it was also certain that the attitude of the administering Power with regard to the establishment of such bases should be founded only on the opinion of the population of those Territories. In that connexion, the Soviet delegation drew the Committee's attention to the communication dated 23 September 1964 (A/AC.109/PET.321) in which Mr. F. A. René, the President of the Seychelles Peoples United Party, had drawn the attention of the United Nations to the fact that there was in the Seychelles a strong movement in favour of independence and stated that, if a base was established in the islands, the inhabitants would have to fight for its removal, once they had obtained their independence.

132. He recalled the statement made by the Soviet delegation on 20 April 1964 in the Special Committee to the effect that foreign military bases were not only an impediment to the establishment and strengthening of the independence of the developing countries, but also a serious obstacle to the liberation of peoples still under colonial domination, a grave threat to the future development of those Territories, and a point d'appui for aggression against peace-loving peoples.

133. The Soviet delegation, which resolutely opposed the installation or maintenance of such bases, associated itself unreservedly with the passages in the Declaration entitled "Programme for Peace and International Co-operation" (A/5763)<sup>3</sup> which condemned the existence or future establishment of bases in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Soviet representative thought that the Special Committee should bear all those considerations in mind when it examined the situation in small colonial Territories, for there could be no free and unhampered expression of the will of the population of colonies concerning their future as long as foreign colonial troops and foreign bases remained in colonial Territories.

134. The representative of India said that the people of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena had an inalienable right to self-determination and independence and that the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence were applicable to all those Territories.

135. His delegation was in general agreement with the conclusions and recommendations of Sub-Committee I as set forth in its report (see annex to this chapter). When Dr. Ramgoolam, the leader of the Labour Party in Mauritius, had become Chief Minister of the Territory in the autumn of 1963, Mr. Nehru had sent him a telegram of congratulations, to which the Chief Minister had replied by saying that he was working to build a multi-racial society and a nation in which all men and women would have an equal share. The constitutional development of Mauritius had opened the way to full internal self-government. However, external affairs, defence and internal security remained the responsibility of the Governor. The Legislative Assembly was not fully elective, and the next elections were not due until 1968, although constitutional discussions might be held in 1965 or 1966.

136. In his delegation's view, the Territory's march towards independence should be further expedited so that the people of Mauritius, like those of the other Territories dealt with in the Sub-Committee's report, could exercise their choice with regard to their future status and independence without undue delay.

137. The representative of Poland expressed appreciation to Sub-Committee I for its report and for the objective manner in which it had carried out its task. His delegation agreed with the conclusions and recommendations of the report, which rightly stated that the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence were applicable to Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena. The peoples of those Territories should already have been given the opportunity to exercise their right to self-determination and independence. However, it was stated in paragraph 63 of the report that progress towards self-government in the three Territories had so far been too slow and that no satisfactory progress had been made with regard to the transfer of power to the people.

138. In Mauritius, where the overwhelming majority of the people were asking for independence at the earliest possible date, nearly all effective powers were still concentrated in the hands of the United Kingdom Governor. The so-called second stage of constitutional advance had brought for the most part only nominal changes. Moreover, it should be noted that the number of nominated members of the Legislative Assembly had increased, while the number of elected members had remained the same.

139. In the Seychelles, nothing had been done to implement resolution 1514 (XV). The Governor held virtually absolute power. A large number of the members of the Executive and Legislative Councils were appointed. The Governor also had the final say in all matters of government, and the suffrage was limited by prosperity and literacy qualifications.

140. The situation in St. Helena was even worse. All legislative powers were vested in the Governor, and the so-called Executive Council had only an advisory function.

141. All of the foregoing showed that the administering Power had so far failed to implement resolution 1514 (XV) and had delayed the granting to the people of the Territories of their right to decide about their future status. The Polish delegation felt that those peoples should be given an opportunity as soon as possible to express their wishes by means of elections based on universal suffrage. It also supported the Sub-Committee's recommendation that the constitutional conference on Mauritius should be convened immediately, with the participation of all the political parties, in order to draw up a constitution for the Territory and to fix an early date for its independence.

142. His delegation wished to comment on some very recent developments which had taken place after Sub-Committee I had adopted its report. In a petition (A/AC.109/PET.321), the President of the Seychelles Peoples United Party sought United Nations assistance in preventing the establishment of a military base on one of the islands of the Territory. Moreover, information which had appeared in the Press indicated that the United Kingdom and the United States were attempting to establish naval bases on the Island of Diego Garcia, in the archipelago of Chagos, which was a dependency of Mauritius, and in the Aldabra Islands, which were part of the Seychelles.

143. The Polish delegation felt that it was the duty of the Special Committee to denounce those plans. Recent history had shown that military bases were used not only to impede the process of decolonization but also to exert pressure on newly independent countries. The African Heads of State and Government at the recent Conference of Non-Aligned Countries had expressly condemned the plan to establish military bases in the Indian Ocean as an attempt to intimidate the emerging countries of Africa and Asia and a manifestation of the policy of neo-colonialism and imperialism (A/5763, section VIII). The representative of Poland recalled that the Special Committee had already requested the removal of the military base in Aden, which had been used for the suppression of the liberation movement, and felt that a similar action with regard to the preparations for the establishment of military bases in Mauritius and the Seychelles would be fully justified.

144. His delegation proposed that the Committee should adopt the report of Sub-Committee I with the following amendment: the words "and to an even greater extent the Constitutions of Seychelles and St. Helena" should be inserted after the words "the present Constitution of Mauritius" in the first sentence of paragraph 62 and, in the same sentence, the words "three Territories" should be substituted for the word "Territory".

145. The representative of Syria said that, since his delegation had been a member of Sub-Committee I, its views on the matter under discussion were reflected in the Sub-Committee's report. His delegation felt that the people of the islands in question were entitled to full independence. The Seychelles had served as a place of detention for political exiles from a number of countries, including some in the Middle East. Many of the exiles had suffered from ill health and some had died there.

146. It was a known fact that Mauritius and the Seychelles were regarded as of great strategic importance. In May 1964, the United Kingdom representative in Sub-Committee I had denied the existence of plans for the establishment of military or naval bases in the islands. However, according to reports published in the Press on 4 November 1964, studies were being made by certain great Powers with a view to the establishment of joint military bases on the islands. While he would not attempt to evaluate the accuracy of that information, he wished to say that his Government was opposed to the establishment of military bases anywhere by anyone. The islands under discussion were not very far from Aden and the Arabian Peninsula or from Africa—a fact which could not fail to arouse some concern. The Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries had, in their Declaration, condemned the expressed intention of imperialist Powers to establish bases in the Indian Ocean as a calculated attempt to intimidate the emerging countries of Africa and Asia and an unwarranted extension of the policy of neo-colonialism and imperialism (A/5763, section VIII). That declaration had been unanimously adopted by forty-seven Heads of State or Government representing more than one third of the world's population. In his opinion, the Committee was in duty bound to give the most serious attention to the apprehension expressed in the declaration. Constitutional advances should be made in the Territories without delay, and the idea of converting them into military bases should be totally discarded.

147. The representative of the United Kingdom said that his delegation had taken note of the Sub-Committee's report and would transmit it to its Government when adopted. He reserved the position of his Government on the recommendations addressed to it.

148. He proposed the replacement, in paragraphs 64 and 67 (d), of the words, "coalition government" by "all-party government", which better described the Government of Mauritius.

149. His delegation had noted the recommendation in paragraph 67 (d) that a constitutional conference should be convened immediately. In both the pace and the direction of constitutional advance in the Territory, his Government would be guided by the wishes of the people, as expressed through democratic procedures and through their freely chosen leaders and representatives. It was surely the unanimous feeling of the Special Committee that it was what the people themselves wanted, that must be regarded as the decisive consideration, in accordance with the principle of self-determination and with paragraph 2 of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

150. The representative of the United States of America believed that the conclusions and recommendations of the report did not take fully into account the political situation in the Territories, particularly Mauritius. It would appear from paragraph 62 of the conclusions that the Legislative Assembly of Mauritius had no power whatsoever. That conclusion was misleading in view of the information given by the United Kingdom representative as set forth in paragraph 28 of the report. A large degree of self-government was to be seen in the Legislative Assembly, the Council of Ministers which advised the Governor on government and administrative matters, and the Prime Minister.

151. With regard to the recommendations in the report, his delegation, while supporting the principles embodied in the recommendations, considered that the people of those Territories had every opportunity to express their wishes concerning their future political and constitutional status and would be able to decide their future status when they were ready to do so. As to the method of supervision of the act of self-determination, his delegation believed that that was a question solely for the administering Power.

152. At the 304th meeting, on 9 November 1964, the Special Committee approved the report of Sub-Committee I concerning Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena (see annex to this chapter) and adopted without objection the conclusions and recommendations contained therein with the following oral amendments:

(a) In the first sentence of paragraph 62, the insertion of the words "and to an even greater extent the Constitutions of Seychelles and St. Helena" after the words "the present Constitution of Mauritius"; and the replacement of the word "Territory" by the words "three Territories", as proposed by the representative of Poland.

(b) In paragraphs 64 and 67 (d), the replacement of the words "a coalition government" by the words "an all-party government", as proposed by the United Kingdom.

153. The conclusions and recommendations adopted by the Special Committee are as follows.

Conclusions

154. The Special Committee is of the opinion that the present Constitution of Mauritius, and to an even greater extent the Constitutions of Seychelles and St. Helena, do not allow the representatives of the people to exercise real legislative or executive powers, and that authority is nearly all concentrated in the hands of the United Kingdom Government and its representatives in the three Territories. All laws passed by the Legislative Assembly are subject to the assent of the Governor, who is empowered, moreover, to give legal effect to any bill before the Assembly even if it has not been voted upon.

155. Progress towards self-government in the three Territories has so far been too slow. No satisfactory progress has been made with regard to the transfer of power to the people.

156. The Special Committee was pleased to learn that the various political parties of Mauritius had recently combined their efforts to form an all-party government of the Territory.

157. The Special Committee has come to the conclusion that key positions of responsibility in the administration of the Territories are still in the hands of United Kingdom personnel. The training of indigenous persons in administration and higher education for such positions is slow and inadequate, particularly at a time when these Territories are approaching self-government and independence.

158. The economy of the Territories is characterized by lack of diversification and insufficient capital investment. The steps taken by the administering Power in the field of economic development are slow and inadequate.

Recommendations

159. The peoples of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena have an inalienable right to self-determination and independence in accordance with the United Nations Charter and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The Special Committee accordingly recommends that the administering Power should take the following measures:

(a) The provisions of the Charter and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples should be fully applied to these Territories without delay.

(b) The people of the Territories should be given the opportunity to exercise their right to self-determination without delay under United Nations supervision and in complete freedom.

(c) The people should be guaranteed the right to decide for themselves their status and the form of government and constitutional system that they will adopt for the future.

(d) Concrete steps should be taken for the final transfer of powers of government to the democratically elected representatives of the inhabitants. Bearing in mind that an all-party government has been formed in Mauritius, the Special Committee considers that the constitutional conference on this Territory should be convened immediately, with the participation of all the political parties, in order to draw up a constitution for the Territory and to fix an early date for its independence.

(e) The training of indigenous inhabitants for key positions of responsibility in the administration of the Territories concerned should be speeded up.

(f) Measures should be taken for the rapid and planned development of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena in the economic, social and educational fields. More funds should be allocated for this purpose by the administering Power, and co-operation with the specialized agencies, wherever already established, should continue.

(g) The Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and the relevant documents on the work of the Special Committee should be brought to the attention of the peoples of the Territories utilizing all mass information media.

ANNEX

Report of Sub-Committee I on Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena***

INTRODUCTION

1. At the 234th meeting on 25 March 1964, the Special Committee decided that the Territories included in the preliminary list which were not considered in 1963 should be divided into three groups and referred, for consideration and report, to three Sub-Committees to be appointed by the Chairman.

2. In accordance with this decision, the Territories referred to Sub-Committee I were as follows:

Territories	Administering Power
Mauritius	United Kingdom
Seychelles	United Kingdom
St. Helena	United Kingdom

The Special Committee also decided to entrust Sub-Committee I with the task of considering, in co-operation with the Secretary-General and the agencies of the United Nations, the implications of the activities of the mining industry and the other international companies having interests in South West Africa, in order to assess their economic and political influence and their mode of operation, and reporting to the Special Committee.<sup>a</sup>

3. At the 239th meeting of the Special Committee on 2 April 1964, the Chairman announced that Sub-Committee I would be composed of the following members: Denmark, Ethiopia, Mali, Syria, Tanganyika, Tunisia, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Yugoslavia.

4. At the same meeting the Chairman informed the Special Committee that the representative of the United Kingdom had informed him that the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland did not wish to participate as a full member in any of the three Sub-Committees, but that it would prefer to participate in their work in accordance with the agreement of the Special Committee when it adopted the seventh report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.104). Consequently he had not included the United Kingdom as a member in any of the three Sub-Committees.

5. At its 1st meeting held on 13 April 1964 Sub-Committee I elected Dr. Tesfaye Gebre-Egzy (Ethiopia) as Chairman and Mr. Miloš Melovski (Yugoslavia) as Rapporteur.

6. At the same meeting the Sub-Committee decided that it would first consider Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, administered by the United Kingdom.

CONSIDERATION BY THE SUB-COMMITTEE

7. The Sub-Committee considered the Territories of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena at its 2nd to 6th meetings, held on 23, 28 and 29 April and 6 and 13 May 1964.

8. The Sub-Committee had before it the working paper prepared by the Secretariat (see paragraphs 1-99 of this chapter). It also had before it the statement concerning these Territories which the representative of the United Kingdom made at the 245th meeting of the Special Committee on 20 April 1964 (see paragraphs 103-117 of this chapter).

9. At the request of the representative of the United Kingdom and in accordance with the procedure agreed upon by the Special Committee, the Chairman invited the representative of the United Kingdom to participate in the consideration of the three Territories. Accordingly the representative of the United Kingdom participated in the 3rd, 4th and 5th meetings of the Sub-Committee.

Mauritius

10. The representative of Denmark pointed out that Mauritius was developing towards full internal self-government. The Territory had a mixed population, and it was interesting to note that the different political parties in Mauritius were participating in a coalition government. Elections had recently been held in the Territory and the prerequisite for a truly democratic political representation was thus present. Substantial progress had also been made with regard to local government, and the way had been opened towards full internal self-government.

11. The remaining question was what status Mauritius should have after the attainment of full internal self-government. The Danish delegation's view was that the Sub-Committee should make no recommendation but leave the decision completely to the people of the Territory. Its one-sided economy and its small size might call for some special arrangement. Having representative elected organs, the people were assured that they could express their views freely.

12. The representative of Ethiopia stated that much remained to be accomplished to improve economic, social, health and educational conditions in Mauritius. The administering Power should accelerate the establishment of schools. Facilities for higher education were very limited. At a time when the Territory was approaching independence, there should be an adequate number of trained persons, and it was to be hoped that the number of scholarships for higher study would be increased. His delegation wished also to stress the need for expanding health facilities and for strengthening the contacts already made with WHO. It had been pleased to learn that IBRD had granted Mauritius a loan of $7 million, and it hoped that relations of that kind with United Nations agencies would expand as the Territory progressed towards complete independence.

13. The representative of Ethiopia noted that although, according to the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, immediate steps should be taken for the transfer of powers to the inhabitants of the Territory, progress in that direction was unduly slow. The second stage of constitutional advance for the Territory would not represent any real advance, as it mainly involved a change of names; what was more, it would increase the number of nominated members in the Legislature from twelve to fifteen, while the elected members would remain at forty. In addition, no date had been proposed for independence, and the conditions for the achievement of self-determination had not been anticipated.

14. The representative of Tanganyika said that in Mauritius development towards self-government was slow. The posts of Chief Secretary and Financial Secretary were still held by representatives of the colonial Power. Only an insignificant minority in Mauritius sought to prolong colonial domination and the overwhelming majority of the people were asking for independence at the earliest possible date. The role of the United Nations should be to make it clear to the people that they had the right to self-determination and independence in accordance with resolution 1514 (XV). The administering Power should be urged to publicize the Declaration in the Territory. The United Nations could also send a team of experts to the area to make sure that the people exercised their right to self-determination in full freedom and knowledge.

15. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics reminded the Sub-Committee that his delegation had already stated in the Special Committee the principles which should be followed in considering the application to the small Territories included in the agenda of the Sub-Committee of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Those principles were the following: unconditional recognition of the right of all peoples, whether large or small, to self-determination and independence, regardless of how developed any particular Territory might be; full and unlimited freedom for the population to express their wishes regarding their future; withdrawal of all armed forces and dismantling of the administering Powers' military bases in order to create conditions in which the people could express their will without hindrance; and elimination of any special rights and privileges of the metropolitan countries in relation to the economies of the Territories.

16. The representative of the USSR pointed out that the constitutional changes introduced in Mauritius had had very little effect on its colonial status. All authority in the colony was still vested in the United Kingdom Governor, who held all legislative, executive and judicial power. The rights and privileges of the colonial Power and its nationals were strictly protected by the Constitution of the Territory. All laws required not only the assent of the Governor, but also the approval of Her Majesty's Government, which could disallow any legislative measure even if it had been assented to by the Governor. The prerogatives of the Council of Ministers were very limited. The franchise was subject to property qualifications, the effect of which was to deprive a large part of the working population of the colony of the vote. The constitutional reforms planned by the colonial Power, to which the United Kingdom representative had referred, would enable the Governor to retain all his present powers.

17. The representative of the USSR drew attention to the colonial structure of the economy and the low level of living in Mauritius and said that the economy was wholly controlled by United Kingdom and French capital. The penetration of United States monopolies into the island was a recent development. Among other things, they owned plantations and tobacco factories. There was an odd sort of division of labour between the British and French on the island: the British were mostly employed in the local colonial administration, while the French owned the main sugar and tea plantations and most of the sugar mills and tea processing plants.

18. The social situation in Mauritius was also extremely unsatisfactory. There was chronic unemployment on the island. The Legislative Council's establishment of a special mission to investigate working conditions on the plantations was evidence of the difficult situation of the workers, who, according to The Times of 11 October 1962, were protesting against the striking contrast between the lives of a handful of rich planters and the disinherited mass of workers. In 150 years of domination the colonial administration had been unable to improve the situation of the population in any way. The settlers spread various theories about the island being over-populated and propagated Malthusianism, which they needed in order to conceal from the people the real reason for their wretched situation. Racial discrimination had not been eliminated. Only Europeans—Franco-Mauritians or United Kingdom nationals—could work in banks. There were hotels "reserved for whites", which did not admit Africans and Indians. More than 65 per cent of the inhabitants were illiterate. The colonial administration consistently ignored the demands of the people of the island that its resources should be used and its economy developed in such a way as to serve the interests of the whole population and not just a handful of exploiters. The demands of the Mauritian trade unions for the establishment of a social security system and free education had also been ignored by the colonial administration. The Government of the island was giving great attention to economic and social development. It had established an economic development fund and co-operative banks, which provided the peasants with low-interest loans, and it had undertaken a road-building programme. It realized, however, that it could not promote economic reconstruction in earnest until independence had been achieved. There were already definite plans for the development of certain branches of industry. First of all, it was planned to set up paper factories and textile, footwear and food undertakings. They would work with local materials, which at present were exported. That would make it possible to reduce the amount of foreign currency spent on imported consumer goods and to accumulate the necessary capital for industrialization. A plan to nationalize docks and other port installations belonging to a French company also had first priority.

19. Those facts justified the following conclusions: (1) politically speaking, there existed a situation in the Territory which showed that the administering Power had ignored the provisions of Article 73 of the Charter and those of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples; (2) economically and socially speaking, there was stagnation and destitution among the working masses as a result of the exploitation of the island's natural and human resources.

20. The representative of the USSR stated that the problems of the Territory also included a military aspect. According to the Indian weekly Blitz of 18 May 1963, the United States was planning to turn the island into a guided missile base, despite the opposition of the people. The construction of a powerful radio station on the island to be used by the United Kingdom navy had been completed in 1962. The military interest of the Western Powers in the Territory was evident and constituted a threat to the people. The struggle of the people of Mauritius for national liberation had become particularly intense since the Second World War. The aim of the present Government was independence. In July 1963, Mr. Ramgoolam, the Chief Minister of Mauritius, now Prime Minister, had said that Mauritius must gain its independence by the middle of 1964. The Mauritians realized that many stumbling blocks still awaited them on the road to independence. But scarcely anyone could doubt that despite all obstacles they would achieve their end.

21. In conclusion, the representative of the USSR stated that the Special Committee should adopt recommendations on the Territory providing for:

(a) Confirmation of the right of the people of Mauritius and its dependent territories to self-determination and independence in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples;

(b) The holding of elections in the Territory based on universal suffrage and free from any limitation of the franchise, or a plebiscite, referendum or some other form of expression of the national will which would enable the people of the islands to decide their own future in complete freedom;

(c) The establishment in the Territory, following those elections, of truly representative national legislative and executive organs which would wield all powers;

(d) The withdrawal of all foreign troops and elimination of military installations and bases;

(e) The return to the inhabitants of all the wealth of the island and of all lands taken from them on any pretext.

22. The representative of Yugoslavia regretted that the administering Power's statement in the Special Committee had contained so little new information and had merely described those steps which were to enable the Territory to progress towards "internal self-government". The Yugoslav delegation had already stressed the fact that the Special Committee's task was not to discuss whether the progressive development of the colonies towards internal self-government was being ensured, but rather to see that they were granted the right of self-determination and independence without delay. It was not the Sub-Committee's task to discuss whether a particular small island could actually be an independent State or whether it would continue to remain within the Commonwealth or would choose some other form of association with the United Kingdom or some other independent State. That would be a question for the people to decide. The people must be given a chance to express themselves about their own destiny, and this would be achieved by giving them a chance for self-determination, under the control of the United Nations. The Sub-Committee should request the administering Power, first, to allocate immediately more funds for the economic, social and educational development of the Territory, and secondly, to apply resolution 1514 (XV) to it without delay.

23. The representative of Tunisia stated that the island's Constitution was still essentially a colonial constitution despite the existence of a Council of Ministers and of a Legislative Assembly, some of whose members were elected by universal adult suffrage and others directly appointed. The British Governor enjoyed excessive authority. While the Legislative Assembly could enact laws relating to the Territory's internal affairs, all such laws were subject to the assent of the Governor, who was, moreover, empowered to give legal effect to any bill before the Assembly even if it had not been voted. Thus, the powers of the two Mauritian bodies were purely residual. Since no real progress had been made with regard to the transfer of power to the Mauritians, the Tunisian delegation appealed to the administering Power to lose no time in implementing the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and in granting self-determination and independence to the people of Mauritius.

24. The representative of Syria stated that while his delegation had taken note of the results achieved in the Territory, it felt that the United Kingdom could have done much more and hoped that it would increase its efforts to promote the people's advancement, particularly in the economic, social and educational fields. It was pleased to note that the Territory had recently entered into co-operation with international agencies and hoped that that co-operation would be intensified.

25. The Syrian delegation felt that it was time for the United Kingdom to speak of independence, rather than self-government, for the Territory. The people of the Territory were the best judge with regard to both their internal and their foreign affairs, and they should be permitted to express their wishes freely in accordance with the letter and spirit of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). The people of the Territory should be afforded an opportunity to exercise their right to self-determination under United Nations supervision.

26. The representative of Mali stated that the constitutional progress of Mauritius in the last few years had been mainly the result of the will of its people. In the economic field, the Territory had to import all consumer goods in spite of all its agricultural potential. It had been deprived of all means for serious industrialization and its trade balance had a constant deficit. It was necessary therefore to modify the methods of development and production. Many improvements were also needed in the social field.

27. The delegation of Mali considered that every dependent people would be impatient to attain their independence and that under paragraph 5 of resolution 1514 (XV) no conditions should be imposed upon them for the achievement of that goal. The Declaration should therefore be applied to Mauritius without delay. This should be done by concrete measures, including the confirmation of the right to independence, the holding of elections on the basis of universal adult suffrage, the creation of competent legislative and executive organs and the transfer of all powers to the democratically elected representatives of the people.

28. The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that in respect of 95 per cent of the matters of day-to-day government and administration the Governor exercised his powers only after consultation with the ministers and in agreement with them. Section 59 of the Mauritius Constitution stipulated that, with certain very limited and specific exceptions, the Governor should not merely seek the advice of the Council of Ministers in the formulation of policy and in the exercise of the powers conferred on him by the Constitution, but should act in accordance with the Council's advice. The exceptions he had mentioned stemmed from the United Kingdom's responsibility for the international relations, defence and administration of Mauritius, and in no way inhibited the Council of Ministers from exercising full control over virtually all Government activities. Bills passed by the Legislative Assembly in Mauritius did not become law until the Governor had given his assent, but acts which came into force were those adopted by the Legislative Assembly and were not diktats handed down by the Governor. Regarding the electoral system in Mauritius, Sections 37 and 38 of the Mauritius Constitution stipulated that a British subject aged 21 or more who had resided in the island for a least two years before the date set for the registration of electors was entitled to vote. There was absolutely no income or property qualification. Furthermore, the electors had a choice of candidates from several parties and the ballot was secret. Provision for nominated members in the Mauritius Legislative Assembly had been included in the Constitution as a result of the recommendations of the 1958 Constitutional Commission and their number had been increased after consultations at the 1961 Conference. The object of reserving seats for nominated members was to ensure that the main communities in Mauritius were represented in the Legislature broadly in proportion to their percentage in the population. The Governor had in fact nominated only twelve members and had consulted the leaders of the political parties before doing so. The Constitution forbade him to use his power of nomination to frustrate the election results. The constitutional changes introduced in 1964 had not consisted merely in altering the titles of certain individuals or organs; their importance lay in the fact that Mauritius now had an all-party Government in which representatives of the main parties and communities were working together for the economic, political and social development of their country. In a multiracial Territory that was a remarkable achievement. The leaders of all the parties had agreed to tackle in a spirit of harmony the important problems facing the island and not to raise the question of further constitutional advance until October 1965, two years after the elections. Such were the wishes of the people.

29. Although it was true that the economy of Mauritius was based essentially on sugar cane, the reason was not colonial exploitation. The report of a commission of inquiry into the sugar industry in Mauritius, the Balogh Commission, had pointed out that the explanation for the dominant position of sugar cane was that it was among the plants most resistant to the high winds which occasionally visited the island. If there was a cyclone, only one year's harvest was damaged, whereas the destruction of tree-crops, for example, would affect the island's economy for years. The Balogh Commission's report also stated that about half of the cane land belonged to sugar millers and the other half to independent planters. Only two of twenty-three sugar mills were not owned by Mauritian companies. The profits of the sugar companies were not very high and were taxed in such a way that the Mauritian Government received a fair share. The island enjoyed a preferential market and the United Kingdom Government guaranteed it a very favourable price for its sugar. There was no differentiation in treatment on racial grounds in Mauritius and relations between the different races in social and commercial life were good and close. There was complete integration in schools and other institutions. In the Mauritius Constitution it was stated that no law was to make any provision that was discriminatory either in itself or in its effect. He also denied that there were military bases in the Territory. There was only a small naval wireless station. Local Mauritius ministers had no objection to the presence of that radio station in their Territory, and relations between the naval personnel and the inhabitants of the island were good.

CONCLUSIONS OF THE SUB-COMMITTEE

62. The Sub-Committee is of the opinion that the present Constitution of Mauritius does not allow the representatives of the people to exercise real legislative or executive powers, and that nearly all authority is concentrated in the hands of the United Kingdom Government and its representatives in the Territory. All laws passed by the Legislative Assembly are subject to the assent of the Governor, who is empowered, moreover, to give legal effect to any bill before the Assembly even if it has not been voted upon.

63. Progress towards self-government in the three Territories has so far been too slow. No satisfactory progress has been made with regard to the transfer of power to the people.

64. The Sub-Committee was pleased to learn that the various political parties of Mauritius had recently combined their efforts to form a coalition government of the Territory.

65. The Sub-Committee has come to the conclusion that key positions of responsibility in the administration of the Territories are still in the hands of United Kingdom personnel. The training of indigenous persons in administration and higher education for such positions is slow and inadequate, particularly at a time when these Territories are approaching self-government and independence.

66. The economy of the Territories is characterized by lack of diversification and insufficient capital investment. The steps taken by the administering Power in the field of economic development are slow and inadequate.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE SUB-COMMITTEE

67. The peoples of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena have an inalienable right to self-determination and independence in accordance with the United Nations Charter and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The Sub-Committee accordingly recommends that the administering Power should take the following measures:

(a) The provisions of the Charter and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples should be fully applied to these Territories without delay.

(b) The people of the Territories should be given the opportunity to exercise their right to self-determination without delay under United Nations supervision and in complete freedom.

(c) The people should be guaranteed the right to decide for themselves their status and the form of government and constitutional system that they will adopt for the future.

(d) Concrete steps should be taken for the final transfer of powers of government to the democratically elected representatives of the inhabitants. Bearing in mind that a coalition government has been formed in Mauritius, the Sub-Committee considers that the constitutional conference on this Territory should be convened immediately, with the participation of all the political parties, in order to draw up a constitution for the Territory and to fix an early date for its independence.

(e) The training of indigenous inhabitants for key positions of responsibility in the administration of the Territories concerned should be speeded up.

(f) Measures should be taken for the rapid and planned development of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena in the economic, social and educational fields. More funds should be allocated for this purpose by the administering Power, and co-operation with the specialized agencies, wherever already established, should continue.

(g) The Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and the relevant documents on the work of the Special Committee should be brought to the attention of the peoples of the Territories utilizing all mass information media.

LETTER OF TRANSMITTAL

New York, 15 November 1965

Sir,

I have the honour to transmit to you the report of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, submitted to the General Assembly in accordance with Assembly resolution 1556 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963. This report covers the work of the Special Committee during 1965.

Accept, Sir, the assurances of my highest consideration.

(Signed) Sori COULIBALY
Chairman

His Excellency U Thant
Secretary-General
United Nations

CHAPTER I

ESTABLISHMENT, ORGANIZATION AND ACTIVITIES OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

A. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

1. Information on the establishment of the Special Committee is contained in the report of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its nineteenth session (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. I, paras. 1-7).

2. During 1965, the Special Committee continued to discharge its mandate as established by the General Assembly by resolution 1956 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963 and other pertinent General Assembly resolutions, including resolution 1899 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963 and 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963. The Special Committee did so in the context of the declaration made by the President of the General Assembly, at its 1330th plenary meeting on 18 February 1965, in relation to the note circulated by him on 10 February 1965 concerning the status of the agenda of the nineteenth session (A/5884). This declaration was to the effect that the General Assembly should, for its own official records, note that reports relating, inter alia, to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples had in fact been received and that those bodies which had continuing responsibilities such as the Special Committee should continue to do their work, subject to the agreed budgetary limits for 1965.

3. This report covers the work of the Special Committee for the period 6 April to 10 November 1965 during which it held seventy-four plenary meetings, including thirty-five in Africa, and its Working Group and sub-committees held forty-one meetings.

B. OPENING OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE'S MEETINGS IN 1965

4. The first meeting of the Special Committee in 1965 (320th meeting) was held on 6 April 1965.

Opening statement by the Chairman

5. The Chairman stated that, after more than two centuries of colonial rule, the Gambia had attained independence on 18 February 1965. The Committee could take pride in its contribution to that achievement as it had considered the Gambia in 1963 and 1964 and had adopted a resolution (see A/5446/Rev.1, chap. XI, para. 105) reaffirming the inalienable right of its people to self-determination and independence. On behalf of the Committee the Chairman wished the Gambia every success and prosperity in the future.

6. Although the Special Committee had not made spectacular progress since its establishment, it had contributed to a better understanding of the conditions of people living under foreign domination. The Committee was still the hope of millions of people who, in difficult, trying and often unpublicized circumstances, were struggling in different parts of the globe to regain their right to equality and dignity. He was sure that all members were aware of the urgent need to do everything possible to put an immediate and unconditional end to colonialism, in order to establish relations of friendly co-operation among peoples on the basis of respect for the dignity and equality of all.

7. Concluding, the Chairman drew attention to the fifteenth report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/

L.189) which contained a recommendation that the Special Committee should take up the question of Southern Rhodesia as the first item on its agenda.

Election of officers

8. At its 320th meeting, on 6 April 1965, the Special Committee elected by acclamation Mr. Huot Sambath (Cambodia) as Second Vice-Chairman of the Committee, in place of Mr. Voeunsai Sonn (Cambodia), who had been assigned to other functions by his Government. Mr. Sori Coulibaly (Mali) continued as Chairman, Mr. Carlos Maria Velázquez (Uruguay) as First Vice-Chairman, and Mr. K. Natwar Singh (India) as Rapporteur.

C. ORGANIZATION OF WORK

9. The Special Committee discussed the organization of its work at its 320th and 321st meetings.

10. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that, although the General Assembly had been unable to discuss the Special Committee's report, the mandate entrusted to it by General Assembly resolutions 1654 (XVI), 1810 (XVII) and 1956 (XVIII) remained in force. The Committee should organize its work in such a way as to ensure the most rapid implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence and of the decisions taken by the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Special Committee on a number of colonial Territories, which had not been carried out because of sabotage by the colonial Powers.

11. Under its mandate, the Committee had not only the right but the obligation to reconsider the situation in any colonial Territory on which it had adopted recommendations, if it considered that events there required a further analysis and further measures to ensure the implementation of the Declaration.

12. The situation in a number of colonial Territories on which United Nations organs had adopted recommendations was giving rise to serious concern and the Special Committee should adopt specific measures to prevent a dangerous turn of events there. The Committee could request the Chairman of the sub-committees on Southern Rhodesia, Aden and British Guiana to report on the situation with regard to the implementation of United Nations decisions on those Territories. As far as South West Africa was concerned, the Government of South Africa was taking steps to implement the Odendaal Plan aimed at annexing that Territory. Such action was a direct violation of the United Nations Charter and a defiance of the warnings issued by various United Nations organs. The South African Government was thus launching a challenge to the United Nations and, in particular, to the countries of Africa. The situation in the Territories under Portuguese administration, too, was deteriorating. Not only were Salazar's troops being supplied with weapons by the United States, the United Kingdom, West Germany and other NATO members to continue their war against the peoples of those territories; they were also engaging in provocative and aggressive actions against other independent African States, thus creating a serious threat to peace on the African continent. Those provocations were designed to create a tense situation on the borders of neighbouring African States and thus to pave the way to greater interference in African affairs by the United States and other colonial Powers, which wanted not only to maintain their domination in southern and central Africa but to extend it to the peoples who had already thrown off the colonial yoke.

13. The Committee should not merely reaffirm its previous decisions but should request the administering Powers to give an account of the steps they had taken or intended to take in the near future to implement those decisions. It should set time-limits for the implementation of its recommendations and warn the administering Powers that failure to comply would be regarded as premeditated sabotage. The NATO Powers should be requested to remove their military bases and personnel from the Territories and to cease all military or other assistance to the Governments of Portugal, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

14. The Committee should also consider matters on which it had not had time to make recommendations previously. Those matters included the activities of foreign economic and other interests in the Territories under Portuguese administration, which had been referred to Sub-Committee I. In its report of November 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. V, annex) the Sub-Committee had said that it would consider the question as soon as the necessary working papers for the study had been prepared. Considerable time had elapsed since then and the Secretariat should be asked to provide the necessary material as soon as possible, so that the Sub-Committee could consider the question and submit conclusions and recommendations to the Committee. As far as Brunei and British Honduras were concerned, the USSR delegation thought that the Special Committee could itself make the necessary recommendations without referring those Territories to the respective sub-committees once again. There were other problems to be dealt with, in particular those mentioned in the fourteenth report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.172/Rev.1). The Working Group was to continue examining the question of a list of all other Territories which had not yet attained independence.

15. As far as the order of items was concerned, his delegation thought that such questions as Southern Rhodesia, the Portuguese colonies and Aden should be given urgent consideration. It agreed with the recommendation in the fifteenth report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.189) to the effect that the Committee should first take up the question of Southern Rhodesia.

16. Southern and central Africa should remain in the forefront of the Committee's attention because, in those regions, the struggle for liberation was being opposed by the combined forces of the major imperialist monopolies, which were amassing huge profits by exploiting the resources and people of Angola, Mozambique, Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and other Territories. The Committee should give every possible support to the people struggling in those Territories and in other parts of the world where colonial domination continued.

17. The representative of India read out the message sent to the Prime Minister of the Gambia by the Prime Minister of India on the occasion of the Gambia's achievement of independence. He welcomed the fact that the Security Council had recommended the admission of the Gambia to the United Nations.<sup>1</sup>

18. Developments in other parts of Africa were less encouraging. In particular, the situation in Southern Rhodesia had been aggravated by the dissolution of the so-called parliament of Southern Rhodesia on 31 March and the announcement that fresh elections would be held on 7 May. By some constitutional acrobatics, Mr. Smith, the leader of the white minority Government, was trying to remove the cross-race voting between the A and B rolls, thus ensuring a two-thirds majority for himself, a procedure which was totally undemocratic. It was obvious that the Southern Rhodesian Government intended to face the United Kingdom with a constitutional fait accompli and was preparing the way for a unilateral declaration of independence. The Indian delegation was eagerly awaiting the statement of the representative of the administering Power, who would no doubt enlighten the Special Committee on the latest developments in the Territory.

19. The situation in Aden was still causing concern; the Special Committee should take up that question without delay. Conditions in the Portuguese colonies had deteriorated still further and the Committee should consider those Territories and study the activities of foreign and other interests there. There were also the questions of British Guiana, Basutoland, Bechuanaland, Swaziland and South West Africa, in addition to the island Territories of the Pacific, the Atlantic and the Indian Oceans. There could be no question of the Committee's relaxing its efforts to ensure the speedy implementation of the relevant General Assembly resolutions, particularly resolution 1514 (XV).

20. The representative of Tunisia expressed his delegation's whole-hearted support of the recommendation that the Committee should take up the question of Southern Rhodesia without delay. The situation in that Territory was daily becoming more serious and Mr. Smith's latest decision to hold elections made it imperative for the Committee to study the problem.

21. Furthermore, his delegation considered the questions of Aden and of the Portuguese Territories to be of vital importance. The question of South West Africa should, in the view of his delegation, also receive high priority.

22. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania expressed the hope that the Special Committee was not tending to become a permanent body, for prolonged discussion merely delayed the achievement of independence by the countries concerned. He trusted that the year 1965 would see the acceleration both of the Committee's work and of the process of decolonization.

23. Tanzania was particularly concerned about the situation in Southern Rhodesia, which was its near neighbour; developments since the Committee's last meeting had not been reassuring. First, there had been the so-called indaba conference, where a few chiefs had come to certain decisions that were supposed to be binding on all the Africans in Southern Rhodesia. Secondly, there had been the visit of the Commonwealth Secretary of the United Kingdom Government; it was regrettable that, after that visit, the United Kingdom Government had given no indication that it was going to assume its responsibilities and ensure that Southern

Rhodesia obtained a government run by Africans. Lastly, there had been the "constitutional acrobatics" to which the Indian representative had referred. A statement by the United Kingdom Government was anxiously awaited.

24. His delegation fully supported the Working Group's recommendation that the question of Southern Rhodesia should be taken up as a matter of urgency. The question of the Portuguese colonies should be the next item on the Special Committee's agenda. His delegation would in due course submit suggestions on how the whole work of decolonization should be carried out.

25. The representative of Iraq said that, now that the Special Committee was entering the fourth year of its work, it could usefully consider its achievements and its failures. It had certainly made some progress with the tasks entrusted to it by the General Assembly. Since the beginning of 1962, more than a dozen new States had become Members of the United Nations. While it would be presumptuous to say that the Committee had been primarily instrumental in bringing independence to those countries, there was no doubt that the struggle of those people for independence had been given moral support by the United Nations, as reflected in the work of the Special Committee.

26. Nevertheless, there were many colonial problems which had yet to be solved. The Special Committee should redouble its efforts in dealing with those problems. Firstly, it should take up the question of Southern Rhodesia, in accordance with the recommendation of the Working Group. The situation there was rapidly deteriorating, particularly in view of the announcement of fresh elections in May and of the manoeuvres of the Smith Government to obtain a two-thirds majority.

27. The Special Committee should also take up the problem of Aden at an early date. He hoped that the Sub-Committee on Aden would shortly be able to report on its contacts with the administering Power and on developments in the Territory, which had been going from bad to worse. Then there were the two great problems in Africa, that of the Portuguese Territories and that of South West Africa. Despite the fact that the question of the Portuguese Territories had been before the United Nations for ten years, the Portuguese Government had not changed its policy one whit, the Special Committee should now consider the advisability of asking another organ of the United Nations to take effective measures. He was strongly in favour of a study of foreign interests and influences in the Portuguese Territories.

28. Although the decision of the International Court of Justice on the complaint regarding South West Africa brought before it by Ethiopia and Liberia was still pending, the Special Committee should consider the question once again, particularly the question of foreign financial interests in the Territory.

Decisions

29. At its 320th meeting, the Special Committee, on the recommendation of the Working Group contained in its fifteenth report (A/AC.109/L.189) decided to consider the question of Southern Rhodesia as the first item on its agenda for 1965.

30. By adopting the sixteenth report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.190), the Special Committee, at its 321st meeting, decided that, following its consideration of the question of Southern Rhodesia, it would take up the question of Aden, and the Territories under Portuguese administration, in that order.

31. By the same decision, the Special Committee requested Sub-Committee I, II and III to continue their work<sup>2</sup> in order to consider any items which they were unable to dispose of during 1964 and to bring up to date, as necessary, their reports on the items considered by them in 1964.

32. By adopting the seventeenth report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.196), the Special Committee at its 331st meeting, decided that it would accept the invitations extended to it by the Governments of Ethiopia, the United Republic of Tanzania, and Zambia, to hold meetings at Addis Ababa, Dar es Salaam and Lusaka and that these meetings would take place between 20 or 25 May and 20 June 1965. At the same time, the Special Committee approved the Working Group's recommendation that, during its meetings in Africa, it should consider the Territories under Portuguese administration, the question of South West Africa, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, and the question of Southern Rhodesia.

33. While at Lusaka, the Special Committee received an invitation from the Government of Somalia to hold meetings at Mogadiscio in the course of its visit to Africa. On the recommendation of the Working Group, contained in its nineteenth report (A/AC.109/L.205), the Special Committee, at its 341st meeting, decided that it would express to the Government of Somalia its deep appreciation of the invitation, but that, having previously established the programme for its meetings in Africa, including the closing date for these meetings, and taking into account the probable financial implications, it would prefer to take advantage of the invitation at a more convenient time.

34. By adopting the twenty-first report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.239 and Corr.1), the Special Committee decided, at its 374th meeting, to consider the following items, in the order indicated, at its remaining meetings during 1965:

(a) Report of the United Nations Representative for the Supervision of Elections in the Cook Islands (see A/5962);

(b) Report of the Secretary-General (A/5958) under operative paragraph 5 of the resolution on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, adopted by the Special Committee at its 299th meeting on 2 November 1964 (see A/5800/Rev.1, chap. VIII, para. 365);

(c) Information on Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter (operative paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 1970 (XVIII));

(d) Adoption of the report of the Special Committee to the General Assembly covering its work during 1965.

35. At its 379th meeting, on 26 August 1965, the Special Committee had before it two letters from the Permanent Representative of Somalia, the first (A/AC.109/134) requesting that French Somaliland be taken up by the Committee at its current session and the second (A/AC.109/135), requesting participation in the Committee's discussions concerning this item. At the same meeting, the Committee decided to refer the first letter to the Working Group, and, as regards the second letter, to authorize the Chairman to reply that the request for participation would be considered by the Special Committee when it decided to take up the question of French Somaliland.

F. CONSIDERATION OF OTHER MATTERS

Matters relating to the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) in general

52. At its 372nd and 373rd meetings, held at Addis Ababa on 17 and 18 June 1965, the Special Committee considered a draft resolution relating to the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to Southern Rhodesia, Territories under Portuguese administration, South West Africa and Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland. The draft resolution was adopted by the Special Committee at its 373rd meeting on 18 June 1965 (A/AC.109/128/Rev.1). Details of the Special Committee's consideration of this item are contained in chapter II of the present report.

53. At its 386th meeting, on 16 September 1965, the Special Committee decided to reproduce as an annex to the present report (annex I) a letter dated 26 August 1965, addressed to the Chairman by the representative of the United Kingdom, covering the main constitutional developments in United Kingdom dependent Territories from November 1964 to July 1965.

Report of the United Nations Representative for the Supervision of Elections in the Cook Islands (A/5962)

54. The General Assembly, by resolution 2005 (XIX) of 18 February 1965, authorized the supervision by the United Nations of the elections to be held in the Cook Islands in April 1965 and authorized the Secretary-General to appoint a United Nations representative who would supervise these elections with the assistance of the necessary observers and staff and observe the proceedings concerning the Constitution in the newly elected Legislative Assembly. Under the terms of the resolution, the United Nations representative was to report to the Special Committee and to the General Assembly.

55. The Special Committee considered the report of the United Nations representative for the Supervision of Elections in the Cook Islands, at its 375th, 378th to 382nd meetings between 23 August and 30 August 1965 and adopted a resolution thereon at its 382nd meeting on 30 August 1965 (A/AC.109/136). Details of the Special Committee's consideration of this item are contained in chapter VIII of the present report.

Report of the Secretary-General on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland (A/5958)

56. The Special Committee, in operative paragraph 5 of its resolution of 2 November 1964, requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the administering Power, to undertake a study as to the ways and means of ensuring the economic independence of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland vis-à-vis the Republic of South Africa and to submit a report to the Special Committee and the General Assembly.

57. The Special Committee considered the report of the Secretary-General, submitted in compliance with this request, at its 384th to 387th meetings, between 9 and 20 September 1965, and adopted a resolution (A/AC.109/141) concerning this item at its 387th meeting, on 20 September 1965. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of this item are contained in chapter VII of the present report.

Information on Non-Self-Governing Territories under Article 73 e of the Charter

58. The General Assembly, by resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, decided to dissolve the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and entrusted its functions to the Special Committee. The Special Committee accordingly considered, at its 383rd and 385th meetings, held on 7 and 15 September 1965, an item on information on Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of this item are contained in chapter XXVI of the present report.

Implications of the activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence in the Territories under Portuguese administration

59. The Special Committee, in its resolution on Territories under Portuguese administration, adopted at its 277th meeting on 3 July 1964 (see A/5800/Rev.1 chap. V, para. 352) requested Sub-Committee I of the Special Committee, with the assistance of the Secretary-General, to study the activities of foreign economic and other interests, which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence in the Territories under Portuguese administration.

60. The Special Committee considered the report of Sub-Committee I at its 391st and 392nd meetings, held on 27 and 28 October 1965. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of this item are contained in chapter V, section D of the present report.

Implications of the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation

61. The Special Committee in its resolution on the question of Southern Rhodesia (see below chap. III, para 292) adopted at its 328th meeting, on 22 April 1965, decided to study, in co-operation with the Secretary-General and the agencies of the United Nations, the implications of the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation in order to assess their economic and political influence. The Special Committee hopes to submit a report on this matter to the General Assembly during 1966.

Question of the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable

62. In approving the fourteenth report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.172/Rev.1), the Special Committee took due note of a letter dated 12 November 1964 from the Permanent Representative of Somalia (A/AC.109/107), requesting the inclusion of the question of French Somaliland on the agenda of its current session and of the Declaration adopted by the Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries during October 1964 which was circulated as a document of the General Assembly (A/5763). By the same decision the Special Committee agreed to the Working Group continuing consideration of the question of preparing the list of "all other Territories which have not yet attained independence".

63. The Working Group, at its 28th meeting on 18 May 1965, considered a letter dated 13 April 1965 from the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of Somalia (A/AC.109/110), reiterating the previous requests of his Government (A/AC.109/107 and Add.1), for the inscription of the question of French Somaliland on the agenda of the Special Committee. After discussion, the Working Group, in its eighteenth report (A/AC.109/L.203/Rev.1), recommended that the Special Committee should accede to this request.

64. The Special Committee, at its 341st meeting on 27 May 1965, adopted the eighteenth report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.203/Rev.1). In adopting this report, the Special Committee decided to include French Somaliland in the list of Territories to which the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples applies.<sup>6</sup>

65. At the 389th meeting, on 7 October 1965, the Chairman drew the attention of the Special Committee to a letter dated 1 October 1965 (A/AC.109/144) from the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Cuba which, referring to the final communiqué of the Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries held in Cairo in October 1964, requested the inclusion of the question of Puerto Rico on the agenda of the Special Committee. The representative of the United States of America, referring to General Assembly resolution 748 (VIII) of 27 November 1953, protested the circulation of this letter (389th-391st meetings) owing to lack of time, the Special Committee was unable to examine the request contained in document A/AC.109/144.

66. Subject to any directives the General Assembly at its twentieth session may wish to give for the speedy implementation of the Declaration, the Special Committee intends to continue its consideration of the question of the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable.

G. RELATIONS WITH OTHER UNITED NATIONS BODIES

Security Council

67. In its resolution 1956 (XVII), of 11 December 1963, the General Assembly invited the Special Committee to apprise the Security Council of any developments in any Territory examined by it which may threaten international peace and security.

Southern Rhodesia

68. By operative paragraph 10 of the resolution adopted at its 328th meeting on 22 April 1965 (see below chap. III, para. 292) the Special Committee drew "the immediate attention of the Security Council to the grave situation prevailing in Southern Rhodesia and, in particular, to the serious implications of the elections announced to take place on 7 May 1965 under a Constitution which has been rejected by the majority of the people of Southern Rhodesia and the abrogation of which has repeatedly been called for by the Special Committee and the General Assembly since 1962".

69. The text of the resolution, together with the records of the debates on the question in the Special Committee was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 23 April 1965 (S/6300).

70. By operative paragraph 4 of a further resolution (see below chap. III, para. 513) adopted at its 347th meeting on 28 May 1965, the Special Committee drew "the attention of the Security Council to the extremely serious situation which would arise in the Territory if the authorities of Southern Rhodesia were to execute the persons sentenced to death under the amended Law and Order (Maintenance) Act". By operative paragraph 5 of the same resolution, the Special Committee further drew "the attention of the Security Council to the threats made by the Southern Rhodesian authorities, in particular, the economic sabotage which the Southern Rhodesian authorities intend to carry out in regard to the independent African States adjoining the Territory".

71. By operative paragraph 6 of the resolution, the Special Committee decided "to transmit to the Security Council the records of the meetings devoted to this question by the Special Committee during its visit in Africa, including the statements of the petitioners and of the representative of the Organization of African Unity, as a supplement to the document transmitted to the Security Council and reproduced as document S/6300".

<sup>6</sup> Subsequent to this decision, the Special Committee circulated two memoranda relating to French Somaliland, one dated 25 May 1965 from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Somalia (A/AC.109/121) and the other dated 8 June 1965 from the Permanent Mission of Ethiopia to the United Nations (A/AC.109/122).

72. The text of the resolution, together with the records mentioned in operative paragraph 6, was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 2 June 1965 (S/6412).

Aden

73. By operative paragraph 11 of the resolution adopted at its 388th meeting on 17 May 1965 (see below chap. VI, para. 300), the Special Committee drew "the attention of the Security Council to the grave situation prevailing in the Territory".

74. The text of the resolution, together with the records of the Special Committee's debates on the question, was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 18 May 1965 (S/6368).

Territories under Portuguese administration

75. By operative paragraph 7 of the resolution adopted at the 363rd meeting on 10 June 1965 (see chapter V, para. 415), the Special Committee drew "the urgent attention of the Security Council to the continued deterioration of the situation in the Territories under Portuguese domination as well as to the consequences of the threats made by Portugal against the independent African States that border upon its colonies".

76. By operative paragraph 8 of the same resolution, the Special Committee requested the Security Council "to consider putting into effect against Portugal the appropriate measures laid down in the Charter, for the purpose of carrying out its resolutions concerning the Territories under Portuguese domination".

77. By operative paragraph 9 of the resolution the Special Committee decided "to transmit to the Security Council the records of the meetings held by the Committee on this question during its visit in Africa including the statements of the petitioners and of the representative of the Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa of the Organization of African Unity".

78. The text of the resolution, together with the records mentioned in operative paragraph 9, was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 17 June 1965 (S/6460).

South West Africa

79. By operative paragraph 5 of the resolution adopted at its 372nd meeting on 17 June 1965 (see below chapter IV, para. 285), the Special Committee recommended to the General Assembly and the Security Council "to take appropriate steps to safeguard the sovereignty of the people of South West Africa and the integrity of the Territory and to this end to take the necessary concrete and adequate measures in co-operation with the Organization of African Unity".

80. By operative paragraph 6 of the same resolution the Special Committee drew "the attention of the Security Council to the serious situation prevailing in South West Africa".

81. The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 21 July 1965 (S/6565).

Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland

82. By operative paragraph 4 of the resolution adopted at its 372nd meeting on 17 June 1965 (see below, chap. VII, para. 292), the Special Committee drew "the attention of the Security Council to the threat to territorial integrity of the Territories posed by the expansionist policy of the Government of the Republic of South Africa".

83. By operative paragraph 5 of the same resolution, the Special Committee recommended "to the General Assembly and to the Security Council urgently to consider and initiate the measures necessary to ensure the territorial integrity of the Territories and the safeguarding of their sovereignty".

84. The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 21 July 1965 (S/6566).

Implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to Southern Rhodesia, Territories under Portuguese administration, South West Africa and Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland.

85. By operative paragraph 1 of the resolution (see chap. II, para. 463) adopted at its 373rd meeting on 18 June 1965, the Special Committee drew "the attention of the General Assembly and the Security Council to the explosive situation existing in this region of Africa owing to the intolerable behaviour of the Governments of Portugal and South Africa and the minority settler régime of Southern Rhodesia".

86. By operative paragraph 2 of the same resolution, the Special Committee recommended "that the General Assembly and the Security Council, each acting within its own competence, should take the positive measures laid down in the Charter with a view to: (a) ensuring respect for the rights of the African populations in the region and in particular their rights to self-determination and independence, and putting an end to the dangerous activities of the Portuguese and South African Governments and of the minority settler régime of Southern Rhodesia; (b) strengthening the confidence which the peoples under colonial domination place in the United Nations".

87. The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 21 July 1965 (S/6567).

Trusteeship Council

88. In accordance with paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) which requested the Trusteeship Council to assist the Special Committee in its work, the President of the Trusteeship Council, by letter dated 30 June 1965 (A/AC.109/130), addressed to the Chairman, informed the Special Committee that the Council, at its thirty-second session, examined conditions in the Trust Territories of the Pacific Islands under United States administration, and of Nauru and New Guinea under Australian administration. The letter stated that the conclusions and recommendations of the Trusteeship Council, as well as the observations of the members of the Trusteeship Council, representing their individual opinions only, were contained in its report to the Security Council on the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands (S/6490) and in its report to the General Assembly on Nauru and New Guinea (A/6004).

Special Committee on the Policies of apartheid of the Government of the Republic of South Africa

89. The Chairman of the Special Committee has maintained close contact with the Chairman of the Special Committee on the Policies of apartheid of the Government of the Republic of South Africa as regards matters of common interest relating to the work of the two Committees.

Specialized agencies

90. Collaboration of the specialized agencies with the Special Committee has been maintained by the presence of representatives of the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and the World Health Organization (WHO) at meetings of the Special Committee.

H. REVIEW OF WORK<sup>7</sup>

91. During the year, the Special Committee continued to discharge the mandate entrusted to it by the General Assembly. At the commencement of its work the Chairman of the Special Committee noted with profound regret that the renewed hopes of freedom and independence without delay which were inspired in colonial peoples by the Declaration, on its adoption nearly five years ago, have with but a few exceptions not been realized. The Special Committee was aware that, in refraining from setting a time-limit for the complete application of the Declaration to all colonial territories, it was the expectation of the General Assembly that immediate steps to that end would be taken in accordance with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples of these territories. Nevertheless, owing to the negative attitude and the deliberate non-co-operation of the administering Powers concerned, progress has not been made in the implementation of the Declaration in most of the Territories, notably the larger Territories in Africa, to which the Special Committee gave extensive consideration in previous years. The Special Committee also noted that concern in this regard had most recently been expressed in the resolutions adopted by the Council of Ministers of the Organization of African Unity at its fourth ordinary session held in Nairobi during February/March 1965.

92. At the same time, the Special Committee took note of the limited constitutional progress that had taken place in a few of the Territories to which the Declaration applies and welcomed the attainment of independence by the Gambia on 18 February 1965. In doing so, the Special Committee recalled that the Gambia had been the subject of consideration and of a resolution adopted during September 1963 by which, inter alia, the Special Committee reaffirmed the right of the people of the Territory to self-determination and independence and declared that the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) must be applied to the Gambia without delay.

93. The Special Committee wishes to report to the General Assembly that during 1965 it re-examined the situation regarding the implementation of the Declaration in a number of Territories to which it gave prolonged attention last year. In carrying out this review, the Special Committee was deeply concerned by the further deterioration, owing to recent developments, in the already grave situation prevailing in these Territories and by the increasingly serious threats to international peace and security which have therefore developed. As regards the remaining Territories, the Special Committee took note of the information contained in the working papers prepared by the Secretariat and decided to transmit this information to the General Assembly as a supplement to the relevant chapters of its report covering its work last year. The Special Committee's intention was to enable the General Assembly in considering that report to take into account the latest developments relating to the Territories concerned.

94. An important development affecting the Special Committee's work this year was its decision to accept invitations which were extended to it by the Governments of Ethiopia, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia, to hold meetings at their respective capitals. This decision was a reflection of the concern of the United Nations with colonial peoples generally, and was guided by the consideration that it was in Africa that the most difficult and serious colonial problems, as well as the largest number of people living under colonial rule, were to be found. The Special Committee was confident that by thus establishing direct contact with peoples under colonial rule in the continent, it would be in a better position to understand and therefore to assist them in their struggle for independence. It was also the hope of the Special Committee to facilitate the appearance before it of petitioners from colonial territories who would otherwise have found it virtually impossible to travel to New York.

95. At its meetings at the three capitals held between 25 May and 18 June 1965, the Special Committee considered the questions of Southern Rhodesia and South West Africa, the Territories under Portuguese administration, and Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, and heard a large number of petitioners concerning these Territories as well as on Aden.

96. The situation in Southern Rhodesia, regarding which the Special Committee adopted a resolution prior to its visit to Africa, continued to show serious deterioration. The elections held by the minority settler régime on the basis of the 1961 Constitution, which had previously been rejected by the majority of the people of the Territory, emboldened that régime to intensify its repressive measures against the African majority, to further curtail democratic freedoms and political rights, to make threatening gestures towards neighbouring African States and to take steps in the direction of a unilateral declaration of independence. The Special Committee took note of the United Kingdom Government's adherence to its warning to the minority settler régime of the consequences of a unilateral declaration of independence, and of the search by that Government of an agreed solution to the problem of constitutional advance. In this connexion, the Special Committee recalled that the objectives outlined in its resolutions and those of the General Assembly and endorsed by the recent Security Council resolution on the question, were the establishment by the United Kingdom of complete democratic freedom and equality of political rights in the Territory and the adoption, by means of a fully representative conference to be convened by the United Kingdom, of new constitutional arrangements based on universal adult suffrage, for independence at the earliest possible date. It was therefore a matter of great disappointment to the Special Committee that, while insisting on its exclusive responsibility for the constitutional progress of Southern Rhodesia, the United Kingdom Government has not taken effective steps for the attainment of the above-mentioned objectives. Having already drawn the attention of the Security Council to the extremely serious deterioration in the situation and its implications for peace and security in Africa, the Special Committee considers that measures must be taken without delay to secure the implementation of the Security Council's own resolution as well as those of the General Assembly and the Special Committee.

97. In Aden, the continued maintenance of the state of emergency and the carrying out of military operations, in disregard of the repeated demands of the General Assembly and the Special Committee, increased the tension in the area. While noting the United Kingdom Government's declared acceptance of the principles of self-determination and independence for South Arabia as set out in General Assembly resolution 1949 (XVIII) concerning Aden, the Special Committee deplores the failure of that Government to apply the approach and methods outlined in that resolution, which, it may be noted, have received the widespread support of the political leaders in the Territory. The Special Committee also noted with deep regret that the United Kingdom continued its refusal to permit a visit to the Territory and its failure unequivocally to accept the recommendation contained in the above-mentioned resolution for a United Nations presence before and during the elections. At the same time, the United Kingdom Government has yet to make any moves towards the removal of its military base in Aden, although it has itself stated that no base is militarily or morally defensible unless it has the support of the people of the Territory in which it is situated. Further recent developments have led to a sharp aggravation in the already serious situation prevailing in the Territory. The Special Committee wishes to reiterate its conviction that any hope of arresting the continuing deterioration in the situation and of moving towards a peaceful solution of the problem lies in the taking of immediate measures for the strict and complete implementation of the resolution of the General Assembly and the Special Committee concerning the Territory.

98. With regard to the Territories under Portuguese administration, the Government of Portugal maintained its disregard of the obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter and its attitude of non-co-operation with the Special Committee. Not merely did it fail to take any steps to implement the pertinent resolutions of the Security Council, the General Assembly and the Special Committee, but by pursuing its policies for the closer political and economic integration of the Territories with Portugal, it persisted in its flagrant defiance of these resolutions. Further, its repressive activities in the Territories were on the increase, and it intensified its military efforts to suppress the legitimate struggle of the African people for self-determination and independence. In this connexion, as noted by the Special Committee in the resolution adopted this year concerning the Territories, the Portuguese Government availed itself of the military and other assistance, direct and indirect, which it continued to receive from certain States, including some of its allies within the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). In that resolution, the Special Committee also noted with alarm threatening statements emanating from Portuguese official sources directed at the African States bordering upon the Territories. The Special Committee has drawn the attention of the Security Council to these developments which are cause for grave concern, with the request that the Security Council should consider putting into effect against Portugal the appropriate measures laid down in the Charter in order to carry out its own resolutions concerning these Territories.

99. Regarding South West Africa, the Government of South Africa, in addition to maintaining its refusal to co-operate in the work of the Special Committee as well as intensifying the application of apartheid policies in the Territory, enlarged its own power to declare states of emergency and to take repressive measures against the African populations. Further, in complete disregard of the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee, it took steps to carry out several of the recommendations of the (Odendaal) Commission of Enquiry into South West Africa Affairs (1962-1963), including measures preparatory to the establishment of non-European "homelands". In its resolution on this question, the Special Committee also noted with concern that the South African Government proceeded with the establishment of military installations in the Territory, including an important military base in the Eastern Caprivi Zipfel, which gave rise to concern on the part of the Governments of African States adjacent to the Territory. The South African Government has thus continued its persistent violation of the Charter and of the Mandate, as well as its defiance of the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee relating to South West Africa. As indicated by the Special Committee in its report on the implications of the activities of the mining industry and other international companies having interests in the Territory, the intransigence of the South African Government in relation to South West Africa is, in large measure, due to the failure of several States to take the measures outlined in paragraph 7 of General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) and to the acquiescence of some States in the support given to South Africa by their nationals who own and operate international companies in the Territory. In view of the continuing deterioration of the situation, which has been brought to the attention of the Security Council as a serious threat to international peace and security, the Special Committee considers it necessary that urgent measures be taken to secure the implementation of the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee concerning the Territory.

100. Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland also engaged the attention of the Special Committee as regards the implementation of the Declaration in conformity with the wishes of the people and the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee. Of concern was the threat to the territorial integrity of the Territories posed by the expansionist policies of the Government of the Republic of South Africa and by the preponderant influence of that Government in the Territories. In the view of the Special Committee, there is an urgent need for the General Assembly and the Security Council to take the measures necessary to ensure their territorial integrity and to safeguard their sovereignty. A problem of special importance affecting these Territories, to which the Special Committee devoted particular attention, was their heavy economic dependence on South Africa and their unsatisfactory economic, financial and social situation after several decades of colonial rule. In order to initiate appropriate remedial measures, the Special Committee requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the administering Power, to undertake a study and submit a report as to the ways and means of ensuring their economic independence vis-à-vis South Africa. Having endorsed the proposals and recommendations contained in the Secretary-General's report (A/5958), the Special Committee commends them to the General Assembly for adoption and implementation without delay. In this regard, the Special Committee attaches great urgency and importance to the establishment of the proposed fund for the economic development of the Territories and the setting up of a United Nations Technical Assistance Office for each of them.

101. The delay in the implementation of the Declaration in several other Territories was also a matter of concern to the Special Committee. As regards British Guiana, a Sub-Committee of Good Offices was established by the Special Committee last year with the task of taking necessary measures, including a visit to British Guiana, for the implementation of the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee concerning the Territory. The Special Committee regrets that, owing to the inability of the United Kingdom Government to permit a visit to the Territory the Sub-Committee of Good Offices on British Guiana was denied the opportunity effectively to carry out its task. The Special Committee considers that the General Assembly should call on the United Kingdom Government to co-operate with the United Nations in ensuring that British Guiana accedes to complete independence without further delay and in an atmosphere of harmony, peace and unity. In such other Territories as Fiji and Mauritius, recent political and constitutional developments fell far short of the requirements of the Declaration and the relevant recommendations of the Special Committee. In particular, the changes adopted or envisaged in the representational system and the continued delay in instituting an unqualified system of one man one vote constitute a negation of the objectives of the Declaration.<sup>8</sup> In the opinion of the Special Committee, urgent steps require to be taken to enable these and other colonial territories to accede to independence in conformity with the freely expressed wishes of the people.

102. The Special Committee was also seized of the report of the United Nations representative for the supervision of elections in the Cook Islands (A/5962), who had been appointed under the provisions of resolution 2005 (XIX), by which the General Assembly authorized the supervision by the United Nations of the elections in the Cook Islands including observation of the proceedings concerning the Constitution in the Legislative Assembly to be elected. In addition to being highly appreciative of the work of the United Nations representative, the Special Committee welcomed the co-operation extended to it by the Governments of New Zealand and the Cook Islands, and expresses the hope that as a result of the General Assembly's examination of the report, co-operation between administering Powers and the United Nations will increase.

103. In laying special stress, in its last report, on the importance of sending out visiting groups, the Special Committee pointed out that the task of formulating concrete recommendations for the total application of the Declaration was sometimes hampered by the lack of adequate information on the political, economic and social situations in the Territories concerned and as to the opinions, wishes and aspirations of the people. The Special Committee wishes once again to emphasize that it regards the sending out of visiting groups as one of the most effective means of discharging its mandate and recommends that the General Assembly should call upon the administering Powers to extend their full co-operation to this end by permitting access as desired by the Special Committee to Territories under their administration.

104. In this context, the Special Committee wishes to draw attention to the importance of its recent visit to Africa. While the Special Committee was unable, owing to the non-co-operation of the administering Powers concerned, to visit the colonial Territories which it considered at its meetings at the three African capitals, it was enabled, by reason of its proximity to these Territories, to establish closer contact with the realities of their situation and to obtain more direct knowledge than hitherto regarding the aspirations of their peoples. Although a few of its members had reservations about the wisdom of a visit to Africa by the Special Committee in the current financial circumstances of the Organization, the Special Committee considers that the validity of its reasons for proceeding with the visit have been amply borne out by the results.

105. Some indication of the great significance of the work of the Special Committee during its visit is contained in the resolutions adopted at its meetings in Africa. In reaffirming the inalienable rights of the peoples under colonial rule to self-determination and independence, the Special Committee, in its resolutions concerning Southern Rhodesia, Territories under Portuguese administration and South West Africa, explicitly recognized the legitimacy of the current struggle of the colonial peoples in Africa to attain the effective exercise and enjoyment of the rights set forth in the Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Declaration embodied in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). Proceeding from this recognition, the Special Committee appealed to all States to give them the moral and material support necessary for the restoration of their inalienable rights.

106. In the light of these considerations, the Special Committee attached particular importance to the role that the Security Council could play in realizing the objectives contained in the Declaration and in resolutions adopted during its visit to Africa. In this connexion, the Special Committee recommended that the General Assembly and the Security Council, each acting within its own competence, should take positive measures laid down in the Charter with a view to ensuring respects for the rights of the colonial peoples in Southern Africa to self-determination and independence and putting an end to the dangerous activities of the Governments of Portugal and South Africa and the minority settler régime of Southern Rhodesia. A further recommendation of importance adopted by the Special Committee was the request addressed by the Special Committee to all States and international institutions to refuse assistance of any kind to the Governments of Portugal, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia so long as they fail to renounce their present colonial policies.

107. The work of the Special Committee in Africa also benefited greatly from the co-operation which it was able to establish with the Organization of African <sup>8</sup> The representative of the United Kingdom, referring to his letter (see annex I) covering the main constitutional developments in United Kingdom Territories, reserved the position of his delegation on the comments relating to Fiji and Mauritius, which were not discussed by the Special Committee during 1965.

Unity through the participation of the Chairman and the Executive Secretary-General of the Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa as well as of the Administrative Secretary-General of that Organization. It is the hope of the Special Committee that with a view to increasing co-operation between that Organization and the United Nations appropriate links between the OAU and the relevant organs of the United Nations under Chapter VIII of the Charter will be further developed and strengthened.

I. FUTURE WORK

108. In its last report to the General Assembly, the Special Committee expressed the opinion that, taking into consideration the tasks still to be carried out, the General Assembly should provide for the further examination of the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration in the Territories already considered by the Special Committee as well as in those Territories that had not yet been considered. Having regard to the considerations outlined in the preceding section of the present report, the Special Committee remains of this opinion and wishes to reiterate that in the light of the valuable experience it has hitherto gained it would be desirable that its mandate as established by the General Assembly in resolution 1956 (XVIII) and other pertinent resolutions, including resolutions 1899 (XVIII) and 1970 (XVIII), should be continued.

109. The Special Committee also wishes to repeat its recommendation that the necessary provision should be made by the Secretary-General and the General Assembly in order to facilitate its work and that, in particular, provision should be made to cover the expenses of the activities of the Special Committee, including the cost of visiting groups and of supervision of elections and other forms of consultation of the wishes of colonial peoples. Taking into account the need, as explained in the preceding section, for visits to several of the Territories to which the Declaration applies, particularly in the Atlantic, Indian and Pacific Ocean areas, the Special Committee wishes to place special emphasis on this recommendation. Further, considering the great importance of the work that its recent visit to Africa enabled it to carry out, the Special Committee, in the context of paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI), may hold another series of meetings in Africa next year. The Special Committee accordingly recommends that the arrangements to be made for its activities during 1966 should also include provision for these meetings. The Special Committee anticipates that these activities will give rise to expenditure of the order of $200,000.

110. The Special Committee further considers that the administering Powers should once again be requested to afford the Special Committee their fullest co-operation and, in particular, to facilitate visits to Territories, as the Committee may consider necessary. The Special Committee also recommends that the General Assembly should urge the administering Powers concerned to co-operate with the United Nations with a view to the establishment of United Nations presence as called for in the relevant resolutions in South West Africa and Aden as well as in such other Territories as the General Assembly may consider necessary and desirable.

111. The Special Committee wishes also to recall that the General Assembly, at its eighteenth session, took note of a report (A/5523) submitted by the Secretary-General in compliance with operative paragraph 6 of resolution 1848 (XVII), which requested him to continue his efforts towards large-scale circulation and dissemination of the Declaration through all the appropriate media of mass communication in all the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Special Committee considers that efforts to widen the acquaintance of colonial peoples with the Declaration and with the work of the Special Committee should be increased in scale, and accordingly recommends that adequate provision for this purpose should be made. In this regard, the Special Committee also recommends that the General Assembly should once again invite all administering Members to co-operate more effectively with the Secretary-General in the circulation and dissemination of the Declaration and to include the Declaration in the curricula of all educational institutions in all Non-Self-Governing Territories.

112. Subject to any further directives that might be given by the General Assembly at its twentieth session and taking account of further developments in the Territories concerned, it is the intention of the Special Committee during 1966 to continue to seek the best ways and means for the immediate and total implementation of the Declaration with regard to the Territories it examined this year as well as to those it was unable to review, taking into consideration the pertinent resolutions of the General Assembly, including resolutions 1899 (XVIII) and 1970 (XVIII). The Special Committee will also examine the situation in those Territories which might be included in the list of Territories to which the Declaration applies.

J. APPROVAL OF THE REPORT

113. The Special Committee approved the present report as a whole at its 393rd meeting on 10 November 1965.

CHAPTER II

MEETINGS HELD IN AFRICA (May/June 1965)

INTRODUCTION

1. Paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961 authorized the Special Committee "to meet elsewhere than at United Nations Headquarters, whenever and wherever such meetings may be required for the effective discharge of its functions". Availing itself of this provision, the Special Committee held meetings at Tangier, Addis Ababa, and Dar es Salaam during May/June 1962 for a period of three weeks.

2. In the context of the same provision, the Governments of Ethiopia, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia extended invitations to the Special Committee during April 1965 (A/AC.109/111 and Add.1, A/AC.109/SR.327, A/AC.109/113) to hold meetings at Addis Ababa, Dar es Salaam and Lusaka respectively, in May/June 1965.

3. During the Special Committee's consideration of the question of holding meetings in Africa, several members expressed the view that, as the Special Committee had not met outside United Nations Headquarters since 1902, its work was becoming divorced from the realities of the situation in Africa and from the aspirations of the African people. By holding meetings in Africa, the Special Committee would increase the effectiveness of its work, particularly as representatives of nationalist movements in colonial Territories in the continent would thus be enabled to appear before it. A visit to Africa would therefore assist the struggle of the African population of those Territories for their legitimate rights and freedoms.

4. The question was referred to the Working Group of the Special Committee, which submitted its recommendations in its seventeenth report (A/AC.109/L.196). During its consideration of this report, the Special Committee also had before it a report by the Secretary-General on the financial implications of the proposed visit of the Committee to Africa (A/AC.109/L.197). The report of the Working Group was adopted by the Special Committee at its 331st meeting, on 4 May 1965, by 20 votes to 3 (Australia, United Kingdom, United States), with one abstention (Denmark). In adopting this report, the Special Committee decided that it would accept the invitations extended to it by the Governments of Ethiopia, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia and that its meetings at the three capitals would take place between 20 or 25 May and 20 June 1965. The members which felt unable to support this decision explained that they had reservations concerning the wisdom of a visit to Africa by the Special Committee in the current financial circumstances of the Organization. By the same decision, the Committee approved the Working Group's recommendation that, during its meetings in Africa, it should consider the Territories under Portuguese administration, the question of South West Africa, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland and the question of Southern Rhodesia. The decision was the subject of a communiqué issued on 14 May 1965, by the Chairman on behalf of the Special Committee, which was widely disseminated in the three countries. The text of the communiqué is appended to this chapter (appendix I).

5. The members of the Special Committee, accompanied by members of the Secretariat, arrived at Lusaka on 23 May 1965. A list of the representatives present at its meetings in Africa is appended to this chapter (appendix II). At Lusaka, the Special Committee met at the Oppenheimer College from 25 to 28 May 1965; at Dar es Salaam, where it arrived on 29 May, it met from 31 May to 10 June 1965 at the Msimbazi Community Centre; and at Addis Ababa, where it arrived on 11 June 1965, it met from 14 to 18 June 1965 at Africa Hall.

6. During its stay in Africa, the Special Committee held thirty-five plenary meetings, the Working Group two meetings, and the Sub-Committee on Petitions seven meetings. The Special Committee heard twenty-three groups of petitioners and circulated sixteen written petitions, excluding requests for hearing, in connexion with the items on the agenda for its meetings in Africa. In addition, the Special Committee heard one group of petitioners concerning Aden and circulated three written petitions concerning French Somaliland which, by adopting the eighteenth report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.203 and Corr.1) at its 341st meeting on 27 May 1965, the Committee had decided to include in its list of Territories to which the Declaration applies.

7. In accordance with a decision taken by the Special Committee at its 339th meeting on 25 May 1965, the Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) was represented by an Observer at the Special Committee's meetings in Africa. In accordance with a further decision taken at the same meeting, the Government of Zambia was similarly represented at the Special Committee's meetings at Lusaka. In a letter dated 27 May 1965 (A/AC.109/119 and Corr.1) the representative of Somalia asked to participate in the discussions of the Special Committee on the questions of South West Africa, French Somaliland, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, and Territories under Portuguese administration. At its 345th meeting, on 28 May 1965, the Special Committee decided to grant this request on the understanding that French Somaliland was not on the agenda for its meetings in Africa. At the opening and the closing of its meetings in Addis Ababa, the Special Committee heard a statement by the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity.

8. At the opening of its meetings at Lusaka, Dar es Salaam and Addis Ababa, respectively, the Special Committee was addressed by H.E. Dr. Kenneth Kaunda, President of the Republic of Zambia, by H.E. Mr. Rashidi Kawawa, Second Vice-President, on behalf of the President of the United Republic of Tanzania, and by H.E. Mr. Syum Haregot, Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs on behalf of His Imperial Majesty, the Emperor of Ethiopia. The Special Committee was also received by each Head of State during its stay at the three capitals.

9. Following consideration of the items on its agenda, the Special Committee adopted two resolutions concerning the question of Southern Rhodesia (see below chap. III, paras. 471 and 513), as well as an appeal to the United Kingdom Government to ensure the release of Mr. Joshua Nkomo, Rev. Sithole and other political prisoners, in order to enable them to appear before the Special Committee; one on the Territories under Portuguese administration (see below, chap. V, para. 415); one on the question of South West Africa (see below, chap. IV, para. 285); and one on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland (see below, chap. VII, para. 292). An account of the Special Committee's consideration of these items is contained in chapters III, IV, V and VII of the present report.

10. In the light of its consideration of the above-mentioned items, and following a general discussion, the Special Committee also adopted a resolution concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to Southern Rhodesia, Territories under Portuguese administration, South West Africa and Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland (see para. 463 below). At the conclusion of its meetings in Africa, the Special Committee adopted by acclamation a further resolution expressing its appreciation to the host Governments (see para. 467 below).

A. MEETINGS HELD AT LUSAKA

Opening of meetingsAddress by the President of Zambia

11. The President of Zambia recalled his emotion three years before, when he had had the honour of appearing before the Special Committee to describe his country's bitter experience in its struggle for human rights and independence; he still felt the sorrow of those days, for millions of his African fellowmen were still labouring under oppression and suppression in neighbouring Territories. Historically speaking, three years was but a moment, so that it was particularly gratifying that this year Zambia, in its own right as an independent Republic, should be having the honour to entertain the Special Committee. It was particularly fitting, too, that the Committee was starting its deliberations on Africa Liberation Day.

12. The people of Zambia, whose history of struggle was still so fresh in their minds and whose geographical position painfully brought home to them the atrocities committed against mankind in the name of the so-called "maintenance of civilized standards", knew only too well that the evil forces responsible were aware that world opinion was against them. The people of Zambia therefore believed that it was their duty to remind the Special Committee that it was time for less talk and more effective measures; too much shouting merely helped to cement, strengthen and entrench those forces.

13. All Zambia warmly and sincerely welcomed the Special Committee's visit, for the Committee and its predecessors had done much to encourage and assist that country in its efforts towards independence. It was hoped that the fact of meeting in Lusaka would help to hasten the attainment of independence by other countries. The visit was giving all Africans, including Zambia's less fortunate brothers and sisters, great encouragement. The latter could, by their own efforts, do much to help themselves, and Zambia, for its part, felt it a solemn duty to give them every possible assistance. But those who could give the greatest assistance and do the most to speed up matters, thereby preventing violence and unnecessary destruction of human life were the administering Powers themselves. He would therefore appeal to all the Powers concerned to face their responsibilities and, in co-operation with the Special Committee, to meet their obligations to the United Nations and to the people of the world.

14. It should be noted with regard to Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland that once those countries attained independence the situation might become more critical than was generally appreciated, because of their economic dependence on South Africa.

15. In Southern Rhodesia, the situation was clear. Mr. Ian Smith had worked up the issue of a unilateral declaration of independence to such an extent that, on the international level, the campaign had had the effect of neutralizing counter action for majority rule. In fact, he had actually achieved his aim—namely the continuance of white domination—even though only for the time being. Southern Rhodesia's Constitution was tantamount to independence, save in name, for the white electorate. So long as the people concerned continued to fear the unilateral declaration of independence, they would not talk of majority rule, and nothing could suit Mr. Smith better.

16. Zambia had been firm in its stand against Portugal, South Africa and Rhodesia, its main concern being the recognition of the importance of man, the individual, irrespective of his colour. That right had been ignored in the régimes of those countries and has resulted in the creation of second-class citizens, in the degradation and oppression of many millions who were being denied the chance of a dignified existence. Zambia's geographical position and the past development of its communications and economy had left it in a well-nigh impossible situation, but that situation did not deter it from condemning those who pursued imperialistic, racist and colonialist policies.

17. The time had come for all Member States to make the United Nations a force for action, rather than a forum for speeches. Both the so-called big Powers and the small Powers must begin to respect the Charter and decisions of the Organization. Zambia promised to renew its efforts in that direction, and offered its full support to the Special Committee, whose deliberations would result in a step forward in the elimination of the forces of evil—forces which worked not only against the oppressed but against the oppressor as well. It was to be hoped that the goal would be rapidly achieved.

18. The Zambian people had the utmost confidence in the United Nations Organization. They had deliberately chosen United Nations Day, 24 October, as their Independence Day, to mark their complete acceptance of the principles of the United Nations Charter and to show that they fully supported the world Organization. It was a sad fact, however, that the United Nations was not yet a truly world Organization; the People's Republic of China was not represented in it.

19. The establishment of a counter organization had been suggested by the People's Republic of China but, much as he welcomed the desire implicit therein for a truly world-wide body, success would be more likely if that nation were admitted to the existing Organization. In the United Nations none had the moral right to blame China for thinking on those lines, for it had been driven against the wall by that Organization. The value of close and frequent joint discussions on matters of mutual interest could not be over-emphasized. Despite widely differing views and considerable suspicion and tension, the United Nations had played an important part in bringing about the nuclear test ban Treaty. The People's Republic of China, which was excluded from the United Nations, had just exploded its second nuclear device.

20. The People's Republic was not the only country that was outside the United Nations Organization. Indonesia's withdrawal had been an occasion of deep sadness for which the Organization could not be held to be without fault. The Members recognized its shortcoming only too well, but realized equally that, so long as those composing it were still dominated by human weaknesses of fear, suspicion and hatred, so long would any organization they might form remain ineffective. The President of Zambia made a strong and sincere appeal to President Sukarno and the Indonesian people to reconsider their decision. Indonesia's struggle for independence had been a shining example and a source of great inspiration for many. The world could not afford to dispense with Indonesia's potential contribution to its councils.

21. He mentioned those matters because he wished to stress once more what he had said over and over again: it was pure self-deception to believe that the United Nations could serve the entire world when so many millions of people were excluded from it. Apart from all the citizens of the independent countries in that position, there were many millions still under colonial rule.

General statements by members

22. The Chairman thanked the President of Zambia and the members of the Government for their invitation, which had enabled the Special Committee to meet in a region of Africa in which many Territories and peoples were unfortunately still either under colonial domination or subjected to the most shameful régime which man had ever known: apartheid. In speaking thus, he was thinking with sadness of the African people of Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, Angola, Mozambique, so-called Portuguese Guinea and South Africa. He felt anxiety, too, about the people of Basutoland, Swaziland and Bechuanaland, surrounded as they were by the racist Government of South Africa whose imperialism and desire for domination were a cause for real concern. Zambia's proximity to the authorities which had usurped power in that part of Africa placed its Government in a special position, of which the international community was well aware. That situation placed a heavy responsibility on the President and his Government for solidarity with the peoples of that region who were struggling in very difficult conditions to regain their human rights and sovereignty over their own country.

23. The Special Committee was meeting at Lusaka at a moment when the international situation was dominated by a number of very disquieting facts which concerned the sovereignty of certain peoples and which, by their very nature, were a violation of the United Nations Charter. He had noted with interest that the President had alluded to some of those events in his statement. The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, without disregarding the international context to which he and the President had alluded, was going to concentrate its efforts on the situation of the peoples which, under its terms of reference, it was to help to achieve independence. Everyone was convinced that peace was indivisible and that the rights of all men and of all peoples were universal. That being so, the members of the Special Committee were deeply concerned to note that, twenty years after the establishment of the United Nations and almost eighteen years after the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, millions of people were still deprived of their inalienable rights. That state of affairs was creating centres of tension which might at any moment bring about a breach of international peace. The Special Committee appealed to the men and the Governments responsible for such anachronistic situations to show reason and good sense.

24. To the Government of Portugal, it would say that the period of colonial domination was over. Portugal, which wanted to identify itself with a certain kind of civilization, should understand that history was a graveyard of empires. After the Roman Empire, which had left its imprint on the life of many peoples, the French and British colonial empires, which had been the greatest during the colonial period, had in their turn disappeared. The Portuguese colonial empire could be no exception to the rule. It was destined to disappear and it lay with Portugal to act in such a way that that inevitable transformation would come about in friendly collaboration with the people who had been subjected to so many affronts to their sovereignty and their dignity.

25. To those who claimed to represent the Government of Southern Rhodesia, the Special Committee appealed to show moderation and reason. The 200,000 settlers in Southern Rhodesia should understand, in their own interest, that neither by force nor by discriminatory legislation nor by repression of the most fundamental freedoms could they continue to impose their domination on the 4 million Africans of the Territory. They would have to revise their ideas and in that connexion the example of the co-operation between the former colonized and colonizers in Zambia should encourage them to accept the changes which were henceforth inevitable throughout the African continent. They claimed to be a Government which was qualified to negotiate with the administering Power, the United Kingdom, concerning the future of the Territory and its inhabitants; they even wanted to proclaim the independence of the Territory, all without consulting the people. The Special Committee was convinced that, if they showed some understanding, new relationships based on recognition and respect for the rights of the majority could enable the two communities living in Southern Rhodesia to co-operate so as to ensure the well-being and social advancement of the entire population. It was because the members of the Special Committee were prompted by that sentiment that they wished to help the settlers of Southern Rhodesia not to remain outside international legality, and to that end asked them to accept and respect the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which stipulated (Article 21 (3)) that:

"The will of the people shall be the basis of the authority of government; this will shall be expressed in periodic and genuine elections which shall be by universal and equal suffrage..."

26. The Special Committee had come to Lusaka in the hope that the authorities established in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia would understand that the United Nations was the repository of human rights and that those rights should be protected so that man should not be forced as a last resort to revolt against tyranny and oppression. The fact that the Special Committee was meeting in Africa should also be interpreted as an additional effort on the part of the United Nations to give more tangible proof of its solidarity with all the people of that continent who were deprived of their right to sovereignty, with all those who were victims of racial discrimination, in a word with all those on that continent who were suffering the effect of men who did not believe in racial equality.

27. In conclusion, he expressed the satisfaction of the members of the Special Committee at the progress achieved by the people of Zambia since independence. That was something of which the Special Committee and the whole of the United Nations could be justifiably proud.

28. The representative of Ethiopia sincerely thanked Zambia for its warm welcome to the Special Committee. President Kaunda's words were indeed those of a statesman who was fully aware of the immense burden that the accidents of history and geo-politics had placed upon the shoulders of the young Zambian nation. They were full of wisdom and understanding and constituted a useful guide and inspiration for the Committee.

29. Zambia was regarded today as the farthest outpost in the heroic battle for African freedom and independence. The role history had thrust upon it could not be played effectively without great sacrifice on the part of its people. The same unenviable position had been filled in the past by many countries of Africa, including his own, and the confronting truth for Zambia was that all had emerged victorious.

30. It was true that the majority of African countries had attained the status of free nations, but the point at issue was whether their brethren in the remaining few but vitally important areas of the continent were to be left languishing under the evil domination of entrenched and bigoted alien races. Never would Africans abandon the disinherited masses of South Africa, Angola, South West Africa, Mozambique, the so-called Portuguese Guinea and Zimbabwe. A rude shock was in store for the reactionary few, since all progressive mankind, including the Africans, would never rest until the entire continent was free and independent.

31. The Europeans now living in Zimbabwe—outnumbered by the Africans by twenty to one—were apparently convinced that their survival lay in a policy of segregation and racial discrimination and in ruthless suppression of all African political activity. The determination of that ruling white minority had steadily pushed the country to the brink of national catastrophe. And the “winning” of the so-called national elections recently by Mr. Ian Smith’s Rhodesian Front had been another tragic step in that direction. Those elections, based on the 1961 Constitution—which was unrelated to the political reality of the time—had been a mockery, designed to mislead international opinion. The facts were that the great majority of the African population were disenfranchised and that the small percentage eligible to vote had boycotted the election, since under that Constitution the Africans could never win at the polls.

32. Mr. Smith’s latest plans—to alter the constitutional legislation by introducing more racial laws on apartheid lines and to seize independence illegally—were well known to the United Kingdom Government. The equivocal attitude and lack of caution on the part of the latter was most puzzling, the representative of Ethiopia stated. The economic and diplomatic threats made by the United Kingdom Government had merely given Mr. Smith an opportunity to study economic consequences. One main target of his threatened counter measures would not be the United Kingdom but Zambia, which was dependent on Southern Rhodesia for coal and electric power. It was thus likely that the proposed United Kingdom economic sanctions, far from achieving the desired effect, might hurt innocent parties more than the intended target, and the Zimbabwe African nationalists regarded such sanctions as a poor weapon for subduing Mr. Smith.

33. It should not be forgotten that Mr. Smith was not without allies. Within Southern Rhodesia itself, “big business” was partly behind him, and he was backed by the whole Southern Rhodesian army and air force and the majority of the white electorate. Externally, he counted on sympathetic assistance from South Africa and the Portuguese authorities in Angola and Mozambique. That triangular axis seemingly in process of formation was signed for evil purposes and augured ill for tranquillity in the area, not to mention Africa as a whole. Pressure must be brought to bear to prevent its firm establishment.

34. Recalling that one of the United Kingdom arguments for inaction was that it had not been able to interfere in the internal affairs of Southern Rhodesia, as a self-governing colony since 1923, the representative of Ethiopia observed that self-government applied to the white community only, and African interests seemed to count no more today than they had in 1923, despite the radical and irreversible changes that had taken place throughout the African continent. That calculated ignoring of African interests was a tragedy and Mr. Smith had given no indication of how he intended to meet the aspirations of 95 per cent of the population. Any self-government which catered for the few at the expense of the majority was unacceptable on moral and other grounds. The fundamental fact that should not be overlooked was that Southern Rhodesia was a British colony and self-government of that kind could be instituted only through United Kingdom connivance with the minority Government. If the United Kingdom sought a formula for granting independence without the application of the democratic principle of “one man, one vote”, it would stand exposed before international public opinion.

35. In 1910, only fifty-five years ago, an Act of the British Parliament had made South Africa an independent country. By that Act, South African political realities had been ignored and political power blindly handed over to white South Africans, proponents for the most part of racialism and segregation. As a result, the majority of the people of South Africa had lived and were still living through untold suffering. Zimbabwe, under the ruling Rhodesian Front, was inspired by the same evil philosophy of apartheid and was facing a gloomy future similar to that of South Africa. The United Kingdom, more than Mr. Smith and his followers, must be held responsible for that situation.

36. Racial bitterness in Zimbabwe had been heightened to an explosive degree. Thousands of Africans were in prison for political reasons, in violation of human rights and others who had escaped were living in forced exile. Bigger detention camps were being established, and African political parties, and newspapers sympathetic to their cause, had been banned. Should they decide to take up arms to regain their rights or to set up a nationalist government-in-exile, the Africans of Zimbabwe could not be blamed. The Organization of African Unity had already warned that it would support a government-in-exile in the event of a unilateral declaration of independence.

37. Should that come to pass, the United Kingdom could not escape responsibility for the bloodshed that would inevitably result. The Ethiopian delegation was therefore strongly of the opinion that the United Kingdom Government must act swiftly to save the situation from further deterioration. It was not too late to summon a round-table conference of all shades of political opinion, for the purpose of working out a fair constitution that would form the basis for democratic government. The release of African political leaders and the reactivation of their political parties would be a prerequisite for serious political negotiations. In the event of Mr. Smith rejecting those proposals, Britain could exercise her powers to suspend the outdated 1961 Constitution, refuse to recognize the results of the recent fraudulent elections, impose economic sanctions and take military action to prevent the minority Government from declaring independence unilaterally. In the eyes of the world the use of its military strength for the laudable purpose involved would be to the credit of the United Kingdom Government. In short, Zimbabwe was a test case for the United Kingdom's oft-vaunted sense of justice and goodwill towards Africa. With or without that goodwill, Zimbabwe would inevitably win its freedom.

38. In conclusion, the representative of Ethiopia appealed to the Africans of Zimbabwe to act as one united force. It was no time for division in their ranks. Only determined united action by all could eventually defeat the adversary; in the struggle the entire strength of Africa and of all progressive mankind stood solidly behind them.

39. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed his Government's gratitude to Zambia for giving the Special Committee an opportunity to meet in Lusaka, to consider the major issues involved in the elimination of colonialism in Africa. He wished the people of Zambia great success in establishing their sovereign national State. The Soviet Government hoped that the Special Committee, during its first session in tropical Africa, would be able to make a substantial political contribution to the noble cause of the colonial peoples in their struggle for liberation.

40. The era was one of revolutionary transformation to achieve man's well-being and eliminate social, national and racial oppression and inequality. The national liberation movement of peoples, which had resulted in the collapse of the colonial empires, was one of the most important elements of that gigantic revolutionary process.

41. The liberation of the countries and peoples of Africa, Asia and Latin America from the colonial yoke was the result of the selfless heroic struggle which those peoples were successfully waging with the active support of all the progressive forces of the world. All the socialist States, including the Soviet Union, had helped and would continue to help the colonial peoples in their revolution against imperialistic domination, according to the Leninist principles adopted by the Soviet people from the first day of victory of the socialist revolution in Russia. It was a historical fact that the advent of the new socialist States had given an impetus to national liberation movements elsewhere, which now had a real chance of success. It was a source of pride that in the past two decades, about sixty newly independent States had emerged and, in particular, that the African continent had undergone marked changes. Those young States were now joining in the solution of major international problems, as an independent force in shaping the destinies of mankind.

42. The last and final stage in the elimination of the colonial régimes had begun; it was characterized by the desperate attempts of the colonial Powers to retain their domination in the remaining colonies and to restore and strengthen their positions in the newly liberated States. Strongholds of colonialism were scattered all over the world but the main front of the struggle lay in Africa, where the enslaved peoples of Angola, Mozambique, Portuguese Guinea, South West Africa and Zimbabwe were waging an intense and courageous struggle for their inherent right to freedom and national independence.

43. In their response the colonialists had unleashed barbarous colonial wars and committed monstrous brutalities, with the object of prolonging their domination and retaining their opportunities for fabulous profits which was the main incentive for colonialism. The main purpose of the colonialists was to plunder the natural wealth of the colonial Territories and use them for military bases to form the springboards for aggression. They were ready everywhere to apply force, as was evidenced by the events in the Congo, Viet-Nam, the Dominican Republic and the Republic of South Africa. Hardly a day passed without bringing further evidence of the uniting of the imperialists' forces in a common effort to halt freedom. The tangled web of the financial interrelation of American, British, Belgian and Portuguese monopolies, engaged in plundering the riches of the Territories he had mentioned, was supplemented by the system of military and political ties of the NATO partners. The reports of plans to create a military/colonial bloc in southern Africa, composed of the Republic of South Africa, Portugal and Southern Rhodesia, under the joint aegis of the United States and the United Kingdom, were disturbing and deserved most serious attention. Therefore all the forces of freedom would suffer fewer sacrifices the sooner the final victory of the struggle for freedom and independence was achieved.

44. He noted with great satisfaction that more than half the States of the world, at the Addis Ababa and Cairo Conferences of Heads of African States and Governments and the Cairo Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, had expressed the firm determination to go on to victory in the just cause of ridding the world of the remnants of colonialism. Undoubtedly, imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism constituted the main sources of international tension and conflict, lending importance to the decision to unite in giving all moral, political and material assistance in the struggle against such forces. The fact that that policy was fully shared and supported by the Soviet Union, by all the socialist States and by the overwhelming majority of mankind was a major guarantee of victory.

45. He recalled that the founders of the United Nations had embodied in the Charter the principles of self-determination of peoples and of equality of rights of big and small nations. Those principles had been further elaborated in the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples adopted on the initiative of his country. Thus, the United Nations had taken a political stand on the side of the oppressed peoples and had established the Special Committee to watch over the application of the Declaration. As the Committee had already entered its fourth year of existence, the time had perhaps come to consider whether its work had redounded to the benefit of the fighters for freedom.

46. The work had produced some positive results. It had contributed to the political isolation of the colonialists, by bringing the situation to the attention of world public opinion. Important decisions had been adopted, governing the manner in which the status of any colonial Territory must be determined. It remained for those members opposing colonialism and imperialism to ensure that more effective decisions, giving even greater help, were adopted. And the conditions for fruitful work were more propitious in Lusaka than in New York. The Special Committee could establish direct contact with prominent African leaders and with the Organization of African Unity.

47. The items on the Special Committee's agenda regarding the progress made in carrying out the Declaration in the Portuguese colonies, Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, Bechuanaland, Basutoland and Swaziland were of great importance for the final elimination of the colonial system in the African continent. No matter how different those Territories might be under natural conditions, population density and tribal origin, their lot had many common features, grounded in the refined cruelty of the colonial authorities. In justification of the savage reprisals against the colonial population under Portuguese rule, the Portuguese Foreign Minister had stated at a press conference recently in London that his country was pursuing a policy which seemed to it as lawful and honourable as any other policy, and that Portugal would not wish anyone to doubt its determination and ability to carry out that policy. That was a perfect illustration of the cynicism of the colonialists. Southern Rhodesia's Prime Minister was defiantly attempting, with the virtual consent of the United Kingdom, to turn the country into a racist State on the South African pattern and was trying to mislead world public opinion by alleging that the struggle in Southern Rhodesia was not between the indigenous population and the colonialists but between communism and western civilizations. That charge was as absurd in its substance as it was provocative in its purpose.

48. Another common feature was that the colonialists in Africa and elsewhere were backed by the United States, which had no colonial possessions of its own in Africa but which was taking an active part in plundering them and drawing a major share of the economic, military, strategic and other advantages derived from the continuance of the hated colonial régimes. Without that outside support, the colonial régimes in Africa would long since have collapsed.

49. Lastly, all the colonial peoples in Africa, as elsewhere, had an indisputable right to freedom and independence, as recognized by the whole world and by the United Nations. The member States composing the Special Committee had a special duty to help the enslaved peoples to establish their own independent sovereign States. In the case of Southern Rhodesia, that meant the establishment of an independent State of Zimbabwe, where the power would be in the hands of the indigenous majority.

50. The dozens of resolutions adopted by various United Nations bodies, calling upon the colonialists to grant freedom to those Territories, had thus far not been implemented. The present meetings, however, offered a further real opportunity for the Special Committee to bring the governing Powers and their supporters to book by reaffirming its solidarity with the struggling peoples and working out proposals for measures to be taken against them, in accordance with the United Nations Charter. Under the Charter, there was no authority to take measures of force against those creating a threat to peace, except by decision of the Security Council. But the Special Committee had an indisputable right to express its competent opinion on the need for such measures and that opinion would carry considerable international and political weight. Such conclusions, adopted on African soil, would have to be given the most serious consideration by the Security Council; achievement of that objective required clarity of aim, political firmness and consistency of principles in the Special Committee. The Soviet Union, in line with its expressed principles, was willing to support any effective measures designed to rid African soil speedily of the last colonial régimes.

51. The representative of India said that President Kaunda's opening address had recalled his stirring appeal as a petitioner before the Special Committee of Seventeen on 18 April 1962 and the prediction by the representative of India concerning the part Dr. Kaunda would play in the future of Zambia. It was fitting that the Special Committee should be meeting in President Kaunda's free country of Zambia on African Liberation Day.

52. The President had played a leading part in building up the close friendship existing between Zambia and India, which was based on similar history and common interests and ideals. Both countries were in the process of economic and social change; and both believed in peaceful coexistence, non-alignment and Afro-Asian solidarity. Zambia's fight for freedom had had a special appeal for India because Dr. Kaunda had adopted Mahatma Ghandi's policy of non-violence, explaining his reasons for so doing to the United Nations General Assembly on 4 December 1964 (1291st plenary meeting).

53. India had long been at the forefront of the struggle against colonialism and racialism, both in the United Nations, where his Government had been responsible for the question of racial discrimination in South Africa being placed on the agenda of the first session of the General Assembly in 1946, and as a non-aligned country attending the Bandung, Belgrade and Cairo Conferences.

54. In August 1963, speaking in New Delhi, the late Mr. Jawaharlal Nehru had referred to the awakening of Africa as the most exciting happening in the twentieth century. Today there were thirty-four independent African States Members of the United Nations. But in Southern Rhodesia, not far from Zambia, 4 million people were still being denied their rights. The Indian Government had already made known its attitude: that full and equal rights for all inhabitants, regardless of colour or creed, should come before independence. As a protest against the so-called general election held on 7 May 1965, against the wishes of the indigenous people and the recommendations and resolutions adopted by the Special Committee on 22 April 1965, the Government of India had withdrawn its mission from Salisbury and sent an explanatory note to the United Kingdom Government and its representative in Salisbury. In Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea colonialism in some of its worst forms still persisted; South West Africa faced the threat of illegal annexation by South Africa; Bechuanaland, Basutoland and Swaziland were still petitioning for independence. Efforts must not be relaxed as long as colonialism existed anywhere. The increasing support for the struggle against colonialism and racialism, particularly by socialist and Latin American countries, was a source of great encouragement. His Government had also welcomed the more progressive policies of the United Kingdom Government in recent years and hoped there would be no disappointment over Southern Rhodesia.

55. In a broadcast to the people of India on 11 June 1964, Prime Minister Shastri had referred to the names of Ghandi and Nehru as symbols of the movement of subject peoples for freedom from colonial domination. He had also spoken of the Afro-Asian movement, of which Pandit Nehru had been one of the founders. Afro-Asian solidarity was, he had said, not an end but a means of working for the freedom of the African and Asian peoples, for peace and understanding among all nations, and for economic growth and better standards of living; India sought no leadership in the group, but would work on an equal footing with the other nations in the common cause.

56. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said it was gratifying to see the Special Committee meeting in the free country of Zambia which, barely three years earlier, had been petitioning for independence. There were advantages, too, in meeting in Africa. The cost and the difficulties of travel for petitioners would be considerably reduced; the Special Committee would be able to gain first hand knowledge of its subject; and the people still seeking their independence would realize that some of the Governments represented on the Committee were on their side.

57. On the general issue of colonialism the attitude of the United Republic of Tanzania could be summed up in the words of President Nyerere, speaking in Mbeya in 1962:

"Those of our brothers still under the colonial yoke must fight; if they do not do so they are cowards. And those of us who are independent must help them even if it means shedding our blood; if we do not do so then we shall also be cowards."

58. He stressed the importance of united action. Divided factions only prolonged colonial domination.

59. He urged the Government of Southern Rhodesia not to miscalculate the African's determination by declaring unilateral independence. He also spoke of the responsibility of the United Kingdom Government which, as the administering Power, had ignored the Security Council's appeal to call off the recent elections. He urged that the United Kingdom Government should declare the elections void and convene a constitutional conference. If the problem were not soon settled by peaceful means, it might ultimately have to be settled by military action.

60. His Government's views on the Portuguese colonies remained unchanged. The situation had worsened, because the African people had taken to arms, but he was sure of their ultimate victory.

61. He hoped that the colonial Powers would respond to the Special Committee's appeals before it was too late, so that Africa could achieve full freedom without being forced to abandon the ways of peace.

62. The representative of Yugoslavia thanked the Governments of Zambia, Tanzania and Ethiopia for their generous invitations, which would enable the Special Committee to make a maximum contribution to the struggle for independence of the peoples subjected to foreign domination. His delegation was happy to see that Zambia, which only recently had still been under colonial domination, was today an independent and sovereign State and was making a valuable contribution to the efforts made by peace-loving peoples to promote international co-operation and to safeguard peace and security. The Government and people of Yugoslavia were following with sympathy the efforts of the people of Zambia to resolve the many difficult problems which they faced, such as the heritage of the colonial era; they were sure that Zambia would, by its own efforts and with the help of friendly countries, succeed in solving those problems and they wished it every success.

63. The fact that the Special Committee was meeting in Africa was of great importance. That continent, which had perhaps suffered more than any other from foreign exploitation, was unfortunately not yet rid of the colonialism, racial discrimination and apartheid which had long since been severely condemned by history and humanity. It was in Africa that some of the most difficult colonial problems still persisted, among which the problems of Southern Rhodesia, the Territories under Portuguese administration, South West Africa, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland and the problem of South Africa were the most disquieting. For Zambia and Tanzania, the situation in Southern Rhodesia, Angola, Mozambique and South West Africa not only was a source of concern because of the suffering inflicted on their African brothers, but represented a direct threat to their security and independence. It was in Africa that colonialism, which had been conquered and condemned both morally and politically, was trying to re-emerge in other forms by exploiting the difficulties encountered by the recently liberated countries. The Special Committee's visit was not only a demonstration of solidarity with the peoples struggling for freedom and independence, it was also a demonstration of the firm determination of the international community and of the United Nations to give those peoples all the assistance they needed to remove immediately, once and for all, the last vestiges of the colonial era: discrimination and subjugation. The Special Committee should make a thorough examination of the problems of Southern Rhodesia, the Territories under Portuguese administration, South West Africa, Basutoland, Bechuanaland, and Swaziland and should reach conclusions and make recommendations in keeping with the aspirations and interests of the peoples of those Territories. The members of the Special Committee were going to meet many representatives of those peoples and through them would be able to gain a more accurate picture of the real situation, which would be of great value in the formulation of conclusions and recommendations.

64. He recalled a recent statement in which President Tito had said that, in spite of the efforts made by monopolist circles in the metropolitan countries to prevent or slow the process of decolonization, the end of colonialism was near and that the last bastions of colonialism were preventing the attainment of a stable situation in many regions of the world and were an anachronism from both the political and the humanitarian point of view. The Heads of States of Non-Aligned Countries who had met at Cairo in October 1964 had declared that lasting peace could not be achieved so long as peoples subjected to foreign domination continued to be deprived of their fundamental right to freedom, independence and self-determination.

65. One of the principal aims of the United Nations was to ensure that all men, without distinction, should enjoy the inalienable right to freedom and human dignity, to do away with colonialism once and for all, to promote peace and security and to ensure international co-operation on the basis of equality, non-interference in the internal affairs of other countries and respect for the dignity of all human beings. The work of the Special Committee in Africa should be effective in helping to speed up the elimination of the last vestiges of colonialism and to create an atmosphere of peace and security in which the African people would be able to concentrate their efforts on solving the problems of economic, social and cultural development and to advance on the road to progress.

66. His country's position on the question of colonialism was well known and there was no need to state it again. As in the past, his Government would continue to give every assistance to the peoples of Zimbabwe, Angola, Mozambique, South West Africa, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, as also to all other peoples struggling against colonialism and fighting for liberty and independence.

67. The representative of the United States of America recalled that in April 1962, Dr. Kaunda, today the President of Zambia, had with others presented to the Special Committee a detailed picture of the situation in their country. Since then, some of their momentous aspirations had been realized, and it thus seemed most fitting that the Committee should be meeting, three years later, in independent Zambia on Africa Liberation Day. Dr. Kaunda had spoken of his country's claim and emphasis on self-determination. That must be the inspiration of the Committee also, which should continuously seek ways of bringing closer the day when the peoples of each of the Territories on its agenda would exercise fully, freely and peacefully their right to self-determination.

68. His country's dedication to self-determination was firmly rooted in the very circumstances of its emergence as a sovereign independent nation. For the United States self-determination was not just a slogan, but a concrete concept which should include three specific aspects of choice: first, the choice of status, whether independence or some other status selected by the people; second, the right of self-government, i.e., the right to be ruled by a government which governed by consent of all the governed; third, the right to choose the kind of institutions under which the people wished to live. Those were the components of choice in the true exercise of self-determination such as his country would wish for all dependent peoples—a choice to be achieved through the process of peaceful change within a framework of agreement of all the parties. That was the process which had more than doubled the membership of the United Nations in the few short years of its existence, and it could not be abandoned. But the process was only a beginning; preserving independence was often as delicate a task as winning independence. President Johnson, speaking of the newly independent nations of Asia and Africa, had affirmed the United States' commitment to help those who were seeking to strengthen their own independence and to work closely with Governments dedicated to the welfare of all the people; the United States, he had said, did not seek to extend its power, but to strengthen the freedom of all peoples.

69. The representative of Italy, after thanking the Government and people of Zambia for the friendly hospitality offered to the Committee, said that Italy had been closely associated with Africa through the centuries and was proud to play a part, through membership in the Special Committee, in the historic process of decolonization, which would go down in history not only for what had been achieved but also for the way it had been achieved: namely by the bravery and tenacity with which the colonial peoples had pursued their ideals of freedom and independence, by the pressure of all liberal forces in the world and by the wisdom of all parties concerned who had decided that decolonization should be achieved by peaceful means. In the past, many empires had been swept away by violence, but historians would always ask themselves whether the results justified the cost in human suffering, or whether the new order did not contain in itself the seeds of future destruction. He did not believe that that was true of decolonization. The fact that the new order had been created by peaceful means was the best guarantee of its soundness and durability, and the Special Committee's presence in a newly independent country testified to the fortunate trend history had taken.

70. Not all the problems had been solved, and the virtues of wisdom, tenacity and restraint exercised in the past by the former colonial peoples and administering Powers would have to be exercised again and to an even greater extent. If the outlook was not bright in certain areas, the Committee should redouble its efforts. Italy was confident that the requirements of justice, freedom and peace would eventually be reconciled, and pledged its wholehearted co-operation to that end.

71. The representative of Denmark recalled that his delegation had, from the outset, found that the holding of meetings in Africa might be useful in helping the Committee to obtain a clearer understanding of African problems. He sincerely hoped that the meetings would further the cause of decolonization and lead to constructive measures on behalf of all peoples still living under colonial rule. The statements made by previous speakers had shown how strong was the pressure for the final abolition of all colonies and how great was the need for self-determination.

72. The representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland said he was impressed by the way in which the Zambian Government had set about the task of development which faced the country.

73. The United Kingdom Government's approach to the problem of the Territories in southern Africa was founded on the principle of self-determination as laid down in the United Nations Charter. His Government had pledged itself to that principle and had consistently honoured its pledge. In this connexion, he pointed to the changes that had taken place in Africa since the Special Committee's visit in 1962. During that period no less than six African countries formerly under British administration, with a total population of over 21 million, had attained full independence.

74. The record of the United Kingdom Government was proof of its sincerity and good faith, which the Committee should bear in mind when considering the solution of the remaining colonial problems in Africa and elsewhere. It was against that background, and with the basic principle of self-determination constantly in view, that his Government approached the four items to be dealt with by the Committee. The United Kingdom had direct responsibility in regard to only two of those items. In Southern Rhodesia, his Government had already declared its determination to find, by negotiation, a basis for independence which would be acceptable to the people of Southern Rhodesia as a whole. Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland were already well on the way to full independence, and Basutoland and Bechuanaland had fully representative Governments which were busily engaged in planning the final stages in their progress to independence. As to the Portuguese African Territories, the United Kingdom had repeatedly stated that the principle of self-determination should be implemented and had repeatedly urged the Portuguese Government to base its policies on that principle. The problem of South West Africa was at present being examined by the International Court of Justice and, in his view, it would be incorrect for the Committee to say anything which might prejudice the Court's findings.

75. In discussing all those questions, his delegation would endeavour to play its part constructively. Where United Kingdom responsibilities were involved, frank discussions had been held with the United Nations to the fullest possible extent consistent with his Government's views on the competence of the United Nations and the limitations on its own authority and responsibility. It was his Government's firm intention and, he felt sure, the wish of Africa, to seek a peaceful solution to all those problems.

76. The representative of Poland, after expressing his delegation's gratitude and appreciation to the President, Dr. Kaunda, his Government and the people of Zambia for the invitation extended to the Special Committee to meet in that part of the African continent, welcomed the representative of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in his capacity as an observer in the Special Committee. He pointed out that, although the sphere of colonial domination had shrunk in the last few years, the dangers inherent in the continued existence of colonialism had by no means decreased. The dependent peoples refused to live any longer under the colonial yoke, particularly when they could see examples in neighbouring countries of peoples enjoying their independence. However, through violence and the use of force, the colonial Powers still attempted to frustrate their just aspiration to achieve independence.

77. The problems that the Special Committee was called upon to discuss, together with the policy of apartheid in South Africa, were closely interrelated and constituted the most urgent matters facing the Organization of African Unity, the United Nations and the world as a whole. In southern Africa the colonial Powers were using all the means at their disposal to prevent the implementation of the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. They still continued to wage colonial wars against the indigenous population, thus creating a permanent source of tension and a threat to international peace and security. Recent events in the Portuguese Territories and Southern Rhodesia gave rise to serious concern. A unilateral declaration of independence in Southern Rhodesia might lead to the creation of a new apartheid State in Africa, dominated by a minority settlers' Government.

78. Southern Rhodesia, Angola and certain other Territories in Africa were not merely colonies of the United Kingdom or Portugal, but virtually economic colonies belonging to South Africa, Britain, the United States and Western Germany, whose nationals were part-owners of the great trusts that exploited the natural resources and peoples of southern Africa. The unholy alliance of Portugal, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia was based on the mutual ramifications of the international financial groupings. Confident in the support of the big monopolies, which were powerful enough to influence official policies, the Governments of Portugal, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia were constantly intensifying their fight against national liberation movements.

79. The world was witnessing both open and disguised aggression by colonial and neo-colonial forces in different parts of the world in flagrant violation of the United Nations Charter. Those desperate acts had followed upon pronouncements that wars of national liberation would not be tolerated by the imperialist Powers. It was the duty of the Special Committee to reject the contention that the imperialists were entitled to decide what form the struggle for national liberation should take. If their contention were accepted, the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and Southern Rhodesia would have to abandon their struggle for freedom and independence. That must not be allowed to happen.

80. The Polish people fully shared the desire of Africans to see their brothers liberated from foreign domination, humiliation and oppression. By virtue of its historical traditions and the nature of its socialist structure, Poland was opposed to any form of national or social oppression. It had on many occasions demonstrated its support for the cause of freedom and progress. Only a concerted effort by all the anti-colonial forces, as envisaged by the Addis Ababa conference and the Cairo Declaration of the non-aligned countries, could speed up the process of decolonization.

81. His Government considered that the Special Committee should draw the necessary conclusions from the fact that numerous resolutions adopted by the United Nations had been ignored by the colonial Powers. Certain cases could be submitted to the Security Council with a request that appropriate action be taken to enforce decisions in accordance with the United Nations Charter. Special emphasis should be placed on the urgent need to put an end to military and other assistance offered by NATO to the colonial Powers to help them to suppress nationalist movements in Africa and elsewhere.

82. The Polish delegation attached great importance to the present session in Africa, which would allow the Special Committee to make contact with the people still living under colonial rule. The representatives of the oppressed peoples would be given an opportunity to explain their views and their aspirations. The road to independence was not an easy one. It was for the colonial peoples themselves to decide which direction they wished to take. The task of the United Nations, and the Special Committee in particular, was to help them in their struggle.

83. The representative of Iraq said that the Special Committee's decision to meet in Africa reflected the growing concern of the United Nations for Territories still under foreign domination and its determination to see that the people in those areas gained their independence and freedom. His delegation hoped that independence would be achieved speedily, peacefully and smoothly. Many of the countries in the Special Committee were developing nations that needed peace and security to pursue their objectives of social justice, economic development and higher standards of living. The Afro-Asian nations had many common goals, foremost among them being to ensure that the colonial Territories gained their independence peacefully. History proved that domination and injustice could not last long and that oppressors would ultimately be defeated.

84. The Special Committee's work in Africa would necessarily be limited by the short time available, but its work would surely bear fruit. It would be an inspiration to those Territories still under foreign domination to achieve their goals of freedom and dignity.

85. While meeting in Zambia, the Special Committee would look into the question of Southern Rhodesia, Zambia's immediate neighbour. His delegation's views on the situation there had been fully explained when the question was debated in New York. Since then the Special Committee had adopted a resolution calling upon the administering Power to assume its responsibilities by securing the release of prisoners and detainees, the repeal of discriminatory laws and the suspension of the 1961 Constitution. The recent elections in Southern Rhodesia and the return to power of the present racist Government, which had stated its intention of declaring unilateral independence, had created an explosive situation. It was for that reason that the Special Committee had decided to meet on African soil, in order to be physically closer to the Territories in question and to hear petitioners. He felt sure that the opportunity offered to the Committee would be valuable and would result in a fresh understanding of the problems involved.

86. The representative of Bulgaria recalled that his country had always stood solidly behind Zambia both in its past struggles and in its present endeavour to build an outpost of freedom on the frontiers of oppression. He was gratified to see the progress Zambia had achieved in the brief period since independence. It was a happy coincidence that the Special Committee should be starting its work on African Liberation Day, and he was sure its decision to come to Africa would prove timely and far-sighted. Millions of people in Africa still languished in colonial bondage, and the Special Committee's visit would bring it into closer touch with spokesmen for the liberation movements there.

87. The situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples was far from satisfactory. It would soon be five years since the Declaration had been adopted, yet there was more need than ever for vigorous action by the Special Committee. As the President of Zambia had said in his opening address, what was required was action, not words.

88. In endeavouring to reflect the aspirations of dependent peoples, the Committee had always sought to adopt recommendations designed to bring about a peaceful solution of the problems posed by colonialism. Blame for the present situation must therefore lie with the colonial Powers, which had consistently refused to comply with the decisions of the Special Committee, the General Assembly and the Security Council. It was that stubborn opposition to the process of decolonization that constituted the common denominator of all the items on the Special Committee's agenda. The racial discrimination, oppressive measures and direct military action undertaken by Salazar, Verwoerd and Smith, and the assistance given them by the United States, the United Kingdom and other NATO countries, showed that the colonial Powers were resolved to do everything possible to preserve white domination in southern Africa and to further the interests of the monopolies which were exploiting the peoples and the natural resources of that whole region. While criticizing those policies in words, the imperialist Powers in fact acted as accomplices. Meanwhile, the United States had embarked on a series of aggressive acts in other parts of the world such as Viet-Nam, the Congo and the Dominican Republic. The United States policy of intervening to crush national liberation movements in flagrant violation of international law was thus another manifestation of the same fundamental attitude. The Special Committee could therefore not ignore the resulting international situation, for it was highly relevant to the questions on its agenda. The Special Committee must take whatever steps were necessary to become an effective instrument in securing compliance with the Declaration. His country's unswerving support for the principles of that Declaration was well known, and the Bulgarian delegation would support any measures designed to secure its speedy implementation.

89. The representative of the Ivory Coast thanked the Zambian people for their welcome and congratulated President Kaunda on his message of welcome. He was particularly happy to be in Zambia, a State which, since its liberation from the colonial yoke, had welcomed to its territory its oppressed brothers from Rhodesia, South West Africa, Mozambique, Angola, Bechuanaland, Swaziland and Basutoland. They should know that they were not alone in that struggle and that all peace-loving peoples stood shoulder to shoulder with them.

90. The representative of Sierra Leone said that, by meeting in Zambia, the Special Committee would give new hope to those African Territories still under colonial domination and make clear the determination of most countries of the world to free them. It was the earnest desire of his delegation to bring about the speedy decolonization of Africa and other continents. In that respect he fully endorsed President Kaunda's call for immediate action rather than words, and hoped that some positive results would come out of the present session, for example the release of Mr. Joshua Nkomo and the Rev. Sithole.

