81. In any event the Committee considered that it would be premature for it to press its inquiries into problems of method in connexion with the component approach on the present occasion. When the subject has been further considered under the auspices of the Economic and Social Council, and when the results are available of the operations of the working group established by the International Labour Office in co-operation with other interested international organizations to consider the applicability of the methods in under-developed countries, the General Assembly may have far more precise indications of methods applicable to the Non-Self-Governing Territories or to particular groups of the Territories.

82. The Committee continues to be deeply interested in the collection and communication of information on standards and levels of living in the Non-Self-Governing territories. Even at present, the information available, although inadequate for the purposes of exhaustive study, is comprehensive enough to warrant a more detailed and comprehensive treatment of the subject, at least in respect of certain Territories. Information supplied the Committee during its present session threw new light on the improvement in living conditions in some areas which were cited by way of example. Although generalizations are not always possible concerning standards and levels of living in the Territories or even in a single Territory, a number of broad differences can be traced with the varying degrees of economic and social development and the varying extent to which such forms of development have reached all parts of the Territory and all sections of the population. These differences illustrate the importance for future progress of taking full account of the objectives of social policy in the formulation of programmes for the Territories, as has been pointed out in paragraph 24 of this report.

VII. Race relations

83. In its 1952 report the Committee examined questions of race relations in Non-Self-Governing Territories. Recognizing the great significance of the question universally, it stated that the fact that in most Non-Self-Governing Territories the bulk of the inhabitants are of an ethnic origin and have a cultural heritage different from the peoples responsible for their administration makes of even greater importance collaboration among the races in these Territories.

84. In 1952 the General Assembly also adopted resolution 644 (VII). This resolution recognizes that the establishment of improved race relations largely depends on the development of education, and commends measures designed to improve the understanding of the needs and problems of the community as a whole, recommending:

- (a) (i) The abolition in Non-Self-Governing Territories of discriminatory laws and practices contrary to the principles of the Charter and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;
- (ii) The examination of all laws, statutes and ordinances with a view to such abolition;
- (b) The examination of laws which distinguish between citizens and non-citizens primarily on racial or religious grounds;

<sup>6</sup> International Definition and Measurement of Standards and Levels of Living, United Nations publication. Sales No.: 1954. IV.5.

(c) The opening of public facilities to all inhabitants of the Territories, without distinction of race;

(d) The frequent examination of laws providing particular measures of protection for sections of the population, in order to ascertain whether their protective aspect is still predominant, and whether provision should be made for exemption from them in particular circumstances.

85. The Committee repeats its condemnation of race discrimination and race prejudice which are violations of human dignity and contrary to the Principles of the Charter. It continues to emphasize that the establishment of friendly relations based on mutual respect and a recognition of equality is of outstanding importance. Race prejudice and tension, wherever they exist, intensify the division of mankind and it is the Committee's duty to support the efforts being made to seek the co-operation of all peoples in implementing the Charter provisions and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights concerning race relations. The Committee noted with interest in this connexion that in a resolution adopted by the United Nations Conference on the Eradication of Prejudice and Discrimination held from 31 March to 4 April 1955 in Geneva under resolution 546 (XVIII) of the Economic and Social Council and participated in by the non-governmental organizations in consultative status with the Council, the conference condemned all discriminatory practices, in whatever form they assume and in whatever country or Territory they exist.<sup>7</sup>

86. In the statements of principle included in the Committee's previous reports and in General Assembly resolution 644 (VII), adequate and clear indications are given of the agreed views of the General Assembly on this question. The Committee on this occasion accordingly turns its attention to action that is being taken to give positive effect to the views expressed in 1952, to the difficulties that may have been encountered within recent years in giving effect to these views, and thirdly, particularly in multi-racial societies, to the growth of social relations among different groups which will strengthen race collaboration and contribute to the ending of race prejudice.

87. The aspirations of social policy, as seeking the development of all groups in the community, are in certain cases hampered by barriers of custom and religion, by illusions of cultural superiority and by the existence of separate racial or cultural groups, particularly if committed to the defence of entrenched economic interests. Any of these factors may lead to ethnic and cultural conflicts which one representative on the Committee described as being more lasting than the crude results of military conquest and occupation.

88. Yet progress has been made in many Territories and in many spheres. The Committee noted the following as among the principal encouraging developments in general policy since 1952. In the French Union, the law relating to publications for young people has been amended to include among prohibited publications those of a nature likely to inspire or maintain racial prejudice. The new text is based on the principle that the dignity of the human person possesses a universal value and should be respected without distinction of race or origin. French decrees of 1954 concerning the administration of justice under customary law replace terms involving the use of the word indigène (native) by terms such as citizens of special status, local courts, local tribunals, etc. In the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland it has been authoritatively stated that the association of the Territories would conduce to the security, advancement and welfare of all their inhabitants, and, in particular, would foster partnership and co-operation between their inhabitants. An African Affairs Board is established, whose particular function will be to draw attention to differentiating measures by which Africans are subjected or made liable to any conditions, restrictions or disabilities disadvantageous to them to which Europeans are not also subjected or made liable. In Northern Rhodesia resolutions passed in the Legislative Council in July 1954 declare that the objective of policy must be to remove from each race the fear that the other might dominate for its own racial benefit, and to make it clear that every lawful inhabitant of Northern Rhodesia has the right to progress according to his character, qualifications, training, ability and industry, without distinction of race, colour and creed. In Kenya, the Government has reaffirmed the principles of promoting racial harmony and friendliness, and of developing opportunities for all loyal subjects, irrespective of race or religion, to advance in accordance with character and ability.

89. These indications are encouraging. Two other examples of general policies are in harmony with the recommendation of General Assembly resolution 644 (VII) which provides that the necessity for laws which distinguish between citizens and non-citizens primarily on racial or religious grounds should be examined. The extension of citizen rights in Malaya to a greatly increased number of Chinese and Indian inhabitants has been noted, and also the action taken in some cases for the improvement of the position of évolués among the African population. While differentiations on grounds of culture may be acceptable, yet in certain instances the question arises whether the granting as a privilege of forms of equality to selected persons from among the local inhabitants may not become a new form of discrimination between favoured and other groups in the population.

90. The Committee also noted points arising in respect of different treatment in education. In Territories inhabited by communities of different races, a usual practice was to operate separate school systems for the different groups of the population; in a number of these Territories in recent years, there has been a marked tendency towards the strengthening of schools attended by pupils from all the different groups in the communities. This is notably the case in Territories under French administration where education is free at all levels for all children, without distinction of sex, nationality or religion, and where there is no discrimination on racial, religious or political grounds. In some of the British East and Central African Territories and also in Fiji, Papua and Bermuda various patterns of school segregation are maintained by reasons of language difficulties, different home circumstances and general opinion. In Malaya, greater integration has been reached, with 1952 legislation in the Federation providing for free and compulsory education in non-communal national schools for children of all races on the principle of (1) multi-racial schools; (2) English and Malayan as official languages; (3) a single system of education and a common content in teaching.

91. While the question of the association of pupils from all races in junior schools is thus determined differently in various local circumstances, in respect of higher education the principle of inter-racial education, already applicable in most institutions of higher learning, is being strengthened. The University College of East Africa (Makerere) has been opened to all races. The Royal Technical College of British East Africa in Nairobi has been merged with the Mahatma Gandhi Memorial College for Asian students, and will provide higher technical and technological education for all students. In the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, the Rhodesia University College, established in 1954, will provide university education for students of all races. The report of the Commission for Higher Education for Africans in Central Africa, which recommended the foundation of the University College, pointed out that it is contrary to university tradition to have regard to race, religion or class when selecting candidates for higher studies, and that admission should be solely dependent on the educational attainments and good character of the students.

92. The Committee holds that progress in the field of education is a first necessity. It draws attention to General Assembly resolution 328 (IV) which invites the Administering Members to take steps, where necessary, to establish equal treatment in matters related to education among the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration, whether they be indigenous or not. Practical difficulties, particularly those of language are held by some Members to justify school systems adapted to the special needs of groups of the population. But the Committee holds that, at the secondary level, this justification can only be accepted in very exceptional circumstances and as a temporary expedient and that at no level should the differences be established on a racial basis.

93. In its 1952 report on social conditions, the Committee drew attention to the importance of providing ways and means by which members of the indigenous population may have access to all ranks in the public service, together with the allied questions of facilities for training, opportunities for promotion and equality of remuneration. Opportunities for the employment of indigenous inhabitants in government service have since increased. The right of and opportunities for the indigenous population to public employment have been emphasized and encouraged in a number of policy statements and specific recommendations. The Minister for Overseas France in the National Assembly in December 1954, declared that the participation of the indigenous élite in the administration of the Territories is one of the main concerns of the Government. In order to improve the situation in practice, it is proposed to extend the age limit for the admission of indigenous candidates to public employment and to establish preparatory courses for admission to the Ecole Nationale de la France d'Outre-mèr. The Committee was also informed that in all probability the civil service in Morocco and Tunisia will shortly be entirely staffed by indigenous inhabitants with the exception of a few posts. In the United Kingdom, a 1953 government statement declares that the policy is to encourage the progress of the peoples of the Territories towards control of their own affairs by adapting the public services to local conditions and by staffing them to the greatest possible extent by local people. In the Gold Coast, measures have been taken to establish a completely indigenous civil service staffed entirely by Gold Coast Africans. In the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, it is provided that no person domiciled within the Federation who is a British subject or of British protected status may on ground of race only be ineligible for employment in the federal public service, and in appointing or recommending any person for such employment regard shall be had only to his competence, experience and suitability. In the Federation of Malaya, a Committee appointed to study the problems of Malayization of the public services, recommended in 1954 that the present policy of not recruiting expatriates if suitable Malaysians were available, should be continued. In Singapore, the Government early in 1954 adopted a ten-year programme to hasten the process of Malayization of the public service.

94. Information as given to the Committee on similar trends showing improved opportunities in general employment, resulting from both the disappearance of direct discriminations and improved facilities for training. The barriers to the advancement of Africans in some employments in Central and East Africa are, however, still considerable. This matter is not expressly treated in resolution 644 (VII). It forms an important feature of the International Labour Convention on social policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories. It is urgent for the Administrations and the employers and workers concerned to find ways and means by which openings can be provided for qualified workers from among the inhabitants of the Territories, without distinction of race, and which will create the appropriate institutions of courses of training. While this must be done without lowering the general standards of labour or upsetting the wage structure on which existing social standards are based, inaction motivated by reasons of existing race differences cannot be justified.

95. The above circumstances arise in particular in industrial and mining employment in a few of the Territories under United Kingdom administration. The Committee accordingly noted with all the more interest that in Uganda where the prospects of economic development are substantial, the Government has recognized that the people have a right to demand that in such development certain conditions should be fulfilled and in particular that there should be no colour bar in industries, that Africans must be trained for skilled work and increasingly responsible positions and that wherever possible there must be local participation in the financing of industrial development.

96. Resolution 644 (VII) recommends that all public facilities should be open to the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories without distinction of race. Separate accommodations on public transport, in public offices, in restaurants and hotels are still a common practice in the few Central and East African Territories which are of a multi-racial character. Information was, however, supplied to the Committee indicating that in some instances steps are being taken to abolish discriminations in public facilities as well as to encourage private enterprises, to provide their services without regard to colour or race. The Committee did not enter into any examination of particular aspects of this problem. It was pleased to note that some advance has been made, especially as this is a sphere in which discrimination may cause conflicts between inhabitants who would otherwise be in the best position to promote satisfactory race relations.

97. The information before the Committee on race relations had in the main reference to discriminations and to action taken to mitigate or abolish such discriminations. The most effective way to rid the Territories of such discriminations is by positive measures to increase the co-operation by the races and to create more programmes, institutions and interests in which all races have a common interest. There are two particular aspects of race relations in the Non-Self-Governing Territories: the attitude taken by the Administrations and the collaboration among different races in non-governmental organizations to promote better race relations. To promote better race relations the Governments should take the initiative and build up public opinion, provide the necessary leadership and organize public campaigns. However, moral preparation cannot be accomplished by the Government alone. The contribution which voluntary organizations can make in the promotion of better understanding among races is generally recognized. Their efforts in this field should be encouraged by all appropriate means.

98. In a multi-racial and multi-lingual community differences between races tend to heighten conflicts, and racial harmony is essential to human advancement. In 1952, the Committee recorded the views of experts appointed by UNESCO that differences between races are not fundamental and absolute, that some biological differences between human beings within a single race may be as great as the same biological differences between races, and that genetic differences are of little significance in determining the social and cultural differences between different groups of men and women. At its present session the Committee had before it the results of further studies by UNESCO, and in particular the report of the 1954 Abidjan conference of social scientists on the social impact of industrialization and urban conditions in Africa. It notes the attention called to the need for studies of legislation affecting race relations, to the new values and motivations that are now emerging, to the varying degrees of integration of groups of different ethnic origin and social status, to the effects of education upon the integration of communities. The results of further studies of this nature should be of marked interest.

99. Note may also be appropriately taken of the establishment of a number of new institutions for the study of problems of race relations, and of the causes of antagonisms in multi-racial communities. These initiatives are appreciated, particularly where they contribute to popular education on race prejudice and on the means of overcoming it. Yet, what is wanted most at present is not more inquiries but the application to existing situations of the widely accepted conclusions that distinctions based on race should no longer form any part of social policy or public administration.

VIII. Public health and health administration

100. Statistical information on public health conditions in most Non-Self-Governing Territories is imperfect. That available on mortality rates indicates that in many Territories there has been a considerable decrease in mortality rates in recent years; but in only a few cases are there reliable data by cause of death, and morbidity data are even less satisfactory. Further and more accurate information is necessary if public health policies are to be planned so as best to meet existing needs and if economic and social policies are to take adequate account of the public health situation.

101. It is, however, evident that the major epidemic diseases are more or less under control and that even more vigorous action is now being taken against endemic diseases. Medical knowledge has advanced rapidly in recent years. Even so, experience in applying preventive methods of communicable disease control on a large scale has shown that results often cannot be correctly forecast; clinical and laboratory methods of proved efficacy in individual cases do not always yield the results expected when applied to communities on a large scale; public health measures effective under certain epidemiological conditions prove disappointing in others. A number of new and highly promising tools have become available, as for example insecticides in the fight against malaria, the sulphones against leprosy, single dosage treatment against treponematoses and new anti-tuberculosis drugs. More research through experience in the field is, however, needed. The importance of such research and of the inter-territorial and international exchange of experience should be fully realized.

102. With the decrease in mortality, there has been a marked increase in expenditure on medical services and facilities, and although the number of physicians in proportion to the population is still low in the case of most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, there has been a large increase in the personnel of all skills engaged in public health work. Moreover, following the improvements in medical facilities available in urban and semi-urban areas, the scattered rural populations have become more health conscious, and modern communications have made it possible to plan services to meet their needs.

103. These changes have deeply affected the planning and organization of public health services, the integration of public health in other forms of social policy, and the relation of the services with other government services and the general social organization of the Territories.

104. In 1952, the Committee pointed out that in seeking the maximum results at a minimum cost from public health organization, it is necessary to consider (a) the relationship between metropolitan and territorial services; (b) the relationship in other government services and non-governmental institutions; (c) the means of reaching remote areas; (d) the extension of modern methods for the control of disease; and (e) the co-ordination of curative and preventive services, research and training, central control and decentralization of operations. In all this the Committee stressed the necessity of obtaining, even in purely medical work, the support of all instruments of social and educational policy and of the population as a whole. Accordingly, the Committee now notes with interest the trend in United Kingdom Territories for Ministries to take over responsibility for health policy and for the administration of the health and medical services. While such Ministries differ in their internal structure to suit local conditions, in all of them the power and responsibility as regards health policies rests with the responsible Minister, and the Director of Medical Services or the Chief Medical Officer becomes the Minister's chief professional adviser.

105. Another point noted this year by the Committee is the increasing emphasis on the organization of services for the rural populations. Whether these services are provided by mobile teams or rural health centres, the tendency is for them to carry out both curative and preventive work, to encourage the improvement of environmental sanitation, and to foster public interest in and knowledge of healthy living. It is recognized that, whereas the effects of modern medicine are widely appreciated, it is far more difficult to persuade a primitive people to follow the elementary rules of hygiene on which so much of general health depends. Bearing this consideration in mind, the Committee considers that the community development movement and similar forms of popular initiative can be used appropriately to support public health campaigns and that the public health services in their operations may well follow principles indicated by the community development movement. Rural co-operative societies might also be developed so as to provide medical services. In any event, a community interest, supported by the people, must provide a starting point and motivating force for public health activities and attitudes. The good will of the people should be enlisted and this can often best be achieved by securing their participation in planning and action.

106. As health development at the community level must receive the support of the members of the community, so health planning at the territorial level can only be dealt with realistically as part of a general policy in which all those concerned with economic and social welfare are associated. Modern public health services, if unassisted and working in isolation, will not succeed in effecting any great or lasting improvement in the health of the inhabitants. The improvement of levels of living depends on economic development, and to achieve a satisfactory level of economic activity, the health of the workers must be good. The Committee in this connexion agreed with the opinion expressed by an Administering Member that in their future work the health services must to a much greater extent than in the past, take into account the work of other social agencies and the requirements of modern economic life. Similarly, general social and economic policies require the co-operation of the medical officer in anticipating problems and in providing for their solution at the earliest possible stage and in taking an active part in all phases of the implementation of the resulting programmes.

107. Sanitation is fundamental and basic to individual community existence and the environmental sanitation programme in under-developed areas could also be integrated with general programmes for the development of the community. In spite of the complexity and difficulties of the problem, Governments have already started important developments either through the Departments of Health or other departments in the field of environmental sanitation, especially in the case of water supplies. However, much is still to be done in this field.

IX. Nutrition and public health

108. With the extension of modern medicine to the Non-Self-Governing Territories and its impact on human life as by the elimination, complete or partial, of a number of serious diseases and by the establishment of conditions permitting rapid economic development, it is necessary to create conditions for better living. For this, many people must be disabused of the idea that health can be regarded negatively as the absence of disease, and persuaded to act for themselves in improving their own immediate circumstances. In this evolution, the improvement of nutrition, quantitatively and qualitatively, is of first importance.

109. Information submitted to the Committee shows that malnutrition is a serious problem in many Non-Self-Governing Territories. The development of transport and communications, improved agricultural methods, action against animal and plant diseases and pests and the introduction and expansion of modern facilities for the processing and storage of agricultural products, have made it possible to avoid the worst effects of lean years due to drought, locusts, other pests and diseases. Yet, while in some Territories the general state of nutrition is good and deficiency diseases rare and unimportant, in others unsatisfactory diet is a major cause of death, disease and debility, particularly in certain age groups.

110. The solution to the problem of malnutrition lies primarily in economic development in general and particularly in the appropriate expansion of food production. The effectiveness of modern public health measures has caused a rapid growth of population in a number of Territories. This process tends to outstrip the development of food production, even though it increases the physical efficiency of food producers. In a great number of Non-Self-Governing Territories, the development of agricultural production has kept pace with the increase in population; in certain territories the consumption indices even have a tendency towards rising. However, the production of food crops should be increased adequately, so that the levels of consumption, as a whole, reach a satisfactory standard. In 1954, the Committee, in examining economic conditions, raised the question of the relative emphasis in agricultural development which should be placed on production for local consumption on the one hand, and on production for export on the other. It held that for many Territories the desirable objective is to provide for the local production of sufficient food crops to permit adequate nutrition, so that other agricultural land can be used for export purposes through the cultivation of the crops most suited to local conditions and world markets.

111. While the long-term solution lies in the development of the natural resources, much can be done to improve nutrition through programmes yielding more immediate results and leading to the better utilization and distribution of food resources which are now available. The age group one to five is particularly susceptible to malnutrition, a fact which calls for an expansion of maternity and child welfare services and a strong emphasis in the work of these services, on the prevention of malnutrition. The distribution of cheap surplus foods of high nutritive value, such as skimmed milk, can be of great benefit. Such distribution must, however, be regarded as a temporary expedient, the imported product being largely replaced in due course by suitable locally produced foods of high nutritive value. The Committee notes that increasing interest is being shown by the Governments of various Non-Self-Governing Territories in the production and processing of foods of this nature, and that research is being carried out on this question.

112. The supplementary feeding of school children is again a valuable measure, even though in present circumstances it can often benefit only a proportion of children of school age.

113. The prevention of malnutrition may require not only appropriate food production, distribution and preservation programmes, but also a knowledge of the other influences which decide dietary practice. Education must play an all-important role, but it is only likely to be effective when conditions responsible for nutritional disease in the different Territories are fully understood. Mothers must be taught better methods of feeding their families and especially how to make best use of the foods and food resources available to them. Much serious malnutrition in young children could be eliminated even in present circumstances by educational means. The development of education in nutrition depends, however, on the availability of workers appropriately trained in nutrition and home economics and the creation of active "extension" services in these fields. The need for more workers with such training is abundantly evident and is realized in most Non-Self-Governing Territories. In a number of instances facilities have been organized to provide the training required. Trained nutrition workers are also required to take part in the planning of food production programmes designed to make available a better balanced diet for the community.

114. The Committee noted the services in this field that are being performed by the Food and Agriculture Organization, the World Health Organization and the International Children's Fund in co-operation with the Governments concerned. Because of their wide experience in many countries throughout the world, these organizations are often in a position to render effective help. The Committee hopes that wide use will be made of them in all appropriate circumstances.

X. The training of public health staff

115. The Committee noted the increase in facilities for the training of fully qualified medical officers in a number of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and the increase in the number of scholarships by which students could obtain professional training in the metropolitan countries or abroad. This training is of fundamental importance because local professional officers are urgently required to fill the more responsible posts in their own health services, to help in the training of their own people at the lower levels and to take part in the teaching in the local faculties of medicine.

116. The attention of the Committee was drawn to certain calculations which suggest that the cost of establishing a properly equipped teaching hospital in some of the Territories is out of proportion to the cost of constructing a hospital for local needs but without teaching facilities, and also that it is far less expensive to send and train students in metropolitan countries than to provide for their full professional training in their home Territories. The Committee holds that calculations of this character should be scrutinized with the utmost care. It is not clear, for example, whether the capital cost of founding a territorial teaching hospital plus the total recurrent costs have not been compared with the recurrent costs of lodging, board and tuition alone in the case of students attending established schools in the metropolitan countries. Furthermore, insufficient account may have been taken of the contribution to the capital equipment of a Territory which may be provided by the construction of the various buildings and facilities needed by those who serve a major teaching hospital. In any event, the existence of a faculty of medicine raises standards of public health, and nursing stimulates research, provides specialized treatment, and confers other benefits on a Territory. There are advantages in training doctors who will be working in the tropics in the conditions with which they must be familiar. In principle the Committee considers that no health service is complete without a faculty of medicine provided territorially or regionally. A faculty of medicine, a training or teaching hospital, a cadre of locally qualified doctors are well worth the money expended.

117. Information also showed increases in the facilities for the full professional training of nurses and midwives. With improvements in education, it appears that more candidates should be available with higher standards of general education. In these circumstances and given the possible competition of other employments, more steps have been taken in many Territories to overcome prejudices against the training of girls away from their homes and their work when qualified. The information is of interest and further action on this question merits attention.

118. Recently there has been considerable increase in training facilities and raising of standards for the numerous ancillary and auxiliary personnel required for the public health services of Non-Self-Governing Territories. In this development, it has been necessary to provide great flexibility in the training programmes so as to allow the experienced staff to undertake more responsible duties, even though the basic education each man or woman may possess does not meet the requirements which are being established for new trainees.

119. Another point of policy which has become even more apparent with the development of training facilities is the desirability that the subordinate staff where reasonably possible should be drawn from the communities in which their future work will lie, and that on the completion of training the new recruits should be encouraged to return to work where they will be readily accepted as members of the community. Concurrently with the close attachment of this staff to the local community, every opportunity must be given to inculcate in all health workers a realization of their position in the developing societies and the responsibilities involved by this position.

XI. Training and leadership

120. In the evolution of changing societies, the recruitment and training of competent staff, able to undertake efficiently the new tasks and to discharge responsibilities in all fields of social administration and social action, is of first importance. The creation of a corps of officers in sufficient numbers, based on territorial recruitment and embracing all levels of the administrative structure, is an inevitable corollary of a policy aiming at a permanent transformation of the peoples so that they may contribute to a society adequately equipped with the economic institutions, social services and cultural attributes which make possible higher standards of collective and individual life. No such transformation can be achieved unless the people are able to run the services themselves, to expand, to develop and adjust them, according to their own changing needs as realized by themselves.

121. The magnitude of the personnel requirements, and the resulting training needs arise in many Territories, not only from the distance which traditional societies have to travel to achieve modern standards, but also as a result of the rapid change which necessitates the establishment of all kinds of social services covering the whole social field: public health, industrial relations, remedial social welfare services, town planning, co-operatives, mass education, community development, etc. This calls for a systematic effort in developing training institutions and programmes to meet present needs and those which are expected to arise or multiply in the future. In this respect much progress has been made in a number of Territories, particularly in respect of territorial training facilities at a pre-professional level, designed to train the personnel for junior or auxiliary posts in various social fields. In the more advanced Territories no adequate solution to the problem can be found without developing centres of professional training at the university level as a part of the total educational system. Training programmes should be directed towards the formation of the cadres of professional workers, if possible through the territorial or regional training facilities, completed or supplemented by wider experience, as in the universities and colleges of the metropolitan countries. They should take into account not only the need of the Territories for competent personnel acting in its own professional capacity, but also the part which this personnel is to play in the training of junior and auxiliary workers.

122. The formation of the specialist officer and of his auxiliaries in various technical fields and at all levels of the administrative structure, although important, is only part of the problems of training. Progress depends not only on an adequate expansion of the government-administered social services, but primarily on the activities of the inhabitants supported by a climate of informed opinion. The task of building a new society requires the creative participation of inhabitants on various levels and in various types of activities through which progress can be achieved, reaching all members of the community, embracing all the local groups and releasing the initiative of the people to diagnose their own problems and to find solutions for them. The development of the potentialities of the peoples, individually and collectively, so as to make them creative and efficient in building the new forms of their lives, is the ultimate goal of community development policies and the central problem of training. It is also essential in all other social programmes which cannot succeed, unless the specialist officer finds support from among all the inhabitants where he is working.

123. This raises the question of popular leadership in modern society. Widespread and resourceful popular leadership is an inseparable element of a modern social structure and necessary for social progress. In the societies that are undergoing a rapid evolution from the traditional framework to modern economic, political and social forms of life, the part played—or to be played—by popular leadership is of primary importance. The evolution of the society in transition depends upon men and women of superior intelligence, character and ability, capable of exercising vigorous and imaginative leadership in the social development and reconstruction to be undertaken by the people. The promotion of popular leadership, in all areas of social reform and in all segments of the community, and the training of the people for leadership is to be viewed as the most immediate task of social policy and a primary responsibility of government. The difficulties encountered spring from the isolation of many local groups, the recession of traditional systems and new obstacles in the form of social cleavages arising as the changing societies adapt themselves to the new occupational and administrative structure.

124. In particular, training for new professional skills and new public responsibilities carries with it various degrees of westernization which may alienate from the rest of the people those who acquire western traits. In this way occupational differentiation based on new standards of training may create a situation in which the distance between the educated and the rest of the people becomes accentuated and which results in a tendency to form a small élite group, taking part in activities resembling those of the Europeans but losing contact with the bulk of their fellow-countrymen and unable to assume leadership among them.

125. The Committee was informed of the research programme that is being carried out by UNESCO as part of its campaign against racial discrimination. Studies have been undertaken in Dahomey, the Gold Coast and Nigeria and among African students in Paris. Other studies are to be made among women in one or more African societies. Such inquiries are matters of great interest, particularly when they are based on a broad view of the attributes of emerging leadership to meet changing needs, since the development and spread of popular leadership throughout the community is inconceivable if various groups remain insulated by barriers of class, status or culture.

126. The development of popular leadership calls for the appraisal of the training policies and programmes both in respect of its scope and extent, and also in terms of its social content. With the expansion of community development in its various forms, there is an increasing need for the decentralization of training facilities and for the integration of the training policies and programmes in the social field over a broad geographical area. At present, the main function of territorial training programmes of this type is the training of professional and specialist personnel required by official organizations. All this is necessary but also a broader conception should be formed of the place and function which should be assigned to central training institutions in the total field of social development.

127. Such training institutions should not be regarded as merely schools for professionals, officials or technicians of various types and levels. They should be conceived as workshops of social thought and as places of training and orientation for many kinds of agents and leaders in social development, official and non-official, employed and voluntary. In addition to the task of preparing men and women as full-time workers in the fields of social welfare and community development, these training centres should provide courses of various duration and content for chiefs, local government officers, members of voluntary agencies and other traditional and natural leaders of the community. They should also offer facilities for re-orientation or training in the methods of group-work to personnel engaged in different types of social action: teachers, agriculturalists, health workers, local government employees, trade union officers and industrial welfare workers, probation officers and others active in similar specialist fields. The purpose of the training should be the perfection of skills, the increase of technical efficiency, and above all the development of the creative potentialities of the people through better understanding of each other, encouragement of individual and collective initiative and the formulation of common ideals and purposes capable of uniting and guiding the people despite their ethnic affiliation, occupation or status.

XII. The planning of social development

128. In recent years there has been an expansion of programmes of social action in countries at all levels of economic development.<sup>8</sup> This expansion has been accompanied by changes in the form, character and underlying philosophy. The principle of social rights has become widely established. Increasingly, social policies aim at anticipating need and preventing it from arising rather than meeting individual cases. The extent of social action depends to a large degree upon the level of economic development and the availability of financial resources, but the economically under-developed countries are able to study the past experiences and the present standards of living of the developed countries and profit from the lessons of the past by introducing the necessary social measures in good time.

129. On the other hand, as these countries are faced with the problem of widespread poverty a strong emphasis is consequentially placed upon higher productivity. The practical conclusions to be drawn involve difficult problems of social and economic programming. Countries have no simple formulas to guide them when faced with the problem of deciding how much of their resources should be devoted to future production and how much to the immediate improvement of social conditions. There has been a trend toward greater emphasis on immediate raising of levels of living, but the trend is uncertain. In several fields of social action there has been a growing reliance upon the combination of welfare and production objectives by which the Governments assist individuals to mobilize and apply their own resources to the solution of their problems. Use of this self-help method requires that, as Governments assume increasing responsibilities in the field of social welfare, those who are to benefit likewise assume increasing responsibilities.

130. In the under-developed areas with their predominantly rural populations, modern health measures continue to cause a sharp decline in death rates while birth rates remain largely unaffected. Questions of population growth and distribution bear directly upon social policies, and population trends may in turn be influenced by these policies.

131. Special services for transitional population groups have proved necessary, and, in particular, urban community organizations in a few cases have been established to substitute for rural communities and kinship groups. Orientation, guidance and occasionally temporary accommodations have been provided by public service agencies or voluntary organizations. Consideration has been given to the need for consumer protection and guidance for groups who have little experience in the use of money.

132. In connexion with practically all types of social programmes, there are three problems that constantly arise. These are problems of obtaining: (1) adequate staff to execute the programmes; (2) adequate information to guide the programmes; and (3) adequate resources to finance them. In their efforts to provide staff for their social programmes, the less-developed countries have increasingly turned to auxiliary workers who have less than full professional qualifications and who can undertake responsible duties while releasing the fully trained professional staff for other tasks. The problem of obtaining adequate information for social programmes is, in part, one of balancing the use of limited resources. There has been a clear trend toward greater reliance upon social research in recent years, as a basis for formulating systematic plans and programmes, spurred by concrete instances of failures of programmes founded on poor information and mistaken assumptions. The problem of financing social programmes is not only that of the limitation of the total amount of funds available, but also that of the competition for these funds. There has been considerable emphasis in recent years on balanced economic and social development. There is, however, little agreement as to what constitutes balanced development or a balanced allocation of funds for development. Nor is there agreement as to the order and timing of expenditures on different types of programmes.

133. The above general considerations apply to under-developed areas generally including most Non-Self-Governing Territories except for the few that have attained a comparatively high level of development. The position of Non-Self-Governing Territories considered as such, differs principally in that their social policies are determined to a greater or lesser extent by the directives of the countries responsible for their administration.

134. In 1954, the Committee examined the major plans of economic and social development by which the Administering Members have made available appreciable sums, by way of grant or loan, in order to supplement local resources and to stimulate development. The Committee noted that, broadly speaking, in comparison with arrangements made under the original plans, there is now a tendency to allocate a greater proportion of new resources to schemes of economic development likely to be productive of increased revenue in preference to schemes aiming at social improvement only.<sup>9</sup> This does not lessen the urgency of the social reforms which are essential parts of the economic programmes. Peoples deficient in health, education and welfare may be unable to increase their productivity unless a vigorous policy is pursued for the expansion of social and educational standards and services. Forms of social policy which stimulate action by the people may contribute directly to economic development, to the expansion of facilities assisting development and to the increase of productivity.

135. For economic as well as social reasons, the participation of the inhabitants in the formulation of development plans is an essential of public policy. It is through their understanding of general aspects of social policy that popular participation can be obtained in the implementation of particular programmes, while the association of popular and expert opinion at the planning stage should result in an impetus to action far less costly than the advocacy by official publicity of schemes determined without initial popular support.

136. Accordingly, it is held that no social policy is likely to be fully successful without the understanding of the inhabitants obtained in advance through the consent of their representatives obtained at the stage of the formulation of social policy. In 1952, the Committee stated in this connexion that it had been encouraged in the information supplied on progress of this kind showing that in some Territories representatives of the inhabitants were already in charge of their own social affairs, and that it hoped for a rapid attainment of this result in all Non-Self-Governing Territories. This point is reiterated, but it is further suggested that the participation of the inhabitants can best be solicited when positive programmes of social advance, based on their own needs, are presented to them.

XIII. International and regional co-operation

137. In this process, the chief contributions in technical skills and in finance come from the expanding resources of the Territories themselves and from the aid supplied by the Administering Members. It was pointed out to the Committee that a considerable part of the efforts of the administrators and technical experts in the Territories is devoted to transmitting the necessary technical knowledge to the local peoples, so that in all fields they will be equipped to deal effectively with their own problems and that thus, to a considerable extent, the function of officials in the Territories may legitimately be described as technical assistance. Moreover, the Administering Members are large contributors to international technical assistance schemes by the experts they can provide for other under-developed countries; and some of the more advanced Non-Self-Governing Territories, as, for example Hawaii, are themselves making valuable contributions to present programmes.

138. Although the total funds available for international technical assistance are necessarily limited and such assistance is only a supplement to that provided from national sources, it nevertheless should be regarded as of substantial importance by reason of the needs of the Territories, the particular problems that arise and the general principles of international co-operation that are applicable to them. The Territories and their peoples in many cases need every possible source of assistance since they are grappling with deep-seated problems of poverty, climatic and other natural disadvantages, and lack of general education and training in modern skills. Their particular problems can be best examined in the light of comparable problems elsewhere and it is highly desirable that their own territorial experts should learn from and contribute to the solution of similar problems elsewhere. Thirdly, if international technical assistance is necessarily on a small scale in terms of the money and services provided, it can supply to technicians an invaluable impetus to their inquiries and activities and to the inhabitants a realization of the interest of the outside world in their problems.

139. Once again, this year the Committee had before it particulars of the technical assistance furnished to the Non-Self-Governing Territories by the United Nations and the specialized agencies. It noted that France, on 30 May 1954, and the Netherlands, on 6 October 1954, had signed agreements with the Technical Assistance Board for the provision of assistance to the Non-Self-Governing Territories and other Territories for which these countries are responsible, following similar action previously taken by the United Kingdom. It noted that in the percentage of allocations of the total sums there had been an increase in the percentage of allocations made to Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories between 1954 (2.79 per cent) and 1955 (4.89 per cent) and of the total sums ($626,000 in 1954 to $812,000 in 1955); that the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) had approved in 1955 an expenditure of over a million dollars for African Non-Self-Governing Territories and $150,000 for certain Territories in the Caribbean and Pacific; and that the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development had made loans for the use of a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories, as for example to the Belgian Congo, French West Africa and the Territories served by the East Africa High Commission.

140. This information was welcomed by the Committee. It was considered that, even though the assistance is to be regarded as supplementary, consideration should be given to the possibility of making more available to the Territories. More information is desirable on the manner in which international assistance of this nature is integrated in the territorial development plans, and how particular pilot schemes are developed on a wider and more lasting basis, how UNICEF grants operate with a view to the progressive improvement of the welfare of children, or how fellowships and scholarships are used to broaden existing or contemplated programmes and to enhance the expert knowledge of those taking part in the territorial development of these programmes.

141. Finally, in the field of social development, the Committee received information on aspects of the work of the United Nations, the specialized agencies and the inter-governmental regional commissions of the Caribbean, the South Pacific and Africa South of the Sahara.

142. The usual forms of such assistance are well known: the provision of fellowships, scholarships and experts; conferences and seminars; surveys, reports and exchange of information by many formal means of discussion. Less publicized but no less useful may be the opportunities for informal contacts among officers of the administrations, representatives of the local peoples and leading private citizens, which the international and regional organizations can furnish.

143. As previously, the Committee holds that the United Nations, as through the Economic and Social Council, the specialized agencies and the regional bodies, can and should provide services to the Non-Self-Governing Territories valuable in their concrete results and contributing to the growth of international co-operation, as indicated by Article 73 d and Article 74 of the Charter.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

ADDENDUM

1. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories resumed its sixth session on 7 September 1955 to consider the communication from the Netherlands Government relating to the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter in respect of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam.

I. Election of the Vice-Chairman

2. At its 131st meeting, the Committee, under rule 107 of the rules of procedure of the General Assembly, elected Mr. Emilio Arenales (Guatemala) as Vice-Chairman in replacement of Mr. S. A. Frazão (Brazil) who was unable to continue to serve.

II. Communication by the Netherlands Government relating to the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter in respect of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam

3. At its 131st meeting, the Committee resumed consideration of the item on its agenda relating to the communication by the Netherlands Government (A/AC.35/L.206) on the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter in respect of the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam. This item had been previously considered at the 125th and 126th meetings of the Committee held on 10 May 1955.<sup>1</sup>

4. The representative of the Netherlands pointed out that the Charter of the Kingdom of the Netherlands had been communicated to the Secretary-General and that, at the 125th and 126th meetings, the representatives of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles had reviewed the constitutional changes and explained the various provisions of the Charter of the Kingdom. He reminded the Committee that an exchange of questions and answers had followed between a number of representatives and the two representatives of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, and that at the conclusion of the debate the Committee had been unable to reach a decision since some delegates had not then received instructions from their Governments.

5. The representative of the Netherlands considered that it was not intended that the Committee should again go over all the ground that had been so well covered in the previous part of the session. In the view of the Netherlands Government, it was no longer appropriate for information to be transmitted to the United Nations in respect of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles under Article 73 e of the United Nations Charter. Under the constitutional order set up by the Interim Orders, these two countries had had an opportunity to familiarize themselves during a number of years with the practice of democratic government. Meanwhile, there had been elections and new Governments had taken over. These new Governments were as staunch supporters of the Charter of the Kingdom as their predecessors. The promulgation of that Charter had marked the beginning of full and equal partnership between the three countries forming the Kingdom of the Netherlands.

6. The representative of Guatemala sought information on the extent to which the factors contained in the annex to General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII) had been fulfilled in respect to the recent constitutional changes. In particular, he referred to the third part of the list of factors "indicative of the free association of a Territory on an equal basis with the metropolitan or other country as an integral part of that country or in any other form". The representative of the Netherlands replied that the attitude of the Government of the Netherlands in respect of resolution 742 (VIII) and its annex were well known. He reserved the position of his Government with respect to the resolution and the list of factors; in its opinion, each case as it arose had to be judged on its own merits. Moreover, the competence of the General Assembly in this field was not recognized by the Netherlands Government.

7. The representative of Guatemala put a number of questions to which the representative of the Netherlands replied as follows:

(i) With respect to whether the opinion of the populations of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles had been freely expressed by informed and democratic processes, the answer was in the affirmative. The freely elected Parliaments in Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles had unanimously accepted the Charter of the Kingdom of the Netherlands. Negotiations with respect to the Charter had been under way for a number of years, and the questions at issue had been freely discussed in the local Press. As a consequence, the population of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles had been kept fully informed with respect to the constitutional changes which had subsequently been enacted.

(ii) As to the freedom of the populations of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles to modify their present status, the Ministers Plenipotentiary of Surinam and the Antilles had the right to introduce a bill for amendment of the Charter and modification of the status of the countries in the Parliament of the Kingdom. Her Majesty the Queen had made a statement prior to the promulgation of the Charter to the effect that no political partnership could endure unless supported by the overwhelming majority of the citizens. It would also be contrary to the established policy of the Netherlands to prevent a partner from leaving the Kingdom if that partner desired to do so.

(iii) As to the respective competence of the countries and of the Kingdom, article 3 of the Charter set forth those matters which were affairs of the Kingdom and these included defence and foreign relations. In all other respects, each of the three countries comprising the Kingdom was completely self-governing. In matters of defence, the citizens of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles could only be called into the armed forces pursuant to their own local legislation. In the field of foreign relations, each Government had the right to decide whether it would take part in any international agreement under consideration by the Kingdom of the Netherlands. Except in rare cases where it was impossible to do so, each Government had the right to abstain from such agreements.

(iv) There was no discrimination in respect to the appointment of citizens from the three countries to government posts within the Kingdom; each of the three countries could summon its own citizens only for service in the armed forces.

(v) The Council of Ministers of the Kingdom of the Netherlands decided upon the amount each country would contribute to the support of the armed forces. This decision, however, had to be taken unanimously under the provision of article 35 of the Charter, and no contribution could therefore be imposed on Surinam and the Antilles without their consent.

(vi) With respect to voting rights of illiterate persons, appropriate provision was made by the use of symbols on ballot forms. The percentage of illiteracy in the Netherlands Antilles was less than one half of 1 per cent. In Surinam, the percentage was slightly higher.

(vii) The populations of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles were very mixed in origin. In Surinam, the population was predominantly of mixed white and coloured origin. There were also other ethnic groups, but smaller in number. The group of Dutch origin constituted a small minority of the total population. Apart from the Dutch language a vernacular was spoken by people in the interior. With respect to the Netherlands Antilles, Dutch was the common language of the islands, although Papiamentu was also spoken in those islands lying off the coast of Venezuela, and English was spoken in the three islands of the Leeward Group.

(viii) With respect to political development in Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles, the transition had been one from a completely colonial régime through various stages of self-government. At first, representative bodies were made up of partly elected and partly appointed members having limited powers. Gradually, the powers of these bodies had been increased and the system of appointing members had been relinquished. Eventually a stage had been reached when the representative bodies assumed full powers in all internal matters. The forerunners of the parliamentary bodies in the two countries had been in existence for nearly a century.

(ix) Amendment of the Charter was provided for in article 55. An amendment had to be voted upon and accepted by a majority in Surinam and in the Netherlands Antilles before being enacted for the Kingdom. Representation of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles in the Kingdom Parliament was provided for in articles 17 to 19 inclusive. If Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles had been given representation in the Kingdom Parliament on the basis of population, they could have exerted only a negligible influence in Kingdom affairs. Thus, a different system of representation for the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam in the Kingdom Parliament had been provided for by which their representatives would have a larger voice in Kingdom affairs than under a numerical system of representation. Actually, under articles 12 and 18 of the Charter, Surinam and the Antilles now could exert influence equal to two fifths of the votes.

(x) Only one nationality—Netherlands nationality—prevailed throughout the three countries comprised in the Kingdom of the Netherlands.

(xi) Residence for purposes of voting in each country was a matter regulated by the country concerned.

8. Following the above replies, the Committee discussed the procedure to be adopted in the preparation of a draft resolution. The Chairman suggested the establishment of a working group to prepare a text for the consideration of the Committee. Statements were made by the representatives of Brazil, Guatemala, India, Iraq, the Netherlands, Peru and the United States of America. The representatives of Iraq and Peru were not in favour of the suggested working group, and the Committee finally agreed that the Chairman would undertake to consult the representatives on the preparation of a draft resolution.

9. At the 132nd meeting, the representatives of Brazil and the United States of America introduced the following joint draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.216):

"The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"Recalling that by resolution 222 (III), adopted on 3 November 1948, the General Assembly, while welcoming any development of self-government in Non-Self-Governing Territories, considers that it is essential that the United Nations be informed of any change in the constitutional status of any such Territory as a result of which the responsible Government concerned thinks it unnecessary to transmit information in respect of that Territory under Article 73 e of the Charter,

"Recalling that by resolution 747 (VIII), adopted on 27 November 1953, the General Assembly invited the Government of the Netherlands to communicate to the Secretary-General the result of the further negotiations which were to be undertaken with respect to the status of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles,

"Recalling that by resolution 747 (VIII) the General Assembly further invited the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to examine the communications referred to in the previous paragraph in connexion with the information already transmitted and to report thereon to the General Assembly,

"Having examined a communication, dated 30 March 1955, by which the Government of the Netherlands transmitted the Charter of the Kingdom of the Netherlands promulgated on 29 December 1954 together with an explanatory memorandum thereon,

"Having heard the explanations given in relation to the basic principles of Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations and the provisions of General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII) by the representatives of the Government of the Netherlands,

"1. Commends the action of the Government of the Netherlands in including in its delegation to the Committee representatives of the Governments of

Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles for the purpose of explaining the new constitutional situation;

"2. Notes with satisfaction the political advancement achieved by the peoples of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles;

"3. Notes from the documentation submitted that the peoples of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles have expressed, through their freely elected Parliaments, their approval of the new constitutional order negotiated with the Government of the Netherlands;

"4. Expresses the opinion—within the limits of its terms of reference and without anticipating the final disposal of this question by the General Assembly—that, on the basis of the information before the Committee, the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter in respect of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles is no longer necessary or appropriate."

10. The representative of Brazil, in introducing the resolution, stated that the aims of Article 73 e of the Charter had been satisfied and that transmission of information was no longer necessary or appropriate. In his opinion, Surinam and Netherlands Antilles had become self-governing countries whose freely elected parliaments had approved the Charter of the Kingdom making them equal partners with the Netherlands. The Committee had also been informed that it would be contrary to the established policy of the Netherlands Government to prevent these two countries from leaving the Kingdom if they wished to do so.

11. The representative of the United States of America endorsed the comments of the representative of Brazil and hoped that the resolution would meet with a wide measure of support.

12. The representative of Iraq regretted that he was unable to support the resolution. His Government's opinion, based on the available information, was that the measure of self-government provided for in the Charter of the Kingdom did not warrant a release from the obligations of Article 73 e. It was not certain that the Charter gave full promise of real self-government, and to accept such an arrangement would be to make inroads into the meaning and validity of Article 73 e. In his opinion the terms of General Assembly resolution 747 (VIII), which had requested the Netherlands Government to continue to supply information under Article 73 e, could not be abrogated unless by the General Assembly, and the Netherlands Government could not by its unilateral action cease transmitting information. The Government of Iraq maintained the principle that an Administering Member should not alter the status of a Non-Self-Governing Territory without the approval of the General Assembly. He felt therefore that the question before the Committee was one for the General Assembly alone to decide.

13. The representative of Peru referred to the position of the American States in respect of the dependent territories and colonies in America of extracontinental countries, mentioning resolution 97 of the Tenth Inter-American Conference of Caracas on which his delegation's attitude was based. He recognized that Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles had advanced considerably towards full self-government, but that the present constitutional system should not be considered as the final or definitive stage, and pointed out that the explanatory memorandum presented by the Netherlands Government (A/AC.35/L.206) did not give it a definitive character. It was pertinent, therefore, to express the hope that the political progress of these Territories would continue in the future and that they would attain full self-government through the exercise of the right of self-determination. With regard to General Assembly resolution 747 (VIII), the Committee should limit itself to the examination of, and reporting on, the documentation received without taking a decision on the substance of the question. His delegation considered that the Committee could not take a decision until it had fully explored the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations, especially as regards the concept and conditions of "full self-government", with a view to their strict observance. In his opinion, Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles had attained some measure of political autonomy as well as complete autonomy in respect of their economic, social and educational affairs, which was the subject matter of the information supplied; it might therefore be impossible for the Netherlands Government to continue to transmit the information required by Article 73 e of the Charter. This Article rendered the transmission of information dependent, among other things, on constitutional considerations, and even if this special obligation should cease, Chapter XI contained other obligations which would continue to exist until the Territory had attained a full measure of self-government, at which point the entire Chapter became inapplicable. It was clear that, under the new constitutional structure, Surinam and the Antilles, although juridical collectivities or entities forming part of the Kingdom, remained, nevertheless, in a state of dependency in important respects within the juridical system and under the authority of the State which had been administering them; but it was no less certain that they enjoyed autonomy in the specific fields to which Article 73 e of the Charter referred. He could not support the draft resolution and would abstain in the final voting because the said resolution did not make it clear that the cessation of information was a consequence of the autonomy of the local Governments from the point of view of the subject matter of the information supplied and that the information would be accepted only for institutional purposes, but implied that the cessation of information was a consequence of the achievement of full self-government.

14. The representative of France, commenting on the remarks of the representative of Iraq, stated that, with the exception of Trust Territories, the General Assembly did not have under the Charter to pass judgment on the change in political status of a Territory.

15. The representative of China expressed his general approval of the text of the draft resolution although, in respect to operative paragraph 4, he thought it preferable that the words "necessary or appropriate" should be replaced by the word "feasible".

16. The representative of Netherlands explained that, in the opinion of his Government, it had the right to decide when its Non-Self-Governing Territory had reached a status where the obligation under Article 73 e ceased. However, subject to this principle, he had no objection to a reference to resolution 742 (VIII) in paragraph 5 of the preamble. He felt that the omission of the question of competence in the draft resolution would enable a larger measure of agreement, and he hoped that this point would also be left out of discussion in the Fourth Committee. The draft resolution had also omitted to state explicitly that Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles had attained a full measure of self-government. The Netherlands delegation, in order to avoid unnecessary controversy, was prepared to accept that omission because the conclusion reached in the draft resolution that transmission of information was no longer necessary or appropriate implied that those countries were no longer non-self-governing. The Netherlands delegation would therefore be able to vote for the draft resolution.

17. The representatives of India and Peru then introduced certain amendments to the draft resolution. The representative of India proposed the substitution of "representative bodies" for "Parliaments" in operative paragraph 3. This was accepted by the sponsors.

18. The representative of Peru proposed substitution of "feasible" for "necessary or appropriate" in operative paragraph 4; this proposal had originally been suggested by the representative of China but was not accepted by the sponsors.

19. The draft resolution was voted upon as follows:

	In favour	Against	Abstaining
First to fourth paragraphs of the preamble .....	8	0	5
Fifth paragraph of the preamble: the words "in relation to the basic principles of Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations and the provisions of General Assembly resolution 742 (VIII)" (separate vote requested by India) .....	3	3	7
Fifth paragraph of the preamble (remainder) .....	9	0	4
Operative paragraph 1 .....	8	0	5
Operative paragraph 2: the words "with satisfaction" (separate vote requested by India) .....	6	0	7
Operative paragraph 2 .....	6	0	7
Operative paragraph 3 .....	11	0	2
Operative paragraph 4: the words "within the limits of its terms of reference and without anticipating the final disposal of this question by the General Assembly" (separate vote requested by France) .....	7	0	6
Operative paragraph 4: to substitute "feasible" for "necessary or appropriate" (amendment of Peru, originally suggested by China) .....	2	6	5
Operative paragraph 4: the words "or appropriate" (separate vote requested by India) .....	6	3	4
Operative paragraph 4 .....	7	1	5

20. The revised draft resolution as a whole, as amended, was approved by a roll-call vote (requested by the representative of Iraq) of 7 to 1, with 5 abstentions. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Australia, Brazil, China, Netherlands, New Zealand, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America.

Against: Iraq.

Abstaining: Burma, France, Guatemala, India, Peru.

21. The text of the resolution as adopted by the Committee is as follows:

"The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"Recalling that by resolution 222 (III), adopted on 3 November 1948, the General Assembly, while welcoming any development of self-government in Non-Self-Governing Territories, considers that it is essential that the United Nations be informed of any change in the constitutional status of any such Territory as a result of which the responsible Government concerned thinks it unnecessary to transmit information in respect of that Territory under Article 73 e of the Charter,

"Recalling that by resolution 747 (VIII), adopted on 27 November 1953, the General Assembly invited the Government of the Netherlands to communicate to the Secretary-General the result of the further negotiations which were to be undertaken with respect to the status of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles,

"Recalling that by resolution 747 (VIII) the General Assembly further invited the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to examine the communications referred to in the previous paragraph in connexion with the information already transmitted and to report thereon to the General Assembly,

"Having examined a communication, dated 30 March 1955, by which the Government of the Netherlands transmitted the Charter of the Kingdom of the Netherlands promulgated on 29 December 1954 together with an explanatory memorandum thereon,

"Having heard the explanation given by the representatives of the Government of the Netherlands,

"1. Commends the action of the Government of the Netherlands in including in its delegation to the Committee representatives of the Governments of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles for the purpose of explaining the new constitutional situation;

"2. Notes with satisfaction the political advancement achieved by the peoples of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles;

"3. Notes from the documentation submitted that the peoples of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles have expressed, through their freely elected representative bodies, their approval of the new constitutional order negotiated with the Government of the Netherlands;

"4. Expresses the opinion—within the limits of its terms of reference and without anticipating the final disposal of this question by the General Assembly—that, on the basis of the information before the Committee, the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter in respect of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles is no longer necessary or appropriate."

22. The representatives of Australia, Burma, France, Guatemala, India, Iraq, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States of America gave explanations of their votes.

23. The representative of India abstained from voting and reserved the position of his Government regarding any future action to be taken in the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly. He pointed out, however, that the Netherlands Government had claimed that the draft resolution implied that all its responsibilities under Chapter XI had terminated, that the two Territories had become fully self-governing under the new Charter of the Kingdom and that it was therefore no longer necessary to transmit information under Article 73 e. He considered that the two countries had not yet attained a full measure of self-government, and he could not therefore be a party to a decision which conveyed any other implication.

24. The representative of the United States regretted that the non-Administering Members of the Committee, with the exception of Brazil and China, had abstained from voting on the draft resolution as amended. His Government thought that the efforts of dependent peoples towards a greater degree of self-government should be recognized. In the present case the people of Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles would have been encouraged by a larger vote in favour of the draft resolution.

25. The representative of France said that he had abstained from voting on the draft resolution, as amended, and in particular on those paragraphs of the resolution which implied a recognition of the competence of the Committee or of the General Assembly to decide whether the Netherlands Government should cease to transmit information on Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles.

26. The representative of Guatemala stated that he had abstained from voting on the draft resolution as amended in order to provide freedom of action for his delegation in the General Assembly. His abstention should not be interpreted as disputing the Committee's competence to decide on questions of this character or as affecting Guatemala's support of decisions taken on colonial questions by inter-American bodies.

27. The representative of the United Kingdom voted in favour of the draft resolution as amended despite certain reservations which his Government maintained. His vote should not be construed as implying that the United Kingdom Government recognized the competence of the United Nations to intervene in political matters affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories or to decide on the question of the cessation of the transmission of information on Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles under Article 73 e of the Charter.

28. The representative of Iraq stated that he had voted against the resolution as amended for the reasons which he had previously given.

29. The representative of New Zealand stated that he had voted in favour of the draft resolution as amended despite certain reservations which his Government held.

30. The representative of Australia said that he had voted in favour of the draft resolution as amended without prejudice to the previously held position of his Government that the decision to cease the transmission of information on Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles under Article 73 e of the Charter was within the sole competence of the Netherlands Government. His Government adhered to the view that Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles were now equal partners in the Kingdom of the Netherlands and that the decision by the Netherlands to cease the transmission of information on these formerly dependent Territories was fully justified. The Australian Government could not accept the view that the General Assembly was competent to take decisions in this matter and it was opposed to the thesis that the Administering Member could be required to submit information to the General Assembly and to the Committee on Information on political developments, or that either organ was empowered to examine or pronounce upon such information. He reserved the position of his Government in respect of any future action to be taken in the General Assembly.

31. The representative of Burma said that he had abstained from voting on the draft resolution, as amended, and reserved the position of his Government in respect to any future action to be taken in the General Assembly. He did not consider that Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles were equal partners in the Kingdom of the Netherlands and that as a consequence the Netherlands Government should continue to transmit information on these Territories under Article 73 e of the Charter.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

I. Constitution of the Committee

1. The General Assembly, by resolution 933 (X) adopted on 8 November 1955, decided to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis as set forth in resolutions 332 (IV) and 646 (VII), for a further three-year period.

2. The terms of reference of the Committee set forth in resolution 933 (X) provide that the General Assembly:

"5. Instructs the Committee to examine, in the spirit of paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 1 and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

"6. Instructs the Committee to submit to the regular sessions of the General Assembly reports containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories".

3. In relation to the Committee's programme of work, the General Assembly considered, in resolution 933 (X):

"That the Committee should, without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, give special attention to educational, economic and social conditions in turn and should consider the information transmitted in respect of these questions in the light of the reports approved by the General Assembly on such conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories".

4. The Committee consists of fourteen members: the seven Member States transmitting information on Non-Self-Governing Territories and an equal number of other Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly. The membership of the Committee in 1956 was as follows:

Members transmitting information

Australia Belgium
France
Netherlands
New Zealand
United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland
United States of America

Members elected by the General Assembly

Burma
China
Guatemala
India
Iraq
Peru
Venezuela

All members were represented at the seventh session of the Committee, with the exception of Belgium.

5. The Committee met in New York at the Headquarters of the United Nations and held nineteen meetings between 27 April and 22 May 1956.

6. Representatives of the following specialized agencies attended the Committee and took part in the discussions: the International Labour Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and the World Health Organization.

II. Officers of the Committee

7. At its opening meeting on 27 April, the Committee elected the following officers by acclamation:

Chairman:	Mr. Emilio Arenales Catalan (Guatemala)
Vice-Chairman:	Mr. Adnan Pachachi (Iraq)
Rapporteur:	Mr. J. Vixseboxse (Netherlands)

III. Sub-Committee

8. A Sub-Committee was appointed at the 139th meeting of the Committee to prepare a special report on education in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was composed of representatives of Australia, Burma, France, Guatemala, India, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela, and was assisted by the Rapporteur. The Sub-Committee elected Mr. T.W. Cutts of Australia as its Chairman. It held six meetings between 9 and 15 May.

IV. Agenda

9. The Committee, at its 133rd meeting, considered the provisional agenda prepared by the Secretary-General. On the proposal of the representative of India it decided, by 5 votes to 2, with 6 abstentions, to include under item 4 a new sub-item entitled "Race relations in education". It also decided to replace sub-item 7 (d) of the provisional agenda relating to future studies on economic conditions by a separate item concerning the future studies of the Committee. The agenda as amended was adopted and is reproduced in annex I to the present report.

V. Preliminary statements

10. At the 133rd meeting, the representative of India noted that no special procedure had been followed by the Committee to consider the credentials of representatives accredited to it. He expressed the views of his Government on the representation of China. On the same matter, views were expressed by the representatives of Australia, Burma, China, France and the United States of America.

11. At the same meeting, the representative of France reaffirmed statements made by his delegation at previous sessions of the Committee concerning the position of his Government regarding its participation in the work of the Committee. References to the reservations of their respective Governments were subsequently made by the representatives of Australia and the United Kingdom. The representative of Guatemala stated the position of his Government on the competence of the Committee.

12. At the 134th meeting, the representatives of Guatemala and of the United Kingdom reserved the position of their respective Governments with regard to sovereignty over British Honduras (Belize Territory).

13. At the 135th meeting, the representative of India stated that, in view of the dispute over the sovereignty over Netherlands New Guinea (West Irian) he wished to reserve the position of his Government. The representatives of Burma and Iraq, at the 135th and 136th meetings, similarly reserved the position of their Governments. The representative of the Netherlands reaffirmed the de facto and de jure sovereignty of his Government over Netherlands New Guinea.

VI. Educational conditions

14. In accordance with the provisions of General Assembly resolution 933 (X), the Committee at its seventh session gave special attention to the examination of information on education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. As persons specially qualified in the functional fields within the Committee's purview, specialist advisers on education were attached to the delegations of France, Guatemala, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

15. The Committee discussed education in Non-Self-Governing Territories, as item 4 of its agenda, from the 134th to the 144th meetings inclusive. Statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Burma, China, France, Guatemala, India, Iraq, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Peru, the United Kingdom, the United States of America, Venezuela and by the representative of UNESCO.

16. Following the general discussion, the Committee considered a number of specific aspects of education: the eradication of illiteracy, provision of reading material for new literates, wastage and retardation in primary schools, secondary education, teacher training and status of teachers, financing of higher education and race relations in education.

17. A number of representatives pointed out that, under Chapter XI of the Charter, the problems of Non-Self-Governing Territories required the particular attention of the Committee, which had been instructed to examine the information before it in the light of Article 1, paragraphs 3 and 4, and of Article 55 of the Charter. Reference also was made to the objectives of education endorsed by the General Assembly in its resolution 743 (VIII), particularly with emphasis on the need to take into account the basic cultural values and aspirations of the peoples and to enable them to take an increasing share of responsibility in the conduct of their own affairs.

18. The representative of UNESCO described the work of his organization, especially in the field of eradication of illiteracy, and gave an account of the assistance given to Non-Self-Governing Territories.

19. A number of representatives stressed the value of co-ordinated planning in drawing up educational policies and the need for provision of increased educational facilities. In particular, vigorous efforts were required for the eradication of illiteracy. The representative of Burma suggested that more direct assistance could be given by UNESCO and that the Committee should consider requesting the Administering Members to fix a time-table for the achievement of universal primary education. The representative of China considered that steps must be taken to stimulate the interest of the peoples in Non-Self-Governing Territories and to help them raise their standards of living. The representative of Peru drew attention to the social and economic repercussions of illiteracy, and emphasized that its eradication would facilitate the full exercise of civic rights by the peoples and, eventually, the right of self-determination. The representative of India stressed the importance of adapting education to the needs of the people, the provision of instruction in the local languages and the establishment of institutions of higher education in the Territories. He urged the speedy abolition of discriminatory practices in education. The representative of Iraq also considered that literacy was indispensable for political advancement; campaigns against illiteracy should form part of a comprehensive plan of educational development.

20. The representative of Guatemala considered that one of the tasks before the Committee was to appraise educational policies and to verify whether any action was being taken on the recommendations of the Committee and of the General Assembly. Commenting on educational conditions in the Territories, he emphasized the need of a broad concept of education. He suggested that basic education programmes, using all media of mass information and organized as part of a general programme of land tenure, economic development, cultural progress and public health, should be initiated for those inhabitants who were unable to benefit from regular instruction. The representative of Guatemala also referred specifically to the educational situation in British Honduras (Belize Territory).

21. The representative of Venezuela stated that the Committee should consider means of assuring the attainment of the objectives of education which formed part of resolution 743 (VIII). In particular, education should prepare the inhabitants for self-government. To that end, the development of the necessary machinery for the initiation and execution of educational programmes was of the utmost importance.

22. The representatives of the Administering Members outlined points of educational policy in the Territories under their administration, and informed the Committee of more recent developments and of the progress made.

23. In the Territories under the administration of France, efforts had been directed to improving education in the village and primary schools. Education budgets had increased both in absolute amounts and as percentages of territorial budgets; new techniques were being applied. In all the Territories under the administration of the United States there was compulsory education; local bodies which were responsible for the administration of education and the provision of finance were making efforts to adapt educational facilities to the needs of the growing population. The representative of the United Kingdom provided illustrative examples of the progress made in the Territories under United Kingdom administration, as reflected in increased enrolments in primary and secondary schools as well as reduced wastage; the establishment of new teacher-training facilities; and the growth of new universities as well as an increase in university enrolments.

24. The representatives of Australia, the Netherlands and New Zealand described the developments in the Territories under their respective administrations, and outlined some of the problems and difficulties met. The representative of Australia noted the increase in school enrolment and in educational expenditure in Papua, and mentioned some of the measures which were being taken to extend primary and secondary education. In Netherlands New Guinea, the immediate aim was to improve existing standards. Progress had been made, particularly in the improvement of the village school systems. Under recent legislation private schools received increased subsidies, including subsidies for research into the adaptation of educational methods to local conditions. One of the main achievements in recent educational developments in New Zealand Territories was the establishment of a college to provide secondary education for selected students from the primary schools of each island.

25. At the 143rd meeting, the representative of India expressed his appreciation for the letters from the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions and from the Friends World Committee for Consultation which had been informally circulated by the Chairman. He hoped that non-governmental organizations would keep the Committee informed of their work in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

26. At the 139th meeting, the Committee appointed a sub-committee of eight members to draw up a report on educational conditions. The composition of the Sub-Committee is given in paragraph 8 above.

27. The Sub-Committee held six meetings and submitted a report on educational conditions for the consideration of the Committee at its 150th meeting.

28. Introducing the report, the Chairman of the Sub-Committee stated that it represented in general a consensus of views of the representatives on education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. As such, its approval was subject to reservations any delegation might wish to make.

29. The Chairman of the Sub-Committee indicated, also, that the section of the report relating to international and regional collaboration might need supplementing since the discussion of the relevant item in full Committee had not been completed in time for adequate consideration by the Sub-Committee.

30. Following this explanation, the addition of new paragraphs was proposed by the representative of Australia (A/AC.35/L.235) and by the representative of Guatemala (A/AC.35/L.238). The representative of India introduced an amendment (A/AC.35/L.236) to paragraph 78 of the draft report. These amendments were adopted, subject to verbal change.

31. The Committee adopted the report as a whole by 11 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

32. The representatives of Australia and of the Netherlands explained that they had voted in favour of the report because they found the report in general satisfactory, although they were not entirely in agreement with some of the views expressed. The representative of Australia stated that the report would receive the consideration of his Government.

33. The representative of France stated that the French delegation, noting the constant implication in the report that the Committee had political functions — an assertion which the French Government had always contested — regretted that it had consequently been unable to approve the report, despite its satisfaction with the technical contents.

34. The representatives of Burma, Guatemala, India and Venezuela explained that they had voted in favour of the report because they considered that it represented a consensus of the opinions expressed in the Committee. The report contained some views with which their own delegations were not in complete agreement and they reserved the positions of their Governments at the General Assembly.

35. At the same meeting, the Committee considered a joint draft resolution submitted by Australia, Guatemala, Iraq and the Netherlands (A/AC.35/L.237). This draft resolution was of a procedural character intended to facilitate discussion in the General Assembly. By it the Assembly would (1) approve the report on education in Non-Self-Governing Territories and consider that it should be studied in conjunction with the reports approved in 1950 and 1953; and (2) invite the Secretary-General to communicate this report to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned for their consideration. The draft resolution was unanimously approved by the Committee for transmission to the General Assembly and is included in annex II to the present report.

VII. Social conditions

36. The General Assembly had approved a report on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories at its last session.<sup>1</sup> The discussions of the committee at its 145th and 146th meetings were accordingly limited to brief statements on general social conditions. Statements were made by the representatives of Burma, China, France, Guatemala, India and the United Kingdom, and by the representatives of ILO and WHO.

37. The representatives of France and the United Kingdom provided information on recent advances in community development programmes in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration. In the French overseas Territories increased efforts were being directed towards assuring the economic stability of the rural communities and, in community development, towards the establishment of organizations and societies by which closer relations between the farmer and the technician could be established. He referred also to the steps taken to improve the status of women and to develop fundamental education. The representative of the United Kingdom described action that had been taken in a number of the Territories to promote community development projects and to examine and implement the principles of the 1954 Conference on Social Development which had been held in the United Kingdom and had received the attention of the Committee at its last session. One of the principal recommendations of the Conference had been that the various aspects of social development should be co-ordinated under a single authority at the highest level. Two Territories had fully implemented this recommendation and a number of other Territories were considering how to give effect to it.

38. The representative of India stressed the importance of community development projects, and hoped that they would be introduced in those Territories where they did not exist and expanded in other cases. He commented on certain social disabilities from which he claimed the peoples in certain Non-Self-Governing Territories, particularly in Africa, were suffering, and hoped for a rapid change in human relations by which such disabilities would be eliminated.

39. The representative of Guatemala emphasized the close relation between social, economic and educational development in the light of the ultimate objective of self-government. In all this, race relations were of decisive importance, and the existence of closed communities governed by different laws was prejudicial to the emergence of an enlightened popular opinion. He drew attention to information on the status of women, to health problems, to the question of the raising of levels of living and to the need for improved labour legislation and social security.

40. The representative of China also emphasized the importance of community development programmes. He welcomed the new information provided on these programmes, and hoped that more detailed information would be provided to the next session of the Committee.

41. The representative of Burma drew attention to a statement on social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories submitted by the World Federation of Trade Unions to the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations of the Economic and Social Council (E/C.2/461). His delegation considered the document worthy of the Committee's attention, providing an example of the way in which non-governmental organizations might assist the Committee.

42. The representatives of ILO and of WHO provided information on the recent activities of their organizations in respect of Non-Self-Governing Territories.

43. The representative of ILO informed the Committee of some recent developments within that organization's competence. He outlined decisions taken by the 1955 International Labour Conference concerning the abolition of penal sanctions in the case of indigenous workers and concerning the protection of migrant workers. He also gave a brief account of discussions and conclusions of the ILO Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories at its 1955 meeting on industrial relations, wage systems and policies and initial measures of social security in non-metropolitan territories.

44. The representative of WHO supplemented the information contained in the progress report on general developments presented under item 10 of the agenda (A/AC.35/L.229) and informed the Committee that the Ninth World Health Assembly ad admitted Morocco, Tunisia and the Sudan to full membership and the Gold Coast, Nigeria and Sierra Leone to associate membership.

VIII. Economic conditions

45. The Committee considered this question at its 147th and 148th meetings. Statements were made by the representatives of China, France, Guatemala, India, New Zealand and the United Kingdom.

46. The representative of China, emphasizing that every effort should be made to raise the levels of living of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, requested further information from the Administering Members on the steps taken to raise the per capita income of the local inhabitants and to enable them to participate in economic planning.

47. The representative of Guatemala classified the Non-Self-Governing Territories into three groups. In the relatively advanced Territories it was important to provide that, in planning economic development, tangible benefits should be conferred upon the broad masses of the population and greater use made of the abilities of the indigenous population. Steps should be taken to disseminate knowledge, to extend basic social services and to increase extension services. There must be a greater increase in production for domestic consumption so as to raise the level of living. In the less advanced Territories it was to be hoped that the Administering Members would direct more attention to the diversification of production and to strengthening the domestic economy by public works and social services. In the third group of Territories with little or no economic development, the situation required the efforts of the Administering Members supplemented by large-scale international assistance channelled through the United Nations. The representative of Guatemala also referred specifically to the economic situation in British Honduras (Belize territory).

48. The representative of India directed attention to a number of economic problems, including the shift from a rural self-sufficient economy to an urban economy and the need to attract foreign investments and to develop industries. It was regrettable that in some instances fiscal policies prejudiced the local handicraft producers in favour of industrial centres in the metropolitan countries. He asked that cottage industries be developed as an integral part of economic development. He expressed concern at measures of discrimination in the alienation of land which prevailed in some Territories. He also suggested that tariffs, particularly on basic commodities, should be reviewed from time to time to ensure that they were in the interests of the economic life of the Territories.

49. The representatives of France, New Zealand and the United Kingdom informed the Committee of further economic developments in the Territories under their respective administrations.

50. The representative of the United Kingdom reviewed the progress made in financing of development plans; the establishment of development corporations and new industries; the provision of basic services, including power, ports and harbours, and airports; and the increase in gross capital formation in the period 1952-1955. He agreed that there was need to attract foreign investment and that the primary objective in diversifying the economy and introducing new undertakings in any Non-Self-Governing Territory was to improve the position of the local inhabitants.

51. The representative of France gave the Committee an account of the investments and efforts of his Government in the economic development of the Territories under its administration. He reviewed the measures taken to diversify production in the Territories and other steps taken to protect them from fluctuations of world prices of commodities. In many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories the original situation had been that there was no economic development. Accordingly, any plan for such development had to cover all branches of activities. Much progress had been made through the creation of governmental or semi-governmental organizations for economic development and by the provision of grants and loans from the metropolitan authorities. Development was directed towards the harmonious growth of all the economic, social and cultural potentialities of the Territories. The French system, having established the prerequisites for economic development, was now endeavouring to promote by all possible means the expansion and modernization of agricultural production by which the levels of living of the populations as a whole could be appreciably raised.

IX. International collaboration in respect of economic, social and educational conditions

52. The Committee discussed this item at its 146th, 147th and 148th meetings. It had before it a report (A/AC.35/L.230) on decisions taken by the Economic and Social Council and on studies undertaken under its auspices which included within their scope economic and social conditions affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories, on relations with Governments and specialized agencies and on regional conferences; a progress report prepared by WHO on its activities in the Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/AC.35/L.229); and a report on international technical assistance to Non-Self-Governing Territories giving a brief review for the years 1954-1955 of the development of such assistance, particularly under the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance (A/AC.35/L.227 and Corr.1).

53. The representative of FAO noted that the report before the Committee covered the technical assistance provided by it to the Non-Self-Governing Territories which was predominantly directed to the improvement of agriculture. She informed the Committee of a number of FAO regional projects in which there had been participation from the Territories. These projects included programmes in health education, nutrition, statistics, fisheries and home economics. The representatives of ILO and WHO had previously spoken in the debate on social conditions on the work of their organizations.

54. Further information was given to the Committee by the representatives of Australia, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States on the co-operation of their Governments with international and regional organizations, and on the participation of the Territories under their administration in international conferences, seminars and training programmes. Representatives of the Governments participating in the Caribbean Commission, the South Pacific Commission and the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara informed the Committee of the work of these regional bodies. The representatives of Australia and New Zealand also informed the Committee of the part played by their Governments in rendering assistance to Territories in the region under the Colombo Plan for Technical Co-operation in South and South-East Asia.

55. A number of representatives expressed their appreciation to the specialized agencies for their collaboration and for their work in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representatives of Burma and Iraq expressed their appreciation of the establishment by WHO of a regional office in Africa.

56. The representative of Iraq also noted that replies had been received to the communication the Secretary-General had addressed to the sixteen new Members drawing their attention to the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter. He hoped that new Members administering Non-Self-Governing Territories would reply to the communication in the affirmative at an early date, as the question would be considered by the General Assembly.

57. The representative of Venezuela noted that the information contained in the report prepared by the Secretariat (A/AC.35/L.230) was limited to the co-operation of Administering Members with international bodies and with one another as provided for in Article 73 d of the Charter. In his view, a wider form of international co-operation was envisaged in Article 74. By the terms of this Article both the Administering Members and the non-administering Members of the United Nations had agreed that:

"Their policy in respect of the Territories to which this Chapter applies, no less than in respect of their metropolitan areas, must be based on the general principle of good-neighbourliness, due account being taken of the interests and well-being of the rest of the world, in social, economic and commercial matters."

This provided for co-operation between all Members in the interest of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and, to this end, he suggested that neighbouring States might possibly be invited to participate as observers in regional conferences organized by Administering Members and dealing with the development of their respective Non-Self-Governing Territories.

58. The representatives of Guatemala and Peru shared the views of the representative of Venezuela. The representative of Peru informed the Committee of a recent conference on primary education which his Government had convened and which had been attended by UNESCO, by Member States and by representatives from British Territories in the region.

59. The representative of Guatemala expressed the hope that full account would be taken of the principles and recommendations contained in resolutions adopted by the Economic and Social Council. He noted that the information did not contain any account of the work of non-governmental organizations in Non-Self-Governing Territories. His delegation noted the report presented to the Council by the World Federation of Trade Unions, and acknowledged the communications from the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions and the Friends World Committee for Consultation. He shared the view of the representative of Burma that closer collaboration of the non-governmental organizations in the work of the Committee would be valuable, and hoped that in future means could be found by which this could be achieved. He suggested that the Administering Members should include, in information transmitted under Article 73 e, a description of the work of non-governmental organizations interested in economic, social and educational work in the Territories. This suggestion was supported by the representative of Burma.

60. The Committee noted the increase in international technical assistance to Non-Self-Governing Territories and expressed the hope that this upward movement would continue. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government had once again found the technical assistance provided by the Technical Assistance Administration and the specialized agencies to be of great value and it appreciated the increased scale of this assistance. The representative of China expressed the hope that technical assistance would be expanded both in scope and to as many Territories as possible, and that UNESCO would continue to concern itself with the idea of raising international low-interest loans to finance universal compulsory primary education in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representative of Iraq expressed some disappointment that, in proportion to the total, the allocations for technical assistance to the Non-Self-Governing Territories had decreased in comparison with the previous year.

61. The representatives of the Netherlands and of New Zealand outlined some of the technical assistance which their Territories had received, and indicated that new negotiations were under way or were being considered. In this connexion, the representative of the Netherlands stated that, in respect of Netherlands New Guinea, his Government valued the international experience and expert knowledge brought by the specialized agencies and that the international cachet had often helped to stimulate the interest of the population in local projects.

62. The representative of France stated that his Government provided technical assistance on a very large scale to its overseas Territories. He gave an account of the collaboration of his Government with international organizations, particularly with the United Nations Children's Fund and WHO, in regard to health and child welfare.

63. The representative of Guatemala considered that international technical assistance should be used to the most practical effect and every co-operation should be extended to international experts so as to derive the fullest possible benefits of their knowledge and experience.

64. The representatives of Burma and of India expressed the hope that the Administering Members would include, in the information transmitted under Article 73 e, details of applications for technical assistance made on behalf of their Territories and on the manner in which technical assistance received from the United Nations and the specialized agencies had been integrated into long-range development programmes in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

X. General questions relating to the summaries and analyses prepared by the Secretary-General

65. At the 149th meeting of the Committee, the representative of the Secretary-General referred to General Assembly resolutions 593 (VI) and 789 (VIII) on the control and limitation of documentation. He stated that, in an attempt to economize in the printing of the documentation on Non-Self-Governing Territories a change would be proposed in the system of presentation of the summaries of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter. The printing of summaries of information would continue in the year when "full summaries" were required, i.e., every third year. In the intervening years, however, when annual supplements only are required, there would not be mimeographed documents and printed volumes but a single presentation of the information in the form of fascicules produced by offset process. The fascicules would not be put on sale, but would be available for distribution. The economy resulting from the above changes would exceed $6,000 per year.

66. The representatives of Burma, Guatemala, India and Iraq expressed strong reservations on the Secretariat proposals. They did not think that a proposed saving of $6,000 in each of the two years out of three was justified if this would lead to a decrease in the distribution of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories with their 125,000,000 inhabitants. References were made to the reservations on this subject made in 1955 by the representatives of Brazil, Burma, India and Iraq, who had then stated that the publication of this information as information specifically supplied on Non-Self-Governing Territories in the terms of Article 73 e of the Charter was highly desirable, and indeed necessary, in terms of the provision of General Assembly resolutions.<sup>2</sup>

67. The representative of Venezuela associated himself with the views expressed by the previous representatives. He asked whether any other steps than the proposed change in presentation were possible if it were necessary to secure an economy.

68. At the 150th meeting of the Committee, the representative of the Secretary-General replied to some of the questions asked. He pointed out that no votes had been taken by the Advisory Committee or the General Assembly, and that, should the General Assembly wish to retain the present system, it need only so indicate and restore the necessary credits. In reply to the representative of Venezuela, he stated that if the number of copies distributed would be reduced since none would be offered for sale, there would still be copies available for supply to depository libraries, non-governmental organizations, and similar institutions which received United Nations publications on a free or exchange basis.

69. The Committee agreed that the discussion on this point should be recorded in its report so that the Fourth Committee would be fully informed of the situation.

70. During the discussion on general questions, and previously at the 143rd meeting in the discussion on education, the representative of India drew attention to inadequacies in the information provided to the Committee. He pointed out that the General Assembly, at its eleventh session, would undertake a review of the progress made in Non-Self-Governing Territories since the United Nations had come into existence. In that connexion, the Assembly might also examine the Standard Form with a view to assessing the adequacy of the information supplied and, if necessary, suggesting modifications. It might perhaps set up a sub-committee, or such a sub-committee might be created by the Committee on Information.

71. The representative of Burma, in the discussion on general questions, examined the use made by the Administering Members of the Standard Form for the guidance of Members in the transmission of information under Article 73 e. He supported suggestions by the representative of India that it would be of value to examine the use made of the Standard Form by the Administering Members. He hoped that the Members would be able to make fuller use of the Standard Form or, if necessary, to indicate any changes required in it. The Secretariat might be able to prepare for the next session an analysis of the use made of the Standard Form by the Members which transmitted information.

XI. Procedures for the consideration of communications relating to the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter

72. General Assembly resolution 850 (IX) invited the Committee at its 1955 session to include in its report any proposals it considered desirable on the implementation of the resolution which aimed at perfecting the methods and procedures to be followed in connexion with cases of cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e.

73. The Committee informed the Assembly in 1955 that it had not had sufficient time to discuss the wider implications of the resolution and that further consideration might be deferred to its 1956 session. At the tenth session of the Assembly, during the Fourth Committee's discussion of the question of cessation of the transmission of information, the representative of Iraq at the 527th meeting introduced a draft resolution (A/C.4/L.424), the text of which reads as follows:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that by resolution 222 (III), adopted on 3 November 1948, it considered it essential that the United Nations be informed of any change in the constitutional position and status of any Non-Self-Governing Territory as a result of which the responsible government concerned thinks it unnecessary to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter, and requested any Member concerned to communicate to the Secretary-General appropriate information on such a change,

"Noting that resolution 448 (V), adopted on 21 December 1950, requested the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to examine information transmitted in pursuance of resolution 222 (III),

"Noting that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories has examined communications from the Members concerned relating to the cessation of the transmission of information in respect of Puerto Rico, Greenland, the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam,

"Considering that in accordance with resolution 850 (IX) adopted on 22 November 1954, the methods and procedures to be followed in the consideration of such communications were to be further studied,

"Noting that the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories has been renewed with responsibility for the examination of summaries and analyses of various aspects of conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and for the submission of recommendations relating to functional fields,

"Considering that in the examination of communications relating to the cessation of information questions may arise requiring primary consideration by the General Assembly at its regular sessions,

"1. Decides that, notwithstanding the provisions of resolution 448 (V), communications transmitted to the Secretary-General by the Members concerned relating to the cessation of the transmission of information in respect of a Non-Self-Governing Territory should be referred directly to the General Assembly;

"2. Considers that the General Assembly should, as indicated in resolution 742 (VIII) and 850 (IX), examine cases of the cessation of the transmission of information with particular emphasis on the manner in which the right of self-determination has been attained and freely exercised;

"3. Considers that the General Assembly, as circumstances may make appropriate, should adopt such conclusions as it deems fit, or should refer points for study to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, or should take other measures to reach conclusions in the interests of the inhabitants of the Territory concerned."

74. At the same meeting of the Fourth Committee, the representative of Greece introduced a draft resolution by which the General Assembly, at its eleventh session, would examine the manner of implementing resolution 850 (IX) concerning procedures for the consideration of communications relating to the cessation of information. At the 543rd meeting, the Fourth Committee decided to refer the draft resolution submitted by Iraq to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. On the understanding that the question would thus be before the General Assembly at the eleventh session the representative of Greece stated that he would not press for a vote on his own text.

75. Accordingly, the agenda of the Committee included an item "Procedures for the consideration of communications relating to the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter". The Committee had before it a note prepared by the Secretary-General (A/AC.35/L.222) giving a brief review of General Assembly action on this question, together with a summary of procedures and practices developed since 1948 in the consideration of communications relating to the cessation of information.

76. The Committee considered this question from its 144th to its 146th meetings inclusive. At the 144th meeting, the representative of Iraq explained that his delegation had raised the question of procedures for the consideration of communications relating to the cessation of the transmission of information under Article 73 e to protect and guarantee the rights of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories and preserve the prerogatives of the General Assembly. The principal change in the existing procedures proposed in his draft resolution was that communications to the Secretary-General regarding the cessation of information would first be considered by the Assembly. In the past, the Committee had examined first such information and heard explanations concerning Territories which had changed status without achieving full independence. Although the procedure had worked fairly well, it was the opinion of his delegation that the information communicated in accordance with resolution 222 (III) should be first considered by the Assembly. This would be particularly relevant to Territories which had achieved full independence, and had been admitted to membership in the United Nations. Questions arising out of any such communication could be referred by the Assembly to the Committee on Information or to some other committee if the General Assembly considered that a more detailed examination by a small committee was desirable.

77. In the course of the ensuing debate statements were made by the representatives of Burma, China, Guatemala, India, Iraq, Peru, the United States and Venezuela.

78. The representative of China pointed out that, in consequence of General Assembly resolutions 222 (III), 448 (V) and 742 (VIII), procedures had already been established for the consideration of communications on the cessation of information and, under resolution 850 (IX), the Committee had been asked to make proposals for their improvement. Any consideration of procedures should therefore take into account these resolutions. His delegation had no preference between the established procedures and those proposed by Iraq since the General Assembly would take the final decision in any case; nevertheless, if reintroduced in the Assembly, the Iraqi resolution would have the support of the Chinese delegation.

79. The representative of Venezuela pointed out that by resolution 742 (VIII) the General Assembly had decided that each concrete case of cessation of information should be considered and decided upon in the light of the particular circumstances of that case, taking into account the right of self-determination of peoples, and had adopted a list of factors as a guide. He therefore doubted whether any uniform procedures could be drawn up. The Assembly had never renounced its right to be informed directly of changes in the status of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, but it had asked the Committee to perform certain tasks in connexion with such changes. It was difficult to see how the Committee could carry out those tasks unless it was given clear instructions.

80. The representative of the United States held that questions of cessation of information should be first considered by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. Such consideration by the Committee in no way prejudged the final decisions of the General Assembly. The exclusion of the Committee from consideration of the question whether a Territory was in fact self-governing would not be in the interest of the inhabitants.

81. The representative of Peru said that in each particular case the General Assembly should give the Committee specific instructions. The Assembly itself should first consider the communications in each case of cessation of information.

If for any reason it was unable to deal with the matter itself, it should then refer it to the Committee with special instructions. On the basis of these instructions, the Committee would then express a tentative opinion; the final decision would, in any case, rest with the Assembly.

82. The representative of India noted that the draft resolution submitted by Iraq was not intended to restrict the competence of the Committee. Under its terms of reference, the Committee was not required to take a final position on questions of cessation of transmission of information. There were some aspects in the present procedures which his delegation would like to preserve, and there were others which required amendment. Subject to these remarks, his delegation shared the concern expressed by the delegation of Iraq. He reserved the position of his delegation at the General Assembly.

83. The representative of Burma shared the views expressed by the representative of Iraq. The Committee had been highly successful in its technical work. It should not except as instructed by the General Assembly, take the first step in examining questions of political judgement.

84. The representative of Guatemala said that the Committee had fulfilled its mandate in respect of the draft resolution submitted by Iraq, but had not carried out the instructions in paragraphs 3 and 4 of General Assembly resolution 850 (IX). However, he would refrain from taking any position pending a full discussion in the Fourth Committee.