91. Recalling its own colonial days, the Government of Sierra Leone was dedicated to the quest for the liberation of all oppressed peoples. It understood the problems involved in the struggle for emancipation and knew how cunning the colonial Powers could be. It was partly because all political parties had presented a united front on the question of independence that Sierra Leone had achieved its independence peacefully. He therefore hoped that where internal differences existed, the parties in any Territories under colonial rule would be able to unite for freedom, leaving the colonial Power no excuse for delay.

92. The Special Committee's agenda covered the High Commission Territories of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, where the chief difficulty would be to preserve their territorial and national integrity, and South West Africa where the people had been forced into a system of apartheid against their will. Whatever the legal outcome at the International Court of Justice—and his delegation devoutly hoped that the result would be emancipation—a human tragedy existed in those countries and it would have to be discussed. In the Portuguese Territories the nationalists of Angola, Portuguese Guinea, Mozambique and other areas were denied the right to choose their own destiny. In Zimbabwe a few thousand whites under Mr. Ian Smith intended to create another South Africa. However different those countries might be, and however varied their problems, the basic situation was the same: millions of people were denied the inalienable right of every individual to be treated with human dignity and to enjoy his fundamental liberties.

93. He called upon the colonial Powers to release their subject peoples and allow them to fend for themselves. It was his delegation's wish to see the nationalist leaders of today installed at the United Nations as heads of truly independent countries.

94. The representative of Cambodia thanked the President of Zambia warmly for having allowed the Special Committee to meet in Lusaka.

95. Although it was situated far from the African continent, whose peoples were still suffering cruelly under colonialism, Cambodia was nevertheless an Afro-Asian country which had given and continued to give its firm and constant support to its African brothers in their lawful struggle for independence, for Cambodia itself had, for a long period, experienced the humiliation of the colonial yoke. In November 1953, however, alone among the countries of the former French Indo-China, Cambodia had succeeded in regaining its freedom and complete independence, without a drop of blood being shed.

96. At all international gatherings—at Bandung, at Belgrade, at Cairo and at each session of the United Nations General Assembly—Cambodia had raised its voice in condemnation of colonialism, neo-colonialism, racialism and imperialism. Cambodia, like the other Afro-Asian countries, could not leave several million of its African brothers at the mercy of the colonial Powers. They must be helped to recover their freedom and independence as speedily as possible. That was why, immediately after the Cairo Conference, Prince Norodom Sihanouk, the Head of State of Cambodia, had informed the Secretary-General of the Conference that the Royal Government of Cambodia, in solidarity with its African brothers, had decided to break off all relations with Portugal and South Africa.

97. The Special Committee, as also the General Assembly and the Security Council, had adopted a number of resolutions concerning, in particular, Southern Rhodesia, the Territories under Portuguese administration and South West Africa. Unfortunately, those resolutions had not been complied with. His delegation therefore considered that the time had come for action and for the consideration of specific measures designed to compel the colonial Powers and their allies, the imperialists, to respect and carry out the resolutions adopted. Millions of Africans living under the colonial yoke had placed their hope in intervention by the United Nations, and the Organization must not disappoint them.

98. The representative of Syria pointed out that Africa's rise to prominence in world affairs was one of the outstanding features of the twentieth century. Within a short space of time much had been done to unite Africa in defence of the rights of man. In that connexion the Special Committee had a heavy burden of responsibility. The time for action had come and it must ensure that its work was positive and effective.

99. In Southern Rhodesia, Mozambique and Angola, as well as in South Africa, the forces of bigotry and reaction were firmly entrenched. Devoid of any sense of humanity, they ruthlessly suppressed the indigenous peoples. Blinded by the immense profits they were accumulating at the expense of the majority, they still denied the masses their most elementary rights. Against the current of history and progress, they still carried out policies of colonial exploitation and racial superiority. In Zimbabwe, a small minority sought to achieve its so-called independence in order to deny the legitimate rights of 4 million Africans. For all of them, the African peoples represented no more than cheap labour.

100. It was not enough to decry their actions, because moral pressure was of no avail. They flouted all moral and international obligations and defied the resolutions of the international community. It was therefore time to undertake a positive investigation. The remaining representatives of colonialism manufactured only small arms themselves. Where did they get their abundant supplies of modern weapons? What were their sources of foreign investment? Without animosity he wished to draw the attention of the major Powers to the fact that by condoning those supplies of arms, money and assistance they were doing a disservice to the cause of humanity. It was deeds and facts that mattered, not declarations of innocent intentions. Legalistic quibbles must not hamper effective action. Millions of lives were at stake and international peace was in danger. Amid the great revolution for the betterment of mankind, vile attempts were being made to debase human values and reinstate the worst forms of exploitation and slavery.

101. The Afro-Asian countries had long experience of the anti-colonial struggle, and had pronounced themselves in unequivocal terms in the historic resolutions of the Cairo Conference of non-aligned countries. Great hope had been placed in the work of the Special Committee, which should do its utmost to ensure that the expectations of the colonized countries were not disappointed.

102. The representative of Venezuela expressed warm thanks to the President of Zambia for his invitation to the Special Committee. The fact that the Special Committee was meeting in Africa was of particular importance, for it was certainly the African continent which had suffered most from the ravages of colonialism. Its land and its inhabitants had been exploited, and millions of Africans, torn from their native land, had nourished the soil of America with their blood, but millions, too, had finally become merged and identified with the other inhabitants of the American continent. It was to the African that Latin America owed its spirit of independence, its love of freedom and its courage in rebelling against every kind of oppression.

103. One hundred and fifty years previously, at great sacrifice, Latin America, and Venezuela in particular, had attained independence. There were still, however, peoples in America subjected to the colonial yoke and Territories occupied by foreign Powers. Those peoples too would regain their independence one day and the occupied Territories would be reunited with the States from which they had been severed.

104. For Venezuelans, inhabitants of a country where discrimination did not exist, where social democracy was not an empty word and where the Indian, the African and the Spaniard had blended into one freedom-loving people, it was hard to understand how there could be colonial régimes where some were denied the exercise of their fundamental rights.

105. Only universal suffrage, which was still denied to a large number of men, was capable of ensuring the free expression of the popular will. The Venezuelan Government had been elected by universal suffrage in elections in which more than 90 per cent of the registered voters had participated. His delegation therefore considered that the Zimbabwe people, and the millions of other Africans still under the colonial régime, could no longer be deprived of their fundamental rights. It was inconceivable that some Powers could believe that the anachronistic system of colonialism could continue in being or that a people could be denied its freedom and independence. A people might be deprived temporarily of its freedom and independence, but sooner or later it would regain its rights.

106. His delegation was convinced that free co-operation among peoples and respect for the principles of the United Nations Charter were enough to resolve all the problems which might face the international community. Venezuela had always defended the principle of non-intervention and would never allow a foreign Power to interfere in its internal affairs. It wished to see that principle respected also in the case of all other peoples, without distinction. The African peoples had the right to decide their destiny in complete freedom. That was an inalienable right which it should be possible to exercise peacefully, and it was incumbent on the United Nations to see that the right of the peoples was respected if it did not wish violence to break out.

107. Venezuela had always struggled against colonialism; in United Nations bodies it had always defended the right of the peoples of Africa to freedom and independence, and it would continue to do so.

108. The President of the Republic of Zambia, in the address he had given on the occasion of "African Liberation Day", had expressed the hope that the Special Committee would not have to return to Lusaka again as a committee on decolonization. The delegation of Venezuela associated itself with that hope.

109. The representative of Madagascar expressed satisfaction that Zambia, which had just gained independence, was already showing that it was resolved to contribute actively to the defence of the interests of the international community. Zambia was thus proving to the world that it regarded the plight of those still suffering under foreign rule as a matter of prime concern. That gesture deserved the admiration and gratitude of all.

110. Five years after the adoption by the General Assembly of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, there were still regions of the world, particularly on the African continent, where the exploitation of one people by another continued and where scorn for the most elementary human rights was the rule. The fact that recommendations and resolutions of United Nations bodies remained without effect was not the result of chance but the work of a few Governments and individuals who clung to principles which were dictated by their selfish interests.

111. The current of independence was becoming so strong in Africa that all those trying to oppose it were courting disaster, for the independent African States would not indefinitely tolerate the use of violence against their brothers.

112. The Malagasy Republic was whole-heartedly with those struggling for their freedom and hoped that the Special Committee, when it concluded its work, would have opened the way to an era of co-operation among all peoples.

113. The representative of Australia heartily endorsed President Kaunda's plea for a strengthening of the United Nations and its work. Having observed at first hand Zambia's development both before and after independence, he considered Zambia to be a good example of successful decolonization. Credit for that should go primarily to the leaders and people of the country, but also to the United Kingdom Government. A people's revolution was taking place in Zambia, but a revolution without violence or injustice. Race relations were characterized by tolerance and co-operation. Hard work and the dynamic utilization of resources were the main-spring of development for the welfare of all and not for a minority. Less concern was shown for the maintenance of civilized standards—a negative and static concept—than for the steady raising of standards above the existing level for the whole of the population.

114. For leaders and peoples in Africa south of the Zambesi, those were lessons of the greatest importance. The Special Committee could exhort, appeal, and warn, but example had a more profound and permanent influence than precept. He hoped that the leaders and peoples south of the Zambesi would study the policies and plans of Zambia and see for themselves how transition to majority rule and advance to higher standards of productivity, welfare and human dignity for everyone could be achieved with justice and in peace. Such changes would not easily be achieved in Rhodesia, for example, where an extraordinary effort, in particular by the Rhodesian Government, would be required. The Special Committee was entitled to ask that such an effort be made, and he hoped it would continue to play a constructive part in achieving that end.

115. The representative of Chile welcomed the fact that Zambia, which was like Chile in that its principal source of wealth was copper, was today an independent democratic State.

116. The attitude of the Chilean delegation in the Special Committee was well known. It had always been guided by an unshakable faith in the principle of equality for all and respect for basic human rights. Chile had a deep interest in the African cause and in the process of liberation in Africa and looked forward to living in a world which was completely liberated, devoted to the task of improving the welfare of all and rid of the unjust system of discrimination. Latin America had struggled in the past to free itself from the colonial yoke; today it was the turn of the Africans to fight for liberty. The best wishes of the people and Government of Chile were with them.

117. It was regrettable that the Special Committee should once again have to consider the situation in Southern Rhodesia, its previous resolutions having so far been of no avail. The Committee's decision to ask for the release of the political leaders Nkomo and Sithole was of the utmost importance and he wished to address another urgent appeal to the administering Power to use its influence with Mr. Ian Smith's Government to obtain the immediate release of the political prisoners—who were the true representatives of Southern Rhodesia—and the convening of a constitutional conference on the basis of the principle "one man, one vote". The Chilean delegation was concerned also about the situation of the inhabitants of South West Africa and of the Territories administered by Portugal, and it strongly condemned the attitude of South Africa and Portugal. It would continue to co-operate actively with the efforts being made to restore those countries to their lawful owners. The inhabitants of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, too, had a right to self-determination and to a government of their choice. The Chilean delegation expressed its sympathy with them and warmly supported their cause. Lastly his delegation was glad that an observer from the Organization of African Unity was attending the Special Committee's meetings and hoped that consideration might be given to the possibility of having a permanent representative of that regional organization at United Nations Headquarters in New York.

118. The representative of Iran recalled that, from the outset, his Government had backed every action taken by the United Nations for the liberation of people from colonial rule. As a sponsor of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, Iran took a keen and active interest in its speedy implementation by peaceful means. The struggle of the Zimbabwe people for liberation from the racist minority régime of Southern Rhodesia had received Iran's full support. The struggle for independence in other parts of Africa, in particular in Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea where colonialism in its most cruel form prevails was of equal or even greater importance.

119. In addition to serving the cause of freedom, justice and human dignity, the struggle for independence had also been instrumental in bringing together the peoples of the Afro-Asian countries. Those fraternal ties should not be slackened once independence had been achieved. Independence meant only political liberation. True freedom implied economic independence and the eradication of poverty, disease, hunger and illiteracy. Since all developing countries were faced with similar problems, they should co-operate in solving them. Common action against social and economic ills should begin with small and feasible projects which could be successfully accomplished. A start could be made by creating or expanding commercial and economic ties and by exchanging technical knowledge.

120. Progress made under Zambia's transitional development plan, and the projects undertaken in agricultural development, the expansion of trade, health and education, indicated the high degree of competence and dedication on the part of the leaders of Zambia.

121. The representative of Tunisia associated himself with the speakers who had expressed their thanks to the Zambian Government for all the efforts it had made to ensure the success of the meetings of the Special Committee in Lusaka.

122. As long ago as 1959, President Bourguiba had raised the question of decolonization and suggested that the countries with colonies should hold a round-table conference to decide themselves on the procedures for the decolonization of the countries and peoples under their administration. President Bourguiba had pointed out at that time that decolonization was inevitable and that it was better that it should be brought about peacefully than that it should involve unnecessary bloodshed; colonialism was out of date and it was impossible to oppose the trend of history. President Bourguiba had concluded that it was in the interests of the colonial Powers themselves to bring about decolonization, since they would thus retain the friendship and sympathy of the colonized peoples. Although President Bourguiba's suggestion had not been taken up by the colonial Powers, the United Nations had in a way replied to it by establishing the Special Committee.

123. The Tunisian delegation wished to pay a tribute to the Special Committee for the way in which it had discharged its task so far. The Special Committee was a body of which the administering Powers should make the greatest use, since it enabled them to carry out decolonization in favourable conditions, and they should co-operate closely with it in the interests of world peace.

124. Tunisia would spare no effort to contribute fully to the observance of the principle of decolonization wherever it might be applicable, and, in particular, would do its utmost during the session to advance the Special Committee's work with regard to the items on its agenda.

Other statements

125. The representative of the Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa of the Organization of African Unity expressed the gratitude of the Secretary-General of the OAU for according the Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa of that organization an observer status on the occasion of the Special Committee's meetings in Africa. He also extended his good wishes to the members of the Special Committee for a fruitful stay in Africa. On behalf of the OAU, he thanked the Government and people of Zambia for the hospitality accorded to the various delegations and to the OAU observer.

126. He observed that the President of Zambia had eloquently stated the stand of the OAU with regard to the problem of colonialism in Africa which the OAU regarded as a challenge to the African continent and an affront to African dignity. A situation in which millions of African peoples were subjected to alien rule and exploitation with a reckless disregard for the aspirations of the peoples for a decent life and self-determination could no longer be tolerated.

127. It was the hope of the OAU and its Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa that the meetings of the Special Committee in Africa would bring new hope to the suffering peoples still under colonial domination and that the Special Committee, having met and heard the various nationalist organizations, would recommend to the General Assembly concrete action to ensure that colonial Powers grant independence to all the Territories under domination.

128. He offered to make available for distribution to members of the Special Committee the resolution of the Council of Ministers and the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the OAU. He explained that the documents related to the Lagos Conference (February 1964) resolution on Southern Rhodesia (A/AC.109/59), the Cairo Conference (July 1964) resolutions on apartheid and racial discrimination, Southern Rhodesia, the Portuguese Territories, the High Commission Territories and the Nairobi Conference (February-March 1965) resolutions on Portuguese Territories and Southern Rhodesia.

129. He stated that in order to co-ordinate assistance to liberation movements in Africa, to give direction and purpose to the struggling peoples of Africa, and to focus world attention more intensely on the problems of colonialism in Africa, the OAU had established a Co-ordinating Committee of nine members with headquarters in Dar es Salaam.

130. He emphasized that it was the desire of the Co-ordinating Committee that there should be a peaceful transition to independence in all colonial Territories in Africa. Where colonial Powers showed a genuine desire and took practical steps to achieve such a goal speedily, all attempts had always been made to encourage them in their efforts and to ensure that nationalist parties, without prejudice to their cause, pursued their goal in a spirit of moderation. On the other hand, there were a few recalcitrant Powers and racist minority groups which had proved impervious to reason and common sense, in the attitudes of which there could be no change unless brought about by violence and the destruction of human life. Conditions in Mozambique, Angola, Southern Rhodesia, South Africa, South West Africa, Portuguese Guinea, São Tomé and Príncipe and French Somaliland were such as to constitute a threat to peace in Africa and the whole world unless the United Nations exercised that sacred duty imposed upon it by the Charter to impose sanctions in order to ensure that a blood-bath was not let loose in Africa. Africa could not be expected to tolerate alien rule and a shameless exploitation of its peoples by a minority, however powerful.

131. The history of Africa was written in bloodshed by those who, under the guise of an evangelizing Christian mission, enslaved millions of people, banishing many to barren and unproductive lands in favour of a microscopic minority who, in all appearances, had lost all sense of justice and common humanity. In Zimbabwe, a minority had arrogated to itself the inherent right to rule the majority under a system that was akin to the Nazi Gestapo. The United Kingdom, as the administering Power, had failed to live up to its reputation for justice and fair play. It had refused to take the initiative to suspend the Rhodesian Constitution and to convene a constitutional conference of all shades of political opinion in Zimbabwe. On the contrary, the leaders of the people were either in jail or under restriction and yet all that the United Kingdom had done was to threaten economic and diplomatic sanctions against the Government of Southern Rhodesia if it declared independence unilaterally. The situation in Zimbabwe was explosive and constituted a potential threat to world peace. Africa, and no less the United Nations, had a responsibility to ensure that the situation did not deteriorate further as a result of the continued travesty of the elementary rules of justice and democratic principles by a recalcitrant racist minority waxing strong on the sweat of the labouring masses of Zimbabwe.

132. The racist minority Government was embarking upon a disastrous course by threatening to declare independence unilaterally. The OAU considered this a challenge to the integrity and good faith of the administering Power and a challenge to organized world opinion. If allowed to materialize, it would constitute, not only on the part of the racist Government of that Territory, but also on the part of the Government of the United Kingdom, a flagrant violation of the resolutions of the Special Committee and the General Assembly.

133. The United Kingdom had threatened economic and diplomatic sanctions against Southern Rhodesia in the event of a unilateral declaration of independence. It was therefore pertinent to draw a comparison between past experiences in South Africa and the possibilities presented in Zimbabwe. In spite of the adoption of General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) of November 1963, calling on all Member States, inter alia, to boycott all South African goods and to refrain from exporting goods, including arms and ammunition, to South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States together with their Western allies had not complied with the resolution. Since then, Western Germany and Japan had substantially increased their investments in, and trade with South Africa, thereby postponing the day of reckoning for the racial bigots of that country. Those two countries had in fact successfully taken advantage of the situation created by the trade embargo imposed upon South Africa by some countries. There were countries ready to take advantage of such sanctions, and in any case, Portugal and South Africa had already pledged their support should this become necessary.

134. Mr. Ian Smith had gone further, by threatening economic reprisal against Zambia and Malawi. The racist minority clique of white settlers should be warned without delay that any attempt to disrupt the economy of the young Zambian nation would be regarded as an act of hostility to the whole of Africa.

135. The Co-ordinating Committee called upon the United Kingdom to take the following steps:

(a) To seize the initiative immediately in Southern Rhodesia by giving Mr. Smith a time-limit within which to agree to a review of the Constitution in such a way as to ensure majority rule;

(b) To suspend the Rhodesian Constitution pending this review;

(c) To convene immediately a constitutional conference in London reflecting all shades of political opinion in Zimbabwe; and

(d) To order the immediate and unconditional release of all political detainees in Zimbabwe.

136. If Mr. Smith failed to comply with these conditions, the United Kingdom would be honour bound to intervene militarily in Southern Rhodesia as it had done elsewhere in the recent past. The Co-ordinating Committee endorsed the stand of the Special Committee that the United Kingdom use its good offices for the release of Mr. Nkomo and the Rev. Sithole to enable them to appear before the Special Committee.

137. He remarked that Africa did not desire bloodshed as a solution to the Southern Rhodesian problem. It desired a solution that guaranteed majority rule in a new society in which the worth of the individual was protected without regard to the colour of his skin. At the same time, Africa would leave no stone unturned to ensure that the common will was the basis of law in Southern Rhodesia.

138. Elsewhere, in the Territories under Portuguese domination—Angola, Mozambique, so-called Portuguese Guinea, São Tomé and Príncipe—no visible step had been taken by Portugal to respect and comply with United Nations resolutions on decolonization. Portuguese authorities still claimed that these Territories situated in Africa were overseas provinces of Portugal; they still claimed a Christian civilizing mission although forced labour and political repression, mass illiteracy and poverty were all that could be shown for Portugal's five centuries in these Territories. NATO arms were being used in all these Territories to suppress the genuine aspirations of the peoples for self-determination. Portugal continued to practise genocide on a large scale and to mete out to a defenceless people a reign of terror reminiscent of Hitler atrocities in Europe. It was on record that some Members of the United Nations had not only flouted the resolutions of the United Nations on this issue, but had consistently sold war materials and munitions to Portugal though aware that such materials would be used in the Portuguese colonial Territories. How else could one explain the recent utterances of the Portuguese Foreign Minister in London and the threat of military reprisals against Tanzania simply because that country was host to the OAU Co-ordinating Committee and was in no way responsible for the military rebellion going on in Mozambique? Let Portugal be warned that an attack on Tanzania would constitute a declaration of war on the whole of Africa and all the efforts of the whole continent would be employed to put an end once and for all to Portuguese militarism and oppression in Africa.

139. Portugal had joined in an unholy trinity with apartheid South Africa and racist Southern Rhodesia in a futile attempt to stop the onward march of history and the rising but engulfing tide of African nationalism. The Special Committee, currently sitting in Lusaka, in a country wedged between Mozambique, Angola and Southern Rhodesia, should recommend positive and definite sanctions against Portugal because the presence of Portugal in those areas constituted a threat to the peace of Zambia. Let the strength of the Special Committee's condemnation of Portuguese atrocities echo across the borders of Zambia to lift the hearts of those yearning for self-determination and a government chosen by themselves. He expressed the hope that the different liberation movements would present their cases before the Special Committee and explain the various turns and twists in imperialist strategy in the remaining colonial Territories in Africa as well as the aspirations of millions of people to participate in a government of their own choice.

140. He said that so-called French Somaliland, which was still regarded as an integral part of metropolitan France, served as a military base for about 20,000 French troops. One was tempted to ask why France was keeping so large an army in that small Territory even after it had granted independence to all of its other Territories in Africa. It was to be hoped that it was not an instrument of terror and blackmail to enable France to perform self-appointed policing duties in Africa. France had refused over the years to grant independence to that Territory and was prepared to maintain its position there with armed force, even though the history of the last fifteen years had demonstrated the futility of seeking to entrench a colonial régime in the teeth of determined opposition. Despite the special problems of French Somaliland, the overriding factor must be the necessity to allow the people of that Territory freely to determine their own future. France should be prevailed upon to withdraw from the area and to grant the Territory the same rights which France had found it necessary to grant to many of its former overseas provinces. It was hoped that some of the liberation movements representing the oppressed peoples of so-called French Somaliland would be given an opportunity to present their case before the Special Committee.

141. He stated that he would not attempt to recapitulate the oppressive role of South Africa in South West Africa because of the fact that the problem was already before the International Court of Justice.

142. On behalf of the Secretary-General of the OAU, he assured the Special Committee of Africa's total commitment to the liberation of every inch of any Territory under colonial domination and the desire of the OAU to co-operate with the Special Committee in ushering in a new period of peace and harmony all over the world without the spectre of domination of one group by another. The OAU believed that the activities of the Special Committee were complementary to the work of the Co-ordinating Committee in Dar es Salaam. The Special Committee's presence in Africa, at the invasion of member States of the OAU, was evidence of their hope that the Special Committee's visit would mark an important turning point in the struggle to end man's inhumanity to man.

143. In conclusion, he emphasized that Africa did not desire bloodshed as a solution to the problem of colonialism, but that it would spare nothing and endure every hardship to ensure that alien rule disappeared from, and the dignity of man was restored in Africa.

Closing of meetings

General statements by members

144. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that he wished, as the representative of a State member of the OAU, to state that he had reservations concerning certain parts of the statement made by the representative of the OAU Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa.

145. The Chairman said that, on the occasion of the last meeting of the Special Committee at Lusaka, he wished to thank the President of Zambia for his hospitable reception of the Special Committee. During its stay at Lusaka the Special Committee had listened to people whose sufferings were both of the body and of the soul. They were suffering because others who claimed to represent a certain form of civilization did not believe in the equality of men. Those whom the Special Committee had heard had been suffering because adventurers and renegades from European society had come, by trickery and force of arms, to steal their land and deprive them of their sovereignty. The colonialists and white racists who were killing Africans, robbing them of their freedom and compelling them to do forced labour to ensure the prosperity of certain metropolitan countries, were cynical enough to say that they were defending the values of Christian or Western civilization in Africa.

146. In South Africa, in Southern Rhodesia and in South West Africa apartheid was practised. It had been said that Mr. Verwoerd and his clique were even engaging in experiments with poison gas and atomic weapons with the idea of waging a war of extermination against the African peoples, all in order to maintain the supremacy of the white race in that part of the African continent. In Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea, the officials and armed forces of the dictator Salazar were deporting Africans or giving them poisoned food and drink. Salazar claimed to represent and defend Christian civilization in Africa. There was no doubt, however, that if Christ were to return to earth today, his first crusade would be against the Salazar, Verwoerd and Smith clique.

147. He felt certain that, when the Special Committee published its report, world public opinion would condemn the survival of colonialism and apartheid even more forcefully and that all sane forces would join more vigorously in the fight against those two scourges, which were real anachronisms in the present day and age. He was convinced that progressive forces would unite their efforts in all countries to see that the Portuguese Government and the illegal authorities in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia were isolated and deprived of any kind of co-operation that might enable them to persist in their crimes against and exploitation of the African peoples, whose only desire was to live in peace and friendship with all peoples, to enjoy the benefits of science and technology and to have their sovereignty respected.

148. The Special Committee would leave Lusaka the following day for Dar es Salaam, where it was to continue its work, but he was sure that no one would ever forget the freedom fighters whom the Special Committee was leaving at Lusaka and who from one day to the next might be done away with by the repressive forces of Salazar, Verwoerd and Smith.

149. The members of the Committee represented Governments with different economic, political and social systems. Their Governments differed even in philosophical outlook, but they had at least one obligation in common—to defend the principles of the United Nations Charter, to which they had all subscribed of their own free will, and to see that all men enjoyed the rights laid down in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. That common obligation, and the thought that the petitioners they had heard at Lusaka might be tortured or murdered merely for having testified before the Special Committee, imposed an imperative duty on their Governments and on themselves to act, and act quickly, to secure the early and unconditional liquidation of colonialism and of all other forms of oppression of man by man.

150. He felt certain that the members of the Special Committee would make the necessary effort to understand him when, as an African and representative of the Republic of Mali, he concluded by saying that the Portuguese Government and the so-called authorities in South Africa had deliberately put themselves beyond the pale of international society by placing their own sordid interests, based on the exploitation and oppression of the African peoples, above humanism and international morality, and that they had consequently lost any moral justification for membership of the United Nations, the Organization which remained the hope of mankind as the guardian of human rights.

B. MEETINGS HELD AT DAR ES SALAAM

Opening of meetings

Address by the Second Vice-President on behalf of the President of the United Republic of Tanzania

151. The Second Vice-President of the United Republic of Tanzania said it was a great pleasure to extend to everyone present a warm welcome on behalf of President Mwalimu Julius K. Nyerere and the Government and people of the United Republic of Tanzania.

152. People of more than twenty-four nationalities were gathered together in the Special Committee from all parts of the world. Such meetings were rare and unique, and the people of Tanzania were conscious of the great honour and tribute which the United Nations had rendered to their country in holding sessions of one of its most important committees in their capital. Dar es Salaam was not new to some of those present. In 1962 the Special Committee, then known as the Committee of Seventeen, had visited the country, and he understood that, among the delegates present, were some who had been there in 1962; no doubt the representatives of Tanzania on the Special Committee had endeavoured to acquaint the rest with the outlook of their country and people and above all with the policy of their Government.

153. The present meeting was a unique occasion, with a unique and noble purpose. The Special Committee was charged by the General Assembly of the United Nations with the responsibility of implementing the United Nations Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, and the fulfilment of that responsibility was of extreme urgency if Africa and the world were to be saved from explosions which could lead to another war.

154. For centuries, Africa had suffered under foreign domination and exploitation. Today about a third of Africa was still languishing under colonialism, imperialism and racial humiliation. The enslavement and abuse of Africa and her peoples by the colonialists, imperialists and racist régimes was an intolerable affront to all mankind.

155. For the people of Africa, a solemn decision had already been made. The Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the freedom fighters from colonial and European-dominated areas had resolved to bring the continued humiliation of Africa to an immediate end. As the distinguished delegates were aware, Dar es Salaam had been selected by the OAU as the headquarters of its Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa—the Committee of Nine. The Special Committee was the United Nations committee for the liquidation of colonialism. Although its stay in Dar es Salaam was only temporary, the highest importance was attached to the present session. The two liberation committees were of historic importance in the struggle against colonialism.

156. The Special Committee had played a considerable part in making Members of the United Nations aware of the extreme misery and suffering imposed on millions by colonialism and imperialism. Indeed, the United Nations, through the Special Committee, had helped to rally world opinion against those evils, which were gross examples of man's inhumanity to man. The historic General Assembly Declaration against colonialism and the numerous resolutions passed by the Special Committee had made it abundantly clear that peace in Africa and in the world was seriously jeopardized by colonialism. At the same time it was clear that the Special Committee realized that it could not fully achieve its noble and urgent mission if it met only at United Nations Headquarters, which was far from Africa where colonialism was still most rampant. Hence the wise decision to come to Africa. The ideal arrangement would have been for the Special Committee to visit the colonial Territories themselves, such as Mozambique, Zimbabwe or Southern Rhodesia, the High Commission Territories of Basutoland, Bechuanaland, Swaziland, South Africa, South West Africa, Angola, so-called Portuguese Guinea and the Spanish and other colonies.

157. But the colonial Powers were afraid of the Special Committee and the freedom movement. They were fooling nobody but themselves by playing the ostrich game. They could never succeed in hiding from the world the wicked and inhuman practices being perpetrated in the colonies which had been exposed by men of goodwill in the past and which would continue to be exposed in the United Nations, mainly through the Special Committee. In spite of all the efforts by the United Nations, however, it was disappointing to notice that even at so late an hour a small but powerful minority of its Members was still practising colonialism and continuing to give moral, economic, military and other forms of assistance to such inhuman and doomed régimes as those of Salazar, Verwoerd and Smith. It could be seen from the records of the proceedings of the United Nations meetings, that a few Members of the United Nations, especially the powerful Western countries, still found it difficult or impossible even, just to vote for resolutions which unreservedly condemned colonialism and its leading advocates such as Salazar, Verwoerd and Smith.

158. Those Powers continued to help Salazar, Verwoerd and Smith to place their economic, military and other arrangements, and indeed their race, above the sacred principles of human freedom and dignity as well as national independence.

159. However, it would be noted, too, with inspiration, that through such efforts as those made by the Special Committee the die-hard colonial Powers and their allies were gradually being awakened from their centuries of sleep. Time was running very short and the colonialists had either to abandon their outmoded system or be compelled to do so by forceful action. The mounting world solidarity against colonialism was certain to defeat it once and for all.

160. The people of Tanzania had taken an uncompromising stand against colonialism. The sufferings of their brothers in colonial Territories were deeply felt and known. It was, after all, only a few years since they had broken the chains of colonialism. Moreover, their geographical position was such that they had on their southern border Mozambique, which was dominated by the ruthless régime of fascist Portugal under Salazar. Thus Tanzania was one of those countries which was in the actual front line of the battle against colonialism. Thousands of its brothers came to Tanzania to escape from the oppressive hand of the Portuguese and South African fascists, as well as from the British-dominated areas of Zimbabwe, or Southern Rhodesia, and other parts of southern Africa. The Special Committee would no doubt hear accounts of their suffering during its present tour of Africa. Tanzania had to concern itself daily with the actual survival of the thousands of its brothers coming in from the colonial Territories. As a matter of national policy, and within the context of the African Liberation Committee, Tanzania was determined to do its utmost to help the freedom fighters so that they could regain control of their countries and live as free men in an independent State like all others in the world.

161. There was ample opportunity for those people all over the world who supported the struggle for freedom to render moral and material aid to the freedom fighters. The least that could be expected of any person or State claiming to defend or cherish human freedom was an outright and public condemnation of the colonial system and, therefore, a vote in favour of all United Nations resolutions calling for sanctions against Portugal and South Africa. Equally urgent was the need for a unanimous call to the United Kingdom to carry out its responsibility in Zimbabwe or Southern Rhodesia, to release the nationalists who were being tortured under the ruthless European settlers led by Smith, and to establish majority rule. Any declaration of independence under the European settlers' régime would be resolutely and effectively opposed by the African people of Zimbabwe, with the full backing of the whole of independent Africa.

162. Time was running short and what was most important in the struggle for freedom from colonial rule was action rather than words. In that struggle, and after many years of foreign domination and exploitation, Africa was steadily and surely distinguishing its true friends from its real enemies. Some States, especially among those of the Western world, continued to have friendly ties with the arch-enemies of Africa, which included Salazar's Portugal and Verwoerd's South Africa. Portugal and South Africa, for example, continued to receive economic, military and other forms of aid from some countries which regarded themselves as part of the free world. Such countries should not continue to entertain the illusion that they could at the same time establish true friendship with the 200 million and more people of Africa.

163. In the Africans' struggle to win back their human dignity, those who were not with them were against them. One of the greatest services which the distinguished representatives of the Special Committee could render to the United Nations and to their respective Governments and peoples was to make sure that nobody continued to have any doubts about African determination to liquidate colonialism, imperialism and apartheid once and for all. By their continued and unswerving solidarity with the cause of freedom they would hasten the day when all mankind would live in freedom and brotherhood. Only then would world peace be assured.

164. In that noble endeavour the Government and people of Tanzania were irrevocably committed to play their part. They regarded those people all over the world who were in full solidarity with them as true friends and reliable allies. The members of the Special Committee should therefore feel quite at home in Tanzania where the people fully shared their aspirations. The Government and people were happy to receive the Special Committee and would do all within their power to make its stay happy and successful.

General statements by members

165. The Chairman thanked Mr. Kawawa and asked him to express to President Nyerere and to the Government and people of the United Republic of Tanzania the gratitude of the members of the Special Committee for the courteous invitation which had enabled the Special Committee to meet for the second time at Dar es Salaam, the capital of Tanzania, which was also the headquarters of the OAU Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa.

166. In the welcome that the Special Committee had been given upon its arrival in the dynamic capital, a note of gaiety, but at the same time full of significance, had been added to the traditional African hospitality. Everyone had been struck by it, and the various demonstrations with which delegations had been greeted at the airport had made the Special Committee even more aware of its responsibilities and of the confidence that the people who were still under colonial domination or subjected to the inadmissible system of apartheid placed in the United Nations and the Special Committee. The fact that the capital which was the headquarters of the OAU Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa was also the temporary headquarters of the work of the United Nations Special Committee was no coincidence: in the eyes of the representatives, it testified to the important contribution that the Government and people of Tanzania were making each day to the realization of the noble ideals of equality, peace and justice which had always been mankind's objectives.

167. The members of the Special Committee were intensely aware of the threats and intrigues of every sort that the forces of reaction were bringing to bear against the Government of Tanzania because of the establishment of the headquarters of the OAU Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa in its capital and because of the brotherly hospitality that Tanzania was offering to the African freedom fighters. It was common knowledge that at certain periods of their evolution peoples and men were suddenly faced with a dilemma: the choice between a selfish tranquillity, which made them indifferent to the arbitrary acts that were going on around them, and the prosecution of the struggle in fulfilment of their duty to support those who were deprived of their inalienable rights. The Government and people of Tanzania had chosen the hard path of struggle because they believed in the principles enunciated in the United Nations Charter and in the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. For that reason the fact of holding meetings of the Special Committee in the capital of Tanzania was a matter of pride to the delegations and a source of inspiration. It was a source of inspiration because the members of the Special Committee had followed with great interest the actions and efforts of President Julius Nyerere to bring about peaceful decolonization.

168. As at Lusaka, the Special Committee was no doubt going to experience moments of intense emotion when it was told of the atrocities committed by Portugal against the people of Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea. It would certainly feel its indignation rising once again when it heard about the police brutality, death sentences and imprisonment of every type imposed upon the African people of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and South West Africa.

169. He wished to tell all the representatives of national liberation movements and all the African people suffering under foreign domination that the visit of the Special Committee to Africa was an expression of the firm determination of the United Nations to liquidate colonialism rapidly by seeking ways and means of putting into effect the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Unfortunately, despite the wishes of the United Nations, which had been repeatedly reaffirmed, and despite the efforts that had been made, the progress achieved so far in the matter of decolonization had been slow and was inadequate in the light of the sufferings and the legitimate and urgent aspirations of the colonized peoples. Some people were tempted to connect this lack of progress with the fact that certain administering Powers took part, as members, in the work of the Special Committee.

170. In that connexion, it was worth pointing out that in keeping with its principles and its structure, the United Nations had recourse first and foremost to persuasion and sought peaceful solutions, that made discussion with the administering Powers essential. Certainly, in the assessment of the fact of colonialism and in the determination of the ways and means of liquidating the colonial system, there were divergencies, and sometimes profound divergencies, between the administering Powers and the anti-colonialist countries, especially those which had formerly been subjected to colonialism. That was clearly regrettable, since all Member States subscribed to the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

171. What should be denounced with force and indignation, however, was the attitude of the colonial Powers which refused to co-operate with the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Those colonial Powers, such as Portugal and South Africa, which refused to co-operate with the Special Committee stubbornly continued, in the face of international opinion and of good sense, to regard colonial problems as domestic problems.

172. The colonial system was based on the violation of the rights of other peoples and by its nature and its manifestations it was a threat to international peace and security. Being the result of a situation that had been imposed by force, it should be abolished and it was encouraging to note the efforts being made to that end by the United Nations and the OAU. He was sure that the work of the Special Committee in Africa, supplemented by the praiseworthy efforts already made by the OAU Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa, would help to make world opinion increasingly aware of the urgent necessity of doing everything possible to liquidate colonialism.

173. The Government of Portugal and the illegal authorities established in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia were worried about the work of the Special Committee in Africa. Mr. Smith had already shown his anxiety by declaring a state of emergency in certain parts of the Territory as soon as he had heard about the resolution on the question of Southern Rhodesia adopted by the Special Committee. There was no doubt whatever that the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples would be applied to all the Non-Self-Governing Territories; that would be so because it was in accordance with logic. The will of the colonized peoples would inevitably triumph in the end. The struggle of the colonized peoples would be victorious because it was just and it would gain the increasing support and sympathy of the free peoples of the whole world.

174. In 1962, when the Special Committee, which had then numbered seventeen members, had met at Daes Salaam, it had had the Territories of Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland and Zanzibar on its agenda. All those Territories had now become independent and their peoples were making their contribution to the liberation of the rest of Africa with deep conviction. That was a source of pride, satisfaction and hope to the Special Committee. The Salazars, the Verwoerds and the Smiths would have to understand that all the African countries would be free. The Special Committee was asking them to understand that the march of history was irreversible and that imprisonment, murder and torture could not halt the movement of national liberation.

175. The representative of Ethiopia said he would like, on behalf of his delegation, to thank the Government and people of Tanzania most sincerely for the very warm and fraternal reception accorded to the Special Committee. He thanked the Vice-President for his wise and inspiring address, which would prove a useful guide to the Special Committee in its deliberations, and the Chairman for his animated reply on behalf of the Special Committee.

176. As his country's ambassador to Tanzania, he was privileged in having the rare opportunity of observing at close quarters the tremendous progress being made there and witnessing the valuable contribution the country was making in all fields of human endeavour, under the wise and dynamic leadership of President Nyerere. Perhaps the greatest contribution of all was being made in regard to African salvation and emancipation, which at times had meant great risks and sacrifices in the face of threats from neighbouring hostile and ill-intentioned colonial régimes. Indeed, the fact that Dar es Salaam had been chosen as the seat of the OAU Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa was itself eloquent testimony to the continent-wide recognition of the devotion and dedication of Tanzania's leaders and people to the cause of African freedom and independence. It was the fervent hope and prayer of his delegation that President Nyerere and his dedicated aides would be endowed with good health and long life, so as to be able to see for themselves the realization of their dream of the total liberation of Africa, and also to continue to lead Tanzania on the path of progress and prosperity for a long time to come.

177. It was not his intention to make any long statement on the agenda item to be taken up, for two main reasons. First, the position of his Government on the question of colonialism and imperialism was too well known to need any further restatement, and secondly, his delegation felt that the Committee should immediately address itself to its duty of meeting the various petitioners who had been anxiously and with great expectation awaiting its arrival in Dar es Salaam. He would, however, crave indulgence to say a word or two on the question of the Territories under Portuguese colonialism which, together with South Africa and more especially Southern Rhodesia, today constituted the greatest threat to African and world peace.

178. Portugal was perpetuating in the Territories under its domination a slave-state policy. Its tyranny had driven thousands of innocent Africans into exile. In addition, Portugal, in the name of law and order was today committing the crime of genocide on a massive scale in Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea. The outcry of the millions of Africans would not remain unheeded. Experience taught that increasingly brutal acts such as were being practised by the Portuguese colonialists, unless checked in time, could provoke a chain reaction which would lead to catastrophe.

179. Portugal must realize that it could not reverse the course of history. No matter how barbarous the régime might be, no matter how abundant and mighty its allies and the sources of its power, no matter how calculating and cunning its social, economic and psychological warfare against the African people, it would not be able to withstand the wave of history much longer. Nothing less than the granting of independence would stop bloodshed. A fire had been set to the thick and cruel jungle of colonialism in Africa, and it had swept across the continent. That fire of freedom would not be extinguished before it consumed the remaining vestiges of colonialism. It was incumbent, therefore, upon the Special Committee to explore all avenues so as to be able to show the way, so as to bring to a speedy end the dreadful situation now obtaining in the Territories under Portuguese colonialism.

180. The representative of Cambodia, after expressing his gratitude to the Tanzanian Government for its friendly hospitality, said that the Royal Government of Cambodia attached particular importance to the work of the Special Committee and was sure that in the course of its visit to Africa the Special Committee would have an opportunity to study and enact specific measures to ensure the rapid liberation of all Africans still living under the colonial yoke. Those Africans had the sympathy and the constant resolute support of the people and Government of Cambodia in their legitimate struggle against the colonialists and the white imperialists. For that reason, not only did Cambodia maintain no relations with the racist and colonialist Governments of South Africa and Portugal, but it was struggling and would go on struggling vigorously against the forces of racism, colonialism, neo-colonialism and imperialism that were the common enemies of the peoples of Africa and Asia.

181. The results that the United Nations was achieving in the matter of decolonization were slow in appearing and did not meet the wishes of the Africans, who, despite the resolutions that had been adopted, were still suffering and living in humiliation beneath the yoke of the colonialists and the white imperialists. That abnormal situation was due both to the fact that certain Member States refused to respect and comply with the resolutions adopted by the international organization and to the complicity of certain other countries with the fascist Governments of South Africa and Portugal.

182. That coalition of the imperialists and colonialist forces, whose obvious aim was to exploit the African countries, was a serious threat to the peace and security of the peoples of Asia and Africa. The Cambodian delegation considered that it was the duty of the United Nations to take urgent and resolute action to put an end to it, first by recognizing the legitimacy of the struggle of the African peoples and then by asking all States to sever all relations with the Governments of South Africa and Portugal. The Cambodian delegation was convinced that, thanks to their unity and to the support of all peoples who cared for peace and justice, the Africans would gain final victory, for theirs was a just struggle.

183. In conclusion, he offered the Government and people of Tanzania his most sincere wishes for the complete success of their work of national construction.

184. The representative of India thanked the Government and people of Tanzania for inviting the Special Committee to Dar es Salaam, and expressed appreciation of the important address delivered by the Vice-President.

185. Ever since attaining independence, it had been India's fervent wish to see a similar boon conferred on other dependent Territories. Tanzania's struggle for independence, and its present and future problems, bore a close resemblance to India's own; both countries had a common approach to world problems, sharing the same ideals of peaceful coexistence, non-alignment and Afro-Asian solidarity. There was therefore a solid basis for their future co-operation. India had watched with the greatest interest the steady progress of Tanzania in all spheres, and the changes that had taken place on the economic, political and social scene since the Special Committee's previous visit in 1962 were visible for all to see.

186. Having itself been under colonial rule, India could not but identify itself against colonialism and racism, India had taken action against the monstrous régime of Portugal, and condemned the repression being carried on in the Territories under Portuguese administration. He assured the freedom fighters of those Territories of India's full support, and expressed the hope that their struggle would soon be crowned with success. While his delegation was dedicated to the peaceful settlement of all issues, there came a time when all roads to a negotiated settlement were closed and the freedom fighters had no other course but to oppose the colonial régime by every means at their disposal.

187. His delegation had stated its views on the question of Southern Rhodesia earlier at Lusaka. The freedom fighters of Zimbabwe had India's full support in their struggle against the white minority Government. However, the United Kingdom had great experience in dealing with colonial problems, and his delegation had confidence that a peaceful solution would be found.

188. In almost all parts of Africa today the fires of freedom were ablaze. As Mr. Nehru had once said, the awakening of Africa was an event of historic importance, not only for Africa itself but for the whole world. Yet there were parts of the continent where colonialism and racism still held sway. He trusted that the Special Committee's sojourn in Tanzania would help to speed their elimination.

189. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics thanked the Government and people of Tanzania for inviting the Special Committee to Dar es Salaam. Tanzania was indeed a worthy torch-bearer of African liberty, as had been confirmed by the Vice-President's speech.

190. During its stay at Lusaka, the Special Committee had come into close contact with spokesmen for the freedom fighters of a number of dependent Territories. An overwhelming majority of the Special Committee had voted for the resolution on Southern Rhodesia. In the days ahead, the Special Committee would hear further harrowing accounts of the monstrous crimes committed under colonialism and the machinations of the "Unholy Alliance" of Southern Rhodesia, South Africa and Portugal once again be laid bare.

191. How was the Special Committee to meet the just demands of the African peoples? Deeds were required, not words. The Special Committee must adopt resolutions condemning the colonialists and call on all Member States to support indigenous peoples fighting for their freedom. It must demand the immediate release of political prisoners, the future statesmen of independent nations.

192. Observing that the term "petitioner" was becoming outdated he pointed out that the people who had been appearing before the Special Committee had come, not to plead, but as leaders of the people's rightful crusade for freedom. They were tomorrow's leaders of independent Mozambique, Zimbabwe and the other countries now under colonial domination.

193. He wished to read to the Special Committee the message of congratulation from the Government and the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet to the independent countries of Africa on African Liberation Day. It was relevant, as an expression of the attitude of the Soviet Government and people to the eradication of colonialism in Africa.

194. The message stated that the Soviet observed African Liberation Day together with the African peoples and they sincerely rejoiced at Africa's historic transition from colonial oppression to freedom and national independence, which had opened the way for the African peoples from fragmentation and backwardness to unity and progress. The just and noble efforts of the Africans to achieve the final liquidation of colonial and racist régimes throughout the continent and to oppose neo-colonialism in all forms had invariably had and would continue to have the full understanding and support of the Soviet Union. The great movement for freedom in Africa, which had gathered irresistible force, was becoming merged with the universal struggle of progressive mankind for freedom, independence and peace.

195. The Soviet Union was convinced, the message continued, that at that moment, when the forces of aggression pitted against the liberation of peoples from alien domination were provoking dangerous conflicts in a number of Asian, African and Latin American countries, the solidarity and co-operation of peace-loving countries and peoples was of the utmost importance.

196. In conclusion, the message stated that the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR and the Soviet Government sincerely wished each of the African States further success in their free national development and in the consolidation of unity and peace.

197. The Soviet delegation urged that the Special Committee should work closely with the OAU Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa in their common task of helping the Africans to speedier and less costly independence.

198. The Special Committee must seek to cut off the flow of economic, military and other assistance to Messrs. Smith, Salazar and Verwoerd. That assistance was the source of their strength and the Special Committee must call on the NATO countries to state clearly whether or not they intended to stop providing it. The representatives of some NATO countries had had the courage to vote for the resolution on Southern Rhodesia. Those who had abstained must choose which side they were on, and say whether they were with the enemies or the friends of Africa. As was rightly pointed out in an article published in the Tanzanian periodical, The Nationalist, the United Nations could do no less than call upon those of its Members which were willing to see the objectives of the Special Committee attained to give whatever material aid they could to the movements of national liberation. The Special Committee must face up to that challenge. His own country would do its utmost to comply with any decision by the Special Committee to that effect.

199. The representative of Poland, after paying tribute to the Government and people of Tanzania for the invitation and the warm welcome extended to the Special Committee, expressed his delegation's gratitude to the Second Vice-President for his inspiring and encouraging address. The Polish delegation, which had the privilege of being for the second time in Dar es Salaam, could not fail to be impressed by the achievements of the United Republic of Tanzania in many fields and by the determination of its leaders and peoples to follow firmly the course that would ensure the ultimate liquidation of colonialism, imperialism and racialism in Africa. Today, he greeted Tanzania as the headquarters of the OAU Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa and the seat of the nationalist organizations representing people from the enslaved part of the African continent.

200. Poland fully shared the aspirations of the Africans and considered that the United Nations had a duty to help and assist the people struggling for their independence and the final eradication of colonialism and racialism which still continued to cause much suffering and which still provoked armed conflicts and threatened peace and security in Africa. He believed that it was precisely in Africa that urgent and practical measures were needed in order to help the nationalist movements in their legitimate struggle against the most brutal forces of colonialism and racialism, represented by the unholy alliance of Verwoerd, Salazar and Smith.

201. The representative of Iraq thanked the Tanzanian Government for its generosity and co-operation, and expressed confidence that the Committee's work in Dar es Salaam would inspire hope and determination in the many organizations fighting to liberate their homelands. Most of the African continent was independent, but some areas were still suffering under colonial oppression. It had been confirmed that Portugal continued to disregard public opinion and trample on the human rights of the African population. Those evil policies were condemned by all at the United Nations.

202. The representative of Iran thanked the Government of Tanzania for its kind invitation which enabled the Special Committee to hold meetings in Dar es Salaam. That dynamic and beautiful city, which was also the headquarters of the OAU Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa, by giving refuge to those escaping from the suffocating conditions of colonial rule, made it possible for the Special Committee to obtain first-hand information about conditions prevailing in Territories still under colonial domination. The Special Committee had heard and through it the whole world would hear about the exploitation, imprisonment and destruction of the African peoples of Zimbabwe, South West Africa, and in particular Territories under Portuguese administration. Colonialism, like the many-headed hydra in the form of Verwoerd, Smith and Salazar inflicting its evils upon the indigenous population of Africa, had been exposed for what it really was.

203. The fight for freedom had brought forth a new phenomenon in international relations. It had resulted in concerted action and close collaboration among the Afro-Asian countries, with notable success in both political and economic fields. Once independence was attained, these links should be strengthened for the second stage of the fight for freedom, namely economic independence ensuring freedom from poverty, disease and illiteracy. Tanzania, under its dynamic leader, was already forging ahead with its development programme, supported by the vigour and enthusiasm of its emancipated people.

204. The contrast was striking between the situation there and the sorry picture in Mozambique as painted by the petitioners. The story there was that of an enslaved people, suffering under atrocities, exploitation and imprisonment at the hands of the oppressive Portuguese administration. Nevertheless, the people of Mozambique were continuing to strive for the noble cause of freedom and human rights, and he would assure them of the support and sympathy of his Government in their legitimate aspirations.

205. The representative of Yugoslavia thanked the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania for inviting the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Tanzania and expressed his delegation's deep gratitude for its generous hospitality. Since its accession to independence, Tanzania had resolutely joined the ranks of those who considered that colonialism, racial discrimination and the enslavement of peoples were intolerable scourges which could not be allowed to continue in the present-day world. His delegation fully appreciated the firm and courageous attitude of the Tanzanian Government and people which, as the Vice-President of the United Republic of Tanzania had stated, were ready to fight to accelerate the process of decolonization. They were thus making their contribution to the effort to ensure the triumph of and respect for the inalienable right of every people to freedom and independence.

206. The struggle would be difficult, for the colonial Powers were striving to slow down that process and to maintain colonial strongholds in certain regions which played a particular role in their political and economic strategy. Those strongholds were intended to serve the further purpose of enabling them to interfere in the affairs of countries which had recently freed themselves from the colonial yoke and to maintain them in a state of economic dependence. It was regrettable that that colonialist policy found the support and assistance of a number of other countries which themselves had interests in those Territories. The acts of the colonial Powers in those regions constituted a grave threat to the security and independence of countries which had recently freed themselves. Tanzania, in particular, was subjected to constant pressure by the colonialists and Portuguese racists, and the United Nations must take note of those threats. It was also desirable that the specialized agencies should give Tanzania assistance in respect of the refugees coming from countries under colonial domination whom it welcomed in its territory.

207. The struggle for independence of the people of the Territories under colonial domination was legitimate and deserved the support of the whole world and of the United Nations. It was more than time to take decisive steps and to sweep away the last vestiges of colonialism, to remedy the conditions of servitude and humiliation in which millions of human beings were still living, and to prevent colonialist circles from threatening the freedom of the countries which had recently attained independence. It was intolerable that an insignificant minority should be allowed to go on flouting the principles of the Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The time had come when the principle of respect for human dignity, without regard to race, colour, or religion, must be made to prevail in the world and in international relations. His Government had always struggled and would continue to struggle to ensure respect for that principle. It had given and would continue to give its full support to the peoples of Mozambique, Angola, South Africa, South West Africa, Basutoland, Bechuanaland, Swaziland and so-called Portuguese Guinea, the Zimbabwe people and all other peoples engaged in the struggle for independence. Peace and freedom were indivisible and could not be reserved exclusively to certain privileged countries and peoples.

208. As far as the situation in the Territories under the Portuguese colonial system was concerned, he thought that the Special Committee should, among other things, recommend that the General Assembly and the Security Council adopt economic and political sanctions against Portugal and invite all countries, in particular that country's allies in NATO, to cease giving it any assistance, direct or indirect. The Special Committee should draw the Security Council's attention to the danger to peace and security inherent in the existence of an alliance between Portugal, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

Other statements

209. The Minister for Agriculture of the United Republic of Tanzania, addressing the Special Committee on behalf of the Chairman of the OAU Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa, welcomed the Special Committee on the occasion of its second visit to Dar es Salaam and sincerely hoped that its session in Tanzania would produce positive results. The Special Committee would always be welcome, but it was to be desired that the purpose of any future visit would be to put an end to the process of decolonization for ever. The Special Committee must remember that it was essentially a temporary committee, and that it should finish its task in the shortest possible time.

210. He had asked to address the Special Committee because Dar es Salaam was also the Headquarters of the OAU Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa. In May 1963, the Conference of Heads of African States and Governments of independent Africa had met in Addis Ababa with a view to establishing a framework for the promotion of African unity and a machinery which would pool their efforts to accelerate the liberation of the African continent. They had set up the OAU for that purpose; they had also constituted a special fund and established a Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa. They had pledged themselves to promote mutual understanding and to give expression to the reality of African brotherhood "in a larger unity transcending ethnic and national differences". In that way, the independent African States were helping one another to remove the colonial legacies of poverty, ignorance and disease, and to bring about Africa's economic and cultural revitalization. The urgent need to achieve the total liberation of the continent had been uppermost in the minds of the Heads of African States and Governments at Addis Ababa. The African States understood that their individual freedom was inseparable from that of all their brothers in Territories under colonial domination, and not until the whole of Africa, from the Cape to Cairo, had been liberated would there be genuine freedom. It was that deep consciousness of their common destiny which had led to the establishment of the Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa.

211. The Co-ordinating Committee had not been intended to supersede the work of the Special Committee. But the African States, which had been among the parties to the 1960 Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, had every reason to desire a more rapid application of that Declaration, for it was in Africa that the most serious colonial situations were to be found. Some of the African States that had only recently regained their independence were adjacent to Territories still under colonial rule. For that reason they continued to cherish a passionate yearning for freedom and to identify themselves with the struggle of their colonial brothers. Further, they experienced the secondary effects of living with explosive colonial situations. The denial of freedom in the Portuguese Territories, in Southern Rhodesia, in South West Africa and in so-called French Somaliland had created great unrest and resulted in streams of refugees into the neighbouring independent African States. The settlement of those refugees had necessitated for the neighbouring countries the diversion of much needed development revenue, and the refugees were giving the OAU, and the Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa in particular, cause for much concern. A Refugees Commission was considering that question.

212. In the preceding few months conditions in Southern Rhodesia and the Portuguese Territories had deteriorated into situations of grave unrest. The authorities had intensified their oppression of the African peoples, who had reacted with determination to defy their oppressors and fight for their rights with all the means at their disposal. The colonial authorities in those Territories had refused to remove the arbitrary, oppressive laws that were at the root of the African people's resistance, or to introduce democratic reforms; instead they had elected to charge the neighbouring countries with subversion because of their support for liberation movements. The Portuguese authorities in Mozambique had repeatedly violated the territorial integrity of Tanzania, while in so-called Portuguese Guinea they had violated Senegalese and Guinean territory. In their latest outburst, they had threatened wars of what they described as "legitimate retaliation" against independent African States adjacent to the Territories they held under domination. The racist Government of Southern Rhodesia had made similar threats to African States north of Southern Rhodesia.

213. The Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa considered those allegations and threats to be as dangerous as they were mischievous. In themselves, they were a clear admission by the authorities that an explosive situation existed in their Territories; in an international context they threatened the peace and stability of the African continent.

214. The administration of South West Africa continued to carry out the apartheid policy of South Africa. The elements of that policy were well known to the Special Committee: the calculated denial of human dignity and fundamental freedoms to the African population, the arrest, detention and torture of nationalist leaders, the forced deportation of whole communities with the consequent disruption of family and community life, in brief the complete absence of the rule of law.

215. In Southern Rhodesia, the racist minority Government appeared to be bent on a unilateral declaration of independence. The United Kingdom Government had abdicated its authority over the minority Government and refused to rescue the African people from the oppression and exploitation to which it had consigned them by default. Furthermore, the United Kingdom Government had failed to call for a constitutional conference to pave the way for majority rule in Southern Rhodesia. It had refused to exercise its authority to effect the release of restricted nationalist leaders.

216. The position of the OAU and of its Co-ordinating Committee was clear. In their resolution on Southern Rhodesia, adopted at Cairo in July 1964, the Assembly of Heads of State and Government had agreed to take a vigorous stand against any declaration of Southern Rhodesian independence by a European minority Government.

217. They called on the United Kingdom to convene immediately a constitutional conference in which rep-representatives of all political groups in Southern Rhodesia would participate with a view to preparing a new democratic constitution ensuring majority rule on the basis of "one man, one vote".

218. Such were the terms of the instructions to the Co-ordinating Committee from the Assembly of Heads of State and Government. It was accordingly determined to do everything to thwart any unilateral declaration of independence and to hasten the restoration of their rightful freedom and independence to the African peoples of Zimbabwe.

219. The Portuguese colonial Territories of Mozambique, Angola and so-called Portuguese Guinea were reaching the peak of armed opposition to colonial authority. Portugal clung shamelessly to its theory that the colonial Territories constituted overseas provinces and stubbornly continued to defy the many resolutions of the United Nations General Assembly and Security Council and the OAU. In a ruthless attempt to suppress the forces of nationalism and freedom, Portugal had increased its military expenditure in the colonies and was dispatching more troops against the so-called guerrillas. In one peak month alone in late 1964, Tanzania had received more than 10,000 refugees fleeing from the Portuguese armies in Mozambique. The Republics of Guinea and Senegal had received even larger numbers.

220. The Portuguese colonial system stood resolutely condemned by the independent African States. At the inaugural assembly of Heads of State and Government at Addis Ababa it was decided to boycott Portugal by prohibiting the import of goods from that country, by closing African ports and airports to its ships and planes, and by refusing overflight to its aircraft. That decision had been respected at the first regular session of the Assembly at Cairo in 1964, and States members of the OAU had been relentlessly responding to it.

221. In the past year, the Portuguese Government had embarked on a vicious campaign to malign the nationalist movements in its colonial Territories and the OAU Co-ordinating Committee which supported those movements. The Portuguese Government had been issuing propaganda to the effect that the nationalist movements were not an expression of discontent under colonial domination but were communist inspired and directed. For example, the Portuguese Foreign Minister had drawn a parallel between Portugal's colonial situation and the turmoil in South-East Asia and the Middle East; the comparison was clearly calculated to mobilize the support of Portugal's allies in the Western world.

222. In past years, the High Commission Territories had witnessed the introduction of internal self-government. Satisfaction at that development must be tempered by the limits within which self-rule was to be exercised. The geographical situation of these Territories made them pockets in a vast morass of South African apartheid and Portuguese colonialism, and there was a danger that their free exercise of the right to self-rule might be seriously jeopardized by their hostile neighbours. He hoped that the Special Committee would remain alive to that danger and advise the administering Power accordingly.

223. The remaining colonial Territories in Africa were thus exposed to explosive developments. The obstinacy of the Portuguese Government, the blindness of the South African administration in South West Africa and the recklessness of the racist minority Government in Southern Rhodesia constituted a grave threat to peace and stability, and would impose severe strain on the development of the African continent.

224. The United Nations Declaration on the Granting of Independence, the commitment of the OAU, and the mission of its Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa made it impossible to think that the outcome of the struggle for freedom in the dependent Territories should be at issue. What was at issue, however, was how long and violent the process of decolonization would be. The Special Committee would help to make that process less protracted and to avert unnecessary bloodshed. The Special Committee had been established in the expectation that it would reason with the colonialists; the African nationalist movements and their brothers in the independent African States, too, would prefer that independence should be won by peaceful methods. But they were prepared, if need be, to fight for it. They were not asking for independence as a gift; they were demanding it as a right. The time had come for the Special Committee to tell the colonial Powers that Africa would not be reduced to the state of appearing to beg for what was the sacred and inalienable right of its peoples. Time was not on the side of those Powers, and Africa was asking no more than that they should leave, while they could, with some grace.

225. Left to themselves, the authorities in the colonial Territories had neither the economic nor the military strength to withstand the onslaught of nationalism, and to defy international opinion. It was from the economic and military support, however indirect, of their allies that the Portuguese, Southern Rhodesian and South African Governments derived the courage and strength to continue their domination and exploitation of the African peoples. Whether or not independence was to come to those Territories without further bloodshed was a decision which in large measure rested with those allies.

226. Some of them were members of the Special Committee and he hoped that in the course of the Committee's deliberations they would be persuaded to reconsider their positions. But regardless of their attitudes, the Liberation Committee stood committed, and independent African States would not rest until the whole of Africa was cured of the cancer of colonialism and it could assume its place in the world, in freedom and dignity.

General statements by members

227. The Chairman thanked the Minister of Agriculture of the United Republic of Tanzania for the statement he had made on behalf of the Chairman of the OAU Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa. The Co-ordinating Committee and the Special Committee each had its own structure and form of action, but their objectives were the same as far as decolonization was concerned. He hoped that the co-operation between the two bodies would be still further strengthened and he gave his assurance that the Special Committee would see to it that, in conformity with the provisions of the Charter, the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples was applied without restriction or reservation to all the peoples still under colonial domination.

228. He also thanked the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania for the valuable assistance it had given the members of the Special Committee throughout their work, and again paid tribute to the warm welcome of the Tanzanian population and the determination displayed by the Government in its fight against colonialism and the oppression of man by man.

229. During the week it had spent in Dar es Salaam, the Special Committee had heard the petitioners of various Territories subject to the odious régimes of colonialism or apartheid. The members of the Special Committee had understood the sufferings and the legitimate aspirations of those populations. Their struggle, no matter how difficult, was a just struggle, for the rights denied them were inalienable. The Special Committee therefore assured them of its support and would redouble its efforts to hasten the independence of all the peoples concerned. He was convinced that world opinion would be informed of the atrocities committed by the racists in that region of Africa, in contempt of human rights. He was glad to note that courtesy and mutual respect had prevailed throughout the discussions, despite the emotional aspect of the relations between the members of the Special Committee and both colonizers and colonized. He was sure that he expressed the feeling of all when he affirmed that the Special Committee's visit to Africa had been a happy and positive initiative which would without any doubt hasten the application of resolution 1514 (XV).

230. On behalf of the members of the Special Committee, he thanked the petitioners and urged them to persevere in their struggle, for their Territories were the scene of colonialism's last-ditch stand, comparable to the last convulsions of a mad dog. Crazy animals did not behave rationally and ended up by causing their own death. The same would be true of Salazar, Smith and Verwoerd, who refused to reconcile themselves to the emancipation of peoples hitherto oppressed, an emancipation which should be effected in friendship with the former administering Powers. Those populations had reason to hope, for they would be set free thanks to their heroic struggle and the solidarity of justice-loving peoples. For the progress of mankind rested on international co-operation based on respect and, as the Special Committee approached the end of its second mission in Africa, he looked to the future with optimism. He expressed the hope that the Special Committee's next and third visit to Africa would be in order to celebrate the independence of all the still dependent Territories.

231. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, on behalf of his Government, thanked the Chairman and members of the Special Committee, as well as the petitioners and others who took part in the meetings, for the good work done at Dar es Salaam. The Government and people of Tanzania would always play their part in any efforts to advance the welfare of the African peoples and, more especially, in the struggle to free those still groaning under the colonial yoke. It was regrettable that some countries represented on the Special Committee should still continue to take a negative attitude, but their motive of self-interest was obvious to all.

232. It was the earnest hope of Tanzania that Mozambique, Angola and Southern Rhodesia would be sitting, as free nations, with their African neighbours, at the next session of the United Nations General Assembly.

233. In conclusion, he wished the Special Committee a safe journey and a pleasant stay in Addis Ababa.

C. MEETINGS HELD AT ADDIS ABABA

Opening of meetings

Address by the Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs on behalf of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Ethiopia

234. The Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ethiopia, delivering a message in the name of His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I and the Ethiopian Government and people, welcomed the members of the United Nations Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

235. Since the establishment of the Special Committee in 1961, His Imperial Majesty had followed with great interest the Special Committee's endeavour to implement the principle embodied in the United Nations Charter by which peoples at present under the colonial yoke would eventually be free to decide their future destiny. That principle did not admit of double standards; yet lofty though it was, the difficulties confronting the Special Committee in the face of deep-rooted prejudices and self-interest inherited throughout the ages could be appreciated.

236. So long as Member States, individually or collectively, ignored the pronouncement and disregarded the recommendations of the United Nations, so long as they shirked their obligations to the organization, and so long as they continued to pursue their individual aims and ends, the work of the Special Committee faced constant frustration. Nevertheless, His Imperial Majesty and the Government and people of Ethiopia were happy to note that the Special Committee's inquiries into specific matters had been conducted objectively and dispassionately. His Imperial Majesty had observed with pleasure that ever since the Special Committee was set up it had been able to devise practical measures for advancing the cause of independence for people at present under the colonial yoke. However, before the goal of independence was achieved, he knew that there would be bloodshed, that wealth would be wasted, and that countries would be weakened. The question was: where would the responsibility lie?

237. His Imperial Majesty prayed that the Special Committee's attempt to focus and direct the combined influence of world opinion on the solution of the problem would meet with success. On its part, Ethiopia would do its utmost to urge the accession to independence of all colonial countries.

Statement by the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity (OAU)

238. The Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, speaking at the Chairman's invitation, said that, at a moment when the Special Committee was beginning its work in the third African capital on its itinerary, it would be superfluous to welcome it to the African continent. He wished to do so, however, because Addis Ababa, which had the distinction of being the capital of the continent's oldest independent State, was also the headquarters of the OAU.

239. On learning of the Special Committee's decision to come to Africa to continue on the spot the work, in favour of decolonization which it had begun in New York, the whole of Africa had experienced with particular intensity the conflicting feelings of faith and scepticism, hope and anxiety.

240. It had felt faith, because the OAU knew that the United Nations, of which the Special Committee was a respected and responsible organ, had inscribed in its Charter and its methods principles which, properly observed, would definitely resolve one of the most important problems facing Africa, namely, the liberation of the whole continent from colonialism and racism.

241. It had felt scepticism, because the Articles of the United Nations Charter and those of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, not to speak of the various resolutions dealing with the self-determination of peoples, had been disregarded, with the complicity of certain great Powers which assumed vital responsibilities not only in the international community but also in the Special Committee itself.

242. It had felt hope, because the OAU knew that the United Nations was, in the contemporary world, the only instrument guaranteeing peace and security and better understanding between the States and peoples of the world community, and because Africa believed that the things which a United Nations committee, the Special Committee, would see and hear, feel and experience on African soil would impart a little more impetus and dynamism to the action of the United Nations in general, and of the Security Council in particular, on behalf of the peoples of Africa and world peace.

243. Lastly, it had felt anxiety because, seeing the world organization powerless to free those Africans who still lived under the colonial yoke or who were subjected to the worst type of discrimination, it wondered what avenues remained open to human hope and what refuge from despair there was for the many human beings who were waiting to regain their dignity.

244. The whole of Africa knew what the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was; it knew that that Declaration had been solemnly signed and accepted by all the States Members of the United Nations; Africa knew the history of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), adopted by the United Nations in December 1960, which demanded the unconditional granting of independence to countries under colonial domination; but Africa knew, too, that all those solemn declarations and statements of principle had not yet succeeded in finally eliminating colonialism, racism or their consequences from African soil.

245. That showed the extent to which decolonization, which was the Special Committee's raison d'être, preoccupied the peoples of Africa, and the close attention with which the Special Committee's work was followed by all, especially by the leaders of the OAU. Africa as a whole was particularly sensitive and exigent with regard to the smallest word, action, project or decision liable to influence in any way the sacred mission it had assumed to free the continent completely from foreign domination and its consequences, and from the injustice of racism and of its most carefully disguised forms.

246. That unanimous opposition to colonialism and racism, which had never been contradicted by the individual positions adopted by the African States in the United Nations, or by the action of any individual State after it had reconquered its sovereignty, had taken a decisive direction and had derived new strength from the birth of the OAU. The miracle of May 1963 represented, among other things, the impulse of a whole people, of a whole continent and all its leaders, to pool their natural and human resources in the service of the general progress of their people. Moreover, and above all, it represented the decision to establish and maintain peace and security as indispensable conditions for its harmonious progress.

247. Indeed, peace and security for the African people meant nothing more than the elimination of colonialism and racial discrimination in all their forms. Decolonization was the first condition for any positive action by the OAU and that explained three significant events in the history of that young organization, to mention no others.

248. The first resolution unanimously adopted by the summit Conference which had established the organization was devoted entirely to the problems of decolonization, and declared, inter alia, that the colonial Powers' determination to maintain colonies or semi-colonies in Africa constituted a menace to the peace of the continent. Furthermore, it should be remembered that on that occasion all the African Heads of State had issued a solemn appeal to the allies of colonial Powers to choose between their friendship for the African peoples and their support of Powers that were oppressing those peoples. It seemed that that appeal had not been heeded.

249. The first organ that that Conference had established to lay the foundations for the organization's general action had been the Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa, whose headquarters was at Dar es Salaam and with which the Special Committee had established contact during its stay in Tanzania. Finally, the first bureau of the general secretariat, which had been established by a decision of the Heads of State and Government, was the Bureau of Sanctions, whose function was to co-ordinate the action of member States against the reactionary forces at work in Africa, particularly South Africa and Portugal.

250. Since that time, while the Co-ordinating Committee—the Committee of Nine—had intensified its action on behalf of the nationalist African movements, and Africa, thanks to the Bureau of Sanctions, had increased the ostracism and isolation of the Pretoria Government and the Salazar régime, the determination of the African leaders to co-ordinate their efforts to ensure that all traces of colonialism and racism should disappear for ever from that continent had become ever firmer from one resolution to the next, from one summit conference to another.

251. In point of fact, as the requirements for co-ordinated and harmonious development and for general progress in all fields crystallized within the framework of the OAU, the African leaders were becoming aware that solidarity was meaningless and progress would not be durable unless they could rely upon every individual to provide the support and assistance and make the sacrifices necessary for the final destruction of colonialism and the complete elimination of all régimes based on racial discrimination. The strengthening of African unity and the implementation of the basic principles of the Charter of the OAU depended exclusively upon the disappearance from that continent of certain situations whose mere mention sufficed to spur people to revolt, or at least to shake their faith in human nature.

252. Although within the special perspective of the United Nations such a matter did not fall within the Special Committee's terms of reference, he wished first of all to describe briefly the situation in South Africa, because what was happening in that country represented, for all Africans, the most typical case of the most abject colonialism.

253. The phenomenon of apartheid established as a system of government constituted a flagrant injustice which enabled an infinitesimal minority of European settlers to profit from the advantages of 87 per cent of the richest and most fertile part of the country, while the African majority was reduced to deriving a bare subsistence from 13 per cent of the territory: in other words, an economic, social, political and cultural complex which condemned the Africans of South Africa to a status lower than that of second-class citizens, in fact, to sub-human status.

254. Without going into the details of the inhuman and criminal racist practices of apartheid, it should be stressed that the Pretoria régime represented a threat to the peace and security not only of Africa, but of the whole international community.

255. It was pertinent to recall that, on the pretext of ensuring its defence, the Pretoria régime had, in less than four years, quadrupled its military expenditure and had recently intensified its research in the field of nuclear and bacteriological weapons.

256. Since it was clear that all those military preparations could hardly be intended for the imprisoned, humiliated or disarmed Africans of South Africa, Africa now knew that it was ever more menaced by the folly of the Pretoria régime. It therefore needed the support of the whole international community, and it was the OAU's duty, no matter what the tribune, to appeal to all those complex forces which, some years ago, had united in Europe and elsewhere to crush the forerunner and model of the Pretoria régime, namely, Nazi Germany.

257. As the Special Committee was aware, there were very great similarities between the Pretoria régime and Nazi Germany. In view of those similarities the economic sanctions against South Africa which had been requested represented a strict minimum; nothing in contemporary international morality was more serious or more discouraging than the great Powers' hesitation to apply those sanctions systematically.

258. The solution of the South African problem lay in the hands of certain States which played an important role in the United Nations and in some cases in the Special Committee itself, namely the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands, Japan and, of course, Portugal. Africa was convinced that those Powers, which had vital commercial and economic links with South Africa, possessed, by that very fact, peaceful weapons which could bring the Pretoria régime to its senses. Those Powers were therefore in many respects responsible for the colonialist threat to the peace and security of the African continent, for their benevolent neutrality, to say no more, and their refusal to impose economic sanctions, strengthened the position of the Pretoria leaders and, what was more serious, encouraged them to extend their vile system of government to other Territories, for example South West Africa and now Southern Rhodesia. Worse still, such international complicity intensified the havoc wrought by colonialism in Africa, since it encouraged others to imitate South Africa and gradually to tighten the screw in their machinations against the liberty and dignity of the African peoples.

259. Indeed, on close examination, it was apparent that the situation in Southern Rhodesia was already very similar to that prevailing in South Africa. Profiting by the dilatory pretexts advanced by the United Kingdom to evade its responsibilities with regard to the African majority in that Territory, Ian Smith, strengthened by the farcical elections he had held on 7 May 1965, had seized all fifty seats of the "A" list electoral constituencies and thus at the present time wielded dictatorial power, in the name of which the racist minority of 200,000 settlers intended to reduce the four million Africans to eternal servitude, slavery, and humiliation. That was something Africa would never accept. It was useless for the United Kingdom Government to declare that it was prepared "to undertake negotiations" with the obstinate, power-drunk minority group, for it was now clear that it would do nothing concrete to avoid the unilateral declaration of independence. The Africans now knew that Ian Smith had decided to declare independence unilaterally, using the recent elections to exert pressure on the United Kingdom, basing his action on the "1961 Constitution", all aspects of which had already been sufficiently denounced in the competent United Nations organs.

260. Severe and ever more brutal security measures had already been enacted against the African nationalist opposition, all because the Government of Ian Smith minimized the sanctions which the United Kingdom and the rest of the world might eventually impose upon it. It was clear that there, as in South Africa, the danger should not be underestimated, for the despicable régime of Ian Smith threatened not only the countries bordering Southern Rhodesia, not only the African peoples who supported those countries, but the whole world, which placed the ultimate responsibility for what was happening in Southern Rhodesia upon the United Kingdom Government, because the latter still bore the political and moral responsibility to construct that territory's future within a truly democratic framework.

261. There was nothing, in fact, to prevent the United Kingdom Government from assuming the responsibilities which it had formerly assumed elsewhere and suspending the "1961 Constitution" in order to demand and establish in Southern Rhodesia the conditions most favourable to the installation of a régime permitting equitable representation of all races, all creeds and all classes, for according to the moral judgement of the international community the elections of 7 May did not represent an ordinary political victory, since they had not been won by one party and its leader in competition with other parties and other leaders which had from the outset had the same opportunities to express themselves and the same openings. It was rather a declaration of intention by the settlers, instructing Ian Smith to implement the plan for a unilateral declaration of independence and to transform Southern Rhodesia into a second South Africa as quickly as possible. Africa had likewise taken a solemn decision not to accept such action. The Rhodesian Government was already strengthening its links with South Africa, and in order to complete the solidarity of the benighted exponents of colonialism and racism was effecting a rapprochement with Portugal, which quite naturally, in view of the international complicity, had no reason to respect the self-determination of peoples, the resolutions of the United Nations, the United Nations Charter or the appeals of world public opinion.

262. The extraordinary session of the Council of Ministers for Foreign Affairs, held at Lagos, had recently adopted some very important resolutions concerning Southern Rhodesia. He could not give the Special Committee any details until their contents had been submitted to the Ethiopian Head of State, but he assured the Committee that those documents would be made available to it before it left Addis Ababa.

263. The political reports from Mozambique, Angola and so-called Portuguese Guinea showed that Portugal was progressively intensifying its reign of destruction by extending the war of extermination against all African nationalists who were determined to resist foreign domination by all means. In defiance of Africa, in defiance of the United Nations, in defiance of the Special Committee's recommendations, in defiance of common sense and elementary logic, Portugal was increasingly determined to maintain on the African continent its so-called overseas provinces, where Africans were nothing more than slaves.

264. Portugal was undeniably benefiting from the chain of colonial complicity, for how else could it find the strength and power to oppose the numerous decisions by which the United Nations had demanded the granting of independence to all Territories under colonial domination? How else could its ability to flout the clearly expressed wishes not only on Africa, but of the world community, be explained?

265. The Lisbon authorities, emboldened by the support of the NATO Powers, were confronting Africa and the whole world with a situation from which there was no way out except through a war of liberation in which the whole of Africa, despite its love of peace, was prepared to engage its forces. But above all, it was the OAU's duty to inform the international community, represented by the Special Committee, of its conviction that, without the guilty silence and the passive and sometimes active contribution of many great Powers which were Members of the United Nations, Africa would not be on the brink of such a painful and extreme step. The members of the OAU had already stated, by principle and by conviction, that they wished the liberation of their continent to be peaceful. They would not hesitate, however, to resort to force if that proved necessary. It was the OAU's duty to state that every African held those great Powers responsible collectively for that was happening in South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and all the Territories under Portuguese domination, perhaps because those Powers themselves wished to contribute in one way or another, in Asia as in Africa, to the maintenance of foreign domination over peoples who aspired only to freedom.

266. It was a fact that, although their situation was less explosive than that prevailing in South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the Territories under Portuguese domination, thousands of Africans were still subjected to English, French or Spanish colonization, and Africa was anxious to see them take their place in the community of independent African States. Their seats in the OAU meetings remained unoccupied. It must be clearly understood that the fact that a territory was tiny or that the colonizer was English, French or Spanish, did not exempt it from the African States' determination to crush colonialism. On the contrary, Africa was particularly vigilant in such cases and intended to do its best to ensure self-determination for those peoples and complete independence for all African territories. That was the solemn engagement entered into by the African Heads of State in the very hall in which the Special Committee was now meeting.

267. The independence demanded by the African peoples could not be conceived as a privilege to be awaited from the hand of others. The African peoples had already proclaimed their desire to attain their ends by peaceful means, but independence was an inalienable right for which every African knew he must make the necessary sacrifices if he wished to save the little he had, develop his potentialities and take his place harmoniously, with dignity, in the concert of nations.

268. There colonial and racial problem was not only an insult and a danger to those continents which were still its theatre and its victims; it was a problem whose development threatened the peace and prosperity of the whole world, as was exemplified by the Second World War. The United Nations, established essentially to prevent for ever any relapse into that type of human folly, must rightly be in the vanguard of the struggle against colonialism and racism, those seeds of world catastrophe. It was in that profound conviction that the African States, individually and collectively, had constantly drawn the attention of the United Nations and of all the Powers which exerted some influence there to the explosive nature of the present situation in Southern Rhodesia, South Africa and the Territories still under Portuguese or other domination.

269. There was still time to take preventive action to eliminate once and for all the risk of a world-wide confrontation, which would spare neither the small Powers nor the great. It was the duty of the OAU, which embodied the aspirations of all the African peoples for peace, solidarity, rehabilitation, dignity and harmonious development, to reaffirm those truths which the Special Committee had constantly heard from the lips of the sufferers themselves. Because it believed that its ideals were universal, the OAU would like to count on the combined effort of the international community, represented by the Special Committee, to eliminate colonialism and racism for ever from all those parts of the world where they continued to hamper the development of the human personality and human dignity.

270. Since the Committee was meeting at Addis Ababa, ancient capital of African independence and the headquarters of an organization which embodied the hopes of a whole continent, he hoped that its mission would be crowned with complete success, because that success was essential to the success of the United Nations itself, and because the fundamental progress of the OAU depended upon the complete liberation of the African peoples; the Special Committee knew that Africa was one of the United Nations most important concerns.

271. He hoped that during its stay on African soil, in the heart of the continent which had experienced more shame and humiliation than any other, through the cries of revolt of those still groaning under the colonial yoke; through the suffering of those who were denied the most elementary human rights; through the unanimous revolt of a whole people and the determination of a whole continent to assist those still subjected to foreign domination and if necessary to die with them and for them; through the explicit accusations levelled by every African against the great Powers, which remained silent while it was within their power to stay the folly of a Verwoerd, of an Ian Smith or of a Salazar; through all that Africa had frankly revealed to the Committee; through all that Africa incessantly proclaimed from the depths of its being; through all that the Special Committee already knew and that it had felt and experienced during its African mission, the Special Committee had been able to discover, define and definitively strengthen the methods which would bring about the total and immediate liberation of Africa and the speedy elimination of racism.

272. The Special Committee now knew that that was the victory which Africa expected of it, for in the matter of decolonization the Members of the United Nations could no longer be content to remain in New York, to adopt resolutions and to wait. The Committee's visit to Africa should mark a definite turning-point in the world organization's methods, for its experience and the faith which inspired it had aroused great hopes in the hearts of all Africans. It should be prolonged by closer co-operation with the OAU, whose first objective was decolonization.

273. In that connexion, it was important to specify that henceforward Africans would be unable to understand how the international community, like any other committee, commission or body dealing with the problems of decolonization, could carry out its work without close and intelligent collaboration with the OAU. That organization which, although young, was already prepared for the inevitable dialogue and the necessary co-operation, expected a committee such as the Special Committee to harmonize general action and co-ordinate efforts so that the crucial struggle against colonialism and racism might at last enter the practical phase of concrete action, as opposed to the empty words which filled the United Nations archives. The OAU, which could never be content to play an observer's role when a combat as momentous as the decolonization struggle was being fought on African soil and on behalf of Africa, expected much of the Special Committee. Africa expected the Special Committee's conclusions—and the OAU was empowered to request as much from the Special Committee as the only possible solution for the welfare and security of the African peoples—to inspire the Security Council with a somewhat more realistic spirit and to prompt it not only to adopt resolutions but to take decisive action, irreversible decisions and practical steps through which the sanctions against South Africa, Portugal, and Southern Rhodesia and the opposition to the unilateral declaration of independence by Ian Smith, in short, the programmes vital to the complete liberation of the African continent, might be implemented.

274. In conclusion, he said that the co-operation which Africa expected implied that occasions such as the present one would become more frequent, for Africa was convinced that it was only to the extent to which various United Nations organs, and particularly the Security Council, could come to Africa, to the very heart of the drama of colonialism and racism, in full collaboration with the OAU, which embodied the most noble ideas of the African peoples, that the United Nations, to save the tortured world, would be able to lay the new foundations which could strengthen the Organization and rehabilitate it in the eyes of Africa, and, what was even more important, in its own eyes. The OAU had confidence in the Committee and was prepared to collaborate with it in every possible way.

General statements by members

275. The Chairman said that the Special Committee was happy to be at Addis Ababa, capital of the oldest of the independent States of Africa, to hold the last meetings of its long journey devoted to a search for the solutions and methods that the United Nations should adopt in order to enable all the peoples still under colonial domination to exercise fully their right to self-determination and independence.

276. He wished, on behalf of all his colleagues, to express to His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I and to the Ethiopian Government, through the Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ethiopia, his deep gratitude for the kind invitation and for the attentive hospitality which had been extended to the Special Committee since its arrival at Addis Ababa. Many members of the Special Committee had already had the honour of becoming acquainted with Ethiopia and the Ethiopian people, and it was a great pleasure for them to return to that country. The Government of Ethiopia, an African State which had been a founding Member of the United Nations, had always made an important contribution to the Organization's activities, and the fact that the Special Committee had been given the opportunity to meet at Addis Ababa for the second time was additional proof of the Government's interest in its work. The Special Committee, meeting in Africa Hall, was aware that the first conference bringing together all the Heads of State and Government of the independent countries of Africa had been held in that same hall in May 1963, and he wished to pay a well-deserved tribute to His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I for the wise and constructive role he had played in order to enable that first African summit meeting, unprecedented by reason of its objectives and by reason of those who had attended it, to be held.

277. The important decision taken on that occasion by the African Heads of State and Government to free the rest of the continent from foreign domination, and the establishment for that purpose of the OAU Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa, had been greeted with great hope by the Special Committee. He thought it appropriate to mention that during its African journey the Special Committee had been greatly encouraged by the unreserved co-operation of the OAU, and it was certain that the links thus established between the United Nations and the OAU would be strengthened in the future, in order to ensure the speedy attainment of the basic objective of the two organizations, namely, respect of the rights of all peoples to self-determination and to the free choice of their own national institutions.

278. The Special Committee, whose mandate was to examine the situation in all the Non-Self-Governing Territories with a view to proposing to the United Nations General Assembly and to the Security Council measures to enable all the peoples under colonial domination to exercise without delay their right to self-determination and independence, had come to Africa because it was on the African continent that the most refractory and inhuman cases of colonialism were still to be found. During its stay at Lusaka and at Dar es Salaam, it had heard petitioners from Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, South Africa, Basutoland, Swaziland, Bechuanaland, Angola and Mozambique. It had also received written petitions concerning other African Territories still under colonial domination or subjected to the hateful régime of apartheid. No matter what the political, economic or social systems of the various Governments represented on the Special Committee, all members had been moved and indignant upon learning of the atrocities and the various violations of human rights committed by the colonial authorities of Portugal and by the white racists of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

279. The Special Committee had learned that the Portuguese colonialists, in their deluded attempt to maintain the fiction of transforming the Africans of Angola, Mozambique and Guinea into second class pseudo-Portuguese, had carried their horrible, criminal acts to the point of mutilating and burning Africans after having savagely murdered them. It had learned that the Portuguese, in their stupid determination to stifle the legitimate aspirations of the African peoples subjected to their cruel domination, went so far as to give the African inhabitants poisoned food and drink. The Special Committee had even learned that at the beginning of June the Portuguese were thought to have employed poison gas in Angola. Those were crimes which should not be passed over in silence, for they constituted acts of genocide unworthy of the contemporary epoch. The Special Committee's journey to Africa was an eminently constructive step. The evidence obtained from petitioners who had come direct from the Territories still under colonial domination had enabled the members of the Special Committee to obtain a more realistic idea of the situation in those Territories. That evidence, and the impressions which the Special Committee had gathered on the spot had reinforced its conviction that the survival of colonialism and apartheid constituted a real threat to international peace and security. The Special Committee was now convinced that persuasive methods had no influence on the Portuguese Government or on the illegal authorities of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. The alliance of those Governments to maintain régimes condemned by the international community represented a serious threat to the whole African continent.

280. In view of the persistent refusal of the Portuguese Government and the illegal authorities of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia to comply with the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee, the latter had come to the conclusion that the Security Council should now take the appropriate action laid down in the Charter to ensure that the rights of the peoples still under colonial domination were respected.

281. The Special Committee knew that the Ethiopian Government and the other African Governments represented in the OAU were determined to do everything possible to free the peoples of Angola, Mozambique, South West Africa, Southern Rhodesia, South Africa and all the other colonial Territories.

282. He had listened with much interest to the encouraging words which the Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs had addressed to the Special Committee on behalf of His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I. The courageous struggle which His Imperial Majesty had always waged to safeguard his people's independence would be a source of inspiration to the Special Committee during its work at Addis Ababa.

283. The Chairman also thanked the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU for his important statement. The sincerity and frankness with which he had described the position of the OAU with regard to decolonization had greatly impressed the Special Committee, which was prepared to provide the OAU with ever more active support and to support any initiative taken by that Organization to rid Africa of colonialism and apartheid without further delay.

284. The Special Committee's journey through Africa had enabled it to acquire a deeper knowledge of the sufferings of the peoples still under colonial domination. Having been in a position to assess the situation in those Territories, the Special Committee had been prompted to take unprecedented decisions. It was, indeed, the first time that a United Nations body had officially recognized in a resolution the legitimacy of the struggle being waged by the African freedom fighters; it was the first time that the Security Council had been requested to take the appropriate measures laid down in the Charter to implement the resolutions on decolonization adopted by the General Assembly and the Security Council; it was the first time that a definite appeal had been addressed to the military Powers of NATO to cease supporting Portugal.

285. He reiterated his thanks to the Administrative Secretary for the words of encouragement and confidence he had addressed to the Special Committee and assured him that the latter would spare no efforts to complete its task, namely, the liquidation of colonialism.

286. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania expressed the gratitude of his delegation to His Imperial Majesty and to the Government and people of Ethiopia for the kind invitation extended to the Special Committee to meet at Addis Ababa, and for the warm welcome accorded to the Special Committee members on arrival. The friendliness of the people of Ethiopia reflected the warm African hospitality that Ethiopia had shown since biblical times; and it would undoubtedly inspire the Special Committee and make for the smooth and efficient dispatch of its remaining tasks.

287. For hundreds of years, Ethiopia had been one of the few States that had breathed the air of freedom —yet not without being constantly on its guard against external aggression aimed at colonialization. For centuries Ethiopia had been an island in an Africa which had become a victim of aggressive colonialism. While the rest of Africa succumbed to colonial subjugation and ruthless exploitation, the people of Ethiopia successfully defended their land and had written a glorious page of history which all must admire.

288. In advocating the peaceful liquidation of colonialism, the Tanzanian delegation did so because it knew only too well what it meant to fight a war. Yet if the time came when the only means of liberating a people was to resort to arms, Africa would not hesitate to do so. In the dark days when fascism in Europe spread to Africa, in the form of aggression against the Ethiopian people by Mussolini, Ethiopia had had no alternative but to defend itself by arms. It was significant that the colonialists then had used the same methods of torture and cruelty against the gallant Ethiopian fighters as were used against some of the African countries still under colonial domination, e.g., Angola, Mozambique, Southern Rhodesia, and so-called Portuguese Guinea. But in the end colonialism faced the same fate in Ethiopia as it was facing now in other parts of Africa, namely, defeat. His Imperial Majesty's courageous leadership in that struggle had been an inspiration to Tanzania in its own struggle for independence. The people of Tanzania would never forget that for many years Ethiopia had been a place of refuge for some of the now prominent leaders in Africa, that financial and material aid had always been extended by Ethiopia to suffering brothers in colonized Africa; and that His Imperial Majesty had played the leading role in establishing the OAU. Ethiopia might be described as the umbrella of the OAU, and it was to be hoped that His Imperial Majesty would continue to exert all efforts to keep OAU united under it, in spite of the many hostile external forces that might have to be faced.

289. The enthusiasm with which the freedom fighters had petitioned had shown clearly their determination to be free and their resolve to fight to the bitter end. Their faith in the United Nations and in the Special Committee would have made the task of decolonization much easier if only the colonial Powers were willing to co-operate.

290. The Tanzanian delegation would like to state once again the policy of its Government with regard to colonialism. Tanzania would never have any truck with colonialism under whatever guise. The people of Tanzania had not only condemned it; they had sworn to do everything they could do contribute to its liquidation in Africa and elsewhere in the world. Hence, in spite of slander and intimidation from certain States, especially Portugal, the Tanzanian Government had consistently and boldly reasserted its stand.

291. The brutalities and atrocities committed by the colonizers, in their so-called civilizing mission, made distressing hearing and made it clear that the colonial Powers involved still regarded an African as fair game for enslavement and exploitation. At Lusaka, the petitioners had demonstrated how the United Kingdom was gradually handing over their African brothers to racist Smith and his band of criminals, thus creating another South Africa in Southern Rhodesia. Yet, when taxed with such matters, the United Kingdom representative merely evaded the issue.

292. After nearly a hundred years of colonization in Southern Rhodesia, the white racists today could still commit atrocities against Africans freely. In the Territories under Portuguese domination, things were even worse. Yet there were still Governments which had failed to condemn Portugal categorically.

293. It was disappointing to find that certain delegations had not seen their way to supporting the resolution on the Portuguese colonies adopted at Dar es Salaam (A/AC.109/124 and Corr.1), especially after they had seemingly sympathized with the petitioners' plight during the general debate. A delegation which, throughout the African tour, had not supported a single resolution adopted could hardly claim to be anti-colonial. The Tanzanian delegation noted with appreciation the newspaper report of steps taken by the Netherlands Government to provide practical assistance and legal defence for apartheid victims. It was to be hoped that other Governments would follow that example, thus responding to the Special Committee's appeal in operative paragraph 2 of its resolution on the Portuguese colonies for moral and material help to those now under the colonial yoke.

294. With regard to the Committee's programme of work at Addis Ababa, his delegation trusted that discussion of the questions of South West Africa and the High Commission Territories would culminate in the adoption of appropriate resolutions. In the discussion of the High Commission Territories, the machinations brought to light were appalling. The administration of justice seemed to have become a mockery, despite the United Kingdom claim to be the custodian of respect for the law.

295. There were several issues which had come up during the meetings in Africa which merited consideration, e.g., the recommendation to the Secretary-General of the United Nations that all the testimony heard by the Special Committee should be printed in book form and submitted to all Governments so as to give them a more realistic view of what colonization meant for Africa.

296. Similarly, the question of refugees might be further discussed with a view to the adoption of a more detailed resolution appealing to the world as a whole on the issue of refugees from Territories still under colonial domination.

297. The representative of India thanked His Imperial Majesty and the Government and people of Ethiopia for inviting the Special Committee to the ancient African capital, which in the last few years had not only changed in a remarkable manner but had become the centre of African and Afro-Asian activity, especially since the establishment of the OAU headquarters.

298. Ethiopia's past and future problems were not unlike those of India. Both nations were now engaged in nation-building programmes and had declared war on poverty, ignorance and disease. In international affairs, the two countries had an identical approach to world problems and shared the same ideals of peaceful coexistence, non-alignment, Afro-Asian solidarity and faith in the United Nations. As one of the great and historic figures of the century, His Imperial Majesty was held in high esteem everywhere, and his generous moral and material support at a critical moment in India's history had endeared Ethiopia to the millions of his countrymen. The recent visit to Ethiopia by the Foreign Minister of India, and the forthcoming visit of its President as guest of His Imperial Majesty, would further cement the ties of friendship between the two countries.

299. The Special Committee's work thus far, at Lusaka and Dar es Salaam, had culminated in resolutions on Southern Rhodesia and on Territories under Portuguese rule. It would be a mistake to regard them as just two more mere resolutions to add to a long list. They crystallized a hope that even at the eleventh hour the administering Powers concerned would ensure the peaceful transfer of power to the indigenous peoples. The granting of independence to Southern Rhodesia by the United Kingdom Government must follow, not precede, the granting of full and equal rights to all the inhabitants of the Territory irrespective of their colour or creed. Elections should be conducted on the principle of one man one vote, and a constitutional conference of all concerned should be called by the United Kingdom, and all repressive legislation withdrawn.

300. With regard to the Portuguese Territories, a constructive discussion with the Salazar Government was out of the question. Portugal had shown no change of heart. Yet the liberation of people from alien subjugation was an irreversible process of history, and it would be unwise to resist that process by giving assistance—moral, military or monetary—to Portugal.

301. The problem of South West Africa had first been brought up some eighteen years earlier by the Indian delegation. South Africa was the only State that had failed to accept the obligations incumbent on it under the United Nations Trusteeship System. The Special Committee was fully entitled to discuss South West Africa, and did not accept the argument that the matter was still sub judice. A country where apartheid was a State policy and which flouted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the United Nations Charter, forfeited the right to be called a civilized nation.

302. It was the responsibility and duty of every member of the Special Committee to make the maximum contribution towards the rapid implementation of the Declaration contained in resolution 1514 (XV). In conclusion, he quoted the moving and inspiring words spoken by His Imperial Majesty, Emperor Haile Selassie, addressing the General Assembly on 4 October 1963 (1229th plenary meeting), twenty-seven years after his appeal to the League of Nations for relief from the destruction unleashed by the fascist invader, to the effect that undertakings were of little worth if the will to keep them was lacking, and voicing a message of cautious yet buoyant optimism. That same spirit should inspire the Special Committee today.

303. The representative of the United Kingdom said he would like to express the thanks of his Government to His Imperial Majesty and the Government and people of Ethiopia for the splendid hospitality enjoyed by the Special Committee in Ethiopia. He personally had been greatly impressed by the tremendous expansion and modernization of Addis Ababa in the last few years. The changes bore eloquent testimony to the energy and vitality of the Ethiopian people and their Government and the strides they had made in their economic and social development. It was fitting that the final stage of the Special Committee's work should be concluded in the capital city of a country which had so long a history of national independence and such a magnificent record of valour in its defence.

304. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics thanked His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I for his message and assured him that all the participants would be inspired by it in the course of their work.

305. After thanking the OAU for assistance it had consistently given the Special Committee since the latter's arrival in Africa, he reminded the participants that the establishment of close contact with that organization imposed certain obligations upon the Special Committee; it should not be forgotten that the OAU embodied the hopes of 200 million Africans.

306. During its initial meetings in Africa, the Special Committee had already taken a number of useful steps which, it was to be stressed, were unprecedented. It had, in fact, recognized the legitimacy of the African peoples' struggle for independence, it had requested Portugal's military allies, particularly those which were members of NATO, to refrain from supplying that country with any assistance which might help it pursue its policy of oppression, it had drawn the attention of the Security Council to the fact that the situation in the Portuguese Territories constituted a threat to international security, and it had also proclaimed the need to take steps against Portugal and to inform public opinion of what was happening in the Territories under Portuguese domination.

307. Recalling that twenty States which were members of the Special Committee had voted in favour of the resolution on the Territories administered by Portugal and that eighteen had voted in favour of the resolution concerning Southern Rhodesia, he said that those votes reflected each country's real policy with regard to decolonization. Certain Member States were trying to create the impression that they were concerned about the destiny of the Territories under Portuguese domination and that of Southern Rhodesia, but their efforts deceived no one, for the votes on the two resolutions in question constituted deeds, not words.

308. The meetings at Lusaka and at Dar es Salaam had shown that the African atmosphere was favourable to the Special Committee, and the latter was indeed aware that in Africa it could do valuable work to promote the freedom of the African countries.

309. The USSR delegation supported the statements of the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU. It would do everything within its power in the Special Committee to help to solve the problem of sanctions against South Africa, Portugal and the Smith Government.

310. He confirmed his country's position with regard to Southern Rhodesia, which had been set forth by the Permanent Representative of the USSR to the United Nations in a note addressed to the Secretary-General on 5 June 1965 (S/6416). In that note, the Permanent Representative had recalled that, when the question of Southern Rhodesia had been considered by the Security Council, the USSR representative had stressed that it was essential to prevent any further crimes in Southern Rhodesia and to prevent that country from being transformed into a racist State modelled on South Africa. The USSR representative had also stressed the fact that the United Kingdom should take steps to annul the elections which had been held in Southern Rhodesia on 7 May 1965, to revoke the Constitution on which those elections had been based and to convene immediately a meeting of representatives of all political parties with a view to drawing up a new constitution, based on the immediate granting of full rights to the indigenous population and of independence to the country. The Permanent Representative of the USSR had also stated that it was the duty of the United Nations to eliminate that shameful vestige of the past without delay.

311. The Special Committee must unceasingly assist the African peoples in their struggle for independence. The USSR delegation, for its part, was prepared to co-operate with all the members of the Special Committee to take more efficient action and to make, on African soil, a contribution to the welfare of Africa and to world peace. As the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU had said, the destiny of Africa and that of the world were inseparable.

312. The other members of the Special Committee also expressed their thanks and associated themselves with the tributes paid to His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I and to the Government and people of Ethiopia.

313. The representative of Ethiopia said that his delegation would be happy to convey to His Imperial Majesty and to the Government and people of Ethiopia the kind expressions of gratitude of the Special Committee. He, as well as other members of the Special Committee, also thanked the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU for the important statement which he had made.

314. The representative of Yugoslavia noted that the fact that Ethiopia was for the second time offering its hospitality to the Special Committee was but one more manifestation of the traditionally anti-colonialist policy of Ethiopia and its sincere desire to help to eliminate the colonialist régime once and for all. For centuries Ethiopia had preserved its independence and its freedom, time and again fighting courageously against the efforts of the imperialists who had sought to bring it under their sway, and it had set an example to the peoples of Africa who had themselves been fighting for independence and freedom.

315. The representative of Poland observed that the Polish people had much appreciated His Imperial Majesty's official visit to Poland in September 1964 which, as the final communiqué had amply testified, had helped to strengthened friendly relations between the two countries and to confirm their common determination to prevent the rebirth of aggressive militarism and to work for the final liquidation of colonialism. The determination to help Africans still living under the colonial yoke had done much to forge the unity of independent Africa at the historic summit conference at Addis Ababa.

316. The Special Committee must co-ordinate its efforts with those of the OAU, and he agreed with the Secretary-General of that organization that the Security Council should act on the Special Committee's conclusions and take practical action, in the form of sanctions, against South Africa, Portugal and Southern Rhodesia. The "unholy alliance" of Verwoerd, Salazar and Smith was the major obstacle to the liberation of the oppressed peoples of Africa. That alliance was founded on a common political outlook: racism and fascism, a common economic objective: ruthless exploitation of African natural and human resources, and a common military design: the defence of colonialism and the subversion of neighbouring African States. The Special Committee must bring the realities of that situation to the attention of the Security Council.

317. The representative of Bulgaria recalled that in a joint statement issued on the occasion of His Imperial Majesty's visit to the People's Republic of Bulgaria in 1964, the two countries had declared their support for the just struggle of peoples for freedom and national independence; urged the prompt implementation of the General Assembly's Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples; condemned the apartheid policies of the South African Government, emphasizing the need for application of the sanctions adopted; and expressed their support for the struggle for national liberation of the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea. Bulgaria reaffirmed its readiness to co-operate with Ethiopia in the achievement of those aims.

318. The representative of Tunisia said that the statement made by the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU testified to the vitality and dynamism of the OAU, and it was to be hoped that the United Nations would take advantage of it by co-operating as closely as possible with that organization.

319. The Special Committee must do everything in its power to eliminate the scourge of colonialism. To attain that goal, it had first studied the situation in the countries still under foreign domination and had then recommended concrete measures designed to rid the world of the degrading acts of a number of persons who continued to represent humanity at its basest. Unfortunately, it so happened that those representatives of evil were protected by certain great Powers, which continued to put forward all manner of excuses to justify their support and encouragement of the oppressors.

320. The moving statements of the petitioners only brought out more clearly that unhappy and painful state of affairs. He was convinced that the reason the petitioners' accusations were exclusively directed at certain Western Powers was that the facts were undeniable and the timid explanations with which those same Powers had tried to disclaim their responsibility had hardly been convincing. That was a serious matter for those Powers, for they stood to lose whatever prestige they might have acquired in Africa in recent years.

321. As a member of the United Nations and of the OAU, the Conference of Non-Aligned Countries, the Conference of Afro-Asian Countries and the Arab League, Tunisia would spare no effort to make its full contribution to the attainment of the objectives which all those organizations had set themselves in liberating all the indigenous peoples that were still dominated by the blind force of colonialism. The day was nigh, without any doubt, when all the African continent would be in the hands of Africans. For just as America was for Americans, the Soviet Union for the Soviet people, and Europe for the Europeans, Africa must inevitably return to the Africans.

322. The representative of Chile said that he was particularly happy to express his thanks to His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I, and his Government and people, for the kind welcome and generous hospitality they had extended to the Special Committee, for only a few days earlier, the Chilean Government had decided to open an Embassy in Ethiopia which would be its first in the region. Chile was a new country with a heroic history and had always been interested to observe countries having longer experience. That was what it hoped to do in Africa, by coming to Ethiopia, the corner-stone of the continent, a country whose principles and firm traditions it profoundly admired. Addis Ababa was the headquarters of organizations active throughout the African continent, just as Santiago was in Latin America. It was the headquarters of the OAU, which represented a common front for that region and sought to resolve the problems which arose there and to encourage its political, economic and social development.

323. Chile was proud to have contributed to the formation of that regional bloc by sending one of its experts to assist in its creation and in the drafting of its charter. The Chilean Government had always attached prime importance to regional organizations, particularly in Africa and Latin America which were made up of small countries the majority of which were economically weak and which must join forces in order to make themselves heard in the concert of nations.

324. The principal object of Chile's presence in Ethiopia, and hence in Africa, was to strengthen relations between Chile and the African continent. Chile was interested in African problems, which had much in common with its own. It shared the African countries' concern at the fact that some African peoples continued to live under the colonial system, which was unworthy of the modern world. It stood by their side in the war of liberation which it hoped would soon draw to a close, and sincerely looked forward to the establishment of very close links between Latin America and Africa which would enable them to fight together for the welfare of their peoples.

325. Chile had always insisted that the OAU should take a very active part in the work of the Special Committee; that organization should make its authoritative voice heard in all the Special Committee's deliberations. That was why, during the Special Committee's meetings in Lusaka, his delegation had expressed the desire to see an observer from that organization taking part, on a permanent basis, in the Special Committee's meetings in New York. The Chairman had stated at the time that talks to that effect were under way, and his delegation expressed the hope that those talks would soon be translated into reality.

Statement by the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity

326. The Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) speaking at the Chairman's invitation, said that it was for him a very pleasant duty to express, first of all to the Chairman, in his dual capacity as Chairman of the Special Committee and as a great African patriot, and through him to all the members of the Special Committee on the conclusion of its African tour, his feelings of gratitude, esteem and confidence at the results the Special Committee had achieved at Lusaka, Dar es Salaam and Addis Ababa.

327. He stated that he had never made any secret, in the General Assembly of the United Nations, in the Security Council, in the Committees of the General Assembly, or, in particular, in the Fourth Committee of the disappointment, bitterness, discouragement and sometimes indignation that he felt, in regard to decolonization, at the routine methods, empty speeches and automatic adoption of resolutions, never implemented, which in many respects characterized the work of the United Nations and of its various organs in the field of decolonization.

328. That emboldened him to say, publicly, how glad he was on behalf of the OAU—which was primarily dedicated to the total and unconditional liberation of the African continent from all foreign domination—to express solemnly his deep appreciation and the new hopes inspired in him by the new methods which the Special Committee adopted some while ago, but which its visit to Africa had strengthened in a remarkable manner.

329. He had already said how mixed his feelings were on welcoming the Special Committee to African soil, at a time when so many millions of Africans, at a crucial moment in the history of their continent, had placed fervent hopes in its work from the outset, convinced that it could carry to the great glass house in Manhattan echoes of the cries of suffering uttered by the martyrs of colonialism, and the unanimous appeal by the African leaders, by their organization and by the peoples of their continent for the immediate restitution to their brothers still under colonial rule of their stolen freedom, their plundered riches and, above all, their daily flouted dignity.

330. His hope had been that the Special Committee, strengthened by the observations and findings derived from contact with African realities and with the criminal policies pursued by the colonial Powers with the complicity of their allies, would bear living witness, in the United Nations, to the serious threat to, and in some cases the breach of, international peace and security presented by the colonial wars waged by Portugal, the racist settler minority in Southern Rhodesia and the nazi régime in Pretoria.

331. Lastly, he had thought that the Special Committee would place particular emphasis on the role played by friends and allies and the encouragement, direct or indirect, witting or unwitting, and consequently the direct responsibility which those friends and allies effectively assumed in enabling the outdated régimes of Lisbon, Salisbury and Pretoria to pursue their policies of repression and genocide in Africa and their high-handed defiance of the United Nations, whose authority and prestige they incessantly undermined.

332. Now that the Special Committee was concluding its work, he would say that thanks to the atmosphere the Special Committee had created, the resolutions it had adopted, its dynamic presence, and its determination to get to the bottom of things and fully to assume its responsibilities under its mandate, none of the above-mentioned hopes had been disappointed. For all this, he would reiterate to the Special Committee his full and entire satisfaction.

333. It might be that the fundamental provisions of the Charter could not easily be adapted to the new realities of the modern world. Nevertheless, he thought and seriously hoped that the other organs of the United Nations, and more particularly those which, in various capacities, were concerned with African affairs, should at least be inspired by the Special Committee's example and, if at all possible, betake themselves to Africa; once there, he was convinced their findings and impressions, not only of poverty and the various forms of humiliation but also of the fierce determination of the African populations to live in freedom, would enable them to find adequate solutions to the problems falling within their respective spheres of jurisdiction.

334. The OAU would use all the means at its disposal to give maximum publicity to the immense work the Special Committee had done in a few days or the African continent. He was convinced that the visit of the Special Committee would not only confirm and strengthen certain hopes, but would remarkably reinforce the prestige and the moral and political authority of the United Nations in the eyes of the African masses, a renewal of confidence which was sorely needed, particularly in relation to decolonization.

335. He wished to emphasize one essential provision of the resolutions of the Special Committee, all of which he endorsed without any reservation, which in his view would largely suffice to justify its journey to Africa. By recognizing the legitimacy of the struggle of the African people under colonial domination and by appealing to all States to provide the freedom fighters in Africa with all the assistance necessary for their struggle, the Special Committee and, through it, the United Nations, had associated itself with the essential claim for unanimity made by the Heads of African State and Government at their first meeting in Addis Ababa in May 1963 when the OAU was created—a claim which had been constantly reaffirmed at all subsequent meetings of the OAU.

336. He believed that the conclusions to which he had referred could never have been reached as a result of mere debates in the luxurious rooms in which the Special Committee usually met in New York. That important result was one of the fruits of the visit of the Special Committee to Africa. It was the direct contact with the bare facts of African reality that had made it possible for the Special Committee to reach so vital a conclusion—a conclusion which, he hoped, would be disseminated and fully implemented in the first place by all members of the Special Committee and in the second place by all justice-, freedom- and peace-loving Governments throughout the world.

337. He wished to state once again that Africa and its instrument for concerted co-operation, the OAU, continually proclaimed its peaceful determination and ardent wish that the great Powers, those that had a direct influence on Portugal, South Africa and the Southern Rhodesia settlers, should do all in their power, if need be by imposing a diplomatic strait jacket when the time came, to avoid war, bloodshed and the inevitable and long-term deterioration in the relations between the martyred African peoples and all those who, for one reason or another, had joined with their present-day executioners.

338. He was relying on the Special Committee to help the African people avert, against their strong conviction, against their political and moral principles and against obvious practical necessities, more devastation, more massacres and more useless sacrifices in the pursuit of their liberation, which would be achieved no matter how great the material forces opposed to their legitimate aspirations.

339. To this end, he thought it desirable that the Special Committee should persuade the other organs of the United Nations, and more particularly the Security Council, to hold in Africa, as close as possible to the theatres of colonial war, a session that would enable it to meet with honour, dignity and effectiveness the serious threats which colonialism at bay was levelling at stability in Africa, at the welfare of the African peoples, and above all at international peace and security.

340. He expressed to the Special Committee his special gratitude for the favourable reception given to the proposals for close co-operation between the Special Committee and the OAU in the field of decolonization. The decision of the Special Committee in that matter had been made clear not only in the numerous statements made by several representatives, statements which he welcomed with joy and reassurance; it was also officially recorded in operative paragraph 8 of the Special Committee's resolution (A/AC.109/128/Rev.1.) concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to Southern Rhodesia, Territories under Portuguese administration, South West Africa, and Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland. This effective co-operation already existed and no matter how modest its present form, he was convinced that this joint action would spare the world greater misfortunes and enable tomorrow's African historians to see, in the struggles for national liberation, the historic role that the United Nations had assumed, thanks to the Special Committee, in the name of the international community.

341. For all the above reasons, he wished to thank the Special Committee whole-heartedly, on behalf of the OAU, for what it had already done and for all that it was resolved to do for the complete decolonization of the African continent.

342. In conclusion, he assured the Special Committee, on behalf of the OAU, of his complete faith and entire support in the battle the Special Committee had joined with colonialism, a battle in which it might consider the African people and the OAU as an instrument for concerted action; all the vital forces of the African continent were constantly at the side of the Special Committee and ready to support its work in the service of justice, of equality, of freedom, in short, in the service of the noblest ideals inscribed in the United Nations Charter and repeated in the Charter of the Organization of African Unity.

General statements by members

343. The representative of Yugoslavia said that his delegation had never shared the doubts of those who had questioned the usefulness of the Special Committee's visit to Africa. Now that the Committee had completed its work, it was clear that much had been accomplished: by meeting with numerous representatives of national liberation movements from Territories still under colonial domination, the Special Committee had been enabled to enter into contact with the populations of those Territories and to arrive at a more realistic appreciation of the situation there. The on-the-spot testimony of the petitioners had strengthened the Committee's conviction that colonialism and apartheid would continue to constitute a threat to international peace and security until they were finally eliminated. The Committee's visit had also constituted an encouragement to the colonized peoples to persist in their struggle until victory was theirs.

344. During its mission to Africa the Special Committee had adopted a number of important resolutions. The resolutions concerning the Territories under Portuguese administration, South West Africa and Southern Rhodesia were of particular significance because the Committee, in calling on all States to give moral, political and material assistance to the peoples of those Territories in their struggle against the oppressor, had recognized the legitimacy of that struggle as the sole remaining means by which the peoples concerned could seek to liberate themselves in view of the refusal of the colonial Powers to co-operate in the attainment of this and by peaceful means. He hoped that all States, including those which continued to tolerate or give assistance to Portugal, Southern Rhodesia, and South Africa, would realize that the elimination of colonial and racist régimes was inevitable and would take a positive attitude towards the resolutions adopted by the Special Committee.

345. Many of the petitioners had advanced practical suggestions as to the steps the United Nations might take to assist them in their efforts. The Special Committee should use the interval before the next session of the General Assembly to study those suggestions closely, and to reflect on the Committee's African mission as a whole. His delegation, for its part, could already say then and there that such missions were indeed useful, giving a new urgency to the Committee's work. He accordingly believed that such missions should be undertaken every year.

346. Another positive result of the Special Committee's mission was the close contact which had been established with the OAU. Both bodies had the same concern—decolonization—and it was important that their respective activities in that field should be further co-ordinated in the future. In conclusion, he again thanked the Governments of Ethiopia, Tanzania, and Zambia for inviting the Special Committee to meet in their capitals. That gesture had been a valuable contribution to the Committee's work.

347. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania recalled that in a previous statement he had assured the Special Committee that the Government and people of Tanzania would always play their part in any efforts to advance the welfare of the African peoples, and particularly in the struggle to free those groaning under the colonial yoke.

348. In the opinion of his delegation, the Special Committee at its meetings in Africa had made an important contribution to the struggle and the results of its work had amply borne out the wisdom of its decision to visit Africa. In the resolutions adopted by the Special Committee at its meetings in Africa, the Committee had not been content simply to reaffirm the inalienable rights of peoples under colonial domination to self-determination and independence; it had stressed the legitimacy of the struggle of the colonial people to attain the effective exercise of the rights set forth in the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Furthermore, the Committee had appealed to all States to give the African populations the moral and material support necessary for the restoration of their inalienable rights.

349. He expressed the hope that the Security Council would, in accordance with the resolutions adopted by the Special Committee, take the necessary measures as laid down in the Charter to ensure respect for the rights of the African populations to self-determination and independence and to put an end to the dangerous activities of the régimes of Verwoerd, Salazar and Smith. He urged that all States, particularly the States members of NATO, and international institutions would forthwith withhold assistance of any kind to Portugal, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia so long as they failed to renounce their present colonial policies.

350. Referring to South West Africa and Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, he stated that his delegation attached importance also to adequate measures being taken to safeguard their territorial integrity and their sovereignty in the face of threats by the Verwoerd régime to disrupt their national unity.

351. The particular importance of the Special Committee's work in Africa had been due in very large measure to the close and direct contact the Committee had been able to establish with the realities of the colonial situation in Africa and with African nationalist leaders who might otherwise have been unable to come to New York. His delegation earnestly hoped that the Committee would increase its efforts to ensure the complete implementation of all the resolutions it had adopted during its visit to Africa.

352. In conclusion, he paid tribute to the Emperor as well as the Government and people of Ethiopia for their invitation to the Special Committee to meet in Addis Ababa. He also expressed his delegation's gratitude to the Chairman and the Bureau of the Committee as well as to the staff of the Secretariat.

353. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that as the Special Committee's work in Africa drew to a close, his delegation considered it necessary to state its views on the results of the visit.

354. During its visit to Africa the Special Committee had, in his delegation's opinion, done a great deal of highly effective work. In general, the purposes of the visit had been achieved: direct contact had been made with the national liberation movements of the peoples of the Portuguese, United Kingdom and other colonies in Africa, and the delegations of the countries belonging to the Special Committee had had an opportunity to acquaint themselves at first hand, on African soil, with the progress of the struggle for the definite liberation of Africa from colonialism. It was no accident that during the Committee's visit to Africa a whole series of delegations had come to see events in a light different from that in which they appeared in Manhattan.

355. The results of the Special Committee's work in Africa also differed substantially from its previous work in New York. The Committee, representing the United Nations, had to some extent succeeded during its visit in passing from words about decolonization to deeds, to practical support of the struggle of the peoples for their freedom. Working on African soil, the Committee had been able to probe more deeply into the roots of colonialism. The part played by NATO as a union of colonizers co-ordinating their activities against the peoples striving for their freedom had now been completely revealed. The sinister role of the West German revanchists and militarists in Africa, and particularly in South West Africa and the Portuguese colonies, had been exposed. The social, economic and political roots of the unholy alliance of the enemies of Africa—Salazar, Verwoerd and Smith—had been brought to light. The Special Committee had received conclusive proof that the activities of the colonizers in the African colonies constituted a threat to international peace and security.

356. On the basis of the vast amount of information submitted to it by the leaders of the national liberation movements, the Special Committee had been able to make a realistic evaluation of the current situation, to affirm its resolution of the legitimacy of the national liberation struggle in the Portuguese colonies, Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and other colonial Territories, and to appeal to all States to extend moral and material support to that just struggle and deny the colonizers any assistance. The Committee had made a completely justified proposal to the Security Council for the application of sanctions against colonial Powers that refused to comply with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The fact that the Committee had established contact with the OAU was undoubtedly of great importance. That contact must now be strengthened.

357. The positive outcome of the Special Committee's work during its visit to Africa had been the result of sharp conflict. Those who defended colonial interests in the Committee had tried to rebuff just criticism and lawful claims and accusations. Naturally they had failed in that aim and had only unmasked themselves with every speech. He was referring primarily, of course, to the delegations of the United States and the United Kingdom, but also to those who had supported them either directly or indirectly at the meetings.

358. A very characteristic picture had emerged during the votes in the Special Committee. The delegations of the socialist and Afro-Asian States had voted for all the resolutions without exception. It was the solid co-operation of the socialist and Afro-Asian countries which had made possible the positive results of all the Special Committee's work during its visit to Africa. Some delegations (those of Italy and Denmark) had abstained on some resolutions and voted for others, thereby revealing inconsistency but clearly not deciding to give direct support to the dark cause of colonialism. One delegation had taken a peculiar position, abstaining during the voting on all the resolutions without exception; that was the delegation of Australia, and its refusal even there, on African soil, to support the rightful cause of the struggle of the African peoples for freedom spoke for itself. Finally, there were two delegations which had voted against or at best had abstained during the voting on the draft resolutions. Those were the delegations of the United States and the United Kingdom, and their position showed with absolute clarity whom they were for and whom they were against; they were for the Portuguese colonizers, Verwoerd's wild racist fanatics and the white racists of Southern Rhodesia, and against the peoples of Zimbabwe, Angola, Mozambique, Guinea, South West Africa, Bechuanaland, Basutoland and Swaziland and against the peoples of all Africa and African freedom.

359. Such a disposition of forces in the Special Committee had its origins and causes, and would have its consequences. However, it must be noted with satisfaction that the overwhelming majority of States represented in the anti-colonial Special Committee had really taken an anti-colonial and anti-imperialist position in support of the peoples of Africa.

360. From that fact one fundamental conclusion emerged: the Special Committee's visit had evidently been of some use and had justified itself. A conclusion could also be drawn for the future: if the Special Committee wanted to serve the cause of the peoples' fight for their freedom, it should travel more frequently to the scene of events and come into direct contact with the peoples fighting for their freedom.

361. The question now was what else must be done, what further tasks lay before the Special Committee upon completion of its visit to Africa. It was the Soviet delegation's profound conviction that the results of the Committee's visit were not the finish, but the beginning. The adoption of resolutions, even the best of them, was not an end in itself. The point of adopting them was that they should be implemented and that their provisions should become realities. What the Special Committee had adopted were not declaratory statements, but a programme of action, and now that it had adopted that programme the Committee must proceed to the wider task of implementing it. As it came to the end of its visit, it must make a start on further work in support of peoples fighting for national independence.

362. A characteristic feature of decisions by the Special Committee, even when they were expressed in the most energetic terms, was that they were still decisions on paper. If the Special Committee or any other United Nations body took weak decisions, then they might remain decisions on paper whatever happened, because there was nothing in them to implement. Strong decisions contained provisions whose implementation could really alter the development of events. The Soviet delegation wished to appeal for joint efforts to see that all the decisions taken by the Special Committee during its visit were really implemented. His delegation felt that the Committee should now subordinate its work to that task, at least until the twentieth session of the General Assembly. After a certain time, it must examine what had and what had not been achieved under each paragraph of the resolutions adopted, find out who was hampering the fulfilment of this or that paragraph and what more had to be done. In that connexion, his delegation wished to draw particular attention to both the operative paragraphs of the first resolution on Southern Rhodesia; operative paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 of the second resolution on Southern Rhodesia; operative paragraphs 4, 5, 6 and 8 of the resolution on the Portuguese colonies; operative paragraph 4 of the resolution on South West Africa; operative paragraphs 2 and 3 of the resolution on the Protectorates of Bechuanaland, Swaziland and Basutoland; and all the main operative paragraphs of the concluding general resolution.

363. When it had done that, the Special Committee would be able to submit to the General Assembly not merely a formal, but a workmanlike and effective report which would facilitate the consideration of questions concerned with the elimination of colonialism at the twentieth session of the General Assembly and would enable the Assembly to make further progress towards that great goal.

364. In conclusion, the Soviet delegation expressed its gratitude to President Kenneth Kaunda and the Government and people of Zambia, President Nyerere and the Government and people of Tanzania and His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I and the Government and people of Ethiopia for their hospitality and co-operation during the Special Committee's visit. His delegation also thanked the representatives of the national liberation movements who had addressed the Special Committee and submitted extensive information on the situation in their countries and the struggle of the peoples of those countries for national independence and freedom. His delegation was grateful to Mr. Sori Coulibaly of Mali, the Chairman of the Special Committee, for his able and effective guidance of the Committee's work during the visit; Mr. Huot Sambath of Cambodia, the Vice-Chairman of the Committee, and Mr. Natwar Singh of India, the Rapporteur. The Soviet delegation attached great value to the work of the Afro-Asian Group and Yugoslavia, which had shouldered the task of drafting the Special Committee's draft resolutions. His delegation was grateful to its colleagues for their co-operation and attention, and to the Secretariat and all the technical services for their efficient work during the Special Committee's visit to Africa.

365. The representative of Iran said that the Special Committee's purpose in coming to Africa was two-fold. First, it was to obtain first-hand information about conditions in dependent and Non-Self-Governing Territories, and to keep in direct contact with the subjugated peoples of those areas. Second, it was to show the United Nations' active interest and support for the liberation and independence of these peoples.

366. In connexion with these two objectives, the Special Committee's work had been a complete success. The impact of the high sentiments and aspirations of the African peoples of subjugated areas was strongly reflected both in the Special Committee's deliberations as well as in its decisions. Moreover, by the Committee's response to their wishes and its support of their just cause, it could be safely assumed that their confidence in the United Nations had been reinforced to a great extent.

367. In the course of the hearing of petitioners, to whom his delegation had listened with sympathy, colonialism in its ugliest and most shocking form had been exposed. The machinations and sinister designs of Verwoerd, Salazar, and Smith to keep the African peoples under their oppressive yoke had been unmasked. In its resolutions, the Special Committee had not only taken full account of these conditions, but had also embarked upon important decisions in order to put an end to the situation once and for all.

368. On the questions of Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, the High Commission Territories, and the Territories under Portuguese domination, the Special Committee had decided, among other things, to reaffirm the right of the African peoples to self-determination and independence, and to recognize the legitimacy of their struggle for the enjoyment of rights that were unequivocally theirs by virtue of the United Nations Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

369. The Special Committee had also decided to bring to the attention of the Security Council the seriousness of the situation prevailing in these Territories, recommending measures in accordance with the varying circumstances of each case. On the question of Territories under Portuguese domination, the Special Committee had gone further, by recommending to the Security Council for the first time "to consider putting into effect against Portugal the appropriate measures laid down in the Charter".

370. In the course of the debate his delegation had pointed to the high degree of co-operation that had developed among countries from all continents, in particular, the Afro-Asian continents, for the sole purpose of bringing about the final liquidation of colonialism. That co-operation had been further reinforced by the solidarity and unity shown by the Afro-Asian countries in the preparation and adoption of the highly significant and even novel decision to which he had referred.

371. Referring to yet another important development in the conduct of international relations, he said that never before, to such an extent, had the deliberations and decisions of an international body been formulated by the participation of small States. Furthermore, never before, to such an extent, had such deliberations and decisions been influenced by the aspirations and direct participation of individuals at large. This was a highly salutary development because it tended to democratize the conduct of international relations. It tended to reduce the effect of power in international decision-making procedures in favour of general principles of justice and universally accepted rules of conduct.

372. That new democratic element, if allowed to develop, could only culminate in the firm establishment of the rule of law in international relations. However, complacency and an unrealistic appraisal of the world situation would be guarded against.

373. It would be a delusion to believe that power in all its forms no longer remained the dominant factor in international relations. The new democratic development must be prevented from suffering setbacks which might postpone to a distant future the firm establishment of a world system based on the rule of law and general principles of justice. The final outcome thus was more imperative than temporary successes which, though rewarding, might have the opposite effect.

374. In conclusion, he attributed part of the success of the Special Committee's mission to the hospitality and generosity of the host Governments of Zambia, Tanzania, and Ethiopia, to which his delegation was deeply grateful.

375. He also expressed his delegation's thanks to the members of the Secretariat, the interpreters, the présis writers, and all the others for their indispensable assistance and untiring efforts, without which the Special Committee's work would not have been possible.

376. The representative of Poland said he would express briefly the views of his delegation on the work accomplished during the Special Committee's meetings in Africa.

377. In the opinion of the Polish delegation the Special Committee's deliberations and resolutions adopted in the three African capitals, Lusaka, Dar es Salaam and Addis Ababa, had been indeed extremely important and useful. They had proved the wisdom of the decision to have visiting sessions outside New York and no doubt marked a step forward in the performance of the task entrusted to the Committee. The meetings in Africa where the most difficult and complex problems of decolonization still existed had given the Special Committee the benefit of closer contact with Southern Rhodesia, Angola, Mozambique, so-called Portuguese Guinea, South West Africa, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland and with their people, thus placing the Committee in a much more favourable position to obtain a realistic view of the nature of the problems besetting the dependent peoples in this part of the African continent. The Special Committee had been privileged to have the views of the prominent leaders of the respective host countries and to listen to their encouraging addresses. The Polish delegations also appreciated the importance of the direct contact established during the current African tour with the OAU and its Co-ordinating Committee which advocated, as the Special Committee did in the United Nations, the immediate liquidation of colonialism and apartheid throughout Africa.

378. During the Special Committee's African session, it had listened to outstanding leaders and representatives of the national liberation movements from the Territories, where Africans were still suffering humiliation and exploitation and were subjected to all kinds of repressions and atrocities committed by the Portuguese, South African and Southern Rhodesian colonizers.

379. From all the statements heard, it would be concluded that Africa was committed to liberate by all means the enslaved part of the continent. On the other hand, the Special Committee had learnt that the discredited régimes of Salazar, Verwoerd and Smith were closing their lines and were determined to stop the liberation of Africa at the very boundaries of the area they continued to dominate and oppress. Thus its African session had enabled the Special Committee to evaluate more profoundly the dangers inherent in confrontation between Africa and its enemies.

380. The Polish delegation considered that the Special Committee was well advised to have adopted a number of recommendations for both the General Assembly and the Security Council and to have denounced the policy of colonial Powers as well as of their allies, who cynically continued to pose as defenders of the so-called free world.

381. The Polish delegation, in accordance with Poland's peace-loving foreign policy, whose basic principles were determined by solidarity and support for all other nations and peoples striving for international co-operation and progress against imperialist and colonialist forces, attached particular importance to the recognition by the Special Committee of the legitimacy of the struggle of the peoples in dependent Territories for freedom and independence. It also considered that the Special Committee should take credit for the appeal made to all States to grant moral and material support to those Africans struggling for the restoration of their inalienable rights to self-determination and independence.

382. The Polish delegation viewed the decisions adopted during the current African tour as steps taken in the right direction. Yet, it was only a beginning, for the decisions had to be implemented vigorously and without delay. Thus, the Special Committee's main task still lay ahead. The Polish delegation for its part would continue to co-operate with other members in seeking the most effective and practical means for the speedy implementation of the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) in all dependent Territories.

383. His delegation reiterated its profound appreciation to the Governments of Ethiopia, Tanzania and Zambia for their kind invitation and all the facilities they had provided the Special Committee during its stay in Africa. His delegation also expressed its warm congratulations to the Chairman on the successful conclusion of the Committee's African session, and reiterated its admiration of the Chairman's outstanding qualities and devotion to the cause of peace and progress.

384. His delegation's congratulations and thanks also went to the Vice-Chairman, Ambassador Sambath of Cambodia and to the Rapporteur, Mr. Natwar Singh of India, whose contribution to the Special Committee's work in Africa was greatly appreciated. Last but not least, he thanked the members of the Secretariat, interpreters and technical staff for their hard work and the assistance they had extended to the Special Committee.

385. The representative of the United Kingdom said that the Special Committee's tour of Africa appeared in some measure at least to have achieved the main objectives set out in the communiqué issued in New York before its departure. He hoped the Special Committee would agree that, despite the financial and political misgivings about the visit which he had expressed in New York, his delegation had co-operated and played its full part throughout the tour whenever British responsibilities were involved.

386. His Government might have views to express in due course, but in the meantime he would mention—without casting aspersions or making attacks—some impressions which had occurred to him on the tour as a whole. The Special Committee could all agree that they were sometimes divorced to some extent from reality in New York. On the other hand, he thought that in Africa the Committee had been in some danger of going to the opposite extreme, with a tendency to consider the problems before them from a rather one-sided and even distorted point of view without access to all the facts which should be taken into account. He hoped, however, that the visit had contributed in some degree to the solution of the great issues of southern Africa, and he would certainly report all that had been said in the debates to his Government.

387. If his delegation had stressed the need for patience and for peaceful solutions it was because it considered, as Members of the United Nations, that all avenues of peaceful settlement must be explored and not because it did not fully appreciate the strength of feeling existing in Africa on the subjects discussed.

388. He felt bound to refer to the remarks just made by the distinguished representative of the USSR that his Government was the champion of decolonization and self-determination, and that the United Kingdom

Government supported the perpetuation of colonialism. There was so much humbug in this attitude that he was forced to ask the Soviet representative two simple questions. First, would he tell the Special Committee of one single Non-Self-Governing Territory administered by the Soviet Union, either acquired since 1939 or inherited from the former Czarist Empire in Asia, to which his Government had granted self-determination and national independence? Secondly, did the Soviet Government really accept the principles and obligations of self-determination and of Chapter XI of the Charter in respect of the Non-Self-Governing Territories of South Sakhalin and the Kurile Islands under Soviet administration? Until these questions were answered positively he did not think the Soviet delegation should put itself forward as the champion of decolonization and self-determination in Africa, since surely the voice of Africa was sufficiently powerful to stand by itself.

389. In conclusion, he wished to repeat his delegation's gratitude to the Heads of State and Governments of Ethiopia, Zambia and Tanzania for their warm welcome and hospitality, and to pay tribute to the courtesy of the Chairman and other officers of the Special Committee, and to the admirable work of the Secretariat staff and of the many others who had contributed to the smooth running of the Committee's work.

390. The representative of Venezuela said that, for the sake of brevity, he would not attempt to evaluate the Special Committee's work in Africa or to state what conclusions the Committee should draw from its meetings. That would be the task of his eminent friend the Indian representative, the Committee's Rapporteur, in whose ability and competence he had complete confidence.

391. Before leaving the soil of Africa he wished, on behalf of the Chilean and his own delegation, to express once more his thanks to the President, Government and people of Zambia, to the President, Government and people of Tanzania and to His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I and the Government and people of Ethiopia for their invitations, welcome and magnificent hospitality which had afforded the Special Committee the inestimable opportunity not only of obtaining direct information on the colonial situation in Africa but also of making contact with the reality of that new world in ferment which was Africa today.

392. Their stay in Africa would be unforgettable and their gratitude was due to all those who made it possible and had helped to make their visit fruitful and pleasant. Thanks were due also to the Chairman for his competent direction of their meetings and their work.

393. Lastly, thanks were due to the translators and précis-writers for their co-operation in the smooth conduct of the Committee's work and especially, as far as the Spanish-speaking delegations were concerned, to the interpreters into Spanish for the hard work which had devolved upon them during the month's deliberations.

394. The Latin Americans were in complete sympathy with the aspirations of the peoples of Africa and their visit to that continent had certainly intensified that feeling.

395. The representative of Cambodia thanked His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I for inviting the Special Committee to meet in Addis Ababa. His delegation had great admiration for the courage with which the Ethiopian Government and people had fought against Mussolini's fascist Italy, and paid tribute to their continuing vigour in the struggle against colonialism.

396. The Special Committee's visit to Africa had given him an opportunity to make known the Cambodian Government's unequivocal stand against colonialism and imperialism, and to work together with his African brothers in the struggle against common enemies. There could be no compromise with colonialists and imperialists. He had listened closely to the testimony of the petitioners from Territories still subjected to the odious régimes of Smith, Salazar and Verwoerd, whose crimes against the African populations must outrage the conscience of all peace-loving and freedom-loving peoples. He had been particularly moved by the documentary film informally presented to members of the Special Committee by the freedom fighters of Portuguese Guinea, certain scenes of which had been reminiscent of the criminal acts inflicted on the helpless people of Cambodia by the imperialists and their creatures. Like the African Territories, Cambodia, too, had learned that the arms used against its people came from one country alone, a country whose representatives dared to affirm that their Government's policy was to defend peace, freedom and justice. But deeds spoke louder than words.

397. During the Special Committee's stay in Africa, it had learned that the struggle for freedom had reached a decisive phase. International peace and security were in grave danger, and the United Nations—especially the Security Council—must take immediate steps to put an end to colonial domination on the African continent. Those who had it in their power to do so, but instead refused to comply with the resolutions of the United Nations and collaborated with the fascist régimes of Smith, Salazar and Verwoerd, must bear full responsibility for present and future bloodshed.

398. The peoples of Africa and Asia were long-suffering in the face of colonist and imperialist harassment, but their pacific nature must not be misunderstood as cowardice. The Cambodian people were glad to learn that their African brothers were resolved to free the African continent once and for all, and they offered their full support in that heroic struggle. There could be no doubt of their final victory, for their cause was just.

399. The representative of Bulgaria said that in his brilliant address at the opening meeting in Addis Ababa, the Secretary-General of the OAU had stated that the Special Committee's stay in Africa must clearly mark a turning point in the methods of the world organization, because the Committee's action in visiting Africa which had raised many hopes, must be continued.

400. It was the belief of his delegation that the results of the Special Committee's work during its meetings in Africa had clearly marked the beginning of such a turning point. The Committee had adopted several important resolutions. Its main task in the months ahead, as he saw it, should be to see to it that its recommendations did not remain just another set of dead words, but that they were translated into real facts of life.

401. In the opinion of his delegation, the Special Committee's meetings in Africa had contributed to a better realization of its tasks and its place in the great process of decolonization. This process had reached a very important and difficult phase. The most die-hard colonizers and racialists in the southern part of Africa had clearly taken the course of holding on to their slave empire by all means, including military aggression. The difficulties arose mainly because of the support and assistance—military, financial and economic—which Verwoerd, Salazar and Smith were receiving from their allies and friends in the West, who cynically claimed to be the self-appointed guardians of freedom in the world.

402. Faced with this situation, the Special Committee and the United Nations as a whole were duty bound to take a course of support for the liberation movements. Having recognized the legitimacy of the struggle of the peoples in the colonial Territories for freedom and independence and having launched an appeal to all States to grant the colonial peoples the moral and material support necessary for the restoration of their inalienable rights, it was the duty of the Special Committee to work for the adoption by the United Nations of such measures as would throw the whole weight of the world Organization on the side of the peoples fighting for their liberation and would put all its resources, moral and material, in the service of the right cause of freedom and peace.

403. This could best be achieved only in close co-operation with the OAU whose prime objective was decolonization. That was why his delegation hoped that the co-operation which had been established between the Special Committee and the OAU during its stay in Africa would be further strengthened in the interests of the African peoples still languishing under the colonial yoke.

404. He expressed the gratitude of his delegation to the Governments and peoples of Zambia, Tanzania and Ethiopia for all they had done to make the Special Committee's meetings in Africa possible and fruitful. He also thanked all petitioners, representing the national liberation movements in Southern Rhodesia, the Portuguese colonies, South West Africa, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, South Africa and Aden, who had appeared before the Special Committee to tell the truth about the situation in their enslaved countries and thus help the Committee to reach correct conclusions and make the appropriate recommendations.

405. Finally, he expressed the gratitude of his delegation to the brilliant and untiring Chairman of the Special Committee, to the members of the Bureau, to the Secretariat and to all others without whose efforts the Committee's work would have been impossible.

406. The representative of Syria expressed the sincerest gratitude of his delegation to the Governments and peoples of Zambia, Tanzania and Ethiopia for their generous gesture in allowing the Special Committee to come into intimate contact with the African atmosphere of generosity, genuineness, great expectations and warmth.

407. The visit of the Special Committee was extremely fruitful in crystallizing the vivid picture of African aspirations—aspirations which were noble indeed because the African people had faith in man and societies, in their struggle for emancipation and in the restoration of their rights.

408. The Special Committee's resolutions, as the distinguished representative of the USSR had so rightly indicated, were a beginning, not the end, of action. No effort should be spared until the total disappearance of the last remnants of colonialism was achieved.

409. It was unfortunate that these resolutions, especially the resolutions contained in document A/AC.109/128/Rev.1 (see para. 463 below), had not been adopted unanimously. It was also unfortunate that the distinguished delegations who had not participated in the vote on this resolution had failed to acknowledge the efforts of the co-sponsors to gain their support. However, it was evident, throughout the Special Committee's stay in Africa that these delegations, in spite of the manner of their voting, possessed a deep sense of humanity and had been gravely shocked at the treatment meted out to Africans in the remaining areas under foreign domination. These delegations would be making a useful contribution if they would, at least, convey to their Governments and peoples these experiences.

410. The unconditional support which the delegations of the socialist countries had consistently lent to the just anti-colonialist cause deserved sincere gratitude. It was a source of comfort to find such staunch supporters for the cause of humanity. The Latin American delegations, for their part, had shown their readiness to collaborate within every possible limit. His delegation had been struck by their genuine feeling.

411. One cause for great pride was the collaboration the Special Committee had established with the OAU, on which millions of Africans pinned their hopes. The statesmanship of the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU was an illustration of the great potentialities of the African personality.

412. In conclusion, he paid tribute to the Chairman of the Special Committee, for his statesmanship, and for being the incarnation of all that was noble in the African personality. The great continent of Africa had reason to be proud of the Chairman and his colleagues. He expressed the sincere gratitude of his delegation not only to the Chairman but also to the Vice-Chairman, to the untiring Rapporteur to whom the Special Committee owed a great deal, to the Secretary of the Special Committee and to the other members of the Secretariat, including the interpreters.

413. The prayer of his delegation was that the total liberation of Africa, and indeed of all other areas of the world still under foreign domination, might be achieved very soon. Incontestably, the determination and faith of the subjugated peoples, led by their liberation movements and supported by every friend of freedom and human dignity, would carry through the struggle for freedom to a successful conclusion.

414. The representative of the USSR, exercising his right of reply, observed that the United Kingdom delegation had found it necessary on the last working day of the Special Committee's visit to try to disrupt the normal conclusion of the Committee's work by making a provocative attack on the Soviet Union. He was confident that the United Kingdom representative would not achieve his objective and that the Committee would successfully complete its work in Addis Ababa.

415. Since the United Kingdom representative had put certain questions to the Soviet delegation, he felt that he should make a brief reply in spite of the aims which the United Kingdom representative was pursuing in the present instance.

416. The United Kingdom representative had asked him whether he could tell the Committee of any Non-Self-Governing Territory to which the Soviet Union had granted self-determination or independence. The Soviet Union had never had any Non-Self-Governing Territories; hence, the question was meaningless except as provocation. Under the Constitution of the USSR the Soviet Union consisted of fifteen equal and sovereign Union Republics, each of which had the right to secede from the Union.

417. The United Kingdom representative had also asked whether the Soviet Government accepted the principles of self-determination and of Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter in respect of "the Non-Self-Governing Territories of South Sakhalin and the Kurile Islands". That question was also essentially meaningless, since South Sakhalin and the Kurile Islands, as the United Kingdom representative must know very well, had been incorporated into the Soviet Union in accordance with a decision adopted at the Potsdam Conference of the Heads of Government of the USSR, the United States and the United Kingdom. Those territories did not and could not fall in the category of Non-Self-Governing Territories. They were an integral part of the Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic, one of the fifteen sovereign Soviet Republics forming the USSR.

418. The representative of Tanzania asked the United Kingdom representative to convey to his Government the Tanzanian delegation's gratitude for the hospitality extended to the Special Committee during its stay in London on the way to Lusaka.

419. His delegation also wished to thank the OAU and in particular its Administrative Secretary-General for its valuable contribution to the Special Committee's work. The need for closer co-operation between the United Nations and the OAU was recognized on both sides, and his delegation intended to introduce a resolution to that effect at the appropriate time in New York.

420. The representative of Yugoslavia thanked the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU for his important statement. He also thanked the officers of the Special Committee, and the members of the Secretariat, for their tireless efforts to make Committee's work a success.

421. The representative of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Italian and Danish delegations, thanked the Governments of Zambia, Tanzania and Ethiopia for their kindness and hospitality to the Special Committee. He was appreciative of the opportunity the Committee had had of obtaining knowledge about the situation in Africa in a more concrete way than was possible in New York. He thanked the officers of the Special Committee, and the members of the Secretariat, for their hard work under what had often been strenuous conditions.

422. The representative of Ethiopia, reviewing the Special Committee's work in Africa, noted the adoption of five important resolutions on the questions of Southern Rhodesia, the Territories under Portuguese Administration, South West Africa, and the so-called High Commission Territories, and of a final resolution, the contents and conclusions of which reflected the aspirations of the peoples of dependent Territories concerned and indeed world public opinion.

423. The several petitioners who had appeared before the Special Committee on behalf of their peoples had expressed their determination to be free from alien subjugation, domination and exploitation. On the question of Southern Rhodesia, they had appealed to the United Kingdom Government to discharge its obligations vis-à-vis the African population of that Territory by effectively compelling the present minority Government to recognize majority rule on the basis of one man one vote. The nationalists from Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea had asked the United Nations to take effective and concrete measures towards the attainment of their inalienable rights to self-determination and independence. Identical requests had been addressed by the nationalists of South West Africa and the High Commission Territories.

424. As a founding member of the United Nations and the OAU, both of which reaffirmed faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, Ethiopia stood and would continue to stand for the immediate and total emancipation of colonial Territories from foreign rule. The contributions of Ethiopia in the General Assembly of the United Nations and its main committees, in the former United Nations Committee on South West Africa, in the Special Committee, and in the Coordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa of the OAU demonstrated Ethiopia's determination to realize the final liquidation of colonialism in dependent Territories.

425. In every international forum, the delegation of Ethiopia had insisted on the restoration of rights and privileges to colonial Territories and peoples. It was to advance the cause of colonial peoples in Africa towards a fruitful and successful end that the delegation of Ethiopia had taken the initiative of insisting that the Special Committee should visit Africa. The Committee had done everything in its power to bring to light the actual situation prevailing in Southern Rhodesia, the Territories under Portuguese Administration, South West Africa and the so-called High Commission Territories. He was confident that the appropriate organs of the United Nations would take up the recommendations of the Special Committee on each of the above-mentioned Territories on a priority basis.

426. He thanked the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU and his colleagues for their close co-operation and for helping the Special Committee in the discharge of its duties. He expressed his confidence that this co-operation would continue and that any new elements in the African colonies that might come to the notice of the OAU would be transmitted to the Chairman of the Special Committee.

427. His delegation had been honoured by the presence of the Special Committee in Addis Ababa and hoped that the Committee would continue its work of decolonization as vigorously and as urgently as possible. Time was running out in the African colonies and unless the prevailing situation was remedied by all concerned, the consequences would be far-reaching and unfortunate.

428. Referring to the twentieth anniversary of the signing of the United Nations Charter, he recalled that the signatories of the Charter had expressed determination "to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our life-time has brought untold sorrow to mankind". Perhaps more relevant to the work of the Special Committee was the declaration of the signatories that "Members of the United Nations which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government recognize the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of these territories are paramount" (Article 73). It was therefore fitting that the Chairman of the Special Committee should be attending the forthcoming twentieth anniversary celebrations in San Francisco.

429. Aware of the pressure of work during the visit of the Special Committee, he nevertheless hoped that the members of the Committee and of the Secretariat had had an enjoyable stay in Addis Ababa, and wished them pleasant trips to their respective destinations. He assured all the members once again that he would convey their messages of good wishes to His Imperial Majesty, the Government and people of Ethiopia.

430. The Chairman said that the Special Committee had exhausted the agenda for its meetings in Africa. He would therefore take the opportunity of extending sincere thanks, on behalf of all members of the Committee, to the Governments of Zambia, Tanzania and Ethiopia, not only for their kind invitations which had enabled the Committee to come to Africa, but also for all the facilities which they had made available to it. His thanks went also to the officials and all the officers of those Governments who had assisted the Special Committee with dedication and conviction throughout its work; thanks to their contribution, the Committee had been able to work in suitable conditions and to fulfil its mandate. He also wished to thank the OAU, through its Administrative Secretary-General, for its effective co-operation throughout the Special Committee's stay in Africa, and to express the Committee's support for the efforts of the Co-ordinating Committee of the OAU, whose action had strengthened and complemented that of the Special Committee. He had no doubt that more systematic relations would be established in the future between the Special Committee and the OAU, within the framework of Chapter VIII of the United Nations Charter.

431. He was sure all the members of the Special Committee would agree that its decision to visit Africa had been both fortunate and positive; the decision had been fortunate because the Committee's visit to Africa had been an expression of the interest and solidarity of the United Nations vis-à-vis peoples still under colonial domination. At the same time the decision to visit Africa had been a positive one because it had enabled the Special Committee to enter into direct contact with the peoples whose accession to independence was its mandate to hasten. Brought face to face with hard facts, the members of the Committee had come to understand the situation of African populations subjected to foreign domination. Those members of the Special Committee who had had the privilege of being spared the direct experience of the colonial system had been able, during the journey in Africa, to grasp the extent and nature of the sufferings imposed on colonized peoples.

432. They had heard irrefutable evidence of the atrocities committed by the Portuguese authorities and the white racist settlers of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. In this connexion, it was not excessive to draw particular attention to the testimony of the petitioners who had told the Special Committee that the Portuguese had burned Africans alive and cast them into rivers bound hand and foot. The violations of human rights committed by the white settlers and racists in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia had been described by the very men who were their victims. The members of the Special Committee had seen for themselves that the existence of colonial Territories or foreign racist minority régimes constituted a grave threat to the peace and security of the African continent. Members of the Committee whose countries were military allies of Portugal were certainly concerned to learn that the assistance supplied by their countries to Portugal was being used by the latter to burn African villages, and to torture children, women and old men who were often completely unaware of the reasons for these persecutions. It was to be hoped, judging by the statements made before the Special Committee following the hearing of the petitioners, that those of Portugal's military allies who did not wish to continue to share the responsibility for the crimes committed by the Salazar Government would withdraw their aid and bring to bear a more humane and more realistic influence on it.

433. The Special Committee's visit to Africa had been positive to the extent that it had enabled all its members to understand the significance and the legitimacy of the struggle waged by the African populations to regain their independence. Thus it was that in all the resolutions adopted in Africa, the Special Committee had not only affirmed the legitimacy of the struggle of peoples oppressed by colonialism and apartheid, but had also addressed an appeal to all States to extend moral and material assistance to the freedom-fighters. That was an unprecedented decision which would certainly give rise to others and entail a fundamental change in the nature of future United Nations action to eliminate colonialism and apartheid. This strengthening of United Nations dynamism in the fight against colonialism and apartheid found its justification in the effect which the petitioners' testimony had produced on the members of the Committee. That was why it was highly desirable that the Security Council, the supreme decision-making organ of the United Nations, should shortly meet in Africa when it came to discuss the problems of colonialism and apartheid so that it might itself hear the evidence which the Special Committee had gathered during its journey. The members of the Special Committee were convinced that the Security Council, wherever it met, ought to hear the representatives of the freedom-fighters during its debates on colonialism or apartheid. All the members of the Council would then be convinced that colonialism and apartheid constituted grave threats to peace and security, and they would also understand that a dynamic interpretation must be placed on Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter.

434. The Chairman was convinced that the Special Committee's report on its work in Africa would contribute to a better understanding of colonial problems. It would make clear the fact that the patience of the African peoples was exhausted, and that those who were subjected to the tyranny of the Verwoerds, Salazars and Smiths could no longer rest content with resolutions affirming principles which no one contested in theory, but which in practice remained but a distant aspiration for the peoples of Angola, Mozambique, South West Africa, Zimbabwe, so-called Portuguese Guinea, South Africa, etc. The Special Committee's report would show that there was no longer any compromise possible between the victims and the apologists of colonialism. The rights of all men were universal, and there could be no sincere friendship between peoples except on the basis of scrupulous respect for the rights of all peoples to guide their own destinies. The Special Committee's journey to Africa had been positive, for it had added to its members' knowledge of the crimes committed in Africa by the fascists and racists who did not believe in the equality of men and races.

435. The Special Committee's deliberations had also helped to point up the contradictions of the time—at a time when man was seeking to overcome the laws of gravity and conquer space, one could but be appalled to learn that human beings were still subjected to treatment more hateful than that which mankind suffered under the nazi régime. Competition or co-operation for the conquest of space had certain scientific merits, but the pooling of efforts to free man and to protect him against the forces of evil was even more meritorious.

436. The Special Committee's meetings in Africa had often been stormy, because differences of opinion had emerged among its members as to the ways and means of fulfilling its mandate. But the Chairman was convinced that the Committee would continue its efforts to eliminate the colonial system. It would succeed, for it was unthinkable that the international community should capitulate before the alliance of Salazar, Verwoerd and Smith. He thought that the members of the Special Committee could congratulate themselves on the work they had done in Africa, thanks to the important contribution of the petitioners, to whom he wished to address his thanks. He also thanked all representatives for the understanding they had shown him in his capacity as Chairman, and for the encouraging words they had addressed to him. He might not always have been able to give satisfaction to all, but he asked them to believe in the consideration he had for each of them. He wished lastly, to thank the members of the Secretariat, the translators, the interpreters and all the other officers who made their valuable contribution. The Special Committee had often kept them late hours, but the Chairman was sure they were happy to make their contribution to the cause which the Special Committee was defending.

437. He wished, lastly, once again to extend the Special Committee's very sincere thanks to his Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I and his Government for the hospitality and all the tokens of sympathy which had been shown the members since their arrival in Addis Ababa.

D. ACTION ARISING FROM THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE'S VISIT TO AFRICA

438. At the 372nd meeting of the Special Committee on 17 June 1965, the Chairman, speaking as the representative of Mali said that he had been asked by the delegations concerned to place before the Special Committee a draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.219) sponsored by Cambodia, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, the United Republic of Tanzania and Yugoslavia. The purpose of the draft resolution, he stated, was to draw the attention of the General Assembly, the Security Council and world opinion to the grave situation prevailing in part of the African continent. In so doing, the sponsors had had in mind General Assembly resolution 1810 (XVII), which invited the Special Committee to apprise the Security Council of any developments in the Territories within its purview which might threaten international peace and security.

439. The sponsors of the draft resolution were convinced that the Portuguese Government's alliance with South Africa and the illegal authorities of Southern Rhodesia with a view to oppressing the African populations created a very dangerous situation. The members of the Special Committee would recall that at Lusaka, at Dar es Salaam and, finally, at Addis Ababa, their attention had been drawn to the threats of military and economic reprisals which the Governments of Portugal and South Africa and the illegal authorities of Southern Rhodesia were directing at the independent African States adjacent to Non-Self-Governing Territories.

440. The Special Committee's visit to Africa would enable it better to inform world opinion of the situation prevailing in the Territories under consideration and the sponsors of the draft resolution felt it was necessary to give proper publicity to the Special Committee's meetings in Africa in view of the importance of the petitioners' testimony. For the goal of the sponsors was to act in such a way that the Governments of Portugal, South Africa and the illegal fascist authorities of Southern Rhodesia, which were defying the United Nations and ignoring the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council, were isolated and deprived of their means of oppression.

441. Having drawn lessons from what they had seen and heard in Africa, the sponsors wished to place before the Special Committee a draft resolution proposing dynamic measures to the General Assembly and the Security Council designed to put an end to colonialism and apartheid, those two major causes of international tension. But, in a concern to win the support of other delegations, the sponsors had mastered their emotions and agreed to submit a compromise text to the Special Committee. In the eyes of the sponsors, the Special Committee's journey to Africa had enabled delegations to arrive at a more realistic appreciation of the misdeeds of colonialism and the dangers which it represented. That was why they felt that their text should command the unanimous support of the Special Committee. He then read out the draft resolution.

442. The representative of Italy said that, because of the nature and length of the draft resolution just submitted, his delegation would have to seek instructions from its Government, and a reply could not be expected within less than forty-eight hours. In the circumstances, it would seem to him that the Special Committee had three alternative courses of action: to defer a decision on the draft resolution until it met in New York; to decide to meet again in Addis Ababa on the following Monday; or to proceed to an immediate vote without the participation of the Italian delegation.

443. At the 373rd meeting, the representative of the United States, referring to the draft resolution, said that, until then, it had been his delegation's understanding that the Special Committee's presence in Africa had two main objectives: first, to enable the Special Committee to hear petitioners from each of the four Territories or groups of Territories on its agenda, thus permitting each delegation to update its appraisal of the situation there; and second, to pass resolutions dealing with each of those four items. His delegation had acquiesced in the latter, although feeling that the time available for evaluation of such new information as had been furnished by the petitioners had been undesirably brief. The Special Committee had carried out both those functions, within the time allotted.

444. It had further been the understanding of his Government that the Special Committee's African mission would terminate on 18 June, the day on which they were then meeting; on that basis, assignment of personnel to other important functions had been made and could not now be changed. Yet at the very last minute, the Special Committee was faced with a new draft resolution which, while purporting to summarize the results of its work in Africa, did not come under any of the agenda items it had been considering. The submission of that omnibus draft resolution presented his delegation with an impossible situation, for it would not have time to study the draft, formulate recommendations to its Government or to receive instructions in regard to it. His delegation would therefore be unable to participate in the discussion on the draft, except to exercise its right of reply, or in any vote which might be taken.

445. His delegation had no objection to an attempt, at the proper time, to achieve a Committee view of the over-all significance of its African experience. But that could be best deferred until the Committee returned to New York.

446. The representative of Tunisia said that he would like to draw the attention of the members of the Special Committee to the fact that the sponsors of the draft resolution had made strenuous efforts to arrive at a text which would meet with the unanimous approval of the members of the Committee precisely because it was a special draft resolution, the aim of which was to combine in one text certain general points which were not controversial. In view of the spirit in which the draft resolution had been drawn up, and the numerous concessions which had been made by the sponsors, he appealed to all members of the Committee to give the draft resolution their unanimous support.

447. The representative of Australia expressed regret that his delegation would not have enough time to study the draft resolution or to obtain instructions from his Government. His delegation had been given the impression that the Special Committee's meetings would be concluded on 18 June and had even begun preparation of its report on the Committee's work. In the circumstances his delegation would be unable to participate in the consideration of, or the vote on, the draft resolution.

448. The representative of Denmark declared that a draft of such a wide scope as presented in the draft resolution should not be rushed through the Committee. Not having been given sufficient time to consult his Government for instructions, his delegation could not participate in the vote.

449. The representative of the USSR said that the general draft resolution submitted for the Special Committee's consideration by the Afro-Asian group and Yugoslavia concerning the implementation in the Portuguese colonies, Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, Bechuanaland, Basutoland and Swaziland of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, was undoubtedly the fruit of considerable efforts on the part of its sponsors to summarize the political results of the discussions which had taken place during the Committee's visit to Africa. The draft contained important provisions of principle directed towards the immediate implementation of the Declaration in regard to the colonial Territories of Africa. The Soviet delegation supported the basic provisions of the draft resolution and would vote for it.

450. It should be noted that different points of view had been expressed on the draft resolution. There was nothing surprising about that. The fact that an overwhelming majority of delegations had declared their support for the draft was cause for satisfaction. The United States representative, however, had refused to give his views on the basic provisions of the draft, stating that he had not had time to consider it. That was nothing more than a clumsy colonialist manoeuvre.

No less absurd was the Australian representative's statement that he was already preparing a report on the results of the Special Committee's work and was therefore unable to start considering the draft resolution which had been submitted. And the Italian representative, who the previous day had expressed concern that the Committee might not be able to complete its work today had simply "voted with his feet" and failed to appear at the Special Committee's meeting.

451. Similar actions by the representatives of the NATO States merely revealed their desire to prevent at any price the successful conclusion of the Committee's work. But they would fail in their attempt. His delegation was convinced that the overwhelming majority of delegations would vote for the joint draft resolution and thereby make a further contribution to the work accomplished by the Special Committee during its African visit.

452. The representative of the United States, in exercise of the right of reply, said that the United States position on the Territories which had been under study by the Special Committee during its session in Africa was well known and that it was not for the Soviet delegate to explain the reasons behind his delegation's voting records.

453. He further said that the absence of the Italian delegate did not mean the latter's lack of interest in the work of the Special Committee, but that he had other duties to perform which required his presence elsewhere. Therefore, he did not think that it was for the Soviet delegate to suggest hidden meanings as to the absence of the Italian delegate.

454. As regards the term "voting with one's feet", which he understood the Soviet delegate to have used with reference to the distinguished representative of Italy, this was a term which had been most often applied to describe the only ballot box available to the people of East Germany who had so eloquently voted by fleeing in thousands until the erection of the wall in Berlin.

455. At the 373rd meeting, on 18 June 1965, a number of revisions were made to the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.219) by the representative of India, speaking on behalf of the sponsors.

456. At the same meeting, the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.219) was adopted by 15 votes to none, with no abstentions.

457. The representative of Venezuela said that the thirteen-Power draft resolution not only contained conclusions of a general nature but raised questions of substance on which he would have to seek fresh instructions from his Government. Since it was physically impossible to receive such instructions in time, his delegation had had no alternative but to refrain from participating in the vote.

458. The representative of the United Kingdom said that he had had no opportunity to obtain instructions from his Government on the resolution in the very short time available since its circulation. Moreover the resolution referred, among other matters, to Rhodesia. His delegation could not accept the validity or accuracy of many of the references to Rhodesia in the resolution. In view of his Government's well-known position regarding the competence of the United Nations to discuss or make recommendations about Rhodesia, and also since he was without instructions on the other matters involved, his delegation had not participated in the vote on this resolution.

459. The representative of Chile said that, in explaining their votes, the countries which had not participated had given the same reason for that decision, namely, that they had not had time to consult their respective Governments. The Chilean delegation thought it necessary to make a statement to the same effect, namely, that it deeply regretted not having taken part in the vote on the draft resolution which concerned the Committee's general activities during its visit to Africa and in which a series of measures for future action were suggested.

460. It was the lack of time for consulting its Government which had prevented the Chilean delegation from participating in the vote on the draft resolution.

461. In his delegation's opinion, the draft resolution should have been submitted for the Committee's consideration on its return to New York, so that all the States members of the Special Committee could have had an opportunity to study it with the attention that it deserved. Its contents were too important for it to have been put to the vote in the hasty way in which that had been done.

462. He asked that his statement should appear in full in the records.

463. The text of the resolution concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to Southern Rhodesia, Territories under Portuguese administration, South West Africa, and Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland (A/AC.109/128/Rev.1), adopted by the Special Committee at its 373rd meeting on 18 June 1965, reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having held meetings from 25 May 1965 to 18 June 1965 successively at Lusaka, the capital of Zambia, at Dar es Salaam, the capital of the United Republic of Tanzania, and at Addis Ababa, the capital of Ethiopia, and having heard the spokesmen of the Governments of those countries,

"Noting the concern expressed by the Governments of the independent States of Africa bordering on the Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"Noting with particular concern that, according to the evidence submitted by the petitioners, efforts are being made by the Government of South Africa for the installation of military bases, the production of poisonous gas and preparations for the manufacture of atomic weapons,

"2. Recommends that the General Assembly and the Security Council, each acting within its own competence, should take the positive measures laid down in the Charter with a view to:

"(a) Ensuring respect for the rights of the African populations in the region and in particular their rights to self-determination and independence, and putting an end to the dangerous activities of the Portuguese and South African Governments and of the minority settler régime of Southern Rhodesia,

"(b) Strengthening the confidence which the peoples under colonial domination place in the United Nations;

"3. Requests the Secretary-General of the United Nations to make all the measures necessary to publicize the work of the Special Committee as widely as possible, so that world opinion may be sufficiently informed concerning the grave threats to peace constituted by colonialism and apartheid;

"4. Requests all States to publicize the report of the Special Committee by all the means at their disposal so that all peoples may be informed of the atrocities committed by the Governments of Portugal and South Africa and the minority settler régime of Southern Rhodesia;

"5. Requests further all States and all international institutions to refuse assistance of any kind to the Governments of Portugal and South Africa and the minority settler régime of Southern Rhodesia, so long as the latter fail to renounce their policy of colonial domination and the practice of apartheid;

"6. Draws the attention of the Commission on Human Rights to the evidence submitted by the petitioners respecting the violations of human rights committed in the Territories under Portuguese administration, in South West Africa and in Southern Rhodesia;

"7. Expresses its satisfaction that its visit to Africa has enabled it to obtain a more thorough knowledge of the colonial issue and has strengthened its determination to achieve the elimination of colonialism throughout the world as rapidly as possible;

"8. Expresses its pleasure at the participation of the Organization of African Unity in its work in Africa and hopes that the co-operation thus established between the two organizations with regard to decolonization will be intensified in the future."

464. At the 373rd meeting of the Special Committee, the representative of India introduced a draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.222) sponsored by Australia, Bulgaria, Cambodia, Chile, Denmark, India, Iran, Iraq, Italy, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United States of America, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, by which the Special Committee would express its appreciation to the Governments and people of Zambia, the United Republic of Tanzania and Ethiopia for inviting the Special Committee to hold meetings at their respective capitals and for offering members their hospitality.

465. Introducing the draft resolution, the representative of India said that the Special Committee's visit to Africa had been extremely valuable. It had had the honour of being received by the Heads of State of the three host countries, whose interest in the Committee's work was a source of great inspiration. It had heard many petitioners. Lastly, the Committee's links with the Organization of African Unity had been further strengthened, to the benefit of all. He thanked the officers of the Committee, and the members of the Secretariat, for the efforts they had made to ensure the success of the Committee's work.

466. In conclusion, he had pleasure in submitting a draft resolution thanking the Governments of the three countries in whose capitals the Committee had held meetings. The resolution was co-sponsored by all delegations except those of Ethiopia and Tanzania, two of the host countries.

467. At the same meeting the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.222) was adopted by acclamation. The text of the resolution (A/AC.109/129) thus adopted reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having met from 25 May 1965 to 18 June 1965 successively at Lusaka, the capital of Zambia, at Dar es Salaam, the capital of the United Republic of Tanzania, and at Addis Ababa, the capital of Ethiopia, and having heard the spokesmen of their Governments,

"Expresses its profound gratitude to the Governments and people of Zambia, the United Republic of Tanzania and Ethiopia for inviting the Committee to hold meetings in their capital cities and for offering to the members of the Committee their generous and kind hospitality."

APPENDIX I

Communiqué issued on 14 May 1965 by the Chairman on behalf of the Special Committee

The Governments of Ethiopia, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia extended to the Special Committee invitations to hold some of its meetings in 1965 in their respective capitals, Addis Ababa, Dar es Salaam and Lusaka.

The Special Committee was highly appreciative of these invitations and decided at its meeting on 4 May 1965 to accept them. The Committee consequently decided to hold its meetings in the three African capitals during the period 20 May to 20 June 1965.

The Special Committee's decision to meet in Africa was taken in the context of operative paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) which, in establishing the Special Committee, authorized it to meet elsewhere than at United Nations Headquarters whenever and wherever such meetings may be required for the effective discharge of its functions in consultation with the appropriate authorities.

In deciding to proceed to Africa, the Special Committee was especially guided by the fact that it is in Africa that the largest number of people living under foreign domination, as well as the most difficult and serious colonial problems, are to be found. Indeed, the Special Committee notes with regret that despite numerous General Assembly resolutions, little progress could be recorded in the total and peaceful application of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Nearly twenty years after the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, millions of human beings still live under colonial rule, which is but a disguised form of slavery.

The Special Committee is aware of the importance of manifesting the most active solidarity of the international community with peoples who are struggling under difficult conditions to regain their inalienable rights.

The Special Committee is also convinced that by establishing direct contact with peoples under colonial domination, in the context of the realities of their everyday life, it will acquire a deeper knowledge of the situation and of the aspirations of these peoples. The Committee is certain that it will thus be in a more favourable position to understand and, therefore, to assist these peoples in their struggle for independence. In the opinion of the Special Committee, the visit to Africa will demonstrate not only the concern of the United Nations with the destiny of colonial peoples, but it would make it easier for representatives of nationalist movements, who would otherwise find it impossible to travel to New York, to appear before the Committee and to express their views concerning their country's future and their own destiny.

The tentative programme of the Special Committee's meetings in Africa is as follows:

Lusaka, Zambia, between 23 and 29 May 1965.

Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, between 30 May and 11 June 1965.

Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, 11 June to 18 June 1965.

In addition to the hearing of petitioners, the items on the agenda of the Special Committee for these meetings will include the following:

- (a) Territories under Portuguese Administration;
- (b) Question of South West Africa;
- (c) Basutoland, Bachuanaland and Swaziland;
- (d) Question of Southern Rhodesia.

CHAPTER XIII

MAURITIUS, SEYCHELLES AND ST. HELENA

A. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORIES

Introduction

1. Information on Mauritius, the Seychelles and St. Helena is contained in the report of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its nineteenth session (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XIV, paras. 1-99). Supplementary information is set out below.<sup>1</sup>

1. MauritiusGeneral

2. The population of Mauritius was estimated at 713,381 at the beginning of 1964, as against 681,619 in July 1962. The present population density is estimated at over 1,000 per square mile. The high rate of population increase continues to pose a problem for the island.

3. In the past, all persons of Indian origin have been classified in the census statistics as "Indo-Mauritians". Since 1 September 1964, officials have been instructed that this classification is no longer to be applied to Muslims. The population of Indian origin is estimated at half a million, nearly a quarter of whom are Muslims.

Political and constitutional developments

4. As reported by the representative of the United Kingdom during the last session of the Special Committee, the second stage of constitutional advance, planned in 1961, was brought into effect on 12 March 1964. The leader of the majority in the Legislative Assembly, Dr. Ramgoolam of the Labour Party, was designated as Premier. The new Council of Ministers was formed of representatives of all the political parties in the following way: six ministers from the Labour Party (including the Premier); three from the Parti Mauri-cien Social Démocrate; two from the Independent Forward Bloc; two from the Muslim Committee of Action; and one independent.

<sup>1</sup> The information presented in this chapter has been derived from published reports, and from the information transmitted to the Secretary-General by the United Kingdom under Article 73 e of the United Nations Charter, on 22 June 1964 (Mauritius), 14 September 1964 (Seychelles) and 12 June 1964 (St. Helena).

5. The date of the next constitutional talks on the political progress of the Territory was discussed during the negotiations on the formation of an all-party Government. It was then agreed that these talks would be held during the third year of the life of the present legislature, namely during the twelve months beginning 22 October 1965.

6. In November 1964, the deputy leader of the Parti Mauricien Social Démocrate, Mr. Gaëtan Duval, reportedly had talks in London with Mr. Anthony Greenwood, the new Secretary of State for the Colonies, following which he declared that the date of the future talks on the constitutional development of Mauritius would not be advanced without the agreement of his party. On the other hand, the Premier, Dr. Ramgoolam, proposed to the other ministers in the Government on 30 December that they should immediately begin discussions in order to draw up the main lines of negotiation with the United Kingdom.

7. The Secretary of State for the Colonies visited the Territory from 5 to 11 April 1965, and had talks with Government ministers and leaders of political parties about economic and political problems and the future of the island. On his return to London he expressed the hope that it would be possible to have a conference in London later in 1965 at which all outstanding constitutional problems could be discussed.

8. Large demonstrations and mass rallies were organized by the major political parties during the visit of Mr. Greenwood to the Territory, some in support of integration with the United Kingdom and some for independence. Tension and the threat of public disorder is reported to have led the Police Commissioner, on 16 April, to ban all public processions and meetings for two weeks. On 1 May, clashes occurred between the partisans of the two main political parties in the capital and other areas of the island. On 13 May, it was announced that British troops would be flown into Mauritius to help maintain law and order. The next day a state of emergency was declared by the Governor.

9. It is reported that a round-table conference of leaders of political parties is to be convened shortly by the Governor.

10. The two principal political parties are the Labour Party and the Parti Mauricien Social Démocrate (previously the Parti Mauricien). The Labour Party has expressed its belief that the Territory should become an independent nation within the Commonwealth rather than conclude an association with the United Kingdom or another independent African country. The Parti Mauricien Social Démocrate is the main "Opposition" party, although it has joined in the All-Party Government of Mauritius. While stressing the need to solve the economic and social problems of Mauritius before its final status is decided, the party has favoured "close and effective union" with the United Kingdom in the future.

11. Other political parties include the Independent Forward Bloc, the Muslim Committee of Action (allied to the Labour Party), the Peoples Progressive Party, the Tamil United Party (allied to the Parti Mauricien Social Démocrate) and the Muslim Democratic League.

Economic conditions

12. The total production of sugar in 1963 amounted to 685,500 metric tons, compared with 532,518 tons in 1962 and 553,259 tons in 1961. With the exception of some 26,500 tons consumed locally, the whole of the production was exported, mainly to the United Kingdom. The quota of sugar for Mauritius exportable under the terms of the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement amounted to 351,750 tons. The price was £46.0.10d. per long ton.

13. Tea production amounted to 3,256,891 pounds in 1963, compared with 2,799,627 pounds in 1962. In 1961 the Mauritius Government had introduced a five-year tea development programme which aimed at planting 2,500 acres of tea by mid-1965. The total acreage was estimated at 5,600 acres in 1963. A Tea Control Board was set up to regulate the tea industry. Nearly two thirds of the 1963 crop was exported.

14. In 1963, the value of imports amounted to Rs.333,116,292<sup>2</sup> and that of exports to Rs.427,782,619. Approximately 28 per cent of all imports originated from the United Kingdom (32.4 per cent in 1961) and 69 per cent of exports were directed there (82 per cent in 1961). The principal export items were sugar (574,300 tons), molasses (109,770 tons), rum (326 hectolitres) and tea (987 tons).

15. Ordinary recurrent revenue for the year ended 30 June 1963 was Rs.162,819,688, compared with Rs.154,565,508 in the previous year. Recurrent expenditure amounted to Rs.167,946,018 and Rs.156,045,487 respectively. Capital expenditure in 1963 amounted to Rs.64,109,150.

16. The Reconstruction and Development Programme, 1960-1965, envisaged a total expenditure of Rs.354 million. Actual total expenditure at 30 June 1963 was Rs.161,891,228, of which Rs.64.11 million were spent during 1962-1963, Rs.52.05 million during 1961-1962 and Rs.45.73 million during 1960-1961.

17. In addition to low-cost housing, major projects included the construction of new harbour installations at Port Louis, the development of the international airport at Plaisance, the construction of a new trunk road between Port Louis and Phoenix, improvement of other roads, bridges and sewerage systems and the provision of services such as electricity, irrigation and domestic water supplies. Substantial allocations (Rs.25 million) were also made for loans towards the development of secondary industries and agricultural diversification.

18. Under the Government's declared policy of expanding the tourist industry, a sum of Rs.1,645,560 has been provided in the Capital Expenditure programme for the development of hotels. A Tourist Advisory Board advises the Ministry of Industry, Commerce and External Communications on all matters connected with tourism.

19. Technical assistance reportedly was offered by the Government of India to Mauritius when the Premier and other ministers of Mauritius visited India in January 1965. An Indian expert on the textile industry was to visit the Territory to study the possibility of introducing this industry.

<sup>2</sup> One Mauritius rupee is equivalent to 1s.6d. sterling; 1 million rupees to £70,000 sterling.

Social conditionsLabour

20. Unemployment is a major problem in Mauritius. The census of 1962 showed that over 10,000 wage-earners were unemployed. In addition, the total number of persons above the age of fifteen who had left school but had never worked amounted to approximately 12,600. The number of unemployed in 1964 was reported to be relatively higher owing to a low sugar crop.

21. During the first six months of the year which constitute the intercrop period for the sugar industry, the large sugar estates decrease their labour force by some 4,600 persons. In addition, a large number of agricultural labourers are normally laid off by individual planters at the completion of the harvest. In order partially to offset the effects of seasonal employment in the sugar industry, an ordinance was passed by the Legislative Council in November 1963 whereby persons who have worked with an employer for not less than 80 per cent of his harvest period are entitled to work with that employer on every working day until the following harvest. Workers with between 70 and 80 per cent attendance during that period are entitled to intercrop employment to a proportionate amount.

22. The total number of workers employed by the sugar millers' estates in March 1963 was 35,924 (including administrative, technical, skilled and unskilled labourers); in September the number rose to 42,722.

23. Simultaneously, with the slack period in the sugar industry, a considerable reduction occurs in the labour force employed on the docks and in shipping. The unemployment situation in Mauritius has led to a growing demand for emigration, principally to the United Kingdom. In 1963, a total of 1,007 applications were transmitted by the Employment Service to the Ministry of Labour in the United Kingdom, as against 249 in the previous year. The number of those whose applications for employment in the United Kingdom were granted was 305.

Public health

24. Expenditure on public health for the financial year 1962-1963 amounted to Rs.18,252,206, or roughly 10.8 per cent of the total budget. In the previous year, expenditure on health had amounted to Rs.17,426,996.

25. Deaths from tuberculosis numbered 108 in 1963, compared with 69 in 1962 and 75 in 1961. Infant mortality in 1963 was 59.3 per thousand, compared with 60.1 in 1962, and 62.0 in 1961. This decline in infant mortality started in 1946 and is attributed to improved public health conditions.

Educational conditions

26. The number of children of school age from the ages of five and six to eleven and twelve was estimated at 167,300 in 1963. The number of students enrolled in primary schools increased from 119,160 in 1962 to 120,049 in 1963, although actual attendance decreased from 102,652 to 96,786. This was attributed to the agricultural nature of Mauritian society. The number of students in secondary schools increased from 26,861 in 1962 to 28,134 in 1963. Students in the Teachers' Training College numbered 567 during the school year 1963-1964, against 575 during the previous year. The number of teachers who completed the two-year course in 1963 was 313. There were approximately 1,075

Mauritian students studying abroad in institutions of higher education.

27. The total number of primary schools in 1963 was 325, of which 129 were Government schools, 73 were subsidized and 123 were private schools. Of the secondary schools four were Government schools, thirteen were subsidized and 93 were private. Five new schools were to be opened by the Government at the beginning of 1965, according to unofficial sources. Plans were also being made for the creation of "The University College of Mauritius" from Colonial Development and Welfare Funds.

28. Six scholarships are awarded annually by the Mauritian Government to the best students from secondary schools for higher education overseas. Fifteen scholarships are awarded to Mauritian students under the Commonwealth Scholarship Plan and Teacher Training Scheme. Scholarships are also granted by various foreign Governments and institutions.

29. Actual recurrent expenditure on education amounted to Rs.22,785,860 in the financial year 1962-1963, compared with Rs.20,655,161 during the previous year. Capital expenditure on education amounted to Rs.2,839,664.

CHAPTER XXVI

INFORMATION ON NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER OF THE UNITED NATIONS AND RELATED QUESTIONS

1. By its resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, the General Assembly dissolved the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and, inter alia, requested the Special Committee to study the information transmitted to the Secretary-General in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter and to take it fully into account in examining the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

2. It will be recalled that in a note (A/AC.109/L.97) dated 14 February 1964, the Secretary-General drew the attention of the Special Committee to the above-mentioned resolution and made suggestions concerning the procedures which the Special Committee might wish to follow. The procedures set out in the note were approved by the Special Committee at its 315th meeting on 17 November 1964.

3. In compliance with the provisions of operative paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 1970 (XVIII) and in accordance with the procedures approved by the Special Committee at its 315th meeting, the latest information transmitted by the Administering Members under Article 73 e of the Charter was used in the preparation of the working papers by the Secretariat on most of the Territories for the Special Committee. This information was taken into account by the Committee in its consideration of the Territories concerned and is reflected in the chapter of the Special Committee's report dealing with each of these Territories.

4. At its 383rd and 385th meetings, held on 7 and 15 September 1965, the Special Committee considered a report by the Secretary-General (see appendix to this chapter) on the information which had been transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter up to 7 September 1965<sup>1</sup> and on the action which had been taken in implementation of General Assembly resolution 1970 (XVIII).

5. In the course of the debate at the 383rd meeting on 7 September 1965, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said he wished once again to voice his strong disapproval of the continued failure of the United Kingdom to transmit information on Southern Rhodesia under Article 73 e of the Charter. He expressed disappointment at the United Kingdom explanation that in its view Southern Rhodesia was not a Non-Self-Governing Territory. This attitude showed a complete disregard of world opinion and of the opinion of the Special Committee. He hoped that the United Kingdom delegation would transmit the required information very soon.

6. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that a thorough knowledge of the political, constitutional, economic, social and cultural conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, made possible by the transmission of objective, specific and up-to-date information, enabled the members of the Committee, and all States Members of the United Nations, to help towards the attainment of independence by all colonial countries and peoples. He was compelled to note with great regret, however, that some administering Powers were violating the provision of the Charter which required all colonial Powers to transmit information on conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration. Portugal was a case in point: it continued to blatantly violate General Assembly resolution 1542 (XV) and the numerous other United Nations decisions on the question of the Portuguese colonies. It was waging a savage colonial war against the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea with the political, economic and military assistance of its NATO allies. The same was true of the United Kingdom, which, as the representative of Tanzania had just pointed out, refused to transmit information on the Non-Self-Governing Territory of Southern Rhodesia, in violation of General Assembly resolution 1747 (XVI). It was the duty of the Special Committee to draw attention to those violations of the United Nations Charter and to appeal once again to those colonial Powers to submit the required information on the Territories under their administration.

7. Furthermore, an analysis of the information on the political and constitutional development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories that had been transmitted in recent years showed that the administering Powers were placing every possible restraint on the process of political development in those Territories, in contravention of the principles of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The information gave no indication of the specific steps, the dates and methods contemplated for bringing a Territory to independence, whereas not only the Special Committee but above all the people concerned were entitled to know those facts.

8. The sections dealing with economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories were also unsatisfactory: they included no data on the actual standard of living of the indigenous population, on salaries and purchasing power, on the steps the administering Power proposed to take in order to raise the standards of living, on the enormous profits made by foreign monopolies through the exploitation of the indigenous population or on unemployment and measures to eliminate it. The Special Committee should take a decisive stand against this inadmissible practice and should request the administering Powers to transmit information which would enable a definite idea to be formed of the standard of living of the people, their participation in the economic life of the country and the steps taken by the administering Power to raise the country's economic level.

9. Similarly, the information on social conditions, health and education lacked objectivity and was designed to conceal from the members of the Special Committee the real conditions in the Territories. This had been demonstrated on many occasions, the most recent example being that of the petitioners from the Bahamas, who described the deplorable educational conditions, so different from the optimistic picture painted by the United Kingdom.

10. Thus, the picture of conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was distorted and important details were left out, with the result that the members of the Committee were misinformed and unable to assess the situation objectively. In that connexion, he referred to the information transmitted by the United Kingdom on the elections held in November 1962 for the House of Assembly of the Bahamas and the details given by the petitioners, which had cast a very different light on the results of those elections.

11. The Soviet Union delegation wished to point out that the information transmitted by the colonial Powers constituted virtually the only source of information made available to the members of the Special Committee by the United Nations Secretariat. It was obvious that, in so far as the information provided by the colonial Powers did not provide a comprehensive and objective picture of conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the data provided by the Secretariat suffered from the same defect. In order to correct that serious defect, the Secretariat could and should draw liberally on other sources of information such as the statements of petitioners, written petitions, economic and social studies, surveys and similar material.

12. At its 385th meeting on 13 September 1965, the Special Committee took note of the report of the Secretary-General which it decided to include in its report to the General Assembly. This document appears as an appendix to the present chapter.

13. At the same meeting, the Special Committee decided without objection to transmit to the General Assembly the information contained in the working papers prepared by the Secretariat on the Territories which it might be unable to consider before the closing of its meetings in 1965. This information, which is included in separate chapters of the present report, was to be considered as supplementary to the relevant chapters of the Special Committee's report to the General Assembly covering its work during 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1).

APPENDIX*

Information on Non-Self-Governing Territories Transmitted Under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: Report of the Secretary-General

TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

1. The Secretary-General's previous report on this subject (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. II, appendix II) listed the dates on which information was transmitted to the Secretary-General under Article 73 e of the Charter up to 30 November 1964. The table at the end of the present report shows the dates on which such information was transmitted in respect of the years 1963 and 1964.

2. The information transmitted under Article 73 e follows in general the standard form approved by the General Assembly and includes information on geography, history, population, economic, social and educational conditions. In the case of Territories under the administration of Australia, New Zealand and the United States of America, the annual reports of the Territories, which also include information on constitutional matters, were transmitted. Additional information on political and constitutional developments in Territories under their administration was also given by the representatives of Australia, New Zealand, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States of America during meetings of the Special Committee.

3. No information has been transmitted to the Secretary-General concerning Territories under Portuguese administration, which, by resolution 1542 (XV) of 15 December 1960, the General Assembly considered were Non-Self-Governing Territories within the meaning of Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter. Nor has the Secretary-General received information concerning Southern Rhodesia which, the Assembly affirmed by resolution 1747 (XVI) of 28 June 1962, was a Non-Self-Governing Territory within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter.

4. In compliance with the provisions of operative paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, which requested the Special Committee to study the information transmitted under Article 73 e, and in accordance with the procedure approved by the Special Committee in 1964, the Secretariat has continued to use the information transmitted in the preparation of working papers on each Territory for the Special Committee.

ANNEXES

Annex I

LETTER DATED 26 AUGUST 1965 FROM THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

I have the honour to enclose a calendar of constitutional advance covering the main developments in the United Kingdom dependent Territories from November 1964 to July 1965.

This calendar brings up to date the calendar enclosed with Mr. King's letter of 20 October 1964, reproduced as annex I to the report to the General Assembly of the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (A/5800/Rev.1).

The calendar again provides a record of continued constitutional progress in the Territories for which the United Kingdom is responsible. In particular, the Gambia, with a population of about 316,000 achieved full independence in February 1965.

I have the honour to request that this letter and the enclosed calendar be circulated to members of the Committee as a Committee document, and also that they form part of our further report to the General Assembly.

(Signed) F. D. W. BROWN

This report covers the work of the Special Committee during 1966.

Accept, Sir, the assurances of my highest consideration.

Chairman

His Excellency U Thant
Secretary-General

CHAPTER I*

ESTABLISHMENT, ORGANIZATION AND ACTIVITIES OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

A. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

1. The General Assembly, at its fifteenth session, by resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, adopted * Previously issued under the symbol A/6300 (part I).

the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

2. At its sixteenth session, the General Assembly considered the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and adopted resolution 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961, by which it established a Special Committee of seventeen members to examine the application of the Declaration, to make suggestions and recommendations on the progress and extent of the implementation of the Declaration, and to report to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session. The Special Committee was directed "to carry out its task by employment of all means which it will have at its disposal within the framework of the procedures and modalities which it shall adopt for the proper discharge of its functions".

3. At its seventeenth session the General Assembly, following its consideration of the report of the Special Committee,<sup>1</sup> adopted resolution 1810 (XVII) of 17 December 1962, by which it enlarged the Special Committee by the addition of seven new members. It invited the Special Committee "to continue to seek the most suitable ways and means for the speedy and total application of the Declaration to all territories which have not yet attained independence".

4. At the same session, the General Assembly, in its resolution 1805 (XVII) of 14 December 1962 on the question of South West Africa, requested the Special Committee to discharge, mutatis mutandis, the tasks assigned to the Special Committee for South West Africa by resolution 1702 (XVI). By resolution 1806 (XVII) of 14 December 1962, the General Assembly decided to dissolve the Special Committee for South West Africa.

5. The General Assembly, at its eighteenth session, following its consideration of the report of the Special Committee,<sup>2</sup> adopted resolution 1956 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963. In this resolution, it requested the Special Committee "to continue to seek the best ways and means for the immediate and total application of the Declaration to all territories which have not yet attained independence, and to report to the General Assembly not later than at its nineteenth session".

6. At the same session, the General Assembly, in its resolution 1899 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963 on the question of South West Africa, requested the Special Committee to continue its efforts with a view to discharging the tasks assigned to it by resolution 1805 (XVII).

7. The General Assembly at the same session, by resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, decided to dissolve the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and requested the Special Committee to study the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations. It also requested the Special Committee to take this information fully into account in examining the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration in each of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and to undertake any special study and prepare any special report it might consider necessary.

8. At its nineteenth session, the General Assembly was unable to consider the report of the Special Committee on its work during 1964.<sup>3</sup> The Special Committee, however, continued to discharge its mandate during 1965 in the context of the declaration made by the President at the 1330th plenary meeting of the General Assembly at its nineteenth session, on 18 February 1965, to the effect that the General Assembly should for its own official records note that reports relating, inter alia, to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples had in fact been received and that those bodies which had continuing responsibilities such as the Special Committee should continue to function, subject to the agreed budgetary limits for 1965.

9. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly, following its consideration of the reports of the Special Committee for 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1)<sup>4</sup> and 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1),<sup>5</sup> adopted resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965. The text of this resolution is reproduced below:

"The General Assembly,

"Recalling the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, contained in its resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, and its resolutions 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961, 1810 (XVII) of 17 December 1962 and 1956 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963,

"Recalling also its resolutions 1805 (XVII) of 14 December 1962 and 1899 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963 by which it assigned to the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples tasks relating to South West Africa, and its resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963 by which it entrusted to the Special Committee additional functions relating to information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations,

"Having considered the reports prepared by the Special Committee for the years 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1) and 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1),

"Noting with deep regret that five years after the adoption of the Declaration many Territories are still under colonial domination,

"Deploring the negative attitude of certain colonial Powers, and in particular the unacceptable attitude of the Governments of Portugal and South Africa, which refuse to recognize the right of colonial peoples to independence,

"Concerned about the policy of colonial Powers to circumvent the rights of colonial peoples through the promotion of the systematic influx of foreign immigrants and the dislocation, deportation and transfer of the indigenous inhabitants,

"Noting the action taken and envisaged by the Special Committee regarding the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable,

"Deploring further the attitude of certain States which, despite the resolutions of the General Assembly and of the Special Committee, continue to co-operate with the Governments of Portugal and South Africa and even to provide them with aid which is being used by the two Governments to intensify the repression of the oppressed African populations.

At the 1408th plenary meeting, on 21 December 1965, the President of the General Assembly announced the nomination of Afghanistan as a member of the Special Committee to fill the vacancy created by the withdrawal of Cambodia<sup>6</sup> from the membership of the Committee. The Special Committee, therefore, was composed of the following twenty-four members:

Afghanistan	Sierra Leone
Australia	Syria
Bulgaria	United Republic of Tanzania
Chile	Tunisia
Denmark	Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
Ethiopia	United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland
India	Ireland
Iran	United States of America
Iraq	Uruguay

Madagascar
Mali
Poland

12. This report covers the work of the Special Committee for the period 8 March to 30 November 1966 during which it held ninety plenary meetings, including forty meetings in Africa, and its Working Group and Sub-Committees held over 100 meetings.

B. OPENING OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE'S MEETINGS IN 1966

13. The first meeting of the Special Committee in 1966 (394th meeting), held on 8 March, was opened by the Secretary-General.

Opening statement by the Secretary-General

14. The Secretary-General welcomed the members of the Special Committee and particularly the newest member, the delegation of Afghanistan.

15. In the introduction to his last annual report on the work of the organization,<sup>7</sup> he had observed that, while there had been a few positive developments, the major problems in the field of decolonization had remained without any positive movement towards peaceful solution. At the twentieth session of the General Assembly, the majority of delegations had expressed serious concern about the continued delay in the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Accordingly, in resolution 2105 (XX), the General Assembly had requested the Special Committee to continue to seek the best means for the immediate and full application of the Declaration to all Territories which had not yet attained independence. Inspired by the same considerations, the Fourth Committee had for the first time given separate consideration not only to the more difficult colonial problems but to most of the Territories with which the Special Committee had been concerned. Consequently the General Assembly, on the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, had been able to adopt specific resolutions concerning individual Territories, which had outlined the particular direction, emphasis and action required in each case for the implementation of the Declaration.

16. In his note of 11 February 1966 (A/AC.109/L.260), he had drawn attention to the resolutions adopted by the Assembly at its twentieth session which concerned the work of the Special Committee. He had also made available a note (A/AC.109/L.261) drawing attention to specific points which members would wish to take into account in drawing up the programme of work for 1966.

17. The main problems before the Special Committee had not become more tractable. In particular, the situation in Southern Rhodesia was increasing the grave disquiet already felt by Member States. It might be appropriate to recall recent official statements by the United Kingdom Government to the effect that it would continue to seek a speedy end to the rebellion in the Territory and to help the people of Southern Rhodesia in making a fresh start towards majority rule and the establishment of a just society without discrimination. It was to be hoped that rapid progress would be registered in that regard and that, in conformity with the pertinent United Nations resolutions, the United Kingdom Government would without delay take the necessary measures to enable the people of Southern Rhodesia to determine their own future in accordance with the objectives of the Declaration.

18. With regard to the Territories under Portuguese administration, the Government of Portugal had maintained its disregard of the relevant United Nations resolutions. It had failed to give effect to the principle of self-determination as laid down in those resolutions and there was no sign of a reversal of its policy of political and economic integration of the Territories with Portugal. The situation in those Territories, which the Security Council had described as a serious disturbance of international peace and security, was one to which the Special Committee would probably wish to devote continued attention.

19. The refusal of the South African Government to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee concerning South West Africa were also a matter for serious concern. Far from discontinuing its policy of apartheid, the South African Government seemed to be taking various steps for the further implementation of that policy, including measures for the establishment of non-European "homelands". That grave situation would no doubt be the subject of consideration by the Special Committee in the light of current developments.

20. In resolution 2063 (XX), the General Assembly had requested the Special Committee to consider, in co-operation with the Secretary-General, what measures were necessary for securing the territorial integrity and sovereignty of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland. In transmitting the General Assembly resolution to Governments, he had requested information on the extent to which they would be prepared to make contributions towards the Fund for the economic development of those Territories. The Fund had been the subject of one of the recommendations which he had submitted in 1965 and which had been endorsed by the Special Committee and the General Assembly. A positive response from Governments would be a constructive step towards the achievement of the objectives sought by the Special Committee and the General Assembly.

21. The General Assembly had also requested the Special Committee to pay particular attention to the smaller Territories. Adequate information on the political, economic and social situation in those Territories and on the opinions, wishes and aspirations of the people would facilitate that task. In that connexion, the Special Committee's intention to use visiting groups, which had been endorsed by the General Assembly, was especially relevant.

22. The work of the Special Committee in 1966 would be unusually onerous and the programme of meetings correspondingly heavy. For that reason, he wished to draw attention to General Assembly resolution 2116 (XX) on the pattern of conferences and to express the hope that, in drawing up its programme of work, the Committee would appreciate the need for rational planning to facilitate the provision of the required technical and substantive support.

23. He offered good wishes for the success of the Committee's work and expressed his confidence that it would make a further constructive contribution to the implementation of the Declaration in conditions of peace and harmony. It was to be hoped that the Special Committee would receive all necessary co-operation from the administering Powers concerned.

Statement by members

24. The representative of Mali thanked the Secretary-General for having come in person to open the Committee's first meeting in 1966. His statement would be a source of inspiration to the members of the Committee, who saw in him an ardent defender of freedom and justice, tireless in his efforts to ensure respect for the rights of the oppressed peoples.

25. The Special Committee was beginning its meetings at a very troubled time. The international situation was marked by grave crises which might at any moment degenerate into a world conflict. The basic causes of those crises were the numerous violations of the right to self-determination and the numerous foreign interventions in the domestic affairs of other countries. While the people still under colonial domination were waging national liberation struggles against the colonial forces, the newly independent countries were subjected to an increasingly strenuous onslaught from imperialism and neo-colonialism. The determination of the colonial and neo-colonial Powers to preserve their political and economic domination was a serious violation of the United Nations Charter, which included important provisions on the right to self-determination. The Special Committee should work unrelentingly to ensure that colonial peoples could fully exercise their right to independence and self-determination and should unflinchingly denounce the abuses of the colonial Powers.

26. The representative of Afghanistan said that his country regarded membership of the Special Committee as a privilege and an honour. Afghanistan, which had shown whole-hearted support for the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, had always given full approval to the recommendations of the Special Committee. Its devotion to the cause of the abolition of colonialism in all its forms and manifestations was a matter of recorded history. Afghanistan had been the first country in Asia to oppose colonialism from the moment of its appearance. At the cost of untold sacrifices, it had waged a struggle against colonialism and had finally been able to stand among the peoples and nations of the world as a champion of the cause which was enshrined in the mind of man and the conscience of humanity and had been reflected in the Declaration. It was in that spirit that Afghanistan would co-operate fully in the Special Committee in efforts to achieve justice and equality among all nations and peoples. The foremost desire of Afghanistan was that all peoples and nations should achieve their goals and fulfil their aspirations through understanding and by peaceful means.

27. The representative of Ethiopia expressed his delegation's appreciation of the wise statement by the Secretary-General, which would help and guide the Committee in its work. His delegation was convinced that, although certain racist minorities were still bent on the futile course of trying to reverse the inexorable tide of history, the Committee would remain firm in the discharge of its duties until all the colonial peoples were emancipated and colonial domination had been replaced by freedom and independence.

28. The representative of Uruguay, speaking on behalf of the Latin American countries, which were represented on the Committee by his own delegation and those of Chile and Venezuela, said that the Latin American countries had not always been staunch advocates of law, democracy and freedom but had unswervingly supported the principles upheld by the Committee in its efforts to liberate the oppressed peoples and to eradicate colonialism, so that the rule of law and freedom might be the guiding principle of coexistence between men and nations.

29. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania thanked the Secretary-General for the wise words he had spoken and stated that the United Republic of Tanzania had always appreciated the value of the Committee, for it would not consider that its own independence had been totally achieved until every African in the continent could breathe the air of freedom. His country looked forward eagerly to the day when all those now under the colonial yoke would have achieved independence. Its policies with regard to the evils of colonialism were well defined and it would never deviate from them. His delegation would work untiringly in the cause of decolonization and would co-operate with all those who were striving to eradicate colonialism and thus to complete the task of the Committee at an early date.

30. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that, as the Secretary-General had stressed in his heartening words to the Committee, the task that the General Assembly had assigned to the Committee was one of great magnitude. He was sure that all the members of the Committee would approach that task with the same feelings with which they had always been animated and which had been so well understood by the outgoing officers, whose work had been highly appreciated by his delegation.

31. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed his delegation's gratitude to the Secretary-General for the unflagging interest he had shown in the work of the Committee. The Secretary-General's statement at the present meeting and the support which he gave the Special Committee would undoubtedly be a source of inspiration to its members to do everything possible within the framework of the United Nations to implement the lofty ideals of the Charter of the United Nations and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. He welcomed the delegation of Afghanistan as a new member of the Committee and expressed the conviction that Afghanistan, a country whose untiring efforts in the struggle against the forces of colonialism were well known, would make a valuable contribution to the common efforts to bring about the rapid elimination of the remaining colonial régimes.

Election of officers

32. At its 394th meeting, on 8 March 1966, the Special Committee unanimously elected the following officers:

Chairmen: Mr. Gershon Collier (Sierra Leone)

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. José Piñera (Chile) and Mr. John Malecela (United Republic of Tanzania)

Rapporteur: Mr. Ala'uddin Aljubouri (Iraq)

Statement by the Chairman

33. The Chairman thanked the members of the Special Committee for the high honour conferred upon his country and his person. He hoped to be able to guide the work of the Committee into productive channels along the lines already laid down by his illustrious predecessor.

34. He also wished to express to the Secretary-General the Committee's gratitude for his having attended the meeting and having made a comprehensive statement on the work and problems of the Committee.

35. The Special Committee had made a remarkable contribution to the process of decolonization throughout the world. Its visit to Africa in 1965 had brought its work nearer to those peoples of Africa who were still suffering under colonial rule and had given publicity to its work. Since millions of people were still struggling for equality and dignity, the Committee should pursue its mandate with increased vigour. It should extend its activities outside New York to reach the victims of colonialism all over the world and particularly in Africa. Only if co-operation was displayed by all members would the Committee's work reflect a real consensus of United Nations thinking and demonstrate that the Organization was totally committed to the eradication of colonialism. The efforts of the Special Committee would do much to uphold the rule of law and would make a worthy contribution to the ennoblement of the United Nations as the real conscience of the international community.

Statement by the outgoing Chairman

36. Mr. Sori Coulibaly (Mali) speaking as the outgoing Chairman, stated that the progress of decolonization was slow, not because the Committee had spared any effort, but because there were men and Governments that did not believe in the equality of peoples and continued to violate the principles of the Charter. Governments, imperialist companies and men who lived by exploiting others preferred to ignore all humanitarian principles and derive super-profits at the price of the blood and sweat of the patriots of Angola, Mozambique, so-called Portuguese Guinea, South West Africa, Southern Rhodesia, South Africa and elsewhere. The Government of Portugal was murdering and torturing Africans in order to maintain the privileges which kept alive a backward metropolitan country incapable of adaptation. In South Africa and South West Africa, apartheid and a police régime were maintaining a white population in opulence while the Africans were herded into reservations on the soil of their ancestors. In Southern Rhodesia, a white racist minority had proclaimed the independence of the Territory in order to perpetuate its domination over almost 4½ million Africans.

37. The persistence of those anachronistic situations was a threat to international peace and security and a challenge to the United Nations and the Special Committee. The Committee would have an important place in the history of the struggle against injustice, exploitation and humiliation. Colonialism and apartheid should be liquidated as soon as possible, because they were a disgrace to mankind. At a time when man was liberating himself from the laws of gravity and walking in outer space, colonial domination and apartheid were paradoxical, unjust, humiliating and abhorrent. The colonial peoples, which suffered not only from exploitation but also from humiliation, placed great hopes in the Committee. The Committee should go to their countries, live their tragic life and tell the world about them. It should forcefully fight the colonial Powers and exert effective pressure on all States which gave assistance to those Powers as were responsible for the arbitrary activities of the racist minorities illegally in power in certain colonial or semi-colonial territories. The delegation of Afghanistan would no doubt make an important contribution to the work of the Committee.

38. He expressed gratitude to all his friends and colleagues for their confidence and understanding and to the Under-Secretary and the other members of the Secretariat for their assistance. The tributes paid to him by the members of the Committee had shown that the differences of opinion which had from time to time arisen had not affected the deep feelings of friendship and respect which bound them together.

C. ORGANIZATION OF WORK

39. The Special Committee discussed the organization of its work for the year at its 394th, 395th to 397th and 399th meetings, at which general statements were made by members.

Statements by members

40. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that the Committee should adopt procedures that would enable it to move forward towards achieving the goal proclaimed in the Charter and in the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, namely that of guaranteeing to all peoples, large and small, the right to self-determination and independence. While a decisive part in the struggle for the definitive elimination of colonial régimes would, of course, be played by the peoples themselves, with the support given to them by many States which had adopted an anti-colonialist policy, the Government of the Soviet Union considered that the United Nations, which was the most comprehensive international forum, could and should play a useful role in that struggle.

41. The adoption in 1960 of the United Nations Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, the decisions of the twentieth session of the General Assembly recognizing the legality of the struggle of the peoples for freedom and independence, the appeal by the General Assembly to all States to provide moral and material assistance in that struggle, and the condemnation of colonialism in all its manifestations as a crime against humanity and a threat to peace and security had proved to be of substantial political support in the people's fight to throw off the colonial yoke.

42. The Special Committee had a special role to play in the anti-colonialist struggle by unmasking the colonialists and drawing attention to the situation in colonial territories. In his opinion, the Committee had been right the previous year to decide, on the initiative of the Afro-Asian and socialist States, to hold a series of meetings on African countries. Those meetings had produced positive results; they had enabled the Committee to enlist the participation in its work of many representatives of national liberation movements in African colonies, to work out and adopt more effective provisions which had formed the basis for the decisions of the twentieth session of the General Assembly, to establish contact with the Organization of African Unity and to strengthen the unity of those countries which supported the rapid elimination of the remaining colonial régimes. The experiment should certainly be continued and, in accordance with paragraph 7 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX), the Committee should decide to hold a session in Africa in the current year.

43. His delegation had supported that resolution and continued to think that a further session in Africa was essential and would be of great value. At its meetings in Africa the Committee would be able to make a comprehensive examination of the progress made in the implementation of the decisions of the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Committee itself on such important questions as Southern Rhodesia, the Portuguese colonies, South West Africa and other matters connected with the elimination of colonial régimes in Africa. It would also be able to give its views on the action which should be taken by the General Assembly and the Security Council to compel the colonialists to comply with United Nations decisions on those issues.

44. The Soviet Union delegation welcomed the invitation extended to the Special Committee by the Government of Tanzania to visit Dar es Salaam in 1966 and to hold some of its meetings in Africa in close proximity to the places where Africans were waging a struggle for liberation from the colonialist yoke. His delegation would also like to express its support for the idea put forward by several delegations during the Committee's session in Africa that the Security Council should hold a session in Africa to consider the situation in Southern Rhodesia and the Portuguese colonies and to examine the policy of apartheid pursued by the Government of the Republic of South Africa in South Africa and in South West Africa. Such a session would enable the representatives of African countries and the leaders of the national liberation movements to participate in the work of the Council with a view to working out specific measures, in accordance with the Charter, to ensure the implementation of the decisions adopted by the Security Council and other United Nations organs. It would also make it possible to co-ordinate the work of the Security Council and the Organization of African Unity on those questions.

45. During the twentieth session of the General Assembly, the representatives of a number of national and patriotic organizations in South West Africa, as well as the overwhelming majority of the Members of the United Nations, had resolutely condemned the policy pursued by the racist Verwoerd régime in respect of South West Africa and had called for the unconditional implementation of United Nations resolutions concerning that Territory. In particular, many delegations had favoured the adoption by the United Nations of a decision to terminate South Africa's Mandate over South West Africa and to take specific steps to transfer power in the Territory to the legitimate representatives of the people. The Soviet Union delegation entirely shared the views of those delegations. The examination by the Special Committee and the General Assembly of the situation in South West Africa had shown that the Government of South Africa was using the Mandate to serve the interests of international monopolies and to further its annexationist policy in respect of that Territory.

46. In his opinion, the Special Committee would be perfectly justified in pronouncing itself unequivocally in favour of withdrawing the Mandate for South West Africa from the Republic of South Africa and recommending to the General Assembly and the Security Council the adoption of appropriate decisions on the subject. His delegation shared the view held by some Members of the United Nations that a special session of the General Assembly should be convened as soon as the International Court of Justice had completed its proceedings in the case of South West Africa, to consider the question of terminating South Africa's Mandate and of making appropriate recommendations to the Security Council so that the latter could take the necessary action.

47. It was well known that the colonial Powers had recourse to all kinds of manoeuvres to block the implementation of United Nations decisions, in order to preserve their rule in the Territories under their control. They resorted to various kinds of constitutional devices, bribery and conspiracy; they left people to rot in prison; they killed thousands of freedom-fighters and prohibited the activities of patriotic and nationalist parties and organizations. Where those methods of persecution and terror failed to produce the desired results, the colonialists resorted to overt forms of military oppression, using the most modern means of destruction, including napalm bombs and toxic substances. They interfered in the internal affairs of other States and imposed systems that protected the interests of the imperialist monopolies. It was obvious that, in the face of those colonialist intrigues, the United Nations and all States must take new and resolute steps to bring about the final elimination of the remnants of the colonial system.

48. His delegation therefore considered that at the present stage of the Committee's work primary attention should be given to ensuring the implementation by the colonial Powers of the decisions adopted by the General Assembly at its twentieth session by the Security Council in regard to the granting of independence to Southern Rhodesia, the Portuguese colonies of Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea, South West Africa, Aden and the entire southern part of the Arabian peninsula. His delegation shared the view expressed by a number of delegations at the twentieth session of the General Assembly that the Committee should seriously examine the question of setting specific dates for the granting of independence to colonial Territories in accordance with the wishes of the peoples. If the colonialists refused to carry out such decisions and failed to grant independence by the date specified, they should be declared aggressors and measures such as those provided in Chapter VII of the Charter should be enacted against them.

49. During the discussion of the report of the Special Committee at the twentieth session of the General Assembly, considerable attention had been devoted to the unsatisfactory situation regarding the implementation of the principles of the Declaration in respect of the smaller colonial Territories. It had been suggested that, in view of the inadequate information available regarding those Territories, visiting groups should be sent to them to establish direct contact with the people and their representatives. That legitimate request of the General Assembly should be fulfilled. If the colonial Powers were really in favour of the self-determination of peoples, they should abandon their position of refusing to allow representatives of the Special Committee to visit those Territories.

50. The General Assembly had adopted a number of important decisions on the consequences of the activities of foreign monopolies in colonial Territories, the liquidation of military bases in those Territories and the withholding of any economic, financial or technical assistance by the specialized agencies of the United Nations, particularly the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund, to the Governments of Portugal, the Republic of South Africa and the authorities of the white settler Government in Southern Rhodesia. The discussions in the Special Committee had shown clearly the harmful effects of the activities of the international monopolies and of the presence of military bases in those Territories and the danger which they represented for the cause of the liberation of peoples from colonial oppression. The Committee must do everything in its power to ensure that the decisions which the General Assembly had adopted on those questions were carried out and must call on the colonial Powers to provide it with all relevant information on the progress made in giving effect to those decisions.

51. The Committee should not be content to have submitted to the General Assembly its report on the implications of the activities of foreign monopolies in South West Africa and the Portuguese Territories; it should pursue, in co-operation with the Secretary-General, the study of that problem in respect of those Territories and in respect of Southern Rhodesia.

52. With regard to military bases in colonial Territories, the Committee in co-operation with the Secretary-General, should study the question of the harmful influence of such bases on the cause of the liberation of the peoples of those Territories from colonial oppression and should make recommendations to the General Assembly and the Security Council.

53. In addition, the Chairman or the officers of the Committee should establish direct contact with the specialized agencies and request them to submit information on the action taken or envisaged with a view to implementing the United Nations recommendations concerning the cessation of economic, financial and technical assistance to Portugal, the Republic of South Africa and the white settler Government in Southern Rhodesia.

54. The Special Committee might take the initiative in drawing the attention of other United Nations bodies, in particular the Social Commission and the Commission on the Status of Women, to aspects of the criminal policies of the colonialists which came within the competence of those bodies. He recalled that, on the initiative of the Special Committee, the question of the flagrant violation of human rights in colonial Territories had been included as an important and urgent matter in the provisional agenda of the twenty-second session of the Commission and he hoped that such co-operation among United Nations organs would be continued.

55. In the post-war period, the national liberation movement had dealt a crushing blow to the colonial system of imperialism, oppression and enslavement and dozens of newly independent countries had been built upon the ruins of the old colonialist world. The last vestiges of the colonial system were crumbling but the colonialists continued to offer stubborn resistance and to do everything possible to maintain their domination. It was the duty of the United Nations and of the Special Committee to help the peoples who were fighting for their liberation and to do their utmost to ensure the implementation of the principles of the Charter and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The Soviet Union Government's position in that regard was in complete accord with the purposes and principles of the Declaration and his delegation was prepared to co-operate closely with all delegations which supported anti-colonialism.

56. In conclusion, he informed the Committee that the previous day the Soviet Union Government had become one of the first nine countries to sign the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.

57. The representative of Italy stated that his delegation was facing the new session of the Special Committee in the firm conviction that the Committee was contributing to an important task, namely, the transformation of the society of nations from an old structure into a new order in which there would be freedom and equal opportunities for all nations, under the rule of law. Although that transformation had already been accomplished to a great extent, the Committee was still called upon to secure the disappearance from the face of the earth of the remnants of colonialism and to ensure that that change was brought about by peaceful means, through the process of self-determination. The General Assembly had requested the Committee to keep the problem of decolonization in the spotlight of world public opinion and at the same time to study all the details and complexities—political, economic, social, cultural—that had prevented the speedy attainment of independence by a considerable number of Territories still under consideration. He was referring in particular to the subject of small Territories, which was on the agenda and for which his delegation would suggest a high degree of priority.

58. His delegation firmly believed in the value of the methods of conversation, negotiation, conciliation and compromise—not as far as principles were concerned, but with regard to practical measures—and favoured calling the attention of what had been rightly defined as the "world conscience" to specific problems in order to exert all due moral pressure on reluctant parties. His delegation placed great reliance on the role that the Secretary-General could play in facilitating the solution of problems arising out of colonial situations. It hoped that the Special Committee would not be a prisoner of old formulas that were applicable to conventional decolonization but which might be less valid for the special cases on the agenda.

59. The three points to be considered in the organization of the Committee's work were the agenda, the priorities and the methods of work.

60. With regard to the agenda, the resolutions on the subject of decolonization adopted by the General Assembly at its twentieth session gave a clear picture of the work required of the Committee. The papers prepared by the Secretariat (A/AC.109/L.260 and L.261) were also useful and he suggested that document A/AC.109/L.261 could be regarded as the provisional agenda for 1966.

61. With regard to priorities, his delegation regarded all colonial problems as urgent and would accept any recommendation agreeable to the majority of members. He hoped that the Committee would give adequate priority to the problem of so-called small Territories, which were particularly complex and required special attention.

62. As far as methods of work were concerned, the Committee should take a preliminary position on a number of important questions. The first was whether in the weeks to come and in its report to the General Assembly the Committee should consider all or only some of the territories listed in document A/AC.109/L.261. His delegation favoured consideration of them all; whichever policy was adopted, however, it was essential to adhere to it and not change it in mid-session.

63. The second question was whether resolutions should be based on debates held in plenary meetings or on sub-committee discussions and reports to the full Committee. His delegation favoured the sub-committee method, which had proved successful in the preparation of a large part of the Committee's 1965 report.

64. Lastly, the question of a time-table was more urgent than usual, in view of the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2116 (XX) on the pattern of conferences.

65. His delegation appreciated the reasons which had prompted four Member States to invite the Committee to hold part of its 1966 session in their respective capitals, but it felt that a decision on the matter could be taken only after careful consideration of the organizational problems he had outlined. Preliminary consideration of those problems could be referred, as in the past, to an expanded working group consisting of the officers of the Committee and four other members, but it would be necessary to hear the views of as many Committee members as possible before the working group was actually convened.

66. The representative of Yugoslavia said that the problems before the Committee were as difficult as ever. Certain colonial Powers, supported by others with identical interests, were doing their utmost to retain their influence in the Territories under colonial rule, to suppress national liberation movements and to halt progressive processes on a wider scale. Such a situation was an evident danger to peace and security, as had been recognized by the great majority of the representatives who had spoken at the twentieth session of the General Assembly.

67. The Committee's session in Africa in 1965 had been of great value. Such visits and contacts with petitioners enabled the members of the Committee to study the situation in certain Territories, the attitudes of the administering Powers towards the problems of the Territories and the extent to which the provisions of certain resolutions had been implemented. A further session of the Special Committee in Africa would be in keeping with the spirit of General Assembly resolution 2011 (XX) on co-operation between the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity and his delegation hoped that such co-operation would become a constant feature of the Committee's activities.

68. He hoped that in preparing the Committee's programme the Working Group would consider the problem of the participation of foreign capital in the economies of colonial Territories, which was closely related to the protraction of the decolonizing process.

69. The problems of so-called small Territories also were significant; visiting missions of the Special Committee to such Territories would help towards the solution of the problem.

70. His delegation regarded the problems of colonialism and peace as interdependent. It was ready to support all measures that would guarantee faster and more effective action by the Committee in speeding the process of decolonization and the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

71. The representative of India said that in the planning of the calendar of work it should be borne in mind that the Committee was beginning its session three or four weeks later than in previous years. In spite of the reduced time available, however, the Committee must follow the specific instructions of the General Assembly to keep the various Territories under discussion and to report to the Assembly at its twenty-first session.

72. He hoped that a working group to discuss the Committee's programme would be announced at the next meeting or soon after. The working group could plan which Territories would be taken up during the next three months and make recommendations concerning a possible visit to Africa, which would require a good deal of advance preparation. His delegation had always considered that it was useful for the Committee to visit Africa, for such visits gave the members a more realistic picture of the situation in the Territories.

73. The Sub-Committee on Petitions should be appointed and start functioning soon, since there were a number of petitions awaiting action. Similarly, the Committee should decide whether the three Sub-Committees on the small Territories in the Caribbean and the Atlantic Ocean, in the Indian Ocean and in the Pacific Ocean should be revived or whether their composition should be changed.

74. Lastly, there were important questions relating to the Committee's report to the General Assembly. In the past the Committee's reports had run to almost 2,000 pages each year and few people, if any, were able to read them in their entirety. In view of the financial problems and the vast amount of work entailed in the preparation and translation of such voluminous reports, he hoped that the Committee would be able to consider, in the early weeks of the session, what could be done to reduce the size of the report while preserving the right of every delegation to make known its views.

75. The representative of the United Kingdom said that in its four years of work the Special Committee had virtually completed its examination of the colonial Territories on its agenda and a large number of resolutions had been adopted by the General Assembly on the basis of the Committee's recommendations. His Government had whole-heartedly supported some points in those resolutions, had partially agreed with others and had found others unacceptable. The disagreements in the Committee had been mainly concerned with methods, since in most recent cases there was general agreement on the Committee's objectives. It had been suggested that the Committee should concentrate on seeing that the provisions of all the Assembly resolutions were carried out. He did not think that that was necessarily the right, or the only, approach. It would be more productive to examine carefully the practical problems of the various Territories and the means for overcoming them. This required steady and detailed work, not necessarily by resolution but perhaps more by consensus. The special difficulties and characteristics of each Territory should be considered in greater depth, and perhaps in a more objective manner, than during the first general examination.

76. His Government bore the responsibility for the administration of United Kingdom Territories and for their progress to full self-government and self-determination, but it fully recognized the interest of the international community in those matters and had always willingly co-operated with the Committee in its work. That co-operation would be continued in the future, for the United Kingdom objectives were the same as those often endorsed by the Committee, namely, self-determination, decolonization at all practicable speed, and urgent help to the colonial peoples to enable them to take their place in the modern world with a status that they themselves had freely chosen and accepted.

77. If the Committee was to make a more truly objective study, however, it would have to go beyond those objectives and face the real and varied problem in the remaining colonial Territories. His Government's policies in the Territories it administered were naturally designed to help the people of those Territories to overcome their problems, which ranged from racial divisions and suspicions in some places to economic backwardness or a lack of any feeling of national unity and consciousness in others. His delegation was ready to provide the Committee with information on those policies and would welcome constructive proposals from the Committee. The United Kingdom Permanent Representative and Minister of State in New York would willingly take part in informal discussions of problems or proposals; moreover, the Colonial Secretary in London was prepared to consider any suggestion that representatives of the Committee should visit London to discuss particular cases of special importance or complexity.

78. The United Kingdom's contributions could be made more effective by some adjustments in the Committee's methods of work. First, in the light of General Assembly resolution 2116 (XX) and of the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions,<sup>8</sup> the Committee should draw up within the next week or two its detailed programme for the entire year, with dates for discussions of particular Territories or subjects laid down from the outset. There might be some loss of flexibility, but that would be far outweighed by the improvement in the organization of the work. The administering Powers, including the United Kingdom, could then prepare more effectively for discussion of their own Territories and could provide the Committee with more information and, where appropriate, bring in specialists and experts from their own countries or possibly from the Territories themselves.

79. The second aspect of the more constructive elaboration he suggested would be increased consultation between the Working Group and the administering Power concerned. His delegation had no doubt whatsoever of the great usefulness of the Working Group and favoured its continuation.

80. Similarly, the preparation and drafting of reports and draft resolutions could be based on a broader cross-section of opinion in the Committee, taking the views of the administering Powers more fully into account; the Committee's work might then be more productive and more objective, and hence of more real value to the people of the colonial Territories themselves. The wishes and views of the colonial peoples, as publicly expressed through their democratically elected leaders and representatives, might be reflected more fully in the Committee's reports and recommendations. Resolutions frequently reflected only the point of view of the majority; the Committee might usefully proceed much more by balanced consensus or by reports which adequately covered all the points of view, even when they were in conflict.

81. The use of small groups or sub-committees within the Committee to deal with particular Territories or areas had obvious advantages: small groups could consider problems in greater depth and perhaps with less formality. In the past, however, some of the advantage had been lost by the subsequent full debates on the same subjects in the plenary Committee. To avoid duplication, the Committee might in appropriate cases refrain from full debates on the reports of small groups and, instead, incorporate those reports in its report to the General Assembly without necessarily endorsing or approving them.

82. While his delegation was grateful to the four African Governments which had extended invitations to the Committee, all he had said about the advantages of small groups and the undesirability of expanded debate by the full Committee applied with even greater force to the suggestion of another visit to Africa. The 1965 visit had already acquainted the Committee better with African problems and personalities; a second visit would not encourage the objective studies which he had suggested and the Committee had little time before the autumn session of the General Assembly to prepare its report. An elaborate and costly tour of several African countries could be justified only if it brought very considerable and tangible advantages unattainable by other means; his delegation did not believe that such justification existed in the present case and it would therefore regard a second African tour by the whole Committee as a waste of time and money.

83. He thought it would be useful to the Committee to have some information concerning his Government's programme for progress in constitutional development and decolonization in its remaining colonial Territories. He would deal first with the four Territories whose course to independence was now mapped out and set. British Guiana was due to become independent on 26 May, Bechuanaland on 30 September and Basutoland, subject to the submission of a formal request by the procedure laid down, later in 1966. It had been decided at the Mauritius Conference in September 1965 that the United Kingdom Government would be prepared to take the necessary steps to declare Mauritius independent if the new Legislative Assembly so requested. There would be six months of internal self-government after the elections which were due to take place after the report of the Electoral Commission had been dealt with.

84. In addition to those Territories, invitations had recently been sent to the parties represented in the Barbados Legislature to attend a conference in London in July 1966 for the purpose of discussing their Government's request for early independence. New constitutional proposals had been put forward and published recently for the Caribbean Territories of Antigua, Dominica, Grenada, St. Kitts, St. Lucia and St. Vincent and would be the subject of conferences in London in spring 1966.

85. As the Committee was aware, South Arabia was due to become independent by 1968. Recent developments affecting that Territory included the publication of the report of the constitutional advisers commissioned by the Federal Government to draw up proposals for a constitution for the whole of South Arabia. Secondly, there had been the announcement by the United Kingdom Government that, as part of its over-all defence review, it intended to withdraw its forces from the Aden base when South Arabia became independent. Thirdly, there had been the decision by the Federal Government to recommend that all orders which for political reasons required South Arabians to live outside their country should be lifted so that those people should be free to return. The United Kingdom Government hoped that all those developments would encourage consultations among all sections of opinion in South Arabia with a view to the reaching of agreement on the necessary constitutional measures for independence.

86. The Territories he had mentioned accounted for nearly 5 million out of the 9.5 million people in all the United Kingdom dependent Territories, not including Rhodesia.

87. In the remaining Territories, constitutional progress was continuing, in almost all cases at an accelerated rate. Most of them were small in area and population and their problems and requirements defied generalization. It was those problems, varied and different in each case, which his Government, in co-operation with the peoples of the Territories, was seeking to tackle in the last phases of the great historical movement towards decolonization. In the Seychelles a Constitutional Commissioner had been appointed to advise on future constitutional advance and had already begun his work. In Swaziland the Constitutional Committee had been considering the next stages of constitutional progress, and it was expected that final decisions on the form of an internal self-government constitution would be taken later in 1966. The next stage in the constitutional development of the Gilbert and Ellice Islands was now being considered. In Bermuda, the joint select committee of the two houses of the Legislature appointed to consider constitutional changes had recommended, inter alia, lowering the voting age from 25 to 21 and abolishing the second vote previously enjoyed by some Bermudians on a property basis. Those recommendations had been put into effect and Bermuda now had an electoral system of one man, one vote.

88. In addition, measures designed to achieve constitutional progress were likely to be taken in the near future with regard to Fiji, the British Virgin Islands, Montserrat, the Cayman Islands, the Falkland Islands and the Solomon Islands.

89. Lastly, there were certain Territories which were the subject of territorial claims by other countries. In the case of Gibraltar, the United Kingdom Government had agreed with the Government of Spain that, following General Assembly resolution 2070 (XX), talks should be held between the two Governments in London. The question of the frontier between Venezuela and British Guiana had been discussed in London and Geneva by the United Kingdom Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the Foreign Minister of Venezuela, with the participation of the Prime Minister of British Guiana. He was sure that the resulting agreement, which had been signed in Geneva in February, would be welcomed in the Committee.

90. With regard to the Falkland Islands, the Governments of the United Kingdom and Argentina had informed the United Nations of the agreement reached between the United Kingdom Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the Argentine Foreign Minister that discussions, as recommended in General Assembly resolution 2065 (XX), should be pursued without delay for the purpose of finding a peaceful solution.

91. This heavy programme of decolonization and constitutional progress for 1966 showed that the United Kingdom Government was making every effort to assist the people of its colonial Territories to achieve the objectives which all members sought. He hoped that his delegation's suggestions for making the Committee's work more effective would be fully discussed.

92. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania recalled that while the Committee had been in Addis Ababa the previous year the suggestion had been made that the Security Council should meet in Africa to consider some of the serious questions of colonialism, such as those of the Portuguese Territories. His delegation considered that a meeting in Africa by a body such as the Security Council would be of great value, since for many Africans Portuguese colonialism constituted a threat to the peace and security of the continent, as the Security Council itself had once observed. He therefore hoped that the Committee would do its utmost to make that suggestion become a reality.

93. His delegation felt that the Committee should make greater use of the sub-committee system it had followed the previous year. It should re-establish the sub-committees it had had the previous year, but the composition of those bodies could be left to the officers of the Committee to decide. The Sub-Committee on British Guiana could, however, be abolished, since that Territory was to become independent during the present year. It could be replaced by a sub-committee that would deal with the small islands to be considered at the present session. Once the sub-committees were re-established, they would be able to draw up their programmes of work and present them to the Committee for approval. The Committee would then be able to prepare a programme of work for the entire year.

94. With regard to the visit to Africa, his delegation had always held the view that the best meeting place for the Committee was the place nearest to areas where colonialism still existed. Since, unfortunately, there were still colonies in Africa, his delegation considered it necessary for the Committee to meet in that continent. It hoped that the Committee's experience in Africa the previous year would be sufficient justification for another visit. If the idea of holding a session in Africa was accepted, all questions concerning that continent should be taken up while the Committee was there. He hoped that the decision would be taken quickly, so that the host countries would have time to prepare for the Committee's visit.

95. While his delegation thought that the question of small Territories should be considered at the current session, it also felt that the Committee should send a group of three or four members to such places with a view to obtaining additional information. In making that suggestion, his delegation was not disregarding the reports of the administering Powers; it merely thought that a report from such a small group would supplement the information submitted by those Powers.

96. With regard to the questions of Aden and Oman, he suggested that it would be useful if the Committee took up those items in Cairo, where it would have an opportunity of hearing petitioners from those areas.

97. The representative of Syria said that, despite the optimism which had been expressed with regard to the imminent end of colonialism, there were indications of a recalcitrant attitude on the part of some colonial Powers and of a consolidation of reactionary power to suppress the identity of some indigenous peoples. In one place, it would be claimed that strategic interests were involved—a claim which made the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) conditional upon other factors; in another place, colonialism would disappear in name only and be replaced by economic ties. In South West Africa, the world was witnessing a gradual and deliberate, although disguised, conquest of an African land by a minority of foreign settlers.

98. The Committee should bring all its energies to bear on those problems, in the hope that it might help to alleviate the sufferings of subjugated peoples. In that spirit, his delegation strongly supported the suggestion that the Committee should visit the African capitals which had extended invitations. Experience had shown that the colonial Powers were often reluctant to furnish a complete picture of the conditions prevailing in the Territories under their administration and it had become a matter of course for them to reject requests for visits by United Nations missions. If the Committee could only convey the message that the majority of peoples followed with deep interest and supported, morally at least, the legitimate struggle of the peoples for independence, its visit would accomplish a great deal. An early decision by the Committee not only would be a matter of courtesy to the host Governments but would affect the Committee's time-table. If the visit were agreed upon, it would be logical to discuss questions concerning Africa in Africa; the questions of Aden and Oman could profitably be discussed in Cairo, a city which petitioners could reach easily. The Committee could then deal with the other questions on its agenda either before or after its visit to Africa.

99. Sub-committees might be established to assess the present situation in specific Territories, or, in the case of sub-committees dealing with new questions such as that of Oman, to make suggestions about the method of work on the item.

100. There would be no harm in the Committee omitting from its report certain parts that had been included in previous reports, but it should continue to exercise the authority vested in it by the General Assembly and to adopt clear and unambiguous resolutions. If previous resolutions had not been implemented, that was the fault of the colonial Powers and not of the language used in the resolutions. If the colonial Powers had left it to the United Nations to decide what was right and what was wrong, the work of the Committee would have been completed long since.

101. The representative of Mali said that, in organizing its work, the Committee should bear in mind the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX).

102. As in the past, the Committee should establish a working group which would draw up an order of priority for the various questions before the Committee. The consideration of those questions would require a debate by the Committee itself, but it should be remembered that the phase of denunciation of colonialism was past and that attention should be concentrated on proposing specific means for its eradication. The time had come to fulfil the hopes of millions of people for release from colonial domination. Sub-committees would be able to study more closely certain aspects of colonial exploitation, particularly the economic and military aspects connected with the operations of foreign monopolies and the establishment and maintenance of military bases. The small Territories, in particular, were being used as bases for aggression and his delegation supported the suggestion of the Tanzanian representative that visiting groups should be sent to such Territories. It was because of such economic and military considerations that it was difficult for those small Territories to achieve independence.

103. His delegation welcomed the forthcoming independence of Guiana and Bechuanaland. The Committee should study the Territories under Portuguese domination and propose a deadline for their attainment of independence. The withdrawal of South Africa's Mandate for South West Africa should also be proposed; the International Court of Justice would undoubtedly condemn the policies of apartheid pursued by the racist Government of South Africa against the population of South West Africa, in violation of the very spirit of the Mandate.

104. His delegation was grateful to the Governments of Algeria, Ethiopia, Somalia, the United Arab Republic and the United Republic of Tanzania for their kind invitations to the Special Committee. A visit to Africa would show members the scope of the struggle for liberation being waged by the peoples of Angola, Mozambique, Guinea-Bissau, Aden and South Arabia. The Committee would obtain information from petitioners and the peoples concerned would realize that the United Nations understood their problems.

105. The Committee's reports should deal only with new developments; for the past history, members could refer to earlier reports.

106. The representative of Poland said that the Committee's methods of work should reflect the aims and objectives of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) and the specific tasks and obligations laid down in General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX). The latter resolution had requested the Committee to seek the best means for the immediate and full application of resolution 1514 (XV) to all Territories which had not yet attained independence. The Committee should therefore seek new methods and new approaches to the questions on its agenda, in order successfully to implement all the resolutions adopted on particular Territories. It should consider how the colonial Powers were implementing the decisions already taken by the General Assembly; certain Powers, particularly South Africa and Portugal, were continuing to defy the United Nations. The Polish delegation agreed that the Committee should recommend the withdrawal from South Africa of its Mandate for South West Africa. It therefore supported the idea of convening a special session of the General Assembly as soon as the International Court of Justice had concluded its consideration of the question. It also agreed that the Committee should pursue the idea of the Security Council meeting in Africa to consider the situation in South West Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the Portuguese colonies. The Committee was perfectly entitled to suggest such a procedure, since paragraph 13 of resolution 2105 (XX) authorized it "to make suggestions which might assist the Council in considering appropriate measures under the Charter of the United Nations".

107. Also in accordance with resolution 2105 (XX), the Committee should recommend a deadline for the accession to independence of each Territory in accordance with the wishes of the people. It was obvious that colonial Powers interested in preserving their rule in the Territories under their domination were resorting to all kinds of delaying tactics.

108. His delegation fully supported the idea of a visit to Africa and was grateful to the five Governments which had extended invitations to the Committee. It would be equally important to send visiting missions to certain Territories in order to establish direct contact with the population, ascertain their wishes and aspirations and determine the real situation. The colonial Powers, which called the legitimate struggle of the people for liberation an act of terrorism, could not be expected to take into account the views of the oppressed peoples. It was to be hoped that the administering Powers would abandon their earlier position of refusing to allow representatives of the Special Committee into their Territories.

109. The Committee should follow its established practice of appointing sub-committees. The advantages of such a practice outweighed the disadvantages; above all, it would save time and expedite the Committee's work.

110. With regard to the Committee's reports, it would be logical in future to omit the historical background material, which could be found in earlier reports.

111. The representative of Sierra Leone said that, under the resolutions adopted at the twentieth session of the General Assembly, the Committee was required to report to the twenty-first session of the Assembly on the Territories on its agenda; for some of the Territories, particularly the smaller ones, the Committee had to consider new ways of solving peculiar problems; lastly, it had to suggest deadlines for the independence of some Territories.

112. His delegation hoped that the Committee would visit Africa, because it thought that the gains which could result from such a visit would outweigh all other considerations. It was the Committee's duty to make every effort to liberate the Territories on that continent which were becoming "chronic" cases of colonialism. The working group should be established as soon as possible and should start by considering whether or not a visit should be made to Africa. Problems such as those of Southern Rhodesia, the Portuguese Territories, South West Africa, Aden and the Federation of South Arabia should be considered during the visit to Africa.

113. In planning its programme, the Committee should bear in mind the time and the resources at its disposal. Considerations of economy, however, should not obscure the primary aim of ensuring that all Territories still under colonial rule received independence. The time remaining before the visit to Africa could be used to consider the other Territories on the agenda and to establish the sub-committees. In addition, more background material could be prepared for the visit to Africa.

114. The United Kingdom representative had mentioned the possibility of a visit to London by representatives of the Committee. It was regrettable, however, that the United Kingdom would not allow visiting missions into the actual Territories concerned. That attitude left doubt about the sincerity of the United Kingdom. Visiting missions to individual Territories on the agenda, particularly the smaller islands, would allow the same kind of direct contact as had been made during the Committee's previous visit to Africa.

115. The task of the Secretariat would be facilitated if all background material were omitted from future reports of the Committee.

116. The representative of Bulgaria said that the statement made by the Secretary-General at the opening of the session (see paras. 14-23 above) had provided guidelines for the Committee's work, in the light of the discussions at the twentieth session of the General Assembly and at meetings of the Special Committee. As the Secretary-General had pointed out, the major problems in the field of decolonization had remained without any positive movement towards peaceful solution and the majority of delegations had expressed serious concern about the continued delay in the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence.

117. Although the majority of delegations agreed on the methods to be followed and thought that the Committee should do everything possible to obtain the implementation of the resolutions of the General Assembly, certain delegations had expressed a different view. The United Kingdom representative, for example, had said that it was not necessarily the right or the only approach to concentrate on seeing that the provisions of all the Assembly resolutions were carried out. If it was the policy of the United Kingdom Government not to implement the resolutions of the General Assembly, it was understandable that the views of the United Kingdom delegation on the subject of the Committee's methods of work differed from those of the majority of delegations. The United Kingdom representative had stated that his Government bore the responsibility for the administration of United Kingdom Territories and for their progress to full self-government and self-determination. That, however, did not absolve the United Kingdom from its obligations, since it claimed that there was no disagreement about general objectives.

118. Moreover, the United Kingdom representative had suggested that the Special Committee should not adopt resolutions but should endeavour to arrive at a consensus, for resolutions reflected only the opinion of the majority, whereas the consensus was the common denominator, namely, the maximum that the colonial Powers could give. It was therefore obvious that opinions differed considerably with regard to the policy which the United Nations had thus far followed in respect of decolonization.

119. The Bulgarian delegation agreed with the United Kingdom representative's statement that the Committee should be careful to organize its work in such a way as not to spend United Nations money unwisely. His delegation wished to emphasize, however, that the Committee should not seek to effect economies by leaving entire populations in Africa and other parts of the world to suffer under the colonial yoke. That was why his delegation considered that the Committee should not let the mere desire to save a few pennies prevent it from taking the necessary initiatives in organizing its work. The Committee should go ahead with the proposals made by various delegations for speeding up its work in connexion with the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples.

120. Some delegations, in particular that of the United Kingdom, had categorically opposed the proposal that the Committee should hold meetings in Africa. The Committee's last visit to Africa had been of great value. During that visit those who were fighting for freedom, independence and self-determination in the Territories under Portuguese domination, in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and other colonial Territories, had been able to appear before the Committee, and the members of the Committee had been able to live in the atmosphere in which the African peoples were waging their desperate struggle against a powerful enemy helped by all the imperialist and reactionary forces of the world. Direct contact with the representatives of those struggling peoples had had a positive influence on the anti-colonial decisions which the Committee had adopted in Africa. There was no doubt regarding the urgent need for the Committee to hold another session in Africa, for events in Southern Rhodesia and elsewhere were evidence of a new offensive by the forces of imperialism and neo-colonialism. A session of the Committee in Africa would enable the United Nations to bring its full weight to bear at that decisive stage in the fight against colonialism.

121. From time to time certain decisions adopted in the United Nations were not effectively implemented. That was why his delegation supported the idea of the Security Council meeting in Africa. At a time when the racists and colonialists were becoming more and more arrogant in their aggressive policy against the oppressed peoples and the young African States, the United Nations body entrusted with the primary responsibility for maintaining peace and security would be able to take the necessary decisions on the spot and to hear the representatives of the African peoples who were in such desperate straits.

122. His delegation therefore suggested that if the Committee did not adopt a resolution on that subject, the Chairman should get in touch with the President of the Security Council during the year in order to suggest a visit to Africa by the Council.

123. The situation in South West Africa had always been one of the most difficult problems. It was well known that the racist Verwoerd Government intended to annex the Territory of South West Africa. That Government had shown nothing but contempt for the decisions of the United Nations, which was primarily responsible for South West Africa. His delegation supported the idea of a special session of the General Assembly on the subject, to be convened as soon as the International Court of Justice had handed down its decision on the question of South West Africa. The Mandate for South West Africa should be withdrawn from South Africa.

124. The Special Committee should of course devote special attention to the question of Aden and the South Arabian peninsula, Oman and other colonial Territories. Attempts had recently been made by certain circles to deprive the peoples of those regions of the possibility of intensifying their struggle for independence. The Special Committee—and the Security Council, if it went to Africa—should endeavour to help those peoples in their efforts for liberation.

125. The colonial Powers should not be given the impression that the Committee was less interested in the so-called small colonial Territories. Manœuvres aimed at perpetuating colonial domination under new guises had recently been undertaken in some of those Territories and the Committee must be vigilant. The General Assembly resolutions on the Territories in the Caribbean, the Atlantic and the Pacific should be scrupulously implemented. He had in mind particularly the General Assembly decision that visiting missions should be sent to those Territories, a point which had been taken up by the representative of Tanzania in his proposal that groups should visit the small Territories. The States administering those Territories should realize that by receiving such missions they would be giving proof of their goodwill and their recognition of the rights of the peoples of the Territories to independence and self-determination.

126. During the past year the Special Committee had devoted much attention to the role of foreign monopolies in Africa. On the basis of studies made by the Committee and in its Sub-Committee I, the General Assembly had taken important decisions concerning the consequences of the activities of foreign monopolies in South West Africa and the Portuguese colonies. The study on the role of monopolies in Southern Rhodesia should be completed and the Committee should recommend to the Assembly practical action to be taken against the harmful influence of the most important imperialist and neo-colonialist bodies in Africa.