85. In reply to the representative of the United States, the representative of Iraq stated that his resolution had been based on his country's interest in the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and its regard for the high position of the present Committee. His purpose was solely to find the most appropriate means for the examination by the General Assembly of all cases of cessation of transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter.

86. Regarding the form in which this question would be placed before the Fourth Committee, the representative of the Secretary-General pointed out that, as indicated in the report of the Fourth Committee of 1955, the question of procedures for the consideration of these communications would be open to examination by the General Assembly whether or not the item figured as a special item on the provisional agenda. The representatives of Iraq and India, however, suggested that it would be more appropriate for the question to be placed on the agenda of the eleventh session of the General Assembly as a separate item or as a separate part of the item on information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

XII. Future work of the Committee

87. In order to permit consideration of the future work of the Committee in all three functional fields, the Committee at its opening meeting had decided to include in its agenda as a separate item

"Future work of the Committee". It had before it a working paper (A/AC.35/L.233) prepared by the Secretariat giving an outline of a number of proposed studies in the economic and social fields, selected in the light of previous studies, the reports and discussions of the Committee, and the general studies of the various organs of the United Nations.

88. The Committee discussed this item at its 148th to 150th meetings. The representatives of China, Guatemala, India and Venezuela commented on the proposed studies, making a number of suggestions regarding the principles to be taken into account in the preparation of the studies in the economic field and the papers which might be useful for the consideration of the Committee. Stress was laid on the necessity for a full analysis of development plans and of technical assistance, having regard to the paramount interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In the case of the social studies proposed in the Secretariat paper, there was general agreement as to their scope and treatment. It was, however, pointed out that there would be a further opportunity for the discussion of these points at the next session of the Committee. In the meantime, the Secretariat paper could be taken as a first indication of the type of approach requested of the Secretariat and of the specialized agencies.

89. In respect of economic conditions, the representative of Guatemala suggested that the Secretariat should also undertake studies on the following subjects: development programmes in Non-Self-Governing Territories, indicating the objectives and measures taken; the resources available for economic development, including investments in both public and private sectors; handicraft activities in relation to economic and social development; and the economic relations of the Territories with the rest of the world.

90. In regard to the collaboration that might be furnished by the specialized agencies, note was taken with appreciation of the studies on public health which WHO suggested it would undertake and of the statement by the representative of ILO that, within the limits of that organization's own responsibilities and programmes, every assistance would be given to the Committee for its 1958 studies.

91. The Committee agreed that at its 1957 session it would give primary attention to economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Secretary-General would be invited to prepare the necessary studies for this discussion and to seek the collaboration of the specialized agencies, taking account of the working paper and of the suggestions made by the representatives.

92. The Committee also agreed that the general outline of studies in the social field, as suggested in the Secretariat working paper, should be used to initiate these studies for consideration in 1958 and that, for this purpose, the assistance of the specialized agencies should be invited. The Committee would have a further opportunity of reviewing the programme of work on social conditions during its 1957 session.

93. The attention of the Committee was drawn to the possibility that, owing to the change in date of the eleventh session of the General Assembly, a change in the date of meeting of the 1957 session of the Committee on Information would be necessary. The representative of Venezuela pointed out that the Committee should meet early enough to permit the communication of its report to the various Governments in time for instructions to be given to the delegations before the opening of the General Assembly. He considered that it was hardly possible for the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly to begin with the report of the Trusteeship Council. If the report of the Committee on Information were to be examined first it would need to be prepared in time for early consideration. The representatives of Australia, India and the United Kingdom expressed their appreciation of the points raised by the representative of Venezuela. They considered that, since account would have to be taken of the programme of the Trusteeship Council for 1957, it would be premature for the Committee to indicate any preference in respect of the date of its 1957 meeting.

94. The Committee noted that the date of the meeting of the Committee in 1957 would be fixed by the Secretary-General, taking into account the general programme of the United Nations and the views of the delegations principally concerned.

Resolution submitted for the consideration of the General Assembly

The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories submits the following draft resolution for the consideration of the General Assembly:

"The General Assembly,

"Considering that, by resolution 445 (V) adopted on 12 December 1950, it approved the special report drawn up in 1950 as a brief but considered indication of the importance of educational advancement and of the problems of education still to be faced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"Considering that, by resolution 743 (VIII) adopted on 27 November 1953, it approved a further report on education as a supplement to the report approved in 1950,

"Noting the report prepared in 1956 by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on educational conditions in these Territories,

"1. Approves this new report on education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and considers that it should be studied in conjunction with the reports approved in 1950 and 1953;

"2. Invites the Secretary-General to communicate the 1956 report on education in Non-Self-Governing Territories to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned for their consideration."

Part Two

REPORT ON EDUCATION IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES<sup>1</sup>

I. Introduction

1. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories consists of Members of the United Nations which, as responsible for the administration of these Territories, transmit information to the Secretary-General in accordance with the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter, together with an equal number of non-administering Members of the United Nations elected by the Fourth <sup>1</sup>The present report was prepared by a Sub-Committee of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, composed of the representatives of Australia, Burma, China, France, Guatemala, India, Iraq, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Peru, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the United States of America and Venezuela.

The members of the delegations who served on the Sub-Committee were: Mr. T. W. Cutts (Australia); U Mya Sein (Burma); M. Michel de Camaret, M. Jean Debayle and M. Michel Removille (France); Dr. Isidro Lemus Dimas and Dr. Maximillano Kestier (Guatemala); Mr. R. Jaipal (India); Mr. W. E. F. Ward and Mr. J. A. Sankey (United Kingdom); Miss Elizabeth H. Armstrong and Mr. Arthur L. Harris (United States); Dr. Victor Manuel Rivas (Venezuela).

The Sub-Committee elected Mr. T. W. Cutts (Australia) as Chairman.

The Rapporteur of the Committee and the representative of UNESCO also participated in the debates of the Sub-Committee.

Committee on behalf of the General Assembly.

2. The Committee examines summaries and analyses of the information supplied by the Administering Members on economic, social and educational conditions in the Territories. It is invited to submit to the General Assembly reports containing such procedural recommendations as the Committee may deem fit and "such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories" (resolution 933 (X)).

3. In 1950, and on a second occasion in 1953, the Committee prepared special reports on education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>2</sup> The General Assembly, by resolution 455 (V), approved the 1950 report as a brief but considered indication of the importance of educational advancement and of the problems to be faced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and invited the Secretary-General to communicate it to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories and to UNESCO for their consideration. Similarly, by resolution 743 (VIII), the Assembly in 1953 approved the report of that year and invited the Secretary-General to communicate it to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, and to the Economic and Social Council, the Trusteeship Council and the specialized agencies concerned.

4. Resolution 743 (VIII) also contains an enumeration of the objectives of education in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It states that these objectives are:

"(a) To develop moral and civic consciousness and responsibility among the peoples, and to enable them to take an increasing share of responsibility in the conduct of their own affairs;

"(b) To raise the standards of living of the peoples by helping them to improve their economic productivity and standards of health;

"(c) To promote the social progress of the Territories, taking into account the basic cultural values and the aspirations of the peoples concerned;

"(d) To secure the extension of the intellectual development of the peoples so as to provide for them access to all levels of culture."

5. In 1956, in accordance with the programme of work laid down in General Assembly resolutions 333 (IV) and 933 (X), the Committee was again called upon to pay particular attention to education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It has undertaken the examination of the problems of education on the basis of the information transmitted by the Members responsible for the administration of the Territories, and in the light of the views expressed by the Committee in 1950 and in 1953 and endorsed in those years by the General Assembly.

6. To assist it in its 1956 discussions, the Committee had before it reports prepared by the Secretariat based on the information transmitted by the Administering Members to the Secretary-General. It had also before it studies on education problems relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories and other countries prepared by UNESCO and summaries of the information that had been transmitted by the Administering Members relating to educational conditions up to the end of 1954 in some instances and to mid-1955 in other instances. The principal studies on education are listed in the annex and, together with the summary records of the Committee's discussions, should be regarded as an adjunct to the report.

7. For the meetings of the Committee, UNESCO presented at United Nations Headquarters an exhibition of literacy materials from different parts of the world. The publications selected were chosen to show styles of production and types of materials used in the teaching of literacy in different parts of the world and to indicate the kind of material in which UNESCO is interested for distribution to specialists and to national organizations. The Committee expresses its appreciation of the UNESCO exhibit as a contribution to its discussions on education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

8. The Committee wishes to record also the assistance it received in the form of information and explanations on the progress and problems of education in the various Non-Self-Governing Territories from the representatives of Australia, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States, who usefully supplemented the details transmitted under Article 73 e.

9. By resolution 933 (X), following resolution 745 (VIII), the General Assembly invited Members to attach to their delegations persons specially qualified in the functional fields within the Committee's purview. The Committee on this occasion had the advantage of the presence of specialist advisers on education in the delegations of France, Guatemala, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States. It notes the valuable assistance that it received from these advisers in the provision of new information and in the discussion of programmes and methods of education.

10. The Committee's approach to its work took account of the consideration that, in the light of General Assembly resolution 745 (VIII), its discussions, in a spirit of international collaboration, provide opportunities for the exchange of information on the experience of its Members. The Committee believes that, while its responsibilities are limited to the study of economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories, the representatives attending its meetings from many countries have in this spirit of international economic and social co-operation much to contribute from their own experience.

II. General developments

11. On the basis of information outlined by the Administering Members, the Secretariat provided the Committee with a summary of general developments in education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories recorded since it last paid special attention to this subject, and studies prepared by UNESCO supplemented this data.<sup>3</sup> The material included (a) a brief account of the extension of primary education in Non-Self-Governing Territories, with particular reference to the problems that have arisen where compulsory universal education has recently been introduced or where this result is nearing practical attainment; (b) a survey of the progress of school enrolment in the Non-Self-Governing Territories as a whole, showing the total number of pupils enrolled in schools in 1946, 1951 and 1954; (c) a survey of general problems of school organization and attendance; (d) literacy rates for the majority of the Non-Self-Governing Territories according to the latest census or estimate year, together with illustrations over the period 1900 to 1950 from certain Territories for which the United Kingdom and the United States are responsible; (e) a comparison between the illiteracy and school enrolment rates for a single year, usually 1952; (f) figures showing the enrolment of girls in primary and secondary schools in some thirty of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, with comparisons between the year 1950 and 1954; (g) a brief account of the development of vocational and technical education since 1953; (h) a similar brief account of the institutions of university education in Non-Self-Governing Territories, with figures showing the number of students enrolled in institutions of higher education outside their home Territories; (i) certain recent statements of general educational policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories; and (j) information on programmes of literacy work among adults and the problems arising in these programmes.

12. The Committee in the first place noted that the Administering Members generally subscribe to the objectives of education given in paragraph 4 above. It took account of a number of problems connected with the extension of instruction in the Territories, the ways and means of teaching and the problems and techniques of school administration. These are matters for examination and treatment by those responsible for the initiation of education programmes in the Territories, and for discussion by educational experts both nationally and through the international services of UNESCO. It is a function of the Committee to seek to contribute to the promotion of education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the broadest sense of the work "education", with objectives such as those set forth by the General Assembly, and to give such impetus as it can to the search for means by which in the Non-Self-Governing Territories education can be made available to all, in forms suitable to the ages, abilities and aptitudes of the pupils and in circumstances in which no child will be debarred from enjoying full educational opportunities on grounds such as those of race, creed, sex, language, colour, financial disability or social status.

13. The Committee is prevented by its terms of reference from making recommendations in respect of individual Territories. At the same time, it wishes, as far as possible, to avoid a repetition of the generalizations, however useful they may be as statements of initial principle, which it made in 1950 and 1953, which the General Assembly has endorsed and which the Administering Members accept. Generally speaking, the aims of education and the needs of the people for better educational facilities are well known; and the Administering Members attending the Committee provided many details of the steps taken in their Territories to improve school systems, attendance and methods. Therefore, the Committee seeks this year to review the ways and means by which the aims of education can be more surely promoted, the educational needs of the people met, and fresh advancement stimulated.

14. The Committee has not limited itself to matters primarily the concern of government educational services. Practically every function of government has educational aspects and every government department, particularly in Territories in a stage of rapid evolution, has educational services to perform and principles of the education of the people to respect. Thus, the Committee was interested to learn details of the development in French West Africa of school mutual aid societies among the pupils, extending the principles of co-operation into the schools as a concrete lesson in civic duties by familiarizing the children with local problems and the spirit of responsible self-aid in solving such problems. In a broader context, it noted the recognition, as in United States Territories, of the principle that education should be a reflection of democratic self-government with control vested in representatives of the local populations or, as stated in the case of Territories under United Kingdom administration, that the participation of the indigenous people in the formulation and execution of educational policy is a fundamental principle. In this connexion, the Committee strongly supports the policy which is already widely applied in some Non-Self-Governing Territories, and which merits universal application, that every assistance and encouragement should be given to local committees, boards or other means by which the people's will in educational matters can be expressed in the determination of educational policies and in the practical working of school systems. It agreed that the people themselves must decide for themselves what forms of education they require and how education can contribute to the exercise of civic responsibilities.

15. The Committee also emphasizes that teaching must be closely linked to the local indigenous life and culture. This conception is, indeed, already expressed in the objectives of education in Non-Self-Governing Territories that have been stated.

During the discussion, examples were given of the means by which use can be made of and interest can be stimulated in local history, local geography, and in local social and natural sciences. It is not enough, however, to adapt the curriculum to local conditions; the teacher must be prepared to adapt his outlook and method of teaching. The use of local examples in lessons and the stimulation of interest in what has happened and is happening directly affecting the pupils' lives should contribute to education as a whole and provide access to world culture in all its forms. In encouraging local initiative to develop along these lines, the educator may not be able to wait for the evolution of local ideas. Therefore, he must evoke a popular response and, for this purpose, may need to secure the authority to direct the course of instruction to the attainment of the best ends of education.

16. In recent years educational advancement in a number of the Non-Self-Governing Territories has been considerable. The Committee was informed of a number of increases in government expenditure in terms of money and in terms of percentage of total expenditure. There has been progress in the extension of primary education towards the goal of systems of universal and free schooling adequate in length and quality to lead to the evolution of literate populations; there has also been progress in secondary education and in the development of higher education.

17. In considering this evolution, it is to be noted that progress in education is all the more urgent now that fundamental changes are taking place rapidly in the Non-Self-Governing Territories leading ever closer to the attainment of the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter. The solution of the problems is a social-economic process which requires more than a scholastic approach. The battle is directed not only against ignorance, but also against ill-health and every form of poverty. The General Assembly has affirmed that, in accordance with the objectives of education, the processes should be designed to familiarize the inhabitants with, and train them in, the use of the tools of economic, social and political progress, with a view to the attainment of a full measure of self-government. It is to perfect the processes that the necessary machinery should be planned, put into motion and extended by all agencies of government, aided by the force of public opinion and with the assistance of expert knowledge and the necessary financial support (resolution 743 (VIII), para. 3).

18. By resolution 330 (IV) the General Assembly, recognizing that illiteracy is one of the fundamental problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories, invited co-operation between the Administering Members and UNESCO with a view to the practical achievement of the eradication of illiteracy in the Territories. The resolution also invited the Secretary-General to collaborate in any necessary studies on the basis, in particular, of the information transmitted under Article 73e. The operation of this resolution has been kept before the Committee at its annual meetings and close collaboration has been maintained with UNESCO. The Committee feels, however, that it is appropriate to make specific reference to the resolution in order to mark once again its importance as a form of co-operation under Article 73d of the Charter in the general evolution of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

III. Extension of primary education

19. The extension of school education, especially the establishment of universal primary schooling, is one of the surer ways to reduce and eventually to eradicate illiteracy. In respect of the promotion of primary education and the development of school systems towards the effective implementation of compulsory school attendance, the Committee in 1953 suggested that the means to be employed should include (a) power to require the regular attendance of those who enrol in the schools; (b) fixing of minimum and maximum ages for admission to various grades; (c) provision for compulsory school attendance in areas where school facilities and staff can provide for the population of school age; (d) eventual establishment of compulsory education for all children.

20. The information furnished to the Committee this year provides a number of cases where these steps are being taken. It shows that, even after compulsory school attendance has been introduced by law, it still will be necessary to direct attention to the effective application of other measures to meet immediate educational needs. In this connexion, the Committee views with favour the suggestion which was made that, for each of the Territories under their administration, the Administering Members might endeavour to secure the establishment of time-tables setting forth dates for the attainment of each particular stage on the path towards universal primary education and general literacy.

21. The cost of building schools and of providing standard classroom equipment constitutes an important factor hindering the extension of school facilities. Various cases were cited in which (a) through simplified building plans and the use of local building materials the high cost of constructing and maintaining school-buildings can be substantially reduced; and (b) in the case of classroom equipment, the challenge of making the best use of the educational funds available may lead to improved teaching methods by encouraging local initiative and by directing attention to lessons provided by the local scene. School-building plans in Territories in the Caribbean were mentioned as providing an instance where construction costs had been substantially reduced by the use of local materials in school buildings and by planning those buildings while taking full account of local climatic conditions. In the case of Territories under French administration, the point was made that, by introducing a double-cycle system of indoor and outdoor teaching in the schools and by using materials most readily available locally as the tools of teaching, it had been possible to extend school enrolment greatly without increased cost, to provide better education and to stimulate resourcefulness among teachers and pupils. Such a plan had been found to be feasible under favourable climatic conditions.

22. Related problems concern the length of the primary school course, as determined by the range of grades that can be covered by the generality of schools within the local environment. In some Territories the immediate programmes in this respect contain measures (a) to upgrade schools so that they can provide the extra year or years of tuition necessary for the foundations of rudimentary literacy; (b) to enable the schools to operate with better chances of success by excluding children who are outside the age range most suited to the tuition offered; and (c) to require regularity of attendance from those already enrolled. Through means such as these, attempts are being made to meet the first and immediate needs of the population for more schools, for the extension of schools and for schools with a wider range of studies.

23. A technical paper was submitted by UNESCO entitled "The Stagnation of Primary School Pupils". This problem and the allied problems of wastage and retardation<sup>4</sup> among school children show that, in spite of numerous efforts to provide more schools and classes and in spite of a fervent desire on the part of most of the population for more teaching facilities, some of the schools fail at a certain stage to hold the pupils or to inspire their further progress. It is to be hoped that more thorough inquiries can be undertaken into the multiple causes of this situation. These may include an inadequate supply of well-trained teachers, problems resulting from the use in schools of languages with which the pupils are unfamiliar, the failure to connect school-teaching with the obvious needs of the local communities and their cultures, and the failure of the school to arouse and retain the interest of the children.

24. The information before the Committee also drew attention to problems of the relative rate of progress of the urban and rural communities in certain Territories, as well as to contrasting situations in central and in outlying districts. In some Territories where school developments have been substantial in the principal urban centres, there is a serious lag in rural education, providing one of the principal obstacles to the general economic and social development of the inhabitants. Steps toward the establishment of general primary education need to be planned in these cases with special emphasis on the needs of the rural communities so that effective opportunities may be provided for the rural children comparable to those available in the towns. Elsewhere, it may be of particular importance to press forward with educational developments in the towns where social organization has not adjusted itself to new conditions.

IV. Education of adults

25. The extension of school education is the principal way to reduce and eventually to eradicate illiteracy among the population as a whole, and there is a close connexion between progress in school enrolment and the reduction of illiteracy. Nevertheless, even the most rapid extension of school enrolment over the whole child population will not solve the problem of illiteracy.

26. This obvious fact led the Committee to examine the promotion of literacy in two of its main aspects: the eradication of illiteracy and the retention of literacy among those who have learned to read and write. In its consideration of these problems, the Committee agreed that the promotion of literacy is not an end in itself but is rather an integral part of a broad attack on all the conditions that are detrimental to individual welfare and retard community progress. The inability of a substantial part of the population to read and write forms a collective deficiency preventing the community from participating in the broad advance of world culture.

27. In the case of adults, the eradication of illiteracy needs to be approached by different measures from those useful in the teaching of children. Regard must also be had for the needs of urban, semi-urban or rural areas and for special requirements such as those of nomadic populations. The Committee, therefore, emphasized that it must be part of a comprehensive plan co-ordinated with other essential plans for economic and social development. The eradication of illiteracy should include different treatment according to the particular requirements and interests of the community, and comprise measures designed to prevent those who have been taught from falling back into illiteracy. These measures must be based on the co-operation of all those affected. Where adults are concerned, the learning of reading and writing should be linked with results regarded as useful by those benefiting from the programmes, so that they are part of broader community development programmes providing a comprehensive approach to the problem of the eradication of illiteracy as a whole.

28. There have been a number of successful literacy campaigns, but further examination is required to determine the best methods to be employed. One given method of teaching reading does not always produce equally good results. Different methods develop different aptitudes and skills. The best results are as a rule secured when a clear grasp of meaning and accuracy in word recognition are stressed from the beginning. Even in relation to these broad suggestions there remains a need for further experiment and research, for more complete statistics and for information on pilot projects so that their results can be assessed with some degree of accuracy.

29. Literacy programmes should be widely conceived. They should provide for the progress of students beyond the minimum levels often accepted in the past and should seek the development of functional literacy<sup>5</sup> on the basis of a comprehensive understanding of needs and conditions. They must make provision for the necessary administrative services, the training of personnel, the production of teaching material of all kinds, the enrolment and maintenance of public support, the co-operation of the local communities, research and a continuing process of evaluation. As regards mass media, the use of radio, films and television should be developed, although here again carefully controlled research is needed to ascertain where and how these media can best be used.

30. In the maintenance of literacy, it is of considerable importance to provide reading material to carry the new adult literates from literacy classes to the stage where they can read fluently for pleasure and profit and to secure that the young students who leave school will continue to read and write. On the provision of literature for new literates an interim report was provided by UNESCO.<sup>6</sup> This report gave an account of various measures taken in a few of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to provide such reading material, including the work of vernacular literature bureaus. It showed that there are a number of aspects of the problem which require further study and action both nationally and internationally. These include problems of the administration and financing of literature-producing agencies, the training of staff and the most economic use of resources, printing and production and the need for the frequent evaluation of methods and results.

31. Any effective organization will need to be comprehensive; it may also be complex, particularly where there are many languages. Account must also be taken of the need for a variety of approaches in accordance with the interests of the potential readers. It is of no use to expect adults who have newly learned to read to develop their reading habits if they are provided with literature written primarily for children. Equally, account must be taken of subjects which the country-man or the townsman, or any other group of the population with particular interests, is likely to find of real concern.

32. The question of the provision of literature for new literates is only one aspect of the wider question of the development of mass communications in Non-Self-Governing Territories. If these Territories are to be ready to satisfy the aspirations of their peoples at an early date, the circulation of news and opinions through the Press, the radio and the cinema and the use of such media for general and specialized education, in languages and in forms accessible to the generality of the people, needs to be encouraged. The relations between government authorities and the media of mass communications merit consideration, and the suggestion was made in the Committee that when it next considers social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories the broad question of mass communications should be one of the subjects for study.

V. Education of women and girls

33. In its 1953 report, the Committee commented on the widely recognized fact that in many Non-Self-Governing Territories, particularly in Africa, the education of women lags behind that of men. The problem is part of the general problem of the social and cultural evolution of the inhabitants and requires comprehensive action, administrative, economic and social, for the protection of women and for the improvement of their status. In the field of education and instruction the Committee suggested, as measures to be taken (a) the increasing adoption of free education; (b) the inclusion of girls in any schemes of compulsory primary education; (c) more provision for primary girls' schools; (d) the development of technical training in fields suited to women; (e) the encouragement of the recruiting of girls for teaching; (f) improvements in the status and remuneration of women teachers; and (g) the extension of educational opportunities for adult women.

34. In the very short period since the question was considered in 1953 the Committee noted that, as some Territories are moving closer to systems of general primary school enrolment, the number of girls in the schools shows a substantial increase and the proportion of girls to boys is moving nearer to equality. Great difficulty, however, is noted too in retaining girls in school through the post-primary or secondary school stages, particularly in societies where girls are usually kept at home for domestic or agricultural duties.

35. A strong body of prejudice has to be overcome if provision for the satisfactory education of women is to become widespread. There is local prejudice against the education of women; there are shortages of trained teachers for girls; the usual problem of the lack of funds has to be overcome; and there is the lack of opportunities accepted by the local communities for the employment of those young women who win their way through the difficulties of obtaining schooling and training. The Committee re-emphasizes its appreciation of the importance of this question.

VI. Vocational and technical education

36. In 1953, the Committee stated that the pupil who is to be trained as a competent artisan requires an adequate basic standard of general education, followed by three years of technical training continued into the first years of employment.

37. The nature of general education will also deeply influence the pupils in their ambitions and aptitudes. There have been too many instances where schools have aimed at giving an academic training, often narrow in scope, for the preparation of candidates for employment in clerical posts, and where if, for example, science was introduced into the curriculum, it was taught by rote as a book subject. It is increasingly being recognized that technical and vocational education first depends on the character imparted to general education from the primary stages upwards, as shown, for example, in the recommendations of the conference on education and small-scale farming held in 1954 under the joint auspices of FAO and the Caribbean Commission and the 1954 conference of directors of education of French Africa and Madagascar.

38. To strengthen this tendency, a process of educating the parents may be necessary. There is often a firmly rooted idea that the only valid form of secondary education is that provided by schools of the grammar or classical types; the Committee noted that, in spite of the efforts of the Administering Authorities to encourage a wider choice, students in higher institutions often tend to concentrate on one or two courses; for example, the number of students from Non-Self-Governing Territories taking law courses in one metropolitan country is larger than the combined number studying agriculture, forestry and veterinary science, architecture, pharmacy, general science and economics.

39. It is not enough for the schools to train people to lead a happy and contented life. Education should help them to improve their lot in life; school programmes should be integrated with general plans for the development of the whole community. In respect of institutions of vocational and technical education, information was laid before the Committee showing major developments in the organization of this education at the post-primary level, at the secondary stage and in technical colleges for senior students. In a number of Territories, the student enrolment in all these forms of training and the range of subjects taught have been greatly enlarged in recent years. Much is new. But further development in these fields, the integration of vocational and technical education in systems of general education, its planning in relation to the over-all prospects of the Territories and to the actual and potential labour market for semi-skilled, skilled and professional posts merit close attention. Vocational and technical education is often a new development in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It should be rated among the highest priorities.

VII. Secondary education

40. The need for secondary schools in greater number, providing for more pupils and giving a wider range of education to meet the new social, economic and general developments, has been widely recognized by educational authorities. The number of schools providing advanced and wider instruction after the primary stages is increasing. Even so, in most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, there is not enough secondary education. Existing secondary schools are in some cases good; but in other cases, where the educational concepts of the staff are antiquated or sterile, the schools are bad or indifferent. This year the Committee paid particular attention to the subject. It examined a study prepared by the Secretariat outlining the secondary education situation by illustrative material from nineteen of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the various regions. It held that this study should be widely extended to cover most if not all of the Territories.<sup>7</sup>

41. Particular points raised before the Committee were (a) the need for expansion and for diversification of secondary education, involving the question of the quantity and quality of the forms of primary education which will produce a reasonable number of entrants to secondary schools; (b) the organization of a system of guidance in the junior secondary classes; (c) the adaptation of the curriculum; (d) the possibility of making secondary education progressively free, and of taking immediate measures to offer greater opportunities for secondary education under present circumstances; and (e) the extent to which secondary education needs to be expanded in the light of present economic circumstances and of the possibilities of further economic development in each Territory.

42. The concept of secondary education as an intermediate stage between primary and higher education sometimes leads to formalism and rigidity. Secondary education in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories should have its own purpose and should be autonomous in the sense that it provides an education and training of sufficient content in itself without necessarily leading to higher education. While the possibilities of secondary education depend to a large extent on the quality of primary education, and on the economic potentialities of the Territory, it is of interest to note that the goal of an educational structure is often primary and middle school education for all, and secondary education for about one child in four.

43. Many of the secondary schools in the past were founded and developed in relation to the need for young people trained in the culture of the metropolitan country and anxious to serve in its local clerical services. The Committee agreed that such an education is no longer sufficient. What is now more generally required is the development of schools in which the indigenous culture is both recognized and imbued with elements of education to provide general standards, as well as a basis of technical knowledge not inferior to those of the metropolitan country. Some progress is being made in this respect. Steps are being taken to adapt the curricula to local conditions. Studies of local history and geography and of indigenous institutions have been introduced, together, where relevant, with the study of indigenous languages or that of the classical languages of the regions.

44. A basic problem in the development of secondary schools is the question of quality. It is possible that, at both the primary and the higher level of education, the need for reaching a larger student body is more immediate than that of maintaining and improving the quality of the teaching provided and assimilated by the individual students. In the case of secondary education, there is often a demand by the public for the prestige conferred by the traditions and certificates of the academic school; but the Committee agreed that here, too, such an education is no longer sufficient; what is required in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories is a secondary education of a broad character, providing specialized knowledge and training and this, too, should be of the highest quality. However difficult it may be to explain such a programme, a higher standard of secondary education would be more easily attained by concentrating the resources available on a few large, well-staffed and well-equipped schools rather than scattering these resources over a larger number of smaller institutions.

45. Meanwhile, in addition to the establishment of new schools and the development of high standards of comprehensive secondary education, present opportunities for those most qualified to profit by secondary education can be improved by such measures as the extension of boarding facilities, greater provision for the remission of fees (pending any development of free secondary education), and the continued improvement of the standards in existing schools. Scholarships might also with advantage be provided for secondary education abroad where local first-class facilities do not exist.

46. In the long run, however, the problem of the expansion of secondary education is a question of general educational policy and planning. Planning, designed to carry out the adopted policy, sets the means to be used, the proportion of funds to be allocated for each level and type of education, and the target dates for reaching each of the desired goals.

VIII. Teacher-training and the status of teachers

47. Studies submitted by the Secretariat on the training and status of teachers covered a minority of the Territories only.<sup>8</sup> Representatives on the Committee expressed the view that a far wider survey would have been desirable since the rate of progress in a large number of the Territories now depends to a large degree on more teachers and better teachers.

48. The improvement of teacher-training requires (a) the expansion of pre-service facilities; (b) the raising of the standards of existing training institutions; (c) the progressive raising of levels for the training of the different grades of teachers; and (d) the development of an effective system of

in-service training properly co-ordinated with the work of pre-service teacher-training and with the work of head teachers and inspectors of schools.

49. Improvements of this kind will involve the progressive elimination of the pupil-teacher systems in Territories where they exist. The Committee recognized that these systems are both expensive and ineffective. Even very short courses of teacher-training provided for candidates of whom moderate qualifications are required usually give far better results than the pupil-teacher system.

50. A first element in the problem is that of educational planning. Whether the teacher-training facilities are provided by government institutions or government-supported private institutions, the number of teachers required and the minimum standards of training must be decided by the appropriate authorities as questions of policy. A network of teacher-training institutions may be required involving initial emergency training, supplemented by in-service training in which account will be taken of the wider conceptions of education in its social, civic and economic aspects. The Committee attaches importance to the training of the teacher in rural surroundings as part of the revitalization of rural life and as preparation of the teacher for rural service. The Committee was glad to hear that this importance was generally recognized.

51. The recruitment and training of secondary school teachers may need special consideration in present and future educational plans of some of the Territories. While, in most cases, it has been possible to staff secondary schools with the aid of expatriate teachers, every effort should be made to attract and train local teachers for reasons of principle as well as of cost.

52. In recent years, a number of the recommendations of the International Conferences on Public Education convened by UNESCO and the International Bureau of Education have been concerned with the provision of facilities for teacher-training. The extent to which the moral, material and financial aid of UNESCO and of the other United Nations specialized agencies and the various regional organizations can be enlisted deserves examination.

53. In the process of recruiting and training new teachers, the question arises of their status in employment and as members of society. The problem of attracting to the teaching profession the best possible candidates in sufficient quantity is to a great extent conditioned by the status of teachers. This status is affected by factors and conditions both material and moral. They involve salaries, promotions, facilities for further studies, provision of housing, holidays, work-load, systems of transfer, sick leave and general social security. One suggestion that merits wide consideration is that educational authorities might well encourage teachers to serve on loan without loss of rights and privileges in Non-Self-Governing Territories and on secondment from the Territories. The importance of a local indigenous teaching service is great; but such a service may with advantage both lend to and borrow from other countries and Territories in respect of its teaching staff.

54. The measures taken in some Territories to bring the status of teachers to a level comparable to that of civil servants of equivalent qualifications were noted as constituting an important step in raising the status of teachers. The Committee considered that it may be necessary in some cases to offer teachers conditions more favourable than those of civil servants of similar qualifications. The attraction of clerical service has in some cases led to the use of teacher-training facilities as a step towards admission to such employment. The improvement of the cultural standards and the enhancing of the prestige of teacher-training institutions are necessary if misdirection and wastage in this form are to be avoided.

55. Besides questions of tenure, social security, salary and other material compensations, there are other significant aspects of the status of teachers which will be decided by government policy. In particular, there are those mentioned in the resolution on the conditions of employment of teaching staff approved by the Advisory Committee on Salaried Employees and Professional Workers of ILO and dealing with freedom for teachers to exercise their civic rights, the right and freedom to form or join professional organizations and principles of academic freedom. It is important that the teacher should hold a place in society which enables him to play a part in the everyday life of his community, local and territorial, so that he may be able to exert his leadership in activities beneficial to the progress of the community he serves without special authorization.

56. In attracting the best candidates to the profession and in maintaining the best teachers therein much depends on the climate of public opinion. Associations of teachers and of federations of teacher-training colleges will provide valuable services in their appropriate fields. At all stages of training, in refresher courses and in the public and professional discussion of educational problems, conferences and meetings should be encouraged among all teachers. Territorial or regional institutions of university type might well serve as centres for the consultative co-ordination not only of the staffs of the University and training colleges, but also of the teachers and school inspectors, as a result of which any isolation from which teachers may suffer can be mitigated and a unity of purpose created throughout the system of education as a whole.

IX. Higher education

57. Information was provided showing a regular increase in the number of institutions of higher education, their facilities and student enrolment.<sup>9</sup> This is an evolution which began with the end of the Second World War, which the Committee noted in 1950 and 1953 and which has accelerated in recent years. The number of students from the Non-Self-Governing Territories in institutions in the metropolitan and other countries also reached higher levels with each year.

58. With the development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, there are increasing calls for more and more of the inhabitants to participate fully, up to the highest levels, in all branches of the administration and in all professions. In these circumstances, a further development in university institutions is a matter of urgency. Institutions with the broad range of education of a university and capable of operating with efficiency and reasonable economy should not be below a certain size. Some of the existing institutions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories have not yet reached this size. Some of the Territories have not the population to support institutions of their own and would be unable to bear the cost of building, equipping and running a university. In these circumstances, the creation and development of regional institutions, such as exist in parts of Africa, in South East Asia, the Pacific and the West Indies, is to be strongly commended. Territorial contributions to the regional universities are justified on grounds of the distribution of costs; furthermore, the regional universities may strengthen the teaching of subjects and the accompanying research of vital importance for each of the Territories in the region, and should serve to strengthen the bonds of regional solidarity.

59. The number of students from Non-Self-Governing Territories studying abroad has, as has been stated, grown steadily. The value of this development is recognized. Certain dangers are recognized in that students, including the most brilliant, may be induced to remain abroad and thus may fail to contribute directly to the development of the Territories from which they come. Much will depend on particular circumstances. Clearly, there are cases where it is better to encourage wider attendance at the local institutions, just as there are other cases where higher education can best be undertaken in some of the existing universities abroad. The Committee noted that policies are being followed by which the Governments provide scholarships for training abroad only if there is insufficient provision for the teaching of the subject at the territorial or regional institutions; but agreed that students who use their own resources to seek university education abroad are fully entitled to do so. The need for more graduates with university training is so general and so great that all processes to encourage them are to be commended.

60. One argument occasionally used in favour of providing university education in the metropolitan country or abroad instead of developing local university facilities is based on calculations that it may cost less to send a student to an established university overseas than to pay for the development of a local university. This might lead to the fallacious conclusion that higher education should be provided for all Non-Self-Governing Territories predominantly by assistance for study abroad.

Neither the argument nor the conclusion was supported by any member of the Committee. Comparison of costs in such a case is highly artificial, and on grounds of general policy is irrelevant in any estimate of the need to establish universities in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

61. At the same time, closer ties between the universities in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and other universities should be developed. In this connexion, the Committee would welcome information on such co-operation in the fields of post-graduate study and research, in teaching and in student enrolment.

62. All university institutions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories are organized on non-racial principles and are open to students without any discrimination on grounds of race or colour. This is a point of outstanding importance. Its value in practice would be enhanced if encouragement could be given to students of non-indigenous origin to attend the territorial universities in company with the local students. Examples were noted where students of all races attend some of the new universities in Africa and of the offer by one English organization of scholarships for United Kingdom students to enter the African universities. It is hoped that the practice will be extended.

X. Financing of education

63. A special study was laid before the Committee on the financing of university education in Non-Self-Governing Territories and the Secretariat report on general developments in education contains a brief general review of the increase in Government costs in respect of education.<sup>10</sup>

64. The figures make it apparent that there has been a considerable increase in the sums spent on all forms of education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Not only has more money been spent, but in many instances the percentage of the territorial budgets devoted to education has increased. It was explained also that some of the figures showing the direct governmental expenditure on education by no means represent the total expenditure, that the grants supplied by the metropolitan Governments are often supplemented by large sums for research, and that commercial companies operating in the Territories have contributed to educational development by various grants.

65. Yet in respect of some promising programmes for the extension of education, it is feared that, with the growing population, needs will outstrip financial resources. Shortage of funds is often considered to be a major, if not the main, obstacle to educational advancement. More money is required; a higher percentage of the territorial budgets should, where possible, be spent on education; the development of educational facilities is to be considered as a necessary part of all large-scale development plans.

66. The Committee did not enter into details. It did not think that it could take into account all varying circumstances. It held also that from the point of view of principle it was a responsibility of the Administering Members to assist in the provision of adequate resources for the development of education, which forms an important part of the foundation of the new societies in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Investment in education is no less imperative on grounds of economic policy than on grounds of cultural and social policy.

XI. Local participation in the development of education

67. The creation, where it does not already exist, of effective local machinery by which educational policy can be settled and educational programmes put into effect is of vital importance. The machinery must take account of the need already mentioned for bringing into play the whole services of the government, whether provided by the departments of education or by other branches. It must also elicit the interest and support of organs of public opinion in the Territories, both those operating on a wide scale and those representing local interests.

68. Different circumstances will call for different methods and a different emphasis will be placed on the varying aspects of education according to the character of the communities involved. In all cases, however, the local administrative machinery must aim at recruiting the full co-operation of the inhabitants.

69. A number of technical problems will arise. There are cases where, to enlist local loyalties and skills in the service of education, increased decentralization may be desirable. In other cases, in order to improve the effectiveness of educational services, teaching, administration and inspection, it may be found that a wider geographical scope should be given to organization. The educational services will require to establish flexible arrangements with other organs, official and non-official, contributing to the advancement of the Territories.

70. In 1955 the Committee, in its report to the General Assembly, strongly commended programmes of community development and of fundamental education. In its present report it has pointed out that programmes for the eradication of illiteracy should be instituted in promotion of a wide range of interests and subjects. These suggest aspects of educational programmes requiring many differences of detail in the administrative organization. Community development programmes themselves should have a clear educational purpose and include as concrete objectives the promotion of literacy among the participants in the programmes. But in all cases the fundamental objectives of education should be the same; the principal processes to be followed are likely to be similar; and the machinery must conform to the objectives and processes.

XII. Race relations in education

71. The Committee comments in the first place on the principle of equality of opportunity in education. As it has stated in paragraphs 12 and 62, it holds that education should be open to all without any discrimination on grounds of race or colour.

72. This point was expressed as follows by the Committee in the 1950 report on education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories:<sup>11</sup>

"(a) In the field of education no principle is more important than that of equality of opportunity for all racial, religious and cultural groups of the population.

"(b) Respect should be paid to the wishes of any group desiring to establish particular educational facilities for its members, but this should be subject to the overriding consideration that the general welfare of the whole community is not thereby prejudiced and that the practical operation of any system of differentiation does not lead to discrimination against any group.

"(c) While the programmes and organization of different types of schools may properly be designed to meet the needs of different groups of pupils, it should be accepted as a general principle that no school should exclude pupils on grounds of race, religion or social status.

"(d) Differentiation in school facilities and programmes should not militate against the development of mutual sympathy and a feeling of common citizenship among the inhabitants of a Territory.

"(e) Where separate systems exist, each group in the community should be given a fair share of the public funds used for educational purposes."

73. In 1953, the Committee added that the betterment of human relations in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and access to equal opportunities in education for all children are points of such fundamental importance that it should continue to focus attention on them. In noting favourable developments, it also declared that there remained wide differences in the educational facilities open to children of different groups in some of the Territories under consideration, that compulsory education in certain territories in Africa was applied to all but African children, that there was a wide diversity in the sums spent on the education of each child according to the category assigned to him by law and that there are systems where provision for the culture of a particular group of children is such that modern education is difficult to link with traditional values.

74. In 1955, the Committee in its report on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories noted a marked tendency towards the strengthening of schools attended by pupils from all groups in the communities. It noted a number of instances of the extension of the provision of education at all levels without distinction of sex, nationality or religion, and of the universal recognition of the principle of inter-racial education in institutions of higher education.<sup>12</sup>

75. The Committee concluded as follows:<sup>13</sup>

"The Committee holds that progress in the field of education is a first necessity. It draws attention to General Assembly resolution 328 (IV) which invites the Administering Members to take steps, where necessary, to establish equal treatment in matters related to education among the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration, whether they be indigenous or not. Practical difficulties, particularly those of language, are held by some Members to justify school systems adapted to the special needs of groups of the population. But the Committee holds that, at the secondary level, this justification can only be accepted in very exceptional circumstances and as a temporary expedient, and that at no level should the differences be established on a racial basis."

76. In examining information in 1956, the Committee noted that in the Non-Self-Governing Territories it was accepted in principle and practice that universities and colleges of higher education, both general and technical, should be interracial and open to students without discrimination. Where custom or creed requires differences of diet these should be provided within an equal and common setting permitting no implications of different standards or levels of living.

77. At the other end of the education ladder, special schools to meet the special needs, particularly linguistic, of young children may be justified so long as the system established has relation to these needs and not to race barriers.

78. With regard to secondary education, in the few cases in which this is provided through different systems of schools, every effort should be made to develop a unified school system open to children of all races. Some members of the Committee suggested that time tables for reaching the objectives of equality of access to the schools might be established wherever these objectives had not already been attained.

79. Thus there would still remain some special schools for younger children as envisaged in paragraph 77. The Committee believes that in no event should any one child be prevented by reason of race or colour from securing admission to any school for which he is qualified educationally.

80. The question of race relations in education, as considered by the Committee, also touched upon other questions. Mention has been made of the desirability of an interchange of teachers and students as between Non-Self-Governing Territories and other countries. In addition, attention was drawn to the benefit which is being obtained from organized games and sports in which the best athletic talents of any Territory serve in teams representing the Territory and its communities without regard to race differences.

81. The principle of non-discrimination is essential to and is an essential part of education. It should be encouraged by all means and every effort made to overcome the technical difficulties of linguistics and finance that may limit equality of opportunity.

XIII. International and regional technical and scientific collaboration

82. During the discussions in the Committee account was taken of the work of international institutions such as UNESCO and of inter-governmental agencies of regional co-operation. Article 73 d of the Charter provides that the Administering Members undertake to promote constructive measures of development, to encourage research, and to co-operate with one another and, when and where appropriate, with specialized international bodies with a view to the practical achievement of the social, economic and scientific purposes set forth in Article 73.

83. The services which UNESCO can provide for the Non-Self-Governing Territories are determined by its resources and by the requests addressed to it by the Administering Members. In this respect the Committee repeats the hope expressed in 1950 that the Administering Members will continue their close collaboration with UNESCO in the solution of the problems of various types of education in those Territories for the administration of which they are responsible, making use of the experience, studies and conclusions of that organization and of similar experience and studies of Member States in this field.

84. The Committee also suggests that, where UNESCO has indicated that further inquiries should be undertaken as into the methods of literacy campaigns, the causes of retardation in schools and the most efficient methods of providing reading material, the Administering Members will wish to consider undertaking such inquiries.

85. It is also to be noted that the secretariat of UNESCO has collaborated closely with the Secretariat of the United Nations in submitting studies to the Committee and in assisting the Committee's debates. In this sphere, too, further encouragement should be given. In the separate studies prepared by the secretariats, duplications have largely been avoided. It still seems that more co-ordinated studies might be possible if at the working level more opportunities were provided for collaboration on the basis of the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter and other relevant information and experience accumulated by UNFSCO in the conduct and observation of education campaigns.

86. The Committee also wishes to record its recognition of the services which are being provided in the field of education by other specialized agencies, notably ILO in respect of vocational training, and WHO and FAO in respect of health and nutrition, by UNICEF and by the inter-governmental regional commissions (the Caribbean Commission, the South Pacific Commission and the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara). The Members responsible for the Territories under their administration will naturally provide the greater part of the expert assistance required. But co-operation between them and the international and regional organizations in the spirit of Article 73 d and of Article 74 of the Charter will continue to be of great service in advancing the interests of the inhabitants.

87. The Committee considers it appropriate to conclude this special report on education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories by referring to General Assembly resolution 845 (IX) by which the Members of the United Nations in general are invited to extend generously their offers of facilities for study and training to the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and by which the Administering Members are invited to make the greatest possible use of facilities at all levels of education and training that may be offered by States Members of the United Nations. In accordance with the resolutions of the Assembly, the Secretary-General will inform the Assembly of the offers of facilities made and the use made of them. The Committee wishes to record on the present occasion interim information brought before it on this question, namely the further extension of facilities for educational advancement offered by the Government of India and an offer made by the Government of Poland.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

I. Constitution of the Committee

1. The General Assembly, by resolution 933 (X) adopted on 8 November 1955, decided to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis as set forth in resolutions 332 (IV) and 646 (VII), for a further three-year period.

2. The terms of reference of the Committee set forth in resolution 933 (X) provide that the General Assembly:

"5. Instructs the Committee to examine, in the spirit of paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 1 and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

"6. Instructs the Committee to submit to the regular sessions of the General Assembly reports containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories".

3. In relation to the Committee's programme of work, the General Assembly, in resolution 933 (X):

"Considers that the Committee should, without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, give special attention to educational economic and social conditions in turn and should consider the information transmitted in respect of these questions in the light of the reports approved by the General Assembly on such conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories".

4. The Committee consists of fourteen members: the seven Member States transmitting information on Non-Self-Governing Territories and an equal number of other Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly. The membership of the Committee in 1957 was as follows:

Members transmitting information

Australia
Belgium
France
Netherlands
New Zealand
United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland
United States of America

Members elected by the General Assembly

Ceylon
China
Guatemala
India
Iraq
Peru
Venezuela

All members were represented at the eighth session of the Committee, with the exception of Belgium.

5. The Committee met in New York at the Headquarters of the United Nations, and held sixteen meetings between 22 July and 15 August 1957.

6. Representatives of the following specialized agencies attended the Committee and took part in the discussions: the International Labour Organisation, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and the World Health Organization.

II. Officers of the Committee

7. At its opening meeting on 22 July, the Committee elected the following officers by acclamation:

Mr. Jan Vixseboxse (Netherlands), Chairman,
Mr. Adnan Pachachi (Iraq), Vice-Chairman, and

Mr. Gray Thorp (New Zealand), Rapporteur.

III. Sub-Committee

8. A sub-committee was appointed at the 158th meeting of the Committee to prepare a special report on economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was composed of representatives of Ceylon, China, France, Guatemala, India, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, and was assisted by the Rapporteur. The Sub-Committee elected Mr. Rikhi Jaipai of India as its Chairman. It held seven meetings between 30 July and 7 August.

IV. Agenda

9. At its 152nd meeting, the Committee considered the provisional agenda (A/AC.35/10) prepared by the Secretary-General. Though no proposal was made for an amendment to the provisional agenda, it was adopted subject to the reservation expressed by the representative of Guatemala, supported by the representatives of India and Iraq, who suggested that the Committee should discuss during its examination of economic conditions the effect on Non-Self-Governing Territories of administrative unions and of the association of Territories in the European Common Market under the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community. On the latter point, the representative of France expressed the opinion that any discussion would be premature.

10. The agenda as adopted is reproduced in annex I to the present report.

V. Preliminary statements

11. At the 152nd meeting, the representative of France reaffirmed the statements made by his delegation at previous sessions of the Committee concerning the position of his Government as to its participation in the Committee. At the 153rd meeting, the representative of the United Kingdom reaffirmed the reservations of his Government.

12. At the 152nd meeting, the representatives of Guatemala and of the United Kingdom reserved the position of their respective Governments with regard to sovereignty over British Honduras (Belize Territory).

13. At the same meeting, the representatives of Ceylon, India and Iraq reserved the position of their Governments with regard to sovereignty over Netherlands New Guinea (West Irian). The representative of the Netherlands reaffirmed the de facto and de jure sovereignty of his Government over Netherlands New Guinea.

14. The representative of Guatemala stated that the participation of his delegation in the work of the Committee did not imply its acceptance of the de facto situation regarding Territories the sovereignty over which was in dispute, such as Western New Guinea, the Falkland Islands, Gibraltar, etc.

VI. Economic conditions

15. In accordance with the programme of work laid down in General Assembly resolution 333 (IV) and confirmed in resolution 933 (X), the Committee at its eighth session gave special attention to economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. For these discussions, specialist advisers on economic affairs were included in the delegations of France, Guatemala, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

16. The Committee had before it reports prepared by the Secretariat giving a general review of economic development in the Territories over the period 1953-1956 and analysing topics of particular interest to the Committee. The Committee also had before it a report prepared by FAO on the diversification of agriculture and a report on social aspects of industrialization prepared by UNESCO.<sup>1</sup> At the request of the representative of India, a preliminary study on indigenous systems of land tenure during economic transition was provided to members of the Committee. Furthermore, certain provisions of the agreements relating to the European Economic Community were also made available.<sup>2</sup>

17. The Committee discussed the question of economic conditions and development in Non-Self-Governing Territories from its 153rd to 164th meetings. The Sub-Committee referred to in paragraph 8 above held seven meetings and drew up the report which forms part II of the present report to the General Assembly.

18. Statements on general economic developments were made by all members. General Assembly resolution 933 (X) had invited the Committee to examine the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter in the light of the views expressed in the special reports on economic, social and educational conditions. Accordingly, the debate provided the opportunity for a review of general economic conditions and developments in the Territories and policies and activities of the Administering Members in the light of the observations expressed by the Committee in 1951 and 1954 in its special reports which were approved by General Assembly resolutions 564 (VI) and 846 (IX) respectively.

19. Economic policies being pursued in the Territories under their administration were outlined by representatives of the Administering Members. In the course of statements discussing the extent to which economic trends in the Territories had been maintained, they drew attention to evidence of economic growth provided by statistics on production of primary products, on expansion in industrial development and on the volume and value of exports. Other indicators of economic progress were also cited, such as the increases in investments in Non-Self-Governing Territories and in the rate of gross capital formation. The representatives of France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom provided a number of details on recent progress in the establishment and implementation of development plans in the Territories under their administration. The representatives of Australia and New Zealand described economic progress in the Territories for which their Governments was responsible. The representative of the United States emphasized the need to examine the economic situation of the Territories in the light of world conditions. He discussed a number of problems connected with economic development in all under-developed areas, including the Non-Self-Governing Territories: inflation, balance of payments, the allocation of resources between industry and agriculture and between infrastructure and immediately productive enterprises.

20. The representatives of Ceylon, China, Guatemala, India, Iraq, Peru and Venezuela also made general statements. In a number of these statements it was emphasized that the economic policies of the Administering Members should be determined by the principles contained in Chapter XI of the Charter. Economic development should be directed to the attainment of the concrete objectives outlined in the report on economic conditions as approved by General Assembly resolution 846 (IX). The value of the economic programmes established under the various development plans was recognized. The opinion was expressed however that, even though there had been a general increase in production and in the expansion of exports, much remained to be done to hasten economic development in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was claimed that the information available did not permit an accurate assessment of the extent to which the standards of living in the Territories had been raised, but there were indications that more active steps were needed to reduce the disparity between the levels of living in the advanced countries and in the Territories.

21. Following the general debate, the Committee discussed a number of specific aspects of economic conditions and development: external trade; the development of manufacturing industries, with particular relation to government measures for the promotion of industries; the diversification of agricultural production; certain aspects of indigenous land tenure problems; the social aspects of industrialization; and other questions. The representatives of Australia, Ceylon, China, Guatemala, France, India, Iraq, the Netherlands, Peru, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and Venezuela took part in the discussions. Statements were also made by the representatives of FAO and UNESCO. The second part of the present report on economic conditions gives a general consensus of the views expressed.

22. At the opening meeting of the Committee, the representative of Guatemala, supported by the rep-

representatives of India and Iraq, referred to the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community and suggested that the Committee should consider the possible effects on the economies of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. At the request of the representative of Iraq, the Secretariat was asked to circulate the provisions of the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community and the provisions of the Applicatory Convention relating to the association of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representative of France considered that the European Economic Community could not be of immediate concern to the Committee; the Community would not be established until 1958; the information on the subject could only be transmitted in 1959; and the Committee would not be able to examine it until 1960. He reserved the position of his Government should the question be discussed at the present session.

23. The Chairman pointed out that the Treaty had not been ratified by all the participating countries, so that any consideration of its provisions might be premature. He recognized that some members might feel that references to the Treaty were bound to occur and in that case the Chair would not object to such references provided the debate was confined to economic aspects of the question under appropriate headings of the agenda, which was sufficiently flexible for this purpose.

24. During subsequent discussions, the representatives of Ceylon, Guatemala, India, Iraq, Peru and Venezuela commented on the possible economic effects of the association of the Non-Self-Governing Territories with the European Economic Community.

25. The representatives of Ceylon, Guatemala, India and Iraq expressed apprehensions that, through economic specialization, the economic role of the Territories might be limited to furnishing primary products to Europe which would find in them a market for manufactured goods. The representatives of Guatemala, India, and Iraq raised the question whether the inhabitants of the Territories concerned had been consulted in regard to the proposals. The representative of Peru stated that the impact on the Non-Self-Governing Territories required further examination, while the representative of Venezuela expressed concern over the consequences that might follow the economic integration of the Territories in Europe.

26. The representative of India considered that the association of dependent Territories in the European Economic Community should be examined in the light of the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter and, as provided in Article 103 of the Charter, if there were any incompatibility of interests the Charter obligations would prevail. It was doubtful whether the investment fund under the Treaty would be adequate for the needs of the Territories and whether the inhabitants of the Territories would share in the formulation of investment policies. He suggested that the Secretariat should co-ordinate its studies with those of the secretariats of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the Economic Commission for Europe, the Economic Commission for Latin America, and the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East, and report to the Committee at its next session.

27. The representative of Iraq expressed concern at the far-reaching consequences which might result from the association of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the European Economic Community. Increasingly, Territories were moving towards self-government and independence. He found no provision under which Territories could terminate the association. He referred to the Treaty provisions on the free movement of workers and expressed anxiety as to the possible effects of uncontrolled immigration. He associated himself with the suggestion made by India concerning further study of the question.

28. The representative of China considered that the question should not be discussed in detail, as the European Economic Community could not come into effect until 1958. He hoped that the benefits received by the Territories so associated would be comparable to those received by Territories in South and South East Asia under the Colombo Plan for Economic Development.

29. The representative of the Netherlands held that any discussion of the new arrangements under the Treaty was premature. He pointed out that there were political implications outside the competence of the Committee. Notwithstanding these comments, and to allay any misgivings, he could assure the Committee that the association of the overseas Territories was to enable them to share in the expected increased prosperity. As the Netherlands Minister for Foreign Affairs had stated at the twenty-fourth session of the Economic and Social Council, this association would make positive contributions to the accelerated economic development of the Territories and would contribute to their political advancement. The concern of the Administering Members for the advancement of the Territories was illustrated in the provision for an investment fund. The use of the word "association" in the articles in the Treaty did not mean full integration in the European Common Market; its meaning could only be fully understood with a full knowledge of the European Economic Community itself. It would be advisable to await the results of the study which would take place at the Conference of GATT.

30. At the 162nd meeting, the representative of France said that his delegation would make specific reservations if a full debate were undertaken on treaties which were not yet in force.

31. At the 163rd meeting, when the question of the European Economic Community in its relations to Non-Self-Governing Territories was being further debated, the representative of France moved the closure of the debate on item 4 (g) in accordance with rule 118 of the rules of procedure. He stated that, if the closure were not accepted, his delegation would not take part in the Committee's discussion on the matter.

32. The representatives of Ceylon and India spoke against the closure of debate; the motion was rejected by 6 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions. The representative of Venezuela explained his vote against the closure. Following this vote, the French delegation withdrew from the meeting for the remainder of the discussion of this subject.

33. Following the rejection of the closure, the representative of Guatemala stated that the non-administering Members on the Committee were concerned at the possible implications of the European Economic Community and the question required further study.

34. The report of the Sub-Committee was considered by the Committee at its 166th meeting. At the request of the representative of France, a separate vote was taken on part IX of the report containing two paragraphs dealing with the European Economic Community. This part was adopted by 11 votes to 1, with 1 abstention. On the proposal of the representative of India, presented in his capacity as Chairman of the Sub-Committee, the Committee, without objection, approved the addition of a paragraph noting the Committee's comments on international collaboration and technical assistance (A/AC.35/L.262/Add.1.) The report as a whole was approved by 12 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

35. The representative of the United States of America explained that he had voted in favour of the Committee's text since it represented an accurate reflection of the discussion which had taken place in the Committee. He wished to record his Government's belief in the advantageous effects upon the economies of Western Europe which might result from the establishment of a European Economic Community and its hope that similar benefits would accrue to the peoples of the African Territories concerned on a basis of equality and mutuality of interest. His Government considered the proper place to be the Conference of GATT.

36. At the same meeting, the Committee considered a draft resolution submitted by India, Iraq, the Netherlands and New Zealand; the draft was of a procedural character intended to facilitate discussion in the General Assembly. Under it, the Assembly would: (1) approve the report on economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories and consider that it should be studied in conjunction with the reports approved in 1951 and 1954; and (2) invite the Secretary-General to communicate the report to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned for their consideration. The draft resolution was approved by the Committee for transmission to the General Assembly by 12 votes to none, with one abstention, and is included in annex II to the present report as draft resolution A.

VII. Educational conditions

37. The Committee had given particular attention to educational conditions at its previous session in 1956 and had drawn up a special report which was approved by the General Assembly by resolution 1048 (XI). The discussions this year were accordingly brief.

38. The Committee examined the summaries which the Secretary-General had prepared of the information on educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories for 1955 and 1955-1956 contained in the information transmitted by the Administering Members. It also had before it a report on the eradication of illiteracy prepared by UNESCO under the terms of General Assembly resolution 330 (IV).<sup>3</sup> This report summarized the assistance provided by UNESCO in campaigns for the eradication of illiteracy, and included tables showing the estimated distribution of the world's illiterate population around 1950 and the estimated adult illiterates in fifty-three Non-Self-Governing Territories in 1955.

39. In the discussion which took place from the 161st to the 164th meetings, statements were made by the representatives of Australia, China, France, Guatemala, India, Iraq, the Netherlands, Peru and Venezuela and by the representative of UNESCO.

40. The representatives of Australia, France and the Netherlands outlined aspects of policy and described recent measures taken in the Territories under their administration since the Committee's education report was prepared in 1956.

41. The representative of Australia reaffirmed that the educational policy of his Government was to educate the inhabitants of Papua so as to enable them increasingly to take a share in their own affairs. An essential element was to teach all the inhabitants to read and write in a common language. He cited figures showing increases in school enrolment, in the number of teachers and in financial assistance. As regards illiteracy, he drew attention to the world-wide character of the problem, as shown by the statistics of UNESCO.

42. The representative of France gave an account, supported by comprehensive statistics, of the progress of education in French Equatorial Africa, French West Africa and Madagascar. The figures showed substantial increases in school enrolment at all levels and an extension of higher education.

43. The representative of the Netherlands described the progress made in Netherlands New Guinea since legislation establishing a new school system had come into force in 1956. The chief characteristic of the new system was a flexibility which enabled education to be adapted to the needs of the population whose development varied between regions.

44. The representative of China agreed that there should be the fullest possible participation of the indigenous inhabitants in drawing up and implementing educational programmes. Referring to the emphasis placed on balanced development in the general development plans in Non-Self-Governing Territories, he stressed the importance of vocational and technical education and hoped that vocational and technical training programmes would be closely geared to the over-all needs involved in the successful implementation of these plans at their various stages and phases. He recalled that UNESCO had formulated a proposal for an international fund to assist the development of primary education in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

45. The representative of Guatemala believed that education should be closely related to the needs of the community and that campaigns of fundamental education should be organized within the scope of general development programmes. In this connexion, he drew attention to the recommendations made by the UNESCO regional seminar on curricula in South Asia which he thought could be usefully followed in the Territories. He stressed the importance of the principle of equality of all races and urged the Administering Members not to relax their efforts to persuade the different races to live together in harmony.

46. The representatives of Guatemala and India regretted that there was not much information in the summaries on the educational policies of the Administering Members, on the progress of the development plans and on the degree to which education was directed to preparing the people for self-government. The representative of India emphasized the importance of secondary education. He urged the speedy abolition of discriminatory practices in education. He noted UNESCO was currently assisting projects of fundamental education in Africa and hoped the assistance would be extended.

47. With reference to the information on educational conditions contained in the summaries prepared by the Secretary-General, the representative of Iraq suggested that a statistical treatment of this information was insufficient. Vigorous campaigns should be undertaken to reduce the generally high rates of illiteracy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He stressed the value of the vernacular in education in helping the indigenous inhabitants to pursue their own cultural aspirations. He drew attention to the useful work that could be performed by teachers' associations.

48. The representative of Peru, while recognizing the efforts of the Administering Members to overcome illiteracy, considered the problem of extreme urgency particularly in view of the constant increase in population and attached particular importance to the extension of primary education. The representative of Venezuela considered that fundamental education and the training for leadership were the two basic educational problems. He noted with satisfaction the resolution adopted by the UNESCO General Conference on school education in 1956 and expressed his appreciation of the assistance provided by UNESCO to Non-Self-Governing Territories through fundamental education projects.

49. In reply to questions raised by the representatives of India and Venezuela, the representative of the United Kingdom clarified a number of points contained in the summaries and gave further information on recent progress in Territories under United Kingdom administration.

50. In reply to the representative of China, the representative of UNESCO informed the Committee that the 1956 resolution adopted by the General Conference of UNESCO proposing the establishment of an international fund had been transmitted to the International Bank. Further information was provided to the Committee by the representative of UNESCO on the assistance of his organization to associated projects of fundamental education and to Member States in the field of vocational and technical education.

VIII. Social conditions

51. During its examination of economic conditions the Committee, at its 159th to 164th meetings, considered as one of the special topics the social aspects of economic development. The Secretariat had prepared a study on the social effects of economic change in peasant societies.<sup>4</sup> A report on the social effects of industrialization in Africa South of the Sahara in rural areas was introduced by the representative of UNESCO.<sup>5</sup> Statements were made by the representatives of Ceylon, China, France, Guatemala, India, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and Venezuela.

52. The Committee considered the item on social conditions at its 163rd to 165th meetings inclusive, examining the information on social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories contained in the summaries prepared by the Secretary-General. Statements were made by the representative of China, Guatemala, India and Iraq and by the representatives of the ILO.

53. The representative of the ILO informed the Committee of some recent developments within the competence of that organization. The ILO was at present undertaking a broad survey of labour and social conditions in Africa South of the Sahara, covering the general social and economic background of African labour, and in particular questions such as manpower and employment, industrial relations, wage policies and wage rates, training and labour standards. The survey would be presented to the ILO Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories at its fifth session. He also outlined the action taken at the 1957 session of the International Labour Conference on conditions of employment of plantation workers and on discrimination in employment. Drafts for conventions on these subjects were now being drawn up for presentation to the Conference in 1958. Representatives of ten non-metropolitan territories had participated in the 1957 session. A brief account was given of assistance rendered by the ILO to Non-Self-Governing Territories.

54. The representative of China noted that, in the summaries of information which had been made available to the Committee, it had been frequently reported that there had been no significant changes in social conditions during 1955. Many changes were desirable, and he hoped that they would be reflected in the information provided next year. In his view, the problems of economic and social development were interrelated and a concerted attack on these problems was needed. The importance of a balanced development had been emphasized in the objectives of social development drawn up by the Committee in 1954. Greater use should be made of the community development movement by stimulating the active participation of the whole community.

55. The representative of Guatemala claimed that the information contained in the summaries before the Committee was not sufficient to permit an analysis of the social policy or conclusions as to the progress made in the Territories towards social integration. He cited a number of important problems which had both economic and social aspects. He suggested that the Committee should study in greater detail at its session in 1958 social security and welfare measures and the prevention of crime.

56. The representative of India endorsed the view that progress was indivisible, believing that represented as a practical course of policy this would foster balanced all-round development. Information was needed on the broad problem of cultural adaptation under the impact of political and economic change, and the extent and direction of social change. He considered that legislation might play an important role in social reorganization, as a means of removing restrictive practices or abuses. He urged the Administering Members to adopt a more positive policy of social action.

57. The representative of Iraq considered that the summaries should give more information on social policy and conditions. He thought that if, as reported in many cases there had been no significant changes in important aspects of social conditions the conclusions to be drawn were depressing. In order to achieve a better way of life, Governments should encourage voluntary associations, such as co-operatives, which were essential to the establishment of a free dynamic society. Legislation should supplement other means of social action in the Territories.

IX. International collaboration in respect of economic, social and educational conditions

(a) GENERAL DEVELOPMENTS

(b) INTERNATIONAL TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

58. The Committee considered the above sub-items at its 166th meeting.

59. The Committee had before it a report prepared by the Secretariat on decisions taken by the Economic and Social Council and on studies under its auspices, on relations with Governments and specialized agencies and on regional conferences affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/AC.35/L.246), a report prepared by WHO on its activities in Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/AC.35/L.251), a report prepared by UNESCO on services rendered in 1956 to Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/AC.35/L.257), and a report prepared by the Secretariat on international technical assistance and UNICEF aid to the Non-Self-Governing Territories (A/AC.35/L.247). The Committee had also been informed at its 163rd meeting by the representative of the ILO of activities of that organization in the interests of Non-Self-Governing Territories (see para. 54 above).

60. Statements were made by the representatives of Ceylon, China, Guatemala, India, the United Kingdom and the United States of America and by the representatives of FAO and UNESCO.

61. The representative of Ceylon welcomed the increase in technical assistance but doubted whether the assistance was proportionate to needs. He noted that most of the Territories receiving assistance in 1957 were under United Kingdom administration. He urged that greater advantage should be taken of international assistance in the development of all Territories and that the Administering Members should provide more information on technical assistance projects in their Territories. Since other forms of international assistance were also being provided to Non-Self-Governing Territories, he hoped account could be taken of them in future reports.

62. The expansion of technical assistance to the Non-Self-Governing Territories was urged by the representative of China on the grounds that they were among the world's most under-developed areas. He hoped a greater use would be made of scholarships and that the Administering Members would increasingly associate indigenous inhabitants with technical assistance projects.

63. The representative of India noted that the Sub-Committee had made reference in its report to the information before the Committee on international collaboration and technical assistance. He suggested that an account of technical assistance rendered should also include information on the problems met in putting the schemes into practical operation. He sought information on the general principles governing plans for long-term economic assistance to Territories drawing near self-government.

64. The representative of Guatemala stressed the importance of international collaboration in the interests of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The problem in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories was the need for technical knowledge and skills. Much could be done through international collaboration to assist the Territories in their development.

65. The representative of the United States of America said that his Government considered United Nations technical assistance an important factor in the development of under-developed areas, including Non-Self-Governing Territories, and that it fully supported such programmes. He referred to the assistance provided by the Caribbean and South Pacific Commissions in the regions in which they functioned.

66. The representative of the United Kingdom expressed the appreciation of his Government for the assistance provided by the specialized agencies to the Non-Self-Governing Territories under its administration, noting that in general co-operation had increased. The Territories were also participating in the programme by providing training places. He referred to United Kingdom participation in the regional commissions and described some of the work of the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara in providing technical assistance to Non-Self-Governing Territories.

67. The representative of FAO reported to the Committee on activities of that organization in the fields which had been discussed at its present session of particular interest to the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Assistance was being provided in meeting agricultural problems in general as well as in relation to specific problems in individual Territories; examples cited included projects on animal and plant production, staple food production, fisheries, forestry, marketing, co-operatives and credit, nutrition and home economics.

68. The representative of UNESCO outlined the services rendered in 1956 to Non-Self-Governing Territories by that organization, details of which were contained in its report.<sup>6</sup>

(c) SCHOLARSHIPS FOR STUDENTS FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES UNDER GENERAL ASSEMBLY resolution 845 (IX)

69. In pursuance of resolution 931 (X), the Secretary-General had prepared a report for the General Assembly on the offers of study and training facilities for students from Non-Self-Governing Territories under resolution 845 (IX).<sup>7</sup> This report set out the progress in the implementation of the scholarship scheme and the publicity given in the period 20 February 1956 to 28 January 1957. As at the last date of the report, fifteen Member States had offered 247 scholarships and 123 applications had been received. During the period 26 July 1956 to 28 June 1957, twelve scholarships had been awarded.

70. The Committee discussed the question of scholarships for students from Non-Self-Governing Territories at its 166th meeting. Statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Ceylon, France, India and the United States of America and by the representative of UNESCO. The representative of the United States gave particulars of scholarships recently awarded by his Government.

71. The representative of India noted the limited number of scholarships awarded out of the total offered under resolution 845 (IX). India had for the past ten years successfully carried out a scholarship programme of its own for students from some Non-Self-Governing Territories and had no particular difficulties in finding students with the requisite qualifications. In 1956-1957, sixty-four scholarships were offered and fifty-one taken up; for 1957-1958, there were fifty-eight scholarships of which forty-seven were being used.

72. The representative of Ceylon announced the offer by his Government of three scholarships for students from Non-Self-Governing Territories. The details of his offer were being transmitted to the Secretary-General. He noted that, out of 123 applications, twelve scholarships had been granted and seventeen refused; no information was given in the Secretary-General's report of the outcome of the other applications.

73. The representative of Ceylon explained the changes which his delegation thought should be made in the procedures in the light of the situation revealed in the Secretary-General's report. He introduced a draft resolution (A/AC.35/L.260) by which the General Assembly would (1) request Members submitting their observations on the qualifications of the candidates in accordance with paragraph 5 of General Assembly resolution 845 (IX) and Members offering facilities to speed up the necessary procedures; (2) request the Secretary-General to give any assistance that may be necessary to Members concerned and to applicants with a view to expediting the required procedures; (3) invite the offering States to inform the Secretary-General of the use made by the candidates of the scholarships awarded to them; and (4) request the Secretary-General to include in his annual reports to the General Assembly the information on the action taken as a result of this resolution.

74. The representative of Australia recalled that his delegation had not supported the adoption of resolution 845 (IX) since in the present stage of development of the Territories his Government considered that the Administering Members should maintain the right and the responsibility to review candidatures for scholarships. His delegation also entertained doubts on the procedures being followed and would accordingly abstain. That his Government was conscious of its obligation to assist the education of inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories was demonstrated by reference to assistance provided through the Colombo Plan. As at 30 September 1956, places had already been provided for 387 students from Non-Self-Governing Territories in South East Asia which were not under Australian administration. Other Administering Members had also by bilateral arrangements provided a number of scholarships to students from Non-Self-Governing Territories. He asked that the Secretary-General's report include a list of scholarships provided by Administering Members to the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

75. The Under-Secretary explained that it would require further co-operation from Administering Members if the list were to be comprehensive. Some information could be obtained from the UNESCO publication Study Abroad.

76. The representative of France stated that he would abstain on the resolution. In connexion with the suggestion made by the representative of Australia, he drew attention to the large number of scholarships offered by France to students from the French Non-Self-Governing Territories.

77. The representative of India proposed the following amendments to the draft resolution submitted by Ceylon:

(1) In operative paragraph 1, to replace the phrase "to speed up the necessary procedures" by "to consider the applications with all possible speed";

(2) In operative paragraph 2, to delete the words "necessary to Members concerned and to the applicants with a view to expediting the required procedures" and replace them by "sought by the Members concerned and by the applicants";

(3) In operative paragraph 3, to delete the words "by the candidates" and to replace "awarded to them" by "awarded by them".

78. The representative of Ceylon replied to the debate. He pointed out to the representative of Australia that his text would enable the Administering Members to review candidatures. He accepted the amendments submitted by India.

79. The Committee adopted the draft resolution by 9 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

80. The draft resolution as adopted is included in annex II to this report as draft resolution B.

X. Questions relating to summaries and analyses of information

(a) METHODS OF REPRODUCING INFORMATION CONCERNING NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

81. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 1052 (XI), the Secretary-General has prepared for the twelfth session of the General Assembly a report showing the comparison of costs of various methods of reproduction of the summaries.<sup>8</sup> This report together with statistics on distribution was placed before the Committee.<sup>9</sup>

82. In his report, the Secretary-General recalled that, up to 1956, the summaries had each year been printed and put on sale with other publications of the United Nations. Taking account of General Assembly resolutions 593 (VI) and 789 (VIII), on the control and limitation of documents, in 1956 the Secretary-General proposed a new system. This system provided that, in two years out of three, the printed volumes of summaries should be replaced by offset fascicles, with consequent savings of the mimeographed documents and the cost of printing.<sup>10</sup>

83. In reporting on the new system, the Secretary-General suggested that, without prejudice to the action of the Assembly:

"(1) The use of fascicles produced by the offset process has not yet lasted long enough for final judgement;

"(2) For purposes of a better distribution of information, a fascicle system for the supplementary summaries, whether the fascicles are printed or prepared by an offset process, is to be commended; and

"(3) Certain delays, which have occurred this year, should be reduced next year, when there may be better elements for a final judgement by the General Assembly."

<sup>10</sup> See Offi : Records of the General Assembly, Eleventh Session, Supplement o. 15 (A/3127), part I, paras. 65-70.

84. The Committee considered the methods of reproducing summaries of information concerning Non-Self-Governing Territories at its 165th and 166th meetings. Statements were made by the representative of Iraq, India and China.

85. The representative of Iraq emphasized that the transmission of information under Article 73 e was a Charter obligation. The summaries of this information should be made available so that they could be consulted and used. He noted that, owing to delay in the transmission of information as shown in the statistics prepared, a number of the fascicles had not yet been distributed. He appealed to the Administering Members to observe the time limits suggested in General Assembly resolution 218 (III). He suggested that, under the new system, if fascicles were delayed, the summaries should be first distributed as mimeographed documents. Another aspect of the distribution related to sales. One of the consequences of the new system was that summaries of information when reproduced as fascicles would not be given publicity as a United Nations publication and would not be placed on sale. He considered that low sales returns should not offset the necessity to make the summaries available to all who might be interested.

86. The representative of India found the new form of reproduction satisfactory, but considered that it should not be necessary to hold up the distribution of a fascicle if part of the information was missing. He thought the summaries of the information transmitted under Article 73 e should be given publicity in United Nations catalogues of publications and asked the Secretary-General whether this was possible. In reply the Secretary-General informed the Committee that a solution to the problem of publicity was being sought.

87. The representative of China regarded favourably the fascicle form of the summaries as likely to provide wider distribution. However, he was concerned that under the new system the supplementary summaries might not be placed before the Committee when it met in the spring and would not be available to the general public. He associated himself with the views expressed by the Secretary-General in his report.

88. As the question of the methods of reproducing the summaries will be considered by the General Assembly at its twelfth session, the Committee did not take any decision on this matter, but transmits to the Assembly this account of the discussions in the Committee.

(b) TRANSMISSION OF INFORMATION UNDER ARTICLE 73 E OF THE CHARTER

89. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 218 (III), the Members transmitting information under Article 73 e of the Charter are invited to send to the Secretary-General the most recent information at their disposal, as early as possible and at the latest within a maximum period of six months following the expiration of the administrative year in the Non-Self-Governing Territory.

90. The information before the Committee at its eighth session related to the calendar year 1955 or the administrative year 1955-1956. The information which had been received was placed before the Committee in the form of fascicles containing summaries in which Territories were grouped according to geographical regions. Since, however, information had not been received from the Governments of Belgium and France, a number of fascicles had not been distributed as they could not be completed without the information on the French and Belgian Territories.

91. At its opening meeting, the representative of France explained the reasons for the delay in the transmission of information under Article 73 e on the Territories under French administration for the year 1955. In 1956, a loi cadre and enabling legislation affecting the French Overseas Territories had been adopted and, in consequence of the work involved, the preparation of the reports on the Territories had been delayed. The Government of France expected however, to be able to transmit some information to the Secretary-General immediately and the remainder shortly.

92. In reply to an inquiry by the representative of India, the Secretary of the Committee explained that the information on the Belgian Congo had not yet been received. The representative of Guatemala suggested that the Chairman should informally approach the Belgian authorities concerning the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter. The representatives of Ceylon, China, India, Iraq and Peru supported this suggestion.

93. At the 159th meeting, the Chairman informed the Committee that, in response to this request, he had informally approached the Permanent Mission of Belgium which had had no communication to make. The representative of India expressed the disappointment of his delegation. He proposed that the matter should be discussed later in the session and that, in the meantime, copies of the correspondence between the Secretary-General and the Belgian authorities on the transmission of information under Article 73 e should be circulated to the Committee. After the representatives of Ceylon, Guatemala, Iraq, Peru and Venezuela had supported this proposal, the Committee decided to take up the question under item 8 of its agenda and requested the Secretariat to circulate the correspondence.<sup>11</sup>

94. The Committee further considered the question of the transmission by Belgium of information under Article 73 e at its 165th and 166th meetings. Statements were made by the representatives of Ceylon, China, India, Iraq, Guatemala, the Netherlands and Venezuela.

95. Referring to the correspondence exchanged between the Secretary-General and Belgium, the representative of India emphasized that Belgium had accepted under the Charter the obligation to transmit regularly to the Secretary-General information in respect of the Belgian Congo. He suggested that, as it was not certain what decision had been taken by Belgium on this matter, the Committee was not in a position to do more than to bring to the notice of the General Assembly the fact that the information for the year 1955 which should have been transmitted to the Secretary-General in 1956 had not yet been received. The Assembly's attention should also be drawn to the correspondence in document A/AC.35/L.258.

96. The representative of China shared the view that the Committee should report to the General Assembly the delay in the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter by Belgium.

97. The representatives of Ceylon, Guatemala, Iraq and Venezuela expressed grave concern at the delay in the transmission of the information on the Belgian Congo and considered that the Assembly should be informed of the situation. The transmission of information was a Charter obligation; as there had been no change in the nature of the obligations accepted, it was difficult to understand the apparent reversal by Belgium of its position. The representative of Guatemala supported the suggestion that the correspondence circulated to the Committee should be brought to the Assembly's attention.

98. The representative of Iraq considered the situation serious. Citing the correspondence before the Committee and the statements of the Belgian spokesman, he said that Belgium had never questioned its obligations to transmit information under Article 73 e and it had continued to transmit information on the Belgian Congo even after Belgium had withdrawn from the Committee in 1953.

The Belgian Government had also fully agreed that such information should be submitted in time for the Secretary-General to prepare summaries for consideration by the General Assembly, had assisted the Secretary-General in this respect by authorizing the use of official publications and had accepted the Assembly's resolution recommending a six-months time limit for the transmission of information. No explanation had been received by the Secretary-General. However, a communiqué from the Ministry for Foreign Affairs of Belgium had been made public 2 August 1957 in which it was stated that Belgium had always recognized its obligations under the Charter and would continue to conform to the exact terms of the Charter in transmitting information on the Belgian Congo to the Library of the United Nations. The representative of Iraq noted that in the terms of the Charter it was to the Secretary-General that the Administering Members were under an obligation to transmit information. It was important in his view that the General Assembly should be informed of the situation as fully as possible.

99. The Chairman invited the Rapporteur to take note of the request of the representative of Iraq, in which he was supported by the representatives of Ceylon, India, Guatemala and Venezuela, that the views expressed should be fully reflected in the report of the Committee. The representative of the Netherlands agreed with the representative of India that the Committee could do no more than to state that no information had been transmitted.

100. At its 166th meeting, the Committee agreed without objection to the proposal, now made formally by the representative of India, that the correspondence between the Secretary-General and the Government of Belgium,<sup>12</sup> with particular reference to the last communication from the Permanent Mission of Belgium, should be brought to the knowledge of the General Assembly.

101. In reply to an inquiry made at the 152nd meeting by the representative of India, at the 167th meeting the representative of Australia stated that his Government intended to transmit information under Article 73 e on the Cocos-Keeling Islands.

102. The representatives of Ceylon, India and Iraq expressed concern at the continued failure of certain Member States to transmit information concerning their Non-Self-Governing Territories.

XI. Preparation of the report on progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in pursuance of Chapter XI

103. At the 166th meeting, the representative of the Secretary-General made a statement to the Committee on the preparation of the report on progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in pursuance of Chapter XI undertaken in pursuance of General Assembly resolution 1053 (XI).

104. At the request of the representative of India, this statement is reproduced in extenso and appears in annex III to the present report.

XII. Future work of the Committee

105. The Committee considered the programme of work for 1958 and the timing of its next session. The Secretariat had prepared a programme of social studies<sup>13</sup> on the basis of the discussions of the Committee at its last session. A suggested outline of the main themes of studies to be prepared by the Secretariat and the specialized agencies was set out in an annex under general headings: family studies, public health studies and mass communications. At the 158th and 161st meetings, the Committee had also decided to refer to its next session two studies prepared for the current session: a study on land tenure and the study on economic change in peasant societies (A/AC.35/L.248). In the light of these developments, and in accordance with Article XIII of the Financial Regulations of the United Nations, the Committee was informed of the financial implications of the printing of the special study on social conditions arising from its programme of social studies in 1958.<sup>14</sup>

106. The Committee discussed the programme of studies at its 164th and 165th meetings. Statements were made by the representatives of China, India and Venezuela and by the Secretary of the Committee.

107. The representative of India considered that, while the scope of the studies outlined in the programme was in general satisfactory, the family studies should not be limited to urban areas. Studies would be useful on rural housing problems and on social assistance provided to rural and urban populations, with reference to both traditional and legal measures. He also hoped that full treatment would be given to the growth of population in the Territories. Referring to the estimated costs of the special study, he opposed any restriction of the scope of the studies which might be prejudicial to the work of the Committee.

108. The representative of Venezuela also supported the proposed programme. He suggested, moreover, the inclusion of an additional summary embodying general conclusions regarding changes in social institutions and systems of social control in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He suggested the inclusion of an additional study on changes in social institutions and problems of social control in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

109. The representative of China agreed with the view that due attention should be paid to the rural family and its problems. He suggested that a further study might be undertaken on community development since this was one of the most successful means of bringing about social change in its most comprehensive form.

110. In response to the various suggestions, the Secretary of the Committee submitted that some of the material might more effectively be included in the long-term report requested by the General Assembly under resolution 1053 (XI); others would require consideration in the light of the progress of other studies such as the general studies on community development. With regard to what several members of the Committee had described as the brevity of the information contained in the summaries, the Secretary explained that the Secretary-General had summarized the information transmitted to him under Article 73 e on the basis of the instructions of General Assembly resolution 218 (III). Account would be taken of the suggestions which the Committee had made at its present session both in the social studies for 1958 and in the preparation of summaries.

111. The representative of UNESCO assured the Committee of the continued co-operation of the organization and indicated that UNESCO would collaborate with the Secretariat on the preparation of the studies outlined in the programme.

112. The Committee decided to give special attention to social conditions at its next session and agreed that the Secretary-General, in collaboration with the specialized agencies, should undertake a programme of studies on the basis of document A/AC.35/L.252, taking into consideration the comments and suggestions made by members of the Committee.

113. On the question of the date of the next session, the Committee, after hearing the views of the representatives of the United States and China, decided to request the Secretary-General to make arrangements for the convening of its next session in the spring of 1958.

Preparation of the report on the progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in pursuance of Chapter XI: statement made by the Under-Secretary at the 166th meeting

By resolution 1053 (XI) adopted on 20 February 1957, the General Assembly invited the Secretary-General, in collaboration with the specialized agencies concerned, to prepare, for submission to the Assembly at its fourteenth session in 1959, a report on the progress that has taken place in the Non-Self-Governing Territories since the establishment of the United Nations. The Assembly invited the Secretary-General to keep the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories regularly informed of the progress of the report.

A meeting of the officers of the United Nations Secretariat and representatives of the specialized agencies was held on 19 July 1957. The specialized agencies represented were the International Labour Organisation, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and the World Health Organization. The International Bank was unable to be represented, but indicated its willingness to assist.

The subjects discussed at this meeting included the organization of work, the distribution of sections to be drafted by the various secretariats, the timetables to be observed in the preparation and submission of the reports, and the desirable length of contributions.

The report will be divided into three main parts. The first part will consist of an introduction emphasizing general trends in the Territories as indicated by the information transmitted and the discussions in the General Assembly. The second part, in which the specialized agencies are mainly concerned, will be a summary and analysis in the various functional fields of the information presented where appropriate for the Territories in general or for groups of Territories. A third part will consist of separate summaries presenting briefly the basic conditions in each of the Territories, with particular reference to the changes which have taken place between the first and last years covered.

In this last connexion, it was suggested that the years 1946 and 1956 as the first and last years to be covered should be observed with flexibility. In some cases information on particular subjects might be more detailed in one particular year owing to certain important events or activities such as the holding of special surveys, inquiries or censuses. The choice of the first year, therefore, should be dictated by specific circumstances and, as regards the last year, the secretariats would naturally take account of the latest information available.

General agreement was reached on the timetables to be observed subject to further discussion of a few particular points. The meeting also agreed that the tentative length of the separate contributions should be established at an early date by inter-secretariat discussion. In general, it may be noted that the object in view is to obtain contributions by the end of 1958 in order that the report may be co-ordinated in early 1959 for submission before the opening of the 1959 session of the General Assembly.

The information to be transmitted in 1958 will thus be of considerable importance in the preparation of the report. In particular, the Secretariat expressed the hope that the Administering Members concerned would be able, in their 1958 communications, to provide material under section C of the explanatory preface to the Standard Form (General Assembly resolution 551 (VI)) giving a survey of the principles and practical measures showing general trends in the Territories.

As regards other information, the Secretariat will make available to the specialized agencies the information transmitted under Article 73 e, and the specialized agencies will use their normal information channels to obtain any official supplementary information that proves essential for the presentation of their contributions to the report. In the case of countries and territories on which information is no longer transmitted, any information provided in the functional fields will be limited to information covering the years when the Territories were subject to Article 73 e, and conditions will not be covered for Territories where information was transmitted only briefly before the first Standard Form in 1947 came into use.

In conclusion, I should state that the arrangements so far made take into account the views expressed by the representatives of the specialized agencies at inter-secretariat meetings, and that the respective agencies are now taking steps to plan their contributions to the report.