127. If the considerations he had set forth were taken into account and if the Committee followed the guidelines indicated in the resolutions of the General Assembly, in the Secretary-General's statement at the opening meeting and by most of the delegations which had spoken, it would be able to work constructively to make the current year one of co-operation in the field of decolonization.

128. The representative of Iraq recalled that, in his statement to the Committee, the Secretary-General had spoken of the unusually heavy programme with which the Committee was faced. The magnitude of the Committee's obligations and responsibilities was indeed in sharp contrast with some ideas which had been expressed regarding its work, especially the suggestion that its deliberations should be curtailed.

129. The Committee had been entrusted by the General Assembly with the task of helping the peoples still under colonial rule and oppression in their struggle for independence and emancipation. It had been given the responsibility of keeping under review the questions of Aden, Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, the Territories under Portuguese administration, Oman and all the other colonial Territories. As the Committee was in permanent session, it would always be entitled to take up any question that arose in connexion with United Nations resolutions and the refusal of colonial Powers to give effect to those resolutions. The Committee's prompt action with regard to the repressive measures recently carried out by the United Kingdom authorities against the people of Aden was an indication of the importance of its role and it should be careful not to abdicate its rights and responsibilities.

130. The Committee should of course organize its work in such a way as to make it possible for delegations and petitioners to participate as fully as possible, but it should not adopt rigid rules or set unchangeable dates for the consideration of items. His delegation would like to put forward the following suggestions.

131. First, the Committee might hold a general debate on the questions before it and try to evaluate the progress achieved thus far. It could discuss the items in detail when it met in Africa. His delegation thanked the Governments of Algeria, Somalia, the United Arab Republic, Ethiopia and the United Republic of Tanzania for their kind invitations, which it hoped the Committee would accept. He was convinced that a session in Africa would be of the utmost benefit.

132. Secondly, the Committee should give serious consideration to the question of setting immediate dates for the attainment of independence by various colonial Territories. His country had stressed the importance of that question at the second Conference of Non-Aligned Countries, held at Cairo, and it was glad to see that that idea had gained support.

133. Thirdly, the Committee should consider ways and means of making its work known throughout the world, particularly in the colonial Territories. The Office of Public Information might be requested to study the matter and to submit a report to the Committee on how the public could be better informed of the plight of the people suffering under the colonial yoke and of the efforts made by the Committee and the General Assembly.

134. Lastly, his delegation saw merit in the sub-committee system and was ready to continue to participate in the sub-committees. There should, however, be no delegation of powers from the Committee itself to its subsidiary bodies. His delegation also supported the suggestion that visiting groups should be sent to the small Territories.

135. The representative of Iran said that in discussing the organization of its work the Committee should bear certain basic factors in mind.

136. First, the Committee should organize its work in such a way as would best accelerate the attainment of the objectives set by the General Assembly. It would accomplish more if it spent most of the time available in helping to expedite the attainment of independence by a number of Territories than if it prepared a report covering all the Territories. His delegation fully supported the suggestion made by the Tanzanian representative that the question of the small Territories should be studied in greater detail. The Committee might send sub-committees to those areas or collect information through other means to supplement the data supplied by the administering Powers. It would then be able to take appropriate action on the question of those Territories.

137. Secondly, it must be borne in mind that the Committee had a heavy agenda and relatively little time available to it. It had been invited by five Member States to hold meetings in Africa. His delegation thanked those countries for their kind invitations and was fully in favour of holding a session in Africa. In organizing its work the Committee must first decide whether it would hold meetings in Africa and, if so, for how long. It must also determine which questions it would deal with during its session in Africa so that other items could be examined in the intervening period.

138. Thirdly, his delegation fully shared the view expressed by the representatives of Italy and Tanzania that greater use should be made of the sub-committee system. The present sub-committees should be reconsidered; some might be dispensed with and new ones might be needed. In determining the composition of the sub-committees, care should be taken to maintain adequate geographical representation and to arrange that every member had an equal opportunity to serve in the various bodies.

Decisions

139. On the conclusion of the debate on organization of work, the Special Committee, at its 399th meeting, requested the Working Group to consider and submit recommendations regarding the Committee's programme of work for the current year, taking into account the two notes by the Secretary-General (A/AC.109/L.260 and L.261), and the invitations extended to the Committee by the Governments of the United Republic of Tanzania (A/AC.109/147), the United Arab Republic (A/AC.109/148), Ethiopia (A/AC.109/149), Somalia (A/AC.109/150) and Algeria (A/AC.109/152) to hold meetings at their respective capitals, as well as the views expressed by members during the debate.

140. On the basis of the recommendations contained in the 22nd, 23rd and 24th reports of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.265/Rev.1, L.270 and L.275), the Special Committee, at its 400th and 409th meetings, took decisions regarding its programme of work for 1966 including the order of priorities for the consideration of the items before it. These decisions, as subsequently modified at the 410th, 462nd and 471st meetings, are reflected in section E of this chapter.

141. In addition, the Special Committee decided to hold a series of meetings in Africa and to accept the invitations from the five Governments to hold meetings at their respective capitals, beginning on 23 May 1966 in Dar es Salaam.

142. It further decided to maintain Sub-Committees I, II and III and requested them to begin their work without delay. In addition to their terms of reference, as laid down in General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XX) and 2105 (XX), the Special Committee requested the Sub-Committees to carry out the specific tasks which are mentioned in the Secretary-General's notes contained in A/AC.109/L.260 and L.261 concerning the items referred to them. It also authorized the Sub-Committees to submit recommendations regarding the sending of visiting groups to the Territories with which they were concerned.

143. In addition, the Special Committee at its 409th meeting, on 26 April 1966, decided to refer to Sub-Committee I for consideration and report the item relating to the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation, pursuant to operative paragraph 9 of the resolution on the question of Southern Rhodesia, adopted at the 328th meeting of the Committee on 22 April 1965 (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. III, para. 292).

180. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of the Territories listed above and its conclusions and recommendations thereon are given in chapters III to XIX and XXII of the present report.

181. The Special Committee took note of the accession to independence of British Guiana on 26 May 1966 (see A/AC.109/SR.421).

182. Owing to lack of time, Sub-Committee II was unable to consider Brunei and Hong Kong.<sup>14</sup> Information concerning these two Territories is given in chapters XX and XXI of the present report.

183. Sub-Committee III was unable to consider British Honduras owing to lack of time. Information on this Territory is contained in chapter XXII of the present report.

F. QUESTION OF SENDING VISITING GROUPS TO TERRITORIES

184. In operative paragraph 7 of its resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, the General Assembly approved "the programme of work envisaged by the Special Committee during 1966, including the possibility of holding a series of meetings in Africa and the sending of visiting groups to Territories, particularly in the Atlantic, Indian and Pacific Ocean areas".

185. In approving the twenty-second report of the working group (A/AC.109/L.265/Rev.1), the Special Committee, at its 400th meeting, on 4 April 1966, authorized its Sub-Committees I, II and III to submit, as appropriate, recommendations to the Special Committee regarding the sending of visiting groups in relation to Territories with which they are concerned.

Recommendation of Sub-Committee III

186. At the 413th meeting, the Special Committee considered an oral report submitted by the Rapporteur of Sub-Committee III concerning the question of sending visiting missions to the Territories referred to it. The recommendation made by Sub-Committee III in this regard, as reproduced below, as well as the statements made by members of the Sub-Committee, are incorporated in its report (A/AC.109/L.329), which is annexed to chapter XXII of the present report. Summaries of the statements made by members during the Special Committee's consideration of the report of the Sub-Committee are given below.

187. In making the report, Mr. Mohsen Sadigh Esfandiary (Iran), Rapporteur of Sub-Committee III, stated that at its meeting on 5 May 1966 the Sub-Committee had authorized its Chairman to contact the representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States in order to ascertain their views concerning the request made by the General Assembly in resolution 2069 (XX), operative paragraph 3, on the question of visiting missions.

188. The reply from the United Kingdom representative had been that the question of visiting missions raised difficult problems of principle for his Government and that he could not say anything that might encourage the Sub-Committee to expect any changes in his Government's previously expressed attitude. His delegation would be prepared to transmit to the United Kingdom Government any specific request or suggestion from the Committee for a visit to a particular Territory, but that action could not be taken to imply any commitment that the United Kingdom Government would be able to respond to such a request.

189. The representative of the United States had said that he was not in position to give a reply to the question of visiting missions in general. Any specific proposal from the Sub-Committee for a visit to a Territory for which the United States was responsible would be transmitted to his Government, but he could not offer any encouragement that his Government would change its position.

190. After considering the replies, the Sub-Committee had adopted by consensus the following recommendation:

"The Sub-Committee recommends to the Special Committee that, in agreement with the position adopted on the question of visiting missions by the General Assembly at its twentieth session, as set out in paragraph 3 of resolution 2069 (XX) of 16 December 1965 and in the pertinent part of paragraph 7 of resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, it invite the administering Powers, in cases where the Special Committee may decide to send out visiting missions to any of the Territories being considered by Sub-Committee III, to make it possible for such visits to take place and to extend to them their co-operation."

191. The representative of the United States of America reserved the position of her Government in regard to the question of visiting missions. Any specific request for a visiting mission would be transmitted by her delegation to the United States Government, but she could not at present offer any encouragement that her Government's position on the matter would change.

192. The representative of Australia reserved his Government's position on the matter.

193. The representative of the United Kingdom confirmed that his delegation's position had been stated accurately by the Rapporteur of Sub-Committee III. If the Committee decided to approve the Sub-Committee's report, he wished to reserve his Government's position.

194. The representative of Bulgaria said that, in order to enable the Special Committee to have some idea of what was happening in the Territories under consideration and to make recommendations to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session, it was essential that visiting missions should be sent to those Territories to obtain information direct from the people. In view of the discouraging replies given by the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom, Sub-Committee III had felt it necessary to recommend that the Special Committee should invite the administering Powers to make it possible for the visits decided upon by the Special Committee to take place and to co-operate with visiting missions. He would point out that the Sub-Committee's recommendation added nothing to what the Special Committee and the General Assembly had already asked.

195. The representative of India supported the interim report presented by the Rapporteur of Sub-Committee III.

196. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that on the basis of a cursory study his delegation felt that the report of Sub-Committee III was in complete conformity with the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly at its twentieth session, in particular resolutions 2069 (XX) and 2105 (XX). The General Assembly had specially instructed the Special Committee to consider the question of establishing dates for the independence of colonial

<sup>14</sup> The representatives of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Bulgaria and Poland stated that since the question of Hong Kong was directly related to the People's Republic of China, the United Nations and its organs, including the Special Committee, could not consider this matter until the lawful rights of the People's Republic of China were restored in the United Nations.

Territories in accordance with the wishes of their peoples. It was essential to send visiting missions to colonial Territories in order to ascertain the views of the people concerning their future development and the status they desired for their Territory. The refusal of the colonial Powers to admit visiting missions, even after repeated requests by the General Assembly, must be regarded as a refusal to co-operate with the Committee and with the United Nations. The Committee should therefore adopt the report of Sub-Committee III and thus make clear the concern of its members for decisions of the General Assembly.

197. The representative of Mali said that his delegation supported the report of Sub-Committee III and was sure that the Special Committee would adopt it, especially as it included two important provisions from resolutions adopted by the General Assembly at its twentieth session. The sending of visiting missions to small Territories as well as to others, would provide the Special Committee and the General Assembly with information that would enable them to adopt adequate measures leading to the granting of independence to colonial Territories by the administering Powers in co-operation with the United Nations.

198. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation supported the report of Sub-Committee III, which reflected the decisions of the General Assembly. The adoption of the Sub-Committee's report would provide an opportunity for the colonial Powers to give the Committee the co-operation they had always promised it, by allowing visiting missions to go to the Territories.

199. The representative of Italy recalled that in the course of the debate in Sub-Committee III his delegation had expressed certain reservations, not about the principle of visiting missions, which it supported, but about the nature of the consensus reached. The Special Committee was only a small body and its pronouncements could not make the resolutions of the General Assembly any more important or more weighty. In addition, it was unrealistic to ask administering Powers to give a positive response to a hypothetical question: whether they would accept visiting missions which the Special Committee might decide to send to the Territories under their administration.

200. The representative of Venezuela said that Sub-Committee III was not merely reaffirming General Assembly resolutions but was making a specific recommendation on the basis of the relevant provisions of two Assembly resolutions. It was not asking for a response from the administering Powers; it was appealing for their support and co-operation in the event of the Special Committee's deciding to send visiting missions to their Territories. Venezuela fully supported the consensus and the report of the Sub-Committee.

201. The representative of Syria said that his delegation endorsed the report. There was no harm in emphasizing General Assembly resolutions which had still not been implemented.

202. The representative of Iran said that the reservations of the Italian delegation had been noted in the records of the Sub-Committee. The consensus had been reached after hearing those reservations and with the consent of the Italian representative.

203. The representative of Uruguay recalled that his delegation's views had been expressed during the discussion in Sub-Committee III. He associated himself with the remarks made by the representative of Venezuela and supported the consensus.

204. The representative of Tunisia said that the report should not give rise to lengthy discussion; it was based on decisions taken at the twentieth session of the General Assembly. His delegation supported the report and hoped that the administering Powers would give their full co-operation.

205. The representative of Sierra Leone expressed whole-hearted support for the report. Only through visiting missions would the Special Committee be able to gain a first-hand knowledge of the problems of the colonial Territories and to find a speedy solution to them.

206. The representatives of Ethiopia and the Ivory Coast expressed support for the Sub-Committee's report.

207. The representative of Afghanistan said that his delegation endorsed the report. It was not discouraged by the reservations expressed, particularly by the United Kingdom and United States delegations, and it hoped that, when they were requested to do so, the administering Powers would co-operate with the Special Committee for the benefit of the people of the dependent Territories.

208. At the same meeting, the Special Committee adopted the report of the Sub-Committee and approved the recommendation contained therein, on the understanding that the reservations expressed by members would be reflected in the record.

209. By letters dated 17 May 1966, the Chairman, on behalf of the Special Committee, transmitted to the Permanent Representatives of the United Kingdom and of the United States to the United Nations the text of the recommendation thus approved by the Special Committee concerning the question of sending visiting missions to Territories referred to that Sub-Committee (A/AC.109/170).

210. By letter dated 23 May 1966, the Permanent Representative of the United States acknowledged receipt of the Chairman's letter.

211. In a letter dated 26 May 1966 (A/AC.109/171), the Deputy Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom stated as follows in reply:

"... The question of visiting missions raises difficult problems of principle for the United Kingdom Government and I am unable therefore to say anything that might encourage the Special Committee to expect any change in my Government's previous attitude to the question as frequently explained to the Special Committee and its Sub-Committees. The United Kingdom delegation would naturally be prepared to transmit to the United Kingdom Government, and seek instructions on, any specific request or suggestion for a visit to a particular territory that the Committee might consider it appropriate to put forward. This cannot, however, be taken as implying any commitment that the United Kingdom Government would be able to respond to such a request."

Recommendation of Sub-Committee II

212. The Special Committee, at the 468th meeting, considered the section of the report of Sub-Committee II on the question of visiting missions to the Territories referred to it (A/AC.109/L.318), which is reproduced in annex II to the present chapter. Summaries of the statements made by members during the Special Committee's consideration of the report of Sub-Committee II concerning this question are given below.

213. Following the introduction of the report by the Rapporteur of the Sub-Committee the representative of the United Kingdom stated his delegation's reservations concerning the sending of visiting missions to Territories administered by the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom delegation had made clear its position on the question during the Sub-Committee's meetings and he drew the attention of the members of the Special Committee to the summary records of these meetings. With regard to visiting missions, he also drew attention to the comments of the United Kingdom delegation set forth in document A/AC.109/171.

214. The representative of the United States of America expressed the reservations of his delegation on the question of the desirability of visiting missions.

215. The representative of Australia said that the Australian position on the question of visiting missions was set forth in document A/AC.109/L.318; although in certain circumstances visiting missions could be of great value, it was doubtful whether they would be useful in the case of the Territories under Australian administration, to which the Trusteeship Council had already sent a number of visiting missions. Just as the administering Power had responsibilities, which it did not seek to deny, it also had the right to make decisions and could not agree in advance to any recommendation without having considered its financial implications, especially when there was a possibility of duplication of effort. The Australian delegation was, however, prepared to transmit to its Government any proposal that the Committee might make on the subject.

216. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics recalled that the majority of the members of Sub-Committee II had recommended, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX), the sending of visiting groups to Territories in the Atlantic, Indian and Pacific Ocean areas, since they considered that those missions would make it possible to obtain first-hand information on the situation in those Territories and on the best means of securing the implementation of the Declaration. Unfortunately it was clear from the summary records and the report of the Sub-Committee that the administering Powers did not share that view and were resorting to pretexts of all kinds in order to obstruct the sending of such missions. The arguments adduced by those Powers did not withstand scrutiny. The United Kingdom delegation said that it was prepared to transmit to its Government any recommendation relating to the sending of visiting missions, but at the same time it made it quite clear that such action did not imply any obligation on the part of the United Kingdom. What could be thought of a Government which sought to ignore the competence of the United Nations and was afraid of the consequences that the Organization's action might have in the economic and political fields? It would seem that the United Kingdom had something to conceal in those Territories. The United States representative, for his part, tried to assure the Committee that the situation in the Territories in the Pacific administered by his Government was so satisfactory that there was no point in sending a visiting mission there. The Special Committee had often heard the fine words of the United States delegation, but it was clear from the facts that the United States had so far done nothing to implement resolution 1514 (XV) in its Territories. Evidence of that was to be found in the report of the WHO Visiting Mission to the Territory of the Pacific Islands, which revealed the deplorable sanitary conditions in which the people of the Territory lived. Australia, too, had followed the example of its partners by stating that it had the right to refuse to receive visiting missions in the areas under its jurisdiction. The Australian Government seemed to forget that the Charter and the Declaration in resolution 1514 (XV) imposed certain obligations on it with respect to the peoples under its administration. By its refusal, Australia demonstrated its contempt for the right of peoples to self-determination, which had become one of the fundamental rules of international law, and for the will of the majority of the States Members of the United Nations. The attitude of New Zealand was scarcely more satisfactory, since the New Zealand Government stated that it did not object to the sending of visiting missions but would be able to receive such missions only as part of a broader survey of the situation in the region. In view of the negative attitude of the other administering Powers, New Zealand's reply was nothing but a disguised refusal. In fact, those four Powers were seeking primarily to conceal the actual situation in the bastions of colonialism which still existed in the Pacific and which they were using in their struggle against the national liberation movements in South-East Asia, and in particular against the people of Viet-Nam. It sufficed to look at a map to see that all those Territories were situated along the major Pacific Ocean routes and were of extreme importance for military communications. Moreover, before the Second World War, the imperialist Powers had already been vying with each other for possession of the most important bases. Twenty years after the cessation of hostilities, their armed forces were still there and by their presence were contributing to the unbridled exploitation of the Territories. After the collapse of the colonial system in the other parts of the world, the Pacific Islands had become an even greater target for the greed of the colonialist Powers. It was worth noting that since that time gold had been found in Fiji and silver and manganese in the Solomons, while Nauru's phosphates were a tempting prize for foreign monopolies. From the agricultural point of view, the Pacific Territories were no less attractive to the large commercial companies, for their perfect climate made them an ideal site for the cultivation of bananas, copra, citrus fruits, coffee, cocoa and medicinal herbs. Seeking to increase their profits still further, the colonial Powers had adopted a whole series of measures to strengthen their position in the extractive and sugar industries and in tropical agriculture. It was regrettable that the working papers prepared by the Secretariat gave very little information in that regard. That was not surprising, since those documents were based essentially on information made available by the administering Powers, which were seeking to keep world opinion in ignorance of the actual situation in those Territories with regard to public health, social security, land tenure, the conditions governing the engagement and dismissal of employees, and the very small part that the indigenous inhabitants played in the civil service.

217. All those facts prevented the Committee from determining what the true situation was and from ascertaining the wishes of the people with regard to their future political and social status. The Committee must gain a true picture of the real situation in the Territories as soon as possible. The only way of doing so was to visit the Territories and to have direct contact with the population. There was no justification for a refusal on the part of the administering Powers; any such refusal to comply with resolution 2105 (XX) and to facilitate the activities of such visiting missions would only confirm the fact that their assurances that they wished to co-operate were only empty words designed to deceive world opinion. If the United Kingdom representative was sincere in saying that the Secretariat reports did not adequately reflect the progress achieved in the Territories, why did he not admit that it was only by sending visiting missions there that the true situation could be ascertained?

218. The representative of the United States of America, replying to the Soviet representative, said that he would provide detailed information on the United States Territories in the Pacific when the Committee discussed the reports on that area. With regard to the question of United States bases, the Committee was well aware that the United States had been obliged to maintain its military presence precisely because of the attitude of certain Powers and because of the needs both of its own defence and of that of the region. When the situation in that part of the world had returned to normal, the United States Government would make it its duty to devote the resources at present being used for military purposes to other ends. In the present circumstances that was unfortunately out of the question.

219. The representative of Australia reserved the right to reply to the remarks of the Soviet representative at the appropriate time. It was well known that no Government was more faithful in discharging the obligations it had undertaken than the Government of Australia. Since the United Nations had been set up, six or seven visiting missions had been able to visit the Territories under Australian administration and their members had been made most welcome. He referred the Committee to the reports of those missions, which gave a detailed account of the situation obtaining in the Territories in question.

220. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation fully supported the conclusions and recommendations in the various parts of the report. At the present time, the essential thing was that the anachronism which the continued survival of colonialism in mid-twentieth century represented should be brought to an end as quickly as possible. The Tanzanian delegation hoped that the administering Powers would place no obstacles in the way of visiting missions and would give them their full co-operation.

221. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that he merely wished to point out that the United States representative's reply confirmed the fact that the Territories in question were being transformed into military bases instead of being developed economically, socially and politically, as laid down in the Charter.

222. As for the large number of visiting missions to which the Australian representative had alluded, most of them had been composed, for the most part, of representatives of administering Powers and their conclusions were therefore unreliable, since the opinion of the other members had not usually been reflected in their reports.

223. At the same meeting the Special Committee adopted the report of Sub-Committee II on this question and endorsed the recommendation contained therein, it being understood that the reservations expressed by members would be reflected in the record.

G. IMPLEMENTATION OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTIONS 2105 (XX) AND 2107 (XX) AND PERTINENT RESOLUTIONS OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE: REQUESTS TO INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTIONS AND SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

Introduction

224. At its 415th meeting, on 18 May 1966, the Special Committee requested the Secretary-General to communicate with the various international institutions in connexion with the appeals addressed to them by the General Assembly and by the Special Committee in their resolutions relating to the implementation of the Declaration and to the Territories under Portuguese administration and South West Africa. The Special Committee asked the Secretary-General to request these institutions to inform the Committee as a matter of urgency, first, whether the requests and appeals to them had been brought before their respective executive organs for decision, and secondly, what action they had taken or contemplated taking in response to those appeals and requests.

225. The paragraphs of the General Assembly resolutions containing requests and appeals to international institutions read as follows:

[Resolution 2105 (XX)]

"11. Requests all States and international institutions, including the specialized agencies of the United Nations, to withhold assistance of any kind to the Governments of Portugal and South Africa until they renounce their policy of colonial domination and racial discrimination;"

[Resolution 2107 (XX)]

"9. Appeals to all the specialized agencies, in particular to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund, to refrain from granting Portugal any financial, economic or technical assistance so long as the Government of Portugal fails to implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV);

"10. Requests the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the specialized agencies concerned and other international relief organizations to increase their assistance to the refugees from the Territories under Portuguese administration and to the people who have suffered from military operations".

226. The Secretary-General transmitted the Special Committee's requests to a number of international institutions including the specialized agencies by letters dated 6 June 1966.

Consideration by the Special Committee

Introduction

227. The Special Committee considered this item at its 464th to 467th meetings between 9 and 15 September 1966.

228. During its consideration of this question, the Special Committee had before it a note by the Secretariat (A/AC.109/194 and Add.1) containing the replies received by the Secretary-General from various international institutions, including the specialized agencies concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX) and pertinent resolutions of the Special Committee.

229. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that he was glad that, at the suggestion of the Working Group, the question of the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX) had been placed on the agenda of the Special Committee.

230. It was the opinion of the USSR delegation—and the same opinion had been expressed many times by various other delegations—that the Special Committee should do its utmost to ensure that the resolutions directed towards the rapid elimination of the colonial régimes were put into effect. The Committee could make no claim to efficiency if it was content to set forth measures that were considered desirable and did not concern itself about the implementation of the United Nations decisions.

231. It was indeed the fundamental task of the Special Committee to keep a close watch on the implementation by the colonial Powers of the General Assembly decisions concerning the manifold aspects of decolonization. That task was all the more important in that those Powers stopped at nothing in their efforts to obstruct the implementation of those decisions; they did their utmost to maintain their domination over the colonial Territories, either directly or through puppet régimes, and even used force in their fight against the national liberation movements of Africa, Asia and Latin America.

232. In view of those manoeuvres on the part of the colonial Powers, it was even more urgently necessary to ascertain how the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Committee were being put into effect by all those concerned, and by the specialized agencies of the United Nations as well.

233. In that connexion, the USSR delegation was sorry to note that some agencies were disregarding the General Assembly resolutions, although they had been directly asked to take steps to put them into effect. The replies of the specialized agencies to the questions of the Secretary-General, who in accordance with a decision taken by the Committee on 18 May 1966 had asked them to inform him what they had done to comply with the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Committee, and in particular to comply with the provisions of paragraph 11 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX), could not be considered satisfactory. While some specialized agencies had already considered the General Assembly's request and had taken, or were preparing to take, certain steps in that connexion—UNESCO, for example, was to be congratulated on its decision to place the question of the tasks that devolved upon it in the light of the resolutions on the liquidation of colonialism and racism adopted by the General Assembly at its twentieth session on the agenda of the fourteenth General Conference—some replies showed that a number of agencies were disregarding the decisions of the General Assembly. That was true in particular of the replies of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund. Those agencies had in fact evaded the question. They had not even deigned to state, in reply to the Secretary-General's request, what steps they proposed to take to comply with the General Assembly's decisions. Such an attitude was tantamount to a repudiation of the wishes of the overwhelming majority of Members of the United Nations. In the case of the International Bank, that fact was confirmed by the policy of that agency, which had just approved two loans, amounting to $30 million, for the expansion of the Portuguese electrical network. That decision was patently contrary to resolution 2107 (XX), and in particular paragraph 9 of that resolution. Moreover, the Bank had repeated that offence by approving a loan of $20 million to none other than the Government of South Africa, thus bringing the number of loans already granted to the South African Government by the Bank to eleven, with a total value of $241.8 million. The authorities of the Bank, which was dominated by United States capital, were certainly not unaware of the relevant General Assembly resolutions, which had been brought to their attention as early as March 1966. That action on the part of the Bank was in flagrant contradiction both with the United Nations policy of refusing all assistance to racists and colonialists and with the United Nations resolution asking for sanctions to be applied against the Portuguese and South African colonialists. By granting large loans to the Governments of Portugal and South Africa, the International Bank had simply given further proof of the criminal alliance of international capital and the colonialists, united in their efforts to combat the national liberation movements of the peoples of South West Africa, Mozambique and Angola and other colonial peoples.

234. He urged that the Committee should condemn the decision of the International Bank to grant loans to Portugal and South Africa and demand that the agreements already concluded should be cancelled. The Committee must ensure that the Bank respected the United Nations resolutions condemning colonialism in all its forms, such as racism and apartheid, as a crime against humanity.

235. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania expressed his delegation's appreciation of the replies received from certain international bodies and United Nations agencies on the subject of General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX). His delegation had noted with particular satisfaction that the WHO Regional Committee for Africa had adopted a resolution suspending Portugal's right to participation in the Committee and suspending any assistance to that country.

236. His delegation wished, however, to record its disapproval of the disregard and lack of co-operation shown by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. Although in its reply the Bank claimed to have brought the request before its Executive Directors, it was not only surprising but somewhat shocking to find that the Bank had recently granted the neo-fascist régime of South Africa a loan of $20 million. The Bank had also granted assistance to the Portuguese colonialist régime for various projects which might increase that régime's power to suppress the African people of Mozambique, Angola and so-called Portuguese Guinea. Since 1963, when the Bank had signed an agreement for a loan of some $5 million to the fascist Government of Portugal, that Government had stepped up its aggressive war against the people of those Territories. While his delegation acknowledged that the activities of the Bank were beneficial to some areas, it felt that the extension of any assistance that might in any way alleviate some of the self-created problems of the Portuguese colonialists and South African racists was contrary to the interests and legitimate aspirations of the peoples of Angola, Mozambique, so-called Portuguese Guinea and South West Africa. His delegation called upon all those who cherished freedom and independence to join in the universal struggle against colonialism and its crimes against humanity. There was ample evidence to show that the Portuguese colonialist régime could not continue its policies without the assistance it was receiving from its friends. Similarly, the South African régime was able to go on flouting world public opinion because it received encouragement and assistance from its hypocritical trading partners.

237. In his delegation's view, all international institutions and agencies should act in concert to ensure that the principles underlying the decisions of the General Assembly were respected. Such concerted action was of great importance both materially and morally to the masses of the African people in their struggle to overcome colonialist aggression and apartheid. Any action by an international body contrary to the decisions of the United Nations was a challenge to the Organization and a blow to national liberation movements. It was therefore his delegation's hope that the International Bank would reconsider its position and extend its full co-operation not only to the United Nations but to the heroic peoples of South West Africa and so-called Portuguese Guinea, who were waging a struggle against the forces condemned by civilized humanity.

238. In conclusion, his delegation hoped that all international institutions which had not yet done so would immediately take all the steps called for in resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX).

239. The representative of Syria said that, when the Secretary-General had been requested to draw the attention of the specialized agencies to the provisions of the United Nations resolutions enjoining those agencies to refrain from extending to South Africa and Portugal assistance which would run counter to the objectives of the United Nations, it had been expected that those agencies would give a clear-cut undertaking that they would comply with the resolutions. Some agencies had done so, but others had given evasive answers, saying, for example, that they had referred the matter to their administrators. Perhaps, having made loans to both South Africa and Portugal, those agencies did not know how to reply or perhaps they considered their administrators above the United Nations. In either case, it was a serious matter. For the time being, however, the Committee might simply say that it expected more thorough replies where the commitment to put the United Nations resolutions into full effect was beyond question.

240. The representative of Bulgaria, referring to documents A/AC.109/194 and Add. 1, expressed regret that certain international institutions and specialized agencies forming part of the United Nations family had waited until the Committee's decision of 18 May 1966 and the sending of the Secretary-General's note before reacting to the General Assembly resolutions. That was particularly true of the International Bank and the International Monetary Fund, which were specifically mentioned in resolution 2107 (XX).

241. Those two bodies had once again submitted a purely formal reply—a procedure which did not reflect a very accommodating attitude towards the United Nations and had been the subject of expressions of disapproval by the General Assembly. It might be supposed that those replies indicated that the two organizations in question had been merely inactive with regard to the task of decolonization being undertaken by the United Nations. In fact, however, even after the decision adopted by the Special Committee on 18 May, the International Bank had approved two loans amounting to $30 million to enable Portugal to improve its electric supply system. The Bank had thus shown genuine contempt for the decisions of the United Nations, particularly resolution 2107 (XX), which appealed to the International Bank and the International Monetary Fund to refrain from granting Portugal any financial, economic or technical assistance so long as the Portuguese Government failed to implement General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). The loans granted to Portugal were not an isolated case; the recent $20 million loan to the Government of South Africa was further proof that it was part of the Bank's policy to co-operate with colonialist and racist régimes. It was to be noted that the Bank had already granted South Africa eleven loans totalling $241.8 million. The studies made by the Special Committee and by Sub-Committee I had thrown light on the pernicious part played by the international financial interests which were partners of the racist and colonialist régimes in exploiting the natural resources of the colonial countries. The Committee must not permit those interests to pursue their policy of assisting the Portuguese and South African régimes through two bodies which were affiliated with the United Nations.

242. His delegation was pleased to note that a number of international institutions and specialized agencies took a serious attitude towards General Assembly decisions and towards the appeals which the Assembly had addressed to them. Some, such as the International Labour Organisation and the World Health Organization, had not only taken account of United Nations resolutions on decolonization in their general work but had adopted specific measures to implement those resolutions. The World Health Organization and its nineteenth Assembly were to be commended for adopting a resolution which suspended Portugal's right to participate in the Regional Committee for Africa and in regional activities until its Government furnished proof of its willingness to conform to the injunctions of the United Nations and which also suspended technical assistance to Portugal in application of General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX).

243. The representative of India said that his delegation had given its full support to the efforts of the United Nations to induce the Governments of Portugal and South Africa to abandon their present policies; in that spirit, it had supported General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX), which appealed to the specialized agencies to refrain from granting assistance to Portugal and South Africa until they renounced their present policies. Since resolution 2107 (XX) mentioned in particular the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund, his delegation had been disappointed to hear of the recent granting of new loans to South Africa by the Bank. Any such help would only encourage the Governments of Portugal and South Africa in their shameful policies. At the same time, his delegation paid a tribute to the Bank and the Fund for their record in helping developing countries to achieve decent levels of living.

Action taken by the Special Committee

244. At the 466th meeting on 14 September 1966 the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania introduced a draft resolution concerning General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX): requests to international institutions including the specialized agencies (A/AC.109/L.330), jointly sponsored by Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, United Republic of Tanzania and Yugoslavia.

245. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania observed that the Committee had already examined the report of the Secretary-General based on the replies he had received to his request to international institutions not to give any assistance to South Africa and Portugal. The Afro-Asian group and Yugoslavia had considered the matter further and had agreed that the time had come for concrete action. They had therefore produced the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.330) requesting those international institutions which were enabling the Portuguese and South African régimes to continue their unjust treatment of innocent Africans to desist from that policy. He read out the text of the draft resolution.

246. The draft resolution asked for nothing more than justice, and the Committee should surely adopt it.

247. The representative of Iran stressed the need to deny South Africa and Portugal any assistance, financial or other, so long as they continued their policy of oppressing the African population, as indicated in operative paragraphs 2 and 3 of the draft resolution.

248. The request was addressed, in particular, to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund, which had done much to bridge the gap between rich and poor by helping developing countries but would be doing just the opposite by providing aid to South Africa and Portugal; for such aid would strengthen the régimes of those countries which pursued policies wholly detrimental to the welfare of the African population.

249. He hoped that all the specialized agencies, in particular the Bank and the Fund, would refrain from granting aid to South Africa and Portugal, and that the draft resolution would be adopted unanimously.

250. The representative of Tunisia said that he would have preferred the Committee take a decision on the draft resolution by consensus, since, in his view, it was couched in sufficiently moderate terms to gain the support of all members of the Committee.

251. He deplored the fact that the Bank and the Fund had continued to grant new loans to Portugal and South Africa although General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX) had been communicated to them. The draft resolution now submitted made a further appeal to them to co-operate in implementing resolutions of the General Assembly.

252. The representative of Bulgaria stated that his delegation welcomed draft resolution A/AC.109/L.330 because it felt that it was time for the Committee to take a clear, unequivocal stand on the activities of international institutions with regard to colonial problems and particularly with regard to the implementation of General Assembly resolutions. His delegation agreed with the sponsors of the draft resolution that the Committee should express appreciation to those international institutions and specialized agencies which were seriously trying to act on the Assembly's appeals and assist in the process of decolonization, and condemn those which, like the International Bank, were taking action contrary to the Assembly's decisions and continuing to aid the Portuguese and South African colonialists and racists. His delegation shared the view of those speakers who had called upon the International Bank to cancel the loans recently granted to Portugal and South Africa. Although no such provision appeared in the draft resolution, his delegation supported and would vote for the latter, since it expressed the ideas which it was the task of the United Nations to uphold.

253. The representative of Australia said that, as an expression of concern regarding important aspects of the present policies of South Africa and Portugal, draft resolution A/AC.109/L.330 was bound to evoke the Australian delegation's sympathy. Despite its opposition to those policies, however, the Australian delegation could not but express its anxiety when efforts were made to control or channel international aid for political purposes, particularly when the limiting of aid might in practice mean deprivation or the elimination of opportunity for innocent people. The observance of agreements was vital to the conduct of human relations. Under the terms of article IV of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, neither organization was to present formal recommendations to the other without reasonable prior consultation with regard thereto and the United Nations recognized that action taken by the Bank on loans should be determined by the independent exercise of the Bank's own judgement. The draft resolution before the Committee did not seem to be in accord with either the spirit or the letter of that Agreement. For those reasons, his delegation could not support the draft resolution as it stood.

254. The representative of the United Kingdom recalled that his delegation had reserved its position on the issue of the introduction of political controversy in the specialized agencies in a statement at the last session of the General Assembly.<sup>15</sup> His delegation had accordingly reserved its position on the same matter at the 415th meeting of the Special Committee and wished now to reserve its position on draft resolution A/AC.109/L.330, on which it would abstain.

255. The representative of the United States of America reserved the position of her delegation on the draft resolution, in the light of the agreements between the United Nations and the Bank and the Fund; in that regard, she wished to associate her delegation with the reservations expressed by the Australian delegation.

256. The representative of Uruguay said that his delegation had voted in favour of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX) but not of resolution 2107 (XX); in view of that fact, and in the absence of instructions, his delegation would have to abstain on the draft resolution. That abstention did not affect the basic position of Uruguay in condemning the policies of South Africa and Portugal.

257. The representative of Denmark said that at the last session of the General Assembly his delegation had either reserved its position or abstained from voting on provisions similar to those in the present draft resolution. It must therefore reserve its position with respect to the present draft resolution also. Its attitude was approximately the same as that expressed by the Australian representative.

258. At its 467th meeting on 15 September 1966, the Chairman, before putting the draft resolution to the vote, informed the Special Committee that in operative paragraph 3 the words "from rendering any financial assistance" had been revised by the sponsors to read "from rendering any financial or other assistance".

259. At the same meeting, the Special Committee adopted the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.320) as orally revised, by 15 votes to none, with 7 abstentions.

260. The representative of Venezuela speaking in explanation of his vote, said that his delegation had been obliged to abstain in the vote, primarily because it had received no instructions. In conformity with the position taken by his delegation on the same matter at the last session of the General Assembly, its abstention should not be interpreted as a change in its position regarding the policies of Portugal and South Africa, a position which was well known to the Special Committee.

261. The resolution (A/AC.109/206) thus adopted by the Special Committee at its 467th meeting, on 15 September 1966, entitled "General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX): requests to international institutions, including the specialized agencies", reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having considered the replies (A/AC.109/194 and Add.1) received from international institutions and the specialized agencies on the implementation of paragraph 11 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965 and paragraphs 9 and 10 of resolution 2107 (XX) of 21 December 1965, containing requests and appeals addressed to them,

"Noting with appreciation that several international institutions and specialized agencies have undertaken or intend to undertake in the near future measures for the implementation of the above-mentioned resolutions,

"Regretting that the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund continue to grant substantial loans and credits to the Governments of Portugal and South Africa in disregard of the above-mentioned resolutions,

"1. Expresses its appreciation to those international institutions and specialized agencies which are co-operating with the United Nations in the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX) and appeals to them to continue their efforts in this regard;

"2. Expresses its deep disappointment at the granting of new loans and the extension of credits to the Governments of South Africa and Portugal by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund;

"3. Urges the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund to co-operate in the implementation of General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) and 2107 (XX), by refraining from rendering any financial or other assistance to the Governments of Portugal and South Africa until they have renounced their policies of colonial domination and racial discrimination."

262. The text of this resolution was transmitted to international institutions and the specialized agencies by a letter dated 2 October 1966.

H. QUESTION OF THE LIST OF TERRITORIES TO WHICH THE DECLARATION ON THE GRANTING OF INDEPENDENCE TO COLONIAL COUNTRIES AND PEOPLES IS APPLICABLE

263. In its report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session, the Special Committee stated that "subject to any directives the General Assembly at its twentieth session may wish to give for the speedy implementation of the Declaration, the Special Committee intends to continue its consideration of the question of the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable" (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. I, para. 66).

264. In the seventh preambular paragraph of its resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, the General Assembly noted "the action taken and envisaged by the Special Committee regarding the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable".

265. At its 471st meeting, the Special Committee considered a report submitted by the Working Group concerning this question, which is contained in paragraphs 6 to 10 of the latter's twenty-fifth report (A/AC.109/L.338). These paragraphs read as follows:

"6. The Working Group noted that in its report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session the Special Committee had stated as follows: 'Subject to any directives the General Assembly at its twentieth session may wish to give for the speedy implementation of the Declaration, the Special Committee intends to continue its consideration of the question of the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable' (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. I, para. 66).

"7. The Working Group was also aware that, in the seventh preambular paragraph of its resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, the General Assembly noted 'the action taken and envisaged by the Special Committee regarding the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable'.

"8. In this connexion, members recalled that, as stated in its report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session (ibid., para. 65), the Special Committee at its last session had before it a letter from the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Cuba requesting the inclusion of the question of Puerto Rico on the agenda of the Special Committee but that, owing to lack of time, the Committee was unable to examine that request.

"9. Members also recalled that in his address at the opening meeting of the Special Committee in Addis Ababa on 6 June 1966 (A/AC.109/SR.433) the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) drew attention to the omission of the Comoro Archipelago from the list of Territories to which the Declaration applies, and requested that the necessary corrections be made.

"10. Following an exchange of views on various suggestions, the Working Group agreed that the question of the inclusion of these Territories, namely, Puerto Rico and the Comoro Archipelago, required further detailed study and that, in view of the lack of time at this session, it should make such a study at an early date during the next session of the Special Committee. It further agreed that, at that time, it would also consider any other Territories which might be included in the list of 'all other Territories which have not yet attained independence'."

266. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics pointed out that the question of the inclusion of Puerto Rico on the agenda of the Special Committee had already been considered the previous year and it was clear from document A/6000/Rev.1, chapter I, paragraphs 65-66, that the Committee had decided to continue its consideration of the question at subsequent sessions. Since that time, many requests had been received to the same effect, stating that the inclusion of Puerto Rico on the Committee's agenda was fully justified. His delegation was therefore in favour of considering the question during the current session; it was a perfectly clear issue since the people of Puerto Rico had not been given an opportunity to express their wishes freely concerning the future status of their country.

267. The representative of Bulgaria said that his delegation would agree with the consensus that the question of the inclusion of Puerto Rico on the Committee's agenda should be discussed early in the next session. The Special Committee was quite competent to consider Puerto Rico as a dependent Territory to which resolution 1514 (XV) was fully applicable. The Declaration in that resolution was the raison d'être of the Committee and statements appearing in United Nations documents before that Declaration had been adopted could not be allowed to prevent the Special Committee from considering all dependent Territories. He had welcomed the request made by the Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries in 1964 that the Special Committee should consider the question of Puerto Rico in the light of resolution 1514 (XV).

268. The representative of the United States of America explained that the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico was fully self-governing and autonomous, a fact which had been confirmed by the General Assembly, and was therefore not subject to the jurisdiction of the Special Committee. Her delegation would view very seriously any attempt to discuss the matter since that would question Puerto Rico's self-governing status. That status had been established following an overwhelming vote by the people of Puerto Rico in 1952. In view of the adoption of resolution 748 (VIII) by the General Assembly in 1953, her delegation considered that the subject should not be included in the Special Committee's agenda.

269. At the same meeting, the Special Committee approved the proposals contained in paragraph 10 of the report of the Working Group, it being understood that the reservations expressed by members would be reflected in the records.

I. CONSIDERATION OF OTHER MATTERS

Implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to colonial Territories considered by the Special Committee during its meetings in Africa (1966)

270. At its 454th and 455th meetings, held in Algiers on 21 and 22 June 1966, the Special Committee considered a draft resolution relating to the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to colonial Territories considered by the Committee during its meetings in Africa (1966). The draft resolution was adopted by the Special Committee at its 455th meeting on 22 June 1966 (A/AC.109/188). Details of the Special Committee's consideration of this item are contained in chapter II of the present report.

Report of the delegation of the Special Committee to the international conference concerning South West Africa, Oxford (March 1966)

271. At the 396th meeting, the Special Committee decided to accept an invitation extended to it to send observers to an international conference concerning South West Africa to be held at Oxford, England, from 23 to 27 March 1966. At the 398th meeting, the Committee decided that the delegation of observers to attend the conference on behalf of the Special Committee should consist of Mr. Hans Tabor (Denmark) and Mr. Gershon Collier (Sierra Leone). The Special Committee took into consideration the report of the delegation to the conference (A/AC.109/L.290) in its examination of the question of South West Africa, an account of which is contained in chapter IV of the present report.

Co-operation with the Organization of African Unity and the League of Arab States

272. At the 403rd meeting, the Special Committee decided to accede to a request by cable from the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) that the Organization be represented as an observer at the Special Committee's meetings. Accordingly, representatives of the Organization attended the Committee's meetings at United Nations Headquarters, in Dar es Salaam and Addis Ababa as observers.

273. At the 440th meeting, the Committee decided to accede to a request dated 11 June 1966 from the Acting Secretary-General of the League of Arab States (A/AC.109/182) that the League be represented as an observer at the Special Committee's meetings in Cairo. Accordingly, a representative of the League of Arab States attended the Committee's meetings in Cairo in an observer capacity.

274. In a letter dated 20 September 1966, the Chairman of the Special Committee, having regard to section II, paragraph 14, sub-paragraph (c) thereof, transmitted the report of the Sub-Committee on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland to the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU.

Matters relating to Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland

(a) Appointment of United Nations Special Representatives

275. The Special Committee, in operative paragraph 7 of its resolution of 9 June 1966 on Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland (A/AC.109/178), requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Special Committee, to appoint United Nations Special Representatives in each of the Territories for the purpose of following up the progress towards independence and to report to the General Assembly as soon as possible. The report of the Secretary-General concerning this matter was made available to members of the Special Committee in document A/AC.109/199.

(b) Operation of the Fund for Economic Development of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland

276. In operative paragraph 9 of its resolution 2063 (XX) of 16 December 1965 on the question of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to appoint resident representatives in the three Territories and to report to the Assembly at its twenty-first session on the operation of the Fund established under paragraph 7 of the same resolution. In operative paragraph 5 of its resolution adopted on 9 June 1966 (A/AC.109/178) the Special Committee addressed a further appeal to all States to contribute to the above-mentioned Fund.

277. In his report to the General Assembly at its twenty-first session (A/6439), the Secretary-General expressed regret that, as the contributions pledged so far were insufficient, it had not been possible to bring the Fund into operation (ibid., para. 6). Specific pledges of contributions received up to that time to the Fund were: Cyprus, £100; Democratic Republic of Congo, $US2,500; and Liberia $US6,000. In addition, Denmark and India had indicated that their Governments would contribute to the Fund when it became operational. Since then a further pledge has been received from Kuwait for $US2,000.

278. As regards the appointment of resident representatives in the three Territories, the Secretary-General stated in his report (ibid., para. 7) that the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) had established separate offices headed by a Deputy Resident Representative in each of the Territories under the general supervision of the Regional Representative of the UNDP in Lusaka, Zambia.

Information on Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter

279. The General Assembly, by resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, decided to dissolve the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and entrusted its functions to the Special Committee. The Special Committee accordingly considered, at its 472nd and 473rd meetings on 12 and 19 October 1966, an item on information on Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of this item are contained in chapter XXIII of the present report.

Activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation

280. At its 328th meeting, on 22 April 1965, the Special Committee adopted a resolution on the question of Southern Rhodesia (A/6000/Rev. 1, chap. III, para. 292). In operative paragraph 9 of that resolution the Special Committee decided "to study in co-operation with the Secretary-General and the agencies of the United Nations the implications of the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation in order to assess their economic and political influence".

281. At its 409th meeting, on 26 April 1966, the Special Committee decided, without objection, to refer to Sub-Committee I, for consideration, the item relating to the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia and their mode of operation.

282. Sub-Committee I submitted its report on this item to the Special Committee on 29 September 1966. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of the report are contained in chapter III of the present report.

Activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in the Territories under Portuguese administration

283. The Special Committee, in its resolution adopted at its 277th meeting, on 3 July 1964 (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. V, para. 352), requested "Sub-Committee I of the Special Committee, with the assistance of the Secretary-General, to study the activities of foreign economic and other interests, which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence in the Territories under Portuguese administration". On the basis of the study by Sub-Committee I, the Special Committee submitted a report on the matter to the General Assembly at its twentieth session (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V), in which it endorsed the conclusions and recommendations of the Sub-Committee. In its conclusions and recommendations, the Sub-Committee informed the Special Committee as follows:

"278.... In order to enable it to have a more comprehensive view of the effects of foreign economic and other activities in the other major sectors of the economic life of the Territories under Portuguese administration, the Sub-Committee has asked the Secretariat to prepare background papers on the agricultural and allied industries, foreign owned railways and the economic relations of Mozambique with South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. After the Sub-Committee has reviewed the additional information, it will report to the Special Committee and submit such further observations, conclusions and recommendations as may be necessary." (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. V, appendix, para. 278.)

284. Sub-Committee I continued its consideration of this question in 1966 and submitted a supplementary report to the Special Committee at the 470th meeting on 6 October 1966. An account of the Sub-Committee's consideration of this report is contained in chapter V of the present report.

Matters relating to the small Territories

285. In operative paragraph 8 of its resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, the General Assembly requested "the Special Committee to pay particular attention to the small Territories and to recommend to the General Assembly the most appropriate ways, as well as the steps to be taken, to enable the populations of those Territories to exercise fully their right to self-determination and independence".

286. In requesting its Sub-Committees I, II and III to carry out the tasks assigned to them, the Special Committee called their attention to the above-mentioned provision of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX). Further, in arriving at its conclusions and recommendations concerning the small Territories, details of which are contained in the relevant chapters of the present report, the Special Committee took the same provision into consideration.

287. Subject to any directives that the General Assembly at its twenty-first session may wish to give for the speedy implementation of the Declaration in respect of these Territories, the Special Committee will continue to be guided by this and other provisions of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX).

288. In operative paragraph 9 of its resolution 2105 (XX), the General Assembly requested "the Special Committee, whenever it considers it appropriate, to recommend a deadline for the accession to independence of each Territory in accordance with the wishes of the people".

289. In requesting its Sub-Committees I, II and III to carry out the tasks assigned to them, the Special Committee called their attention to the above-mentioned provision of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX). Further in its consideration of specific territories, the Special Committee took the same provision into consideration.

290. Subject to any directives that the General Assembly at its twenty-first session may wish to give in this regard, the Special Committee intends to pursue its consideration of all Territories which have not yet attained independence, and in this connexion will continue to be guided by this and other provisions of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX).

291. In its resolution 2116 (XX) of 21 December 1965 concerning the pattern of conferences, the General Assembly decided, inter alia, "that a fixed pattern of conferences to govern the places and dates of the meetings of United Nations bodies shall come into force on 1 January 1966 for a further period of three years". It requested the Secretary-General "to submit to the General Assembly each year a basic programme of conferences for the following year, established in conformity with the present pattern and after consultation, as appropriate, with the organs concerned". It also urged "all organs of the United Nations... to review their working methods and also the frequency and length of sessions, in the light of the present resolution, the growing volume of meetings, the resulting strain on available resources and the difficulty of ensuring the effective participation of members".

292. By adopting the twenty-fifth report of the working group (A/AC.109/L.338), the Special Committee at its 471st meeting on 10 October 1966 decided to hold two sessions in 1967, the first from 20 February to 31 May, and the second from 17 July to 25 August. This will provide for fourteen working weeks during the first session, a recess of six weeks during June and July, and six working weeks during the second session.

293. It was the understanding of the Special Committee in taking this decision that the above meetings programme would not preclude the holding of extra-session meetings on an emergency basis if developments so warranted. Further, the decision was based on the expectation that the Special Committee would be able to complete the major part of its work by the end of its first session. Included in the first session would also be any meetings which the Special Committee may decide to hold outside Headquarters. In fixing the closing date indicated above, the Special Committee also took account of the annual Trusteeship Council session which normally begins at the end of May and lasts for about one month. The Special Committee envisaged that the second session which should conclude before the opening of the twenty-second session of the General Assembly would be devoted to the consideration of unfinished business as well as any developments after the close of the first session which the Special Committee may wish to bring to the attention of the Assembly.

294. The Special Committee further decided that any visiting groups it might be able to dispatch to Territories should time their visits so that their reports may be taken up by the Special Committee at the beginning of its second session.

295. Finally, the Special Committee decided that in order to ensure adherence to the programme outlined above, it would, first, decide its programme of work in some detail at the beginning of the first session, and secondly, decide upon the Territories to which it would send visiting groups, in order to allow sufficient time for the necessary negotiations, planning and administrative arrangements.

J. RELATIONS WITH OTHER UNITED NATIONS BODIES

Security Council

296. The General Assembly, in its resolution 1956 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963, invited the Special Committee to apprise the Security Council of any developments in any Territory examined by it which may threaten international peace and security.

(a) Southern Rhodesia

297. In operative paragraph 6 of its resolution of 21 April 1966 (A/AC.109/158), the Special Committee recommended to the Security Council "to consider urgently the further measures envisaged under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations to put into effect its decisions concerning Southern Rhodesia". The text of the resolution, together with the records of the debate on the question in the Special Committee, was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 21 April 1966.<sup>16</sup>

298. By operative paragraph 6 of its resolution of 31 May 1966 (A/AC.109/167), the Special Committee drew once again "the attention of the Security Council to the grave situation prevailing in Southern Rhodesia with a view to recommending mandatory sanctions under Chapter VII of the Charter and to taking appropriate measures to secure the effective application of sanctions in case of default by any State". In operative paragraph 7 of the same resolution, the Special Committee recommended to the Security Council "that it request the Government of the United Kingdom to take measures provided for in Chapter VII of the Charter in order, by the use of air, sea or land forces, to prevent any supplies, including oil and petroleum products, from reaching Southern Rhodesia". The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 14 June 1966.<sup>17</sup>

(b) South West Africa

299. By operative paragraph 5 of its resolution of 9 June 1966 (A/AC.109/177), the Special Committee drew "the attention of the Security Council to the serious situation prevailing in South West Africa and its aggravation caused by the racist rebellion in Southern Rhodesia and its consequences for international peace and security". The Special Committee, in operative paragraph 6 of this resolution recommended to the Security Council "to make it obligatory for all States to implement the measures contained in General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963 and in particular those mentioned in paragraph 7 thereof". It further recommended to the Security Council "to take the necessary measures to ensure the withdrawal of all military bases and installations from the Territory". The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 14 June 1966.<sup>18</sup>

(c) Aden

300. By operative paragraph 10 of its resolution of 15 June 1966 (A/AC.109/179/Rev.1), the Special Committee drew "the attention of the Security Council to the dangerous situation prevailing in the area as a result of British military action against the people of the Territory". The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 15 June 1966.<sup>19</sup>

(d) Territories under Portuguese administration

301. In operative paragraph 6 of its resolution of 22 June 1966 (A/AC.109/187), the Special Committee recommended to the Security Council "to make obligatory for all States to implement the measures contained in General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX), in particular those mentioned in paragraph 7 thereof". The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 1 July 1966.<sup>20</sup>

302. In operative paragraph 3 of its resolution of 22 June 1966 (A/AC.109/188), the Special Committee recommended to the Security Council "to make obligatory the measures provided for under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter against Portugal, South Africa and the racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia". The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 1 July 1966.<sup>21</sup>

Trusteeship Council

303. In accordance with paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) which requested the Trusteeship Council to assist the Special Committee in its work, the President of the Trusteeship Council, by letter dated 25 July 1966 (A/AC.109/191) addressed to the Chairman, informed the Special Committee that the Council at its thirty-third session examined conditions in the Trust Territories of the Pacific Islands, Nauru and New Guinea. The letter stated that the conclusions and recommendations of the Trusteeship Council, as well as the observations of the members of the Trusteeship Council, representing their individual opinions only, were contained in its report to the Security Council on the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands<sup>22</sup> and in its report to the General Assembly on Nauru and New Guinea (A/6304).

Special Committee on the Policies of Apartheid of the Government of the Republic of South Africa

304. The Chairman of the Special Committee has maintained close contact with the Chairman of the Special Committee on the Policies of Apartheid of the Government of the Republic of South Africa as regards matters of common interest relating to the work of the two Committees.

305. By letter dated 14 September 1966 addressed to the Chairman of the Special Committee, the Chairman of the Special Committee on the Policies of Apartheid of the Government of South Africa drew attention to a memorandum received from Mr. Matthew Nkoana of the Pan-Africanist Congress of South Africa, concerning the arrest in Basutoland of Mr. John Myati Pokela, a member of that party (A/AC.109/204). The memorandum, reproduced in document A/AC.115/L.182, was made available to the members of the Special Committee.

306. Collaboration of the specialized agencies with the Special Committee has been maintained by the presence of representatives of the International Labour Organisation (ILO), the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and the World Health Organization (WHO) at meetings of the Special Committee.

307. During the period covered by the report, the Special Committee adopted the following resolutions which contained appeals or requests addressed to international institutions, including the specialized agencies:

K. REVIEW OF WORK<sup>23</sup>

309. In resolution 2105 (XX), the General Assembly renewed the mandate of the Special Committee requesting it to continue to perform its task and to continue to seek the best means for the immediate and full application of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) to all Territories which have not yet attained independence. The Assembly also requested the Committee to pay particular attention to the small Territories; to recommend a deadline for the accession of each Territory to independence whenever it considered it appropriate; and to apprise the Security Council of developments in any Territory which may threaten international peace and security and to make suggestions which might assist the Council in considering appropriate measures under the Charter of the United Nations.

310. At the beginning of its work in 1966, many members of the Special Committee expressed the feeling that progress in the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples has fallen far short of the expectations aroused by its adoption nearly six years ago. It was noted that generally there had been no abatement in the persistent violation of the right of colonial countries and peoples to self-determination, and in repressive activities by the Powers concerned, in collusion with vested economic and other interests, against the struggle of national liberation movements. The belief was expressed that this anachronistic state of affairs represented one of the basic causes of the prevailing unfavourable international situation. In particular, many members were gravely concerned that, owing to the deliberate opposition or the continuing non-co-operation of the administering Powers concerned, a number of serious and difficult colonial problems had shown no perceptible movement towards peaceful solution within the context of the Declaration, and had attained alarmingly grave proportions, fraught with dangerous possibilities. It was in this context that the Committee approached its tasks at the beginning of 1966.

311. In the course of its work during 1966, the Special Committee continued to examine the implementation of the Declaration with respect to individual Territories. In the case of some Territories, because of new developments concerning them, it was necessary to consider them more than once. The Committee also completed studies on the activities of foreign economic and other interests in the Territories under Portuguese administration and in Southern Rhodesia, on the basis of which it made recommendations to the General Assembly (see chapters III and V of the present report). The Committee also continued to discharge the additional functions entrusted to it by the General Assembly concerning the question of South West Africa and of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

312. This programme of work placed a great strain on the resources of the Special Committee which it attempted to meet by means of a heavy schedule of meetings both in plenary session and in its sub-committees. However despite the fact that the Committee met from March until November, except for one short break, it was not able to give adequate consideration to a few of the questions on its agenda.

313. During the period under review, the Special Committee noted the attainment of independence of three of the Territories which had been the subject of consideration by the General Assembly and by the Special Committee, namely, British Guiana (Guyana), Bechuanaland (Botswana), and Basutoland (Lesotho). It also noted the setting of 30 November 1966 as the date on which Barbados would become independent.

314. As foreshadowed in its last report to the General Assembly, the Special Committee held a further series of meetings in Africa in 1966. The Committee accepted invitations extended to it by the Governments of Algeria, Ethiopia, Somalia, the United Arab Republic and the United Republic of Tanzania and held a series of meetings in their respective capitals in May and June. The Committee wishes to lay particular stress on the important results achieved by these meetings, which not only underlined the increasing concern of the United Nations for the position of colonial peoples, but strengthened the Committee's own capacity to assist these peoples in their struggle for freedom and independence. Further, the Committee's visit facilitated the appearance before it of representatives of national liberation movements wishing to express their views regarding the future of their countries, who would otherwise have found it impossible to travel to New York.

315. The Special Committee devoted prolonged attention to the question of Southern Rhodesia, the situation regarding which was further aggravated by the illegal declaration of independence by the racist minority régime. The Committee was aware of statements by the United Kingdom Government that it would seek to end the rebellion without delay and to assist the people of the Territory towards majority rule and a society free of oppression and discrimination. The Committee nevertheless noted that the diplomatic and economic sanctions applied against Southern Rhodesia by that Government had not resulted in progress towards these aims. Further, the measures taken by the majority of Member States in response to the relevant United Nations resolutions had had no more than limited impact on the régime, owing mainly to the failure of the Governments of South Africa and Portugal to take corresponding action. In addition, the United Kingdom to the disapproval of the Committee undertook pourparlers with the régime without regard to the harmful consequences which these pourparlers might entail for the legitimate rights of the African people. It was therefore the considered view of the Committee that energetic action by the United Kingdom Government, including the use of force, was necessary, in order to pave the way for positive progress in the implementation of the Declaration to this Territory.

316. On the question of South West Africa, the continuing disregard of the pertinent United Nations resolutions by the Government of South Africa was further demonstrated by its introduction of further repressive legislation in application of its apartheid policies. It also proceeded with the establishment of the infrastructure considered necessary for the establishment of "homelands", in line with the recommendations of the (Odendaal) Commission of Enquiry into South West Africa Affairs, 1962-1963. Moreover, the Special Committee noted with disappointment that the long-awaited judgement of the International Court of Justice, delivered on 18 July 1966, refrained from pronouncing on the substantive legal issues placed before it for adjudication. While recognizing that the earlier advisory opinions as well as the 1962 judgement of the Court remained unimpaired, the Committee considered that it was the responsibility of the United Nations to achieve a political solution to the problem. In this regard, the Committee reaffirmed that the provisions of the Declaration continued to be applicable to South West Africa and reiterated the right of the people of the Territory to self-determination and independence. It also recommended that the mandate should be terminated and that the United Nations should concurrently assume responsibility for the direct administration of the Territory, with the view of making arrangements for the holding of elections on the basis of universal adult suffrage and the granting of full independence.

317. As regards the Territories under Portuguese administration, the administering Power, maintaining its insistence that they were overseas provinces, took additional measures for their political, economic and administrative integration with Portugal. Continuing to avail itself of assistance from some States, it further intensified its military operations against the African population of the Territories. It also extended its violation of the economic and political rights of the indigenous population by the large-scale settlement of foreign immigrants and by the export of African workers to South Africa. In view of these developments, the Special Committee recommended to the Security Council to make it obligatory for all States to implement the measures provided for in General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX). The Committee also remained of the opinion that the Security Council should take the steps necessary to implement its own resolutions concerning these Territories.

318. As a result of the special studies it undertook concerning Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, and the Territories under Portuguese administration, the Special Committee noted the prominent role played in the economic life of these Territories by international economic and financial interests. The Committee was concerned that these interests, in collaboration with one another, had been instrumental in denying the African people the means of effective participation in the economic life of their countries. The Committee therefore considered that the activities of these interests, which were impeding the implementation of the Declaration in these and other colonial Territories, should be urgently inscribed as an item on the agenda of the General Assembly.

319. Concerning Aden, the Special Committee regretted that the United Kingdom Government had not taken the necessary steps to establish normal conditions, including the abolition of the state of emergency, the repeal of laws restrictive of public freedom, the cessation of repressive activities, the release of political prisoners and the return of exiles. A new element in the already grave situation relating to mass arrests and the torturing of political prisoners was also brought to the attention of the Special Committee. The Committee was further concerned at the prospect of the United Kingdom transferring all powers to the unrepresentative régime in the Territory and in conditions which would not correspond to the provisions of the Declaration. It accordingly requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Special Committee and the administering Power, to appoint immediately a special mission to Aden for the purpose of recommending practical steps necessary for the full implementation of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly and, in particular, for determining the extent of United Nations participation in the preparation and supervision of elections. The Committee was disappointed that the United Kingdom Government, while expressing willingness to co-operate with a United Nations mission for the purpose indicated above, had recorded certain reservations in this connexion which created difficulties in the way of the appointment of the special mission. The Committee remained convinced that any hope of arresting the deteriorating situation in the Territory lay in the unqualified acceptance and implementation by the United Kingdom Government, in full co-operation with the United Nations, of the relevant United Nations resolutions.

320. Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, which had been of special concern to the Special Committee in previous years, were also the subject of extensive consideration. Disturbed, as previously, at their unsatisfactory economic and social situation, the Committee accordingly appealed to all States to contribute to the Fund established by the General Assembly for their economic development. In view of the imminent independence of Bechuanaland on 30 September and of Basutoland on 4 October, the Committee gave urgent attention to the measures necessary to enable them to enjoy complete independence and to secure their territorial integrity and sovereignty.

In addition to requesting the United Kingdom Government to take all appropriate action, the Committee recommended that the General Assembly address a strong warning to the South African Government against any encroachment upon the territorial integrity and sovereignty of the Territories and any hindrance to the movement of persons and goods. As regards Swaziland, the Committee maintained its view that steps should be taken by the administering Power to ensure its accession to independence in full compliance with the Declaration.

321. The Special Committee paid particular attention to the small Territories, regarding which there had also been regrettable delays in the implementation of the Declaration. On the question of Fiji, the Special Committee considered that general elections should be held on the basis of universal suffrage for the purpose of forming a constituent assembly which would be responsible for drawing up a democratic constitution. The Committee also urged the United Kingdom Government to ensure the formation of a representative Government, the transfer of full powers to that Government and the fixing of an early date for the independence of the Territory. In addition, it decided to appoint a sub-committee to visit Fiji for the purpose of studying at first hand the situation in the Territory. Regarding Equatorial Guinea, the Committee was appreciative of the co-operation extended by the Government of Spain in permitting a sub-committee to visit the Territory. On the basis of the findings of the sub-committee, the Committee decided to recommend that the Spanish Government should, inter alia, convene a conference, fully representative of the people of the Territory, to establish the modalities for the transfer of all powers to the people and to fix a date for independence, which, in response to their wishes, should be no later than July 1968.

322. With regard to the smaller Territories, the Special Committee recognized that their small size and population as well as their limited resources presented peculiar problems. At the same time, the Committee was firmly of the opinion that the provisions of the Declaration were fully applicable to them. Accordingly, it requested the administering Powers responsible for these Territories to ensure, without delay, that the people were enabled, in complete freedom and without any restrictions, to express their wishes concerning the future of their countries. In this connexion, the Committee expressed the belief in the desirability of a United Nations presence during the procedures for the exercise of the right of self-determination. The Committee also noted the urgent need for measures to strengthen the economic base of these Territories and to promote their social and economic development. In a few of these Territories, the Committee was deeply concerned by reports pointing to preparations for their use for military purposes and by the lack of respect shown for their territorial integrity by the administering Power.

323. Having regard to its mandate, the Special Committee once again laid special stress on the importance of sending visiting missions to the smaller Territories referred to above. In view of the inadequacy of the information available to it regarding conditions in these Territories and as to the views, wishes and aspirations of the people, the Committee reiterated its request to the administering Powers to extend their full co-operation by permitting access to the Territories under their administration. The Committee noted with regret that the responses of the administering Powers concerned to this request were either negative or qualified in character. The Committee, therefore, considered that the General Assembly should again urge them to reconsider their attitudes in view of the vital importance to its work of the sending of visiting missions.

324. The Committee also had before it for consideration a number of Territories which were the subject of either conflicting claims to sovereignty or of special interest to some Member States for geographical, historical, economic and other reasons. Included in this category were the Falkland Islands (Malvinas), French Somaliland, Gibraltar, and Ifni and Spanish Sahara. As noted in a previous report, the Committee was of the view that the provisions of the Declaration fully applied to such Territories and that such disputes or divergent interests as may exist with respect to them should be peacefully resolved through mutual accommodation and goodwill.

L. FUTURE WORK

325. It will be noted from the various chapters of the present report that there still remain a large number of colonial Territories which have not yet attained independence. The Special Committee believes that until the peoples of all of the remaining Territories are enabled to exercise their right to self-determination and independence in accordance with General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), the Assembly would wish the Special Committee to continue to examine the situation in each of these Territories with a view to assisting in the earliest possible application of the Declaration.

326. Subject to any further directives that the General Assembly might give at its twenty-first session, the Special Committee intends in 1967 to continue to seek the best ways and means for the immediate and full application of the Declaration with regard to the Territories already examined. It also intends to take up for consideration those questions to which for lack of time it was not able to give adequate attention. As indicated in paragraphs 263 to 269 above, the Special Committee also intends to give further consideration to the question of the list of Territories to which the Declaration applies.

327. As already indicated in paragraphs 285 to 290 above, the Special Committee, in its examination of Territories, will continue to be guided by the requests contained in operative paragraphs 8 and 9 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX). In these paragraphs, the General Assembly requested the Special Committee to pay particular attention to the small Territories and, when appropriate, to recommend a deadline for the accession to independence of each Territory in accordance with the wishes of the people.

328. In the section of this chapter concerning visiting missions (paragraphs 184 to 223 above) and in many of the chapters of the present report relating to specific Territories, the Special Committee has set out its recommendations with regard to visiting missions. It will be clear from these recommendations that the Special Committee continues to place great value on such visits as a means of collecting first-hand information on conditions in the Territories and the wishes of the people, thus assisting it in the implementation of the Declaration. It intends therefore to pursue its recommendations with the utmost vigour and to continue to seek the co-operation of the administering Powers to enable such visits to take place.

329. Further, considering the value and importance attaching to the series of meetings the Committee has held in past years in Africa, the Special Committee may hold another series of meetings in Africa.

330. In accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2116 (XX) concerning the pattern of conferences, the Special Committee has already approved a tentative time-table to enable it to carry out its programme of work in 1967. The tentative time-table and related decisions are set out in paragraphs 292-295 of this chapter.

331. In order to assist it in carrying out its tasks in 1967, the Special Committee wishes to offer the following recommendations which the General Assembly may wish to include among the matters it takes into consideration when it examines the question of the implementation of the Declaration.

332. The Special Committee considers that the General Assembly should renew its appeal to administering Powers to implement the Declaration on the Granting of Independence in the colonial Territories they are administering without further delay.

333. The Assembly should again appeal to the administering Powers to co-operate with the Special Committee by facilitating visits to Territories in accordance with the requests contained in resolutions and decisions already adopted by the Special Committee and with any other decisions in this regard that the Committee may find it appropriate to adopt in the future.

334. The Assembly should again request the administering Powers to co-operate with the Secretary-General in promoting large-scale dissemination of the Declaration and of information on the work of the United Nations and, in particular, of the Special Committee in implementation of the Declaration.

335. The Special Committee recommends that the Assembly approve the programme of work as outlined in this section and make adequate financial provision to cover the expenses of the activities of the Committee, including the cost of visiting groups. Further, within the context of operative paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI), the Special Committee may decide to hold another series of meetings in Africa. The Special Committee considers that its activities in 1967 will give rise to expenditure of the order of $250,000.

336. The Special Committee considers that the Assembly should request the Secretary-General to continue to provide the Special Committee with all the facilities and personnel necessary for the implementation of its mandate.

M. APPROVAL OF THE REPORT

337. The Special Committee approved the present report, as a whole, at its 483rd meeting on 30 November 1966.

ANNEX II

[A/AC.109/L.318]

Report of Sub-Committee II

Rapporteur: Mr. C. R. GHAREKHAN (India)

INTRODUCTION

1. At its 400th meeting on 4 April 1966, the Special Committee decided to continue Sub-Committee II with the same membership, except for the replacement of Cambodia by Afghanistan.

2. At its 42nd meeting on 28 April 1966, Sub-Committee II elected Mr. Kadhim Khalaf (Iraq) as Chairman and Mr. C. R. Gharekhan (India) as Rapporteur.

3. At its 43rd meeting on 5 May, the Sub-Committee decided first to consider the question of visiting missions, the Territories referred to it, and then take the Territories up in the following order: Gilbert and Ellice Islands, Pitcairn, Solomon Islands, New Hebrides, American Samoa, Guam, Niue, Tokelau Islands, Cocos (Keeling) Islands, Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, Trust Territory of Nauru, Trust Territory of New Guinea (and the Territory of Papua), Brunei and Hong Kong.

VISITING MISSIONS

Consideration by the Sub-Committee

4. The Sub-Committee considered the question of sending visiting missions to the Territories referred to it at its 44th, 45th, 46th, 47th and 48th meetings held on 12 May, 19 July, 2, 8 and 9 August.

5. Regarding the views of administering Powers concerning the sending of visiting missions to their Territories, the Sub-Committee received the following information.

6. The representative of the United Kingdom said that the dispatch of visiting missions to the Territories administered by the United Kingdom raised difficult questions of principle and he could not encourage the Sub-Committee to expect that his Government's existing position would change. His delegation was, however, prepared to transmit to the United Kingdom Government any particular request concerning the sending of such a mission to a specific Territory, although this could not be regarded as implying any commitment that such a request would be accepted.

7. The representative of the United States of America said that, if the Sub-Committee proposed a visiting mission to Guam and American Samoa in 1966, the United States Government would probably not think that the situation warranted such a journey; the Territories administered by the United States were advancing rapidly towards self-government and should not present a pressing priority for the Special Committee in arranging its crowded work agenda for the year.

8. The representative of Australia stated that in certain circumstances visiting missions could be of value. He was doubtful, however, whether this applied to the Committee of Twenty-Four visiting missions to Australian Territories which had been the subject of intense scrutiny by the United Nations over a period of a good many years so that the United Nations had become very familiar with all aspects of development there. A part of this scrutiny had been by visiting missions from the Trusteeship Council.

9. Nevertheless, the attitude of his Government was conditioned in important part by the fact that, just as an Administering Authority had responsibilities in the territories for which it was responsible, so also it had rights—and among these was the right to accept or not to accept a visiting mission.

10. His Government could give no agreement in vacuo to accept a mission and would have to consider at any time in relation to any specific request such factors as the appropriateness of any particular time proposed, the convenience of the Australian Government, the convenience of the Territory Administration and the composition of any mission that might be proposed. These considerations, at any given time, would no doubt be conditioned also by particular views which his Government might have in relation, for example, to United Nations finances involved in any particular proposals and whether duplication and/or overlapping of United Nations effort was involved.

11. His Government could not therefore at this stage give any commitment that it would be able to respond to a request to receive a visiting mission, but his delegation would be prepared to transmit to its Government any specific request that might be put forward by the Committee or Sub-Committee at any particular time.

12. In a letter dated 1 August 1966, the representative of New Zealand stated that his Government had no objection to such a mission although it considered that any visit by a United Nations mission to Niue and Tokelau Islands should be undertaken only as part of a more comprehensive tour of the area.

13. The representative of France informed the Sub-Committee that his Government did not encourage the sending of a visiting mission to the New Hebrides.

14. The representatives of India, Chile, Iraq and Poland stated that they were in favour of recommending to the Special Committee that visiting missions should be sent to the Territories referred to the Sub-Committee.

15. The Sub-Committee, bearing in mind the remarks of some members, agreed to make a recommendation to the Special Committee concerning the sending of visiting missions to the Territories referred to it.

Recommendation of the Sub-Committee

16. The Sub-Committee recommends that the Special Committee should invite the administering Powers to receive visiting missions to the Territories referred to Sub-Committee II. The Sub-Committee's recommendations regarding the details of the Territories to be visited and the dates of the visits will be decided upon at a later stage.

CHAPTER II*

MEETINGS HELD IN AFRICA

INTRODUCTION

1. In its report to the General Assembly at its twentieth session, the Special Committee envisaged, as part of its programme for 1966, the possibility of holding another series of meetings in Africa during that year, in view of the great importance of the work that its previous visits to Africa had enabled it to carry out. This programme was approved by the General Assembly in operative paragraph 7 of resolution 2105 (XX). Within the context of the programme thus approved, the Governments of the United Republic of Tanzania, the United Arab Republic, Ethiopia, Somalia and Algeria extended invitations to the Special Committee (A/AC.109/147-150 and 152) to hold meetings at their respective capitals during 1966.

2. During the discussions on the organization of work which took place at its meetings held between 8 March and 6 May 1966, a wide measure of support was expressed by members of the Special Committee for the holding of a series of meetings in Africa. Several members expressed the view that the holding of such meetings would enable the members of the Committee to study closely the situation in certain Territories, the attitudes of the administering Powers concerned and the extent to which the provisions of previous resolutions had been implemented. It would, moreover, facilitate the appearance before the Committee of petitioners who would otherwise find it impossible to travel to New York.

3. At its 400th meeting on 4 April 1966, the Special Committee considered and, after discussion, approved, by 20 votes to none with 3 abstentions, a recommendation in this regard which was contained in the twenty-second report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.265/Rev.1). By approving this recommendation, the Committee decided to hold a series of meetings in Africa during 1966 and to travel to Africa for that purpose not later than the middle of May.

4. At its 408th and 409th meetings on 26 April, the Special Committee considered further recommendations on the subject which were contained in the twenty-third and twenty-fourth reports of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.270 and 275). The Committee also had before it a report by the Secretary-General on the administrative and financial implications of the Working Group's recommendations (A/AC.109/L.271). The Committee at its 409th meeting decided to adopt the reports of the Working Group, on the understanding that the reservations expressed by some members would appear in the record. By adopting these reports, the Committee decided that it would accept the invitations extended to it by the five Governments, and that the duration of its meetings in Africa would be for a period not exceeding six weeks. The Committee decided at the same time that these meetings should begin at Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, on 23 May 1966, and subject to the convenience of the Governments of Somalia, Ethiopia, the United Arab Republic and Algeria, it would hold meetings thereafter at Mogadiscio, Addis Ababa, Cairo and Algiers respectively. Reservations were expressed by some members regarding the duration of the visit and the number of capitals to be visited.

5. In reaching these decisions, the Special Committee took account of a statement made by the Chairman at the same meeting setting out the recommendations of the Working Group concerning the items to be taken up at the various capitals, subject to the agreement of the host Governments. These recommendations were as follows:

Dar es Salaam: Southern Rhodesia, Mozambique, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland;

Mogadiscio: French Somaliland, Mauritius and the Seychelles;

Addis Ababa: South West Africa, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, Ifni, Spanish Sahara and French Somaliland;

Cairo: Aden and Oman;

Algiers: Angola, Portuguese Guinea, São Tomé and Príncipe and dependencies, the Cape Verde Archipelago, Equatorial Guinea (Fernando Póo and Río Muni).

* Previously issued under the symbol A/6300 (part II).

The Chairman also informed the Committee that in making these recommendations, the Working Group envisaged that the hearing of petitioners would take precedence over the substantive consideration of the above-named items.

6. In a letter dated 7 May 1966 (A/AC.109/159), the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom to the United Nations informed the Chairman of the Special Committee that the United Kingdom Government would not be able to be represented in the Committee at its meetings in Africa. Also contained in the letter was an invitation to members of the Committee to hold informal discussions in London with representatives of the United Kingdom Government, on their way to Dar es Salaam. After a discussion at the 411th meeting concerning the letter, the Chairman of the Special Committee addressed a reply on 13 May 1966 to the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom expressing the regret of the majority of the members at the prospect of the United Kingdom not participating in the Committee's meetings in Africa, and appealing to it to reconsider its decision. The Chairman also informed the United Kingdom that the Committee's itinerary did not provide for travel by way of London and that consequently the opportunity for the proposed discussions in London would regrettably not occur (A/AC.109/160). In a reply dated 17 May 1966, the Permanent Representative of the United Kingdom informed the Chairman that the decision of the United Kingdom Government concerning its non-participation in the Special Committee's meetings in Africa had been taken only after the most serious consideration of all the issues involved and that, accordingly, the United Kingdom Government was unable to change that decision (A/AC.109/162).

7. In a telegram dated 3 June 1966, the Permanent Representative of Uruguay to the United Nations informed the Chairman of the Special Committee that his delegation was unable, for reasons beyond its control, to participate in the Special Committee's debates during its visit to Africa. He expressed support for the work of the Committee and gratitude to the various host Governments for their invitation (A/AC.109/173).

8. On 14 May 1966 the Chairman on behalf of the Special Committee issued a communiqué on the Committee's meetings in Africa which was widely disseminated in the five host countries. The text of this communiqué is appended to this chapter (annex I).

9. Members of the Special Committee,<sup>1</sup> accompanied by the representative of the Secretary-General and other members of the Secretariat, arrived at Dar es Salaam on 22 May 1966. The Special Committee met in Dar es Salaam from 23 to 31 May 1966 at the Msimbazi Community Centre; it arrived in Mogadiscio on 1 June, and met from 2 to 4 June 1966 at the Parliament Building; it arrived in Addis Ababa on 5 June and met from 6 to 9 June 1966 at Africa Hall; it arrived in Cairo on 10 June and met from 11 to 15 June 1966 at the headquarters of the League of Arab States; and it arrived in Algiers on 17 June and met from 17 to 22 June 1966 at the Club-des-Pins Conference Hall.

10. During its stay in Africa, the Special Committee held forty plenary meetings, and the Sub-Committee on Petitions twelve meetings. The Special Committee heard thirty-two groups of petitioners and circulated thirty-nine written petitions, excluding requests for hearings.

11. At the opening of its meetings in Dar es Salaam, Mogadiscio, Addis Ababa, Cairo and Algiers respectively, the Special Committee was addressed by H.E. Mr. Rashidi Kawawa, second Vice-President, on behalf of the President of the United Republic of Tanzania, by H.E. Hagi Hussein Abdirizak, Prime Minister, on behalf of the President of Somalia, by H.E. Mr. Ketema Yifru, Minister of Foreign Affairs, on behalf of His Imperial Majesty, the Emperor of Ethiopia, by H.E. Mr. Mahmoud Riad, Minister of Foreign Affairs, on behalf of the President of the United Arab Republic, and by H.E. Mr. Abdelaziz Bouteflika, Minister of Foreign Affairs, on behalf of the President of the Revolutionary Council and Head of the Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria. The Special Committee also had the honour of being received by the Head of State or Government at each of the five capitals.

12. In accordance with the decision taken by the Special Committee at its 403rd meeting, representatives of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) attended the Committee's meetings in Dar es Salaam and Addis Ababa as observers. On 17 May 1966, the Administrative Secretary-General of that organization addressed a letter to the Chairman in which he welcomed the Committee to Africa and offered it the co-operation and assistance of his organization (A/AC.109/165). Following another decision taken by the Committee at its 440th meeting on 11 June 1966, to grant a request addressed to the Chairman by the Acting Secretary-General of the League of Arab States (A/AC.109/182), a representative of that organization attended the Committee's meetings in Cairo in an observer capacity.

13. In accordance with a decision taken by the Special Committee at its 424th meeting on 30 May 1966, to grant a request addressed to the Chairman on behalf of the Government of Czechoslovakia (A/AC.109/164 and 166), a representative of that Government attended the meetings in Africa as an observer. Following other decisions taken by the Committee at its 428th and 433rd meetings on 2 June and 6 June 1966 concerning requests addressed to it on behalf of the Government of Somalia (A/AC.109/169 and Add.1), a delegation of that Government attended the meetings of the Special Committee in Mogadiscio and Addis Ababa in an observer capacity. Further, in accordance with a decision taken by the Committee at its 440th meeting on 11 June 1966, to grant a similar request from the Government of the United Arab Republic (A/AC.109/180), a representative of that Government attended the meetings in Cairo as an observer. Finally, representatives of the Governments of Algeria and of Spain attended the meetings in Algiers as observers following a decision taken by the Committee at its 448th meeting on 17 June 1966 to grant requests made to it by those Governments (A/AC.109/184 and 185).

14. At its 426th meeting, on 31 May 1966, the representative of Czechoslovakia with the consent of the Special Committee made a statement on the question of Southern Rhodesia. At the 428th and 430th meetings on 2 and 3 June 1966 the representative of Somalia in accordance with a decision taken by the Committee concerning a request submitted by his Government (A/AC.109/172), participated in its consideration of French Somaliland. At the 435th and 436th meetings on 7 June 1966, the representatives of Mauritania and Morocco, in accordance with decisions taken by the Committee to grant requests submitted on behalf of their respective Governments (A/AC.109/174 and 175) participated in the discussions on Ifni and Spanish Sahara. The representative of Spain, whose request for permission to participate in these discussions (A/AC.109/176) was granted by the Committee at the 435th meeting, subsequently submitted a letter withdrawing his request (A/AC.109/176/Add.1). At the 441st to 447th meetings held between 11 and 15 June 1966, the representative of the United Arab Republic following a decision taken by the Committee to grant a request made on behalf of his Government (A/AC.109/181) participated in the discussions on the questions of Aden and Oman. Finally, at the 451st, 452nd and 454th meetings held on 20 and 21 June 1966, the representative of Spain, in accordance with a decision taken by the Committee concerning a request submitted on behalf of his Government (A/AC.109/185) participated in the discussion on the question of Equatorial Guinea (Fernando Póo and Río Muni).

15. Following consideration of the relevant items, the Special Committee adopted resolutions on the questions of Southern Rhodesia (chapter III, paragraph 1097), South West Africa (chapter IV, paragraph 306), Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland (chapter VII, paragraph 237), Aden (chapter VI, paragraph 382), Equatorial Guinea (chapter IX, paragraph 79), and Territories under Portuguese administration (chapter V, paragraph 675), as well as a consensus concerning the question of Ifni and Spanish Sahara (chapter X, paragraph 116). An account of the Special Committee's consideration of these items is contained in chapters III, VII, IX and X of the present report.

16. With regard to the question of French Somaliland, the Special Committee decided at its 432nd meeting held on 4 June 1966 that following the hearing of petitioners and statements by representatives it would conclude consideration of the item upon the resumption of its meetings in New York. As regards Mauritius and the Seychelles, the Committee decided on the proposal of the Chairman at the 447th meeting on 15 June 1966 to defer consideration until the resumption of its meetings in New York. On the question of Oman, the Committee similarly decided at the same meeting, that following the hearing of petitioners it would defer consideration until the resumption of its meetings in New York.

17. In the light of its discussions on the above-mentioned items, the Special Committee also adopted a resolution concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to colonial Territories considered by it in Africa in 1966 (see paragraph 619 below). It also adopted by acclamation a resolution expressing its appreciation to the host Governments (see paragraph 626 below).

A. MEETINGS HELD AT DAR ES SALAAM, UNITED REPUBLIC OF TANZANIA

Opening of Meetings

Address by the Second Vice-President on behalf of the President of the United Republic of Tanzania

18. The Second Vice-President of the United Republic of Tanzania greeted members on behalf of the President and Government of Tanzania and expressed his country's view that the work of the Special Committee was fundamental to the whole purpose of the United Nations. Some considered the Special Committee less important than other United Nations bodies directly concerned with the affairs of peace and war; but Tanzania fully recognized its significance in that it was dealing with colonialism and therefore with the principle of human equality in the world and subsequent threat to universal peace and order. Africans were convinced that peace among peoples based on the injustice of colonialism was impossible. No group of world citizens would agree for ever to be governed by other people. Therefore Africans would resort to arms, if necessary, to achieve their freedom. The role of the Special Committee was to endeavour to obviate the need to fight by fostering a situation in which the peoples of each nation governed themselves in accordance with their own wishes and needs. The members of the Special Committee should therefore be working themselves out of a job.

19. He expressed strong disagreement with the view that it was a waste of money for the Special Committee to travel in Africa when it could not visit the colonial Territories themselves.

20. The depth of African emotion over freedom from all interference was not understood in the sophisticated and developed countries of Europe and America. In Africa, however, the Special Committee could not fail to grasp the importance of its activity, for it would meet people who had to deal with the day-to-day results of colonialism and Tanzanians who were trying, with inadequate resources, to guard their frontier against the colonial forces of Portugal. The Special Committee would also meet many political refugees from colonialism and hear them in their own environment, which would make it easier to judge their conviction and sincerity. Although the Special Committee could not visit the colonial Territories themselves, Africa was so much one in its history and traditions that an understanding of conditions in newly independent Africa was a sound basis for a grasp of the reality of continuing colonialism.

21. Since the Special Committee's previous visit, there had been only limited progress away from colonialism in Africa, and there had been one overwhelming setback to the cause of justice and humanity. That situation could not be allowed to continue and words alone would not put matters right. The Special Committee had come to listen to petitioners; afterwards it would pass resolutions and report to its parent body. If nothing further happened no progress would have been made and the situation would have deteriorated with the passage of time. Action must result because colonialism was a festering sore which, as long as it remained, poisoned the whole body.

22. African States were recovering from a period in which their peoples had been humiliated and denied the most elementary rights to prepare themselves for the efficient service of their country. Africans were having to learn the arts of administration and economic development as they practised them, since before independence their destinies were decided for them and their training was designed to make them good Englishmen, good Frenchmen or good Belgians. Africans had to eliminate that poison from the body of their society at the same time as they demanded of the people a degree of activity beyond anything needed in the developed countries.

23. Africans did not wish to be obliged to resort to arms. They wanted freedom for Africa to enable it to live in friendship with the whole world, and an orderly transfer of power from the colonial authorities to the peoples of the States concerned.

24. Africans would be very patient, subject to formal recognition by the colonial Powers of the principle that all States under their jurisdiction would attain independence on the basis of majority rule. But if that principle was not conceded and if work did not begin on the transfer of power, Africans would be forced to prepare themselves for a war of liberation. They hoped that the work of the Special Committee would help to make it unnecessary for any African peoples to take up arms.

25. He welcomed the prospect that the British Territories of Bechuanaland and Basutoland would receive their independence during 1966. But he would like the Special Committee to examine the reality of that transfer of power. If the United Nations was satisfied with the situation, then Tanzanians would congratulate those peoples, and the Committee, on that new accession to freedom in Africa.

26. But those countries were almost completely surrounded by the Republic of South Africa. The Special Committee and the United Nations as a whole should therefore be vigilant in order to ensure that those countries maintained their sovereignty. Although the situation in South Africa was not the direct concern of the Special Committee, it was relevant to all discussion concerning the southern part of Africa. The course which South West Africa would take to freedom would be very much affected by the forthcoming judgement of the International Court of Justice and by the subsequent action taken by the Security Council. But no member of the Special Committee could doubt the reality of the oppression under which South West Africa was suffering, or that the situation would be brought to an end. The Special Committee had the responsibility of trying to make the transition to freedom a constructive rather than a destructive one.

27. The problem of the Portuguese Territories was of direct concern to the Special Committee, which had to make the world realize two things: that Portuguese colonialism continued only because of the support which Portugal received from her allies in Europe; and that therefore the whole relationship between Africa and Europe would be affected by developments in the freedom struggles of the Portuguese colonies.

28. In all the colonial Territories to which he had referred the situation was the same as when the Special Committee had visited Africa previously, or a little better.

29. But in Southern Rhodesia the situation was, of course, very much worse. Tanzania wanted Southern Rhodesia to be independent on no other basis than majority rule. It had called upon the United Kingdom Government to defeat the illegal régime and give a pledge that Southern Rhodesia would become independent only on the basis of majority rule. In view of the commitments of all members of the United Nations, Tanzania did not regard those demands as unreasonable. But they had not been fulfilled; nor was there any real evidence to suggest that they would be. Instead there had been a gradually increasing list of economic sanctions by the United Kingdom Government, coupled with appeals to the rest of the world not to trade with the illegal authorities. Only after five months had the United Nations been asked to authorize any real action—and that was only with regard to oil shipments to one particular port. Africans were assured only of intense diplomatic activity in which the racist Government of South Africa and the colonial Government of Portugal were asked to co-operate with the United Kingdom authorities. Their willingness to do so was attested by the fact that six months after the unilateral declaration of independence the Smith authorities were still in control. Another serious fact was that the only assurance received from the United Kingdom Government was that it would not grant independence on any other basis than majority rule.

30. He did not believe that Africans minded how the Smith régime was defeated, as indeed it would have been on 11 November 1965 had the United Kingdom Government sent troops to uphold its sovereign rule. But if the British refused to quell the rebellion, then surely the United Nations should act regardless of British wishes. Under Chapter VII of the Charter the Security Council could make economic sanctions mandatory on all Member States. And if some of those States refused to co-operate then the sanctions would be applied against them too. Africans could not agree to leaving four million people under the effective control of a racist and privileged white minority, and whatever the cost they would have to reject that extension of oppression in Africa.

31. In conclusion, he expressed the hope that the Special Committee would have an opportunity of seeing some of the difficulties faced in Tanzania and the great efforts which its people were making to overcome them. He also hoped that members would sense something of the excitement and challenge of developing in independence—for that excitement and that challenge had become part of daily life in Tanzania. He believed that an appreciation of those factors would help the Special Committee to understand the importance of its work, and perhaps to devise some way forward out of colonialism.

General statements

32. The Chairman thanked His Excellency Vice-President Kawawa for his very important address. The Special Committee was particularly grateful to the Vice-President for the warmth of his welcome, and had been extremely touched by the hospitality and friendship displayed since its arrival in Dar es Salaam. It was also grateful for the Vice-President's assurances of support in its work.

33. The beautiful city of Dar es Salaam, which had set a shining example in African liberation struggles, was a most fitting background to the beginning of the Special Committee's work in Africa. The achievements of Tanzania since independence had fired the imagination of all men of goodwill.

34. He renewed his thanks to the Vice-President for having taken time from his busy schedule to open the session, and expressed the hope that the efforts deployed would contribute significantly to the liquidation of the last bastions of colonialism—a problem with which both Africa and the United Nations were most deeply concerned.

35. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed the thanks of the people, delegation and Government of the Soviet Union to the Government and people of Tanzania for their fraternal welcome. The United Republic of Tanzania was a young and courageous country and was situated close to the Territories where the vestiges of colonialism still prevailed. He expressed his appreciation for the important address made by Vice-President Kawawa and paid a tribute to the courage and dynamism of that young African nation which, together with other fraternal Governments, was struggling to liberate those who were still oppressed in South Africa, Southern Rhodesia, the Territories under Portuguese domination, and the United Kingdom Protectorates. The storm raised by the national liberation movement must continue, for there were unfortunately a number of African Territories where the vestiges of colonialism still existed. The monopolies established in southern Africa sought only to enrich themselves and therefore supported racism. The international monopolies which reaped the profits of such exploitation were therefore equally guilty, since they prolonged an inadmissible situation. The countries of NATO which supported Salazar by providing him with aircraft, weapons, instructors and industrial equipment were thus assisting the racist régimes. During the previous session of the General Assembly important decisions had been taken against colonialism and imperialism: the international monopolies which were hampering the freedom of still dependent Territories had been severely condemned. The Special Committee, which owed its existence to the desire of peoples to achieve freedom, should seek all ways and means capable of bringing about the independence of the oppressed peoples and take energetic decisions that could be rapidly applied. The procedures to be adopted by the Special Committee in order to apply those decisions would be determined by the nature of each particular problem. The Committee should concentrate on questions such as the immediate implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples; the provision of genuine assistance to peoples struggling for independence, and the participation of the United Nations specialized agencies in such efforts; the setting of target dates for the attainment of independence by colonial Territories, and so forth.

36. The Special Committee should emphasize the utilization of military bases by the colonial countries against the peoples, in particular the use of Ascension Island against the people of the Congo, the island of Guam against the Viet-Nameese people, and so forth. A productive and fruitful action should be undertaken in order to put an end to such aggression.

37. He opposed the view that the Special Committee could serve no useful purpose in Africa; on the contrary, he was convinced that the presence of the Special Committee in Africa would give new impetus to the struggle that had been undertaken. The Soviet Union, a socialist State, had eradicated the enslavement of man by man and abolished social classes; it would defend, as it had always done, those who were struggling for freedom and were the victims of the policies of the imperialists. The Soviet Union would support the freedom fighters by every means at its disposal; it insisted on independence for all countries under foreign domination and would stand by them in order to bring about the final liberation of the African continent.

38. The United Nations must adopt sanctions against South Africa and Southern Rhodesia in order to compel them to comply with the decisions of the General Assembly.

39. The representative of India expressed the gratitude and appreciation of his Government, his delegation and himself personally to the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania for its generous invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Dar es Salaam. Members had sensed the warmth and affection of the friendly people of Tanzania, and he extended to them the best wishes of his delegation for their continued well-being and prosperity.

40. Bordering on several Non-Self-Governing Territories, Tanzania occupied a unique position in the brave struggle against colonialism and had a major role to play in helping the freedom fighters of those territories. His delegation was extremely satisfied with the contribution Tanzania had made, and was making, to that worthy cause. The locating of the headquarters of the Liberation Committee of Eleven of the Organization of African Unity in Dar es Salaam was in itself recognition of Tanzania's special position. His delegation wished to pay a tribute to one of the most outstanding personalities of Africa, His Excellency Mwalimu Julius K. Nyerere, President of the Republic, and to his Government and people.

41. India enjoyed the most friendly relations with Tanzania and greatly esteemed Mr. Nyerere for his qualities of leadership, for his devoted efforts to raise the living standards of his people and for his success in building up a truly multiracial society. The signing of the Friendship and Scientific, Economic and Technical Co-operation Agreement between Tanzania and India was, in the words of Mr. A. M. Babu, Tanzanian Minister for Commerce and Co-operation, "not the beginning but the continuation of the age-old friendly relations between India and Tanzania". His country was proud of Mr. Babu's tribute that, through its co-operation, India was aiding not only Tanzania's economic development but also the economic emancipation of colonial Africa.

42. The Second Vice-President had reminded the Special Committee, in his inspiring address, of the continued urgency of the problem of colonialism. Mr. Kawawa's enlightening words would guide the Committee in its discussion. India's attitude towards colonialism had been consistent and forthright. India had always stood for the emancipation from subjection by alien powers of peoples who, for varying periods of history, had not known freedom. India would continue to display the same uncompromising forthrightness fearlessly and disinterestedly. His people's conscience and principles were not for sale.

43. His delegation deeply regretted the absence from the Special Committee of the representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. In view of the clear acceptance which the United Kingdom had already given to the principles underlying the purpose of the Special Committee, it would have been preferable if the United Kingdom representative had remained associated with its deliberations.

44. The representative of Mali thanked the Government and people of the United Republic of Tanzania for the very warm and very African welcome which they had given the Special Committee. He also thanked Vice-President Kawawa for his address and for his Government's interest in the work and objectives of the Special Committee. He recalled that General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), which had been adopted in 1960, had given rise to a new hope: the immediate liberation of millions of human beings who were still living under the yoke of colonialism and imperialism. With a view to the practical implementation of that resolution, the Special Committee had already made recommendations to the colonial Powers; but the time for statements of principle was past. The Special Committee should decide on the adoption of specific measures in order to hasten the accession of dependent Territories to freedom, in accordance with resolution 2105 (XX). Mali, for its part, suggested the following: (1) that the Committee should proceed to hear the petitioners from the national liberation movements, since in most cases they were unable to come to New York; (2) that working groups should be set up to consider the agenda items. The working groups would propose practical measures regarding the Territories in question; they might set a target date for the accession to independence of Territories still under foreign domination. That would be in keeping with the spirit of operative paragraph 9 of resolution 2105 (XX), which read as follows:

"Requests the Special Committee, whenever it considers it appropriate, to recommend a deadline for the accession to independence of each Territory in accordance with the wishes of the people".

He thanked the Tanzanian Government for the assistance it was giving to the African liberation movements. In addition, he requested the Secretariat to keep the Special Committee informed of the results of the Security Council debate on the question of Southern Rhodesia, in order to assist the Special Committee in its work.

45. The representative of Iran conveyed the greetings of the Iranian people and Government to the United Republic of Tanzania and expressed his country's gratitude to the President for enabling the Special Committee to hold meetings in Dar es Salaam, where it had a unique and important opportunity of meeting and conversing with the representatives of thousands of people who had taken refuge in Tanzania—a land of the free. The location was important because it would help the Special Committee to find ways and means of bringing about the rapid elimination of colonialism. Vice-President Kawawa had been quite right when he had said, in his inspiring statement, that peace was not possible if it was based on the injustices of colonialism. Peace and quiet would come to Africa only when colonialism was completely eradicated from the continent. Then the energies and efforts at present being spent on regaining independence would be released for improving conditions of life in Africa. For under colonialism Africans had been materially and spiritually deprived.

46. The progress made in Tanzania during the year since his previous visit was clear evidence of what a people could do when master of its own destiny. Under the dynamic and wise leadership of President Nyerere, great progress had been made in the economic, social, educational and political development of the country. Of particular significance was its great experience in democracy, which would serve as a guideline for the newly independent countries.

47. He pledged the full support of his delegation for all measures likely to promote the liberation of the Zimbabwe people, the inhabitants of South West Africa, people under Portuguese subjugation and all other peoples still languishing in colonial bondage.

48. The representative of Bulgaria expressed the sincere gratitude of the delegation of the People's Republic of Bulgaria to the Government and people of Tanzania for their invitation and for their contribution to the work of the Special Committee. The young Tanzanian people inspired admiration since they were in the front ranks of those who were struggling against colonialism and neo-colonialism. The address by Vice-President Kawawa was further proof of the Tanzanian contribution to the struggle for the elimination of the last vestiges of colonialism in Africa. The United Republic of Tanzania could rely upon the assistance and friendship of all those who were struggling against imperialism, including Bulgaria.

49. He whole-heartedly endorsed the Special Committee's visit to Africa and believed that the work which the Committee would do during its stay would be the most important of the year. The twentieth session of the General Assembly had adopted resolutions which represented a great step forward. The Special Committee should see to it that they were applied without delay, for the time had come to give full effect to resolution 1514 (XV). In the course of the visit to Africa members of the Committee would make contact with the representatives of the oppressed peoples; they should ask themselves how they could help them effectively. As far as Southern Rhodesia was concerned, for example, the recent debates of the Security Council had shown that the United Kingdom did not hesitate to enter into negotiations with Ian Smith and to work out a compromise with him. Bulgaria, for its part, had supported the draft resolution which had been submitted by the African members of the Council and which had called upon the United Kingdom to use force against the racist Smith régime and upon the Council to apply the measures provided for under Chapter VII of the Charter. The Special Committee should request that the United Kingdom should suspend the 1961 Constitution in order to restore the rights of the people of Zimbabwe, convene a constitutional conference, and set a date for the independence of Southern Rhodesia. As far as Portugal was concerned, Bulgaria had supported all the United Nations resolutions aimed at the application of sanctions against the colonial Salazar régime with a view to restoring the legitimate rights to independence of the peoples of Mozambique, Angola and so-called Portuguese Guinea. The representatives of the liberation movements could be certain of the assistance and co-operation of the Bulgarian people.

50. He thanked Vice-President Kawawa and assured him that the Bulgarian delegation was well aware of the special responsibilities of the United Nations towards South West Africa and the Territories of Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland. Resolution 1514 (XV) should be implemented without delay. The Special Committee should be guided by the noble principles of the United Nations and by the desire to preserve world peace. However, the Bulgarian delegation unreservedly endorsed the wise words of Vice-President Kawawa that "peace among peoples based on the injustice of colonialism was impossible".

51. The representative of Yugoslavia expressed his thanks to the Government and people of Tanzania for inviting the Special Committee to Dar es Salaam. He emphasized the prominent role played by Tanzania in the struggle against colonialism and the policy of apartheid. He stressed that the remaining colonial problems were extremely serious, and more especially so as there were no changes for the better in the positions of the colonial Powers.

52. He expressed his delegation's opinion that the Special Committee's visit to Africa would enable the members to get closely acquainted with the problems, and expressed the belief that this would bring about more effective work by the Committee.

53. He extended the thanks of his delegation to the Vice-President, Mr. Kawawa, for his inspiring address, and expressed the best wishes of Yugoslavia to the Government and people of Tanzania.

54. The representative of Australia thanked the Special Committee's kind Tanzanian hosts for their welcome and hospitality. He expressed the respects of the Australian delegation to President Nyerere, vital teacher and leader of a vital people, thanked Vice-President Kawawa for his welcome and thanked Ambassador Malecela for all he had done and was doing.

55. There was a fellow feeling between Tanzanians and Australians as members of the Commonwealth, sharing many common inherited institutions and ideas. His country had also been a colonial Territory. It also had experienced the excitement of the period of transition to and after independence and had found that time was necessary to meet many of its problems. But it was exciting. Round him now in Tanzania he could feel the excitement of new development. Australians did not profess to know a great deal about Africa. But there were Africans in his country—not a great many, it was true, but among some 12,000 other students from developing countries (mainly Asian) they were bringing much that was good to Australia and, he believed, taking much that was good away. Through them Australia had become aware of the fact that the future of Africa was in good hands. As an individual he was conscious of a dream coming true on this his first visit to Africa south of the Sahara, and sensed an atmosphere of new hope in Africa.

56. The representative of Poland expressed the thanks and gratitude of his delegation to President Nyerere and the Government and people of Tanzania for the invitation extended to the Special Committee. Indeed, the welcome accorded to it was a token of the country's willingness to assist the United Nations in the struggle against colonialism and racism.

57. He had had the privilege of representing Poland in 1962 on the Committee of Seventeen, which had met in Dar es Salaam, and had again visited the capital in 1965 to serve on the same enlarged Committee. It was gratifying to see the progress achieved by Tanzania in all fields of national development since independence. The Polish Government and people welcomed the political, economic and social attainments of Tanzania and wished them every further success in their aspirations and a happy and prosperous future.

58. Vice-President Kawawa's address would inspire those wishing to hasten the end of colonialism and racism at a time when concern was deepening over open and disguised forms of oppression by colonial and neo-colonial forces. Poland had always given staunch support to national liberation movements in Africa and other parts of the world. The Special Committee had always sought to adopt recommendations for peaceful solutions to the problems posed by colonialism. Blame for the situation in Southern Rhodesia, in Territories under Portuguese domination, in South West Africa and in Aden, as well as in other dependent Territories, rested with the colonial Powers, which had consistently refused to comply with the decisions of the Special Committee, the General Assembly and the Security Council. The racial discrimination, oppressive measures and direct military action undertaken by Portugal, South Africa and the Smith régime, together with the assistance given them by the United States of America, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United Kingdom and other countries in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), showed that the colonial Powers were determined to preserve white domination in the parts of Africa in question and to further the interests of foreign companies and trusts exploiting the peoples of the whole region. That policy was fraught with tragic consequences and dangers to peace and security. The Polish delegation therefore believed that any decisions or recommendations adopted by the Special Committee with regard to the Territories in question should make concrete provision for early dates for eliminating colonial régimes and dismantling military bases. The time had come to fix, in consultation with the peoples of the dependent Territories, target dates for the granting of independence to every such Territory in line with the freely expressed views and aspirations of the inhabitants. The claim often advanced by defenders of the so-called "free world" that dependent peoples were immature and unready to assume self-government was discordant with the spirit of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), which recognized the right of all peoples to self-determination. Recent developments had made it clear that unless mandatory measures provided for under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter were taken, the existence of colonial régimes would lead to a further deterioration of the international situation and to armed conflict. Finally, he endorsed Vice-President Kawawa's statement that the sooner the United Nations acted, and acted effectively, the better for all concerned.

59. The representative of Iraq thanked the Government and people of Tanzania for the cordial and spontaneous welcome extended to the Special Committee.

60. Vice-President Kawawa had rightly emphasized the special position and esteem enjoyed by the Special Committee in Tanzania and in all other freedom-loving countries. In that connexion he quoted an extract from the Vice-President's address to the effect that sooner or later, in default of other ways of achieving their freedom, subjugated countries would fight for it; that it was the role of the Special Committee to obviate such fighting by fostering a situation in which the peoples of each nation governed themselves in accordance with their own wishes and needs; and that the members of the Special Committee should therefore be working themselves out of a job.

61. In the light of what the Vice-President had said, he regretted the absence of the United Kingdom delegate. Member States had an obligation to abide by resolutions of the various organs of the United Nations. That was especially true of the major Powers, which should continue to demonstrate their good faith to the rest of the world.

62. The struggle undertaken by Tanzanians for the cause of independence in Africa and all over the world had won the admiration of freedom fighters and peace-loving countries. He felt sure that the Special Committee's meetings would further the cause of freedom and hasten the process of decolonization. Nothing would delight his delegation more than the winding up of the Special Committee once the colonized peoples of the world had regained dignity and freedom for the benefit of all mankind.

63. The representative of Syria thanked the people and Government of Tanzania for their generous hospitality. In the field of international relations, Tanzania had distinguished itself, under the leadership of its President and the guidance of such able men as Ambassador Malecela, by its constant and vigilant stand against colonialism. Loyal to the principles and resolutions of the United Nations, it ever strove to translate the ideals of that organization into action. The Vice-President of Tanzania, in his address to the Special Committee that morning, had stated that the African continent sought justice above all since only by its attainment would the need to fight be removed. So long as justice had not been secured, the struggle of the freedom fighters was not only a right but a duty and should command the support of every nation professing belief in the principles of the United Nations and in the freedom of all mankind. The Republic of Tanzania was to be congratulated upon its admirable record in that connexion.

64. As the representative of Mali had said, the time had come for the Special Committee, and the United Nations as a whole, to pass from general principles to effective action. Those who still subjugated vast numbers of peoples in Africa and elsewhere, should be made to realize that a clear choice lay before them: either they had to recognize the cause of emancipation or they would be faced with a mortal fight which would ultimately lead to their defeat. The Vice-President of Tanzania, Mr. Kawawa, had rightly described as fundamental the important task of the Special Committee, faced as it was with the explosive situation existing in such areas as Southern Rhodesia, the Portuguese-dominated colonies, Aden and Oman. Those facts should now guide the Special Committee in its action.

65. The representative of the United States of America joined previous speakers in expressing her delegation's appreciation for the generous welcome extended to the Special Committee by the Vice-President of Tanzania, Mr. Kawawa, and for the hospitality offered by the Government and people of Tanzania. As he had stated, it was to be hoped that the time would come when the Special Committee would no longer need to meet, having secured the right to self-determination, through universal suffrage, for all the remaining dependent Territories.

66. The United States Government had frequently expressed the view, which she wished to take the opportunity of reiterating at that stage, that only by the expression of a free and informed choice could any people achieve the government it desired. No nation could rest content until the peoples of Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, the Portuguese Territories and dependent Territories elsewhere had all, in accordance with the United Nations Charter, freely selected the governments of their choice.

67. It was to be hoped that the Special Committee would take advantage of its proximity to the Territories referred to in its agenda to acquaint itself directly with the difficult and complex problems being experienced daily by the peoples concerned. In view of the unhappy lot of those peoples, the Special Committee should devote itself to reasoned consideration of their problems rather than to provocative accusations or sterile polemics.

68. As the Vice-President had said, the people of Tanzania, unlike those of Southern Rhodesia and other Non-Self-Governing Territories with which the Special Committee was concerned, were able to develop their own society and economic and political institutions. In view of the spirit of enthusiasm with which its people were pursuing those tasks and their pride of achievement, the United States delegation considered that the choice of Tanzania as the starting point for the Committee's African tour had been extremely fortunate.

69. In conclusion, she said that the Government and people of Tanzania were to be congratulated upon the remarkable progress achieved in developing a modern and active economy.

70. The representative of Tunisia recalled that whenever the Special Committee went to Africa, the Tanzanian Government always invited it to hold part of its session on the hospitable soil of Tanzania; in spite of all the problems of development faced by it, Tanzania did not lose sight of its duty and responsibility in respect of the liberation of the peoples still under the colonial yoke. He therefore thanked the Government and people of Tanzania for having been kind enough to offer their warm and fraternal hospitality once more to the Special Committee.

71. The Tunisian delegation's views of colonialism had been stated on several occasions in the Special Committee and in other international bodies. The Tunisian Government was in favour of the liberation of all countries still under foreign domination and would spare no effort to carry out the measures which would be adopted with a view to obtaining tangible results in that field.

72. The representative of Venezuela thanked the Government and people of Tanzania for the warm welcome which they had accorded the Special Committee. He hoped that the Committee would do constructive work and obtain satisfactory results.

73. The representative of Ethiopia associated his delegation with the expressions of appreciation extended by previous speakers to the Government and people of Tanzania. He also wished to pay tribute to the people of Tanzania for their sacrifices and achievements in the struggle against colonialism, both in Africa and elsewhere. It was with satisfaction that he could testify, as Ethiopian Ambassador in Tanzania, to the remarkable progress which that country had made under the able and dynamic leadership of President Nyerere.

74. In his opening address, the Vice-President of Tanzania, Mr. Kawawa, had clearly outlined the tasks which lay before the Special Committee. As he had said, until the septic sore of colonialism had been removed from Africa, there could be no security for the continent. It was the firm belief of the Ethiopian delegation that the Special Committee could, during its forthcoming tour, do much to bring the eradication of colonialism closer to realization. By helping and encouraging the freedom fighters, now locked in a mortal struggle with the ruthless forces of oppression, the Special Committee could, as the representatives of the moral conscience of all mankind, greatly advance the cause of justice and the rule of law, both of which were the hallmarks of international society.

75. The representative of Italy expressed his delegation's appreciation to the Government of Tanzania for their hospitality and thanked the Vice-President, Mr. Kawawa, for his kind words of welcome. The Special Committee, which had already had the privilege of meeting in the congenial atmosphere of Dar es Salaam in 1965, would benefit from its renewed contact with the realities of the African scene and would be enabled to make sure and genuine progress towards the goals on which all were agreed.

76. With regard to the substance of the Special Committee's work, the Italian delegation fully agreed with the Chairman that it should demonstrate the increasing concern of the United Nations with regard to the position of the peoples under colonial administration and strengthen its own capacity to help those peoples in their struggle for self-determination and independence. The statements to be made by the petitioners would be particularly valuable: the information they could furnish on the situation in their respective Territories, as well as their views with regard to the best methods of attaining the objectives set forth in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), would greatly assist the Special Committee in its deliberations and would, at the same time, provide the petitioners with further encouragement. In the light of those factors, the Italian delegation wished to pledge its full and loyal co-operation in the Special Committee's work which, it was confident, would be fruitful.

77. The representative of Denmark thanked the Vice-President of Tanzania for his cordial welcome and excellent analysis of his Government's views on the problems of colonialism. The Danish delegation was grateful to the Government of Tanzania for its generous invitation to the Committee to hold a part of its current session in Dar es Salaam. Those who had attended the Special Committee's previous session would remember the warm hospitality already extended to the Special Committee by the Government and people of Tanzania as well as the excellent arrangements which had been made in that connexion. The Danish delegation, which was well aware of the active role played by Tanzania in the fight against colonialism and of the energy and zeal with which it was dealing with the internal problems of a newly independent country, looked forward to learning of the progress made during the past year.

78. As far as the Special Committee's work in Africa was concerned, it was a source of concern to his delegation that little or no progress had been recorded with regard to the situation in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and the Portuguese colonies. However, it was to be hoped that the Special Committee, which would have the opportunity of discussing those serious problems in detail, would prove worthy of the confidence of the African peoples, in word and in deed. Both the Chairman and the representative of Italy had rightly observed that one of the Special Committee's most important tasks was to demonstrate the deep concern of the United Nations regarding the problem of colonialism. To do so, the Special Committee should agree not only upon the general principle, that colonialism should be brought to an end as soon as possible, but also upon the way in which that objective could be achieved. That would of course necessitate concessions on all sides but, in the opinion of the Danish delegation, it would serve the common cause, namely, the effective fight against colonialism.

79. Lastly, he expressed the hope that the Special Committee's session in Africa would be fruitful and that a spirit of co-operation would prevail between all delegations.

80. The representative of Madagascar said that the Malagasy Government was against colonialism; its views on the question had already been stated on several occasions and were well known. He would comment on the agenda items as they were considered.

81. He thanked the Tanzanian Government for having been kind enough once again to invite the Special Committee to hold part of its session in Tanzania.

82. The representative of Sierra Leone said that every delegation would certainly wish to study the important and thought-provoking statement made by the Vice-President of Tanzania in his opening address to the Special Committee.

83. The problems of colonialism still remained and every effort was being made to liberate the countries concerned, despite great odds. Sierra Leone had supported those efforts in all the organs of the United Nations and had maintained its stand unequivocally, both in the Organization of African Unity and in other international bodies. He would comment in detail upon his Government's policy as the Special Committee dealt with each Territory in turn. It was to be hoped that those freedom fighters who had had to flee their countries would find succour and that the Special Committee would, as a result of its deliberations, move nearer to a solution of the problem of colonialism.

84. Expressing his delegation's appreciation to the Government and people of Tanzania, he said that their hospitality was well known to the Special Committee which had met in Dar es Salaam the previous year. It was to be hoped that the Special Committee's current session would meet with greater success than it had in 1965.

85. The representative of the Ivory Coast expressed thanks to the Tanzanian Government for the kind invitation which it had extended to the Special Committee and for its warm welcome. He expressed his gratitude to the Vice-President of Tanzania for his wise observations, which the delegation of the Ivory Coast would not fail to take into account in the work that the Special Committee was to undertake.

86. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation was gratified that it had been possible for the Special Committee to hold its first meeting in Tanzania's capital city.

87. Since much of his Government's policy with regard to the problem of colonialism had already been outlined by the Vice-President of Tanzania, he merely wished at that stage to assure the Special Committee that their expressions of appreciation would be conveyed to those concerned. He also wished, on behalf of the Tanzanian delegation, to welcome all members of the Special Committee to Tanzania. Their presence in Dar es Salaam was a reminder of the work which remained to be done in the struggle to free the African continent. Once independence had been achieved, the talents and ability expended in that connexion—and as exemplified by the Special Committee itself—could be used in other fields of human progress, particularly in Africa which had for so long been exploited.

88. During their stay in Tanzania, members of the Special Committee might experience certain inconveniences. His Government would however make every effort to minimize such difficulties, in so far as the limited resources of a developing country allowed.

89. Lastly, he expressed the hope that all members of the Special Committee would enjoy their stay in the United Republic of Tanzania.

Anniversary of Africa Freedom Day celebrated on 25 May 1966

General statements

90. The representative of Venezuela speaking on the occasion of the anniversary of Africa Freedom Day, recalled that the previous year, at Lusaka, he had expressed the hope that there would be no need for the Special Committee to go back to Africa because Africa would celebrate Africa Unity Day a completely free continent; in other words, as President Kaunda had so eloquently expressed the hope, Africa would celebrate the unity of a continent entirely liberated from the colonial yoke. Africa Unity Day had come and that hope was far from being realized. President Kaunda could not yet dry his tears, for millions of his brothers were still suffering under foreign domination. But colonialism had been judged and condemned. Nothing and nobody could prevent the sentence being carried out. The course of history was irreversible. Colonialism must disappear and would disappear from all the places where it still persisted. The peoples of Africa who were still subject to a colonial régime had, like all the peoples of the earth, an inalienable right to self-determination and independence. The day was not far off when that right would be recognized. African unity, which had started so well, could not be completely achieved so long as there were still peoples on the African continent subject to foreign domination. The Latin American peoples, who had paid a very high price in human life and economic well-being for their independence, who were still fighting to eliminate the last vestiges of colonialism in the Americas, unconditionally supported their African brothers in the fight to recover their national dignity and their freedom. They hoped that in the very near future Africa Unity Day could be celebrated in a continent composed solely of free and independent States, where racial inequality had disappeared, where relations between men were founded on respect for human rights, and where harmony, the symbol of unity and prosperity, would prevail.

91. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, speaking on behalf of the Bulgarian, Polish and Soviet delegations, greeted the peoples of Africa who were today celebrating Africa Unity Day.

92. At their historic meeting at Addis Ababa in May 1963, the Heads of State and Government of the independent African countries had decided to celebrate, on 25 May each year, the anniversary of the liberation of Africa. It had been their intention to remind all the African peoples, whether they were already free or were still subject to the yoke of the oppressor, of the tasks which lay before them. It was for Africans to sweep the last vestiges of colonialism from Africa as soon as possible. For the members of the Conference at the Addis Ababa summit, it had been self-evident that no African people could be considered entirely free so long as any part of the African continent still groaned under the colonialist boot.

93. In the past few years Africa had undergone a radical transformation. Many African countries had acceded to independence. A number of names that the African people had learned to hate had been expunged from the map of Africa. It was now the turn of the countries situated in the south of the continent. It was through their territory that colonialism's last line of defence was drawn, and it was in their territory that colonialism was now digging its own grave. The ever more bitter struggle that the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea were waging for their freedom showed the whole world that the fate of colonialism was sealed.

94. All men of good will rejoiced at the successes scored by the African peoples in their struggle against colonialism and imperialism. The peoples of the Soviet Union, Bulgaria and Poland, like those of the other socialist countries, had proved to the Africans the firmness of their friendship, and were more than ever ready to give them aid and assistance.

95. On that day when the peoples of Africa were celebrating the liberation of their continent, and when all those who were fighting for the freedom and independence of that continent shared their joy, the Soviet, Bulgarian and Polish delegations paid a tribute to the sacred struggle which the Africans had undertaken for the complete liberation of their ancestral land, part of which was still subject to foreign domination, and for the development of their country in peace, freedom and progress. Those delegations hoped that the African peoples and the Organization of African Unity would meet with further successes in their noble enterprise: the union of all the forces of the African continent in the fight against imperialism and colonialism to promote peace and social progress.

96. The representative of Iran said that that day—Africa Day—was the third anniversary of the founding of the Organization of African Unity, which was the instrument of African solidarity, and it was the second such occasion on which the Special Committee had had the good fortune to be present on African soil in pursuit of the same aims as the OAU.

97. Speaking on his own behalf and on that of the Asian countries represented on the Special Committee, he extended hearty congratulations to the OAU. During its very short existence it had done much to assist liberation movements everywhere in Africa, and had been instrumental in promoting inter-African co-operation. It was fast becoming a centre for co-ordinating the activities of African nations in solving economic, social, cultural or humanitarian problems, in accordance both with the charter of the OAU and with the letter and spirit of the United Nations Charter. The OAU, unlike many similar organizations, was more than a mere institution: it was a living concept and a reflection of strong African sentiments for a larger union transcending ethnic and national boundaries.

98. Speaking on his own behalf, he said that Africa, in its drive for unity, was much more advanced and forward-looking than the other continents, since an African, in addition to his loyalty to his own country, passionately regarded himself as an African. Such a sentiment was a vital ingredient for eventual unity on a continental scale, and it was that spirit that had brought the OAU into being. It was the same spirit that would help the organization to surmount the obstacles put in its path by those interested to see it discredited, and finally the same spirit that would in the end root out Smith and his kind, notwithstanding temporary setbacks, and bring about the freedom and independence of all Africans.

99. The representative of Iraq on behalf of his own delegation and that of the Syrian Arab Republic, said that he would be expressing the feelings of all Arabs in speaking on that auspicious day, which symbolized the hopes and aspirations of the people of the great African continent.

100. The Arab nation was bound to Africa by innumerable links, more than half the Arab world being in fact on African soil and the remainder geographically near it. Both Arabs and Africans had suffered—and indeed some were still suffering—from colonial domination. They were counting on all the help the United Nations could give to gain their freedom, dignity and independence. History, religion and culture had also brought Arabs and Africans together and moulded their common heritage and common interests.

101. The struggle of the African people in Southern Rhodesia, Mozambique, Angola and the rest of the colonies in Africa was being watched with great interest and admiration in the Arab world, with no less an interest, in fact, than in the liberation of the rest of the Arab world.

102. On that great occasion, he invoked the mood of the great American poet, Walt Whitman, whose belief in the brotherhood and common interests of man had inspired his poem that began with the lines:

"I celebrate myself
And sing myself,
And what I shall assume
You shall assume,
For every atom
Belonging to me
As good belongs to you".

103. The celebration of Africa Day was not confined to the great continent of Africa, but was shared in by all freedom-loving nations and by humanity and large.

104. The representative of the United States of America speaking on behalf of her own delegation and the delegations of Australia, Denmark and Italy, extended the warmest congratulations to the Organization of African Unity and to independent African States. Africa Day was a fitting reminder of the phenomenal development of independent States during the past two decades.

105. It also gave pause to reflect that the right of self-determination and of people freely to express their wishes and govern themselves as they saw fit, had yet to be universally recognized. The Organization of African Unity could make an increasing contribution to such universal recognition wherever there was repression of those rights. Its role was of the greatest importance to the African countries and to those others, such as hers, which had a strong interest in Africa's future.

106. The African continent had great human and natural resources, and great potential for economic development, and her country, together with others, was privileged to be contributing technical and economic assistance and educational aid.

107. One important key to Africa's economic future lay in increased co-operation between nations, which the OAU was in a position to further. Co-operation in social and cultural affairs was also a significant area in which the OAU was able to make an important contribution.

108. She congratulated those members of the Special Committee who represented African countries, and conveyed to the people of Africa through them the warmest good wishes of all Americans and of all the delegations on whose behalf she was speaking.

109. The representative of Yugoslavia, speaking on behalf of his Government, people and delegation, warmly greeted the people of Africa on their historic anniversary.

110. He stressed the importance of the OAU and its international role which had been recognized by the resolution passed by the General Assembly on the subject in 1965. He expressed the hope that there would be a large measure of meaningful co-operation between the OAU and the United Nations. His delegation had supported the proposal for the Special Committee's visit to Africa, and had voiced its expectation that the visit would offer large possibilities for promotion of co-operation between the Special Committee and the OAU.

111. He emphasized that Yugoslavia had very friendly relations with African independent countries, and stood firmly in support of those that had not yet attained independence.

112. He conveyed warmest wishes for the further success of the OAU and for the prosperity and better future of Africa.

113. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that for the sons and daughters of Africa, Africa Day was a day on which to celebrate, meditate and resolve. It gave Africans cause to meditate on two aspects: the freedom that had been gained in the liberated States, and their championship of the cause of liberating from colonial subjection and apartheid those States still afflicted by it. Only a decade ago, colonial exploitation had been running roughshod over the continent. The African people had stood with courage, notwithstanding the overwhelming odds against them, to liberate their continent and enjoy their legitimate rights of freedom and independence. Many of their struggles against their well-armed oppressors had been crowned with success. Those countries that had won their independence were now working to consolidate it.

114. The second factor—the cause of liberation of the countries still under subjection—was brought sharply into focus by the Special Committee's presence in Africa. Millions of brother Africans were being oppressed by the racist minorities of Southern Rhodesia and South Africa, who would have been defeated but for the military and economic aid received from their allies in spite of the many resolutions that had been passed by the United Nations. Free Africans must therefore once again reiterate their unqualified support for the just struggle of their brothers in South Africa, South West Africa, Southern Rhodesia and other countries. The day should be one of rededication and renewed pledge of support for the charter of the Organization of African Unity to enable the final goal of a united Africa to be reached: a day to remind all the colonizers in Africa that their departure was long overdue and there was nothing the free African States could not do to get them out. It was however, the desire of all Africans to live in friendship with the rest of the world, so long as it could be based on freedom and equality.

115. The Chairman said that it was not a matter of accident that the Special Committee was meeting in Africa on Africa Day. It was symptomatic of the fact that Africa had arrived in the United Nations.

116. Speaking on his own behalf, as a proud and humble son of Africa, he expressed the hope that the future would be brighter than the past, and that the patience and resilience of the African people would be able to find full expression in the years ahead, enabling them to contribute towards fundamental human values.

117. The Chairman said that the Special Committee had come to the end of its deliberations in Dar es Salaam. New ideas and fresh information had been provided by the petitioners; the Committee had had the advantage of co-operation from the OAU, and it had adopted a resolution (A/AC.109/167) representing an important contribution to the solution of the problem of Southern Rhodesia. It had listened with interest to petitioners from Southern Rhodesia, Mozambique and South West Africa, whose testimony would no doubt be of assistance to the Special Committee in its task of hastening their advancement and independence.

118. On behalf of the Special Committee, he expressed his deep gratitude to the Government and people of the United Republic of Tanzania for their cordial hospitality and for their many personal acts of kindness.

119. The representative of the Secretary-General, on behalf of the Secretariat, expressed his deep gratitude to the Special Committee's hosts for their generous hospitality and for the many facilities provided. He was particularly thankful to Mr. Malecela, Mr. Fom and other members of the Tanzanian delegation who had gone out of their way to facilitate the Secretariat's work.

120. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania on behalf of the President, the Government and people of Tanzania, said how happy his country had been to play host to the Special Committee. Its action sprang from its sincere belief in the work of the United Nations and in the need for decolonization.

121. He hoped that the Special Committee's work in Dar es Salaam and elsewhere in Africa would prove fruitful and that the resolutions adopted would be implemented. His own country would do its utmost to carry out those decisions so that fellow Africans still under the yoke of colonialism could be freed and enabled to join the United Nations.

B. MEETINGS HELD AT MOGADISCIO, SOMALIA

Opening of meetings

Address by the Prime Minister on behalf of the President of Somalia

122. The Prime Minister of Somalia said that he had great pleasure in welcoming the Special Committee to Mogadiscio on behalf of His Excellency President Aden Abdulla Osman and the Government and people of the Somali Republic. The Somali people were especially honoured to be able to serve as the Committee's hosts. Somalia owed a debt of gratitude to the United Nations for, under its trusteeship, it had been able to follow a smooth and steady path from colonial subjection to sovereign independence. If Somalia could in any way assist the Committee in its task of implementing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, it would have done something towards repaying that debt.

123. The Somali people felt honoured to be the Special Committee's hosts because they had a deep sense of the historic significance of its work in Africa—work which proved that the concept of colonialism had been condemned. Millions of people on the African continent, who had formerly been subjected to humiliation and indignity to serve the economic and political interests of the colonial Powers, were now free to work out their own destinies. As a people ruthlessly divided by the colonial Powers and a nation still suffering from that division, the Somalis were particularly conscious of the importance of the Special Committee's task. They were aware, too, that the struggle against the remaining enclaves of colonialism might prove to be the most bitter of all. The Somali people joined in the Committee's concern for the plight of those who still had to fight for freedom, and the Committee could rest assured of their complete support in its endeavour.

124. The Special Committee's visit and the presence in Mogadiscio of the petitioners reminded him of the days when he had himself addressed the United Nations Trusteeship Council as a petitioner. He had spoken on behalf of Somalia at a time when its course towards independence was still being chartered and he therefore knew full well the value of such hearings: they provided an opportunity for viewpoints to be presented personally; they gave encouragement to those who were struggling for their freedom and they stimulated world-wide interest in the cause of liberty. The fact that the Special Committee could hold some of its meetings in Africa had enhanced the value of the hearings. Through its findings, the Committee would be in a position to present to the United Nations General Assembly a more complete picture of the situation prevailing in each of the remaining colonial Territories. Furthermore, the extensive itinerary arranged for its visit enabled petitioners from the remotest areas to obtain a hearing.

125. Ideally, the Special Committee should visit the Territories themselves. The reason why that had not been possible, however, was well known: the Governments administering those Territories had much to hide, and a visit from the Committee would have finally disproved the false propaganda circulated about them. Throughout those areas, and particularly in those controlled by South Africa and Portugal, the colonial Powers would have the world believe that the indigenous people under their rule were satisfied with their lot and that economic betterment meant more to them than the attainment of political and social equality. Such claims were demonstrably false. A great and unjust gap existed between all African workers and white immigrant settlers—a gap which was maintained by the denial to Africans of their political and social rights.

126. Time and again, history had shown beyond doubt that the search for national identity through the process of self-determination was an inexorable trend followed by all people as part of their natural development. When that natural right was denied, social unrest and turmoil were the inevitable consequences. Unhappily, that unrest had already manifested itself in many colonial Territories and, in some, had led to grave and bloody conflicts.

127. In his opinion, the most important point was that the United Nations General Assembly stood committed, by a majority decision, to ensure the speedy progress towards self-government of all peoples under colonial rule. If Member States were allowed to flout that decision and if they were to be supported and encouraged by powerful industrialist countries, which placed economic interest above the principles of the United Nations Charter, then there would be justification for the charge that the United Nations had failed in its purpose—which would be sad indeed.

128. It was not his intention, however, to end on a pessimistic note. The United Nations had already achieved much for the liberation of the colonial peoples and the Special Committee was continuing to propose practical and far-sighted solutions to the pressing colonial problems of the age. It might take time, and it would certainly take determination on the Committee's part, before its recommendations were implemented. But the irresistible forces of freedom which had radically transformed the map of Africa over the past decade were by no means spent. He was confident that the Committee's presence in Africa would be an encouragement to those forces and would ensure that they would continue to operate with the same degree of intensity until all Africans were free.

129. The Chairman expressed appreciation to the Prime Minister and to the President, Government and people of Somalia for their generous invitation to the Special Committee to hold a part of its session in Mogadiscio.

130. The warm welcome extended to the Special Committee on its arrival at Mogadiscio, which was both a reflection of traditional African hospitality and an expression of the Somali people's uncompromising stand against colonialism, had made its members even more aware of the trust placed in them and in the United Nations.

131. It was gratifying to note the progress which Somalia had made in all fields since it had attained independence, and the Prime Minister had graciously referred to the assistance which the United Nations had rendered in that connexion. In turn the Government and people of Somalia could be assured that, in discharging its mandate, the Special Committee had derived inspiration from the United Nations contribution to Somalia's independence.

132. As the Prime Minister had rightly pointed out, ideally the Special Committee should visit colonial Territories themselves. Unfortunately, however, that had not been possible owing to lack of co-operation from the administering Powers, and the Committee was therefore holding its meetings in Africa as close as possible to the various centres of the colonial struggle. It hoped in that way to acquire more direct knowledge of the aspirations of the colonial people while at the same time demonstrating once again the Committee's solidarity with them and its determination to spare no effort in assisting their countries to attain independence.

133. It was in that spirit that he wished to inform all representatives of national liberation movements, as well as all African peoples suffering under the colonial yoke, that the Special Committee's visit to Mogadiscio was yet another expression of the United Nations firm determination to liquidate colonialism without delay. Admittedly, despite the efforts made, progress had been slow. However, in keeping with the principles of the Charter, the United Nations sought to achieve its objectives primarily by persuasion. Therefore, if the efforts of the United Nations had not been as fruitful as might be desired, it was the colonial Powers which were to blame, since they refused to co-operate with the Committee.

134. Lastly, reiterating his thanks to the Prime Minister, the President, the Government and the people of Somalia, he said that the Special Committee would make every endeavour to implement the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

135. The representative of Italy associated his delegation with the Chairman's expression of thanks to the Government and people of Somalia, which occupied a special place in the heart of all Italians. The common efforts of Somalia and Italy, during the years of trusteeship administration, had not been in vain, and the task of bringing Somalia to independence had been fulfilled to the satisfaction of the United Nations.

136. As the Chairman had said, the Special Committee had come to Africa to demonstrate the increasing concern of the United Nations for the position of the colonial peoples and to strengthen its own capacity to help them in their struggle for independence. While in Mogadiscio, it would consider the problem which was so important to the people of Somalia.

137. He had been impressed by the idealism and sense of responsibility underlying the words of the Prime Minister of Somalia, which would be borne in mind by the Special Committee when the time came for it to submit its recommendations to the General Assembly. The Committee could not always promise prompt solutions, since that was neither in the nature of the problems themselves nor of the United Nations, which sought to work through conciliation and mediation rather than through force. However, the Government and people of Somalia could rest assured that the Committee's deliberations would be guided by the sense of responsibility and justice which had always characterized its work. The results achieved would not betray the trust which the Somali people had placed in the United Nations.

138. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania thanked the Government and people of Somalia for their timely invitation to the Special Committee to meet in Mogadiscio and expressed appreciation to the Prime Minister for his words of welcome. The enthusiasm with which the Committee had been received upon its arrival in Mogadiscio had revealed that the spirit prevailing in Africa would ultimately lead to the annihilation of colonialism.

139. The position of Tanzania with regard to colonialism was well known: it was the duty of all Africans to secure the liberation of those Territories which were still being exploited and suppressed by the colonialists and as his delegation had repeatedly stated, there could be no real freedom for Africa until that was done. Tanzania supported the struggle for independence not only of Africans, but of all peoples who, during the course of history, had been subjugated by colonialists. The Committee's meetings in Mogadiscio was a page in the history of the fight against colonialism, just as the struggles in Algeria, Kenya and the Congo had been. Ultimately, the people of Africa would win; they would not only attain their own freedom but would also reinforce that of all men throughout the world, and strengthen the United Nations founded, as it was, upon the Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

140. It was of great value to the Special Committee in its work to be able to meet on African soil, where the immediacy of the problems was felt and for that reason Tanzania had offered to be host to the Committee for a part of its session in Africa.

141. Lastly, he expressed the conviction that the revolutionary spirit would further the interests of African liberation.

142. The representative of Iraq, expressing his delegation's appreciation to the Government and people of Somalia, said that from time immemorial, Arabs and Somalis had lived side by side, sharing the same ideals and aspirations. Great spiritual values linked them together and their characteristics had been shaped by a common heritage. In recent years, the struggle against colonialism had bound them even closer together in sympathy and understanding. The Iraqi delegation had been greatly impressed by the warmth with which the Special Committee had been received, by the hospitality and courtesy of the Somali people and by the atmosphere of cordial co-operation which prevailed. It was mindful of the positive role played by Somalia, in close co-operation with the Arab States as well as in the OAU and other bodies, in the decolonization and emancipation of all subjugated peoples.

143. The representative of Ethiopia expressed his delegation's thanks and appreciation for the welcome and hospitality extended by the Government and people of Somalia.

144. The people of Ethiopia regarded the people of Somalia as brothers and sisters and entertained the warmest feelings towards them. Consequently, they regarded the differences dividing the two countries as a temporary phase which would pass and be forgotten in time, for the bonds of brotherhood uniting the two peoples were as strong as they were varied.

145. Some six years earlier, he had the honour of attending Somalia's independence celebration as a member of the official Ethiopian delegation, and he remembered the joy which he had shared with the people on their attainment of freedom and independence in the beautiful city of Mogadiscio. The entire Ethiopian nation had shared in the Somali people's happiness, since their Independence Day on 1 July 1960 marked not only the successful culmination of the struggle waged by the peoples of the two countries for the eradication of colonialism in their part of Africa but also the beginning of a new era in the relations of Somalia and Ethiopia—an era of equal independent status as two neighbouring African States, with all the duties and responsibilities which that involved for the inhabitants of both countries towards each other as well as towards the international community as a whole. Ethiopia took legitimate pride in the humble role it had been able to play, both at the United Nations and in other international organizations, in bringing about that happy situation.

146. However, in all frankness, he felt bound to refer to the events of the previous day. Needless to say, his delegation had been pained and saddened by the demonstrations which had taken place.

147. First of all, he wished to refer to some pertinent parts of the Special Committee's terms of reference, since a certain amount of confusion and misunderstanding seemed to exist in the minds of certain people in Mogadiscio as to the purpose and objectives for which the Committee had been created. Its terms of reference, as contained in General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961, read inter alia as follows:

["The General Assembly"]

"1. Solemnly reiterates and reaffirms the objectives and principles enshrined in the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples contained in its resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960;

"...

"4. Requests the Special Committee to examine the application of the Declaration, ... and to report to the General Assembly ...;

148. It was evident therefore that the relations between two independent States, or the disputes that might exist between them, did not come within the purview of the Special Committee. All references and illusions made by the demonstrators to the existing border dispute between Ethiopia and Somalia, or between Somalia and Kenya, therefore, should be dismissed as irrelevant to, and without any bearing on, the work of the Committee.

149. The events at the airport and in the streets of Mogadiscio the previous day were only a small example of what misguided and ignorant people could do when they were actively incited. In his opinion, the demonstrations which had taken place had brought nothing but disgrace to the name of Africa. He said that more in sorrow than in anger. It was to the eternal shame of the leaders of Somalia that such great names as Haile Selassie and Jomo Kenyatta, two illustrious sons of Africa, revered and respected all over the world, had been defiled with impunity in the streets of Mogadiscio. It was also a measure of the distortion and misrepresentation inculcated in the minds of the demonstrators that they had shouted against the name of such a great and outstanding liberal European leader as General de Gaulle, while nothing had been said against Verwoerd, Salazar and Ian Smith, the real enemies and oppressors of the African people.

150. As for the oft-repeated declaration concerning the so-called division of the Somali people and the reference to the existence of people of Somali origin and the Somali ethnic group in Ethiopia and Kenya, his delegation wished to stress again that it had no intention of being dragged into irrelevant and pointless discussions of that kind.

151. Such worn-out phrases and clichés had become so threadbare that they could hardly disguise the real aim and objective of the Government of Somalia—namely, its desire for expansion and for territorial aggrandizement at the expense of neighbouring States.

152. High sounding words, lofty concepts and terms like “self-determination”, “unification”, “independence” and “freedom” were recklessly prostituted in Somalia to mean, in stark reality, territorial expansion and aggrandizement for the realization of which the Somali Government incited innocent nomads and shepherds in remote areas to murder, loot and plunder.

153. That policy of the Government of Somalia had been exposed and condemned by the entire body of African and international public opinion. Formal resolutions and declarations had been adopted by conferences of African Heads of State and by the conference of the Heads of State and Government of Non-Aligned Countries to the effect that all African States should respect the boundaries which they had acquired at the time of independence. His delegation saw no useful purpose, therefore, in bringing up a dead issue during the Special Committee's visit to Mogadiscio.

154. Instead of obstinately clinging to a bankrupt and discredited policy, his delegation ventured to suggest to the host Government that it should muster enough courage to renounce once and for all its futile ambition for expansion and should clear the way for fruitful co-operation and friendly relations between the two neighbouring African States. He appealed to them from the hall of their own Parliament building which they had so kindly put at the Special Committee's disposal, to awaken to reality.

155. In that connexion, the Ethiopian Government challenged the Government of Somalia to work as it did for the wider unity of pan-Africanism or even of East Africa, instead of harping on so-called “Somali unity”—a concept which was not only too narrow in scope to be of any use in the requirements of modern Africa, but also contained outmoded and dangerous elements of tribalism and racism.

156. The Ethiopian delegation believed that the two countries had much to gain from co-operative and friendly relations which would be conducive to peace and stability in the area. His Imperial Majesty, Haile Selassie I, had time and again brought that fact to the attention of the Somali leaders but so far to no avail. However, Ethiopians were a patient people and could wait. Time was on their side.

157. The question of Djibouti had been one of the preoccupations of the Somali News, the Government newspaper, and to a certain extent of the demonstrators. Since it was on the Special Committee's agenda, and a matter in which his delegation was vitally interested, he intended to participate fully in the debate when it came up for discussion. The view of his Government on the matter was well known to the Committee and his delegation reserved the right to make a detailed statement on its stand at the appropriate time. At that stage, however, he only wished to make it clear that Ethiopia totally rejected any claim on that Territory by Somalia.

158. With regard to the question of Mauritius and the Seychelles, which were also on the Special Committee's agenda for its meetings in Mogadiscio, the Ethiopian delegation would have concrete proposals to make when the time came to consider draft resolutions. Until that time, however, his delegation merely wished to welcome the coming independence of Mauritius and to express the hope that the people of Seychelles would be able to follow suit in the near future.

159. In conclusion, he reiterated his delegation's appreciation to the Government and people of Somalia for their invitation to the Special Committee and for the kind consideration they had shown.

160. The Chairman said that he regretted that the representative of Ethiopia had insisted upon making a controversial statement upon matters outside the Special Committee's purview. It would assist the Committee in its work if, in the future, representatives would confine themselves to questions on the agenda.

161. The representative of India thanked the President, Government and people of Somalia for their invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Mogadiscio.

162. India enjoyed most friendly relations with Somalia; both belonged to the group of economically developing countries in the vanguard of the fight against colonialism, and they were joined in the common endeavour to raise the living standards of their peoples. India had, within the limits of its resources, sent such trained technical personnel as doctors, engineers and teachers to help Somalia in its development. His Government's contribution was a token of the genuine friendship existing between the two countries.

163. The Prime Minister's fine address was an important contribution to the work of the Special Committee. Recalling Mr. Abdirizak's personal appearance before the Trusteeship Council years ago as a petitioner, the representative of India stated that his appearance before the Special Committee as Prime Minister of his country showed the interest of the Somali Government in the struggle against colonialism.

164. In conclusion, he extended his delegation's warm greetings to the people of Somalia and best wishes for their continued well-being and prosperity.

165. The representative of Afghanistan expressed his thanks to the Prime Minister for his inspiring address, and his gratitude to the Government and people of Somalia for their warm welcome and for enabling the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Mogadiscio.

166. The people of Afghanistan and Somalia were bound by common aspirations and strong spiritual ties, which made it all the more rewarding for his delegation to work in the young republic of great traditions.

167. The representative of Australia thanked the Government and people of Somalia for the memorable welcome extended to the Special Committee, and expressed his appreciation of the opening address of the Prime Minister, whose words would provide inspiration and guidance along the road to an Africa free of colonialism and united in human dignity.

168. The representative of Syria said that his delegation fully associated itself with the statement made by the Chairman in response to the Prime Minister's opening address.

169. The first words of welcome the Special Committee had heard on its arrival in Mogadiscio, "As-salaam aleikum" (Peace be upon you!), were a symbol of faith in peace built upon justice, human brotherhood, and the eradication of all forms of colonialism and exploitation of man by man, faith in the imminence of absolute equality and justice everywhere, and especially in Africa, and faith in the true emancipation of man and of his assumption of the dignified role long denied him as an active builder of true progress and restorer of values and ideals.

170. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed his sincere thanks to the President of the Republic of Somalia and to the Somali Government and people for the warm welcome which they had extended to the Special Committee.

171. The Somali Government had once again expressed a desire for the immediate implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in all countries still under the colonial yoke. Almost all the countries of Africa and Asia had been freed from colonial domination except for a few, particularly in Africa, where millions of human beings continued to be exploited and humiliated. That was why the Special Committee had decided to hold its session in Africa. He was convinced that the Special Committee's work in Somalia would constitute a further step towards the elimination of the last vestiges of colonialism in Africa. The Soviet Union was the friend of the peoples who were struggling for freedom and had always supported the courageous efforts of the African peoples to obtain their independence.

172. The representative of Tunisia thanked the President of the Republic of Somalia, the Prime Minister and the Somali people for having so cordially welcomed the Special Committee to Mogadiscio. Their touching hospitality was further proof of the trust which they had placed in the United Nations. He had been particularly impressed by the address of the Prime Minister of Somalia, who had so ably expressed his country's aspirations. The role that Somalia had played on various occasions in the United Nations, the Organization of African Unity and the specialized agencies was a particularly promising sign for its future.

173. The representative of Sierra Leone said that his delegation associated itself with the Chairman's expression of thanks to the Prime Minister.

174. Somalia itself had been under United Nations trusteeship and was therefore in a unique position to understand the feelings of oppressed peoples. The invitation to the Special Committee to come to Mogadiscio had been no mere accident, but a symbol of the Somali pledge to uproot colonialism and of the faith of the Somali people in the United Nations. Sierra Leone shared that faith and would continue to exert itself to the utmost in the task of wiping out all forms of oppression in Africa and elsewhere.

175. His delegation thanked the Government and people of Somalia for their invitation to the Special Committee. Awareness that Somalis placed their African above their national identity made his delegation feel at home with close friends with whom it could work steadfastly towards the goal of decolonization and peace in Africa.

176. The representative of Iran expressed his delegation's gratitude to the President, the Government and people of Somalia for their invitation to the Special Committee to hold a part of its session in Mogadiscio. The welcome extended to the Special Committee was an expression of the deep-seated confidence of the people of Somalia in the United Nations.

177. His delegation had been highly impressed by the wise and inspiring statement by the Prime Minister, which was a further indication of the confidence which the Government and people of Somalia placed in the United Nations. The hospitality extended to the Special Committee was symbolic of the high values for which Somalia had been known throughout history; for it was history that bound the peoples of Somalia and Iran in ties of friendship, religion and culture.

178. The representative of the United States of America, speaking on behalf of her country, thanked the people and Government of Somalia for their invitation to the Special Committee. The gratifying esteem of Somalia for the United Nations had been demonstrated by the Prime Minister's fine address of welcome and by the arrangements made for the Committee's work in Mogadiscio.

179. Somalia had a long and close association with the United Nations. As the Prime Minister had pointed out in his address, Somalia exemplified the assistance the international community could give towards the orderly transition of government to the people.

180. It was a source of pride that the United Nations was giving technical assistance for the social, economic and educational development of a proudly independent Somalia.

181. As a member of the United Nations Trusteeship Council, the United States was happy to be able to contribute to the development of Somalia's agriculture, port facilities, civilian security forces and—perhaps most important of all for the country's future—schools and teacher-training facilities.

182. In conclusion, she extended the congratulations and best wishes of the United States to the Government and people of Somalia for their further progress.

183. The representative of Venezuela endorsed the remarks which the Chairman of the Special Committee had made in response to the interesting address by the Prime Minister of Somalia. He thanked the Government and people of Somalia for the warm and unforgettable welcome they had given the members of the Special Committee. He paid a tribute to the courageous Somali people, who had succeeded in obtaining their independence and were now striving to maintain their position in the international community.

184. Venezuela was familiar with many of the problems that confronted Somalia today, some of them relating to sovereignty and to the inalienable rights of their two peoples. That was the legacy which had been left by the colonial era and which must disappear. The Venezuelan delegation had accordingly welcomed the Chairman's decision to allow members of the Somali delegation to participate as observers in the Special Committee's work. He was convinced that that delegation's participation would help the Special Committee to make progress toward its goal, viz., the final eradication of colonialism.

185. The representative of Bulgaria thanked the President of the Republic of Somalia and the Government and people of Somalia for the warm welcome they had extended to the Special Committee. He further expressed sincere thanks to the Prime Minister of Somalia for his warm words of welcome, which fully demonstrated the trust which the Somali Government placed in the Special Committee. Somalia was in the forefront of the African countries that were waging an effective struggle against colonialism and neo-colonialism. It was actively participating in the work of the United Nations and of the Special Committee, whose principal task was to ensure the full and immediate implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

186. Since its accession to independence, Somalia had made considerable progress and was endeavouring, despite numerous difficulties, to raise the level of living of its people. There was no need to recall that Bulgaria, as a socialist country, stood solidly behind the African countries in their struggle to eliminate the remaining bastions of colonialism in Africa. Very friendly relations already existed between Bulgaria and Somalia, which day by day were strengthening their economic, cultural and other ties in the interest of their two peoples. He wished the Government and people of the Republic of Somalia every success and thanked them for their active co-operation with the Special Committee as well as for the remarkable manner in which they had organized the Committee's activities at Mogadiscio.

187. The representative of Madagascar thanked the Somali Government for having invited the Special Committee to hold part of its session on the hospitable soil of Somalia. He was particularly proud to be able to convey to the Government and people of the Republic of Somalia the good wishes of his own Government, which had always resolutely defended the sacred principle of self-determination and would continue to do so.

188. He was convinced that the attempts being made to suppress the legitimate aspirations of the peoples still under the colonial yoke would boomerang against their authors instead, for the peoples already liberated would not permit their brothers to continue to be exploited indefinitely by foreign Powers. It was not enough to condemn colonialism; in addition, and above all, it must be eradicated from the African continent. Peace and co-operation among the members of the international community would be only empty words so long as the exploitation of one people by another had not completely ceased.

189. He was convinced that the African countries and all those who believed in the value of human dignity would continue to unite their efforts in order to eliminate colonialism completely and promote an era of fruitful co-operation based on equality and objectivity.

190. The representative of Mali thanked the Government and people of the Republic of Somalia for the very fraternal and very warm welcome they had given the Special Committee. The Republic of Somalia had confidently and vigorously tackled the difficult problems occasioned by development, and each step was a victory over imperialism and colonialism.

191. The invitation addressed to the Special Committee and the warmth of the welcome extended to it clearly demonstrated the desire of the entire Somali people to co-operate with the United Nations. Moreover, Somalia was endeavouring to hasten the liberation of the millions of Africans still subject to colonial domination and imperialism. Colonialism was already condemned; it must disappear from Africa so that all the peoples of that continent could unite their efforts in the fight against under-development.

192. The representative of the Ivory Coast wished to add his thanks to those of the speakers who had already expressed their gratitude to the Government and people of the Republic of Somalia for the kind invitation which they had extended to the Special Committee. In spite of all the problems of economic development with which it had to contend, the Republic of Somalia had not hesitated to invite the Special Committee to hold part of its session at Mogadiscio and had spared no effort to make its stay in that beautiful city as pleasant as possible.

193. Somalia thus demonstrated once again the importance which it attached to the United Nations in general and to the Special Committee in particular, and its sympathy with the peoples of the Territories still under colonial administration. For its part, the Ivory Coast was in favour of self-determination for those peoples and of the progressive and orderly transfer of power to their representatives. His country would spare no effort to make the noble ideals set forth in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) a reality.

194. The representative of Denmark associated himself with the Chairman's appreciation of the address by the Prime Minister and expressed his delegation's gratitude for the welcome and hospitality extended to the Special Committee. Indeed, that welcome was clear evidence of Somalia's interest and confidence in the United Nations. Smaller countries should recognize in the United Nations the only true prospect for peace and well-being. As the Prime Minister had said, by visiting Africa the Committee was better able to appraise the situation; and the experience would encourage the Committee in its determination to strive for rights and freedom everywhere.

195. The representative of Poland associated his delegation with the Chairman's reply to the opening address by the Prime Minister, and thanked the Government and people of Somalia for their invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of their meetings in yet another peace-loving independent African country. His delegation was also deeply touched by the warm welcome, hospitality and facilities extended to the Committee.

196. As Poland and Somalia were bound by ties of friendship and co-operation he was particularly happy to visit Mogadiscio. Somalia had been one of the co-sponsors of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples; and the Prime Minister's address was an expression of the noble aims enshrined in the United Nations Charter and of the firm determination of the people to continue to join in the efforts of the international community, and of the Special Committee in particular, in bringing colonialism to a rapid and unconditional end. Poland considered that the uprooting of colonialism in Africa and elsewhere was an act of historical justice. It had become increasingly clear that the existence of colonialism—which by its very nature was aggressive—and the stubborn persistence of the colonial powers in oppressing, exploiting and subjugating dependent peoples was a flagrant violation of the legitimate rights and aspirations of peoples to freedom and independence, an obstacle in the way of international co-operation and a threat to world peace. Poland had therefore lent consistent support to the just struggle of dependent Territories to throw off the fetters of foreign domination.

197. In conclusion he renewed his Government's thanks to the people of Somalia for their warm welcome and hospitality and extended to them his most cordial wishes for their well-being and prosperity.

198. The representative of Chile said that he wished to add his thanks to those which the Chairman had extended to the Government of the Republic of Somalia. He had been very impressed by the warm welcome which the Special Committee had received upon its arrival at Mogadiscio and by the interest which the Somali people took in the work of the United Nations in general and of the Special Committee in particular. The interesting speech made by the Prime Minister had been further proof of that.

199. The cordial invitation of the Government of Somalia had given the Special Committee an opportunity, on the one hand, to become acquainted with that country, which was striving to improve the living conditions of its inhabitants, and, on the other hand, to continue the Committee's task of decolonization on the occasion of its further visit to Africa. Chile, which at one time had also lived under the colonial system, attached particular importance to the struggle against colonialism and every form of oppression. The Chilean Government was following with interest the progress which Somalia had made since its accession to independence and offered it its best wishes for success.

200. The representative of Yugoslavia associated his delegation with the statement made by the Chairman in reply to the inspiring address by the Prime Minister. He also expressed his Government's gratitude to the President, Government and people of Somalia for their invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Mogadiscio.

201. The fact that Yugoslavia enjoyed friendly relations with Somalia enhanced his delegation's satisfaction at being in Mogadiscio. He believed that the Special Committee's work there would lead to further positive results in the process of decolonization in Africa and elsewhere, and that it would enable members of the Committee to become better acquainted with the people of Somalia and their efforts on behalf of economic and social reconstruction.

202. In conclusion, he expressed his country's best wishes to the Government and people of Somalia in the efforts they were making to build prosperity and a better future for their beautiful country.

203. The Minister of Foreign Affairs of Somalia, acknowledging the remarks made by members, welcomed the Special Committee as champions of freedom and friends of peace. The people and Government of the Somali Republic wished the Committee success in its search for the truth with regard to the great problem facing the Committee—a problem which in fact was facing the whole world. His Government was aware of the Committee's responsibility, and was fully prepared to assist in the serious task, particularly in the case of French Somaliland, in which it was easier for his Government to express its opinion in detail, since it was one of the three Somali Territories still under foreign domination.

204. The city of Mogadiscio was the capital of two former colonies—Italian Somaliland and British Somaliland. On 1 July 1960, the two Somalilands had achieved their independence and unification. The desire for unity of Somalis living in the two former colonies had been entirely spontaneous. Having fought for their freedom and unification against Britain and Italy, they had always supported and would continue to support men and women fighting for liberty and justice. It was their belief that unless justice prevailed, there would be no permanent peace for mankind. The causes of injustice must first be eliminated and a solid foundation laid—a foundation based on the principles of equity and self-determination—as a basis for world peace, which, without that basis, would be built on shifting sands. The Special Committee symbolized the dawn of the new era. Its work would contribute to the liberation of millions of human beings who remained under the shackles of colonial rule in Southern Rhodesia, South Africa, Mozambique, Angola, French Somaliland, Southern Arabia, South West Africa, Portuguese Guinea and other parts of the world. The facts of the recent history of the human struggle for freedom, and the events that had taken place in Africa, Asia and Latin America gave great hopes that the world was moving towards liberty and that colonialism in all its forms was doomed.

B. Closing of meetings

General statements

205. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, speaking on behalf of the Afro-Asian group and Yugoslavia, thanked the Government and people of the Somali Republic for their warm hospitality and above all for having helped the Special Committee to further its aims—the eradication of colonialism and the liberation of man in Africa and elsewhere.

206. While resolution 1514 (XV), adopted by the General Assembly in 1960, had been a positive step forward, none had over-estimated it, and—in the Somali Prime Minister's words—the struggle against the remaining enclaves of colonialism might prove to be the bitterest of all.

207. The problem of colonialism had to be attacked from all angles, but always with a single aim: the defeat of colonialism and the elimination of the exploitation of man by man. The struggle for freedom and independence was also one for peace, for so long as colonialism existed there would be no real peace in the world.

208. The apartheid policy in South Africa and South West Africa, the annihilation policy of Portugal and the butchering of Africans in Southern Rhodesia were crimes against humanity. Yet it was common knowledge that, while the forces committing those atrocities were vile and criminal in themselves, they were the tools of imperialism, which would stop at nothing to plunder Africa's resources and exploit the African working people. The studies made by the Special Committee had shown that foreign financial monopolies were impeding the attainment of freedom and independence by the people of those Territories. It was therefore inevitable that the fight against colonialism should involve a clash of interests, with a resulting threat to peace.

209. The Afro-Asian group and Yugoslavia categorically condemned colonialism. They adhered to the principles of the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and would continue their efforts to secure the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

210. There were two main ways by which colonialism could be eliminated. The first way was that of persuasion, which had been followed, for example, in the case of South West Africa. That had been the course which the United Nations had chosen to follow; it had led to the establishment of the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly, the Trusteeship Council and, finally, the Special Committee. By that method, the colonial Powers were daily urged to give up their colonies and to lay down a programme for their independence; but the conditions for their independence were laid down in resolution 1514 (XV). So far, the method of persuasion had not been very successful.

211. Then there was the second way: a bitter struggle, the history of which would be written in the blood of the freedom fighters.

212. He was sure that all peace-loving people would prefer to take the first course of action, but the colonial Powers would not see reason. Their lack of co-operation had already shaken the faith in the United Nations of many Africans. It would be indeed regrettable if the Special Committee, for example, came to be regarded as merely a resolution-passing body.

213. As experience had shown, the accumulation of frustration eventually left subjugated people with no alternative but to fight to the bitter end. That had happened in Algeria, Kenya and many other parts of the world, and was in fact happening in Mozambique, Angola and elsewhere in Africa at the present time.

214. He was sure that he was expressing the sentiments not only of the Afro-Asian members of the Special Committee and Yugoslavia but also of the peace-loving people of Somalia, when he warned the colonial Powers to recognize the inevitable and to avoid bloodshed. Africans were determined to free their brothers, whatever the cost; they would fight to the bitter end. The colonial Powers could not change the course of history.

215. He assured the freedom fighters who had appeared before the Special Committee of support in their legitimate struggle, and urged them to maintain their unity of purpose and action. As President Nyerere had said, "You, our brothers under the colonial yoke, must fight or else you will be cowards. And those of us who are independent must help you even if this means shedding blood. If we do not do so we will be cowards."

216. He called on the people of Somalia to remember that Africans could not rest until all Africa was free from colonialism. They were determined to defeat the forces of apartheid, wipe out Portuguese colonialism, crush the racist minority régime in Zimbabwe and eradicate French colonialism in French Somaliland. The freedom fighters should continue to wage their wars, and their friends would do everything possible to see that the United Nations helped them to gain their lost freedom. Freedom was indivisible and could not be isolated from peace.

217. In conclusion, on behalf of the Afro-Asian members of the Committee and Yugoslavia, he again thanked the President, the Government and the people of Somalia for their cordial hospitality. Their enthusiasm would serve to remind the colonial Powers how eager Africans were for their continent to be free.

218. The representative of Chile, speaking on behalf of the Venezuelan and Chilean delegations, thanked the Government of the Somali Republic for having invited the Special Committee to hold a part of its session at Mogadiscio. He assured it that Venezuela and Chile would spare no effort to ensure that the lofty ideals of the United Nations triumphed throughout the world.

219. He also thanked the President of the Somali Republic and the Somali people for having received the Special Committee with a friendliness and warmth which it would never forget.

220. The representative of Ethiopia joined the representatives of Tanzania and Chile in thanking the Government and people of Somalia for the hospitality extended to the Special Committee.

221. The words which had been exchanged between himself and the Foreign Minister of Somalia would not interfere with personal and official brotherly relations. Indeed those exchanges were but a demonstration of the open-mindedness with which Ethiopia and Somalia approached their common problems. The differences were only a temporary phase which would be forgotten; for the existing bonds of friendship were eternal. His delegation would take home happy memories of hospitality, new friendships and renewed acquaintances. He hoped that those acquaintances would bloom into a wider and greater friendship.

222. Finally, he expressed his delegation's gratitude to the Somali Government and voiced the hope that Ethiopia and Somalia would flourish in friendship and freedom for the sake of the whole of Africa.

223. The representative of Poland, speaking on behalf of the delegations of Poland, the USSR, Bulgaria and Czechoslovakia, thanked the Government and people of Somalia for their kindness and hospitality.

224. The meetings of the Special Committee had always been inspiring, and he felt that progress was being made towards the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. He had been struck by the determination of the African peoples, as borne out in the Prime Minister's stirring address, to strive towards freedom and independence. The stubbornness of the colonial Powers in opposing those just aspirations was fraught with danger. The Special Committee had the obligation to support the right of all peoples to self-determination, and the best way to reminding the imperialist forces of that commitment was to show a united front against colonialist oppression.

225. The representative of Italy, speaking on behalf of the delegations of Australia, Denmark and the United States, and also of his own delegation, expressed appreciation to the President, the Government and the people of Somalia for their hospitality and warm welcome. The members of the Special Committee had had the opportunity, during their brief but enjoyable stay in Mogadiscio, to admire the progress made by Somalia during its six years of independence and had also been able to make further progress in the important task entrusted to them by the United Nations, in accordance with the Charter and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. He extended to the Government and people of Somalia sincere wishes for their future happiness and prosperity.

226. The representative of the Secretary-General, speaking on behalf of all members of the Secretariat, expressed gratitude to the Government and people of Somalia for their generous hospitality and for all the facilities made available during the Special Committee's visit to Mogadiscio. The Ministers of the Government, the Chief of Cabinet in the Prime Minister's Office and the Somali Ambassadors who had attended the Committee's meetings in Mogadiscio, to name but a few, had been among those who had eased the Secretariat's task and made its stay in Mogadiscio so enjoyable.

227. The Chairman expressed gratitude, on behalf of all members of the Special Committee, to the President, the Government and the people of Somalia. The Committee's visit to Mogadiscio, which had been most constructive, had deepened its understanding of the significance of the colonial peoples' struggle to regain their independence and had demonstrated the concern, both of the United Nations and of the Special Committee, for those peoples. Possibly the most important aspect of the United Nations work, as evidenced by the Committee's visit to various African capitals, was its involvement in the question of decolonization. The warm welcome extended to the Committee by the Somali people was of special significance since, as the Prime Minister had so graciously observed, Somalia owed its independence largely to the work of the United Nations. Moreover, as a result of its visit to Mogadiscio, the Committee had been able to gain further information from the petitioners about the situation in French Somaliland and in Aden.

228. He joined previous speakers in expressing the earnest hope that the Special Committee would make a substantial contribution to the speedy attainment of independence by the colonized Territories.

Statement by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Somalia

229. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Somalia, thanking the Chairman and members of the Special Committee for their kind words of appreciation, said that the Government and people of Somalia had been privileged to act as the Committee's host, albeit for only a brief period. During its meetings in Mogadiscio, the Committee had been able to learn of the aspirations of the peoples of French Somaliland and South Arabia, although it was to be regretted that the petitioners from the Seychelles and Mauritius had been unable to appear.

230. The Special Committee's arrival in Mogadiscio had been a cause of rejoicing since it had provided the people of French Somaliland with the opportunity to express their views without fear or favour. Furthermore, all Somalis had a special regard for the United Nations, under whose guidance their country had emerged from trusteeship administration to sovereign independence, and they were grateful for the assistance which that Organization continued to render. Somali people still under foreign rule were confident that their representations would receive full consideration by the Committee which, they believed, would not be influenced by outside pressure but would be motivated only by its awareness of the inalienable right of the people of French Somaliland to self-determination and independence. The Committee's arrival in Africa had been long awaited by the millions who still suffered under colonial domination, since it was a symbol of the freedom and dignity of mankind and represented the principles enshrined in the United Nations Charter.

231. Lastly, he thanked the Special Committee, on behalf of the people and Government of Somalia, for the patience and understanding shown during its deliberations in Somalia and wished it every success in its humane endeavours to liberate those still under foreign domination. He also expressed appreciation to the Chairman for allowing observers from Somalia to participate in the Committee's meetings in Mogadiscio and Addis Ababa. Somalia was anxious to contribute to the cause of freedom and would spare no effort to further the liberation of all subjugated peoples.

C. MEETINGS HELD AT ADDIS ABABA, ETHIOPIA

Opening of meetings

Address by the Minister for Foreign Affairs on behalf of His Imperial Majesty, the Emperor of Ethiopia

232. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Ethiopia, welcoming the Committee to Addis Ababa, expressed the hope that its deliberations would prove fruitful and constitute a further step towards the liberation of the still-dependent peoples and territories.

233. He read out a message of the Special Committee from His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I:

"On behalf of Ourselves, Our Government and the Ethiopian people, We are pleased to welcome once more distinguished members of the United Nations Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

"The importance of this Committee cannot be over-emphasized. Its intrinsic value lies in its attempt to foster the achievement by the United Nations of one of the fundamental human rights, which is to lead peoples and countries still under colonial yoke to freedom and independence. We are all cognizant of the fact that the struggle for freedom must and will always end in victory. Freedom being the aim of this Committee, it shall be achieved. There is no question as to whether freedom should be attained, but rather how best it should be reached. Thus, the main concern of this Committee becomes to suggest ways and means to achieve this end as best it could.

"It is in its choice of means that the Committee encounters monumental problems. We are conscious that there are opposing forces at work: on the one hand the forces which unceasingly search for freedom, and on the other, the forces of oppression which attempt to deter freedom. A typical example of such conflict of forces is the unlawful Government in Southern Rhodesia. Except for such proponents of injustice like South Africa and Portugal, all freedom-loving States have condemned this racist and minority Government. We trust that a majority rule will take over in Zimbabwe. But how and when? It is here that the Committee has to apply itself and suggest means. Since the measures that have been tried to force down the illegal Government seem to be ineffective, this Committee will have to consider other methods, methods that we can perhaps adopt in concert. No matter how hard the choice may be, We are confident that the members of this Committee will fulfil the noble task entrusted to them.

"We know that as long as there are men who believe that one race is superior to the other and that they can lead the destinies of other men by any means, there shall be no peace. As long as there is going to be groundless irredentism and interference in other States' internal affairs, there is still not going to be peace. It is only by adhering to the principles set out in the Charters of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity that we can achieve our aims, and that our unity will grow stronger. On Our part, We assure you that We will never tire in our endeavours to free our brethren who are still under the yoke of colonialism.

"We are aware that the job you are charged with is not easy, but We hope and pray that God will guide you during your deliberations."

234. Adding his own expression of appreciation for the Special Committee's work, he said that Ethiopia—a Member of the United Nations and of the Special Committee since their inception—had always done its utmost to contribute towards fruitful deliberations. Having itself had five years' experience of harsh colonial domination, it had never hesitated to give moral and material aid to peoples struggling for independence, and its delegation would continue to give effective support to the Committee's work.

Statement by the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity

235. The Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity said that he was proud to be able to associate his organization with the many people, who, from Dar es Salaam, via Mogadiscio to Addis Ababa, had welcomed the Special Committee to Africa and expressed, in addition to their own pleasure, Africa's fervent hopes for the full success of its decolonizing mission.

236. At Addis Ababa, where the OAU had its headquarters, the staff of the Organization's Secretariat particularly welcomed the Special Committee's happy decision to make yet another pilgrimage to the source, which would enable it to grasp the extreme gravity of the situation created in Africa by the survival of colonial rule, and the imperative need to put an end to the colonial and racist adventures against which all African people and their leaders had been forced to rise in protest.

237. He wished to express to the United Nations, through the Special Committee, the faith and confidence of the OAU, but also the impatience and legitimate anxiety of the African peoples at the slowness with which the process of peaceful decolonization was taking place under the auspices of the international community. The OAU fully realized that for the United Nations, almost six years previously, the problem of decolonization had been solved in principle by the adoption of the historic Declaration of 14 December 1960 on the granting of unconditional independence to all territories and all peoples still living under foreign domination. The adoption of that Declaration, and the establishment in 1961 of a Special Committee to find the quickest and most effective ways and means of giving effect to the decolonization policy thus defined, had aroused throughout the world, and particularly in Africa, immense hopes and a special fervour which was obviously both sincere and profound.

238. The OAU, an instrument of concerted co-operation among the independent States of Africa, had been conceived and organized in the same spirit of confidence and fervour that typified Africa's feelings towards the United Nations, its Charter, its various agencies and, of course, the Special Committee. The African Heads of State and Government had given absolute priority to decolonization, for liberation was the prerequisite for the fulfilment of all the aspirations of the African Governments and peoples. That profound truth had been solemnly reaffirmed throughout the continent only a few days earlier, on African Liberation Day commemorating the third anniversary of its signing of the OAU charter.

239. Because the task of liberation was one of the OAU's fundamental objectives and constant concerns, and because co-operation between, on the one hand, the OAU and, on the other hand, the United Nations in general and the Special Committee in particular had functioned perfectly in the course of the past year, the OAU proposed to change the form of its contribution to the Addis Ababa deliberations in 1966.

240. He and his staff placed themselves at the Special Committee's disposal, not only for attendance as observers at the discussion that would take place on each agenda item, but also for participation in any other exchange of views that might be thought desirable on matters of common concern to the Special Committee and the OAU. His organization was ready to co-operate with the Special Committee as fully as possible in view of the close solidarity linking Africa to the international community in the task of decolonization, to which the OAU was devoting its best efforts.

241. He was glad that the Special Committee had decided to include in its agenda the question of the liberation of the small Territories that were still dependent, the colonial enclaves scattered all over the African continent. The OAU was as concerned about the fate of those small Territories as it was about the fate of the big colonies, for a question of principle was involved. The decolonization to which the OAU aspired and for which it was working should cover all the African Territories, large or small, rich or poor. The African peoples would not be fully satisfied on that score until the last square inch of African soil had been withdrawn from non-African authority.

242. In that connexion he considered it his duty to bring to the Special Committee's knowledge a fact that had just been pointed out to him by the secretariat of the OAU Liberation Committee at Dar es Salaam: the Comoro Islands had been omitted both from the list of small African Territories on which the Special Committee intended to concentrate its attention, and from the general list of dependent Territories drawn up by the Committee. The OAU was sure that, if such an omission had been made, it could only be the result of a clerical error or an unintentional oversight, and the organization would be grateful if the Special Committee would make the necessary correction. It was quite clear that the Comoros were among the off-shore islands of Africa and, under the Special Committee's terms of reference, its competence extended to all dependent Territories, whatever the legal ties which bound those Territories to the colonial Powers occupying them.

243. The salient feature of the current situation in Africa was the aggravation of the threat to international peace and security constituted by the survival of colonialism and by the strengthening, during the past year, of the alliance formed between Portugal, South Africa and the Rhodesian settlers in order to consolidate their hold over the entire southern part of the African continent and to ensure the perpetuation of colonial and racist domination there. It was a known fact that that unholy alliance of the most backward régimes of oppression—all three of which had been unanimously condemned, on several occasions, by the United Nations—nevertheless had its accomplices among the powerful. Those accomplices were the forces—individuals, companies or States—which had made investments in the south of the continent, which lived by the exploitation of African wealth in that region, and which thus bore a large share of responsibility for the deterioration of the situation and for the bloody tragedy besetting the peoples of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the Territories under Portuguese domination. The need now, so far as decolonization was concerned, was not for resolutions but for solutions.

244. The colonial wars forced on the African peoples, the many acts of oppression, the various forms of vexation and humiliation which almost everywhere, had driven their African victims to take up arms, all went to show how, in the current phase of decolonization, the threat presented by colonialism to international peace and security in Africa had worsened. The situation necessarily raised the question of the responsibility borne by the great Powers which under the United Nations Charter, were the guardians of world peace. The Special Committee should devote a considerable share of its efforts to stressing that responsibility on the part of the great Powers, in order to induce them to extinguish, before it was too late, the fires that colonialism and its allies were busily lighting all over Africa.

245. All the foregoing strengthened the OAU's conviction that the Security Council should act on its specific responsibilities in the drama which was unfolding in Africa, and which might well plunge the world into a blood-bath. It was generally known that the material interests which were directly or indirectly supporting the colonialist and racist régimes in Africa were also paralysing the Security Council and had so far prevented it from meeting the expectations of the oppressed African peoples. Nothing, however, not even the repeated disappointments caused by the recent Security Council debates on Southern Rhodesia, could altogether extinguish the hope of seeing the United Nations face up to its responsibilities in Africa.

246. It should be remembered that complicity and inaction in the face of aggression by fascist Italy against the African people of Ethiopia had started the League of Nations on the fatal down grade which was to bring it swiftly to an inglorious fall. The United Nations should ponder that example, and the Security Council should avoid bringing upon it the fate of the League of Nations.

247. The Special Committee could and should play a great role in that regard by insisting against all opposition that, in view of the scope and gravity of the problems presented by colonialism and racism, the Security Council should come and meet in Africa in order to understand more clearly, in contact with African realities, that it simply must act and act quickly. It was doubtful that academic debates in New York, whatever faith and courage were shown by the Africans and their friends, would make the Security Council change its attitude. Perhaps, however, a session of the Security Council in Africa might bring about the desired change before it was too late.

General statements

248. The Chairman expressed the Special Committee's deep appreciation for the encouraging address by the Minister for Foreign Affairs on behalf of His Imperial Majesty, the Emperor of Ethiopia. The long, bitter but successful struggle by His Imperial Majesty and the Government and people of Ethiopia to safeguard the independence of their country, as well as their devotion to the objectives of the United Nations Charter, would be a source of inspiration to the Committee.

249. He also expressed gratitude for the open-handed welcome and hospitality offered to the Special Committee. The history of such hospitality went back to biblical times, and it was truly African in its generosity. Many members had the privilege of visiting Ethiopia on previous occasions, of forming close fraternal ties with its people; their pleasure on the present occasion was shared by those who were visiting Ethiopia for the first time.

250. It had been with whole-hearted gratification that the Special Committee had accepted the invitation of the Government of Ethiopia to hold some of its meetings in Addis Ababa. That that was the third such invitation testified to the importance the Ethiopian Government attached to the Committee's work, while its presence for the third time in Addis Ababa was in its turn evidence of the esteem in which the Committee held the continuing contribution of the Ethiopian Government towards the total and speedy elimination of colonialism.

251. It was fitting that the Special Committee should be meeting in Africa Hall where, in May 1963, the charter of the OAU had been signed, and which had witnessed a large number of important and far-reaching OAU decisions aimed at the liberation of all Territories still under colonial rule in Africa. He was confident that the Committee would be stimulated by the example of the OAU and would in its turn make further effective contributions to the application of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

252. The work of the Special Committee in Africa had so far been constructive. Further testimony had been heard of the grave deterioration of the situation in Southern Rhodesia and of the reprehensible failure of the United Kingdom Government to take effective steps to end the rebellion of the racist minority régime and to establish democratic conditions on the basis of one man, one vote, with a view to the speedy granting of independence. An important resolution (A/AC.109/167) had been adopted which, if implemented, would lead to the liquidation of the colonial régime in Southern Rhodesia.

253. Further evidence had also been heard of the intolerable conditions under which the peoples of Angola and Mozambique were suffering, of the criminal acts being carried out by the Portuguese, and of their flagrant refusal to apply the principle of self-determination.

254. Valuable testimony had been given concerning Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, which emphasized the need to ensure that their progress towards independence should be unconditional and in accordance with the aspirations of the people.

255. Petitioners had also been heard concerning French Somaliland and had provided valuable information which should assist in objective consideration of the question.

256. He was confident that the Special Committee's deliberations at Addis Ababa concerning South West Africa, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, Ifni and Spanish Sahara, and French Somaliland would yield positive and fruitful results.

257. The Chairman, replying to the statement by the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity, recalled the Special Committee's resolution of 18 June 1965 (A/6000/Rev. 1,<sup>2</sup> chap. II, para. 463) expressing the hope that the co-operation between it and the Organization of African Unity would be intensified, and General Assembly resolution 2011 (XX) of 11 October 1965 adopted at its twentieth session on the same subject. In the light of those resolutions the Committee could be especially gratified by the presence of the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, whose outlining of his organization's position regarding the various problems of decolonization in Africa had been very impressive. The Committee attached great importance to the collaboration with the OAU in the attainment of the common objective of the total and speedy elimination of colonialism.

258. The representative of Denmark expressed his delegation's gratitude to His Imperial Majesty and the Government of Ethiopia for having invited the Special Committee to Addis Ababa, the capital of a proud people with a long and glorious history, and centre of the activities of the OAU.

259. Although economic and political unity in Africa was still perhaps a remote goal, the Special Committee had had daily evidence that the free Africans were united in their fight for the freedom of their brothers under colonial rule. He expressed the hope that the long and hard struggle, like that of the world-famous Ethiopian marathon runner, would lead to a successful conclusion, and conveyed the best wishes of his Government for a bright future in peace and prosperity.

260. The representative of Iran associated his delegation with the thanks that had been expressed to His Imperial Majesty and the Government and people of Ethiopia. He was greatly impressed by the progress that had been made during the year since his last visit. New buildings and roads had been constructed and new aerial routes opened up, while political, social and cultural evolution had continued apace. Ethiopia had carried on the struggle for the independence of subjugated peoples in other countries, and was bringing the fruits of liberty to its own people on the principle of justice and prosperity for all. The message of His Imperial Majesty would be a source of great inspiration to the Committee, as would the statement by the Secretary-General of the OAU.

261. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania expressed his delegation's thanks to His Imperial Majesty and to the Government and people of Ethiopia for the cordial invitation extended to the Special Committee, and for the wise inaugural statement.

262. Ethiopia's safeguarding and defence of its independence had been a source of inspiration to the United Republic of Tanzania. Strong bonds of friendship existed between the two countries, stemming from their desire for advancement in their own countries and from their hopes for the development of the continent. His delegation was happy to be in Africa Hall, the seat of the OAU. He expressed his delegation's appreciation of the statement by the Secretary-General of that organization, its confidence that his endeavours would meet with increasing success, and its strong support for his suggestion that the Comoro question be placed on the Committee's agenda.

263. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics thanked His Imperial Majesty the Emperor and the Government and people of Ethiopia for their kind invitation. The Special Committee had already met at Addis Ababa the previous year and had adopted some very important recommendations, which had served as a basis for the decisions taken by the General Assembly at its twentieth session. One of the most practical measures had been the establishment of direct contact with the OAU representatives who had participated in the work of the Special Committee. Such contact should be frequent, so that the existing links between the United Nations and the OAU might be tightened, the struggle against colonialism made more effective, and resolution 1514 (XV) applied.

264. He thanked Mr. Diallo Telli for his significant address. He, for his part, hoped that African unity would be strengthened still further in order to wage a more effective struggle against the remaining vestiges of colonialism.

265. The representative of Afghanistan associated himself with the thanks expressed by other members of the Committee of His Imperial Majesty and the Government of Ethiopia for their hospitality, and also to H.E. Mr. Diallo Telli for his inspiring address.

266. The representative of Venezuela thanked His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I and the Ethiopian Government and people, who had once again enabled the Special Committee to get into touch with African realities and to return to Addis Ababa, that bastion of freedom and independence.

267. The representative of Mali thanked His Imperial Majesty the Emperor and the Ethiopian Government and people for their invitation and their warm welcome. His delegation was happy to be in Addis Ababa, that great capital and symbol of African unity, which had raised so many hopes. The message from His Imperial Majesty, which the Ethiopian Minister for Foreign Affairs had kindly read to the members of the Committee, would be a source of inspiration to all delegations.

268. He was also glad to have heard the indignant voice of Mr. Diallo Telli, the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, who had spoken feelingly about the liberation of millions of Africans now languishing in poverty and oppression.

269. The representative of India expressed his gratitude to His Imperial Majesty the Emperor and to the Government of Ethiopia for their generous invitation, and recalled the unique position and significant contribution of Ethiopia in the struggle against colonialism, and the many ties and shared ideals it had with his own country.

270. The representative of Poland joined previous speakers in expressing appreciation to the Government and people of Ethiopia for their hospitality and warm welcome. The message delivered by the Ethiopian Foreign Minister, on behalf of His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie, would guide and encourage the Special Committee in its deliberations.

271. Poland and Ethiopia were bound by ties of friendship, as evidenced by the official visit in December 1965 of the Chairman of the Council of State in his country to Ethiopia. During that visit, the two nations had reiterated their support for the struggle for freedom of such countries as Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea. They had also condemned all racial discrimination and had urged the full implementation of the Security Council's resolutions on Southern Rhodesia.

272. He expressed appreciation for the address by the Secretary-General of the OAU and said that it had always been his delegation's firm conviction that the Committee's objectives could best be achieved if it joined its efforts with those of the OAU.

273. The representative of Tunisia thanked the Government and the people of Ethiopia for their hospitality and all their efforts to enable the Special Committee successfully to complete its decolonizing mission. He also expressed gratitude to the Minister for Foreign Affairs for his inaugural statement and for the message from His Imperial Majesty, Emperor Haile Selassie I, which he had been good enough to convey to the Special Committee and which would be a source of inspiration to the Committee throughout its deliberations.

274. In addition, he unreservedly supported the ideas expressed in the statement made by Mr. Diallo Telli, the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, which reflected the profound aspirations of millions of Africans still groaning under the colonial yoke. The attitude of the Tunisian Government would be moulded by the principles of the United Nations Charter and would be based on the pertinent resolutions adopted on decolonization.

275. He agreed with the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, and with other speakers, that it was very unfortunate that the question of the Comoro Islands had not been included in the Special Committee's agenda and he hoped that the omission would soon be remedied. He welcomed the fact that there was close co-operation between the United Nations and the OAU, since both pursued a common ideal, namely, liberation of peoples under colonial domination and improvement of their lot.

276. The representative of Bulgaria also thanked his Imperial Majesty, Emperor Haile Selassie I, and the Ethiopian people for their generous invitation to the Special Committee.

277. The Bulgarian Government, which unreservedly supported African peoples in their attempt to storm the last bastions of colonialism, attached very great importance to the Special Committee's current session in Africa. The fact that the peoples of Africa had chosen Addis Ababa, in which the United Nations had also set up several international organizations, as the site for the headquarters of the OAU, clearly demonstrated their gratitude to Ethiopia, a country which had continually fought to free the oppressed peoples of Africa.

278. He was particularly grateful to Mr. Diallo Telli, the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, for his confidence in the Special Committee. He agreed with him that the burning colonial problems in Africa called not for resolutions but for solutions, and that effective measures must be taken against the racist, colonialist and minority régimes of South Africa, Portugal and Southern Rhodesia. He also approved of the Administrative Secretary-General's suggestion that meetings of the Security Council should be held in Africa with a view to settling the dangerous situation prevailing in Southern Rhodesia, South Africa, South West Africa and the Portuguese colonies, a situation which was a threat to peace in Africa and in the entire world.

279. The representative of Chile expressed his gratitude to His Imperial Majesty, Emperor Haile Selassie I, for having invited the Special Committee to hold a part of its session in Ethiopia.

280. Chile had welcomed the establishment of the OAU in 1963, and that organization had already achieved very satisfactory results. It was unfortunate that such an organization, which should devote itself solely to improving the economic, social and cultural conditions of the African peoples, had to concern itself with such problems as colonialism, which ought not even to exist in the contemporary world, since freedom belonged by right to all without distinction.

281. He had listened with interest to the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, who had given a very comprehensive picture of the situation in his statement. He welcomed the close co-operation between the United Nations and the OAU, which enabled the OAU to participate in the work of the Special Committee. Despite many efforts, the results achieved to date had hardly been outstanding, owing to the resistance of certain Members of the United Nations which did not respect the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Security Council.

282. The representative of the Ivory Coast thanked His Imperial Majesty, Emperor Haile Selassie I, for his wise message which the Minister for Foreign Affairs had transmitted to the Special Committee. That message was further proof of the persevering and conciliatory efforts which His Imperial Majesty had made, both at the United Nations and in the OAU, to foster peace between peoples. He also thanked the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU for a clear and precise statement which he would certainly bear in mind during the work of the Special Committee.

283. The representative of Syria paid a tribute to the Government and the people of Ethiopia for their contribution to the liberation and the unity of Africa, and expressed appreciation of their hospitality.

284. He supported the statement made in the preceding meeting by the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU and wished that organization success in its task of liberating oppressed peoples.

285. The representative of Yugoslavia expressed his delegation's gratitude to His Imperial Majesty the Emperor, to the Government and people of Ethiopia for their hospitality, and to Mr. Diallo Telli for his important statement.

286. The representative of Sierra Leone was gratified by the warm welcome extended by His Imperial Majesty the Emperor and by the Government and people of Ethiopia. Addis Ababa was the birth-place and headquarters of the Organization of African Unity and a source of inspiration in the struggle for freedom and independence.

287. The representative of Iraq, recalling the long-standing ties of Ethiopia with the Arab world, thanked His Imperial Majesty the Emperor and the Government of Ethiopia for their warm welcome and Mr. Diallo Telli for his statement.

288. The representative of Italy said that the presence of the Special Committee in Addis Ababa for the third time in five years constituted a tribute to the people of Ethiopia for their outstanding contribution to decolonization. He thanked His Imperial Majesty the Emperor, the Government and the people of Ethiopia for their generous hospitality.

289. The representative of the United States of America deemed it an honour and a privilege to be present in Addis Ababa, and recalled the long-standing ties between her own country and Ethiopia.

290. The representative of Australia wished first to offer to His Imperial Majesty, Haile Selassie I, and to the great and ancient land of Ethiopia, the homage of his delegation's deepest respects and its gratitude for the kindnesses extended to the Committee. It was most fitting that the revitalized heart of Africa should pulsate so strongly from a country which had not gone the way of many ancient civilizations, but was building firmly on a magnificent past. A beautiful symbol of that fresh vigour was Africa Hall itself. He had listened with the greatest respect to the message which His Imperial Majesty had graciously sent to the Committee, and had noted the words of the Foreign Minister of Ethiopia and the Secretary-General of the OAU. The Australian delegation would faithfully place all those communications before its Government.

291. Associating himself with those who had expressed appreciation of the statement by the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, the representative of Ethiopia said that his delegation whole-heartedly shared his view on the need for speedy elimination of the remaining vestiges of colonialism in Africa, and deeply appreciated the tremendous efforts that the OAU was making. That organization and the Special Committee had common aims and objectives, and the forthright statement was an important contribution to the Committee's work.

292. Responding to the representatives' expressions of appreciation of the welcome they had received, he said that, as His Imperial Majesty Haile Selassie I had said, they had only returned to their own home, and it was a great joy for the Ethiopian Government and people to welcome them again. As a country that had had to fight for its very existence against marauding foreign Powers through its long and chequered history, Ethiopia had an interest in seeing colonialism banished from the earth.

293. He hoped that the facilities put at the Special Committee's disposal by his Government would assist in its work.

294. The peoples of Mozambique, Angola, Zimbabwe, South West Africa and other oppressed Territories were awaiting the day of deliverance, and looked to the Special Committee with hope and expectation. The Committee could look back with pride at the successes it had achieved, but as long as colonialism and the exploitation of man continued, there was no room for complacency. His delegation was determined to continue the work with renewed vigour during the Committee's remaining sessions in Africa.

Closing of meetings

Statement by the representative of the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity

295. The representative of the Organization of African Unity said that he would convey the encouraging words of the Chairman and members of the Special Committee to his organization's Administrative Secretary-General, who regretted that owing to unavoidable circumstances he was unable to be present at the closing meeting. He was gratified to hear of the Committee's desire for closer liaison with the OAU, whose representative in New York maintained close contact with it, as well as with the Special Committee on the Policies of Apartheid of the Government of the Republic of South Africa.

296. The one important aim of the OAU was the total liquidation of colonialism and racism from the continent—a sine qua non for the strengthening of African unity. The struggle would be pursued unremittingly by Africans until the whole continent was free. History and experience had shown that nothing could hold back the march of freedom: the freedom fighters would overcome all obstacles and win the support of all decent men and women.

297. He regretted that the Committee had been unable to discuss the question of Comoro in accordance with the wishes of the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU, but hoped it would find it possible to do so during its later meetings. He expressed the hope that the Committee's discussion in the next two African capitals it was to visit would be as fruitful as those in Addis Ababa.

General statements

298. The Chairman, on behalf of all members of the Committee, expressed gratitude to his Imperial Majesty and the Government of Ethiopia for their kind invitation to the Special Committee; for all the facilities put at its disposal, which had contributed in such large measure to the success of its work; for their generous and gracious hospitality; and for the privilege of another opportunity to strengthen contacts and friendship with the people of Ethiopia. He also expressed gratification at the collaboration of the OAU through its Administrative Secretary-General, whose participation had been of great benefit.

299. It could be said with assurance that the misgivings of one or two members concerning the advisability of the Special Committee's meetings held in Africa had proved groundless. If evidence were needed, it was only necessary to examine the results so far achieved by the Committee and the resolutions adopted; that morning, for instance, it had adopted a highly important and constructive resolution on South West Africa recommending, inter alia, that the Security Council should make it obligatory for all States to implement the measures contained in General Assembly resolution 1899 (XVIII). In so doing it had discharged one of the tasks specifically assigned to it by the General Assembly in paragraph 5 of resolution 2105 (XX), which requested the Special Committee to apprise the Security Council of developments in any Territory examined by it which might threaten international peace and security, and to make suggestions that might assist the Council in considering appropriate measures under the United Nations Charter.

300. The Committee had also adopted that morning a resolution concerning Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland (see chap. VII, para. 237), aimed first at ensuring that the progress of the Territories towards independence should be based on the free expression of the people in conformity with resolution 1514 (XV); secondly, at securing territorial integrity and sovereignty; and thirdly, at improving their economic situation. Those resolutions, together with the discussions that had taken place concerning Southern Rhodesia, Aden, Ifni and Spanish Sahara were adequate justification for the Committee's visit to Africa. He was confident that the meetings in Cairo and Algiers would yield similar fruitful and valuable results.

301. Members would leave Addis Ababa with very happy memories of their stay, and invigorated and inspired by the work being done both in the development of the great capital and by the OAU.

302. The representative of the Secretary-General, on behalf of all members of the Secretariat, expressed deep gratitude to His Imperial Majesty and the Government of Ethiopia for all the facilities placed at their disposal and for the generous hospitality extended to them. Special thanks were due to Mr. Mekasias, and his colleague Mr. Deressa, for their assistance and personal kindness, as well as to the officials of the OAU and the Economic Commission for Africa for their co-operation.

303. The representative of Ethiopia said that his Government was grateful to the Special Committee for having accepted its invitation, and strongly believed that its visit had greatly advanced the cause for which it had been established. The resolutions it had adopted had undoubtedly brought encouragement to the many people all over the world still struggling to win freedom and independence, and the petitioners had been left with no doubt as to where the sympathies of the Committee lay. Those were no mean achievements.

304. Colonialism was a scourge that continued to bedevil humanity, and Ethiopia deplored the situation that had made the creation of the Committee an urgent necessity. The fact that even in the latter half of the twentieth century—a period that had witnessed a high degree of practical human achievement—a large proportion of the family of man was suffering deprivation and indignity, was a sad commentary on civilization. His Government therefore looked forward to the day when the Committee's existence was no longer necessary, when the nations would enjoy equally the fruits of freedom and when the exploitation of man by man would be a thing of the past. The fact that the achievement of that aim might be a slow and frustrating process should serve as a challenge and spur the Committee into making ever greater efforts.

305. He hoped that members had enjoyed their stay in Addis Ababa, and wished them success in their work in Cairo and Algiers. It would be his delegation's pleasant duty to convey their expressions of appreciation to His Imperial Majesty and the Government of Ethiopia.

D. MEETINGS HELD AT CAIRO, UNITED ARAB REPUBLIC

Opening of meetings

Address by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the United Arab Republic

306. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of the United Arab Republic said that President Gamal Abdel Nasser had asked him to transmit his greetings to the Special Committee and welcome it to the United Arab Republic. The President also conveyed his best wishes for the fulfilment of the Committee's noble efforts to implement the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and to end colonialism in the world. The President was confident that members would continue their great mission with the persistence and determination they had always displayed. Meanwhile the President wished them a happy stay among the people of the United Arab Republic.

307. It was the Foreign Minister's privilege to welcome the Committee on behalf of the Government and people of the United Arab Republic. He expressed his country's gratitude for the decision to meet in Cairo and appreciation of the Committee's constructive new practice of holding meetings close to Territories still under colonialism in Africa and the Arabian Peninsula.

308. The ending of all forms of colonialism was vital to the maintenance of international peace. The United Arab Republic therefore appreciated the Committee's noble and essential efforts, which had helped to raise the morale of peoples subjected to colonialism and given them fresh hope of freedom amidst the continuing acts of oppression. Those efforts had also consolidated the struggle of oppressed peoples to attain their right to self-determination, develop their political systems and exploit their economic resources in order to reach a dignified standard of human prosperity in complete freedom from discrimination.

309. The Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples represented a landmark in the history of the international Organization and a most constructive step forward. Moreover, the efforts of the Committee had considerably contributed to forming a trend of world public opinion hostile to colonialism. That trend had reinforced the will to struggle and sharpened the awareness of peoples striving to recover their freedom. He wished to assure the Committee of the determination of the Government and people of the United Arab Republic to continue to support peoples struggling against all forms of colonialism.

310. His country had followed with great interest and appreciation the Committee's deliberations in Dar es Salaam, Mogadiscio and Addis Ababa, and had no doubt that the African peoples would attain their noble and legitimate objectives in Southern Rhodesia, Angola, Mozambique and other African Territories still under the yoke of colonialism. The United Arab Republic was equally convinced that the forces of colonialism and racialism would soon surrender in the face of the great African struggle and the values it represented. Meanwhile colonial powers had to recognize the force of the African national struggle and the value, accomplishments and role of the African man. They also had to reckon with the decisions of the Organization of African Unity, which represented both a framework and an instrument of the independent African States for the attainment of the honourable objectives of freedom and construction throughout the African continent.

311. The people of the United Arab Republic attached the greatest importance to the questions of Aden and Oman, which the Committee was to discuss. The question of Aden and the Aden Protectorates had already passed the stage of mere adoption of resolutions. The challenge lay rather in taking the necessary action to carry out the United Nations and Special Committee resolutions; and it was the duty of the United Kingdom Government to abide by and fully implement those resolutions, as well as to embark upon a policy of co-operation with the Special Committee for that purpose.

312. He was confident that the Committee fully realized the extent of the aggression and armed intervention to which the people of Oman had been subjected. The General Assembly had already taken positive steps at its twentieth session, when it had recognized the legitimate right of the people of Oman to self-determination and the withdrawal of foreign forces from their territory. He was also confident that the Committee, in fulfilling its United Nations mandate to examine the cause of the struggling people of Oman, would take the decisions and steps necessary for putting an end to armed aggression against the people of Oman and enabling them to recover true sovereignty and enjoy their inherent right to development and progress.

313. The people of the United Arab Republic stood with all Arab and African peoples in watching the work of the Special Committee with great hopes and expectations. Its meetings in Cairo and other African capitals would surely be crowned with success, thereby crystallizing its noble and vital task of ending colonialism.

Address by the Acting Secretary-General of the League of Arab States

314. The Acting Secretary-General of the League of Arab States welcomed the Special Committee to the Arab League's headquarters on behalf of the League of Arab States and thanked it for inviting the League to attend as an observer the meeting of that body, which reflected the noble aims of the United Nations for the liquidation of imperialism and the liberation of humanity from imperialistic aims and dangers.

315. That same aim was also the corner-stone on which the Arab League was founded and for the realization of which it had worked during the whole of its twenty-one years of existence. If the revival of unity was considered to be the ultimate goal of the Arab nation, then freedom could be regarded as the foundation of unity and at its core. That was why the League of Arab States, and its members had struggled for the cause of liberating the Arab nation. Victory for the cause of freedom in Libya, Tunisia, Morocco, Sudan, Kuwait and Algeria had eventually been achieved. Those countries had become full members of the League of Arab States and of the United Nations.

316. With great faith and purpose, the League and its members were now struggling against British imperialism in the Arabian Peninsula. British imperialism had imposed tyrannic rule over the Occupied South, Oman, Muscat and the Emirates of the Gulf, thus flagrantly disregarding the United Nations and violating its Charter and its principles and the resolutions of both the General Assembly and of the Special Committee.

317. Imperialism was still clinging to outdated measures reminiscent of the past two centuries and was resorting to suppression, intimidation and annihilation. In so doing, imperialism disregarded the sufferings, casualties and sacrifices of the people and ignored the fact that that area of the Arab nation embodied one of the oldest civilizations of the world. The Arab nation and the other free nations of the world would in no way agree to the presence of imperialism, which imposed its outrageous exploitation and tied the people to its yoke, thus leading to large-scale ignorance and poverty in the area. Imperialism also constituted a threat to the security of the region and to the peace of the world. It must be borne in mind, at the present juncture, that imperialism had been liquidated in all Asian countries and only remained in the Arab area. It was high time for imperialism to depart from other African States. Cloaked in new shapes, imperialism desperately tried to resume its former power, but its attempts were doomed to failure for they struck deep at the nature of the evolution of life and the maturity of the human conscience.

318. It might not be out of place, in that connexion, to recall what had been taking place in the Arab areas 140 years ago, when British imperialism aligned itself with backwardness against the Arab people; or to recall the protracted nationalist struggle throughout that dark age, which reached a decisive stage with the inception of the Liberation Front, its sacred war against imperialist aggression and the historic feats of heroism it achieved in the last four years; or of imperialist machinations to subvert those movements. The most outstanding example of such machinations had taken place in 1959, when the United Kingdom had embarked upon the foundation of the so-called "Federation of South Arabia", its puppet and the medium for exercising its imperialist powers in the Occupied South. That was exemplified again by the subversive conferences of the United Kingdom, which that country falsely called constitutional. The next conference of that kind would take place in August 1966 between the United Kingdom on the one hand and its puppet in the area on the other. In reality that will mean a conference between the United Kingdom and itself.

319. Attention should also be drawn to the acts of intimidation and tyranny in Muscat, Oman and the Gulf. Those acts had been exposed and publicized thanks to the Special Committee, which had upheld liberty and would continue to uphold it during the present discussion on the two questions.

320. However, he wished to stress the fact that British imperialist danger in the Arabian peninsula was of the same nature, though it took on different forms. It threatened not only the Arabian Peninsula, but also the whole Afro-Asian world. Imperialism would never be eradicated unless its bases were dismantled in the Arab area.

321. Only a week ago he had read the twenty-sixth pamphlet of the Adelphi Papers, entitled Sources of Conflict in the Middle East. There was nothing more significant and eloquent than that paper in revealing the United Kingdom's underlying objective of imperialism in the Arabian Peninsula and in focusing light upon the bases from which aggression was directed against the people.

322. That document needed no comment; it would suffice to quote a few paragraphs from it. For example:

"Britain has bases for land, sea and air forces at Aden and Bahrain, linked by a chain of four air stationing posts and supplemented by smaller landing strips in the South Arabian Federation and the Eastern Aden Protectorates. The bases support a mixed land force of infantry, armour and artillery, a small naval force of escorts, minesweepers and landing craft and an air element including interceptor-ground attack aircraft, reconnaissance bombers, transport aircraft and a few helicopters. Britain is formally bound to defend the South Arabian Federation (including Aden) as well as the Protectorates which remain outside the Federation. In the Persian Gulf area, Britain is also formally bound to defend Bahrain against attack from within the Gulf, to defend Qatar against attack by sea, to defend the Trucial State of Fujairah against any aggression. . . . In addition to these formal commitments, Britain considers itself, and is widely considered, to have a general moral commitment to defend all those States in the Gulf for whose international relations the British Government remains responsible. The main routes by which Britain communicates with and reinforces the bases in the area are by sea through the Suez Canal or by air over Turkey and Iran to Bahrain. Both routes are also important in sustaining the British military presence in the Indian Ocean area and South-East Asia."<sup>3</sup>

323. The document contained accounts indicating a rapprochement between the United States and the United Kingdom concerning that imperialist military plan. Reference was also made to the Western strategic belt, which aimed at the containment of the Soviet Union and the countries parties to the Warsaw Pact, thus forming a defensive-offensive force to face Soviet expansion. The document went on to say:

"British bases and commitments in southern Arabia and the Persian Gulf . . . [help to promote Western influence in the Middle East and to deter any local belligerence. . . . They] help to keep open a strategic route to British positions in the Indian Ocean and South-East Asia, and may thus be said to contribute to the containment of any advance by a communist Power into those areas. But their primary purpose is a more local one: to safeguard the flow of Middle East oil, to prevent or check conflict in their own immediate area and to provide a base for British military intervention in other areas close at hand."<sup>4</sup>

324. The document also mentioned the danger originating from Arab nationalism and its power, and uncovered imperialistic plots against the emerging Arab countries in the area. Imperialism feared that force, which constituted a threat to its aggressive aspirations.

325. The document then stated, in a manner reminiscent of the fossilized imperialist mentality, that Curzon's Declaration of 1903, which stipulated that "The peace of these waters must be maintained . . . and the influence of the British Government must remain supreme", still held good in 1966 so far as the Occupied South and the Gulf were concerned, thus completely disregarding twentieth century developments.

326. He begged indulgence for his lengthy quotations, for he regarded them as unequivocal evidence uncovering the latest British machinations directed against the liberation movement of the Occupied South, and evidence of the unyielding British attitude in Muscat, Oman and the Gulf Emirates. Those statements showed the far-reaching effects of the battle and revealed the truth sought after by the Committee.

327. He also wished to disclose three main parallel aspects of the same imperialist policy followed in South Arabia and to indicate the stand taken by the League of Arab States on those issues.

328. In the cause of the Occupied South, the Arab League, during its first seventeen years of existence, had resorted to every diplomatic means at its disposal to deal with British imperialism, but all its attempts had been in vain. The result was more aggression and repression on the part of imperialism. In 1962 the liberation movement of the Occupied South had initiated a new stage of action, both through an effective nationalist struggle and through the United Nations. During the last four years the Arab countries, through its organs—the League's Councils, Heads of Government and meetings of Heads of State—had pursued the following policies:

They had striven against British imperialism in the Arabian Peninsula by every means at their disposal in order to eradicate imperialism and to consolidate the liberation movement in the Occupied South and Oman. They had also given active aid to the Arabian Gulf to enable it to achieve liberation and advancement.

They had implemented the resolutions of the Special Committee and of the United Nations General Assembly, and in particular the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly on 5 November 1965, regarding the Occupied South, and on 17 December 1965 regarding Oman.

They had taken a firm stand against the British conferences and imperialist manoeuvres which, in a bid to safeguard continued imperialistic presence in a new form, sought to establish puppet régimes which were not the product of the free will of the people of the area. Those attempts and manoeuvres had been condemned by the United Nations.

They had united the efforts of the nationalists in one organization so as to close their ranks against imperialists, which tried to sow the seeds of discord among them.

329. The Nationalist Liberation Movement had recently gained impetus. On 3 March 1966, the Nationalist Front and the Liberation Organization were merged to form a single body: the Front for the Liberation of Occupied South Yemen (FLOSY). The agreement had been ratified on the same day by the Yemen Occupied South Commission of the Arab League and by the League's Council during the same month.

330. The League of Arab States staunchly believed that the Committee would condemn the current attempt by the United Kingdom to hold negotiations with the Federation Government, its tool. It was taking pains to involve the United Nations in its aggressive attempts and taking steps to hold a conference next August which would be a replica of former conferences, which were doomed to failure. It also refused to implement the United Nations resolutions. The United Kingdom should therefore be faced with a decisive confrontation. The nationalist struggle inside the Territory was escalating and becoming more ferocious.

331. But the United Kingdom was persisting in its negotiations and preparations, and was adamant in its insistence on more sacrifices and bloodshed. That was incontestable evidence that current British negotiations were far removed from the aspirations of the people of the area, whose belief in freedom was becoming stauncher and who were more determined to gain victory than ever before.

332. With regard to the Omani cause, on 17 December 1965 the United Nations General Assembly had upheld the natural right of the Omani people to liberation from British imperialists, and to independence and self-determination; it had further condemned the United Kingdom for refusing to co-operate with the Special Committee on Oman, and called for the withdrawal of British forces from Oman, and for the abolition of British supremacy in all its forms, without restrictions on liberties and with legal rights for the people.

333. But since 1955 the occupying forces of the United Kingdom persisted in defending their presence and were still defying the resolutions of the United Nations and the natural rights of the Arab people of Oman. The Arab League was confident that the Special Committee would uphold the Omani people's right to liberty and independence in a new and effective way.

334. The Gulf Emirates were also fettered by British imperialism, which impeded their progress and deprived them of prosperity. Imperialism further imposed its internal and external guardianship without any basis in international law. This, in fact, was the most heinous form of imperialism, whose liquidation was the primary aim of the Special Committee.

335. In compliance with the League's Pact, which called for "co-operation with the Arab countries non-members of the League's Council in a bid to achieve prosperity and safeguard their future", the League Council on 31 March 1964 had adopted a resolution in which it decided to send a mission headed by the Secretary-General of the League, and whose members were personal representatives of the Heads of Arab States which are immediate neighbours of the Gulf Emirates. The aim of that mission was to conclude an agreement with the Emirs on methods of achieving brotherly co-operation with that area, and to offer economic and technical aid.

336. The mission had departed in October 1964 and was followed by a mission of technicians. Agreements were concluded with the rulers of the Emirates concerning projects for paving roads, agriculture, water, electricity and hygiene, to be financed and implemented by the League. The League earmarked the necessary funds and transferred the balance to the Dobai banks before beginning the work.

337. Since 1964, the United Kingdom had been indifferent to the League's projects aiming to revive the area, but once it realized the effectiveness of Arab aid and the willingness of the rulers and people to accept it, that country had embarked upon a policy of pressure and conspiracy. It was then decided that the Secretary-General of the League should visit the Emirates to obtain ratification of the Arab projects from the rulers. A few hours after his arrival on 10 May 1965, he received the necessary documents. The rulers, especially those of Sharjah and Ras El Khaima, because of their prestige, were then intimidated and threatened with deposition, unless they withdrew their agreement to co-operate with the League. All of them refused to submit to such threats.

338. On 22 June 1965, a mission of Arab experts left for Dubai to begin work there. It was then that British imperialism revealed its odious and outdated methods. When the experts arrived in Doha, the capital of the Qatar Emirate, on 24 June 1965, they were prevented, by sheer force, from continuing their journey, and were obliged to return to Kuwait on the same day. There followed the detention of Sheikh Sakr Ibn Sultan, the ruler of Sharjah Emirate, and his banishment to Kuwait. Identical cables were sent to the Secretary-General of the League signed by the other rulers informing him that they had withdrawn from their previous agreements. That incident thus demonstrated one of the heinous methods of imperialist despotism.

339. These brief references to British imperialism in the Occupied South, Omani Imamate and the Gulf Emirates clearly demonstrated imperialist planning, which constituted a threat to the security of the whole area and showed the untruthfulness of recent declarations by the United Kingdom.

340. At that time, the United Kingdom had declared its willingness to put into effect projects for construction in the area, but after a year it was still indifferent to those projects. The Arabs, however, had learnt, in their protracted struggle for freedom, not to listen to any imperialist promises, for they were mere lies. Imperialism would presumably never allow progress, its deadly foe, to replace backwardness, its pliant ally.

341. The United Kingdom Government had announced its determination to evacuate the Occupied South by 1968, but had simultaneously engaged in negotiations under a non-constitutional system condemned by the United Nations, and was disregarding the true representatives of the people. It had just concluded a new secret agreement with the ruler of Bahrain. That agreement aimed at enlarging the military base in Bahrain and equipping it with large quantities of offensive arms. It had been further reported that the United Kingdom Foreign Office was taking the utmost pains to keep that agreement confidential, fearing as it did the pressure which the Arab nationalists might exert upon the Bahrain Government to annul its co-operation with the United Kingdom.

342. That situation aroused grave concern. One reason was that the United Kingdom was persisting in its outdated imperialist schemes, and paying no heed to the fact that it was in the second half of the twentieth century. Another reason was that the Occupied South revolutionaries were continuing their heroic struggle for the liberation of their country and the Omani people were engaging in hostilities. Nationalist resistance had spread from the Imamate of Oman to the internal areas of Muscat. The present situation indicated that an explosion was imminent especially after the deposition of Sharjah Emir, and the United Kingdom's persistence in rejecting the League's support for rehabilitation projects.

343. Intimidation activities had escalated in the area and an agreement concerning an aggressive military base in Bahrain had been concluded.

344. The Arab nation and free peoples everywhere looked to the Committee's historic meeting in Cairo, a city which had scored historic victories against the aggressive forces of colonialism and neo-colonialism; for Cairo was the bulwark of the struggle for freedom. Everybody remembered with gratitude its painstaking efforts to meet freedom fighters in their homelands. People would always remember the praiseworthy stands taken by the Committee on the causes of justice and liberty, and had unswerving faith that it would take a decisive stand in support of the Arab liberation causes.

General statements

345. The Chairman, speaking on behalf of the Special Committee, thanked the Foreign Minister of the United Arab Republic for his inspiring address and for the stirring and remarkable message he had communicated from President Gamal Abdel Nasser. The Foreign Minister had set out important elements which would assist the Committee in its work in Cairo.

346. The Committee's gratitude went out to the Government of the United Arab Republic for inviting it to hold some of its meetings in Cairo and for extending to it hospitality and fine facilities.

347. The position of the Government of the United Arab Republic in the vanguard of the struggle for the liberation of colonial peoples, its devotion to the cause of peace, its dedication to the aims embodied in the United Nations Charter, and its constructive contribution to the work of the Committee, represented an inspiration and a stimulus at the outset of the Committee's work in Cairo.

348. The Chairman also thanked the observer for the League of Arab States for his statement. The special relationship of the League with the United Nations and its contribution to the Special Committee's aims and aspirations made it of particular importance, and due attention would be given to the points raised in the Committee's deliberations in Cairo.

349. It was appropriate that the Committee should be taking up the matters of Aden and Oman while in Cairo. Developments concerning Aden had reached a crucial stage. Fully appreciating the importance attached to the matter by all Arab peoples, he gave an assurance that the Committee would spare no effort to make the contribution expected of it by those peoples and by all freedom-loving peoples everywhere. As the representative of a country which had suffered under colonial domination, he pledged the Committee's unflagging determination to secure the full and earliest possible application of the pertinent General Assembly and Special Committee resolutions. In that connexion, he extended a warm welcome to the Special Representative of the Secretary-General on Aden, Mr. Omar A. H. Adeel, who was present and would take his seat when the matter of Aden was considered.

350. With regard to the question of Oman the Committee would, with equal determination, endeavour to make an effective contribution towards ensuring for the people of Oman the exercise of their inalienable right to self-determination and independence in accordance with their freely expressed wishes. In that task the Committee would of course be guided by General Assembly resolution 2023 (XX) of 17 December 1965.

351. He concluded by renewing his thanks to the Foreign Minister for his address and, through him, to the Government of the United Arab Republic for enabling the Committee to meet in Cairo. He also wished, through the Foreign Minister, to reiterate his gratitude to President Gamal Abdel Nasser for the inspiring message he had that day communicated to the Committee.

352. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics thanked the Government of the United Arab Republic for its invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in the capital of the new Arab State which was in the vanguard of the struggle against imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism and for the freedom and independence of all the oppressed peoples of Africa, Asia, Latin America and the rest of the world. On behalf of the USSR delegation, he expressed his deep appreciation to His Excellency Gamal Abdel Nasser, President of the United Arab Republic, and to the Government and people of that country, which had close ties of friendship with the Soviet people. Relations between the two countries and peoples were based on their common struggle for peace, social progress and socialism. The Government of the United Arab Republic had given the Special Committee an opportunity to make an on-the-spot inquiry into the fundamental problems of the peoples of Arabia fighting against colonial régimes and to hear the representatives of nationalist and patriotic organizations of Aden and Oman and of all those engaged in the struggle to liberate those territories. It had also provided an opportunity for the Committee to work out agreed solutions which would facilitate the rapid implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples as well as many other resolutions adopted by the General Assembly on the questions of Aden and Oman.

353. Although five years had passed since the adoption of the Declaration, millions of human beings, for the most part in Africa and East Arabia, were still held in chains under colonial rule, being brutally exploited, subjected to every kind of humiliation, deprived of their human dignity, persecuted and murdered, solely because they refused to remain slaves. The conscience of mankind could not ignore the crimes of the colonialists. Ways must be found to eradicate the last traces of colonialism and its aftermath, apartheid and racism. Although mortally wounded, colonialism refused to die. It was defending itself fiercely. For some time now, in some parts of the world, colonialist and imperialist forces had been attempting to organize counter-attacks against national liberation movements and to undermine the sovereignty of a number of newly independent young States.

354. The ruling circles in the United States were interfering in the internal affairs of other States and waging an aggressive war against the people of Vietnam. The British colonialists were sending punitive expeditions against the peoples of South Arabia, Aden and Oman. Their Portuguese henchmen were pouring fresh troops into Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea to exterminate the patriots in these Territories. The Verwoerd régime made no attempt to conceal its intention of annexing South West Africa. Ian Smith's unilateral declaration of independence was an act of defiance directed not only against 4 million inhabitants of Zimbabwe, but against all of peace-loving Africa.

355. The criminal plans of Ian Smith, Verwoerd and Salazar, aimed at keeping racist and colonialist régimes in power, could never have succeeded without the military, economic and political support of a number of States members of NATO, foremost among them the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany. The international situation made it imperative for all forces fighting imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism to unite. South Arabia was one of the last bulwarks of British and international imperialism.

It was being used as a major base, which threatened the peace and the security of the peoples of East Arabia.

356. The imperialist monopolies, particularly the United States and British monopolies, had taken possession of the principal resource of South Arabia, oil. The interests of the oil monopolies were carefully protected by land, sea and air forces which threatened the security not only of the people of the area but of the entire Arab world. During the Suez crisis, the Aden and Bahrain bases had served as a spring-board for the air attacks on Egypt. Now, by repeated military provocations, the same bases were threatening the young Arab States. They were being used to combat the national liberation movements in South Arabia and to punish the Arab peoples which had taken up arms to fight for freedom. British airplanes took off from those bases to bomb the villages of South Arabia. British soldiers launched what amounted to colonial expeditions against the patriots of the region and hunted down the Aden freedom fighters. The United Kingdom still had a network of military bases in the Near and Middle East. In the area of Aden and the Gulf, it maintained large contingents of troops which were used both to suppress national liberation movements in South Arabia and to exert pressure on the independent States of East Arabia.

357. On the subject of the importance attributed by imperialism to maintaining military bases in that part of the world, Mr. Julian Amery, former Minister for Air of the last British Conservative Government had recently written that the facts irrefutably proved that the military presence of the United Kingdom east of Suez had considerably helped and was still helping to protect its interests against the hostile local elements. The statement was wholly without guile: the "hostile local elements" were none other than the peoples of Asia and Africa and the peoples of South Arabia, which were resisting British rule and opposing any interference in their internal affairs. The "east of Suez" policy amounted to a sustained effort to protect imperialist interests. It was contrary to the interests of the peoples of Asia and Africa and aimed at strengthening the colonial rule of British imperialism in the southern part of the Arabian Peninsula.

358. However, the monstrous and barbarous methods used by imperialism and colonialism to stifle the legitimate aspirations of the peoples to freedom and independence were doomed to failure. Despite local frustrations and temporary defeats, the liberation forces were steadily increasing in number and their equipment was improving. The last vestiges of colonialism would be unable to withstand an attack by those forces: he could state that with certainty, because all States and peoples which loved freedom, peace and progress were giving increasingly active support to the freedom fighters.

359. The position of the Soviet Union on the question was well known: in order to help to liquidate colonial régimes as rapidly as possible, it had provided and would continue to provide assistance to the peoples which were waging a heroic struggle against colonial oppression.

360. During his recent visit to the United Arab Republic, Mr. Kosygin, Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR, had said: "Our State and the whole Soviet people are providing decisive support for all those fighting for their freedom and independence. For many years, the Soviet Union has been pursuing a policy of active support for peoples fighting for their national independence, for the permanent liquidation of capitalism and for the strengthening of peace. You can be sure that we shall continue to pursue that policy."

361. The joint communiqué on the talks between the leaders of the Soviet Union and the United Arab Republic setting forth the position of the signatories on colonial questions stated that they condemned the policy of oppression of the colonial Power in Aden and South Arabia. They affirmed that they were prepared fully to support the heroic struggle of the Arab peoples for their freedom and genuine self-determination. They appealed to the United Kingdom Government to implement the decisions of the United Nations General Assembly and pledged their support to the people of Oman in its fight against colonialism.

362. The USSR delegation expressed confidence that during its meetings in Cairo, the Special Committee would adopt decisions aimed at supporting the liberation forces of South Arabia and expediting the liquidation of colonial régimes in that part of the world. The Organization of African Unity and the League of Arab States had an important part to play in the overthrow of these régimes in Africa and East Arabia. In previous years, the United Nations, the Organization of African Unity and the League of Arab States had managed to co-ordinate their activities more and more efficiently. His delegation welcomed that co-operation and expressed the hope that the representatives of the Arab League would work with the Special Committee in an effort to resolve the problems to be discussed in Cairo.

363. On behalf of his delegation, he extended to the people of the United Arab Republic his best wishes for their complete success in building a new life of happiness and prosperity.

364. The representative of Venezuela said that he was pleased to have an opportunity, for the first time in four years, to pay a tribute to the United Arab Republic for its co-operation with the Special Committee. At the previous session, he had conveyed his thanks to the United Arab Republic in his capacity as a member of the Sub-Committee on Aden. Now, it was on behalf of the delegations of Chile, Uruguay and Venezuela that he thanked the people and Government of the United Arab Republic for the kind invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of its African meetings in Cairo. The warm welcome the United Arab Republic had given the members of the Special Committee had once again demonstrated its readiness to fight against colonialism and showed that it had taken an unequivocal stand in favour of United Nations action in that struggle.

365. The Venezuelan delegation fully appreciated the valuable assistance given the Special Committee by the United Arab Republic and thanked its Government for having enabled the Committee members to have direct contact with the reality of colonialism in that part of the world. He was confident that the experience gained during the Cairo meetings would be very valuable and would help the Committee to complete its task successfully and thus to carry out the instructions of the General Assembly.

366. The representative of Iraq expressed his delegation's profound appreciation and gratitude for the invitation extended to the Special Committee by a sister Arab country to hold some of its meetings in Cairo. Coming to Cairo was, for Arabs and Africans alike, something in the nature of a long-cherished pilgrimage.

367. The same banks of the Nile had seen the flowering of a great Arab and Islamic civilization that had spread light and justice throughout that part of the world. Since the great revolution of 23 July 1952 the United Arab Republic had come to represent, for Arabs and Africans, the pulsating heart of Arab and African unity, the defiant stand against colonialism and its offshoot, international Zionism, the rallying point in the struggle against all foreign domination and oppression, and a refuge for freedom fighters from all over the world.

368. In 1954, President Nasser had written in his Philosophy of the Revolution that it was not in vain that his country lay to the south-west of Asia close to the Arab world, whose life was intermingled with that of the United Arab Republic; neither was it in vain that his country lay to the north-east of Africa, a position from which it overlooked the African continent, wherein was raging the most violent struggle between white colonizers and the black indigenous inhabitants for the possession of its inexhaustible resources.

369. Indeed, the United Arab Republic had played, and continued to play, a leading role in the struggle against Zionist colonialism and its forcible occupation of a very dear part of the Arab homeland as well as in the general fight against all forms of colonialism everywhere.

370. He felt confident that the Committee's deliberations in Cairo would be as successful, constructive and fruitful as those held previously in other African capitals.

371. The representative of Bulgaria also expressed his delegation's appreciation to His Excellency Gamal Abdel Nasser, President of the United Arab Republic, and to the people and Government of the United Arab Republic for inviting the Special Committee to meet in Cairo and for the warm welcome extended to the members. The results of the Committee's present session in Africa, since it was already possible to speak of results, had shown how much the Committee owed to the United Arab Republic and the other countries which had invited it to hold meetings in their respective capitals. The United Arab Republic's hospitality was not fortuitous. It was in line with the overall policy of the United Arab Republic on colonial questions. The United Arab Republic was in the forefront of the African countries and the States Members of the United Nations which consistently supported the struggle against colonialism and imperialism. Its contribution to the fight against imperialism and the help it gave to national liberation movements in Africa, the Near East, South Arabia and all other areas of the world where vestiges of colonialism still existed were of the greatest significance. The statement of His Excellency El Sayed Mahmoud Riad, Minister for Foreign Affairs of the United Arab Republic, was further evidence of that fact.

372. The Bulgarian delegation, which represented a people friendly to the United Arab Republic, was gratified to be able to see for itself that the United Arab Republic with its age-old culture and civilization, was forging ahead towards a free and independent existence. Indeed, the few hours spent in the beautiful capital of the United Arab Republic had already given the Committee members an idea of the enthusiasm and optimism with which the people of the United Arab Republic were building their State under the leadership of their Government. Their economic achievements and improved level of living were a source of inspiration and an example for all peoples which had severed the chains of colonialism. The Bulgarian delegation fully agreed with the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the United Arab Republic that the Committee's work would assume special importance during its stay in Cairo. The Committee was to define the ways and means of ensuring the speedy implementation of the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) and the resolutions on Oman and the Aden Protectorates adopted by the General Assembly at its last session. Its further task was to frustrate the attempts of the United Kingdom to maintain its military bases in South Arabia with the help of reactionary and corrupt elements and puppet governments and prevent it from continuing to enslave the peoples of those territories.

373. Guided by the anti-imperialist policy of its Government, the Bulgarian delegation could assure the representatives of the Government of the United Arab Republic that it would assist the Special Committee in every way in its efforts to liberate the peoples of South Arabia. To the people of the United Arab Republic, with which the Bulgarian people had close ties of friendship and co-operation which had been reaffirmed by the recent visit of the Chairman of the Council of Bulgaria to Cairo, it extended its most sincere wishes for continued success in building its independent and sovereign republic.

374. The representative of Ethiopia wished to associate his delegation with the expressions of thanks and appreciation already voiced for the welcome and hospitality extended to the Special Committee by the Government and people of the United Arab Republic. His country had grown accustomed to that hospitality throughout the long history of common ties between the peoples of Egypt and Ethiopia. The historical, cultural and geographical links existing between the two sister countries were so strong as to reduce the physical distance between them to insignificance. The Ethiopian delegation therefore felt very much at home in the great and ancient city of Cairo.

375. It was fitting that the Special Committee should take up the question of Aden and Oman while in Cairo; for the people of the United Arab Republic had long suffered under ruthless colonialists and imperialists, and rightly expected from the Committee the support and assistance due to them as a people still struggling to win freedom, independence and human dignity.

376. As a neighbour of Aden and South Arabia as a whole, Ethiopia had been keeping a close and sympathetic watch on the struggle that the gallant people of those Territories were waging for freedom, democracy and social justice. He therefore wished to assure the people of Aden of the sympathy of his delegation and its full support for any measure designed to ensure the rapid transition of Aden from its present colonial status to complete freedom and unfettered independence.

377. History testified to the fact that Ethiopia had always stood by the side of the Arab world in times of difficulty. It was therefore only natural for the Ethiopian Government and people to support the aspirations of the struggling peoples in the remaining pockets of colonialism and imperialism in the Arab world. He warned the United Kingdom that it was high time for it to cease oppression and make the necessary preparations for a speedy and complete withdrawal from the area in question.

378. He concluded by extending his thanks to the President, Government and people of the United Arab Republic for inviting the Special Committee to their country and expressed the hope that its meetings in Cairo would contribute to the complete eradication of colonialism in the Arab world and elsewhere.

379. The representative of Iran expressed his delegation's gratitude to the President, Government and people of the United Arab Republic for their invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Cairo. It was a special pleasure for the Iranian delegation to be amongst a people with whom Iran shared immutable ties of friendship and common heritage. Those ties, dating back over two thousand years, had been reinforced by the present common aim to uproot colonialism.

380. His delegation had listened with great attention and interest to the highly important statement made by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the United Arab Republic. The Iranian representative was convinced that that statement would greatly assist the Special Committee in its task.

381. His delegation would do everything within its power to help all peoples languishing under colonial subjugation to regain their freedom and independence. The Special Committee, to a greater extent than any other United Nations body, had been instrumental in strengthening the confidence of those peoples in the United Nations and had been able to gain a direct acquaintance with their wishes and aspirations. He was convinced that the Committee would make a valuable contribution to implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), containing the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

382. He concluded by reiterating the thanks of his delegation for the friendly welcome and the warmth of feeling extended to the Committee.

383. The representative of Poland expressed the gratitude of the Polish delegation to the President, Government and people of the United Arab Republic for inviting the Special Committee to the capital of a country which had become a shining star in the firmament of liberation struggles in the Arab world, as well as playing a leading role in liberation struggles elsewhere. He trusted that the presence of the Special Committee in Cairo would give hope and encouragement to the freedom fighters of Aden and the adjacent Territories which were still suffering humiliation, exploitation and foreign domination under oppressive and abhorrent colonial régimes. The United Arab Republic was making a most important contribution towards the realization of the noble aims of progress, peace and justice, and its dedicated efforts in the cause of its own socialist development were admired by all its genuine friends. The economic, political and social changes in the United Arab Republic, set a visible example to the world. Poland had many ties of friendly co-operation with the United Arab Republic, and both countries had a common approach to world problems. Poland cherished those relations and vividly recalled the warm welcome extended to its Chairman of the Council of State, Mr. Edward Ochab, during his visit to the United Arab Republic in November 1965. The Polish representative wished to take the opportunity of conveying to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic Poland's warm wishes for further success in their noble endeavours in the cause of peace, progress and a bright and prosperous future. Thanks were also due to the Foreign Minister of the United Arab Republic for his important and inspiring address, which was but a further testimony of the determination of the host country to assist the United Nations in its efforts to uproot colonialism everywhere. He also wished to express his delegation's gratitude to the Arab League for the facilities extended to the Committee.

384. The Polish delegation supported the just and legitimate struggle of the people of Aden and of South Arabia as a whole, and, in expressing his deep appreciation to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for their invitation, reiterated its most cordial wishes for peace, progress and social justice.

385. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania thanked the President, the Government and the people of the United Arab Republic for their welcome and expressed his appreciation of the statement made on behalf of President Nasser by the Foreign Minister. He assured Mr. Riad that the Committee would give full consideration to the President's words of wisdom.

386. Since the United Arab Republic had emerged as a free State in 1952, its people, under the leadership of President Nasser, had consistently defended human rights, and particularly the right to political independence in countries still under the yoke of colonialism. The spirit of the United Arab Republic had been shown in its acts and not by words alone. It was well known that the United Arab Republic supported the Liberation Committee of the OAU whose headquarters were in Dar es Salaam. It had striven, at great sacrifice, to free peoples exploited by foreign Powers. It had given up trading with South Africa, and had not hesitated to break off diplomatic relations with the United Kingdom because of the Southern Rhodesian question.

387. The work of the United Arab Republic for Africa was beyond praise, and he was happy that the Special Committee could hold some of its meetings in Cairo, for the United Arab Republic was extending the struggle against colonialism to the Middle East, and Aden was of particular concern to it. The United Kingdom had vested interests in those Territories and pretended that its presence enabled the indigenous peoples to make progress. It used that pretext to defy the United Nations resolutions. In that connexion he wished to pay a tribute to the many people who had lost their lives in the struggle for the independence of their country.

388. Tanzania, like the United Arab Republic with which it had long-standing ties of friendship, had always fought against colonialism. He assured it of his Government's strong support and of his conviction that with Committee's help the people of Aden would attain their freedom.

389. The representative of Yugoslavia thanked the Foreign Minister and the President for their messages of welcome. He was particularly happy to be in the United Arab Republic. Cairo was a most appropriate meeting place for the Committee. It was well known that the United Arab Republic had played an outstanding role in the process of decolonization and in freeing Africa, and had indeed served as an outstanding example to other countries.

390. His own country had many ties of friendship and co-operation with the United Arab Republic. Both were interested in maintaining international peace and security, in eradicating all forms of foreign domination and in the improvement of international relations on the basis of non-interference. Those ties had recently been reaffirmed by the seventeenth meeting between Presidents Tito and Nasser. His delegation was certain that the Committee's work in Cairo would be successful.

391. The representative of Syria felt that no expression of homage and thanks could do justice to the President, Government and valiant people of the United Arab Republic. Hospitality had deep roots in that country and was indeed a matter of everyday life. Colonialism had met with its most humiliating defeats in the United Arab Republic, whose stand against oppression was not a matter of politics but rather a profession of faith. Its defence of subjugated peoples was a sacred duty, not a mere question of choice. The United Arab Republic gave support to the cause of emancipation and justice regardless of race, and was determined to liquidate the last bastions of colonialism as well as the inhuman legacy left behind: underdevelopment, poverty, disease, ignorance, division and degradation. As President Nasser himself had said, colonialism was a basic source of evil. If it were to be eradicated, the instruments that it used must also be eradicated.

392. The United Arab Republic had become an outstanding example of progress, and Cairo had become the meeting place of progressive forces in the Arab world and elsewhere, co-ordinated by the United Arab Republic.

393. The aims of the United Arab Republic were those of the Special Committee. President Nasser's message would be a source of inspiration to the Committee, as the Chairman had pointed out: the present age was too enlightened to be deceived by the puppet régimes erected by colonialism to perpetuate its exploitation of men and resources.

394. On behalf of the Syrian Arab Republic and its people and Government, he expressed his deep gratitude, solidarity and unity of purpose with the United Arab Republic, and wished that country every success in its noble endeavour in the cause of humanity, as well as his sincere thanks to the Arab League for the assistance given the Committee.

395. The representative of Mali thanked the people and Government of the United Arab Republic and President Nasser for the kind invitation and warm welcome extended to the Special Committee.

396. Since the sixth century, Mali and the United Arab Republic had been linked by ethnic, historical and cultural ties. Although they had been separated by colonialism for nearly three quarters of a century, after their liberation they had found themselves more united than ever in the final struggle against old and new colonialism and against imperialism.

397. Mali was observing with special attention the real pride the UAR's efforts to strengthen its independence and emerge from under-development. Every success of the Egyptian peoples was a victory for Mali, an African victory over the common enemies —colonialism and imperialism. Both phenomena were destined to disappear because all peoples would ultimately gain their freedom; as the Administrative Secretary-General of the OAU had said, it was only a matter of time and methods.

398. The very fact that the United Arab Republic had invited the Special Committee to hold part of its session in Cairo indicated that country's interest in the problems of decolonization.

399. He was pleased to have an opportunity in Cairo to hear the true representatives of Aden and Oman speak on behalf of their peoples about the inhumane and intolerable conduct of the United Kingdom in those Territories. The United Kingdom Government must implement the relevant resolutions of the Special Committee and the General Assembly on Aden and the Aden Protectorates. The people of Oman, in particular, had the same right as others to exercise self-determination and achieve independence in circumstances of their own choosing.

400. In conclusion he expressed appreciation to the valiant people of the United Arab Republic for their efforts to combat the reactionary forces of colonialism and the reprehensible régimes of Verwoerd, Salazar and Ian Smith, and he extended to their leaders and to President Gamal Abdel Nasser his best wishes for their happiness.

401. The representative of Australia said that he had been doubly touched by the warmth of the reception given to the Special Committee in the historic city of Cairo. Civilization was based on the learning, art and culture which grew up in that city when the rest of the world was still at the barbarian stage. On behalf of his delegation he extended his sincerest thanks to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic and his deepest respects to the great Arab people who were playing such an important role in the modern world. His delegation appreciated the message of President Nasser and would faithfully convey it to the Australian Government; it would be grateful if the Foreign Minister could convey its respectful thanks to the President.

402. The representative of India said that his country was no stranger to the United Arab Republic. Links of many different kinds had existed between the two countries for thousands of years. He had been struck by the splendour of Cairo and thought it only fit that the Special Committee should be meeting there. It was indeed a privilege for the Committee to meet there, because of the noble aims of the United Arab Republic and also because of the friendly welcome of its citizens.

403. He recalled that, when the United Arab Republic had suffered the Suez attack, his own country had been one of the first to proffer support; when India had forced the Portuguese out of Goa, the United Arab Republic had given its help. His country had also been the first to establish diplomatic relations with the Arab League. He thanked the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for their hospitality and the President for his kind message.

404. The representative of Denmark joined previous speakers in thanking the Special Committee's hosts. His delegation had particular pleasure in meeting in Cairo, the cradle of a great civilization from which Europe had received so much inspiration. The illustrious history of the United Arab Republic was well known, but that history was also the background to the present work of the country. It was fitting that the Committee should be meeting in Cairo, for the United Arab Republic had for many years pursued a policy of anti-colonialism. In that connexion his delegation wished to thank President Nasser and Mr. Riad for their messages clearly outlining the problems to be discussed.

405. His own country had friendly relations with the United Arab Republic, and he hoped that country would continue to make progress towards a bright future of prosperity and peace.

406. The representative of Italy said that the visit to Cairo had special significance for his delegation not only because of the cordial relations of Italy with the United Arab Republic, but also because the two countries' history was so closely linked. The invitation of the United Arab Republic was a symbol of the confidence placed in the work of the Special Committee and in that of the United Nations by a country which was so bravely engaged in building its future. He was grateful to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for that confidence, and expressed his delegation's admiration for the achievements of the United Arab Republic together with its best wishes for the future.

407. The representative of Madagascar wished to express his most sincere appreciation to President Gamal Abdel Nasser and to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for inviting the Special Committee to hold part of its session in the magnificent capital city of Cairo.

408. He was confident that the Special Committee's stay in the United Arab Republic would help it to solve the problems on its agenda.

409. He paid a tribute to the Government of the United Arab Republic for the warm welcome it had given the members of the Special Committee and for its generous hospitality.

410. The representative of Tunisia thanked President Nasser and the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for their kind invitation to the Special Committee. He also paid a tribute to the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the United Arab Republic for his address, which would be a source of inspiration to the Special Committee in its efforts to frustrate the schemes of the colonial Powers.

411. It was not enough to condemn colonialism; some way had to be found to render it harmless. The Special Committee should draw the attention of world opinion to that evil of the modern world so that every means would be mobilized to eradicate it once and for all.

412. He would express his delegation's views concerning the situation in Aden and the Aden Protectorates at a later stage. For the time being, he would merely say that foreign influence in those Territories could not be tolerated and that he would spare no effort to see that the resolutions of the United Nations were fully implemented there.

413. The representative of Afghanistan associated himself with the thanks expressed by other members of the Special Committee to the Government of the United Arab Republic for its generous invitation to hold some of their meetings in the beautiful city of Cairo on the sources of the great Nile. That hospitality was not only in accordance with the country's fine traditions but also demonstrated a strong belief in the Committee's work.

414. He had been particularly gratified by the inspiring message received from President Nasser. He was sure that the Committee would give due consideration to the words of wisdom it contained.

415. It was a particular source of joy to his delegation to be in Cairo, for innumerable ties of friendship existed between Afghanistan and the United Arab Republic, which had a common policy of non-alignment as well as a common religion.

416. The representative of the Ivory Coast associated himself with previous speakers in thanking the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for their generous invitation to the Special Committee and for their warm and fraternal welcome.

417. The invitation was all the more significant as the United Arab Republic itself was engaged in a struggle to improve the lot of its people and cope with the disastrous effects of under-development. That country was thus demonstrating once again its interest in the Special Committee's work and the importance it attached to the total eradication of colonialism from the world in general and from the South Arabian peninsula in particular.

418. The position of the Government of the Ivory Coast on colonial problems was well known. He would only recall that it supported the self-determination of peoples and the gradual and orderly transfer of all the attributes of sovereignty to the true representatives of the countries still under foreign rule. Accordingly, he would spare no effort during the Special Committee's work in Cairo to seek, together with other delegations, ways and means enabling the Committee to carry out the task assigned to it by the General Assembly.

419. He concluded by extending to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic his best wishes for their happiness and prosperity.

420. The representative of Sierra Leone thought it particularly fitting that the Special Committee should be able to meet in the United Arab Republic, for that country represented a geographical and cultural bridge between the Arab world of Africa and of Asia.

421. It was particularly fitting that the Committee should discuss in Cairo problems of interest both to Africans and Asians, including the questions of Aden and Oman. Because of its own opposition to colonialism and neo-colonialism, his country shared the hope and determination of the United Arab Republic to free subjugated peoples from the yoke of colonialism. It would be the Committee's task to ensure that the United Kingdom implemented the United Nations resolutions on Aden and Oman.

422. He thanked the President of the United Arab Republic for his inspiring message. His delegation was convinced that the Committee's stay in Cairo would be both pleasant and fruitful.

423. The representative of the United States of America said that it was a particular pleasure for her delegation to visit Cairo in response to the generous invitation of the host country. The representative of Iraq had said that to come to Cairo was a spiritual privilege for Arabs; but it also was a privilege for all the peoples of the civilized world. All the members of the Special Committee were inspired by awe and respect for the continued accomplishments of the people of the Nile valley, which had begun before the dawn of recorded history.