REPORT ON ECONOMIC CONDITIONS IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

I. Introduction<sup>1</sup>

1. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories consists of the seven Members of the United Nations which, as responsible for the administration of the Territories, transmit information to the Secretary-General under Article 73 e of the Charter, together with an equal number of non-administering Members of the United Nations elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly.<sup>2</sup>

2. The Committee examines summaries and analyses of the information furnished by the Administering Members on economic, social and educational conditions in the Territories. It is invited to submit to the General Assembly reports containing such procedural recommendations as the Committee may deem fit and "such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories" (resolution 933 (X)).

3. In 1951, and on a second occasion in 1954, the Committee prepared special reports on economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>3</sup> The General Assembly, by resolution 564 (VI), approved the 1951 report as a brief but considered indication of economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and of the problems of economic development, inviting the Secretary-General to communicate it to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned. The Assembly, by resolution 846 (IX), took similar action in respect of the 1954 report.

4. In 1957, the Committee was again called upon to pay special attention to economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It undertook this on the basis of the information transmitted by the Members responsible for the administration of the Territories and in the light of the views expressed in its 1951 and 1954 reports.

5. For its discussions the Committee had before it studies prepared by the Secretariat of the United Nations, the Food and Agriculture Organization and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, as well as summaries of the information that had been transmitted by the Administering Members relating to economic conditions up to the end of 1955 or to mid-1956. The studies are listed in the annex and, together with the summary records of the Committee's discussions, should be regarded as part of the present report.

<sup>1</sup> The draft of the present report was prepared by a Sub-Committee of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, composed of the representatives of Ceylon, China, France, Guatemala, India, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America.

The members of the delegations who served on the Sub-Committee were: Mr. Y. Duranowamy (Ceylon); Mr. Hsi-kun Yang (China); Mr. Michel de Camaret, Mr. G. Touro and Mr. A. Warnod (France); Mr. Ramiro Aragón (Guatemala); Mr. Rikhi Jaipal (India); Mr. Ch. J. Grader (Netherlands); Mr. B. O. B. Gidden and Mr. Percy Selwyn (United Kingdom); Mr. James A. Lynn (United States).

6. The Committee appreciates the assistance it received from the representatives of Australia, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, who provided details supplementing the information transmitted under Article 73 e.

7. By resolution 933 (X), the General Assembly reiterated its invitation that Members should attach to their delegations persons specially qualified in the functional fields within the Committee's purview. The Committee in 1957 had the advantage of the presence of economic advisers in the delegations of France, Guatemala, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States. These experts greatly assisted the Committee by providing new information and by contributing to the discussions.

II. General

8. The Committee examined a report<sup>4</sup> prepared by the Secretariat, on the basis of the information provided by the Administering Members, outlining the main features of economic developments in Non-Self-Governing Territories from 1953 to 1956. Included were some of the major policy statements made on behalf of the Administering Members on the objectives of economic policies, information on the development of production for local consumption and the rate of increase of certain imports of particular importance to the inhabitants, a brief note on the expansion of transport facilities and power, and an examination of information on the national income and the standards and levels of living to be found in various Territories.

9. This information was considered by the Committee in the light of Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter and of the general principles contained in the Committee's 1954 report. The report stated that the fundamental aim of economic policy was to develop the Territories in the interest of all sectors of the population, to raise the standard of living by increasing individual real purchasing power, and to increase the total wealth of each Territory in order to make possible higher standards of social services and administration.

10. From this fundamental aim the Committee in 1954 defined the concrete objectives of economic policy. These objectives read as follows:

(a) To remove the obstacles to economic development by modifying where necessary the basic structure of the economy;

(b) To stimulate economic growth through which the standards of living of the peoples will be raised

The Sub-Committee elected Mr. Rikhi Jaipal (India) as Chairman.

The Rapporteur of the Committee and the representative of FAO also participated in the debates of the Sub-Committee.

<sup>2</sup> Members transmitting information are: Australia, Belgium, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and the United States of America. The elected members serving in 1957 were: Ceylon, China, Guatemala, India, Iraq, Peru and Venezuela.

and an increase obtained in their national output and improvement in their productivity;

(c) To establish and improve the capital equipment of the Territories so as to provide a firm basis for future development;

(d) To promote those types of economic activity, whether primary or industrial production, in which the Territories are best fitted to engage, having regard to the balance of their economies and the advantages of external trade;

(e) To secure the equitable distribution amongst the peoples of the material benefits of the economy as expressed in the national income;

(f) To create a firm economic basis for political, social and educational programmes, taking into account the basic cultural values and aspirations of the peoples;

(g) To conserve and develop the natural resources of the Territories for the benefit of the peoples;

(h) To create conditions conducive to standards of health and of social welfare which will help to develop moral and civic consciousness and responsibility, so as to enable the people to take an increasing share in the conduct of their own affairs;

(i) To work towards fully developed economies capable of taking their appropriate place in the world economy.

11. The fundamental principles and the purposes to be pursued in the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories are defined in Chapter XI of the Charter and they are applicable to all Territories, large and small. There are many deficiencies in economic resources, and there may be shortcomings in the steps taken to make the best of existing resources, but it is to be noted and appreciated that the economic policies since 1954 as outlined in statements of the Administering Members continue to stress the objectives defined by the Committee in that year. The French loi-cadre of 23 June 1956, in its provisions relating to the objectives of economic policies in Territories under French administration, has empowered the Government to take measures intended to raise still further the standards of living in the Territories, to promote economic development and social progress and to facilitate economic and financial co-operation between Metropolitan France and the Territories. Emphasis is also being placed on the participation of the peoples in the formulation of economic policies. In this connexion, the Netherlands representative cited a statement that the execution of a social-welfare programme implies the "auto-activity" of the peoples themselves, to be realized only if they understand the programme, wish to bring it to fruition and are able to cope with its execution. In the same spirit, the United Kingdom representative cited from Western Nigeria a statement in which social development was defined as the bringing to a community a vision of the better way of life which by their own efforts they can build for themselves.

12. The economies of the Non-Self-Governing Territories since 1953 have generally continued to develop in line with the long-term trends of growth apparent from the post-war period onward. While there has been no drastic structural change, there has been a further shift towards a monetary economy and the areas of subsistence economy unaffected by world trade are now few and far between. It is by no means certain that the change has yet been reflected in improvements in the living conditions of the indigenous peoples in some of the Territories. Doubts were expressed in the Committee whether, for example, in some territories in Africa the local production of food has kept pace with the growing population or whether the expansion of export crops has brought sufficient returns to compensate for deficiencies in local food production. Such situations are difficult to judge since information on the production of food crops for local consumption is still scanty. In general, some members of the Committee felt that economic progress in Non-Self-Governing Territories was slow, and that a wide gap still existed between the standards of living of the Territories and those of the administering countries.

13. In some Territories where the monetary economy has been long established, there is great dependence on a single export crop or a single mineral. This dependence may in part be due to the limited character of the resources and potentialities of the Territories. Specialization, moreover, may contribute to higher productivity and thus to the economic welfare of the communities. But the resulting vulnerability of the economies of such Territories is great.

14. Subject to these considerations, and reserving to a later section particular comments on the external trade of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee here notes that, although a change in export values or in the national income may reflect only a change in prices and may not involve any real changes in the local economy, Administering Members reported substantial economic progress in real terms over the past four years.

15. Several significant indicators were cited by representatives of the Administering Members as evidence of progress.

16. In the Territories administered by the United Kingdom, the gross domestic product is estimated to have risen by about 7 per cent between 1954 and 1955 and by a further 4 per cent between 1955 and 1956. The volume of exports of primary products was some 17½ per cent higher in 1956 than in 1953; the volume of exports of bauxite, iron ore, coconut oil, copra, coffee, tea and timber rose by more than 50 per cent over the period. In terms of constant prices, the rate of gross capital formation in 1956 was some 75 per cent higher than in 1948. Currency in circulation in the Territories rose by 23 per cent between the end of 1953 and the end of 1956; bank deposits rose by 25 per cent; local loans and advances by banks rose by 64 per cent, showing the extent to which commercial banks are finding local outlets for their funds and decreasing the proportion remitted to London.

17. For the overseas Territories under French administration, information supplied to the Committee marked that, after 1954, when economic expansion reached a new high, a further increase in export production in 1955 was offset by lower world prices for cocoa and coffee, which are of special importance for these Territories. This had obliged the authorities to continue to expand the combination of measures designed to shelter the producer in the Territories from price fluctuations and to provide him with reasonable remuneration. As examples of material advance, the Committee was informed that, between 1948 and 1957, the production of French West Africa increased at a rate of approximately 9 per cent annually; and that the economic evolution of French Equatorial Africa has been characterized by the modernization and expansion of the rural economy, a steady improvement in the quantity and quality of agricultural products, a considerable increase in exports, and the emergence of mining and processing industries. In Madagascar, the national income had in ten years risen by 53 per cent and in 1955 was 38 per cent higher than in 1949.

18. The information before the Committee also provided examples of economic expansion as represented in particular services and commodities. In 1954, the Committee noted that the production of electric power in thirteen Territories which were non-self-governing at that time (Belgian Congo, French Equatorial Africa, Morocco, Gold Coast, Kenya, Nigeria, Tunisia, Uganda, Malaya, Singapore, Hong Kong, Jamaica, Trinidad) had increased from 1,850 million kilowatt hours in 1947-1948 to over 4,000 million kilowatt hours in 1952-1953, or by about 120 per cent in five years. Between 1953 and 1955, in twelve Territories (Belgian Congo, French Equatorial Africa, French West Africa, Kenya, Nigeria, Northern Rhodesia, Uganda, Malaya, Singapore, Hong Kong, Jamaica, Trinidad) production had increased from 3,300 million kilowatt hours to 5,400 million kilowatt hours, or over 60 per cent in two years. The 1954 report similarly gave examples of the increased imports and local production of cement as a symptom of economic expansion and figures since then provide further evidence of development. Between 1953 and 1955, the production of cement, measured in metric tons, increased from 248,000 to 405,000 (63 per cent) in the Belgian Congo, from 60,700 to 129,000 (115 per cent) in French West Africa, from 33,000 to 130,000 (294 per cent) in Kenya, from 57,000 to 91,000 (59 per cent) in Northern Rhodesia and from 17,000 to 50,000 (194 per cent) in Uganda.

19. These and other figures given to the Committee presented a generally favourable picture of the economic expansion in the last few years. Yet, this picture has its dark side. In particular, it is uncertain in many cases to what extent the indigenous rural communities, which form at least 90 per cent of the population of the Territories, are benefiting from the economic expansion that is taking place.

20. There are also general principles which the Committee should stress.

21. The Charter of the United Nations provides in Chapter XI that the Members which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government recognize the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of these Territories are paramount. This obligation and the doctrine of the sacred trust render unacceptable any policy in which priority is given to interests other than those of the inhabitants.

22. In 1954, the Committee pointed out that economic development can only be considered as satisfactory if it improves the standard of living and well-being of the indigenous populations. It is essential that the utilization of the resources of the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be in the best interests of their inhabitants and should lead to the attainment of a maximum degree of self-reliance and to the establishment of a sound and stable economy. The measurement of changes in the economic conditions of the populations is difficult and any exact calculation is impossible. In certain cases it is not clear to what extent the local peoples have directly benefited from the various elements of material progress recorded in the information before the Committee. However, production and consumption have increased, and this should mean an improvement in welfare and in levels of living. An increase certainly appears to have occurred in the production of many subsistence and export crops. The domestic production of industrial consumer goods, though still at its earliest stages in most Territories, has increased and a significant shift in the importation of consumer goods towards higher quality and price categories has taken place. Passenger and freight traffic have been increasing at a steady rate. So has the production of electric power. There are increases in the national income in those Territories for which relevant data are available. From all these points, and even taking into account the growth of population and the effects of inflation, it may be concluded that in a number of the Territories there has been an increase in the per capita income of the indigenous population and in the available facilities for the improvement of economic, social and educational conditions of communities, families and individuals.

23. At the same time, the Committee recognizes that there are some Territories whose natural resources, as so far ascertained, cannot without considerable and long-term external assistance provide reasonable conditions of living for the population even at its present size. In other instances, difficulties may arise with the transition from a subsistence way of life to an exchange economy, the former giving real if limited satisfactions and the latter stimulating new personal aspirations and calling for new relationships in community life. These situations should be faced, and are being faced in many cases, by co-operation between the representatives of the Administering Members and the peoples of the Territories. They suggest that, of the concrete objectives of policy outlined by the Committee in 1954 and reproduced in paragraph 10 above, one of the most important purposes is to create conditions conducive to standards of health and social welfare which will help to develop moral and civic consciousness and responsibility, so as to enable the people to take an increasing share in the conduct of their own affairs.

III. Development plans

24. In its 1954 report, the Committee commented on the progress of development plans in Non-Self-Governing Territories, notably in the Belgian Congo and in the Territories under the administration of France and the United Kingdom. It commended the policies of planned governmental investment typified by these plans. It noted the changes made in the early plans with a view to alleviating poverty by improving productivity. It made the generally recognized point that economic policy should be integrated into a general policy of development and that, as shown in many of the development plans themselves, it may not be possible to increase economic productivity unless a vigorous policy is pursued for the expansion of social and educational services and the improvement of social and educational standards.

25. Since 1953, long-term development plans have been continued and extended in a large number of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Data given on the progress of these plans show in many cases an expansion of the resources used and a broadening of the purposes of the plans.

26. The objective is not so much to make a financial contribution to desirable projects as to set in motion a process of balanced development based on scientific research and supported by material and technical assistance. In the light of experience, certain plans have been revised in ways that emphasize the interdependence of the economic and social aspects of development. The revisions have also reflected the conclusion that, while the formulation of ten-year plans is useful in indicating general objectives, concrete programmes should be formulated in terms of shorter periods. Accordingly, a number of plans are now based on a four or five-year period, a change in programming which not only has practical advantages, but which also may make more effective the participation by the Territories in the development of the programmes and in their implementation and adaptation as interpreted by local needs and aspirations.

27. The importance of scientific research as providing a sound basis for economic development has become ever more widely appreciated. Expenditure on research has come to figure more prominently in development programmes. The cost is largely borne by grants under the development plans. The Committee noted examples of the establishment of research foundations having long-term appropriations with wide freedom in research.

28. Information on the recent progress of development plans were placed before the Committee in a report<sup>5</sup> prepared by the Secretariat and further information was supplied by representatives of Administering Members, in particular by the representatives of Australia, France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom.

29. For the United Kingdom Territories since 1945, some £135 million has been spent from metropolitan sources under the Colonial Development and Welfare Acts, and £120 million is being made available for the period 1955-1960. Grants-in-aid to the poorer Territories have also been widely used for development purposes, the grants-in-aid for 1956-1957 totalling £18.9 million. Further assistance results from the access to the London money market enjoyed by the Territories and the status given to their stock, as a result of which over £150 million has been raised by local governments since the war. To this should be added the operations of the Colonial Development Corporation which, up to the end of May 1957, had approved projects totalling £85 million for the promotion or expansion of agricultural, industrial and other enterprises in colonial development.

30. In the case of France, the first four-year plan resulted in the expenditure of nearly 300,000 million francs directed largely to the establishment of the essential infra-structure for economic development. The second four-year plan, initiated in mid-1953, aims more directly at the expansion of production, agricultural development and such social measures as town and country planning. The funds approved from the metropolitan budget for the second programme total 250,000 million francs. The metropolitan country has thus allocated for the development of these territories approximately 8 per cent of the total investments made from public funds since 1946.

31. Available information for the United Kingdom Territories suggests that Governments and other public bodies plan to spend rather more than £150 million per annum on development over the next few years. Of this, it is hoped to raise over £30 million per annum from external loans, about £15 million per annum from Colonial Development and Welfare Funds, between £15 and £20 million per annum from local loans, and the rest from local revenue surpluses and reserves. Territorial Governments are thus looking to their own resources for over half of the cost of their development projects. In Territories under French administration, local budgetary participation in the financing of the cost of development programmes, initially set at 45 per cent, has been reduced gradually to 10 per cent in order to enable the budgets to meet the increase in charges under earlier programmes. The result is that France is meeting 90 per cent of the costs, although local contributions have been substantial in French West Africa, and in some instances in Madagascar almost matched the Fonds d'investissement et de développement économique et social des territoires d'Outre Mer contribution. In the Belgian Congo the development programme continues to be financed not by metropolitan grants but chiefly by means of loans contracted by the Territory.

32. The Belgian Congo situation is in contrast with the general financial position in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In many of the Territories, continued and increased assistance from the metropolitan country is necessary to ensure economic development. This applies to some Territories which are preparing for independence or self-government in the near future. If the new societies are to face the future with reasonable confidence in the economic prospects, substantial financial assistance may be required.

33. The sums expended on development from metropolitan sources and the sums secured under metropolitan guarantees for development are impressive when considered as a whole but do not fully meet urgent needs, particularly in the Territories which are not attracting private capital. In some areas, the main limitations on expanding the rate of public development are the lack of technical and administrative staff and an insufficiency of trained workers. In other regions finance is the principal limiting factor. In some cases, domestic resources can be mobilized by raising tax levels or by extending taxation to groups not at present paying their due share. Nevertheless, the deterrent effect of high rates of taxation on enterprise may outweigh the need to increase government revenue, and where, as in many Territories, the taxable capacity is low because of low personal incomes, the marginal yield of any increase in taxes may be small.

34. The Committee noted with interest that several Territories under United Kingdom administration have been examining the basis of the financial relations between the Territories and London with a view to the establishment or extension of local money markets in the Territories. Proposals for the establishment of territorial central banks made in reports of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development are of particular interest in this connexion, since such banks could help to establish local markets and make available more local funds for development. In this connexion, the Committee noted with satisfaction the establishment of central banks in French West Africa and French Equatorial Africa.

35. Nevertheless, the establishment of a central bank or of a local money market will not necessarily provide sufficient funds for development. In addition to the sources available to the public authorities in the Territories and in the metropolitan countries, other investments will require to be stimulated before the economic development of the Territories can meet the needs of their people. Far greater investment from private sources, territorial, metropolitan and foreign, is required. Indeed, the effectiveness of investments made under government development programmes in present circumstances is largely governed by the extent to which public funds are supplemented by private investment. The importance of public investment is largely that it creates the necessary conditions conducive to increased production. The climate for private investment in many cases needs to be improved by the extension of basic facilities such as harbours, roads, communications and power, together with the basic services required to improve the health and education of the peoples. A number of measures of a financial character also need further consideration. In particular, the metropolitan Governments should take action, as they have already done in many cases, to see that the metropolitan tax systems do not frustrate the efforts of the Territories to encourage private investment. Similarly, where not already in existence, treaties should be negotiated with foreign countries for the purpose of relieving undertakings in the Territories from double taxation.

36. Private capital from the metropolitan countries or from within the Territories will in many cases be inadequate to finance development. For the Territories, and particularly for those in an advanced stage of political development, conditions should be provided and guarantees offered by which, with due regard to the public good and with public understanding, the investment should be encouraged of capital from abroad directed towards the increased productivity on which the future of the Territories and of their peoples will mainly depend.

37. The establishment of well-balanced development programmes requires several conditions: an extensive research programme intended to provide an inventory of existing resources; a balance between short-term profit-yielding projects and more basic and long-term undertakings; and the consideration of all implications of development not only economic, but also educational and social. The Committee emphasized in 1951, and again in 1954, the value of the increased participation of the peoples in the planning of economic programmes, in the general supervision of their execution and as managers and technicians in the separate undertakings. According to data submitted to the Committee in 1957, increasing participation by the local public authorities in the preparation and application of the programmes has been a characteristic feature of recent developments. A similar trend has been observed with regard to the participation by the indigenous inhabitants. In a number of Territories there are elected legislatures and ministries composed largely of local representatives, and the development plans are drawn up by committees responsible to the appropriate ministers who, in their turn, are responsible to local opinion. Many of the plans reflect the peoples' own interpretation of the emphasis which they desire to place on various forms of development. Whatever the details of the plans, the progress of representative institutions in the Non-Self-Governing

Territories has meant that the plans are being prepared to an increased degree by bodies responsible to the elected representatives of the peoples and are increasingly being brought into execution by these bodies.

38. The information before the Committee, including the additional information supplied by representatives of several of the Administering Members, indicates the desirability of an ever-widening association of the representatives of the peoples in the elaboration and implementation of the programmes until the stage is reached when the Territories initiate and implement their own chosen forms of development. The programmes of development in Non-Self-Governing Territories do not make economic sense if the basic political objectives, with which they are inextricably connected, are not part and parcel of the general design.

IV. External trade

39. Summary tables were submitted to the Committee showing developments in the external trade of the Non-Self-Governing Territories during the years 1953 to 1955.<sup>6</sup> Additional information on conditions in 1956 was provided by representatives of the Administering Members.

40. In general, there has been an increase in the external trade of the Territories. The volume of exports of United Kingdom Territories in 1956 was 17.5 per cent higher than in 1953. The value of exports was 24 per cent higher. The value of imports increased by 28 per cent in the same period. In Papua under Australian administration, the value of exports for the period 1955-1956 was 35 per cent higher than for 1952-1953 and, over the same period, the value of imports more than doubled. For the Belgian Congo, the current value of exports for 1955 was 15 per cent higher than in 1952, although imports showed a decline of some 6 per cent. In the African Territories under the administration of France, the volume of exports and imports continued to increase in 1955; there was a value decline owing mainly to a fall in export prices. From 1950 to 1955 exports increased in volume from 1,900,000 tons to 4,025,000 tons and in value from 98 to 177 thousand million francs. The proportion of external trade with countries outside the franc area has been steadily increasing: exports to these countries reached in 1955, 31 per cent of total exports as compared with 24 per cent in 1950. The proportion of semi-manufactured and industrial products in total exports increased from 14 per cent in 1954 to 16 per cent in 1955 for the French Territories as a whole, and reached 21.6 per cent for French West Africa.

41. In 1954, the Committee recognized the significance of the action taken by marketing boards and the Fonds de soutien. The need for arrangements for stabilization of income of producers was emphasized by the 1955 decline in prices of some major commodity exports of Non-Self-Governing Territories. Owing to reserves accumulated in previous years of higher prices, marketing boards in United Kingdom Territories were able to absorb this fall and to continue to pay satisfactory prices to producers. In the Territories under French administration, a general system of price stabilization was introduced and stabilization funds for most major products were established in 1955. With the assistance of advances from the Metropolitan Treasury through the National Stabilization Fund for Overseas Commodities, remuneration of producers was maintained at a satisfactory level. The steps taken to strengthen the territorial producers on the metropolitan market were described to the Committee as marking outstanding progress in the economic organization of overseas production and trade. For a similar purpose of giving guarantees of stability to the producers, information on the measures taken by the metropolitan countries for long-term bulk purchases of the products of the Territories was mentioned as instances of favourable trade relations established through the action of the Administering Members.

42. There were no significant changes in the structure of the foreign trade of most Non-Self-Governing Territories whose exports in most cases remain limited to one or a few primary commodities. While variations in prices of individual export products have been substantial, with considerable repercussions on the economy of the Territories concerned, there was no uniform general trend in the Territories as a whole. Little further progress has been made in the stabilization of world prices of basic commodities, apart from bringing into force an international tin agreement. There has been a gradual, if slow, decline in the share of the external trade of many Non-Self-Governing Territories with the metropolitan countries and with other territories of the same currency area. The widening of markets for exports and sources of supply for imports, seems to indicate some progress towards a greater economic independence. It may also reduce the cost of imports and thus improve the price-cost relations and the competitive character of the exports of the Territories.

43. These are currents indicative of general movements which are difficult to evaluate in their short-term manifestations. Some members of the Committee considered that the trading relations of many Territories were restricted by their lack of independent currency. On the other hand it was pointed out that the United Kingdom Territories were free to trade with any country they wished apart from restrictions applying to all members of the sterling area and that their use of sterling-backed currency involved no limitations on this freedom. Some members drew the attention of the Committee to an aspect of monetary policy which has had repercussions on the trend towards the freedom of external trade. They pointed out that inasmuch as the Territories have no issuing institutions of their own and as, therefore, there is not in these Territories an autonomous administration of foreign exchange resources, the practical results of the measures for liberalizing external trade may be limited so far as the general interests of the inhabitants are concerned. It was pointed out that issuing institutions do exist in Territories under French administration. However, both for commercial reasons and for the purpose of encouraging capital investments, it may be desirable in certain instances to develop territorial monetary systems. As has been suggested in an earlier passage, the changing situation in the monetary relations between many of the Territories and the metropolitan countries is one of the most significant developments of recent years, but it must be emphasized that both trade and these monetary relations would benefit from an increased autonomy on the part of the Territories.

44. The Committee stresses this particular point, not only because it regards it as desirable for some Territories to develop monetary systems of their own, but also because it wishes to re-emphasize the viewpoint, that so long as Members of the United Nations remain responsible for the administration of Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government, policy must be directed firmly towards creating favourable conditions in all fields which in practice contribute to the paramountcy of the interests of the inhabitants.

45. The Committee was interested in the part played by the local population in external trade and particularly in the share of proceeds of exports accruing to them. Some members felt that an excessive share of the proceeds of exports from certain Territories accrued to external investors: the large-scale purchasing of agricultural products, their transport and processing mainly benefit non-indigenous and extra-territorial interests; mining, while it encourages ancillary industries, is largely limited in its direct benefits to the Territories, to the payment of wages for lower paid employment and to taxes. On the other hand, it was pointed out that the external companies had done a great deal to stimulate the economics of the Territories in which they operated. In so far as external capital was required to develop the Territories, the Committee considered that it was only reasonable that such capital should be allowed reasonable returns.

46. The share of indigenous producers in export production and the participation of indigenous traders should be increased. As has been illustrated by the successful developments in a number of cases, the extension of co-operative marketing to export crops is one way of increasing the share of indigenous interests in the development of the Territories. Another aspect of policy, which has also been illustrated in certain Territories, is the extension of commercial training in order to create the business and professional skill necessary for encouraging local inhabitants to play a larger part in the trading operations of the Territories.

47. Finally, the Committee recognizes that the external trade of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in part is determined by natural conditions and that the adverse effects which may result from these conditions are being partially remedied. There are, however, certain observations made by the Committee in 1954, which merit repetition.

48. The question of the exports of Non-Self-Governing Territories raises the problem of the preference given on the markets of the Administering Members to certain products of the Territories. The latter clearly find it advantageous for their production to be supported by an assured outlet on the metropolitan market. Such a policy may, however, have some drawbacks. It is for the Non-Self-Governing Territories to judge whether these drawbacks are adequately offset by the advantage of a stable metropolitan market and the financial assistance given in certain cases by the Administering Members during periods of falling prices. Some long-term agreements providing for bulk purchases of the Territories' products by the Administering Members have proved beneficial, particularly when the Administering Members have accepted the principle of a periodic review of the terms of contracts, in the light of conditions on the international markets and the trend of the prices of the imports paid for by these exports.

49. As was also stated in 1954, the same problem of trade policy arises with regard to imports. There is no fundamental objection to the Territories obtaining most of their supplies from the Administering Members, or from the same currency area provided that this trend is not forced and that prices in effect in the metropolitan country are not too high. The import policy of the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be based on world prices, in order to benefit from international competition.

V. Industrialization

50. In its reports of 1951 and 1954, the Committee examined various aspects of industrial development in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The information before it in 1957 provided further instances of industrial expansion in the Territories. These have occurred mainly by taking the processing of the territorial raw materials a further stage towards the production of finished products for export and in meeting local demands for consumer goods requiring comparatively simple manufacture.

51. The Administering Members have declared themselves favourably disposed towards the establishment and development of local industries. There remain, however, some points that require consideration. Under the Ten-Year Plan for the Belgian Congo, for example, the promotion of industries is to be encouraged, subject, inter alia, to the costs comparing favourably with the prices of similar imported products. The Plan also proposes that the initiative should be left to private interests and that State intervention should be considered only in the case of certain basic industries. Some Members of the Committee suggested that limitations of this type are too rigid.

52. Moreover, although industrial development in many Territories is approved in principle, a note of caution is often sounded when practical action is under consideration. Such an attitude can be readily understood. The basic natural resources, the availability of capital and of technical personnel, the degree of economic and social evolution of the Territory, the level of living of the populations and their purchasing power, the existence and potentialities of local, regional and international markets are all factors influencing the views of the authorities responsible for the progress of a given Territory when the advisability of promoting industrial development is being considered. While recognizing the considerations that must thus result, some Members of the Committee expressed some concern lest over-emphasis on private initiative might slow down industrial development when existing conditions are not conducive to it.

53. Industrialization should not be regarded as an end in itself but as one of the means of raising the income and levels of living of the population. Local conditions may limit the range of manufactured products which can be made and sold. Where very favourable conditions exist for particular crops or products the general interest of a Territory may be best served through the increase of their production and sale in return for manufactured goods from abroad. But, where conditions are suitable, industrial production will assist in raising living conditions and is essential for diversifying and strengthening the territorial economies.

54. The encouragement of new industries in the Non-Self-Governing Territories should not therefore be governed wholly by criteria of price possibilities, important as these may be to the individual undertakings. The Governments should take account of the broader economic and social needs of the Territories. In considering particular policies and projects, consideration should be given to the possibilities of employment that may be offered to indigenous workers, the relationship between modern industries and traditional skills and the chain reaction of economic development which some industries produce in contrast with the insulated character of others. Some Members of the Committee stressed the advantages offered by a network of small industries providing consumer goods for local consumption in contrast with the more spectacular and more hazardous possibilities of the large and highly capitalized undertakings requiring possibly costly equipment and highly skilled technical staff. Nevertheless, where, as through the existence of power resources, conditions are particularly favourable for larger industries, the Governments should encourage their development. Some Members suggested that from the point of view of an increase in national income it is sometimes preferable to use natural resources and employ national labour which would otherwise remain idle to the detriment of the community, even though one would have to accept a temporary increase in the price of goods.

55. The Secretariat study submitted to the Committee in 1957 was not intended to describe progress achieved in industrial development but to indicate the measures adopted by the Administering Members for encouraging the degree of industrialization considered suitable to local conditions.

56. The principal source of finance for industrial development in most Non-Self-Governing Territories is private capital. The statements already made in this report on the general need to encourage private capital and to provide guarantees for private investments in the Non-Self-Governing Territories applies to industrial development with special force, since in this field the private entrepreneur may be able to offer the greatest skill and experience. The Governments therefore usually, even when providing finance for the promotion of industrial development, leave the running of the businesses to private industries. It was suggested that conditions conducive to private initiative should be promoted.

57. In some of the Territories the Governments have made loans to encourage local manufactures. Institutions specializing in promoting industry have been set up, as well as, in some cases, industrial development corporations which undertake the establishment of manufacturing industries either on their own account or through subsidiary bodies. The metropolitan countries have also provided direct financial assistance and taken part directly in the establishment of industrial undertakings. Nevertheless, some Members of the Committee are concerned that the development of industries is left to private initiative to such a large extent. They consider that reliance on private investments which, in the circumstances of many of the Territories, is most likely to be directed to the further development of existing plantation and mining undertakings, will not ensure a sufficiently rapid and diversified industrial development. They therefore urge the Administering Members to accept a more active role for Government authorities in industrial development, to increase the present proportion of public funds allocated to industry in the development programmes of the respective Territories and, in appropriate cases, to sponsor or to operate pilot plants for new industries.

Other Members feel that it is appropriate for Governments to establish and pursue policies which encourage industrialization, but that generally the establishment and operation of individual industrial plants should be left to private enterprise. They also feel that all things considered private enterprise usually leads to the most efficient operation of industry. Still others think that the role to be played by Governments in promoting industrial development should be considered in the light of the individual circumstances of the Territory concerned.

58. The Non-Self-Governing Territories do not as a rule make a wide use of protective tariffs as a means of shielding local manufactures from competition from imports of a similar nature. In some cases, import dues are reduced or waived on equipment for new factories and on the raw materials which are to be processed. Many Territories apply a quota system on imported manufactures and this may assist local industries. Reciprocally, the quota policies adopted by the metropolitan countries may favour the admission into these countries of the industrial products of the Territories. In Territories where there are export duties, these are sometimes used to promote the disposal of local manufactures in external markets or to discourage the exportation of raw materials needed for local industries.

59. The general attitude which this Committee has outlined in speaking of external trade indicates the reservations which need considering in respect of protective measures. Some of the measures which the Territories are following to protect nascent industries are no doubt justified by immediate needs. They should not be regarded as satisfying the needs of a long-term policy. Discriminatory measures hampering competition may prove detrimental to the efficient development of the enterprises enjoying protection. They may result in unjustified price increases which will have to be borne by the local populations. They should be used only in the interest of the population of the Territories to enable the establishment or expansion of industries which, at least at an early stage, would be unable to resist to competition of imported industrial products.

60. In some Non-Self-Governing Territories the Governments grant tax concessions to industry and, in particular, to new undertakings of a pioneer type. Among the incentives of this kind most frequently used are the reduction or temporary waiving of taxes on profits, the right to apply in the initial stages of new industries accelerated rates for the depreciation of plant and machinery and the authorization to carry over losses from one year to a longer period in calculating profit and loss. In the Territories under French administration approved undertakings have since 1953 had the advantage of the guarantee offered by exempting them from tax increases for periods up to twenty-five years. In Territories under United Kingdom administration legislation has been adopted from 1947 onwards in the Caribbean region to encourage pioneer industries by means of a number of tax concessions and this legislation has more recently been extended to West Africa.

61. The tax holiday providing exemption from taxation on profits for a number of years may be spectacular and may encourage new investments. Some Members of the Committee doubt its value for the generality of cases. Investments in new industries may earn little in the initial years of the undertakings so that any exemption from taxation on profits may be illusory or may only encourage undertakings with a high degree of mobility to take advantage of a temporary situation to establish short-lived undertakings which will not contribute to the permanent prosperity of the Territory concerned. It may also be difficult to distinguish between the exemption for new undertakings and the exemption which should be extended to existing undertakings diversifying their manufactures. This does not mean that no encouragement can be given by way of tax concessions. In particular, as has already been stated, in relation to private investment in general, agreed action should be taken to avoid the cancellation in practice by tax policies pursued in capital exporting countries of concessions granted through reduced territorial tax rates.

62. In general too much importance should not be attached to income tax exemptions and similar measures. Effort should rather be concentrated on stimulating industry by improving the basic public services. This does not imply any neglect of the particular needs of industry that can be met by government action. The Committee noted with satisfaction the cases where Governments are making use of means of promoting industry, such as industrial research, vocational technical education, surveys, studies of domestic and foreign markets with a view to establishing outlets for local products, and the development of sales by advertising and trade negotiations.

63. As the Committee stated in 1954, since industrialization is only one aspect of economic diversification and since economic and social progress are part of a single if complex process of modernization, public agencies for industrial research and development should be vested with broad functions; where they work in conjunction with private operators they should associate the operators in the risks of the enterprise rather than using them on a commission or similar basis; and their programmes should operate through the devolution of responsibility to territorial and local authorities representative of the inhabitants. In the particular undertakings representatives of the inhabitants should, as far as is possible, participate in management.

64. Particular importance should be attached to vocational and technical education. In 1956 in its report on education in Non-Self-Governing Territories,<sup>8</sup> the Committee noted the major developments that had taken place in this field from the character of primary schooling, to the development of secondary education up to the establishment of technical colleges for senior students providing education to the degree level. The Committee in 1957 reiterates the view expressed in 1956 that further development in vocational and technical education, the integration of this education in systems of general education, its planning in relation to the over-all prospects of the Territories and to the actual and potential labour market for semi-skilled, skilled and professional posts demand close attention. Complementary to this educational policy, the Territories in their industrial planning will need to take fully into account their educational structure and the potential availability of trained workers, technicians and managers.

65. Industrial development may well lead to revolutionary changes in the structure of society. A number of considerations and safeguards should be borne in mind. Industrial development should not threaten the land rights of the indigenous peoples. Any immigration involved should not be of such proportions as to alter the basic character of the society in the Territory. There should be no colour bar in industry in any Territory. Provision should be made for training and for the holding of increasingly responsible posts in management by members of the indigenous population. There should be adequate conditions of employment and proper provision for housing. Wherever possible, there should be local participation in the financing of development. In general, industrial development should not in any way endanger general development in all its aspects and should be in harmony with the traditions and aspirations of its peoples. These considerations do not justify inaction. On the contrary, they suggest the kind of positive measures which should be included in programmes of industrial development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in order to lead to the best results.

66. The information supplied to the Committee by representatives of the Administering Members outlined some of the measures that are being taken.

67. In Territories under United Kingdom administration the Government holds that three types of industry generally have initially favourable prospects: import-replacement industries, i.e., production of consumer goods and capital goods (such as cement) previously imported; the initial processing of agricultural and mineral products previously exported in crude form; and servicing and repair industries such as engineering works. Industrial development has developed rapidly in Hong Kong, which has entered the world market on a considerable scale with a wide range of manufactured products. The United Kingdom Territories' output of cement in 1956 was eight times what it had been in 1950, and there were large increases in the output of electricity in several Territories. There has been a large expansion of soap production in the Federation of Malaya, textile production in Northern Nigeria, edible oil output in Trinidad, and various developments in Jamaica and Kenya. On the whole, however, industrial production is still of minor importance in most Territories, although the United Kingdom representative stated that Governments are endeavouring to remove existing obstacles by improving basic services such as communications, power and water supplies, by extending technical education, and by taking steps to enlarge local markets by increasing incomes generally.

68. The representative of France stated that in the Territories under French administration the effort of industrialization extends to large as well as to small industries. The vast potentialities of hydroelectric power in tropical Africa, amounting to two-fifths of the world's resources, which can be produced there much cheaper than in Europe, are held to justify the establishment of heavy industry for processing of minerals for which power is a major cost component. In the action that is being taken the industries are to be established by private enterprise but often with considerable financial government participation. The French Government also encourages small-scale industry which is of more direct interest to the indigenous population, in order to broaden the basis of the local economy and to create greater economic stability. Processing industries frequently obtain by priority the required raw materials and enjoy tariff and quota protection from foreign competition. Fiscal import duties which exist in all Territories and are established by local legislatures, without intervention by the metropolitan authorities moreover provide to local industries a protection against imports as well from the metropolitan country as from foreign countries.

VI. The rural economy

69. Industrialization will not change the basic economy of the majority of Territories in the immediate future. Most of the populations will for many years be engaged in forms of agriculture so that rural development will be the key to their economic integration and national stability. The policies of the Governments should aim at broadening the foundations of the territorial economy but in the main progress will continue to depend on the direction and speed of rural development, to which indeed suitable industrial development should be designed to contribute.

70. During recent years, agricultural exports continued to expand. Although in 1955 and 1956 world prices of some crops failed to maintain the levels of 1954, on the whole, the export producer, whether a plantation or a single peasant family, benefited from the trade situation. Information on production for local consumption is less adequate, but it appears that, while the production of the starchy staple crops has generally continued to increase, there are still serious deficiencies in the production of the more nutritionally valuable foods and thus in the quality of the diet.

71. In 1954, the Committee, on the basis of an analysis prepared by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, stressed the importance of encouraging greater agricultural diversification and the need for selectivity in future agricultural development plans. In 1957, FAO submitted a further study on agricultural diversification.<sup>9</sup>

72. The lack of diversity is a major feature of agricultural production in most of the Territories. The staple crops produced for domestic consumption consist largely of starchy staples. The range of agricultural exports is comparatively narrow in many territories. There is sometimes and in some areas an imbalance between production for local consumption and export. Diversification is also needed on individual farms including crop rotation and animal husbandry.

73. The progress that is being made towards greater diversification is often slow. Many factors require consideration. These include climatic and soil conditions, the demographic situation and the particular circumstances of the Territory's agricultural development. Population pressures often make it desirable to cultivate crops with high yields per acre and, where there is potential unemployment, to maintain those crops which support the largest possible number of workers. The establishment of new export crops requires a careful assessment of world markets and local conditions. The replacement of the dominating crops which provide maximum yields and employment may result in a decline in income and employment. In many cases diversification may be considered as an insurance against the risks resulting from over-specialization and while often necessary, should not be increased at a cost which may appreciably reduce the Territories' income derived from crops that have already found an established place in overseas markets. With food crops for local consumption, although their diversification is essential in order to improve diets through increased output of protective foods, here also there are difficulties, such as the smaller yields of some of the beneficial crops, the need for refrigeration and storage, and also for nutritional education.

74. All these considerations indicate that to bring about diversification, either in the Territories' economy as a whole or on the separate farms, action and encouragement by Governments will be needed over a long period. In many cases the distribution of planting material, free or at reduced prices, has been found a useful beginning. Demonstration plots and other extension methods are also used and settlement schemes permitting supervision over cropping systems have resulted in more varied production. Credit and guaranteed prices may be provided and the organization of marketing facilities is of special importance. On these matters, and, in general, on the methods used to establish alternative crops, a greater exchange of information is desirable, since so many Territories are facing the same difficulties.

75. The present situation of world agriculture calls for a more selective approach to the expansion of agricultural production. In most Non-Self-Governing Territories a policy of diversification should be actively pursued. It will often have a beneficial influence on nutrition and health and facilitate more rational farming. It should be considered a necessary part of a balanced effort to strengthen the economy and raise levels of living. For success, diversification needs the co-operation of the rural population and the acceptance by them of new crops and techniques. The training of local leaders is essential. Agricultural extension services should pay particular attention to encouraging suitable forms of diversification and should operate with a high measure of decentralization.

76. In 1951 and 1954, the Committee drew attention to certain aspects of land problems, in particular stressing the need and the action taken to restrict land from alienation to non-indigenous inhabitants. In 1957, some members of the Committee drew attention to certain situations where they consider alienation has been excessive. But the Committee's chief attention this year was focussed on a first discussion of indigenous land tenure problems during periods of economic transition. The Committee decided that the question would be further explored as part of the study of social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories which the Committee will take up in 1958. The following comments are accordingly tentative and general.

77. In Non-Self-Governing Territories land is the basic resource of the indigenous peoples. Land should not be considered as an economic asset only or even primarily; land legislation and policies should take into account all the wider social and political ramifications of the development of society. Any programme for the so-called modernization of existing systems may fail if attempted as a form of a change in land use without full regard to other economic and social factors. Customary forms of land tenure for example, which are sometimes regarded as obstacles to increased productivity, have their roots in the social structure of society and cannot be changed without changing the society itself. It was suggested that to increase productivity customary forms of land tenure should be modified.

78. Nevertheless, the basic conditions governing the traditional indigenous systems of land tenure have largely disappeared since the extent of available land is becoming limited as a result of increasing populations. Soil exhaustion and erosion create serious problems where traditional forms of agriculture impinge on increasingly restricted areas of land. The existing land systems limit incomes, discourage or prevent agricultural change, deprive the peasants of guarantees in the possession of land and make it difficult to organize agricultural credit. Notwithstanding the fact that in many Non-Self-Governing Territories family and group ownership of land remains prevalent and shows a high degree of flexibility and adaptability under varied conditions, cash crops, increasing populations and the impact of more individualistic patterns of social and economic behaviour mean that old tenures are giving way and that more individual titles to land are emerging.

79. The assumption that under pressure of modern economic forces a satisfactory land-tenure system would automatically evolve, well adjusted to the requirements of present economic and social conditions, does not hold true. A lead must be given by Governments. This may involve a basic reorganization of the land tenure system by law, which should also include adequate provisions to deal with the defects of individual tenures sometimes occurring in an exchange economy: chronic indebtedness, fragmentation, landlordism and the creation of a class of landless unemployed.

80. Representatives of Australia, France and the United Kingdom gave a number of examples of successful action to improve and diversify indigenous agriculture, to check soil deterioration, to consolidate holdings, to settle nomads and in general to obtain agreed solutions to local problems. In particular, the representative of France stated that under new legislation, Article 713 of the French Civil Code, by which ownerless land belongs to the State has been revised in its application overseas. He stated that recent legislative provisions empower the administering authorities to recover the land, which has already been granted as concessions but which is not yet being utilized, with a view to its redistribution to communities for the needs of populations short of land for cultivation.

81. The various examples show that the imposition of even necessary land and agricultural reforms gave poor results. When the administrations are supported by experts who can win the confidence of the people, the populations, in very diverse situations, have agreed to change and have often accelerated its pace beyond the most optimistic forecasts. The Committee was interested in these examples as instances of agrarian revolutions supported by the populations which may permanently alter the whole picture of indigenous agriculture and greatly improve the whole rural economy of many Territories. It hopes that agrarian reform by popular consent will be encouraged and extended and that information will be exchanged on problems and solutions.

VII. Social aspects of economic development

82. Economic development should be pursued not as an end in itself, but as an integral part of a broad programme of general action. Many adjustments to new social conditions are required as a result of economic change; many economic problems cannot be solved without solutions to the accompanying social problems. But the policies to be followed will have to strike a balance between social and economic development and will involve the interdependence of economic and social action. Accelerated economic development may assist in overcoming critical phases of social transition, provided that, within the desirable limits of governmental action, the social conditions indispensable for economic progress have been laid down.

83. The Committee will in 1958 consider social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. A number of questions on social development raised in the debates of this year should be further examined on that occasion. For the purposes of the present report, the Committee emphasizes certain questions of social change which may be particularly affected by changing economic conditions. Two studies were examined. One, prepared by UNESCO, considers certain social aspects of industrialization in Africa South of the Sahara.<sup>10</sup> The other, prepared by the Secretariat, examines the general social problems of peasant societies during periods of economic transition.<sup>11</sup>

84. The UNESCO report suggests that in rural Africa, there are both disturbing and stimulating effects of industrialization. As examples of the first type of effects there are the increase in social inequality, marriage instability and the inadequate investment of industrial earnings in the predominant rural sector of the economy. Examples of the stimulating effects are the improvement of levels of living, the greater availability of goods and services, the improvement, in some cases, of housing and the creation of markets. A number of other consequences were mentioned in the Committee which may, in different circumstances, have a favourable or unfavourable effect on the local society, such as changes in the tribal structure and labour migrations. In many parts of the Territories, industrialization is in its early stages. Studies of the areas concerned would make it easier to supervise the resulting adaptation, the balance between the changes, the adaptation of customary land tenure and land use systems and the means of securing a better social reconstruction. The Committee hopes that studies of this kind will be encouraged and the results made available to those who have to tackle similar problems.

85. Economic progress should be fostered through the fullest use of the elements of the traditional pattern that can be adapted to new purposes. The foundations may thus be laid for the social growth of society and for fostering the means by which those more energetic in the vanguard of economic change will take up corresponding social responsibilities. The economic progress of Non-Self-Governing Territories, it was argued in the Committee, cannot be effected except at some cost to the social values of traditional institutions. But, where levels of living are low, economic advance is one of the first necessities of social policy and through it should be created new conditions under which new social institutions can evolve or traditional institutions take on new meaning.

86. In the combination of economic and social forces, the part played by the co-operative movement may be of particular importance. Co-operation, the structure of which may extend from the smallest units to territorial-wide organizations, provides an important means by which individuals and groups can combine their isolated efforts in wide programmes of economic and social development. The processes of co-operation require the assistance of those familiar with business methods under modern conditions. Hence, there is need for the training of staff and the education of members of the societies, through which co-operative organizations may enable traditional customs of self-help and mutual aid to find new expression and broader application.

87. The development of co-operative societies in the Territories should be an important factor in social progress and prepare the people for the transition to a modern economy. There has been a steady spread of co-operative organizations in some areas. The representative of France outlined French experience in this field. The early sociétés de prévoyance, in spite of their contributions to progress, proved too bureaucratic. When, however, they were replaced by co-operative societies, setbacks occurred leading to the conclusion that any new start should be carefully organized with due attention to better education and social reform. The present situation is that, established on firmer bases, the new societies are showing promising enterprise and are operating under local indigenous boards and with adequate staff and technical advice. Other encouraging instances of co-operative development were furnished by the representatives of Australia, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom.

88. In the Territories, the co-operative system has been developed in diverse forms suggesting that many extensions of the movements are possible. The success of the "multi-purpose" and particularly of the "better living" co-operatives in Asia indicates that there may be still unexplored possibilities for establishing the co-operative movement on a wider basis more appealing to the people and meaningful to their largest numbers. By linking the co-operative movement with the basic needs and aspirations of the people, it may be associated more closely with economic and social reconstruction and its effectiveness increased.

89. Another promising area of combined economic and social operations is provided by the community development movement. The movement is designed to promote better living for the whole community with the active participation and on the initiative of its members. It is a phase of general development which can be realized only through the creative participation of the people in the whole process of change. The movement provides a wide range of social incentives to economic effort and makes the narrow economic objectives subordinate to broader social goals and purposes. The interaction between the local group and the wider environment bridges differences between traditional institutions and the exigencies of progress and creates conditions for the further economic expansion as a part of an orderly evolution of the indigenous society towards modern forms and standards through its own institutions and talents. Very similar aims may be followed in programmes for the encouragement of the indigenous peasantry under paysannat schemes which are reported to have given good results in the Belgian Congo and in French Equatorial Africa.

90. There is a close connexion between these developments and the evolution of the economic services which operate under local government control. Local organizations such as exist in a number of territories should be capable not only of mobilizing forms of voluntary action but also of taking care of the routine management of established public services and providing for their expansion. In the long run, community development schemes cannot fully succeed unless they are carried out through local councils or with their full co-operation. Where community development policies have taken root, they have sometimes led to a reform of the local administration directed towards building up efficient and representative local government institutions able to provide and run the services needed by the people.

91. In all these forms of social development an important point is the training of leaders on as wide a scale as possible. The successful evolution of the society in transition depends to a great extent on the co-operation of the Administering Authorities with the representative elements of the population. One of the immediate tasks of social policy is the promotion of popular leadership in all areas and in all sectors of agricultural or urban communities.

92. At its 1955 session, the Committee expressed the view that the development of popular leadership calls for appraisal of the training policies and programmes both in respect of scope and extent, and in terms of social content. The Committee pointed out that any training programme concerned mostly with imparting technical skills or training staff required by official organizations would not be sufficient. A broader conception is needed of the place and functions assigned to central training institutions as workshops of social policy and as cultural and training centres for many types of leaders and agents in social development. The purpose of training should be not merely the increase of technical efficiency, but above all the development of the creative potentialities of the people through better understanding, the encouragement of initiative and the formulation of common ideals and purposes.

93. Interesting information was supplied to the Committee on a number of general aspects of social policy in Non-Self-Governing Territories, for example, the extension of measures of social security and housing programmes. Since the Committee will be paying special attention to social conditions in 1958, it does not include in its present report any summary of this discussion. It wishes to refer, however, once again to the Report of International Definitions and Measurement of Standards and Levels of Living,<sup>12</sup> prepared by a United Nations Committee on Experts in 1953. It suggests that in its studies, the Secretariat should attempt to assess the information transmitted on standards and levels of living as affected by economic development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories by reference to a wide range of factors relating to the principal aspects of economic, social and educational conditions.

VIII. International and regional co-operation

94. The Committee, in its 1954 report on economic conditions, welcomed the information before it at that time on international technical assistance furnished to the Non-Self-Governing Territories for economic development and on the operations of the specialized agencies and regional inter-governmental commissions of particular value to the Territories. Since 1954, technical assistance has continued to be rendered to the Non-Self-Governing Territories by the United Nations and the specialized agencies under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance and under the regular programmes. Assistance has been also provided by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the United Nations Children's Fund.

95. With the rise in 1955 of the general level of activities under the entire expanded programme, the Technical Assistance Board has recognized the need to give special attention to the Territories which are about to reach independent status; this is reflected in the rise in the cost of projects to Non-Self-Governing Territories, both in actual amount and in percentage of the total costs. Of the thirty projects which may be broadly classified as being directed primarily towards economic development and for which assistance has been approved for 1957 under the expanded programme in fifteen Territories, seven are for surveys and general development; four for improving soil and water resources; eleven for plant and animal production and control of diseases; three for vocational training; five for co-operatives or marketing.

96. A number of Non-Self-Governing Territories have acted as host countries for conferences and seminars. In 1956, seventeen Non-Self-Governing Territories provided facilities for study for thirty-one fellows under the expanded programme and fifty fellows under the regular programmes of the specialized agencies.

97. In the period 1952-1956, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development sent missions to assist in the planning of general economic development in five Territories: British Guiana, Jamaica, Nigeria, Singapore and the Federation of Malaya. By the end of 1956, a number of loans had been made to the Non-Self-Governing Territories. A total of nearly $200 million was lent by the Bank for various branches of development in Non-Self-Governing Territories of Africa in the period between 1951 and 1956.

98. Aid furnished by the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), totalling $8,191,900 has been approved for 100 projects in forty-one Non-Self-Governing Territories in the period from early 1952 to mid-1957. Of these, eighty programmes in thirty-nine Territories are currently receiving help from the Fund. Most of the twenty projects previously assisted are being continued by the Governments concerned. Aid for forty-two new or continuing programmes in twenty-two Territories was approved during 1956 and in the first half of 1957.

99. The United Kingdom Territories in South-East Asia continued to participate in the Colombo Plan for co-operative economic development in South and South-East Asia. The fifth annual report of the Consultative Committee emphasized the role and importance of technical assistance in economic development. The Plan has been extended to June 1961.

100. Technical assistance has also been provided to the Non-Self-Governing Territories by the United States through its International Cooperation Administration. In March 1955, a survey team reviewed a number of possible activities in Kenya, and recommended several projects in agriculture, health, education and community development. Arrangements were made for sending technicians to study cattle disease in Nigeria; expansion of technical education in Sierra Leone; establishment of a trade training centre in the Gambia; and a large agricultural development programme in the Western Region of Nigeria. In the Caribbean region agreements were signed in June 1955 for new technical co-operation programmes in Jamaica and the British Honduras, and in British Guiana technical assistance was provided for specific projects, such as soil analysis, resettlement, reclamation work, rural youth activities, and poultry and hog raising. In Africa, expenditure on the ICA programme, from 1 July 1951 to 31 December 1956, amounted to $US5,945,000 in Territories under French administration; $US5,108,000 in Territories under United Kingdom administration and $US57,000 in Territories administered by Belgium.

101. The degree to which projects of technical assistance are integrated into the long-term development plans vary from Territory to Territory, but there is a tendency not only for assistance to increase but also for it to change its scope. The first somewhat isolated schemes are succeeded by programmes in which a number of the international organizations are called upon to play their role.

102. In regard to international discussions and inquiries on economic advancement, the Committee received information on the activities of the Economic and Social Council at its twenty-first, twenty-second and twenty-third sessions. The World Economic Survey of 1955 indicated that, despite an unparalleled rate of total world economic activity, in only a few of the under-developed countries had per capita economic growth been consolidated to a point where it might be considered to be self-cumulating. In the under-developed countries perhaps the most significant advances lie not so much in the physical expansion of productive capacity as in the evolution of a social climate favourable to economic development. The Council recommended that attention should continue to be focussed, in future surveys, on long-term problems of general interest (resolution 614 D (XXII)), and that the attention of Governments should be invited to the importance of surveying their human and material resources and their needs, with a view to their fuller utilization (resolution 614 C (XXII)).

103. Both national action and international co-operation are necessary for helping under-developed countries to advance their economic development. In the formation and administration of their trade and production policies, the Economic and Social Council recommended in resolution 614 B (XXII) that Governments should take into account the possible effects of their policies on other economies and particularly on the economic development of under-developed countries, which are heavily dependent on trade in primary products and on a reasonable stability in prices. It also recommended that under-developed countries should make every effort to diversify the markets for their products by such measures as the acceleration of industrialization, the development of new markets, and the diversification of production.

104. In describing the activities undertaken by the Secretariats of the United Nations, the regional economic commissions, the specialized and other United Nations agencies with a view to assisting Governments to promote industrialization and productivity, the Council indicated that problems of industrialization in certain regions such as Africa and the Middle East had so far received little attention. The Council looked forward to intensified implementation of the programme of work, with special attention to the needs of Africa and the Middle East and with particular emphasis on studies that would provide practical assistance and guidance in the industrial progress of the under-developed countries (resolution 649 A (XXIII)).

105. The Economic and Social Council has also suggested that Governments undertake specific studies on implementation of land reform measures and their impact on production, living standards and economic and social development (resolution 649 B (XXIII)), and that Governments encourage in the less developed areas, especially in the fields of agriculture and fisheries and in general fields of community development, the organization of co-operatives and of elementary and advanced training for their staff and information for their members and that they bear in mind that technical assistance is available to the Governments of under-developed countries to promote the development of co-operatives (resolution 649 C (XXIII)).

106. A recommendation by the Council that Governments conduct a population census during the ten-year period 1956-1965, preferably around 1960 (resolution 622 B (XXII)), has been supplemented by a request for studies of the improvement of census and vital statistics in Africa, and exploration of the desirability and feasibility of early establishment of demographic training and research centres in the region (resolution 642 B (XXIII)).

107. The Caribbean Commission, the South Pacific Commission and the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara have continued their work in their respective regions. A number of regional conferences were also held by, or under the auspices of, various specialized agencies. The subjects covered by regional co-operation through conferences, missions, experts and training courses included; problems of economic planning and development; the role of external aid; agricultural development in relation to economic development as a whole and industrialization; the financing of agriculture; the establishment of a pasture and livestock institute; statistical questions connected with the 1960 world census of agriculture; forestry, marine fisheries; hydro-biology and inland fisheries; river development; town and rural planning and development; land settlement; community development; home economics and nutrition, co-operatives; the promotion of trade; the study of population trends and improvement of statistical methods.

108. During the discussions, further information was given to the Committee on the activities of international and regional organizations affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee notes the value of the services that can be provided to the Territories by organs of the United Nations, the specialized agencies and regional commissions. It expresses the hope that, in accordance with the principles laid down in Article 73 d of the Charter, co-operation will be still further developed with the specialized international bodies with a view to the practical achievement of the purposes set forth in Article 73.

IX. Other questions

109. The Committee referred to the Articles on the association of Overseas Countries and Territories contained in the "Treaty Establishing the European Economic Community" and the provisions of the "Applicatory Convention Relating to the Association of the Overseas Countries and Territories with the Community".<sup>13</sup> These agreements were signed in

Rome on 25 March 1957. They therefore fall outside the period covered by the information transmitted under Article 73 e which was considered at this session of the Committee. Certain members maintained that their consideration by the Committee at this stage exceeded the Committee's terms of reference. Other members, however, held that a report on economic development in Non-Self-Governing Territories prepared in 1957 would be unrealistic if account were not taken of developments which might be of far-reaching significance for the Non-Self-Governing Territories under the administration of Belgium, France and the Netherlands.

110. Some of the members who commented on the possible effects on the Non-Self-Governing Territories of the proposals for a European Common Market, stated that their views were to be regarded as tentative and that further information would be required before definitive opinions could be formed. They expressed concern, however, lest the proposals retard the economic development of the Territories and their industrialization and lead to their integration in an economic system in which they might be largely limited to the furnishing of primary products. The question was also asked whether the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories had been consulted on proposals which might be of such importance to them. Other members, reiterating the view that for the present any discussion in the present Committee would be premature, suggested that the international aspects of the agreements would be considered by other agencies of international co-operation, in particular at the forthcoming Conference of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

I. Constitution of the Committee

1. By resolution 933 (X), adopted on 8 November 1955, the General Assembly decided to continue, for a further period of three years, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, on the same basis as was set forth in resolutions 332 (IV) and 646 (VII), adopted respectively on 2 December 1949 and 10 December 1952.

2. The terms of reference of the Committee, set forth in resolution 933 (X), provide that the General Assembly:

"5. Instructs the Committee to examine, in the spirit of paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 1 and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on the economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

"6. Instructs the Committee to submit to the regular sessions of the General Assembly reports containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories."

3. In relation to the Committee's programme of work, the General Assembly, in resolution 933 (X):

"Considers that the Committee should, without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, give special attention to educational, economic and social conditions in turn and should consider the information transmitted in respect of these questions in the light of the reports approved by the General Assembly on such conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories."

4. The Committee consists of fourteen members: the seven Administering Member States transmitting information on Non-Self-Governing Territories and an equal number of other Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly. In 1957, the term of Peru having expired, the Fourth Committee, on behalf of the General Assembly, elected Brazil as a member of the Committee. The membership of the Committee in 1958 was as follows:

Members transmitting information

Australia
Belgium
France
Netherlands

New Zealand
United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland
United States of America

5. The Committee met in New York at the Headquarters of the United Nations for its ninth session, in the course of which it held nineteen meetings between 14 April and 16 May 1958. With the exception of Belgium, all members were represented at the ninth session.

6. Representatives of the following specialized agencies attended the Committee and took part in the discussions: the International Labour Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and the World Health Organization.

II. Officers of the Committee

7. At its opening (168th) meeting on 14 April, the Committee elected by acclamation the following officers:

Chairman: Mr. Arthur S. Lall (India)

Vice-Chairman: Mr. Francisco Alfonso Ravard (Venezuela)

Rapporteur: Mr. Kevin T. Kelly (Australia)

III. Sub-Committee

8. At its 175th meeting, the Committee appointed a sub-committee to prepare a report on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. This sub-committee was composed of the representatives of Ceylon, China, France, Guatemala, India, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America. It was assisted by the Rapporteur and the representatives of the specialized agencies. At its opening meeting, held on 23 April 1958, the sub-committee elected Mr. Jan Vixseboxse of the Netherlands as its Chairman and Mr. Yogendra Duraismwamy of Ceylon as its Vice-Chairman. After holding eleven meetings, the sub-committee concluded its work on 8 May 1958.

IV. Agenda

9. At its 168th meeting, the Committee considered the provisional agenda (A/AC.35/11) prepared by the Secretary-General. The representative of Ceylon suggested that the sub-item on mass communications be included under social conditions (item 4), instead of under educational conditions (item 6). The representative of New Zealand suggested that mass communications as a whole be retained under the item concerning "Educational conditions" and that the social aspects of mass communications be discussed under item 4 (h). The suggestion of New Zealand was acceptable to the representative of Ceylon and the Committee agreed to it.

10. The agenda as adopted is reproduced in annex I to the present report.

V. Preliminary statements

11. At the 168th meeting, the representatives of Ceylon, India and Iraq reserved the position of their Governments with regard to sovereignty over Netherlands New Guinea (West Irian). The representative of the Netherlands reaffirmed the sovereignty of his Government over Netherlands New Guinea, in respect of which his Government had transmitted information in accordance with its obligations under the Charter. The representative of Australia stated that the position of his Government with regard to the sovereignty of the Netherlands over Netherlands New Guinea remained unchanged.

12. The representatives of Guatemala and of the United Kingdom reserved the position of their respective Governments with regard to sovereignty over British Honduras (Belize).

VI. Social conditions

13. In accordance with the programme of work set out in resolution 933 (X), the Committee at its ninth session gave special attention to social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. In response to the invitation extended by the General Assembly in resolution 745 (VIII), specialist advisers on social affairs were included in the delegations of France, Guatemala, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States. The Committee discussed social conditions from the 169th to 180th meeting.

14. In conformity with the programme of studies approved by the Committee at its eighth session, the Secretariat and the specialized agencies had prepared a number of special studies relating to problems of family and community in the context of economic and social change and relating to broader aspects of public health. The Committee had also before it summaries, prepared by the Secretary-General, of the information transmitted by the Administering Members in respect of 1956 or 1956/1957. The principal studies prepared by the Secretariat included papers on the social aspects of urban development, social measures for the economic welfare of the family, peasant societies in transition, indigenous land tenure, juvenile delinquency, race relations, demographic conditions and population trends, mass communications, and a general paper on social conditions covering aspects of community development, industrial relations and town and country planning and housing. The reports prepared by the specialized agencies included studies on family earnings in urban industrial areas and on workers' housing problems (ILO); development and problems of the urban family in Africa South of the Sahara (UNESCO); maternal and child health, population and public health in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and long-term health planning (WHO); and a report on nutrition (FAO and WHO). There was also a report by UNICEF on its activities. The list of special studies appears in the annex to part Two of the present report.

15. In 1955 the Committee drew attention to the concept of social development as "nothing less than the whole process of change and advance in a Territory considered in terms of the progressive well-being of the society and the individual". This year the Committee discussed developments in the social field in the light of the principles of the Charter and the objectives of social policy set forth in the 1955 report. In the course of discussion, the representatives of Australia, France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom outlined principles of policy and reviewed recent developments in the Territories under their administration; statements on aspects of development in the field of social conditions were made by the representatives of Brazil, Ceylon, China, Guatemala, India, Iraq, the United States and Venezuela. The representatives of FAO, ILO, UNESCO and WHO supplemented the information presented by their organizations.

16. The representative of Australia affirmed that in Papua the promotion of social change leading to the emergence of a new society remained the fundamental care of his Government in Papua. While it was possible to aid the growth of this new society, which could not be arbitrarily constructed, it was clear that the Papuans had the right to determine the social conditions under which they wished to live. With only 2.7 per cent of Papua at present not under some degree of Administration influence, it was planned to bring the whole Territory under full Administration control by 1959. In Papua, there had been an expansion of the administrative services, progress in the provision of public health services and the extension of education, and a growth of community effort and heightened social education, as evidenced by the increases in co-operative societies and local government councils. Instances were given of the implementation of the declared policy of co-operation between the Australian and the Netherlands Administrations in New Guinea.

17. The representative of France considered that one of the most important social problems was the family change taking place in urban industrial areas as a result of the impact of Western culture on the indigenous social structure. The aim of French policy was to facilitate and guide this change so that there would be equal progress among all elements of the population. Modern African families were coming into existence, with assistance provided by the welfare centres and their trained social workers. Since the introduction of the loi cadre, responsibilities in the social sphere had been largely transferred to the local authorities. The Committee was informed of legislative and administrative measures taken by territorial governments to protect family earnings in industrial areas, including provisions for an eight-hour day, a weekly rest day, paid holidays and guaranteed minimum wages, and the establishment of a system of family benefits. Under the Labour Code of 15 December 1952, which was in force in all French Overseas Territories, there was no discrimination on the basis of race, sex, age or status.

18. The representative of the Netherlands reviewed the implementation of policy in Netherlands New Guinea, including the 1953-1956 development plan and subsequently adopted measures, which took into account the criteria established by the various organs of the United Nations. Government control over the Territory had gradually been extended to cover more than half of the estimated population, and was gaining momentum as new cadres were trained. A start had been made in creating village councils and advisory bodies, through which the people assumed responsibility for their own affairs. A scheme to promote social activities at the regional level had been introduced. The Committee was also informed of recent developments in various fields, including education, public health and research. As indicated in the joint statement of the Netherlands and the Australian Governments of 6 November 1957, the collaboration between their respective administrative services in New Guinea was being further intensified in the interest of the inhabitants.

19. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that a great deal of valuable advance had been achieved by the Governments and peoples in the Non-Self-Governing Territories during the period 1954-1956. He pointed out that in assessing progress an important factor to be taken into account was the extent to which a community had gained experience and become conscious of its social responsibilities. Efforts were being made to stimulate the active participation of the people and to train local leaders in every field and at every level. In Kenya and Uganda, for example, national community development training centres had been established. In the United Kingdom Territories, generally, training was also provided in citizenship, rural hygiene, housing, agriculture and the organization of co-operatives as well as trade unions. The Committee was informed of the progress made in the training of public health personnel and in the control and eradication of various diseases in the Territories. In the sphere of social medicine, greater attention was being given to the needs of the family and of individuals, particularly through the education of women.

20. The representative of the United States emphasized that all social policies should be based on the needs and aspirations of the peoples concerned and welcomed the success of the housing policies of France, Belgium and the United Kingdom in their Territories in Africa.

21. In subsequent statements, the representatives of Australia, France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom furnished additional information on the social aspects of urbanization, including housing and measures for the economic welfare of the family. The representative of the United Kingdom also made available to the Committee supplementary material on social conditions and photographs of housing projects in several Non-Self-Governing Territories.

22. The representatives of ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO introduced and amplified the reports prepared by their organizations, making, in the opinion of the Committee, an important contribution to its discussions.

23. The representative of FAO informed the Committee of the assistance his organization provided and could provide to Non-Self-Governing Territories in rural development, for instance, in matters concerning co-operatives, rural credit arrangements and village handicrafts.

24. The representative of the ILO informed the Committee of some recent developments within the purview of his organization, particularly in Africa. A comprehensive survey of labour and social conditions, which would provide a basis for the ILO's work in Africa, had been completed and would soon be published. The ILO had decided to establish an African Advisory Committee and to set up a field office in Africa. There had been an increase in the application of ILO conventions to Non-Self-Governing Territories.

25. The representative of UNESCO reaffirmed the importance his organization attached to the scientific study of the social aspects of urbanization in countries undergoing rapid economic development and informed the Committee of the further studies and activities of UNESCO in this field. The report on development and problems of the urban family in Africa South of the Sahara contained a synthesis of the general trends and the most pressing problems.

26. The representative of WHO drew attention to the shortage of medical personnel in Non-Self-Governing Territories, particularly in areas where health conditions were poor. He underlined a number of recommendations which WHO had made concerning the control of communicable diseases, the training of personnel and the use of peripheral health units. He reaffirmed WHO's offer to assist in carrying out general planning surveys in the Non-Self-Governing Territories at the request of the metropolitan Governments concerned.

27. The representatives of Brazil, Ceylon, China, Guatemala, India, Iraq and Venezuela made general statements emphasizing the principles of progress in the field of social conditions. In general they noted the advances reported in the social field, particularly in the extension of community development, the growth of trade unions and co-operatives, as evidence of the increasing participation of the inhabitants of the Territories in the execution of policies and programmes. They affirmed that social progress could not be dissociated from economic, educational and political progress and stressed the importance of co-ordinated and balanced developments in all fields. They called for greater attention to the problems of the rural areas, particularly through the intensification of programmes of community development. One of the most urgent tasks in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was to reduce their vulnerability to fluctuations of world commodity prices and to raise the standards of living of the rural population.

28. The representative of Ceylon urged the Committee to consider particular social problems in the general context of the transition of peoples in the Territories towards modern forms of society. He pointed out the need for local leadership and called for a vigorous social policy providing for increasing co-operation between the indigenous peoples and the administrations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

29. The representative of China endorsed the view previously expressed by the Committee that the improvement of urban living conditions not only called for direct administrative action but for profound changes in the traditional social structure and the reorganization of the changing society on a new basis. He stressed the need for a serious study of the impact, in urban and rural areas, of urbanization and of the commercialization of the indigenous economics, on the traditional family and social patterns.

30. The representative of Guatemala underlined a number of problems arising from urbanization in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and urged far-sighted urban and rural planning. The role of government should be to provide the basic social institutions, to assist the communities in their adaptation to modern life and to help the inhabitants of the Territories to take part increasingly in their own development. He also noted that community development was now gaining force as a national movement in many Territories and provided a basis for the development of local government. He pointed out that, where modern forms of government were not being established rapidly enough, there were risks of creating a political vacuum and he urged that the training of leaders and community workers should be increased.

31. The representative of India pointed out that with the changes taking place in the Territories it was necessary to create in urban areas conditions which would enable members of every race to participate in all urban activities on a footing of equality. He expressed the hope that Administering Members would take measures to stabilize the urban labour force and that, in so doing, they would take into account the recommendations made at its third session by the ILO Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories on workers' housing and the recommendations on wage policy made at its fourth session. Community development was related to the development of local government institutions in that both were a means of educating the people in the theory and practice of democracy. He informed the Committee of the experience gained from India's work in the field of community development, which had shown that the close association of the people in the formulation and execution of development programmes was essential for success.

32. The representative of Iraq shared the view that in order to mitigate the effects of social disruption in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, priority had to be given to preventive social measures. He welcomed the advances made in town and country planning and observed that an effective means of solving housing problems, which had been employed in his country, was the establishment of government banks to provide long-term, low-interest loans to house builders.

33. The representative of Venezuela stressed that social development should be examined in the light of the aims of policy contained in the Committee's 1955 report on social conditions. Social policies should be directed towards ensuring the well-being of the inhabitants and towards developing their moral and civic consciousness so as to enable them to take an increasing share in their own affairs. He welcomed the extension and consolidation of community development schemes, and the growth of co-operatives and trade unions in the Territories, all of which were evidence of the active participation of the inhabitants in effecting the transformation of society.

34. In accordance with the suggestions made during the discussion of the agenda (paragraph 9), the Committee also discussed under this item the social aspects of mass communications. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the importance of mass communications in community development work and extension work in general was fully recognized in the United Kingdom Territories. Extensive use was made of visual and audio-visual media by community development officers. Efforts were being made to meet the need for follow-up literature in connexion with literacy and adult education campaigns.

As an example, he cited the work of the East African Literature Bureau in preparing and disseminating suitable literature. The Committee was also informed that a permanent centre had recently been established in the United Kingdom to help the overseas Territories in the use and application of visual aids.

35. The representative of Ceylon considered that mass media could play an important part in bettering social conditions and in training local leaders. He noted from the information before the Committee that there was an increasing demand for effective audio-visual aids as a means of disseminating information and furthering education. Since the effective use of such media was hindered by illiteracy, he urged that efforts should be made to promote literacy, and that wider use should be made of local languages, particularly in film commentaries, radio programmes, books and magazines.

36. The Committee also discussed in some detail juvenile delinquency, aspects of public health, and race relations. The views expressed by members of the Committee are reflected in the special report on social conditions, which forms Part Two of the present report.

37. At the 186th meeting, the Chairman of the Sub-Committee introduced the report on social conditions. The representatives of Australia, India, the Netherlands and Venezuela submitted jointly a draft procedural resolution under which the General Assembly would (a) approve the further report on social conditions prepared in 1958 and consider that it should be read with the earlier reports approved in 1952 and 1955; and (b) invite the Secretary-General to transmit the 1958 report to the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, the Trusteeship Council and the specialized agencies concerned for their consideration. The draft resolution, to be submitted for approval to the General Assembly at its thirteenth session, was approved by the Committee by 12 votes to none, with 1 abstention. The text of the draft resolution is included in annex II of the present report as draft resolution A.

VII. Economic conditions

38. In 1957, at its eighth session, the Committee had given particular attention to economic conditions and had drawn up a special report. In the light of that report, the Committee considered economic conditions at its ninth session from the 174th to the 182nd meetings.

39. No special studies were submitted to the Committee on this item, but information on economic conditions was included in the summaries, prepared by the Secretary-General, of the information transmitted by the Administering Members relating to 1956 or 1956/1957<sup>1</sup> and in the summaries of information transmitted by the Netherlands and the United Kingdom under section C of the Standard Form.<sup>2</sup>

40. At the 179th meeting, the representative of France reviewed the economic situation in the French Overseas Territories. Information available since the Committee had last considered economic conditions showed that the levelling off in 1955 of the steady economic progress in the Territories had been followed by a more favourable trend in 1956. The information for that year showed that the deficit of the balance of trade had been reduced, with exports covering 83 per cent of imports in 1956 compared with 78 per cent in 1955. With the decline in prices of tropical produce, continued assistance, through stabilization funds subsidized by the Metropolitan Government, had been provided to raise the incomes of producers. The magnitude of the economic development in the French Overseas Territories was evidenced by the capital invested in them and by the growth of their gross production. Over the period 1946-1957 a total of 862,000 million francs had been invested in these Territories from Metropolitan resources. Over the period 1948 to 1956 the gross national product of French West Africa had increased by 80 per cent and that of French Equatorial Africa by 87 per cent. The Committee was informed of further progress made in large-scale projects for industrial installations in these Territories and of measures taken to stimulate agricultural production, as steps towards developing a more balanced economy and providing a better living for the peoples concerned.

41. The representatives of Ceylon, China and India welcomed the information given by France, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom on the general trends of development in their Territories. They noted the advances made in various fields, particularly in development planning and research, but considered that for making an assessment too short a time had elapsed since the Committee had last examined economic conditions. They asked the Administering Members what action had been taken in respect of the report on economic conditions and the recommendations of the Committee.

42. In the general debate and in the discussion of this item, several representatives referred to the establishment of the Economic Commission for Africa. They expressed the hope that it would contribute substantially to the social and economic advancement of the peoples in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in Africa. The representative of Brazil felt that the Committee should consider the advisability of establishing close relations with that Commission and that Members administering Non-Self-Governing Territories in Africa might suggest means of establishing an effective relationship between the two bodies.

43. At the 168th meeting, in reply to a question by the representative of Guatemala, the Secretary stated that the report requested under General Assembly resolution 1153 (XII) on developments connected with the association of Non-Self-Governing Territories with the European Economic Community was being prepared and would be submitted to the General Assembly at its thirteenth session. The representatives of Ceylon and Iraq reiterated the apprehensions felt by their delegations concerning the association of certain Non-Self-Governing Territories with the European Economic Community.

VIII. Educational conditions

44. The Committee considered educational conditions from the 180th to the 183rd meetings. In addition to the summaries of information, the Committee had before it a report on the eradication of illiteracy prepared by UNESCO in accordance with Assembly resolution 334 (IV) and also a report on mass communications prepared by the Secretariat, its first comprehensive study of this subject.

45. Statements were made by the representatives of Brazil, China, Guatemala, India, Iraq, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela. The representative of UNESCO introduced the report on illiteracy prepared by his organization and made available to the Committee additional material on mass communications and illiteracy.<sup>3</sup> In accordance with the suggestions made during the discussion of the agenda (paragraph 9), mass communications were also discussed in connexion with social conditions.

46. The Committee had before it this year for the first time a special study on mass communications prepared by the Secretariat. The information before the Committee showed that progress had been made in many Territories in the development and use of mass communications and in the training of locally appointed information officers. Since the Second World War, the distribution of newspapers and periodicals had increased in many Territories but there was still a shortage of newspapers in local languages. Increasingly, the effectiveness of radio broadcasting was being recognized, as was evident from the number of radio programmes broadcast and the number of radio receivers in use. Mobile film units with commentaries in local languages had made possible the use of film as a medium of information to assist in educational, health and agricultural programmes. The representatives of the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States reviewed aspects of policy and developments in mass communications in the Territories under their administration.

47. The representative of the Netherlands gave an account of the educational situation in Netherlands New Guinea and indicated the problems resulting from the geographical distribution of the population. He discussed the use of mass communications media in health campaigns and agricultural work, and outlined recent developments in film and radio programmes and in the provision of reading material in books and periodicals. In areas under government control, a school system now existed which provided every child with an opportunity to attend school.

48. The representative of the United Kingdom reviewed the growth of information services and the use of mass communications media in the Territories for the administration of which his Government was responsible. It was the essence of a free society with democratic institutions that there should be a free flow of opinions and ideas; in this the Government had a duty to take part on the same terms as others, but not to be the only voice that could be heard. The public must have confidence in the integrity and accuracy of official information services, and they must therefore be free from any suspicion of furthering partisan political interests. He reviewed the history of broadcasting in the United Kingdom Territories, and the principles upon which services had been established there. He also described the financial and technical assistance provided by the United Kingdom Government for the development of local information services, the development of a free and responsible local Press and the establishment of film units and broadcasting services. Recently, television services had also been established in several Territories.

49. The representative of the United States emphasized the importance of fostering the indigenous languages and cultures of the Non-Self-Governing Territories as a means of strengthening the self-awareness of the inhabitants and the foundation on which their future development could be based. He gave the Committee information on the newspapers, reading materials and other media in use in Samoa and Guam.

50. Several representatives noted with interest the advances made in the development of all forms of mass media. They welcomed the United Kingdom Government's policy of encouraging a free and responsible press. They recognized that the full utilization of mass media was still impeded by a number of problems in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, particularly in areas of high illiteracy. They stressed the importance of the use of local languages both as a means of strengthening the cultures of the peoples concerned and as a means of reaching wider sections of the populations. They noted that in some Territories broadcasting had been used to promote campaigns against illiteracy and in others to stimulate the participation of the inhabitants in various development programmes and in local elections. They expressed the hope that greater encouragement would be given to the development of a local press and to the use of radio broadcasting, as well as other visual and audio-visual media.

51. The representatives of Brazil, Ceylon, China, Guatemala, India, Iraq and Venezuela stressed the fundamental importance of education for social, economic and political advancement, the diffusion of culture, the development of moral and civic consciousness and the integration of national communities. They expressed concern that the information provided by UNESCO showed that there had been little change since 1956 in the rates of illiteracy, which remained high in many Territories. Pointing out that experience had proved that progress was most rapid when education was in the hands of local authorities, the representative of China urged the increasing participation of the inhabitants in the formulation and execution of educational policy. The representative of India noted that the Committee in 1953 had set universal and free schooling as the basis for a literate population. Recalling General Assembly resolution 1049 (XI), he suggested that it was desirable to set target dates for various phases of educational development. Affirming that the paramount educational problem was the eradication of illiteracy, the representative of Venezuela drew the attention of the Committee to the recommendations made by the Twentieth International Conference on Public Education and to the direct and indirect help UNESCO was giving to the Territories.

52. The representative of UNESCO informed the Committee that under resolution 6.21 of the General Conference of UNESCO, the Director General was authorized to plan, award and administer fellowships, scholarships and travel grants in co-operation with Member States, the United Nations, the specialized agencies and international non-governmental organizations. He reaffirmed that his organization was ready to provide such assistance as might be requested.

IX. Questions relating to summaries and analyses of information

53. The Committee considered this item at its 182nd and 183rd meetings.

54. Under General Assembly resolution 218 (III) the Secretary-General had prepared for the Committee summaries of the information transmitted by the Administering Members for the years 1956 and 1956/1957. Following the decision to change the system of reproduction in the years when supplemental information was transmitted, this year, as at the eighth session, the summaries were again submitted to the Committee in the form of off-set fascicles. Since each fascicle was to contain summaries of information on Territories in a given geographical region, only three out of nine of the fascicles of summaries could be prepared for the Committee at its opening meeting, as a result of the delay in the receipt of information on a number of Territories.

55. The representative of France indicated at the 169th meeting that his delegation would shortly transmit to the Secretary-General information on French West Africa and French Somaliland. The territorial authorities had been preoccupied with new tasks arising out of the implementation of the loi-cadre.

56. The Committee had before it a document<sup>4</sup> giving the dates of receipt of the information transmitted under Article 73 e during the years 1955, 1956 and 1957, and showing that, for the current year, information had not yet been received on Barbados, Fiji, French Somaliland, French West Africa, Pitcairn and Singapore.

57. The question of the delay in the transmission of information by Administering Members, to which attention had been drawn by several representatives under earlier items, was again raised under this item of the agenda. The representatives of Ceylon, China and India drew attention to General Assembly resolution 218 (III), which invited Administering Members to transmit the information to the Secretary-General within six months of the end of the administrative year of the Territory concerned. They expressed the hope that the Administering Members would do their utmost to comply with that request. In the course of the discussions on economic, social and educational conditions, a number of representatives pointed out that the information available did not provide an adequate basis for an analysis of conditions in the Territories and sought and obtained clarifications from Administering Members. The representative of China recalled that at the eighth session of the Committee, while favourably impressed with the possible advantages of the new method of reproduction and distribution of the summaries, his delegation had expressed concern lest some of the information might not be ready for the Committee. His delegation refrained from comment until sufficient experience had been gained of the new methods and, as the question would be before the thirteenth session of the General Assembly, he reserved the position of his delegation.

58. Several representatives drew attention to General Assembly resolutions 144 (II), 327 (IV), 551 (VI) and 848 (IX), by which the Administering Members were invited to transmit information on political development. The view was expressed that the primary objective of Chapter XI of the Charter was the development of self-government in the dependent Territories and that economic and social conditions could not be examined in a political vacuum. It was urged that, as many Territories were undergoing rapid changes, information on political development was particularly important. It was noted that Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United States had furnished information on political development and the hope was expressed that other Administering Members would also submit such information. It was also noted that in 1958 Australia had submitted to the Secretary-General information on the Cocos (Keeling) Islands.

59. It was pointed out in the Committee that under the revised Standard Form, adopted by the General Assembly at its sixth session (resolution 551 (VI) of 7 December 1951), the Administering Members were specifically invited to transmit information on the manner in which human rights were protected by law and the extent to which this protection accorded with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Several representatives considered there was inadequate information on human rights.

60. Several representatives also suggested that it would be useful if representative persons from the Territories and of non-governmental organizations concerned with activities in the Territories could be more closely associated with the work of the Committee.<sup>5</sup>

61. With reference to the obligation of Member States to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter, the representatives of India, Ceylon and Guatemala stated that, as indicated in resolutions 334 (IV) and 742 (VIII), the General Assembly was competent to express its opinion on what were the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which the obligation to transmit such information existed. They rejected the view that the determination of such Territories was the exclusive prerogative of individual Member States. They expressed the hope that Member States which had not yet transmitted information on Non-Self-Governing Territories under their administration would do so.

62. The representative of Australia opposed the claim of a number of countries, in contradiction with Article 2, paragraph 7, and Article 73 of the Charter, to determine what Territories forming part of the metropolitan areas of Member States, as defined by their constitutions, should be characterized as Non-Self-Governing Territories. Australia was reluctant to think that any country might, even by inference, suggest that Chapter XI diminished the sovereign rights of Member States under the Charter.

X. International collaboration in respect of economic, social and educational conditions

63. The Committee considered this item from its 182nd to its 184th meetings. The representatives of Australia, Ceylon, China, India, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and United States took part in the discussions.

<sup>5</sup> The Chairman of the Committee had received, and had informally distributed to members of the Committee, communications addressed to him by the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions and the Friends World Committee for Consultation.

64. The Committee had before it reports prepared by UNESCO, UNICEF and WHO on their activities in Non-Self-Governing Territories and a report on international technical assistance<sup>6</sup> prepared by the Secretariat, and heard additional statements on this subject by the representatives of FAO and WHO.

65. The information on the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance showed that for the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration, as for other participating organizations, 1956 had seen the emergence of new programmes in Africa not only in countries that have recently become independent, but also in Non-Self-Governing Territories, following the increased participation of Administering Members in the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance. The 1958 global programme, however, was estimated to be below the level of 1957. This change was also reflected in the assistance approved for Non-Self-Governing Territories in 1958, which amounted to $US825,861 for twenty-five Territories, compared with $US993,101 for twenty-one Territories in 1957. The number of experts approved in 1958 was 107, compared with 158 in 1957, and the number of fellowships was eleven, compared with twenty.

66. The representatives of India, Ceylon and China commented on this change. They pointed out that international technical assistance provided through the United Nations and the specialized agencies played a significant role in the development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and served to further the peoples' understanding of the United Nations. They considered that greater use might be made by the Administering Members of fellowships provided under the Expanded Programme. They expressed the hope that technical assistance would be increasingly provided to assist these Territories in the establishment of long-term services and programmes integrated in national plans of development. The representative of Guatemala expressed the view that it would be appropriate to strengthen relations between Non-Self-Governing Territories and the regional organizations in which they participated with independent countries in the same area and their respective regional organizations.

67. The representatives of Australia, Netherlands and the United Kingdom welcomed the assistance provided to the Non-Self-Governing Territories by the United Nations, the specialized agencies and UNICEF. The representatives of the United States reiterated the support of his Government for this assistance. Representatives of Administering Members provided the Committee with further information on activities of their Governments within the framework of the Colombo Plan, the South Pacific Commission, the Caribbean Commission and the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara (CCTA). They stated that the specialized agencies and the regional commissions effectively complemented each other's activities in promoting the welfare of the peoples of the Territories and cited examples of collaboration. They described the facilities and services provided by members of the regional commissions to the Territories.