424. The United Arab Republic had a glorious future now that the people of the country had taken their destiny into their own hands. Her own country had long-standing friendly relations with the United Arab Republic and was especially happy that the Committee could be meeting in Cairo.

425. She thanked the President and the Foreign Minister for their speeches of welcome and looked forward to the important deliberations of the Committee in the beautiful and historic city of Cairo. She was confident that the generosity of the Government and people of the United Arab Republic would contribute to the success of the Committee's meetings in that city.

426. The representative of the United Arab Republic wished to convey to the Chairman and members of the Special Committee the very sincere thanks of his Government for the generous and elegant way in which they had referred to his country. Those words were more than mere courtesy; they represented an encouragement to the Government of the United Arab Republic in its difficult path of non-alignment. His Government had reserved for itself the right to judge each world issue on its own merits, and that, he believed, was also the way of the United Nations. The encouraging speeches made that morning would serve to strengthen his country's purpose on its lonely and difficult path.

427. His Government was also happy that the Committee was meeting in Cairo. The United Nations represented the ideals and the dreams of mankind and the Committee's presence in Cairo made those aspirations more tangible.

428. The Committee was one of the most effective organs of the United Nations, and a great deal of hope was placed in its works; he felt sure that that hope would be justified.

429. His own country had worked patiently for solidarity to further the aims of the United Nations, for freedom, justice and lasting peace. It would give the Committee the fullest co-operation so that its work might be fruitful and its stay in Cairo a success.

430. He would ask for permission to address the Committee later on specific points of the agenda, and thanked members for having given him the opportunity of making a statement.

General statements

431. The representative of the Secretary-General expressed the Secretariat's deep gratitude to the Government of the United Arab Republic for its generous hospitality and for all the assistance it had given in connexion with the Special Committee's meetings in Cairo. The Secretariat was also deeply grateful to the Secretary-General of the League of Arab States and his colleagues for having placed at the Committee's disposal its beautiful conference room and its facilities.

432. The Chairman expressed the Special Committee's heartfelt thanks to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for their generous hospitality during its short stay in Cairo. Their contribution to the cause of freedom and justice for all the oppressed peoples of the world was too well known to require elaboration. It would suffice to say that whether within the Organization of African Unity, the non-aligned world or the United Nations, the United Arab Republic, under the dynamic leadership of its indefatigable and able President, Mr. Gamal Abdel Nasser, had always been the torch-bearer of freedom in a world darkened by the forces of colonialism.

433. For that reason, the Special Committee considered it a special honour to have been invited by the Government of the United Arab Republic to hold its meetings there. That could also be considered as a special recognition of the work of the Committee, since Cairo had come to be considered as an important haven for all freedom-loving peoples the world over. In addition to the constructive contribution of the Government and people of the United Arab Republic to the work of the Committee, they had also found time to lavish on it hospitality in true African and Arab tradition, for which it was very grateful. On behalf of all the members of the Special Committee, he took special pride in extending their gratitude to the Government and people of the United Arab Republic for all the facilities they had offered.

434. He also thanked the League of Arab States for having put its hall at the Special Committee's disposal and for providing it with the necessary conference facilities. It was only proper that it should have discussed there the questions of Aden and Oman, since the League of Arab States was the champion of freedom and justice in the Arab world.

435. The Special Committee had taken significant steps forward with regard to the application of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples as it affected Aden and Oman. The resolution adopted that afternoon on the question of Aden (A/AC.109/179/Rev.1) contained important recommendations which should help in the solution of the problem. Members would recall that operative paragraph 12 of that resolution requested the Secretary-General, in consultation with the Special Committee and the administering Power, to appoint immediately a special mission to Aden for the purpose of recommending practical steps necessary for the full implementation of the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, and in particular for determining the extent of United Nations participation in the preparation and supervision of elections and of making a report to him as soon as possible for transmission to the Special Committee. It was hoped that the implementation of that important operative paragraph would help the people of Aden to reach their goal of true independence and freedom.

436. Regarding the question of Oman, the petitioners had provided the Committee with very pertinent information which should help it in assessing the situation in the Territory and arriving at appropriate conclusions. General Assembly resolution 2073 (XX) recognized the inalienable right of the people of the Territory as a whole to self-determination and independence in accordance with their freely expressed wishes, and on behalf of the Special Committee he assured the petitioners that it would keep that constantly in mind when giving further consideration to the question of Oman in New York.

Statement by the Deputy Foreign Minister of the United Arab Republic

437. The Deputy Foreign Minister of the United Arab Republic on behalf of the people, the Government and the President of the United Arab Republic, expressed appreciation to the Special Committee and its secretariat for their work. The people still struggling to free themselves from colonialism had in the Committee able and articulate champions, and he was confident that its efforts would meet with continued success. He also expressed appreciation to the Secretary-General of the United Nations for having sent a special representative to attend the meetings in Cairo. His Government had unquestioned confidence in U Thant, and knew that he would spare no effort to implement the General Assembly's resolutions and thereby help the just cause for which the Committee was working. The nationalists in that part of the world were well aware that they could expect only moral support from the United Nations, but they were content with and grateful for it in their struggle for freedom and for a legitimate opportunity to achieve progress and happiness.

438. His Government was glad to know that the Special Committee was keeping the question of South Arabia on its agenda, but hoped that it would not have to remain there for too long.

Statement by the Acting Secretary-General of the League of Arab States

439. The Acting Secretary-General of the League of Arab States expressed deep appreciation to the Special Committee for its tireless work and valuable support to the cause of freedom. It had been a great privilege for the League of Arab States to receive the Committee and he hoped its work would meet with continued success.

E. MEETINGS HELD AT ALGIERS, ALGERIA

Opening of meetings

Message from the President of the Revolutionary Council and Head of Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria

440. At the request of the Chairman, a message of welcome from the President of the Revolutionary Council and Head of Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria was read to the Committee. The message read as follows:

"On the occasion of the opening of a new session of your Committee in Algiers, I take pleasure in welcoming you to our country and in expressing to you, on behalf of the Revolutionary Council and the Government, our satisfaction, as well as the great pride we feel, in receiving you in Algeria to carry out a task which is in the forefront of our thoughts.

"The struggle against colonial domination, in all its forms and on all continents, is one of the constant factors in our policy and actions. Your presence in Algiers to study the problems of decolonization therefore has symbolic significance for us, and we regard it as an event of the highest importance. You will find in Algeria the greatest sympathy for your work, among a people which feels linked in fraternity with all peoples fighting and suffering to win their freedom.

"We are also glad to be given the opportunity of reaffirming our support for the United Nations and expressing all the hopes we place in it for better understanding among men and sincere friendship among peoples. We are convinced of the importance of its role in maintaining and strengthening peace throughout the world, and we are confident that it will shoulder all the responsibilities of its lofty and noble mission.

"I wish you every success in your work and a pleasant stay in our country, which will strive to give you a worthy welcome, both as guests and as friends."

Address by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria

441. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria said that Algiers was the last stage in the Special Committee's journey through Africa. Its stay in various capitals of the African continent had enabled it to enter into direct contact with several liberation movements and it had thus been able to supplement its information on the problems of decolonization by placing them in their context and by seeing them as they actually were. In its African tour, the method thus applied by the Committee should be pondered, enriched and, if necessary, extended, in order to bring nearer all the solutions likely to rejuvenate, strengthen and consolidate the United Nations.

442. Algeria was happy to welcome the Committee and to help to make its mission a success. Algeria had itself placed great hopes in and had obtained much from the United Nations at the time when it had been engaged in its life and death struggle for its own liberation. It therefore felt duty-bound to give the Committee every support in the discharge of its task, to encourage its deliberations, and to share in the achievement of its objectives which were intimately linked with Algeria's convictions and actions.

443. His country, yesterday still colonized, today independent after a bitter and bloody struggle, endorsed the just and legitimate cause of peoples still fighting against colonial domination. Their liberation movements encountered a natural understanding and support in Algeria among a people who shared their desires and hopes and who sustained them in their efforts and their sacrifices.

444. The Committee would thus have an opportunity to enter into extensive contacts with the leaders of those movements and would find on a land still shuddering from its clash with colonialism a particularly appropriate background for the study of the problems it had to tackle.

445. He therefore welcomed the Committee, brought greetings from the Council of the Revolution, the National Liberation Front and the Government, and thanked the Committee for having chosen Algiers as one of its meeting-places in Africa.

446. As soon as the Second World War had ended, the elimination of colonial domination had become an international objective. The recognition of the right of peoples to self-determination, embodied in the United Nations Charter, had given rise to great hopes among the oppressed peoples and a new era was opening which was to be marked by the final abolition of colonialism.

447. While many countries had indeed recovered their independence during those last twenty years, their liberation had not always been easy and often they had only succeeded in shaking off the colonial yoke at the cost of immense sacrifices. The general upsurge of human brotherhood which had been apparent at the end of the war was gradually dying down, while imperialism, as soon as it was threatened, was recovering its vocation and striving to maintain and strengthen its domination. The very objective of the Committee's mission revealed the extent and difficulty of the task which remained to be accomplished of freeing peoples who were still under the colonial yoke and who were constrained to use violence and to wage an unequal war to establish their most elementary rights to freedom, justice and dignity. The struggle against colonialism continued, marked both by the determination of the imperialist Powers to perpetuate a régime of colonial exploitation and by the increasingly strong determination of the colonized peoples to break that stranglehold. The irreconcilable antagonism between oppressive force and faith in justice and freedom was reflected by successive outbursts of violence. In every place where a colonial régime persisted there was a hotbed of tension which gave rise to the courageous and often heroic action of liberation movements.

448. It was not by chance that the Special Committee had arranged the stages of its itinerary in Africa, for it was mainly in Africa that the fight against colonialism was taking place and that many countries continued to suffer from colonial domination. Whereas the other European Powers who had taken part in the colonization of Africa had, either voluntarily or under pressure from the African people, modified their attitude and their behaviour, Portugal persisted blindly in following its policy of colonial exploitation, completely disregarding the profound aspirations of peoples and flouting all the obligations of international society towards colonized peoples. As a result of that retrograde policy, immense areas of Africa were dominated by one of the last adherents of an anachronistic colonialism and their peoples were at the mercy of Portuguese exploiters. In Angola the Portuguese authorities were increasing their war effort in the face of an armed struggle for liberation which had been going on for more than five years. That had in no way undermined the determination of the Angolan patriots. In the end, Angola would inevitably triumph over the blindness of the colonial Power. The same was true of Guinea and the Cape Verde Islands. Although the armed struggle in Mozambique had been unleashed more recently, it was still no less atrocious and no less violent and could not leave international opinion indifferent.

449. The situation in Southern Rhodesia was the direct responsibility of the United Kingdom which, in spite of its commitments and promises, had paved the way for the advent of a racist régime. The unilateral proclamation of independence by Ian Smith, the logical conclusion of United Kingdom policy, constituted a challenge and a provocation to African opinion and international opinion. It had placed the people of Zimbabwe under the domination of a white minority, thus instituting a régime of racial segregation similar to that of South Africa. That was a serious blow to the freedom of an African people and an inadmissible affront to its dignity. The African conscience could not disregard that new aggression which it had already denounced before international opinion and against which it would be able to mobilize all the forces of Africa. The seriousness of the Rhodesian problem could not be emphasized enough. It brought dire threats to the African continent and with regard to it each member of the international Committee must consider his responsibilities.

450. In South Africa and Portugal the régime of Ian Smith found its natural allies, that double alliance being based both on racism and colonialism. The policy of apartheid applied in South Africa had been resolutely condemned in international institutions but it was clear now that the Government of Pretoria was maintaining its attitude with impunity and was frustrating the economic sanctions taken against it. That striking example showed how well founded was the scepticism felt by Africans concerning the efficacy of the economic measures taken by the United Kingdom Government against the Ian Smith régime. Nevertheless, the Head of the United Kingdom Government had promised faithfully to take all the necessary steps to restore the situation in Southern Rhodesia and had requested the African countries of the Commonwealth to allow him six months to prove to them that his policy of economic sanctions would be enough to attain the objective apparently sought. That had been at the beginning of 1966 and the time-limit granted to Mr. Wilson had now expired. It was difficult to say that the régime of Ian Smith was on the point of collapsing, a victim of the means of coercion dreamed up by Prime Minister Wilson. Indeed, negotiations were now taking place between the Salisbury racists and the representatives of the United Kingdom Government. Did the United Kingdom really believe that international opinion could be thus hoodwinked? The attitude of the Algerian Government remained clear and the delaying tactics of the United Kingdom could deceive no one. Only a resolute policy could put an end to the Ian Smith rebellion. The present shilly-shallyings were doing nothing to solve the problem; they were paving the way for a period of violence in which all Africans and free men everywhere would find themselves fighting at the side of the Zimbabwe people.

451. It was not only on the African continent that United Kingdom colonialism continued to manifest itself. In Southern Arabia, Aden and Oman peoples were fighting to free themselves from United Kingdom domination and their struggle took on the same character as in the colonized countries of Africa. There again the exploitation of the wealth of the country and the maintenance of strategic positions remained the basic aims of colonial domination. The selfish interests of the colonial Power were obstinately opposed to the fierce determination of the peoples for liberation and thus led to the same bloody clashes.

452. The problem of Palestine also had the same colonial character. By some strange justice, the Arab peoples of Palestine had been forced to pay for the Nazi crimes against the Jews and to abandon their own country and remain deprived of their fatherland. The Powers which had helped to create the artificial State of Israel had perhaps sought to solve a human problem which the sufferings of the Jewish people had certainly imposed on the international conscience. But the terrible situation in which they had plunged millions of Palestinians, who had been transformed into miserable refugees at the frontiers of their country, constituted no less a human tragedy the intensity and scale of which could not fail to trouble the international conscience. The voluntary contributions—which were becoming more and more modest—by certain great Powers for the Palestine refugees could not dissimulate their responsibility for a problem whose social and humanitarian aspects merely accentuate its political character.

453. For a country had been despoiled, a people had been driven out and dispossessed of their wealth. Therefore, that was indeed a colonial problem. The present situation offered the Palestinians no other hope but for the reconquest by arms of their fatherland. It was for that that they were preparing and it was that objective which the Palestine Liberation Organization had set itself. The United Nations could not much longer ignore the real nature of that problem which threatened the equilibrium of the Middle East and therefore represented a permanent danger for world peace. The injustice which had struck the people of Palestine must be remedied and it was in the general interest that all countries which proclaimed themselves in favour of equality of peoples and the free enjoyment of their inalienable rights should associate themselves in that task.

454. In reviewing the problems of colonial domination and the threats they brought to mankind it was impossible to disregard the war which was raging in Viet-Nam and whose gradual escalation and murderous character directly endangered the peace of the world. The motives for aggression in South Viet-Nam could in no way justify the sufferings of a people whose sacrifices were so great that their right to peace and freedom must be recognized. The warlike attitude of the United States extremists could not be equated with the attitude of the United States people who were deeply perturbed by a war imposed on a small country which was resisting heroically that imperialist adventure. Accordingly, he ventured to state that reason must triumph and that reason made it necessary to take account of facts. It was a fact that the people of South Viet-Nam would continue to fight without respite against the foreign intervention which was being imposed on it. It was another fact that the resistance of the people of South Viet-Nam was supported by the National Liberation Front (FNL) which was canalizing its energies and organizing its struggle and which consequently was alone able to speak for the future of that country. Any sincere search for a solution to a conflict which was condemned by all peoples and primarily by the United States people must necessarily consider the FNL as the only valid spokesman and the authentic representative of the South Viet-Nameese people. Any other approach to the problem was necessarily doomed to failure and could only constitute a delaying tactic or a diversionary operation. Algeria expressed that opinion quite calmly because it felt the suffering of the Viet-Nameese people and because it was convinced that the future of mankind was based primarily upon friendship between free and equal peoples.

455. The task of the Special Committee was certainly difficult and vast in scope. Decolonization remained a problem which weighed heavily over the modern world and its multiple and varied aspects concealed the basic consideration that peoples must have the right to enjoy their freedom and live a more worthy life. Colonial domination, the exploitation of man by man, the maintenance of part of mankind in a state of moral and intellectual degradation were a blot upon a world where science was daily achieving miracles which enlarged man's horizon and held out hopes of a promising future for peoples. The anachronistic survival of colonial régimes at a time when man was freeing himself from his earthly ties was becoming more and more an international responsibility, since it was obvious that world peace would always remain precarious so long as peoples continued to be deprived of their elementary rights.

456. Nevertheless, decolonization was not merely a political problem and the struggles for liberation to which it led were only one of its most tangible aspects. It was also and above all a state of mind, a new conception of relations between peoples. It must take hold in the minds and customs of men and replace the antagonisms between races and peoples with a feeling of human solidarity and an awareness of the need for real co-operation between human beings. Decolonization of minds must therefore precede and accompany the liberation of peoples.

457. Without that transformation, without that revolution in the rules of international morality, the work of decolonization would remain incomplete and would not succeed in eliminating all the problems it sought to solve. For, to decolonize a people did not mean only to rescue it from direct domination, which was all the more revolting because it was shameless and open. To decolonize a people was also and above all to free it from any foreign intervention, to allow it to manage its own affairs and to enable it to embark unrestrictedly along the path of progress. It was an undeniable fact, unfortunately proved by many examples, that no colonial Power had ever tried to prepare a colonized people for the exercise of its national responsibilities and that, on the contrary, its whole policy had been aimed at keeping the colony in a backward social and cultural state in order to continue its exploitation indefinitely. The difficulties experienced by the newly liberated peoples were thus the primary responsibility of the colonial Powers who often sought to profit from those difficulties by maintaining their political stranglehold and their economic privileges. The achievement of independence did not mark the end of colonial exploitation but rather caused it to reappear in new forms which were no less to be condemned.

458. Decolonization must therefore be applied equally to that kind of colonial domination which potentially had the same dangers as direct and brutal domination. To be complete, decolonization must maintain the patrimony of formerly colonized peoples and enable them to pursue their development without any foreign pressure.

459. Of course, it was primarily the responsibility of the newly independent countries themselves to take stock of their obligations and to ensure that their sovereignty was respected. By uniting their efforts and pooling their resources they could oppose manifestations of neo-colonialism. But the accession to independence of a colonized country must bring about new relationships with the former colonial Power whose responsibility towards it could not cease merely because the colonial régime was at an end. The establishment of those new relationships, if they were stripped of all vestiges of domination and if they were aimed at building a better future, based on solid and durable friendship, could facilitate the changes that must follow the disappearance of the colonial system and could provide a new and fruitful basis for friendship between peoples. In that way, Algeria without complexes and with an open mind had co-operated with France in a spirit of mutual respect for the essential interests and sovereignty of the two countries. That co-operation, which had developed in spite of difficulties of every kind and which had gradually adapted itself to the realities and aspirations of the two peoples, constituted an enlightening experience not only as regards relationships between a colonized and a colonial Power but also as regards relationships that it had instituted between an under-developed and a developed country. The efforts which were being made by each of the parties to improve that co-operation and triumph over the difficulties that might naturally arise were so many pledges of its success.

460. That experience showed that such co-operation, desirable in itself, became inspiring when friendship and mutual esteem characterized bilateral relations, when the real interests of both partners were judiciously assessed and when there was a common determination to eliminate and transcend all the vestiges of the past in order to consolidate the present and guarantee the future. Such an undertaking was the result of a truly historic view of events because it was inspired by a sincerely shared attachment to the freedom of peoples, to the fruitful relations which could exist between them and to the consolidation of peace and stability in the world. That was one of the most healthy manifestations of decolonization.

461. International opinion had become aware of the importance of the problem of decolonization and it was perfectly legitimate that international organizations had tackled that problem and continued to follow its development. The presence of the Special Committee in Algeria showed the increasing interest that the United Nations was taking in decolonization and the work of liberation movements.

462. While the maintenance of colonial domination was a flagrant and inadmissible violation of the rights of peoples inscribed in the United Nations Charter, that situation also had serious dangers for international equilibrium and for world peace.

463. Undoubtedly, the United Nations had been preoccupied since its establishment with problems of decolonization and with the problem of racial discrimination. At each session of the General Assembly those problems were discussed at length and gave rise to many resolutions. The Security Council had often dealt with those questions and special bodies had been set up to study them. The United Nations was thus clearly determined to help carry decolonization to its completion since colonial domination and racial discrimination were irrevocably condemned by Member States.

464. However, it was unfortunately impossible to assert that the results obtained were commensurate with the good intentions shown. Twenty years after the establishment of the United Nations, vast territories and numerous peoples remained under the colonial yoke. The régime of apartheid continued to be the scourge of South Africa and was now being extended to Southern Rhodesia. It was true that some countries had recovered their independence during that period and had come to take their place in the Organization. Their efforts had always been aimed at the strengthening of United Nations action in the field of decolonization and against régimes of racial segregation. In spite of that new source of strength for the Organization, few, if any, practical results had been achieved.

465. The only conclusion was that the United Nations must revise its basic organization and its methods of work, for in their present state they were responsible for its ineffectiveness and immobility. It was abnormal and inadmissible that a country, however big, should be able to defy the whole of the Organization and ignore its decisions. As it was now conceived, the Organization allowed such an anomaly which prejudiced its authority. The time had come to give the highest international institution a structure which was more in conformity with the modern world and which would enable it to assume its proper responsibility in the maintenance of good relations between all peoples. The newly independent countries must find their proper place and play their full role in it. Also, the powers and responsibilities of the General Assembly should be reviewed so as to establish a better balance between the Assembly and the Security Council. Finally, the Organization would remain imperfect so long as it failed to acquire the necessary universality. It was impossible much longer to keep outside of the United Nations a nation as important as the People's Republic of China whose population amounted to a quarter of mankind. It was also time that countries which might have had doubts about the value and effectiveness of the Organization should find again their legitimate place in it, for the deficiencies and imperfections which he had just pointed out in no way diminished the importance of the role of the United Nations in the maintenance of world peace and the strengthening of co-operation between peoples. The setbacks, the mistakes, the delays must not obscure all that the Organization had done and the dangers that it had been able to avert. Algeria wished to pay a tribute to the United Nations for its perseverance and would continue to support it in the continuation of those efforts. In that tribute it also included the Secretary-General who had been able to direct the activities of the United Nations with competence and authority. It did so with all the more sincerity and warmth because it could not forget the decisive role he had played as Chairman of the Committee of Solidarity with Algeria at the time when it was waging its struggle for national liberation. U Thant would certainly have been one of the men who had done most to give the United Nations a meaning, a vitality and a dynamism which could make it universally respected.

466. Finally, he wished the Committee every success and assured it that the Algerian Government would spare no effort to facilitate the Committee's task and help it in the accomplishment of its mission.

General statements

467. The Chairman expressed gratitude to the President of Algeria for his inspiring message, and to the Foreign Minister of Algeria for the important address which he had delivered on behalf of the President and the Government of Algeria. He requested the Foreign Minister to convey to the President and to the Government and people of Algeria the gratitude of the Special Committee for the honour they had accorded them by inviting the Committee to hold their deliberations in Algiers, the capital of a nation that was second to none in its dedication to the liquidation of colonialism and the attainment of true independence—objectives to which the Committee also was irrevocably committed.

468. The history of Algeria's gallant struggle for independence had been justly acclaimed as a classic and heroic example of the undying quest for freedom by all colonial countries and peoples. It was to the lasting credit of the Government and people of Algeria that in spite of the heavy sacrifices they had made to achieve their independence, they had not, in their moment of triumph, forgotten their brothers in Africa and in the Arab world who were still struggling to attain their legitimate rights and aspirations. The Government and people of Algeria, by deed as well as by example, had kept faith with all the freedom fighters the world over. It was for that reason that the Committee considered it a signal honour to meet in Algiers.

469. The presence of the United Nations in Africa, in the cause of decolonization, was ample evidence of the new emphasis in the work of the United Nations in the 1960s and of the ever growing involvement of the United Nations in the question of decolonization, in accordance with its responsibilities as laid down in the Charter and in response to the challenge of the world, in which, despite the pious pronouncements of many Members of the Organization, the evil cancer of colonialism was still existent.

470. During the course of its meetings in Africa, the Special Committee had held very fruitful discussions in the United Republic of Tanzania, Somalia, Ethiopia and the United Arab Republic. It had examined in detail the colonial situation in various parts of the African continent and the Arab world. In Algeria it would pursue its study of other colonial questions which were still plaguing that continent. The environment of the host country, at once congenial and anti-colonialist, coupled with the inspiration which it had given freedom-loving peoples everywhere, would give impetus to the Committee's deliberations and contribute to the effective and vigorous discharge of its task.

471. On behalf of all the Committee members and the United Nations Secretariat staff, he wished to thank the Government of Algeria for the splendid living and working arrangements which had been so generously made for them. He expressed appreciation of the warm hospitality which in the finest Arab and African traditions had been showered on the Committee and which without a doubt would contribute to the success of their work.

472. The representative of Mali, speaking on behalf of the people and Republic of Mali, the Sudanese Union (RDA) and the Government of Mali, expressed his sincere gratitude, to the fraternal people and Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria, and to the leaders of the National Liberation Front, the progressive party which had led that sister State ever since independence. When a Malian stood on Algerian soil for the first time, he was sincerely moved and proud, because he shared the feelings of the Algerian people about the struggle against colonialism and imperialism. The historical ties which had united the two peoples for several centuries had been made possible by the two-way flow of trade, culture and religion across the Sahara; that desert was not an obstacle but a link.

473. One could not speak of Algeria without evoking that people's glorious struggle to end colonial domination and promote a dynamic policy which met the genuine aspirations of the Algerian people. To be sure, Mali had gained its independence easily because of the courage and tenacity of its people, but also because of the courageous sacrifices of the valiant Algerians. He could not express the emotion he felt on remembering the thousands of Algerians who had died on the field of honour in order that Africa might one day recover its independence and dignity.

474. He was convinced that Africa, once freed of the colonial yoke, would conquer hunger and disease and would at last be able to play its rightful historic role. Unfortunately there were still trouble-spots in Africa, places where man exploited man and where apartheid, that baleful system which was no more than a relic of slavery, flourished. It was the Special Committee's duty to demonstrate the complicity of the great Powers, which, by helping the colonialist régimes, were impeding the implementation of resolution 1514 (VX).

475. His good friend, Mr. Bouteflika, the Foreign Minister of Algeria, had drawn attention at the previous meeting to the seriousness of the situation in Africa. The United Nations was morally obliged to support all national liberation movements, since their struggle was just and in conformity with the Charter. Moreover, everyone knew that Portugal, left to itself, could not continue its hateful war of conquest. He paid tribute to the freedom fighters and assured them of the unconditional support of the people of Mali.

476. Before concluding its meetings in Africa, the Special Committee should adopt a general resolution condemning the retrograde policy of the Salazar, Smith and Verwoerd Governments and the financial monopolies which were supporting them, and submitting firm recommendations to that effect to the General Assembly. It should also fix a deadline for the accession to independence of the Territories under Portuguese domination, in execution of its mandate under resolution 2105 (XX), and recommend the Security Council to make the economic sanctions taken against Portugal mandatory. It should also recommend the Security Council to require the administering Powers to apply United Nations resolutions and suspend the operations of their foreign military bases.

477. He was prepared to take part in any discussions for that purpose and reiterated his delegation's fraternal gratitude to the Government and people of Algeria.

478. The representative of Tunisia thanked Mr. Bouteflika for his inspiring address. He was sure that it would be a valuable source of encouragement to all the delegations and he associated himself with the Chairman's warm thanks to the Government and people of Algeria for their magnificent welcome. With deep emotion he recalled the ancestral ties which had always linked Algeria and Tunisia, in times of distress as in times of joy. It was a special pleasure for the Special Committee to be in Algeria, that sister country whose brave struggle against colonialism would for ever be an example and a symbol for all oppressed peoples. For eight years, the men, women and children of Algeria had suffered in silence and continued their long campaign of resistance under the guidance of the National Liberation Front. From the start, Tunisia had considered that struggle its own for, like

Algeria, it had promised never to deny its support to peoples sincerely inspired by the sacred desire for liberty. The inalienable right to independence was, of course, guaranteed by the United Nations Charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

479. At the neo-Destour Congress held at Sousse in 1959, President Bourguiba had suggested that the administering Powers should hold a conference at which they themselves would decide on arrangements for the liberation of the peoples they administered. That suggestion had not been accepted by the administering Powers but the United Nations had responded to it by adopting resolution 1514 (XV). He was glad of the opportunity to express his delegation's great satisfaction at the way in which the Special Committee had carried out its noble mission.

480. At the current meeting the members of the Special Committee were to take up the question of the Territories under Portuguese domination. In population and total area they represented almost a quarter of the African continent. It was quite natural that that grave problem should be dealt with in Algiers, a city which was an exemplar and in which freedom fighters found both encouragement and an unending source of inspiration.

481. Nothing could ever halt Africa's advance towards progress. The family of independent African countries was daily becoming larger and in the near future the whole of the African continent would be independent.

482. In conclusion, he again thanked the Government and fraternal people of Algeria for their warm welcome.

483. The representative of Iraq expressed his delegation's gratitude to the Government and people of Algeria for the welcome accorded to the Special Committee. Algeria, which had struggled so valiantly against colonialism, to the admiration of the whole world, was a fitting choice for the Committee's deliberations: the sacrifice made by its people to regain their freedom was an example to all those who still suffered under the yoke of foreign domination. Furthermore, Algeria played a leading role in the Organization of African Unity, in the League of Arab States and in the non-aligned world and had spared no efforts in the cause of peace, freedom and human dignity.

484. His delegation was confident that the Special Committee's meetings in Algiers would meet with the same success as in other African capitals. Important resolutions, aimed at the peaceful granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples, had been, and would be, adopted by the Committee. However, when the Committee's counsel passed unheeded by the forces of colonialism, the oppressed peoples, who looked to the Committee for moral support, had no alternative but to fight for their freedom. As a result of colonialism, many critical situations had arisen throughout the world—for example, in the Portuguese colonies, Southern Rhodesia, South Arabia and Oman. Moreover, as the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Algeria had rightly pointed out, there was also the tragedy of Palestine.

485. The co-operation rendered by the Algerian people and Government to the Special Committee during its meetings in Algiers would provide it with added impetus enabling it to justify the faith of millions of human beings in the United Nations.

486. The representative of Poland expressed appreciation to the President, the Government and people of Algeria for their invitation to the Special Committee to hold the final meetings of its African session in Algiers. His delegation had been profoundly moved by the welcome extended to the Committee on its arrival and was grateful for the inspiring message with which the President had honoured the Committee, and for the address which had been delivered by the Foreign Minister. Those messages, and the invitation to the Special Committee to meet in Algiers, were an expression of the importance which Algeria attached to the lofty principles of the United Nations Charter and to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The Committee was privileged to meet in a country which had become a symbol of the peoples' heroic struggle for freedom and independence. As a result of the Committee's visit to Algeria, he was at last able to realize a long-cherished dream and to pay a personal tribute to a courageous people who had fought, and given their lives, for the liberation of their land. The Algerian people's struggle, under the leadership of the National Liberation Front, had been admired throughout the world. The people of Poland had known that theirs was a just cause which had not only aimed at Algeria's liberation but had also paved the way to independence for many other African countries. The Algerian people and their leaders were also to be congratulated upon their remarkable achievements in other fields, for their untiring efforts in the cause of peace and progress and for their outstanding contribution to the eradication of colonialism in Africa and other parts of the world.

487. Conveying his own Government's best wishes to the Algerian people and their Government for the future, he said that his delegation was particularly happy to visit Algeria, with which Poland enjoyed fruitful co-operation.

488. The Special Committee had reached the last stage of its deliberations in Africa, and it was to be hoped that its discussions in Algiers would provide encouragement for the freedom fighters in Angola, Mozambique, Portuguese Guinea and the other Territories to be considered. At that stage, he wished to restate his delegation's stand regarding colonialism, for the benefit of the petitioners who would appear before the Committee. Assuring them of his Government's support for self-determination and independence for all countries still under colonial rule, he said that Poland, by virtue of its historical tradition and social structure, was utterly opposed to any form of national or racial oppression. It viewed the liberation of colonial peoples as an act of historic justice and considered that as long as colonialism existed, there could be no real peace throughout the world. His delegation had always condemned the brutalities committed by colonialists—brutalities which were in direct contradiction of the colonialists' avowed civilizing mission in the Territories concerned. In Southern Rhodesia and South West Africa crimes were being perpetrated against humanity and, as the testimony of the petitioners from Angola and Mozambique had revealed, Portugal was intensifying its war to exterminate the African people. Because it received eco-conomic, military and political aid from certain NATO Powers, Portugal was able to flout United Nations resolutions and those Powers were responsible for the events in the Portuguese Territories in Africa. They had deeply entrenched economic and financial interests there and were determined to arrest national liberation movements. The perpetuation of apartheid and colonial domination guaranteed huge profits, earned with cheap migrant labour, for the United Kingdom, the United States and West Germany. However, their defiant attitude would have to change radically. Poland, which had been the first victim of Nazism and its creed of the master race, considered that colonialism and racism were not only an affront to human dignity but also a threat to world peace. It would not cease to raise its voice, therefore, to support national liberation movements and it would continue to denounce colonialists as the enemies of peace and international co-operation. The time had come for the Special Committee to take action to remove a danger which would not spare any Power, great or small. For that reason, his Government whole-heartedly supported the total eradication of colonialism and racism.

489. The representative of India thanked the President, the people and the Government of Algeria for their hospitality. Algeria was a fitting choice as the venue for the Special Committee's last meeting in Africa, since the lives of over two millions of its people had been lost in its struggle against colonialism. The messages to the Committee of the President of the Revolutionary Council and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Algeria, which had emphasized the urgent nature of the various problems and had drawn attention to the seriousness of the situation in such Territories as Southern Rhodesia and those under Portuguese administration, would make an important contribution to the Special Committee's work.

490. India's struggle against colonialism was well known throughout the world and the names of Gandhi and Nehru would remain for ever enshrined in the hearts of all who cherished freedom. It had always maintained that its own independence would be incomplete while other countries in Asia and Africa remained enslaved since freedom was one and indivisible for all peoples. India therefore joined with all those who fought against the hideous forces of colonialism in Africa.

491. Despite the fact that many of the most powerful countries had at last realized that colonialism could not endure, Portugal still clung to its inhuman domination of certain African Territories. It was living in an age that had since passed by and ruthlessly perpetuated its domination over the African people with the aid of its allies. It was to be deplored that, after hundreds of years of the so-called civilizing Christian mission, barely 3 to 4 per cent of the people in the Portuguese Territories were literate.

492. While the Special Committee could not physically prevent the Portuguese from their ruthless domination in the African Territories, it could speak forth and expose Portugal and its allies for their reprehensible action. His delegation would support all those who endeavoured to expose colonialism. Human dignity and freedom, to have any meaning, had to be one and indivisible for all mankind.

493. Lastly, his delegation extended to the Government and people of Algeria every best wish for their continued well-being and prosperity.

494. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania expressed the gratitude of his delegation to the Government and people of Algeria for their invitation to the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Algiers.

495. The warmth of the welcome extended to the Special Committee, despite the lateness of its arrival, was part of an inseparable tradition among Algerians. It was very touching that the Committee should be holding meetings in Algeria only four years after the country had disengaged itself from the claims of colonialism. Never in the twentieth century had a people paid such a price for freedom. Indeed, that should be a lesson to colonial Powers that the just cause always won. A further lesson was provided by Algeria's progress since independence. The country's attainments showed what could be done in an atmosphere of freedom and independence.

496. It was fitting that the Special Committee should discuss the question of Portuguese Territories in Africa. Portugal was refusing to learn from history, but the freedom fighters of those Territories should draw inspiration from what Algeria had achieved. Tanzania would always be on the side of the forces of freedom; for so long as the cancer of colonialism and apartheid subsisted, there could be no true freedom or lasting peace. The Committee was therefore not only performing a task but also carrying out its duty to eliminate colonialism.

497. He was grateful for the encouraging message from the President of the Revolutionary Council and for the inspiring address by the Foreign Minister. As the Committee's tour drew to a close, his delegation was more than ever convinced of the determination of Africans to uproot colonialism from their continent.

498. The representative of Yugoslavia associated himself with the Chairman's statement thanking the Government and people of Algeria for their warm welcome. His delegation was happy to be in Algeria, whose struggle for independence had been an inspiration to liberation movements elsewhere in Africa. Since the country continued to play an important role in that respect, various African liberation movements had set up their headquarters in Algeria.

499. The inspiring message from the President of the Revolutionary Council and the statement of the Foreign Minister would provide further impetus for the Special Committee's work. Co-operation and friendship between Algeria and Yugoslavia dated from the time of the Algerian struggle for independence and continued on the basis of non-alignment and peace.

500. He concluded by expressing his thanks for the hospitality extended to the Special Committee and the fine facilities and working arrangements provided, and wished the Algerian people all success, prosperity and progress.

501. The representative of Afghanistan associated himself with the Chairman's statement thanking the President of the Revolutionary Council for his inspiring message and the Foreign Minister for his important address and kind words of welcome. His gratitude also went to the Government and people of Algeria for inviting the Special Committee to hold some of its meetings in Algiers.

502. The warm welcome extended to the Special Committee was further testimony of the traditional hospitality of Algerians, in whose country colonialism had encountered one of its greatest setbacks. Having gained its independence, Algeria was playing a leading role in decolonization.

503. Afghanistan and Algeria were bound in common aspirations and spiritual ties. When the heroic efforts and sacrifices of Algeria had led to independence, the joy of Afghanistan had been immense. He expressed his country's heartfelt wishes to the Algerian people for their happiness, prosperity and progress.

504. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics expressed the sincere gratitude of the Soviet Union delegation to the President of the Revolutionary Council, the Government and the people of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria for their invitation and very cordial hospitality. The Special Committee's meetings in Algiers would undoubtedly be a source of inspiration to all those who desired the complete elimination of colonial régimes because the heroic struggle of the Algerian people against foreign oppression would always serve as an example to those who were fighting for their liberty.

505. The Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria was in the forefront of the fight against colonialism and imperialism; the struggle being waged by Algeria, in co-operation with sister States and the Organization of African Unity, for the final destruction of colonialism, deserved the admiration and gratitude of all peace-loving peoples.

506. He was particularly happy to be in Algeria, because the Soviet Union's relationship with that country had always been close. That relationship had begun as soon as the Algerian people had set out to resist oppression. On his arrival the previous day he had felt the effect of that friendship. The Soviet Union and Algeria had a common ideal: the building of socialism and of a new life.

507. The message which the President of the Revolutionary Council had addressed to the members of the Special Committee would be a source of inspiration to them, because it encouraged all those who were fighting for their independence. Mr. Bouteflika's address was also most valuable. He was gratified at the position adopted by the Algerian Government on problems of colonialism and on a number of international problems. He fully shared the views of the Algerian Government about the activities of United States imperialism in Viet-Nam.

508. The Soviet Union delegation would do everything in its power to ensure the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV). In due course it would give a detailed account of its position on the problems of putting an end to Portuguese and Spanish colonialism. For the moment, however, he would confine himself to assuring the peoples of those regions of the sympathy and fellow-feeling of the Soviet Union, which had helped and would in the future continue to help the independent States of Africa and the OAU in their noble struggle against colonialism and imperialism.

509. The colonial Powers would have to be compelled to respect the decisions of the General Assembly and the Security Council. That would be an arduous undertaking because those criminal régimes were being helped by the Western imperialist and colonialist Powers. Imperialism presented a united front. A coalition should be formed against those who wished to impede the irreversible process of the liberation of peoples. Peace-loving peoples too, would have to present a united front to them. The Special Committee should make use of the right conferred on it by the General Assembly at its twentieth session to report on any developments which might threaten international peace and security. It should recommend measures in conformity with Chapter VII of the Charter against Portugal, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. Decisions had to be taken to justify the hopes of the oppressed peoples of Africa. In conclusion, he wished Algeria every success in the course upon which it had embarked.

510. The representative of the Ivory Coast said that he considered it an honour and a pleasant duty for his delegation to associate itself with the very sincere thanks which had been expressed to the Government and people of the Republic of Algeria for their friendly invitation and for the brotherly and warm welcome they had extended to the members of the Special Committee. The invitation to visit Algiers, the last stop on its information tour through Africa, would enable the Committee to make contact, as it had at Dar es Salaam, Mogadiscio, Addis Ababa and Cairo, with freedom fighters who were trying to liberate their territories from colonial domination, apartheid and shameful régimes, such as the rebel régime of Ian Smith. Peace was indivisible and the rights of all peoples were universal. He therefore deplored the fact that, nineteen years after the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, millions of human beings were still being deprived of their inalienable rights. Such a state of affairs created trouble-spots which represented a constant threat to international peace. He appealed once more to the intelligence and common sense of the men and régimes responsible for that anachronistic situation. The period of the exploitation of man by man had passed.

511. The Special Committee was responsible for the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. It had to take into account the international background to which the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Algeria had referred in his address at the previous meeting and to concentrate its efforts on the peoples it had been instructed to assist in gaining their independence. Its visit to Africa should be interpreted as a further sign of the links of solidarity between the United Nations and all African peoples still deprived of their inalienable right to freedom and independence and subjected to racial discrimination.

512. He sincerely thanked the President of the Revolutionary Council and Head of the Algerian Government, whose country had already done so much to help solve the problem of decolonization, for the very wise and understanding message he had addressed to the members of the Committee. He also thanked the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Algeria for his clear and most informative statement. Both those statesmen were well aware of the heavy burden their country had assumed by welcoming to its territory the liberation movements of countries under colonial domination. He also paid a well-deserved tribute to the valiant Algerian people, which had itself fought so hard for its independence and was gratified that an Algerian delegation was participating in the Special Committee's work during its visit to Algiers. The Committee would derive valuable inspiration from the message from the President of the Revolutionary Council and from the words of the Algerian Foreign Minister. He was happy to note that the Algerian people, despite its modest resources, had been able to make useful progress since independence. He wished the Algerian Government and people peace and prosperity.

513. The representative of Venezuela said that the Special Committee could have wished for no better place than Algiers in which to complete its work in Africa. Algeria was a living example of what a people filled with an ardent desire to win its independence and recover its sovereign liberty could do. The heroic struggle it had waged was reminiscent in many ways of that of the peoples of Latin America in general, and of Venezuela, in particular. Like the Venezuelan people, Algeria had not been content with obtaining its independence. Since regaining it, Algeria, as a member of the international community, had been pursuing a policy of capital importance within the United Nations, where it had adopted an attitude of unequivocal opposition to colonialism and of assistance to peoples fighting for their independence in Africa. He was certain that the Algerian people, which had not hesitated to sacrifice the lives of over a million of its sons in order to win its independence, would not consider its struggle ended until the millions of Africans suffering under the colonial yoke had regained, with their independence, their dignity as free peoples. The message which the President of the Revolutionary Council, Head of Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria, had addressed to the Special Committee that very morning was proof of that. In his interesting address, Mr. Abdelaziz Bouteflika, Foreign Minister of Algeria, had taken up the same theme. The Venezuelan delegation associated itself with the Chairman of the Special Committee in thanking them both; their words would be a source of inspiration to all members of the Committee. The people of Venezuela had followed every phase of the heroic struggle of the Algerian people and the Venezuelan delegation had made it its duty to defend that people in all circumstances in its statements and by its votes. He was happy and proud to be able to express, on Algerian soil, his admiration and respect for a people which had not only refused to be intimidated by the oppressor but had waged a relentless struggle to regain its liberty and independence.

514. 'It was no accident that the Special Committee was holding its meetings in Algeria at that time. Its journey through the African continent would have been incomplete if it had not included a visit to that sanctuary of anti-colonialism. Neither was it an accident that the Algerian Government had invited it. The Committee had a duty to see the country which had suffered so much and fought so hard against colonialism. That invitation had enabled it not only to come into contact with colonial reality in Africa but to become acquainted with the noble Algerian people which was, in its eyes, a living symbol of anti-colonialism in modern times.

515. Algeria was now free. It had begun a fresh struggle against ignorance and under-development. He had been struck by the country's youth. The streets were full of children and young people going to school or college. Algeria was making a determined stand against illiteracy in order to combat one of the most notable consequences of colonialism: ignorance. On behalf of his delegation, he thanked the Government and people of Algeria for their cordial invitation and generous hospitality. The work of the Committee could not be concluded in a more propitious atmosphere. He was certain that that work would bear fruit. He hoped that the admirable people of Algeria would find a better future and wished it every success in all its undertakings.

516. The representative of Syria said that the fact that the Special Committee's concluding meetings should be held in Algiers was evidence of Algeria's awareness of the paramount role it was destined to play in support of the cause of emancipation everywhere, and to its determination to lead it to full accomplishment.

517. In the defence of freedom, of the right to self-determination and of emancipation from colonialism, that country had sacrificed a million martyrs and had waged one of the most heroic struggles in human history. In the face of its opposition, the myth of colonial assimilation had crumbled, and from that land, with African solidarity, Asian support, and the co-operation of justice-loving nations, would be directed the coup de grâce against the remaining pockets of colonialism. It was therefore significant that the plight of Angola should form the main topic of the Special Committee's consideration in Algiers.

518. With total self-denial and universal dedication, Algeria had not stopped at its own achievement, but had gone on to play its part in the solution of international problems at large and in support of the cause of liberation. The brilliant statement by its Foreign Minister had clearly depicted the large perspective of its role in international affairs in general, and above all in the struggle against the remnants of colonialism, a flagrant example of which in a new form was thriving to the detriment and misery of the Arab people of Palestine.

519. The great Algerian revolution had not stopped at the eradication of the physical presence of colonialism. It had been a structural revolution aimed at restoring the value of man, developing his resources, placing his welfare at the centre of endeavour, reviving his true culture and enhancing his contribution to civilization, in human relations based on social justice and equality. Last but not least it had been aimed at stimulating the legitimate tendency of progressive forces towards solidarity, and community of interests, aims and aspirations. It had been a genuine revolution against the concept of master and slave, first and second class citizens, privileged and under-privileged. It had thus a most intimate connexion with the purposes of the Special Committee in helping to implement the granting of independence to innocent peoples who had for long suffered under colonial inhumanities, and with the United Nations objectives of international peace and justice.

520. The gallant people of Algeria were to their brother Arabs of Syria a source of inspiration, and the model they had offered was an embodiment of all that was noble for humanity. He expressed his country's sincere gratitude to them, to their Government and to the President of the Revolutionary Council.

521. The representative of Italy associated himself with the thanks expressed by the Chairman, on behalf of the Special Committee, to the President of the Revolutionary Council and to the Foreign Minister of Algeria. His delegation's gratitude went to the Government and people of Algeria for inviting the Committee to hold its final meetings in Algiers. So close were the ties and so short the distance that Italians did not feel themselves to be abroad when in Algeria. He was indeed most happy to be there and hoped that his visit would give him a closer acquaintance with the country's progress since independence.

522. The Special Committee had to reaffirm its pledge to foster the process of decolonization by peaceful means. All should adhere to that principle, both for moral reasons and because it was a prerequisite for international co-operation in accordance with the United Nations Charter. The invitation extended to the Committee was symbolic of Algeria's confidence in the United Nations, for which the Committee was grateful.

523. He expressed his delegation's deep admiration for Algeria's past and present achievements and extended his best wishes for the country's subsequent prosperity and well-being.

524. The representative of Madagascar expressed his delegation's thanks to the Algerian Government for inviting the Special Committee to hold the final part of its session in the wonderful city of Algiers.

525. The task which the Special Committee was performing on Algerian soil was, in his delegation's opinion, of special importance. History had willed that Algeria and Madagascar should have experience of the same master and the same tribulations. The colonial history of Madagascar was bound up with that of the Maghreb countries generally and particularly with that of Algeria; for instance, Mohamed V, Sultan of Morocco, had been exiled to Malagasy territory, and the Queen of Madagascar, Ranaivalona III, had ended her days in exile in Algiers.

526. Like so many other countries, Madagascar desired peace and sought co-operation at all times among the members of the international community, but its Government was convinced that concord among members of that community would be resting on a fragile and precarious foundation as long as any State cherished the ambition to exploit a foreign people, as long as any Government persisted in refusing a subject people the right to self-determination. The accession to independence of a large number of African countries and their awareness of their responsibilities to their brothers who were still oppressed should be a clear warning to those who still clung to the idea of domination and exploitation that they were trying to swim against the tide. The ideals of freedom and independence had gained such strength in Africa that those obstinate Governments would be forced to listen to the voice of reason and accept their defeat.

527. The case of the Algerian people had provided the annals of history with an illustration of the victory of those ideas over arms. An entire nation might be exterminated, but it had never been possible to stifle by force the genuine aspirations of a people, because there would always be others outside its frontiers who shared its ideals. Madagascar had recovered its sovereignty and was aware of its responsibility to peoples still subject to foreign domination. The Malagasy delegation was therefore deeply grateful to the Algerian Government for the generous hospitality it had offered to the Committee of Twenty-four, which would again enable the members of that Committee to meet men still living under the colonial yoke, to gather first-hand information on the situation in colonial territories seeking liberation, to draw practical conclusions from it and to produce better results.

528. The representative of the United States of America thanked the Government and people of Algeria for their hospitality and welcome.

529. She regretted to have to place it on record that her delegation took exception to certain remarks of the Foreign Minister of Algeria and the representative of the Soviet Union, both of whom had seen fit to interject and distort a subject which lay outside the purview of the Special Committee.

530. However, she was extremely happy to be in a country which, since the first settlements of Carthage, the sweep of Islam and the contact of Christianity, had played a prominent role in history. It was a pleasure for her to recall that Algeria and the United States had always maintained diplomatic or consular relations. Her delegation was gratified to see the emergence of a new Algeria confidently facing the future, and wished it every success in its difficult task.

531. The representative of Ethiopia joined in thanking the Government and people of Algeria for the hospitality and warm welcome extended to the Special Committee. The heroic struggle of the Algerian people against colonialism and imperialism would always remain a landmark in the annals of the Continent, and serve as an example and an inspiration to all those struggling to win freedom and independence.

532. The Special Committee's presence in the brave city of Algiers, whose very name had become synonymous with anti-colonialism, was of great significance. The question of the Territories under Portuguese domination had appropriately been reserved for discussion in that heroic place where the militant atmosphere and revolutionary enthusiasm would undoubtedly provide a suitable setting for consideration of such a burning question. The sacrifices of the people of Algeria in defence of freedom and independence would strengthen the determination of those now engaged in a life and death struggle against Portuguese oppression. They would continue the struggle to the bitter end, knowing that their efforts would be crowned with success and that their sacrifices would not be in vain. The trail of heroism and sacrifice blazed by Algeria had left its indelible mark on the struggling masses of Angola, Mozambique, Portuguese Guinea and other lands. The Committee was grateful to the Government and people of Algeria for having invited it, and for having made it possible for world attention to be focused on such a crucial issue.

533. So far as Ethiopia was concerned, the complete eradication of colonialism and imperialism from the earth was a commitment and a national objective. The fossilized attitude of Portugal in obstinately clinging to its colonies in Africa was not only an affront to world public opinion, but a shame to modern civilization. Ethiopia would not rest until that shame had been obliterated.

534. After a rule lasting for several centuries, the Portuguese colonialists had nothing to show in their favour. Forced labour, torture and oppression were the hallmarks of their civilizing mission in Africa. The inhabitants of Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea were left with no alternative but to resort to arms to regain their right to decent human existence. They had the full moral and material support of progressive humanity for their struggle, long and bitter though it might be. As the struggle intensified in the days to come, Portuguese obduracy was bound to collapse under its own weight of cruelty and oppression.

535. His delegation wished to thank the President and the Foreign Minister of Algeria very sincerely for their inspiring messages, and assured the Algerian people that in their efforts for advancing the great cause of freedom and independence they had in Ethiopia a strong and faithful ally, whose aims and objectives were identical. He also assured all the freedom fighters present that Ethiopia, together with all progressive mankind, would leave no stone unturned in seeing that the struggle for justice and democracy was finally crowned with success.

536. The representative of Chile expressed the Chilean delegation's very sincere gratitude to the Government of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria for the invitation it had extended to the Special Committee. Like the beauty of the Algerian landscape, the history of the Algerian people's bravery was a source of inspiration to all nations which loved peace and desired the victory of equality and justice throughout the world.

537. Algeria had provided the finest example of total elimination of colonialism. The whole world had followed, minute by minute, the fight waged by its people to emerge from the phase of oppression to that of free exercise of its rights. The Chilean people had always defended that cause. It had unremittingly opposed the colonial system. It had remained aware at all times of its obligations to the rest of the world. It had contributed in every way possible to the liberation of peoples and territories under colonial domination, in order to enable them to exercise as early as possible their basic right to self-determination and to decide their own future.

538. Chile had always greatly admired the Algerian nation and had always supported the liberation movement, through which, at the cost of so much suffering and bloodshed, it had achieved the independence of its territory and its people. It had felt the proclamation of Algeria's independence to be a personal triumph. Its relations with Algeria had always been close and cordial, as it had proved by concluding bilateral agreements with that country and acting in complete harmony with it in the community of nations.

539. The Chilean delegation had listened with great interest to the message from the President of the Revolutionary Council and to the excellent address that morning by the Foreign Minister of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria. It warmly congratulated both those distinguished figures on their brilliant exposition of their Government's point of view on the situation in Territories still under colonial domination.

540. Algeria, like the other States of the world community, well knew Chile's attitude to that type of domination. As a member of the Special Committee, Chile had been able to make an effective contribution to the fight being waged against colonialism in order to secure for men who were still aliens on their own territory the full exercise of their rights. If all States acted in the same way and applied the basic principles of the United Nations Charter, the problem could be solved and a long obsolete system defeated.

541. In conclusion, he reiterated his delegation's thanks to the Algerian Government and people for their cordial hospitality and the fraternal welcome they had extended to the members of the Committee of Twenty-Four.

542. The representative of Iran expressed his delegation's sincere thanks to the President of the Revolutionary Council, the Government and the people of Algeria for their kind invitation to the Special Committee to hold its concluding meetings in Algiers. Although it had come to the final stage of its journey, its task still remained to be accomplished. In the course of its meetings in Africa it had been greatly encouraged by the faith which people everywhere had placed in its work; among the heroic people of Algeria it would draw strength and reinforce its determination to liquidate imperialism.

543. It was through valour, unflagging determination and strength of character that the Algerian people had secured their great success against colonialism. Theirs had been the sweat, blood and toil, while the Special Committee's role was one of persuasion. It could, however, be safely said that in spite of the great odds the Special Committee had to face, it would succeed in the cause of freedom and independence if it always kept in mind the heroic example of Algeria. That country's championship of freedom and justice had not stopped at its own independence, but it had been a torch-bearer to all colonial peoples and had spared no effort to fight for the total liquidation of imperialism everywhere. Its independence had marked the beginning of a new era, from the first day of which its Government had embarked upon a bold policy for the betterment of the life of its people. Its efforts in the fields of education, the fight against illiteracy, industrialization and the mechanization of agriculture had been crowned with success, and would open up the possibility of a richer life for all. He paid homage to the Algerian martyrs, whose sacrifice had not been in vain. They had given their lives so that their brothers and sisters could live in freedom and justice.

544. The Special Committee would derive great benefit from the wise and inspiring words of the President of the Revolutionary Council and the Foreign Minister of Algeria. He expressed the thanks of his country, which had from time immemorial been linked to Algeria by spiritual and cultural ties, for the warm hospitality that had been extended, and its best wishes for the success and prosperity of the Algerian people.

545. The representative of Sierra Leone thanked the Foreign Minister of Algeria for his stimulating words on the Special Committee's responsibilities in regard to colonialism, and assured him that his delegation would do all in its power to contribute towards the quest for a just and speedy solution.

546. The questions of Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and the Territories under Portuguese domination had been described as chronic cases of colonialism. The armed struggle in those Territories called to mind the struggle that had been waged by the heroic people of Algeria for so long, and he was convinced that it too would be successful. The Special Committee was fortunate to be in Algiers for its discussion on those Territories, which would bring new hope to the freedom fighters. Its deliberations and recommendations would rekindle the fire of independence that the colonial Powers had tried to smother.

547. The bondage of colonialism left behind it low economic standards which were a form of oppression that left a lasting wound. Algeria's example, however, would give strength to its kith and kin still awaiting liberation.

548. The Special Committee had received a warm welcome from the people of Algeria. He was convinced that its stay would be an enjoyable one, and that his country and Algeria would go from strength to strength in their quest for peace, justice and freedom in all parts of the world. His delegation was grateful to the President of the Revolutionary Council and the Government and people of Algeria for their gracious invitation and generous hospitality, and to the President and Foreign Minister for their thought-provoking statements. The Committee would leave no stone unturned in its task of fighting all forms of colonialism.

549. The representative of Bulgaria expressed his delegation's sincere thanks to Mr. Houari Boumedienne, President of the Revolutionary Council and Head of Government, the other members of the Government and the people of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria for the warm welcome they had extended to the Special Committee.

550. At that final stage of its discussions, the Committee was in a position to appreciate the true worth of Algeria's generous hospitality. Its work had not been fruitless and its results, good as they were, would be even better, thanks to the welcome it had received.

551. The Bulgarian delegation welcomed the presence at the meeting of the Algerian delegation. The members of the Committee, who had a special role to play in the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, would appreciate the real value of that delegation's co-operation. The active participation in the Committee's work of a country which was in the forefront of the fight against imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism was bound to give fresh impetus to the Committee's decolonization activities. The moving message from President Boumedienne and the excellent address by Mr. Bouteflika, Foreign Minister of Algeria, contained ideas and suggestions which would increase the effectiveness of the Committee's work and be a source of inspiration to all. The Bulgarian delegation associated itself with the Algerian Foreign Minister's moving expression of solidarity and sympathy with the people of South Viet-Nam. The Bulgarian delegation had always ardently desired to be on close terms with the revolutionary people of Algeria, which had been able to break its colonial shackles by its own efforts and had written in blood, at the cost of the lives of almost 2 million of its children, one of the most glorious pages in the history of the armed struggle against imperialism, colonialism and the oppression of man by man. He was profoundly moved at being on Algerian soil for the first time. The Committee's presence in the beautiful city of Algiers, the pearl of the Mediterranean, was deeply significant. He was sure that the Committee would be able to fulfil its task, that it would not disappoint the brave Algerian people which was so generously giving it hospitality, that it would be inspired by Algeria's victorious struggle against colonialism and would spare no effort to help, with the support of the United Nations, in the liberation of colonized peoples.

552. In pursuance of its anti-imperialist policy, characteristic of a socialist State, the People's Republic of Bulgaria unreservedly supported the fight against colonialism and national liberation movements in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, South Africa, Mozambique, Angola, so-called Portuguese Guinea, Aden, Oman and elsewhere, in the same way as it had sided unconditionally with the Algerian people when it was carrying out its heroic fight for liberation. In that city, imbued as it was with a revolutionary and anti-colonialist spirit, the Bulgarian delegation wished to reaffirm the solidarity of the Bulgarian people with peoples still suffering under the colonial yoke. It asked the President to convey to the valiant Algerian people and to his Government the best wishes of the Bulgarian people for success in their task of building a new society founded on freedom and justice. It wished the people of Algeria, to which the Bulgarian people was linked by bonds of friendship and co-operation, further success in consolidating the power of the people and building a popular and democratic Algeria.

553. The representative of Denmark sincerely thanked the Government of the Algerian Republic for inviting the Special Committee to hold meetings in Algiers. He had been deeply impressed by the cordiality of the Algerians' welcome and by the traditional hospitality of the country and the people. It was quite natural that the Special Committee should meet in the capital of a country whose fight for independence was an example to other countries under colonial domination. The Danish delegation was convinced that the work of the Committee would be inspired by the spirit of freedom which had been the mainspring of that fight. The same spirit was evident in the message addressed by President Boumedienne to the Committee and in the statement on the colonial problem made by Mr. Abdelaziz Bouteflika, Algerian Foreign Minister. The Danish delegation had been most gratified to note the confidence which Algeria placed in the United Nations, since that Organization could and should play a very important part in the process of decolonization. It had been very happy to note Mr. Bouteflika's statement on the friendly relations which had developed since the liberation between Algeria and France and which proved that the relationship between the dominator and the dominated could be replaced by a more fruitful one based on the principles of sovereignty and equality.

554. The Danish delegation was gratified that its Government maintained excellent relations with the Government of the Algerian Republic. It wished to convey to the President of the Revolutionary Council, and to the Government and people of Algeria the best wishes of the Danish Government and people for their happiness and for progress in the course they had chosen.

555. The representative of Australia said that in coming to Algeria his delegation was very conscious of being among people who had suffered greatly, dared greatly and were achieving greatly. It was an honour to be among them, and it had been a particular pleasure to be greeted in their own country by former friends and colleagues of the Algerian Mission to the United Nations in New York. Their offices and his were adjacent, and apart from being good neighbours they had become firm friends.

556. His delegation offered its deepest respects to the President of the Revolutionary Council, and thanked him and the people of Algeria most sincerely for their hospitality. It would faithfully convey to its Government the message with which the President had honoured the Special Committee, together with that of the Foreign Minister.

557. On the last stage of its journey through Africa, the Special Committee had become more deeply conscious than ever of the importance of the people, who were the object of all its efforts. Their rights and their hopes could in the ultimate be realized and their fears overcome only by the common efforts and common understanding of humanity. For free people everywhere, the price of liberty was eternal vigilance to protect their rights and to recognize the changing and sinister forms of aggression against them, so that every man could remain or become the free man he would wish to be.

558. He expressed his delegation's warmest good wishes to the leader and people of that free country for the future that they had bought so dearly.

559. The representative of Algeria said he knew that it was not customary for an observer to take part in the discussion but he wished to say a few words in reply to the friendly remarks made by all the delegations about his country. If, as he would have wished, the whole Algerian people had been able to hear the words of friendship, admiration, confidence and gratitude which had been addressed to his country, it would have found them to be the finest tribute paid to its courage and its heroic sacrifice, and would have discovered that all the members of the Committee were aware of the grandeur and repercussions of its struggle.

560. The statements by members of the Committee were too numerous to allow him to reply individually. The Algerian delegation would therefore thank the members of the Committee collectively, on behalf of the Revolutionary Council, the Government and the whole Algerian people, for their friendly remarks and the unanimous good wishes they had expressed.

561. At the end of a difficult struggle, Algeria was trying to rebuild all its ruins, the inevitable consequences of its desperate fight for liberty, in order to build a strong sovereign State, worthy of its thousand-year past and therefore capable of playing its full part within the community of nations. There was no incompatibility at all between that ambition and the principles by which the Committee was guided. True to the description "Algiers, sanctuary of anti-colonialism", which one of the speakers had used, Algeria was determined to oppose the after-effects of colonialism wherever they were still to be found.

562. The Algerian Government therefore had a binding duty to co-operate as effectively as possible with all forms of anti-colonial struggle, by giving direct and indirect help to liberation movements in their bitter fight. The logical consequence of that attitude was the invitation which had been extended to the Special Committee to hold part of its session in Algeria. He was very pleased that an opportunity was thus being provided to all his brothers-in-arms present in Algiers to obtain a hearing from the Committee, which would in that way be fully informed of the conditions under which they were fighting. He was also gratified to be able to welcome the members of the Committee to a country whose tradition of hospitality had so often been praised and to make available to it all the necessary working facilities and all the tourist resources of his young motherland. He again thanked the members of the Committee for the warm friendliness they had demonstrated towards Algeria.

General statements

563. The representative of Czechoslovakia said that he had enjoyed the opportunity to attend the Special Committee's session in Africa, if only as an observer. The Committee had accomplished much and had adopted a number of effective resolutions on the Territories it had considered. His Government would pay due attention to those resolutions and would support the Committee's recommendations during the deliberations at the General Assembly. It would, moreover, do its utmost for the cause of freedom and independence of colonial countries and peoples.

564. Certain delegations had expressed concern at the outset that the participation of observers in the Committee's discussions might delay its work. The majority of members would, however, agree with him that that had not proved to be the case and that any obstacles which had hampered the smooth running of the Committee's proceedings came from an entirely different source.

565. Lastly, he extended thanks to the Committee for allowing him to attend its session as an observer and to those Governments which had invited the Committee to meet in their capitals. He wished the Committee every success in its future work for the freedom and independence of colonial countries and peoples.

566. The representative of the Secretary-General expressed gratitude, on behalf of the Secretariat and in his own name, to the Algerian Government and people for their hospitality and for all the facilities they had made available and asked the Algerian delegation to convey his thanks to all concerned. The Secretary-General had also asked him to express deep appreciation to the Algerian Minister for Foreign Affairs for the kind words in his opening address to the Committee.

567. He also wished to record the gratitude of all members of the Secretariat for the many personal kindnesses extended to them by the Chairman, Vice-Chairman, Rapporteur and members of the Committee.

568. The Chairman, speaking on behalf of the Special Committee, expressed gratitude to the President and the Government of Algeria for enabling the Committee to hold its final meetings in Algiers, and to the Government and people for their warm welcome and hospitality. The facilities provided for the Committee's meetings had been particularly appreciated.

569. The Committee had been most happy to visit Algeria because of the opportunity to strengthen contacts, friendships and links with the brave Algerian people. Their struggle had indeed been a source of inspiration to the Committee and lent impetus to its work. Algeria had won a bitter, long drawn-out struggle for independence with but limited assistance from the United Nations, owing to the unfavourable balance of forces in its political organs. However, the very success of the struggle had given impetus to a process which had somewhat redressed that balance and led to the establishment of the Special Committee. The Committee had also been able to appreciate Algeria's whole-hearted dedication to the cause of the emancipation of all colonial countries and peoples, as attested by its position in the vanguard of countries extending, at great sacrifice, generous material and moral assistance to national liberation movements. It had also sensed the country's attachment to the cause of true freedom, the purging of all traces of colonialism from its system, and its progress in the consolidation of its hard-won independence.

570. The resolution on Equatorial Guinea (A/AC.109/186) adopted by the Committee in Algiers expressed gratification at the Spanish invitation, which was both a welcome indication of willingness to co-operate with the Committee and an example worthy of emulation by other colonial Powers. However, it should be stressed that those sentiments were based on the expectation that the invitation would lead to the complete and rapid implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). Only then would the Spanish gesture and the Committee's subsequent action deserve to be regarded as a constructive contribution. With regard to the resolution on Territories under Portuguese administration (A/AC.109/187), the Committee had heard several petitioners whose testimony amounted to a massive indictment of the Portuguese Government's violation of human rights. Members had been horrified and overwhelmed by the irrefutable evidence of the Portuguese atrocities committed against children and old people, in particular. However, the Committee had been heartened by news of the unrelenting struggle being waged by the nationalists in order to free themselves from the yoke of the oppressors, and had gained direct knowledge of their aspirations, needs and difficulties. On the basis of that evidence, the Committee had adopted an important and far-reaching resolution, which contained a number of new elements: concern at the further aggravation of the already critical situation by the racist minority rebellion in Southern Rhodesia; condemnation of the violation of the economic and political rights of the indigenous people by the settlement of foreign immigrants and the transfer of African labour to South Africa; condemnation of the activities of financial concerns in the Territories exploiting the human and material resources and impeding progress towards independence and freedom; an appeal to all States to prevent their nationals from co-operating with the Portuguese authorities, especially in the matter of foreign investment; and a firm recommendation to the Security Council to make the implementation of General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX) mandatory on all Member States.

571. The decision to undertake another African visit had been more than justified by the results achieved. The concern and active solidarity of the United Nations with colonial peoples generally had been further emphasized. Direct contact with peoples under colonial rule had put the Special Committee in a better position to understand and assist them in their legitimate struggle for freedom and independence. Petitioners had found it easier to appear before the Committee in order both to provide confirmation of the iniquitous nature of the colonial system, and to offer fresh ideas and suggestions—thereby adding to the capacity of the Committee to contribute to the rapid liquidation of colonialism. That was illustrated by the resolution adopted that morning concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) (A/AC.109/188).

572. In that connexion, particular attention should be drawn to the recommendation to the Security Council to make the measures provided for under Chapter VII of the Charter against Portugal, South Africa and the minority régime in Southern Rhodesia, mandatory on all Member States. That was a worthy response to the request made by the General Assembly to the Committee in its resolution 2105 (XX) to make such suggestions as might assist the Council in its consideration of appropriate measures to counteract threats to international peace and security arising from developments in colonial Territories.

573. In addition to reiterating the legitimacy of the struggle of colonial peoples to exercise their right to self-determination and independence, the Committee had gone further than in previous resolutions by inviting all States to provide material and moral assistance to liberation movements in colonial Territories.

574. Another noteworthy development in the thinking of the Committee was its implied condemnation of military bases in colonial Territories and its request to colonial Powers to dismantle such bases and refrain from establishing new ones in their colonies.

575. Furthermore, the resolutions adopted by the Committee during its visit to Africa showed a renewed emphasis of the importance of economic factors in the implementation of the Declaration. Experience had shown that those factors, in the form of financial and economic interests operating in collusion with the colonial Powers, all too often obstructed progress towards the application of the Declaration.

576. The Committee's deliberations had also clearly demonstrated the need to ensure that independence was based on the freely expressed wishes of the people.

577. He expressed his deep appreciation to the Organization of African Unity and to the League of Arab States for their effective collaboration in the Committee's work and hoped that those links would be strengthened. He also extended the Committee's thanks to all host Governments for their warm welcome and kind co-operation.

578. The representative of Ethiopia said that throughout its visit to Africa the Special Committee had sensed the depth of African feeling and the desire to rid the continent of colonialism. The five capitals in which the Committee had held meetings represented a cross-section of Africa. The visit had therefore been very useful, in that it had afforded close contact and had strengthened the confidence of Africans in the Committee and in the United Nations as a whole. That had been attested by the warm and spontaneous welcome extended to the Committee.

579. The speeches delivered and resolutions adopted had given encouragement to all African freedom fighters. The Committee was of course only a moral force, and no panacea; but because of its tenacity of purpose it had gained stature in the eyes of the world.

580. The road to decolonization was long, but the right course had been engaged. Because of the noble, though necessarily modest, efforts of the Committee, colonialism was being driven to bay and would be vanquished if the pressure continued.

581. He wished to associate his delegation with the thanks expressed by the Chairman, on behalf of the Committee, to the President, Government and people of Algeria for their fraternal welcome. The great work of national reconstruction and development under way in Algeria was evidence of what a people could accomplish when master of its own destiny. He concluded by extending the best wishes of his Government for all further success on the road of progress, democracy and social justice.

Statement by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria

582. The Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria said that he was addressing the members of the Special Committee in order to tell them, on behalf of President Boumedienne, the Revolutionary Council, the National Liberation Front and the Algerian Government, how much they had all appreciated the goodwill that the members of the Committee had, with one accord, expressed towards Algeria, which had suffered so much during its long and murderous war of liberation. It was particularly encouraging to see that the enormous sacrifices made by the Algerian people on the altar of liberty not only had enabled Algeria to achieve independence but could also be a source of encouragement to the enslaved peoples who were still struggling against colonial domination. He offered his heartiest congratulations to the Committee, which had been unsparing in its efforts to accomplish the lofty mission entrusted to it and which, after fruitful discussion, had achieved such encouraging and positive results.

583. As the Chairman had pointed out, the presence in Africa of the Special Committee, dedicated as it was to the cause of decolonization, revealed the change of heart that had taken place at the United Nations. Indeed, the adoption of the historic Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples marked a decisive stage in the evolution of the United Nations. It was possible to assess the progress achieved and the distance travelled by recalling that not until 1961 had the Special Committee replaced the defunct and ridiculous Committee on Information, whose terms of reference had covered all the problems of the Non-Self-Governing Territories with the exception of the immediate, basic and essential problem of their political situation and their achievement of independence. It was therefore a source of great satisfaction to Algeria, which had struggled for so many years before it had been able to make the long-stifled voice of its revolution heard in various international bodies, that the Special Committee had been able to visit Africa in order to hear representatives of the liberation movements, to obtain first-hand information about the situation in the dependent territories and to establish closer contact with the realities of colonialism.

584. While, however, it thus gave credit to the United Nations for the great progress it had brought about in international opinion in the quest for a solution to the degrading problem of colonialism, Algeria could not fail to note with indignation and deep concern that resolution 1514 (XV) on the granting of independence had remained a dead letter, like so many other resolutions, as was clear from all the petitions which the Committee had heard. The colonial Powers, which were responsible for the future of the peoples placed under their administration, were refusing to co-operate with the Special Committee, defying the United Nations with impunity and displaying utter contempt for international opinion. He could not but deplore once again the negative attitude of the United Kingdom, which had absented itself from the meetings of the Committee but was present at Salisbury, where it was compromising itself with Ian Smith instead of responding to the appeal of the United Nations and committing itself honestly to a policy of decolonization.

585. That was why Algeria felt that the time for resolutions of which nothing ever came had passed and that immediate and effective measures should be put into effect to abolish colonialism and the exploitation of man by man. The time had come to transfer full powers to the dependent peoples in order to enable them to choose their political status freely, to organize the development of their countries and to pursue their progress in every field, in conformity with the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Meanwhile Algeria, faithful to its revolution and to its martyrs who had fallen on the battlefield of freedom, would continue to furnish unstinted material and moral support to all liberation movements in the just and legitimate struggle which colonialism was forcing them to wage for the recovery of their dignity and of their inalienable right to self-determination. Algeria knew by experience that it was idle to hope that Lisbon, Pretoria or Salisbury would allow independence to be achieved by peaceful means.

586. Turning more specifically to the question of the Territories under Portuguese domination, which the Committee had just been studying at Algiers, he would like to compliment the Committee on the calm and serious atmosphere that had prevailed at its meetings and on the unflagging attention which it had given to the petitioners. The resolutions that the Committee had adopted in the light of the information which it had patiently amassed meant that there were still grounds for hoping that the United Nations, thus brought face to face with its responsibilities, would do its duty. By taking the important step of recommending to the Security Council that it should be made obligatory for all States to implement the measures provided for in General Assembly resolution 2107 (XX), the Committee had put its finger upon one of the provisions that was most likely to bring Portugal to its senses if that provision was adopted and consistently followed. Those results responded to the hopes which the liberation movements and the African peoples had reposed in the Committee. They did honour to the United Nations and added lustre to its reputation. The work of the Committee, after its African tour, was really only just beginning. It must be carried on tirelessly within the United Nations, in order to bring all States to a healthier appreciation of the realities of colonialism. Algeria's devotion to the universal principles of the United Nations, the enthusiasm with which it would support any measures calculated to strengthen the Organization, the faith and optimism which it felt with regard to the future of mankind, and, lastly, its passionate thirst for justice and freedom—all those factors showed how closely the aims of the Committee coincided with those of the country which had the honour to be its host.

587. On behalf of the Revolutionary Council and the Algerian Government, he congratulated the Committee most warmly on the hard work it had done both at Algiers and elsewhere, in other capitals of the African continent. That work had brought the Committee's arduous but inspiring task considerably nearer to fulfilment. That the result of the Committee's efforts was encouraging, to say the least, was undoubtedly due to a spirit of healthy rivalry, to the existence of such a widespread and concerted will to hasten the process of decolonization, and to the invaluable, indeed indispensable, assistance of valiant freedom fighters, full of forceful ideas, imbued with hope and faith, and determined to conquer and radically to transform the future of their peoples, whose subjugation ran counter to the spirit of the age. The Committee had proved, if proof were needed, that the vast majority of its States members, and particularly, in spite of their inevitable growing pains, those that had emerged in recent years, respected the struggle of the peoples who were still oppressed and encouraged their actions, thus putting into practice in the best possible way the principles which most clearly embodied the spirit of the United Nations. The Committee's reaffirmation and renewed demonstration of active solidarity undoubtedly marked a decisive step on the path towards decolonization and the consolidation of the independence of the young States. Algeria, which owed the progress and ultimate victory of its cause to the support it had received from so many quarters during its war of liberation, was today able to appreciate the true value of the Committee's work. Support for liberation movements all over the world was a sacred ethical principle by which the Algerian people and its Government were constantly guided. Algeria gave unconditional support to the peoples of Angola, Mozambique, Guinea (Bissau), Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, South Africa, Palestine, Oman, Aden and all Territories still under colonial rule in their heroic struggle to shake off the colonial yoke and to regain freedom. Algeria would continue its unstinted support until the day when those peoples were able to resume their rightful place among the family of independent States of the Third World and in the community of nations.

588. Apart from the action undertaken for the assistance of the countries under colonial domination, the Committee's solidarity reflected the efforts made by the recently constituted States to establish their independence on increasingly healthy foundations. Indeed, national independence only became genuine and acquired true meaning as a country gradually shaped and built up its own economic and social framework. Because of circumstances as complex as they were outdated—an inevitable consequence of struggles for influence between exclusively foreign interests—attempts were often made to oppose that type of consolidation.

589. The adoption of the resolution on the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, a resolution which recognized the legitimacy of the struggle—in all its forms, particularly the most effective ones—of the peoples under colonial rule and which invited all States to provide material and moral assistance to the national liberation movements in colonial Territories, constituted a welcome change in the methods of the United Nations. It had been inevitable, in view of the blind obstinacy of certain colonial Powers. The recognition of the legitimacy of the struggle of the peoples under colonial rule put an end to the age in which the efforts of those peoples—oppressed, humiliated and deprived of all their rights, even that of living in freedom—to regain their independence were regarded by colonialists and their natural allies as a violation of established laws. That the dignity of the struggle had today been stressed by one of the principal organs of the General Assembly was a source of considerable encouragement to all national liberation movements. Moreover, the Special Committee's appeal to all States to provide moral and material assistance to the oppressed peoples reduced the scope of all the tendentious and improper interpretations which the colonial Powers applied to the principle of non-interference in the domestic affairs of a State. By providing the sorely needed assistance for which they had been asked, countries that cared for justice, freedom and the preservation of world peace would be able to give effective support to the oppressed peoples in what had now become a world-wide struggle for the abolition of colonialism, which constituted an ever increasing threat to international security. Such a course would also preclude attempts at the use of force by certain States that dreamed of keeping their colonies for ever and by others that longed to recover their lost empires.

590. On behalf of his Government, he congratulated the Committee on having requested the specialized agencies of the United Nations and other relief organizations to increase, in co-operation with the liberation movements of all the Territories under colonial domination, their assistance to the refugees of those Territories. The petitioners who had appeared before the Committee had pointed out the social aspect of the sacred struggle they were waging against foreign occupation, a struggle of the first importance for all leaders of liberation movements throughout the world. The petitioners were aware that the future of their country after independence would depend essentially on the strength of its people and on the fresh sources of energy that would be released. By requesting the specialized agencies to increase their assistance to oppressed peoples and to do so in co-operation with the representatives of those peoples, the Committee was giving due recognition to the men who today were shaping the destiny of their country. The Algerian Government fully supported that decision.

591. Other decisions of equal importance had been taken by the Committee while it had been at Algiers. They marked the firm resolve of the member States to achieve rapid decolonization of the occupied territories. That laudable intention would achieve results equal to the hopes it inspired if it was backed up by the sincere co-operation of the Powers still administering the Territories. By inviting a delegation of the Special Committee to visit Equatorial Guinea, the Spanish Government had adopted a helpful initial attitude. That attitude would not really bear fruit until Equatorial Guinea became a free, independent and sovereign State, as was bound to happen.

592. The positions of other colonial Powers, however, had undergone no change. Portugal, among others, was persisting in its refusal to co-operate with the United Nations. That intransigence was due far more to the assistance given to Portugal by certain Western Powers than to the resources of its own which the Lisbon Government thought it possessed. It was clear that in helping the Portuguese armed forces to resist the legitimate claims of the oppressed peoples those Western States were seeking to safeguard economic and strategic interests of the first importance. And when the last bastions of colonialism had been conquered, those same Powers would want to replace that collusion by indirect action designed to prolong indefinitely the exploitation of the peoples of those Territories by hindering the consolidation of their newly won independence. That new form of colonialism was a potential source of real dangers, the existence of which it would be idle to deny; hence the work of decolonization, if it was not to remain incomplete, would have to be extended to neo-colonial situations. It was the direct responsibility of the Committee to carry out in full the task which had been entrusted to it. If complete and total independence was to be achieved, that aspect of the problem should not go unanalysed. If it did, decolonization would lose much of its meaning in the eyes of the peoples.

593. That danger loomed even larger when, as in the case of certain colonial Territories already on the road to independence, the administering Power was seen to be installing indigenous elements who represented the economic, and often also the political, interests of the colonialists themselves. That could only result in further exploitation of the peoples of those territories within the framework of the granting of independence. The Special Committee should not think that, once independence had thus been granted, its work was over. It would be useful if commissions representing the United Nations could visit territories about to become independent in order that their peoples might be free to choose genuine leaders under United Nations supervision. The idea of granting independence must be conceived in flexible terms allowing full play to the legitimate aspirations of the peoples concerned. Any restriction would limit the extent of that natural right and run counter to the aims both of the peoples themselves and of the United Nations.

594. In conclusion, he once again conveyed to the Committee the congratulations of the Algerian Government and people on the conclusive results which the Committee had achieved in Africa and wished it every success in the fulfilment of its task. He also thanked all the representatives who had spoken so warmly and kindly about Algeria and the Algerian people and assured them of the deep and sincere feelings of friendship and esteem which Algeria entertained towards all the peoples whom they represented. He asked the indulgence of members of the Committee for the inevitable defects in the organization of the Conference. Whatever efforts were made, they would never fully succeed in expressing the welcome of the Algerian people, who strove to be among the worthiest heirs to the splendid traditions of Arab-African hospitality. What really mattered was that each member of the Committee should have felt himself thoroughly at home during his brief stay and should now enjoy the pleasures of a well-earned rest.

F. ACTION ARISING FROM THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE'S VISIT TO AFRICA

Adoption of resolution concerning the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to colonial Territories considered by the Special Committee during its meetings in Africa (1966)

595. At the 454th meeting of the Special Committee on 21 June 1966, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania introduced a draft resolution co-sponsored by Afghanistan, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, the United Republic of Tanzania and Yugoslavia (A/AC.109/L.315). In view of the interrelation of the colonial problems with which the Committee had dealt, the co-sponsors thought it advisable to supplement and summarize the various relevant resolutions in a general resolution.

596. The Chairman noted the following important aspects of the draft resolution: in the fifth preambular paragraph, the expression of the Special Committee's regret had been prompted by its awareness of the United Kingdom's obligation to attend the meetings in Africa, not only as a member of the Special Committee but also as an administering Power. In the sixth preambular paragraph it had been necessary to point out the negative attitude of certain colonial Powers, to which one petitioner after another had testified. Operative paragraph 3 had been a response to Portugal's and South Africa's and Southern Rhodesia's defiance of world opinion and of the international Organization's recommendations. It was based upon the position that had always been taken by the Special Committee and by the African group in the Security Council. Operative paragraph 4 reflected the Committee's concern about the foreign financial interests that not only collaborated with the administering Powers but also provided funds enabling them to continue their wars of oppression. Operative paragraph 5 reflected past statements, but also contained a slight departure from previous resolutions, in its request for material assistance for the national liberation movements. After seeing a documentary film on Portuguese Territories, the Committee had felt all the more strongly the urgent need for aid to be granted not only by the Special Committee but also by organizations the world over. Operative paragraph 7 was of vital importance, in view of the administering Powers' need of military installations in order to continue their oppressive measures. The existence of such bases constituted not only a menace to the population in the Territories but also a threat to neighbouring countries. The recommendation in operative paragraph 8 that assistance should be withheld from the Governments of Portugal and South Africa had been intended to cover only the duration of their colonial rule over the Territories in question. He asked for the entire Committee's support of that paragraph.

597. The representative of Ethiopia supported the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.315) on behalf of the Afro-Asian group and Yugoslavia, and commended the Chairman for his excellent introductory remarks. It could be seen that the document provided a summary of all that the Committee had done in Africa, giving a bird's-eye view of the salient points contained in its debates and resolutions.

598. The last preambular paragraph on colonialism's threat to international peace and security was vitally important but needed no explanation, as the facts were self-evident. In view of the many years that had passed since the adoption of resolution 1514 (XV) it was not out of place to reaffirm in operative paragraph 1 the inalienable rights of the peoples in colonial Territories to freedom and independence.

599. He associated himself with the Tanzanian representative in noting the importance of operative paragraph 5, which laid down a juridical basis for the support of national liberation movements in colonial Territories. Operative paragraph 8 would be instrumental in focusing the world's attention upon the grave threat to peace inherent in the continuation of colonialism. Peoples everywhere must be convinced of the evils rampant in colonial domination and of the urgent necessity to eradicate it. He announced his support of the draft resolution and strongly recommended it to the Committee.

600. At the 455th meeting, on 22 June, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that two changes had been made as a result of consultations held by the sponsors of the draft resolution the previous evening. The first concerned operative paragraph 7, which had been amended to read:

"Requests the colonial Powers to dismantle the military bases installed in colonial Territories and to refrain from establishing new ones."

The second change related to the co-sponsors of the draft resolution: Iran, the Ivory Coast and Madagascar had indicated their wish to withdraw their names.

601. The representative of Poland said that the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD) and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) were the two agencies which provided most assistance to the colonial Powers. Only the previous day, the Special Committee had been informed that IBRD was to grant further assistance to Portugal. He therefore proposed that operative paragraph 8 should be amended to read:

"Requests all States and international institutions, including the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Monetary Fund and other specialized agencies of the United Nations, to withhold assistance of any kind to the Governments of Portugal and South Africa until they renounce their policy of colonial domination and racial discrimination;"

602. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the Polish amendment was acceptable to the sponsors of the draft resolution and would be included in the revised text (A/AC.109/L.315/Rev.1).

603. The representative of Venezuela said that he would have preferred the draft resolution, as it appeared in document A/AC.109/L.315/Rev.1, not to have been submitted at that time. He thought that it would have been better to wait until the Special Committee returned to New York. The draft resolution embodied a number of ideas, principles and statements in regard to which his delegation had several times stated its position in detail, and that position had not changed. In order to vote on the draft resolution, his delegation was obliged to seek precise instructions from its Government. Since that could not be done from Algiers, the Venezuelan delegation was reluctantly compelled to take no part in the vote.

604. The representative of Australia, expressing agreement with the opening remarks of the representative of Venezuela, said that his delegation was opposed to resolutions of the kind before the Special Committee since they lacked precision on important points of principle. In the first place, the last preambular paragraph of the draft resolution was couched in language which was unacceptable to his delegation. He further wished to restate his opposition to the wording used in operative paragraph 3, in which connexion he had already voiced his delegation's views regarding the use of force in Southern Rhodesia. He wished to point out, however, that his Government had been among the first to refuse recognition of the illegal régime in Salisbury, recalling its representative and initiating far-reaching trade and financial measures to support those proposed by the United Kingdom Government and the Security Council. For those reasons his delegation would oppose the draft resolution before the Committee.

605. The representative of Chile repeated that a draft resolution of such importance could not be voted on hastily. He agreed with most of the ideas in the draft resolution, his reservations being all on points of drafting and terminology. Since, however, the draft resolution summarized the Committee's activities during its tour and defined future policy, it would not be possible for his delegation to take part in the vote without being able to receive instructions from its Government.

606. The representative of Italy stated that his delegation had been unable to obtain instructions from its Government and would not, therefore, take part in the vote.

607. The representative of the United States of America said that he shared the reservations expressed by previous speakers regarding the introduction at the last minute of a draft resolution which contained new and substantive provisions. His delegation supported many of the basic objectives set forth in the draft resolution but was of the opinion that the interests of the peoples of the Territories concerned, as well as of the administering Powers, would best be served by peaceful co-operation. Since, however, other paragraphs in the draft resolution obscured those objectives, his delegation would vote against it.

608. The representative of the Ivory Coast deeply regretted that it had not been possible for his delegation to be one of the sponsors of the draft resolution because of a problem in relation to the wording of operative paragraph 7. Owing to lack of time it had been impossible to reach a compromise. His delegation supported the draft resolution as a whole but had some reservations of principle with regard to operative paragraph 7. He assured the freedom fighters of the full support of the Government and people of his country in their just and noble struggle.

609. The representative of Madagascar said that his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution, which included a number of ideas and principles which it had always supported in the Committee. Nevertheless, he had serious reservations about operative paragraph 7. In his view the question of the military bases was not within the competence of the Special Committee. The Committee's task was to understand the aspirations of the inhabitants of the Territories under Portuguese domination, but it would be for the inhabitants themselves to decide the question of the bases once they were independent.

610. The representative of Denmark said that his delegation did not support operative paragraph 3 of the draft resolution. It could not agree to a recommendation to the Security Council couched in such general terms and based on principles the consequences of which were so hard to foresee. Nor did Denmark support the fifth and eighth preambular paragraphs or operative paragraphs 4, 7 and 8. In the absence of instructions from his Government he would go no further into the question of the draft resolution. The progressive position of Denmark on colonial problems was well known. For the reasons he had just stated, he would be obliged to abstain in the vote on the draft resolution as a whole and would vote against operative paragraphs 3 and 7 if they were put to the vote separately.

611. The representative of Iran, referring to operative paragraph 7 of the draft resolution, said that his Government was opposed to the establishment of any foreign military bases on its territory and had made its views in that connexion abundantly clear in many official statements. It was, by the same token, opposed to the establishment of foreign military bases in principle. However, since the Special Committee was concerned with decolonization, his delegation was of the opinion that the question of such bases could only be considered in the light of their effect upon the local population's aspirations for independence. Otherwise, the matter would not fall within the Committee's purview. For that reason, his delegation had not been able to accept the wording of operative paragraph 7 and had had to withdraw its name from the list of sponsors.

612. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, replying to points raised on behalf of the sponsors of the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.315/Rev.1), said that certain delegations had expressed the opinion that the draft resolution had been introduced at short notice. It had, however, in fact been submitted to the Special Committee on the previous day and delegations had therefore had plenty of time in which to make suggestions if they so wished. In any event, the draft resolution contained only one new element, namely, a reference to the United Kingdom's failure to participate in the Committee's work—which had been commented upon by most members when the Committee had opened its session in Africa.

613. With regard to the view held by certain delegations that operative paragraph 7 of the draft resolution did not fall within the Committee's purview, he pointed out that its terms were very similar to those of operative paragraph 12 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX), which had been supported by the majority of Afro-Asian members and which, moreover, provided the Committee with a further mandate to continue its work. Although no general reference to the question of military bases had been made in the draft resolution, the sponsors of course agreed that they should only be established with the consent of the people. But, as far as the colonial Territories were concerned, the presence of military bases after independence would, in effect, mean the continuation of colonialism.

614. As for operative paragraph 3, the views expressed in it had always been held by the African members of the United Nations.

615. The representative of the Ivory Coast, speaking in exercise of his right of reply, recalled that the General Assembly had indeed adopted a paragraph identical with paragraph 7 of the draft resolution, but it alone was entitled to do so. Moreover, that paragraph had aroused lively controversy even in the General Assembly, as was clear from the fact that it had been adopted by only 49 votes to 37, with 18 abstentions.

616. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that his delegation would vote in favour of the draft resolution since it accorded with the position which the USSR had always maintained. It also corresponded to the interests of the African peoples.

617. With regard to foreign military bases in colonial Territories, it had always been the opinion of the Soviet Union delegation that they constituted a direct threat to the independence of the indigenous population and the sovereignty of States, as events in Aden, Guam and Ascension Island proved. The same was true of Libya. The Italian and Australian statements were unacceptable. The motives behind the statements of certain Powers were well known. If Italy allowed United States military bases to be established in its territory, that was its own affair. The colonial Territories, however, had never been consulted and foreign military bases were imposed upon them to prevent them from gaining independence.

618. The revised draft resolution was adopted by a roll-call vote of 16 to 2, with 1 abstention, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Ethiopia, India, Iran, Iraq, Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Mali, Poland, Sierra Leone, Syria, Tunisia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Republic of Tanzania, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, United States of America.

Abstaining: Denmark.

619. The text of the resolution (A/AC.109/188) adopted by the Special Committee at its 455th meeting on 22 June 1966 reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having held meetings from 23 May 1966 to 22 June 1966 successively at Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, at Mogadiscio, Somalia, at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, at Cairo, United Arab Republic, and at Algiers, Algeria, and having heard the spokesmen of the Governments of those countries,

"Having considered the situation in various Territories still under colonial domination,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960,

Adoption of resolution expressing appreciation to host Governments

621. At the 455th meeting, the representative of Iran said that he was privileged to introduce, on behalf of twenty members of the Special Committee, a draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.316) expressing appreciation to the Governments which had invited the Committee to meet in their countries.

622. The Committee could be proud of its accomplishments in Africa; it had taken important decisions for the full implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and had done much to strengthen the confidence placed in the United Nations by those still under colonial domination. The Committee, which had everywhere received an enthusiastic welcome, was particularly indebted to the host countries which, by their invitation, had helped to accelerate independence for all countries. They had also made it possible for the United Nations to establish direct contact with the peoples concerned. In conclusion, he proposed that the draft resolution should be adopted by acclamation.

623. The representative of Mali said that after the admirable statement by his Iranian colleague he had little to add regarding the draft resolution which had just been submitted to the Committee. On behalf of all the sponsors he wished to tender sincere thanks to their brother States of Africa who had invited the Special Committee to hold part of its session in their wonderful countries, thus enabling the members to form an idea of how the struggle against colonialism in Africa was developing. They had found during their stay that, in cases where colonialism still clung to the countries under its domination, the economic factors to which all the petitioners and personalities who had appeared before the Committee, as also the majority of the members of the Committee, had drawn attention were of particular importance.

624. While the Committee was at Addis Ababa, Mr. Diallo Telli, Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity, had shed light on that aspect of the question when he had stated:

"The salient feature of the current situation in Africa is the aggravation of the threat to international peace and security constituted not only by the survival of colonialism but by the strengthening, during the past year, of the alliance formed between Portugal, South Africa and the Rhodesian settlers in order to consolidate their hold over the entire southern part of the African continent and to ensure the perpetuation of colonial and racist domination there. It is a known fact that that ungodly alliance of the most backward régimes of oppression—all three of which have been unanimously condemned, on several occasions, by the United Nations—nevertheless has its accomplices among the powerful. Those accomplices are the many forces—individuals, companies or States—which have made investments in the south of the continent, which live and prosper from the exploitation of African wealth in that region and which thus bear a large share of responsibility for the deterioration of the situation and for the bloody tragedy besetting the African peoples of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the Territories under Portuguese domination. As these accomplices are in large measure responsible for the paralysis which affects all peaceful attempts at decolonization, they are naturally the major obstacles in the way of the Committee's efforts. It is therefore important that you should find an adequate solution to a serious and specific situation, failing which your Committee and all those working for peaceful decolonization cannot hope to achieve any positive result. This is a most important point, for what is needed now in the matter of decolonization is not resolutions but solutions. The obstacles to the solutions are, firstly, the alliance between the régimes of Pretoria, Salisbury and Lisbon; and, secondly, the support which this alliance is receiving from its accomplices in Europe and the United States, especially by way of bilateral assistance or the aid provided by organizations such as NATO. That is the source of the great difficulties which are hampering the efforts to achieve decolonization in Africa. It is to this that the principal efforts of the Committee should be directed."

625. After hearing the petitioners and seeing the film which some of them had made, members of the Committee were surely more convinced than ever that colonialism was a disgrace to mankind and to the conscience of man, a view which had been eloquently expressed by the representative of Denmark. In conclusion, he thanked all the host Governments for welcoming the Committee and for the facilities with which they had provided it for the achievement of its task: they had all proved, if proof were needed, their sincere desire to co-operate with the United Nations. He therefore proposed that the Committee should adopt the twenty-Power draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.316) by acclamation.

626. At the same meeting the Special Committee adopted the draft resolution (A/AC.109/L.316) by acclamation. The text of the resolution (A/AC.109/189) reads as follows:

"The Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples,

"Having held meetings from 23 May to 22 June 1966 successively at Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania, at Mogadiscio, Somalia, at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, at Cairo, United Arab Republic, and at Algiers, Algeria, and having heard the spokesmen of the Governments of those countries,

"Expresses its profound gratitude to the Governments and people of the United Republic of Tanzania, Somalia, Ethiopia, the United Arab Republic and Algeria for inviting the Special Committee to hold meetings in their respective capitals, for providing the Committee with the necessary facilities for its meetings, and for their generous and kind hospitality."

ANNEX I

Communiqué issued on 14 May 1966 by the Chairman on behalf of the Special Committee

In response to invitations extended to it by the Governments of Algeria, Ethiopia, Somalia, the United Arab Republic and the United Republic of Tanzania, the Special Committee of Twenty-Four has decided to hold a series of meetings this year in Algiers, Addis Ababa, Mogadiscio, Cairo and Dar es Salaam.

This decision was taken in the context of operative paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961 which, in establishing the Special Committee, authorized it "to meet elsewhere than at United Nations Headquarters, whenever and wherever such meetings may be required for the effective discharge of its functions". The Special Committee was also aware that the General Assembly, by operative paragraph 7 of its resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965, had approved "the programme of work envisaged by the Special Committee during 1966, including the possibility of holding a series of meetings in Africa" and had authorized the necessary financial provision in the budget for 1966.

In deciding to hold another series of meetings in Africa this year, the Special Committee was particularly conscious of the positive results achieved by its visit to Africa last year. While the Special Committee was unable, owing to the non-co-operation of the administering Powers concerned, to visit the colonial Territories it considered in Africa last year, it was enabled, by reason of its proximity to these Territories, to establish closer contact with the realities of their situation and to obtain more direct knowledge than hitherto regarding the aspirations of their peoples. The experience of the Special Committee in Africa last year thus made possible the adoption of several important resolutions concerning these Territories, which formed the basis of the relevant decisions taken by the General Assembly at its twentieth session.

The work of the Special Committee in Africa last year also benefited from the co-operation it was able to establish with the Organization of African Unity through the participation of the Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa as well as of the Administrative Secretary-General of that organization.

The Special Committee notes with grave concern that the renewed hopes of freedom and independence without delay which were inspired in colonial peoples by the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples on its adoption over five years ago have, with but a few exceptions, not been realized. Indeed, owing to the negative attitude or non-co-operation of the administering Powers concerned, very little progress has been made in the implementation of the Declaration in most of the Territories, including the larger Territories in Africa, which engaged the attention of the Special Committee in previous years.

The Special Committee is convinced that its forthcoming visit to Africa will not merely demonstrate the increasing concern of the United Nations for the position of colonial peoples but strengthen its own capacity to assist these peoples in their struggle for independence. This consideration is of special significance in view of the General Assembly's request, contained in its resolution 2105 (XX) that the Special Committee in continuing to seek the best means for the immediate and full application of the Declaration, should, whenever it considers necessary, recommend a deadline for the accession to independence of each colonial Territory. Further, the Special Committee's visit to Africa will facilitate the appearance before it of representatives of nationalist movements wishing to express their views regarding the future of their countries, who would otherwise find it impossible to travel to New York.

The programme of the Committee's meetings in Africa is as follows:

Dar es Salaam, United Republic of Tanzania: between 22 and 30 May 1966;

Mogadiscio, Somalia: between 31 May and 3 June 1966;

Addis Ababa, Ethiopia: between 4 and 9 June 1966;

Cairo, United Arab Republic: between 9 and 16 June 1966;

Algiers, Algeria: between 16 and 22 June 1966.

The items on the agenda of the Special Committee for these meetings will include all the colonial Territories in Africa, Aden, Oman, Mauritius and Seychelles.

B. INFORMATION ON THE TERRITORIES<sup>3</sup>

5. Information on Mauritius, the Seychelles and St. Helena is contained in the reports of the Special Committee to the General Assembly at its nineteenth and twentieth sessions (A/5800/Rev.1, chap. XIV; and A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XIII). Supplementary information is set out below.

1. Mauritius

General

6. Up to 8 November 1965, the Territory of Mauritius consisted of the island of Mauritius and its dependencies, Rodriguez, the Chagos Archipelago, Agalega and the Cargados Carajos. As from that date, the Chagos Archipelago forms part of a new Territory, created by the United Kingdom Government, which is known as the British Indian Ocean Territory (see paras. 41-53 below).

7. The total population of Mauritius at the end of 1965, excluding the dependencies, was estimated at 751,421. Racially the population is divided into the general population (Europeans (mainly French), Africans and persons of mixed origin), 220,093; Indo-Mauritians (made up of immigrants from the Indian subcontinent and their descendants), 506,552 (of whom 383,542 were Hindus and 123,010 Muslims); and Chinese (consisting of immigrants from China and their descendants), 24,776.

8. With an average of over 1,000 people to the square mile, Mauritius is already one of the most densely populated agricultural areas in the world, and a continuing high birth-rate and falling death-rate are resulting in an increase of some thirty per 1,000 annually. The growth of population has led to a reduction of living standards among certain sections of the people, and to growing unemployment.

Political and constitutional developments

Constitutional Conference of 1965

9. The decision that Mauritius should become an independent State probably by the end of 1966, after a period of six months' full internal self-government, was announced by Mr. Anthony Greenwood, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, at the end of a Constitutional Conference held in London from 7 to 24 September 1965.

10. The Conference was attended by representatives of all political parties in the Mauritius Legislature, namely: the Mauritius Labour Party (MLP) led by the Prime Minister, Sir Seenoosagur Ramgoolam; the Parti Mauricien Social Démocrate (PMSD) led by Mr. J. Koenig; the Independent Forward Bloc (IFB) led by Mr. S. Bissoondoyal; the Muslim Committee of Action (MCA) led by Mr. A. R. Mohamed; two independent members of the Legislature, Messrs. J. M. Paturau and J. Ah Chuen.

11. The MLP, the party of the working class which in the October 1963 general election won nineteen out of the forty elected seats in the Legislature, represents mainly the Indo-Mauritian and Creole (Afro-European) communities. Most of the Indo-Mauritians supporting this party are Hindus, though it also has the support of some Muslims. The majority of Muslims, however, belong to the MCA which at the last election won four seats and stood as the ally of the MLP. The PMSD, which won eight seats, traditionally represents the Franco-Mauritian landowning class and the Creole middle class. To the left of the MLP is the IFB, a rural Indo-Mauritian party, which won seven seats.

12. According to reports, the PMSD withdrew from the Conference on 23 September 1965 and did not attend the final plenary meeting. Its leader, Mr. J. Koenig, said that Mr. Greenwood had been informed that the party would not return to the Conference until he had made his decision on two vital points on which the party had insisted throughout. These points were that the United Kingdom Government must agree to, first, the right of the Mauritians to a referendum on whether they desired independence or a form of free association with the United Kingdom, and secondly, some form of proportional representation to ensure the representation of the minorities in the Legislature in approximate proportion to their numbers.

13. In the absence of unanimous agreement among the Mauritian parties the United Kingdom Government's decisions on the future of the Territory were announced at the final plenary meeting by Mr. Greenwood. These decisions were recorded in a report on the Conference,<sup>4</sup> a summary of which follows.

Future status

14. The main debate at the Conference was between the advocates of independence and of continuing association with the United Kingdom, as the ultimate status for Mauritius. A considerable time was also devoted to the question of whether advance to this ultimate status should be preceded by consultation with the people and, if so, in what form. All the parties saw the future of Mauritius as being within the Commonwealth, with the Queen as Head of State. But as between independence and some form of continuing association with the United Kingdom, they maintained their opposing views.

15. The MLP and the IFB advocated independence, and the MCA was also prepared to support independence, subject to certain electoral safeguards for the Muslim community. On the other hand, the PMSD advocated a continuing link with the United Kingdom (although not ruling out eventual independence as a possibility) and called for a referendum to allow the people to choose between independence and association. Other points of view, put forward by representatives of independents in the Legislature, included the argument that Mauritius was too small, isolated and economically vulnerable to survive as a viable unit.

16. The report on the Conference stated that the United Kingdom Government, faced with these conflicting views, had to take a decision without the benefit of unanimous advice from the parties at the Conference. After careful study of all the issues, the Secretary of State held that "it was right that Mauritius should be independent and take her place among the sovereign nations of the world". He rejected the proposal for a referendum on the ground that the main effect would be "to prolong the current uncertainty and political controversy in a way which could only harden and deepen communal divisions and rivalries". He felt confident that "it would be possible to produce a constitution which would command the support and respect of all parties and of all sections of the population".

17. Announcing these views to the Conference, the Secretary of State said that when the electoral commission (see below) had reported, a date would be fixed for a general election under the new system, and a new government would be formed. In consultation with this government, the United Kingdom would be prepared to fix a date and take the necessary steps to declare Mauritius independent, after a period of six months' full internal self-government if a resolution asking for this was passed by a simple majority of the new Assembly. The United Kingdom Government would expect that these processes could be completed before the end of 1966.

Framework constitution

18. During the discussions, the Conference recognized that there were a number of matters which would have to be provided for in the constitution of Mauritius which would not be affected by the decision on final status. On most of these matters a large measure of agreement was reached and a framework constitution embodying the points of agreement was circulated to delegates.

19. Among subjects covered in the framework constitution are: provisions for the preservation of fundamental human rights; for securing the continued impartiality of the judicial system and of the commissions concerned with the Public Service, the judicial and legal service and the police service; and for dealing with criminal prosecutions and the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. A further safeguard against any possibility of the abuse of power is contained in the provision for the appointment of an Ombudsman, who will have a wide jurisdiction to investigate complaints against specified public bodies and officers.

20. The framework constitution also sets out provisions for the appointment of a Queen's representative who, in the exercise of his functions, will generally act on the advice of a Council of Ministers, consisting of a Chief Minister and not more than fourteen other ministers collectively responsible to a wholly elected Legislative Assembly.

21. Alterations to the constitution will require the support of not less than two thirds of all the members of the Legislative Assembly or, in the case of entrenched provisions, not less than three fourths of the members.

Electoral commission

22. A further point on which it proved impossible to reach agreement at the Conference was the electoral system to be adopted under the self-government constitution. The Secretary of State said that he was reluctant to determine such an important matter without further consultation, and therefore proposed to appoint an electoral commission to make recommendations on the most appropriate method of allocating seats in the Mauritius Legislature and on the boundaries of electoral constituencies.

23. In making its recommendations, the commission would be asked to accept certain principles: the system recommended should be based primarily on multi-member constituencies; there should be a common electoral roll, with provision, by the reservation of seats if necessary, for fair representation of the main sections of the population; no encouragement should be given to the multiplication of small parties; there should be no nominated members in the Legislature; and provision should be made for the representation of Rodriguez. The Commission, which consisted of a Chairman (Sir Harold Banwell) and two other members (Professor Colin Leys and Mr. T. G. Randall), visited Mauritius during January 1966.

24. In its report,<sup>5</sup> which was submitted to the Secretary of State for consideration on 22 February 1966, the Commission stated that in formulating its proposals for the electoral system, it had taken into account the views presented by individuals and organizations, including the four main political parties, and the principles laid down for its guidance in the report of the Mauritius Constitutional Conference of 1965.

25. Under the proposed system, sixty members would be returned for the island of Mauritius by block voting (each elector being obliged to cast his full three votes) in twenty three-member constituencies, and two members returned for Rodriguez (the principal dependency of Mauritius) by block voting in a single constituency. The members elected for Rodriguez would also represent the interests of the two lesser dependencies, namely, Cargados Carajos and Agalega.

26. There would be a constant corrective consisting of five additional seats to be filled in turn from the runners-up among the losing candidates who were least well represented after the poll. A party would gain a seat by means of this corrective, only if it secured the return of one member by direct election and 10 per cent of the total vote cast.

27. Provision would be made for the establishment of a variable corrective system. Under this system, any party which received more than 25 per cent of the vote but less than 25 per cent of the seats would have its representation correspondingly augmented.

28. The Commission also recommended the sending of independent observers from Commonwealth countries to Mauritius during the preparation of the next register of electors and the subsequent elections, and the formation of an independent electoral commission of three members.

29. In a dispatch of 28 May 1966 addressed to the Governor of Mauritius, the Secretary of State for the Colonies stated that after carefully considering the recommendations made in the report of the Banwell Commission, he had reached the conclusion that the electoral arrangements proposed, taken as a whole, fully conformed with the relevant principles set forth in the report of the Mauritius Constitutional Conference of 1965, and that these arrangements were "as fair and satisfactory as it is possible to devise in the particular situation of Mauritius". He had accordingly decided to accept the Commission's recommendations in full, and very much hoped that all political parties would in the best interests of Mauritius willingly accept the arrangements proposed and co-operate in implementing them so that planning might go ahead on the arrangements that would be required for the elections to be held later in 1966.

30. The Secretary of State also stated that in the circumstances of Mauritius, a team of observers from Commonwealth countries was clearly appropriate as recommended by the Commission, and that he was taking urgent steps to select suitably qualified persons to undertake this task. Finally, he requested the Governor to arrange for the Commission's report and his dispatch to be published in Mauritius at an early date.

31. In the course of nearly four weeks following its issuance, the Commission's report became the centre of controversy in Mauritius, notably between the three parties participating in the present Government (i.e., MLP, IFB and MCA) and their opponents the PMSD. According to reports, the former organized the Pro-Independence Front under the leadership of the Prime Minister in protest against the Commission's proposals for the electoral arrangements. The main points of protest were reported to be that these proposals did not provide for majority rule or for direct adequate representation of the Muslim and Chinese communities. On the other hand, the PMSD was reported to be in favour of the system proposed by the Commission, mainly because it felt that this system was very much like one of proportional representation and was based on non-communalism. Both sides made charges and counter-charges and organized mass political meetings, at which resolutions were adopted, pledging support for their respective stands.

32. On 16 June 1966, a motion introduced by the Prime Minister was adopted by an overwhelming majority in the Legislative Assembly, asking for further consideration of the proposals contained in the Banwell report. An opposition amendment accepting that report was rejected by a large majority. On 27 June 1966, Mr. John Stonehouse, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for the Colonies, began an eight-day visit to Mauritius for discussions with the four main parties concerning the Banwell proposals. As a result, full agreement was reached on certain variations of these proposals.

33. These variations, which were later approved by the Secretary of State, include the following.

34. While the system proposed by the Banwell Commission for constituency elections will be retained in full, changes have been made in the correctives recommended by the Commission. The variable corrective will be dropped. The constant corrective will be replaced by provision for eight "best loser" seats. Parties or party alliances will be permitted to qualify for these seats if registered with the Electoral Commissioner before nomination day. The requirement that a party should secure certain minimum results in the constituency elections in order to qualify for constant corrective seats will be dropped and no corresponding provision will be made for the "best loser" seats.

35. The first four "best loser" seats will be reserved for communities under-represented in the Legislative Assembly after the constituency elections. These four seats will be allocated irrespective of party. The remaining four "best loser" seats will be allocated on the basis of party and community.

36. The general effect of the application of the eight "best loser" seats as a whole will thus be to help any community to obtain a fair share of seats in the Legislative Assembly by the allocation of extra seats reserved for the purpose, and to maintain the position of the party or party alliance which led after the constituency elections.

37. On 4 July 1966, before his departure for London, Mr. Stonehouse was reported to have said that the general elections based on the revised proposals of the Banwell Commission must be held as soon as possible, but that the date at which Mauritius would assume full internal self-government could not be fixed at the present stage.

Commonwealth membership

38. On the question of Commonwealth membership, the Secretary of State made it plain that it was a matter not for the United Kingdom Government alone but for the members of the Commonwealth as a whole to decide. He indicated, however, that his Government would be happy, if the desire for membership of the Commonwealth were confirmed by a resolution of the Mauritius Legislature elected before independence, to transmit such a request to other Commonwealth Governments.

39. The Secretary of State believed that the achievement of independence by the Territory would strengthen the close and friendly relations which had existed between Mauritius and the United Kingdom for over 150 years. Mauritius would continue to be eligible for economic assistance from the United Kingdom in the same way as other formerly dependent Territories and would still benefit from the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement.

Defence

40. At the final plenary meeting of the Conference, the Secretary of State indicated that his Government had given careful consideration to the views expressed concerning the desirability of a defence agreement being entered into between the Governments of Mauritius and the United Kingdom. He announced that his Government was willing in principle to negotiate the terms of a defence agreement with the Mauritius Government before independence, which would be signed and come into effect immediately after independence. The United Kingdom Government envisaged that such an agreement might provide that, in the event of an external threat to either country, the two Governments would consult together to decide what action was necessary for mutual defence. There would also be joint consultation on any request from the Mauritius Government in the event of a threat to the internal security of Mauritius. The agreement would contain provisions under which, on the one hand, the United Kingdom Government would undertake to assist in the provision of training for, and the secondment of trained personnel to, the Mauritius police and security forces; and on the other hand, the Mauritius Government would agree to the continued enjoyment by the United Kingdom of existing rights and facilities in HMS Mauritius (a wireless-telegraphy station) and at Plaisance Airfield.

British Indian Ocean Territory

41. On 10 November 1965, the Secretary of State for the Colonies stated in a written answer to a question in the United Kingdom House of Commons that:

"With the agreement of the Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles new arrangements for the administration of certain islands in the Indian Ocean were introduced by Order-in-Council made on 8 November (The British Indian Ocean Territory Order 1965, Statutory Instruments 1965, No. 1920). The islands are the Chagos Archipelago, some 1,200 miles north-east of Mauritius, and Aldabra, Farquhar and Desroches in the Western Indian Ocean. Their populations are approximately 1,000, 100, 172 and 112 respectively. The Chagos Archipelago was formerly administered by the Government of Mauritius and the other three islands by that of Seychelles. The islands will be called the British Indian Ocean Territory and will be administered by a Commissioner. It is intended that the islands will be available for the construction of defence facilities by the British and United States Governments, but no firm plans have yet been made by either Government. Appropriate compensation will be paid."

42. Subsequently, it was announced that the first Commissioner of the Territory would be Lord Oxford and Asquith, Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Seychelles, and that the new appointment would be additional to that of Governor of the Seychelles.

43. According to reports, the new Territory could become the strategic base for a new Anglo-American security system east of Suez. Although there were no firm plans, the intention was to use Diego García, the largest island in the Chagos Archipelago, thirteen miles long and four miles wide, with a population of about 500, as a communications centre and refuelling base, upon the completion of the necessary preparations. The island could be expanded into a staging post, though that was not now planned. The other islands were included in view of possible future requirements.

44. Certain other countries were reported to have been kept informed. These included Australia and New Zealand, which were believed to have an interest in alternative staging posts for air and sea transport across the Indian Ocean between the Red Sea and the Cocos (Keeling) Islands (now administered by Australia).

45. The compensation to be paid to the Government of Mauritius was reported to be about £3 million in the case of the Chagos Archipelago.

46. In Mauritius, all three Ministers of the PMSD resigned from the Government on 12 November 1965 in protest against the United Kingdom Government's scheme to detach the Chagos Archipelago from Mauritius for the purpose of setting up an Anglo-American military base. The ministers concerned, whose respective portfolios were subsequently taken by three other persons (one from the IFB and two from the MCA), were Mr. J. Koenig, the Attorney General, the party leader; Mr. G. Duval, Minister of Housing, Lands and Town and Country Planning, deputy leader; and Mr. R. Devienne, Minister of State (Development), party chairman. One of them (Mr. Duval) was said to have cabled the Indian Prime Minister, thanking him for India's opposition to the planned base. According to information provided by the administering Power, the three ministers announced at a press conference in November 1965 that they were not opposed to the detachment of the Chagos Archipelago from Mauritius for Western defence purposes but only to the terms and conditions of that detachment.

47. The discontent among the Mauritians over the above-mentioned scheme was said to be growing. On 16 November 1965, a Remembrance Day ceremony held in Curepipe was disturbed by opponents of this scheme. Several thousands of them brandishing French, Indian and Pakistani flags attended a meeting at Port Louis on 5 December 1965, during which a resolution was adopted, denouncing the United Kingdom.

48. On 2 February 1966, the scheme in question formed the subject of discussion in the United Kingdom House of Commons. In the course of this discussion, the Secretary of State for Defence stated that his Government did not propose to make any modification of this scheme following the adoption by the General Assembly of resolution 2066 (XX) on 16 December 1965.

49. He was asked whether the establishment of military bases anywhere outside the islands referred to in the resolution was liable to run into political difficulties and whether alternatives should therefore be studied. He replied: "We did not think that the resolution dealt with the problem realistically . . . We have taken certain action here that we think is wise bearing in mind that we cannot foresee what the future defence needs in the area might be."

50. With regard to the nature, purpose and cost of the defence facilities to be constructed in the British Indian Ocean Territory, he said:

"Neither Her Majesty's Government nor, I understand, the United States Government have at present any specific plans for constructing military facilities on any of these islands. There are, of course, a number of military uses to which the islands might be put in due course, as and when specific requirements arise, and this was the justification for the establishment of the British Indian Ocean Territory."

51. On the question of the proportion in which the cost of any defence facilities in the Territory would be shared between the United Kingdom and the United States, the Secretary of State said that each country would pay for the facilities in which it had the prime interest and that all facilities would be available for use by both countries without charge.

52. He was also asked to describe the extent to which this sharing of defence facilities and costs in the Far East meant an integration of the defence policy of the United Kingdom with that of the United States as well as to give an assurance that it was not the United Kingdom Government's policy to put down revolutions in other countries. Replying, he asserted that: "We have had very long and very successful experience of this sort of military co-operation with the United States".

53. At the meeting of the British Parliamentary Labour Party held on 15 June 1966, a motion presented by the Prime Minister's critics calling for a decisive reduction in the United Kingdom military commitments east of Suez by 1969-1970 was rejected by 225 votes to 54. Mr. Wilson attacked the motion on the grounds that "if we believe in peace-keeping through the United Nations and in making our contribution to it, we have to be there or capable of getting there", and that the United Kingdom could not disregard the wish of its partners that it should be able to assert influence in Asia and Africa "to neutralize the trouble spots and potential trouble spots". Mr. Wilson said that "What we want to get away from where we can is the system of great bases in populated areas. What we need more is staging posts such as those available to us in the Indian Ocean, with virtually no local population, but which will enable us speedily to get to where we are needed at minimum cost".

Economic conditions

54. Mauritius is primarily an agricultural country. In 1960, it suffered a severe economic setback brought about by two cyclones. Since then the economy has made substantial progress.

55. The gross national product in 1963 was estimated at Rs.926 million (£69 million), the highest since the Rs.542 million for 1960. In 1964 (the last year for which national income statistics are available), the total production of the agricultural and manufacturing industries declined. These industries contributed 24 per cent and 15 per cent of the gross national product respectively, with the remainder being made up by the other smaller sectors. The gross national product in 1964 was estimated at Rs.767 million, or Rs.161 million less than in 1963. During this period, the per capita income fell from Rs.1,300 to Rs.1,020.

56. In 1963, farming and manufacturing contributed 33 and 19 per cent of the gross national product respectively, with the remainder from the other smaller sectors.

57. The relative prosperity which Mauritius enjoys is due almost entirely to the continuing expansion of the sugar industry and guaranteed prices under the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement, which runs until 1971.

58. In 1963 and 1964, the arable land under cane continued to expand, from 213,000 acres to 215,800 acres, representing 90 per cent of the total area under cultivation. Sugar production varies according to weather conditions; in this period, it experienced a considerable decline, from 685,300 to 519,600 metric tons. But sugar exports showed a slight increase from 574,300 to 575,662 metric tons, accounting for 90 and 94 per cent of the Territory's export respectively.

59. In 1965, some progress was made in the diversification of agriculture and the expansion of the secondary industry. The arable land under crops other than sugar-cane rose by 2,400 acres to 17,600 acres, while that under cane remained at 215,800 acres. A notable example was the emergence of tea as a major cash crop following an increase in its acreage by 800 to 6,600. A total of twenty-five new industries was set up, compared with eleven in 1964 and eight in 1963. Loans granted by the Development Bank of Mauritius for agricultural purposes and industrial projects totalled about Rs.1 million at the end of 1964 and Rs.8 million at the end of 1965.

60. Capital expenditure by the mill-owning sugar companies was estimated at Rs.165.5 million for the period 1964-1969 for a target production of 800,000 metric tons of sugar.

61. The bulk of sugar-cane is produced on plantation scale. The larger plantations, with factories and modern equipment, owned by twenty-three Franco-Mauritian sugar millers, produce about 60 per cent of the total crop. The remainder is produced by some 26,000 peasants, mainly Indo-Mauritian owners. They cultivate about 20 per cent of the land under cane, and depend on the twenty-three sugar mills for the extraction of the sugar from their cane. According to reports, managerial, supervisory and technical jobs on the Franco-Mauritian plantations are a close preserve of their own community.

62. Nevertheless, the general economic situation continued to deteriorate in 1965, when the total external trade amounted to about Rs.680.1 million, down from Rs.755.8 million in the previous year. Imports were valued at Rs.388.9 million in 1964 and Rs.367.3 million in 1965, compared with exports totalling Rs.366.9 million and Rs.312.8 million respectively. During 1965, the Territory's unfavourable balance of trade was thus widened.

63. Some important changes occurred in the structure of this trade. Sugar still dominated the export sector of the economy, but its exports decreased from Rs.344.2 million in 1964 to Rs.289.7 million in 1965. It was followed by tea (exports worth Rs.4.4 million in 1964 and Rs.5.9 million in 1965), which replaced molasses (exports worth Rs.8.8 million in 1964 and Rs.5.0 million in 1965) as the second most important export product. The changes in the structure of imports showed less favourable aspects. During these two years, imports of food and edible oils and fats increased from Rs.117.2 million to Rs.122.9 million, while those of capital goods, particularly machinery and transport equipment, decreased from Rs.133.7 million to Rs.121.1 million. As in the past, trade was conducted mainly with the United Kingdom, which received 76.2 per cent of the Territory's exports and supplied 26.7 per cent of its imports in 1965.

64. The recent poor performance of the economy has weakened the financial position of the Territory. During 1965, recurrent revenue decreased by Rs.10 million to Rs.205 million, while recurrent expenditure increased by Rs.18 million to Rs.210 million. Capital revenue amounted to Rs.38 million and capital expenditure to Rs.52 million, compared with Rs.61 and Rs.56 million respectively in 1964. Thus, there was a total budgetary deficit of about Rs.20 million. The public debt in the fourth quarter of 1965 stood at Rs.264 million, or Rs.18 million more than in the corresponding quarter of 1964.

65. The principal economic problems confronting the Territory are its economy's heavy dependence on sugar and the urgent need to widen employment opportunities for the fast-rising population.

66. The two main political parties—the MLP and the PMSD—are very much alive to these problems. The PMSD's policy of association with the United Kingdom is said to be partly inspired by the fear that independence will lead to nationalization of the sugar industry and possibly job discrimination in favour of Indo-Mauritians. In order to dispel this fear, the leader of the MLP is reported to have said that his party favoured constitutional safeguards for minorities and was opposed to nationalization.

67. The Government has made efforts to promote diversification of agriculture, but a factor hampering realization of this objective is that the guaranteed marketing conditions make it more profitable for people to grow sugar.

68. Manufacturing industries in Mauritius are still in their early stages. With a relatively small home market and no raw materials except for sugar and its by-products, aloe and some timber, the development of manufacturing industries has been confined in the main to those directly concerned with the processing of these raw materials.

69. Measures taken by the Government for stimulating the growth of secondary industries include import duty concessions or exemptions on machinery, plant and raw materials for manufacture in Mauritius and income tax incentives. These incentives have already resulted in the production locally of a variety of goods, including car batteries, carbon dioxide, bituminous paints, nails, fibre glass manufactures, steel furniture, etc., and in the establishment of a modern sawmill, a brewery and a factory for processing milk.

70. According to reports, the leader of the MLP has said, in explaining his party's policy of independence within the Commonwealth, that Mauritius is economically more viable than other colonies that have been granted their independence; that it has never needed a grant-in-aid to balance its budget; and that it has financed the greater part of its development from its own resources.

71. The diversification of the Territory's economy and the reduction of its dependence on sugar are the basic objects of a reconstruction and development programme, which originally covered the period 1960-1965. In 1964, it was decided to increase the ceiling of the programme to Rs.400 million and to extend the period to mid 1966. The United Kingdom is contributing about one third of the total cost of the revised programme.

72. On 1 March 1964, the Development Bank of Mauritius was established to provide loans for agricultural purposes and industrial enterprises. The total amount of loans granted by the Bank up to the end of the year was some Rs.966,000.

73. More recently, the Government has expressed great concern over an increasing level of unemployment caused chiefly by the slowdown in the economy and the rapid growth in population. The population of working age was 190,000 in 1963 and is estimated to reach 250,000 in 1970. In 1965, the Government published for the first time more detailed statistics for 1964 on employment provided by various concerns engaged in construction, electricity, mining and quarrying, manufacture and repairs, and transport. The total number of persons engaged in the above-mentioned undertakings was about 22,000. In addition, the twenty-three Franco-Mauritian sugar millers' estates had some 49,000 employees in 1964. However, no data are available for total unemployment in that year.

74. In his speech to the legislative Assembly on 16 March 1966, the Governor proposed a series of measures designed to achieve full employment by 1970 mainly through the acceleration of economic growth and the reduction of the birth-rate. Subsequently, despite the opposition from the PMSD, the Assembly was reported to have adopted a motion expressing support for these measures, which are summarized below.

75. Under a new development programme covering the period from July 1966 to June 1970, all projects will be carried out in "as labour-intensive a manner as possible", and a higher proportion of funds will be devoted to directly productive development. The Government intends to nearly double the rate of expansion of tea plantations for small-holders and discuss shortly with the International Development Association (IDA) the financing of two irrigation schemes.

76. The Government will continue to strive to create favourable conditions for private investment by such means as the strengthening of the public finance system, the establishment of a Standards Bureau and a Trade Training Centre (the cost of which will be mainly financed by the United Nations Development Programme), the maintenance of good industrial relations and stability in the basic cost of living, and the further expansion and improvement of health, housing, transportation and urban facilities and services. The Government will also continue to make funds available to entrepreneurs through the Development Bank of Mauritius. Three large industrial projects, among others, in the private sector are under study, namely, in fertilizers, textiles and edible oils.

77. The Government has agreed that Mauritius should participate in the negotiations for an Economic Community of Eastern Africa, and it will take every step to promote further economic development within the Community.

78. With the assistance offered by the United Kingdom Ministry of Overseas Development and other overseas agencies, the Government is determined to check the rate of population growth through a sustained campaign of education in family planning. Where opportunities for employment of Mauritians abroad are found, those wishing to take advantage of them will be helped to do so. Improvement will be effected in the administration of public assistance to those for whom no work can be found.

79. As shown in the draft capital budget, revenue and expenditure for the first year of 1966-1970 Development Programme are estimated at Rs.65.9 and Rs.93.2 million respectively. The budget has three main sources of revenue: transfer from the current budget, Rs.12.0 million; Colonial Development and Welfare Fund, Rs.14.8 million; and loans, Rs.32.6 million. However, by the addition of the unspent development funds amounting to some Rs.48.3 million at the end of June 1966, the total estimated capital revenue is brought to Rs.114.2 million.

80. In July 1966, the Government decided to increase both direct and indirect taxes in order to distribute the burden among those with the ability to pay and to meet the budgetary deficit of Rs.25 million for the period ending on 30 June 1966. It also decided to strengthen the monetary system by the formation in 1966 of a central bank to be known as the Bank of Mauritius with an authorized capital of Rs.10 million.

Social conditions

Labour

81. The average rate of increase of population in recent years has been some 20,000 persons a year. The estimated annual increase in the working age population (15 to 64 years) up to 1972 is about 7,500. Steps have been taken to accelerate economic growth, but thus far the economy has not expanded fast enough to provide employment for all work-seekers, and it is considered likely that the current trend will continue unless the birth-rate is reduced. More recently, the problem of unemployment has been aggravated by the continued political uncertainty and adverse weather conditions. As a result, there has been an increasing demand for emigration to the United Kingdom, but the number of applications granted has been small.

82. Measures have been taken by the Government for easing the unemployment situation. These have included a territory-wide registration of unemployed agricultural workers, the implementation of schemes for relief works and for the growing of food crops, the provision of public assistance to those for whom no work could be found, and the undertaking of a programme of family planning.

83. The largest single employer of labour in the Territory is the sugar industry, which provided employment for 40,822 and 48,635 in March and September 1964 respectively. During the year, there were seventy-eight (seven more than in 1963) associations of employees, with a membership of 48,229 (6,113 more than in 1963). There were twenty-five trade disputes involving 7,302 workers (of whom 5,447 were employed by the sugar industry) and resulting in a loss of 11,053 man-days. The cause of those disputes involving the sugar industry was dissatisfaction with rates of pay, which remained unchanged between 1963 and 1964.

Public health

84. Government expenditure on medical and health services in the financial year 1963-1964 was Rs.19,205,094 (an increase of Rs.949,888 over the previous year), or about 11 per cent of the Territory's total expenditure.

85. During 1964, the medical and health facilities were expanded by the addition of one government dispensary, one maternity ward in a government hospital and nine maternity, child welfare and social welfare centres. The number of beds available for in-patients in the Territory totalled 3,324 (an increase of 100 over the previous year). This total included 2,121 general beds, equivalent to one general bed per 345 persons. There were 118 government and sixty-five private physicians (compared with 122 and sixty respectively in the previous year). There was, thus, one physician for every 4,008 persons.

86. The main disease found among the people in Mauritius today is anaemia, which may affect as many as 50 per cent or more of certain groups of the population. This and other allied nutritional disorders lead to poor physique, intermittent sickness and general apathy.

Educational conditions

87. Actual recurrent expenditure for the financial year 1963-1964 amounted to Rs.24.9 million (compared with Rs.22.8 million in the previous year), or roughly 13.8 per cent of the Territory's total recurrent expenditure. Capital expenditure on education was Rs.3.4 million (compared with Rs.2.8 million in the previous year).

88. Enrolment in primary, secondary, teacher-training and vocational training schools in 1964 was as follows:

	Schools	Enrolment	Teachers
Primary education .....	297 <sup>a</sup>	132,074 <sup>b</sup>	3,750
Secondary education .....	119 <sup>c</sup>	31,797	1,348
Teacher training .....	1 <sup>d</sup>	496	23
Vocational training .....	3 <sup>d</sup>	301	28

<sup>b</sup> Representing over 88 per cent of all children of primary school age (5-6 to 11-12 years).

89. Free primary education is provided by the Government and aided schools, but not by the private schools. One of the main objects of the Government has been to expand facilities for such education as rapidly as possible to include all children of primary school age. The Government is now faced with a great problem of primary schools overcrowding, which has been aggravated by the damage to the school buildings caused by cyclones in 1960. Ten new primary schools were completed in 1964 and an extensive school-building programme was formulated for the next year.

90. Another important problem is the need to expand the facilities for further education. At present, the majority of Mauritian students seeking such education have to go abroad. In 1964, over 1,100 students were taking full-time courses in institutions of higher education overseas, most of whom were in the United Kingdom. Forty-three scholarships and bursaries and one cadetship were awarded to Mauritian students by certain Commonwealth countries and Member States of the United Nations, and six scholarships by the Mauritius Government for students to attend universities or other institutions of the United Kingdom and other countries.

91. During the year, a request was made to the United Nations Special Fund for technical assistance in expanding the Mauritius Technical Institute. Arrangements are now being made for the establishment of a university in the Territory, which will be financed by a grant of Rs.3 million from Colonial Development and Welfare funds. The university will consist of a faculty of agricultural sciences, a faculty of development services and an institute of education. It will also run extra-mural courses.

C. CONSIDERATION BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Introduction

153. The Special Committee considered Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena at its 396th and 470th meetings on 16 March and 6 October 1966. At its 470th meeting, the Special Committee had before it the report of Sub-Committee I concerning these Territories, which is annexed hereto.

Written petitions and hearing

154. The Special Committee had before it the following written petitions concerning Mauritius and Seychelles:

Petitioner	Document No.
Mauritius
Mr. M. Ayaperoumall, President, Central Committee, Communist Party of Mauritius (CPM) ....	A/AC.109/PET.433
Mr. A. Bhunnoo .....	A/AC.109/PET.448 and Add.1
Mr. T. Sibsurun, Secretary-Gen- eral, Mauritius People's Progres- sive Party .....	A/AC.109/PET.449 and Add.1 and 2
Mr. S. Ramgoolam, Premier of Mauritius and twelve others ..	A/AC.109/PET.479
Seychelles
Seychelles Transport and General Workers Union, Seychelles Build- ing and Construction Workers Union, and Seychelles People's United Party .....	A/AC.109/PET.533

155. The Special Committee heard the following petitioner concerning Mauritius:

Petitioner	Meeting
Mr. T. Sibsurun, Secretary-General, Mauritius People's Progressive Party .....	396th

156. Mr. Teekaram Sibsurum (Mauritius People's Progressive Party) read out the text of a petition which his party had submitted to the Special Committee on 30 August 1965 concerning the establishment of military bases in Mauritius (A/AC.109/PET.378/Add.1). He said that the population of Mauritius was opposed to the idea of bases, as had been shown by the protest demonstration staged by 100,000 inhabitants in December 1965. In September 1965, the Government of Mauritius had signed an agreement with the United Kingdom Government on the subject of the military base which the United States and the United Kingdom wanted to establish in Diego Garcia. The Government of Mauritius had never told the public about the agreement with the United Kingdom Government and the establishment of a nuclear base in the country. After the collapse of the coalition Government, the Parti Mauricien had disclosed the agreement to the people. His own party, the Mauritius People's Progressive Party, had been formed in 1963, when the rumours about the installation of a military base had started to circulate.

157. In addition, he said that there was widespread unemployment in Mauritius: out of a population of 750,000, 100,000 were unemployed. The white settlers owned all the best land and all the sugar-cane factories. Workers could not earn enough to support their families; because of a law forbidding them to work more than four days a week, they could earn only twenty rupees a week. In addition, there was an unemployment crisis, which the Government was unable to overcome.

158. Racial discrimination was found everywhere. In 1953, the United Kingdom Government had agreed at the constitutional talks that the Muslim Party would have six reserved seats, whether or not they were elected. In keeping with the United Kingdom policy of "divide and rule", there were various political parties which concerned themselves with individual racial groups.

159. The Mauritius People's Progressive Party made the following appeals: firstly, that Mauritius should be granted immediate and unconditional independence; secondly, that no military or nuclear defence bases should be established on their Territory; and thirdly, that the general elections to be held in June 1966 should be supervised by the United Nations in order to prevent bribery and corruption.

160. In answer to a question, he stated that general elections had been held in 1963. None of the four parties had won a majority and a coalition Government had therefore been imposed by the United Kingdom. There were fifty-two seats—forty-two elected and ten nominated by the Government. The Parti Mauricien had seven seats, the Independent Forward Bloc nine, the Muslim Party six and the Labour Party twenty.

161. In answer to a further question, he said that his party had asked the Governor of Mauritius for permission to participate in the Constitutional Conference held in London in September 1965. They had been told that they were not entitled to do so and that only ministers who were members of the Government and the Legislative Council would be allowed to participate. The requests of other parties for permission to attend as observers had also been denied.

Statements by members

162. The representative of the United Kingdom said that his delegation's comments would deal with the conclusions and recommendations in the report and would be essentially factual.

163. The conclusions and recommendations fell into three main categories: firstly, the constitutional and political progress of the Territories of Mauritius, the Seychelles and St. Helena; secondly, the detachment from Mauritius and the Seychelles of the British Indian Ocean Territory; and thirdly, the economic situation in the Territories.

164. With regard to the constitutional questions, his delegation had informed the Sub-Committee of major steps taken in each of the three Territories. In Mauritius, it had been decided after the Constitutional Conference in November 1965 that, if the newly elected Legislative Assembly requested independence, the United Kingdom Government would accept that request and independence would be achieved after a six-month period of full internal self-government following the new elections. Following the recommendations of an independent electoral commissioner and a subsequent visit to the Territory by a United Kingdom Minister to discuss these recommendations, full agreement among all political parties in Mauritius had been reached on a new electoral system. Registration had begun, with a team of Commonwealth observers present, and the elections would be held early in 1967. If the party favouring independence won the elections and asked for independence, independence could thus come about by the middle of 1967.

165. In the Seychelles, the elected Legislative Council had asked the United Kingdom Government to express a view on the Council's desire that there should be no change in the relationship between the United Kingdom and the Territory. In his reply, the United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies had acknowledged that desire and had suggested that the time had come for further constitutional advance, including a move to abolish the minor property and literacy qualifications for the franchise and thus move to full universal adult suffrage. A Constitutional Commissioner had visited the Territory for extensive consultations with all shades of opinion and his recommendations on the various paths of constitutional evolution open to the Seychelles were being examined.

166. In St. Helena, the Governor had undertaken extensive consultations with all sections of the community and had reached virtually unanimous agreement on a set of constitutional proposals which would represent a considerable transfer of powers and responsibility to local hands. His Government was now studying those proposals.

167. None of that progress, however, had found a place in the Sub-Committee's conclusions and recommendations. There was not mention of the prospect of independence for Mauritius within a few months. There was no mention of the consultative processes leading to fresh constitutional proposals for the Seychelles and St. Helena. There was not even any recognition that the Legislatures of Mauritius and St. Helena were already elected by universal adult suffrage and that the United Kingdom Government itself had proposed a move to universal suffrage for the Seychelles. Indeed, the report asserted that the Seychelles people were "deprived" of universal suffrage and it characterized the political development in the Territories as "slow". It blindly recommended that elections on the basis of universal adult suffrage should be held as soon as possible, thus completely ignoring the facts and the decisions that had been taken.

168. With regard to the conclusions and recommendations relating to the detachment of certain small atolls in the Indian Ocean from Mauritius and the Seychelles, his delegation had already explained the matter in its statement to the Fourth Committee at its 1558th meeting on 16 November 1965. It had made it clear that the new arrangements represented an administrative readjustment which had been fully agreed after consultations with the elected Governments of Mauritius and the Seychelles. The atolls did not form any geographical, political or ethnic union with those Territories and had previously been administered as part of Mauritius and the Seychelles purely as a matter of administrative convenience. The interests of their few inhabitants, almost all migrant labourers from Mauritius and the Seychelles, were fully protected under the new arrangements. No decisions had yet been reached about the construction of any facilities in the British Indian Ocean Territory. The suggestion (see para. 46 above) that the resignation of three Ministers from the Mauritius Government had been in protest at the principle or objectives involved in the detachment of the atolls was inaccurate, as had been shown by the public statements of the Ministers at the time. In view of the fact that the two elected Governments had agreed to the detachment, his delegation could not accept the suggestions in the Sub-Committee's report that the new arrangements violated the territorial integrity of the Territories. Furthermore, his delegation knew of no supporting evidence for the assertions (see annex, para. 55) alleging anxiety about reports that military bases in Mauritius or the Seychelles were envisaged, since there were no such bases in either Territory and, to the best of his delegation's knowledge, no plans for any such bases. There were certain minor facilities which were not bases; there were the naval wireless station in Mauritius and an airfield which was used occasionally by the Royal Air Force but primarily by the Mauritius Government for purely civilian purposes. His delegation knew of no evidence that those minor facilities had caused anxiety to anyone in the Territories concerned.

169. With regard to paragraph 63 of the recommendations of Sub-Committee I (see annex), the clear legal position was, had been and remained that until independence the administering Power alone had the authority to enter into international commitments or agreements affecting its dependent Territories. His delegation could not, therefore, accept that recommendation. He would point out, however, that in recent times the United Kingdom Government had certainly not concluded any agreements with other countries affecting the basic interests of United Kingdom colonial Territories without the fullest consultation beforehand with the representatives of the Territory concerned.

170. Finally, his delegation regretted that paragraph 57 of the conclusions and paragraph 64 of the recommendations paid no regard to the information supplied by his delegation to the Sub-Committee about the economies of the Territories and about United Kingdom Government aid to them. His delegation had made it clear that 1963 had been an exceptional year for sugar prices and that that had a marked effect on the economy of Mauritius; in interpreting the annual statistics it could not be deduced from a comparison of the 1963 and 1964 figures that there was a significant economic decline. He knew of no evidence to support the allegation in paragraph 57 that foreign companies were exploiting or otherwise acting contrary to the interests of the Territories. It was difficult to attach any meaning to the reference to "indigenous inhabitants" in paragraph 64, since the islands had been uninhabited when they had first been discovered, and no section of their inhabitants was more "indigenous" than any other.

171. On all three counts, therefore, the conclusions and recommendations seemed either to ignore or to misrepresent the basic and significant facts of the situation in the three Territories concerned. His delegation could not accept the conclusions or recommendations and he reserved his Government's position on them.

172. The representative of Italy said that during the twentieth session of the General Assembly his delegation had abstained in the vote of resolution 2066 (XX) on Mauritius and had voted against the paragraph of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX) that dealt with the so-called problem of military bases in colonial Territories. He therefore reserved his delegation's position on the report under consideration.

173. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that, as a member of Sub-Committee I, he had not been surprised to hear the United Kingdom representative disagree with the contents of the report, which was aimed at correcting the many wrongs committed by the United Kingdom Government against the people of the Territories concerned.

174. The United Kingdom representative had spoken about the revised electoral system. The Tanzanian representative in Sub-Committee I had studied the statement issued by the United Kingdom delegation and had found that system to be very complicated. Indeed, the United Kingdom representative had been obliged to explain the system in detail to the Sub-Committee.

175. With regard to the slow pace of political development referred to in paragraph 64 of the report, since the Territories had been under United Kingdom control for about 150 years, it was clear that they should have made far more progress. The Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples had been proclaimed in 1960; it is now six years later and the United Kingdom has not implemented it. The Sub-Committee had therefore been justified in noting the slow pace of political development. The people of the Territories were demanding their inalienable and sovereign rights and the United Kingdom Government was withholding those rights. The conclusions and recommendations were therefore in keeping with the facts.

176. The United Kingdom representative had said that the British Indian Ocean Territory was not part of Mauritius and the Seychelles. The Tanzanian delegation rejected that argument, since the United Kingdom Government would not have agreed to pay compensation to the inhabitants of the islands concerned if those islands were not an integral part of Mauritius and the Seychelles.

177. The United Kingdom representative had said that he disagreed with the Sub-Committee's conclusion relating to the establishment of military bases in Mauritius and the Seychelles. The Tanzanian delegation would like to hear a formal denial from that representative; it might even propose that a visiting mission should be dispatched to the Territories to ascertain the facts.

178. In keeping with its traditional opposition to colonialism and neo-colonialism, his delegation fully supported paragraph 63 (see annex), which dealt with agreements concluded between the administering Powers affecting the sovereignty and fundamental rights of the Territories.

179. The representative of Australia said that, on the basis of the facts just presented by the United Kingdom representative, his delegation considered that the conclusions and recommendations in the report were unfounded. It therefore reserved its position on the report.

180. The representative of Denmark said that the reservations expressed by his delegation at the 32nd meeting of Sub-Committee I were still valid.

181. The representative of the United States of America said that his delegation did not support all the conclusions and recommendations in the report. In particular, it endorsed the reservations made by the Danish representative at the 30th meeting of the Sub-Committee.

182. The United States delegation considered the emphasis on military facilities entirely unwarranted, especially in the light of the remarks of the United Kingdom representative.

183. With regard to the reference to paragraph 12 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX), members would recall that at the time of the adoption of the resolution the United States had pointed out that certain paragraphs were null and void because they had not been adopted in accordance with the provisions of the Charter.

184. Lastly, the report did not take sufficient account of the efforts of the administering Power and the people of the Territories which were leading to self-determination, and nothing about the possibility that Mauritius might become independent by the middle of 1967.

185. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics disagreed with the representative of Australia that, on the basis of the facts which had just been presented by the United Kingdom representative, the conclusions and recommendations in the Sub-Committee's report was unfounded. When the question of Mauritius, the Seychelles and St. Helena had been studied thoroughly by Sub-Committee I, the Special Committee and the General Assembly in 1964, the United Kingdom representative had painted a rosy picture of the situation, but the dismal truth had nevertheless emerged. At the current meeting, the United Kingdom representative had objected that the report made no reference to political and economic progress in the Territories and that the recommendations, especially those concerning military bases, were incorrect. He agreed with the representative of Tanzania that, as six years had elapsed since the adoption of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples progress had indeed been slow, since the Declaration had still not been implemented in the Territories.

186. As for the economic situation, foreign monopolies were depriving the local inhabitants of the opportunity to participate in the economic life of the Territories. All the land in Mauritius which did not belong to the Crown was owned by foreign companies and big landowners, and two thirds of all the arable land in the Seychelles belonged to a small group of planters. The colonial structure of the economy of the Territories, which was based mainly on the cultivation of a single crop, made them entirely dependent on the metropolitan country.

187. The United Kingdom representative had said that the progress achieved had not been taken into account. Yet even the working paper prepared by the Secretariat, which, it must be agreed, was objective, had stated that in 1964 the total production of the agricultural and manufacturing industries had declined and that in 1965 the general economic situation had continued to deteriorate (see paras. 15 and 59 above). According to the Christian Science Monitor of 6 June 1965, out of a total population of more than 750,000 in Mauritius, less than 100,000 were employed, and most of those on seasonal work. The Secretariat working paper had also referred to the increasing level of unemployment. In protest against the desperate economic situation, the inhabitants had organized strikes. In May 1965, serious disturbances had broken out in Mauritius and, according to the Christian Science Monitor, had been suppressed by British troops. In June 1966, a strike called in the Seychelles had been ended by the colonial Power with the help of military units from Aden and United Kingdom naval vessels. The United Kingdom representative had omitted to mention those incidents, which were yet another example of the criminal use of military bases against a people struggling for freedom and independence and a better standard of living; instead, he had reserved his delegation's position on the question of military bases and had claimed that military bases did not impede the development of the population.

188. The Secretariat working paper (see para. 148 above) referred to the use of St. Helena and Ascension Island by the United Kingdom and United States for special communications and tracking projects and The Times (London) of 14 February 1965 had stated that Ascension Island might be used as a base for F.111 bombers. The Secretariat working paper quoted the United Kingdom Secretary of State for the Colonies concerning the establishment of the British Indian Ocean Territory and the plans for the construction of defence facilities there (see para. 41 above), yet the United Kingdom representative had claimed that there were no such plans. Both the United Kingdom newspaper The Scotsman and the United States magazine Time had reported that the Territory could be used as a base for atomic submarines and bomber aircraft, and might even be used as a platform for rocket launchings. A petition from the President of the Seychelles People's United Party (A/AC.109/PET.321) had protested about the prospect of an Anglo-American military base in the Territory, and the Secretariat working paper described the discontent among the Mauritians over the scheme (see para. 47 above). The Governments and peoples of many independent countries were strongly opposed to the construction of such bases, which represented an attempt to perpetuate the colonial system and constituted a threat to the independence of countries and to the peace and security of peoples.

189. The Secretariat working paper (see para. 48 above) quoted the United Kingdom Secretary of State for Defence as saying that his Government did not propose to make any modification of the scheme to establish the British Indian Ocean Territory as an Anglo-American military base following the adoption by the General Assembly of resolution 2066 (XX). The United Kingdom Government, therefore, had not only failed to implement the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, but had violated the territorial integrity of the Territories in question. The United Kingdom's policy was fully supported by the United States, which was exerting pressure on the United Kingdom to maintain a presence east of Suez.

190. The United Kingdom Government was reported to be prepared to pay compensation for the part of the British Indian Ocean Territory which had belonged to Mauritius. The right of a people to self-determination could not be the subject of bargaining and the United Kingdom's transaction should be condemned, particularly since it was aimed at transforming a Territory into a base for aggression against the people of Asia and Africa.

191. The recommendations of Sub-Committee I had been dictated by conditions in the Territories. Only their unconditional implementation would enable the people of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena to exercise their right to self-determination and to express their wishes freely concerning the future status of the Territories. The conclusions and recommendations submitted by Sub-Committee I had been fully confirmed by the facts available and were the very minimum acceptable to the Special Committee.

192. The representative of Syria asked the United Kingdom representative why Mauritius was still not independent when the Prime Minister of the Territory had stated unequivocally that it would be ready for independence by the middle of 1964. The United Kingdom representative had said that independence would be granted by the middle of 1967, but this statement was clothed with so many conditions that it had failed to convince the Sub-Committee. He would like to know whether the United Kingdom representative was in a position to say that the administering Power was ready to grant independence without conditions.

193. On the question of constitutional progress, he could not see the advantages of the complex electoral system introduced by the administering Power. Such constitutional arrangements should be left for the people themselves to decide after independence.

194. As for military bases, the fear had been strengthened by the United Kingdom representative's statement that negotiations with the United States concerned only certain facilities. The negotiations were apparently secret and the people's consent had consequently not been obtained. The United Kingdom representative had been asked which representatives of the people of Mauritius had taken part in the negotiations, but he had not replied.

195. The pace of progress should be considered in the light of 156 years of colonial rule. In that light, progress had indeed been slow.

196. As a general remark, he asked what the reservations of certain Powers meant concerning United Nations recommendations which were based on fact. Those Powers which had an opportunity to do so did nothing to alleviate the sufferings of the colonial peoples involved and that made it impossible to ensure that United Nations resolutions were respected.

197. The representative of the United Kingdom, replying to the representative of Syria, repeated his statement that if the party favouring independence won the elections and asked for independence, independence could come about by the middle of 1967. There was therefore only one condition for independence by that date, namely a decision by the people, through their newly elected representatives, to ask for it.

198. The representative of the USSR had stated that his delegation had omitted to mention the strike in the Seychelles. Far from suppressing such information, his delegation had drawn the Sub-Committee's attention to terms on which the strike in the Seychelles had been settled (see annex, para. 24). He had also understood the USSR representative to say that the strike in Mauritius had been suppressed by British troops. The facts were that when some British sailors had gone ashore, a crowd of local inhabitants had cheered the party and had been relieved to see them, that football matches had subsequently been arranged and that the visit had been entirely cordial.

199. The USSR representative had said a great deal about the British Indian Ocean Territory. He had nothing to add to his delegation's various statements on the subject and he asked the members of the Special Committee to pay attention to those statements rather than to speculate on reports mentioned by the Soviet representative.

200. As for the remarks concerning the slow pace of progress in the Territories, in the opinion of his delegation the only valid yardstick for the speed of political progress was the wishes of the people of the Territories themselves. By that yardstick, progress had most certainly not been slow. The Tanzanian representative was at liberty to disagree with the people of the Territories about their wishes, but the administering Power was equally at liberty to base itself on the wishes of the inhabitants rather than on the views expressed by the representatives of Tanzania, the USSR and Syria.

201. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that he did not claim to speak for the people of the Territories but that the United Kingdom had no right to do so either. His country would always speak in support of the rights of all peoples to control their own national territory and to exercise their sovereign rights; it considered it its duty to oppose all those who committed aggression or annexed other territories.

202. The representative of Poland thanked the members of Sub-Committee I for their illuminating report. He was particularly pleased that the Sub-Committee had focused its attention on the implementation, or rather non-implementation of General Assembly resolution 2066 (XX). He fully shared the view expressed by the representative of Syria in the Sub-Committee that the motives of the United Kingdom Government were twofold, namely to assure the permanence of the privileges of the minority of settlers and to use the Territories for strategic purposes against the wishes of the people of the Islands. It was immaterial whether they were called bases or "minor facilities"; the fact was that military installations did exist there and that there were plans to expand them, as had been reported in the United Kingdom and United States Press and in the Secretariat working paper. He would be glad to hear a clear statement from the United Kingdom representative that such information was false and that there were not and would not be any military installations in the Territories.

203. At its twentieth session the General Assembly had adopted resolution 2066 (XX), which included specific provisions to be implemented by the United Kingdom to enable the people of the Territories to exercise their right to self-determination in accordance with resolution 1514 (XV). The conclusions and recommendations in paragraphs 53 to 64 of the Sub-Committee's report elaborated the steps which should have been taken and were only the logical consequence of the Sub-Committee's findings. A resolution should be submitted to the General Assembly in those terms. His delegation fully supported the recommendations, especially those calling upon the administering Power to respect the territorial integrity of Mauritius and Seychelles and to refrain from establishing military bases there.

D. ACTION TAKEN BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE I

204. At its 470th meeting on 6 October 1966, the Special Committee adopted without objection the report of Sub-Committee I on Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, and endorsed the conclusions and recommendations therein (see annex, paras. 53-64), it being understood that the reservations expressed by some members would be reflected in the records.

INTRODUCTION

1. The Sub-Committee considered Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena at its 28th, 29th, 30th and 32nd meetings held on 12 August, 9, 12 and 19 September 1966.

2. The Sub-Committee had before it the working papers prepared by the Secretariat (see paras. 1-152 of chapter XIV).

3. In accordance with the procedure agreed upon by the Special Committee, the Chairman invited the representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to participate in the consideration of the three Territories. Accordingly, the representative of the United Kingdom participated in the 29th, 30th and 32nd meetings of the Sub-Committee.

CONSIDERATION BY THE SUB-COMMITTEE

A. Statements by members

4. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics recalled that the situation in Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena had been studied very thoroughly by the Sub-Committee, the Special Committee and the General Assembly in 1964. That study had revealed the true situation in those Territories and had shown that the administering Power had not applied to them the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples but, on the contrary, had done everything possible to retard their attainment of independence.

5. The economic and social status of the inhabitants of the islands was deplorable. The administering Power had deprived them of the wealth which was theirs by right and, by granting concessions to foreign monopolies, had made it impossible for them to progress economically. In Mauritius and Seychelles, for example, two thirds of the arable land had been turned over to groups of planters. Without land, the inhabitants were forced to seek work on the plantations at starvation wages or else rent land. The economy was still very largely based on a single crop, which made the Territories entirely dependent on the metropolitan country. The inhabitants' standard of living was declining. The population was reduced to despair, and discontent was growing daily. In May 1965, serious disturbances had broken out in Mauritius, where the economic situation was steadily deteriorating, and the administering Power had used the Army to suppress the protests. In June 1966, a strike had been called in the Seychelles and the United Kingdom Government had brought in military units from Aden to disperse the strikers and prevent them from expressing their discontent. It was thus apparent that the administering Power was ignoring the recommendations of the General Assembly and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The Special Committee and the General Assembly should therefore continue to study the question and formulate recommendations calling upon the United Kingdom to take prompt action to enable the Territories to attain independence immediately in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV).

6. The negative attitude of the administering Power was based on strategic considerations. The establishment of the new British Indian Ocean Territory, which would form the basis of a United Kingdom-United States security system, was a threat directed against the new countries of Africa and Asia, and it fully justified the fears expressed by the non-aligned countries at the Cairo Conference. The inhabitants were opposed to the idea of transforming the Territories into defensive bastions intended not only for the suppression of the nationalist movements in the islands themselves but also for use by the colonialists against those who were fighting for freedom in that part of the world. A petition (A/AC.109/PET.321) from the President of the Seychelles People's United Party protested against the construction of a military base, and demonstrations had been held in Mauritius for the same purpose (see para. 47 of chap. XIV). According to The Times of London of 14 February 1966, an air base was to be built on Ascension Island; an article published in the American magazine Time on 19 December 1965 had stated that certain nearby atolls might be used as a base for submarines equipped with Polaris missiles. The Indian people, among others, were aroused at the prospect that new hotbeds of aggression would be created in the Indian Ocean, for those plans threatened not only the independence of certain peoples but also world peace. The United Kingdom Government did not propose to modify its scheme to convert the islands into a military base (see para. 48 of chap. XIV). The United Kingdom was thus in effect hurling a challenge at the United Nations, for it was not only doing nothing to apply the Declaration embodied in resolution 1514 (XV) but also failing to respect the territorial integrity of the islands and defying the provisions of the resolution calling for the dismantling of military bases. One had only to read the Press to see that the United Kingdom was being encouraged by the United States and other imperialist Powers; during the Washington talks held earlier in the year between the United Kingdom Foreign Secretary and the United States Secretary of State concerning the development of military bases, the Australian Government had announced that large sums were to be allocated for military construction in Papua and New Guinea.

7. In order to eliminate colonialism as quickly as possible from Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, his delegation suggested that the Sub-Committee should recommend the Special Committee to take decisions to the effect that: (1) the right to self-determination and independence of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena and their dependencies should be reaffirmed; (2) elections should be held on the basis of universal adult suffrage; (3) following such elections, representative bodies exercising full powers should be established; (4) all land should be restored to the indigenous inhabitants; (5) the right of the indigenous inhabitants to dispose of all the natural resources of their Territories should be preserved; (6) military bases should be removed; (7) all agreements imposed on the Territories which limited the sovereignty and fundamental rights of the peoples concerned should be abrogated; (8) enterprises of the metropolitan country should refrain from any actions prejudicial to the integrity of the Territories; (9) any use of military bases should be condemned.

8. His delegation would support any recommendations which the Special Committee might adopt with a view to attaining those ends.

9. The representative of Syria noted that, despite the clear and straightforward recommendations made by the Sub-Committee in 1965 and subsequently adopted by the Special Committee, the question of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena had to be taken up once again, because the administering Power, notwithstanding its disclaimers, was not yet willing to transfer full powers to the democratically elected representatives of the inhabitants. He did not believe that the reason for the delay was a desire for a better preparation for independence and self-determination. In fact, the administering Power had made but small contribution to accelerating the process of emancipation; it surrounded the idea of independence with all sorts of conditions which cast doubt on its good faith. The reforms which had been introduced in recent years were due entirely to the initiative and toil of the indigenous Government. In reality, during 156 years of British rule, nothing significant had been done to provide for the welfare of the masses of the people, who were exposed to extremely unfavourable meteorological conditions, to spread education or to prepare in the Territories cadres sufficiently enlightened to assume the responsibilities of government, development and industrialization.

10. He submitted that the United Kingdom Government's motives were twofold: to assure the permanence of the privileges of the tiny minority of settlers, and to use the Territories for strategic purposes against the wishes of the people of those islands and of the surrounding areas. Syria regarded the information given by the USSR representative on the Anglo-American plan to establish military bases in the Garcia Islands as extremely serious; the Special Committee should thoroughly investigate the matter and weigh its gravity.

11. Why, after all, did the administering Power wish to maintain the obsolete institution of the Governor, who was foreign to the country and foreign to its culture, its outlook and its aspirations, who appointed and dismissed unbound by the advice of the Public Service Commission who robbed the indigenous representatives of their legitimate right to care for their own internal security and external affairs and who, while he was supposed to act in accordance with the advice of the Executive Council, was nevertheless authorized to act against its advice?

12. Why should more than one quarter of the national representatives be nominated by the Governor, and not elected by the people, and why should the Governor, and not the representatives themselves, select the Speaker of their Assembly? Why should he have the last say on expenditure, when the island needed large funds for development? Why should bills require his assent and, worse still, why could a bill rejected by the Legislative Council be put into effect by him if he considered it expedient?

13. Of course, the administering Power had a ready answer to those questions: the country was not yet independent, it was only in the experimental stages of internal self-government. Naturally, the administering Power, invoking apparently plausible reasons of balance, objectivity and reason, wanted it to be believed that the Territories were not ready for independence and self-determination. The Special Committee was very sceptical about the alleged pace of preparation undertaken by the administering Power; moreover, it firmly believed that the problems of poverty, under-development, illiteracy, cleavage between rich and poor and social injustice could not be solved by the administering Power, but would be overcome by the inhabitants themselves when they were independent and could freely decide their own future, their own form of government and the best way of meeting their own needs and when they would receive assistance from the community of nations in equality, equity and dignity. Credence should be given to the Chief Minister, Mr. Ramgoolam, when he asserted that the country should have achieved independence by the middle of 1964, and not to the administering Power, which invoked the need for a process of constitutional progress as a pretext for the continued denial of legitimate rights to the peoples in question.

14. The representative of Mali stated that the situation in Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena was a subject of serious concern to his Government. In Mauritius, there was a racial problem which the administering Power had kept alive with a view to perpetuating its domination, in accordance with the principle "divide and rule". It was in obedience to that principle that the United Kingdom Government had appointed the Banwell Commission to make recommendations on the electoral system.

15. Mali believed that the constitution of a country and all related questions were essentially matters for that country's people to decide. The administering Power had no right to make self-government and independence for the Territory conditional on full agreement among the political parties concerning a constitution which did not meet the legitimate aspirations of the indigenous inhabitants. In his view, the setting up of the Banwell Commission was simply a manoeuvre designed to perpetuate the United Kingdom presence in the Territory simply in order the better to exploit its wealth and its people; for while the attention of the Mauritians was centred on constitutional problems, the British companies were continuing to pillage the country, whose economy was in a catastrophic condition. Mauritius could not be considered in isolation in that connexion; attention must also be given to conditions in Seychelles and St. Helena, whose climate, owing to their geographical position, was ideal for diversified cultivation. Yet sugar plantations covered a total of 215,800 acres and tea plantations 6,600 acres, leaving only 17,600 acres for other food crops, and the Mauritians, and for that matter the inhabitants of Seychelles and St. Helena also, were forced to import foodstuffs from the United Kingdom and elsewhere. Thus, the decline of the Mauritian economy noted in the working paper was not surprising. In the fourth quarter of 1965, the public debt had amounted to 264 million rupees, or 18 million rupees more than in the corresponding quarter of 1964. That loss to the Territories swelled the excessive profits of the British companies, and that was why the administering Power was refusing to allow self-government and independence for the Territories. Sugar exports had fallen from 334.2 million rupees in 1964 to 289.7 million rupees in 1965, while the profits of the British companies were on the increase. Meanwhile there was heavy unemployment in the island and the Government was advising the indigenous inhabitants to go abroad to work, so that it could make greater military use of the island. He remembered the statement made by the petitioner concerning the intention of the United Kingdom and the United States to turn the island into a military base for aggression. It was interesting to recall the United Kingdom Prime Minister's recent statement that any Power called upon to participate in United Nations peace-keeping operations would have to be on the spot or in a position to go there, and that the United Kingdom could not ignore the fact that its partners wanted it to be able to exert enough influence in Asia and Africa to neutralize existing or potential centres of infection. According to the Prime Minister's own words, the United Kingdom Government had sought to abandon the system of large military bases in populated areas and to establish itself in areas which were virtually devoid of indigenous inhabitants and from which its forces would be able to move to the theatre of operations rapidly and at minimum expense. That statement, especially if it was recalled what had happened in Ascension Island two years previously, needed no comment.

16. Mali was opposed to military bases which were meant for aggression and which prevented the peace-loving peoples of the Territories, notably Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, from enjoying their right to self-determination and independence. Consequently, his delegation again appealed to the administering Power to fulfil its obligations by enabling the indigenous people to attain independence, in accordance with their freely expressed desire, in the best conditions. The constitutional problem should not prevent the granting of self-government in the near future, since the Territory must attain independence as soon as possible. The establishment of the military base in the area was an unlawful act. The United Kingdom should dismantle the base and replace it with hospitals and schools, which the people certainly needed much more.

17. The representative of the United Kingdom said he assumed that the statement made by the Soviet Union representative at the 28th meeting of the Sub-Committee on 12 August, as it appeared in the provisional summary record, would be extensively rewritten. The new arrangements for the administration of certain small islands represented an administrative readjustment freely worked out with the Governments and elected representatives of the Territories concerned. No decisions had yet been reached by either the United Kingdom Government or the United States Government on the construction of any facilities anywhere in the British Indian Ocean Territory.

18. Since the representative of the Soviet Union had suggested that the Sub-Committee should recommend the Special Committee to take steps to ensure that all land was restored to the indigenous inhabitants of those Territories and that the rights of those inhabitants to dispose of the natural resources of the islands were preserved, he recalled that the United Kingdom delegation had already pointed out that the first human inhabitants of Mauritius and the Seychelles had come from France and those of St. Helena from the United Kingdom. He wondered whether the indigenous inhabitants to whom the representative of the Soviet Union was referring were the dodos and tortoises—the sole occupants of the islands before the Europeans had arrived.

19. At the twentieth session of the General Assembly, the Fourth Committee had discussed the question of Mauritius. The Electoral Commission, established in December 1965, under the chairmanship of Sir Harold Banwell, had recommended in February 1966 that there should be twenty three-member constituencies for Mauritius and one two-member constituency for Rodriguez, giving a total of sixty-two seats to be filled by direct suffrage. Five additional "corrective" seats would be filled, to be allocated, one at a time, to the party which had the highest average number of votes per seat won; a "good loser" candidate of that party, belonging to the community least well represented, would then be declared elected. These "corrective" seats, however, would be awarded only to parties which had secured 10 per cent of the total poll and had won at least one constituency seat. Also, under a "variable corrective", any party with 25 per cent of the votes should have its seats increased up to 25 per cent if necessary by the appointment to the Legislature of the requisite number of "good losers". The United Kingdom Government had accepted the Banwell Commission's recommendations in full, but the three parties forming the Coalition Government had protested. Only the leader of the Opposition party, the Parti Mauricien Social Démocrate, had welcomed the report. Most of the opposition had been directed towards the "correctives", i.e., the measures designed to provide assurances to minorities on the island that they would be adequately represented in Parliament and therefore that the main clauses of the Constitution should not be amended without their agreement.

20. In the course of a visit to Mauritius by a British Minister, full agreement among all political parties had been reached on a system of seventy seats in twenty three-member constituencies; sixty members would be elected by block voting (each voter being obliged to cast his full three votes). Two members would be elected for Rodriguez by block voting. In addition, there would be eight "best loser" seats. The first four such seats would be reserved, irrespective of party, for communities under-represented in the Legislative Assembly after the constituency elections. The remaining four "best loser" seats would be allocated on the basis of party, without any qualifying requirement for a minimum number of seats or votes. That system would guarantee the fair distribution of seats among the various communities, on the one hand, and the different parties, on the other. Registration was due to begin on 5 September, but because of Ramadan the elections could not be held before February 1967. If a majority of the new Legislature favoured independence, Mauritius would therefore be able to achieve independence after six months of internal self-government, i.e., during the summer of 1967.

21. Pursuant to the Banwell Commission's recommendations, a team of observers from Commonwealth countries had been established under the chairmanship of Sir Colin McGregor, formerly Chief Justice of Jamaica. Some of them would be present in Mauritius from the outset of the registration of electors.

22. The establishment of the Banwell Commission had not been in any sense a delaying manoeuvre, as the representative of Mali had implied, because agreement had finally been reached and independence was conditional upon the outcome of the elections. That had been the most appropriate procedure, because of the divisions of opinion concerning the ultimate status of the Territory. The United Kingdom Government continued to regard independence as the right solution and would take all possible steps to ensure that Mauritius became independent as soon as possible.

23. He pointed out in connexion with the economic conditions in Mauritius referred to in the working paper, that 1963 had been in some respects an exceptional year with a record production of sugar and very high exports because of the international sugar shortage during that year. In fact, the receipts from sugar exports in 1964, although lower than those in 1963, had still been well above those in 1961 and 1962. Again, sugar production in 1965 had shown an increase compared with 1964. The Mauritius and United Kingdom Governments had taken measures to maintain the pace of economic development in Mauritius. In addition to receiving grant funds ($US6.7 million allocated for development for 1965-1968 and nearly $13 million in further grants and loans for cyclone reconstruction), it should be remembered that Mauritius enjoyed an outlet at guaranteed preferential prices under the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement (currently more than £47 a ton compared with the world price of about £17); the preferential price applied to an estimated 75 per cent of Mauritius sugar exports.

24. With regard to the Seychelles, he drew attention to the main developments since July 1964 and in particular to the exchange of dispatches between the Colonial Secretary and the Governor, a useful summary of which was to be found in the working paper (see para. 98 of chap. XIV). The Legislative Council had asked the United Kingdom Government for a response to its proposal that the Territory should remain British or be integrated with Britain. The Colonial Secretary had replied acknowledging the Council's desire for no change in the present relationship and suggesting that the Territory should now drop the minor qualifications for voting and move to universal suffrage. He also suggested apportioning departmental responsibilities to non-official members of the Executive Council and the appointment of a Constitutional Commissioner who would visit the Seychelles and consult all shades of opinion, including parties and individuals, before reporting on the future constitutional evolution of the Territory. The Commissioner had accordingly been appointed and had visited the Seychelles and submitted his report, which was under consideration. A strike had taken place in the Seychelles, but the strikers had returned to work, having accepted an interim wage award equivalent to an 11.1 per cent increase. His delegation thought that that information should answer the Syrian representative's questions concerning low wages in the Seychelles.

25. The Seychelles were receiving under the Colonial Development and Welfare Acts increased assistance in grants, part of which had been allocated towards development schemes ($3.36 million for 1966-1968) and the remainder towards the Seychelles budget.

26. There had been a number of major economic and social developments in St. Helena since 1964, which were briefly described in the working paper. Government labourers had received a pay increase of 90 per cent with effect from July 1965. That had caused the collapse of the flax industry but had not caused unemployment, owing to the other employment opportunities available.

27. The Governor of St. Helena had transmitted to the Colonial Secretary a dispatch in which he had referred to consultations which had taken place with a representative cross-section of the community in regard to possible further constitutional advance. The Advisory Council had adopted a resolution welcoming the proposed revisions of the Constitution and asking the United Kingdom Government for approval. Under the proposals, which had been almost unanimously agreed among the inhabitants of the Territory, the Advisory Council would be replaced by a Legislative Council which would include four additional elected members, bringing the total number of these to twelve. The Council would also have six nominated non-officials and two nominated officials. The Council would enact legislation, the Governor possessing certain reserve powers for use in exceptional circumstances. He would appoint committees of the Council as appropriate and delegate powers and departmental responsibilities to them. Those committees would include special experts as necessary and a majority of members drawn from the Legislative Council. The Executive Council would consist of two officials and the chairman of the Legislative Council committees. The Public Service would remain the responsibility of the Governor. The Governor had expressed his belief that those changes would enable the people of the Territory to take a much more effective and responsible part in the regulation of their own affairs.

28. The Territory already had universal adult suffrage and elections had been held in 1963. Significant and progressive developments had thus taken place in the political and constitutional evolution of the three groups of islands, in each case with the full participation and in consultation with the peoples of the Territories themselves and their democratically elected representatives.

29. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the United Kingdom representative's statement was intended only to confuse and to keep the United Kingdom Government from having to say what it intended to do to carry out the resolutions of the General Assembly and the Special Committee. The United Kingdom representative had spoken at length about the constitutional changes, the establishment of an electoral system and appropriate legislation, as though such matters were central to United Kingdom policy. The USSR delegation wished to state categorically that the changes in the Constitution were a matter for the people alone to decide and to ask the United Kingdom to cease manoeuvring to prolong colonial domination and to remove all obstacles to its termination, for it was time to grant the peoples the independence to which they were undeniably entitled.

30. The United Kingdom representative had tried to refute the USSR delegation's remarks by saying that no agreement had been signed between the United Kingdom and the United States regarding the financing of the base in the Chagos Archipelago, but he had been careful to say nothing about the fact that work had already started on the base. The USSR delegation had not invented those facts; the information mentioned in the Special Committee and the Subcommittee had been published in the United Kingdom and United States Press and could easily be checked. Indeed, the Press had revealed that the United States was bringing pressure to bear on their partners to remain east of Suez and carry out their obligations there. Those "obligations" were to police that part of the world. There had been reports in the United States and the United Kingdom Press that talks had taken place between the United States and the United Kingdom and an agreement had been signed giving responsibility for most of the bases east of Suez to the United States, which undertook to pay for the installation of the base in the Chagos Archipelago. It was difficult to see why the Press of the two great Western Powers should publish the information if no such agreement had been signed. If the United Kingdom persisted in its denials, it would be easy to demonstrate the truth by sending a mission of inquiry to the spot, as the Syrian representative had proposed; but the USSR delegation feared that the news was well founded and that all information about the base was correct.

31. As to the original inhabitants of Mauritius, the turtles and the dodos, the United Kingdom had not told USSR representatives anything they had not known and they had replied to its comments. As the United Kingdom delegation had brought up the subject of ornithology, however, he would remind it that other birds than dodos, birds with a larger wing-span, now swept over the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and were used by the colonialists to terrorize the subject peoples. There had been talk quite recently about those that had flown over Ascension Island. The United Kingdom representative had apparently been instructed to repeat the specious arguments that had been advanced the previous year, but there was certainly much more to be said about those modern birds, a species which was neither extinct nor becoming extinct; the 1965 and 1966 summary records were very instructive on the subject.

32. The representative of Mali said that although the electoral system described by the United Kingdom representative, which the administering Power wished to introduce into Mauritius, was very complex—he himself had difficulty in understanding it properly—he welcomed the fact that the report of the Banwell Commission had been approved by all the political parties and that the elections would enable the Territory to attain independence beginning in the summer of 1967.

33. The representative of Syria agreed with the representatives of the USSR and Mali that the fundamental question was how the United Kingdom intended to apply General Assembly resolution 2069 (XX).

34. The possibility of the United Kingdom and the United States installing military bases caused concern in Africa and the Middle East, particularly as bases of that kind had recently been the starting point for acts of aggression that had been condemned by the United Nations. The representative of the administering Power had stated that there was no agreement between the two countries at present, but negotiations were apparently under way; he would like to know whether the indigenous population was represented in the negotiations, and if so by whom.

35. Constitutional development must be freely decided on by the inhabitants. The representative of the administering Power had said that when representatives had been elected by the electoral system it had proposed, they would decide the question of independence. He would like to know when the Legislative Assembly which was to be elected would meet and take such a decision. He also wondered how the problem of the different ethnic groups was to be overcome by the proposed electoral system.

36. As he had pointed out earlier, Mauritius was subject to economic difficulties because of its bad climate; and the local housing was not sufficient protection from the elements.

37. The representative of Tunisia wondered what might be the advantages of such a complicated, not to say peculiar, electoral system as the one proposed for Mauritius and described by the United Kingdom representative. Would national unity really be possible under such a system? Would not elections on the basis of universal suffrage be preferable?

38. The representative of the United Kingdom said that it had been decided not to set aside special seats for particular minorities or communities, but that the new electoral system had been framed so as to ensure their fair representation. The new system was less complicated than might appear and above all it commanded general agreement among all the Mauritius political parties. Replying to the Syrian representative's question, he said that he had already stated in his report that the Legislative Assembly would meet immediately after the elections, or about February 1967; Mauritius would then be able to ask for independence if it so wished.

39. The representative of Syria asked whether the eight "best loser" seats would be filled by representatives of the island's Chinese and Muslim population.

40. The representative of Tunisia recalled that the question of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena had already been considered by the Special Committee and had also been the subject of General Assembly resolutions 2066 (XX) and 2069 (XX). Those resolutions reaffirmed the inalienable right of the people of those Territories to freedom and independence and invited the administering Power to take effective measures with a view to the immediate and full implementation of resolution 1514 (XV).

41. Recalling that the United Kingdom representative had outlined the future of the islands at the previous meeting, he expressed the hope that the proposed electoral system would not have the effect of accentuating racial differences in the Territories but might, on the contrary, promote the interests of the various sectors of the population. Nevertheless, a serious economic and social problem remained. The main features of the economy of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, which was rudimentary and colonial in nature, were a heavy loss of revenue, the impossibility of increasing employment and the impossibility of bringing payments into balance, because exports were less than imports. The situation was so unsatisfactory that 3,250 workers had gone on strike in the Seychelles on 13 June 1966, and the administering Power had had to use troops to break the strike.

42. In addition, while resolution 2066 (XX) invited the administering Power to take no action which would dismember the Territory of Mauritius and violate its territorial integrity, it was clear that such dismemberment had already taken place. On 10 November 1965, the Secretary of State for the Colonies had stated that new arrangements had been made, with the agreement of the Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles, for the administration of the Chagos Archipelago and of Aldabra, Farquhar and Desrochas. Those Territories, which had formerly been administered by the Governments of Mauritius and Seychelles respectively, were now called the British Indian Ocean Territory, and the United Kingdom and United States Governments would be able to construct defence facilities there. The administering Power had therefore dismembered Mauritius and Seychelles in order to set up a military base on the islands. The establishment of such bases in countries which were still colonized was reprehensible in every respect, and he recalled that his own country had experienced the same problem with the base of Bizerta. The Sub-Committee should therefore recommend to the Special Committee that it should invite the administering Power to take steps to implement resolution 1514 (XV), to lead the populations of the islands to independence, to abandon the plan to dismember Mauritius and Seychelles and to install military bases there, and to permit and encourage the sending of United Nations visiting missions to the Territories.

43. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the United Kingdom representative's statement at the previous meeting seemed to mean that, because they had been uninhabited when the French and the English had arrived, Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena belonged to nobody. Without going into detail on that matter, he believed that the inhabitants of the islands, whatever their origin, were none the less subjected to colonial domination. It was precisely that domination, depriving them as it did of the right to choose their own form of government, which the Government of the United Republic of Tanzania condemned. There had been nothing new in the statement of the United Kingdom representative: he had merely avoided the main issue, the obligation to allow the populations of those Territories to exercise their right of self-determination. There could be no possible doubt on that matter: that obligation was one of those laid upon the administering Power both by resolution 2066 (XX) on Mauritius and by resolution 2069 (XX) on, inter alia, the Seychelles and St. Helena. So far as the latter Territories were concerned, resolution 2069 (XX) also requested the administering Power to allow United Nations visiting missions to visit the Territories, and to extend to them full co-operation and assistance. Those were perfectly natural requests and there should be no difficulty in implementing those resolutions if the administering Power were to honour its obligations and respect the decisions which the General Assembly had taken in accordance with the Charter. But what had happened since the adoption of those resolutions? The Chagos Archipelago had become part of the new British Indian Ocean Territory. That decision had been taken scarcely a month before the adoption of General Assembly resolution 2066 (XX), which invited the administering Power to take no action which would dismember the Territory of Mauritius and violate its territorial integrity. The present situation therefore made it highly unlikely that Mauritius would accede to independence in 1966, as had been envisaged. Instead of implementing the General Assembly resolutions, the United Kingdom Government had endeavoured to delay the important steps which it should have taken by forming an electoral commission, which had produced what might be called a scientific constitution. The strong opposition to that strange constitution was therefore quite natural, and indeed it was most unlikely that the United Kingdom Government had ever expected the Mauritians to accept it. In that connexion, the agreement which had been reached between the Under-Secretary of State for Colonies and opposition representatives in Mauritius was of no significance because there was no evidence that the discussions had been held freely. The United Kingdom Government should remember, however, that every time it had endeavoured to draw up the constitution of one of its former colonies without taking due regard of the interests of the population, those constitutions had always come to nought and had been replaced by genuinely democratic instruments.

44. The manner in which the British Indian Ocean Territory had been set up and the haste with which it had been done could not but engender suspicion. His delegation had reason to believe that the Territory was to become a military base. Apart from the threat posed by such bases to neighbouring countries in the event of war, the example of Ascension Island, which had been used by mercenaries as a base for attacking the Congolese freedom fighters, could not be forgotten. The Special Committee should therefore aim at guaranteeing the territorial integrity of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, and ensuring that they would not be used for military purposes.

45. The economic situation of those Territories was scarcely satisfactory at the moment. There had been a considerable decline in both agriculture and industry, which in 1964 had represented 24 and 15 per cent, respectively, of the gross national product of Mauritius, while unemployment was increasing rapidly. Monoculture should therefore be abandoned on Mauritius, as well as on Seychelles and St. Helena, if special disturbances were to be avoided. While it was doing nothing to stop the Southern Rhodesian Government from depriving 4 million Africans of the right to rule their own country, the United Kingdom Government had seen fit to send two warships to the Seychelles to compel strikers to resume work.

46. In conclusion, he hoped that reason would prevail and that the administering Power would eventually leave the peoples of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena to rule their country as they wished.

47. The representative of Yugoslavia recalled General Assembly resolution 2066 (XX) on the question of Mauritius, in which the Assembly had, in particular, invited the administering Power to take no action which would violate the integrity of the Territory; the Assembly had likewise adopted resolution 2069 (XX) concerning a number of small Territories, including Seychelles and St. Helena. It seemed that, in spite of the provisions of those resolutions, the administering Power had not only failed to take effective measures for ensuring the independence of those Territories, in accordance with the provisions of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, but it had even undertaken some measures contrary to those provided for in the Declaration.

48. His delegation considered that the development of those Territories was still very slow, because of the interests which the administering Power hoped to preserve there as long as possible. As early as 1964, the Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held in Cairo, had condemned the intentions expressed by imperialist Powers of establishing military bases in the Indian Ocean, holding that such bases would constitute a threat to the new Afro-Asian countries and impede the process of decolonization. The course of events had shown that the Conference had been right, for in November 1965 the United Kingdom had decided to establish the new British Indian Ocean Territory as the site of defence bases for the United Kingdom and the United States of America. In spite of the resignation of three Ministers of the Mauritius Social Democratic Party and the protests raised in Mauritius following that decision, the administering Power had not changed its position on the establishment of those bases, as was evident from the statement of the United Kingdom Defence Secretary contained in the Secretariat working paper (see para. 48 of chap. XIV).

49. As it had already stated, his delegation held that the United Kingdom was not entitled to dismember the Territory of Mauritius for the purpose of military installations. It considered that the Sub-Committee was duty bound to recommend to the Special Committee that the peoples of the Territories in question should accede without delay to independence, in accordance with their freely expressed wishes and with the provisions of the Declaration contained in resolution 1514 (XV). It further thought that the problem of the establishment of military bases through the dismemberment of Mauritius should be given particular attention, in accordance with the provisions of resolution 2066 (XX).

50. The representative of Denmark expressed his satisfaction that the Territory of Mauritius was to accede to independence the following year, in accordance with the agreement established at the Constitutional Conference in London in September 1965. Following negotiations between the administering Power and the island's three main political parties, the electoral provisions made in the original draft Constitution, which had aroused some criticism by the parties, had been modified and subsequently approved by all concerned. In that connexion, the electoral system drawn up for Mauritius might seem at first to be unduly elaborate, but a similar and equally elaborate system had been functioning in Denmark for a long time, to everyone's satisfaction. Experience had shown that the system fulfilled its purpose perfectly, which was to assure fair and equal representation of all voters. The elections which were to take place on Mauritius would ensure the establishment of an autonomous Government and subsequently, after an interval of six months, accession to independence. The economic and social situation in the Territory seemed satisfactory, thanks to the determined efforts made by the authorities and the people to overcome the severe difficulties due to the losses caused a few years ago by two cyclones. Moreover, the authorities had been trying for some years to diversify the island's economy, which, at present, depended largely on its sugar production. The Danish Government thought, therefore, that the Territory of Mauritius could advance confidently towards independence, and it was looking forward to maintaining the best of relations with the new State.

51. With regard to Seychelles and St. Helena, his delegation considered, as it had often stated, that it was for the people of those Territories, and for them alone, to determine their constitutional future. The size, population and economy of those Territories might justify the adoption of special constitutional arrangements, which should not be ruled out, provided they met with the support of the population.

52. His delegation thought that in its report to the Special Committee, the Sub-Committee should express its satisfaction with the considerable progress made by the Territory of Mauritius on the path towards independence and should express the hope that the forthcoming elections would be another proof of the population's desire to accede to independence. With regard to Seychelles and St. Helena, the Sub-Committee's recommendations should take account of the special circumstances prevailing in those Territories and should, therefore, not contain any proposals which might be incompatible with those circumstances and perhaps with the wishes of the population concerned.

B. Conclusions

53. The study of the situation in Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena shows that the administering Power has so far not only failed to implement the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) in these Territories, but has also violated the territorial integrity of two of them by creating a new territory, the British Indian Ocean Territory, composed of islands detached from Mauritius and Seychelles, in direct contravention to resolution 2066 (XX) of the General Assembly.

54. The Sub-Committee notes with regret the slow pace of political development in the Territories, particularly in Seychelles and St. Helena. This has delayed the transfer of powers to democratically elected representatives of the people and the attainment of independence. Key positions of responsibility in the administration of the Territories seem to be still in the hands of United Kingdom personnel.

55. The Sub-Committee notes with deep concern the reports pointing to the activation of a plan purporting among other things to establish military bases in Mauritius and Seychelles as well as an air base on Ascension Island, a plan which is causing anxiety in the Territories concerned and among people in Africa and Asia and which runs contrary to the provisions of resolution 2105 (XX) of the General Assembly.

56. The electoral arrangements devised for Mauritius apart from being complex in themselves seem to have been the subject of great controversy between the various groups and political parties. Regarding the Seychelles, the Sub-Committee regrets that people are still deprived of the right of universal suffrage.

57. The economy of the Territories, particularly Mauritius, is characterized by diminishing revenue, increasing unemployment and consequently a declining standard of living. Foreign companies continue to exploit the Territories without regard to the true interests of the inhabitants.

C. Recommendations

58. The Sub-Committee recommends that the Special Committee reaffirm the inalienable right of the peoples of Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena to self-determination and independence in accordance with the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The administering Power should therefore be urged again to allow the populations of the three Territories to exercise without delay their right of self-determination.

59. Any constitutional changes should be left to the people of the Territories themselves, who alone have the right to decide on the form of government they wish to adopt.

60. Free elections on the basis of universal adult suffrage should be conducted in the Territories as soon as possible. The elections should lead to the establishment of representative organs which would choose responsible governments to which all powers could be transferred.

61. The administering Power should be called upon to respect the territorial integrity of Mauritius and Seychelles and to insure that they would not be used for military purposes.

62. In fulfilment of the provisions of paragraph 12 of General Assembly resolution 2105 (XX), the administering Power should be called upon to refrain from establishing military bases in the Territories.

63. The Special Committee should recommend to the General Assembly to state categorically that any bilateral agreements concluded between the administering Power and other Powers affecting the sovereignty and fundamental rights of the Territories should not be recognized as valid.

64. The administering Power should be called upon to preserve the right of the indigenous inhabitants to dispose of all the wealth and natural resources of their countries. It should be urged to undertake effective measures in order to diversify the economy of the Territories.

D. Adoption of the report

65. This report was adopted by the Sub-Committee at its 32nd meeting on 19 September 1966. The representative of

Denmark stated that certain parts of the conclusions and the recommendations of the report did not conform with his delegation's opinion as expressed in the Sub-Committee's meeting on 12 September 1966 (see paras. 50-52 above). His delegation therefore could not support all the conclusions and recommendations of the report.

CHAPTER XXIII*

INFORMATION ON NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER OF THE UNITED NATIONS AND RELATED QUESTIONS

1. By its resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, the General Assembly dissolved the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and, inter alia, requested the Special Committee to study the information transmitted to the Secretary-General in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter and to take it fully into account in examining the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

2. It will be recalled that in order to discharge its functions under the above resolution, the Special Committee, at its 315th meeting on 17 November 1964, approved certain procedures which had been suggested by the Secretary-General (A/5800/Rev.1,<sup>1</sup> chap. II, appendix I). These procedures were later also approved by the General Assembly in its resolution 2109 (XX).

3. In compliance with operative paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 1970 (XVIII) and in accordance with the procedures approved by the General Assembly, the latest information transmitted by Administering Members was used in preparation of the working paper by the Secretariat on most of the Territories for the Special Committee. This information was taken into account by the Committee in its consideration of the Territories concerned and is reflected in the chapter of the Special Committee's report dealing with each of these Territories.

4. In its resolution 2109 (XX), adopted on 21 December 1965, the General Assembly, besides approving the procedures referred to above and requesting the Special Committee to continue to discharge the functions entrusted to it in accordance with those procedures, addressed itself to Administering Members as follows:

"2. Expresses its regret that not all Member States having responsibilities for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories have seen fit to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations;

"3. Once again urges all Member States which have or which assume responsibilities for the administration of Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government to transmit, or continue to transmit, to the Secretary-General information as prescribed under Article 73 e of the Charter, as well as the fullest possible information on political and constitutional development".

5. In accordance with the procedures referred to above, the Special Committee, at its 472nd and 473rd meetings, held on 12 and 19 October 1966, considered a report by the Secretary-General (see appendix) on the information which had been transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter up to 18 October 1966 and on the action which had been taken in implementation of General Assembly resolution 1970 (XVIII).

6. At the 472nd meeting, the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that the Special Committee was once again obliged to note the fact that the fascist Government of Portugal had transmitted no information on the Territories under its administration. No condemnation could be too strong for a Government which constantly made mock of the rules recognized by the entire international community. It was common knowledge that the Portuguese Government was engaged in carrying out a policy of extermination in the Territories under its administration. The atrocities committed in those Territories were now beyond number, and members of the Committee had been able to see for themselves their full horror in the films exhibited for their benefit during their stay at Algiers. The ultimate goal of the war being waged in the Territories in question was to enable Portugal to exploit all their resources to the point of exhaustion, if necessary; and in that process of exploitation Portugal was calling on the services of foreign companies and financial groups. In that intolerable situation it was more than ever necessary that the General Assembly should be presented with information on the Territories administered by Portugal—information which the administering Power was anxious at all costs to conceal from the eyes of the world. At a moment when the machinations of the monopolies were more than ever being concealed behind the cloak of Portuguese policy, it was important that they should be exposed.

7. The report by the Secretary-General also showed that other administering Powers had failed to communicate to the United Nations all the information expected of them. For example, New Zealand had provided no information for the year ended March 1966, and the Special Committee should therefore request it to carry out its obligations as promptly as possible. The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland had transmitted no information on Southern Rhodesia; doubtless it proposed to provide no clarification of the situation in that Territory. The United Kingdom's entire attitude in the Southern Rhodesian question, in any event, confirmed that its sole purpose was to mislead world opinion, for while proclaiming its intention to take action against the Ian Smith régime it was in fact carrying on discussions with the representatives of that régime as between equals. That attitude of defiance, which had long since become intolerable, called for energetic action, and the Committee should insist on the United Kingdom Government's transmitting information on Southern Rhodesia.

8. The information transmitted by the United States of America related solely to the year 1964. Yet it had been reported in the Press in late September 1966 that one of the United States Samoan Islands was to be transformed into a "tourist paradise". From the reports published in the Press, the truth seemed to be that the planned improvements served the interests of the tourists alone, and in no way those of the indigenous inhabitants.

9. Generally speaking, the information on the Non-Self-Governing Territories was most unsatisfactory, being either fragmentary or insufficiently complete. The delegation of the United Republic of Tanzania therefore considered that an effort should be made without delay to improve its quality.

10. At the 473rd meeting, the Chairman drew attention to a letter dated 18 October 1966 addressed to him by the Permanent Representative of New Zealand to the United Nations, copies of which had been made available to members. In the letter, the Permanent Representative of New Zealand stated that his Government took most seriously the obligation to provide full information on the Territories under its administration, and expressed regret that a member of the Special Committee had been moved to express criticism of his Government's execution of that important obligation. The Permanent Representative of New Zealand also stated that advance copies of the reports for the year ended 31 March 1966 had been formally transmitted to the Secretary-General a few days earlier. As the detailed information required by General Assembly resolution 551 (VI) took months to gather, it was difficult for an administering Power to furnish such information any earlier than his Government had done. Furthermore, his delegation had previously made available directly to Sub-Committee II comprehensive information on the Territories under New Zealand administration, which, in his view was more directly useful to the Committee than the statistical material called for under resolution 551 (VI).

11. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, supported by the representative of Syria, said that some administering Powers had transmitted information so late that the effect was as though they had not supplied the information, since the delay prevented the Special Committee from studying it and using it for its report. One administering Power, for example, had transmitted its information on 14 October. If the information was not submitted at the proper time, the Committee could hardly give it more than routine consideration, which did not further the cause of decolonization.

12. The representative of India noted that paragraph 3 of the Secretary-General's report pointed out that two Powers had not complied with Article 73 e of the Charter or with the relevant General Assembly resolutions; no information had been transmitted on the Territories under Portuguese administration or on Southern Rhodesia.

13. Portugal's attitude, in holding that those Territories were a part of the metropolitan country, despite their distance from that country and despite General Assembly resolution 1542 (XV), which established that they were Non-Self-Governing Territories, should be condemned.

14. The United Kingdom's position on Southern Rhodesia was regrettable; however plausible it might seem to affirm that the Territory had been self-governing since 1923, that position was not acceptable to India or to the majority in the United Nations. General Assembly resolution 1747 (XVI) specified that Southern Rhodesia was a Non-Self-Governing Territory and that information on it should be transmitted in accordance with the Charter. The argument that the United Kingdom could not intervene in that Territory was indefensible since the unilateral declaration of independence; the United Kingdom itself had declared that the régime in Southern Rhodesia was in a state of rebellion against the United Kingdom Government and that the Territory could not be regarded as independent. In 1965 the United Kingdom had claimed that the question of Southern Rhodesia was exclusively within its jurisdiction and now, whether it wished to or not, it was obliged to take action. It could at least comply with Article 73 e of the Charter.

15. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics supported the representatives of the United Republic of Tanzania and India with regard to the transmission of information by Portugal and the United Kingdom. Moreover, the information transmitted by the administering Power was not sufficient to throw light on the actual situation in colonial territories. He repeated a request made the previous year by his delegation to the effect that the Secretariat should obtain from other sources information which the administering Powers failed to supply, in order to provide a more complete picture which would permit more thorough consideration and make it possible to prepare specific statements on the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration.

16. The representative of Mali considered that Portugal should be condemned for not sending information on the Territories under its administration. Although such information as it might supply would be of only relative value, since its days as an administering Power were numbered, it should nevertheless comply with the Charter.

17. The United Kingdom Prime Minister did not recognize the unilaterally proclaimed independence of Southern Rhodesia and properly termed it illegal. That being the case, Article 73 of the Charter continued to be applicable, but the United Kingdom did not transmit information. The United Kingdom must decide whether Southern Rhodesia was a colony or whether, on the contrary, its régime was legal, as it seemed to admit by conducting secret negotiations with it.

18. The representative of Bulgaria said that the majority in the Special Committee shared the Tanzanian representative's view regarding the delay in the transmission of information. That situation was inadmissible, particularly since the information was also frequently incomplete, as the representative of the USSR had pointed out.

19. It was surprising that no information was supplied on Southern Rhodesia, which not only the Committee but also the General Assembly regarded as a matter of serious concern.

20. Information on American Samoa for 1964 had been transmitted only on 4 February 1966, so that the Committee did not have complete and timely data to assist it in its deliberations. It was to be hoped that the Committee would take a stronger stand in the future so that the administering Powers might be induced to heed its views.

21. The representative of the United States of America, referring to the efforts of the Tanzanian delegate at the preceding meeting to suggest that there was something sinister in reported plans to develop tourism in American Samoa by establishing a park and constructing a tourist hotel, said that some of these allegations were too far-fetched to call for a response. The development of tourism was a significant aspect of economic policy in many areas of the world today, both non-self-governing and independent. The inference made at the preceding meeting was probably as puzzling to other members of the Special Committee as it was to his delegation.

22. The series of articles from which an excerpt was quoted was interesting and informative, and he commended it to the attention of anyone interested in American Samoa. With respect to the allegation that the projected investments in tourism would not benefit the indigenous inhabitants, he quoted from an article from the same series which stated that the United States policy of keeping American Samoa for the Samoans barred land ownership or settlement by mainland Americans and any business activity by outsiders in which Samoans would not have major participation. The Tanzanian delegate's analysis of this series of articles was quite incomplete and this aspect of United States policy seemed to have escaped his notice.

23. With regard to the providing of up-to-date information, he said that the current report on American Samoa was in preparation but that much of the substance had already been conveyed to the Committee in the detailed statements in Sub-Committee II. There was no intention, as the delegate from Tanzania seemed to be suggesting, to withhold information. Such a policy would be impossible, since American Samoa was wide open to regular factual reporting by the Press.

24. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania, referring to a letter from the Permanent Representative of New Zealand to the United Nations which had been made available informally to the members of the Committee, said that it was absolutely essential for information on Non-Self-Governing Territories to reach the United Nations early enough for it to be used in discussion on the respective items. The explanation New Zealand gave in the letter in question was unacceptable and inappropriate. The tone of the United States representative's comments was inappropriate; the information on American Samoa for 1964 had not arrived until February 1966, and the information for 1965 had still not arrived. That was no way to co-operate with the United Nations, and he hoped that the matter would be brought to the General Assembly's attention.

25. The Chairman agreed with the representative of Tanzania about the statements in the letter and added that, contrary to the implication contained in the New Zealand representative's letter, it was not for the administering Power to decide what kind of information was most useful.

26. The representatives of Syria and Iraq shared the Tanzanian representative's views concerning the attitude expressed in the New Zealand representative's letter. In their opinion it should not be allowed to pass without criticism.

27. The representative of Australia said that New Zealand should be invited to take part in the discussion, if it desired to do so.

28. The Chairman stated that, according to its procedure, the Special Committee could not comply with that suggestion, since it had not received any request from New Zealand.

29. The representative of Chile pointed out that delays in transmitting information made the Secretariat's work more difficult. It was regrettable that Portugal was not transmitting any information at all and that, in addition, the United Kingdom was not transmitting information on Southern Rhodesia, which was undoubtedly still a colony.

30. The Chairman suggested that, if there were no objections, the Special Committee should take note of the Secretary-General's report and include it in its report to the General Assembly.

31. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania thought that mention should be made of some of the fears which had been expressed about the lateness or incompleteness of information.

32. The representative of Tunisia, supported by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, said that his delegation's primary concern was that the Special Committee should receive information as to the date when the administering Power intended to carry out the transfer of powers requested in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), paragraph 5. He was in general agreement with those who had already spoken of the lack of co-operation on the part of the administering Powers and he supported the Chairman's suggestion, with the addition proposed by the representative of Tanzania. He asked the Chairman to suggest a text which would command a consensus in the Committee.

33. The Chairman suggested a text whereby the Special Committee would take note of the report of the Secretary-General and also of the fact that some administering Powers have transmitted information under Article 73 e. At the same time it would deplore the fact that other administering Powers had not done so or had done so insufficiently or too late.

34. The representatives of Mali and the United Republic of Tanzania suggested that the lack of co-operation on the part of certain administering Powers should be brought to the General Assembly's attention and that the administering Powers should be asked to say when they intended to grant independence to their colonies.

35. The representative of Uruguay, supported by the representative of India, agreed with the text the Chairman had suggested. He also agreed with the representatives of Mali and Tanzania, but said that the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) was much too important a question to be confused with the question of the transmission of information.

36. The representative of the United Kingdom said that his delegation could not support that text since it could not be divorced from the preceding discussion and the United Kingdom was one of the administering Powers to which it might appear to refer. Moreover, he could not agree with many statements made during the debate, especially some of the references to the New Zealand letter. In addition, it was for the administering Power to decide when and how much information on Non-Self-Governing Territories was to be transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. It was not the case that the United Kingdom Government had failed to transmit information or that the information was inadequate or late.

37. The representative of the United States of America reserved his delegation's position on the text the Chairman had suggested.

38. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics pointed out that the consensus indicated in the Chairman's suggested text did not in fact exist among the members of the Special Committee, since some delegations had expressed differing views and others had entered reservations. Therefore, if the Committee wished to reach a consensus, it should pursue its examination of the question further.

39. The representative of Tunisia observed that the reservations made the consensus text quite valueless.

40. The representative of Mali thought it astonishing that some administering Powers were refusing to comply with the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter, which they themselves had helped to draft.

41. The representative of Australia agreed with the United Kingdom representative that it was for the administering Powers to decide when they were to send the information requested.

42. At its 473rd meeting, on 19 October 1966, the Special Committee decided without objection to adopt the text suggested by the Chairman as representing the consensus in the Committee, it being understood that the comments made by representatives would be included in the record of the meeting. The text adopted by the Committee reads as follows:

"The Special Committee takes note of the report of the Secretary-General. The Special Committee also takes note of the fact that some administering Powers have transmitted information under Article 73 e of the Charter, and deplores the fact that other administering Powers have not done so, or have done so insufficiently or too late."

43. The Committee further decided to include the report of the Secretary-General in its report to the General Assembly. This document appears as an appendix to the present chapter.

44. At the same meeting, the Special Committee decided, without objection, to transmit to the General Assembly the information contained in the working papers prepared by the Secretariat on the Territories which it might be unable to consider before the closing of its meetings in 1966. This information is included in separate chapters of the present report.

APPENDIX

[A/AC.109/203 and Add.1]

Information on non-self-governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations: report of the Secretary-General

TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

1. The Secretary-General's previous report on this subject (A/6000/Rev.1, chap. XXVI, appendix), listed the dates on which information was transmitted to the Secretary-General under Article 73 e of the Charter up to 7 September 1965. The table at the end of the present report shows the dates on which such information was transmitted in respect of the years 1964 and 1965.

2. The information transmitted under Article 73 e follows in general the standard form approved by the General Assembly and includes information on geography, history, population, economic, social and educational conditions. In the case of Territories under the administration of Australia, New Zealand and the United States of America, the annual reports of the matters, were transmitted. Additional information on political and constitutional developments in Territories under their administration was also given by the representatives of Australia, New Zealand, Spain, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America during meetings of the Special Committee.

3. No information has been transmitted to the Secretary-General concerning Territories under Portuguese administration, which, by resolution 1542 (XV) of 15 December 1960, the General Assembly considered were Non-Self-Governing Territories within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter. Nor has the Secretary-General received information concerning Southern Rhodesia which, the Assembly affirmed by resolution 1747 (XVI) of 28 June 1962, was a Non-Self-Governing Territory within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter.

STUDY OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER

4. In compliance with the provisions of operative paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963 and operative paragraph 4 of resolution 2109 (XX) of 21 December 1965, which requested the Special Committee to study the information transmitted under Article 73 e, and in accordance with the procedure approved by the Special Committee in 1964, the Secretariat has continued to use the information transmitted in the preparation of working papers on each Territory for the Special Committee.

CHAPTER I*

ESTABLISHMENT, ORGANIZATION AND ACTIVITIES OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

A. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

1. The General Assembly, at its fifteenth session, by resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960, adopted the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

2. At its sixteenth session, the General Assembly considered the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration and adopted resolution 1654 (XVI) of 27 November 1961, by which it established a Special Committee of seventeen members to examine the application of the Declaration, to make suggestions and recommendations on the progress and extent of the implementation of the Declaration and to report to the General Assembly at its seventeenth session. The Special Committee was directed "to carry out its task by employment of all means which it will have at its disposal within the framework of the procedures and modalities which it shall adopt for the proper discharge of its functions".

3. At its seventeenth session, the General Assembly, following its consideration of the report of the Special Committee,<sup>1</sup> adopted resolution 1810 (XVII) of 17 December 1962, by which it enlarged the Special Committee by the addition of seven new members. It invited the Special Committee "to continue to seek the most suitable ways and means for the speedy and total application of the Declaration to all territories which have not yet attained independence".

4. At the same session, the General Assembly, in its resolution 1805 (XVII) of 14 December 1962 on the question of South West Africa, requested the Special Committee to discharge mutatis mutandis the tasks assigned to the Special Committee for South West Africa by resolution 1702 (XVI) of 19 December 1961. By resolution 1806 (XVII) of 14 December 1962, the General Assembly decided to dissolve the Special Committee for South West Africa.

5. The General Assembly, at its eighteenth session, following its consideration of the report of the Special Committee,<sup>2</sup> adopted resolution 1956 (XVIII) of 11 December 1963. In this resolution, it requested the Special Committee "to continue to seek the best ways and means for the immediate and total application of the Declaration to all Territories which have not yet attained independence, and to report to the General Assembly not later than at its nineteenth session".

6. At the same session, the General Assembly, in its resolution 1899 (XVIII) of 13 November 1963 on the question of South West Africa, requested the Special Committee to continue its efforts with a view to discharging the tasks assigned to it by resolution 1805 (XVII).

7. The General Assembly at the same session, by resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963, decided to dissolve the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and requested the Special Committee to study the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations. It also requested the Special Committee to take this information fully into account in examining the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration in each of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and to undertake any special study and prepare any special report it might consider necessary.

8. At its nineteenth session, the General Assembly was unable to consider the report of the Special Committee on its work during 1964.<sup>3</sup> The Special Committee, however, continued to discharge its mandate during 1965 in the context of the declaration made by the President at the 1330th plenary meeting of the General Assembly at its nineteenth session, on 18 February 1965, to the effect that the General Assembly should for its own official records note that reports relating, inter alia, to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples had in fact been received and that those bodies which had continuing responsibilities such as the Special Committee should continue to function, subject to the agreed budgetary limits for 1965.

9. At its twentieth session, the General Assembly, following its consideration of the reports of the Special Committee,<sup>4</sup> adopted resolution 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965. In this resolution it requested the Special Committee "to continue to perform its task and to continue to seek the best means for the immediate and full application of resolution 1514 (XV) to all Territories which have not yet attained independence".

10. The General Assembly, at its twenty-first session, following its consideration of the report of the Special Committee,<sup>5</sup> adopted resolution 2189 (XXI) of 13 December 1966.

[For the text of this resolution, see Official Records of the General Assembly, Twenty-first Session, Supplement No. 16.]

11. At the same session, the General Assembly adopted a number of other resolutions assigning certain specific tasks to the Special Committee. Among these were the following resolutions concerning the items indicated:

13. This report covers the work of the Special Committee for the period 9 February 1967 to 5 December 1967 during which it held 89 plenary meetings, including thirty-two meetings away from Headquarters. In the same period its working group and sub-committees held over 100 meetings.

B. OPENING OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE'S MEETINGS IN 1967

14. The first meeting of the Special Committee in 1967 (484th meeting), held on 9 February, was opened by the Secretary-General.

Opening statement by the Secretary-General

15. The Secretary-General said he was very glad to have the opportunity of being present at the opening meeting of the session of the Special Committee. It gave him much pleasure to extend a warm welcome to all the representatives, and in particular to the representative of Finland, the newest member of the Committee.

16. As members would recall, he had had occasion to make the following remarks in the introduction to his last annual report on the work of the Organization:

"The extent to which decolonization has progressed in the last few years serves only to underline the anomaly of the fact that several million people are still subject to colonial rule—and, worse still, that most of these live under régimes which offer them no hope of an early and peaceful emancipation. It must be admitted that, while the United Nations has been in the forefront of support for the principle of self-determination, and while it has done much to encourage and at times to assist the emergence of dependent peoples, it has so far failed to provide or facilitate effective solutions to the several difficult and serious colonial problems which remain."<sup>6</sup>

17. It had been with great interest that he had noted during the debate in the General Assembly at its twenty-first session concerning the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples that that assessment corresponded with the views of the majority of the Members. A large number of Members had observed, as he himself had done, that the failure of the United Nations in regard to the problems referred to had not been due to lack of concern or effort. Rather, as they had pointed out, that failure had been principally due to the non-compliance of certain administering Powers with the relevant United Nations resolutions, and to the reluctance of some others to extend their full co-operation in giving effect to those resolutions.

18. That, then, was the context in which the General Assembly, in its resolution 2189 (XXI) of 13 December 1966, had requested the Special Committee to continue to perform its tasks and to seek suitable means for the immediate and full implementation of the Declaration in all Territories which had not yet attained independence. In amplification of that mandate, the General Assembly had invited the Committee, whenever it considered it proper and appropriate, to recommend a deadline for the accession to independence of each Territory, to pay particular attention to the small Territories and to make any concrete suggestions to the Security Council which might assist the Council in considering appropriate measures regarding developments in dependent Territories which might threaten international peace and security.

19. The increasing concern of the United Nations at the delay in the implementation of the Declaration, as also the wide consensus existing among Members with regard to questions of decolonization, had been equally manifest in the proceedings of the Fourth Committee during the twenty-first session. Impelled by that concern, the Fourth Committee, as it had done during the twentieth session, had given separate attention not only to the more serious and difficult colonial problems but also to many other individual questions, the special character of which required careful examination. In consequence, it had become possible for the Assembly, on the recommendation of that Committee, to adopt a number of specific resolutions which, taking account of the peculiarities of each situation, outlined in concrete terms the measures and procedures required in particular Territories for the attainment of the objectives laid down in the Charter and in the Declaration.

20. It went without saying that the work of the Special Committee in that regard would include following up and supervising the implementation of those resolutions, reviewing the situation in each Territory, carrying out other tasks as requested by the Assembly, and, in the light of developments, recommending further measures as appropriate for the speedy application of the Declaration. In addition, there were a number of specific points arising from other resolutions of the General Assembly and from previous decisions taken by the Committee itself to which members would wish to give attention in establishing the Committee's programme of work for the year. That programme of work would undoubtedly be strenuous; furthermore, many of the problems which the Committee was called upon to examine had themselves increased both in difficulty and gravity.

21. The question of Southern Rhodesia, the universal and serious concern regarding which was registered in the resolutions recently adopted by the Security Council and the General Assembly, was one of those problems. When it took up that question, the Special Committee would, he was sure, be guided, as it had been in the past, by the need to secure rapid and positive movement towards a solution in keeping with the aspirations of the people of the Territory.

22. Concerning South West Africa, members were of course aware that, pursuant to General Assembly resolution 2145 (XXI), the Ad Hoc Committee for South West Africa was examining the practical means by which South West Africa should be administered, so as to enable the people of the Territory to exercise the right of self-determination and to achieve independence. As the Secretary-General had stated elsewhere, the question of South West Africa also remained the concern of the Special Committee within the context of the implementation of the Declaration, and would no doubt receive the attention of the Committee as appropriate.

23. With regard to the question of the Territories under Portuguese administration, no progress could be recorded in the implementation of the relevant United Nations resolutions. Considering that the need to enable the peoples of those Territories to exercise fully and in freedom their right to self-determination and independence was more imperative than ever, he was certain that the question would be the subject of further examination by the Special Committee.

24. On Aden, his consultations in regard to the appointment of a special mission, as requested by the General Assembly in its resolution 2183 (XXI), were still in progress. It was his confident hope that the work of the proposed mission would be of assistance to the Special Committee and the General Assembly in enabling the people of Aden to attain independence in conditions of peace and harmony.

25. The emphasis placed by the General Assembly on the importance of sending a special mission to Aden was, in his judgement, a reflection of the widely held conviction that the United Nations could play an increasingly useful role in bringing dependent Territories to independence. It was in line with that conviction that stress was laid, in the General Assembly's resolutions on Fiji and on Territories in the Caribbean, Indian and Pacific Ocean areas, on the sending of visiting missions. In that connexion, it would be pertinent to reiterate that, especially with respect to the small Territories, visiting missions had an indisputable value; they were a means of securing adequate information on conditions in the Territories and on the views, wishes and aspirations of their inhabitants.

26. As a further indication of the role envisaged for the United Nations by the majority of Members, it was also noteworthy that on French Somaliland, Ifni and Spanish Sahara and Equatorial Guinea the relevant General Assembly resolutions called for various forms of participation by the United Nations in the processes involved in the exercise by the inhabitants of those Territories of their right to self-determination. He was in communication with the administering Powers concerned regarding the discharge of the mandate entrusted to him by the General Assembly in those resolutions, and he would of course report to the Special Committee and the General Assembly on developments in that regard.

27. In conclusion, he wished to express to the Special Committee his best wishes for the success of its work and the earnest hope that the necessary co-operation would be made available by the administering Powers. He was as conscious of the magnitude and difficulty of the tasks facing the Committee in 1967 as he was convinced of their importance. He was, however, confident that the Committee's work during the year would represent a further positive contribution towards the realization by dependent peoples of their aspirations to freedom and independence.

Election of officers

28. At its 484th meeting, on 9 February 1967, the Special Committee unanimously elected the following officers:

Chairman:

Mr. John W. S. Malecela (United Republic of Tanzania)

Vice-Chairmen:

Mr. Kadhim Khalaf (Iraq) and

Mr. Manuel Pérez Guerrero (Venezuela)

Rapporteur:

Mr. Mohsen Sadigh Estandiary (Iran)

Statement by the Chairman

29. The Chairman said that he considered his election an indirect tribute to Mr. Julius Nyerere and to the Government and People of Tanzania for the vigorous struggle which they had never ceased to wage against colonialism.

30. Recalling that the task of decolonization was still unfinished, as a large part of the human race, particularly in Africa, was still subjected to merciless oppression, he pointed out that that situation was due to the non-co-operation of certain colonial Powers. Portugal, in particular, remained adamant, while the practice of cruelty and massacre was being intensified against the African people of Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea. The South African racists also were persisting in their brutal suppression of the aspirations of the people of South West Africa. Although the question of South West Africa had that year been referred more particularly to an Ad Hoc Committee established by the General Assembly, it still remained within the realm of the Special Committee. It was therefore to be hoped that the latter would maintain its vigilance on the problem and give the Ad Hoc Committee on South West Africa its fullest co-operation.

31. In Southern Rhodesia, the situation could only be described as tragic, because the issue at stake was the possible establishment in Africa of another apartheid régime. The way in which the United Kingdom Government had reacted to the situation in Southern Rhodesia was regrettable, especially as more than a year had passed since the unilateral declaration of independence and no concerted effort had been made by the United Kingdom Government to put down the rebellion. The Tanzanian delegation wished to reiterate that the proposed sanctions would never work in Southern Rhodesia. The whole question of Southern Rhodesia had to be approached realistically, because the Smith régime would never fall without the use of force. For the Africans, it was a question not of the white racists' power of resistance but of the moral obligations the United Nations had towards 4 million Africans. That moral consideration should supersede all other considerations and, in particular, all kinds of relationships, whether economic or military.

32. The situation in Aden seemed to be the reverse of that in Southern Rhodesia, and he hoped that the members of the Committee would give that question the full attention it deserved.

33. In the case of the Territories administered by Spain, the Committee had witnessed a new departure in its work, namely, an invitation by Spain to visit one of the Territories administered by it. The results had so far been encouraging. In particular, that new trend had encouraged the General Assembly to call for more of that co-operation between the Special Committee and the administering Powers. He therefore took that opportunity to appeal to those Powers to agree to the sending of visiting missions to the various colonies—for example, to the numerous islands in the Caribbean. He personally was convinced that the process of decolonization would as a result be considerably accelerated.

34. In 1965 at Addis Ababa, Mr. Coulibaly, then Chairman of the Special Committee, had appealed to the Security Council to meet in Africa. He himself wished to renew that appeal and ask the Council seriously to consider meeting in Africa during 1967 to examine the many African problems, especially the Rhodesian problem. It would be more advantageous for that important organ of peace to meet near the roots of the trouble if it was to help Africa avoid becoming the scene of bitter conflict.

35. He wished to pay a tribute to Ambassador Collier, the outgoing Chairman, whose untiring devotion to the cause of decolonization would never be forgotten. After expressing his appreciation to the representatives of Chile and Iraq, the outgoing Vice-President and Rapporteur, respectively, and to the Danish delegation, which was no longer a member of the Committee, and after welcoming the representative of Finland and the new Under-Secretary for Trusteeship and Non-Self-Governing Territories, he said that he would endeavour—in particular, by organizing as many consultations as possible at all levels—to achieve the widest possible agreement within the Committee in order to solve the grave problems still remaining.

C. ORGANIZATION OF WORK

36. The Special Committee discussed the organization of its work for the year at its 484th to 487th meetings.

37. The Chairman recalled that the Special Committee had decided to hold two sessions in 1967, the first ending on 31 May and the second lasting from 17 July to 25 August. In order to assist the Committee, he wished to make some suggestions that might be referred to the Working Group for consideration, together with the views expressed by members.

38. Regarding the scope of its work, the Committee might wish, in addition to the assignments referred to it by the General Assembly in the relevant resolutions, to consider on its own initiative some problems of special interest. Referring in particular to operative paragraphs 12 and 20 of General Assembly resolution 2189 (XXI), operative paragraph 4 of General Assembly resolution 2232 (XXI) and operative paragraph 1 (b) of Assembly resolution 2160 (XXI), he mentioned two matters on which the Committee might decide to undertake a study. These were "Activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and Territories under Portuguese domination and in all other Territories under colonial domination" and the role of military activities and arrangements by the colonial Powers which might be impeding the implementation of the Declaration. It was pursuant to a recommendation of the Special Committee (A/6300/Rev.1, chap. III, para. 1134 (f)) that the General Assembly had decided to include in the agenda of its twenty-second session an item concerning the activities of foreign economic interests in colonial Territories.

39. The Working Group should be constituted and might be requested to submit recommendations without delay, regarding the order of priority of items to be considered in plenary meeting, bearing in mind the views expressed by members and taking into consideration the nature of recent developments in the various Territories, especially in the Caribbean area.

40. It might also be desirable for the Working Group to consider recommending that the Special Committee should maintain Sub-Committees I, II and III and request them to begin their work immediately. In addition to their existing terms of reference, the Special Committee might ask them to carry out the specific duties assigned by the General Assembly concerning the items referred to them. Any special studies which the Special Committee might decide to undertake could probably be referred to Sub-Committee I. The Sub-Committees might also be requested to submit specific recommendations without delay regarding the sending of visiting missions to the Territories with which they were concerned.

41. Any visiting missions that the Special Committee might dispatch to the various Territories should be sent before the third week of April 1967, whether the Territories were those studied by sub-committees or those which the Special Committee had discussed in plenary meeting the previous year. In either case account should be taken of the forthcoming special session of the Assembly, the decision previously taken by the Special Committee regarding its programme of meetings, and the further series of meetings which it might hold in Africa shortly.

42. For some of the missions, namely those to be sent to Aden, Equatorial Guinea, Spanish Sahara and French Somaliland, consultations were called for between the Secretary-General and the administering Powers and, as appropriate, with the Special Committee. It was to be hoped that the Secretary-General would report to the Special Committee on those matters at an early date.

43. The Special Committee would also have to decide on the establishment or prolongation of various sub-committees. Regarding Fiji, the Chairman would make the necessary arrangements for the appointment of a sub-committee in accordance with General Assembly resolution 2185 (XXI). He intended to begin appropriate consultations with the administering Power and to make an announcement as early as possible.

44. Concerning Aden, the Special Committee might wish to maintain the existing Sub-Committee and to request it to keep the situation in that Territory under continuous review. On Oman, the Special Committee could consider whether to set up a sub-committee to examine the situation in the Territory on the basis of General Assembly resolution 2238 (XXI) and to submit recommendations to the Special Committee.

45. The Chairman recalled the possibility of the Special Committee holding another series of meetings in Africa in 1967. There were indications that invitations might be extended by some Governments, and the Special Committee would no doubt wish to refer them to the Working Group for its consideration.

46. Finally, referring to resolution 2202 (XXI), in which the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to organize as soon as possible an international conference or seminar on the problems of apartheid, racial discrimination and colonialism in southern Africa, he observed that the Special Committee would be called upon to express its views on certain matters relating to the organization of the proposed seminar and the participation of the Special Committee itself. The Working Group might also be requested to submit recommendations thereon.

47. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that, at the outset of another year, the Special Committee should devote a certain amount of time to taking stock of what had been achieved and analysing the problems and tasks facing it. The continuation of colonialism was a challenge to all the freedom-loving and peace-loving forces of the world. Human freedom was indivisible, and colonialism was the enemy of freedom. Today, the threat to freedom and peace represented by colonialism was more serious than ever. In Africa, especially the southern part of Africa, colonialism was taking on a particularly dangerous form. It was manifested in the illegal régimes of the racist white minority in Southern Rhodesia, the prophets of apartheid in South Africa and South West Africa and the Portuguese aggressors in Mozambique and Angola. Those forces, which in their turn were tools of international imperialism, represented a threat not only to peace in southern Africa but also to international peace and security in general.

48. Although their activities had been condemned by the freedom-loving peoples of the world and in countless United Nations resolutions, the Portuguese colonialists continued to flout the basic principles of the Organization and persisted in their criminal war against the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and Guinea called Portuguese Guinea. It was able to do so only because of the hypocritical attitude of its military allies which, while professing allegiance to the principles of freedom and peace, supplied Portugal with weapons. Meanwhile, their nationals exploited the resources of the Territories. Foreign financial monopolies, in order to safeguard their super-profits, co-operated with the Portuguese in impeding the attainment of independence by the Territories. Although those monopolies might be private undertakings, the Western countries where they originated, such as the United Kingdom and the United States, profited indirectly from the sweat and blood of the African peoples. Exports from the Territories helped to reinforce the economic structures of the industrialized nations of the West. Some of the financial monopolies were making direct cash contributions, amounting to millions of escudos, toward the Portuguese war effort in Angola and Mozambique, and thus contributing to the crime against humanity being perpetrated by the Portuguese aggressors. The legitimate rights of the African peoples to freedom and independence were being denied and a threat to international peace and security was being perpetuated, particularly as the Portuguese imperialists were aiding and encouraging the illegal racist white minority régime in Southern Rhodesia.

49. The continuation of the situation in Southern Rhodesia was another source of danger for peace, security and freedom in southern Africa. The racist minority, having obtained control of the Territory by means of the notorious 1961 Constitution, which had been imposed by the United Kingdom against the wishes of the people, remained in power, and the current situation in Southern Rhodesia was simply a prolongation of colonialism. Despite eloquent statements by representatives of the administering Power, all measures which would have put an end to the racist régime had been frustrated, and responsibility for the continued sufferings of the African people of Zimbabwe lay with the United Kingdom Government. Although the heroic people of Zimbabwe, who were in the front line of the struggle against the forces of colonialism and racism, must play the main role in bringing about their liberation, the United Nations could do its part to help them achieve their goal. Part of the Committee's task during 1967 should be to study all the different elements of the Southern Rhodesian situation.

50. It was true that resolutions had been adopted calling for selective mandatory sanctions against the Southern Rhodesian régime. His delegation had always maintained that sanctions as proposed by the United Kingdom would not be effective. To put an end to the situation in Southern Rhodesia, force must be used, the racist minority must be isolated from its Portuguese and South African allies and the so-called rebellion must be crushed. As the Secretary-General had noted in his opening address, the failure of the Organization to resolve colonial problems had been due mainly to the non-compliance of certain administering Powers with relevant United Nations resolutions and the reluctance of others to co-operate fully with the United Nations. His delegation also fully supported the Chairman's suggestion that the Committee should undertake a study of the role of foreign interests in impeding the attainment of independence by the peoples of Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, the Territories under Portuguese domination and other colonial Territories. The activities of such financial interests were co-ordinated with those of the colonial Powers and formed part of a plan to establish neo-colonialism in the Territories concerned.

51. In South West Africa, the Pretoria régime was resorting to neo-fascist methods in suppressing the people. Although the question of South West Africa was under study by the Ad Hoc Committee for South West Africa, his delegation considered that the Special Committee must still undertake the task of making an over-all analysis of the situation in that Territory and formulate its own recommendations which could be adopted in conjunction with those that might be submitted by the Ad Hoc Committee.

52. His delegation welcomed the proposal in General Assembly resolution 2202 (XXI) for a seminar on the problems of apartheid, racial discrimination and colonialism in southern Africa. In its view, apartheid, racial discrimination and colonialism were all aspects of a single system. The Committee should consider the possibility of creating an ad hoc sub-committee to propose guidelines for that undertaking. He also hoped that the Chairman would, without delay, enter into consultations with the Secretary-General regarding the venue and other arrangements for the seminar.

53. He fully supported the Chairman's suggestions regarding those various matters. He would also like to suggest that the Office of Public Information should devote more attention to the dissemination of information concerning developments in colonial Territories.

54. Turning to the immediate question of the organization of the Special Committee's work, he supported the Chairman's view that certain recent developments called for urgent action. The announcement by the United Kingdom of preparations to convert the British colonies in the Caribbean into what were termed "associated States" was highly disturbing. The United Kingdom had not kept the United Nations fully informed of its intentions regarding the Territories concerned. The Committee should take into account the urgency of the situation and consider whether a mission should be sent to the area.

55. The colonial Powers had so far failed to implement the General Assembly resolutions on the dismantling of military bases in colonial Territories. He strongly supported the suggestion that a special study should be devoted to the question.

56. His delegation had always favoured the sending of visiting missions to colonial Territories. To secure the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, the Committee must be given facilities for visiting such Territories and appraising itself of the situation there. He welcomed the co-operation shown by the Spanish Government in that regard. The decision of the United Kingdom Government finally to agree to a mission to Aden was welcome. He hoped that the Committee would seek still more co-operation from the administering Powers in that respect.

57. His delegation would support a proposal for the Committee to hold some meetings in Africa during 1967.

58. The representative of Syria fully agreed with the Chairman that the Committee should pursue the study of specific aspects of colonialism with a view to helping the Assembly implement resolution 1514 (XV). The decision of the Assembly in resolution 2189 (XXI) to include in the agenda of its twenty-second session an item concerning the activities of foreign economic and other interests in colonial Territories was particularly important, and the Sub-Committee which dealt with such activities should resume its useful work without delay.

59. Almost all United Nations resolutions relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories emphasized the need to dismantle military bases established by the colonial Powers against the wishes of the people. The independence of such Territories could never be genuine until such sources of overt or covert coercion disappeared. The administering Powers, however, when they actually acknowledged that such bases existed, described them as small and benign military installations or as staging posts for port facilities. In view of the situation, the question of military bases should be studied by a special sub-committee.

60. The Sub-Committee on Aden should keep the situation in that Territory under constant review; it seemed that no real improvements had taken place since the adoption of General Assembly resolution 2183 (XXI) and that the administering Power was still determined to consolidate its grip on the Territory. Similarly, the United Kingdom's complete disregard of United Nations resolutions on Oman meant that the situation in that Territory was deteriorating; it was therefore urgently necessary for a sub-committee on Oman to be established, particularly since oil exploitation was about to begin in that Territory.

61. The change in the composition of the Sub-Committee on Petitions might perhaps be accompanied by a clarification of the terms of reference of that body. In his view, the Sub-Committee had full competence to scrutinize petitions and the status of petitioners. It was inconceivable that the Sub-Committee should serve any purpose contrary to that of the Special Committee, namely, decolonization.

62. In conclusion, his delegation strongly supported sending visiting missions to Non-Self-Governing Territories, organizing seminars on specific items and holding a further series of meetings in Africa. The Special Committee's visits to Africa were now a well-established tradition, and the Syrian people and Government would be most grateful if the Special Committee decided to accept their invitation to visit Damascus. He agreed that the Special Committee should visit Africa during the first part of its session although he felt that the Chairman and the Working Group should make specific recommendations on the time-table for the visit.

63. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that his delegation fully agreed with the Secretary-General and the Chairman that in 1967 the Committee should make new efforts to secure immediate implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. It should make full use of the right granted to it by the General Assembly to recommend dates for the independence of colonial Territories, it should make recommendations to the Security Council to help it settle situations in dependent Territories threatening international peace and security and it should give attention to the situation of the so-called small colonial Territories. His delegation also agreed with the Secretary-General that the failures of the United Nations in decolonization were not its fault, but were due to the unwillingness of the colonial Powers to carry out the Declaration, to their opposition to other United Nations resolutions and to their determination to maintain colonial domination in their own economic and strategic interests. The Committee should therefore make a special point of reviewing the application of resolutions already adopted by the United Nations.

64. His delegation fully supported the Chairman's statement on the tasks facing the Committee in 1967 and the organization of its work. It agreed that the Commission should concentrate on the decolonization of Africa, keeping a watch on the course of events in Southern Rhodesia, the Portuguese colonies and South West Africa and on imperialist and colonialism manoeuvres and making appropriate recommendations where necessary. That did not mean, however, that it should neglect other matters, such as the decisions taken by the General Assembly on Aden, Oman and other small colonial Territories, or, in general, any resolutions designed to help the struggle of colonial peoples for their rights, freedom and independence. Such resolutions included the General Assembly's appeals to Member and non-member States, especially the NATO Powers, and to the specialized agencies and their member States not to grant any aid, whether military, economic, financial or other, to Portugal, South Africa or Southern Rhodesia until they renounced their policy of racial discrimination and colonial supremacy. The Committee should consider as soon as possible the question of compliance by IBRD and IMF with the General Assembly's recommendation that no loans be granted to South Africa or Portugal. The Committee did not know how those various resolutions were being applied. The Secretariat should be asked to provide it with information showing which countries were complying with the resolutions and which were not and what diplomatic, economic and other ties countries maintained with the Governments of Portugal, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia. The whole world would then know where those régimes got their support.

65. His delegation supported the Chairman's proposal that the Committee should consider the consequences of the activities of international monopolies in South West Africa, the Portuguese colonies, Southern Rhodesia and other colonial Territories. The Committee had prepared reports on the activities of monopolies in South West Africa, Angola and Mozambique and Southern Rhodesia, but they had not included the latest data and had not contained information on other colonial Territories. It was therefore most desirable that a general report on the subject should be submitted to the General Assembly. The Soviet Union also agreed with the Chairman's proposal to consider military and related activities of the colonial Powers in dependent Territories. Such activities were becoming more and more important. The colonial Powers not only had not dismantled their military bases and installations in colonial Territories, as recommended by the General Assembly, but were taking steps to expand them. Such behaviour was an obstacle to self-determination and created a threat that the Territories might be used for aggression against independent States and for the suppression of independence movements. The colonialists claimed that their military bases were no obstacle to independence, but the way they used their military bases on Guam and Ascension Island, in Aden and elsewhere showed that claim to be false. The Committee should supply the General Assembly with material showing the true nature of colonial military activity in dependent Territories.

66. His delegation supported the Chairman's proposal that missions should visit small colonial Territories to study the local situation and determine the wishes of the people regarding their future. The Committee should not permit neo-colonialist decisions on such Territories and should prevent the colonial Powers from absorbing them under the guise of "association" or "integration". Such missions would also help to reveal the effects of the presence of military bases and the nature of military action taken to suppress independence movements. His delegation also agreed with the Chairman's proposal that the question of an international conference or seminar on apartheid should be entrusted to a working group and with his proposals concerning the work of the sub-committees.

67. In 1966 the Committee had not been able to take a decision on the Cuban proposal to include the question of Puerto Rico in its agenda. Further delay would be inadmissible; the Committee should take a decision on the substance of the matter in 1967. Another question to which the Committee should give attention was the General Assembly's recommendation that all United Nations channels should be used to publicize United Nations activities in the field of decolonization, the struggle of oppressed peoples to win freedom and the reasons preventing implementation of the Declaration. The situation at present was not satisfactory. Accomplices of the colonialists used their influence to prevent publicity about the achievements of the United Nations and to whitewash the policy of the colonial Powers. The Committee should study the matter thoroughly and recommend improvements.

68. At its twentieth and twenty-first sessions the General Assembly had taken a number of important decisions in which it had recognized the legality of the struggle of colonial peoples for freedom and independence, had declared colonialism, apartheid and racism to be crimes against mankind and had condemned the policy of the colonial Powers. Those resolutions had given substantial political support to the peoples in question. In their struggle to eliminate colonialism their own efforts and the support given them by the many States opposing imperialism and colonialism were of vital importance. At the same time, the United Nations and particularly the Special Committee, could play a useful role. The forces of imperialism and colonialism did not want to surrender their positions in the remaining colonial Territories and resorted to various cunning devices to maintain their domination. It was the duty of the United Nations to unmask the colonialists' plots, protect the interests of enslaved peoples and do everything possible to assist them in their struggle. The Soviet Union, which had gone through a great revolution to secure equality and end the exploitation of man by man, would continue to give full support to peoples oppressed by imperialism and colonialism.

69. The representative of India said that since the establishment of the Special Committee only thirteen former colonies had been restored to freedom and independence—hardly a satisfactory record. Moreover, the Special Committee could not really consider that it alone had been responsible for the independence of those thirteen territories. However, while not spectacular, its work was essential if only because it served as a constant reminder to the colonial Powers that it was their sacred obligation to transfer power to the true representatives of the people and to allow the people to determine their own future in accordance with their own wishes. The Special Committee also provided a forum which enabled those suffering under the colonial yoke to voice their grievances and obtain moral support.

70. He endorsed the suggestions which the Chairman had made at the previous meeting regarding the organization of the Special Committee's work and hoped that the Committee as a whole would accept them so that it could take up its substantive work as soon as possible. He agreed that the working Group should be established without delay and that Sub-Committees I, II and III should be maintained. While it was true that Mauritius would very probably become independent during 1967, he felt that Sub-Committee I should be maintained, since it had achieved some sort of expertise in economic matters; it would therefore be appropriate if the item on the activities of foreign economic and other interests in colonial Territories, which the General Assembly was to discuss at its twenty-second session, were assigned to that sub-committee.

71. He agreed with the comments made by the representative of the United Republic of Tanzania concerning the Office of Public Information. While the Office had been doing useful work in the field of decolonization, he felt that it could do still more. He had been surprised to learn during the Special Committee's visit to Africa in 1966 that the Prime Minister of Mauritius had been unaware of where the Special Committee was to hold its meetings, since he had been led to believe that the Committee's programme had been well publicized in advance.

72. He endorsed the suggestion made by the representative of Syria that the terms of reference of the Sub-Committee on Petitions should be defined more clearly. He fully agreed with the Secretary-General that visiting missions had an indisputable value, especially in the case of small Territories, because they were a means of securing adequate information on conditions in the Territories and on the wishes of their inhabitants. His delegation's views on the question of holding meetings in Africa remained unchanged.

73. The representative of Poland said that at each session of the Special Committee members were reminded that the task of decolonization was still incomplete. However, he was deeply convinced that the process of liberation of colonial peoples could not be stopped or reversed and that, with the help of all progressive forces, such peoples would finally free themselves and regain their rightful place among sovereign nations. Naturally, the decisive role would be played by the people themselves; however, the tempo of decolonization had to be speeded up and conditions had to be created so that decolonization could take place without unnecessary bloodshed and misery. To that end, the United Nations, and in particular the Special Committee, had an outstanding role to play. All avenues should be explored and all means used to exert pressure on the colonial Powers trying to counteract and halt the process of liberation.

74. He had been particularly interested by the suggestions made by the Chairman. Certainly, the Special Committee should concentrate on the implementation of the resolutions adopted at the twenty-first session of the General Assembly. It was therefore advisable for the work of the Committee to be organized so as to ensure that developments in Non-Self-Governing Territories could be followed up and, if necessary, action taken. In his view, the most effective method would be to create an adequate number of permanent or ad hoc sub-committees to examine particular problems or Territories. Attention had been drawn to the problem of the small Territories. In view of all the difficulties deriving from the geographical location, size and limited economic potential of such Territories, it was all the more necessary to ensure that proper recommendations were made for their future development. Visiting missions could be particularly useful in that respect and the Committee should therefore repeat its appeal to administering Powers to allow such missions to visit the Territories under their administration.

75. General Assembly resolution 2232 (XXI) had made it clear that the establishment of military bases and installations in colonial Territories was incompatible with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). In addition, General Assembly resolution 2189 (XXI) had requested the colonial Powers to dismantle their military bases and installations in colonial Territories, and to refrain from establishing new ones and from using those that still existed to interfere with the liberation of the peoples in colonial Territories in the exercise of their legitimate rights to freedom and independence. He therefore fully supported the proposal that the Committee should undertake a study of the military activities and arrangements of the colonial Powers which might be impeding the implementation of resolution 1514 (XV). Also of great importance was the proposal that the Committee should undertake a study on the activities of foreign economic and other interests impeding the implementation of that resolution in colonial Territories. With all its accumulated knowledge and experience, the Committee could and should produce a comprehensive report for the next session of the General Assembly.

76. In conclusion, he hoped that the views expressed in the Special Committee would be taken into account by the Working Group; the Working Group should be able to examine during the present session those matters which had not been taken up at the previous session.

77. The representative of Bulgaria said that his delegation agreed with the ideas and suggestions concerning the Committee's work advanced by the Chairman and the Secretary-General in their statements. The Committee's work would also be facilitated by the decisions taken by the General Assembly at its twenty-first session.

78. While it was true that decolonization was proceeding only slowly, the reason was not that the Committee had neglected its work. The slowness of the pace was actually due to the fierce opposition of those who sought to safeguard their own interests, sometimes at the cost of the blood of patriots and the sweat of oppressed peoples. The responsibility of the administering Powers had been emphasized also by the Secretary-General. In those circumstances, the Committee must ensure that its activities were more and more closely associated with the struggle of the colonial peoples themselves. In particular, it must continue vigorously to combat the colonialist policies of certain

States and certain organizations which rendered assistance to the colonialists and the policies of those who, by their attitudes, encouraged the arbitrary actions of racist minorities.

79. One of the ways in which the Committee could draw nearer to the oppressed peoples would be to hold a session in Africa in 1967, in accordance with a practice already established. Meetings in Africa would give the Committee an opportunity to increase its awareness of the tragedy of the colonized peoples, and at the same time to make a detailed study of the progress achieved and of the continuing obstacles to the implementation of United Nations decisions on such important questions as Southern Rhodesia, the Portuguese colonies and South West Africa.

80. His delegation also supported the proposal that the Security Council should be requested likewise to hold a session on African soil. Such a session would be especially useful, in that its results could be coupled with those of the forthcoming special session of the General Assembly on South West Africa.

81. Nothing must be left undone to foil the schemes of the colonial Powers, and with that end in view his delegation believed that the Special Committee, at the present stage of its work, should set itself the primary goal of taking measures to compel those Powers to facilitate the implementation of the decisions taken by the General Assembly at its twenty-first session and, very recently, by the Security Council.

82. In view of the fact that at the twenty-first session the General Assembly had devoted particular attention to conditions in the smaller colonial Territories and the dearth of information about them, his delegation shared the view that visiting missions should be sent to those Territories for the purpose of establishing direct contact with the local inhabitants and their representatives.

83. The Committee should also undertake a study of the activities of foreign economic interests in South West Africa, the Portuguese colonies and Southern Rhodesia, and in all the Territories under colonial domination, and submit a report on the subject to the General Assembly.

84. The question of military bases in colonial Territories should also be studied by the Committee, which should determine to what extent such bases had an adverse effect on the outcome of the liberation struggle of the peoples of those Territories and should make recommendations on the subject. In particular, the Special Committee could establish direct contact with international organizations and the specialized agencies, requesting them to supply it with information concerning measures taken or envisaged to implement United Nations recommendations on the cessation of economic, financial and technical aid to the racist régime in Southern Rhodesia and to various Powers which were seeking to strengthen their domination over certain Territories. In that connexion, stress must be laid on the great importance of implementation by the specialized agencies of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence.

85. Under General Assembly resolution 2202 (XXI), the Committee was to take an active part in the preparation and organization of a conference or seminar on the problems of apartheid, racial discrimination and colonialism in southern Africa. In that connexion, his delegation wished to underline the importance of publicizing the struggle being waged by the national liberation movements and the constructive action being taken in the regions liberated by revolutionary movements, and also the role which the United Nations, and in particular the Committee, might play in that respect. It supported the proposals made by the representative of India concerning the part which the United Nations Office of Public Information should take in giving world-wide publicity to the struggle of the colonial peoples. A large section of the Press sought to conceal the truth from world opinion. It would therefore be proper for the Office of Public Information to become more active in the dissemination of information on the peoples' struggle for national liberation and on the sessions of the Special Committee and other bodies dealing with the question. It might be helpful if the Chairman or one of the other officers of the Committee were to contact the Office of Public Information with a view to making the necessary arrangements.

86. The representative of Venezuela observed that, as the Committee advanced towards the elimination of colonialism, it encountered increasingly complex problems, particularly in combating certain colonial practices which were an affront to the most elementary principles of universal morality.

87. His delegation had noted with great interest the Chairman's suggestions regarding the organization of the Committee's work. The dispatch of visiting missions was a practice which his delegation had always favoured. The question of the United Nations presence in French Somaliland called for a special comment, namely, that some degree of priority should be given to it, as a referendum was to be held in the Territory on 19 March 1967.