68. The Committee was informed that the South Pacific Commission had recently reviewed its work and organization and had agreed that particular emphasis should be placed on increased participation by the Governments and the peoples of the Territories of the area in projects to be undertaken. During the past year, the membership of CCTA had increased and a new scheme had been inaugurated to assist in making available to countries and Territories in its region, experts and advisers and help in training personnel.

69. The representative of India welcomed the international collaboration represented by the work of these inter-governmental bodies, but expressed some apprehension lest the use of such agencies might prevent full utilization of the machinery of the United Nations and its specialized agencies. The representative of the United Kingdom did not share the view that regional commissions, which the United Kingdom Government regard as a valuable medium of international collaboration, were in competition with the specialized agencies and other United Nations bodies. He illustrated this by examples showing the collaboration of CCTA with the United Nations Secretariat and the specialized agencies. He also expressed the view that co-operation between CCTA and the United Nations Secretariat would doubtless expand still further with the establishment of the Economic Commission for Africa.

70. Referring, at the 183rd meeting, to General Assembly resolutions 931 (X) and 1154 (XII), requesting the Secretary-General to report to the General Assembly details relating to offers of study and training facilities to the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories under General Assembly resolution 845 (IX), the representative of the Secretary-General gave a preliminary account of recent offers, applications for scholarships, awards of scholarships and the use made of them. Between October 1957 and May 1958, the Secretary-General had been informed that the scholarships awarded and taken up were as follows: Czechoslovakia, seven awarded and two taken up; Greece, two awarded and expected to be taken up during the year; Romania, two awarded and taken up; USSR, six awarded and one taken up. No beneficiary had yet arrived to take up any of the six scholarships awarded by Poland. In some cases, beneficiaries had declined the awards and in others requested their deferment. Further offers notified to the Secretary-General were as follows: five additional scholarships offered by Czechoslovakia, bringing its total to twenty; two scholarships offered by Brazil for university and post-graduate studies and three scholarships offered by Israel for post-graduate studies to students from Non-Self-Governing Territories in Africa. In addition, Australia, India and the United States had communicated information on national and regional scholarships schemes, under which certain awards were made to students from the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

71. The representatives of Australia and the United States gave the Committee details of the scholarships awarded by their Governments to inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories. Under an exchange persons programme fourteen scholarships in the United States had been taken up by students from Non-Self-Governing Territories during the current school year, and it was expected that fourteen would be awarded in 1958-1959 and that, under the technical training programme of the United States International Cooperation Administration conducted in co-operation with the Government of Puerto Rico, between 150 and 200 grants would be taken up. Under the Colombo Plan, Australia had awarded more than 2,000 scholarships to Asians, including 274 from Non-Self-Governing Territories, and granted 160 correspondence scholarships to students resident in these Territories. In addition, under the International Scholarship Scheme, Australia had awarded several scholarships to students in Territories in the Pacific. The representative of Australia also observed that Member States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories had to maintain in principle the right and responsibility of reviewing all scholarships offered to those Territories.

XI. Report on progress achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories

72. The Committee considered this item at its 184th meeting.

73. In pursuance of paragraph 6 of General Assembly resolution 1053 (XI), the Secretary-General submitted to the Committee information<sup>7</sup> on the stages of the preparation of the report on progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Further consultations had been held with the specialized agencies and agreement had been reached among the secretariats on a tentative time-table and the distribution of the various sections of the report following the principal points approved by the General Assembly. The report on progress will consist of three main parts: an introductory or general section; a substantive section, giving a review of economic, social and educational conditions; and summaries of information on individual Territories during the period since the establishment of the United Nations.

74. Taking into account the need for the limitation of documentation, the Secretary-General had stated that every effort would be made to limit the report to a reasonable minimum. According to the schedule agreed upon between the secretariats of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, the drafts of some of the sections would be completed at the end of 1958 and those of other sections during the early part of 1959, so that adequate time would be available for final co-ordination.

75. In his report, the Secretary-General outlined for the consideration of the Committee arrangements whereby, if it were renewed on its present basis, the Committee would in 1959 give primary consideration to educational conditions and examine summaries of information covering the period since the establishment of the United Nations, instead of full three-year summaries, and whereby the introductory and substantive sections of the progress report would be submitted to the fourteenth session of the General Assembly "for such arrangements as it may deem most convenient for the organization of the study of the report with the fullest benefit of the assistance, advice and recommendations which the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories may wish to give".

76. Further information was provided to the Committee in a statement made by the representative of the Secretary-General. The representatives of Brazil, Ceylon, China, India, Iraq, New Zealand, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom participated in the discussions.

77. The representative of India considered that it was for the General Assembly to decide on the size and manner in which it wished the report prepared, and the procedure it wished to adopt for its examination. The representatives of Ceylon, China and the Netherlands expressed similar views. The representative of Brazil expressed his support for the working plan for the progress report and considered that the report should be comprehensive. The representative of New Zealand expressed reservations about the assumption in the report of the Secretary-General that the General Assembly intended to institute a study of the progress report.

78. Having regard to General Assembly resolution 1203 (XII), the representative of the United Kingdom urged that every effort should be made to reduce the size of the report.

79. The representative of India recalled that in resolution 1053 (XI) the General Assembly had invited the Administering Members to include in the information regularly transmitted by them under Article 73 e such information as might be practicable for the preparation of the report.

80. The representatives of China and India further observed that the General Assembly had only asked that the Committee should be kept informed of the progress of the report and that it was not necessary for the Committee to take any decision on the Secretary-General's report. The representative of Iraq agreed with this view. The representative of Ceylon added that it was not for the Committee to take any decision regarding the length of the progress report of the Secretary-General.

81. At the conclusion of the discussion, the Chairman said that it was his understanding that the Committee wished merely to take note of the report of the Secretary-General.

82. The representative of the Netherlands expressed the hope that, if the summaries covering the period from the beginning of the United Nations were to be examined by the Committee, these summaries would be made available in time to enable members to study them. The Secretary of the Committee stated that, subject to the receipt of the information in time, efforts would be made to distribute the summaries sufficiently in advance for study by members. The summaries would not be distributed in offset form but would first be mimeographed as General Assembly documents and subsequently printed.

83. At the 186th meeting, the representative of Guatemala stated that in his judgement it was for the General Assembly to decide upon the various aspects relating to the report on progress achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories ever since the United Nations had been created in accordance with the provisions of resolutions 932 (X) and 1053 (XI) of the General Assembly. He emphasized that this viewpoint reaffirmed the principle of examination which his delegation upholds and which it is the competence of the General Assembly to carry out or apply in the manner it deems appropriate.

XII. Question of the renewal of the Committee

84. By resolution 933 (X), adopted by the General Assembly on 8 November 1955, in operative paragraph 1, it was decided "to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis for a further three-year period," and in operative paragraph 8 that "at its thirteenth session, the General Assembly" would "reconsider the question of continuing the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, together with the questions of competence and terms of reference of this or any such future committee".

85. At the 184th meeting, the representative of the United States, on his own behalf and on behalf of the representatives of Ceylon and India, introduced a joint draft resolution<sup>a</sup> on the renewal of the Committee. At the request of the representative of France, the Committee decided, without further discussion to vote on the draft resolution and adopted it by 10 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

86. The Committee thus recommends to the General Assembly for its approval the draft resolution on the renewal of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis as was set forth in resolution 933 (X). The text of the draft resolution is given in annex II of the present report.

87. The following explanations of vote were given:

88. The representative of the United Kingdom said that his delegation had abstained from voting on the draft resolution in order to reserve its position until the General Assembly was called on to take a decision on the continuance of the Committee on its present basis. His abstention did not imply any change in the attitude of his Government, towards the Committee, for which they could see no constitutional foundation. Chapter XI of the Charter contained a declaration by the Administering Members that they accepted certain general obligations with regard to the Territories under their administration. They also accepted one specific obligation, to transmit regularly to the Secretary-General, for information purposes and subject to certain limitations, statistical and other information of a technical nature relating to economic, social and educational conditions in the Territories. The Charter did not, however, confer on the United Nations the right to consider or to discuss this information.

89. In explanation of his abstention, the representative of France recalled the statement of his delegation at the 169th meeting that, while the reservations of the French delegation concerning the Committee and its powers had not changed, the French delegation would, in a spirit of co-operation, continue to take part in the Committee's work and to communicate information in conformity with the United Nations Charter.

90. Recalling that, without prejudice to its rights under the Charter, Australia had fully co-operated, as an act of international comity, in the work of the Committee, the representative of Australia said he had abstained from voting on the draft resolution and reserved his delegation's right to reconsider its position when the question came before the General Assembly.

91. The representative of India, one of the co-sponsors of the draft resolution, stated that the authority of the Committee rested on the provisions contained in Articles 10 and 22 of the Charter of the United Nations. He said that the abstentions of Australia, France and the United Kingdom showed that those countries would continue to participate in the work of the Committee and he thanked them for adopting that attitude.

92. The representative of Guatemala reaffirmed that the Committee should continue its work and should be established on a permanent basis. At a previous meeting of the Committee's present session the representative of Guatemala had expressed the view that the terms of reference of the Committee should be widened and expressed his delegation's regret that some of the Administering Members continued to make reservations in principle about the continuation of the Committee and had not been able to give their consent to the establishment of the Committee on a permanent basis. On another occasion the representative of Guatemala stated that the General Assembly was responsible for ensuring the fulfilment of the obligations assumed by both Administering and non-Administering Members under Articles 73 and 74.

93. The representative of Ceylon, also a co-sponsor of the draft resolution, considered the Committee fully competent to examine the information transmitted by the Administering Members under Article 73 e of the Charter. He referred to his statement, made at a previous meeting, to the effect that he could not share the reservations made by some of the Administering Members concerning the competence and terms of reference of the Committee. He nevertheless appreciated their assurances of co-operation.

94. The representative of China stated that his delegation had voted for the draft resolution because the Committee's usefulness had been generally recognized and because, in recent sessions, many Members had emphasized the harmonious and co-operative spirit in which the Committee had worked.

95. Several representatives expressed their regret at the continued absence of Belgium from the Committee and their hope that Belgium would find it possible to participate in the work of the Committee in the future.

XIII. Future work of the Committee

96. In accordance with General Assembly resolutions 218 (III) and 846 (IX), full summaries covering a period of three years should be provided to the General Assembly in 1959, and under the programme of work established by resolution 333 (IV) the Committee should in that year give special attention to educational conditions.

97. Without prejudice to any decision the General Assembly might take concerning its renewal, the Committee considered the question of its future work at its 184th and 185th meetings.

98. At its 184th meeting, the Committee considered the Secretary-General's report on the stages of preparation of the report on progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories undertaken by the Secretary-General in pursuance of resolution 1053 (XI). Since the Committee in 1959 would examine the summaries of information, forming part of the progress report, the Committee does not call for the submission of the usual full summaries covering a three-year period.

99. The Committee had before it a programme of studies<sup>9</sup> on educational conditions prepared by the Secretariat. The subjects suggested were fundamental education and eradication of illiteracy, local participation in the development of education, special problems of school systems with particular reference to free and compulsory education and secondary education, higher education, and vocational and technical training.

100. The representative of China pointed out that since agriculture still formed the main basis of the economy of most Non-Self-Governing Territories, measures taken to provide agricultural extension services were of particular interest to the Committee. He suggested that a study might be prepared on agricultural education and research. He also recalled that during the discussions in the Committee emphasis had been laid on the need for trained doctors and other medical personnel and suggested that the study on higher education should include information on such training.

101. The representative of India expressed the hope that in view of the importance of secondary and higher education in the Territories the reports on these subjects would be more detailed.

102. The Committee approved the programme of its work for the next session set forth in documents A/AC.35/L.286 and Corr.1, together with the suggestions made by the representatives of China and India.

Part Two

REPORT ON SOCIAL CONDITIONS IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

I. Introduction<sup>1</sup>

1. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories consists of the seven Members of the United Nations which, as responsible for the administration of the Territories, transmit information in accordance with Article 73 e of the Charter, together with an equal number of non-administering Members of the United Nations elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly. The Committee examines summaries and analyses of information on economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It is invited to submit to the General Assembly reports "containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories" (resolution 933 (X)).

2. In 1952 and 1955, the Committee prepared special reports on social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>2</sup> The General Assembly, by resolution 643 (VII), approved the 1952 report as a brief but considered indication of social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and of the problems of social development, inviting the Secretary-General to communicate it to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council, and to the specialized agencies concerned. The General Assembly, by resolution 929 (X), took similar action on the 1955 report and, at the same time, expressed its satisfaction at the increasing co-operation between those Members of the United Nations administering Non-Self-Governing Territories and the international bodies concerned, and requested the latter, in their work to take full account of the views expressed in the report on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

<sup>1</sup> The draft of the present report was prepared by a Sub-Committee of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories composed of the representatives of Ceylon, China, France, Guatemala, India, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America.

The members of the delegations who served on the Sub-Committee were: Ceylon: Mr. Y. Duraiswamy; China: Mr. Hsi-kun Yang and Mr. Wei-liang Yin; France: Mr. Michel de Camaret, Mr. René Doise and Mr. Jean Pourchel (expert); Guatemala: Mr. José Rölz Bennett, Mr. Carlos Urrutia Aparicio and Mr. Maximiliano Kestler Farnés (expert); India: Mr. R. Jaipal; Netherlands: Mr. J. Vixseboxse, Mr. A. D. Vas Nunes and Mr. Ch. J. Grader (expert); United Kingdom: Mr. G. K. Caston and Mr. W. H. Chinn (expert); United States: Mr. Bolard More, Dr. Arthur S. Osborne (expert) and Mr. John T. Wheelock.

The officers of the Sub-Committee were: Chairman, Mr. J. Vixseboxse (Netherlands); and Vice-Chairman, Mr. Y. Duraiswamy (Ceylon).

The Rapporteur of the Committee and the representatives of FAO, ILO, WHO and UNESCO also participated in the debates of the Sub-Committee.

3. Also in 1955, the General Assembly approved resolution 930 (X) and decided that the Standard Form annexed to resolution 551 (VI) should be modified by the addition of a text providing for information on programmes and progress of community development.

4. In 1958, in accordance with the work programme set forth in resolution 333 (IV), subsequently confirmed by resolution 933 (X), the Committee was again called upon to pay particular attention to social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It undertook the study of social conditions in the Territories on the basis of the information transmitted by the Members responsible for their administration and in the light of the views expressed in its 1952 and 1955 reports, which were brought to the attention of the Authorities responsible in the Territories for the implementation of educational, economic and social policies in accordance with the terms of resolution 645 (VII).

5. For its discussions, the Committee had before it studies prepared by the United Nations Secretariat, the International Labour Organisation, the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, the World Health Organization, and the United Nations Children's Fund, as well as summaries of the information that had been transmitted by the Administering Members on social conditions up to the end of 1956 or to mid-1957. These documents are listed in the annex to this report, and, together with the summary records of the Committee's discussions should be regarded as part of the present report.

6. The Committee appreciates the assistance it received from the representatives of Australia, France, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America who gave additional information on conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

7. By resolution 933 (X), the General Assembly reiterated its invitation that members of the Committee should attach to their delegations persons specially qualified in the functional fields within the Committee's purview. The Committee in 1958 had the advantage of the presence of experts in the delegations of France, Guatemala, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States of America and notes the valuable assistance that it received from them. Finally, assistance was received from representatives of the non-Administering Members who gave information on their experiences with policies and programmes which threw light on comparable problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

II. Principles of social advancement

8. The Committee took into account the information on more recent developments in specific social fields contained in the reports prepared by the Secretariat and the specialized agencies, as well as the supplemental information given in the statements made during the debate by the representatives of the Administering Members.

9. This information was considered by the Committee in the light of Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations. In the examination of the information and in the debate, the Committee was guided by the views recorded in its 1952 and 1955 reports and, in particular, by the principal aims of social policy in Non-Self-Governing Territories which were enumerated in 1955 by the Committee as follows:

(a) To study, alleviate and remedy the social problems which now face all communities, having particular regard to the problems arising from the contact of cultures and economic, political and social changes;

(b) To watch trends and policies in all aspects of development in order to anticipate and guide so far as is possible their effects in the best interests of the individual and the community;

(c) To develop programmes of social policy, to establish and encourage the establishment of social organizations which will take account of the basic cultural values and aspirations of the peoples concerned;

(d) To seek means by which the moral and civic consciousness and responsibility of the peoples will be developed so that they will take an increasing share in the conduct of their own affairs and, to an increasing extent, form and direct their own social programmes in harmony with universal ideals of human betterment and their own cultural characteristics;

(e) To stimulate or encourage initiative in the organization of, or participation in, schemes of community development or other forms of community effort, as effective instruments toward the progressive well-being of society and of the individual;

(f) To develop the family so that as a basic social unit it will contribute effectively to the welfare of its members and to meeting the needs of the local and territorial community;

(g) To provide for the enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health, considered as a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity, so as to promote general physical and mental development;

(h) To improve living conditions in the broadest fields of family and community life and to assist the peoples in the attainment of higher standards of living;

(i) To encourage a balanced progress of all sections of the community;

(j) To achieve an integrated society on the basis of the free contributions of each section of the community;

(k) To co-ordinate all programmes of social policy in order to achieve the above purposes.

These objectives have been taken into account in the legislation of a number of Territories.

10. The Committee reaffirmed its broad concept of social development adopted in 1955. It stressed that social development was nothing less than the whole process of change and advancement in a Territory considered in terms of the progressive well-being of society and its component parts, covering and informing the economic, social, political and cultural fields. Before considering more specific aspects of social policy, the Committee reiterated that social development should not be regarded merely as the sum of developmental activities carried out within these fields. The emphasis should be on a common approach to development as a whole and on the co-ordination of services for economic, social and educational development.

11. The fundamental objectives and the purposes to be pursued in the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories are defined in Chapter XI of the Charter. The Charter provides that the Members which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of Territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government recognize the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of these Territories are paramount and that they accept as a sacred trust the obligation to promote to the utmost the well-being of these inhabitants by ensuring their political, economic, social and educational advancement, with due respect for the culture of the peoples concerned.

12. Data contained in the documentation and the additional information supplied by the representatives of the Administering Members were cited in connexion with progress made in the years under review in community development, social welfare, industrial relations, housing, public health and nutrition, and social research. Although it was observed that basic social conditions had not significantly changed, the expansion of various public services, and the increased participation of inhabitants in the administration of these services and in the programmes and activities concerned with their welfare, were pointed out as indications of advancement achieved by the Governments and peoples of the Territories.

13. The Committee recalled the views expressed in its 1955 report on principles to be followed and steps to be taken in developing social policy with a view to attaining the fundamental purposes of the Charter of the United Nations and the principal aims of social policy as reproduced in paragraph 9 of the present report. Since 1955, the Committee has stressed that sustained progress can best be achieved through the attainment by the peoples of the Territories of a full share in the formulation of policies and in the planning and implementation of programmes of development. It is essential to associate the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the efforts of the administration and in the elaboration of social policy and the implementation of programmes of social development. In order to achieve this, it is of the utmost importance that leadership should be encouraged and the collaboration and support of the people sought. In this context, the purpose of social development is "to bring to every community a vision of the better way of life which, by their own efforts, they could build for themselves".

14. In indigenous societies whose social structure is being transformed and modified to meet the challenge of rapidly changing conditions, the responsibilities of Governments extend beyond the development of economic resources, the creation of new avenues of employment and the provision of public services. It is equally important to develop human resources, to direct and channel the forces and methods of change so that all the potentialities of the indigenous inhabitants may be engaged in creating appropriate and more satisfying forms of social life and organization.

15. In this context, community development has a major part to play, particularly in rural areas where the vast majority of peoples in the Non-Self-Governing Territories live and will continue to live for a long time to come. To a large extent the pace of development in general depends on the rate and nature of progress in rural communities.

16. There is nothing particularly new per se in the principles and methods of community development; they have been implicit in successful work carried out with groups of people for many years. The novelty of community development lies in the formulation of principles, the elaboration or codification of methods and their conscious application as a policy of government. Success in carrying out this policy demands the creation of stable communities capable of enduring the strains of rapid change: that is to say, a community within which the individual can find full satisfaction and a sense of security; the development of a sense of responsibility and integrity; and the possibilities for building a strong and developing economy. These are the foundations on which nationhood within a democratic framework must rest. This premise gives the concept of community development a distinctive character; the emphasis is placed on development of the community rather than by or for the community and it points to the close relationship with the developing and strengthening of local government.

17. The essence of the community development method is to stimulate and guide change through the willing co-operative effort of the community itself, the outside agent acting merely as a catalyst to arouse a sense of cohesion, purpose and achievement in the community. The Committee in 1955 recognized that the use of community development methods constituted a marked advance in administrative practice upon the use of purely ameliorative social measures and the direct technical approach.

18. The Committee noted with satisfaction that with the expansion of community development policies and programmes, the extension of training facilities and the provision of new administrative arrangements, a further spread and intensification of the community development movement had been recorded in many areas. In this connexion, the Committee wished to associate itself with the view that the material achievements of communities engaged in a variety of projects, spectacular as they may be in many cases, should not be mistaken for the attainment of community development objectives. In assessing progress, it is necessary to know how far the community, in the course of the execution of projects, has gained experience and has reached a stage where such projects are maintained, used and expanded, and where, in the process of setting them up, the community has become self-reliant with a confident sense of social responsibility.

19. In 1955, the Committee stressed the promotion and development of local leadership as a prerequisite for successful and sustained community development activities. The discovery, encouragement and training of local leaders, essential in any community programme or project, are equally necessary in every field of activity in which community development methods are being used to achieve new social, educational or economic objectives. The extent to which the local people are being trained to participate effectively in the formulation and execution of social policy in every field and at various levels through their own leaders is an important index of the character and strength of any programme of social development.

20. For these reasons, the Committee in 1955 and again in 1957 expressed the view that the development of popular leadership called for appraisal of the training policies and programmes both in scope and extent, as well as in terms of social content. Any training programme concerned mainly with imparting technical skills or training staff required by official organizations would not be sufficient. A broader conception is needed of the place and functions assigned to training institutions for social work and social administration and as cultural and training centres for many types of leaders and agents in social development; they should also offer facilities for reorientation or training in methods of group work to personnel engaged in different types of social action: teachers, agriculturalists, health workers, local government employees, trade union officers and industrial welfare workers, probation officers and others active in similar specialist fields. The purpose of the training should be the perfection of skills, the increase of technical efficiency, and, above all, the development of the creative potentialities of the people through better understanding of each other, the encouragement of individual and collective initiative, and the formulation of common ideals and purposes capable of uniting and guiding the people despite their ethnic affiliation, occupation or status. The Committee noted that national training centres and training programmes developed in some of the United Kingdom Territories followed these purposes in many respects.

21. Examples of training programmes for local leaders can be found in many other fields. Prominent among them is that of trade unionism. The community development approach has considerable relevance in public health work. Instances were cited from many Territories of the extension of preventive health measures in rural areas, of training schemes for local nursing and medical staff, and of the part played by women's groups and organizations in health education. The local leader who can effectively influence the smallest units of the community is the woman working within the family. One of the main obstacles to successful child welfare and maternity services in traditional rural societies is the ignorance of parents, particularly of mothers. Hence, health education, at the village and family level, should be regarded as an indispensable component of community development work.

22. The Committee was gratified to receive from the representatives of Australia and the Netherlands information on the progress of the co-operative movement and the development of local government machinery in the Territories under their administration, keeping in mind that societies of the co-operative type promote many aspects of better living and stimulate the spirit of popular co-operation essential for all programmes of community development, and that there is a close relationship between community progress and the development of local government.

III. Community development

23. In its 1955 report, the Committee discussed the principles underlying the concept of community development, its meaning and scope, as well as its relation to the evolution of democratic local government. It pointed out that community development embraced all forms of betterment that could be attained through the use of local resources and skills and with external stimulus and assistance. The general purpose of the movement was to enable a joint effort to be made by the Government and the people in which the latter's initiative would be encouraged until the peoples themselves reached the stage where they could assume control and carry forward the programmes. To that extent, community development represented a new approach in the administration of certain Non-Self-Governing Territories.

24. The Committee also referred in its last report to the encouraging results of community development programmes in some areas where they had advanced beyond mere ameliorative measures, and where the people's capacity for leadership and general participation had more than justified expectations. The Committee had stressed that unless organized as a broad movement of the people, community development might fail and that among the ingredients for its success, one of the most important was the vital role of the local leaders and the workers whose personality, training and qualities of leadership would often determine the success of a project. Other important factors were: (a) the informed participation of the people; (b) the co-operation of the various government services; (c) the continual training and special instruction of workers and leaders at all levels; (d) the need to keep the execution of all programmes under constant review; and (e) the desirability of gradually expanding the area of community development activity to cover the entire Territory.

25. The General Assembly in its resolution 930 (X) had modified the Standard Form to provide for the transmission of complete information on programmes and progress in the field of community development, the administrative organizations at the territorial levels responsible for these programmes, the different methods and techniques evolved in the Territories and the training schemes for local leaders and workers. This year, the Committee received much interesting information on community development programmes, their results and experience in many Territories. The term "community development" has now come into broader international usage to connote the democratic processes by which the progress of a community is promoted through its own efforts, united with those of governmental authorities, so that ultimately the community becomes integrated into the life of the nation and contributes in the fullest possible measure to national progress. Because the initial emphasis is on local progress, the primary objective of the movement is the promotion of the welfare of the individual within his community.

26. Community development has taken root in many areas and is expanding in such a manner as to be one of the most significant of present-day movements in under-developed regions. In view of the rapid expansion of community development programmes and the continuous refinement of their methods and techniques, the practice of community development requires frequent reappraisals in the light of the large body of experience that has been gained. It is a mistake to regard community development as a substitute for the expansion of normal government services and activities. It is equally erroneous to regard the introduction of basic social and economic reforms by government as an indispensable prerequisite for the institution of community development programmes.

27. The many aspects of a people's life today are so interrelated that no permanent advance can be made in any one field either by government action alone, or by the independent action of a community. Only a intensive and co-ordinated approach by the Government and the people will yield permanent result. Community development methods serve to reveal the needs of the people, to bring to them the stimulus and means for action, to create opportunities for self-help to furnish the external assistance and guidance so vital to over-all development, and to infuse the outlook of the people with hope and the promise of a better life so that they respond willingly with their skill resources and energies.

28. The method employed is essentially one of education and persuasion, and the incentive is the advancement of the individual and the community. Through community development methods it is often possible for Governments to analyse the problems of particular community, to discover its most pressing needs and then to formulate and introduce basic social and economic reforms, which would be implemented by the willing co-operative effort of the community, with the Government providing the necessary direction and assistance. Such an approach, representing a constructive partnership between the Government and the community, will obviously ensure that what the people get is not only what they need but it is also what they desire. And it is because of the nature of this approach that local programmes can confidently be integrated with national development plans, for they would truly represent the genuine aspirations of the people.

29. Intensive and extensive governmental assistance is an essential complement to local effort and the scale of such assistance is determined by the limitations of community's latent resources. But no community development programme should fail for lack of governmental assistance. The principal aim, however, should be the creation of self-reliant communities, and its attainment depends not so much on the quantity of governmental assistance as on the quality of the relationships that are established. At a certain psychological moment community development gathers such a quickening of tempo that it can assume the proportions of a popular movement affecting the life and attitudes of the people, and influencing territorial development in all fields including the establishment of local government institutions, which in due course must take over many of the responsibilities maintaining the services created by community development. It is this impact on the growth of local government institutions that ultimately determines the democratic pattern of relations between the community, the local government and the national Government.

30. Administrative responsibility for community development in United Kingdom Territories rests with each of the territorial governments, and the United Kingdom provides advisory services, financial assistance and training facilities. The fitting of community development into the existing administrative framework and the adaptation of this framework to the purposes and methods of community development are being undertaken in different ways in the various Territories according to local patterns of administration and local needs. However, there is a broad basis of agreement on the principles on which the new machinery should be built. Those principles are: (a) that community development should be specially fitted to the needs and circumstances of each Territory; (b) that there should be inter-departmental co-operation with a view to evolving a common and combined approach to the solution of problems; (c) that community development programmes should be integrated at all levels with territorial development plans; and (d) that the people themselves should be associated with the planning and the execution of community development programmes at every possible stage and at all levels. Besides these political and economic ends, community development has its own purpose of social construction. It strengthens and prepares the people to meet the need for adaptation in the face of rapidly changing conditions. The accent is therefore placed on the word community: that is the social development of communities rather than for or even by communities.

31. Increasing attention is being paid to the question of selection and training of community development staff at all levels, and much thought is being given to the adaptation of the existing social administration courses. The pattern of training provided in United Kingdom Territories is in general based on the Ashridge recommendations. In African Territories, permanent training centres have been established in Eastern Nigeria, Uganda, Kenya and Northern Rhodesia, with a view to training local leaders and village workers. At the Jeanes Schools in Kenya, a number of short training courses are being given local government officials, co-operative officials, teachers, social welfare workers, community development personnel and others. Women leaders are taught various branches of home-craft, farmers new agricultural techniques and tribal chiefs the principles of citizenship. Both in Kenya and Uganda, men taking the courses may be accompanied by their wives who receive instruction in child welfare, cooking, sewing and other home subjects. A number of district centres for training in community development work have been established in Kenya and Uganda. The aim of these centres is to provide a practical demonstration of a new and improved way of life.

32. The United Kingdom Colonial Office Summer Conference in 1948 made the following recommendations regarding financial procedures connected with community development: (a) that no grants should be made unless and until a community had made a matching contribution in labour and materials; (b) that all grants should be made available at the time when they were needed and unnecessary delays should be avoided; (c) that grants should be judiciously allocated, regard being paid to the industry and enterprise of neighbouring communities; and (d) that the machinery of local government should be used for the payment of grants to help build up local government institutions. Financial arrangements generally following the above recommendations have been put into effect in most Territories administered by the United Kingdom. Block grants are made available in a number of Territories. Some have established revolving funds to enable schemes to operate for several years without the necessity of annual budgeting, and others have established credit unions from which contributions are made to local development schemes. In Kenya, for example, the Territorial Estimates provide for the payment of salaries of senior staff and for certain grants for the expansion of approved schemes, and the Development Budget provides finance for community development in the form of capital expenditure.

33. In the Territories administered by France, the movement for the development of rural communities began some years ago as a part of the fundamental education programme, but it has now been extended to cover many fields of local activity. The methods and techniques employed in those Territories are directly related to local requirements and naturally vary from one region to another. In general, they are somewhat different from the techniques applied in the Territories administered by the United Kingdom although the ultimate ends are the same, viz., the social development of communities. The many experiments now going on in the Territories administered by France are based on the principle of collaboration between the local communities and the Administration. The initiative rests with the community for deciding on the work to be done, and the community partly finances it, either in cash or in kind, by contributing labour and local materials. The Administration furnishes supplementary technical and financial assistance. Work thus undertaken by the community may be aimed at improvement of the land (irrigation, drainage, etc.), or of living conditions (well digging, house building, dam-construction, electricity supply, etc.) or at the construction of facilities for the collective use of the community (silos, cattle sheds, markets, schools, dispensaries, roads, etc.).

34. The Committee was informed of many rural development programmes in the French administered Territories, for example, the establishment of mutual societies for rural production. In these societies, peasants are represented through a system of elections, and the Administrative Board which operates the societies includes peasants, technical specialists, chiefs and officials. These societies create a sense of fellowship and co-operation, and are a means of educating the rural population and adapting it to its environment, while at the same time co-ordinating the rural economy as a whole. The paysannats of French Equatorial Africa also promote the advancement of the rural populations through education and administrative organization, designed to give the farmer greater stability. In Madagascar the collectivités autochtones rurales and the collectivités autochtones rurales modernisées have legal status and financial resources of their own, and carry out agricultural development programmes formulated by themselves and financially assisted by FIDES. The FERDES plays a similar important role. Activities in the Belgian Congo along similar lines, particularly the paysannats, have met with considerable success.

35. The Committee was also informed of a number of pilot projects undertaken as a first step towards the development of communities in the Pacific Territories. A prerequisite of community development is a comprehensive approach of undertaking simultaneously multi-purpose projects. In the Pacific Territories where the culture of the people is relatively less developed, experience has shown that a comprehensive and integrated approach has often proved to be beyond the grasp of the people immediately concerned with it. It has therefore become necessary to introduce this technique in small doses, for example, by paying attention first of all to the more urgent agrarian needs and to the training of men and women as development workers, teachers, agricultural extension and co-operative personnel, etc. Moreover, the resources of these groups of people are somewhat limited at present and, consequently, it is necessary to increase their capacity for contribution in kind or in cash before undertaking more ambitious projects with wider aims.

The training scheme in the Mappi district of Netherlands New Guinea, the pilot project in American Samoa and the Milne Bay district scheme of Papua to train farmers are cases in point. Later, such projects can be integrated into the framework of proper community development programmes. For the present, these projects serve to increase a community's respect for and confidence in itself and to provide the stimulus vital to future development.

36. Aspects of community life in which community development can operate most successfully are: (a) agriculture, by improving yields through better cultivation, the proper use of manure irrigation, soil conservation, the introduction of new crops, etc.; (b) health, by encouraging the interest of the people in cleanliness, both personal and communal, refuse disposal and the removal of the causes of water pollution and eradication of endemic diseases; (c) education, by the promotion of literacy, by adult education and by pioneering the establishment of schools in areas where no educational facilities exist; (d) home economics, by sponsoring improvements in nutrition, cooking, sewing, child care, household management, etc.; (e) village industries, by assisting tradesmen and shopkeepers in setting up their businesses and encouraging the revival of traditional crafts and industries and establishing co-operative marketing arrangements; (f) housing, by fostering the construction of improved types of dwellings; and (g) public amenities, by the provision of road communications, postal services, water supplies, etc. These are some of the important aspects of life to which community development methods may be applied, but there are doubtless other fields of local activity where similar methods would yield results beneficial to the community.

37. Today most Governments are co-operating to try out new forms of organization, new training methods and new techniques for stimulating, teaching and helping the peoples to find a wider social consciousness and to learn how to take action collectively to satisfy their needs. The particular significance of community development is that it provides a wide range of social incentives to economic effort and makes it subservient to broader social goals and purposes. Some communities have already profited from this approach and have substantially improved their lives. The present stage in the evolution of the concept of community development is by no means the final one, for the scope of government programmes is constantly being expanded. Community development should not be regarded simply as a series of episodes embodied in specific achievements. Success in these, significant though it may be, is less important than the qualitative changes expressed in attitudes and relationships, which add to human dignity and develop the capacity of the people to attain goals which they determine for themselves. In this broad sense, community development is an educational process, and a great deal depends inevitably upon men and women of intelligence, character and ability, who are capable of exercising vigorous and imaginative leadership in the tasks of social and economic expansion. It is significant that in the areas where community development policies have been inaugurated and expanded in recent years, there have been comprehensive reforms directed towards the establishment of efficient and representative local government institutions able to assume a large measure of responsibility for community development programmes. The Committee, in commending community development methods for wider application in Non-Self-Governing Territories, with local modifications to suit the circumstances of each Territory, recognizes that the objectives of community development are in close harmony with the principles and purposes of the Charter.

IV. Social problems of urbanization

38. The process of urbanization in the Non-Self-Governing Territories produces problems similar to those experienced by the Western European countries during the industrial revolution. There is however, one fundamental difference between the earlier industrial development and the economic and social changes characteristic of urban life in most Non-Self-Governing Territories, namely, the speed of development. Changes which took 150 years to develop in Europe are now taking place within the lifetime of a single generation and without the background of common services and administrative structure which helped to cushion the effect of change in other countries. The growth of towns results largely from the advent of external commercial enterprise, industrialization, and the concomitant administrative and technical processes. Their growth attracts labour from rural to urban areas. The social problems arising from their development are similar to those experienced in the past in other countries and which are, in fact, perpetuated to this day.

39. Again, the growth of towns in many Non-Self-Governing Territories has not resulted from a gradual evolution of services required by an accepted economic and social system adjusted to meet the needs of a developing industrial society. In most areas, towns have been established under the influence of external authorities. Thus, many towns in Non-Self-Governing Territories are not only new but have grown up, not as a direct result of a need felt by the indigenous people, but haphazardly for a variety of extraneous reasons. The speed of economic development, the process of urbanization and contact with and consequent adoption of a modern way of life, place a considerable strain on the traditional patterns of life.

40. The speed with which the towns are growing makes it difficult to plan them in an orderly fashion, and once they have been allowed to expand without planning, it is often difficult to change them. Buildings cannot easily be demolished, and people acquire a vested interest in those things that exist and in the way of life which has grown up among them, however unsatisfying it may be. The rapidly growing towns cannot immediately provide such necessary amenities as sanitation, medical and health facilities, roads and street lighting, adequate schools and libraries, and recreational facilities, which are usually found in modern cities and are essential to make life in a city satisfying.

41. As has been stated in paragraph 38, this is not a new situation and it is not confined to under-developed countries. But in many developing Territories the even growth of a new urban society is affected by the nature of the processes which have led to the existence of towns, by haphazard migration and by its influence on the indigenous community. In many parts of the world in comparatively recent times such towns have been created as a result of large-scale migrations of people from their own kind of culture to an entirely new environment.

42. A common feature of migration in Non-Self-Governing Territories is that more and more rural workers leave their homes with the hope of earning more money in industrial employment in the towns, where they remain temporarily.

43. This system of migrant labour originally presupposed that the basic livelihood of the worker and his family was derived from within the agricultural community from which he came and which he regarded as his home. At first only a small number of the migrants left their homes with the intention of living permanently away from them. In some places, however, there is a tendency for formerly migratory labour to settle in the towns. This may be so even where migration for temporary employment has long been a factor in both the industrial pattern of the employment areas and the subsistence pattern of the rural areas.

44. These tendencies have a cumulative effect. As workers leave the countryside, the scale of subsistence farming and its production decline in consequence. This in turn causes more people to leave for a better living in the towns. Those who do so develop new habits and desires which may provide an incentive to seek more highly paid employment. Life in the countryside therefore becomes less and less attractive while that in the towns exerts a growing appeal.

45. In this way, many more people are under the influence of the expanding cities than those who are living there at any one time. Even in its very early stages the growth of towns is a powerful factor of social change over a wide area.

46. In many Territories, the growth of towns and the processes accompanying this growth have resulted in a modification of the traditional structure of society and have had a weakening effect on communal customs, habits and culture. This is most obvious in the new towns which have sprung up rapidly in certain Territories. The population of these towns is still unstable and loyalties to the tribe and the tribal lands still exist but, at the same time, the disciplines and customs regulating tribal life and conditioning its purpose tend to decline or disappear. The process of detribalization is seen in various stages in these new towns. One finds various groups of people: some have become urbanized; others have lost touch with their tribes but have not retained themselves to urban life; and still others retain links with the tribe or clan.

47. The deteriorating effect of this state of affairs is most clearly seen in the basic unit of society, the family. Members of families become separated and the disintegration of existing families and other social groups frequently follows. Parental authority is undermined, not only by the fact of separation, but also by the economic independence acquired by young and unmarried wage-earners in the towns. The economic unit formerly represented by the rural family can no longer be maintained.

48. The traditional concept of marriage is also weakened. Marital unions, concluded outside the customary social framework and no longer assured by economic safeguards, are often unstable, particularly as the position of women in both urban and rural areas is deeply affected by the numerical disproportion between the sexes.

49. The weakness of family ties and family structure, which tends to become a significant feature of life among the town-dwellers, impedes the development of a stable urban society. Integrated or inter-dependent unions, based on kinship, break down into small and independent units. The transition to the new form of life, in which the family should still be the firm basis on which broader relations can be established, finds obstacles not only in the social but also in the material conditions of the towns, particularly if wage policies are based on the assumption that rural dependants of urban workers can normally make a living from the land.

50. Whatever the differences in their backgrounds, the urban dwellers live, or attempt to live, by modern standards. They tend to forget that very recently they depended on a complex system of rights and duties, of loyalties and obligations, which brought to their lives a spiritual satisfaction in rural life through ceremony and custom and gave them a satisfying sense of belonging to a community. Estranged from their traditional surroundings, they tend to lead an existence which is neither rural nor urban. They do not easily acquire a new community sense and a new concept of social solidarity.

51. In the towns, difficulties arise from the presence of different ethnic groups living in close and continuous proximity. These difficulties, sometimes amounting to antipathy between groups, are not confined to multi-racial societies; there are antipathies also between tribes from different regions and between religious groups. This tends to slow down the development of a common solidarity and a sense of one community. It is vitally important that all groups of town dwellers should develop an understanding of the real meaning of urban life and a sense of loyalty to the town in which they live.

52. Nevertheless, in spite of these transitional situations, it has to be remembered that urban growth is a part of change from which nations, families and individuals may benefit. Industrialization and urbanization provide an economic base for a more rapid passage to modern conditions, and this is not limited to the economic sphere. The growth of towns also makes possible a large accumulation of capital and personnel for social and cultural purposes. An urban environment creates a climate favouring innovations and stimulating a faster pace of cultural change. Even today, people in towns are exerting great influence on political life and therefore on patterns of development. This influence will undoubtedly increase. Thus, towns have an importance out of proportion to the relative size of their populations.

53. Whatever the more specific problems of these highly diversified urban formations may be, the ultimate and all-embracing goal of social policy is the creation of conditions which will hasten and facilitate the evolution of the impermanent and badly integrated urban structures of the present transitional stage into stable and progressive urban communities. Imaginative social planning is required, giving full consideration to the needs of the family, planning new towns as social units, ministering to the welfare of the community, and adapting existing towns to meet the challenge of modern conditions and to solve the problems caused by rapid development.

54. The attainment of these goals requires a close integration, where feasible, of the economic and social policy of development programmes of whole Territories. A substantial increase should be sought, therefore, in the general productivity of the country through a greater output, not only in industry, but more particularly in agriculture. It is also essential to improve the conditions of economic, social and cultural life in rural areas. Without such a development, the attraction of the towns will continue to drain the rural areas of agricultural workers, with a resulting decline in agricultural production and a consequent increase in prices in the towns.

55. Urban welfare policies, directed towards the improvement of living conditions, have developed from action taken to deal with particular problems, according to their urgency. The first preoccupation of the administrations in meeting the needs of new or rapidly expanding towns has been to provide the basic public utilities and public health and educational services. Action in these fields has been accompanied or followed by the provision of some improved housing, the establishment of machinery for the relief of the distressed, the care of the homeless child, and the treatment of delinquency. While these problems are inseparable from urban conditions and remain a primary public responsibility, a broader concept of urban welfare is being accepted. This concept stresses the long-term aims of social planning based on the recognition that the improvement of urban living conditions and the progressive evolution of urban society to modern forms is not only a matter for direct administrative action, but also calls for profound changes in the traditional social structure and the reorganization of the changing society on a new basis.

56. In areas of rapid urban change, the concern of social policy should be to create conditions indispensable for a balanced urban growth. The stabilization of the urban population is an essential prerequisite. The importance of improving the material conditions of urban life, the payment of wages sufficient to maintain the family, and the introduction of adequate social security measures are all factors which help the process of stabilization.

57. There are obvious limits to what can be done by government action alone. Services and amenities provided by public agencies are unquestionably useful, but, in the last analysis, it is the members of a society who know best their own needs and who can by means of their own efforts, guided and assisted by the Government, raise their levels of living.

58. At its 1955 session, the Committee pointed out that, while community development was originally considered a predominantly rural movement, its methods might also be applied to the towns, particularly in those urban areas which have grown rapidly in recent years and where the inhabitants have not yet had time to develop a sense of belonging together. In such areas community development could assist in the formation of representative bodies whose function would be to create interest in and foster better housing, the development of sanitary facilities, roads, street lighting, clinics, hospitals, libraries, schools, community centres, etc.

59. In certain urban areas, community development has already played an important part in developing the self-reliance of the communities concerning their welfare and progress. Comprehensive self-directed programmes of community development are known to exist in some old cities, the outstanding example of which are the Hong Kong kaifong associations, but such scale of activity is obviously less evident in the new urban centres.

60. As yet, not enough attention has been given in some Territories to the constructive side of urban social development. The tendency has been to concentrate more on remedial than preventive measures designed to anticipate and meet the social problems that result from rapid urban growth. The Committee feels that community development could provide opportunities for self-help in urban areas, which would serve to awaken in the new town dwellers a sense of belonging, inspire a sense of public service and help to organize voluntary participation in development programmes in which their skills and resources can be deployed to the best advantage of the community as a whole.

61. The development of more specific social services also relies largely on local initiative and voluntary effort. There is, however, a firm recognition of the importance of governmental assistance for activities which meet not only the emergency needs but also the long-term needs of the community. Attempts are being made to promote the growth of stable neighbourhoods by organizing or reorganizing residential areas into self-contained units, each equipped with basic social services and community facilities and each of a size favouring close relations between individuals and families. Family welfare centres and multi-purpose community centres are being established not only to meet the basic needs of families and individuals residing in those areas and to provide effective means for their social education, but also to develop these neighbourhood facilities into centres of self-directed local activities.

62. Community development could thus become an integral part of town growth by extending and encouraging the work of voluntary groups and associations into a larger pattern of community development based on common interests and purposes, by discovering and training leaders to accept the challenge of social leadership, by informing the people of the rights and duties of citizenship and by building up a tradition of service to the community.

V. Juvenile delinquency

63. In the widely differing conditions of Non-Self-Governing Territories, the definition, incidence and aspects of juvenile delinquency vary according to the societies in which it occurs. In areas where the traditional social organization remains in force or where the small size of the community enables informal means of social control to operate effectively, the problem is virtually non-existent. In Territories where, owing to the relative weakness of traditional institutions, much of the control resting formerly with the family and community has been or is being assumed by other agencies, juvenile delinquency has for many years engaged the attention both of government and voluntary agencies. Finally, in some Territories, juvenile delinquency is becoming or has recently become a problem which in certain instances is considered to be assuming larger proportions. In such cases, the problem appears to be largely associated with industrialization, urbanization and rapid social change, although sometimes a few rural areas are also affected.

64. The Committee's attention was drawn to the Conference on the Treatment of Offenders held in 1956 in Kampala under the auspices of the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara (CCTA) where the view was expressed that the study of juvenile delinquency in the Territories is of too recent a date to permit of any definite pronouncement on the part played by any one of various elements contributing to the social behaviour of juveniles. Little scientific research has been carried out on factors affecting juvenile delinquency in rapidly developing Territories. In this connexion, the availability of more comprehensive and detailed statistics, both on juvenile offenders appearing before the Courts and on juveniles in need of care and protection would be useful.

65. The Committee noted with satisfaction the efforts of the Administering Members to replace punitive methods of treatment by corrective methods aimed at the re-education of the juvenile offender and his reintegration in the community. In Territories where new methods of treatment have been introduced, there is a tendency to widen the scope of the special treatment accorded to juvenile delinquents both by increasing and diversifying the social services available to them and by broadening the special jurisdictions dealing with juveniles. Juvenile courts or their equivalent, correctional and educational institutions, probation and/or related methods of treatment are in existence in most Territories and are being perfected and expanded within the limits set by local financial considerations. In many Territories, probation is becoming the key method of treatment and prevention and in a number of instances general welfare services have developed from the probation service established to deal with juvenile delinquents. In some cases, although the distinction in law usually still exists, there is a trend towards assimilating the treatment of juvenile delinquents with that of non-delinquents considered to be "in need of care and protection", in "moral danger" or "dependent".

66. With the development of social services, increasing emphasis is being placed, particularly in urban areas, on measures for the prevention of delinquency through the care and supervision of those in special need or whose status or conduct, without violating any legal norms, is considered unsatisfactory. The measures taken, which often follow the metropolitan pattern, differ widely and reflect the varying theories both as to what may be the causes of juvenile delinquency and what preventive measures may diminish its incidence. Thus, community development techniques in some areas can become an effective method of prevention. The general effect of the introduction of social services is to transfer to some extent the responsibility for the protection, welfare and moral guidance of young people from the traditional groups to the State and voluntary agencies. Indispensable for the efficacy of these measures are specialized services, staffed by trained personnel, the co-operation of indigenous leaders and co-ordination in the policy and work of the various institutions and agencies of society, formal or informal, public or private, official or non-official.

67. In areas of rapid social change, measures of control and prevention of juvenile delinquency encounter major obstacles arising from the state of transition of society. In these areas, measures for the control and prevention of juvenile delinquency may in the long run fall short of their purpose unless they are established as an integral part of a broad social programme aimed, through a variety of social and economic measures, at strengthening the family as the basic unit of the society, and at the creation of conditions which will hasten and facilitate the evolution of the present societies into stable and progressive communities.

VI. Family change and welfare measures

A. DEVELOPMENT AND PROBLEMS OF THE URBAN FAMILY

68. In most Non-Self-Governing Territories the traditional family pattern is that of the kinship group or extended family. This group forms part of a wider or tribal organization whose traditions, customs and ceremonies are maintained through an administrative system clearly understood and accepted by the people. Within this extended family grouping the smaller family unit of parents and children is clearly identifiable but its functions are determined by customs, obligations and duties which both limit and extend its responsibilities. Thus, there is a cohesive social structure within which the individual and the family have a clearly defined role to play. This traditional pattern is being considerably modified through the impact of external influences to a greater or lesser extent according to the degree of exposure to new ideas and the speed at which they are assimilated.

69. The most important element of change in the pattern of family life is exposure to events and ideas from outside the normal environment. The establishment of law and order, improved communications and, more recently, the opportunities for employment away from home have resulted in the movement of large numbers of people who previously never travelled far from their ancestral home. The new horizons thus opened up offer attractions impossible of attainment in the tribal setting, and so the weakening of the traditional family ties begins. Another element of change is the spread of educational opportunities for children which widen the gap between child and parent. The resulting disparity between parent and child in the present generation is an important cause of family disruption. Again, the spread of modern trading facilities creating new wants which are met by the importation of manufactured foods, the subsequent rise in the material standards of living and the transition from a subsistence to a money economy seriously affect the normal pattern of family life. When to all this is added the rapid growth of towns and trading centres needing labour for developing industrial and commercial enterprise, it is not surprising that the traditional structure of the family suffers from the strain of rapid economic and social development.

70. The effects of these changes on family life frequently result in domestic friction. The lack of understanding between the generations may become a threat to tradition and custom. The younger generation tends to rebel against conventions and traditional moral principles which appear both too personally restrictive in a modern way of life and inhibiting in the development of their country. Again, in this period of rapid change there seems to be an inevitable time-lag in the influence of such change between the sexes. The man, through better educational opportunities and by virtue of his traditional role, makes more rapid progress in adjusting himself to a modern way of life than does the woman, who is usually the repository of tradition and custom. This has a profound effect on the harmony of married life and often leads to maladjustment with unfortunate results for the more educated members of the family.

71. It is particularly in the towns that traditional family relations have ceased to operate. The family is no longer necessarily a part of a larger structure with clearly defined rights and duties according to tribal law and custom. The traditional marital union was more concerned with an alliance between family groups than between the two individuals immediately involved. In the traditional setting, the joint families of both husband and wife were concerned with ensuring the success and continuance of the marriage; in the towns the survival of the union is mainly dependent on the will of the husband and wife. This change in marital status undoubtedly places a burden on the family but it is an obvious development and there is evidence that satisfactory adjustments are being made. The change in the status of women gives the wife more economic independence and she may more easily break the bonds of marriage but the fact that she has more voice in choosing her husband is a compensating factor in the stability of the marriage. The improvement in the status of women due to the break from her traditional marital role is extremely important but it has obvious dangers. The new found freedom in the towns places a greater strain on the woman than on the man. On the woman, lacking the support of the old code of behaviour, rests the burden of establishing the family in a new pattern, which she has difficulty in interpreting. The woman in the village must endeavour to bridge the gap between herself and her husband, who is more adapted to the new environment, and the woman in the town must find a new code of behaviour to replace or modify the one on which she was nurtured. It is the woman who is going to determine the new family pattern and who must be made conscious both of the extent of her responsibility and her capacity for accepting it.

72. Thus, in many of the rapidly developing Territories "home" tends increasingly to mean the place where the restricted family of husband, wife and children live. Many new problems face the restricted family in the towns. For example, while there are obvious advantages in urban life for children they do not always compensate for the loss of basic training common to the traditional life. The authority of custom has not been replaced by respect for the authority of their parents, who for their part frequently do not know how properly to carry out their duties of training their children. The consequent maladjustment in family life is a most important cause of juvenile delinquency, which is a growing problem in the still unstable environment of many towns. The present state of development of many towns also contributes to the instability of family life. Lack of adequate housing and consequent overcrowding, underemployment and low wages, transient and migrant labour all combine to perpetuate conditions inimical to urban stability.

73. The Committee was informed of the importance attached by UNESCO to the study of the social aspects of urbanization in countries undergoing rapid economic development. Such studies have a direct bearing on the problems of the development of the urban family. The question had been studied at the conference held in Abidjan in 1954, and in 1956 UNESCO published a study entitled Social Implications of Industrialization and Urbanization in Africa South of the Sahara. Other activities of UNESCO in this field include a seminar on the social problems of urbanization in South and South East Asia held in Bangkok in 1956. One part of the report on the work of the seminar dealt with the development of urban families in this region, and some of the problems studied were similar to those arising in urban areas of Africa. Two investigations were undertaken in 1956 on the role of educated African women in the new African society and the results will be published shortly. The UNESCO Social Science Bulletin, No. 8 (March 1956) contained a study of African élites, and UNESCO is planning a study of the role of men and women in family planning as the main item of a comparative study of cultural values in the East and West. The paper prepared by UNESCO entitled Development and Problems of the Urban Family in Africa South of the Sahara<sup>3</sup> is a synthesis of reports prepared by the International Research Institute of Social Implications of Technological Change, which seeks to bring out the general trends and the most pressing problems. The Committee wished to express its appreciation of the high quality of the report and of its value to the Committee's work.

B. FAMILY AND CHILD WELFARE

74. Social welfare is based on the care of family and child. The need for social and educational action is pressing in the new urban centres. The problem revolves around the most important member of the family, namely, the woman, whose role in the transitional urban society remains largely undefined and who, to raise her status, has to adjust herself to a new pattern of family living. Information has been supplied to the Committee on a variety of family welfare programmes developed in the Territories by public and private welfare agencies, and combining advisory and other assistance to the families with social education of the parents, particularly the mother. The aim is to promote the evolution of the urban family by helping its members to acquire knowledge of better family living and to develop new interests and a new sense of social and family responsibilities.

75. The Committee's attention was drawn to social or family welfare centres which are being expanded in the urban areas of the Belgian Congo and in the Territories under French administration. In the French Territories, the social centres are the basic element of social policy concerned with the evolution of urban family. Their purpose is to give women a sound family and social education which would enable them to be better mothers, wives and homemakers. With the emphasis on preventive health work, the activities of the centres staffed by professional social workers, domestic science teachers and African assistants, include teaching of mothercraft and homecrafts, family case-work and home visiting involving practical demonstrations, ante-natal and infant health consultations, running kindergartens, and assistance in kind to mothers and babies. Close relations are maintained between the personnel of the centre and the inhabitants of the surrounding area and instruction is adapted to local conditions and customs. It was pointed out that the coming into being of the modern African family, monogamous in many cases, had been in French African Territories greatly assisted by the work and influences of social centres.

76. In some United Kingdom Territories, the main media for social education of women are women's institutes or clubs organized independently or attached to community centres. The purpose of these clubs or institutions is to raise the status of women by associating them more fully with social development schemes and community development activities. The activities of these women's organizations are not standardized since they follow interests and wishes of the group. Programmes are planned to give instruction in better living for the family and also to develop other interests and activities such as sports, games, crafts, drama and music. The approach to community development among women is intended to promote higher standards of living in the home through self-help and to encourage a community spirit through the active participation of club members in services of various kinds for the communities in which they live. An important part in promoting this type of activity is played by women's organizations or movements organized in some cases on an all-territorial basis. The assistance of government welfare agencies to local family and child welfare activities consists also in training leaders and organizers of women's clubs or institutes and in helping with the initial organization of their activities. Training programmes for local leaders and voluntary workers conducted in central training institutions and also at a district or local level lay stress on family living and related matters.

77. Information was supplied to the Committee on services rendered by community centres in urban areas in the United Kingdom Territories and by cultural centres in French Territories, in promoting new social and cultural interests, developing forms of organized activity and providing for the leisure and recreational needs of all sections of the population.

78. The functions which these centres perform in enriching the life of families and individuals in the community should be stressed as having an important bearing on the well-being of the family. The indivisibility of family and community welfare had been stressed in the Committee's report of 1955 where it was pointed out that sound family and ethical education and the improvement of the material basis for family living were not the only conditions indispensable for strengthening the family and ensuring its efficacy. No less important was the social and cultural development of the community, on which the family depends for the expression and satisfaction of its spiritual and cultural needs. It was through this direct environment that the family would be able to become part of the larger communities and to have an interest in the urban and national life. Local friendships, loyalties and interests would gradually grow and the formation of various clubs and societies would be a result and a contribution to a sense of community and shared interests. The smaller the community the greater the sense of "belonging"; hence the importance of residential neighbourhoods, with their own schools, clubs, clinics, councils, etc., which break down an urban area into a number of smaller communities.

C. FAMILY BENEFITS

79. The Committee considered social assistance and some of the social insurance measures in relation to the welfare of family and community in changing societies where, with the growth of wage-earning classes and of urban centres, increasing numbers of inhabitants are no longer protected by traditional systems. In such situations, there is a clear need to provide new measures both to protect the destitute who have lost the support of the traditional society and to help consolidate a new form of society.

80. The initiation of elements of social insurance or the provision of family allowances in some less-developed Non-Self-Governing Territories was noted as a step which may favour urban stabilization and lead eventually to more comprehensive social security schemes already established in one form or another in more economically developed Territories. The Committee refrained from commenting in detail on this question since appropriate measures will have to be adjusted to the actual environment and introduced gradually within the financial limits and permanent taxable capacity of the Territories concerned. Where social and economic structure is still in the transitional stage, it may be expected that the introduction of social security will have to be restricted to urban areas with a relatively stable labour force entirely dependent on wages. The first step, however, is to ensure a stable and satisfactory urban family life by the payment of an adequate wage to support a normal family and the development of social services and amenities. Of direct concern also may be the provision of public assistance to families and individuals in distress and otherwise unprotected, and of remedial measures to take care of the handicapped and the maladjusted. The emphasis on the rehabilitation of the recipients of assistance so as to increase their independence of outside aid has been noted as a trend which deserves to be more systematically developed. It has been pointed out that social measures for the economic welfare of the family range from direct social security schemes, which can take several forms at different stages of development, to the provision of welfare foods for children and the activities of voluntary organizations, friendly societies and tribal unions. Such services should never be mutually exclusive. The welfare of the family and the community cannot be assured by state aid in the form of grants or allowances for every contingency that may arise. Such an interpretation of social security may undermine the basis of community life and prevent the growth of a sense of public services without which a stable urban community can hardly be established.

D. FAMILY EARNINGS IN URBAN INDUSTRIAL AREAS

81. In its 1955 report, the Committee stressed that the material foundations indispensable for strengthening the family and adapting it to its new role include good housing, secure employment and, in particular, sufficient wages to maintain the whole family. The Committee voiced its convictions that in fixing wages account should be taken of the needs of the family unit and not merely those of a single unmarried worker. It held that any transition to the concept of a family minimum wage should be made as rapidly as possible in the light of local conditions.

82. The problem of family wages was reconsidered by the Committee again on the basis of the report prepared by the International Labour Office, Family Earnings in Urban Industrial Areas<sup>4</sup>. The Committee expressed its appreciation of the quality of the report and of the assistance rendered by the ILO. Account was also taken of the information supplied in the course of the debate relating to the United Kingdom and French African Territories. The Committee considered that the evolution of social policy and the premises underlying this evolution as discussed in the report reinforced the views expressed in 1955.

83. The Committee wished to stress its conviction that, apart from its implications for the welfare of urban family and community, family wage policy is also an economic necessity, essential for the well-being and further general advancement of the Territories concerned. The essential prerequisite is the stabilization of the worker. The most effective way of achieving this result is to raise wages sufficiently to enable the worker to maintain his wife and family in an urban or other employment centre.

84. The Committee recognized the difficulties which prevent the introduction of family wage policy as a measure of immediate universal applicability. Account has to be taken of many complex factors determining the level and structure of wages in under-developed economies, including traditional attitudes towards work and wages and limitations of monetary incentives in certain conditions. These attitudes are undergoing changes. More and more, the early view that wages are a supplement or an alternative to agriculture as a means of sustaining life in the traditional environment is giving way to the view that wages are a means of advancing beyond the traditional environment towards modern standards. In most Territories there is already a proportion of workers who are completely integrated into their urban environment and whose attitudes towards work and wages, as well as patterns of family life, do not differ essentially from those to be found among workers in industrial countries. Consideration has to be given to the changing economic role of the family, particularly in urban industrial areas. In increasing numbers women are moving to towns with their husbands. The existing wage patterns and arrangements as regards food and accommodation are often not designed to meet this situation and the worker finds himself unable to meet his family obligations in the conditions in which wage-paid employment is available.

85. The Committee noted that the concept of a family wage has been recognized lately, not only in principle but also in fact, in a number of African Territories. Steps have been taken towards adjusting wages to take account of family needs by raising their level over the wage for a single adult. The introduction of family allowances, in particular, indicates that workers' family responsibilities are recognized.

86. The Committee did not consider more technical questions regarding changes which will have to be made in the present wage systems with the introduction of family wages. At present, the general wage level comprises a large variety of individual and occupational wage rates and earnings, including payments in kind. The conditions under which these payments in kind are made tend to complicate the evaluation of the relation between workers' income and their family responsibilities. There is also a very substantial differentiation in remuneration according to the value and productivity of work. All this will have to be taken into account when undertaking the reform of wage systems on the basis of family wage concept.

87. The general principles underlying the reform should be stressed. It should be the common aim of Governments, employers and workers to establish wages at the highest levels which the economic circumstances of each Territory permit and to ensure that workers secure, through the adjustment of wage scales, a fair share of the increased prosperity resulting from economic development of the whole Territory. In order to enable wage earners to enter fully into the economic and social life of the community into which wage-paid employment brings them, Governments and employers should take steps to secure the stabilization of wage earners and their families at or near their places of employment, except in the case of essentially temporary and seasonal workers. This implies that minimum earnings, including allowances, should be sufficient to support stabilized family life without the need for assistance from outside sources away from the place of employment, such as distant land holdings, to supplement family income. This objective should be accepted as an aim of policy to be established gradually as a result of economic development. In this connexion, attention is drawn to the responsibilities of Governments, which often are an important if not the main source of employment in the Territories, in setting examples in leadership in favourable wage policies.

88. In some Territories problems are still posed by the existence of wage scales applicable to workers of different races. In such cases, it should be the accepted aim of policy to establish, without regard to race, wage scales providing full coverage of all degrees of skill and qualification applicable to workers who possess the necessary competence. In this connexion, attention is called to the desirability of applying, as regards workers in the Territories in general, the provision of paragraphs 37, 38, 39 and 40 of the 1955 ILO Recommendation concerning the Protection of Migrant Workers in Underdeveloped Countries and Territories, dealing with admission to skilled jobs without discrimination.

89. Most governments face the problem of how to relate an adequate wage policy to a Territory's economic capacity. In these circumstances, in Territories where there has been no recent fundamental examination of wage policies in relation to economic development consideration should be given to the desirability of undertaking it.

VII. Social aspects of rural development

90. The transition from a subsistence to a modern cash economy in some cases has been rapid but generally speaking has not been accompanied by the growth of new social institutions at an equal pace. In other cases there has been economic stagnation due to the slowness of peasant groups to take advantage of the new economic system and to the resistance to change generated by their attachment to traditional values and institutions. Where levels of living are low, economic advancement is one of the first necessities of a successful social policy. However, the policies to be followed will have to strike a balance between social and economic development. Economic development should not be pursued as an end in itself but as an integral part of a broad action engaging all areas of advancement. Economic progress should be fostered through the fullest use of the traditional organization. The successful evolution of a society in transition depends not only on economic change but also on the guidance

d leadership provided by Governments and representatives of the people. One of the immediate tasks of social policy, therefore, is the promotion and training of local leadership on as wide a scale as possible.

91. Information was supplied to the Committee on rural development programmes. In French Territories, these programmes are being expanded with emphasis on simultaneous development in the economic and social fields, and on the Government's responsibility in establishing a basic organizational framework within which, with government or local technical and financial assistance, local initiative may find effective expression. In Madagascar, the adaptation of the traditional fokonolona system to modern forms has been effected in many rural areas; rural indigenous communities endowed with legal status and using their own financial resources are engaging in a variety of projects designed and carried out by themselves. Programmes of development approved by the supreme council of peasantry are carried out with assistance from the agricultural equipment centre, which is the administrative organ of the council. This assistance is now being extended to the bulk of the peasant population organized into "community groups", each comprising a number of villages. In French Equatorial Africa, rural development programmes are carried out under a variety of paysannat arrangements, including technical and administrative establishments designed to give the farmer stability and induce him to stay on his land. In French West Africa, rural production societies were inaugurated in 1951 to bring the economic development of rural areas into line with the general advancement of the population. Each rural production society covers a wide area and the participation of the people in the management of the society is ensured by an elected assembly which is represented on an administrative board. The principal function of these societies is economic development through the application of modern production techniques, the provision of loans and the disposal of products. They encourage the creation of co-operative groups or associations which are represented on the administrative board.

92. An important part in the development of rural economies and communities is played by FERDES (Fund for Rural Equipment and Development). The activities of the Fund are based on the principle of collaboration between the local communities and the Administration. The initiative rests with the community in deciding on the work to be done, which the community partly finances in cash or by contribution of labour and local materials, thus influencing social development. The constructions erected with assistance from the Fund become the property of the community, which is responsible for their maintenance and use.

93. In Netherlands New Guinea, the initiation of more comprehensive welfare schemes based on self-help encounters, in many areas, obstacles in the structure of the indigenous society and its limited experience of the outside world. The initiative in undertaking local improvement projects rests with the Government. The first task is to develop new forms of local government. Native councils are being established with the hope that local authority and leadership can be strengthened and the area of development projects extended from a single village to a number of settlements working together. Preference is given to simple projects primarily concerned with the improvement of agriculture as a basis and starting point for development in other fields. In some areas, projects for the improvement of indigenous agriculture have been undertaken with special stress on training local leaders. Special residential training centres have been established where the prospective leaders and their wives are taught improved farming, stock-breeding, hygiene, nutrition and housekeeping.

94. In Papua, the policy of the Administration is to encourage rural development without sudden disruption of traditional institutions. Agricultural extension programmes seek to stimulate progressive changes in indigenous agricultural methods and the production of cash crops by the indigenous inhabitants. In certain areas an important part is played by Native councils, co-operatives and other modern forms of group activity, which are steadily increasing in membership and in the range of their functions.

95. The Committee emphasized the part played in a balanced economic and social growth of rural societies by the co-operative movement. Its structure, extending from the smallest economic and social units to national organizations, provides important means through which the efforts of individuals or groups become integrated with wider economic processes. Co-operative organizations provide a channel through which traditional usages of self-help and mutual aid may obtain a new expression and broader application. The development of co-operative societies is looked upon in some Territories as a most important element in preparing a people for the transition to a modern economy. A steady spread of co-operative organization has been evidenced in some areas. To succeed, the co-operative movement has to be adapted to the local setting and pattern of society; it has to express the needs of its potential followers and pursue objectives which they understand. The success of the "multi-purpose" and "better living" co-operatives in Asia suggests that the co-operative movement might be extended on a wider basis. By basing the co-operative movement on the needs and aspirations of the people, conditions are created for associating the movement with larger schemes of economic and social reconstruction and for increasing its effectiveness as an instrument of social progress.

96. In the initial stages, co-operative movements need the assistance and guidance of Governments in setting up the organization, framing its rules and regulations, and securing its proper functioning by a well-trained staff. The Committee was informed of the assistance which the Food and Agriculture Organization and the International Labour Organisation provide to Governments in the training of personnel of co-operative services in less-developed regions. Technical meetings for the senior staff were held in the Caribbean in 1951 and 1956 and a co-operative training centre for Caribbean Territories was organized in Puerto Rico in 1954. A training institute for co-operative personnel in Africa is planned to be held in 1959 under the auspices of FAO, the ILO and the Committee for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara. The programme of FAO also includes advisory assistance to Territories in the development of the most suitable credit arrangements, the establishment or improvement of existing village industries and the training of personnel and organization of extension services adjusted to the local social, cultural and economic environment. Non-Self-Governing Territories in Asia have participated in FAO regional extension conferences and study tours. A similar programme is to be initiated in Africa through the operation of an extension development centre in a West African country in 1959. A survey of agricultural credit facilities was recently carried out in the Caribbean Territories with the assistance of FAO.

97. The Committee noted the important role of women in furthering economic development and in creating incentives for the increased production of food and other consumer goods. This aspect has received much attention in the FAO activities. Family extension services now developing in a number of countries focus on the needs of families for improved nutrition, housing and other elements of daily life. FAO technical meetings and conferences on home economics have been held in the Caribbean and the Far East and others are being planned for the Near East and African countries.

98. As anticipated in 1957, the Committee considered this year certain problems of land tenure and the influence of land policies and changes in land tenure systems. Indigenous systems of land tenure, which had been designed to fulfil the needs of traditional life, are often becoming unsuitable for coping with the problems created by limited arable and pastoral land and growing populations. Soil exhaustion and erosion serve to intensify these problems. Although in many African Territories family and group ownership of land remains prevalent and shows a high degree of flexibility and adaptability under varied conditions, nevertheless cash crops, increasing populations and the impact of individualistic patterns of social and economic behaviour tend to hasten the replacement of the old system by individual titles to land. However, it cannot be assumed that, under pressure of modern economic forces, a satisfactory land tenure system will evolve by itself.

99. Land is the basic and often the only resource of agrarian communities, and for this reason is not considered as a commodity. Consequently, great difficulties may arise both in regard to its disposal and to its utilization. The traditional forms of tenure are closely linked to and derived from the structure of society, social concepts, and religious observances. Land legislation and policy have to take into account all these factors. Any programme for the replacement of the existing systems of tenure is unlikely to succeed, unless it has popular understanding and support.

100. The replacement of communal ownership by individual ownership is frequently considered as a prerequisite to the modernization of indigenous agriculture. The conflict arising therefrom is not so much one between communal and individual ownership, as it is a conflict between traditional rights and the needs of progressive agriculture. Since this affects all aspects of social policy, it is necessary to ensure that during the transitional period there is as little disruption of indigenous life as possible.

101. Individual forms of land utilization do not necessarily exclude communal land ownership. Instances were quoted to the Committee of land-tenure systems (for instance, in American Samoa, Papua and the Belgian Congo) where both forms are in existence within the framework of the traditional agriculture or its modernized forms. A study published by FAO stresses the social advantages of communal land tenure, which is considered to be a strong force in knitting together a community. It gives the individual farmer not only a personal and family stake in the land but also a recognized position in society. Therefore, it may be in the interest of a community to maintain the communal land tenure system purely for its social value.

102. Land policies, whether concerned with communal or individual land ownership, should be so formulated as to enable the indigenous farmer to preserve his dignity and status within his community. This may involve a basic reorganization of the land tenure system by law, which should also include adequate provisions to deal with the most common defects of individual tenures in any exchange economy: chronic indebtedness, fragmentation and the bad effects of the landlord-tenant relationship. To this effect, all manifestations of customary law on land should be considered as rights and respected as such. Account must be taken of all indigenous rights exercised by individuals, families, clans or other groups according to customary law or established usages.

103. Substantial land alienation has taken place in the past in some Territories. Most Governments have now taken steps to control the alienation of indigenous land and thus to prevent the uprooting of the indigenous society. Different policies have developed for lands that were apparently vacant, ownerless or unused. In some cases, they are declared state land; in others, vacant land does not become automatically state land, but is presumed to be Native land. State ownership of all vacant and unoccupied land is not necessarily essential for the effective delimitation of the indigenous rights on land or for granting concessions or leases to non-indigenous enterprises. The Committee was of the opinion that in view of the rapidly increasing population the greatest care should be taken in alienating further indigenous land.

VIII. Industrial relations

104. In the 1955 report of the Committee it was noted that the evolution of social policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories since 1952 had reinforced the Committee's view that an effective labour force was inter-connected with social advancement and was one factor in the general stimulation of the desire for social progress. The Committee noted once again that the role of trade union organizations in the Non-Self-Governing Territories continued to gain in significance and that the trade union movement had a wider field of influence.

105. The Committee recognized that many factors contributed to this development. The policy of the governments of Territories to recognize and encourage trade unionism is, in the view of the Committee, one of the main contributing factors. Industrial expansion, which provides greater opportunity for employment, gives rise to an increasing need for good industrial relations to the mutual benefit of management and labour. The efforts of the international trade union movement and the national trade union centres in metropolitan countries, in addition to the work done by international organizations to provide training in trade unionism and develop workers' education, continue to show encouraging results in the promotion of responsible trade union leadership, which is a primary factor in the success of any trade union movement. Generally increasing demand for improved living standards and facilities for education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories are helping the worker to adjust himself to the social changes resulting from industrialization.

106. There are considerable variations in the structure and strength of trade unions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In some Territories the movement is vigorous and progressing. In others it is weak and ineffective. The Committee commended efforts being made in some Territories to provide training for trade union leaders and suggested that increased facilities for training at all levels, from the workbench to the bargaining table, be provided.

107. Information supplied to the Committee showed a continuing increase in the number of trade unions reflecting the expansion of trade and industry rather than the expansion of the trade union movement itself. The Committee welcomed the trend towards consolidation by an amalgamation of a number of small unions. It noted that, despite the general increase in trade union membership, the percentage of trade union membership to the total wage earning population was constant in some cases and had apparently fallen in others.

108. Reference was also made to the rights of agricultural workers to form trade unions and to the obstacles which existed in some Territories hampering the expansion of the trade-union movement. It was suggested by some members of the Committee that on some aspects of trade unionism non-governmental organizations representative of the international trade union movement were in a position to provide the Committee with useful additional information on questions relevant to their affiliated trade union organizations in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

109. Information was given on the development of labour legislation in the Belgian Congo, where racial discrimination in trade unions was eliminated by the new trade union law which came into force in 1957. The Committee noted that the Social Policy (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947, contained non-discrimination provisions relevant to various fields of labour legislation, including industrial relations, and that this Convention had been ratified by Belgium, the United Kingdom, France and New Zealand.

110. The ILO Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories stated in 1957 that, if social development in Africa was not to involve far-reaching conflict between the different elements of the communities living in that continent, practical measures for promoting non-discrimination needed to be applied. The Committee noted further that the International Labour Conference had before it proposals concerning "the elimination of discrimination in respect of employment and occupation which envisaged the adoption in each country of a policy designed to promote, by methods appropriate to national conditions and practice, equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation . . .".

111. The Committee noted with satisfaction that an increasing number of industrial disputes were being settled by conciliation, mediation and other forms of negotiation. While some members expressed certain reservations about compulsory arbitration, there seemed to be general agreement that the use of conciliation and other negotiation procedures should be encouraged. In this regard, the Committee noted with favour the development of joint consultative machinery in the Belgian Congo, in Territories under French administration and in United Kingdom Territories.

112. There is an increasing number of cases in which wages and conditions of employment are being negotiated by collective bargaining procedures; negotiated contracts are being honoured by both parties to an increasing extent. In the view of the Committee, the trend towards mutual respect between management and labour in the Non-Self-Governing Territories augured well for the future. The Committee also noted that in a number of Territories with little or no collective bargaining machinery, use was being made of wages councils for fixing wages and conditions of employment. While recognizing the necessity for making use of such statutory machinery, the Committee would wish to see as soon as is practicable a transition to trade union negotiation of collective agreements in determining of wages and conditions of employment.

113. Information before the Committee showed that opportunities for trade union education continued to be provided from many sources. It specially welcomed the efforts by local trade unions to provide training for their own rank and file members. The Committee wished to record its commendation of the local governments, metropolitan Governments, the international organizations and non-governmental organizations for their valuable contribution to trade union development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

114. The Committee was informed of the initiative taken by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office in authorizing the Office to undertake a comprehensive survey of labour and social conditions in Africa, and that a draft of the survey was laid before the ILO Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories at its fifth session in December 1957.

115. The information provided by the ILO on the application of International Labour Conventions was encouraging. The Committee's interest in the implementation of these and other Conventions has been stated in previous reports. It attaches great importance to their application in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Thus the Committee welcomed the information that the average number of Conventions now fully applied without modification in Non-Self-Governing Territories was sixteen.

IX. Housing policies

116. The Committee discussed at its 1952 and 1955 sessions a number of points relating to the provision of suitable low-cost housing in the towns. This year it had before it a report prepared by the International Labour Office on workers' housing problems.

117. The Committee endorsed the view that rapid action for the provision of adequate low-cost housing and sanitation was of outstanding importance in the context of urban social advancement. The Committee was aware that, as elsewhere, slum conditions were prevalent in many urban and some rural areas in Non-Self-Governing Territories. Urban growth in recent years has been rapid and haphazard; only in exceptional cases had Governments intervened by providing housing. Since the Second World War, rapid population growth, industrialization and migration to the towns have aggravated urban housing problems. The tendency of labour to more permanent settlement in urban areas has grown, thus creating new and more acute housing problems. Most territorial governments now assume a large measure of responsibility for housing and town planning.

118. Housing is an integral part of the physical environment in which the individual and his family live and work. Considering social problems of urbanization earlier in the present report, the Committee emphasized the importance of town planning and housing. During the early stages of industrialization and urbanization, with co-ordinated town and country planning by Governments, local councils and non-official agencies, a rational and comprehensive programme of housing can be developed. Such programmes can largely avoid the growth of slums; their implementation, however, will necessarily depend upon the resources available, the priorities allotted to other development projects, the land tenure system, and the availability of trained labour. The key to higher standards of living, including better housing, is rapid economic development. Hence, town and country development planning should be an integral part of economic development related to the total resources of a country. Housing programmes often require separate administrative organization with staff trained in many forms of social action.

119. The Committee did not engage in detailed examination of housing policies in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It emphasized, however, that housing policy should be co-ordinated with economic policy and an appropriate priority accorded to workers' housing. It should be the responsibility of Governments as an ultimate objective to ensure that suitable accommodation is available to all who need it.

120. It is necessary first of all to have a clear definition of minimum housing standards and a reasonably accurate determination of housing needs: for the latter purpose, reliable data on the size, family, sex and age structure of the population are required, as are reasonably accurate data on income levels. Knowledge of the customs of the indigenous population is important to establish local housing preferences.

121. The Committee was informed by some representatives of Administering Members of various measures taken to provide low-cost housing in the larger towns. Although in a number of Territories housing surveys have been undertaken or data on housing problems and needs have been collected in social and employment surveys, few Governments have yet reached the stage of formulating comprehensive territorial housing programmes: in some instances, however, central bodies with wide powers to study housing needs and to define the broad outlines of a housing programme have been established.

122. Most public housing is undertaken directly by territorial governments or central agencies, rather than by municipal bodies. Some schemes had to be devised on an emergency basis to relieve urgent needs; however, broad programmes aimed at creating integrated neighbourhoods with all necessary amenities are receiving increasing attention. A significant trend in policy is the emphasis on home ownership. A great variety of rent-purchase schemes have been initiated and loans and other assistance have been extended to prospective home owners. Such schemes, however, are necessarily limited to individuals either employed on a reasonably stable basis or earning a sufficiently high wage to pay interest and amortization charges; sometimes they are open only to government and municipal employees. Whilst recognizing that home ownership should be the ultimate aim of policy, the Committee believes that the main problem of housing relates to the low-income groups who may rarely be able to own their own houses even with substantial assistance. Therefore, accommodation for rent must be provided for those who are not in a position to become owners and a proper balance maintained in all public housing schemes.

123. Aided self-help schemes, sometimes integrated in community development programmes, have often been successful. Housing co-operatives and building societies encouraged in various ways by public authorities have also sometimes played a useful part in providing better housing for urban low-income groups. The Committee expressed the view that these organizations, adapted to the circumstances of the Territories, should be actively encouraged and, where appropriate, initiated by public authorities.

124. As in 1952, the Committee was of the opinion that aided self-help in the matter of housing whether provided through co-operatives, building societies or, with necessary safeguards, to individuals, could do much to reduce money costs and to improve living standards. It was recognized that aided self-help on a large scale required considerable organization and control. Nevertheless, in addition to the material results which it can give, its rewards in terms of a sense of achievement and the development of a greater spirit of co-operation are substantial.

125. In view of present urgent housing needs, employers are often encouraged or required to provide housing for their employees, and it may sometimes be necessary to extend the legal obligations of employers in this field. The social disadvantages of placing the exclusive right to provide accommodation in the hands of employers are well known. However, steps should be taken to establish legal safeguards to protect the worker and his family from possible arbitrary action on the part of the employer.

126. Recognition should be given to the part which can be played by trade unions in the provision of workers' housing. Trade unions may participate in discussions with public authorities when the latter are formulating housing programmes and policies. Public authorities should seek the co-operation of trade union organizations in the development of vocational training in the building trades and in the encouragement of self-help house-building activities and other steps to promote community life and spirit.

127. The Committee expressed its appreciation of the assistance rendered in its work by the International Labour Organisation, and associated itself with the recommendations of the resolution on workers' housing adopted at the Third Session of the ILO Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories.

X. Public health and nutrition

128. The Committee expressed its appreciation to the World Health Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization and the United Nations Children's Fund for the documentation they had presented on various aspects of public health and for the assistance the representatives of WHO had rendered to the Committee in the examination of public health conditions.

129. The Committee reiterated the views expressed in its 1955 report that statistical information on public health conditions in most Non-Self-Governing Territories was imperfect, and that further and more accurate information was necessary if public health programmes were to be planned so as best to meet the existing needs and health services adequately integrated into an over-all policy for economic and social development. While the Committee appreciated the obstacles involved in the collection of statistics, owing to suspicion and indifference prevailing in some sectors of the population, it felt that some form of health education might convince the people of the importance of these statistics.

130. Although statistical information is incomplete, there is no great difficulty in forming a clear view of the communicable disease situation in the Territories. The Committee feels that health conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in general are steadily improving; recent advances in medicine and public health have contributed substantially to the reduction in morbidity and mortality rates. However, the extent of the burden of communicable diseases is still considerable and poses a significant economic problem. Attacks on these diseases by mass campaigns, immunization campaigns, and destruction of insect vectors have been widely developed, often aiming not only at control but at complete eradication. Malaria eradication and control campaigns, with international assistance co-ordinated by WHO, have been successful in many Territories while technical difficulties are still encountered in others. Yaws campaigns have been successful in a large number of Territories and a co-ordinated "African Yaws Offensive" for the next ten years was proposed at the Second WHO International Yaws Conference held in 1955. Tuberculosis still poses a serious problem in the tropical areas. In addition, the social situation brought about by the rapidly developing processes of urbanization and migrant labour has intensified the problem in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Yet, in spite of these obstacles, the new approach to the control of tuberculosis promises better results.

131. Sanitation is fundamental and basic to individual community existence. In addition to strengthening sanitation services, environmental sanitation programmes, when combined with general programmes, can be of assistance to the development of the community. The reduction of infectious and parasitic disease affects not only morbidity and mortality but can increase greatly the working capacity of the population. The cost of improved living conditions, i.e., hygienic housing, sanitation and water supply, would be more than returned by the economic capacity of the people living in improved hygienic surroundings. When such diseases as malaria and treponematoses have been successfully eradicated in the future, problems arising out of man's self-made environment will have to be tackled next. Intestinal infestation and diarrhoea have, in many parts of the world, become the major health problem and can be expected to assume a like state in many Non-Self-Governing Territories. However, beginnings are being made in many areas through provision of adequate and safe water supplies and sewage facilities. Such projects as the construction of fish ponds and irrigation works are frequently subject to considerable scrutiny so that they do not become breeding grounds for vectors of diseases. In urban areas, sanitation is inadequate, water supplies rudimentary and construction flimsy. Overcrowding in dwellings is often acute and is one of the more important causes of inadequate sanitation. Village hygiene is a very different problem in practice. Water carriage sanitation is entirely out of the question and adequate provision of a water supply for drinking and washing purposes is far from universal. The Committee was informed that local authorities were making an effort to explain the principles of sanitation to the village populations and to enlist their co-operation in the work of improving local sanitary conditions. There are good reasons for confidence that such co-operation will be forthcoming and that the community feeling and community reliance of the people, particularly in rural districts, can be utilized in schemes for improvement.

132. Population and vital statistics are a requisite for all forms of governmental administration. Health statistics supply the additional information for an over-all planning of public health schemes and for setting up priorities of operation. Health service planning should not be carried out in a vacuum. It is a part of the total social development of the Territory and has its place in the general economic scheme. Since all health services tend to improve the fitness and working capacity of the people, they contribute to national well-being. Consequently, such well-being generates more funds for health and other essential services which tend to improve the level of living, thus making the work of the specific health services easier. There is a close connexion between health and economic and social problems and it is justifiable to ask how large a part of local budgets should be devoted to health services. Short-term budgeting is essentially in conflict with public health long-term planning and it seems important to reach a compromise on this point. The Committee was informed that in some Territories where certain health needs could not be met because of inadequate public funds, local populations were encouraged to co-operate so that better results could be obtained without an increase in the health budgets of the Territories.

133. One of the first necessities of over-all planning is to assess staff requirements for health services over a long period and so to be able to plan for the training and increase of personnel. The ultimate aim should be the provision of an adequate number of fully trained personnel which can be achieved by intensifying training schemes and by up-grading the existing training institutions, together with the further training of auxiliary staff for the purpose of bringing them into the category of fully trained personnel. The Committee gave much attention to the importance of training indigenous staff as a basis for the expansion of health services. Such training schemes are already in operation in various Territories.

134. The Committee reviewed this situation three years ago, and noted at its ninth session that in spite of a considerable increase in public health and medical staff in some Territories, physicians were still scarce in the areas where the poorest health conditions were to be found. The needs of the Territories for medical and nursing staff cannot be met to more than a very limited extent by the importation of trained staff from the metropolitan countries. In 1955, the Committee gave careful attention to the question of whether the staff should be locally trained or trained in the metropolitan country. This year the Committee was informed that medical schools in the Non-Self-Governing Territories at the present time could not provide more than a total of 200 doctors a year and although the number of nurses trained by local nursing schools had increased, the relation to the total need remained much the same. At present, the United Kingdom has in its medical schools approximately 750 students from the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

135. In 1955, the Committee was told that the cost of establishing a properly equipped teaching hospital in some of the Territories was out of proportion to the cost of constructing a hospital for local needs without teaching facilities and that it was far less expensive to send students to train in metropolitan countries than to give them full professional training in their home Territories. The Committee held that calculations of this character should be scrutinized with the utmost care. On the other hand, the Territories in general are accepting the point of view that training in the metropolitan countries is costly and is essentially attuned to the practice of medicine in the metropolitan country so that the trained doctor upon his return to his own country knows comparatively little about many local problems. In 1955, the Committee stated that it was desirable that subordinate staff, where reasonably possible, should be drawn from the community in which their future work would lie and that on the completion of training, the new recruits should be encouraged to return to work where they would be readily accepted as members of the community.

136. Most of the Territories have plans in operation for expanding hospital services and are, in general, relating the provision to local circumstances and resources. Hospital planning and construction must be related to the total health services including existing hospital resources. The Committee noted with satisfaction the increase in hospitals and hospital beds that has taken place in many Territories, but at the same time expressed its concern that, with the incidence of diseases and the lack of good housing conditions or adequate service to care for the sick in their own homes, the Territories are still lacking hospital facilities. It recommended that health activities should be based on a structure of decentralized integrated health services in which curative and preventive services were organized in hospitals, laboratories and health units properly distributed among towns and villages. All these services should be supported by the population and guided by a competent central health authority. The gradual expansion of hospital facilities of a long-term programme for the provision of curative and preventive services was an important step in public health development. The Committee also noted the need for special hospital services for children.

137. A good start has been made in maternity work, although in some Territories maternal morbidity and mortality are still high. This is due not only to poor obstetrics, early marriage, repeated pregnancies, anaemia of a mainly nutritional character and other forms of malnutrition, and heavy physical work, but to diseases such as malaria and helminthiasis. The health of children is frequently poor. There is urgent need for paediatricians and, on the whole, nurses, midwives and medical assistants as well as doctors need training in child health, nutrition and teaching methods. In some Territories, careful child health planning has been handicapped by the lack of paediatricians. Even where international or other funds have been available, the scarcity of qualified paediatricians has continued to remain a serious obstacle. The Committee endorsed the view that every effort should be made to increase the number of paediatricians, through strengthening paediatric training in the medical schools and through fellowships and graduate training locally or abroad, if necessary.

138. In regard to midwifery, the locally trained midwife, though of limited status, has a considerable part to play now and perhaps in the near future. Her complete replacement by the fully qualified midwife will necessarily await long-term planning. The immediate need in most Territories is for the development of modern training for the "local midwife", which should go somewhat beyond the mechanics of labour and provide for ante-natal training together with the rudiments of care for the young child. After completing training, these young women, however, can only work effectively if they are supported by installations capable of providing preventive and curative services and the follow-up of cases. Infant welfare centres located in the villages can contribute greatly by giving simple courses in child care as well as tending directly to child health needs. It is apparent that special attention needs to be given to the "lost" group of children from one or two to five years of age for whom the death rate is high and for whom services are inadequately developed. The importance of trained paediatricians deserves attention also in this connexion.

139. The United Nations Children's Fund has provided assistance to Non-Self-Governing Territories primarily in the form of supplies and equipment to initiate or to expand and strengthen programmes for mother and child health and nutrition and for control or eradication of diseases affecting children. The aid is directed almost entirely towards the development of long-term programmes in which the Fund assists the Governments with the technical collaboration of FAO and WHO.

140. In 1956, the Committee agreed that malnutrition was a serious problem in many Territories, requiring action on the part of Governments to improve the nutrition of the populations concerned. Since the earlier report of the Committee was written, progress has unquestionably been made in studying and attacking problems of nutrition. Investigations of protein malnutrition have continued, often with the assistance of FAO and WHO, regional commissions, and other agencies at work in this field, and advances have been made in the treatment and, to a certain extent, in the prevention of this serious and widespread deficiency. The need for improved nutritional standards is widely appreciated and in some Territories specialized staff have been added to the appropriate departments to provide for an increase in the personnel dealing with nutrition problems.

141. In general, however, the situation remains substantially unchanged. Food supplies are still insufficient to fulfil dietary needs. The demands of population on the food supply in many areas continue to increase and diseases preventable by better nourishment continue to be a problem. More staff with better training in nutrition is needed. A well-trained non-medical nutritionist would prove a very useful member of a team led by a paediatrician in the field of maternal and child health. If made more widely available, such workers could help to educate other health personnel in the fundamentals of nutrition and in the best use of available food resources. The increased production of essential nutritional foods through agricultural extension methods should be correlated with nutritional problems. Furthermore, proper understanding and interpretation of local customs would provide a useful background for programmes to improve nutrition. Consideration should also be given to collaboration between health personnel and the agricultural extension services.

142. The Committee noted that courses for nutrition workers have been given in Africa for the French and English-speaking participants in 1955 and 1956 and other courses were given in 1955 for students in the British West Indies. The Committee also noted with interest that FAO planned to establish a regional office in Africa to give further attention to the association between nutrition, agriculture, home economics and community development programmes.

143. The first aim of public health policies in maternity and child health must be an educational one. Since one of the main obstacles to successful child welfare and maternal services in a primarily agricultural society is the ignorance of the mothers, the educational work in this field must aim at the mother. Ignorance of dietary requirements leads often to nutritional diseases and their concomitants, which take their toll primarily when the child is first established on an adult diet.

144. For the dissemination of health education in urban and rural communities, the co-operation and participation of the population in this work can be solicited. The school is an important means of imparting health education to children and through them to parents. The local community centre in a community development scheme is another obvious place for this type of work for which such various mass communications media as cinema, flannelgraph and radio are proving useful. In devising methods of health education and teaching the local staff to use them, pilot schemes linked to local problems which may vary from Territory to Territory and from community to community have been found valuable: the actual local teaching of health, which, in addition to technical knowledge on the part of those who teach, requires organizational skill, is primarily the responsibility of the health department.

145. Health education remains one of the biggest problems in the Territories. The Committee's attention was drawn to the nutrition and health education seminar held in the Philippines in 1955, jointly sponsored by WHO and FAO which emphasized the responsibility of Governments to give high priority to health and nutrition education. A health education training course organized under the auspices of the South Pacific Commission in 1957 was also noted.

146. In 1955, the Committee emphasized the importance of community participation in health projects and expressed the view that the community development movement and similar forms of public initiative could be used appropriately to support public health campaigns and that the public health services might follow in their operations the principles indicated by the community development movement.

147. The Committee noted with satisfaction the offer of WHO to give assistance to over-all planning surveys in two or three Non-Self-Governing Territories of moderate size. Though the planning problems of the Territories differ in detail, many have the same fundamental principles and from the standpoint of experience could give valuable guidance to others.

XI. Demographic trends

148. Consideration of demographic conditions and the outlook of future population trends are essential for the formulation of any realistic plans for the promotion of health and levels of living as well as for the general advancement of the peoples concerned. The Committee noted that in many Non-Self-Governing Territories, the supporting statistical material was not yet adequately developed. This is particularly true for certain large and populous Territories which lack the necessary statistical information that would make it possible to appraise demographic conditions and trends. Consequently, the need for improvement of the local statistical services becomes urgent; such services should also be assisted or even supplemented, whenever possible, with adequate units of trained personnel capable of dealing with studies on population analysis.

149. The available information indicates a rapid demographic change, the main features of which are: a fairly high rate of population increase, a high and often increasing birth-rate, a moderate and decreasing death-rate and a young age composition. The resulting demographic characteristics in many Non-Self-Governing Territories call for increasing emphasis on economic development and social progress. In the widening gap between fertility and mortality rates there is a danger that gains in production may, in the long run, be largely overcome by increases in the numbers of population, and this would tend to perpetuate poverty and ill health. In many Territories, the pressure of population on the food supply continues to increase.

150. Declines in mortality associated with high fertility rates result in a young age composition and increased dependency rates. In many Territories the proportion of children below the age of fifteen years exceeds the level of forty per 100 persons of all ages. Reduction in mortality rates also leads to high rates of population increase. One of the greatest problems that faces most of these areas is the rapidly increasing population, while the large increase in the number of young people foreshadows a further increase in the birth-rate.

151. In the measurement of levels of living in the Non-Self-Governing Territories the demographic approach has provided little information to date owing to the paucity of the demographic material required. Incomplete census counts and under-registration of vital events, both of which are difficult to assess, detract from the value of this approach as a description of the success of health and social measures in raising the levels of living of the peoples concerned. In only a few of the Territories, in which the population is more homogeneous and the statistics are relatively adequate, can the demographic components of the levels of living be taken as a true indication of the actual levels of living.

152. Urbanization, which is a relatively recent phenomenon in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, brings forth demographic implications of significant magnitude. In many Territories the rate of population growth in towns is increasing faster than that of the total population, and since the process of urbanization, which is known to be selective, depends mainly on rural migration to the towns, it produces profound disturbances in the sex and age composition of both these population segments. The resulting demographic imbalance, i.e., a substantial preponderance of males in the young adult ages found in towns, affects the over-all fertility and mortality rates as well as the productive capacity of the population. However, as in the case of basic demographic statistics, urbanization as a fairly new development and of an intensely dynamic character has not as yet been statistically analysed in sufficient degree to permit an adequate evaluation of its high demographic complexities.

XII. Race relations

153. The populations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories vary widely in race, tradition and culture. They have, however, one thing in common: most inhabitants of many Territories are of an ethnic origin and have a cultural heritage different from those of the metropolitan countries. In a number of Territories, permanent immigration by people of different races and cultures has taken place. Co-operation among the various races in these multi-racial societies is of the utmost importance.

154. In its previous reports on social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee repeatedly condemned race discrimination and prejudice as contrary to the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and supported efforts to promote the co-operation of all peoples in implementing the provisions of these international instruments concerning race relations. While recognizing that abolition of all forms of racial discrimination is indispensable for racial co-operation, the Committee considered that declarations and policy statements cannot automatically bring about complete eradication of racial prejudice and discrimination.

155. At the present session, the Committee reiterated its view that effective means for eliminating racial prejudice and establishing harmonious racial relations on the basis of mutual respect and recognition of equality should be sought in legislation, administrative regulation and practice, education and enlightened public opinion. It also reaffirmed its adherence to the terms of General Assembly resolution 644 (VII) of 10 December 1952 which recommended the abolition in Non-Self-Governing Territories of discriminatory laws and practices; the examination of all laws, statutes and ordinances with a view to such abolition; the examination of laws which distinguish between citizens and non-citizens primarily on racial or religious grounds; the opening of public facilities to all inhabitants without distinction of race; and the frequent examination of laws providing measures of protection for certain sections of the public.

156. The Committee turned its attention once again to steps that were being taken to give effect to the above recommendations and to the collaboration of social and cultural organizations in the Territories for the eradication of racial prejudice and the promotion of better race relations. Although the Committee found it at times difficult to evaluate fully the situation owing to the limited scope of information on this subject, it was able to note that encouraging developments in general policy had taken place and that specific measures for the promotion of better race relations had been taken.

157. The Committee took note of the following among the principal encouraging developments in general policies and anti-discrimination measures since 1955. In the Belgian Congo, steps taken for the elimination of racial discrimination included (a) a recommendation for the establishment of common tribunals for the trial of Europeans and Africans in criminal matters; (b) the abolition of separate representation of the indigenous group, as such, on government advisory councils and provision for the representation of racially mixed professional and economic groups with the participation of indigenous inhabitants in each group; (c) a 1957 decree eliminating racial discrimination in the trade union movement; and (d) the approval by the Colonial Council of a bill providing for a penalty against any person who expresses, provokes or fosters dislike, contempt or hatred for a racial or ethnic group. In the African Territories administered by the United Kingdom, the Race Relations Advisory and Conciliation Ordinance was enacted in 1957 in Northern Rhodesia providing for the establishment of a Central Race Relations and Conciliation Committee and district committees to assist in promoting harmonious race relations between the various races in the Territory, particularly in their common use of public premises. In the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyassaland, the Government has proposed to set up a Federal Office of Racial Affairs. In Kenya, the Government has accepted a 1957 motion by an African member of the Legislative Council urging the authorities to take steps to eliminate discrimination in hotels, restaurants and other public places. In the Bahamas the Territorial House of Assembly, with the concurrence of the Legislative Council, condemned, by resolution in 1956, discrimination against persons on account of their race or colour in the use of facilities at hotels, theatres, and other such public places.

158. The importance of the participation of all sections of the population in the administration of the Territories and of the admission of local inhabitants to higher posts in the civil service had been emphasized by the Committee in its previous reports on social conditions and in the outlines of educational, social and economic objectives which regard the participation of the local inhabitants in the conduct of their own affairs as one of the fundamental aims of economic, social and educational policies.

159. Information transmitted during the period under review indicated, as encouraging trends, that opportunities for the employment of indigenous people in government services have continued to increase; that in many Territories special attention has been given to the training of local inhabitants for higher posts in the civil service; and that in some Territories specific recommendations and programmes have been adopted to bring about full participation by the local inhabitants in the public services. Hope was expressed in the Committee that measures to bring about full participation by local inhabitants in the public services would be expedited, if necessary in collaboration with the appropriate authorities in the United Nations which are now engaged in programmes relating to public administration.

160. General Assembly resolution 328 (IV) of 2 December 1949 invited the Administering Members to take steps, where necessary, to establish equal treatment in matters relating to the education of the inhabitants of the Territories under their administration. In its 1950, 1953 and 1956 reports on educational conditions, the Committee emphasized that education should be open to all without any discrimination on grounds of race or colour, and that every effort should be made to develop a common school system open without discrimination to children of all races. The development of a system of common education plays a major role in the establishment of improved race relations. During childhood, prejudices or attitudes of understanding and tolerance easily take root; children of different races attending separate schools are bound to develop racial attitudes. Information supplied to the Committee indicated that there are no separate school systems in the Territories under French administration; that new steps have been taken towards equality of opportunity in education in the Belgian Congo; and that while educational facilities are still organized along racial lines in a number of other Territories with multiracial, multi-cultural and multilingual communities, the number of interracial schools and their enrolment have increased. Furthermore, in Territories where separate schools exist, emphasis has been laid on uniformity aimed at a national system of education. In this connexion and at the instance of several members, the Committee took note of a resolution adopted by the Commission on Human Rights at its fourteenth session on 25 March 1958, recommending that the States Members of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies should take any necessary steps, appropriate to their respective institutions and educational system, to make the Universal Declaration of Human Rights a required subject of study in all schools and universities of every country and Territory, as the understanding and acceptance of the principles contained in this Declaration contributes effectively towards eliminating prejudice and thus discrimination.

161. The difference in language must be taken into account in framing educational policies which seek to provide interracial primary schools in many Territories. The Committee reiterated the principle, enunciated in 1955, that justification of unequal treatment for various ethnic groups at the secondary school level can only be accepted in exceptional circumstances as a temporary expedient and that at no level should the differences be established on a racial basis. The Committee noted with particular interest the establishment of four interracial government secondary schools in the Belgian Congo and the steps taken to initiate interracial education in government secondary schools in Uganda.

162. Information before the Committee indicates that, in principle and practice, universities and colleges of higher education in Non-Self-Governing Territories are interracial and no quota system for races has been adopted. Preference in admission is naturally given to local candidates. There has been a steady increase in the proportion of locally born staff in the institutes of higher education in the United Kingdom Territories. Four institutions of higher learning have been recently established in the African Territories. The Royal Technical College of East Africa in Nairobi, opened in 1956, admitted 214 students of all races from the East African Territories. At the University College of Rhodesia and Nyassaland, it was reported that no major difficulties had been experienced in achieving a racially unself-conscious student body within the walls of the College itself. The new universities in the Belgian Congo—Lovanium University of Leopoldville and the University of Elizabethville—are interracial institutions. Practically all the universities in the Non-Self-Governing Territories serve communities which are diverse in language, religion, tradition and social custom, and their role in developing broader outlooks, fostering tolerance and in creating the basis of wider social cohesion cannot be overemphasized.

163. To develop the Territories in the interest of all sectors of the population and to raise the standard of living of the population by increasing individual real purchasing power and by providing higher standards of social services through the increase of the total wealth of each Territory were the fundamental economic aims stated in the Committee's 1954 report. Information placed before the Committee showed encouraging trends in the participation of indigenous populations in economic development. Their economic advancement is likely to contribute to the elimination of racial prejudice and discrimination, particularly where the discrimination practised against the indigenous population is not attributed to race alone.

164. The Committee in its 1955 report on social conditions referred to the barriers to the advancement of Africans in some fields of employment in Central and East Africa, and considered it urgent for the Administrations, employers and workers concerned to find ways and means by which openings could be provided for qualified workers from among the inhabitants of the Territories, without distinction of race.

165. As a part of its review of an ILO survey of labour and social policy in Africa at its fifth session in December 1957, the Committee of Experts on Social Policy in Non-Metropolitan Territories of the International Labour Organisation, after recalling that the non-discrimination provisions of the Social Policy (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention of 1947 ratified by Belgium, France, New Zealand and the United Kingdom were in force for all Belgian, British and French non-metropolitan Territories in Africa, concluded that much still remained to be done to make non-discrimination fully effective in the multi-racial societies of Africa. The Committee noted that a proposed convention and a proposed recommendation concerning discrimination in employment and occupation, and a draft resolution concerning the application of the proposed convention in Non-Metropolitan Territories would be discussed at the forty-second session of the General Conference of the International Labour Organisation.

166. The Committee entertained the view that the establishment of racial equality and harmony was not only desirable but also possible. A good example was cited in Hawaii, where components of the population had dissolved a significant part of their differences in their common interest in social, economic and political growth, and where race equality was apparent in the freedom of interracial marriages, in the absence of legal segregation in schools or residential areas, and in the ease with which members of different races mingled at social functions. The eradication of racial discriminatory practices is a long process and calls for co-operation between the administration and its inhabitants and for collaboration and partnership among the various ethnic groups for common economic, social and educational advancement.

167. To eradicate discrimination and establish racial harmony, a strong lead by government in carrying out a policy of non-discrimination on racial grounds is essential. But pressure of public opinion also to abolish the colour bar and to foster collaboration among different races in social and cultural activities plays an important part in the promotion of better race relations. Information transmitted during 1955-1957 indicated that new interracial associations for the promotion of racial harmony had been established in the Belgian Congo and in East and Central African Territories. The Committee was informed of the development of a progressive body of opinion in some Territories and of an increase in the number of those actively working for better relations among all sections of the populations. Efforts of voluntary organizations to promote better understanding among races should be encouraged and supported.

168. The Committee noted that the fourteenth session of the Commission on Human Rights, endorsing the view of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, recommended that a second conference of non-governmental organizations in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council, interested in the eradication of prejudice and discrimination, should be held in 1959. The first such conference held in the spring of 1955 had condemned all discriminatory practices, whatever form they assumed, and in whatever country or Territory they existed. The desirability of sending suitable persons from Non-Self-Governing Territories to seminars to be held by the United Nations under the programme of advisory services in the field of human rights in accordance with General Assembly resolution 926 (X) was expressed. A spirit of mutual respect and co-operation is required to combat racial bias and to promote common advancement in Territories where different ethnic groups live side by side. Advancement of any society depends on the contribution of all its members; when groups of people in a given society are not regarded as equal, progress is difficult. The abolition of discrimination on racial grounds should form an integral part of social policy and public administration.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES (TENTH SESSION, 1959)

I. Constitution of the Committee

1. The General Assembly, by its resolution 1332 (XIII) of 12 December 1958, decided to continue, for a further period of three years, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, on the same basis as was set forth in resolutions 332 (IV) of 2 December 1949, 646 (VII) of 10 December 1952 and 933 (X) of 8 November 1955.

2. The terms of reference of the Committee, as set forth in resolution 1332 (XIII), are as follows:

"5. ... to examine, in the spirit of Article 1, paragraphs 3 and 4, and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

"6. ... to submit to the General Assembly at its regular sessions reports containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories."

3. As regards the Committee's programme of work, the same resolution states that:

"7. ... the Committee should, without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, give special attention to educational, economic and social conditions in turn and should consider the information transmitted in respect of these questions in the light of the reports approved by the General Assembly on such conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories."

4. The Committee consists of fourteen members: seven Administering Member States transmitting information on Non-Self-Governing Territories and an equal number of other Members, elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly. In 1958, the terms of office of China, India, Iraq and Venezuela having expired, the Dominican Republic, Ghana, India and Iraq were elected to the Committee for three-year terms. The present membership of the Committee is as follows:

Members transmitting information

Australia	New Zealand
Belgium	United Kingdom of Great Britain
France	and Northern Ireland
Netherlands	United States of America

Members elected by the General Assembly

	Expiration of term
Brazil . . . . .	1960
Ceylon . . . . .	1959
Dominican Republic . . . . .	1961
Ghana . . . . .	1961
Guatemala . . . . .	1959
India . . . . .	1961

With the exception of Belgium all members were represented at the session.

5. The Committee met at the Headquarters of the United Nations in New York for its tenth session, in the course of which it held eighteen meetings between 20 April and 19 May 1959.

6. Representatives of ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO also attended the meetings of the Committee and took part in its discussions.

II. Officers of the Committee

7. At its opening (187th) meeting on 20 April, the Committee elected by acclamation the following officers:

Chairman: Mr. Kevin T. Kelly (Australia)

Vice-Chairman: Mr. T. P. Davin (New Zealand)

Rapporteur: Mr. M. Rasgotra (India).

III. Agenda

8. At its 187th meeting, the Committee considered the provisional agenda<sup>1/</sup> prepared by the Secretariat. The representative of India proposed that item 4 on the provisional agenda entitled "Progress achieved by Non-Self-Governing Territories in pursuance of Chapter XI of the Charter" be considered after the Committee had discussed the educational, social and economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories (items 5, 6 and 7 of the provisional agenda). The representative of Ghana supported this proposal. The order of the items of the agenda was revised accordingly.

9. The agenda as adopted is reproduced as annex I to the present report.

IV. Sub-Committee

10. At its 192nd meeting, the Committee appointed a sub-committee to prepare a report on educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. This sub-committee was composed of the representatives of Ceylon, the Dominican Republic, Ghana, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America. It was assisted by the Rapporteur and the representatives of the specialized agencies. The sub-committee elected Mr. N. Kanakarathne of Ceylon as its Chairman. It held twelve meetings between 27 April and 7 May.

V. Preliminary statements

11. At the 187th meeting of the Committee, the representatives of Guatemala and the United Kingdom reserved the positions of their respective Governments with regard to sovereignty over British Honduras (Belize).

12. The representatives of India and Iraq stated that their Governments recognized no sovereignty other than that of Indonesia over West Irian (Netherlands New Guinea). The representative of the Netherlands reaffirmed the sovereignty of his Government over Netherlands New Guinea, in respect of which his Government had transmitted information, in accordance with its obligations under the Charter. The representative of Australia stated that his Government's position was that Netherlands sovereignty over Netherlands New Guinea was beyond doubt.

13. At the 193rd meeting, the representative of India expressed his delegation's regret at the absence of the representative of Belgium and the hope that the Belgian Government would reconsider its position and resume participation in the work of the Committee.

VI. Educational conditions

14. At its tenth session, the Committee gave special attention to educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, in accordance with the programme of work set out in General Assembly resolution 1332 (XII). In response to the invitation extended by the General Assembly in resolution 745 (VIII) of 27 November 1953, educational experts were included in the delegations of the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States.

15. The Committee had before it special studies prepared by the Secretariat and the specialized agencies. The studies prepared by the Secretariat included papers on the participation of the inhabitants in the development of education and on secondary and higher education. The reports prepared by the specialized agencies included studies on fundamental education and the eradication of illiteracy, free and compulsory primary education in Non-Self-Governing Territories (UNESCO), on recent developments in technical and vocational training in Non-Self-Governing Territories (ILO), on agricultural education and extension services in Non-Self-Governing Territories (FAO), and on the education and training of medical and health personnel in Non-Self-Governing Territories (WHO). The summaries prepared by the Secretary-General of the information transmitted by the Administering Members under Article 73 e of the Charter, since the establishment of the United Nations, which will form part of the progress report (resolution 1053 (XI)), were also placed before the Committee for its perusal.

16. The Committee discussed educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories (item 4 of the agenda) at its 188th to 196th meetings inclusive. Statements in the general debate on this item were made by the representatives of Australia, Brazil, Ceylon, the Dominican Republic, Ghana, Guatemala, India, Iraq, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States. Following the general discussion, the Committee dealt with a number of specific aspects of education listed in its agenda as sub-items of item 4.

17. The representatives of Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States outlined the educational policies and the organization of educational services in the Territories under their respective administrations and gave additional information covering the progress achieved in these Territories in the educational field.

18. In the Territory of Papua, it was stated, educational policy is aimed at the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the people. One of the principal objectives is the achievement of mass literacy. The most expeditious means of achieving this end is the teaching of all children to read and write in a common language. In Netherlands New Guinea, the policy of the Government is to spread elementary education and vocational training, through programmes adapted to suit local conditions. The village school is the back-bone of the educational system. In the Territories under New Zealand administration, the Government hopes to establish an educational system designed to fit the inhabitants to be good New Zealand citizens and at the same time to make the islands more attractive places to live in by developing their resources and by raising the standards of living of the inhabitants.

19. In the Territories administered by the United Kingdom, educational policy was founded on the dual aim of educating the majority of the population and of providing specialized and technical training for a smaller number. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that, since it had long been recognized that the educational system in any territory must be designed to meet the particular needs of the people, the direction of policy had been entrusted to local officials and bodies with the United Kingdom playing an advisory role and providing professional and financial assistance. The intensity of the demand for educational facilities had imposed a heavy strain on the financial and administrative resources in many territories.

20. Under the United States system, education was wholly controlled at the state, territorial and local level and the only national agency was the Office of Education in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, whose leadership could only appeal to reason, without the power to dictate what people must think, believe or be taught. The representative of the United States outlined the manner in which financial assistance in the educational field is given to the Territories. The Territories of Guam and the Virgin Islands are now treated on a footing of equality with states in this respect, and they receive assistance from the Federal Government under the same conditions as states of the United States.

21. In the discussions on the eradication of illiteracy, the representatives of Brazil, Ceylon, Ghana, Guatemala and India described measures adopted in their own countries to combat illiteracy. The representative of the Netherlands stated that his Government attached great importance to mass education as a prerequisite to advancement in other fields.

22. Many representatives noted that the statistical information given in the UNESCO report<sup>2</sup> did not go beyond 1953, and related to a much earlier period in respect of many Territories, and that it was, therefore, difficult to obtain a clear picture of the progress made in recent years. The representative of India suggested that, even if censuses were not planned for the near future, sample surveys should be undertaken with the aid of UNESCO to obtain more up-to-date statistical data. The representative of UNESCO agreed that sample surveys would be useful, but availability of funds might be a limiting factor.

23. The representatives of Ceylon, Ghana, India and Iraq expressed the view that the rate of development in education and in other spheres could only be accelerated when responsibility for policy and planning was vested in the representative institutions of the people. These representatives, together with those of Brazil and Guatemala, welcomed progress in the extension of participation of the inhabitants of many Non-Self-Governing Territories in the educational field, but they felt that this progress was characterized by a lack of uniformity and, with the exception of a few Territories, was inadequate. In their view the greatest progress in the field of education was registered in those Territories where a ministerial system of Government exists, with powers to formulate and implement educational policy and regulate budgetary provisions in indigenous hands. The representatives of Ghana and India were of the view that the relationship between education and self-government was decisive and that if the goal of self-government is to become a reality the extent of indigenous participation in educational policies and programmes must be rapidly increased. The United Kingdom representative drew attention to the view expressed by the Committee in 1950 that the form of participation was less important than its spirit and effectiveness. He related some of the ways in which effective participation of the local inhabitants in the development of education took place in some United Kingdom Territories where ministerial systems had not yet been introduced.

24. The representatives of Ghana and Ceylon expressed the hope that the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories would be permitted to profit by the experience of those countries which had attained independence in recent years. The representative of Ghana added that the African peoples would like to feel that the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories formed one aspect of a co-operative enterprise aimed at solving the problems of dependent Territories.

25. The representatives of Brazil, Ghana, India and Iraq stated that the principle of universal free and compulsory education had received universal recognition, and should be accepted as a governing principle of the policy in Non-Self-Governing Territories. Progress towards the full implementation of that principle could naturally be achieved by stages. They suggested that the Committee should recommend once again that the Administering Members should draw up educational plans and programmes and indicate the approximate dates at which they hope to attain each of the stages leading to the introduction of universal, free and compulsory primary education in Territories of which they were responsible for the administration.

26. The representative of the United Kingdom observed that free education should be understood to mean education of which the cost was borne not directly by the parents of the child receiving tuition, but primarily by the whole body of tax-payers. Experience had shown that it was dangerous for administrations to assume too hastily financial responsibilities which were beyond their means. The representative of India stated that, if the principle referred to in paragraph 25 was accepted and its implementation regarded as necessary, then the financial difficulties would have to be overcome. The inhabitants bore the incidence of costs through the payment of taxes and in other indirect ways to the extent their means permitted. The Committee had already recognized that the financing of education in Non-Self-Governing Territories was one of the responsibilities of the Administering Powers concerned.

27. The representatives of Australia, Brazil, Ceylon, India, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom made general statements on secondary education in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representative of India drew attention to the definition of the objectives of secondary education, given in the declaration of policy contained in the 1958 report on American Samoa, as follows:

"It is the policy to maintain a free public school system for the education of American Samoans and to provide in that school system a curriculum which will (1) prepare students for life in American Samoa, and (2) establish a firm foundation for the political, economic, and social advancement of the people and thus hasten the date when more Samoans can replace state-side employees in their government and Samoa can achieve a greater degree of self-government."<sup>3/</sup>

He commended this definition of the role of secondary education for universal adoption in all Territories. He added that to make secondary education popular and useful it was necessary to relate it to the day-to-day life of students. This could be done through the diversification of courses and by the conversion of secondary schools of the academic type into multi-purpose schools. The representative of the United Kingdom emphasized the importance in practice of preserving a proper balance between the extension of primary education and that of secondary education.

28. The representatives of Ghana and India believed that the average number of students per teacher was still too high. They and the representatives of Iraq, the United Kingdom and the United States referred to the need for the expansion of teacher-training programmes. The representative of Brazil stated that urbanization and industrialization were creating a sizable middle-class in many Territories and, as a consequence, the increase in the facilities for secondary education had become an urgent need.

29. With respect to higher education, the representative of India noted that, although there were several university colleges affiliated with universities in the metropolitan country, no university as such had as yet been established in African Territories under United Kingdom administration. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that local opinion had not been in favour of starting local universities which might not have enjoyed the high reputation of the metropolitan universities. The university colleges welcomed the guidance of the metropolitan universities and indeed some territories had asked for its continuance after they had become independent. Moreover, education given at the university colleges was in no way inferior to that given in universities in the metropolitan country.

30. The representatives of Ceylon, Ghana, India and Iraq referred to evidence of discrimination in education, particularly in Territories inhabited by people of many races. The harmonious development of a community was not encouraged by bringing up the children of its various racial groups separately and in isolation. The United Kingdom representative stated that his Government had firmly endorsed the principle of non-discrimination; the existence of separate educational systems in some Territories was due to local problems, which the local officials were endeavouring with increasing success to overcome.

31. The representatives of Australia, India, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom made general statements on vocational and technical training. The representative of India believed that the planning of the development of vocational and technical training should form part of over-all, integrated, economic planning and development. Vocational and technical education could flourish only if industry was sufficiently developed to absorb personnel trained in vocations. He hoped that the Administering Members would take full advantage of the offer of medical fellowships made by WHO to students of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The United Kingdom representative stressed some of the practical considerations which had to be borne in mind in developing vocational training. In Africa three institutes had been made into university colleges to assist the advance of technical training. The representative of Australia stated that twenty-two Papuan students were in 1958 studying at the central medical, dental and nursing schools at Suva, in the Fiji Islands.

32. The representatives of FAO, the ILO, UNESCO and WHO introduced the documents prepared by their respective organizations. The Committee expressed its appreciation of the studies prepared by the specialized agencies.

33. At the 203rd meeting, the chairman of the sub-committee introduced the report on educational conditions. The representative of Australia stated that his delegation had reservations about some passages in the report but would vote for its adoption as a whole. The representative of New Zealand observed that the conclusions in the report would not be applicable in all respects to the islands under New Zealand administration. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the report did not exactly reflect the views of his Government at every point, but that he would support it as a compromise between different points of view.

34. At the 204th meeting, the representatives of Australia, Ceylon, India and New Zealand submitted jointly a procedural draft resolution under which the General Assembly would: (1) approve the report on educational conditions prepared in 1959 by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, and consider that it should be studied in conjunction with the reports approved in 1950, 1953 and 1957; (2) invite the Secretary-General to communicate the 1959 report on educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-

Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned for their consideration; (3) express the confidence that the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories will bring the report to the attention of the authorities responsible for education in those Territories. The representative of Brazil introduced an amendment to the draft resolution which would insert in paragraph 2, the words "to the regional economic commissions of the United Nations" after the words "Economic and Social Council". This amendment was accepted by the sponsors of the draft resolution and incorporated in it. The draft resolution as revised was unanimously adopted by the Committee for submission to the General Assembly at its fourteenth session. The text of the draft resolution is included in annex II of the present report.

VII. Social conditions

35. At its 198th and 199th meetings, the committee discussed social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The General Assembly, at its thirteenth session, in resolution 1326 (XIII) of 12 December 1950, had approved a special report on social conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>4/</sup> For this session of the Committee, information on social conditions was included in the summaries of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter since the establishment of the United Nations.

36. The representative of Ghana observed that the Committee should put its discussion into proper perspective by considering also the social fabric within which education was to operate. Many social problems stemmed from racial policies sanctioned or condoned by the governments; future reports from Administering Members should give more information regarding the extent to which attempts had been made to eradicate racial discrimination. His delegation felt sure that the Committee would welcome the progress made in some Territories in fostering good relations among different racial groups. He referred to the progress made in this connexion in the Belgian Congo, Kenya and Uganda.

37. The United Kingdom representative stated that his Government's attitude towards racial prejudice was not one of silence or acceptance. His Government was dedicated to the advancement of all communities without discrimination on the grounds of race, colour or creed, and it was its aim to banish such discrimination by positive measures to increase inter-racial co-operation. There were some times serious practical difficulties which would be overcome as soon as possible.

38. The representative of the ILO informed the Committee that a convention and a recommendation concerning discrimination in respect of employment and occupation had been adopted by the International Labour Conference at its forty-second session. This should be regarded as an important step towards the establishment of equality of opportunity.

39. The representative of Ghana, referring to programmes of community development, stated that his delegation would like to see these extended in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The importance of good low-cost housing in new and developing countries could not be over-emphasized. The representative of India and Ceylon agreed with the observations of the representative of Ghana.

40. The representatives of Brazil, Ceylon and India referred to the social problems arising from urbanization. The representative of India hoped that Non-Self-Governing Territories would not have to go through the same long and painful processes of finding solutions to this problem as had been experienced in some European countries. The Administering Members, with their long experience in this respect, were in a position to render great assistance. He noted that in the Non-Self-Governing Territories some progress had been made in the past two years in the fields of rural development, co-operatives and land tenure. Stressing the importance of community development, he said that while the idea had taken root in East African Territories it had not spread so fast as it should; he suggested that more extensive programmes of community development need to be undertaken in all Territories and that the support and co-operation of the inhabitants should be secured for this purpose.

41. The representative of Ceylon laid stress on the problem of juvenile delinquency, which, in his view, was not an isolated phenomenon but a logical result of developments characteristic of a society in transition.

42. The representative of Brazil observed that social problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories arose out of unplanned urbanization and the impact of modern civilization, which had sometimes been in conflict with traditional social customs. The representative of India emphasized the importance of reforms in systems of land-tenure in the solution of these problems. He pointed out that no improvement seemed to have taken place in labour legislation.

43. The representative of India asked what action had been taken by Administering Members on the special report on social conditions adopted by the General Assembly at its thirteenth session. The representative of the United States informed the Committee that copies of the special report on social conditions for 1958 had been sent to the appropriate departments of his Government and, through them, to the Territories under his Government's administration. The reference in the special report to the need for imaginative social planning would be carefully considered by all agencies of his Government concerned with the administration of Territories. In addition, copies of General Assembly resolution 1328 (XIII) on racial discrimination in Non-Self-Governing Territories had been sent to the Department of the Interior and to the Territories. Territories under United States administration were free from discriminatory legislation and his Government opposed racial discrimination in any form.

44. The representative of the United States added that the significance of the problems which arose from the transformation of an indigenous society through urbanization and industrialization had been fully recognized; this recognition imposed on his Government the obligation to strengthen the social structure, so that the inhabitants could go through that phase with as little difficulty as possible. This was particularly so in the case of American Samoa.

45. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that, as in previous years, copies of the Committee's special report had been sent by his Government to all those concerned with educational matters in the Territories under United Kingdom administration.

VIII. Economic conditions

46. The Committee had given particular attention to economic conditions at its eighth session in 1957 and had issued a special report on this subject. At the 198th and 199th meetings of its tenth session the Committee considered economic conditions in the light of that report. No special studies were submitted on this item, but information on economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was included in the summaries prepared by the Secretary-General.

47. The representatives of Guatemala, India and Iraq noted that some progress, though unspectacular, had been made in the Non-Self-Governing Territories since 1957. The information supplied had been, for the most part, incomplete and purely statistical in nature, making an assessment of progress difficult. The most serious obstacles in the way of economic progress were the weight of subsistence agriculture, lack of capital investment, imbalance in foreign trade and over-dependence on exports. They referred to the lack of integrated economic planning in many Territories and the insignificant part played by the indigenous inhabitants in Territories where development plans were in the making or in various stages of implementation.

48. The representative of Iraq commended the installation from 1946 to 1956, of new industries in certain African Territories, such as French West Africa, the Belgian Congo and Uganda. He welcomed the establishment of the Economic Commission for Africa as an encouraging development, as it was bound to play a vital part in the economic progress of the African continent. He referred to the dangers inherent in the fact that increases in population in many cases had outstripped productivity.

49. The representative of Guatemala stated that the slow rate of development, since 1957, might be due to the absence of co-ordinated economic policies based on sound surveys of potentials. An energetic policy with regard to transport and communications would tend to decrease the cost of living in Territories in which food and other necessities of life had to be transported over great distances.

50. The representative of India urged a shift from subsistence agriculture to the production of cash crops. Surpluses from cash crops could then be used for the formation of investment capital. He noted that exports of raw material had increased in the past two years but there had been heavy increases in imports. He stressed the need for transforming the economy of these Territories from that of raw exports to a processing economy. Tariffs should be made use of to restrict heavy imports of consumption goods and to develop domestic production. He referred to the industrial progress being made in Jamaica and the reduction of development expenditure in the Federation of Rhodesia and in Nyasaland. The policy of relying too much on private investment and loans was unsatisfactory: private investment mainly came from abroad and was not always available when it was needed. While private investment had an important role to play, experience had shown that state-investment was necessary to offer competition to private investment and to stimulate industrialization.

51. The representative of Brazil referred to General Assembly resolution 1329 (XIII), which invited Administering Members to examine the advisability of adopting an investment policy in Non-Self-Governing Territories which would ensure balanced economic development and an increase of per capita income. The reasons which led to the adoption of that resolution in 1958 were equally valid in 1959.

52. The representative of the United Kingdom gave additional information on economic progress attained in Territories under his Government's administration. Between the years 1946 and 1957, they had spent about £1,000 million on development, of which £600 million had come from local sources and £137 million from the United Kingdom Government. In that period the volume of exports of primary products had increased by about half, and the volume of all exports had more than doubled. Gross fixed capital formation had increased by 80 per cent in real terms and the gross domestic product had increased at the rate of 4 per cent a year.

53. The representative of India stated that according to the figures given by the representative of the United Kingdom himself the contributions of the metropolitan Government during the period in question amounted to no more than 15 per cent of the aggregate Government expenditure on development in Territories under United Kingdom administration. While he was glad to note that the Territories were, largely speaking, paying their way, the aggregate expenditure itself was low in relation to the economic needs of the Territories, and, therefore, larger metropolitan contributions and a greater use of internal resources for investment purposes were called for.

54. The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that his Government was proposing to make available a further £94 million in the period to 1964. As far as external loan finance was concerned, his Government believed that overseas Governments should continue to look in the first place to private investment on the London market and to such other sources of external funds as might be available to them. However, in order to ensure that the basic minimum of loan finance would be forthcoming to enable the Territories to plan development on a reasonable basis, his Government proposed, as a considerable departure from previous practice, to take powers to make loans to overseas Governments when it was satisfied that a particular Territory could not raise the necessary development funds in other ways. It was proposed that Exchequer loans towards the cost of approved development programmes would be authorized up to an annual ceiling of £25 million with an over-all ceiling of £100 million in the five-year period ending in 1964. His Government was confident that its proposals would ensure that the rate of development was maintained and, where possible, increased.

IX. Progress achieved by Non-Self-Governing Territories in pursuance of Chapter XI of the Charter

A. METHOD OF EXAMINATION OF THE PROGRESS REPORT

55. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 1053 (XI) of 20 February 1957, the Committee was informed<sup>5/</sup> of the stage reached by the Secretariat and the specialized agencies concerned in the preparation, under the terms of resolution 932 (X) and 1053 (XI), of the report on the progress achieved by Non-Self-Governing Territories in pursuance of Chapter XI of the Charter. The Secretariat reported to the Committee that in addition to the summaries of information concerning the Territories transmitted since the establishment of the United Nations, which had been submitted to the Committee and which would form part of the progress report, the general and analytical sections of the report, to be submitted directly to the General Assembly at its fourteenth session, were either in final form or in an advanced stage of preparation. At its fourteenth session, the Assembly would consequently have for its examination documentation comprising some 1,800-1,900 manuscript pages of analytical studies and some 1,100 pages of summaries of information.

56. In the light of this information and of the provisions of resolutions 932 (X) and 1053 (XI), the Committee considered the request made of it by the Fourth Committee at the thirteenth session of the General Assembly that it should recommend to the latter, at its fourteenth session, the method of examination of the progress report.<sup>6/</sup> Some Members expressed reservations as to the usefulness of any examination of the report. While it would be a useful compendium of information, in accordance with resolution 1053 (XI), it would be based on information transmitted under Article 73 e, summaries of which had already been examined by the Committee and the General Assembly. Other Members considered that the report itself would serve no useful purpose unless it formed the basis of an appraisal by the General Assembly of the progress made by the Non-Self-Governing Territories, since the establishment of the United Nations, towards the attainment of the goals set in Chapter XI of the Charter. It was pointed out that as early as 1955 the General Assembly, in resolution 932 (X), had expressed the opinion that an examination of the progress achieved in Non-Self-Governing Territories would be highly desirable. The representative of the United Kingdom suggested that there might be other interpretations of this resolution. The representative of India explained that in the request to the Committee in 1958, referred to in the present paragraph, it was implied that the General Assembly had in fact decided that an examination of the progress report should be undertaken.

57. Subsequently, the Committee centred its attention on finding a method of examination of the progress report. It was agreed that it would be desirable to obviate the difficulties likely to be encountered by a main committee consisting of eighty-two members in dealing with a report of this type.

58. The Committee accordingly discussed the matter in terms of the desirability of the General Assembly's delegating, in the first instance, to a smaller body the task of examining the progress report in detail. The representative of India suggested that the General Assembly might be invited to decide in favour of one of two alternatives: to appoint an ad hoc committee of five or six members for this purpose, or to ask the Committee on Information itself to undertake the examination of the progress report. Either committee could have the assistance of experts attached to delegations and of representatives of the specialized agencies concerned. He added that in the event that the General Assembly favoured the second alternative, the Committee would without doubt be able to undertake a comprehensive analysis of the progress report. The Committee had a certain expert character and considerable first-hand knowledge of developments in all fields in these Territories. The Committee would also have the advantage of having already studied the summaries of information which form part of the progress report.

59. The representatives of the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and New Zealand expressed the opinion that, in view of the experience of the Committee and the nature of the information transmitted under Article 73 e, on which the progress report would be based, the Committee should be entrusted with any examination of the report requested by the General Assembly.

60. The representatives of Brazil, Ceylon, Ghana, Guatemala and Iraq emphasized the importance of a thorough examination of the report in order to assess the progress made by the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the light of the objectives and obligations set forth in Chapter XI as a whole. They supported the suggestion of the representative of India that the Assembly should be invited to adopt whichever alternative would in its view, lend itself to an exhaustive and useful examination of the report.

61. The representatives of Brazil and Ghana stated that the position of their respective delegations was flexible enough to enable them to associate themselves with the opinion of other Committee members if, in spite of certain merits of the proposal to appoint an ad hoc committee, the majority should consider it more desirable that the Committee on Information be entrusted with this task.

62. The representative of the United States, in the light of the views expressed by other members of the Committee, favoured an examination of the progress report by the Committee on Information, in addition to its regular work. However, since there was a divergence of opinion amongst members as to which alternative should be recommended to the General Assembly, he added that the suggestion of the representative of India to place both alternatives before the Assembly was totally practical.

63. The Committee agrees that it would be practical to entrust the detailed examination of the progress report to a small body. Should the General Assembly, in view of the expert character and special experience of the Committee with regard to Non-Self-Governing Territories, ask the Committee to undertake such an examination of the report, it might, in the light of the purposes which the progress report is intended to serve, indicate to the Committee the principles that should govern it in carrying out this special task. The Committee agrees that it can accomplish this task, if the General Assembly so requests, in addition to the normal programme of giving particular attention next year to economic conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

64. In response to a request by the representative of India, the Under-Secretary for Trusteeship and information from Non-Self-Governing Territories outlined a tentative time-table of the next session of the Committee, suggesting a programme for the examination of the progress report, should such examination be entrusted to the Committee by the General Assembly. The Committee had developed the practice of appointing annually a sub-committee to prepare a draft report on the functional field to which it was paying particular attention, and might wish to apply this procedure to the examination of the progress report. The feasibility of appointing more than one sub-committee could also be considered together with the question of the availability of experts in the functional fields whom members might attach for this purpose to their delegations. Should the appointment of one sub-committee be deemed better suited for the task, the Committee might decide on a general debate on the progress report in full committee, followed by a detailed discussion of progress in each of the functional fields in one or more sub-committees. He estimated that the Committee would require eight to nine weeks for its 1960 session for the consideration of the progress report and its normal annual work. Of this, some four to five weeks would be required for the examination of the progress report. Members of the Committee were not asked to make any proposals regarding the exact date of the beginning and the conclusion of the 1960 session, which, as has been the practice before, would in due time be indicated by the Secretary-General in his usual convocation letter.

65. The representative of the United Kingdom, referring to the statement of the Under-Secretary, stated that it was difficult for his delegation now to discuss the subject in detail. He was convinced that arrangements could be worked out to shorten the time of the work of the Committee without reducing its effectiveness. The representative of Australia also expressed reservations regarding the Under-Secretary's estimate of the time needed for a discussion of the progress report by the committee. Other representatives, referring to the scope of documentation, expressed the view that the Under-Secretary's estimate of the time which would be required by the Committee to consider the progress report was well founded.

66. The representative of France was of the opinion that the discussion in the Committee on item 7 (a) went beyond the question of the examination of the report, and sought to place certain interpretations on the General Assembly resolution requesting the preparation of the progress report, which can only be the sum total of the information transmitted from 1946 to 1956 under Article 73 e. The Committee, instead of discussing the method, tended to prejudge the tenor of the report. His delegation wished to know what the contents of the report were before he could express a well founded opinion on its tenor and on the method of its examination.

67. The Secretary of the Committee recalled that in the reports of the Secretariat previously submitted to the Committee in accordance with paragraph 6 of resolution 1053 (XI), the Committee and the General Assembly had been apprised in detail of the content of the analytical part of the report, and that the Committee and the General Assembly approved the content so outlined. He drew particular attention to documents A/AC.35/L.285 and A/3196 the annexes of which contained the detailed outlines.

B. SUMMARIES OF INFORMATION TRANSMITTED UNDER ARTICLE 73 e OF THE CHARTER SINCE THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE UNITED NATIONS

68. The Committee had before it at its present session the summaries of information in mimeographed form covering the period since the beginning of the United Nations and replacing the "full summaries" which would otherwise have been due this year. As a part of the progress report, two types of maps were laid before the Committee. One map shows the location of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the world, and the three other maps drawn up by regions show the area, population and the main exports of each of the Territories located in the particular region.

69. The Under-Secretary informed the Committee that the summaries of information submitted at this session in mimeographed form would eventually be printed and that they would include the additional information transmitted to the Secretariat by some of the Administering Members. He expressed the Secretariat's appreciation of the additional information including some revisions of statistics supplied by the Administering Members.

70. Several representatives remarked on the usefulness of the summaries of information prepared by the Secretary-General as a general survey of developments which have taken place in Non-Self-Governing Territories since the beginning of the United Nations. They also expressed their appreciation of the maps which show the economic potentialities of the Territories and should be of great help in any study of conditions in these Territories. The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that his Government was among those who had co-operated with the Secretariat in the preparation of the summaries by supplying additional information. The representative of India stressed the value of the maps before the Committee and expressed the hope that it would be possible in the future for the Secretariat to prepare maps showing developments in specific fields. He thought that the more detailed information concerning the level and scope of participation of the inhabitants in the formulation and implementation of educational, social and economic policies in the Territories would have made them more complete and enhanced their usefulness.

X. General questions relating to summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter

71. At its 201st meeting, the Committee heard statements from members on questions relating generally to the transmission of information on Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representative of India stated that information transmitted by Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United States on political and constitutional developments in the Territories administered by them had proved useful background in the Committee's study of economic, social and educational conditions. He expressed the hope that other Administering Members would follow the practice of sending political information which would enable the Committee to take a better informed and more balanced view of the developments in social, economic and educational fields.

72. The representatives of Ceylon, Ghana and India noted that no information on the Territories under the administration of Portugal had as yet been made available to the Committee.

73. The representative of India welcomed the intimation sent to the Secretary-General by the Government of Spain that information on its overseas Territories would be forthcoming. He noted, however, that no information had so far been sent, but hoped that summaries and analyses of information on these Territories would be placed before the Committee. The representative of Ceylon appealed to the Administering Members of the Committee to use their good offices to persuade all Governments administering Non-Self-Governing Territories to submit to the Secretary-General information under Article 73 e of the Charter.

74. The representative of the United States informed the Committee that since the last annual session of the Committee, the United States Congress had voted to admit Alaska and Hawaii as the forty-ninth and fiftieth states of the Union. His Government would shortly inform the Secretary-General that it intended to cease the transmission of statistical and other information on these two Territories. This would leave the United States with only three Non-Self-Governing Territories, American Samoa, Guam and the Virgin Islands, none of which was large enough or strong enough to fit into the accepted definition of sovereign nationhood, although all of them had for some time been moving towards full self-government.

75. The representatives of Iraq, Ghana, Ceylon and India stated that according to the terms of resolution 1051 (XI) the General Assembly would have to consider the communication of the Government of France and the one to be sent by the United States concerning the cessation of information on the Territories concerned.

76. The representative of Iraq further observed that the Committee at its tenth session was not expected to enter into any substantive discussion of the communication from the Government of France on the cessation of information. However, it would be useful if the relevant parts of that communication could be reproduced well before the fourteenth session of the General Assembly. The Secretariat might also prepare a background paper on this matter to enable the Fourth Committee to discuss this question in full knowledge of all the facts.

77. The representative of France considered that it was not appropriate for the Committee to discuss the decision taken by his Government to cease the transmission of information on the greater part of the Territories on which information had been transmitted in the past. Such discussion would, in the opinion of the representative of France, be outside the Committee's terms of reference. He also considered that it was inappropriate to suggest that specific documents should be prepared by the Secretariat on this question.

78. The representative of Iraq stated that no information concerning Malta had been transmitted by the United Kingdom since 1947 when a constitution was promulgated. This constitution had been revoked early in 1959 and presumably Malta would fall back into the scope of Chapter XI of the Charter. It was his Government's sincere wish that steps would be taken to obviate the necessity of transmitting information under Article 73 e of the Charter. The representatives of Iraq and Ghana asked for a clarification of the present status of Malta. The representative of the United Kingdom replied that the constitutional status was not within the competence of the Committee.

79. The representatives of Ceylon and India noted that the Administering Members concerned had not transmitted information concerning the association of some Non-Self-Governing Territories with the European Economic Community and the possible effects of such association. The representative of Ceylon observed that a study existed on the effects of the Community on Latin American countries. He, therefore, failed to understand why the Administering Members had found it difficult to transmit information on the possible effects of the Community on Non-Self-Governing Territories. They added that the association of a Non-Self-Governing Territory with the European Economic Community was a question of some importance to its economic condition, and expressed the hope that all the relevant information would be made available to the Committee at its eleventh session.

80. The representative of the Netherlands informed the Committee that his Government would give most careful attention to the effects of the European Economic Community on Netherlands New Guinea and would transmit all available information on the subject to the Secretary-General.

XI. International collaboration in respect of economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories

81. In its discussion of this item at its 201st meeting, the Committee had before it a report prepared by the Secretariat<sup>7/</sup> on decisions taken by the Economic and Social Council and on studies undertaken under its auspices which included, within their scope, economic and social conditions affecting Non-Self-Governing Territories; a report prepared by WHO<sup>8/</sup> on its activities; and a report prepared by the Secretariat<sup>9/</sup> on international technical assistance in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

82. The representative of ILO made a statement concerning developments in the field of workers' education. The ILO programme was still in its early stages but an appreciable expansion of activities was envisaged in this field. Increasing attention was being devoted to workers' education in less developed countries and Non-Self-Governing Territories through the preparation of workers' education manuals and courses on subjects falling within the competence of ILO. A limited number of ILO fellowships will also be available. A cardinal feature of ILO policy was that the workers' organizations should be closely identified with workers' educational programmes. ILO was co-operating closely with the efforts of international trade union movements such as ICFTU, IFCTU and WFTU.

83. The representatives of UNESCO and WHO referred to the work done in their respective fields in Non-Self-Governing Territories. They outlined projects in operation during 1958 and those planned for 1959/1960.

84. Several representatives discussed the relationship to the Non-Self-Governing Territories of the regional economic commissions of the United Nations, the Caribbean Commission, the Colombo Plan, the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara and the South Pacific Commission. The representative of India suggested that there should be closer co-operation between the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara and the South Pacific Commission on the one hand, and the United Nations and the specialized agencies on the other.

85. The representative of the United Kingdom reviewed the work done by the specialized agencies in the Territories administered by his Government. He referred to the participation of the United Kingdom Government and the Governments of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in regional conferences and listed the scholarships and expert services these Territories had received under United Nations technical assistance schemes. His Government had kept the administrations of the United Kingdom Territories informed on the establishment of the United Nations Special Fund and had invited them to submit applications for aid. Several Territories were working on applications for assistance in various development projects.

86. The representative of the United States observed that international collaboration in the economic, social and educational fields had become increasingly important in the advancement of international understanding. Economic aid and technical assistance given by some nations to other nations and to Non-Self-Governing Territories was essentially an act of enlightened self-interest. He referred to the work done in the functional fields by the South Pacific Commission, by the Caribbean Commission, and the work being done through international co-operation by the University of Hawaii for the spread of higher education in the Pacific Territories. He described the scholarships offered and awarded by his Government to students from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

87. The representative of India endorsed the view that international co-operation in the economic, social and educational development of Non-Self-Governing Territories was essential to international peace. He added that the widening gap in per capita income in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and in other countries necessitated such co-operation. There appeared to be a certain reluctance on the part of some Administering Members to request, for Territories under their administration, assistance from international bodies which were in a position to offer such assistance.

88. The representatives of Australia and the Netherlands discussed the assistance given by the specialized agencies and UNICEF to Netherlands New Guinea and the territory of Papua. They also referred to the assistance provided to these Territories by the South Pacific Commission. They referred to the co-operation between the Governments of Australia and the Netherlands in the administration of Papua-New Guinea and Netherlands New Guinea. The representative of Australia drew attention to the part played by his Government in assisting Non-Self-Governing Territories in Asia under the Colombo Plan.

89. The representatives of Brazil, Guatemala and India expressed their appreciation of the work done by the regional commissions and specialized agencies in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The representatives of Brazil and India emphasized the desirability of establishing close co-operation between the Committee and the Economic Commission for Africa. The representative of India further suggested that it would be useful for the Committee to have the benefit of the Commission's advice. He added that the reports of the

Committee, and particularly the progress report, might prove a useful source of additional information to the Commission. The representative of Brazil announced that his Government had decided to pay travelling expenses for students taking advantage of the Brazilian Government's scholarship offer under General Assembly resolution 845 (IX) of 22 November 1954.

90. The representative of the United Kingdom explained that Territories under United Kingdom administration had not asked for more aid under United Nations Technical Assistance schemes, because they also received substantial assistance from the United Kingdom; there was no desire to burden unduly the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

XII. Future work of the Committee

91. At its 202nd meeting, the Committee decided, in accordance with General Assembly resolution 333 (IV) of 2 December 1949, to consider economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories at its session in 196<sup>a</sup>. It considered a working paper prepared by the Secretariat<sup>10/</sup>, outlining the proposed subjects of studies in the economic field. Some members assumed that, in the preparation of the studies on indigenous participation in agriculture and the productivity of indigenous labour, the Secretary-General would have the full co-operation of FAO and ILO respectively. They also suggested that the scope of the study on trade and financial relations between Non-Self-Governing Territories and the metropolitan countries concerned should be as broad as possible and should include information on trade and financial relations of the Territories with other countries as well. Another suggestion was that the study on terms of trade should include data on the quantum of categories of imports which could be produced in the Territories themselves by processing locally raw materials existing there.

92. The representative of India expressed the hope that the studies on economic conditions will give full information on the nature and scope of development planning and on the financing of development plans in Non-Self-Governing Territories. He added that, from a perusal of the summaries of information, his delegation had formed the impression that while project-schemes and compartmental plans existed in many Territories, integrated long-term economic planning was lacking.

93. The Committee approved the programme of its work for the next session<sup>10/</sup> together with the suggestions as recorded in this section of the report.

XIII. Control and limitation of documentation

94. The Committee took note of General Assembly resolution 1272 (XIII) of 14 November 1958 which drew the particular attention of all organs and subsidiary bodies to the recommendations contained in the report of the Committee on the control and limitation of documentation.

XIV. Adoption of the report of the Committee on information from Non-Self-Governing Territories

95. At its 204th meeting, the Committee considered the draft report of its tenth session.<sup>11/</sup> The report was adopted by 12 votes to none with 1 abstention.

REPORT ON EDUCATIONAL CONDITIONS IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

I. Introduction<sup>1/</sup>

1. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories consists of the seven Members of the United Nations which, as responsible for the administration of the Territories, transmit information to the Secretary-General under Article 73 e of the Charter, and an equal number of non-administering Members of the United Nations elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly.

2. The Committee examines summaries and analyses of the information supplied by the Administering Members on economic, social and educational conditions in the Territories. It is invited to submit to the General Assembly reports "containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories" (resolution 1332 (XIII)).

3. In 1950,<sup>2/</sup> 1953<sup>3/</sup> and 1956,<sup>4/</sup> the Committee prepared special reports on education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The General Assembly, by resolution 455 (V), approved the 1950 report as a brief but considered indication of educational advancement and of the problems still to be faced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and invited the Secretary-General to communicate it to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories and to UNESCO for their consideration. Similarly, by resolutions 743 (VIII) and 1048 (XI), the Assembly in 1953 and 1957 approved the reports on education as a supplement to the report approved in 1950 and invited the Secretary-General to communicate them to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-

Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned for their consideration.

4. At its eighth session, the General Assembly adopted resolution 743 (VIII) of 27 November 1953 in which it emphasized that the objectives of education in Non-Self-Governing Territories are:

"(a) To develop moral and civic consciousness and responsibility among the peoples, and to enable them to take an increasing share of responsibility in the conduct of their own affairs;

"(b) To raise the standards of living of the peoples by helping them to improve their economic productivity and standards of health;

"(c) To promote the social progress of the Territories, taking into account the basic cultural values and the aspirations of the peoples concerned;

"(d) To secure the extension of the intellectual development of the peoples so as to provide for them access to all levels of culture."

5. In resolution 1049 (XI) of 20 February 1957 the General Assembly considered that for the attainment of these objectives it is necessary to establish systems of primary, secondary and higher education which will meet the needs of all, regardless of sex, race, religion, social or economic status, and provide adequate preparation for citizenship. The General Assembly also noted that in some Territories programmes of educational advancement are being implemented according to prearranged targets and dates, subject to periodic review in the light of the progress made. The Assembly consequently recommended to the Administering Members that, according to the requirements of the population of each Non-Self-Governing Territory, and in co-operation with UNESCO if necessary, they should consider the formulation of plans, with targets and dates, for various aspects of educational development, including the establishment or extension of universal, free and compulsory primary education and general literacy.

6. In accordance with the work programme set forth in resolution 1332 (XIII) of 12 December 1958, the Committee was again called upon to pay particular attention to educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in 1959. It has undertaken this work on the basis of the information transmitted by the Members responsible for the administration of the Territories and in the light of the views expressed in its previous reports on education.

7. The Committee had before it studies on education prepared by the Secretariat of the United Nations, UNESCO, ILO, FAO and WHO, as well as the information on educational conditions contained in the summaries of information transmitted by the Administering Members under Article 73 e of the Charter. The studies are listed in the annex and, together with the summary

<sup>1/</sup> The draft of the present report was prepared by a sub-committee of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories composed of the representatives of Ceylon, the Dominican Republic, Ghana, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and the United States of America.

The members of the delegations who served on the sub-committee were: Mr. N. T. D. Kanakaratne (Ceylon); H. E. Dr. Enrique de Marchena and Dr. Emilio Cordero Michel (Dominican Republic); Mr. F. S. Arkhurst and Mr. Y. B. Turkson (Ghana); Mr. L. J. Goedhart and Mr. J. V. de Bruyn, expert (Netherlands); Mr. G. K. Caston, Mr. R. A. Browning and Mr. H. Houghton, expert (United Kingdom); Mr. Bolard More and Mr. John Simms (United States).

The chairman of the sub-committee was Mr. N. T. D. Kanakaratne (Ceylon).

The rapporteur of the Committee and the representatives of FAO, ILO, WHO and UNESCO also participated in the debates of the sub-committee.

records of the Committee's discussions, should be read in conjunction with the present report.

8. The Committee wishes to record the assistance it received in the form of information and explanations on the progress and problems of education in various Non-Self-Governing Territories from the representatives of Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States who provided data supplementing the information transmitted under Article 73 e.

9. By resolution 1332 (XIII), the General Assembly reiterated its invitation that Members should continue to attach to their delegations persons specially qualified in the functional fields within the Committee's purview. The Committee, in 1959, had the advantage of the presence of specialist advisers in the delegations of the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States. These advisers greatly assisted the Committee by providing new information and contributing to the discussions. In resolution 1332 (XIII), the General Assembly also invited Administering Members to attach to their delegations indigenous persons specially qualified to speak on economic, social and educational policies in the Non-Self-Governing Territories; the Members concerned did not find it possible to respond to this invitation on this occasion. Assistance was also received from other Committee Members who gave information concerning their experiences in educational policies and methods in their own countries relevant to problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

II. General developments

10. The Committee took into account the information on more recent developments in specific educational fields contained in the reports prepared by the Secretariat and the specialized agencies as well as the supplemental information provided in the statements made during the debate by the representatives of the Administering Members.

11. This information was considered by the Committee in the light of Article 1, paragraphs 3 and 4, Article 55 and Article 73 of the Charter of the United Nations and of article 26, paragraph 2, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. In the examination of the information and in the debate frequent reference was made to the views recorded in the previous reports on education and in particular to the general principles of education, formulated in 1950 and 1953, to the objectives of education enumerated above, and to General Assembly resolution 1049 (XI) recommending that Administering Members consider the formulation of plans with targets and dates, for various aspects of educational development.

12. The Committee notes, in the first place, that the Administering Members generally subscribe to the principles and objectives of education set forth by the General Assembly and seek rapidly to achieve the broadest possible extension of full educational opportunities to the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

13. Although in the brief period of time since the last report on education, basic conditions have not changed significantly, the documentation before the Committee and the additional information provided by the Administering Members show that educational advancement is increasingly considered of ever greater importance in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee also realizes that there has been an appreciable increase in the educational facilities available in many of them. The Committee notes that one of the most vigorous stimuli for this increase has been the constantly growing urge for education on the part of the people themselves.

14. Figures were cited showing a considerable increase in primary school enrolment in certain United Kingdom Territories over a six-year period. In Kenya, for example, enrolment in primary schools had risen from 367,500 in 1951 to 548,060 in 1957. Post-primary and secondary school enrolment had increased since 1954: in Uganda, for instance, secondary school enrolment was 9,937 in 1954 and 21,599 in 1957. Higher education has expanded at the same time; in 1954, the number of students attending major institutions of higher education in the Territories was 9,249 (including 5,967 students at the University of Hawaii), while in 1957 the enrolment was 13,655 (including 6,676 students at the University of Hawaii). Government expenditure on various forms of education and metropolitan grants have also increased.

15. The rapid expansion of school enrolment and of educational facilities in some Territories should be read in conjunction with other facts which show that educational opportunities in a large number of Territories do not meet the needs of the peoples and their urgent demands for education. For instance, in vast areas less than one tenth of the children of school age are attending schools and many do not remain at school for the minimum period required to lay firm foundations for permanent literacy. In many areas the number of girls in primary school is but a small fraction of the number of boys. While in a few Territories an expansion of secondary education has taken place, in most such expansion has been limited and sometimes has not kept pace with the increase in population and in primary school enrolment. In some Territories secondary school facilities are available for less than 3 per cent of the primary school population and only an insignificant number of girls continue their education above the primary level. The Committee notes that in some Territories not only are school facilities inadequate and the period of schooling too short, but in some cases the quality of education requires considerable improvement.

16. While appreciating in general the progress made in recent years, the Committee is of the view that acceleration of the pace of educational advancement is necessary. The Committee notes that in those Territories where the development of self-government, in accordance with Chapter XI of the Charter, is close to fulfilment, the acceleration of the pace of educational advancement is already taking place. The Committee also expresses the view that to attain the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter more rapid progress in education should be ensured, so that foundations may be laid for stability and progress after such attainment.

17. The Committee emphasizes the fundamental importance of improving general education for the bulk of the population and of expanding higher and technical education, both of which are essential for the effective operation of a modern State. Self-government cannot be effectively maintained without administrators, technicians and other trained personnel. At the same time every measure of social improvement and economic development presupposes a rise in the general level of education among the people as a whole.

18. The inextricable relationship between progress in education and the improvements in economic and social life has been repeatedly stressed by the Committee. Development in education, leading as it does to the improvement of health through the teaching of hygiene and sanitation and to improved economic well-being by imparting professional and vocational skills, would increase the human resources available for further development and should, in turn, lead to accelerated improvement in educational conditions.

19. The Committee emphasizes the very real need for the planning of educational development and expansion for the future. This need arises from the intense demand on the part of the people in most of the Territories for modern school facilities. As long as the available resources were sufficient to meet this demand, the problem of bringing education to the maximum number of pupils was not acute. But present aspirations far outstrip the capacities of the Territories to satisfy them, and the authorities, local and metropolitan, responsible for the promotion of education are faced with the insistent demand for the provision of the financial means, of a teaching force adequate in number and in professional competence, and of all the other facilities required for the introduction of universal and free education.

20. The Committee considers that, to provide a suitable education to the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories, there must be recognition of the need for adapting the subjects and syllabuses of study to local environment, culture and tradition, and, wherever possible, for using the vernacular language as the medium of instruction, at least in the early stages, and for teaching, at all stages, the main languages of the Territory as well as a language of wide communication. Such recognition is reflected in the curricula established in educational institutions in some Territories. In some others, where participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the administration of education and the formulation of educational policies has increased in recent years, there is greater evidence of the recognition and fulfilment of this need.

III. Participation of the inhabitants in the formulation of educational policies and in their administration

21. The information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter is important in relation to the principle recognized in Chapter XI that the interests of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are paramount. The implementation of this principle in educational policy can be ensured only when the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are associated to an effective degree in the formulation of educational policy and in the administration of the educational systems.

22. In 1950, the Committee expressed the view, inter alia, that the indigenous population was directly concerned in all questions affecting education and that no educational system could be completely effective unless the people had control over educational policies.

23. In 1956, the Committee emphasized the vital importance of "the creation, where it does not already exist, of effective local machinery by which educational policy can be settled and educational programmes put into effect". It was stressed that the local machinery which was established must aim at recruiting the full co-operation of the inhabitants and elicit the interest and support of representative organs of public opinion.

24. Again the General Assembly, by resolution 1050 (XI) of 20 February 1957, recommended to the Administering Members that they should intensify their efforts to establish, in Territories where it did not already exist, local machinery provided with sufficient financial resources to perform its functions and staffed by duly qualified indigenous personnel responsible for the formulation of educational policy and the implementation of educational programmes.

25. In 1950 and 1953, studies on the participation of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were considered by the Committee. Since 1953, developments have occurred in many Territories which indicate an increased degree of participation of the local inhabitants in the management of their own affairs and consequently a more effective participation in the formulation of educational policies. The Committee is pleased to note that in some Territories where educational policy had previously aimed at assimilation, education now tends to be adapted to the local needs of the indigenous inhabitants.

26. Changes arising from developments in the various Territories have had an effect on the administration of education, both on the territorial and local levels. As regards the former, in some cases the establishment of a ministerial system, providing for the full participation of the inhabitants through their elected representatives in the legislative bodies, has endowed the Minister of Education with complete responsibility for educational policies and programmes. There are, however, still Territories where the indigenous inhabitants participate in the process of education only at the teacher level and have no direct voice in the shaping of educational policies and programmes. Between these two extremes the participation of the indigenous inhabitants varies from representation on territorial political bodies to membership of territorial or district advisory councils or boards, or may be exercised through education authorities with administrative but no financial powers, through participation in voluntary agencies which share with government administrative or advisory responsibilities in education or through membership of teachers' associations or parent-teacher groups represented on Territorial or local educational bodies.

27. Examination of the information before the Committee indicates that speedy educational advancement is usually obtained when there is the widest participation of inhabitants in political bodies empowered to establish educational policies and to vote educational budgets, particularly when such a method is combined with one or more of the other types of popular participation referred to in paragraph 26 above. On the other hand, in systems where the participation of the inhabitants is non-existent or is restricted to advisory functions unaccompanied by financial responsibility resting on local or territorial bodies, results are likely to be much less satisfactory.

28. The view was expressed that in the transition from paternalism to effective participation of the people in the shaping of educational policies many technical problems are likely to arise which may appear to make educational questions, particularly those concerning the maintenance of standards, more difficult of solution. This transitional phase, in the opinion of the Committee, calls for flexible arrangements within the educational services themselves and greater co-operation between these and representative bodies, official and non-official, which contribute to the advancement of the Territories.

29. The Committee views with concern the situation in some multi-racial Territories where educational policies have failed to enlist the enthusiasm, understanding and support of the inhabitants. The Committee notes that, while in some of these Territories national systems of education have been established under one body formulating common educational policies for all ethnic groups, in several Territories inhabited by plural communities different governmental bodies concern themselves with the education of different racial groups. In the Committee's view devolution of authority, in due course, in the matter of formulation and implementation of educational policy to the inhabitants will help improve this situation.

IV. Race relations in education

30. The problems arising from the organizations of education on racial lines have received the attention of the Committee at its past sessions primarily because in a number of the Non-Self-Governing Territories where non-indigenous minorities have made their homes, separate systems of education have been developed for children of different races.

31. In its 1950 report on educational conditions, the Committee stated that "in the field of education no principle is more important than that of equality of opportunity for all racial, religious and cultural groups of the population".

32. In 1953, the Committee emphasized that the betterment of human relations in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and access to equal opportunities in education for all children are points of such fundamental importance that it should continue to focus attention on them. In 1956, the Committee declared that the principle of non-discrimination is an essential part of education, and that every effort should be made to develop a common school system open without distinction to children of all races. Similarly, in its 1958 report, the Committee expressed the view that the development of a system of common education plays a major role in the establishment of improved race relations, while children of different races attending separate schools are bound to develop racial attitudes.

33. In 1956, the Committee had recognized that in primary education special schools to meet the special needs, particularly linguistic, of young children may be justified as long as the system established is related to these needs and not to racial barriers. With regard to secondary education, however, the Committee had declared that every effort should be made to develop a unified school system open to children of all races. At the current session, the Committee has come to the conclusion that every child of every racial, religious or cultural group should have an equal opportunity for education at all stages, and it recommends that efforts should be directed to the development of a common system of education, open to all children, both at the primary and the secondary stage.

34. Information transmitted during the period under review indicates that there are no separate school systems in many Territories. Encouraging trends are noted in some others, such as the establishment of four inter-racial government secondary schools in the Belgian Congo and the opening of an inter-racial school of the "Outward Bound Movement" in Kenya. In Uganda steps have been taken to initiate inter-racial education in government secondary schools. In North Borneo, a board of education, established in 1956 and composed of members representing all interests, creeds and races, makes possible for the first time a common approach to an integrated educational system.

35. The Committee notes, however, that in some multi-racial Territories education, both primary and secondary, continues to be organized on racial lines. In these Territories, there are for each of the major racial groups separate school systems or schools differing widely in physical conditions, amenities and allocations of funds, as well as in curricula. In several Territories, the facilities available in indigenous schools, more particularly in primary schools, are of the poorest quality.

36. The Committee observes that although these separate systems generally had their origin in a desire to provide types of schooling reflecting the then widely different cultures and social and economic status of the various communities, in some cases they are still maintained as a matter of policy. The unequal development of the separate systems tends to place the immigrant communities at a great advantage over the indigenous majority as far as educational opportunities are concerned.

37. It is the Committee's view that on no ground whatsoever can education on a racial basis be justified. As long as separate school systems must exist, they can only be defended as a transitional arrangement from which their integration should progressively evolve; and even in this transitional period when they may have to be predominantly racial they should not be exclusively so, but should admit all children who qualify for entry to them, regardless of their racial origin.

38. The Committee notes with satisfaction that universities and colleges in Non-Self-Governing Territories are, in principle and practice, inter-racial and open to all students without discrimination, and that considerable progress has been made, during the period under review, in the development of inter-racial higher education. Between 1954 and 1957 seven centres of higher education, open to all races, have been established in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, four of these in East and Central African Territories. Practically all the universities in the Non-Self-Governing Territories serve communities which are diverse in language, religion, tradition and social custom. In the Committee's view they are an important element in fostering toleration and in creating a broad basis for the harmonious development of new societies.

V. Adult education and eradication of illiteracy

39. Illiteracy, as the General Assembly recognized in resolution 330 (IV) of 2 December 1949, is one of the fundamental problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories. In that resolution the General Assembly invited the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to communicate to the Administering Members full information on measures for suppressing illiteracy which could be applied with satisfactory results in Non-Self-Governing Territories, and to communicate annually to the United Nations an account of these measures and of the extent to which its services in campaigns against illiteracy have been provided for any of the Non-Self-Governing Territories at the request of the Members concerned. The Assembly further recommended that the Administering Members continue to co-operate with UNESCO, when and where appropriate, with a view to the practical achievement of the eradication of illiteracy in Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Assembly also invited the Secretary-General to collaborate with UNESCO in any necessary studies, taking as a basis the information transmitted under Article 73 e. The Committee notes with satisfaction that close co-operation has been maintained among all concerned in the implementation of this resolution.

40. In its 1950 report, the Committee noted that a standard definition of the words "literacy" or "illiteracy" was not available, and expressed the view that UNESCO should "seek to define the term 'literacy' and suggest a uniform method for presenting statistics of percentages of illiteracy". In 1958 the Committee noted that a draft recommendation regarding the standardization of statistics relating to illiteracy and education would be submitted to the General Conference of UNESCO at its tenth session.

41. In 1959, the Committee was informed that the draft recommendations concerning not only statistics of literacy but also statistics on the educational attainment of the population had been approved by the General Conference of UNESCO at its tenth session. The Committee welcomes the fact that UNESCO has recommended the classification of populations by age-groups and sex, both in respect of literacy and educational attainment, for statistical purposes. The Committee also agrees that school enrolment figures provide the best basis for estimating educational progress in the statistical sense.

42. The view was expressed that while UNESCO's definition of a literate person as one "who can with understanding both read and write a short simple statement on his everyday life" is useful for the statistical purposes for which it was intended, the scope and purpose of the education of adults should reach beyond this definition. It was also stated that in spite of the standards suggested by UNESCO, the compilation of comparable international statistics would still meet difficulties because such statistics could be variously interpreted and because Government statistical services in many Territories were not yet equipped to take over the additional work that the collection of the statistics desired by UNESCO would entail.

43. Several members commented on the fact that the greater part of the literacy statistics available were more than eight years old and that no statistical indication of up-to-date progress in the eradication of illiteracy was possible because hitherto literacy data were usually derived from a direct literacy question included in censuses which normally take place once every ten years. The Committee is of the view that the Administering Members should undertake, if necessary with the assistance of UNESCO, sample surveys to permit a better evaluation of the latest achievements in the field of adult education and eradication of illiteracy.

44. The Committee reiterates the view expressed in 1950 that the eradication of illiteracy is a problem of the utmost urgency in the majority of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It recognizes that continuous extension of school education, especially of free and compulsory primary schooling is, in the long run, the surest way to the eradication of illiteracy. It is, however, undesirable to allow generations of adult population to endure ignorance in the meantime. Literacy work and the spread of adult education among that part of the population which is not reached by formal schooling becomes therefore imperative. The Committee considers that programmes for the promotion of primary and adult education are complementary and inter-related.

45. The Committee had earlier emphasized that campaigns for the eradication of illiteracy should form part of integrated plans of educational, social, and economic development, and that they should, as such, be formulated in relation to the special requirements and interests of the communities for whose benefit they are intended.

46. With regard to the organization of literacy campaigns the Committee had also commented that these campaigns should be widely conceived. While they should provide for the progress of students beyond the minimum levels often accepted in the past and seek the development of functional literacy, they should also comprise measures designed to prevent those who have been taught from falling back into illiteracy.

47. This concept of educational expansion as a part of comprehensive development has found its expression in recent years in community development programmes of Territories, notably those under United Kingdom administration, in the "community schools" concept in the Territories under United States administration and in fundamental education programmes in the Territories under French administration. These programmes envisage a broad attack on the multiple problem of illiteracy, low standards of health, economic and social backwardness, primitive agricultural methods and outdated manufacturing processes. They lay special emphasis on community participation and self-help measures, on a democratic approach in their conception and implementation and on partnership between Government, which provides funds and technical services, and the people, who furnish leadership and labour. The Committee welcomes the emergence of these programmes and considers that they should be pursued with the utmost vigour and that no effort should be spared in their expansion and intensification. Such programmes, apart from the material benefits they bring, create among communities self-reliance which will help them in their progress towards self-government.

48. In some Territories it is possible to discern a trend towards the organization of literacy programmes as a part of a broad adult education programme providing for vocational and technical training as well as supplementary education, in which the appropriate technical departments of Governments and institutions of learning would co-operate in such fields as health, agriculture and home economics, under the aegis of a competent educational authority, supported by popular associations and extension or extra-mural departments of university colleges. The contribution of these programmes towards the eradication of illiteracy and their growing strength point to the fact that one of the surest guarantees for the maintenance of literacy is the vocational and technical character of the training required by increasingly large sections of the population. The prospect of general vocational improvement does much to provide a meaning to literacy and to ensure its permanency, since present rapid economic and social changes demand new skills in the exercise of which literacy is essential for understanding, civic responsibility and efficiency.

49. The education of the worker is of the highest importance to any country in which workers form an organized component of the population. In the words of resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1950 and 1957, such education should "promote opportunities for workers to be educated in order to be able to participate more effectively in various workers' movements and to fulfil more adequately their trade-union and related functions". The worker's education in this sense benefits society as a whole, not only by helping him to equip himself for his job and for dealing with common social problems, but also by creating a potential channel for better labour-management relations. The Committee considers that programmes for the education of workers in this sense can be usefully undertaken, especially in some of the Territories where workers form an important element of the population, jointly by the Governments of the Territories concerned, industrial organizations in those Territories and workers' movements and organizations. The Committee recommends that Administering Members should consider the formulation of such educational programmes as early as possible, in consultation with ILO if necessary. The Committee would welcome a study by ILO on measures that in its view could usefully be adopted for the promotion of workers' education in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

50. Educational authorities in several Territories have expressed concern at the cultural and social gap between men and women existing in many Territories as they recognize that the whole process of national development will be delayed unless the social and cultural evolution of women keeps pace with that of men. The need to attract the interest and full participation of women in programmes of adult education cannot be over-emphasized, especially where opposition and strong prejudices against the improvement of their status exist. Further research and experimentation are necessary to determine the best methods to be employed for the spread of education among women.

51. From the experience acquired in the Territories, the Committee reiterates its belief that adult literacy campaigns should be part of a general attack on conditions which are detrimental to welfare and community progress. Experience has also shown the necessity for planning all stages of literacy campaigns in order to obtain lasting results. The successful attainment of the objectives of such campaigns implies, therefore, the establishment of some institutional pattern through which the support of Government and educational institutions, popular interest and participation can be effectively harnessed and the co-ordination and continuity of the programmes ensured.

52. The Committee discussed at length various methods used for the training of teachers for literacy work among adults, since the success of adult literacy and education programmes depends largely on the quality of the teacher. While adult literacy teachers should have some formal training, too much emphasis can be placed on high educational attainments. Knowledge of methodology, particularly the use of audio-visual aids, is indeed necessary as is the understanding of the sociological implications of literacy in a community. But in the Committee's view leadership and the ability to evoke enthusiasm for social advancement are indispensable.

53. In 1956 the Committee commented on the importance of ensuring an adequate supply of low priced reading material for adults in accordance with the interests of potential readers if the newly acquired literacy of adults is to have any permanence. The Committee commends the work of literature bureaux in publishing reading material in a number of indigenous languages. The Committee is of the view that in Territories where populations are developing from illiteracy to literacy, governmental activity in the provision of literature should not be confined to the encouragement of private publishers. This is a field in which further study and action both at national and international levels are required to overcome problems of organization, finance, encouragement of new authors, printing, etc.

54. The problems of production and distribution of literature suitable to the requirements of adult literates in Non-Self-Governing Territories merit close attention. The Committee notes with interest that in areas where channels for the regular sale or loan of books exist, new methods are being constantly sought by educational authorities and the agencies producing reading materials. In some Territories, for instance, distribution points have been established at mission stations and schools, and local traders have been encouraged to carry stocks of books; in some others mobile book-van facilities have also been introduced. The rapid progress of urbanization and the spread of communications will undoubtedly make their own contribution to the dissemination of information among adult literates. The Committee is gratified to note that in many Territories books written in simple language on themes likely to engage the interest of adult literates are being produced. The Committee considers that the story of the United Nations, the principles and purposes of the Organization and the principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights would be interesting subjects for study by the adult populations of Non-Self-Governing Territories, and recommends that simply written books on these themes should be made available to adult literates of the Territories at the appropriate time.

55. The Committee was informed of the increasing use of mass media, such as radio and films, in a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories. It recommends that in the Territories where indigenous languages used by large sections of the population are in existence, greater use should be made of one of these languages in broadcasting as part of a policy aiming at the development of a lingua franca. The best use of mass media and the radio is again a field where, as the Committee stated in 1956, carefully controlled research is needed.

VI. Education of girls and women

56. In nearly all Non-Self-Governing Territories the number of girls and women receiving education continues to increase each year at a fairly steady rate. Many thousand more girls start annually up the educational ladder and the emergence of women graduates from the universities is no longer an unusual occurrence as it was in very recent years.

57. Yet, when these encouraging results are viewed in the context of the development of the school populations as a whole, it is apparent that the education of girls still lags behind that of boys. The Committee notes that the problem of the lag in the education of girls continues to vary in degree, not only as between Territories but also as between the main regions in which the Territories are located. Generally where a high rate of school enrolment has been achieved, as for example in most of the Caribbean and Asian and the more highly advanced Pacific Territories, a better balance between the number of boys and girls in the primary school enrolment has also been established. At the levels of secondary and higher education, the ratio of girl students to boys, though usually lower than in the primary schools, does not appear in most cases to represent an acute problem in itself. The problem, however, becomes more serious where the rate of entry of children of both sexes from the primary into the secondary and higher schools is low; in these cases, the inadequacy of facilities bears hardest on the girls.

58. It is in the African area that the shortcomings in the education of girls are most conspicuous. In the context of a relatively low general school enrolment rate, they present a problem which, in the Committee's view, is properly regarded by the educational authorities as serious for the future development of these Territories. Here the disproportion in the ratio of enrolment of girls and boys is almost universally apparent at the lowest levels of education, and is usually being reduced at a slow pace. There are exceptional cases where, for local reasons, the proportion of girls in the primary schools is actually higher than that of boys. For instance, in the multi-racial Territories it is usual to find a well-balanced proportion of boy and girl pupils in the case of the non-indigenous communities; but among the great majority of the African populations girls represent usually between about one-quarter and one-third of the primary school enrolment.

59. The ratio becomes more unfavourable at the secondary school level, falling in many cases to between about one-tenth and one-fifth. The problem is still more acute in the field of higher education, where the modest number of secondary school students entering the university colleges includes an even smaller fraction of women students. In the fields of vocational and technical training, there are also limitations both in the number of girls as compared with boys in training and in the types of courses provided for girls; nursing teaching, home economics, handicrafts and, to a lesser extent, secretarial courses represent the courses most commonly available.

60. The Committee, therefore, notes with satisfaction that UNESCO proposes in the near future to take special steps in Africa to foster the access of girls and women to education.

61. The implications, for the social and economic development of the Territories, of the lack of balance between the number of educated men and women taking their places in the changing society are apparent. In 1958, the Committee noted that it is the woman who is going to determine the new family pattern and who must be made conscious both of the extent of her responsibility and of her capacity to accept it. Since it may be assumed that an educated wife is likely to pass on a foundation of education to the next generation, the education of women may have an effect on the whole educational system itself. Furthermore, improvement in the standards and conditions of life may suffer delays, as an uneducated woman may not be able to contribute as fully as she should to the welfare of her family and community.

62. The information before the Committee in recent years has suggested a number of factors causing the lag in the education of girls and the obstacles preventing them from obtaining the desired education. Among these are the inferior status of women in some societies, local prejudices against the education of girls, preferences offered to men in employment, and the burdens of domestic and field work placed on girls at an early age. These factors and others suggesting resistance to the education of girls have tended in the past to discourage the provision of facilities for it.

63. These are factors subject to evolutionary change, and the Committee believes that this problem requires constant re-examination in order to determine more precisely the practical and psychological obstacles that may be preventing its more rapid solution and the measures that might be taken to surmount them. The Committee reiterates its view that the following measures enumerated in its 1956 report will help improve the education of girls and women and should be vigorously pursued: (a) the increasing adoption of free education; (b) the inclusion of girls in any schemes of compulsory primary education; (c) more provision for primary girls' schools; (d) the development of technical training in fields suited to women; (e) the encouragement of the recruiting of girls for teaching; (f) improvements in the status and remuneration of women teachers; (g) the extension of educational opportunities for adult women.

VII. Free and compulsory education

64. In 1953, and again in 1956, the Committee expressed the view that the extension of school education, and particularly the provision of universal primary schooling, was one of the most effective ways to reduce and eventually eradicate illiteracy. This year the Committee had before it information on the present situation with regard to free and compulsory education and on measures used to enforce attendance at school. It also had the advantage of a study prepared by UNESCO concerning the measures adopted in some Territories to enforce school attendance and the progress thus far made towards the introduction of free and compulsory primary education in Non-Self-Governing Territories.

65. Article 26, paragraph 1, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights states that everyone has the right to education; that education shall be free, at least in the elementary and fundamental stages; and that elementary education shall be compulsory. The Committee was informed by the representatives of Administering Members that it is the ultimate objective of the educational policy of their Governments to introduce universal, free and compulsory education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories for whose administration they are responsible. The Committee notes with satisfaction that in some Territories this objective has been fully achieved, and in some others impressive progress towards its attainment has been made in the last few years. In many others, however, progress in the expansion of facilities for primary education is not rapid enough to justify the expectation that it will be possible to introduce universal, free and compulsory primary education in these Territories in the near future.

66. The Committee is not unaware of the difficulties involved in bringing within the reach of every child of school age the facilities for free primary education. Among these the most important are those of financing educational programmes, of providing additional school buildings and equipment, and of staffing. On the other hand, the Committee is also aware that in some Territories the view is held that it would be unwise to introduce free and compulsory education hastily. The aim should be to provide school facilities for all children, and to create general social conditions to allow them to take full advantage of the opportunities of education. A view also held is that the introduction of universal, free and compulsory education without going through preparatory stages and without adequate financial resources, as is the case in a large number of Territories, will result in the lowering of standards and quality of education.

67. The Committee is aware that there is, among the populations of the Territories, a fervent desire for more education; this must be satisfied, at least at the primary level, if the welfare and advancement of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are to be promoted and the economic and social progress and stability of the Territories in the future ensured. The Committee, therefore, urges that all possible steps should be taken towards the expeditious introduction of universal, free and compulsory education in the Territories.

68. As regards finance, the inhabitants of these Territories contribute to the creation of internal resources needed for their educational, social and economic advancement to the extent they provide, through payment of taxes and in other ways, the revenues of their Governments. The Committee reiterates the view expressed in its 1956 report that it is a responsibility of the Administering Members to assist in the provision of adequate resources for the development of education, which forms an important part of the foundation of the new societies in the Territories.

69. It is the considered view of the Committee that the universal demand for education and the shortage of resources to meet that demand call for boldness and imagination in planning and in executing programmes of educational development and expansion. In several Territories such plans and programmes already exist, and in view of the impending changes in many of these Territories, the Committee stresses the importance of relating these plans and programmes to the whole concept of the social and economic development of these Territories. In the interests of orderly and expeditious development and expansion of primary education, the Committee recommends that the Administering Members and those locally responsible for making educational policy should endeavour to formulate time-tables setting forth dates for a phased programme leading to the introduction, as early as possible, of free and compulsory primary education in Non-Self-Governing Territories. Among the stages in such programmes might be included the steps which the Committee suggested in 1953: (a) compulsory regular attendance of children already enrolled in schools; (b) introduction of free primary education at all stages in selected areas; (c) introduction of free and compulsory education in selected areas; (d) introduction of universal, free and compulsory education. The Committee also expresses the view that these measures should be accompanied by the introduction of free school meals and health services.

70. The Committee welcomes information that no tuition fees are payable in State primary schools in most Caribbean and many Pacific and Indian Ocean Territories and that there are indications that free tuition is being extended in the African Territories under United Kingdom administration. It notes, however, that State primary schools are often able to accommodate only a varying fraction of children of primary school age and that in schools administered by voluntary agencies fees are normally required. The Committee considers that, in order that educational facilities may be used by the whole population, the provision of free primary education should receive high priority.

71. The documentation before the Committee also drew attention to the great disparity in educational provisions represented in various Territories by the term "primary education". In a few Territories it consists of eight years at a well-equipped school staffed by trained teachers, while in some others it consists of three or four years of irregular attendance at a "bush school" with a single, largely untrained teacher in attendance. The attention of the Administering Members is drawn to the definition of primary education formulated by UNESCO. According to this definition, primary education is taken to mean "the first stage of formal education for pupils ranging in age from childhood (five to seven years) to the onset of adolescence, who learn the fundamental skills, knowledge and attitudes which society expects to be the common possession of all citizens".

72. In 1956, the Committee suggested that more thorough inquiries should be undertaken into the multiple causes of wastage and retardation, including an inadequate supply of well-trained teachers, problems resulting from the use in schools of languages with which the pupils are unfamiliar, the failure to connect teaching with the obvious needs of the local communities and their cultures and the failure of the school to arouse and retain the interest of children.

73. The Committee also draws attention to the general economic and social background of pupils and their families as a possible cause of irregular school attendance. An important factor in the problem of school attendance, for instance, is the difficulty of many families in providing adequate clothing for their children. The Committee notes with interest that in Gibraltar the welfare department assists poorer parents to obtain adequate clothing and footwear for their children of school age. Another is the influence of the home; in this case different problems will be faced in urban and rural areas. While appreciating, therefore, the progress made in recent years in establishing and expanding school medical and dental services and supplementary feeding schemes, the Committee believes that, where an appreciable proportion of children come from impermanent, unsatisfactory or very poor homes, it is important to develop school welfare services, in close co-operation with other Government and voluntary social services.

74. The Committee is of the opinion that while the development of free and compulsory education is primarily the responsibility of Administering Members, it is also a matter in which international action and assistance, both financial and technical, would be beneficial. The General Assembly, in resolution 444 (V), had already invited Administering Members which need technical assistance for economic, social and educational advancement of their Non-Self-Governing Territories to submit their requests. In resolution 743 (VIII), the General Assembly recommended that the Administering Members, in order to carry out the objectives of education and in general to solve the educational problems of Non-Self-Governing Territories, should seek the technical advice of the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration and make the greatest possible use of the facilities of the specialized agencies.

75. The Committee notes with appreciation the contribution that UNESCO has made in this field by providing educational specialists and fellowships, and by organizing regional seminars some of which were attended by educational representatives from the metropolitan countries as well as from some of the Territories.

VIII. Secondary education

76. In emphasizing the importance of free and compulsory primary education in Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee has not overlooked the need for the expansion of education in other fields. It is particularly conscious of the great importance of secondary education and of its significance to the development of vocational and technical education, as well as higher education. As it had noted in its 1953 report, secondary education is crucial not only to the spread of higher education for which it must furnish the base, but also to the programmes of development and expansion of education in the primary field for which it must supply teaching personnel. The Committee recognizes, however, that too much emphasis on this concept of secondary education as an intermediate stage between primary and higher education has sometimes led to formalism and rigidity. In 1956 it had, therefore, given expression to the view that secondary education should have its own purpose and should aim at providing training of sufficient content in itself without necessarily leading to higher education. The Committee had paid particular attention to the need for expansion and diversification of secondary education, and to the problems related thereto. At the current session it has concerned itself mainly with the rate of expansion of secondary education and the measures adopted for its diversification.

77. The Committee notes with approval that the need for expansion of secondary education is recognized by Administering Members and this recognition is reflected in various policy statements, development plans and in a continued expansion in the number of secondary school facilities and enrolment. Stronger pressures than ever before, however, are being exerted by the people in many Territories for more rapid progress, and the ever growing popular demand and thirst for education may well increase at a far faster rate than the expansion of facilities.

78. In addition, the increasing need in the Territories for local administrative and technical staff, for semi-skilled and skilled workers and for persons qualified for higher education is also likely to exceed, and seems in some cases already to have exceeded, the output of secondary schools at the present rate of expansion.

79. The Committee is, therefore, of the view that measures are urgently necessary to ensure a substantial increase in the flow of children from primary to secondary schools through accelerated programmes of expansion. Among the obstacles standing in the way of such expansion are the lack of funds and the shortage of teaching personnel with the relatively high qualifications required. In the light of the general demand for secondary schools, the inadequacy of enrolment may perhaps be aggravated by the poverty of the parents of potential pupils who cannot afford tuition fees, and boarding and other expenses, and in some cases by the siting of schools in areas remote from the demand. The opinion was expressed that in some Territories the unduly high standards of performance in selective examinations required from candidates for admission into secondary schools might penalize many potential pupils.

80. In the final analysis, the inadequacy of available public funds and the poverty of the people would appear to be the two most important obstacles to the expansion of facilities for secondary education. Greater financial resources would, without doubt, make possible the construction of more schools and the engagement of competent teachers in metropolitan and other countries when local teachers are not available in sufficient numbers. If more money were available, more extensive programmes for the training of local teachers in adequate numbers could also be undertaken. The provision of adequate funds could also lead to the abolition of tuition fees, and thereby bring secondary education within the reach of all children. The Committee is of the opinion that, in spite of the provision of scholarships for children of exceptional ability and the partial or complete remission of fees, both for tuition and boarding, in the case of some children coming from poor homes, the obstacles to the fullest development of secondary education remain considerably greater in those Territories where fees are charged for secondary education than they are in the Territories where secondary education is free.

81. In 1956, the Committee agreed that secondary education conceived exclusively as preparation for higher education was no longer sufficient, and that what was more generally required was "a secondary education of a broad character providing specialized knowledge and training". The Committee notes that secondary schools of the academic type are being supplemented in many Territories by schools offering an education with a more practical bias. This is an indication that the need to expand education aimed not only at the assimilation of cultural values but also at promoting the economic and social well-being of the Territories is becoming more widely recognized. In recent years the curricula of secondary schools have shown a tendency to depart from the strong influence of the cultural pattern of metropolitan countries. This trend is noticeable particularly in those Territories where the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the formulation of educational policies is effective. The Committee welcomes the inclusion in the curricula in some Territories of the study of local customs, history and traditions and of vernacular languages on an equal footing with the metropolitan languages, as being one of the most significant recent developments. It notes, however, that in a number of Territories curricula continue to ignore local languages and to follow closely the curricula prevailing in the metropolitan countries.

82. The Committee notes with interest the expansion of technical and commercial education at the secondary level. The Committee considers that schools imparting such education could with advantage be integrated into comprehensive systems of vocational and technical education. Some representatives drew attention to the merits of multi-purpose schools which had been introduced with success in some countries. Such schools, in addition to a certain number of core subjects, offer various types of courses for students with diverse aims, interests and abilities to enable them to develop their natural aptitudes and inclinations in the courses chosen by them. It was suggested that the conversion of academic secondary schools into multi-purpose schools would be less expensive than the creation of new schools for diversified education and at the same time would cater better to the training requirements of adolescent boys and girls.

83. Some members emphasized the desirability of pooling resources and ideas for the selection of courses and curricula best adapted to the local needs and conditions. The Committee is of the view that such pooling of ideas might be best effected through meetings of experts from the regions concerned who are familiar with the territorial and regional environments.

84. In 1956, the Committee considered at length the problem of wastage in connexion with a document submitted by UNESCO, entitled "The stagnation of primary school pupils". UNESCO concluded that for a survey of this phenomenon more statistical data than that available for its study would be necessary, but that material at hand tended to show that, in some Territories, there was considerable stagnation and dropping-out. In the light of the available information the Committee notes that the position described by UNESCO continues to exist, and that often only a very small fraction of children reach the secondary stage.

85. The Committee reiterates the emphasis which it laid in 1956 on the essential role played by general educational planning in the expansion and diversification of secondary education. Planning, designed to carry out adopted policies, sets the means to be used, the proportion of funds to be allocated for each level and type of education, and the target dates for each of the goals desired. Some members provided information concerning the experiences of their own countries in educational planning and cited examples showing how the establishment of targets and dates covering five- or ten-year periods have been more effective in the development of education than have the ad hoc measures adopted in some Territories.

IX. Higher education

86. Education as the key to progress finds its ultimate consummation in the product of the university and of the higher technical institute. That product depends, in quality and quantity, on the whole process of education from the primary level upwards; conversely, the process of education as a whole depends, for its teachers and administrators, on the product of higher education. Higher educational facilities must therefore be developed simultaneously with those for primary and secondary schools. Moreover, the character of local leadership in education as in all other fields is largely determined by the development of institutions of higher education.

87. The Committee welcomes evidence of increasing diversification in subjects and courses of study and the expansion of institutions of higher education. Developments in the last few years have confirmed the trend towards an increase in the number and facilities of these institutions which first became apparent in the period immediately following the end of the Second World War. The Committee notes that the need for highly qualified persons both in the administrative and technical fields and for potential leaders has increased at an even faster rate. Yet, there exists evidence that in some areas and for some courses of study a number of places in institutions of higher education are not utilized owing to the lack of a sufficient number of candidates possessing the minimum qualifications for entry. Noting that in a number of Territories existing facilities, although in themselves inadequate, are not fully utilized, the Committee expresses the hope that, with the assistance of UNESCO and other specialized agencies, where necessary, appropriate measures will be adopted at an early date to rectify this situation.

88. The Committee reiterates the view stated in its 1950 report that education is interdependent at all levels, that the vicious circle of educational inadequacies can be broken only by simultaneous action at many different points, and that higher educational facilities should therefore be developed simultaneously with secondary schools. In addition to an increase in the number of secondary schools, consideration should be given to a wider introduction of classes of pre-university standard so that the number of pupils qualified for higher education may progressively increase. A more wide-spread introduction of expert guidance at the secondary level might also be useful in increasing the number of candidates for certain courses of study in the technical field which, although relatively unpopular, are essential to the balanced progress of the Territories.

89. In the majority of cases, the problem is not unutilized accommodation, but rather the increasing number of secondary school graduates desirous of university education, who cannot find accommodation in existing institutions. Because of the time needed to plan, finance and establish institutions of higher education, it appears likely that, in those Territories where the momentum of general development is gathering force, the active demand for higher education will increasingly outstrip facilities in the near future. Expanded secondary school systems will produce larger numbers of graduates every year and it is likely that a higher proportion of these will desire university education owing to the strong incentives deriving both from their own wishes and those of their families as well as from increasing demands by government and private enterprise for the services of local people with high academic and professional qualifications.

90. A sense of urgency is necessary in dealing with these problems in Non-Self-Governing Territories, if events are not to outstrip the measures devised to meet them and if policies are not to become outworn soon after they have been framed. This sense of urgency applies especially to higher education, on which, in quality and quantity, the entire educational system depends.

91. There are now few Territories which do not provide access to higher education, at least on a limited scale, either within their own borders or within the regions to which they belong. The principle of providing local or regional facilities for higher education, which the Committee commended in 1956, appears now to be firmly established. At the same time, the expansion of faculties and revisions in the curricula are making many institutions better adapted to local conditions in terms of staff, the fostering of local cultures and the training of students in needed skills and professions. Although institutions of higher education develop best when they enjoy the greatest possible measure of freedom consistent with the public interest, they should be encouraged, for example through government influence in the allocation of scholarships, to direct their attention to the development of those studies which are most relevant to conditions prevailing in their areas. Examples of such studies are agriculture, animal husbandry, forestry, medicine, technology, public administration and business administration.

92. Greater consideration should be given to the manner in which institutions of higher education provide services to non-resident students. Many Non-Self-Governing Territories face difficulties in this respect owing to the lack of suitable accommodations and inadequate transport facilities. The Committee believes, however, that an extension of extra-mural education, similar to that which has taken place in the Caribbean area, would be widely feasible and would enable institutions to exercise an increasingly vital influence in the growth of local responsibility in all fields. Equally of value would be the establishment in suitable circumstances of "community" colleges for both adults and young persons offering simpler courses than those provided by universities or technical institutions.

93. The Committee recognizes the value of the continued increase from year to year in the number of students from Non-Self-Governing Territories entering universities in the metropolitan and other countries, but expresses the hope that the idea will not gain ground that higher education abroad is always of a higher standard than that in the Territories. As the demand for higher education increases, considerations of cost, distance and difficulty of admission make it increasingly impractical to send ever larger numbers of students overseas to take courses that do not require highly specialized teaching, experience or expensive equipment.

94. It is the Committee's view that the educational policies of the Territories should not be to depend for higher education primarily on the facilities available in metropolitan universities. The general aim of policy with respect to university education, on the other hand, should be to develop the requisite facilities in the Territories themselves. The true value of overseas education, in Territories where higher education has already passed the initial stage, is in those fields where specialization, interchange and final practical experience are essential, in undergraduate courses in subjects not sufficiently in demand to be provided locally and in post-graduate studies. The trend towards regional organization of higher education should tend still further to reduce the need for overseas training at certain stages.

95. Closer ties between institutions of higher education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and in other countries, particularly in the same geographical region, could in the opinion of the Committee be developed with advantage. The Committee would welcome information on such co-operation in the fields of post-graduate study and research, in teaching and in student enrolment.

96. Greater advantage should also be taken of the fellowship and scholarship programmes sponsored by the United Nations and the specialized agencies, not only to provide more opportunities to graduates from Non-Self-Governing Territories, but also to foster broad contacts with the outside world which the Territories require for their progressive development.

97. In 1956 the Committee noted, as a point of outstanding importance, that all institutions of higher education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories are open to students without discrimination on grounds of race or colour. It is a source of satisfaction that since then the number of students of non-indigenous origin attending such institutions, together with indigenous students, appears to have increased. In the opinion of the Committee, this trend should be further accelerated by the provision of scholarships to enable students from other countries to attend territorial or regional universities and, in appropriate circumstances, by making available more opportunities for the entry into various fields of government employment to those possessing local educational qualifications.

X. Vocational and technical training

98. In 1953, the General Assembly affirmed that, in accordance with the objectives of education in Non-Self-Governing Territories enumerated in resolution 743 (VIII) of 27 November 1953, the process of education should be designed to familiarize the inhabitants with and train them in the use of the tools of economic, social and political progress, with a view to the attainment of a full measure of self-government.

99. Technical and vocational training has been considered by the Committee on a number of previous occasions in connexion with educational and social advancement. Although no major changes in policy have occurred since 1956 when the subject was last considered, there are indications of new developments and of a reorientation in policy in some Territories.

100. The Committee notes that there continue to be difficulties in many Territories in persuading children leaving school to choose occupations involving manual work. As a result, even existing facilities for vocational training, modest as they often are, are not fully utilized. The difficulties stem from a wide-spread search for a status which has its origin partly in indigenous tradition and partly in various aspects of foreign influence. Furthermore, vocational training, if it is to gain greater acceptance, requires the development of a wide industrial base which will both require and suitably reward skilled workers. The successful expansion of technical and vocational education requires, therefore, carefully planned and co-ordinated measures in the political, economic, social and educational fields.

101. The Committee has already referred to the need for diversification of and change in emphasis in the general school curriculum. The value of vocational work is still sometimes belittled by students and parents as an element in general education and it is therefore encouraging to note that in some Territories new school curricula which aim at making school life practical and realistic have been adopted and that a status equal to that of academic studies has been accorded to these subjects. It has long been realized that a pupil's work improves when his interest is aroused and when he sees the relevance of his task to his future means of livelihood. The Committee strongly emphasizes the vital need to attune manual and vocational training at the lower levels of education to the basic needs of the inhabitants of the area served by the school. Thus, craft or pre-industrial instruction may be more suitable in some areas, while in others agricultural, animal husbandry or fishing techniques could be appropriately included in the school curriculum. It is also important that the techniques taught and the tools and equipment used should be suited to local conditions.

102. In 1953, the Committee expressed the view that technical education must be part of a general system of education, since the pupil who is to be trained as a competent artisan or technician requires an adequate basic standard of general education. The Committee has already pointed to the need for diversification of courses in secondary schools. However, the selection of vocational subjects, in its opinion, must be conditioned by the prospects of employment or development in the Territory in which the school is situated. The Committee notes with interest experiments in the Caribbean area where pupils from academic secondary schools attend classes at technical institutes and suggests that such sharing of facilities might be considered in other Territories.

103. There is agreement in the Committee that in many Territories there is an urgent need for increasing numbers of technicians with skills which cannot be sufficiently acquired in ordinary secondary schools, even where ample provision is made for vocational training. Despite considerable recent progress, training facilities for such technicians are still quite inadequate. There is an urgent need for the establishment of more technical institutions offering courses most appropriate to the needs of the Territories or regions in which they are situated.

104. This year the Committee paid particular attention to the problem of vocational guidance. In considering this problem, the close relationship between vocational guidance and employment was emphasized and the need to relate the selection of students and the output of trained technicians to the needs of the Territory as a whole was stressed. Greater efforts should be made to establish and maintain contact with employers, employment bureaux and other bodies. The establishment, where they do not yet exist, of effective national or regional advisory committees on technical education with a membership including representatives of employers and trade unions could, in the opinion of the Committee, do much to maintain realism in the choice of the curricula of technical institutions, while fostering a deeper appreciation and knowledge of the work of such institutions.

105. The Committee notes that in most Territories the great majority of senior technical teachers were recruited in the metropolitan country. It believes that in such cases a teacher should be fully aware of the economic and social background of the Territory in which he is working, and that, if practicable, he should have had some industrial experience in the region. Such awareness and experience will bring the teacher closer to the student and should stimulate the student's enthusiasm for learning. The Committee is also of the opinion that since there are difficulties in recruitment of adequate numbers of metropolitan staff, consideration may usefully be given to the recruitment of technical teachers in countries other than the metropolitan. The recruitment of metropolitan teachers and those from other countries is, naturally, essential until the Territories or regions can themselves provide a sufficient number of qualified teachers for their own needs.

106. The studies placed before the Committee at the current session highlight the fact that the greatest impediment to the development of technical and vocational education in the Territories is the lack of adequately trained indigenous teachers. The Committee recommends that the conditions of service for teachers of vocational and technical subjects should be made more attractive, since otherwise it will be impossible to attract personnel of good quality and in sufficient numbers in the face of competition of other forms of employment. The Committee, therefore, urges the Administering Members to create unified cadres of indigenous teachers in this field, with adequate prospects of advancement and promotion. Where the Territories are too small to provide adequate training locally, regional training programmes should be developed.

107. In the process of economic development taking place in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, short courses for workers already employed in industry are a useful element in any general pattern of training and the Committee welcomes the work of territorial, metropolitan and international trade union organizations, and of employers directed towards improving the skill of workers already in employment. It notes with interest that the relative merits of apprenticeship supplemented by theoretical discussion, of "on-the-job" training and of accelerated vocational training, as introduced in certain French Territories, have recently been the subject of discussion at the Inter-African Conference on Education held at Luanda in 1957, under the auspices of the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara. The Committee notes that the up-grading of the skills of workers already in employment, which will contribute to the improvement of present standards of living, appears to receive in most cases less consideration than the provision of technical training for the young. The Committee also notes that in many Territories technical skills are not receiving adequate financial recognition as compared with other skills.

108. The Committee commends the work undertaken by the International Labour Office in studying the problems of technical and vocational training in the light of recent changes in industrial processes and manpower requirements throughout the world, and notes that this work may lead to a further discussion at an early session of the International Labour Conference of the concepts on which vocational training should be based.

109. The Committee notes with particular interest that at the forthcoming first session of the African Advisory Committee of the ILO, to be held at Luanda, one of the items on the agenda will be the consideration of vocational and technical training in Africa. The Committee would wish to be informed of the outcome of the ILO Advisory Committee's discussions at Luanda on various subjects amongst which are apprenticeship and on-the-job training, accelerated training, agricultural education, training of supervisors and the provision of facilities for technical and higher level education and training. The interest of the Committee is the more vivid, as it is in full agreement with ILO's basic approach, which affirms that vocational and technical training is a key problem in the development of the resources of Africa. The Committee believes that this principle is equally applicable to all Non-Self-Governing Territories.

XI. Agricultural education and extension services

110. Since most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are primarily agricultural, agricultural education both in the general school system of the Territories and through extension activities among adults and specific training courses for farmers directed by the Departments of Agriculture is the fundamental basis on which progress among the rural populations as a whole must rest.

111. Search for enhanced status and the nature of general education are likely to influence children deeply in their ambitions and attitudes; this is particularly relevant in an examination of the factors affecting progress in agricultural education. The reasons for the unpopularity of farming as a profession are complex and cannot be solved by efforts in the field of education alone. Among relevant factors are the low status and economic position of farmers and the living conditions in rural areas.

112. In 1957 the Committee stressed that, in the immediate future, industrialization would not change the basic economy of the majority of Territories. There is now a growing realization that if the services introduced by governments in the social and other fields in Non-Self-Governing Territories since the end of the Second World War are to continue even at their present inadequate levels in the face of lower world prices, the general economy must be improved. This means in fact the improvement of agriculture, which is the main industry in most Territories, with the object of improving the quality and increasing the output of export crops, whilst continuing to ensure adequate food supplies for the local population. The achievement of this objective would have the dual effect of developing the economy of the Territory and directing peasant farmers towards a cash economy. In a number of Territories this process has already begun and in some has been carried a stage further through comprehensive programmes of regroupment of the indigenous populations, land consolidation and reallocation, accompanied by farm planning for individual holdings, sometimes enforced by penal sanctions.

113. Major responsibility in this field has been borne by agricultural extension services which, the Committee is happy to note, have been considerably expanded in nearly all Territories. Results, however, have been uneven not only because of complexities in organization, insufficient and inadequately trained staff, lack of funds and the imposition of extraneous duties and responsibilities on the personnel of these services, but also for wider reasons. Thus, both lack of transportation and inadequate prices may sometimes be factors in the difficulties encountered in overcoming the conservatism and lack of interest of the peasant farmer to which reference is made in the information before the Committee. The Committee is also aware that for certain export crops comprehensive grading systems have been established providing higher prices for better quality; in the case of food crops, however, few financial incentives for the improvement of quality would appear to exist. In addition, the effectiveness of the agricultural extension services would be enhanced were farmers given sound economic as well as technical advice. The advice must, in other words, enable the farmer to produce the right crops and to produce them more efficiently.

114. The most satisfactory educational approach in overcoming the rooted prejudices against agriculture is to encourage in young people a love of the land and an appreciation of its importance in their lives and in the economy of their country. The Committee welcomes information indicating the wide-spread introduction of school gardens in most Territories. It emphasizes, however, that school gardens, whilst they can awaken the curiosity of children in natural science as applied to agriculture, which the Luanda Conference considered to be the objective of the teaching of agriculture in primary schools, cannot by themselves inspire a love of the land. If school gardens are to be successful in their objectives, the methods and tools used and the type of crops grown must also be adapted to local conditions. The Committee is of the opinion that, in some cases, school gardens could be used to familiarize children, who are likely to make their livelihood on the land, with new types of useful plants suited to the area. In this way the diversification of agricultural production, which is recognized as a pressing need in most Non-Self-Governing Territories, would be ultimately encouraged.

115. The Committee is of the opinion that the teaching of agriculture at secondary and higher levels requires the creation of a fully integrated system of agricultural education within the general framework of technical and vocational training. In the last few years there has been an intensified effort to increase the number of local people trained in agriculture; most of these efforts have the specific objective of training men for the lower, field-level grades of government agricultural services. The Committee, while appreciating the expansion of special agricultural training facilities for this purpose, notes that enrolment is still too low, that serious staffing difficulties exist and that there appears to be little uniformity in policy and standards between the various institutions. Facilities for higher agricultural education exist only in relatively few Territories and the Committee notes that, although the need for trained local personnel at the highest level has acquired a new urgency, enrolment in several cases is still so low as to make less than full use of facilities which in any absolute assessment of needs would be regarded as inadequate. It sees in this fact a further re-inforcement of the view repeatedly expressed in the present report that the over-all educational provision in most Territories still needs to be greatly expanded if the specialized forms of training, which are the subject of the present chapter, are to be provided on an adequate scale.

XII. Training of medical and health personnel

116. In 1958 the Committee, reviewing the public health situation within the framework of social conditions, commented that physicians were still scarce in the areas where the poorest health conditions were to be found. It was considered that to remedy this situation an adequate number of fully trained personnel should be provided. This could be achieved by intensifying training schemes and by up-grading the existing training institutions, together with the further training of auxiliary staff for the purpose of bringing them into the category of fully trained personnel.

117. The Committee reiterates its belief that the first necessity is comprehensive planning to assess staff requirements for the health services as a whole over a period of time. It will then become possible to plan in detail for the training and expansion of the various categories of personnel.

118. The information before the Committee shows that the development of schools for the professional training of physicians and higher medical personnel has been slow and difficult. At the present time there are in the Non-Self-Governing Territories only nine medical schools or faculties, of which five are in Africa. The present annual output of medical graduates is only 190 for a total approximate population of 113 million, while the output of graduate dental practitioners as well as of other professional personnel is even more inadequate. In addition, the Committee notes that in many Territories enrolment in existing institutions is often but a fraction of the present modest capacity and in some cases is decreasing on account of difficulties, caused by a poor general education, in securing qualified students, particularly in the basic sciences. The shortage of teaching staff is equally serious and is aggravated by the small number of local medical graduates, from among whom teaching staff has to be recruited.

119. The Committee endorses the view that a solution to the problem of limited enrolment in medical schools may be found in an expansion and improvement of primary and secondary education. A contribution towards meeting the shortage of teaching staff would be the preparation of a carefully planned long-term programme of teacher training in medical education, including allied subjects. While some of the primary needs can be met by securing the services of visiting professors, a definite percentage of new medical graduates could be awarded fellowships for study abroad in designated fields for preparation as teachers. The Committee notes with appreciation the undertaking by WHO to offer fellowships for this purpose.

120. Modern public health has developed a form of integrated service at the local level in which both curative and preventive work is carried out under one unit of administration by a team of health workers (doctors, health officers, sanitarians, nurses, midwives and auxiliary personnel). In the Non-Self-Governing Territories the education and training of nursing, midwifery, sanitary and auxiliary medical personnel should, therefore, be planned with this new trend in view. Opportunities for advanced or refresher training should be extended, since the introduction of modern medical and health practices into an under-developed Territory requires that the staff possess relatively advanced levels of training to enable services to be provided efficiently. A minimum number of specialists in medicine and public health should be trained to form a nucleus in each Territory and to take the leadership in research and technical development, as well as in the supervision of the medical and public health work.

121. The training of nurses, midwives, sanitary and auxiliary medical personnel is far more wide-spread than university medical education and represents a growing effort to train indigenous persons to serve their own communities in the medical and health fields. Although the number of those trained is not great and is far from meeting the need, special efforts have been devoted recently to the expansion of this type of training to keep pace with the development of the health services. At present, quantity is maintained at the expense of quality and it is believed that, unless there is an improvement in general education, a continuing increase in numbers may further affect the quality of the auxiliary staff. The training of auxiliary personnel should aim at maintaining the highest possible standard of practice and this standard should be revised periodically. The Committee notes the numerous categories of auxiliary health personnel under training and recommends that in the training of these categories account should be taken of the WHO Expert Committee recommendation that, where many health services are rendered by auxiliary workers, it is advisable to keep the number of categories as small as possible. This may necessitate the combining of duties generally found in more than one professional field into the assignment of a "polyvalent health worker".

122. The curricula of medical schools in Non-Self-Governing Territories closely follow those of the metropolitan country; the Committee believes that while this practice is commendable in relation to the maintenance of standards, it is essential that medical students have the opportunity to study local health problems and to adapt their knowledge and skills to local conditions in order to bridge the gap between theoretical knowledge and practice under local conditions.

123. The Committee, as in 1955 and in 1958, gave careful attention to the question of whether medical staff should be trained locally or in the metropolitan country. It reiterates the view that calculations of comparative cost should be scrutinized with the utmost care. The fact that in some cases it was less expensive to send students to the metropolitan country than to give them full professional training in their own Territories or in regional medical institutions is often due to limited initial enrolment. On the other hand, there is danger that students sent to the metropolitan countries might become attuned to the practice of medicine there and upon their return know comparatively little about local problems.

124. The local training of subordinate medical staff is of equal, or even greater importance, and therefore the Committee notes with some concern that although facilities for nursing training have increased in recent years, in most Territories full nursing qualifications can only be acquired in the metropolitan country. The Committee considers that further training facilities for full nursing training should be provided. Nurses, midwives, and auxiliary medical staff should be trained in an environment as nearly typical of the area in which they will work as can be arranged. Practical field training facilities, as an integral part of the development of centres of training, should be expanded to enable students to acquire the necessary practical knowledge and experience in dealing with local health problems. When the auxiliary worker is expected to work in a rural environment, the training should be oriented towards giving him the close touch necessary for understanding the particular problems of rural dwellers. If circumstances require that the teaching institution be placed in an urban environment, then it is essential that special provisions should be made to include rural field work as an integral part of the training course.

125. The Committee considers that the education and training of professional medical and allied personnel (including dental, pharmacy, laboratory, sanitary engineering, nursing, midwifery) should be planned as an extension of university education; the development of education and training centres in Non-Self-Governing Territories should be encouraged, if not on a territorial basis, certainly on a regional one.

126. The Committee notes with satisfaction the wide scope of the work of WHO in many Non-Self-Governing Territories, including individual, regional and inter-regional projects, and commends the award in 1958, of 113 fellowships to candidates from the Non-Self-Governing Territories by the WHO fellowship programme, which has been expanded considerably in recent years.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES (ELEVENTH SESSION, 1960)

I. Constitution of the Committee

1. By its resolution 1332 (XIII), adopted on 12 December 1958, the General Assembly decided to continue, for a further period of three years, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, on the same basis as was set forth in resolutions 332 (IV) of 2 December 1949, 646 (VII) of 10 December 1952 and 933 (X) of 8 November 1955.

2. The terms of reference of the Committee, as set forth in resolution 1332 (XIII) are as follows:

"5. . . . to examine, in the spirit of Article 1, paragraphs 3 and 4, and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

"6. . . . to submit to the General Assembly at its regular sessions reports containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories."

3. As regards the Committee's programme of work, the same resolution states that:

"7. . . . the Committee should, without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, give special attention to educational, economic and social conditions in turn and should consider the information transmitted in respect of these questions in the light of the reports approved by the General Assembly on such conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories."

4. The Committee consists of fourteen members: seven Administering Member States transmitting information on Non-Self-Governing Territories and an equal number of other Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly. In 1959, the terms of office of Ceylon and Guatemala having expired, Argentina and Ceylon were elected to the Committee for three-year terms. The present membership of the Committee is as follows:

Members transmitting information

Australia	United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland
Belgium
France
Netherlands	United States of America
New Zealand

Members elected by the General Assembly

Date of expiration of term

Argentina	1962
Brazil	1960
Ceylon	1962
Dominican Republic	1961
Ghana	1961
India	1961
Iraq	1961

With the exception of Belgium, all members of the Committee were represented at the session.

5. The Committee held its eleventh session at the Headquarters of the United Nations in New York. In view of the fact that the Committee this year was requested by the General Assembly to examine the progress achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in pursuance of Chapter XI of the Charter, the eleventh session was longer than previous ones. The Committee held twenty meetings between 23 February and 12 April 1960.

6. Representatives of the ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO also attended the meetings of the Committee and took part in its discussions.

II. Officers of the Committee

7. At its opening (205th) meeting on 23 February, the Committee elected by acclamation the following officers:

Chairman: Mr. Alex Quaison-Sackey (Ghana);

Vice-Chairman: Mr. L. J. Goedhart (Netherlands);

Rapporteur: Mr. John George Bacon (United States of America).

III. Agenda

8. At its 205th meeting, the Committee adopted the provisional agenda as submitted by the Secretariat. The agenda<sup>1</sup> is reproduced as annex I to this report.

IV. Sub-Committee

9. At the 207th meeting, the Committee appointed a sub-committee composed of the representatives of Brazil, Ghana, India, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America. The sub-committee was requested: (a) to formulate for the consideration of the Committee observations and conclusions on the report on progress achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories<sup>2</sup>; and (b) to prepare a report on economic conditions in Non-

Self-Governing Territories. The sub-committee was given wide terms of reference and in its examination of the Progress Report it was asked to be guided by the terms of General Assembly resolution 1461 (XIV) of 12 December 1959. The sub-committee was assisted by the Rapporteur of the Committee and representatives of the specialized agencies. It elected Mr. M. Rasgotra (India) as its chairman. It held thirty-three meetings between 29 February and 6 April.

V. Preliminary statements

10. At the 205th meeting of the Committee, the representatives of Argentina and the United Kingdom reserved the positions of their respective Governments with regard to sovereignty over the Falkland Islands (Islas Malvinas) and the Falkland Island dependencies.

11. The representatives of Ceylon, India and Iraq stated that their respective Governments regarded West Irian (Netherlands New Guinea) as an integral part of the sovereign and independent Republic of Indonesia, a Member of the United Nations, and that, in their view, the transmission of information on West Irian under Article 73 e was incorrect. Any views that they might subsequently express on the information thus transmitted would be subject to that reservation. The representative of the Netherlands reaffirmed the sovereignty of his Government over Netherlands New Guinea, in respect of which his Government had transmitted information in accordance with its obligations under the Charter. The representative of Australia stated that his Government's position was that Netherlands sovereignty over Netherlands New Guinea was beyond doubt.

12. At the same meeting, the representative of the Dominican Republic expressed the concern of his Government regarding the juridical modalities generated by the reservations and the manner in which these are apparently accepted or registered in the records of the Committee and of other United Nations organs.

VI. Progress achieved by the Non-Self-Governing Territories in pursuance of Chapter XI of the Charter

13. In compliance with General Assembly resolutions 932 (X) of 8 November 1955 and 1053 (XI) of 20 February 1957 the Secretary-General, with the co-operation of ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO, had prepared for the General Assembly at its fourteenth session a report on the progress achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories since the establishment of the United Nations. The Progress Report<sup>3</sup> consisted of three main parts: a general survey; a second part comprising studies on economic, social and educational conditions; and a third part comprising summaries of information on fifty-four Territories on which information had been transmitted up to the end of 1958.

14. By resolution 1461 (XIV) the General Assembly requested the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories: (1) to examine the Progress Report at its 1960 session with a view to ascertaining the progress made by the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the light of the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations; (2) to submit its observations and conclusions on the Report to the General Assembly at its fifteenth session, in order to assist the Assembly in its consideration of the Report; (3) to be guided by the terms of all relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, in particular, resolutions 932 (X) and 1053 (XI), as well as by the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter. Because the Committee had in 1959 examined the summaries of information which formed the third part of the Progress Report, the Committee, in 1960, gave primary attention to the two remaining parts comprising the General Survey and the twenty-six separate studies on economic, social and educational conditions covering the period since the establishment of the United Nations in 1946. To assist the Committee in this task, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States had included specialist advisers in their delegations.

15. The Committee examined the Progress Report in three stages. First, in full committee (206th to 210th meetings inclusive), the members expressed their views concerning a number of broad trends in the political, economic, educational and social fields since the beginning of the United Nations. The Committee next established a sub-committee<sup>4</sup> with wide terms of reference in accordance with General Assembly resolution 146 (XIV) to draft a report containing observations and conclusions on the progress achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The report of the sub-committee was then approved by the Committee.<sup>5</sup>

16. During the general discussion of the Progress Report, all the members of the Committee who took part paid tribute to the Secretariat and to the specialized agencies for the quality of the Report and pointed out the difficulties and problems existing in the Territories during the period under review. The representatives of Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States provided further information in clarification of some points contained in the documentation.

17. The representative of Australia considered that the progress made was encouraging, and that achievements during the last decade were substantial, although much remained to be done.

18. The representative of New Zealand reviewed the progress made in the Territories under the administration of his Government. In the Cook Islands, a considerable advance had been made in the field of constitutional development, and the enlarged Assembly had been given extensive control over legislation and finance. Similar measures were to be introduced in Niue.

19. Commenting on developments in the Non-Self-Governing Territories since the establishment of the United Nations, the representative of the United States considered that much remained to be done. His Government realized the need for urgency in attaining specific goals and the necessity for pressing forward in all fields of development. In the Territories under United States administration, the outstanding development was the attainment of statehood by Alaska and Hawaii.

20. The representative of the Netherlands reaffirmed the full recognition of his Government of its responsibility under the Charter and reaffirmed that its policy with respect to Netherlands New Guinea was to enable the inhabitants of that Territory to determine freely their own future as soon as possible. To help the inhabitants of that Territory to advance towards this goal, special emphasis was being given to social organization, which was essential to all other development. He informed the Committee of measures taken for the general development of that Territory since the end of the period covered by the Progress Report, and of measures to strengthen the social organization. In 1959, the first regional council with an elected majority was set up, and legislation was being prepared for the establishment of an elected Central Netherlands New Guinea Council to represent the entire population. He assured the Committee that his Government would continue, in conformity with Article 73 of the Charter, to co-operate with the specialized agencies and regional organizations, and with Australia, which administered the rest of the island, for the welfare of the inhabitants of New Guinea.

21. The representatives of Argentina, Brazil, Ghana, India and Iraq recalled that the purpose of the Report was to enable the General Assembly to review the progress that had been made in various fields in the Non-Self-Governing Territories towards the goals set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter. They all attached great importance to the task of the Committee, and the representative of Argentina considered that the work of the United Nations in relation to Non-Self-Governing Territories was now gaining in significance because the scope of United Nations responsibilities under the Trusteeship System was being gradually modified in the light of independence achieved, or about to be achieved, by some of the Trust Territories. They noted that some encouraging progress had been made towards the principal goal, which was the development of self-government. The General Survey contained in the Progress Report<sup>6</sup> showed that, of the seventy-four Territories on which information had been transmitted in 1946, by 1955 eight had achieved independence and had become Members of the United Nations and eleven others had attained various degrees of self-government. During this period, the number of those inhabiting Non-Self-Governing Territories had decreased from 215 million to 113 million. Since 1956, the advance of the Territories to self-government had accelerated: Alaska and Hawaii attained statehood in 1958-1959, and in 1960, Cyprus, Nigeria and the Belgian Congo would also become independent. Commenting on these developments, the representative of Ghana stated that his Government viewed with satisfaction the political changes taking place in the Non-Self-Governing Territories because Ghana considered its own independence meaningless unless it was linked with the independence of other Territories.

22. The non-administering Members pointed out that, despite the accelerated advance of some Territories, little progress had been achieved in many areas. Because of the present intense desire of the peoples to be free, the rate of development had not been rapid enough. They urged that greater efforts should be made in the Territories to overcome difficulties, and to enable the Non-Self-Governing Territories to attain a full measure of self-government or independence as early as possible.

23. The representatives of India and Iraq stated that although in the past the Administering Members had held that self-government should be the culmination of a long process of economic and social development, experience had shown that the Territories progressed more rapidly after they had become self-governing or independent. The representative of India also emphasized that the Committee should consider not only the progress achieved but what more should and could be done. Moreover, it was important that the progress should be assessed not only in terms of statistics and percentages, but also by the extent to which the needs and aspirations of the people had been met. He emphasized that it could no longer be accepted that the attainment of freedom by peoples in Non-Self-Governing Territories should be made conditional on their prior attainment of certain standards in other fields. He expressed his concern that not only had progress not been rapid enough but that a number of Territories still remained in a state of reliance on metropolitan countries. In this connexion, he referred to the absence of information from the Government of Portugal on conditions prevailing in the areas under Portuguese administration. He hoped that action would soon be taken by the General Assembly to bring these Territories within the purview of the United Nations. On this point the representative of Brazil reserved the position of his delegation since he considered that this matter was not within the competence of the Committee.

24. The representative of Iraq considered that, in its examination of the information before it, the Committee should bear in mind the overriding desire of the peoples for independence and self-government. He suggested that the United Nations should aim at accelerating to the utmost the progress of the Territories towards self-government or independence, and that the General Assembly should accordingly amend the terms of reference of the Committee to enable it to encompass the new tasks which the United Nations would have to undertake in the light of changes taking place in the world.

25. The representative of the United Kingdom considered that the achievements of the Administering Members could be judged by the facts contained in the Progress Report. He agreed that the achievement of self-government was of very great importance to the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and recalled that the Administering Members gave it a central place in the obligations they assumed under Chapter XI of the Charter. But other important factors of an economic and social nature made up the total well-being of the inhabitants which it was the sacred trust of the Administering Members to promote. All these factors were interrelated, and in some Territories it was possible that the continued presence of the Administering Members for a period was a necessary solvent for the intractable social and economic situations which remained. In its examination of the progress achieved in the promotion of the well-being of the inhabitants of the Territories, therefore, the Committee would have to weigh carefully all these factors which made up such well-being, and should not give undue emphasis to the factor of self-government.

26. The representatives of Argentina, Brazil, Ghana and India emphasized that the economic development must be directed to raising the standard of living of the inhabitants and should be assessed in the light of trends in world economy. During the period covered, the economies of Non-Self-Governing Territories had benefited from the demand for primary products and general world prosperity. These representatives noted that considerable progress had been made in increasing production and that there had also been some rise in per caput income and level of consumption. Despite these areas of progress, however, the economies of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were still almost completely dependent on subsistence agriculture and on the production of a few primary products, a large part of which was still exported to the metropolitan countries. In consequence, these Territories remained highly vulnerable to fluctuations in world commodity prices. These representatives urged that increased efforts should be made to diversify

27. It was further noted by the representatives of Brazil, India and Iraq that, although there had been some gains in the manufacturing and processing industries, the growth of industrialization had been slow, except in the Belgian Congo. The information showed that most Territories still relied heavily on imported consumer goods, and these representatives expressed the hope that effective measures would be taken to change this pattern of dependence.

28. The representative of India expressed the concern of his delegation over the widening gap in the standards of living between Western countries and the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and pointed out the disparity in the rise of the per caput income in industrialized countries, on the one hand, and in the underdeveloped nations, on the other. He stated that foreign private capital, which had been invested mainly in mineral extractive industries or in agriculture, had not been of much direct benefit to the indigenous inhabitants, and expressed the view that territorial Governments should increasingly promote economic activities in the interests of the indigenous inhabitants.

29. The Administering Members recognized that certain basic problems remained to be solved. The representative of the United Kingdom referred to some general indicators showing the economic growth which had taken place in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the period covered. He pointed out that in many of the Territories under United Kingdom administration development had in the early years been retarded by the lack of natural resources or because the Territories were too small to support the overhead expenses of public services on a reasonable scale or to permit more than the most rudimentary kinds of division of labour. Some of these Territories would continue to offer a problem for years to come. While agreeing that in all appropriate cases the Territories should build up their own industrial production, he pointed out that this was only one part of a country's development programme, and that both agriculture and trade were also sources of wealth. Industrialization should therefore be pursued not as an end in itself, but as part of a general policy which would increase national output and raise standards of living; in the United Kingdom Territories there were many examples of the successful pursuit of this aim, in the production of manufactured goods both for domestic consumption and for export. The Government of the United Kingdom had doubled the financial assistance it made available to the Non-Self-Governing Territories; it had also considerably increased its contributions to the United Nations Special Fund and would contribute substantially to the International Development Association when it was established. Although the greater part of development in the United Kingdom Territories had been financed from the internal savings of the Territories and with the financial help provided by the metropolitan Government as a supplement, private investment had also played an important part.

30. The representative of Australia pointed out that at the end of the Second World War many Territories, more particularly those situated in the Pacific area, had been faced with a tremendous task of reconstruction. In the light of this fact and of subsequent international economic conditions, the post-war period had undoubtedly been one of steady economic progress. The vulnerability of many Non-Self-Governing Territories to fluctuations in world commodity prices still remained one of the main obstacles to their more rapid advancement. The establishment and development of local industries was often limited by local conditions, and due account had to be taken of factors such as the availability of capital and technical personnel, the social implications of industrialization, the level of living of the population and their purchasing power, and the potentialities of local, regional and international markets.

31. The representative of the Netherlands reviewed the measures taken by his Government in Netherlands New Guinea for economic development and noted that the natural resources of the Territory were limited, the soil was of low fertility, and the economy was still based primarily on agriculture. Government efforts were directed at improving agricultural methods, diversifying agricultural food and cash crops, and increasing production. Following a period of reconstruction immediately after the war, steady progress had been made. During the period 1950-1958, the value of exports had increased, the proportion produced by the indigenous inhabitants had tripled during this period, and public expenditure had multiplied several times over. Despite these achievements, Netherlands New Guinea remained a very under-developed Territory and much investment was needed.

32. The representative of the United States shared the view that progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was partly due to the general strengthening of the world economy. Among other important developments, he noted the trend towards more comprehensive economic planning and the growth in size of economic development programmes. He stressed the importance of the role of private investment in economic development and considered that development programmes should include an evaluation of the potential for both domestic and foreign private investment. The United States Government held the view that, to the greatest possible extent, foreign investment should come from the private sector and from international institutions. This policy was reflected in the United States Government's development assistance programmes in various parts of the world and in the support it gave to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and similar institutions.

33. The representatives of Ceylon and Ghana emphasized the need for increased participation of the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the formulation and execution of development plans. The representative of Ceylon drew attention to the fact that no formal procedure had been established for the direct participation of representatives of Non-Self-Governing Territories in organs of the United Nations, and that progress in the Territories could gain much from such direct participation in technical bodies such as the regional economic commissions. Several representatives supported this view and urged that wider use should be made of various forms of international assistance and that Non-Self-Governing Territories should be directly associated in the work of the regional economic commissions of the Economic and Social Council, and more particularly in that of the Economic Commission for Africa.

34. The Progress Report reviewed general developments in the social field and included studies on demographic conditions, co-operatives, public health and nutrition, social security, freedom of association, mass communications, community development, social welfare, race relations and human rights.

35. In examining this information, one of the main points again stressed by members of the Committee was that social development must be viewed as the whole process of change and advancement considered in terms of the progressive well-being of society and of the individual. The representatives of Iraq and India noted that the impact of Western civilization had profoundly affected the structure of indigenous society and expressed the hope that the Administering Members would give particular attention to the social problems resulting from this transition.

36. The representative of Ghana pointed out that the information showed that social progress had been most rapid in those Territories in which the inhabitants had assumed a large share of responsibility in the formulation of policy. He emphasized that government measures should be supported by community development programmes.

37. The representative of India made a detailed review of developments in the social fields. Because almost all of the Non-Self-Governing Territories had large rural populations, it was important to examine the role and the achievements of community development in the whole process of social advancement. He noted that the promotion of such development had been rather slow in some Territories and in no Territory had community development projects been adopted and implemented on a territorial scale. Experience had shown that where schemes were imposed by the Government from above, they often failed to rouse the interests of the people; he urged, therefore, that more efforts should be made to mobilize initiative at the village level. He noted with satisfaction the growth of the co-operative movement and commended the progress made in some Territories. He considered it important that Governments should continue to encourage the establishment of handicraft co-operatives and small industries, both of which helped to prevent the disintegration of the traditional way of life.

38. The representative of Australia considered that the diversity and the inherent nature of the social concepts of many indigenous groups constituted a serious obstacle to orderly social change. It was necessary to awaken the interest of the people so that they would not only desire progress but would also be prepared, if necessary, to accept changes in their traditional social systems. This point was also subsequently emphasized by the representative of the Netherlands in respect of Netherlands New Guinea, where mechanized farming had been introduced to raise the standard of living and to act as a social catalyst. At a later stage, it was the intention of the Netherlands Government to extend the projects to embrace such social questions as the development of leadership training.

39. The representative of India further welcomed the developments in the basic trends of social policy, of labour legislation, of social security and of housing, public health and social welfare. He pointed out, however, that statistics showed many areas in which there was a divergence between professed policy and actual practice in the extension of human rights to the indigenous people, for example, in the implementation of regulations affecting the employment of women and children. He considered it unfortunate that at the end of the period covered by the Progress Report, discriminatory practices continued to exist in some Non-Self-Governing Territories. He cited examples of discriminatory practices in the fields of public service, employment, agriculture and education. He considered it most objectionable that, in many Territories, separate educational systems continued to be provided for different races. He asked why these practices continued to exist since the Administering Members were committed to a policy of the abolition of discrimination.

40. The representatives of Argentina, Brazil, Ghana, Ceylon and Iraq also emphasized the importance of human rights in Non-Self-Governing Territories. They pointed out that under the Charter and the Declaration of Human Rights the Administering Members had the moral and legal obligation to safeguard human rights in the Territories under their administration. They expressed their satisfaction that there was no racial discrimination in the Territories under the administration of France, New Zealand and the United States and noted measures taken by other Administering Members which had led to improved conditions. They expressed their grave concern that the information before the Committee showed that progress in the realization of human rights in many areas had been slow and that discriminatory practices still existed in many Territories with plural populations, and affected such important areas as education, employment, land tenure, public services and social intercourse. They considered it most serious that in some Territories there continued to be separate school systems for European and indigenous school children, except perhaps in the case of higher education. While recognizing that Governments had met some difficulties in abolishing discriminatory practices, these representatives urged that immediate action should be taken to abolish racial discrimination wherever it occurred.

41. The representative of the United Kingdom once again affirmed that his Government rejected any idea of the inherent superiority of one race over the another, and that its policy offered a future in which all the peoples of the Territories under its administration would play a full part as citizens in the countries where they lived, and in which feelings of race would be submerged in loyalty to new nations. When the Committee took up item 6 of its agenda, he and the representative of Australia informed the Committee of further measures which had been taken to improve race relations since the end of the period covered by the Progress Report.<sup>7</sup>

42. Several non-Administering Members emphasized the primary importance of education in preparing the people for self-government and expressed their satisfaction that the educational goals of the Administering Members<sup>8</sup> corresponded closely to the broad objectives laid down by the General Assembly in resolution 743 (VIII) of 27 November 1953. The representatives of Argentina, Brazil, Ghana and Ceylon all noted the advances made since 1946. The representatives of Ceylon and India, while recognizing that at the beginning of the period there was little or no education in many of the Territories, pointed out that at the end of the period covered by the Progress Report, with the exception of the United States and New Zealand Territories, where education had been free and universal for several years, universal free and compulsory education was still beyond the reach of the majority of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Papua was the only Territory in which primary education was free in both government and missionary schools. Pointing out that according to UNESCO, the ratio of primary enrolment is satisfactory when it is 50 per cent of the number of children of school age or above, they observed that, with the exception of the United States Territories and the United Kingdom Caribbean Territories, few Territories had reached this standard. The slow development could no longer be attributed to the apathy of the people since the information showed that the demands for education now generally exceeded the facilities available. Secondary education in most Territories was also inadequate compared with the secondary to primary enrolment ratio for the world as a whole, and facilities for technical and vocational education fell far short of the needs of the people. The representatives of Ceylon and India stressed that, at the level of higher education, it was important to develop universities and other institutions in the Territories to bring higher training within the reach of a greater number of people. They urged that much greater efforts should be made to remove discriminatory measures in education in those Territories and at those levels where they still existed and to satisfy the peoples' need and hunger for education. They suggested that education should be undertaken as an integral part of development programmes.

43. The representative of Australia pointed out that educational policy should be so directed that it endeavoured, while achieving its technical objectives, to blend as far as possible the best features of indigenous culture with those of a modern civilization, so that when the peoples were able to manage their own affairs they would regard themselves as having common bonds which transcended traditional social differences.

44. The representative of Ghana stressed that the educational system should be planned to produce the kind of indigenous leaders needed by the Territories both before and after self-government. He and the representatives of Brazil and India all emphasized the importance of the active participation of the inhabitants in the formulation and administration of educational programmes and policies. The rapid advances made in the provision of education after Territories had become independent or self-governing showed what could be done where the peoples themselves were allowed to assume responsibility.

45. In connexion with the figures given in the UNESCO report, the representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that only in recent years had the concept of education as an investment gained ground. Within the last few years, and since the end of the period covered by the Progress Report, this change in attitude had been reflected in the rising rate of increase in primary school enrolment. He did not share the view that the provision of universal compulsory primary education should be given overriding importance: it was essential that there should be a balanced development of the educational system.

46. During the discussion of the Progress Report, the representatives of the specialized agencies affirmed that, if requested, their organizations were ready to provide assistance in their respective fields to the Territories. Several representatives suggested that wider use should be made of regional and international co-operation as well as of the assistance made available by the United Nations and the specialized agencies including that under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance.

47. At the 223rd meeting of the Committee, the Chairman of the sub-committee introduced its draft report containing observations and conclusions on the Progress Report." He explained that the text had been unanimously approved by the sub-committee as a whole as representing a consensus. There were, however, many passages which, taken separately, did not fully reflect the views of individual delegations and even some on which members might have reservations. He hoped that the Committee would accept the text as a whole with this understanding.

48. The representatives of Australia and the United Kingdom stated that while they had reservations on certain passages which were compromises between opposing views, they would support the text of the observations and conclusions as a whole. The representative of Australia said his support was without prejudice to the views previously expressed by his delegation on various aspects of the Committee's work. The representative of India stated that all the observations and conclusions did not necessarily fully reflect the views of his delegation, but these were an excellent compromise between differing approaches and he would support the draft reports prepared by the sub-committee.

49. The representative of Australia suggested an addition to paragraph 52 of document A/AC.35/L.324/Add.1 to clarify the vocational and technical training situation in Papua. This addition was accepted by the Committee.

50. At the same meeting, by a vote of 12 to none, with 1 abstention, the Committee approved as a whole the observations and conclusions on the Progress Report as contained in documents A/AC.35/L.324 and Add.1-3, as amended, for submission to the General Assembly at its fifteenth session.

51. The representative of France stated that his delegation held the view that the examination of the progress achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be based solely on the information transmitted under Article 73 e. The General Survey contained in the Progress Report and the observations and conclusions drawn up by the sub-committee included references to political conditions which were beyond the competence of the Committee, and he had therefore abstained in the vote.

VII. Economic conditions

52. At its eleventh session, in accordance with the programme of work established by General Assembly resolution 1332 (XIII), the Committee gave special attention to economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In response to General Assembly resolution 745 (VIII) of 27 November 1953, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States had included economic experts in their delegations.

53. The Committee had before it special studies prepared by the Secretariat and by the specialized agencies. Because the Committee had to examine a great variety of information on economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories as part of the Progress Report, the Secretariat submitted to this session reports on the influence of terms of trade on the economy of the Territories,<sup>10</sup> money and central banking systems<sup>11</sup> and balance of payments.<sup>12</sup> In addition, the ILO prepared for the Committee a report on the productivity of labour,<sup>13</sup> and FAO contributed a preliminary survey on the transition of subsistence to market agriculture.<sup>14</sup>

54. The Committee discussed economic conditions from its 210th to its 216th meetings, inclusive. The representatives of Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Ceylon, Ghana, India, Iraq, Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States all took part in the discussion. As already indicated in paragraph 9 above, the Committee, in accordance with its usual practice, requested the sub-committee, appointed at its 207th meeting, to draw up a special report on economic conditions covering the 1955-1958 period.

55. Several representatives pointed out the difficulty of generalizing about conditions in so many Non-Self-Governing Territories, which differed widely in size, natural resources and phase of development. The representatives of Australia, the Netherlands and New Zealand stated that many of the problems discussed in the papers before the Committee were not pertinent to the Territories under the administration of their Governments.

56. The representative of Australia said that the trade pattern in Papua was typical of other under-developed Territories with limited resources. An adverse trade balance, however, did not necessarily mean that the economic policies were unsound, since it might indicate a heavy inflow of equipment and other material needed for development. Over the period 1957-1959, there had been a steady rise in the value of exports, which reflected a real increase in the volume of production in Papua. The Territory still had a substantial trade deficit, which was covered by grants from Australia. Although Papua was economically dependent on Australia, this relationship enabled the Territory to benefit from access to a stable market close at hand, favourable tariff terms and protective duties to assist local industries. Since 1955, further steps had been taken to raise the standard of living of the people through measures to increase the efficiency of Papuan agriculture, widen the variety of subsistence production, and gradually expand the production of cropping for sale, particularly through the expansion of agricultural extension services. It was the policy of his Government to help the Papuans increase their share in the economic life of the Territory, and one indication of progress in this direction was the steady development of co-operatives and co-operative marketing. The Government also provided financial assistance to indigenous organizations and individuals to enable them to participate more widely in production, and agricultural extension programmes with special emphasis on agricultural training had been accelerated and intensified.

57. The representative of the Netherlands also observed that the deficit of the balance of trade of Netherlands New Guinea reflected the extent to which that Territory was under-developed. Imports included a wide range of products, two-thirds of which were consumer goods representing about a third of the value of imports, while exports were limited to a few raw materials such as crude oil and agricultural, forest and marine products. Since 1954, however, the production of crude oil had declined, and, with the diminished activity of the oil company, imports of industrial equipment had declined steadily since 1957. The Netherlands representative described measures taken in the last few years to increase production and stimulate the export of cash crops. He also reviewed the currency and banking situation in Netherlands New Guinea and pointed out that the territorial budget consistently showed deficits which were covered by grants from the Netherlands.

58. The representative of New Zealand explained that many of the problems discussed in the documents before the Committee were not pertinent to the Cook, Niue and Tokelau Islands. These Territories had limited natural resources, no mineral deposits, and poor soils. Wherever possible, the New Zealand Government had introduced new crops and helped to increase production. The New Zealand representative described some of the measures taken to provide technical training in this direction and to meet the need for increased facilities for exporting crops, the lack of which was one of the main obstacles to the economic development of these Territories. His Government was encouraged that it was able to help the people to assume responsibility for their own affairs and to enjoy social and educational advantages similar to those in wealthier Territories.

59. The representative of the United Kingdom observed that the past three years did not have any special characteristics from an economic point of view. For the United Kingdom Territories as a whole, between 1953 and 1958 the gross domestic product at constant prices had risen by 5 to 6 per cent per annum; expenditure on gross fixed capital formation had increased by 27½ per cent in the same period. The rate of development in the individual Territories, however, depended on many factors and varied from Territory to Territory.

60. According to the stage of their development it was possible to place the United Kingdom Territories in three broad groups. A small number, including Jamaica, Trinidad and Hong Kong, had passed the "take off" point and had now reached a stage of sustained economic growth. A second group of Territories, including Kenya, Uganda, Nigeria and most of the other Territories in Africa, had good long-term prospects of achieving sustained growth but still lacked, among other things, capital and trained manpower. The third group consisted of Territories which had poor natural resources or were too small in size; the development of these Territories would have to face difficulties for many years to come.

61. The representatives of Argentina, Brazil, Ceylon, Ghana, India and Iraq observed that the information before the Committee showed that most of the Territories were still dependent on the production of a few primary products. As producers of raw materials, the Territories were vulnerable to fluctuations in the world prices of these commodities. These representatives considered it most serious that, despite the importance of terms of trade to their economy, none of the Territories possessed for any major commodity a share of world production sufficiently high to enable it to exercise some control on the market and to influence world prices. The representative of Ghana pointed out that steps taken by the Administering Members to reduce the effects of price fluctuations on the Territories by guaranteed price schemes and marketing programmes were incapable of affecting the terms of trade.

62. The representatives of Brazil and Argentina considered that the gradual deterioration in the terms of trade of the Territories was due to difficulties inherent in the economic structure of the Territories, in many of which production had been developed to meet the requirements of the metropolitan market.

63. The representative of India pointed out that the Non-Self-Governing Territories were dependent on the more advanced countries for imports needed for their development. With the inflationary trend of prices in the industrialized countries and the fluctuation of world prices in primary products, the combined price movement represented a loss in import capacity of the Territories with a consequent reduction in their terms of trade. This view was shared by the representative of Iraq.

64. The representatives of Ceylon, Ghana and India stressed the need to increase domestic production and to lessen the adverse terms of trade. They pointed out that one way to lessen the vulnerability of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to fluctuations in world prices was through international agreements for stabilizing prices of primary products. They urged the Administering Members to co-operate more widely in negotiating such agreements. They also stressed the need for greater government initiative to promote diversification of agricultural production, increase market facilities and build more roads, storage facilities and processing plants. The representative of Ghana believed that these activities could be more fruitful if they were connected with community development programmes.

65. Referring to the discussion on commodity prices, the representative of the United Kingdom said that his Government was aware of the problems that could be caused by fluctuations in commodity prices and was prepared to participate in the examination of such problems on a commodity-by-commodity basis. At present the United Kingdom was co-operating in the study of commodity problems in GATT and in the United Nations Commission on International Commodity Trade and also participated in the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement and in most of the international commodity agreements. In addition, use was made of internal price stabilization funds. He observed that an adverse trade balance on current account was not always a sign of an unbalanced economy because it was often the result of intensified, long-term investments and was a necessary feature of a developing economy.

66. The representative of the United States emphasized that economic development was a complex process which involved many factors, including the need for education and technical skills. He also pointed out that the Territories, while sensitive to fluctuations in world prices, had also sometimes benefited from these changes. He emphasized the importance of price mechanism in guiding a location of resources in the direction of optimum economic benefits. The United States, a large producer itself, was interested in inter-governmental co-operation in this area and participated in the work of the international bodies on trade and commodities: it was currently a member of the Sugar and Wheat Councils, which administered agreements, a member of all the existing commodity study groups and, since 1959, a member of the United Nations Commission on International Trade. He considered that the transition from subsistence to market agriculture in the Territories was an important aspect of economic development, because a highly productive agriculture was frequently a basic consideration in the development of other sectors of the economy.

67. The representatives of Brazil, Ceylon and India expressed concern that the currency boards system in the United Kingdom Territories was inadequate as a means of financing budgets and furthering economic development. Although the Territories had received financial aid from the United Kingdom they had also assisted the metropolitan country. These representatives emphasized the need for the establishment of central banks, especially in the more advanced Territories, to provide means of mobilizing local money resources for development and for applying a monetary policy.

68. The representative of the United States felt that the value of currency boards as against central banks as instruments in raising funds had to be determined in each case in the light of the situation of the Territory.

69. The representative of the United Kingdom pointed out that the linking of the Territories under its administration in the sterling system had been to the advantage of the Territories in that they benefited by world confidence in that currency. He explained that since 1954 territorial Governments were no longer required to have 100 per cent external cover for local currency so that each Territory could invest a proportion of its currency fund backing in local securities. While the United Kingdom provided financial assistance to the Territories, it left them free to trade wherever they wished. The information before the Committee confirmed that there was a general decrease of the Territories' economic dependence on the United Kingdom.

70. He considered that the transition from subsistence to market agriculture was one of the most important problems in under-developed areas. In the United Kingdom Territories in East and West Africa, although not enough was known of the subsistence sectors, the proportion of national output represented by subsistence production had fallen during the post-war period as a result of the expansion of the cash sector. He felt that the best way of raising the productivity of peasant agriculture was through a concerted attack on all institutional obstacles such as unsuitable systems of land tenure and the lack of credit, communications and education. This had been done, for instance, under the Swynnerton Plan in Kenya and had produced encouraging results.

71. The representative of the ILO, introducing the report prepared by his organization on productivity in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, pointed out that because of the great diversity of conditions in the Territories and the lack of statistics, the ILO had in the present report only enumerated conditions which would facilitate productivity. He informed the Committee that the ILO was prepared to provide technical assistance on request to the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the field of productivity, but as yet had not had much opportunity to do so.

72. The representative of the Netherlands said that studies made in Netherlands New Guinea showed that labour productivity varied widely from one society to another and was affected by traditional cultures. He informed the Committee of measures taken by his Government to raise productivity in that Territory through on-the-job and technical training, better education and improved social relations; a vocational training foundation had been established in this Territory in 1956.

73. The representative of India considered that the brevity of the ILO's report made it impossible to cover the subject thoroughly. The report discussed productivity mainly on the basis of industrial production and did not take into account the fact that the vast majority of inhabitants in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was engaged in subsistence agriculture, in which it was also essential to raise productivity. He pointed out that one of the obstacles to higher productivity was the lack of incentives, both in terms of financial returns and in terms of consumer goods available. Other important measures to raise productivity were increased workers' education, on-the-job training and the establishment of productivity centres. He felt that increased productivity had a direct bearing on the problem of the transition from a subsistence to a market economy. Not only was it necessary that the farmers produce a surplus above their own needs, but it was important to establish markets where they could sell their surpluses and purchase needed goods; otherwise, there would be no incentive to change from subsistence agriculture. He noted that FAO, in co-operation with the Economic Commission for Africa, was undertaking an investigation of this problem, and he expressed the hope that the results of this study would be made available to the Committee at its next session.

74. The representatives of Australia, the Netherlands and New Zealand informed the Committee of progress made in increasing the participation of indigenous inhabitants in such areas of economic activity as agricultural production and distribution, the growth of co-operative societies and the planning and execution of economic development.

75. Statements on the association of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the European Economic Community were made by the representatives of Brazil, Ceylon, Ghana, India, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom at the 212th to 216th meetings, inclusive.

76. The representative of Brazil expressed the opinion that, because the Rome Treaty<sup>15</sup> would affect large stretches of Africa, the United Nations should study the long-term effects of its provisions on the associated and non-associated Territories. The European Economic Community had now been in operation over a year, and in 1960 further measures would come into effect in the form of tariff reductions and other financial provisions. He expressed the hope—which was also expressed by the representative of Ceylon—that the Administering Members would transmit to the Secretary-General the relevant information for inclusion in the report on this subject requested by the General Assembly. He suggested that, in taking into account studies made in other organs of the United Nations, the Secretary-General should include the pertinent studies made by the ad hoc committee set up by the Economic Commission for Africa under its resolution 7 (II) on the European Economic Community.

77. The representative of Australia said that it was not possible satisfactorily to consider all the effects of the European Economic Community on Non-Self-Governing Territories without looking at the EEC provisions as a whole and at the over-all policies of countries concerned with EEC arrangements. He therefore considered that any substantial consideration of this matter could best be pursued elsewhere than in the Committee.

78. The representative of India did not agree that the Committee could not usefully discuss the effects of the European Economic Community on the Non-Self-Governing Territories; such a consideration was of importance to their economic development. He referred the Committee to General Assembly resolution 1470 (XIV) of 12 December 1959 by which, inter alia, the Committee was explicitly requested to devote in 1960 special attention to the effects of this association. He pointed out that the result of the Rome Treaty would be to direct the bulk of the trade of the associated Territories to the Community, a trend which would not be in conformity with the provisions of Article 74 of the Charter. Moreover, there was a danger that the effect of the European Economic Community would constitute a new form of collective exploitation, and it was, therefore, important for the Committee to have more information from the Administering Members concerned.

79. The representative of Ghana stated that it was important that the Committee should consider the effects of the European Economic Community on the associated and non-associated Territories. The preferential treatment set up under the EEC provisions would lead to a diversion of trade to the disadvantages of other countries and non-associated Territories, many of which derived a large part of their earnings from exports of raw materials also exported by the associated Territories to the EEC countries. On the other hand, in the long run, there was a danger of the integration of the associated Territories in the economic system of the European Economic Community which would retard their industrialization and prevent the diversification of their economies.

80. The representative of the United Kingdom expressed general agreement with the views of the representative of Ghana. His Government attached importance to the effect which the European Economic Community would have on the non-associated Territories and countries. It was his Government's view, however, that the best forum for discussion of this matter was GATT.

81. The representative of the Netherlands stated that one of the purposes of the European Economic Community was to promote the economic and social development of the associated Territories. It was, however, too soon to reach any conclusions regarding the effect on the non-associated Territories. He assured the Committee that there was no question of any "collective exploitation" in so far as the Netherlands New Guinea was concerned and this was supported by the information he had already given the Committee to the effect that the resources of that Territory covered only a small part of its general expenditure.

82. At the 223rd meeting, the Chairman of the Sub-Committee introduced the special report on economic conditions.<sup>16</sup> The representative of India introduced a draft resolution jointly sponsored with Ghana, the Netherlands and the United States of America, under which the General Assembly would: (1) take note of the special report on economic conditions; (2) invite the Secretary-General to communicate this report to Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the regional economic commissions, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned for their consideration; and (3) express its confidence that the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories would bring the report to the attention of the authorities responsible for economic development in those Territories.

83. At the same meeting, the Committee adopted the draft resolution by 12 votes to none, with 1 abstention, and submits it to the General Assembly at its fifteenth session for approval. The text of the draft resolution is annexed to this report as annex II.

VIII. Social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories

84. In accordance with its regular programme of work, the Committee, at its 217th to 219th meetings, inclusive, discussed social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories on the basis of the summaries of information for 1958 and in the light of the special reports approved by the General Assembly in 1958 and 1959. Statements were made by the representatives of Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Ceylon, Ghana, India and the United Kingdom.

85. The Committee also had before it a report on the eradication of illiteracy prepared by UNESCO.<sup>17</sup> Introducing this report, the representative of UNESCO pointed out that his organization held the view that only a massive and concentrated attack on illiteracy, making use of all teaching methods, would be likely to succeed. Moreover, an attack on illiteracy was not a matter for educators only, but required the co-operation of social workers, economists and trade-union leaders, as well as legislators, local councils, civic leaders and voluntary organizations. He informed the Committee of the recommendations made by UNESCO on the basis of its survey of educational needs in twenty-two countries and territories in tropical Africa. Among other points, UNESCO had stressed the need for a major effort to expand education, particularly at the primary stage, since education was one of the most potent instruments for economic and social progress. It had also called for increased facilities for the training of teachers and for the development of general and technical secondary education. The representative of UNESCO also informed the Committee that, among other tasks, UNESCO had been asked by the Conference of African Ministers and Directors of Education, held at Addis Ababa in February 1960, to assist in the early establishment on a regional basis of centres for the training of teachers and to provide assistance in the form of staff equipment and fellowships. He assured the Committee of the continuing co-operation of UNESCO and of further development of UNESCO's programme of action for tropical Africa.

86. The representative of Australia informed the Committee of recent progress made in education in Papua, where a thorough review of educational development had been undertaken. In 1959, the Department of Education had been reorganized into four functional divisions instead of two divisions for Papuans and non-Papuans. A new educational development plan had been approved, with the attainment of universal literacy in English as one of the main objectives. A school inspection system had been established and teacher-training programmes were being expanded. In keeping with its policy of encouraging the participation of the Papuans in the formulation and carrying out of educational plans, educational committees had been appointed in some areas and would be set up in other districts. He also described the advances made in increased school enrolment, the education of women and girls and adult education.

87. The representative of Brazil endorsed the view contained in the UNESCO report that education must be undertaken as an essential investment in the process of development. Referring to the information transmitted, he and the representative of Argentina commended the progress made in the field of education and pointed out situations where educational facilities remained inadequate. As the General Assembly had adopted four resolutions on education at its fourteenth session and had recommended that the Administering Members take all necessary steps to develop primary education in the Territories, the representative of Brazil expressed the hope that when the Committee next gave its special attention to education, it would have the satisfaction of seeing more concrete progress.

88. The representative of Iraq emphasized the importance of education in preparing the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories for independence, and urged the Administering Members, in co-operation with UNESCO, to increase the number of primary schools and to abolish illiteracy. She also emphasized the importance of education for women and girls, especially with a view to preparing them to adapt family life to the social changes resulting from the impact of modern ideas and industrialization.

89. The representative of India noted that in the information transmitted on two Territories there were statistics for African education only, which suggested that different authorities were responsible for the education of different communities. He expressed the view that all inhabitants in a Territory should be the concern of the same authority, and that it was the responsibility of the Administering Members to transmit information on European and African education so that the Committee could ascertain the ratio of expenditure for each of the population groups in the Territories.

90. The information also showed that some progress had been made in primary education, but in many areas it had been slow and uneven. The representative of India pointed out that progress over a short period of time had been most rapid in Singapore, where the people exercised greater responsibility for the management of their own affairs. This confirmed the importance of the participation of the inhabitants.

91. The representative of Ghana asked the Administering Members whether, in response to resolution 1462 (XIV), the 1959 special report on education had been transmitted by them to the authorities responsible for education in the Territories. The representatives of the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and Australia confirmed that the report had been transmitted to the competent authorities. The representative of the Netherlands stated that the report had been given the widest possible circulation.

92. The representatives of Ceylon and India commented on the slow development in the social field. The representative of India stated that this was evident from the summaries of information on many Territories which reported no significant change in respect of all or some of the following: general social conditions, human rights, status of women, standard of living, town and rural planning and housing, social facilities and welfare, cultural institutions and mass communications. He also commented on the unsatisfactory conditions concerning the labour situation and social security legislation in the Territories which he related to the slow development of the trade-union movement.

93. The representative of Ceylon considered that most of the social problems in the Non-Self-Governing Territories derived from unplanned urbanization resulting from the impact of industrialization on indigenous social patterns. He stressed that greater emphasis was needed on a co-ordinated effort in the economic, social, political and cultural fields.

94. The representative of Brazil commented on developments in the field of public health. He noted that in the majority of Territories, public health expenditure had increased somewhat, but, with the exception of a few Territories, there had been no significant addition to the hospital facilities provided. The information also showed that the ratio of doctors to population was low in all Territories. He emphasized that improvement in health conditions was essential for economic and social development and expressed the view that the Administering Members should take immediate steps to remedy the situation.

95. The representatives of Argentina, Brazil, Ceylon, Ghana, India, and Iraq expressed their concern over the continuing existence of racial discrimination in the social field and in education. They recognized that much had already been done in recent years, for example, in the West Indies and in American Samoa. They considered the conflict of interests of different racial groups one of the major problems. Practices of a discriminatory nature were now anachronistic, and vigorous action was required for their abolition. This action was the more urgent because of the rapid pace of political evolution in the Territories, particularly in Africa, and harmonious relations between peoples were essential for world stability. These representatives recalled the view expressed in the Committee in its 1958 report to the effect that the development of a common education system played a major role in the development of a common loyalty and the establishment of improved race relations. The representative of Ghana suggested a number of positive measures for the improvement of race relations. Among other measures, he suggested that the Administering Members adopt a policy of fostering closer cultural and educational exchanges between Territories with plural populations and some of the independent African States, enlist the assistance of UNESCO, and make wider use of mass media and visual aids to supplement the work of interracial committees.

96. The representative of Australia expressed the opinion that there were limits to the extent to which administrative action and regulations could provide effective solutions to the problems of race relations. He pointed out that racial discrimination was not necessarily confined to Non-Self-Governing Territories and that the termination of a country's dependent status would not always bring such discrimination to an end. In his view, these problems would only disappear through efforts covering all aspects of social relations, the education of opinion and the development of human conscience.

97. The representative of the United Kingdom referred to the dedication of his Government to the advancement of all communities in the United Kingdom Territories regardless of race, colour or creed. He pointed out that there were in some Territories practical difficulties in the way of the immediate abolition of discriminatory practices; racial discrimination was in many cases not so much a problem of relations between the people and the State as one of relations between individuals, and legislative action alone could not therefore provide the solution. Yet, in the last two years, progress had been made in legislative acts, and other steps had also been taken. He informed the Committee of the steps recently taken to open the civil services of the Territories to all races, a step to which his Government had given priority for many years, and one which required positive action in the field of training and education if it were to be fully effective in practice as well as in theory.

98. The United Kingdom representative gave some examples of the progress made. The Kenya Order in Council of 1958 had established a Council of State responsible for examining any law which might be discriminatory in character, and for advising the Government on questions of race relations; the Government of Kenya had, moreover, declared that the aim of its land policy was to secure the progressive disappearance of racial land barriers. In Northern Rhodesia, a Central Race Relations Advisory and Conciliation Committee, with district committees covering the whole Territory, had been set up to improve relations between peoples of different races, to reconcile the parties in the event of racial disputes, and to propose appropriate measures in the matter of race relations to the Government. In Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia, the system under which Africans were required to have passes for movement at night had been abolished. In Swaziland, prospecting permits had been available to all the inhabitants, without distinction as to race, since 1958.

99. The representative of India, while commending the interracial committees which had been established in some Territories in Africa, considered that the improvement of race relations could not be left to the initiative of private individuals because such methods had yielded no results. What was required were vigorous government measures. The main difficulty arose from the exercise of power exclusively or predominantly by a minority group; therefore, racial discrimination was basically a political question. He expressed the view that one of the positive measures to abolish racial discrimination was the unconditional grant of the right to vote to all on the basis of universal adult suffrage.

100. The representative of Ceylon also expressed the hope that the Administering Members would promote legislation towards abolishing discrimination in employment, land ownership and education, and authorize proceedings against persons guilty of breaking the law. He suggested that the best way to do away with racial discrimination was to make discriminatory practices a criminal offence.

IX. General questions relating to the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter

101. The Committee considered this item at its 220th and 221st meetings.

102. Under the terms of General Assembly resolution 218 (III) of 3 November 1948, the Secretary-General had prepared, for the Committee, summaries of information transmitted by the Administering Members for the years 1958 and 1958/1959.<sup>18</sup> Some of these had not been distributed because of the lateness of the receipt of the information from Administering Members. The Committee also had before it a report prepared by the Secretariat on the dates of receipt of the information transmitted under Article 73 e.<sup>19</sup>

103. The representatives of Ceylon and India commented on the delays in the transmission of information by the Administering Members. They recalled that, under General Assembly resolution 218 (III), the Administering Members were requested to transmit to the Secretary-General the most recent information at their disposal "as early as possible and at the latest within a maximum period of six months following the expiration of the administrative year in the Non-Self-Governing Territories concerned". They and the representative of

Ghana pointed out the delay in the receipt of information on the Belgian Congo,<sup>20</sup> the New Hebrides, and several Territories under United Kingdom Administration. The representative of Ghana considered that the progress which the Territories in the French Community had so far made, though commendable, did not constitute a state of affairs that exempted the Government of France from the obligation to transmit information and that France should continue to transmit information on all the Territories under its administration until they were fully self-governing.

104. At the 205th meeting of the Committee, the representative of India pointed out that information on certain Territories was missing and asked for an explanation on the situation in respect of the Christmas Islands. The representative of Australia informed the Committee that this matter was under consideration by his Government.

105. The representative of India also pointed out that although the United Kingdom Government had agreed that the present constitutional status of Malta rendered this Territory subject to obligations under Chapter XI of the Charter, no information had as yet been received. In his view, the cessation and subsequent resumption of the transmission of information on Malta raised the question whether autonomy based on a constitution which could be unilaterally revoked by the former Administering Member could be considered "full self-government" as set forth in the Charter.

106. The representative of France recalled that at the fourteenth session of the General Assembly his delegation had stated that the question of cessation of transmission of information by France was closed. As regards the information on the New Hebrides, he expressed his regret at the delay and informed the Committee that the information was expected to reach the Secretary-General within a matter of days.<sup>21</sup> The representative of the United Kingdom assured the Committee that his Government would do its utmost to speed up the transmission of information on the Territories under its administration and stated that the United Kingdom proposed to transmit information on Malta for the period beginning 1 May 1959.

107. The representatives of Ceylon, Ghana and India noted that Portugal continued to refuse to comply with the provisions of Article 73 e of the Charter. They expressed the hope that the process of liberation going on in Africa would induce the Portuguese Government to change its attitude soon. The representatives of Ceylon and Ghana also expressed the hope that Spain would fulfil its undertaking made before the General Assembly to transmit information under Article 73 e on the Spanish territories.

108. The representative of Brazil pointed out that, by resolution 1467 (XIV) of 12 December 1959, the General Assembly had decided that it would be desirable to enumerate the principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit information called for in Article 73 e and had set up an ad hoc committee to assist it in this study. He therefore considered that it was inappropriate for the Committee on Information to discuss the question of the transmission of information on the Portuguese Territories. The representative of the United Kingdom also stated that he did not consider that the affairs of Portugal and Spain, or any other matter not within its scope, should be considered by the Committee. The representatives of Ceylon, Ghana and India maintained that the appointment by the General Assembly of a special committee should not prevent the Committee on Information from being concerned with the problems of transmission of information concerning Territories administered by Portugal and Spain.

109. In addition to commenting on the questions arising from delays in the transmission of information and from the absence of information, several representatives also commented on the general content of the information. The representatives of Ceylon and India considered that the Committee needed more comprehensive information to enable it to study various questions and to formulate more precise conclusions and recommendations. The representative of India recommended the Governments of the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United States for the voluntary transmission of political information. He recalled that General Assembly resolution 1468 (XIV) of 12 December 1959 had again invited Members to transmit voluntarily political information concerning the Territories under their administration; he expressed the hope that those Administering Members who had not provided such information would accept the latest invitation of the General Assembly to do so.

110. The representative of Ceylon recalled the terms of General Assembly resolution 1466 (XIV) of 12 December 1959 on the participation of indigenous inhabitants in the work of the Committee and expressed the hope that the Administering Members would increasingly include such persons in their delegations.

X. International collaboration in respect of economic, social and educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories

111. The Committee discussed this item at its 221st and 222nd meetings. Statements were made by the representatives of the ILO, FAO, UNESCO, WHO and by the representatives of Australia, Brazil, India, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States.

112. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 220 (III) of 3 November 1948, the Secretariat submitted a report containing information on decisions taken by the Economic and Social Council and on studies made under the auspices of that body which were of particular interest to Non-Self-Governing Territories, covering the period March 1959 to February 1960.<sup>22</sup> In addition, the Committee had before it a report on the activities of WHO in Non-Self-Governing Territories<sup>23</sup> and an account of international collaboration for the economic, social and educational advancement of the Territories since the establishment of the United Nations, contained in the General Survey<sup>24</sup> forming part of the Progress Report.

113. The representative of the ILO, in response to the wish of the Committee at its tenth session, reported in some detail on the conclusions adopted by the African Advisory Committee of the ILO at its first session held in November-December 1959, more particularly as regards joint consultation between employers and workers and vocational and technical training. The Advisory Committee had emphasized, inter alia, that employers and workers must have the right, without distinction and without previous authorization, to establish or join organizations of their own choosing in accordance with the provisions of the ILO Conventions concerning freedom of association and protection of the right to organize and bargain collectively adopted in 1948 and 1949. It had reached a substantial measure of agreement on the general principles which should guide the further development of vocational and technical education in Africa at the present time, particularly the need for a solid basis of general education comprising: proficiency in the language used in training and employment; mathematics, science and other subjects of importance to life in a modern technical society; and initial training in manual skills. The Advisory Committee also stressed the importance of training in agricultural techniques and rural handicrafts, and of improving the output of experienced and qualified supervisors through "training within industry" schemes and other methods. In all these efforts, it would be desirable to associate employers' and workers' representatives with the relevant consultative bodies. Vocational and technical training and relations between employers and workers would be discussed in greater detail at the first African Regional Conference of the ILO which would be convened in December 1960 and include countries from all parts of the continent; in addition, the general discussion on the Director-General's report would pay particular attention to programmes of workers' education. The ILO representative also informed the Committee that an International Institute for Labour Studies had recently been established by the ILO in order to promote better understanding of labour problems and ways of solving them: this development would be of particular significance to under-developed countries, including the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Although there was no constitutional provision for associate membership in the ILO, tripartite delegations from Non-Self-Governing Territories had participated to an increasing extent as observers at sessions of the International Labour Conference, as well as in the regional conferences and meetings of industrial committees and similar bodies on the invitation of the Governing Body of the ILO.

114. The representative of FAO informed the Committee of some of the activities of his organization which had an important bearing on the problems of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in Africa. FAO had, for instance, assembled documentation on the world's land resources, on soil and land use in tropical regions, and on shifting cultivation. It had also assembled documentation on world forest resources. As examples of the work of FAO relating to the control of animal and plant diseases, he mentioned the work of the Inter-African Bureau of Epizootic Diseases, work under the International Plant Protection Convention, the opening in 1958 of a FAO office at Addis Ababa to co-ordinate desert locust control activities in East Africa, and the organization of livestock disease control campaigns in Africa. He also described some of the work of FAO in the field of nutrition, the organization of training centres to study and demonstrate improved techniques for agricultural services, and the technical assistance rendered by FAO to individual Territories in Africa, Asia and the Caribbean regions, as well as to the regional commissions. Because of the growing importance of Africa, in 1959, FAO had established a regional office for Africa at Accra, and two sub-regional offices, one of which would be at Rabbat; the site of the second had not yet been determined. FAO was also co-operating closely with the Economic Commission for Africa and had established a joint agriculture division at the Commission's headquarters.

115. The representative of UNESCO supplemented his previous statement<sup>25</sup> with information on some of the more recent activities of his organization of particular interest to the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In 1959, UNESCO had conducted an inquiry into educational opportunities for women in tropical Africa and had made a survey of the social and economic factors favouring or hindering the education of women. As had been done in the case of the survey of the educational needs of tropical Africa, the results of this inquiry would be placed before a meeting of experts to be held in May 1960 to which a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories would be invited. Other meetings held in 1959 included an international meeting of experts organized jointly by Belgium and UNESCO to draw up general principles of technical and vocational education applicable to Africa, and a seminar held in Khartoum in November 1959 to study methods of making available the educational statistics and other data necessary for improved planning of educational expansion in Africa. He assured the Committee that, as the Administering Members increased their requests for assistance and more Territories became associate members, UNESCO would increase its activities in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

116. The representative of WHO introduced the report submitted by his organization. Because experience had shown that the regional and inter-regional programmes in the Non-Self-Governing Territories had proved effective and economical, such projects had been increased during 1959. Much of the work of WHO in the Non-Self-Governing Territories related to campaigns against communicable disease and to the promotion of, and assistance in, the training of health personnel, the strengthening of public health services, and the organization and co-ordination of surveys. He gave the Committee a brief account of some of the work of WHO on malaria, leprosy, bilharziasis and smallpox in Africa, and the assistance it provided in the training of personnel.

117. The representative of Australia, the United Kingdom and the United States informed the Committee of the participation of their Governments in international, interregional, regional and bilateral programmes of co-operation. The representative of Australia considered that international co-operation could not be estimated solely on the basis of the number of projects. The value of such co-operation often could not be expressed in any precise way. International collaboration in respect of the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be regarded primarily as a supplement to the efforts of the Administering Members, and the progress should not be judged only by what remained to be done. He expressed the appreciation of his Government to the specialized agencies and, more particularly, to WHO. He also reviewed briefly the part played by Australia in the South Pacific Commission and in the Colombo Plan in providing assistance to other Territories in the region, and described the co-operation between Australia and the Netherlands in New Guinea.

118. The representative of the United Kingdom gave the Committee an account of the participation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories under its administration as associate members in the work of FAO, ITU, IMCO, UNESCO, WHO and the regional economic commissions of the United Nations, and, on the invitation of the Governing Body, in the work of the ILO as observers. He informed the Committee that the United Kingdom had sponsored the application of the West Indies and British Guiana for associate membership in the Economic Commission for Latin America at its forthcoming session. He also expressed the appreciation of his Government to the specialized agencies, the United States, Canada and the regional commissions in Africa, the Caribbean and the South Pacific for their assistance to Territories under United Kingdom administration. The United Kingdom Territories, he said, benefited from many of the projects undertaken by the specialized agencies supplementary to measures undertaken by regional bodies and by the United Kingdom. These formed part of a general plan of development and confirmed the view of his Government that the Non-Self-Governing Territories had every right to apply for international technical assistance on equal terms with independent States. He informed the Committee that in 1959 the United Kingdom Government had increased its contribution to the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance and to the Special Fund, which had approved three projects submitted for Territories under United Kingdom administration: the establishment of a faculty of engineering at the University College of the West Indies; a survey of a dam site on the River Niger in Nigeria; and a survey of the silting of the Demerara River in British Guiana.

119. The representative of the Netherlands assured the Committee that his Government welcomed and continued to promote international collaboration as a means of advancing the development of Netherlands New Guinea. He acknowledged with appreciation the assistance which that Territory had received from the specialized agencies, and referred to international co-operation in the South Pacific Commission. He also gave the Committee a brief account of the co-operation of his Government with the Government of Australia.

120. The representative of the United States referred to the participation of his Government in many co-operative economic programmes as well as to the United States bilateral programmes. As examples of some of the more recent action taken by his Government, he cited the support given and the contributions made by the United States to the Special Fund to the International Development Fund, and to the expansion of the resources of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund. He also told the Committee of the study and training facilities offered by his Government to the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories through the International Educational Exchange Service (IEES) and the International Cooperation Administration (ICA). Under the IEES, grants were given mostly to students at the graduate level, teachers, university lecturers, research scholars, recognized leaders in various spheres, and professional men and women. Under the ICA programme, a considerable number of annual grants were made to students from the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In addition to the government programmes, during the school year 1958-1959, approximately 1,200 students from the Territories had been enrolled in private institutions in the United States, many of them with financial assistance from the institutions themselves, from privately endowed funds or from religious and other organizations. It was the hope of the United States Government that the assistance provided would play an important part in facilitating the advancement of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories towards management of their own affairs.

121. The representative of Brazil commented on the report submitted by the Secretariat<sup>28</sup> and stated that the decisions and studies made by the Economic and Social Council should be taken into account by the Administering Members in the interest of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He expressed his delegation's satisfaction that the Economic Commission for Africa was to undertake a study on the impact of the European Economic Community on African trade in general. He paid tribute to the work of the specialized agencies and took note of the statements made by the Administering Members on the importance they attached to co-operation with these organizations. He hoped that this co-operation would be increased in the future.

122. The representative of India expressed his satisfaction that the Committee had been given an account of various forms of collaboration both with the United Nations and specialized agencies, and between Member States, such as the Colombo Plan. He hoped that the Committee would be kept informed of all forms of collaboration for the advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In this connexion, he suggested that it should make use also of information provided by many of the non-governmental organizations whose work related to Non-Self-Governing Territories.

123. He acknowledged the value of the work done by the specialized agencies and pointed out that the needs of the Territories were constantly growing and that there was much more to be done through co-operative efforts. As examples of such problems, he mentioned the elimination of the tsetse fly in tropical Africa, the dissemination of information on the United Nations, and questions of international commodity price agreements, and suggested that in areas where community development existed, all the specialized agencies could co-operate in promoting such programmes. He observed that his Government considered the provision of fellowships and scholarships to inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories an important form of international collaboration, and had made available a number of scholarships with emphasis on technical training. He expressed the hope that the more prosperous nations would increase their help in this field.

124. The representative of Iraq also paid tribute to the work of the specialized agencies and welcomed the action of the United Kingdom in associating its Territories in the work of the specialized agencies and regional commissions. She also referred to the importance of the work being performed in the Non-Self-Governing Territories by non-governmental organizations. She agreed that the progress achieved should not be judged by what remained to be done, but she expressed the view that experience had shown that events did not wait on the rate of development, and that the speed with which different Territories were achieving independence was the underlying reason for the oft-repeated demand for more to be done. The refusal of new countries to continue to use the services of experts and administrators from the former Administering Member could be explained partly by the fact that under their administration development had been too slow.

XI. Future work of the Committee

125. The Committee discussed this question at its 222nd meeting on the basis of a working paper prepared by the Secretariat.<sup>27</sup> In accordance with General Assembly resolutions 333 (IV) of 2 December 1949 and 1332 (XIII) of 12 December 1958, the Committee, at its twelfth session, will give special attention to social conditions, and the Secretariat paper proposed a number of topics on which reports would be submitted to the Committee for discussion.

126. The representative of India observed that the Secretariat paper, which followed the pattern of the Committee's work in previous years, contained useful suggestions; however, he expressed some doubt as to the usefulness of continuing the practice of previous years whereby the Committee discussed one aspect of social development and drew up general conclusions which were inapplicable to any particular Territory. The Committee had already laid down the principles and objectives of social development and should now endeavour to ascertain the extent to which progress had been made in their implementation. He suggested that the Committee, instead of studying aspects of social development in all Non-Self-Governing Territories, should concentrate its attention on conditions in a group of Territories in a given region or in a number of selected Territories in different regions. He pointed out that groups of Territories were situated in geographical regions and these Territories were linked together in a community of interests and problems. Under its existing terms of reference, the Committee was not debarred from formulating recommendations on groups of Territories.

127. Commenting on the topics proposed in the working paper, he questioned whether there were new developments for a study on juvenile delinquency. He suggested that, instead of a study on the theories of race relations, the Secretariat should prepare for the Committee a factual paper covering existing discriminatory legislation, the policies laid down and practices applied in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In the field of labour, he considered that labour-management relations did not have much relevance in the context of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and suggested that the Committee should study the growth and development of trade unions in a few properly selected Territories and other related subjects, including actual developments in, and provisions for, social security in all its aspects, the relevant legislation, and the relationship of wages to the cost of living. He also suggested that the Secretariat should prepare: (1) a study based on exhaustive information on a limited number of community development projects in different regions; and (2) a comprehensive report on health conditions. He invited the co-operation of WHO in the preparation of the latter report, which he emphasized should not again review the problems on which the Committee had already expressed its views in previous years, but should instead show the new measures taken and the results achieved. The studies undertaken should be marked by a practical and factual approach showing actual developments, and should not engage any further in stating principles and objectives in general terms; at the present stage of the Committee's work what was needed were studies in depth and not broad general studies. A comparative and intensive study of selected aspects of social conditions in a group of Territories situated in a particular region would benefit the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and the work of the Committee would gain in practical effectiveness. He also suggested that the status of women in the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be examined by the Committee every year, and that a study should be undertaken by the Secretariat, UNESCO and, in particular, the ILO, because information on the situation regarding women wage earners in the Territories would be desirable.

128. The representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom considered that the method suggested by the representative of India would restrict the scope of the information made available to the Committee. They pointed out that the expression "race relations", as an example, was more inclusive than the term "discrimination", and that trade-union activities was but one aspect of the more comprehensive subject of labour-management relations. The representative of the United Kingdom further pointed out that because different delegations approached problems in different ways, sufficient information should be given to provide a balanced view. He suggested that the Secretariat should be left free to make the most useful possible study of each of the subjects proposed in the working paper and should not be asked to confine itself to illustrations from selected Territories. The representative of the United Kingdom supported the Indian suggestion for the study of the status of women but did not agree that a study on juvenile delinquency should be excluded, since factors such as urban growth or changes in employment patterns would have altered between 1958 and 1961.

129. The representatives of the Netherlands and Australia agreed that the procedure adopted by the Committee heretofore had enabled delegations to bring out those aspects that they found particularly important. The representative of Australia questioned whether there was in the suggestion of the representative of India an implication that the Committee should approach its next year's work from a different point of view. In his view, the procedures adopted by the Committee should not be modified, and the Secretariat should prepare the studies on the basis suggested in the working paper.

130. The representatives of Brazil, Ghana and Iraq supported in principle the views expressed by the representative of India concerning the method and approach of the Committee to the examination of the information. The representatives of Brazil and Ghana considered that the study on race relations should provide comprehensive information on discriminatory legislation and administrative practices as well as on anti-discriminatory legislation and measures to improve race relations. The representative of Ghana also shared the view that more comprehensive information was needed on some of the other aspects of social conditions, such as trade-union activities and community development, which were of particular interest to his delegation. He agreed that it was difficult to make generalizations on community development embracing over fifty Territories and that an examination of the actual working of six examples, for instance, which had been carefully selected and not chosen to illustrate preconceived ideas, would make the work of the Committee more effective.

131. In reply to the representative of Australia, the representative of India emphasized that he was not suggesting a reorientation of the Committee's methods of work. His proposal had been made to help the Committee study realistically and more effectively the various aspects of developments in a particular field.

132. The Committee agreed to the programme of work outlined in the working paper, A/AC.35/L.320, with the understanding that the Secretariat, in preparing the studies and in collaboration with the specialized agencies, wherever appropriate, would take into account the views expressed by the members of the Committee.

OBSERVATIONS AND CONCLUSIONS ON THE REPORT ON PROGRESS IN THE NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

A. Introduction and general survey

I. INTRODUCTION

1. By its resolution 1461 (XIV) of 12 December 1959, the General Assembly requested the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to examine at its eleventh session the report prepared by the Secretary-General in collaboration with the specialized agencies concerned, in accordance with resolution 1053 (XI) of 20 February 1957, on the progress which had taken place in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the fields on which information had been transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations since its establishment.<sup>1</sup> The Committee was asked to examine the Progress Report with a view to ascertaining the progress made by the inhabitants of the Territories in the light of the objectives set forth in Chapter XI of the Charter; to submit its observations and conclusions to the General Assembly at its fifteenth session in order to assist the Assembly in its examination of the Report; and, in so doing, to be guided by the terms of all relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, in particular resolutions 932 (X) of 8 November 1955 and 1053 (XI) constituting the basic resolutions for the preparation of the Report, as well as by the provisions of Chapter XI.

2. During its eleventh session, from 23 February to 12 April 1960, the Committee—consisting of seven Administering Members, namely, Australia, Belgium, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and the United States of America, and an equal number of non-administering Members, namely, Argentina, Brazil, Ceylon, the Dominican Republic, Ghana, India and Iraq—held a general debate on the Progress Report and appointed a sub-committee composed of the representatives of Brazil, Ghana, India, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States,<sup>2</sup> to draft the observations and conclusions to be submitted to the General Assembly in the terms of resolution 1461 (XIV) referred to above. These were drafted by the sub-committee and adopted by the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories at its 223rd meeting on 12 April 1960. The Committee gratefully acknowledges the assistance received by it and its sub-committee from the representatives of the specialized agencies, namely, the ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO in the examination of the Progress Report.

3. The present report should be read in conjunction with the Progress Report itself. The period covered by the Progress Report is, in general, from 1946 to 1957. In some instances, however, the final year is 1956; in a few others mention is made of developments after 1957 on which official information was available at the time of the preparation of the Report and which appeared to warrant reference. Reference is occasionally made, in the Report itself and in these observations and conclusions, to conditions in certain former Non-Self-Governing Territories which have passed outside the scope of Chapter XI; these references relate only to the years in which information on them was transmitted by the Administering Members, and do not in any way constitute any reflection of existing conditions.

II. GENERAL SURVEY

4. The most striking facts of a general nature which emerge from a study of the Progress Report are: first, the very large proportion of the world's population which, at the time of the founding of the United Nations, was still in a dependent status; secondly, the fact that most Non-Self-Governing Territories remained, during the period under review, under-developed in economic and social terms; thirdly, the fact that approximately one-half of the more than 200 million people concerned were able to demonstrate during the period their capacity to govern themselves; fourthly, the fact that by the end of the period there remained well over 100 million people who, inhabiting Territories recognized as non-self-governing within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter, were by definition politically dependent on other countries; fifthly, the substantial progress which most of these achieved in the economic, social and educational fields; and finally, the extent to which the achievements of the period fell short of the needs of the inhabitants of these Territories.

5. The establishment of the United Nations coincided with a period of profound transformation in Asia, and, when the time came in 1946 to devise procedures for the implementation of Chapter XI of the Charter, many millions of the formerly dependent peoples had already become independent. In a world populated by less than 2,500 million people, there remained at that time approximately 250 million dependent people who comprised for the most part the inhabitants of colonies, protectorates, overseas possessions and mandated Territories in Africa, South East Asia, the Caribbean area and the Pacific Ocean. In 1946 and afterwards, the provisions of Chapter XI came to be regarded as applicable to the great majority of these.

6. The first enumeration of Non-Self-Governing Territories other than those under the International Trusteeship System was established in 1946. At that time, eight Members of the United Nations who, in the terms of Article 73, "have or assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government", began to transmit information, or indicated their intention of doing so, on a total of seventy-four Territories. Of these, forty-three were under United Kingdom administration; sixteen (including two African federations, comprising twelve territories, and Indo-China, comprising three States) were under French administration; seven were administered by the United States; three by the Netherlands; two by New Zealand; and one each by Australia, Belgium and Denmark.<sup>3</sup>

7. Very rough estimates placed the total population of the Territories in 1946 at 215 million, of which more than 115 million inhabited Non-Self-Governing Territories in South-East Asia and the Pacific Ocean, more than 93 million lived in Territories in Africa and adjacent islands and nearly 6 million in the Caribbean area. These were the physical dimensions, so to speak, of the sacred trust referred to in Article 73 of the Charter, in terms of people and geography.

8. The Territories varied greatly in size and population and also, as the information transmitted on them showed, in the ethnic origins of their peoples, in the nature and degree of development of their economic resources, and in the rate and stage of their general advancement. The largest concentrations were in the tropical zones of Africa and South-East Asia. The Territories in Africa and adjacent waters covered the greater part of the continent other than the north-eastern and extreme southern sections. Those in Asia included the large Territories of Indo-China, Malaya and the Netherlands Indies with a total population estimated at more than 100 million people. For the most part, the Territories were seriously under-developed, their peoples largely dependent on subsistence agriculture and inadequately served by facilities for education and medical care.

9. The expansion after 1946 of the membership of the United Nations did not lead to any other areas being declared, by the Member States responsible for their administration, to be non-self-governing within the meaning of the Charter. On this point, some members of the Committee have from time to time drawn attention to the situation of some 12 million Africans and Asians under the administration of Portugal and Spain to whom, in their opinion, the provisions of Chapter XI are equally applicable and who represent an issue of great magnitude to which the General Assembly should address itself without delay. The opinion was expressed by other delegations that this matter did not come within the scope of the examination of the Progress Report.

10. On the other hand—and this was the most significant feature of the period—the number of Non-Self-Governing Territories recognized as such, and above all the total number of non-self-governing peoples, had been considerably diminished by the end of the period. The number of Territories fell from seventy-four to fifty-five and the aggregate of population from approximately 215 million to approximately 113 million, a figure which includes a natural population increase in the remaining Territories of some 22 million over the period. In particular, the total number of Asian and Pacific peoples identified as belonging to Non-Self-Governing Territories was reduced from more than 113 million to less than 14 million. By the end of the period, the continent of Africa contained the last great groups of peoples, totalling some 96 million, whose political status had yet to be finally determined.

11. The Progress Report notes that by far the most important factor in these changes in the geographical and human scope of the practical application of Chapter XI was the emergence of peoples either to independence and statehood or to a full measure of self-government which led to the recognition by the General Assembly that the provisions of the Chapter no longer applied to them. Of particular interest to the United Nations was the fact that from six former Non-Self-Governing Territories emerged seven independent States, three of them in Africa and four in Asia, which became Members of the United Nations. These new States, together with Viet-Nam, accounted for a very large majority of the peoples to whom Chapter XI ceased to apply. Four other Territories (Greenland, Puerto Rico, Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles) acceded to forms of self-government in association with the Members which had administered them and under conditions recognized by the General Assembly as justifying a change of status in relation to the Charter. The transmission of information on the remaining Territories no longer being reported on, nine in number, ceased after constitutional changes or other developments took place which were explained to the General Assembly by the Administering Members concerned. In the case of one of these, Malta, the Administering Member stated in 1959 that transmission of information would be resumed because the constitutional considerations which had prevented it no longer applied. The representative of India, while welcoming the intention of the United Kingdom Government to resume the transmission of information on Malta, felt that the Assembly might wish to give attention to the larger constitutional issues posed by this case: in particular, whether the cessation of information would be justified on constitutional grounds when the Administering Member concerned retained the power to withdraw or revoke the constitution, or whether cessation should take place at all before the achievement on a lasting basis of a full measure of self-government by the Territory concerned.

12. At the end of the period, as noted earlier, the inhabitants of the remaining Non-Self-Governing Territories still constituted the substantial total of well over 100 million people. Since then, the Republic of Guinea has attained independence and become a Member of the United Nations. The General Assembly, in accordance with its resolution on factors and the other procedures relating to the transmission of information, has approved the cessation of the transmission of information on Alaska and Hawaii, both Territories having achieved a full measure of self-government. In connexion with the future status of a Trust Territory, the Assembly has also been apprised of the impending independence in 1960 of the Federation of Nigeria, in population the largest of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee is also aware of the likelihood of similar events taking place shortly in other parts of Africa.

13. A number of the Administering Members made it possible during the period, by voluntarily transmitting information on government, for the Committee to observe the development in their Territories of political institutions and activities as part of the process of promoting self-government. Information of this kind was submitted by the Netherlands concerning the Netherlands Indies as a whole before the independence of Indonesia and on Netherlands New Guinea thereafter, as well as on Surinam and the Antilles until they achieved self-government; by the United States on Puerto Rico, Alaska and Hawaii before self-government, and also on Guam, American Samoa and the United States Virgin Islands; by Denmark concerning Greenland; by Australia, concerning Papua; and by New Zealand in regard to the Cook, Niue and Tokelau Islands. This information showed in all cases, although in widely varying degrees and under different constitutional forms, the establishment of institutions through which the inhabitants were able to a greater or lesser extent to participate in the management of their affairs and finally, in the cases where independence or self-government was attained by constitutional means, to determine for themselves their new political status. The territorial summaries which form part of the Progress Report give an outline of the steps taken in the direction of self-government in each of the other Territories of these Administering Members during the period under review. In some of them at the end of the period, notably in Netherlands New Guinea and Papua, governmental responsibility lay predominantly in the hands of the Administering Members concerned. In the United States and New Zealand Territories, the development of representative institutions and the movement in the direction of internal autonomy were further advanced.

14. The Territories on which political information was voluntarily transmitted represented only a small fraction of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Belgium, France and the United Kingdom, the Members responsible for the great majority of the Territories, containing by far the largest numbers of people, did not find it possible to provide information on political development as such, except in the fairly general terms of the accounts given to the Committee on Information and the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly of the policies by which the Territories were being prepared for self-government, or to the extent that the information provided by these Members reflected the participation of the inhabitants in measures for economic, social and educational advancement. The Committee has, therefore, concentrated mainly on economic, social and educational conditions and progress, without being able, for lack of political information in respect of most of the Territories, to relate the progress in these fields fully to that in the political field, or to appraise development towards self-government on the basis of constitutional changes and the evolution of political institutions.

15. The obligations undertaken by the Administering Members under Chapter XI of the Charter indicate in very broad terms the objectives to be sought; they do not define the meaning of self-government nor the level and pace of political, economic, social and educational advancement. Efforts at definition are to be found explicitly or implicitly in resolutions which the General Assembly adopted during the period in the form of recommendations or expressions of opinion as to the essential requirements of economic, social and educational progress, and in the reports of the Committee itself on developments in these fields.

16. Political dependence is by definition the common characteristic of all the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In the practical effects of this dependence there was by the end of the period, and as far as the information made available by the Administering Members enables the matter to be examined, a great deal of diversity. Diversity in the methods adopted to attain the objectives has been imposed to some extent by the varying circumstances of the Territories, and it appears also in certain respects to have reflected differences in the general policies and the constitutional structures of the Administering Members, in the sense that differing conceptions of the most desirable ultimate political status of the Territories gave rise to differences in emphasis and organization, if not in policy, in the various fields of development.

17. The political and administrative systems in different Territories varied from those having a large measure of direct control by representatives of the metropolitan Governments to those having a very large measure of territorial autonomy and of popular participation in the making and carrying out of territorial policies. By the end of the period, however, the situation was nowhere a static one; whatever might be the final status intended or desired, progressive steps leading to the devolution of powers to the inhabitants through their own political institutions and civil services or through those of countries with which the Territories were associated appeared to have become the common policy of all the Administering Members. However, differences appeared in the pace and methods of the implementation of that policy. These, in turn, were influenced by factors which varied in effect from one Territory or group of Territories to another, such as the duration and intensity of contact with the rest of the world; the objectives and organization of development in all fields; the human skills and aspirations of the peoples and the material resources available, as well as the relative position of peoples of different races in certain Territories; and assessments on the part of Administering Members of the capacity of the peoples concerned to take each new step towards self-reliance.

18. Apart from the great physical variation among the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the differences in the ethnic composition of their peoples, in their religions, customs and traditions, in their social organization and in the degree of development of the natural resources of their Territories were also important. Non-indigenous minorities were present in all the Territories: in most cases, they were small in number, consisting, apart from the officials of the metropolitan Governments, of people engaged in commerce, mining and other private enterprise and in the activities of missions. Almost everywhere, however, they occupied at the outset an economic and social position considerably higher than that of the indigenous populations. In some of the Territories where their numbers were increased by agricultural settlers, mining company staffs and urban artisans and shopkeepers, the special and often "compartmentalized" position of the non-indigenous elements in the life and affairs of the Territories was in some respects supported by legislation or administrative action as well as by established practice. In certain cases, this situation gave rise to problems of race relations which profoundly affected the development of the Territories.

19. The manner in which the Administering Members and territorial Governments applied human and material resources, during the period, to this diversity of conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in order to foster the economic, social and educational advancement of their peoples constitutes the principal theme of the Progress Report. These conditions are also relevant to the policies and measures applied to the attainment by the peoples of the Territories of a full measure of self-government. The dynamic processes which, in most cases, were stimulated in the economic, social and educational fields during the period under review, and which, indeed, were usually accompanied by a progressive transfer of responsibility on both the technical and the political planes to qualified persons and chosen representatives of the population, must be regarded as an inherent part of the development of self-government. Such processes were in fact frequently described as prerequisites of self-government, although without precise definition of the degree of advancement to be attained. It is important to note that the experience of the Territories in passing to a full measure of self-government or to independence offers no clear guide to the approximate levels of economic, social and educational advancement which need to be secured before the peoples can be recognized as ready to stand by themselves, except that in not many cases have those levels been particularly high. The information transmitted on former Territories just before they achieved self-government indicates that they made the transition under widely varying circumstances; however, the levels of their economic and social conditions tended in most cases to be low when judged by the standards of the more highly developed countries. This was evident from the data available for the years immediately preceding self-government in regard to such indices as national income, public revenue and expenditure, development reserves, the numbers of persons passing through secondary and vocational schools and institutions of higher learning and the state and strength of the public services. On the other hand, a basic infrastructure of essential services and a certain momentum of development existed, and these factors supported, to an important though indefinable degree, the progress of the peoples concerned towards full self-government or independence. In the Territories which remained non-self-governing at the end of the period, the establishment of the same kind of essential infrastructure and pace of development, without an attempt to define precisely the standards to be achieved before self-government, could be said to be the general purpose of economic, social and educational policies.

20. The organization and implementation of programmes in these fields took place within the broad framework of the general policies by which the Administering Members envisaged the discharge of their responsibility to develop self-government in the Territories. Generally speaking, two main approaches were apparent. The first envisaged the eventual attainment of independence as the general rule, and full internal self-government as the exception in cases where the small size or particular circumstances of a Territory might incline the aspiration of its people to it. The second approach was one of developing constitutional systems with a view to establishing organic links between the metropolitan and the overseas countries, and a sharing rather than a transfer of the attributes of sovereignty.

21. In the development of self-government, the progressively increasing participation of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in all aspects of the planning and management of their affairs is axiomatic. Information available in the Progress Report on the participation of the inhabitants of the Territories in managing their political affairs is limited. The nature and extent of participation by the inhabitants in the planning and execution of economic, social and educational policy is treated in some detail in subsequent pages. It may be appropriate to state at this stage that towards the end of the period under review it was the policy of all the Administering Members to encourage and assist in varying degrees the inhabitants of the Territories to play an increasingly active and responsible part in local and territorial development. The practical results achieved were uneven. During the period, many of the Territories and their peoples attained a large share in the management of their own affairs, notably as a result of the enlargement of representation in the legislative and executive branches of government and in economic, social and educational agencies and organizations, and through expanded recruitment of local personnel in the civil services at all levels. In some Territories, however, these processes either began in earnest at a relatively late stage or were applied in practice to non-indigenous elements in particular, with the result that urgent measures to prepare the people, and especially the indigenous people, more rapidly for their new responsibilities became indispensable.

22. The rate and extent of participation by the inhabitants in public affairs was necessarily a crucial factor in the success of policies and programmes of economic, social and educational development. It appeared to be universally recognized by the Administering Members that progress in all these fields depended upon popular support and understanding being secured by associating leaders of the people with the planning of measures of development and qualified local inhabitants with their implementation. Again, the increasing need for the extension of economic and social services which was characteristic of all Territories created ever-increasing demands for trained personnel which could not be met by recruitment in the metropolitan countries, and for which the only practical source of supply must be the Territories themselves. Special and increasing attention, therefore, needs to be paid to the training of local personnel for civil and technical jobs in ever-greater numbers. More complete statistical information concerning the composition and character of the territorial public services would, in the Committee's view, assist a better appraisal of progress in this matter.

23. Considering that the primary obligation of the Administering Members is to develop self-government in the Territories, the Committee welcomes the assistance which they have given in the economic, social and educational fields, thereby assisting in the achievement of self-government or independence by a number of former Territories and in the progress of others towards the same goals. It is not unmindful, however, of the fact that, in several Territories, poverty and malnutrition survive and the level of social, medical and educational services remains highly inadequate; greater efforts will therefore be called for on the part of all concerned, especially the Administering Members, to change these conditions for the better in the immediate future.

24. In this general survey and appraisal of the progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories towards self-government, the Committee has been aware of the tempo of the times and of the aspirations, in the context of today's world, of the millions of people still inhabiting dependent territories. It is aware that the trends and events which occurred at the beginning of the period, mainly in Asia, are continuing, at the present time mainly in Africa, and that these, rather than technical development, bear far more profoundly on the attainment by the peoples concerned of the objective of self-government. The aspirations of peoples towards self-government or independence have too often far outstripped the pace of their economic and social advancement for that fact to be ignored.

25. On the other hand, the Committee is also aware that the Administering Members, and others alike, seem agreed that the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are entitled in each case, and on a basis of complete equality, regardless of the differences of race, colour or creed, to complete independence, or, if they prefer, to some form of full self-government freely chosen by them, and that it will be for them to determine their future status. The Committee is confident that the knowledge that their ultimate destiny is for them to choose, will encourage the inhabitants of the Territories to multiply many times their own efforts to build a new and prosperous future for themselves during a period of smooth, constructive and purposeful transition.

III. INTERNATIONAL COLLABORATION

26. During the period under review, the Non-Self-Governing Territories were brought gradually and in widely varying degrees into the principal channels of international economic and social collaboration.

27. The general principles of this collaboration are set forth in Article 55 of the Charter, which provides for the promotion by the United Nations of, inter alia, higher standards of living, solutions of international economic and social problems, international cultural and educational co-operation and universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction; and also, in Article 73 d, which provides for co-operation by the Administering Members with each other and, where appropriate, with the specialized international bodies with a view to the practical achievement of the social, economic and scientific purposes set forth in Article 73.

28. The Economic and Social Council and its commissions have from an early date included the examination of conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories in their programmes of work. As a result of a series of initiatives by the Council and the General Assembly,<sup>4</sup> the studies undertaken by these bodies, including the regional commissions, have included information on Non-Self-Governing Territories wherever appropriate.

Such studies of particular relevance to the Non-Self-Governing Territories include the reports prepared for the Council on the world economic situation, the world social situation, international trade, financing of economic development, industrialization and productivity, community development and standards of living. Similarly, the specialized agencies have covered in many of their studies problems relating to conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. For its part, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories has, in its reports on economic, social and educational conditions, taken account of activities by the organs of the United Nations and the specialized agencies.

29. Also on the initiative of the General Assembly,<sup>5</sup> those specialized agencies whose fields of competence and activity have a particular importance for the Non-Self-Governing Territories have since 1947 collaborated closely with it, especially through the Committee on Non-Self-Governing Territories, in the examination of conditions in the Territories. The ILO, FAO, UNESCO, and WHO participate in the sessions of the Committee, not only in an advisory capacity, but also by preparing studies and reports on topics within their respective spheres of competence and by informing the Committee of services provided by them to the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

30. No procedure has so far been established for the direct participation of the Territories in the General Assembly and its subsidiary organs and accordingly, at this level, progress in devising ways in which the Territories could participate more fully in international discussions affecting them has been limited. The most that could be achieved in this respect, as far as the principal organs of the United Nations were concerned, was the occasional inclusion by some Administering Members in their delegations of representatives from their Territories—a practice often encouraged by the General Assembly.

31. By contrast, the developing regional economic activities of the United Nations, together with the constitutions of many of the specialized agencies, have provided the Territories with opportunities for much fuller participation. Some of the agencies functioning in well-defined technical fields, such as telecommunications, postal services and meteorology, have accorded full membership to Territories or groups of Territories. Those which are active in the economic, social and educational advancement of the Territories, such as WHO, UNESCO and, after the end of the period, FAO, have provided for associate membership, and the ILO has provided for participation of observer delegations in sessions of the International Labour Conference and of tripartite delegations in regional conferences; but advantage was taken of these arrangements during the period in the case of only a few Territories, in particular, some of the more highly developed Territories under United Kingdom administration. The United Nations Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East provided similar opportunities from its inception in 1947, but it was not until after the end of the period under review, with the establishment of the Economic Commission for Africa, that comparable United Nations facilities for participation in regional economic activities were available to the African Territories, although not all the Administering Members have submitted applications for associate membership for African Territories for which they are still responsible. In the case of the Economic Commission for Latin America, the similar provisions allowing for admission of Non-Self-Governing Territories were not utilized by any Territory during the period under review, although they have been recently. Outside the United Nations, regional collaboration in Africa was co-ordinated and strengthened by the Administering Members and other States concerned through the establishment of the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara (CCTA), while the Caribbean, Pacific and Asian Territories participated in the Caribbean and South Pacific Commissions and the Colombo Plan, respectively.

32. Some members of the Committee expressed the view that closer co-operation of non-governmental organizations would be of value to the objectives of the Committee's work and believed that a fuller description of the work of non-governmental organizations interested in economic, social and educational conditions in the Territories should be included in the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

33. The Committee wishes to express its appreciation to all those Members of the United Nations who, in response to General Assembly resolution 845 (IX) of 22 November 1954, adopted in the middle of the period under review, have generously offered scholarships for study in their countries to students from Non-Self-Governing Territories, and equally commends Members who extended scholarship offers to these students under their own national scholarship and fellowship schemes. It also appreciates the co-operation given by the Government of the United Kingdom in making it possible for a number of the scholarships to be taken up. The Committee notes, however, that some of the Administering Members did not find it possible to co-operate in the scheme, and that the implementation of resolution 845 (IX) has not been as successful as the Assembly no doubt desired it to be. While the steadily increasing number of applications towards the end of the period was heavily outstripping the number of offers, the actual use of scholarships was sometimes hindered by considerations other than the candidates' academic qualifications. In this connexion the Committee recalls General Assembly resolution 1471 (XIV) of 12 December 1959.

34. As early as 1948, the General Assembly indicated its awareness of the potential value of the United Nations programmes of technical assistance to the Territories by drawing the attention of the Administering Members, in resolution 220 (III), to the arrangements for technical assistance approved by the Economic and Social Council a short while previously. When the Expanded Programme was subsequently established, the General Assembly again drew attention to the United Nations facilities as a source of assistance for Non-Self-Governing Territories by inviting, in resolution 444 (V) of 12 December 1950, the Administering Members which needed technical assistance for the economic, social and educational advancement of their Territories to submit their requests under the Programme.

35. In the first eighteen months after the establishment of the Expanded Programme, only seven Territories received assistance under it at a cost of $24,000; in 1957, the number of Territories assisted was twenty-five and the cost was $649,000, but this represented only 2.5 per cent of the global cost of the Expanded Programme. The Committee is aware that the number of requests put forward and the amount of assistance made available have continued to increase after the end of the period covered by the Progress Report, but it considers that the Administering Members—on whom lay the responsibility for submitting requests on behalf of the Territories—might usefully have taken greater advantage of the programme at an earlier date; it hopes that they will do so in the future. The Committee considers that there are advantages for Territories emerging to self-government or independence in establishing familiarity with the scope and effective use of the international programmes.

36. The increase in the use of international technical assistance under the Expanded Programme in the Non-Self-Governing Territories towards the end of the period and afterwards was particularly marked in the African area. Of the Territories in that region which were non-self-governing in 1958, only one received assistance under the Expanded Programme in 1950-1951. The number receiving assistance rose to six in 1952, seven in 1953 and again in 1954, and fourteen in 1955; by 1959, all but one Territory in the region had received assistance. Taking the assistance rendered to Non-Self-Governing Territories as a whole, the relative share of the Territories in Africa continued to rise, and in 1958 and 1959 it accounted for some 50 per cent of the total.

37. Although the General Assembly, in resolution 444 (V), recommended that the Administering Members should include in the information transmitted under Article 73 e as full a report as possible on applications for technical assistance and on the manner in which it had been integrated in long-range development programmes, the Committee has had to depend primarily on the United Nations agencies concerned for information of this kind. By far the largest amount of assistance given to the Territories under the Expanded Programme was in the field of public health (amounting to 44 per cent of the total cost in 1957) and education (27.5 per cent). WHO-assisted projects in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under the regular budget and Expanded Programme increased from twelve in 1949 to 113 in 1956, although the number of Territories decreased during that period. The type and scope of assistance requested generally reflected the stage of economic development of the Territory concerned, and a gradual transition from assistance in basic services to assistance in productive services could be noted. The Progress Report<sup>6</sup> gives many examples of the broad range of assistance provided, much of it through the ILO, WHO, FAO, UNESCO and other specialized agencies, the regional activities of which have also been of considerable value to a number of Territories.

38. UNICEF extended to the Territories on an increasingly important scale its world-wide services to maternal and child health. In the period from early 1952 to the middle of 1959, UNICEF aid totalling $11 million was approved for 111 child care projects in forty Non-Self-Governing Territories. The eighty-three programmes being assisted at the end of the period included twenty for child feeding; sixteen for basic maternal and child welfare services and training of child care workers; thirteen for yaws control; fourteen for malaria control or eradication; and seven for leprosy control. UNICEF was providing the necessary supplies and equipment; FAO, WHO and, in some cases, the United Nations, were making available experts and fellowships; and this joint international assistance was often the impetus for broader programmes continued by the Governments themselves. The Committee expresses its warm appreciation of the extensive and far-reaching benefits which UNICEF has helped to bring to many Territories.

39. Outside the auspices of the United Nations, a number of Territories also received both technical and financial assistance on a bilateral basis under the auspices of the Colombo Plan and through agencies of the United States Government. In 1958, the Foundation for Mutual Assistance in Africa South of the Sahara was set up for a similar purpose.

40. The regional commissions—the South Pacific Commission, the Caribbean Commission, and the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara (CCTA)—also played an important part in the promotion of international co-operation in technical matters on a regional basis.

41. The Committee considers it useful, however, to point out in conclusion that the total amount of external assistance of all kinds represented only a small part of total public expenditure, including grants, loans and services provided by the Administering Members, on economic, social and educational development in the Territories. Technical assistance sought for and provided to Non-Self-Governing Territories under the United Nations programmes during the period under review was on a modest scale, even when the limitations of resources were taken into account.

B. Economic conditions

I. GENERAL POLICIES AND DEVELOPMENTS

42. At the beginning of the period under review, the greater part of the productive effort of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories was devoted to raising the agricultural and animal products needed for subsistence; most of the Territories, therefore, began the period with economies extremely under-developed when viewed in the light of the needs of emerging modern States. A few had flourishing internal markets where money had long since replaced barter as the medium of exchange; some were exporting substantial quantities of agricultural, animal and mineral products, often as a direct result of non-indigenous enterprise; but, on the whole, subsistence economy prevailed and production for internal or external sale had developed haphazardly and on a relatively small scale. Moreover, this production was limited to primary products and, in most of the Territories, to one or two main types of product usually acutely sensitive to the vagaries of climate and markets. This common situation was reflected in the low levels of public revenues and indigenous private incomes.

43. The objectives of economic policy formulated by the Committee on Information in 1954<sup>7</sup> represented, in effect, a catalogue of the major tasks which, in 1946, still lay ahead in almost every Territory. For that reason, and also to suggest the standards of achievement by which progress during the decade may be measured, it is useful to re-state the objectives at this point:

“(a) To remove the obstacles to economic development by modifying where necessary the basic structure of the economy;

“(b) To stimulate economic growth through which the standards of living of the peoples will be raised and an increase obtained in their national output and improvement in their productivity;

“(c) To establish and improve the capital equipment of the Territories so as to provide a firm basis for future development;

“(d) To promote those types of economic activity, whether primary or industrial production, in which the Territories are best fitted to engage, having regard to the balance of their economies and the advantages of external trade;

“(e) To secure the equitable distribution amongst the peoples of the material benefits of the economy as expressed in the national income;

“(f) To create a firm economic basis for political, social and educational programmes taking into account the basic cultural values and aspirations of the peoples;

“(g) To conserve and develop the natural resources of the Territories for the peoples;

“(h) To create conditions conducive to standards of health and of social welfare which will help to develop moral and civic consciousness and responsibility so as to enable the people to take an increasing share in the conduct of their own affairs;

“(i) To work towards fully developed economies capable of taking their appropriate place in the world economy.”

44. In assessing progress towards these objectives, the Committee has taken into consideration that development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories can only be properly evaluated in the perspective of general trends prevailing in the world economy as a whole and in relation to the problems common to all under-developed countries. Since the Territories are mostly primary producers with little domestic capital of their own, they are particularly affected by cyclical economic fluctuation in the developed industrialized countries. In considering their progress, moreover, conditions prevailing at the beginning of the period should also be kept in view and, in the final analysis, all progress should be measured in relation to the needs of the Territories.

45. On the whole, the period under review was one of considerable progress for the Non-Self-Governing Territories, but, in the Territories containing the major part of the dependent peoples, this progress took place within a framework the fundamental deficiencies of which remained to be corrected. Substantial advances over 1946 were registered by such indicators as production, consumption and per caput income; nevertheless, the basic structure of the economy of the Territories remained, in general, at a low stage of development, based mainly on subsistence agriculture and, also, on the production of a few primary products for export. A large proportion of the proceeds from the latter were devoted to imports of consumer as well as capital goods from highly industrialized countries. Moreover, the Territories found themselves involved in the global phenomenon of the widening gap between the standards of living of the under-developed countries and those of the developed countries, a phenomenon adverse to the Territories in the sense that their rate of growth had generally not kept pace with that of the developed countries, including those with which they had their most important economic and trade relations. Data on production in the major fields suggest that the gap, already wide in 1946, remained ten years later one of the most striking features of the situation in most of the

Territories and underline the importance of maximizing efforts to accelerate the rate of growth within the Territories.

46. Some progress was made in the shift towards a money economy with a concomitant decline in the share of subsistence production, and this trend may be expected in most cases to continue at an ever-increasing rate, although information on this subject remains fragmentary. The share of primary agricultural or mining production for export in the national product of most of the Territories did not decline during the period. In fact, this type of production remained on the whole the dominating and most dynamic sector of the economy. The dependence of the Territories on the world market therefore remained large, nor was much progress made, with a few important exceptions such as Nigeria and Kenya, in the diversification of agricultural production. The share of the processing industries supplying both export and domestic markets increased somewhat, but it was not a major factor in the economic life of the Territories. The only real exceptions to this situation—Hong Kong and, to a lesser extent, Singapore—confirmed the rule, because of the urban character of these Territories. In most cases, local industrial production did not expand sufficiently to meet the requirements of the domestic market for the major categories of consumer goods, and the production of capital goods remained in its infancy. Very few Territories had yet developed balanced, diversified economies.

47. Within these basic limitations, most of the Territories were substantially better off at the end of the period than at the beginning. Improvements in the living standards of the population, for example, were evidenced by the increased local consumption of both domestic and imported consumer goods, with a trend towards consumption of higher quality and more expensive products. Of far-reaching importance also were the assets which the Territories had acquired in the form of fundamental works and services: expanded transportation systems, agricultural, water supply, power, marketing and other economic services and their attendant capital works. These improvements were brought about in large part through planned development expenditures in which Administering Members and territorial Governments played an important role by providing initiative, funds and management.

48. The formulation and implementation of development plans constituted in fact an outstanding feature of the period. These plans were designed to promote the economic and social development of the Territories, with particular emphasis on the welfare of their inhabitants. The inadequacy of comprehensive and reliable statistical data was a handicap in planning in most cases, and in some cases the first plans were put into effect before extensive surveys of natural resources and development possibilities had been carried out. In the latter part of the period, however, new or revised plans in several Territories were based in large part on special economic surveys, including a number undertaken by missions of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, as in Malaya, Nigeria and Jamaica.

49. The Administering Members in most cases supplied an important part of the financial resources required, though in general, territorial resources themselves made the largest contribution. Some Territories were also assisted by funds provided from other external sources. The United States International Cooperation Administration provided a total of $13 million during the period to help finance a number of special development projects, and the International Bank made loans amounting to $170 million to a number of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The scope of the development plans, as well as the resources available for their implementation, was gradually increasing at the end of the period. The concrete aims and objectives pursued varied according to the needs and potentialities of the different Territories, but, as a general rule, they were intended to establish an economic, social and administrative infrastructure essential to achieve a balanced economy. They did not always appear calculated to secure these results most effectively; in a few cases, they were criticized by members of the Committee as representing a series of inadequately co-ordinated projects some of which bore insufficient relationship to the needs of the people. In the latter part of the period, especially in the French Territories, the plans placed greater emphasis on projects furthering the development of production. The need for expansion of research was stressed in all major development plans.

50. The Committee reiterates the desirability of an ever-widening association of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the elaboration and implementation of development programmes and the desirability of linking those programmes with the basic objectives of promoting the political development of the Territories. In this connexion, the period saw a progressive extension of local control over development planning. In a number of Territories under United Kingdom administration, where territorial Governments already had the major responsibility for development planning, participation by the representatives of the territorial populations in this planning depended on the pace of constitutional change. In a growing number of the United Kingdom Territories, development plans were becoming increasingly the work of bodies responsible to the elected representatives of the people. In addition, the establishment of new public bodies, such as development boards or corporations, resulted in increasing participation by the indigenous populations in the implementation of plans. Some progress towards the transfer of responsibility for planning also occurred at the end of the period in the French Territories, where the powers of the local authorities in the preparation, and of the territorial assemblies in the approval, of development plans were strengthened.

51. The Committee has welcomed the trend towards the establishment of special local bodies for the planning and execution of development programmes; it has repeatedly emphasized the importance of local participation in the formulation and implementation of development programmes. It welcomes the resolution adopted by the Economic Commission for Africa at its second session recommending measures for the training of indigenous economists and statisticians, which, in the Committee's opinion, will make for greater indigenous participation. The Committee also stresses the importance of co-operative regional and international effort in promoting economic development. The Non-Self-Governing Territories should be brought more and more actively into the main stream of the activities directed at fulfilling the purposes of Article 55 of the Charter, including the work of the United Nations regional economic commissions. Such association should help, not only to lay the basis for effective co-operative efforts among neighbouring Territories in the solution of regional problems, but should also assist the Territories in the formulation of their own programmes. It should include the full participation, within the Territories, of representative institutions in the planning and approval of programmes under schemes of international assistance.

52. Data on national accounts included in the Progress Report<sup>8</sup> showed an increase in gross domestic product at current prices in all Territories for which such information was available. Even measured at constant prices (i.e., after taking into account the rise in prices) this increase was considerable. The real per caput income also showed an increase in the few Territories for which relevant separate data on the income of the indigenous populations are available. In some cases the rate of increase was higher than that of the national income of the Territory as a whole. The real per caput income increased by 6.1 per cent in the Belgian Congo from 1950 to 1957, by 5.1 per cent in French West Africa from 1948 to 1955 and by 3.7 per cent in Uganda from 1952 to 1957.

53. On the other hand, the per caput personal incomes<sup>9</sup> of the indigenous population of the African Territories for which data were available for 1956 or 1957 were among the lowest in the world: the figure was $67 for Nigeria (1956), $42.20 for the Belgian Congo, $33.55 for Kenya and $43.34 for Uganda (1957). The striking disparity between the levels of per caput personal income of Africans and non-Africans in these Territories persisted. Thus in 1957 in the Belgian Congo the per caput personal income of the African population was $42.20 and of the non-African $2,973; in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland the corresponding figures were $39.20 and $1,711; and in Kenya $33.55 and $1,100.<sup>10</sup> This disparity was due above all to the fact that most Africans were engaged mainly in subsistence agriculture with low productivity, and that even in urban areas they were mainly unskilled labourers. On the other hand, there were instances in which Africans were receiving considerably less than non-Africans in similar jobs. The Committee stresses the necessity of taking all possible measures to ensure full and equal opportunities and conditions of employment to indigenous workers. It has been assured by the Administering Members that it is one of the objectives of their policies to reduce and eventually to eliminate these disparities. The Committee noted in its triennial report on economic conditions (1960) the efforts which are being made to this end.

54. Capital formation in most Territories for which information was available was at a high level. Apart from public investment to help carry out development plans, private investment was stimulated in some Territories by legislation intended to attract investment capital, in particular from overseas. Investment in the rural indigenous economy, although it escapes accurate measurement, was without doubt a significant part of the total capital formation in most Territories. There was, moreover, an important flow of private capital investment into a number of Territories, such as the Belgian Congo, Northern Rhodesia, Jamaica and Kenya. This investment, reflected in the establishment of new companies and the expansion of existing industries, was partly financed by internal resources, including reinvestment of profits. The contribution of private investment to total capital formation varied, however, according to the Territory, and it was public investment, pursued on a large scale, which provided, in nearly all of them, not only the major contribution to the whole process of development but also a decisive one in providing the basic infrastructure and other vital services which encourage further investment, both public and private. A few Territories began the period with considerable accumulations of funds from war-time commodity sales, and these provided a basis for public investment on a much larger scale than previously.

55. In the Territories under United Kingdom administration, the total authorized public development expenditure during the period under review reached £992 million, of which £187 million was provided by United Kingdom government grants under the Colonial Development and Welfare Acts, and a further £74 million represented investments of the Colonial Development Corporation. Almost £484 million, equivalent to 52.5 per cent of the total public investment, was provided by the Territories from their own budgetary revenues, from the reserves accumulated by public bodies such as marketing boards, and by means of loans. In the French Territories, total public investment financed out of metropolitan resources amounted to 762,000 million metropolitan francs. In these Territories, the share of local financial resources in public investment, which, in 1946, had been expected to amount to 45 per cent, was reduced to 10 per cent in the projects included in the overseas sections of the Fonds d'investissement et de développement économique et social (FIDES). In the Belgian Congo, the total cost of the ten-year development plan, amounting to over 48,000 million Belgian Congo francs, was financed by loans contracted by the Territory and raised both in Belgium and in the Territory itself. Without underestimating the importance of the financial assistance provided during the period under review and at an increasing rate since then by the metropolitan Governments, the Committee hopes that further increases in such assistance will prove possible, having regard to the part which the Territories on their side have played in the post-war recovery of the metropolitan economies; they have provided potentially extensive markets for metropolitan manufactured goods and, in some cases, through their trade surpluses with the dollar area, have helped to improve the balance of payments of their respective currency areas.

56. The rate of capital formation can be calculated for only a few Territories.<sup>11</sup> The Committee notes that in some of them—the Belgian Congo, French West Africa and the United Kingdom Territories taken as a whole—the ratio of investment to national income was high, especially when account is taken of the very low per caput income which usually results in a low ratio of domestic savings and investment to national income.

II. THE RURAL ECONOMY

57. The development of the agricultural sector was, and remains, of fundamental importance in the general economic and social advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, as almost all of them are predominantly agricultural and depend primarily on their agricultural production not only for the nutrition of their rapidly growing populations but also for their earnings of overseas exchange. Economic and social progress in these Territories has depended essentially on the direction and speed of improvements in the rural economy.

58. The inadequacy of available statistical data does not permit a full analysis of the progress made in agricultural production. However, it appeared to increase more rapidly than the population in most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, especially in those located in Africa. FAO estimates that, in tropical Africa as a whole, the per caput agricultural production in 1958 exceeded the pre-war level by about 20 per cent.<sup>12</sup> Progress was made in some Territories in the diversification of agricultural production, but the output of livestock products generally remained small. The volume of agricultural exports also increased fairly steadily, with the major exception of cocoa exports from some West African Territories, while the exports of copra from the Pacific Territories recovered somewhat slowly from the severe war-time setback. There were at the same time substantial increases in agricultural imports and also in purchases of wheat and flour and of condensed and evaporated milk.

59. On the basis of the limited data available, the relatively small part played by livestock products remained at the end of the period a conspicuous, and in the opinion of FAO, the most important, aspect of the pattern of agricultural production in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Although the output of meat, milk and eggs was gradually increasing, there was no evidence of any marked progress in this direction, in spite of the large and, in several cases, increasing numbers of livestock reported in a number of Territories. The desirability of increasing the output of livestock products, both as a source of income and because of their importance in improving levels of nutrition, was nevertheless generally recognized during the period, as evidenced by the development of veterinary research and field services, livestock improvement centres and slaughtering and marketing facilities. Progress was hampered in many Territories by problems which did not prove capable of rapid solution: these included the need for pasture and stock improvement and for protection against the tsetse fly and various animal diseases, difficulties of access to markets, and the fact that in many of the African Territories where cattle are most numerous, they have customarily been treated more as a token of wealth than as a productive resource. While much progress was made during the period in these matters, particularly in the control of diseases within territorial borders, in the East African Territories the continued spread of rinderpest across international frontiers drew attention to the need for international co-operation in control measures, a field in which the collaboration of FAO may, in the Committee's opinion, be usefully sought.

60. The importance of agriculture in the economy of the Territories was generally recognized and this resulted in the allocation to this sector of a substantial share of development funds. Special boards or corporations for agricultural development were set up in many Territories, especially those under United Kingdom administration. In certain Territories, some relatively large-scale projects of agricultural production were attempted, although often with only limited success. Towards the middle of the period under review, therefore, the emphasis shifted to the improvement of indigenous systems of agriculture.

61. The expansion of agriculture for export purposes was given special attention; but the diversification of local food production, which is also essential for the improvement of nutrition in almost all Territories, where diets are dominated by starchy staple crops, poor in protein and other necessary nutrients, received less emphasis. However, efforts were made to diversify local food production by increasing the output of such foods as green vegetables, fruits and pulses. At the end of the period the need persisted for an acceleration of efforts in this direction.

62. Although further diversification of production for local consumption was almost universally desirable, the relative advantages of specialization in the export sector also had to be considered. In the majority of Territories, export earnings and government revenues were initially built up by concentrating heavily on the development of one or two major crops. More recently, however, interest tended to centre on measures to give greater year-to-year stability to these earnings. Thus, efforts to diversify production for export were being made in many of those Territories where export earnings had been derived mainly from only one or two crops.

63. The expansion of agriculture and stock-raising has often encountered difficulties arising from customary systems of land tenure. During the period under review these systems tended to change under economic and social pressures, which were intensified as commercial crop production and plantation agriculture became more widespread. Customary systems of land tenure were almost everywhere in a transitional stage and were gradually giving way to land ownership under registered title. Governments assisted and systematized rather than regulated these changes; attempts to regulate them, particularly where alienation of land to European settlers had brought additional pressure on traditional systems of tenure, were a frequent cause of friction.

64. Reforms of land tenure systems, which occurred in a number of Territories, were generally aimed at strengthening individual ownership rights on the part of indigenous farmers. Thus, in the Belgian Congo, a commission studied in 1956 the practical means of allowing the indigenous inhabitants gradually to assume individual ownership of land while making due allowance for the customary system of collective ownership. In French West and Equatorial Africa, the reorganization introduced by decree in 1955 appeared feasible mainly because of the gradual inculcation of a concept of property ownership. In Kenya, the Swynnerton Plan had amongst its purposes the setting up of economically viable family farm units under registered title, the owners being free to sell their land to other Africans or to mortgage it. In Uganda in 1956, the Government took steps to replace customary systems by tenure by individual titles in districts where there was a demand for them. These examples are not exhaustive, but the Committee considers that a comprehensive and systematic approach to this problem is called for in many other cases as well. The trend towards individual ownership of land opens up the possibility, among other things, of a more rapid expansion of agricultural credit facilities, whose inadequacy during the period was often attributed to the lack of security on the part of indigenous farmers; the expansion of credit facilities should serve as an aid to increased production.

65. The conservation of natural resources is one of the essential objectives of agricultural policy in the Territories. Phenomena of soil deterioration have been well known for some time, but their full seriousness, especially in Africa, was not fully realized before the period under review. Special attention had for some years been given to the more easily predictable consequences, such as the effect on water conservation of deforestation and the removal of vegetation cover. However, the less spectacular aspects of soil erosion—deterioration in the texture of cultivated soils, loss of the humic colloidal complex, the leaching of mineral elements, etc.—had not received as much attention as they deserved in the African Territories. An effort to remedy this serious omission was made by the various scientific and agronomical services after the end of the Second World War. Projects, both local and regional in scale, were initiated. The number of soil scientists in many Territories was considerably expanded, both in the field and on research. An inter-African soils bureau was set up in Africa under the auspices of the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara (CCTA) in 1950, and two inter-African soils conferences were held in the Belgian Congo, one at Boma in 1948 and another at Leopoldville in 1954. Specialized regional committees were established and have met regularly, and an inter-African soil conservation service was brought into being at Yangambi in the Belgian Congo. Substantial progress was achieved during the period under review in the three aspects of the soil conservation programme: studies and research, legislation, and technical measures of implementation.

66. Progress in water control and utilization varied considerably between Territories and generally between geographical regions during the period. In the Territories of tropical Africa, although the authorities have for a considerable time been concerned with the control of the great hydrological basins such as the Congo, the Senegal, the Niger and the Benue and the tributaries of the Chad, crop irrigation and drainage are still, on the whole, in their infancy. The position is entirely different in Asia and some of the Pacific Territories. The delay in this kind of development in the African Territories is undoubtedly due in part to the heavy investments required and in part also to the past inadequacy of vital hydrological data, a factor which led to water resources being frequently insufficiently or inefficiently used and to some projects resulting in failure. During the period, however, serious efforts were made to secure the essential data by means of general hydrological studies and research.

67. The Committee noted that considerable progress was also made in applying measures for safeguarding timber resources and developing forest production. Progress was achieved mainly through the development of research, the introduction of new technical methods ensuring considerably increased productivity and their application to forestry experience, the evaluation of resources and the utilization of products. The gradual replacement of initial methods of forest management (mainly aimed at the regulation of the primitive utilization of a small part of the resources of the wild forest) by sylviculture to ensure maximum economic utilization of forests under management, was well under way in many Territories. The Committee considers that forestry research should be expanded because the vast forest covered areas in African and Asian Territories should be a significant factor in their economic development.

68. Fisheries, which provide food proteins otherwise difficult to obtain, are of considerable importance to the Non-Self-Governing Territories where sea or inland water fishing is possible. A good deal was accomplished in fishery research during the period under review, capital expenditure for establishment of new institutions being financed mainly by the metropolitan Governments. In the United Kingdom Territories, one-tenth of total expenditure for research under the Colonial Development and Welfare Acts from 1946 to 1957 was allocated for fisheries research. In many Territories greater attention was paid, and with success, to fish culture. The number and yields of fish farming ponds in particular increased, and demonstration fish farms were established in Kenya, Nigeria, Northern Rhodesia and Uganda. Progress was also achieved in the mechanization of fishing craft and the improvement of equipment. There was thus a notable expansion in fish catches. The Committee considers that the knowledge gained in successful experiments in fishery development in some Territories should be made available to all of them, and that the establishment of fish processing and canning plants, which has not yet received due attention in many Territories, should be encouraged.

III. INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT

69. The beginning of the period under review was marked, in most Territories, by an almost complete absence of manufacturing industries other than handicrafts; and at the end of the period, development in this sector had usually been considerably slower than the expansion of primary production. Even in a number of large Territories where, with the spread of money economies based mainly on agricultural export production, growing markets for both consumer and capital goods existed, a large part of export income continued to be devoted to the purchase of manufactured imports. These imports included, for obvious reasons, all machinery and other capital equipment, and also the bulk of durable consumer goods. It was only in the categories of non-durable goods and intermediate products for export and domestic use that local manufacturing had, in general, made any appreciable headway.

70. In 1957, the Committee expressed the view that industrialization was not to be regarded as an end in itself but as one of the means of raising the income and levels of living of the population. Local conditions may limit the range of manufactured products which can be made and sold; where highly favourable conditions exist for particular crops or products, the general interest of a Territory may be best served through their increased production and sale in return for manufactured goods from abroad. Where conditions are suitable, however, industrial production will help to raise living conditions and is essential for diversifying and strengthening territorial economies. The encouragement of new industries should not, therefore, be governed wholly by criteria of price possibilities; account should be taken by Governments of the broader economic and social needs and interests of the Territories.

71. Subject to the foregoing considerations, industrialization can accordingly be the means by which, on the one hand, a Territory possessing natural resources may be able to make fuller and more profitable use of these resources rather than by exporting in raw or partially processed form the products derived from them, and may be able to meet the demands of the local market for manufactured goods to an extent that will appreciably diminish excessive dependence on the proceeds of exports. On the other hand, industrialization can play an important part in introducing new forms of technical progress into the economy; it can have a stimulating influence on other sectors of economic activity; and it can provide the population with additional opportunities for paid employment, usually at better wages than those obtainable in agriculture and with the further advantage of creating a demand and a desire for new skills.

72. The need to establish industries, where conditions are suitable, has been recognized by the Administering Members. In practice, a distinction has often been drawn between: (a) industries which process local raw materials of agricultural or mineral origin and produce mainly for export and only partly for the local market; (b) industries producing consumer goods for the local market from imported raw materials; and (c) industries which process imported raw materials for export.

73. The first of these kinds of industry has been encouraged whenever the natural conditions have been considered favourable as, for example, when cheap power is available for metal refining. The second type of industry has been thought to be economically justified especially when it consists of the manufacture of goods in place of imports for which there is a ready outlet on the local market, for example, the manufacture of flour from imported wheat and of containers from imported sheet metal. The third type is more rare, and has been considered feasible only in special circumstances, such as reasonable prospects of external markets; the oil refineries processing imported crude petroleum in Aden and Trinidad, and the cotton textile industry in Hong Kong are examples.

74. At the end of the period under review, in the great majority of the Territories, manufacturing industries, especially those of local ownership, still had to contend with a scarcity of local capital and a shortage of persons with professional, managerial and technical skills. To these difficulties must be added the inadequacy of basic facilities such as power and transport. In some cases there was neither wide range of raw materials nor a ready supply of labour. One of the aims of the measures taken under the development and investment programmes carried out in the Territories, usually with the assistance of the Administering Members, and in some cases with international or other external assistance, has been to create conditions more favourable to industrialization by establishing basic overhead facilities; of these transport has generally received the greatest attention. Moreover, although the establishment of manufacturing industries is, in most Territories, left largely to private enterprise, in some of them Governments have made loans to encourage manufacture, while in others industrial development corporations have been set up.

75. On the whole, industrial production in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was still at a low level in 1956. Most of the Territories were still in a preparatory stage for general industrialization and the development of manufacturing industry was only just beginning. There were important exceptions—such as the Belgian Congo, Kenya, Jamaica, Trinidad, Hawaii and Alaska—where the amplitude and variety of industrial production had definitely passed this initial stage. In the Belgian Congo, for example, there was, in the period under review, a considerable growth of manufacturing industry. The ten-year plan of development emphasized from the very beginning the need to develop processing industries in order to raise the value of agricultural and mineral production and to provide goods for the domestic market. The Belgian policy in this respect was based on the consideration, among others, that it is uneconomical to export raw materials for the manufacture of finished products which are then imported for local consumption. As a result, a fairly diversified manufacturing industry, including cotton, textiles, blankets, footwear, bottles, beverages, tobacco, cement and other products, was brought into existence in that Territory. The policies adopted in some other Territories do not appear to have placed equal emphasis on this principle.

76. Furthermore, in such urban Territories as Singapore and particularly Hong Kong, the export industry, which in 1946 was already making an important contribution to their activity, expanded considerably. Elsewhere, the only industries which made considerable advances in certain Territories were those processing, mainly for export, local raw materials of agricultural and, particularly, of mineral origin. Industries serving the needs of the domestic market, and especially those of the indigenous population, remained very poorly developed. In most of the Territories, this was probably due to such factors as the low purchasing power of the population, lack of fuel, difficulties of distribution and, particularly in African Territories, the low density of population, the inadequacy of the economic and social infrastructure, and the shortage of capital, entrepreneurs and technicians. The result was that most of the Territories were obliged to import the gradually increasing quantities of manufactured goods which they needed. This was true not only of machinery and of durable consumption goods, which require large and expensive plants for their manufacture, but even of many of the most common articles of consumption. Only in such cases as cotton fabrics, cement, tobacco and beer was local production beginning to cover a large proportion of the requirements of certain Territories.

77. Whatever development took place in manufacturing was based, moreover, principally on non-indigenous ownership and management. Except in the intermediate processing of agricultural products, where co-operative or government-assisted enterprises were playing a part of some importance, manufacturing units owned by indigenous persons were usually small in size even if they were not also small in number. The participation of indigenous persons in manufacturing as a whole was primarily through the supply of unskilled and semi-skilled labour.

78. One indication of the extent of manufacturing industries is provided by the numbers of wage-earners employed in them. In this respect, the Belgian Congo, with 152,758 employed in 1956, representing 4.86 per cent of the total economically active population, was well in the lead among African Territories, followed by Kenya with 57,700 (3.97 per cent) and Northern Rhodesia with 24,585 (4.7 per cent). In French West Africa, there were 31,000 in 1955 (0.65 per cent) and in Uganda, 24,868 in 1956 (1.9 per cent).<sup>18</sup>

IV. EXTERNAL TRADE

79. While the transition from a subsistence to a money economy is in a very early phase in most of the Territories in Africa, Asia and the Pacific, the money economy in these, as in most others, is largely based on external trade. The use of money as the medium of exchange, in fact, usually began in the Territories through trade with other countries, mainly through exports; efforts for the economic development of the Territories during the period under review usually began with the expansion and modernization of the production of primary products for sale in world markets and especially the markets of the respective metropolitan countries.

80. In these circumstances, which still largely prevailed at the end of the period, export production formed generally the most efficient and productive activity in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, especially when compared with the far lower productivity of the other major activity, namely, subsistence agriculture. The share of export production in the total production of most Territories was accordingly higher than that in most countries with more diversified and better developed economies. This latter characteristic also applied to the few Territories which were not primary producers, such as Hong Kong and Singapore. While greater efforts were being made in some Territories by the end of the period to increase the scope of their domestic markets, exports still remained of paramount importance. They were providing in most cases the main source of metropolitan and foreign exchange, enabling the Territories to make payments not only for imports of consumer goods to meet their current requirements, but also for capital goods essential to promote their development.

81. In view of the paramount importance of exports to their economy, the main emphasis in the external trade policies pursued in most Territories was not, as is elsewhere generally the case, on the regulation of imports to protect domestic producers from excessive foreign competition, but on the regulation and stimulation of exports. The main objectives were to provide adequate export markets and to ensure satisfactory prices for export products, or at least to stabilize prices paid to, or income received by, primary producers to protect them from the fluctuations of world prices. Tariffs intended specifically to protect local producers against all outside competition, including that of the metropolitan country, existed in only a few Territories, the Belgian Congo being one such example.

82. In the development of external trade, fluctuations in prices and in the volume of world demand for primary products exported by the Territories were a major factor. Attempts to stabilize prices through international commodity agreements were, as far as they applied to important primary export products of Non-Self-Governing Territories, reasonably successful only for tin and sugar. In the case of sugar, moreover, most exports were made within the framework of special arrangements, such as the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement in the case of the United Kingdom Territories, and the United States Sugar Act in the case of Hawaii and the United States Virgin Islands.

83. Since international agreements had not been established for some other commodities, the establishment within the Territories of government agencies entrusted with the stabilization of prices paid to their own producers was necessarily of greater practical importance for most Territories in the period under review than action on the international level to moderate excessive short-term price fluctuations. In the United Kingdom Territories, especially, the marketing boards succeeded to a very considerable extent in maintaining stable prices to producers in a period of wide fluctuations of world market prices. Moreover, owing to generally conservative price policies, the boards accumulated substantial reserves, which were used not only for maintaining reasonable levels of payments to producers during periods of decline in world prices, but also for the financing of development programmes. The Caisse de stabilisation, established generally at a later stage in French Territories with the financial support of the metropolitan Government, aimed also at the stabilization of producers' prices and incomes.

84. There was a considerable increase in the volume as well as the value of exports of Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>14</sup> In most cases, the exports remained limited to a few major primary products and the degree of diversification was limited. Nevertheless, in certain Territories there was a significant rise in the share of exports represented by processed products.<sup>15</sup> There was also, as a general trend, a gradual decline in the volume of exports to the respective metropolitan countries, which nevertheless remained high in some cases, while the share of exports purchased by countries of Western Europe other than those of the Administering Members tended to increase.

85. Imports also increased in volume and even more so in value, the latter partly as a result of the general rise in the prices of manufactured goods.<sup>16</sup> In a number of Territories there was a noticeable increase in the proportion of imports represented by capital goods, mainly machinery and transport equipment. This was largely the result of the acceleration of public investments under the development programmes which were being implemented in most Territories. In some of the Territories, it also reflected an expansion of private investment. There was a general trend towards a reduction in the share of imports provided by the respective metropolitan countries, although in the case of the French Territories nearly two-thirds of the import trade remained with France throughout the period.<sup>17</sup> On the other hand, there was an increase in imports from other countries of Western Europe and also from Japan. A particular rise in the flow of imports from Japan occurred in the Territories under United Kingdom administration.

86. Terms of trade varied from year to year for each Territory, depending in large part on the manner in which price fluctuations affected its major export products. As a rule, terms of trade were most favourable in 1951, at the climax of the stockpiling period which followed the military action in Korea, but they deteriorated afterwards owing both to the decline in the prices of some primary commodities and to the rise in the prices of industrial products. The terms of trade varied less sharply towards the end of the period, and in a number of Territories they were more favourable in 1956-1957 than ten years earlier. The period nevertheless provided some striking illustrations of the particular sensitivity of the Territories' economies to the economic policies and conditions prevailing in the metropolitan and other highly industrialized countries. The recessions of 1949, 1954 and 1958 had substantial effects on the volume of exports of primary products from the Territories and on the purchasing power of these exports in terms of imports.

87. While both exports and imports increased substantially during the period, there was no fundamental shift in the balance of trade in most of the Territories. The balance remained negative for the United Kingdom

Territories as a whole—although significant changes occurred in several of them—and in greater degree for the French Territories.<sup>18</sup> These deficits reflected to a large extent the importation of long-term capital and equipment for the implementation of development programmes. In the Belgian Congo the balance of trade remained positive throughout the period.

88. Nearly all the Non-Self-Governing Territories showed deficits in their balances of payment on current account.<sup>19</sup> For the United Kingdom Territories as a whole, these deficits arose from transactions with the rest of the sterling area, mainly the United Kingdom. The same circumstances applied to the Belgian Congo in its relations with Belgium. On the other hand, the relations of both the United Kingdom and Belgian Territories with other monetary areas, and particularly with the dollar area, left surpluses. The French Territories, however, had a deficit in their balance of current transactions with the rest of the franc area, as well as with foreign countries.

V. TRANSPORT

89. The place given in development programmes to the improvement of transport facilities was a noteworthy feature of the period under review. A substantial share of total development expenditure was usually allocated for the reconstruction and expansion of road, rail, port and aviation facilities. The improvement of transport accounted for nearly 65 per cent of expenditure under the first four-year plan for the French Territories, as particular emphasis had to be placed at that stage on the restoration and expansion of transport facilities which had deteriorated during the war. The expenditure on transport declined to 42 per cent in the second six-year plan. Expenditure on transport facilities absorbed 50 per cent of allocations in the ten-year development plan for the Belgian Congo and in that for Nigeria for the period 1955-1960. Similarly in Sarawak, allocations for transport and communications under the development plan rose from 34 per cent during the period 1951-1957 to 54.4 per cent during 1955-1960. This pattern, however, was not uniform and the proportion of expenditure allocated to transport varied from Territory to Territory. In Kenya, transport received 17.1 per cent of expenditure under the 1946-1953 plan and in Uganda 20 per cent under the 1955-1960 plan. In the United Kingdom Territories as a whole, 21.2 per cent of Colonial Development and Welfare allocations was devoted to communications during the period 1946-1958.

90. A considerable effort was made to cope with the immediate increase in traffic which began to take place after the end of the Second World War. There was also growing awareness of the necessity for expanding the capacity of transport systems to meet both existing and future needs. The economic development of a Territory is not only accompanied by an intensification of traffic and changes in its composition; it also requires changes in the configuration of the transport systems.

91. The major results obtained during the period were the reduction in harbour congestion through the construction of new harbours, such as that at Abidjan in French West Africa, and the expansion and modernization of existing ones, such as Lagos/Apapa (Nigeria), Mombasa (Kenya), and Freetown (Sierra Leone); the improvement and development of road networks, including the construction of main arteries; and the rapid expansion of installations for international and internal air transport, increasingly used for carrying goods and mail in addition to passengers. A relatively smaller expansion occurred in railway mileage, efforts in this field having been concentrated more on improvement of existing services than on their extension.

92. In spite of the progress achieved in the development of means of transportation, the traffic which they carried remained small when compared, not only with the more highly developed areas, but also with the averages of the world as a whole. Thus, per caput railway goods traffic in the Territories for which such data are available amounted to 73 ton-kilometres in 1957, while for the world as a whole it amounted to 1,000 ton-kilometres. Similarly, there were 270 inhabitants per motor vehicle in the Territories and twenty-seven in the world as a whole. These comparisons suggest not only the probability of a further large expansion in the use of transport in the Territories but also the continuing high priority which will have to be given to expanding road, rail and port facilities, in view of the vital importance of transport to development. Generally speaking, the transport systems in many Territories, especially those in Africa and Asia, remained inadequate in relation to their development needs. Only in the Caribbean Territories, the Territories under the administration of the United States, and one or two others, was transportation, especially passenger transportation, developed to a point where it could act as a factor in attracting tourism, for the development of which possibilities exist in many other Territories as well. In African Territories and in Asian Territories such as Sarawak, Brunei and North Borneo, transport capacity seemed to be limited to the primary task of penetrating the interior and bringing its products to the outside world. Even in Territories like Nigeria, the mileage of permanently sealed roads was comparatively negligible, although networks of unsealed roads of considerably greater dimensions existed.

93. The Committee notes with appreciation the assistance granted by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development in loans for transport development: to the Belgian Congo for its road network; to the French Territories for their railway system; to Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland and Nigeria for the improvement or development of their railways; and to the East Africa High Commission for railway and sea-port development. Similarly, through arrangements made under the Colombo Plan, a notable contribution was made to the development of transport and communications in United Kingdom Territories (North Borneo, Singapore and Sarawak) by providing 19.5 per cent of the total expenditure in transport development on these Territories.

VI. MINING

94. The development of mining production had an important impact on the general economic progress of several Non-Self-Governing Territories during the period under review. Geological research and prospecting, to the organization of which the Administering Members devoted considerable resources of money and skilled staff, resulted in a number of discoveries of valuable mineral deposits, in particular iron ore, manganese and oil, in French Equatorial Africa and French West Africa, as well as in Nigeria, for all of which development plans were in process of preparation or were actually being implemented at the end of the period.

95. To a greater extent than in any other field of economic activity, large-scale mining operations in the Territories were financed by external capital and managed by non-indigenous interests. The direct contribution of mining to an improvement in the standards of living of the population was not always substantial, especially as the number of wage-earners employed was often relatively small. Indigenous participation was usually for the most part through unskilled labour, and, in some cases, a considerable share of the proceeds of mining was devoted to the remuneration of the risk capital obtained from outside the Territory as well as of the mainly non-indigenous management and skilled labour. Nevertheless, the contribution of mining to the development of the general economy of the Territories concerned was often substantial. The proceeds of exports of mining products were the major source of foreign exchange for the main producing Territories, and mining made an important contribution to their public revenue through royalties, export taxes on mineral products and income taxes on corporate or personal incomes. While accurate data as to the proportion of public revenues obtained from mining by taxation are scarce, this share amounted for the Belgian Congo in 1956 to 39 per cent and for Northern Rhodesia in 1953 to 60.8 per cent of the total revenue. In the case of oil in Nigeria, the Government's share in royalties and rents alone amounted in 1950, for example, to £539,000, although the company concerned made no profits during the period under review, in spite of additional investments. Moreover, in the case of newly developed mining industries, many Territories have secured a further share in the wealth of their mineral resources by means of direct participation through their Governments in the mining enterprises.

VII. POWER

96. Large resources for production of hydroelectric power, compensating to some extent for the scarcity of mineral fuel, exist in a number of Territories, particularly in Africa. However, the experience of the period under review was that the establishment of hydroelectric plants of large capacity could be justified only where adequate markets for their output existed or were concomitantly created by the installation of large power-consuming industries.

97. Possibilities for integrated power and industry development of this kind were recognized to exist in a number of Territories and several such projects, mainly for metal refining, were in the process of planning and preparation. Only in the Belgian Congo and, on a smaller scale, in Uganda, however, were such projects brought into operation during the period. These Territories, together with Northern Rhodesia, where industrial development has been based mainly on thermal power, and the urban Territories of Hong Kong and Singapore, where there is a great concentration of industry, as well as Territories under United States administration, were the only ones in which power supplied a basis for industrialization. In most Territories, domestic power consumption was limited to urban areas and electric power had not been made available to the rural indigenous populations, except on a small scale in a few Territories, particularly in Uganda.

98. In relative terms, a substantial increase in the production of power was achieved in all Non-Self-

Governing Territories for which data are available; production amounted to 8,180 million kWh in 1957 compared with 3,131 million kWh in 1948. The output rose about three-and-a-half times in Jamaica and over four times in Kenya; in Hong Kong it increased nearly fivefold, in Cyprus over tenfold, and in Uganda nearly twentyfold. These increases, however, still left the Non-Self-Governing Territories far behind the industrialized countries in power development. The share of the Territories in total world production did not significantly increase, amounting in 1957 to 0.46 per cent as compared with 0.39 per cent in 1948. While average per caput power production for the world as a whole amounted in 1957 to 637 kWh, for the Non-Self-Governing Territories it was 70.5 kWh, and in Northern Rhodesia and the Belgian Congo it exceeded 100 kWh. Power production and distribution were limited almost entirely to major urban centres and their surrounding areas, where they mainly met requirements for electric lighting and provided power only to industries located in these areas. Moreover, in nearly all Territories, the number of consumers was very small as compared with the total population.

VIII. PUBLIC FINANCE

99. The expansion of public revenues, reflecting in particular a steady increase in the taxable capacity of both indigenous and non-indigenous participants in the money economy, was a universal feature of the public finances of the Territories during the period under review. Taking as a whole the Territories under each Administering Member, government receipts increased from three to five times.

100. Total public expenditures in the Territories rose at an even faster rate, and at the end of the period were from four to seven times higher than at the beginning. This trend illustrates another important feature of the development of public finances: the expansion in government activities. Although some part of the increase in public expenditure reflected increases in prices and other costs and also the growth of population, a substantial portion corresponded directly with an increase in government activity. Furthermore, in several Territories for which information on the national product is available, the real increase in public expenditure also suggests a relative increase in the share of Government in the national product. In other words, government activity over the period grew faster than the activity of the economy as a whole. There was a shift in emphasis from public administration, justice and police, to such fields of economic and social development as transport and communications, industry, agriculture, education and health.

101. As regards the sources of public revenues, the tax structure in the Territories generally did not undergo any radical changes during the period under review. Direct taxation ranged typically between 20 and 30 per cent of the total tax receipts, serving to emphasize the continued predominance of revenue from indirect taxes, in the great majority of Territories. Among indirect taxes revenue from those on foreign trade—import and export duties—predominated as compared with receipts from taxes on domestic trade such as turnover taxes or excises. In the French Territories, the taxes on domestic trade were relatively more important than those in the United Kingdom Territories. There was a slight but significant shift towards a higher contribution from direct taxes in the Belgian Congo and in the United Kingdom Territories. Although this change can be looked upon as a favourable development from the point of view of equity as well as stability in government revenue, it is to be noted that the increase appears to have come mainly from the increased incomes earned in the existing export sector rather than from any significant expansion in manufacturing for either the export or domestic market.

102. In any event, while the importance of direct taxes increased somewhat during the period under review, as income taxes were introduced or expanded in practically all of the Territories, the revenues from direct taxes continued to be overshadowed in most cases by the rising receipts from indirect taxes. It has been widely accepted that direct taxes result in a more equitable distribution of the tax burden than alternative methods of taxation, but by their nature they face greater political and administrative difficulties. It has been frequently pointed out, for instance, that the lack of trained personnel in many Territories hampers the introduction of income taxes; corollary of this fact is the relatively low yield from income taxes, especially in rural areas, in several Territories where income tax legislation is in force. Equally important in retarding the extension of direct taxation during the period were structural and institutional factors, of which at least two stand out: in many Territories the subsistence sector, as opposed to the money or exchange sector, still dominated; secondly, where small business units prevailed, income account records were either unreliable or were not kept at all. Moreover, it has been argued that direct taxes may discourage savings and consequently impede investment; and on these and other grounds their imposition in the Territories has frequently caused some controversy.

103. The main direct taxes in operation in the Territories in the period under review were the income tax, on both individuals and companies, and the poll tax. In spite of the difficulties mentioned, income tax was the most important direct tax, although its relative yield was generally low except in the Territories where company incomes were significant. Poll tax, sometimes referred to as personal tax or head tax, is a type of direct taxation used most extensively in African Territories. The Committee recalls that as early as 1954 it recommended that steps should be taken for the suppression of the poll tax. The principal reason for its retention now appears to be the ease of its administration in the backward areas and the difficulty of finding a substitute. It is significant to note, however, that in the United Kingdom Territories, and to a lesser extent in the Belgian Congo, its relative importance as a source of revenue declined appreciably in the period under review, whereas the opposite was true in the French Territories. The Committee hopes that this tax will be speedily abolished in favour of more modern forms of taxation related to the incomes of the inhabitants.

104. While indirect taxes continued to be the most important source of revenue in nearly all the Territories, their proportion declined significantly in the Belgian Congo and to a lesser degree in the United Kingdom Territories; the opposite tendency prevailed, however, in the French Territories. In the export-oriented Territories of the United Kingdom, there was also, within the indirect tax structure, a marked shift in relative importance from import duties to export duties. Authorities in the French Territories did not use the export tax to the same extent, and therefore had to rely more heavily on such other forms of indirect taxes as import duties, turnover tax and transactions tax. The export tax has been in use in the Belgian Congo over a long period.

105. Developments in budgetary autonomy varied among the Territories, reflecting differences in their underlying circumstances and in the policies of the Administering Members. Under the legislation of 1946, and more especially of 1956, the French Territories experienced definite and simultaneous shifts towards the transfer of budgetary powers from France to the Territories and the strengthening of the powers of the individual territorial Governments. The transition from predominantly metropolitan control in the case of the United Kingdom Territories took place according to the pace of development of self-government in the individual Territories, occurring through various constitutional and administrative changes rather than through universal legislation. Among the United States Territories, the co-operative division of responsibilities between the territorial Governments and the federal authorities continued.

C. Social conditions

I. GENERAL POLICIES AND DEVELOPMENTS

106. In its examination of the sections of the Progress Report dealing with social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee has been guided by the principal aims of social policy which were set out in its reports to the General Assembly in 1955 and 1958.<sup>20</sup> The impact of different cultures on these Territories, their political evolution and the radical changes which are taking place in the patterns of their economy necessitate many adjustments and organic changes in their indigenous societies. It should be the purpose of social policy to help people to adjust to these changes as swiftly and smoothly as possible, and to encourage a balanced progress of all sections of the community. As the Committee has stated elsewhere,<sup>21</sup> social development is nothing less than the whole process of economic, social and political change and cultural advancement in a Territory considered in terms of the progressive well-being of society and of the individual.

107. In the pre-war era, the task of providing for certain essential social welfare services was left mainly to the care of religious philanthropic organizations. In the post-war era, with its quickening tempo of developments, it was no longer possible to leave these services to voluntary action. Because of the interdependence of social, political and economic development, the Committee has recognized the great importance of the role of governmental action both through short-term measures and through long-term, comprehensive plans of integrated development. It has also stressed the importance of popular participation, at all possible levels, to the success of such plans and to their implementation. It is in this broad general context that the Committee has viewed the record of work in this field in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

108. During the period under review, wide recognition was given to the responsibility of the Administering. Members for helping to create new conditions conducive to more rapid social progress in the Territories. Thus, the long-term development plans which were elaborated for many of the Territories after the Second World War, although laying particular emphasis on economic development, also incorporated broad aspects of social planning. Social development was viewed not only as, in itself, an ultimate objective of development policy, but also as an indispensable element in planned economic expansion. It was recognized that the mobilization and utilization of existing manpower for executing the economic development schemes would require anticipatory measures designed to combat poverty, ill-health, and ignorance, and thus to provide the essential human basis for efficient economic development. It was also recognized that any development programme, to be successful, must provide for the expansion of essential social services and the improvement of living conditions, including education, medical and health services, nutrition, housing and town planning, social welfare (including remedial services) and the use of techniques for the spread of informal education. In the Territories under United Kingdom administration, over 40 per cent of the total expenditure under the territorial development plans approved up to early 1951 was allocated to social services, and almost one-half of the grants and loans under the Colonial Development and Welfare Acts was also devoted to social development during the period 1 April 1946 to 31 March 1956. In the Belgian Congo, social services and schemes in the ten-year plan represented almost 30 per cent of total expenditure under the 1948 estimates and over 25 per cent under the revised 1955 estimates. In the French Territories, economic development was given a relatively larger place, and only slightly more than 16 per cent of total commitments under the 1949-1954 plan was allocated to social development; this was increased, however, to over 20 per cent under the 1954-1958 plan. Social development, in this context, includes education which, together with public health, accounts for the greater part of expenditure.

109. Nevertheless, budgetary considerations during the period under review generally set serious limits on planning for the expansion of social services and amenities. In a number of Territories, general financial considerations caused a considerable reduction in the social components of the development programmes. The financial stringencies which limited the scope of development programmes, particularly during their early stages, were however mitigated in some Territories, such as the Belgian Congo, French West Africa, the Gold Coast and Nigeria, by an accelerated pace of economic growth due to the increased volume and value of exports. This allowed heavier expenditure on public health and education as well as on other public services and made possible the investment of larger sums in economic and social development schemes. Other Territories, with a slower pace of economic growth, formulated modest programmes of social development and were more dependent on metropolitan financial assistance for their implementation. By and large, however, the great bulk of the expenditure on social development has thus far been met by the Territories themselves from their own resources, the expansion in social services being rendered possible, in most cases, by the expansion in production.

110. Although in the later stages of the development programmes the share of social development in the total expenditure planned often remained static, and in some cases diminished, the increase of social expenditure in absolute terms was substantial during the period even though this increase was, in part, due to rising costs of materials and labour and the decrease in the value of money. In the case of Nigeria, for example, while the percentage share of social expenditure under the 1955-1960 development plan went down to 25 per cent, compared with 56 per cent under the 1951-1956 plan, in terms of money it rose from £19 million in 1951-1956 to £38 million in 1955-1960. Similarly, increases occurred in the recurrent territorial expenditures on education, public health and social welfare, as well as on other social services and facilities. In a number of cases, the social expenditure increased during the period to as much as one-third of the territorial budget. Moreover, total recurrent expenditure rose to levels corresponding to increasing annual revenue and costs.

111. There was growing recognition during the period of the fact that the effectiveness of the vital role of government in developing social policy and expanding social services is substantially increased according to the extent and quality of the active participation of the territorial population in the formulation and execution of policy. The trend towards this participation kept pace, in general, with constitutional change. A number of Territories reached the stage where elected representatives had the predominant voice in policy-making. In some of them, progress was also made in filling key posts in the administration of social services with indigenous personnel. In some Territories, community development and similar programmes also provided opportunities for popular participation in social development, starting at the village level.

II. SOCIAL WELFARE

112. The main trends in the evolution of social welfare policies during the period under review were:

(a) The recognition of the responsibility of government to promote social welfare, and the integration of the work of voluntary agencies into general programmes.

(b) The emergence of policies laying greater emphasis on the constructive and preventive aspects of social welfare work, as distinct from the initial concentration on remedial work.

(c) The acceptance of increasing emphasis on the family rather than on the individual as being the main focus of social welfare activities.

(d) The recognition of the need for training indigenous staff.

113. The increasing role of government in social welfare activities was a distinctive development during the period. In most Territories, the Government accepted the responsibility for the formulation of social welfare policy and for the co-ordination of the activities of official and voluntary agencies. There was also a marked trend toward increased government participation in welfare activities. Voluntary agencies continued to play an important role, and in many instances received government grants-in-aid, but in most Territories they were no longer the sole agencies engaged in welfare work. With the increasing role of Governments in social welfare, the need for co-ordination between social welfare planning and activities with those of other technical departments of Governments, notably health, education and labour, also became more apparent. In several Territories, advisory councils to Governments were established on which all social services departments were represented. This is but one example of an administrative method which was being used to provide for the closest possible association of technical agencies.

114. Although both the extent of the recognition of social welfare as a function of government and the organization of social welfare activities varied considerably among the Territories at the end of the period, due largely to different metropolitan traditions and administrative patterns, programmes and policies universally stressed the family as the focus of welfare action. The weakening of family ties under the impact of changing economic and social conditions, especially in the urban centres, led over the years to the establishment of a variety of family welfare programmes by public and private welfare agencies, combining advisory and other assistance to families with social education of the parents, particularly the mother. The aim was to promote the advancement of the family by helping its members to acquire knowledge of better family living and to develop new interests and skills and a new sense of social responsibilities in a changing environment.

115. In the African Territories under United Kingdom administration, social welfare services developed in response to the problems resulting from industrialization, the rapid growth of urban centres and changes in the indigenous social structure. The basic aim of government was to ensure co-operation between government action and voluntary effort through the stimulation and formation of voluntary organizations, community institutions and local government authorities in order to develop a variety of services with the support and participation of the population. The extent of government initiative varied. In some Territories, government-administered small-scale social welfare programmes supplemented the work of voluntary agencies and of the health and education departments. In other Territories, special government services were established to give direct assistance to the public and to encourage and co-ordinate the activities of existing organizations. In Nyasaland, Bechuanaland, Basutoland and Swaziland, for instance, there were no separate social welfare departments, although in Nyasaland, welfare activities were co-ordinated by an official of the Administration and welfare officers had been appointed.

116. In another group of Territories, such as Northern Rhodesia, Nigeria and Sierra Leone, welfare departments were established and expanded during the period under review. In Kenya, welfare services were made the responsibility of the Ministry for Community Development and the Minister for Local Government, Health and Housing.

117. In the Caribbean Territories under United Kingdom administration, the transition from a policy based on voluntary action, with some support from public funds, to one in which the Government accepted the general responsibility for promoting social welfare through co-ordinated systems in which professionally qualified staff were utilized, had been widely effected by 1950, and government services underwent a steady expansion in subsequent years. In the South-East Asian and Pacific Territories of the United Kingdom, the most advanced forms of social welfare policies and organizations were to be found in Singapore and Hong Kong, where post-war relief measures were extended to form comprehensive long-term welfare policies. Policies and programmes in the Western Pacific Territories, on the other hand, were only in an elementary form.

118. In the Belgian Congo, the transition from the pre-war policy, whereby social welfare work had been left very largely to the missions or to private industrial organizations, to one in which there was greater participation of the Government in the formulation and execution of policy took place at an early stage of the period under review. Under the impetus of government policy, a welfare programme, largely directed towards the maintenance of family life in the new environment prevailing in the urban centres, was established during the period.

119. In the Territories under French administration, government social welfare work at the beginning of the period was conducted almost entirely within the framework of the public health services. Most services of a non-medical character were either delegated to, or provided through, voluntary charitable organizations. After 1951, a social service was established in each of the Federations and in many of the Territories; it was staffed by professional social workers, including those locally trained, and stressed family welfare services.

120. In Alaska, Hawaii and the United States Virgin Islands, public welfare activities were largely carried out by government agencies operating within the framework of welfare departments whose principal function was the provision of financial assistance and service to needy persons.

Family welfare services

121. In a process of change occurring throughout the period and continuing at present in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the traditional social structure, in which the individual and the family play clearly defined roles, is being considerably modified through the impact of external influences such as the transition from a subsistence to a money economy, education, opportunities for employment away from home, and improved communications. It is particularly in the towns that traditional family ties have often weakened and sometimes ceased to operate. There the family is no longer necessarily an integral part of a larger structure, and the survival of the union is mainly dependent on the relationship of the spouses themselves rather than on the alliance of two families towards which the spouses have special obligations. While a greater measure of freedom is permitted to the individual in finding his place in society, this new pattern of urban family living is often accompanied by new problems. Among these are unstable marriages, juvenile delinquency, inadequate housing, overcrowding, unemployment and underemployment, and inadequate earnings. Another important factor is the change in the status of women.

122. The pressing need for social action, directed against the factors underlying insecurity, poverty and family disorganization and providing assistance to the needy, led to the establishment of a variety of social welfare services in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In many Territories, specific social services relating to family and child welfare began to be provided through social welfare centres, infant welfare centres, maternal and child health clinics, and women's organizations. In the Belgian Congo and the Territories under French administration, a system of social welfare centres, whose main function was to promote better standards of family living and to assist families to adapt to the new conditions of urban life, became the principal form of social welfare activity. Most of these centres were established during the period under review, and in the Belgian Congo a sixfold increase took place between 1948 and 1957.

123. Such services contributed to the well-being and stability of the urban family in a number of Territories. In particular, they helped women to adjust themselves to the new conditions of urban life and to improve their status. While services of this type were generally to be found only in the urban areas in most Territories, in a few, such as the Belgian Congo and the British East African Territories, they were also provided in the rural districts.

Child welfare services

124. As will be seen later, the young age composition is a special feature of the populations of most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It is in the child sector of the population, therefore, that the problem of malnutrition may be most effectively solved. The provision of free or low-cost meals to school children as well as to those of pre-school age is now a widely recognized means of combating malnutrition resulting from family poverty and insufficient knowledge of food values. During the period under review, increasing attention was given to schemes for child feeding, particularly through the provision of school meals, in most Territories. While in some Territories, such as British Guiana, Trinidad and Tobago, Hong Kong and Singapore, the provision of milk or of meals to children was still in an initial stage and in others, such as Barbados, was restricted mainly to undernourished or needy children, in yet others, including Alaska and the United States Virgin Islands, a considerable proportion of children, particularly in the schools, were covered by the end of the period under review. Child feeding programmes administered by Governments had, in many cases, been expanded in coverage and improved in quality. In many instances, this was due largely to the assistance provided by UNICEF, and such organizations as the Red Cross. In Uganda, Northern Rhodesia and other Territories in Africa and elsewhere, there was no provision for the supply of school meals to children during the period under review.

125. Measures were taken in many Territories to provide day-care services for children—apart from those in infant schools, nursery schools or kindergartens which formed part of existing school systems—in the form of facilities for infants and pre-school age children whose mothers were working or whose home circumstances were poor or deficient. Many of the latter facilities were being run by voluntary organizations or municipalities, with help, in some cases, from Governments.

126. In those Territories where it was necessary to provide accommodation and care for homeless children, traditional style orphanages were the standard type of service provided. These were generally managed by voluntary welfare organizations and religious bodies, with the assistance of government subsidies or grants-in-aid. Although there was a growing preference for placing orphans and children in need of care in substitute family homes through foster home programmes, such programmes existed only in a few Territories, namely, Alaska, Hawaii, the United States Virgin Islands, Gibraltar and Cyprus, and, on a limited scale, in Bermuda, Dominica, Grenada, Jamaica and Trinidad. A beginning of foster home care was also made in Nigeria and Zanzibar.

Public assistance

127. The need for public assistance measures increased during the period, particularly in those Territories and areas where, under the influence of industrial and urban growth, traditions of mutual assistance had been tending to break down. By 1956, many of the Territories had public assistance legislation, and elements of public assistance to persons and families in distress existed in all Territories. However, broad programmes had been established only in a limited number of Territories. Much of the work in this field was undertaken by voluntary organizations and charitable bodies, religious and secular, although in many areas these voluntary activities were supplemented by Governments, either through public programmes of limited scope or through the provision of funds to voluntary agencies. Family assistance in the form of cash payments or relief in kind was being provided under government programmes of assistance in some Territories, although the payments made under such programmes were low, often below recognized subsistence levels.

128. A notable increase in the scope of public assistance legislation took place in certain Territories, such as Hong Kong, Singapore, Jamaica, Trinidad and Mauritius, which faced serious problems arising from high population density, underemployment and unemployment. The resources of voluntary agencies were co-ordinated with those of Governments. The Committee notes that there is an increasing emphasis in some Territories on the rehabilitation of the recipients of assistance so as to increase their independence of outside aid, and it is of the opinion that this is a trend which deserves more emphasis.

Welfare of the aged

129. Although elderly persons in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are often assured, as a matter of custom, of assistance and support as members of extended families or of other social units, the growth of wage-earning classes and urban centres, the change of family patterns and the rise of new occupational and social groupings has resulted in an increasing number falling outside the scope of customary protection. The pace of this process was accelerating at the end of the period under review.

130. While in some Territories institutions and homes were the only or the principal form of public assistance to aged persons, in others, where old-age assistance under general relief or in the form of old-age pensions had been introduced, indoor relief was supplementary to outdoor relief. The administration of these institutions, which included infirmaries for the aged sick, was usually in the hands of either local government authorities or charitable bodies, often of a denominational character, many of which were receiving either per caput grants or fixed subsidies from the Government. Old-age pension schemes at an adequate level and old-age insurance schemes existed only in the Territories under United States administration. Statutory old-age pension schemes were in force in certain United Kingdom Territories, such as British Guiana, Trinidad, Barbados, Bahamas, Mauritius and Brunei. Those schemes, with the exception of Mauritius, where the test was abolished in 1957, and Brunei, are all subject to severe means tests; and, despite several subsequent revisions, the assistance provided under most of these schemes continues to be at sub-standard levels. In African Territories, care of the aged still takes place largely within the traditional framework of the society, and few elements of public assistance to the aged are present.

Youth welfare

131. The social and recreational aspects of youth welfare received increasing attention in many Territories, and policies were evolved by public authorities and voluntary agencies during the period to meet the needs of the growing generations. The provision of recreational facilities in the form of playgrounds, sports fields, youth centres, hostels or camps, figured prominently in youth welfare programmes, carried out separately or jointly by welfare departments, educational authorities, municipalities and voluntary organizations. Another area of public action was the promotion of clubs and other organized leisure-time activities stressing self-directed activities for youth groups. The training of leaders for these activities began to receive much emphasis in a number of Territories.

Juvenile delinquency

132. During the period under review, considerable attention was focused on the problem of juvenile delinquency, which was recognized in most of the Territories affected by it as one deserving serious consideration. The fragmentary statistical data available<sup>22</sup> suggest that with the exception of densely populated urban Territories, such as Singapore, and one or two others, such as Hawaii, the incidence of juvenile delinquency is small in relation to the size of the population and also in comparison with the incidence of delinquency in the more advanced and prosperous metropolitan countries themselves.

133. In many Territories, punitive methods of treatment were replaced by corrective methods aiming at the re-education of juvenile delinquents. Moreover, special jurisdictions, usually juvenile courts, with educational, protective and corrective aims, were increasingly replacing penal courts in dealing with juveniles found guilty of an offence.

134. Legislation and methods of treatment varied from Territory to Territory. In several Territories, special juvenile delinquency legislation was as yet unknown. In some others, juvenile delinquency legislation had been enacted but had not been put into effect throughout the Territory. In many Territories, legislation had been introduced prior to the period under review, and the revision of existing legislation during the period was directed largely towards the improvement and extension of procedures, towards revising matters of practical detail, and towards bringing local legislation into greater conformity with the applicable provisions of metropolitan legislation. This latter was the case in United Kingdom Territories.

135. It was the general trend to avoid sending juvenile offenders to institutions. Whenever possible, treatment in freedom was applied, either in the form of probation and related measures or other measures such as admonition, repatriation, fines, restitutions, or placement in foster homes. The application of methods of treatment in freedom already in existence was extended in most Territories during the period and, in many, new methods on the metropolitan pattern were introduced.

136. Imprisonment was still used in some Territories for young offenders under the age of seventeen, although in all United Kingdom Territories no child under the age of fourteen years may be imprisoned, and such children and young persons from the age of fourteen to seventeen are usually sent to special institutions known as approved schools. Where any type of institutional treatment for young offenders was thought necessary, adult penal and correctional institutions might be used, although young offenders were generally segregated from adult offenders and in some Territories special institutions were established for the long-term treatment of young offenders over the age of sixteen. In some other Territories, such as the Belgian Congo, the Territories under French administration, Netherlands, New Guinea, and Papua, the types of institutionalization for juveniles relied upon were the adult penal and correctional institutions, although for the most part juvenile offenders were kept in separate quarters from adult prisoners and generally received some special consideration.

137. In the United Kingdom Territories, the probationary system was increasingly used for both adult and juvenile offenders, although there was still considerable scope for the extension of this essentially preventive service. In most other Territories, probation was either not used at all or applied only to a comparatively small proportion of juveniles found guilty.

138. Corporal punishment either was never applied or has long been abolished in Belgian, French, Netherlands and United States Territories. On the other hand, it was still being used by order of the courts in many United Kingdom Territories at the end of the period even though it is regarded by the United Kingdom Government as an unsatisfactory method of treatment which should be replaced by alternative methods.

139. While taking note of all these measures, the Committee is not able to conclude, from the data available, that there has been any marked decline in the incidence of juvenile delinquency in the Territories during the period under review. It considers that the proportions of the problem are, at present, manageable. In its view, a preventive approach rather than a corrective one is likely to yield better results. Among the contributory factors would appear to be slum conditions and the disruption in family life resulting from haphazard industrialization and urbanization. The inadequacy of educational facilities for children of ten to sixteen years of age, and the lack of suitable and sufficiently remunerative employment for young persons in the formative years would appear to aggravate the situation. It is in these spheres of social development, therefore, that energetic governmental action might usefully seek to prevent the occurrence of juvenile delinquency.

Care of the handicapped

140. The approach to the problem of rehabilitation of the handicapped in Non-Self-Governing Territories received low priority during the period under review. Until a late date, the care and rehabilitation of the handicapped was left to voluntary organizations and charitable institutions. In the traditional rural communities the care of disabled persons remained the responsibility of the family. Attitudes towards the care and rehabilitation of the handicapped began to undergo a gradual change largely because in urban centres the disabled usually found themselves without the traditional support of their kin. It became necessary for the Governments or the local authorities, therefore, to assume responsibility for the care of an increasing number of handicapped persons. Welfare work among the handicapped has in many Territories continued to be undertaken largely by voluntary organizations. In Territories where no comprehensive provision for the rehabilitation of the handicapped was made by Governments, the latter usually provided funds for assisting disabled persons under poor relief schemes, through welfare departments or voluntary organizations. In many Territories, medical care was given to handicapped persons in government hospitals or grants-in-aid were given by the Government to mission hospitals caring for the disabled. Special orthopaedic hospitals were established in some Territories.

141. Complete and integrated services for the rehabilitation and vocational training of handicapped persons were still in their infancy and only in a few Territories, among them Hong Kong, were such centres established during the period under review. The Committee expresses its appreciation of the few measures which were taken during the period for the rehabilitation of special types of invalidity, including crippled children's programmes, schools for deaf and mute children, such as those in Singapore, Hong Kong, Trinidad, Northern Rhodesia and Madagascar, and therapy programmes in the United States Territories. The development of the care and rehabilitation of the blind was of special importance since the problem is of such disconcerting magnitude. A report prepared by a Commission appointed by the United Kingdom in 1948 indicated that 75 to 80 per cent of all blindness occurring in the United Kingdom Territories was preventable. Following this report, some fifty schools and training centres were established in these Territories by 1957. These, however, covered only a small fraction of the very large numbers of blind people, which a preliminary survey in 1956 estimated at 650,000 in thirty-nine United Kingdom Territories. The Committee welcomes the measures adopted to combat this problem. The work of the Royal Commonwealth Society for the Blind, established in 1950, has helped territorial Governments to lay the foundations of permanent systems of blind welfare. A great deal, however, remains to be done to prevent the heavy incidence of avoidable blindness; and the Committee hopes that WHO and others concerned will be able to lend substantial further assistance in the campaign against cataract, trachoma and river blindness.

142. Many of the diseases which give rise to physical disability are preventable through the application of known hygienic and health measures in organized public health and medical services. Present programmes being carried out in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, such as those against yaws, leprosy, tuberculosis and poliomyelitis, are, in addition to their general importance to the health development of the Territories, also preventing a great many disabilities which would otherwise require a considerable increase in rehabilitation services. However, there are many opportunities in the Territories for increased preventive work in these areas. The same considerations apply equally to the prevention of blindness caused, for example, by trachoma and onchocerciasis.

Training of personnel

143. Trained personnel are indispensable to the effectiveness of social programmes, and most Territories were concerned with the problem of obtaining qualified staff for expanding social programmes and services. To ensure an adequate inflow of personnel with training at various levels, territorial training facilities were expanded and metropolitan training programmes were adapted to the social and environmental conditions of the Territories. There was a growing awareness that professional and pre-professional training at the territorial level was essential if the potentialities of the local population were to be utilized fully in the attainment of social progress, but numerous difficulties accounted for the lack of balance between the need for, and the supply of, trained workers. Of these, two of a fundamental nature persisted in most Territories: the funds available were inadequate; and there was a lack of qualified teaching and supervisory staff and of suitable facilities for practical training, as well as a shortage of suitable candidates for social work.

144. Facilities for the professional training of social workers are provided usually in the metropolitan countries. During the period under review, graduate programmes in social work as well as pre-professional training programmes within institutions of higher learning were established only in Hong Kong, Singapore, the Gold Coast, Puerto Rico and Hawaii. In other Territories, government departments charged with the administration of social welfare services initiated training schools or courses, sometimes with the assistance of colleges or universities or voluntary organizations. While there were no permanent training facilities for the training of welfare workers in some Territories, the training of locally recruited staff, particularly in subordinate positions, became an essential part of the activities of the territorial welfare departments. With reference to in-service training and the training of auxiliary workers, in most Territories the tendency was to rely primarily upon short specialized courses to prepare auxiliary personnel for specific assignments.

III. COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

145. The initiation and expansion of community development programmes, generally on the same principles and with the same purposes with which they have been applied in other areas of the world, assumed increasing prominence in the Non-Self-Governing Territories during the period under review. The term "community development" has found broad international acceptance as the process by which the efforts of the peoples themselves together with governmental assistance may be directed towards the improvement of the economic, social and cultural conditions of the communities. It recognizes the importance of measures to develop local initiative to build a self-reliant community. It also has an important part to play in counteracting the disintegration, often brought about by economic change, of traditional social organization and values and at the same time in helping frequently dissimilar groups to achieve a sense of community.

146. Community development is not a substitute for the expansion of government services. It depends on the co-ordination of both governmental and popular effort: the channelling and use of resources, as represented in particular by government services, in a manner that helps to guide and give form to popular enthusiasm and initiative.

147. Aspects of community life and examples of each in which community development has proved capable of operating most successfully include: agriculture, by improving yields and introducing new crops; health, by encouraging interest in sanitation and eradicating endemic diseases; education, by promoting literacy and adult education; home economics, by sponsoring improvements in nutrition, clothing and child care; housing; and public amenities, by the provision or improvement of roads and water supplies. The training of local leaders and personnel is an essential factor.

148. Community development, according to these concepts, took root in many of the Territories during the period under review. In some of them, projects which were being carried out on a limited scale or on an experimental basis were integrated and expanded into territory-wide programmes. As a result of the initiative and leadership of the people, local projects were often started by the peoples themselves and carried out without waiting for government assistance and guidance. Moreover, in the latter part of the period, attempts were being made to apply community development principles and methods to the solution of difficult social problems arising in urban areas.

149. In many Territories, the early beginnings of community development were linked with literacy campaigns. These campaigns in some Territories led to a closer analysis of the motivations and incentives of the rural adult population and from there to a more comprehensive concept of adult or mass education. In the United Kingdom Territories, the change from a purely educational demonstration approach to a well-rounded programme for promoting local initiative came about slowly, but by 1953, wide recognition was being given to the broader objectives of community development. In the French and Belgian Territories, the evolution of the concept of community development took a somewhat different turn in the sense that more emphasis was given to the economic rather than the social component of development. In the Belgian Congo, mass education was conceived as an essential element of rural reform and there was a tendency to predetermine the type of knowledge and skills which could be imparted to the people to equip them for carrying out necessary rural improvements. None the less, it was found that this programme set in motion changes leading to the growth of individual initiative and group cohesiveness. In the French Territories, the Government played a less dominant role, and the types of economic activities undertaken varied according to local conditions and the degree of initiative of the people. Moreover, priorities in work were determined by the community, which also bore part of the costs. In some Territories in the Pacific, such as Netherlands New Guinea, Fiji and Papua, community development projects were generally limited to pilot projects. These projects—which were of a comprehensive nature—have not proved to be as successful an approach to the development of communities in the Pacific as was originally anticipated.

150. Examination of the methods of organization and administration of community development shows that the type of programme which appears to have found most favour in those Non-Self-Governing Territories where the techniques were furthest advanced was the country-wide programme which operates without requiring major reorganization of government machinery. This became a particular characteristic of African Territories. In some Territories, however, programmes were limited to smaller geographic areas, as in the case of pilot or demonstration projects. As regards the methods and techniques of community development, there was a gradual evolution in methodology from a concentration on campaigns to more flexible forms of group work in collaboration with village community councils or Native Authorities, voluntary associations, or agencies of the local government. However, at the end of the period, the campaign method was still a valuable means by which attention could be focused on practical problems and the people prepared to play an active part in the solution of these problems. The Committee notes the use of demonstration teams, not only in campaigns but also in work in limited areas, to create local interest and encourage effort.

151. Where community centres were used to foster community development programmes they gave uneven results. In an effort to find a more flexible approach to rural problems, the activities of clubs and voluntary associations received emphasis, and information from most Territories indicated that these associations had helped to infuse a new vitality into the community; in particular they led to the increased participation of women and youth in community development. Community councils and committees of various types emerged as a result of the need to associate larger numbers of people with the planning of rural welfare programmes and also to provide for the day-to-day maintenance of facilities developed through communal effort. There was a fairly general acceptance, however, of the principle that community development should lead to the strengthening of local government bodies rather than to the setting up of competitive institutions and services. Grants-in-aid were also in wide use as a means of promoting local initiative and self-help.

152. At the end of the period, the successes achieved in some Territories had demonstrated that communities could substantially improve their lives through community development programmes. It was also significant that in the areas where programmes had been inaugurated and expanded and where local leadership and participation had been vigorous, there had been comprehensive reforms directed at the establishment of efficient and representative local government bodies able to assume a large measure of responsibility for the programmes.

153. The Committee considers that there is no statistical information or other material evidence in the Progress Report to show that extensive community development plans had been successfully implemented in the Territories during the period under review. For instance, it was not known how much of the population of any particular Territory was covered under a community development scheme; how many new village councils or other local government bodies with executive and financial powers had been created and how many roads, schools and hospitals they had constructed with their own efforts and resources; or what the Governments concerned had contributed in terms of finance and technical assistance and advice in the implementation of community development projects. The Committee considers that it would be desirable to undertake, at an appropriate time, a project-by-project study of community development efforts in as many Territories as possible in order to evaluate properly the extent of physical achievements in this field.

IV. DEMOGRAPHIC CONDITIONS AND POPULATION TRENDS

154. The nature, size and dynamic trends of the population of a given Territory constitute one of the important factors determining its pace of social and economic development and influencing the formulation of adequate and effective plans for further advancement. It is a factor which in most Territories, at the beginning of the period under review, could not be accurately measured in terms of census data and statistics of births, deaths and other vital events. In spite of notable advances made in certain Territories in regard to censuses and the techniques of vital registration, statistical documentation on population changes remained inadequate in most Territories.

155. For only about 15 per cent of the peoples living in Non-Self-Governing Territories in 1956 were population data, adequate by international standards, available as a basis for determining changes which had taken place over the preceding decade. The greatest deficiencies were to be found among the Territories of mainland Africa, for most of which conjectural estimates rather than accurate measurements constituted the bulk of the demographic material in existence over the period as a whole. Prospects of significant and rapid improvement in the demographic field have subsequently increased, and the great majority of the Territories will participate in the world population and agricultural censuses of 1960. The Committee notes that the Territories are collaborating fully in the survey of statistical needs being carried out by the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa.

156. An analysis of the population data available leads to some crude but probably valid generalizations of significant interest for the peoples concerned. There appears to have been a consistent reduction in both the crude death-rate and the infant mortality rate.<sup>23</sup> While this represents a sizable improvement in health conditions, these remained generally at a low level. Mortality is highest in the early years; in many Territories mortality before the age of five still accounts for about 50 per cent of all deaths.

157. It may be presumed that the causes of many of these deaths were illnesses and diseases which could have been prevented; but in this respect the statistical data are grossly deficient, inter alia, because of the widespread shortage of qualified medical personnel who could correctly diagnose the causes of death. The problem of matching the supply of physicians with the needs of the population remained a formidable one in most of the Territories.<sup>24</sup>

158. In another area, that of the balance between birth-rates and death-rates, the majority of the Territories appeared to be entering a phase of demographic transition which is usually not in itself conducive to rapid rises in standards of living. The characteristics of this phase are a constantly high birth-rate, which in many Territories lies near the physiological maximum of reproduction, and a medium or low death-rate. This combination tends to increase the size of the average family in such a way that the proportion of "bread winners" dwindles progressively in relation to the growing number of children.

159. The results of a growing divergence between birth-rates and death-rates were also reflected in the census returns of some Territories in which the age structure of the population could be determined at least according to major age groups. In most of these Territories young children under the age of fifteen years comprised a large proportion (40 per cent or more) of the total population, while the proportion of persons in the age groups between fifteen and sixty-five years seldom exceeded 55 per cent.

160. The prerequisite of minimal economic progress is that production should increase at a rate in excess of that of population increase; the population of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, according to available estimates, increased during the period at a rapid rate, ranging between 1.5 and 3.5 per cent per year. In most, if not all, cases, the increase in production was at a still higher rate. While the minimum conditions of economic progress were thus met, and in some cases considerably surpassed, the fast-growing populations could not easily cope with their own needs for proper food, shelter and medical care and also for formal education and technical skills. According to the most reliable indications, at the end of the period, the fairly high rate of population increase appeared likely to continue and even to accelerate in the near future in most Territories; it was therefore clear that in all planning for economic and social development must the demographic factor be taken seriously into account in order that the purposes of development programmes should not be defeated in the long run by underestimates of the needs to be met.

V. PROGRESS IN PUBLIC HEALTH AND NUTRITION

161. The importance of health in relation to social well-being and material progress is nowhere more apparent than in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Most of them began the period under review with serious deficiencies both in the state of health of their populations generally and in the means by which standards of health could be improved. Illness and disease not only took a heavy toll of life, but also hindered improvement of the standards of living.

162. The period saw a considerable improvement in health conditions as the result of a complex of efforts on the territorial, regional and international levels. These efforts were in the direction of structural and organizational improvements in public health services, increased budgetary appropriations, decentralization of the services, campaigns designed and executed with such specific purposes as the control of a widely prevalent disease or the promotion of maternal and child welfare, and a general rise in the standards of living. Nevertheless, the period ended with a great deal still to be achieved.

163. The organizational improvements brought about in the health services in the Territories were of basic importance and their full effects could not be expected to appear until long after the period had passed. The initial minimal medical services, some of which were entirely or largely supported by missions and other voluntary agencies, were consolidated into central public medical and health services. A common feature in the medical and public health administrations of the Territories was that they depended on, and were responsible to, the public authorities, which had thus assumed responsibility for curative and preventive measures among the population as a whole. Financial and technical assistance provided through the territorial Governments, mainly from local funds but with the help in most cases of the Administering Members, made possible the expansion of the medical and public health services, the extent of which could be measured in an increase in the number of hospital beds, general or specialized, the extension of the services to the rural areas through the establishment of rural hospitals, health centres and fixed or mobile medical and health clinics, and the expansion of staff and training facilities. In many Territories, long-term health planning accompanied the formulation of the first development plans in 1946 and 1947. In view of the value and importance of such planning, the Committee hopes that it will continue to give emphasis in future development schemes.

164. The tropical and semi-tropical regions of the world, in which most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories lie, are naturally exposed to higher risks of morbidity and mortality from infectious and parasitic diseases than the temperate zones. The usually lower levels of technological advance and of living standards of the peoples concerned have added to their susceptibility to illness and disease. Among the great variety of diseases endemic to these areas are malaria, yaws, tuberculosis, smallpox, yellow fever, leprosy, venereal diseases, dysentery (amoebic and bacillary), trachoma, trypanosomiasis, bilharziasis, filariasis and intestinal parasitosis. Important successes were achieved in combating these diseases, the most notable gains being in the control of malaria, yaws, smallpox and yellow fever. In recent years the incidence of smallpox and yellow fever was diminishing. Malaria was eradicated from Cyprus, Mauritius, several United Kingdom Caribbean Territories and Singapore, and its incidence was greatly curtailed in some others through the effective control of the anopheline vector. In addition, outstanding progress was recorded in the control of leprosy and in the eradication of yaws in Territories in which the incidence of these diseases had been high.

165. One of the most heartening advances in health care during the period under review was, in fact, the organization of campaigns, sometimes on a large scale, against these major diseases. These campaigns sometimes met with outstanding success, and as mass attacks on communicable diseases, have been the first line of attack on ill-health and have cleared the way for programmes of preventive medicine. Tuberculosis was a special problem and gave every reason for anxiety. In those areas where it was a serious public health problem, measures of various kinds were being taken against this disease. In some fourteen Territories, for example, BCG vaccination, one of the valuable weapons in the prevention of tuberculosis, was being used. In other Territories surveys and pilot schemes were undertaken to determine the best approaches to the problem. In still others, combined methods of early case-finding, treatment and the use of chemotherapy were instituted, as for example in Hong Kong. Increased attention was given to research in new methods of tuberculosis control, for example in Kenya.

166. Other infectious and parasitic diseases such as trachoma and onchocerciasis (the main causes of blindness in Africa), epidemic diseases of childhood (among which poliomyelitis appeared in recent years in Kenya and Mauritius) and the dysenteries and diarrhoeas were of lesser importance, though in some years, or in particular years, they assumed the proportion of major health problems. The venereal diseases were still a matter of grave, and perhaps increasing, social importance.

167. Nevertheless, in spite of some striking successes, the control of communicable diseases in general in the Non-Self-Governing Territories was far from complete at the end of the period. The over-all amount of sickness and death which they still caused, even in terms of the incomplete data available on the basis of reliable records, was still excessive in relation to the knowledge and techniques available for their control.

168. The reduction in the rates of infant mortality<sup>25</sup> in the Territories is attributed partly to the gradual development of maternal and child health services, which in many Territories were first started in urban areas and on a voluntary basis, but later were incorporated into the territorial medical and health organizations and were extended to parts of the rural population. At the end of the period, however, such services were rudimentary or non-existent in many sparsely populated rural areas. Even where they were well established, there remained a pressing need for more paediatricians and other trained staff, as well as for more facilities for the health care of children. Programmes for safeguarding the health of school children were introduced relatively recently and, with a few exceptions, these were not as numerous nor as well organized as the maternal and child health services. An age group which appeared even more neglected was that between one and five years. For reasons difficult to establish, these children tended in many Territories to be given a secondary place in the family and to receive little attention in matters of health. The work of the Medical School of the University College at Ibadan, Nigeria, in developing programmes for the promotion of the health of pre-school-age children, appears to the Committee to warrant study and emulation in other Territories.

169. Environmental sanitation, although of serious import to the standards of health of a given community, received less attention than was due to it in most Territories. A great amount of human suffering and loss of vital energy is known to be directly related to poor sanitary conditions in the immediate environment, such as defective water supply systems, insanitary excreta disposal, and overcrowded housing conditions. The most important attacks on these problems were carried out in urban areas, often when conditions became so conspicuously bad that major improvements could no longer be delayed on the grounds of the high costs usually involved. In the rural areas, where the great majority of the populations of the Territories live, but where deficiencies in environmental sanitation did not reveal themselves in such acute and concentrated form, remedial measures were given less urgency until it was demonstrated that, as part of community development programmes, improvements in at least some of the environmental conditions could be achieved at low cost with community co-operation and assistance.

170. A good deal of work was done in several Territories towards assessing and attempting solutions to the complex problem of human nutrition. Following the pioneer work of the United Kingdom Government in its Territories before the Second World War, many conferences, seminars, surveys and promotion programmes were undertaken in various Territories after 1949, initiated or assisted in many cases by WHO, FAO, and UNICEF. The results obtained are considered significant. Some obscure pathological entities, such as kwashiorkor, were more precisely defined and questions of the prevalence and ways and means of the correction or prevention of such conditions of under-nutrition and malnutrition were more or less definitely settled.

171. Both under-nutrition and malnutrition are still to be found extensively in many Non-Self-Governing Territories, especially in Africa and Asia. Under-nutrition was found to be the rule rather than the exception in fourteen surveys carried out in various areas after 1949. Malnutrition on the other hand was found to be even more pronounced, since the bulk of the excessively low intake of calories was derived mostly from carbohydrates, while the intake of protein, especially that of animal origin, was well below normal requirements.

172. Although scientific knowledge of the treatment and prevention of most, if not all, types of malnutrition was becoming readily available, its application in the Territories most seriously affected, on a scale calculated to influence the nutritional standards of the majority of their peoples, remained at the end of the period largely a task for the future. Efforts had been made and were continuing in several Territories, in some cases with the assistance of WHO, FAO and UNICEF, and for the most part through programmes designed to improve and diversify food production and consumption, with particular emphasis on increasing the supply of protein-rich animal and vegetable foods. The Committee draws attention to the recommendations made in the Progress Report concerning measures to improve nutrition through training and education, the establishment of national nutrition committees, etc.<sup>26</sup>

173. Health education programmes were brought into being in most of the Territories during the period, and their effect upon the gradual improvement of health standards was in many cases believed to be substantial, although difficult to measure in tangible terms.

174. Virtually all of the Territories were confronted during the period with serious shortages of both professionally and technically qualified medical and health personnel. In the mainland African Territories taken as a whole there were in 1948 3.1 physicians per 100,000 population and in 1956 the number of physicians per 100,000 inhabitants was 3.6. At an early stage, it became clear that the difficulty and cost of recruiting trained staff from overseas would oblige the Territories to depend primarily on the training of local and especially indigenous persons. Training facilities, although expanded, especially at the technical levels, remained inadequate in many Territories. Moreover, even when appropriate schools for training in these fields were established, the level of general education in some cases proved insufficient to provide enough students to fill the classes in the training institutions. This situation applied particularly to the supply of students for medical training proper, and its solution appeared to depend above all on the advance and expansion of education in general.

175. Fewer difficulties were encountered in the training of indigenous people for the health services at a lower level, and schools for medical and nursing assistants, midwives, sanitary inspectors and other categories of staff were established or multiplied in many Territories during the period. Some of these schools in the course of time accumulated sufficient experience and teaching staff to make it possible to expand them into full medical and nursing schools with formal curricula and wide recognition. Some of the outstanding examples in this respect are Hong Kong University and the medical schools established in the Belgian Congo (two), and in French West Africa, Nigeria, East Africa, Madagascar, Fiji and British West Indies (one each). However, the output of these educational institutions remained small in comparison with the existing needs, and the Committee hopes that the noteworthy advances made so far in this respect will continue at a more rapid pace in the years to come.

176. The assistance given by the Administering Members, as well as at the international level in such forms as United Nations technical assistance, which proved so valuable during the period under review, appears to the Committee to be no less urgently needed in the future until the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories through their own institutions are able to cope much more effectively than at present with the problem of health in all its phases from the control of communicable disease to the training of professional and technical personnel at all levels.

VI. RACE RELATIONS AND HUMAN RIGHTS

177. Discrimination on grounds of race or colour continued to exist in some Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was still to be found in its most acute form in African Territories, where immigrant communities are present. In all these Territories the indigenous inhabitants constitute the vast majority of the population, and the European group is often an extremely small minority, though the latter has exercised special political, social and economic privileges which are denied to the former. Not only was inferior treatment accorded in varying degrees to indigenous inhabitants in the field of human rights and fundamental freedoms, but in the economic and educational fields and in the exercise of political rights also, their role was restricted. In some cases, discriminatory practices survived because of personal or group attitudes; in others they were reinforced by law and regulation. The Committee considers that discriminatory policies and practices based on distinctions on the grounds of race or colour tend to give rise to racial antagonisms which endanger the balanced economic, social and educational development of the Territories in conditions of stability and harmony.

178. In many Territories, a great deal of progress was achieved during the period in eliminating racial discrimination and in improving race relations generally. It is significant that the Territories where the greatest advances were made were those in which the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the development of their Territories had reached its highest level; the Territories where race relations still gave rise to the most difficult problems were among those where such participation was least developed.

179. Official statements made on race relations by the authorities concerned during the period varied from observations recording the absence of discriminatory practices to the categorical condemnation of such practices and the enunciation of positive measures for the promotion of better race relations. In general, policy statements on race relations tended to emphasize that racial interdependence and co-operation were important to the development and advancement of Territories, particularly those with plural communities, but that the key to the final eradication of discrimination and antagonisms lay in the education of public opinion rather than in legal procedures. There is no evidence in the Progress Report to show that public opinion among the vast majority of the inhabitants of many of these Territories supports in any way the continuance of discriminatory practices. On the contrary, there is every reason to believe that a strong current feeling against such practices exists. The Committee considers that suitable legislation, supported by other constructive measures, such as community education, will be a great step forward towards the eradication of these practices.

180. At the beginning of the period under review, the broad employment structure of the public services in many Territories, particularly in Africa, was one in which European officers occupied the senior positions. Europeans and, in the East and Central African Territories, also Asians, largely or wholly manned the middle grades of technical and clerical appointments, and in-indigenous persons occupied the subordinate and unskilled posts. In some of these Territories, separate sections of the public service with distinct wage and salary scales and other conditions of employment existed for different classes of employees on the basis of race, even though admission to senior posts was open to persons of all races. In other Territories, where the principle of non-discrimination in public employment was not only accepted but generally applied, there was a preponderance of officers recruited from abroad in the senior ranks of the services, owing to the lack of qualified indigenous candidates. The Committee notes that more specific measures were taken in the latter part of the period in a large number of Territories in order to increase facilities for the training and higher education of indigenous persons to fill higher posts, to establish unified public services and to bring about full participation by the local inhabitants in the public services; by the end of the period there was in the great majority of the Territories no bar to the promotion of indigenous persons to the highest posts in the civil services.

181. In a number of Territories with plural communities, the racial pattern in private employment resembled that of the public services in the sense that Europeans or other immigrants usually occupied the managerial and supervisory posts while the indigenous persons were clerical and, in greater numbers, manual workers. Moreover, at the beginning of the period there existed in most African Territories different basic labour laws for different races, or differentiations were made according to the status of the worker depending on racial origin. Discrimination of this kind had become entrenched, particularly in Territories where industrialization had brought indigenous workers into active or potential competition with non-indigenous workers, and the privileged position of the latter group became a source of resentment to the other groups. During the period, there was a marked tendency in several Territories towards the abolition of dual legislation and practice. Separate trade union legislation for different racial groups largely disappeared, but separate trade unions for these groups still existed at the end of the period in a number of Territories.

182. In the Caribbean region and the more highly developed of the Asian and Pacific Territories, integration of the immigrant and indigenous communities continued to advance throughout the period in the economic as in other fields. But in other Territories, such as Papua, Netherlands New Guinea and Fiji, and also notably in the African Territories, there continued to prevail in varying degree a "compartmentalization" of economic activities in each of which one particular racial group predominated. In these Territories, the principal avenue of economic advancement for the indigenous populations was the production of marketable and exportable agricultural crops and animal products. With the help of co-operative organization, rationalized marketing, price stabilization schemes, and improved crops and techniques, the indigenous people were coming to play an increasingly important and profitable part in production for export as well as for local consumption.

183. On the other hand, plantation farming and mining, where the participation of the indigenous inhabitants is limited largely to unskilled labour, the wholesale export and import trade, the complex of economic services such as banking, construction, engineering and transportation which have developed around it, and the processing and manufacturing industries were, in many

Territories, still owned or controlled mainly by European or other non-indigenous groups. The part played in these enterprises by indigenous people had generally not yet progressed far beyond employment up to, and in a few cases including, the managerial level; their participation in ownership and management was otherwise confined, with few exceptions, to petty retail trade, road transport and other small enterprises. In some Territories, the indigenous inhabitants were excluded from ownership and exploitation of mineral rights, thus limiting their opportunities for economic advancement.

184. Nevertheless, in most cases the dividing lines between compartments of economic activity were no longer fixed either by policy or by prejudiced conceptions of the capacity of indigenous persons to take part in more complex branches of the economy; and the lines were, in fact, being crossed at an increasing rate, limited mainly by the time needed to acquire skills and capital. Most Governments and many private enterprises were actively encouraging the steps by which indigenous people could play a fuller part in all branches of the economy as, for example, promotion in employment from unskilled to skilled labour and from there to supervisory and managerial positions; the provision of credit and training to encourage the establishment of independent enterprises; and the reform of land tenure and the organization of loan finance for the modernization and expansion of agriculture and cattle raising. A favourable climate for these developments was being established especially in Territories where the people were acquiring a full share in the formulation of economic and educational policies and in the planning and implementation of programmes of economic development.

185. For many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, economic policy statements made during the period under review emphasized the importance of the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in economic development and free access for all inhabitants to all branches of economic activity, whether in agriculture, industry or commerce. In a number of Territories, special measures were adopted to remove obstacles to the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in agricultural and industrial developments, and to encourage local inhabitants to take a greater share in export production and external trade. Moreover, most of the discriminatory provisions against indigenous inhabitants with respect to their participation in specific economic functions were abolished or liberalized during the period under review.

186. In the majority of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the disposal and use of the land, which is a basic element of the social structure as well as the economy, has a direct and fundamental bearing on all aspects of race relations. In most Territories, Governments exercised various forms of control over lands and land rights for the protection of the interests of the indigenous peoples; in a number of Territories non-indigenous participation in economic development was encouraged as a matter of policy. In some African Territories, considerable land grants or leases to non-indigenous persons had been made before the period and in the immediate post-war years, but in most of the Territories the process of alienation had been greatly diminished by the end of the period. Where conflicts existed, they usually arose from the situations created by previous alienations and by changes in the attitudes of indigenous populations brought about by increases in population and a growing desire for higher standards of living. In some Territories, such as the Belgian Congo, Nyasaland, North Borneo and the Cook Islands, the extent of some areas previously alienated was reduced, and at the same time there was some progress towards a modification of indigenous land tenure systems to facilitate economic development.

187. Education is one of the most important fields in which the indigenous peoples have been at a disadvantage in terms of facilities, and opportunities. While the principle of providing education to all children of school age without discrimination on grounds of race through an integrated system of education was accepted in all Territories, the principle was not yet universally applied. In a number of Territories, separate systems of education and separate schooling facilities existed at both the secondary and primary levels. The disparities in the standards of education indicate inequalities that invariably place the indigenous population at a disadvantage. There was evidence of some progress during the period under review, in that in some Territories, those under French administration, for example, separate school systems were replaced by a unified educational system for all children without distinction of race, colour or creed. In others, a policy of gradual integration was adopted. By contrast with the situation at the primary and secondary levels, the institutions of higher learning in the Non-Self-Governing Territories are interracial in practice as well as in principle, and are free from racial discrimination. The Committee has stated its views on this matter more fully in the chapter on educational conditions in the present report.

188. The Committee recognizes and welcomes the progress achieved during the period in the abolition of a number of forms of racial discrimination and in the improvement of race relations in many Territories. It looks upon racial discrimination not only as a violation of human rights but also as a deterrent to progress in all fields. It is the Committee's considered view that, whatever the origins of the policies and practices of discrimination on the grounds of race and colour, their continuance in any form can only perpetuate disunity; therefore, unremitting efforts should be made towards securing their abolition as soon as possible and towards promoting racial harmony. The Committee considers that the problem of race relations should be attacked in all fields of activity in the Territories; measures to solve it should include the extension to all inhabitants of the full exercise of basic political rights, such as the right to vote. It considers that the establishment of political equality among all members of multiracial communities will prove the quickest way to destroy discrimination and the minority privileges which often give rise to it and to create nations united by a common loyalty transcending race. It is on wise and statesmanlike action in all fields, including the political, therefore, that reliance should be placed for the elimination of racial discrimination.

VII. STATUS OF WOMEN

189. Economic and social changes in the post-war period materially altered the role of women in traditional society in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and enhanced their role in others. In primarily rural societies with a subsistence economy, the change was evidenced by the growing relaxation of old prejudices against daughters receiving formal schooling and a preference amongst male members of the present generation for spouses possessing the equivalent of their own educational and cultural attainments. In areas, such as Alaska, Hawaii, the Caribbean Territories and parts of Nigeria and Sierra Leone, where women had already achieved equal social and legal status with that of men, the trend was towards the greater participation of women in the political, social and economic life of the community.

190. The shift towards a money economy in many of the Territories gave many women the possibility of achieving a degree of economic independence as a result of wider opportunities to produce goods for the market, rather than for subsistence, and to enter paid employment. In some Territories, such as those in West Africa, where by custom women have always been permitted to dispose freely of the yield of their own property or to take up gainful activity, a class of women traders had always existed; many of these formed occupational associations or co-operatives. There was an increase in the number of women in paid employment in almost all Territories, and the percentage of women in the total labour force also increased in many Territories.<sup>27</sup> The majority of women workers were employed in the lower paid positions and, with the exception of the French and United States Territories, where the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value was applied, women generally received less pay than men for work of equivalent value, except in government employment in some other Territories. The Committee stressed the importance of ensuring equal remuneration for men and women workers engaged in work of equal value. While some members considered that equality should be achieved through processes of collective bargaining or other machinery, others took the view that the principle should be established by legislation even where the actual wage levels could best be determined by collective bargaining.

191. There was some increase in the number of women entering the various professions. At the end of the period, there were more women teachers and nurses in almost all Territories, and in some of them, more women were also successfully entering professions such as medicine and law. The trend was most marked in those Territories where higher education facilities had been long established.

192. Almost all Non-Self-Governing Territories had legislation for the protection of women workers in matters such as night work, maternity leave, and other welfare measures. Labour legislation was revised in many Territories to provide better protection of women. Such questions as apprenticeship training, higher opportunities in industry and participation in workers' organizations were, however, only beginning to assume importance in some of the more industrially advanced Territories and were not yet of any significance for women workers.

193. If women are not only to attain but also fully to exercise equal rights with men and to discharge their responsibilities on equal terms with men, it is essential that they receive equal opportunities in education and vocational training.<sup>28</sup> With the improvement in education in the post-war period, there was an increase in the enrolment of girls in nearly all Territories. At the primary level, this was accompanied by a reduced lag in the enrolment of girls as compared with boys. There was some reduction in wastage, but the improvement was smaller for girls than for boys. In the last few years of the period, the increase in the number of girls enrolled gained momentum, and in secondary schools the teaching of vocational training subjects was strengthened and expanded. A more integrated approach in the teaching of home-making through courses in domestic science, home economics and child care received greater emphasis.

194. Professional training for girls continued to be limited, on the whole, to teaching and nursing. In this area, more opportunity for training was becoming available, and there was a growing recognition of the need to raise the social status as well as to improve the material conditions of these workers and to prepare them for responsibility and leadership. With the establishment of university colleges in the Territories, higher education was becoming more accessible to women than previously, when the only opportunities were offered in institutions overseas. Nevertheless, the disparity between the education of girls and that of boys extended to this level of education, and, in general, it was being reduced only at a fairly slow rate.

195. There was growing recognition during the period of the important role of women in the progress and welfare of the community. In most Territories, special measures were taken by the Administering Members to raise the level of education of adult women. Such informal education for women was undertaken by welfare and community development services through the organization of women's groups which concentrated on the home and family aspects of social betterment. In many Territories, the provision of maternity and child welfare services helped to stimulate the interest of women in their own welfare. Through such activities, women were encouraged to play a vital part in community development schemes.

196. Generally speaking, therefore, the process of social and economic change opened up new opportunities to women in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Moreover, marriage under territorial or, in the case of French Territories, metropolitan legislation, was giving to women an individual legal status with personal and property rights different from those under customary law. By the end of the period, however, these opportunities were to be found mainly in urban areas. Even though much remained to be done, the progress achieved reflected a change in social and official attitudes towards the status of women, and a recognition of their rights as individuals.

VIII. LABOUR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

197. With the accelerated growth of wage employment in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, labour problems assumed new dimensions and greater complexity and demanded greater concern than in the past with the broader social and economic implications of labour policy. By the end of the period, most Territories had labour legislation establishing standards of health, safety and welfare, regulating hours of work, prescribing a minimum age for employment, and providing protection for wages. The labour policies enunciated during the period embraced such aspects as the improvement of labour relations; freedom of association for workers; manpower problems such as unemployment, migratory labour and labour efficiency; and the approach to general measures of social security.

198. Despite the existence of factors which tended to retard the development of collective action in labour relations, there was a steady gain in the role of trade union organizations in the Territories during the period under review. The right of association became fully recognized in most Territories and the number of employers' and workers' organizations increased considerably in United Kingdom Territories and substantially in French Territories.<sup>29</sup>

199. On the other hand, the use of collective bargaining in fixing minimum wages and regulating hours and conditions of work varied a good deal. In the United Kingdom Territories, while collective bargaining was the objective desired, it was attained to a limited extent only under the prevailing economic conditions, wide use being made of joint industrial councils, statutory wages councils and advisory boards. Throughout the period, there was a continuing expansion in the scope of collective agreements, wages councils legislation and joint standing machinery; and minimum wage-fixing machinery was restricted in its application in order not to prejudice the future development of collective bargaining. In French Territories, minimum wage rates, which were established by government regulation, under the provisions of the 1952 Labour Code, could be supplemented by collective agreements. The extent to which this was done varied; such agreements were frequently made in French West Africa and French Equatorial Africa. In United States Territories, collective bargaining procedures were well developed and, at the same time, minimum wage-fixing machinery prescribed wage rates for an important percentage of workers. In Papua and the Belgian Congo, collective bargaining and collective agreements were not used in the regulation of wages, hours and conditions of work, which were instead established principally through government regulations.

200. In its 1958 report, the Committee, while recognizing the necessity for making use of statutory machinery for fixing wages, hours and conditions of employment, expressed the wish to see take place, as soon as practicable, a transition to negotiation of collective agreements between employers' and workers' organizations. In general, the metropolitan Governments accepted over the period the proposition that collective bargaining should be promoted, and collective negotiations and bargaining were in practice becoming increasingly the means by which wages, hours and certain conditions of work were being determined. Nevertheless, the Committee considers that the extent to which the scope of the activities of trade unions may be limited by detailed government regulation of wages, hours and conditions of work is an aspect which requires constant vigilance. The Committee notes the observation made by the ILO in the African Labour Survey, 1958, that in the British Central and East African Territories, collective bargaining between workers' and employers' organizations was virtually unknown, and a number of the reports of the labour departments of the Territories concerned gave instances of the unwillingness of particular employers to meet trade union representatives for purposes of negotiation. It was clear, the Survey adds, that in many Territories in this area the atmosphere for collective negotiation was far from propitious; social distances were great and unions were in many instances small and weak, and employers were not prepared to regard them as representative. On the other hand, it was pointed out that in Kenya, there were by 1956 already fifty-seven joint consultative and negotiating bodies, and in Northern Rhodesia, collective bargaining had operated in the important mining industry since 1949. Moreover, there had been considerable progress in this area in these and other Territories since the end of the period under review.

201. The Committee notes the existence in some Territories of complicated legal requirements for indigenous trade unions, in particular regarding their formation, recognition and registration, which do not seem likely to promote the rapid development of these organizations. While conditions in some Territories may have made it more difficult than in others to proceed far with the simplification of formalities and special legal requirements, and although many of these requirements may be to protect the indigenous worker himself, the Committee considers that the aim of policy should be to simplify the requirements, even if the means by which this is done may have to vary in the light of local conditions.

202. Separate trade union legislation for different racial groups largely disappeared during the period. The Committee considers that, as a matter of principle and in view of the difficulties and tensions which inevitably arise where separate legislation is in force, the objective of policy should be to apply to all sections of the community uniform legislation on the right of workers to organize themselves. Moreover, separate trade unions for the different racial groups still existed in a number of Territories at the end of the period. While freedom of association necessarily implies the right of members of an association to determine the criteria of membership, the Committee is concerned at the dangers inherent in organization along racial lines. It considers that trade unions should be constituted without regard to race, national origin or political affiliations and should determine their trade union objectives on the basis of the common economic and social interests of all workers.

203. The development of workers' organizations in the Territories was, in general, inadequate for the extensive development of collective bargaining practices, partly as a result of fluctuating membership of unions, insignificant dues-paying membership, jurisdictional conflicts and personal and political rivalries. It appeared clear in several cases that a major contribution to effective industrial relations in the Territories could be made if more workers recognized the need for representative organizations based on a stable dues-paying membership to represent their industrial interests. The Committee is confident that this development will take place; it can be accelerated by measures to improve the training of trade union leaders and organizers. Information before the Committee at previous sessions showed that opportunities for trade union education were provided from many sources. It is of the opinion that there are three fields in which education in industrial relations can be of particular value: (a) facilities for leaders of management and labour to study general labour-management problems and human relations in industry; (b) facilities for trade union officials to familiarize themselves with appropriate methods for their day-to-day activities such as general administrative methods, accounting, promotion of membership drives and so on; and (c) facilities, within the framework of workers' educational programmes, for education of the worker and trade union member in trade union principles.

204. The Committee notes that employment offices were set up in many of the Territories and that in some Territories, special efforts were made to assist young persons to obtain employment. It welcomes this development, as a means not only of putting employers and workers in touch with each other, but also of carrying out studies and inquiries which could help to lead to the more efficient and scientific use of the available manpower resources.

205. Progress was made towards the abolition of compulsory or forced labour, which by the end of the period was to be found in a few Territories (Belgian Congo, Bechuanaland, Gambia, Kenya, Uganda, Fiji and Papua) and comprised one or more of the forms of compulsory labour (cultivation of food crops, portage and public works) which, under the terms of the 1930 ILO Convention, might be used during a transitional period "for public purposes only and as an exceptional measure". In addition, although the legislation in a number of Territories provided penal sanctions for violation of labour contracts, such factors as the general trend of social development, the replacement of written contracts by oral agreements of short or indeterminate duration, and also the modernization of labour legislation, reduced the number of prosecutions and the scope of penalties, and, in some instances, led to the outright abolition of penal sanctions.

206. Trends and policies in wages have been discussed by the Committee in connexion with the productivity of labour.<sup>30</sup> In many Territories, new laws relating to hours of work were adopted and in others, existing laws were extended and improved. There was a general trend towards a progressive reduction in actual hours of work.

207. Considerable progress was reported in diminishing the harmful practices and abuses associated with the employment of children and young workers. While these require remedial steps on a broad front, experience showed that they could be attacked without delay through labour legislation. In respect of measures for the protection of women wage-earners, the Committee noted that, while many of these had long been embodied in the legislation of the Territories, further advances were made during the period.

IX. SOCIAL SECURITY

208. Although social security systems of wide scope, such as are found in the highly industrialized countries, have not been established in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, except in Cyprus, Gibraltar and the United States Virgin Islands, measures designed to give workers effective protection against occupational and other risks were adopted or broadened in many Territories during the period, and the importance of such measures as one of the means of establishing stable labour forces became widely recognized.

209. In 1946 the legislation of most Territories contained provisions providing compensation for industrial accidents. In many instances, these were broadened or modified in the intervening period. In a number of Territories, where different scales of compensation were applied to the indigenous and non-indigenous inhabitants, the differences were either reduced, as for example, in Northern Rhodesia, or completely abolished, as in French Equatorial Africa, French West Africa and French Somaliland. Moreover, the systems in some Territories were extended to cover any accident and to apply to all workers. In some other Territories, coverage was also extended to agricultural workers, but in others, restrictive clauses excluded wage-earners in certain occupations from the scope of regulations or were based on the cause or nature of the accidents or the nature of the undertaking.

210. Regulations concerned with compensation for occupational diseases were adopted in a number of Territories, and existing schemes were improved in respect of the extension of medical coverage and compensation in cases of temporary disability, permanent disability and death. Medical services for workers, provided by employers, were introduced in a number of Territories; there was also an increasing trend towards the payment of sickness benefits in cash. Measures for the benefit of working women were adopted in a number of Territories as well.

211. Contributory old-age pension schemes were introduced in the Belgian Congo, French West Africa, Madagascar, Gibraltar, Cyprus, the Falkland Islands, Singapore and Mauritius. Inquiries into the feasibility of such schemes were made in the latter part of the period in a number of other Territories, especially those in the Caribbean area. The Committee expresses the hope that steps will be taken to implement the proposals resulting from these inquiries, as well as to conduct inquiries in other Territories where the extent of economic development would suggest the feasibility of such measures.

212. In most Territories, family allowance schemes were either non-existent throughout the period or were restricted chiefly to public servants and were limited in scope. More comprehensive schemes on behalf of broader categories of wage-earners were introduced in the French Overseas Territories and in the Belgian Congo. The French system, introduced in 1956, consisted of four types of benefits: household allowance, ante-natal grants, maternity allowances and family allowances. They were financed by compulsory employers' contributions, supplemented in some cases by public funds, and administered by boards composed of equal numbers of officials and representatives of the workers and of the employers. Under the Belgian system, introduced in 1952, the allowances were the responsibility of the employers, and although the majority of them applied the legislation, it was found that in small and medium-size enterprises, employers were apt to favour the employment of unmarried workers. In the Committee's view, family allowances associated with employment may give rise to difficulties and should not be considered as a satisfactory substitute for the establishment, for all workers, of wage levels enabling them to maintain a suitable standard of living.

X. CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETIES

213. Although the co-operative movement had been established in a number of the Non-Self-Governing Territories prior to the Second World War, it was not until the period under review that large-scale expansion of the system took place under the impetus of economic growth, and that increased stress by the metropolitan Governments on co-operative development and co-operatives assumed greater importance in economic development. The growth of the movement was, in many Territories, closely associated with the expansion of the market economy and the shift by small farmers from subsistence farming to the cultivation of cash crops; the acceptance of the co-operative concept among the indigenous populations could be attributed to their awareness of the need for more effective systems of organization and production.

214. The fivefold increase in the number of co-operatives between 1945 and 1955<sup>31</sup> is perhaps the best measure of the continuous development which the movement has experienced during the period. It had particular success in the United Kingdom Territories, where the number of registered societies rose from 1,881 in 1945 to over 9,000 in 1958, their paid-up membership from 261,000 to 1,158,000 and the value of produce marketed from £1.9 million to £48.9 million. Co-operative development was uneven, however. In some Territories, such as those under United Kingdom administration, although official policy actively supported the movement, its development was retarded by a number of factors, among which were the need for trained and efficient staff and for a full understanding of the principles and practice of co-operation. In a number of other Territories, including the Belgian Congo and those under French administration, the growth of a general co-operative movement was a comparatively recent development.

215. Increasing stress was laid on the development of credit co-operatives, often associated closely with marketing societies. The number of credit societies in the Territories increased approximately four times between 1945 and 1956,<sup>32</sup> and their financial strength increased far more. In some Territories, thrift and credit societies established co-operative banks which are bound to have an increasing influence in the financial life of these Territories. In the United Kingdom Territories, loans granted by co-operative societies to their members totalled £12.7 million in 1958.

216. Co-operative produce-marketing societies were, at the end of the period under review, the second largest group of co-operative societies in the Territories, and were, in fact, more important in most areas than any other group of co-operatives. The development of agricultural, as distinct from marketing, co-operatives appears to have been rather slow. They will no doubt have a more important part to play when farming becomes more mechanized and the lack of education amongst the rural inhabitants, the fragmentation of land holdings and, in some cases, the system of land tenure, cease to be a hindrance to undertakings on a large scale.

217. Although the number of consumer co-operatives increased about tenfold,<sup>33</sup> the Territories do not seem to have attained a stage of development sufficient to foster and develop a prosperous consumers' movement. Consumer co-operatives encountered serious difficulties in most areas largely owing to lack of knowledge, capital and experience, as well as other factors. Nevertheless, in the United Kingdom Territories their sales totalled £12.9 million in 1958. The Committee noted the existence in the Territories of other forms of co-operative activity such as housing and building societies, which made substantial progress during the period, and fishermen's societies and mutual aid societies.

218. It is generally recognized that the development of strong central bodies is necessary for the establishment of country-wide services. Relatively little progress in this direction was made during the period, and Governments, in many instances, undertook responsibility for such functions as promotion, education, supervision and auditing. The co-operative movement had more success, however, in the creation of regional unions servicing specialized groups of co-operatives. Unions of the product-marketing type became numerous in African Territories.

XI. MASS COMMUNICATIONS

219. During the period under review there was an increasing demand in the Non-Self-Governing Territories for effective audio-visual media to satisfy the need for information and for the development of means to facilitate the formulation and expression of public opinion. While in some Territories the use of mass communication media made little or no progress, in general, mass communication media progressed quantitatively: more newspapers and periodicals were published, circulation figures increased, more radio stations went on the air, the number of broadcasting hours and receiving sets increased, a greater number of cinema seats were at the disposal of the public, and there was an increase in the number of cinema vans for use in rural areas and in the number of films produced locally. There was, especially in the African region, not only an increase in the number of newspapers and periodicals published, but also in the number of languages, often vernacular, in which these publications were issued. There were, however, several obstacles to the further development of the Press. One of these was the problem of widespread illiteracy, which, in some Territories, embraced more than 90 per cent of the population. A second obstacle was the often low journalistic standard of the publications. A third was the shortage and high price of newsprint and the frequently obsolete nature of printing equipment.

220. Of all the mass communication media, broadcasting made the greatest headway during the period. There were very few Territories which, by 1956, had no direct broadcasting or rediffusion facilities of their own, and in most others, such facilities increased considerably in power and in transmission time, while the number of individually owned as well as communal receiving sets was multiplied several times. The Administering Members concerned laid great stress on the development of broadcasting facilities and provided substantial financial and technical assistance for this purpose.

221. The need for the professional training of indigenous persons, in particular for service with the mass communication media, became increasingly apparent. Journalists were sent abroad for study courses with reputable newspapers and, in some Territories and regions, journalist training courses were organized. Broadcasting stations in the metropolitan countries assisted their counterparts in the Territories with staff, technical advice and transcriptions, and provided training facilities on their premises. Training in the production of films and other audio-visual aids was carried out in the administering countries with well-established production companies, locally with such companies or with newly formed territorial production units, and at specially arranged film "schools".

222. All this, however, can be considered only as the first step; many more must follow before the mass communication media as a whole can render adequate services to Territories in process of rapid change.

D. Educational conditions

I. GENERAL POLICIES AND DEVELOPMENTS

223. In most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories at the beginning of the period under review, only the minimum foundations of educational systems had been laid; in many, their main practical functions had been to produce semi-skilled clerical and kindred workers for the administrative services and for commercial employment and, on a broader scale, to provide the rudiments of literacy, in close association with the activities of the religious missions, which had assumed the greater part of the responsibility for opening, staffing and running schools. On the one hand, illiteracy was patently widespread in several Territories, and on the other hand, the present sense of urgent need to expand educational facilities on a large scale and in a short time was not shared by public opinion. Among major difficulties facing such expansion were the inadequacy of buildings and other capital equipment and supplies and, most serious of all because of its cost in terms of time, the absence of enough trained teachers and administrative personnel. Moreover, some of the early post-war educational policies, although providing in all cases for an expansion of the systems, contained differences in approach deriving from ultimate objectives pursued in the Territories themselves: for some large groups of Territories, educational policy was designed as part of the process of gradual development towards self-government, and for others, it was shaped to fit conceptions of the assimilation of the Territories with the metropolitan countries. This led to differences of emphasis in matters of curricula and the development of various levels and types of education.

224. In some cases, advance towards self-government or independence preceded the establishment of adequate education systems. The last information transmitted on most of the Territories immediately before the attainment of self-government showed that this came about when their educational development was still far from complete. The last reported illiteracy rates were in most cases relatively high; free and compulsory primary education remained in many cases merely a distant goal; and the output of persons trained in skills and professions was not sufficient to supply the existing demands for their services.

225. Except for a few uniquely situated Territories with relatively small populations and a longer history of development, the same general description can be applied to the Non-Self-Governing Territories as a whole. By the end of the period under review, the objectives of educational policy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories had been more clearly stated and understood than ever before and were being more positively and vigorously related to the needs of peoples approaching full self-government. The expansion of facilities, of enrolments and of the output of educated and trained persons was in full swing almost everywhere and the progress made was impressive in comparison with conditions in 1946. Yet the gaps and the shortcomings in the educational systems and in the quantity and quality of their product remained large, not only in relation to the standards now universally deemed desirable, but also in relation to the immediate needs of the Territories themselves for purposes of economic and administrative development. The possibilities of still more rapid expansion of education continued to encounter some or all of a number of difficulties, notably the competing claims of other services on public funds, the still under-developed or unbalanced economies of many Territories, the rising costs of building, materials and personnel, and the effect of population increases of 2 to 3 per cent per annum.

226. Throughout the period under review, the Committee formulated definitions of education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, determined the objectives to be sought through the implementation of the principles thus defined, and noted with gratification the attempt of all the Administering Members to apply those principles to their policies. It considers that those definitions remain basically valid and warrant reaffirmation as an illustration of the evolution of a United Nations point of view that combines the most enlightened conceptions and practices of the Administering Members with those of States whose own knowledge and experience have made a particularly valuable contribution in this field.

227. In its special studies on educational conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories in the years 1950, 1953 and 1956,<sup>34</sup> the Committee emphasized the crucial importance of education to progress in all other fields of development and particularly as a prerequisite to the raising of levels of living. Education was also considered to be an integral part of general progress aiming at the highest possible development of the individual in a changing society, as it trained him to use the tools of economic, social and political advancement towards the attainment of a full measure of self-government. The Committee asserted that it was necessary to establish systems of primary, secondary and higher education that would meet the needs of all, regardless of sex, race, religion or social or economic status, and would provide adequate preparation for citizenship. In resolution 1049 (XI) of 20 February 1957, the General Assembly recommended to the Administering Members that, according to the requirements of the territorial populations, they should consider the formulation of plans, with targets and dates—as was already the practice in some Territories—for various aspects of educational development.

228. In its most recent study on educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee noted that the Administering Members generally subscribed to the principles and objectives set forth by the General Assembly and were seeking rapidly to achieve the broadest possible extension of full educational opportunities to the peoples concerned. Evidence of appreciable further progress could be found in increased facilities, enrolments and expenditures; yet it was equally clear that there remained vast areas where educational opportunities did not meet the needs of the peoples and their urgent demands for education. One of the most obvious gaps in these achievements was the still high incidence of illiteracy reported from many Territories: indeed the Committee concluded, as it had nine years before, that in the majority of the Territories the eradication of illiteracy was a problem of the utmost urgency.<sup>35</sup> When the General Assembly considered the Committee's report, it took particular note, in adopting resolution 1463 (XIV) of 12 December 1959, that the progress made in solving this problem had been "very slow".

229. The dimensions of the educational tasks still to be undertaken—and to an ever-increasing extent by the populations themselves through their own elected institutions and with their own resources—should not be allowed to minimize the positive results achieved since 1946. The Committee notes, as one striking means of illustrating the progress made, that UNESCO has been able to calculate an approximate enrolment increase of 90 per cent in all Territories in the ten years after 1946.<sup>36</sup> This represented an annual increase in school enrolments of 6.6 per cent over the decade, which was more than double the rate of increase of the school-age population. Of no less importance were an improvement in quality, more difficult to state in statistical terms, and a relative expansion both of facilities and of output at the secondary and higher levels and in the field of vocational training. It was also true that the facilities so far provided and the results so far achieved had in many cases served to stimulate an ever-greater demand for educational opportunities.

230. The Committee has also had a number of occasions to observe that the principle of systematic planning towards definite educational objectives—a principle fully endorsed by the General Assembly—had gained general acceptance among the Administering Members. This was, in fact, another of the more striking features of the period. Administering Members and territorial authorities formulated successive and comprehensive plans to expand the educational systems. As a rule, educational expansion was planned as part of wider programmes for economic and social development, supported by the provision of funds from the Administering Members; in this broader setting, education was generally given an important place. With the development of territorial political institutions, the extension or reformulation of educational plans and the revision of time-tables and the establishment of new targets and dates became, in many cases, the responsibility of those institutions. The Committee finds it gratifying to see the principles of forward planning maintained by the elected representatives of the populations, and also to see, in many cases, the application of those principles made subject to frequent revision and improvement in keeping with changing conceptions of the requirements, not only of the educational systems in themselves, but also of the other main aspects of social, economic and administrative development with which education is so closely linked.

231. In itself, this process of gradual transfer of responsibility to territorial bodies having a popular base was a further significant characteristic of the period. In the broader context, this trend was an essential part of constitutional change. Moreover, it has been the consistent view of the Committee that in the field of formal education, the attainment of the objectives of education can be ensured only when the inhabitants of the Territories are associated to an effective degree in the formulation of educational policy and in the administration of the educational system. It has therefore been considered the responsibility of the Administering Members concerned, not only to devote their own experience and resources to establishing the educational systems, but also to make it possible for public opinion to be brought increasingly to bear on the direction and further development of those systems, including their financing.

232. With fundamental changes taking place rapidly in the Territories, leading ever closer to the attainment of the objectives of Chapter XI of the Charter, it became all the more urgent to bring the people themselves to decide what forms of education they required and how education could contribute to the exercise of civic responsibilities. In its resolution 1050 (XI) of 20 February 1957, the General Assembly recommended that the Administering Members should intensify their efforts to establish, in Territories where it did not already exist, local machinery provided with sufficient financial resources to perform its functions and staffed by duly qualified indigenous personnel responsible for the formulation of educational policy and the implementation of educational programmes.

233. The extent to which the process of the participation of the inhabitants in educational policies and in the administration of education advanced in the Territories after 1946 was determined principally by constitutional changes. It was also governed in part by developments in local government within the Territories, especially where these involved responsibility for local finances, and more generally by developments in the philosophy of education, mass education movements and community development, and the growth of more articulate forms of public opinion. In all these matters there was a great deal of diversity in the pace and nature of change, which in some Territories was fostered by long-term policies, while in others it tended to be withheld until a late date in the political evolution of the Territories. It was especially in the latter half of the period that in an appreciable number of Territories educational policies were being determined directly by wholly or largely representative territorial legislatures or by boards of education with delegated policy-making powers. In most of these Territories, in the Caribbean region, in Asia and in Africa, an elected representative subsequently assumed ministerial responsibility. Other forms of participation of indigenous inhabitants in educational policies and administration were developed in varying degree throughout the period, such as representation in central councils at the federal and regional level which determined, or advised in the determination of, educational policies, participation in voluntary agencies which shared with government administrative or advisory responsibilities, and membership of teachers' associations or parent-teacher groups represented on territorial and local educational bodies. On the other hand, during the period under review there were Territories in which, according to the Progress Report, the inhabitants were not participating in the shaping of educational policies and programmes or where this participation was just beginning to develop.

234. The Committee has noted that a trend in the development of local (as opposed to territorial) control over education was to be found in the devolution of administrative authority from centralized control. In a number of African Territories under the United Kingdom administration, for example, local education authorities co-ordinated with African local government authorities the work of religious missions or other voluntary agencies in their districts, planned future developments and allocated funds raised locally or provided by the central Government. The Committee has welcomed these developments, but has been aware of the difficulties which were likely to arise when local education authorities had the administrative powers but not the financial resources necessary to exercise their responsibilities for primary education.

235. Other forms of increased local responsibility for educational control have been noted by the Committee, such as the appointment of indigenous people to executive posts in the territorial administration, the staffing of schools with indigenous teachers, and the representation of teachers and parent-teacher groups on territorial and local educational bodies. All these forms of participation of the inhabitants in the educational process have warranted encouragement and expansion so that education might become a vital part in the process of the whole development of the communities concerned. Increased possibilities were also given to indigenous inhabitants to influence educational policies and programmes by means of participation in metropolitan or regional conferences.

236. In summary, the Committee continues to be of the opinion that speedy educational advancement is usually obtained when there is the widest participation of the inhabitants in political bodies empowered to establish educational policies and to vote educational budgets, particularly when such a method is combined with wider participation of the inhabitants in the management of their own affairs. On the other hand, in systems where the participation of the inhabitants is non-existent or is restricted to advisory functions, and particularly when the latter are unaccompanied by financial responsibility resting on local or territorial bodies, results are likely to be much less satisfactory.

237. It is perhaps especially appropriate to deal at this point with the question of racial segregation in education, since it was evident at the end of the period that the relatively few Territories where important differentiations of treatment as between racial groups still affected education were generally those where the process of participation by the inhabitants in the management of economic, social and educational affairs had been least advanced.

238. In 1946, separate educational systems existed for children of different races in a considerable number of Territories. The principal distinctions made were between those of European and those of indigenous origin; but in some cases where non-European immigrant elements were also present there was a further separation of the systems. The facilities available to each racial group were not equal; it was the intention of educational policy to provide types of schooling reflecting what were then considered to be widely different cultures and social and economic status. The imbalance in the quality and quantity of the facilities provided for separate racial groups was attributed by the Administering Members concerned to the fact that each group, through different rates of taxation or fees, subsidized the education of its children according to the particular standards which it could afford.

239. The separation of systems of education in a manner which, even if not racially motivated, coincided with racial divisions in the communities concerned was obviously open to increasing risk of fostering interracial suspicion and, indeed, of contributing to discriminatory practices. Moreover, whether or not it had been feasible to provide equally advantageous facilities for each of the racial groups, it was liable to entail a multiplication of staff, effort and resources which no Territory appeared able to afford. From an early date in the period, therefore, efforts were made in a number of Territories—of which those under French administration provided a notable example—to abolish all such distinctions in the public school systems. In others, the principle of integration in educational facilities was proclaimed then or later, although in most of these cases a policy of gradual application of the principle, working downwards through the system from the university level, was applied. In the majority of these cases, the process of integration had not, at the end of the period, penetrated far into the secondary level, and the primary schools remained almost wholly separated. There also remained cases, as the Committee pointed out in 1959, where separate systems were still maintained as a matter of policy.

240. Both the Committee and the General Assembly have always been concerned with this problem and, on the occasion of this special survey of progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee cannot yet state that the problem has been resolved in all of the Territories. At a very early date, the General Assembly, in resolution 328 (IV) of 2 December 1949, invited the Administering Members to take steps, where necessary, to establish equal treatment in matters relating to education among the inhabitants of the Territories under their administration, whether indigenous or not. In 1950, the Committee expressed the view that, in the field of education, no principle was more important than that of equality of opportunity for all racial, religious and cultural groups of the population. In 1956, it declared that the principle of non-discrimination was an essential part of education, and that every effort should be made to develop a common school system open without distinction to children of all races. When the educational system had to make special provisions in order to meet special needs, particularly linguistic, of young children, transitional arrangements to meet such needs should be contrived so that every child might acquire both a knowledge of his culture and a sympathetic understanding of the culture of others, and at the same time the whole system might develop into a common school system.

241. The Committee reiterates the view expressed in 1959<sup>37</sup> that on no grounds whatsoever can education on a racial basis be justified, and recalls that the General Assembly, at its fourteenth session, by resolution 1464 (XIV) of 12 December 1959, renewed its urgent request to the Administering Members to intensify their efforts for its abolition.

II. THE FINANCING OF EDUCATION

242. The financial cost of establishing and maintaining an adequate educational system is high even under the most favourable conditions. In the particular economic and physical circumstances of the greater number of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the financing of education during the period under review imposed a relatively heavy demand on the public revenues, and gave rise to recurring problems in determining the emphasis to be given to it in the face of the claims of other services and of the need to invest heavily also in economically productive capital works. The period provided indications that the cause of education made headway in these respects: first, there was a steady raising of the level of education budgets; and, secondly, there was a small but significant improvement in the place given to education in total public spending.

243. The rise in expenditures on education was evident in the annual budgets of all the Territories.<sup>38</sup> In a number of them, it was in the range of 25 to 35 per cent annually; these Territories include a number of those in Africa—under United Kingdom, French and Belgian administration—where the need for expansion was most pronounced in 1946. In the several Territories where less substantial gains were recorded, it appears probable that a paucity of resources rather than a difference in policy provides the explanation.

244. Any evaluation of the general increase in expenditure on education must take into account the fact that the period was one of greatly increasing costs.

Materials and equipment rose in price at the same time as they had to be improved in quality and quantity; the same applied to the ancillary services, such as school meals, medical services and boarding establishments. The salaries of teachers, usually the largest single item of expenditure, also followed an upward trend from the inadequate levels that were common at the beginning of the period. In these circumstances, it may be said, therefore, that the real value of education budgets did not expand in as spectacular a fashion as the totals of expenditure would suggest.

245. In most Territories, by far the larger part of the cost of establishing, expanding and maintaining the educational systems has fallen on the populations themselves: it was a consistent characteristic of the period under review that the territorial budgets depending on local revenue carried the major part of the burden. The tendency, in fact, was for territorial financial responsibility to increase in keeping with the rest of the movement towards self-government. In Territories where voluntary agencies maintained an important part of the school system, their financial contributions out of their own resources diminished proportionately as assistance from public funds increased. Sources of revenue within the school systems, such as fees, appeared to be important in only a few Territories. The contributions of Administering Members to the funds available for education, although in themselves a pronounced feature of the period, were less significant in terms of the proportion of expenditure which they represented than because of the influence which they had on school systems by stimulating planning and providing capital funds for essential and costly items such as secondary education and teacher training.

246. Territorial funds for education—as distinct from the grants and loans made by the Administering Members—were derived from several sources depending on the prevailing policy and other conditions within a given Territory. Differences of approach affecting a large number of Territories may be illustrated by the general practices in Territories under United Kingdom and French administration. The former usually favoured a decentralized system, functioning first through mission societies, churches and other voluntary agencies, whose educational activity became increasingly subject to support from public funds and at the same time to the imposition of official standards and supervision; and secondly, through district and regional local government bodies, which were given some responsibility, including financial, for primary and secondary schooling in their areas. The French policy, by contrast, tended to centralization, with the territorial administrations (and subsequently Governments) playing a much more direct and predominant role in the provision and running of the schools and the territorial budgets carrying the cost. Both Administering Members contributed importantly through metropolitan funds, often for specific capital works.

247. Taking the Non-Self-Governing Territories as a whole, it is difficult from the statistics available to relate the metropolitan contributions to the educational budgets, but such comparisons as can be made indicate a good deal of diversity in this respect. In recent years, for example, Belgium was contributing between 4 and 6 per cent of the total expenditure and Australia as much as 26 per cent of what was, however, a considerably smaller budget. The actual amounts of assistance given by Administering Members through their various development funds included £29 million by the United Kingdom in 1946-1956; 11,684 million French francs<sup>39</sup> by France during the first development plan (1946-1953) and 9,805 million francs during the second (up to June 1957); and 312 million Belgian francs<sup>40</sup> by Belgium in 1949-1955.

248. The rapid expansion of educational systems required an especially high proportion of funds to be devoted to capital expenditure, and, in particular, to the construction and equipping of schools. Moreover, the extension of facilities for secondary, technical and higher education and teacher training, requiring a much larger expenditure per pupil than at the primary level, is particularly costly, and, for most of the Territories, the finding of the large sums of money required to bring these facilities to an adequate level constitutes a problem still to be resolved. The necessary raising of standards in the existing school systems also entailed increased expenditures. Finally, at the same time as they were faced with the need for continued heavy capital expenditure, most territorial Governments found themselves confronted with an increasingly large responsibility for recurrent costs of the educational facilities already in operation.

249. The Administering Members have the responsibility to assist in the provision of adequate resources for the development of education in the Territories. They have shown that assistance can be effectively given in a variety of ways: on the administrative and professional level, through the provision of specialized personnel and through advice and guidance in measures of economy, administrative efficiency, the reduction of pupil wastage and the cutting of capital costs through the use of local materials, standardized designs and prefabrication; and on the financial level, through the financing and subsidizing of works and institutions to which the territorial Governments may find it difficult to allocate priorities in expenditure. The Committee considers that the Administering Members should endeavour to make increasingly generous contributions of these kinds: there can be no investment that would provide more fruitful results, in terms of opportunities for many millions of people, in the future lives of the Territories.

III. PROGRESS TOWARDS FREE AND COMPULSORY PRIMARY EDUCATION

250. The principle of free and compulsory education is embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which states that everyone has the right to education; that education shall be free, at least in the elementary and fundamental stages; and that elementary education shall be compulsory. These ideals were far from realization in the Non-Self-Governing Territories as a whole at the beginning of the period under review. The Committee is aware that it is the policy of Administering Members to introduce eventually universal, free and compulsory education in the Territories for whose administration they are responsible, but between the acceptance of the principles and the full or substantial attainment of the objectives there has been, and in many cases there remains, a formidable task of development.

251. Universality must naturally be sought first at the elementary level, and the documentation before the Committee has indicated that, with obvious differences between and within geographical regions, the growth in primary school enrolment was steady during the period.<sup>41</sup> In a number of Territories, especially in Africa and South-East Asia, where in 1946 the ratio of children attending school to the estimated school-age population was lowest, the relative increase in enrolments was rapid. Nevertheless, ten years later, the proportion of children in the schools was still unsatisfactory, particularly so in the light of population growth.

252. The Territories in the Caribbean area were closer to the goal of free and compulsory education at the beginning of the period than were those in other regions, and such further progress was made there that by 1956 they were close to providing primary school places for all their children. Some Territories in the Pacific area and in the Indian Ocean reached a satisfactory level of school enrolment and showed a well-developed primary school system. This was largely because in these areas there was an acceleration of progress, enrolments were already high at the beginning of the period, while expansion kept pace with the growth of the population. Such Territories account, however, for only a small proportion of the non-self-governing peoples. In Africa, which contains the majority of these peoples, enrolment statistics in most of the Territories at the end of the period indicated insufficient development of the primary school systems, even where expansion had been marked by comparison with the situation prevailing at the outset.

253. Regarding legal measures to establish universal primary education in the Territories—although these alone are not enough—the Committee has previously (in 1953)<sup>42</sup> expressed the opinion that it would be advisable to proceed by steps towards regularly assigned objectives, such as: (a) compulsory regular attendance of those enrolled in schools; (b) minimum and maximum ages for admission to the various grades; (c) compulsory enrolment and attendance in regions where there are sufficient school facilities and staff; and (d) universal compulsory education.

254. In the Pacific area, in Territories under United States and New Zealand administration as well as in some Territories under United Kingdom administration in the same area, the objective of universal education was nearly achieved. On the other hand, there were Territories in the same area where either no provision for compulsion existed or only initial measures had been taken. Most of the Asian Territories did not have compulsory legislation. In most of the Territories in the Caribbean region, there were statutory provisions for compulsory education before 1946, but in a number of them the law was not enforced on the ground that accommodation was lacking. In the African Territories under French administration the tendency was to introduce compulsory attendance regulations to ensure that existing school places were adequately used. In other African Territories, no legal measures were taken during the decade in East and West Africa; in Southern African Territories, measures corresponding to the first three steps suggested by the Committee were taken, and some Territories in the Indian Ocean, such as Mauritius and the Seychelles, were working actively towards compulsory education.

255. Limitations on the funds available for educational development clearly constituted one of the difficulties encountered in putting into practice the principle of compulsory education. This difficulty usually raised the question of the relative importance of economic and social development in development programmes as well as that of the competing demands within the educational system for the various levels of schooling. Other difficulties were those of providing school buildings and equipment and of staffing; in most cases, the solution of such problems as these was of greater practical importance than the enactment of compulsory legislation. A striking phenomenon of recent years has been the growth of internal pressure for more education; in almost every Territory the demand for schooling outstrips the supply.

256. The real expansion of an educational system must also be measured in terms of the quality of the education which the pupil receives and of the length of time which he spends at school. In both of these respects the conclusions to be drawn from the universal expansion of primary school enrolment in the Territories must be subject to qualifications. UNESCO has provided a definition of primary education that may serve as a useful general guide: namely, that it is the first stage of formal schooling from the age of five to seven years to the onset of adolescence, and the teaching of the fundamental skills, knowledge and attitudes which society expects to be the common possession of all citizens. In the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee has previously had occasion to point out that the term "primary education" means different things in different Territories. In a few of them, it embraces eight years of good teaching at well-equipped schools; in some, at the other end of the scale, it means no more, for most children, than three or four years of irregular attendance at a crudely equipped school under the charge of a single teacher whose own training may have been only of an elementary character. Many Territories appear to provide variations of both kinds of primary education, with sharp differences in quality as between rural and urban areas.

257. Attention has frequently been drawn to the fairly common phenomenon of educational facilities not being used to their full capacity as a result of pupil wastage and retardation. UNESCO has observed in the rapidly growing school systems, particularly those of the African and Asian Territories, a characteristic distribution of pupils in the primary grades: the great majority during the period reviewed were to be found in the two lowest grades, and thereafter the numbers dwindled fast. Wastage of this kind results from two immediate factors: children leaving school after a year or two, and others failing to receive promotion to the next highest grade and being kept back to repeat the year's work one or more times. The result is a school system where most of the pupils are found in the lower grades and where too many of them fail to stay long enough even in the primary schools to complete the course successfully. Since it is only by mastering four or more years of the primary curriculum that a pupil may become permanently literate, it is obvious that a high rate of pupil loss represents a waste of human and material resources.

258. The progress made during the period in combating wastage is difficult to assess accurately from available statistics, but the information before the Committee shows that educational authorities in the Territories were increasingly aware of the problem and several Territories undertook studies which led to remedial measures. They revealed a variety of causes of wastage: the movement of families, the need for, or pressure on, children to work on the farms or elsewhere, the attitudes of parents towards the school and towards their control of the children. Some of the factors may in turn have been rooted in deeper causes, such as failure to connect teaching with the needs of the community, poor quality of teaching and repeated failure of the pupil, or deficiencies in the economic and social situation of the community as a whole. Remedial measures taken in some Territories during the past decade included increasing local participation in control, improvement of the curriculum and teaching methods, and the establishment of parent-teacher groups.

259. The Committee also recognizes that there is a broad range of economic factors which have tended to impede progress towards universal primary schooling. The general economic and social background of pupils and their families and the child's place in the family economy, specially in agricultural areas, may be a cause of irregular school attendance. School medical services increased during the period under review. This development and the establishment and expansion of school meals schemes and the provision of free school materials proved their value in encouraging attendance