88. Visiting missions were an essential factor in the Committee's work and provided it with information of the highest importance on developments in the Territories with which it was concerned. While not wishing to attach more importance to one visiting mission than to the rest, he felt that the mission to Aden called for special mention. At the twenty-first session of the General Assembly, the question of dispatching such a mission had been raised as a matter of urgency, owing to the political disturbances which had occurred in the Territory and the repressive measures which had been taken. It was disquieting to note that, more than a month after the Assembly had concluded its work, it had still not been possible to appoint the visiting mission and its dispatch would apparently have to be further delayed. He hoped that the Chairman could report on the status of the consultations and on any obstacles to the dispatch of a mission which, in his delegation's opinion, should be in the Territory already.

89. With regard to the visiting missions to other Territories, he shared the Chairman's hope that they would be dispatched as soon as possible, so that the information needed for the Committee's report to the General Assembly at its next session could be collected in good time.

90. With respect to the order in which the different Territories should be considered, his delegation thought that, if the Committee was unable to act immediately on the General Assembly's recommendations to it regarding the larger Territories, such as Southern Rhodesia, the Territories under Portuguese administration and South West Africa, it could profitably begin a consideration of the smaller Territories of which it had not yet been able to make a thorough study.

91. His delegation agreed with the suggestion that the existing sub-committees should be maintained and that they must start their work as soon as possible. The Sub-Committees and the Working Group played an essential part in the work of the Committee.

92. The representative of the United States of America said that the members of the Committee were becoming increasingly aware of the difficulties of applying to small Territories the same methods as were used in the consideration of larger Territories. His delegation sincerely believed that those methods needed to be reviewed and that the Committee, in studying the situation in those Territories, should be guided by the aspirations of their people. It was because of the small size and remoteness of some Territories that their people appeared to be hesitant about their own future. The Committee should not place itself in the position of appearing to impose a status which the peoples of the smaller Territories might be reluctant to choose. They nevertheless had the right to determine their political status and their choice must be an educated one.

93. His delegation supported the Chairman's proposal that the three regional Sub-Committees which had been in operation the previous year should be reconstituted. It suggested that each sub-committee should continue to be responsible for serving a specific region and that the studies required by the Special Committee should be allocated to the three sub-committees on that geographical basis.

94. On another matter which had been the subject of proposals, his delegation firmly believed that travel by the Committee should be limited to such travel, in connexion with meetings away from Headquarters and the possible dispatch of missions, as represented the best means of accomplishing the tasks for which it was responsible. It would be strongly opposed to travel which would not only waste the limited funds of the United Nations but might jeopardize the Special Committee's reputation by suggesting that its work was not of the serious nature expected of it. His delegation would express its views on the question of travel when specific proposals were submitted to the Special Committee. For the present it urged representatives to take a careful and selective approach to that question.

95. Turning to another matter, he said that, since Puerto Rico had been mentioned, he was obliged to repeat his Government's position, which was that the Territory was a self-governing one whose status had been confirmed by the General Assembly and that there was therefore no reason for the Special Committee to deal with it.

96. In conclusion, he said that the problems which the Special Committee would have to tackle were not new. The fact that they had already been under attack for several years should not, however, give rise to any pessimism. The United Nations could, in fact, feel satisfied with the steps taken in 1966, such as the establishment of a Special Committee to deal with South West Africa, the adoption of a programme of mandatory sanctions with a view to ending the illegal régime of Southern Rhodesia and the agreement on sending a United Nations mission to Aden.

97. His delegation was prepared to contribute in every possible manner to resolving the problems before the Committee. It believed that peoples everywhere were entitled to govern themselves in an atmosphere of social justice and political and economic freedom. Moreover, the United States believed that it was in its national interest to promote the application of the principles of freedom and self-determination, since the manner in which existing tensions were handled at the international level significantly affected the long-term prospects for world stability and peace.

98. The representative of Sierra Leone said that his delegation wished to reiterate its disappointment at the fact that the Committee had been unable to achieve more since it was established. When its work began, it was dealing with about sixty Territories, of which it still had fifty-two left. Although that state of affairs was not the fault of the Committee, but of the administering Powers which had not applied all the General Assembly and Security Council resolutions, the Committee should nevertheless seek to increase the pace of attaining self-determination.

99. The Chairman had spoken of visiting missions. It was by means of such missions that the peoples of the various Territories, and the administering Powers concerned, could present their case fully to the Special Committee. A number of administering Powers, including Spain and the United Kingdom, had agreed to the sending of missions to the Territories administered by them and others should be urged to follow their example. His delegation would also like to know what progress had been made in the implementation of the resolution adopted by the General Assembly concerning Aden. It urged administering Powers in general, and Australia, Spain, the United States, France, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, in particular, to co-operate with the Secretary-General, so that the Committee might know what missions could proceed during the current session and so that missions would have sufficient time available to report to it in July.

100. The Chairman had suggested that Sub-Committee I might deal with an item which was on the agenda for the twenty-second session of the General Assembly entitled "Activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and Territories under Portuguese domination and in all other Territories under colonial domination". His delegation agreed with that suggestion, as Sub-Committee I was familiar with the subject and that material would enable it to expand the scope of the work it had already done on Rhodesia.

101. Similarly, a study of the role of military bases in impeding progress towards self-determination and independence might be undertaken either by a special group or by a sub-committee whose work programme was less heavy than the others. His delegation left it to the Chairman to choose the sub-committee concerned.

102. His delegation would like visiting missions to be sent to the smaller Territories in the Caribbean and the Pacific Ocean, to which the Special Committee had not given sufficient attention in 1966, and would like the sub-committees concerned to begin their study of those Territories at an early date. The problems peculiar to them were acute and the Committee should devote as much attention to them as to the Territories in southern Africa.

103. On the subject of South West Africa, which had also been mentioned, his delegation believed that, even if some aspects of the Special Committee's work were being considered specifically by other United Nations bodies, the Committee should also keep them under review.

104. He drew the Committee's attention to operative paragraph 4 of General Assembly resolution 2189 (XXI), which concerned the list of Territories referred to in the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. He thought that the Committee should attempt to decide in 1967 which Territories to include in its agenda. With regard to operative paragraph 14 of the same resolution, he pointed out that some members had always resisted any attempt by the Committee to make suggestions to the Security Council, stating that it was not within the Committee's province to do so. He hoped that, as a result of the adoption of General Assembly resolution 2189 (XXI), the Committee would no longer be impeded in respect of such action and would be better able to help the Security Council and the Secretary-General than it had been in the past.

105. It was always difficult to decide on priorities, but the order should be determined in the light of the visits which the Committee would either make itself or entrust to missions, the interests of the peoples of the Territories and recent developments there. While the questions of southern Africa and Aden were, of course, particularly important, the smaller Territories should also be borne in mind.

106. Finally, the Committee should try during the current session to carry out all the tasks specifically entrusted to it by the General Assembly at its twenty-first session.

107. The representative of Italy supported most of the remarks made by the Chairman at the opening meeting, especially those concerning the importance of the work of the Sub-Committees, at least in the first stage of the Committee's work. He felt that the results achieved by sub-committees in previous years had been excellent.

108. In 90 per cent of the cases, the slow progress of the various Territories towards self-determination and independence was not necessarily due to ill-will on the part of the administering Power, but rather to built-in factors, such as political or ethnic divisions, economic difficulties and the small size or sparse populations of certain Territories. The Committee must therefore devote its attention to that specific and, in some cases, very difficult problem. It must request the co-operation of the administering Powers, but must also be ready to give them advice and guidance.

109. He agreed with the Polish representative that the Committee must guide the Territories in their progress towards self-determination and independence by showing them the best way to obtain genuine freedom from colonial rule, which meant helping them to solve their political and constitutional problems and to obtain the economic assistance they needed if they were not to become the prey of a new imperialism.

110. With regard to visiting missions, he suggested that the Committee should abandon the method of asking the administering Powers to grant a general consent to the sending of missions to Territories under their administration. It would be better if, whenever the Committee judged it necessary to send a mission to a specific Territory, the Chairman were to hold informal consultations with the administering Power and report the result of his negotiations to the Committee.

111. With respect to the planned session in Africa or the Middle East, he believed that it was too early to take any decision even of a general nature. Once the Committee had received invitations from Member States, it would be able to decide whether it was possible to visit each of the inviting countries without the journey becoming too long, too expensive or too taxing for members of the Committee. Moreover, to avoid any appearance of discourtesy, it should be made clear in advance that it might be impossible for the Committee to accept all the invitations extended to it.

112. He did not regard the holding of a session away from Headquarters as a sort of climax to the Committee's work. If the Committee took that view, it might fail to realize the urgency of the work it had to do at Headquarters. He hoped that most of that work would be concluded before 31 May so that the summer session might be devoted to a very limited number of items and to the adoption of the report to the General Assembly.

113. In conclusion, he assured the Chairman of his delegation's continuing devotion to the cause of decolonization and of its support for him in his new functions.

114. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania stated in answer to the United States representative's statement concerning Puerto Rico, that in his delegation's view Puerto Rico was indeed a colonial Territory. Its people should therefore have the opportunity to exercise their right to self-determination under the auspices of the United Nations.

115. The representative of Madagascar said that in view of the importance the United Nations attached to the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, it was regrettable that certain Powers were refusing to respect the principles of the Charter and were doing nothing to facilitate the implementation of the relevant General Assembly resolutions.

116. In view of the effectiveness of the work done during the previous session by the sub-committees and ad hoc committees of the Special Committee, he would agree that such committees should be maintained. He welcomed the fact that some Powers had agreed to allow missions to visit the Territories under their administration, and hoped that before such missions left for the smaller Territories the information services of the United Nations would keep the Committee informed of political developments there. In conclusion, his delegation favoured holding another series of meetings in Africa in 1967.

117. The representative of Yugoslavia said that there were still no grounds for optimism regarding a settlement of colonial problems in conformity with General Assembly resolutions and in a manner which would satisfy the legitimate interests of the peoples concerned. Regrettably, many Territories were still deprived of the fundamental right to freedom and independence. Moreover, the peoples of colonial Territories, like the United Nations itself, were faced with the organized resistance of the colonial Powers and their allies, which were attempting by means of pressure and intervention not only to impede the process of decolonization but also to expand their political, economic and strategic positions. That was especially true of southern Africa, where racism, colonial wars and other forms of repression were preventing the indigenous peoples from achieving freedom and independence.

118. He thanked the Secretary-General for the great interest he had shown in the problems of decolonization. He fully supported the Chairman's suggestions regarding the organization of the Committee's work; however, he felt that African colonial problems warranted special attention. A study of the activities of foreign monopolies and other economic interests in colonial Territories would no doubt bring to light the reasons why such monopolies were preventing the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), and would be of great assistance to the Assembly when it considered that question at its twenty-second session.

119. At the twenty-first session of the General Assembly, his delegation had suggested that the Special Committee might consider the possibility of summarizing its studies on the Portuguese colonies in a single document which would be translated into various languages, including Portuguese, and be widely circulated in order to mobilize world public opinion with a view to finding a solution to the problems of those colonies. Another important colonial issue which should be reviewed by the Special Committee was the question of Aden.

120. His delegation had devoted special attention to the question of the small Territories, and had always supported the dispatch of visiting missions to examine the situation prevailing in such Territories. At the twenty-first session of the General Assembly, the Yugoslav delegation had suggested that the Special Committee might consider the possibility of convening a conference, under United Nations auspices, of representatives of the small Territories. Such a conference would enable representatives of the people of those Territories to describe their problems and propose appropriate solutions, on the basis of which the United Nations would be able to work out a broad action programme.

121. The military bases established in some Non-Self-Governing Territories against the will of the peoples concerned were a serious obstacle to the liberation of the colonial peoples and a means of aggression and intervention in the internal affairs of other countries. Since the General Assembly, at both its twentieth and twenty-first sessions, had requested the dismantling of such bases, his delegation supported the suggestion that the question of military bases should be given special attention by the Committee. On the question of holding another series of meetings in Africa, his delegation's views remained unchanged.

122. The representative of Iran said that the eradication of colonialism was an immense task, which was bound to take time. However, steady progress was being made towards that goal, and at the same time the Committee was helping to lay the foundations for new nations. The Committee should seek inspiration for its tasks by maintaining direct contacts with the peoples involved. It could thus derive confidence from the support of those peoples, while they in turn would be encouraged by the knowledge that they were not alone in their struggle for freedom and justice.

123. It was in that light that he viewed the questions relating to visiting missions, the establishment of a United Nations presence to supervise the exercise of self-determination in particular Territories, and the holding of meetings in Africa. The Committee had already received a certain measure of co-operation from some of the administering Powers, and he welcomed the policy pursued by the Spanish Government in that respect, as also the change in the United Kingdom's attitude regarding the dispatch of a mission to Aden. He hoped that a similar attitude would be shown by all administering Powers with regard to other Territories, such as Fiji and the Territories in the Caribbean.

124. The dissemination of information, a matter which had been raised by other speakers, was also an instrument for focusing attention on the plight of subjugated peoples. However, he did not share the view that the Office of Public Information had been remiss in the performance of its duties; it had acquitted itself well in 1966 and he was confident that it would do even better in 1967.

125. The Committee should devote a major share of its attention to problems which concerned international peace and security in addition to the right to self-determination and independence, particularly the questions of Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa, the Portuguese Territories and Aden. Despite the Security Council's decision to apply economic sanctions against the rebel régime in Southern Rhodesia, no progress had yet been achieved towards returning that Territory to its rightful owners, the Zimbabwe people. The Committee should also feel free to take up the question of South West Africa when it deemed it appropriate, although that question was currently under consideration by the Ad Hoc Committee for South West Africa. With regard to the Territories under Portuguese domination, he hoped that the Committee would be able to offer new proposals for stronger action by the General Assembly to overcome Portugal's intransigence. On the question of Aden, he shared the anxiety expressed by other speakers. He sincerely hoped that the special mission called for by the General Assembly in resolution 2183 (XXI) would be appointed soon, so that it could proceed to the Territory without further delay.

126. With regard to the question of small Territories, he considered that the sub-committees should begin work without delay, in order to be able to give those Territories the attention they deserved. On that and other matters, he supported the suggestions made by the Chairman.

127. The representative of Australia said that although there were some quite deep philosophical differences within the Committee, he thought that there was an identity of aims among members. At the time of the drafting of the United Nations Charter, the Australian delegation had been among the most zealous in supporting the inclusion of the provisions concerning Trusteeship and Non-Self-Governing Territories. The aims of members of the Special Committee regarding independence, self-determination and the protection of the rights of the peoples of the Territories were the same, and while there might be differences in approach, it was the Committee's task to harmonize those differences to promote the common goal.

128. He recalled that the Chairman had referred to General Assembly resolution 2189 (XXI) and suggested that the Committee might make a study of activities of foreign economic and other interests which were impeding the progress of colonial Territories to independence. A report to the General Assembly on the results of such a study could constitute a really important document, and he would suggest that for that reason the Committee should be careful in sifting the evidence brought before it. What was required was a sound economic study based on hard facts and statistics, not a polemical document. He also hoped that controversial doctrinaire views would not be injected into the report. His delegation, for example, saw no reason why foreign economic investment in certain forms should not be in the interests of the people of dependent Territories. The Committee should not allow preconceived views on such matters to colour its judgements. The only consideration should be the interests of the people of the Territories and the matter in which they themselves interpreted those interests.

129. He had some reservations about the Chairman's suggestion that all special studies should be referred to Sub-Committee I; experience suggested that detailed studies could best be carried out by a Sub-Committee which devoted its attention to a particular region. He would support what had been said by the representatives of India and Syria regarding the Sub-Committee on Petitions. During 1966, the Sub-Committee's work had not proceeded in an altogether satisfactory manner. The Sub-Committee had been unable to devote adequate time to the consideration of petitions, and there had sometimes been inexplicable delays between the Sub-Committee's approval of a petition for circulation and its actual circulation to the Special Committee. In at least two instances, petitions which might have altered the course of a debate had been delayed and had not been before the Special Committee at the time of its decision on the Territory concerned.

130. He agreed with the view that visiting missions could be of value, but they were impossible without the full co-operation of the administering Power. The administering Power was responsible for the Territories which it administered, and its decision as to the acceptability of a mission must necessarily be governed by many factors. The wishes and interests of the people of the Territory must also be a paramount consideration.

131. There were circumstances in which visiting missions could be very helpful; the proposed mission to South Arabia might have a great influence in helping the people of that area to reach independence, which they were about to attain in any case, with a minimum loss of life. On the other hand, unwelcome visits could antagonize the people of a Territory and make it difficult for the administering Power to bring them to full self-determination.

132. With regard to the possibilities of meetings of the Special Committee in Africa, he would suggest that the Committee should try to arrange its programme on a practical basis. He realized that it was difficult to refuse invitations, but he thought that the paramount consideration should be the practical usefulness of visiting a particular city. By keeping its aims within practical bounds, the Committee would be fulfilling the responsibility it shared with other organs of the United Nations to keep down costs.

133. The representative of Tunisia said the Committee's work was helped by the fact that its responsibilities had been clearly defined in the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, and would also be helped by the advice the Secretary-General had offered at the beginning of the session. However, the time had come for the Committee to ask itself whether it had really made any progress, and whether it should continue to repeat what it had done in previous years. It had proclaimed the rights of subject peoples and condemned the atrocious conduct of the colonialists, but that had not stopped the colonial Powers from perpetrating their crimes against humanity. Nevertheless, the Committee should not despair. The colonial Powers had become so used to the Committee's discussions and resolutions that they no longer took the trouble to vote against the latter in the General Assembly. They merely abstained, which was damaging to the prestige and effectiveness of the United Nations and insulting, in particular, to the Special Committee. If the Committee was to fail, it would mean the failure of the Organization as a whole and of its Members, who adopted resolutions that they were powerless to apply.

134. The Committee must make concrete and effective proposals to the General Assembly for hastening the achievement of independence and national sovereignty by the dependent Territories. He wished to make a number of suggestions on how that could be achieved. First, although private consultations such as those the Chairman had already held regarding the organization of work with many delegations, including that of Tunisia, were an acceptable procedure, they could be fruitful only if all delegations were consulted. Secondly, the influence of foreign financial groups in the prolongation of colonial domination was a very important and complex question. The Committee should ask the Secretariat to provide it with the necessary documentation, and if necessary with the services of experts, to assist it in dealing with what was in some ways a highly technical problem. Thirdly, he agreed that it was advisable to send visiting missions, but they must be properly prepared, and must not be sent without the prior consent of the administering Powers. They must also be assured of complete freedom of action once they were on the spot. If those conditions could not be met, it would be better not to send any missions; the Committee would have to examine each case on its merits. Fourthly, although experience had shown that meetings away from Headquarters could be fruitful, their number should be kept to a minimum, for they involved serious practical problems for small delegations. It would be best to select one or two countries in which the Committee could make a fairly prolonged stay.

135. The representative of Mali said that the results achieved since the adoption of the historic Declaration set forth in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) were not encouraging. Although the Committee had done its work conscientiously, it had to recognize that the administering Powers refused to co-operate fully with it and with the General Assembly. By denying freedom and independence to millions, those Powers openly violated the Charter. The Committee had always denounced such violations and would continue to do so as long as the administering Powers persisted in disregarding the Charter and the relevant resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly. The Secretary-General had referred to the increasing concern of Member States over the refusal of the colonial Powers to apply the resolutions of the General Assembly and over their covert support of the colonialists in Southern Rhodesia and the fascist régimes of Portugal and South Africa. The Special Committee must continue to draw public attention to the dangerous situation prevailing in the Territories of Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Pacific Islands which had not yet attained independence. United Nations information services should give priority to colonial questions, and should use all the media of communication, including radio, to inform the peace-loving peoples of the remedies for colonialism proposed by the United Nations and emphasize the enormous responsibility which the administering Powers took upon themselves in hesitating to honour their obligations to the peoples under their administration.

136. The Committee might well ask itself why the administering Powers were so unco-operative. In his view, it was entirely because they wished to hold on to the substantial advantages, including purely military and strategic advantages, which they derived from the shameless exploitation of the subject peoples and their natural resources. For that reason, the Committee should give attention to the economic and military aspects of colonialism. It was encouraging that the General Assembly had decided, in resolution 2189 (XXI), to include in the provisional agenda of its twenty-second session an item entitled "Activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and Territories under Portuguese domination as well as in all other Territories under colonial domination". The discussion of that item would show the public how the colonial Powers systematically pillaged the colonized countries under the cloak of their civilizing mission. He supported the Chairman's suggestion that the Committee should discuss that subject.

137. He also supported the other suggestions put forward by the Chairman. It was the Committee's responsibility to follow up the application of General Assembly resolutions, and the dispatch of visiting missions, particularly to small Territories, would help the Committee to follow developments in such Territories and obtain first-hand information. His delegation felt that it was bound by the decision already taken that part of the Committee's session should be held in Africa; he would comment further on that point at the appropriate time. He supported the maintenance of the sub-committees, which had done excellent work over the previous year. Lastly, he expressed the hope that the Committee would be able to complete its work in time; that would enable it to obtain more co-operation from the administering Powers, thus ensuring the speedy application of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

Decisions

138. At the conclusion of the debate on the organization of its work, the Special Committee, at its 487th meeting, requested the Working Group to consider and submit recommendations regarding the Committee's programme of work for the current year, including the order of priority for the consideration of items. In doing so, it requested the Working Group to take into account the various tasks assigned to the Committee in the relevant resolutions adopted by the General Assembly at its twenty-first session as well as the tasks envisaged by the Committee itself for 1967, an outline of which is contained in the note by the Secretary-General (A/AC.109/L.366). Further, the Special Committee requested the Working Group to take into consideration the views expressed during its debate on the organization of work (A/AC.109/SR.484 to SR.487), and the possibility of the Committee holding a series of meetings away from Headquarters during the year.

139. On the basis of the recommendation contained in the twenty-sixth report of the Working Group

(A/AC.109/L.368/Rev.1) the Special Committee, at its 488th meeting, decided to maintain Sub-Committees I, II and III and requested them to carry out, in addition to their existing terms of reference, the specific tasks assigned by the General Assembly in its resolutions concerning the Territories referred to them. The Special Committee also authorized the Sub-Committees to submit specific recommendations without delay regarding the sending of visiting missions to Territories with which they are concerned.

140. At the same meeting, the Special Committee decided to undertake special studies concerning the following items and referred them to Sub-Committee I for consideration and report:

(a) Activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and Territories under Portuguese administration as well as in all other Territories under colonial domination;

(b) Military activities and arrangements by the colonial Powers which may be impeding the implementation of the Declaration in Territories under their administration.

141. At its 507th meeting, the Special Committee, by adopting the twenty-eighth report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.385), decided that: (i) it should accept in principle the invitations extended to it by the Governments of Syria, the United Republic of Tanzania, Iraq, Morocco, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Ethiopia, Mauritania and Zambia to hold meetings at their respective capitals, with an expression of its deep appreciation (A/AC.109/221, 222, 224, 226-228, 230 and 232); and (ii) it should avail itself this year of the invitations received from the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Iraq, Syria, the United Republic of Tanzania and Zambia, and it should inform the Governments of Ethiopia, Morocco and Mauritania that, subject to their convenience, it would prefer to take advantage of their invitations at a future date. Subsequent decisions by the Special Committee concerning its meetings held away from Headquarters are set out in chapter II of the present report.

142. At its 498th, 509th and 543rd meetings, the Special Committee took various decisions concerning its programme of work for 1967 including the order of priority for the consideration of the items before it, on the basis of the recommendations contained in the twenty-seventh, twenty-ninth and thirty-second reports of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.380, L.391 and L.418). These decisions are reflected in section E of this chapter.

162. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of the Territories listed above and its conclusions and recommendations thereon are given in chapters III to XXIII of the present report.

163. At the 569th meeting, the Chairman of the Special Committee, on behalf of the Rapporteur of Sub-Committee II informed the Committee that, owing to the limited time available to it, Sub-Committee II had decided at its 67th meeting to postpone its consideration of the Territories of Brunei and Hong Kong. At the same meeting, following statements by the representatives of the USSR, Poland and Bulgaria,<sup>9</sup> the Special Committee agreed to take note of the above-mentioned decision. Information concerning these two Territories is given in chapters XXI and XXII of the present report.

<sup>9</sup> The representatives of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Bulgaria and Poland stated that since the question of Hong Kong was directly related to the People's Republic of China, the United Nations and its organs, including the Special Committee, could not consider this matter until the lawful rights of the People's Republic of China were restored in the United Nations.

164. Sub-Committee III was unable to consider British Honduras owing to lack of time. Information on this Territory is contained in chapter XXIII of the present report.

F. QUESTION OF SENDING VISITING GROUPS TO TERRITORIES

165. In operative paragraph 5 of its resolution 2189 (XXI) of 13 December 1966, the General Assembly approved "the programme of work envisaged by the Special Committee during 1967, including the sending of visiting missions and the possibility of holding a series of meetings away from Headquarters, and requests the administering Powers to allow visiting missions to be sent to the Territories under their administration".

166. In approving the twenty-sixth report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.368/Rev.1), the Special Committee at its 488th meeting, on 20 February 1967, requested its Sub-Committees I, II and III to submit without delay specific recommendations to the Special Committee regarding the sending of visiting groups in relation to Territories with which they are concerned.

167. At the 565th meeting, on 6 October, the Special Committee considered the reports submitted by Sub-Committees II and III concerning the question of sending visiting groups to the Territories referred to them (A/AC.109/L.395 and Corr.1 and A/AC.109/L.401/Rev.1, see annex II).

168. At the same meeting, the representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States of America and Australia reaffirmed the positions of their Governments with regard to the sending of visiting groups, as recorded in the reports of the sub-committees.

169. At the same meeting, the Special Committee approved the sections of the reports of Sub-Committees II and III relating to this question, and endorsed the conclusions and recommendations contained therein, it being understood that the reservations expressed by members would be reflected in the record.

170. The conclusions and recommendations of the Sub-Committees are set out below:

Conclusions and recommendations of Sub-Committee II

"The Sub-Committee notes that most of the administering Powers continue to maintain their same negative attitude towards the acceptance of visiting missions to the Territories referred to Sub-Committee II.

"The Sub-Committee recommends that the Special Committee should strongly urge the administering Powers to receive visiting missions to these Territories at an early date. The detailed recommendations regarding the Territories to be visited and other modalities will be decided upon at a later stage."

Conclusions and recommendations of Sub-Committee III

"Recalling paragraphs five of General Assembly resolutions 2232 (XXI) and 2189 (XXI), the Sub-Committee notes with regret that the administering Powers, namely the United States and the United Kingdom, continue to maintain the same negative attitude towards the acceptance of visiting missions to the Territories referred to Sub-Committee III.

"The Sub-Committee recommends that the Special Committee should strongly urge the administering Powers to receive visiting missions to these Territories at an early date."

G. QUESTION OF THE LIST OF TERRITORIES TO WHICH THE DECLARATION ON THE GRANTING OF INDEPENDENCE TO COLONIAL COUNTRIES AND PEOPLES IS APPLICABLE

171. At its 471st meeting, on 10 October 1966, the Special Committee approved the proposals contained in the 25th report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.338) which read as follows:

"10. Following an exchange of views on various suggestions, the Working Group agreed that the question of the inclusion of these Territories, namely Puerto Rico and the Comoro Archipelago, [in the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable] required further detailed study and that, in view of the lack of time at this session, it should make such a study at an early date during the next session of the Special Committee. It further agreed that, at that time, it would also consider any other Territories which might be included in the list of 'all other Territories which have not yet attained independence'."

172. In operative paragraph 4 of its resolution 2189 (XXI) of 13 December 1966, the General Assembly approved "the action taken and envisaged by the Special Committee for the year 1967 with respect to the list of Territories to which the Declaration applies".

173. At its 509th and 510th meetings, on 17 and 19 April, the Special Committee considered a report submitted by the Working Group concerning the question of the inclusion of Puerto Rico and of the Comoro Archipelago in the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable. The relevant paragraph of this report (A/AC.109/L.392) reads as follows:

"2. After discussion, the Working Group agreed, by consensus, to refer to the Special Committee the question of the inclusion of Puerto Rico and of the Comoro Archipelago in the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable. The representative of Italy reserved the position of his delegation regarding this decision."

174. At the conclusion of its consideration of this question (see paras. 178 to 256 below), the Special Committee, at its 510th meeting, adopted a proposal made by the representative of Syria to adjourn sine die the debate on the question of the inclusion of Puerto Rico in the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable. This proposal was adopted by 19 votes to 8, with one abstention.

175. At the same meeting, the Special Committee also decided to defer consideration of the question of the inclusion of the Comoro Archipelago in the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable.

176. At the 564th meeting, the Special Committee, by approving the 33rd report of the Working Group, decided to continue consideration of the question of the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable at its next session.

177. The views of members on the question of the inclusion of Puerto Rico in the list of Territories to which the Declaration is applicable, as expressed at the 509th and 510th meetings, are set out below.

Views of members

178. The representative of the United States of America said that the problem raised by the Working Group's report was purely procedural and the facts were clear. For a number of years the United States had transmitted information on Puerto Rico, as a Non-Self-Governing Territory, under Article 73 e of the Charter. In the 1948 general elections the people of Puerto Rico had voted unequivocally, by a vote of almost 6 to 1 for the party favouring commonwealth status over the party favouring independence, to become a commonwealth, or free state, associated with the United States, and the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico had come into force on 25 July 1952.

179. Since Puerto Rico had thereby achieved full self-government, the Government of the United States had concluded that it would no longer be appropriate to submit information on it under Article 73 e of the Charter and had duly informed the United Nations of that decision. Full documentation had been sent to the General Assembly's Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, which had discussed the question and approved a resolution noting that the people of Puerto Rico had achieved a new constitutional status after expressing their will in a free and democratic way and that the Commonwealth could be considered as falling outside the scope of Article 73 e of the Charter. On 27 November 1953, the General Assembly had adopted resolution 748 (VIII), which took favourable note of the conclusions of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories and explicitly recognized that the people of Puerto Rico had effectively exercised their right to self-determination and had been invested with attributes of political sovereignty which clearly identified the status of self-government attained by the Puerto Rican people as that of an autonomous political entity. It had furthermore stated that it was considered appropriate that the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter should cease.

180. Since the General Assembly itself had found that Puerto Rico was no longer a colonial or Non-Self-Governing Territory but a self-governing Territory with a constitutional and international status chosen by the people themselves, it was difficult to understand how a subsidiary body of the General Assembly established to implement a declaration pertaining to colonial Territories could inscribe Puerto Rico on its agenda. To claim that Puerto Rico was a colonial Territory falling within the jurisdiction of the Special Committee would be to suggest that the latter was in a position to act counter to its parent body's findings and would expose any General Assembly decision to subsequent challenge by a subsidiary body. The question was one of the utmost importance since a proposal to inscribe Puerto Rico on the Committee's agenda would not only violate the basic rules and provisions of the United Nations Charter, but also constitute interference in a matter of direct concern to the United States and all its citizens, including those in Puerto Rico. About that, there should be no misunderstanding.

181. The status of Puerto Rico as an associated Commonwealth had been freely chosen in democratic elections based on universal adult suffrage and had been confirmed by the General Assembly. The United States delegation therefore formally proposed that Puerto Rico should not be included in the list of Territories to be considered by the Special Committee. This proposal was subsequently reworded to read as follows:

"Having regard to the thirtieth report of the Working Group and recalling General Assembly resolution 748 (VIII), Puerto Rico should not be considered by the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples."

182. The representative of Uruguay said that in considering the problem which had been referred to it by the Working Group, the Committee must first decide whether it was competent to pass judgement on the present status of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. He would approach the question from the point of view of law, bearing in mind the importance of applying the law faithfully if the political, economic, humanitarian and social purposes of the United Nations were to be served and the interests of the people of Puerto Rico safeguarded.

183. The Special Committee was a subsidiary organ of the General Assembly, established under resolution 1654 (XVI), to examine the application of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV)). Its powers were set forth in operative paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 of that resolution. At the seventeenth session, in operative paragraph 8 of resolution 1810 (XVII), the Special Committee had been invited to continue to seek the most suitable ways and means for the speedy and total application of the Declaration to all Territories which had not yet attained independence and to propose specific measures in that regard. It was clear from those provisions that the Committee was to concern itself exclusively with Territories which had not yet attained independence—an expression which was also found in paragraph 5 of the Declaration itself.

184. In 1953, by resolution 748 (VIII), the Assembly had decided that the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico fell outside the category of colonial Territories which had not attained independence. The resolution in question contained a number of findings regarding the new political and constitutional status of Puerto Rico, but he would not go into them since they were outside the competence of the Special Committee. The fact remained, however, that the General Assembly had taken a decision on the matter. The competent principal organ had adopted a resolution, in the exercise of its characteristic powers under the Charter, eight years prior to the establishment of the Special Committee. To question the validity of the General Assembly's decision and attempt to revoke it would be a most serious violation of the legal order of the United Nations, and the Special Committee should therefore limit itself to stating its lack of competence in the matter.

185. A few days previously, at the 29th meeting of the Preparatory Committee for the International Conference on Human Rights, the representative of Poland had rightly maintained that the existence of an earlier General Assembly resolution on the point in dispute left the subsidiary organ in question no say in the matter. It had been pointed out that the General Assembly had already decided to make Russian a working language of the Conference and that the Preparatory Committee had no competence to question that decision. That thesis had been accepted. The Special Committee now confronted an identical situation, except that what was in question was not the exclusion of a language, but the inclusion of a Territory in a particular list. The subordinate organ clearly lacked power to modify the decision of its parent body.

186. He now wished to deal with a possible objection. The Working Group, in order to justify the referral of the question to the plenary Special Committee, had referred in document A/AC.109/L.392 to paragraph 10 of its twenty-fifth report (A/6300/Rev.1, chap. I, para. 265). In the paragraph referred to, the Working Group had stated its view that the question of the inclusion of Puerto Rico and the Comoro Archipelago required further detailed study. That statement, however, in no way suggested a claim of competence in a matter which had been decided years earlier by the General Assembly. The Working Group had simply postponed the matter in view of its complexity, without taking any position on the Committee's competence to take a decision on the matter.

187. Any decision by the Committee to include Puerto Rico in the list of Territories to be considered would be null and void and give rise to a conflict of powers with the General Assembly. He realized that decolonization was a most important political duty and that appeals to legal arguments were unwelcome to those who were deeply concerned for the freedom of peoples. Many essentially political goals were sought by the United Nations, but it was in the interests of all that its actions should conform to legal norms. No one would have faith in a world organization which disobeyed its own rules and encouraged conflicts among its own organs.

188. In the light of those considerations, Uruguay would support a motion to the effect that the Committee had no competence in the matter, and, as a corollary, would vote for the non-inclusion of Puerto Rico in the list of Territories which had not yet attained independence.

189. With regard to the Comoro Archipelago, he suggested that the matter should be taken up at a later date, in view of the complexity of the special factors involved.

190. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics recalled that his delegation had already expressed its position on the question of Puerto Rico in the Special Committee in October 1965 and October 1966 and had demonstrated that the proposal to include the question in the Committee's agenda was well founded. His delegation had based its position on the fact that, notwithstanding United States statements to the contrary, the people of Puerto Rico were being deprived of the opportunity of exercising their inalienable right to self-determination and that island continued to be a colonial Territory. His delegation continued to hold that view. United States representatives in various United Nations bodies sought to cast doubt on the Organization's competence to consider the question of Puerto Rico by claiming that the people of the Territory had allegedly been given the opportunity to exercise their right of self-determination, that, as a result of the adoption of a new Constitution, Puerto Rico had become a fully self-governing State, and that that had been confirmed by the General Assembly in resolution 748 (VIII). Another argument, advanced by the Uruguayan and other delegations, was that since the Special Committee was a subsidiary body of the General Assembly, it could consider the question only on the basis of a relevant General Assembly resolution. In the Soviet delegation's view, both those arguments were invalid, since from the procedural and substantive points of view, the problem of Puerto Rico came within the competence of the Special Committee.

191. With regard to the procedural aspect, he recalled that the Special Committee had taken up the problem in 1965 and 1966 and that in its report to the twenty-first session of the General Assembly it had said that its Working Group had decided that the question of the inclusion of the Territories, i.e., Puerto Rico and the Comoro Archipelago, required further study and that because of lack of time the Group would carry out that study at the beginning of its next session. As members were aware, in its resolution 2189 (XXI) the General Assembly had approved the Special Committee's report and the programme of work proposed for 1967. Thus, it was clear that the General Assembly had unequivocally entrusted the Special Committee and its Working Group with the task of studying the inclusion of the question of Puerto Rico in the Committee's agenda. It was also clear that such a study should be carried out at the beginning of the Special Committee's current session. Two conclusions could therefore be drawn up from the above-mentioned decisions: first, the Committee was empowered to consider the question and to decide for itself whether or not to include it in its agenda, and, secondly, it had been given a clear direction to consider the question at the beginning of its current session. Thus, the argument that the Committee could not consider the question until it received instructions from the General Assembly to do so could not withstand scrutiny, for it had already received such instructions.

192. The Declaration of the Cairo Conference of the Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries had, inter alia, condemned the manifestation of colonialism and neo-colonialism in Latin America. In particular, that Declaration had drawn the attention of the Special Committee to the question of Puerto Rico and had called upon the Committee to consider the situation in that Territory in the light of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). It was clear that the large number of States which had participated in the Conference had been of the view that Puerto Rico was nothing more than a colony and that the General Assembly resolution in question was applicable to it.

193. With respect to the substantive aspect of the problem, it was also clear that the Special Committee was fully entitled to consider the question of Puerto Rico. The assertion by United States representatives that the people of Puerto Rico had been given an opportunity in the referendum of 1951 to choose between independence, statehood in the United States, and associated status in the form of a commonwealth, was in flagrant contradiction with the facts. An analysis of the relevant documents and the present situation in the Territory showed that the people had not been given the opportunity of deciding the question of their future and that Puerto Rico continued to be a dependent Territory. For example, the official responsible for recording the results of elections in the Territory had said on 18 March 1965 that his department had no documents indicating that a referendum had been conducted in Puerto Rico in which the people had been offered three options—independence, statehood, or commonwealth status. That statement clearly showed that the people of Puerto Rico had not been given an opportunity to decide on their future status. Secondly, in seeking to avoid responsibility for preparing its colony for genuine self-government, the United States had imposed the colonial status of commonwealth upon Puerto Rico by Public Law 600, adopted by the United States Congress on 3 July 1950. With a view to creating the impression that Puerto Rico had become self-governing, not as a result of the unilateral action of a colonial Power but in accordance with the wishes of the people of the Territory, the Law had provided that it would be adopted in the form of an agreement subject to approval at a referendum by a qualified majority of Puerto Ricans and that, after the referendum, a constitutional convention would be held to prepare a draft constitution. The Law had empowered the President of the United States to consider the question whether the constitution thus adopted was in accordance with the provisions of United States law and with the United States Constitution. In the event of an affirmative decision, the new constitution would be submitted to the Congress for approval. The resolution adopted on 3 July 1952 by both Houses of the United States Congress had approved the Constitution of Puerto Rico subject to certain changes in that document. As a result, the Constitution had included a provision to the effect that any amendment or revision of the Constitution must be consistent with the above-mentioned United States Congress resolution, with the relevant provisions of the United States Constitution, with the Federal Relations Act and with Public Law No. 600. It was thus clear that the United States Congress in which Puerto Rico was not represented, continued to exercise legal control over that Territory.

194. The Uruguayan representative had sought to prove that the Special Committee was not competent to consider the question of Puerto Rico and that the Committee would be undermining the very basis of the United Nations if it discussed the merits of General Assembly resolution 748 (VIII). The Soviet delegation could not agree that the fact that a resolution had been adopted meant that it could not be discussed. To accept that argument would mean that the "Uniting for Peace" resolution was a basic United Nations document, although it had been adopted in violation of the Charter and all the principles of the United Nations and had been forced on the Organization by the United States at a time when it had enjoyed an automatic majority in the General Assembly. Referring to resolution 748 (VIII) he said that the General Assembly had in essence adopted the point of view of the colonial Power, namely the United States. In manufacturing its nefarious commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the United States had trampled on the principle of the equality of rights which was embodied in the Charter. The Committee should be guided by the Charter rather than by the above-mentioned resolution, which was contrary to the basic provisions of the Charter of the United Nations.

195. With regard to the conclusions of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, he wishes to point out that there had been no unanimity in the Committee regarding the new constitutional status of the Territory. In particular, the Indian representative had said that Puerto Rico did not possess all the attributes of a fully independent or self-governing State. Furthermore, the resolution adopted by the Committee had been based on information submitted by the United States. In resolution 748 (VIII) the General Assembly had expressed the opinion "that it stems from the documentation provided that the association of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico with the United States of America has been established as a mutually agreed association" and had considered it appropriate that the transmission of information on Puerto Rico under Article 73 e of the Charter should cease. In essence, the General Assembly had adopted the point of view of the administering Power, i.e. that relations between dependent Territories and the States responsible for those Territories were an internal matter and that only the colonial Power could decide whether a Territory was self-governing or not. In taking that decision and recognizing thereby that the United States was no longer responsible for the Territory, the General Assembly had failed to carry out one of its most important functions under the Charter, namely that laid down in Article 13 of initiating studies and making recommendations for the purpose of assisting in the realization of human rights. One of the most important of those rights was the right of peoples to self-determination. In the Soviet delegation's view, the Committee should not be bound by a resolution which had been adopted in violation of the provisions of the Charter.

196. Under the Charter all States Members of the United Nations had an obligation to develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples. By creating the "Commonwealth" of Puerto Rico, the United States had retained its privileged position; thus it had flagrantly violated the principle of equal rights and self-determination. The United States continued to be responsible for Puerto Rico's foreign affairs and defence, the most important prerogatives of an independent State.

197. Puerto Rico was represented in the United States Congress only by a Resident Commissioner, who did not have the right to vote, although that body determined questions directly affecting the Territory. While the Constitution provided that the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico was a court of last instance, its decisions could be appealed from to a United States court. The Puerto Rican people had been deprived of the possibility of managing their own affairs. The United States Congress retained exclusive jurisdiction over military service, the declaration of war, customs, currency, shipping, air transport, external relations, citizenship, status of aliens, wages and labour legislation, stationing of armed forces, and so forth. United States monopolies continued to be the masters of the Territory's economy. Moreover, as the United Kingdom newspaper, The Guardian, had pointed out on 6 August 1965, one of the most important factors restricting the independence of Puerto Rico was the existence in the Territory of a large number of military bases. Thus, the referendum held in Puerto Rico in 1951 in order to serve as a "showcase" concealing the colonialist policy of the United States had been conducted in an atmosphere of political and economic domination by the United States, and United States imperialism had sacrificed the aspirations of the Puerto Rican people to its own economic and military purposes. The colonial status of Puerto Rico could not be concealed even in the official circles of the United States. In 1952, a United States Congressman had described the so-called constitution of Puerto Rico as a weak, insignificant colonial statute. In May 1963, a former Attorney General of Puerto Rico had called Public Law 600 a farce that left intact the structure of the colonial administration. In 1964, Luther Hodges, the former Secretary of Commerce, had said that in granting Commonwealth status to Puerto Rico in 1952, Congress had not intended to alter the status of the Territory as a "Possession" of the United States. It was clear that the statements of United States representatives to the effect that the people of Puerto Rico had exercised their right of self-determination and that the island had become a self-governing Territory were without any foundation whatever and were merely aimed at deceiving ill-informed public opinion.

198. The Puerto Rican Constitution, which had been dictated by the United States, was completely at variance with the provisions of paragraph 5 of the Declaration in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). The very fact that the United States Government planned to hold a plebiscite in July of the current year showed that it could no longer maintain the fiction that the present status of Puerto Rico was in accordance with the provisions of the Charter and the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Like the referendum of 1951, the planned plebiscite would be conducted under the control of the executive bodies of the colonial Power, in an atmosphere of repression and persecution, and under conditions of military occupation. The United States Government had not even promised to recognize the results of the plebiscite.

199. Puerto Rico came within the third category of Territories listed in paragraph 5 of the General Assembly's Declaration in resolution 1514 (XV), and it was the duty of the Special Committee to include the question in its agenda.

200. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania said that his delegation rejected the contention that the Committee was not competent to discuss the inclusion of Puerto Rico in its agenda. The General Assembly, in operative paragraph 4 of resolution 2189 (XXI), had approved "the action taken and envisaged by the Special Committee with respect to the list of Territories to which the Declaration applies", and had approved its report containing a reference to the Working Group's twenty-fifth report, in which it had stated its view that the question of the inclusion of certain Territories, including Puerto Rico, required further study, and that such study should take place early in the 1967 session. The General Assembly had clearly approved that decision, and the Special Committee's competence to consider the matter was thus confirmed. That decision by the General Assembly must prevail over any earlier decision inconsistent with it. Each session of the General Assembly was sovereign and the decisions of later sessions had precedence over those of earlier sessions. Thus the Committee was legally empowered to take up the question of Puerto Rico.

201. His delegation strongly supported the inclusion of the question of the colonial Territory of Puerto Rico in the Committee's agenda. In taking that stand it could derive support from the Declaration of the Cairo Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries.<sup>10</sup> The anti-colonialist and anti-imperialist forces represented at that Conference had deemed it their duty to proclaim the right of Puerto Rico to independence. In resolution 1514 (XV), the General Assembly had laid down that immediate steps must be taken in all Territories which had not yet attained independence to transfer power to the people. Puerto Rico was a colonial Territory and was not independent. The representative of the Soviet Union had given a list of some of the matters which still remained in the hands of the administering Power. In such circumstances, Puerto Rico was clearly still a colony, and came within the purview of resolution 1514 (XV) and of the present Committee.

202. He recalled that in the case of the Cook Islands a decision had been taken that the administering Power should cease to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter. It had been stipulated, however, that the people of the Cook Islands had the right to avail themselves of their option under resolution 1514 (XV) at any time they wished. In so doing, the General Assembly had confirmed that the Declaration was applicable as long as a Territory did not enjoy complete independence. The same was true with respect to Puerto Rico. The question of Puerto Rico should therefore be included in the agenda so that it could be fully studied.

203. He also supported the inclusion of the question of the Comoro Archipelago in the Committee's agenda, particularly as the administering Power concerned, in connexion with another Territory, had refused to co-operate with the United Nations, with the result that a serious situation had arisen.

204. The representative of Bulgaria said that, as a member of the Working Group, his delegation had, in view of the importance of the matter, supported the suggestion that the question of the inclusion of Puerto Rico in the agenda of the Special Committee should be referred to the plenary meeting.

205. As the representatives of the USSR and Tanzania had pointed out, the General Assembly, by adopting the reports of the Special Committee for 1965 and 1966, and by approving the action taken and envisaged by the Special Committee for 1967 with respect to the list of Territories to which the Declaration applied (resolution 2189 (XXI), operative paragraph 4), had authorized the Special Committee to discuss the question. In addition, many requests had been received asking for the inclusion of Puerto Rico in the Committee's agenda.

206. His delegation's position was based on the terms of reference of the Special Committee under resolution 1514 (XV), and subsequent resolutions relating to its implementation, and was in conformity with his country's fundamental policy of defending the sacred right of dependent peoples to self-determination and freedom and of supporting them in their struggle. Under paragraph 5 of the Declaration in resolution 1514 (XV), the Special Committee had been given a clear mandate to deal with all colonial Territories, including Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories and all other Territories which had not yet attained independence, as in the case of Puerto Rico. The Second Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, held in Cairo in October 1964, had drawn the attention of the Special Committee to the case of Puerto Rico and had called upon it to consider the situation in the light of resolution 1514 (XV). The Special Committee was fully qualified to discuss the question of Puerto Rico since the latter was still a dependent Territory, to which resolution 1514 (XV) was fully applicable. That resolution was the raison d'être of the Committee and all criteria for deciding whether a Territory was dependent or not must be based on it.

207. If it was true that the people of Puerto Rico had indeed exercised their right to self-determination and had attained self-government, it was difficult to see why a so-called plebiscite was to be held in July 1967. The main reason was obviously to give the impression that the people were being consulted, while the present situation of virtual colonialism was maintained. The plebiscite would offer the apparent alternatives of statehood in the United States or independence but the United States Congress would not commit itself in advance to abiding by the results. The plebiscite was clearly an attempt by the United States to evade its international responsibilities and postpone once again the solution of the colonial problem of Puerto Rico. Puerto Rico must be included in the list of Territories to which resolution 1514 (XV) was applicable and the Special Committee should discuss in detail all the political, economic, social and other conditions prevailing in the Territory.

208. The representative of Syria said that his delegation's position was based on three principles. The first was that each session of the General Assembly was master of its own business. If that was not so, many errors would be perpetuated. Even the history of the United Nations was not without instances of tragedies resulting from falsifications of the will of the majority. Truth was never decided by the number of votes. Secondly, as a non-aligned country, Syria was bound by the decisions of the Second Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, which had called upon the Special Committee to consider, in the light of resolution 1514 (XV), the situation in Puerto Rico and other Territories. Thirdly, there had been a significant change in the composition and political alignment of the United Nations since 1953, when resolution 748 (VIII) had been adopted. Of the forty-six countries which had attended the Second Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, twenty-seven had not been Members of the United Nations in 1953, and that was more than the number of those States which had voted in favour of resolution 748 (VIII) since the result had been 26 in favour, 16 against and 18 abstentions. The fact that the result of the vote in the Fourth Committee, before the question had been referred to the General Assembly, had been 22 in favour, 18 against and 19 abstentions, appeared to indicate that the United States delegation had exerted pressure on some Members in order to gain four additional votes.

209. He pointed out that operative paragraph 9 of resolution 748 (VIII) stated that due regard should be paid to the political advancement of the people of Puerto Rico and to the will of the Puerto Rican and American peoples in the conduct of their relations and also in the eventuality that either might desire any change in the terms of their association. He hoped that some progress had been made since 1953, but, in his view, the will of the people could only be ascertained when they enjoyed political sovereignty and previous speakers had already referred to the rights of which the people of Puerto Rico were deprived.

210. The United States representative had said that it had been the people of Puerto Rico who had decided in favour of their present status. Other countries, including Syria, which had suffered under colonialism, had seen Governments set up and deposed, the will of the people falsified and parts of their countries ceded. In Puerto Rico, only 34 per cent of the population entitled to vote had in fact voted in favour of the present status, while 6 per cent had voted against and 60 per cent had abstained. Furthermore, no alternatives had been offered. That did not indicate that the people of Puerto Rico had been given the opportunity to express their will freely.

211. The only resolution which should guide the Special Committee was resolution 1514 (XV), in particular paragraph 5 of the Declaration, which fully confirmed operative paragraph 9 of resolution 748 (VIII). If the United States was convinced that it had right on its side, it should not try to prevent the Special Committee from considering the matter. He therefore fully supported the inclusion in the Special Committee's agenda of the two Territories of Puerto Rico and the Comoro Archipelago.

212. The representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland fully agreed with the objections expressed by the United States representative to the inclusion of Puerto Rico in the Committee's agenda. It was solely for the administering Power concerned to decide when a Territory under its formal administration had ceased to be non-self-governing within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter. That was his Government's basic position. In resolution 748 (VIII), however, the General Assembly itself had recognized the new status of Puerto Rico as that of an autonomous political entity and had declared it appropriate that the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter should cease. He shared the view expressed by the representative of Uruguay that it was not for the Special Committee to question or seek to reverse a clear, unequivocal and specific decision taken by the General Assembly itself. Furthermore, the Puerto Rican people had repeatedly been asked to express their views about their present and future status. Since 1952, support for the political parties favouring independence had declined to 21,000 in 1964, whereas the two main parties which supported Puerto Rico's present status had in 1964 obtained 479,000 and 277,000 votes respectively. It was therefore clear that Puerto Rico was not a Non-Self-Governing or colonial Territory and that the Committee was not competent to discuss it.

213. Similar considerations applied to the Comoro Islands. The former administering power, France, had informed the United Nations in March 1959 that the Territory had achieved full autonomy and that consequently Chapter XI of the Charter no longer applied. It had also supplied a considerable amount of documentary evidence in support of its decision, which had not been questioned by any formal or other United Nations decision at the time or since.

214. If it was once admitted that new Territories could be added to the Committee's already extensive list, even for the purpose of discussing whether they should be discussed, there would be no end to the controversies raised. If the Committee was to adopt a completely unrestricted view of what constituted a Territory which had not yet attained independence, the list might be endless, especially if the Committee reopened the subject of Territories whose decolonization had already been officially endorsed by the United Nations. His delegation fully supported the United States proposal.

215. The representative of Italy said that the reservations of his delegation, mentioned in the thirtieth report of the Working Group, related both to competence and methods. On the question of competence, his delegation strongly believed that the Special Committee did not have the power or authority to decide that a Territory had not yet attained independence within the meaning of operative paragraph 5 of resolution 1514 (XV) or to inscribe it on its agenda. During the five years of its existence, the Special Committee had not added a single Territory to its original list without a previous decision by the General Assembly. A decision of such magnitude which was tantamount to defining the status of a territory and involved legal and practical consequences could not be left to a subsidiary body of the General Assembly such as the Special Committee. The Special Committee was even less competent to discuss Territories which had already been the subject of a General Assembly resolution, such as Puerto Rico, or had been removed from the list of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the implicit consent of the General Assembly, such as the Comoro Islands.

216. He agreed that in approving the reports of the Special Committee, the General Assembly had implicitly approved each part of the Committee's work, including the decision to postpone until 1967 a procedural debate as to whether a number of items should or should not be inscribed in the agenda. The General Assembly could not, however, express an opinion in advance on a decision which the Special Committee had not yet taken. The reasoning of the USSR and Tanzanian representatives on that point could therefore not be regarded as acceptable.

217. Similarly, his delegation could not be associated with another argument advanced, namely that a change in the membership of the United Nations made earlier resolutions valueless and obsolete. To accept such an idea would deal a serious blow to the United Nations. The General Assembly could, of course, revise or reconsider an earlier resolution, but unless and until that was done, the resolution stood and could not be ignored without violating the spirit and letter of the Charter.

218. On the question of methods, under operative paragraph 5 of resolution 1514 (XV) the Special Committee had special responsibilities in the drawing up of the list of Territories which had not yet achieved independence. As his delegation had repeatedly maintained in the past, such responsibilities should be discharged by the Working Group which should study the relevant criteria and principles for submission to the General Assembly.

219. His delegation had therefore had serious reservations concerning the discussion of the question in the plenary meeting without previous exhaustive consideration by the Working Group. Consequently, his delegation would oppose the inclusion of any Territory not considered within the context of a comprehensive study of the more general problem of the list of the Territories to which resolution 1514 (XV) applied. His delegation therefore supported the United States proposal.

220. The representative of Poland said that his delegation's position with respect to the status of Puerto Rico had been fully explained at the eighth session of the General Assembly and remained unchanged. Despite some changes in the political status of the Territory, there had been no justification for removing Puerto Rico from the list of Non-Self-Governing Territories, as Puerto Rico had not yet attained the stage of full self-government and independence within the meaning of the United Nations Charter. The United States Congress reserved the right to pass legislation on economic, social and educational matters affecting Puerto Rico, while the Puerto Rico legislature could enact such legislation only within considerable limitations. The people of Puerto Rico could not at its will change the constitutional status of the Territory; under the Federal Relations Act, the prior agreement of the United States Congress was required. Moreover, the United States Congress could at any time amend the Puerto Rico Federal Relations Act. On the basis of those facts, his delegation had opposed the adoption of resolution 748 (VIII), which had in any case been adopted only by a very slim majority.

221. General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) stipulated quite clearly that the colonial system should be abolished in all Territories, irrespective of whether or not a given Territory strictly fell into one of the two categories of a Non-Self-Governing or a Trust Territory. It should not be so interpreted as to delay the process of decolonization or to deny the enjoyment of "complete independence and freedom". The people of Puerto Rico did not yet enjoy "complete independence and freedom" and, consequently, the question of Puerto Rico still came under the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) and, as such, could and should be discussed by the Special Committee.

222. United Nations work in similar cases had shown that the Organization had endeavoured to elaborate basic principles to ensure that what had happened in the case of Puerto Rico should not apply in the case of other Territories. That was exemplified by General Assembly resolution 2064 (XX) on the question of the Cook Islands. Although elections had been held in the Cook Islands under United Nations supervision and the Constitution guaranteed the people a right to withdraw unilaterally from its association with New Zealand, the General Assembly had considered itself in duty bound to include in its resolution operative paragraph 6 in which it "reaffirms the responsibility of the United Nations, under General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV), to assist the people of Cook Islands in the eventual achievement of full independence, if they so wish, at a future date". That resolution proved that United Nations responsibility in colonial cases did not cease automatically when the administering Power was absolved of its obligation to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter. Even though the United States Government had been absolved from that obligation in respect of Puerto Rico, the process of self-determination had not been completed in that Territory, and the United Nations still had responsibilities towards the Territory and its people.

223. The Special Committee had been instructed by the General Assembly to seek the best means for the immediate and full application of resolution 1514 (XV) to all Territories which had not yet attained independence. It was therefore the duty of the Committee to discuss the request contained in the Declaration adopted by the Second Conference of Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, and the request contained in the letter from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Cuba (A/AC.109/144) that the question of Puerto Rico and that of the Comoro Islands be included in the agenda of the Special Committee. His delegation also shared the view expressed by the representatives of the Soviet Union, Tanzania and Bulgaria that the Special Committee had already received a specific mandate from the General Assembly to study the problem of the inclusion of Puerto Rico in the list of Territories to which the provisions of resolution 1514 (XV) were applicable, inasmuch as the General Assembly at its twenty-first session had approved the report of the Special Committee covering its work in 1966, which explicitly stated that the Committee intended to study that question.

224. Guided by the principles of anti-colonialism and the rights of all colonial and non-self-governing peoples to complete independence and freedom, his delegation firmly supported the inclusion of the question of Puerto Rico and of the Comoro Archipelago in the agenda of the Special Committee.

225. The representative of Australia said that he had been surprised by the discussion of the question of the inclusion of Puerto Rico and of the Comoro Archipelago in the list of Territories to which the Declaration was applicable. He fully agreed with the representative of Uruguay that Member States must be guided in the matter by their obligations under the Charter.

226. Article 73 of the Charter was quite explicit concerning the obligations of Member States with regard to Non-Self-Governing Territories. At the twenty-third meeting of the Special Committee on Peace-keeping Operations, the USSR representative had stressed the need to adhere to the provisions of the Charter. The basic obligations of Member States were regulated by the Charter, which could not be changed, especially by extraneous meetings of some Members. The Charter had international treaty status and nothing could countermand its clear provisions. He would point out that his Government had played an instrumental part at the San Francisco Conference in drafting the Charter provisions relating to the rights of dependent peoples to self-government and independence and had also played a responsible role in the decolonization operations of the last twenty years.

227. The resolutions of the General Assembly had great persuasive force, but could not amend the Charter. The present discussion raised the whole issue of the relation of General Assembly resolutions to the Charter. Under Article 73 of the Charter, the United Nations had the obligation to develop self-government in dependent Territories. By resolution 748 (VIII), the General Assembly had recognized that the people of Puerto Rico had expressed their will "in a free and democratic way" and had "effectively exercised their right to self-determination" and that the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter were, therefore, no longer applicable to that Territory. The United Nations function in relation to that Territory had ended with its achievement of self-government. Article 10 of the Charter provided that the General Assembly might discuss any question which came within the scope of the Charter, but the question of the self-government of Puerto Rico no longer came within the scope of Member States' obligations under the Charter. The contention that General Assembly resolution 748 (VIII) was invalid because it had been adopted fourteen years previously, when the number of Member States was less than at present, was untenable.

228. Again, much had been said about the power of the General Assembly and the sovereign nature of each separate session of the Assembly. That did not affect the fundamental and paramount status of the Charter. Resolutions on self-government differed from others, which might be varied or amended. A resolution accepting that certain provisions of the Charter had been fulfilled and stating that a particular people had asserted its right to self-determination could not be revoked so that the Territory concerned was demoted again to colonial status.

229. He had noted recently a tendency of certain Member States to wish to force complete independence on States which did not want it. General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) declared the right of all peoples freely to determine their political status. For the United Nations to insist on independence as the only solution for all Territories would be limiting the right of peoples to make a free choice. General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) set forth the various options which were open to the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories when exercising that right of free choice. There was a tendency among certain States to regard the alternatives to independence as "second-class" solutions, as had been apparent in the debate on the Caribbean Territories, in whose case principles V, VI and VII of the annex to resolution 1541 (XV) had been applied.

230. The United States had clearly discharged its Charter obligations with regard to Puerto Rico, and that territory was no longer a Non-Self-Governing Territory and subject to consideration by the General Assembly or the Special Committee. He was surprised and perturbed that the question had been raised, and his delegation would definitely support the United States motion.

231. The representative of the United States of America, speaking in exercise of the right of reply, said that in view of the number of delegations which wished to speak in the debate, her delegation was willing to postpone the vote on its motion until the Committee's next meeting. In replying to the false allegations which had been made by the USSR representative and others, she would keep her statement on a procedural basis and not go into the substance of the matter, as the USSR representative had inappropriately done.

232. The allegation that the attainment of commonwealth status had made no significant change in Puerto Rico's position and that it was still under the authority of the United States Congress had no basis in fact. Congresswoman Bolton, as the United States delegate to the eighth session of the General Assembly, had stated clearly the full significance of the new status in the Fourth Committee in 1953. Mrs. Bolton had explained that there was now a bilateral contract of association between the United States and Puerto Rico, which had been established by a juridical decision based on the common consent of the Puerto Rican people. Previously, the Territory had been under the full authority of the United States Congress in all government matters, by virtue of an Organic Act which only Congress had the right to change. The new Constitution had been chosen by the people, which alone had the authority to alter it.

233. The USSR representative had questioned the act of self-determination of the people of Puerto Rico. In the elections, the people of the Territory had been given a clear choice between the alternative options: commonwealth status, statehood, and independence. The first option had been chosen by an overwhelming majority of the people, and that choice had been reiterated in a series of free elections since. Moreover, while the number of votes for parties in favour of commonwealth status had steadily increased, the number of votes for those in favour of independence had steadily dwindled, and in 1964, as indicated by the results of the most recent elections, 58.5 per cent of the population had voted for commonwealth status, 34.3 per cent for statehood and only 2.7 per cent for independence.

234. The USSR representative had made frequent reference to the fact that the laws passed by the United States Congress applied in Puerto Rico and that the Federal Government had authority in some areas of Puerto Rican affairs. Those statements showed a failure to understand the nature of the relationship between the United States and Puerto Rico. As Congresswoman Bolton had said at the eighth session of the General Assembly, Puerto Rico had agreed under its contract of association with the United States that the United States Government should have in respect of Puerto Rico the same functions that it had in respect of the states of the Union. That in no way detracted from the status of full self-government. The Resident Commissioner for Puerto Rico had said in his statement at the 348th meeting of the Fourth Committee in October 1953 that, as in the case of the forty-eight states of the Union, the United States Congress had no power to enact legislation relating to the domestic affairs of Puerto Rico, but only on matters relating to external policy. The authority of Congress in respect of Puerto Rico was subject to the same constitutional restrictions as in the case of the federal states.

235. Moreover, the Puerto Rican people could change its present status whenever it wished. The senior United States representative at the eighth session of the General Assembly had stated at the 459th plenary meeting on 27 November 1953 that he had been authorized to say on behalf of the President of the United States that if, at any time, the Legislative Assembly of Puerto Rico adopted a resolution in favour of more complete or even absolute independence, he would immediately recommend to Congress that such independence should be granted. The Puerto Rican people was thus free to choose its own status, and repeated elections had shown that the majority of the people in the Territory were in favour of commonwealth status or statehood, while the independence party had received little support.

236. In conclusion, she stressed that, since the General Assembly had recognized, in 1953, that the Puerto Rican people had exercised its right to self-determination and achieved self-government, the Territory was no longer a matter for consideration by the Committee.

237. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, speaking in exercise of the right of reply, recalled the United States representative's statement that the allegation that the attainment of commonwealth status had made no significant change in Puerto Rico's position had no basis in fact. She had referred to a statement made by Congresswoman Bolton at the eighth session of the General Assembly to the effect that there was a bilateral contract of association between the United States and Puerto Rico, which could not be altered except by mutual consent. The Soviet delegation had adduced facts to show that there had been virtually no change of any significance in the structure of Puerto Rico. Those facts had not been refuted by the United States representative.

238. The USSR delegation had said that Public Law 600, adopted by the United States Congress on 3 July 1950, had not repealed the Organic Act of 2 March 1917 and that the former colonial régime had continued in force. Although the new colonial structure was described in the so-called Constitution as an "Associated Free State" or "Commonwealth", in reality Puerto Rico was not a politically independent State. It was not free and the association itself was based on unequal conditions. Puerto Rico continued to be a colonial dependency of the United States. Section 4 of Public Law 600 stated:

"Except as provided in section 5 of this Act, the Act . . . approved 2 March 1917, as amended, is hereby continued in force and effect and may hereafter be cited as the 'Puerto Rican Federal Relations Act'."

Section 5 provided for the repeal of many sections of the earlier act but all of them related to local administration. The powers of the so-called Constitutional Convention authorized by Public Law 600 had thus been limited by that Law, which had fully maintained in force the Organic Act of 1917 and on the basis of which the United States Congress retained complete control over Puerto Rico. Furthermore, under the so-called Federal Relations Act, Puerto Rico was regarded as a "possession" of the United States. The first paragraph of that Act stated that its provisions applied to Puerto Rico and the neighbouring islands, which belonged to the United States.

239. In addition, Public Law 600, like the "Constitution" of Puerto Rico, could be amended, suspended or repealed by the United States Congress. Those facts fully refuted the statement of Congresswoman Bolton. It was clear that, since the United States Congress had acted unilaterally, the United States and Puerto Rico had never entered into a mutually agreed association. In no provision of Public Law 600 did the United States Congress renounce sovereignty over Puerto Rico or recognize Puerto Rican sovereignty. From the moment of the establishment of the colonial régime by the United States, there had never been any negotiations between the United States and Puerto Rico as a sovereign State. When Public Law 600 had been adopted, the United States House and Senate Committees on Territorial and Insular Affairs had emphasized that the existing political, economic and social relations between the United States and Puerto Rico would remain unchanged. That showed that Puerto Rico continued to be a United States colony, that the United States had not renounced its sovereignty over Puerto Rico, that the United States could unilaterally alter the present structure of government in Puerto Rico and that Public Law 600 had not granted the Territory a full measure of self-government.

240. The United States representative had also referred to a statement by the senior United States representative at the eighth session of the General Assembly to the effect that if, at any time, the Legislative Assembly of Puerto Rico adopted a resolution in favour of more complete or even absolute independence, such a request would be favourably considered by the United States Congress. But that promise had not been kept. In 1959, the Legislative Assembly of Puerto Rico had adopted a joint resolution requesting the United States Congress to grant the Territory a greater measure of self-government. The Congress had refused to consider that request. Again, in November 1962, the Puerto Rican Assembly had adopted resolution No. 1 requesting the United States to settle the final political status of Puerto Rico on the basis of giving the island the right to sovereignty. That request, too, had been ignored by the United States Congress. At present, the United States was attempting to force a colonial plebiscite on the Puerto Rican people with a view to avoiding its international responsibility and postponing a definitive decision on the question of sovereignty.

241. The United States representative had referred to elections that had been held in the Territory in 1948, but the Soviet delegation's point was that the people of Puerto Rico had not been given the right to choose, or an opportunity to decide on the future political status of the Territory.

242. He read out the text of a letter he had just received that had been addressed to the United States representative by members of the Popular Democratic Party of Puerto Rico, the Government party, expressing shock at the inaccurate statements which that representative had made in the Special Committee and which were a complete distortion of historical facts. The members went on to say that they had voted for the Popular Democratic Party on the assurance that local elections were not of a plebiscitary character and that their votes could never be interpreted as precluding further examination by the United Nations of the Territory's political problem. They added that their votes had been cast to foster the struggle for recognition of Puerto Rican sovereignty and to elaborate a true association with the United States. The obstinacy of the United States had made such an association impossible since that Government sought to maintain a colonial relationship. They urged the United States delegation, in the name of United States prestige and the moral force which the United Nations represented, to withdraw its opposition to the inclusion of the question of Puerto Rico in the Special Committee's agenda.

243. In his statement, the Australian representative had presented himself in the role of defender of the interests of the colonial peoples and had boasted about the part played by Australia in the drafting of the United Nations Charter at San Francisco. The Soviet delegation would point out, however, that the fact that the word "independence" was associated with the word "self-government" in the definition of the Trusteeship System was not due to the efforts of the Australian delegation. The word "independence" and some other progressive provisions had been included in the Charter at the demand of the Soviet delegation. If the Australian representative's statements concerning his delegation's role in the drafting of the Charter were true, the Soviet delegation wondered why, twenty years after the adoption of the Charter and the establishment of the Trusteeship System, Australia had not granted independence to its Trust Territories and refused to fix the date for the granting of such independence. Like other colonial Powers, Australia adopted a reactionary policy in the Committee with regard to matters concerning decolonization and voted against all progressive decisions in the United Nations. With regard to the slanderous attacks made by the Australian representative against the Soviet Union's policy, he would point out that the Soviet Union did not have the experience of repressing and persecuting people struggling for independence that the colonialists, including the Australian colonialists, had. The shameful participation of Australia in the Viet-Nameese war, which had been unleashed by United States aggressors, was an example of the Australian Government's policy towards people who were defending their right to self-determination and independence.

244. In his view, the colonialists were presenting themselves as the champions of the self-determination and independence of peoples. However, whenever the peoples waged a struggle to defend their right to be free and independent, the colonialists always used the most modern weapons, tanks, aircraft and the like to suppress the desires of the peoples for freedom and independence, to deprive them of their right to self-determination, and to prevent them from deciding their own future. The sole purpose of the Australian representative's statement was to divert the Committee from considering the pressing political problem of Puerto Rico, which called for immediate solution.

245. The representative of the United States of America said that the statement of the Soviet representative had reiterated a large number of the quite baseless allegations which he had made in the past. She had already submitted detailed figures showing the genuine nature of Puerto Rico's self-determination. The United States delegation was not ready to take advice on the subject from the Soviet Union, and she thought it might be interesting for the Committee to investigate the extent to which the various nations and peoples of the Soviet Union had expressed their desires at any point regarding their association with the USSR, and the extent to which they were free, as the people of Puerto Rico were free, to dissolve the association.

246. The representative of Iraq said that his delegation regarded the question under consideration from two aspects: whether General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) was applicable in the case of Puerto Rico and whether the Special Committee was competent to include the question of Puerto Rico in its agenda. With regard to the first aspect, the Iraqi delegation continued to believe that resolution 1514 (XV) was applicable, since that resolution spoke of three kinds of Territories: Non-Self-Governing Territories, Trust Territories, and Territories which had not yet attained independence. No one claimed that Puerto Rico was an independent State. The General Assembly had adopted resolution 1514 (XV) many years after resolution 748 (VIII) and he was sure that the sponsors of resolution 1514 (XV) had been aware of previous resolutions, such as resolution 748 (VIII), concerning Territories not yet independent.

247. As to the second aspect, it had been pointed out in the Committee that in adopting resolution 2189 (XXI) the previous year, the General Assembly had approved the "action taken and envisaged by the Special Committee with respect to the list of Territories to which the Declaration applies" and had also approved the Committee's report containing a reference to the Working Group's twenty-fifth report, in which it had expressed the view that the question of the inclusion of certain Territories, including Puerto Rico, required further study, and that such study should take place early in the 1967 session. Nevertheless, he did not think that the General Assembly had taken a clear-cut position on the Special Committee's competence to consider the matter. In his delegation's opinion, it was not for the Special Committee to take any decision whether or not the item should be included in its agenda.

248. In those circumstances, he wondered why the United States representative was proposing that a decision should be taken by the Committee excluding the discussion of Puerto Rico.

249. The representative of Venezuela observed that his delegation had already expressed its position on the question in the Working Group and that it had stated its opposition to the inclusion of the item in the agenda. It was not for the Special Committee to consider the question of Puerto Rico. That was a matter which fell within the competence of the General Assembly itself and that body had already taken a decision on the question by adopting resolution 748 (VIII), which the Special Committee could not disregard.

250. The representative of Australia said that, despite the Soviet Union representative's assertions regarding his country's position as the defender of the interests of colonial peoples, the fact was that, of all the major Powers, the Soviet Union alone had declined to submit information on Territories—in some cases previously independent nations—which it had acquired following the Second World War.

251. The Soviet Union representative had referred to "peoples struggling for their independence". He recalled that Australia had gone to the assistance of Poland when it had been the victim of aggression in 1939; Australia had had no pact with the aggressor. Later, his country had gone to the assistance of the Federation of Malaya.

252. He only wished to state—since the Soviet Union representative had raised the question of Viet-Nam—that Australia believed that, in supporting the people of Viet-Nam in resisting aggression, it was acting in a manner fully in accord with the principles of the United Nations.

253. The representative of Syria proposed that the debate on the question of the inclusion of Puerto Rico in the list of Territories to which resolution 1514 (XV) was applicable should be adjourned sine die.

254. The representative of the United Republic of Tanzania supported the Syrian motion. Although his delegation was convinced that Puerto Rico was a colonial Territory for the purposes of resolution 1514 (XV), since it was neither an independent State nor part of another State—as had been confirmed by a ruling of the United States Supreme Court—he believed that further consultations were required before the Committee took a decision.

255. The representative of the United States of America opposed the Syrian motion. She thought that the procedural motion submitted at the previous meeting by her delegation had been adequately discussed and that delegations had had time to reach a position on it. In any event, if the Committee decided to adjourn the debate, her delegation would interpret such a decision as indicating that it was the Committee's will that Puerto Rico should not be considered by it. It would be her understanding that the adoption of a motion to adjourn the debate sine die would preclude further consideration of the issue.

256. The representative of Australia also opposed the motion for adjournment of the debate. The question at issue was clear and had been fully discussed; moreover, in view of its possible implications, the Committee had a duty to take a position on it as soon as possible.

H. IMPLEMENTATION OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTIONS 2151 (XXI), 2184 (XXI), 2189 (XXI) AND 2248 (S-V) AND PERTINENT RESOLUTIONS OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE: REQUESTS ADDRESSED TO SPECIALIZED AGENCIES AND INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

257. At the 569th meeting, on 30 October 1967, the Chairman drew the attention of the Special Committee to a decision taken by the General Assembly at its 1583rd plenary meeting, on 6 October 1967, to include the following item in the agenda of the twenty-second session and to allocate it to the Fourth Committee for consideration and report:

"97. Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples by the specialized agencies and the international institutions associated with the United Nations."

258. The Chairman also drew attention to a note by the Secretariat (A/AC.109/276) concerning the action taken by the specialized agencies and international institutions in response to the relevant provisions of General Assembly resolutions 2151 (XXI), 2184 (XXI), 2189 (XXI) and 2248 (S-V) and pertinent resolutions of the Special Committee. In that note reference was made to another note by the Secretariat (A/AC.109/L.417) relating to the measures taken to extend material and other assistance to refugees from Angola, Mozambique and Guinea, called Portuguese Guinea, by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the specialized agencies concerned and other international relief organizations in response to the resolution adopted by the Special Committee on 22 June 1966 (A/6300/Rev.I, chap. II, para. 619) and General Assembly resolution 2184 (XXI). Reference was also made to the report by the Secretary-General on his consultations with the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development<sup>11</sup> pursuant to paragraph 10 of General Assembly resolution 2184 (XXI) of 12 December 1966. Also of relevance to this question was the statement made at the 487th meeting, on 15 February 1967, by the director in charge of the New York Office of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization concerning the implementation by that organization of pertinent resolutions of the General Assembly and of the Special Committee (A/AC.109/SR.487).

259. At the 570th meeting, the Special Committee decided to draw the attention of the General Assembly, in connexion with its consideration of the item referred to above, to the information contained in the relevant report of the Secretary-General and the notes by the Secretariat (A/AC.109/276 and A/AC.109/L.417).<sup>12</sup>

Implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to colonial Territories considered by the Special Committee during its meetings away from Headquarters (1967)

260. At its 541st meeting, held in Dar es Salaam on 20 June 1967, the Special Committee adopted a resolution relating to the implementation of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) with regard to colonial Territories considered by the Special Committee during its meetings away from Headquarters (1967) (A/AC.109/252). Details of the Special Committee's consideration of this item are contained in chapter II of the present report.

Co-operation with the Organization of African Unity and the League of Arab States

261. The Special Committee during its 1967 session maintained close co-operation with the Organization of African Unity and the League of Arab States. During the Committee's meetings in Dar es Salaam, the Organization of African Unity was represented by an official of its Co-ordinating Committee for the Liberation of Africa, who at the 531st meeting made a statement on behalf of that Organization.

262. At its 543rd meeting, the Special Committee decided to circulate a communication dated 23 June 1967, concerning the question of Aden, addressed to the Secretary-General from the permanent observer of the League of Arab States to the United Nations (A/AC.109/256).

263. In a letter dated 13 June 1967, the Chairman of the Special Committee, having regard to operative paragraphs 11 and 13 thereof, transmitted the text of a resolution concerning the question of Southern Rhodesia (A/AC.109/248), adopted by the Special Committee at its 528th meeting, to the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organization of African Unity. Further, in another letter dated 20 June 1967, the Chairman, having regard to operative paragraph 11 thereof, transmitted to him the text of a resolution concerning the Territories under Portuguese administration (A/AC.109/251).

Information on Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter

264. In accordance with its mandate as set out in General Assembly resolution 1970 (XVIII) of 16 Deember 1963, the Special Committee considered, at its 557th to 559th meetings, on 12 and 13 September 1967, the question of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. Details of the Special Committee's consideration of this item are contained in chapter XXIV of the present report.

<sup>12</sup> The note by the Secretariat concerning the assistance to refugees from the Portuguese Territories mentioned above is appended as annex I to chapter V of the present report. The note by the Secretariat concerning the action taken by the specialized agencies and international institutions is appended as annex III of the present chapter.

Activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and Territories under Portuguese domination and in all other Territories under colonial domination

265. Having regard to the decision taken by the General Assembly in operative paragraph 20 of its resolution 2189 (XXI) of 13 December 1966, the Special Committee decided to undertake a study of the activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and Territories under Portuguese domination and in all other Territories under colonial domination.

266. At its 488th meeting, the Special Committee referred this item to Sub-Committee I for consideration and report. Sub-Committee I, accordingly, submitted its report to the Special Committee on 29 September 1967 (A/AC.109/L.434). The Special Committee's report to the General Assembly on this question is contained in document A/6868 and Add.1.

Military activities and arrangements by the colonial Powers which may be impeding the implementation of the Declaration in Territories under their administration

267. The Special Committee decided at its 488th meeting to undertake a study of the role of the military activities and arrangements by the colonial Powers which may be impeding the implementation of the Declaration in Territories under their administration. It also decided to refer this item to Sub-Committee I for consideration.

268. In paragraph 14 of its report to the Special Committee (see annex IV) Sub-Committee I stated that "Owing to the refusal of the administering Powers to co-operate and in view of the lack of time and information available, the Sub-Committee decided to continue its consideration of this item at its next session".

269. At its 568th meeting, the Special Committee endorsed this decision and agreed that, subject to any decision which the General Assembly might take at its twenty-second session, it would continue consideration of the item at its next session, it being understood that the reservations expressed by some members would be reflected in the records. These reservations are set out below.

270. The representative of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland said that his Government's views, which were fully set out in paragraph 11 of the report, made it necessary for his delegation to reserve its position on the adoption of the report.

271. The representative of the United States of America said that her delegation had expressed certain reservations on the question under discussion and wished to reserve its position.

272. The representative of Italy said that his delegation wished to express reservations on both the substance and the method of the report. The Italian delegation had already stated that a broad consensus had never been achieved on the highly controversial question of military bases: for example, forty-six Member States had not supported General Assembly resolution 2189 (XXI). That question was only a part of the general problem of disarmament and almost all Member States were in agreement that it must be considered in conjunction with other disarmament problems, as was clear from their adoption of General Assembly resolution 2165 (XXI), in which the Assembly had referred the question to the Eighteen-Nation Committee on Disarmament. It would be inappropriate for the Committee to formulate conclusions on the matter while the Eighteen-Nation Committee was considering the problem. The procedure whereby the Sub-Committee felt justified in proceeding to a general condemnation of Member States on the inadequate basis of an exchange of letters with a few Member States could serve only to cast doubt on the seriousness of its work. The Italian delegation was unable to support the report. It thought that paragraph 13 should be deleted, as should the words "owing to the refusal of the administering Powers to co-operate" in paragraph 14, but it would not make a formal proposal to that effect.

273. The representative of Australia reaffirmed his delegation's strong reservations, which appeared in the report.

274. The representative of Finland recalled that his delegation had reserved its position on paragraph 13 in Sub-Committee I, since it considered that the question of military bases was a matter of conflict between the great Powers. That reservation, which had been made in accordance with Finland's policy of neutrality, was still valid.

275. The representative of Madagascar maintained the reservations which his delegation had expressed in the Committee and elsewhere.

276. The representative of the Ivory Coast recalled that his delegation had entered formal reservations on the question of military bases during the Committee's meetings in Africa, since his Government considered that the question was a domestic problem and that it was for colonial Territories themselves to negotiate the maintenance or withdrawal of military bases with the administering Power as they approached independence. The Ivory Coast also felt that the Committee was not the appropriate forum for a final decision on the question of military bases. These reservations remained valid.

277. The representative of Uruguay said that his delegation, which had already stated its position on the question of military bases, would abstain in the vote on the relevant paragraph.

278. The representative of Venezuela said that his delegation would not enter any reservations on the report, since it contained no specific conclusions or recommendations regarding the military activities of colonial Powers in the Territories under their administration. That did not mean, however, that his delegation had in any way altered its position.

279. The representative of Iran reaffirmed his delegation's view that the question of military bases was distinct from the question of colonialism and must be decided by the people of the Territory concerned.

International Seminar on Apartheid, Racial Discrimination and Colonialism in Southern Africa

280. On 21 February the Secretary-General requested the advice of the Special Committee concerning the various aspects of the organization of the international conference or seminar envisaged in operative paragraph 6 (a) of General Assembly resolution 2202 A (XXI) of 16 December 1966 on the problems of apartheid, racial discrimination and colonialism in southern Africa. In a letter dated 20 April 1967, the Chairman of the Special Committee, in response to that request, transmitted a report containing proposals concerning the organization of the international conference or seminar which the Special Committee had, by consensus, agreed to adopt at its 509th meeting, on 17 April 1967 (A/AC.109/236).<sup>13</sup>

281. Following an invitation by the Government of the Republic of Zambia, the Secretary-General organized the International Seminar on Apartheid, Racial Discrimination and Colonialism in Southern Africa, which took place from 25 July to 4 August 1967 in Kitwe, Zambia. The Chairman of the Special Committee, Mr. John W. S. Malecela (United Republic of Tanzania) presided over the International Seminar as its Chairman.

282. On 29 September 1967, the Secretary-General transmitted to the General Assembly the report of the International Seminar (A/6818 and Corr.1) in pursuance of the above-mentioned resolution.

Dissemination of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and publicity for the work of the Special Committee 283. In operative paragraph 18 of resolution 2189 (XXI) of 13 December 1966, the General Assembly requested "the Secretary-General to promote, through the various organs and agencies of the United Nations, the continuous and large-scale publicizing of the Declaration and of the work of the Special Committee, in order that world opinion may be sufficiently aware of the situation in the colonial Territories and of the continuing struggle for liberation waged by the colonial peoples". In operative paragraph 13 of its resolution of 20 June 1967 (A/AC.109/252), the Special Committee requested "the Secretary-General to promote the continuous and large-scale publicizing of the Declaration and of the work of the Special Committee, including in particular, the preparation, in consultation with the Special Committee, of publications covering the work of the Committee at its current session away from Headquarters, in order that world opinion may be sufficiently aware of the situation in colonial Territories and of the continuing struggle for liberation waged by colonial peoples".

284. At the 569th meeting, on 23 October 1967, the Chairman of the Special Committee conveyed to the Committee information which he had received from the Secretariat, relating to the measures taken and envisaged by the Office of Public Information to promote the publicizing of the Declaration and of the work of the Special Committee.

285. At the 570th meeting, on 30 October, following statements made by the representatives of Finland, the USSR, Bulgaria, Venezuela, Syria, India and Yugoslavia, the Chairman undertook to convey the views expressed and the suggestions offered by members concerning this matter to the Office of Public Information.

Matters relating to the small Territories

286. By operative paragraph 16 of its resolution 2189 (XXI) of 13 December 1966, the General Assembly invited "the Special Committee to pay particular attention to the small Territories and to recommend to the General Assembly the most appropriate methods and also the steps to be taken to enable the population of those Territories to exercise fully the right to self-determination and independence".

287. In requesting its Sub-Committees I, II and III to carry out the tasks assigned to them, the Special Committee called their attention to the above-mentioned provision of General Assembly resolution 2189 (XXI). Further, in arriving at its conclusions and recommendations concerning the small Territories, details of which are contained in the relevant chapters of the present report, the Special Committee took that provision into consideration.

288. In this connexion, the Special Committee decided to defer consideration of a proposal contained in paragraph 286 of the report of Sub-Committee III, to the effect that the Secretary-General should be asked to initiate a study of the feasibility of arrangements under which small territories which may wish to be fully self-governing might be enabled to have available to them the status of a sovereign entity associated with the United Nations. Reservations concerning that proposal were expressed by the representatives of Madagascar, the United Kingdom and the United States.

289. By operative paragraph 15 of its resolution 2189 (XXI), the General Assembly invited "the Special Committee, whenever it considers it proper and appropriate, to recommend a deadline for the accession to independence of each Territory in accordance with the wishes of the people and the provisions of the Declaration".

290. In requesting its Sub-Committees I, II and III to carry out the tasks assigned to them, the Special Committee called their attention to the above-mentioned provision of General Assembly resolution 2189 (XXI). Further in its consideration of specific territories, the Special Committee took that provision into consideration.

Pattern of conferences

291. By its resolution 2116 (XX) concerning the pattern of conferences, the General Assembly decided, inter alia, "that a fixed pattern of conferences to govern the places and dates of the meetings of United Nations bodies shall come into force on 1 January 1966 for a further period of three years". By the same resolution, the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General "to submit to the General Assembly each year a basic programme of conferences for the following year, established in conformity with the present pattern and after consultation, as appropriate, with the organs concerned". It also urged "all organs of the United Nations... to review their working methods and also the frequency and length of sessions in the light of the present resolution, the growing volume of meetings, the resulting strain on available resources and the difficulty of ensuring the effective participation of members".

292. In operative paragraph 5 of its resolution 2239 (XXI) on the same subject, the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General "to draw up in August of each year, for submission to the General Assembly... the provisional calendar of meetings and conferences planned by the entire United Nations family of organizations for the two following calendar years". In operative paragraph 9 of this resolution, the Assembly recommended that "all competent organs of the United Nations, including subsidiary organs of the General Assembly, should bear in mind that proposals involving new meetings and conferences would be subject to the recommendations of the Committee on Conferences and to final approval by the Assembly".

293. By adopting the 33rd report of the Working Group (A/AC.109/L.432/Rev.1), the Special Committee at its 564th meeting, on 27 September, decided, subject to any decision which the General Assembly might take at its twenty-second session, to hold two sessions in 1968, the first from the second week of February to the end of June and the second from Thursday, 1 August to Friday, 30 August. This programme would not preclude the holding of extra-session meetings on an emergency basis if developments in any dependent Territory so warranted. Further, the first session would include such meetings away from Headquarters as the Special Committee may decide to hold in 1968. During its second session, the Special Committee would take up the reports of any visiting groups it may dispatch to Territories.

294. As regards the provisional calendar of meetings in 1969, the Special Committee decided to adopt, on a tentative basis, the same programme as that planned for 1968.

J. RELATIONS WITH OTHER UNITED NATIONS BODIES

Security Council

295. The General Assembly, in operative paragraph 14 of its resolution 2189 (XXI) of 13 December 1966, requested "the Special Committee to apprise the Security Council of development in any Territory examined by the Committee which may threaten international peace and security and to make any concrete suggestions which may assist the Council in considering appropriate measures under the Charter of the United Nations".

(a) Southern Rhodesia

296. In paragraph 1 of its consensus of 6 June 1967, concerning the question of Southern Rhodesia adopted at its 523rd meeting held in Kitwe, Zambia, the Special Committee decided "to transmit to the President of the Security Council the records of its debates on the question of Southern Rhodesia, including the testimony submitted by the petitioners, following the conclusion of its consideration of that question". The text of the consensus, together with the records of the debate on the question in the Special Committee, was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 16 June 1967.<sup>14</sup>

297. By operative paragraph 12 of its resolution of 9 June 1967 (A/AC.109/248), the Special Committee recommended to the Security Council, "in accordance with its decision contained in resolution 232 (1966) of 16 December 1966, and, in particular, paragraph 1 thereof to take the necessary measures under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations". The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 13 June 1967.<sup>15</sup>

(b) Territories under Portuguese administration

298. In operative paragraph 7 of its resolution of 20 June 1967 (A/AC.109/251), the Special Committee drew "the urgent attention of the Security Council to the continued deterioration of the situation in the Territories under Portuguese domination as well as to the consequences of the aggressive acts committed by Portugal against the independent African States that border its colonies". In operative paragraph 8 of the same resolution, the Special Committee urgently recommended that "the Security Council take the necessary measures to make mandatory the provisions of its resolutions concerning this question, particularly resolution 218 (1965) of 23 November 1965 and those of General Assembly resolution 2184 (XXI) of 12 December 1966". The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 20 June 1967.<sup>16</sup>

(c) Colonial Territories considered by the Special Committee during its meetings away from Headquarters (1967)

299. In operative paragraph 4 of its resolution of 20 June 1967 (A/AC.109/252), the Special Committee recommended "once again that the Security Council make obligatory the measures provided for under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations against Portugal, South Africa and the illegal racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia". The text of this resolution was transmitted to the President of the Security Council on 20 June 1967.<sup>17</sup>

Trusteeship Council

300. In accordance with paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) which requested the Trusteeship Council to assist the Special Committee in its work, the President of the Trusteeship Council, by letter dated 30 June 1967 (A/AC.109/255) addressed to the Chairman, informed the Special Committee that the Council at its thirty-fourth session examined conditions in the Trust Territories of the Pacific Islands, Nauru and New Guinea. The letter stated that the conclusions and recommendations of the Trusteeship Council, as well as the observations of the members of the Trusteeship Council, representing their individual opinions only, were contained in its report to the Security Council on the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands<sup>18</sup> and in its report to the General Assembly on Nauru and New Guinea.<sup>19</sup> of common interest relating to the work of the two Committees. ### United Nations Special Mission on Aden

305. In a note dated 23 February 1967,<sup>20</sup> the Secretary-General announced that following consultations with the Special Committee and the administering Power pursuant to General Assembly resolution 2183 (XXI), he had appointed the United Nations Special Mission on Aden with the following composition: Mr. Manuel Perez Guerrero of Venezuela, Chairman; Mr. Abdussattar Shalizi of Afghanistan, and Mr. Moussa Leo Keita of Mali.

306. At the 567th meeting of the Special Committee, on 13 October, the Chairman drew attention to a letter dated 12 October 1967 addressed to him by the Secretary-General, appended to which was a letter of the same date from the Chairman of the United Nations Special Mission on Aden (A/AC.109/277) indicating when the Mission expected to submit its report.

307. An account of the Special Committee's consideration of the report of the Mission is contained in chapter VI of the present report.

United Nations Council for South West Africa

308. Having regard to its own mandate, the Special Committee has closely followed the work of the United Nations Council for South West Africa. By letter dated 12 September 1967, the Chairman of the Special Committee transmitted to the President of the Council for South West Africa the text of a resolution on the question of South West Africa (A/AC.109/271) adopted by the Committee at its 557th meeting on the same date.

presence of representatives of the International Labour Organisation, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and the World Health Organization at meetings of the Special Committee.

303. During the period covered by the report, the Special Committee adopted the following consensus and resolutions which contained appeals or requests addressed to international institutions, including the specialized agencies:

K. REVIEW OF WORK<sup>21</sup>

309. In its resolution 2189 (XXI), the General Assembly requested the Special Committee to continue to perform its tasks and to seek suitable means for the immediate and full implementation of the Declaration in all Territories which have not yet attained independence. The Assembly also requested the Committee to pay particular attention to the small Territories, to recommend whenever it considered it proper and appropriate, a deadline for the accession to independence of each Territory, and to make any concrete suggestions which might assist the Security Council in considering appropriate measures under the Charter regarding developments in the colonial Territories which may threaten international peace and security.

310. At the outset of its work during 1967 the Special Committee was aware that some constitutional progress had taken place in a few of the colonial Territories to which the Declaration applies, and Bechuanaland (Botswana), Basutoland (Lesotho) and Barbados, to which it had given close consideration in previous years, had acceded to independence during the latter part of 1966. However, many members observed that these developments served only to intensify their regret at the continued delay in the complete and effective implementation of the Declaration. They noted that although more than six years had passed since the adoption of that Declaration, many Territories remained under colonial rule, some of them with little prospect of emancipation in the near future. Indeed, in disregard of the pertinent United Nations resolutions, the administering Powers had persisted in their denial of the right of the people of these Territories to self-determination and had in some instances extended the application of their harshly repressive policies. Many Members viewed this state of affairs as a serious threat to international peace and security. In this connexion special concern was expressed regarding the situation in the colonial Territories in southern Africa where the authorities concerned, acting in collaboration with one another and supported by foreign economic and other interests, continued flagrantly to stifle the legitimate aspirations of the indigenous inhabitants to freedom and independence.

311. It was in this context that the Special Committee engaged in the discharge of its mandate during 1967. In the course of its work it re-examined the implementation of the Declaration and of General Assembly resolutions relating to the various colonial Territories and in the light of developments formulated recommendations for the application of further measures as appropriate. In addition to carrying out a number of specific tasks assigned to it by the General Assembly or arising from its own previous decisions, the Committee also undertook a study of the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and Territories under Portuguese administration and in all other Territories under colonial administration, on the basis of which it submitted conclusions and recommendations to the General Assembly. Moreover, having regard to the relevant provisions of General Assembly resolution 2189 (XXI), 2160 (XXI), and 2232 (XXI), the Committee initiated a study of military activities and arrangements by colonial Powers in Territories under their administration which might be impeding the implementation of the Declaration.

312. This programme of work proved to be strenuous; adding to its weight was the necessity of keeping the situation in certain of the colonial Territories under continuous review. What was more, many of the problems which the Special Committee was called upon to examine had increased both in difficulty and in gravity. Nevertheless by holding meetings continuously from February to November, except for one short recess, the Committee was able to give adequate consideration to all but a few items on its agenda.

313. As envisaged in its last report to the General Assembly, the Special Committee held a further series of meetings away from Headquarters during May and June this year. These meetings took place at Kinshasa, Kitwe and Dar es Salaam, at the invitation of the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Zambia and the United Republic of Tanzania respectively. The Committee also accepted in principle similar invitations extended by five other Member Governments but it agreed to take advantage of them at a future date. As was anticipated by several Members the session away from Headquarters once again facilitated the appearance before it of representatives of national liberation movements wishing to express their views and to acquaint the Committee with the progress of their struggle. Further, the Committee was enabled to acquire more direct knowledge than would otherwise have been available to it of the realities of the situation in several colonial Territories, particularly those in southern Africa, and thus to strengthen its own capacity to assist the people in their efforts to achieve freedom and independence. The Committee was also enabled to assess the extent to which the provisions of previous United Nations resolutions had been implemented and to recommend such additional measures as were necessary for the attainment of the desired objectives.

314. The Special Committee devoted considerable attention to the question of Southern Rhodesia, recent developments regarding which had given cause for general and increasing concern. Following its unsuccessful talks in December 1966 with the illegal racist minority régime, the United Kingdom Government had indicated that it was withdrawing all previous proposals for a constitutional settlement and that it would not submit to the United Kingdom Parliament any settlement involving independence before majority rule. However, most members urged that any future consultations concerning the future of the Territory should be carried out with the representatives of the African political parties and not with the illegal régime. The majority of members also expressed the conviction that in order to succeed in bringing about the downfall of the illegal régime, the sanctions currently in force must be made comprehensive and mandatory, and must be backed by the use of force on the part of the administering Power. The Committee accordingly called upon the United Kingdom to take immediately all the necessary measures to this end and to transfer power to the people of the Territory without delay, in accordance with the Declaration, and on the basis of elections conducted on the "one-man one-vote principle". The Committee also condemned the policies of the Governments of South Africa and Portugal in continuing to support the illegal régime, and recommended to the Security Council to take the necessary measures under Chapter VII of the Charter for the implementation of its own previous decisions. Finally the Committee requested all States to give moral and material assistance to the national liberation movements of Southern Rhodesia and appealed to the specialized agencies to extend assistance to the refugees from the Territory.

315. With regard to South West Africa, the Special Committee noted that following the termination of South Africa's mandate by the General Assembly in its resolution 2145 (XXI), the question had been under consideration by the Ad Hoc Committee established under that resolution. The Special Committee also noted that having examined the report of the Ad Hoc Committee, the General Assembly by resolution 2248 (S-V) set up a United Nations Council for South West Africa with the responsibility, inter alia, of administering the Territory until it attains independence as envisaged by June 1968. At the same time, the question remained the concern of the Special Committee within the context of the implementation of the Declaration, and accordingly received its attention. Meanwhile the South African Government not only repudiated the validity of the above-mentioned resolutions, but also took measures to alter the status of Ovamboland, an integral part of South West Africa, by the establishment of so-called self-government aimed at consolidating the system of apartheid and fragmenting the Territory in furtherance of South African domination. Having reviewed these developments the Committee condemned as illegal, and contrary to the relevant General Assembly resolutions, as well as a flagrant defiance of the authority of the United Nations, the measures taken and proposed by the South African Government with respect to Ovamboland and reaffirmed the territorial integrity of South West Africa, as also the inalienable right of the people to freedom and independence in accordance with the Declaration. Subsequently, the Committee also condemned the illegal arrest by the South African authorities of thirty-seven Africans from South West Africa in flagrant violation of its international status, demanded their immediate release, and called upon those authorities to cease all illegal acts in the Territory.

316. As regards the Territories under Portuguese administration, the administering Power continued to deny the people the right to self-determination on the pretext of the legal fiction that these Territories were overseas provinces of metropolitan Portugal. Continuing to avail itself of military and other assistance from some States, it intensified its repressive activities and military operations against the African population of the Territories. In addition, Portugal continued to violate the economic and political rights of the indigenous population by the settlement of foreign immigrants in the Territories and the export of African workers to South Africa. At the same time the Special Committee received information, which it noted with satisfaction, regarding the progress of the struggle of the national liberation movements in these Territories and about their efforts to rehabilitate the liberated areas and to promote the material and social welfare of the people. The great and urgent need of these movements for assistance, particularly in the field of education and health was the subject of a request by the Committee to the specialized agencies and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. The Committee also appealed to all States to grant the peoples of the Territories the moral and material assistance necessary for the restoration of their inalienable rights. Further, the Committee recommended that the Security Council take the necessary measures to make mandatory the provisions of its resolutions as well as those of the General Assembly concerning this question. Finally, it addressed an urgent appeal to all States and to the specialized agencies to refrain from extending assistance to Portugal as long as it continued its present policies in the Territories.

317. As a result of the special study it undertook concerning the activities of foreign economic and other interests in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and Territories under Portuguese domination and in all other Territories under colonial domination, the Special Committee noted the dominant and increasing role played in the economic life of the Territories, particularly those in southern Africa, by international economic and financial interests. In the opinion of the Committee the activities of these interests constitute a serious impediment to the implementation of the Declaration in the above-named and in other colonial Territories. The Committee noted that these interests, with the encouragement of the colonial Powers, were ruthlessly exploiting the human and natural resources of the Territories for the largest possible profits. The colonial Powers which enjoy a share in these profits were in their turn impelled to devote greater effort to the perpetuation of the existing situation and to the suppression of the indigenous people. The Committee also found that the countries having the largest economic interests in the colonial Territories in southern Africa were those providing moral and material support to the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia in its defiance of international sanctions, to the Portuguese Government in the maintenance of its colonial attitudes and to the South African Government in its expansion of apartheid policies throughout southern Africa.

318. In the light of these findings, the Special Committee recommended inter alia that the administering Powers concerned should be condemned for depriving the colonial peoples of their inalienable right to the ownership and enjoyment of the natural resources of the Territories. Those Powers should also be condemned for their active support of foreign economic and other interests which exploited the human and material resources of the Territories without regard to the welfare of the indigenous peoples or their need for technical economic development. Further, the Committee emphasized that, so long as the people were denied full participation in a government of their own choice, concessions and other discriminatory measures by the colonial Powers in favour of these interests were a violation of Article 73 of the Charter which affirms that the interests of the inhabitants of the Territory are paramount. In addition the Committee expressed grave concern about the assistance given by foreign economic and other interests to the administering Powers which enabled them to continue their colonial domination. Finally the Committee appealed to the Governments whose nationals own and operate enterprises in the colonial Territories, particularly in southern Africa, to put an end to their activities.

319. Another matter which was closely followed by the Special Committee was the question of Aden. During February 1967 the Committee was informed by the Secretary-General that following the necessary consultations, he had appointed a special mission in accordance with General Assembly resolution 2183 (XXI) for the purpose of recommending practical steps for the full implementation of the relevant General Assembly resolutions, including the establishment of a central caretaker government in the Territory. While the Committee was awaiting the submission of the report of the Special Mission on Aden, it was announced by the administering Power that the Territory would accede to independence by the end of November 1967. In order to enable the Fourth Committee to consider the report of the Special Mission, which became available during mid-November 1967, prior to the accession of the Territory to independence, the Committee decided to take note of the report and to transmit it to the General Assembly. At the same time the Chairman on behalf of the Committee expressed the confident hope that the Territory would become independent in conditions of peace and harmony.

320. In addition the Special Committee examined recent developments regarding Swaziland, which was expected to become independent during September 1968. Following this examination, the Committee called upon the administering Power to assure its accession to independence without delay and in accordance with the freely expressed wishes of the people. It also requested the administering Power to take all appropriate action to enable the Territory to enjoy genuine and complete independence and to protect its territorial integrity and sovereignty in the face of the international policies of the racist régime in South Africa. Moreover, the Committee requested the administering Power to take the necessary steps to bring about the economic independence of the Territory vis-à-vis South Africa, and in particular to give full effect to the recommendations previously approved by the Assembly to that end.

321. The delay in the implementation of the Declaration in several other Territories was also a matter of concern to the Special Committee. Regarding Equatorial Guinea, it was the desire of the Committee that the Territory should accede to independence as a single territorial entity not later than 1968. The Committee however noted that following a regrettable delay the proposed constitutional conference had recently been scheduled to take place during October/November 1967. On Ifni the Committee expressed the hope that the dialogue between the Governments of Spain and Morocco would be pursued in accordance with the relevant General Assembly resolutions. As to Spanish Sahara, the Committee observed that the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2229 (XXI) had not been implemented, but owing to lack of time it was unable to give the question the full consideration warranted by its complexity. With regard to French Somaliland the Committee, convinced that the inalienable right of the people to self-determination and independence was beyond question and concerned that the process of decolonization should proceed with greater speed and in conditions of peace and harmony, urged that the referendum scheduled to be held during March 1967 should be conducted in a just and democratic manner under a United Nations presence.

322. As regards Mauritius, Seychelles and St. Helena, the Special Committee urged the administering Power to transfer power to representative organs which should be elected by the people on the basis of universal adult suffrage, to return to Mauritius and Seychelles the islands detached from them in violation of their territorial integrity and to desist from establishing military installations therein. Subsequently it was announced that Mauritius would accede to independence during March 1968. On the question of Fiji, the Special Committee reaffirmed its view that the administering Power should expedite the process of decolonization by holding elections on the "one-man, one-vote" principle and by fixing an early date for independence. Concerning Gibraltar, the Committee considered that the referendum envisaged by the administering Power was in contradiction to the relevant General Assembly resolutions and invited the Governments of the United Kingdom and Spain to resume the negotiations called for by these resolutions.

323. As requested by the General Assembly, the Special Committee paid particular attention to the small Territories with a view to enabling their populations to exercise fully their right to self-determination and independence. With regard to a large number of the small Territories, the Special Committee recognized that their size and population as well as their geographical location and limited resources presented peculiar problems requiring special attention. At the same time, the Committee was firmly of the opinion that the provisions of the Declaration were fully applicable to them. Accordingly, it requested the administering Powers responsible for these Territories to ensure that the peoples concerned were enabled, in complete freedom and in full knowledge of the possibilities open to them in keeping with the Declaration, to express their wishes without delay concerning the future of their countries. The Committee also stressed the urgent need for measures to strengthen the economic infrastructure of these Territories and to promote their social and economic development for the purpose of fostering federations. In a few of these Territories, the Committee was deeply concerned by reports pointing to preparations for their use for military purposes.

324. The Special Committee once again underlined the indisputable value of sending visiting missions to the small Territories as a means of securing adequate information regarding conditions in these Territories and as to the views, wishes and aspirations of the people. Accordingly the Committee once again requested the administering Powers to extend their full co-operation by permitting access to the Territories under their administration. The Committee noted with regret that the responses of most of the administering Powers concerned to this request were either negative or qualified in character. The Committee, therefore, considered that the General Assembly should again urge them to reconsider their attitudes in view of the vital importance to its work of the sending of visiting missions to the small Territories. In the same connexion the Committee expressed a belief in the desirability of a United Nations presence during the procedures for the exercise by the people concerned of their right to self-determination.

L. FUTURE WORK

325. In view of the large number of Territories remaining under colonial rule, the Special Committee believes that the General Assembly will wish it to continue to seek the best ways and means for the immediate and full implementation of the Declaration in all Territories which have not yet attained independence. Subject, therefore, to any further directives that the General Assembly might give at its twenty-second session it is the intention of the Committee in 1968 to continue to examine the situation in each of these Territories, including those Territories to which owing to lack of time it was unable to give adequate consideration during 1967, with a view to assisting in the speedy and effective application of the Declaration. In particular, the Committee will review developments concerning each Territory, examine the extent of compliance with the relevant United Nations resolutions and recommend any additional measures which may be appropriate to achieve the objectives of the Declaration.

326. In this task the Special Committee will continue to be guided by the provisions of operative paragraphs 14, 15 and 16 of General Assembly resolution 2189 (XXI). In these paragraphs the General Assembly requested the Committee to apprise the Security Council of developments in any Territory examined by the Committee which may threaten international peace and security and to make any concrete suggestions which may assist the Council in considering appropriate measures under the Charter of the United Nations. The General Assembly also invited the Committee, whenever it considers it proper and appropriate, to recommend a deadline for the accession to independence of each Territory in accordance with the wishes of the people and the provisions of the Declaration. Further, the General Assembly invited the Special Committee to pay particular attention to the small Territories and to recommend to the General Assembly the most appropriate methods and also the steps to be taken to enable the populations of those Territories to exercise fully the right to self-determination and independence.

327. In addition the Special Committee proposes to continue its examination of the activities of foreign economic and other interests which are impeding the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in Southern Rhodesia, South West Africa and Territories under Portuguese domination and in all other Territories under colonial domination. The Committee also expects to complete the study which it initiated during 1967 of military activities and arrangements by colonial Powers in Territories under their administration which may be impeding the implementation of the Declaration. Moreover the Committee will continue its consideration of the question of the list of Territories to which the Declaration applies.

328. In the section of this chapter concerning visiting missions and in the chapters of the present report relating to the small Territories, the Special Committee has set out recommendations with regard to the sending of visiting missions, to which it attaches special importance, and the establishment of a United Nations presence in connexion with the exercise by the peoples concerned of the right to self-determination. It is the intention of the Special Committee to pursue these recommendations during 1968 and to continue to seek the co-operation of the administering Powers in that endeavour. In particular the Committee proposes, subject to any decision the General Assembly might take in that regard, to dispatch visiting missions to the Territories in the Caribbean, Indian and Pacific Ocean areas, and to certain of the Territories in Africa.

329. In accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 2239 (XXI) concerning the pattern of conferences, the Special Committee has already approved a tentative programme of meetings for 1968 as well as a provisional time-table for 1969. Further, in the context of operative paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) which authorized the Special Committee to meet elsewhere than at United Nations Headquarters whenever and wherever such meetings may be required for the effective discharge of its functions, the Committee many consider during 1968 the question of holding a series of meetings away from Headquarters.

330. In order to enable it to carry out the tasks envisaged above, the Special Committee suggests that the General Assembly may wish to endorse the foregoing proposals when it concludes its examination of the question of the implementation of the Declaration at its twenty-second session. In addition the Special Committee recommends that the General Assembly should renew its appeal to the administering Powers to take all necessary steps for the implementation of the Declaration and the relevant United Nations resolutions. The General Assembly should also urge the administering Powers to co-operate with the Committee by facilitating visits to Territories in accordance with the decisions previously taken by the Special Committee or with any other decisions in that connexion which the Committee may find it appropriate to adopt in 1968. The Assembly should also request the administering Powers to co-operate with the Secretary-General in promoting the large scale dissemination of the Declaration and of information on the work of the United Nations and in particular of the Special Committee in the implementation of the Declaration.

331. Further, the Special Committee recommends that in approving the programme of work outlined above, the Assembly should also make adequate financial provision to cover the activities of the Committee during 1968; the sending of visiting missions as envisaged in paragraph 328 above, will in the estimation of the Committee give rise to expenditure of the order of $80,000, and a series of meetings away from Headquarters, should the Committee decide to hold one as indicated in paragraph 329 above, will result in expenditure of about $160,000. Finally the Assembly should request the Secretary-General to continue to provide the Special Committee with all the facilities and personnel necessary for the discharge of its mandate.

M. APPROVAL OF THE REPORT

ANNEX II

Visiting Missions

Reports of Sub-Committees II and III: visiting missions

Consideration by the Sub-Committee

A. REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE II

[A/AC.109/L.395]

Rapporteur: Mr. G. E. O. WILLIAMS (Sierra Leone)Introduction

1. At its 488th meeting on 20 February 1967, the Special Committee decided to continue Sub-Committee II with the same membership as in the previous year.

2. At its 56th meeting on 23 March 1967, Sub-Committee II elected Mr. C. R. Gharekhan (India) as Chairman and Mr. G.E.O. Williams (Sierra Leone) as Rapporteur.

3. At the same meeting, the Sub-Committee decided first to consider the question of visiting missions to the Territories referred to it, and then take up the Territories in the following order: Gilbert and Ellice Islands, Pitcairn, Solomon Islands, New Hebrides, American Samoa, Guam, Niue, Tokelau Islands, Cocos (Keeling) Islands, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, the Trust Territory of Nauru, the Trust Territory of New Guinea, Papua, Brunei and Hong Kong.

4. The Sub-Committee considered the question of visiting missions at its 57th to 62nd meetings held on 14, 23 and 29 March, and 5, 14 and 21 April 1967.

5. In accordance with a decision taken by the Sub-Committee, the Chairman sent letters to the delegations of Australia, France, New Zealand, the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland asking if their Governments were prepared to receive visiting missions in the Territories under their administration.

6. The representative of New Zealand in his reply recalled the terms of the reply tendered the Sub-Committee in answer to the same request eight months ago and affirmed that this remained the view of the New Zealand Government. In that reply he had observed that it had been New Zealand's consistently held view that United Nations visiting missions may often have a constructive role to play in the development of Non-Self-Governing Territories and particularly in verifying, on behalf of the international community, acts of self-determination. He had further noted that the people of the Tokelau Islands and Niue would probably wish to exercise their right to self-determination in the relatively near future.

7. The reply went on to say that, since in present circumstances it would seem to be paying undue attention to two of the smallest Non-Self-Governing Territories were a mission to be sent exclusively to these islands, the New Zealand Government felt—and this continued to be its view—that it would be appropriate for a United Nations mission to visit the Tokelau and Niue at this stage only if such a visit were to form part of a more comprehensive tour of the area.

8. The representative of the United Kingdom in his reply stated that its position remained as set out in Sir Roger Jackling's letter of 26 May 1966 to the Chairman of the Special Committee (A/AC.109/171). The question of visiting missions raised difficult problems of principle for the United Kingdom Government and the representative of the United Kingdom was unable, therefore, to say anything that might encourage the Special Committee to expect any change in his Government's previous attitude to the question, as frequently explained to the Special Committee and its Sub-Committees. The United Kingdom delegation would naturally be prepared to transmit to the United Kingdom Government, and seek instructions on, any specific request or suggestion for a visit to a particular Territory that the Committee might consider it appropriate to put forward. This could not, however, be taken as implying any commitment that the United Kingdom Government would be able to respond to such a request.

9. The representative of Australia, in his reply, stated that visiting missions from the Trusteeship Council made an extensive visit to the Australian Territories every three years. In accordance with this practice, a Trusteeship Council mission would visit these Territories early next year. In addition to the information available in the record of the findings of the Trusteeship Council and of its visiting missions, the Australian Government provided supplementary information on the Territories for which it was responsible in accordance with its obligations under the Charter of the United Nations. In these circumstances, the Australian Government believed that a visit to the Australian Territories by the Special Committee would not be warranted.

10. The representative of the United States of America, in his reply, stated that the position of his Government with regard to visiting missions to the United States Territories on the Sub-Committee's agenda remained as communicated to the Sub-Committee last year. The United States continued to be of the view that United Nations visiting missions to these Territories were not warranted at the present time, and if such missions were to be proposed for this year, the United States Government would in all likelihood not be in a position to accept such a proposal.

11. The representative of Poland noted that, as had been recommended, communications had been sent to the representatives of the administering Powers requesting that a visiting mission be allowed to go to the Territories administered by them. His delegation appreciated the positive reply received by the Chairman from the New Zealand Government and hoped that other administering Powers would follow New Zealand's example, since a visit by a mission was the only means of obtaining first-hand information on developments in the Territories and ascertaining the wishes of the inhabitants.

12. The representative of India stated that her own delegation believed that the Sub-Committee should visit the Territories covered by its agenda, in order to obtain first-hand information on the situation there. In that connexion, she appreciated the positive reply of the New Zealand Government to the Sub-Committee's request, although she hoped that it would withdraw the condition it had placed on its agreement to a visiting mission. She also hoped that the other administering Powers would reply favourably at an early date.

13. The representative of Iraq said that his delegation, which in 1966 had called for a visiting mission to be sent to the Territories under consideration, urgently reiterated that request. A visit by a mission would also be in the interests of the administering Powers, which should agree to it, as requested in General Assembly resolution 2232 (XXI) of 20 December 1966. Unfortunately, the replies received to date from those Powers had been far from satisfactory. The Sub-Committee should not be content with statements that the situation in the Territories was continually improving.

14. The representative of Chile said that his delegation had noted with interest the reply of the New Zealand delegation concerning visiting missions. It constituted a first step, and the Chilean delegation welcomed the spirit of co-operation which New Zealand had shown in the matter. It would be encouraging if the other administering Powers concerned would follow that example and so enable the Sub-Committee to keep abreast of constitutional developments in the Territories under their administration. The Chilean delegation believed that small Territories, precisely because they were small, should be given special attention. No effort should be spared to help them exercise the right of self-determination and accede to independence in accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960.

15. The representative of Afghanistan said that his delegation attached great importance to the sending of visiting missions to Territories under colonial domination, since that was the only way of knowing exactly what was taking place there. His delegation welcomed the spirit of co-operation shown in that regard by New Zealand, but regretted the fact that the United Kingdom was persisting in its negative attitude. He asked the United Kingdom delegation to reconsider its position. It was difficult to understand why an administering Power should fear the dispatch of a mission to a Territory if it was administering that Territory in conformity with the principles laid down by the United Nations. The Afghan delegation also hoped that a satisfactory decision would be received from the administering Power which had not yet given its reply concerning visiting missions.

16. The representative of Sierra Leone regretted that certain administering Powers refused to authorize the dispatch of visiting missions to Territories under their administration. They should realize that such visiting missions were more useful to the population of those Territories and to themselves than to the Special Committee, because direct contacts gave the Committee a better understanding of the situation in the Territories as it was described by the administering Powers in their statements in the United Nations. He therefore hoped that the administering Powers concerned would reconsider their position.

Conclusions of the Sub-Committee

17. The Sub-Committee notes that most of the administering Powers continue to maintain their same negative attitude towards the acceptance of visiting missions to the Territories referred to Sub-Committee II.

Recommendations of the Sub-Committee

18. The Sub-Committee recommends that the Special Committee should strongly urge the administering Powers to receive visiting missions to these Territories at an early date. The detailed recommendations regarding the Territories to be visited and other modalities will be decided upon at a later stage.

B. PARAGRAPHS 8 TO 16 OF THE REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE III

Question of Visiting Missions

[For the Sub-Committee's report, see the annex to chapter XXIII below.]

ANNEX III

Implementation of General Assembly resolutions 2151 (XXI), 2184 (XXI), 2189 (XXI) and 2248 (S-V) and pertinent resolutions of the Special Committee: requests addressed to specialized agencies and international institutions

Note by the Secretariat

INTRODUCTION

1. In the course of the past year, both the General Assembly at its twenty-first session and the Special Committee adressed requests to specialized agencies and international institutions asking them, inter alia, to (a) give assistance, or increase the assistance which they were already giving to refugees from Southern Rhodesia and Territories under Portuguese administration, and (b) withhold assistance of any kind from the Governments of Portugal and South Africa and from the illegal racist régime of Southern Rhodesia until they renounce their policy of racial discrimination and colonial domination.

2. In each case, the Secretary-General transmitted the text of the resolution or consensus to a number of specialized agencies and other international institutions concerned, drawing their attention to the relevant operative paragraphs.

3. In addition, pursuant to a request contained in operative paragraph 10 of General Assembly resolution 2184 (XXI) of 12 December 1966, the Secretary-General entered into consultation with the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the results of which are set forth in a report by the Secretary-General.<sup>a</sup>

4. In the following sections, the Secretariat has reproduced the texts of the request addressed to specialized agencies and international institutions and the replies, other than formal acknowledgements, which have been received to date.

"10. Requests the Secretary-General to enter into consultation with the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development in order to secure its compliance with General Assembly resolutions 2105 (XX) of 20 December 1965 and 2107 (XX) of 21 December 1965 and with the present resolution;

"11. Expresses its appreciation to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the specialized agencies concerned and other international relief organizations for the aid they have extended so far, and requests them, in co-operation with the Organization of African Unity, to increase their assistance to the refugees from the Territories under Portuguese domination and to the people who have suffered and are still suffering owing to military operations."

7. At its 1492nd plenary meeting, on 13 December 1966, the General Assembly adopted resolution 2189 (XXI) concerning the implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Operative paragraphs 8 and 9 of this resolution read as follows:

8. Requests the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other international relief organizations and the specialized agencies concerned to increase their economic, social and humanitarian assistance to the refugees from those Territories;

"9. Requests all States, directly and through action in the international institutions of which they are members, including the specialized agencies, to withhold assistance of any kind to the Governments of Portugal and South Africa and to the illegal racist minority régime of Southern Rhodesia until they renounce their policy of racial discrimination and colonial domination";

8. At its 1518th plenary meeting, on 19 May 1967, the General Assembly adopted resolution 2248 (S-V) concerning the question of South West Africa. Operative paragraph 2, part III of the resolution read as follows:
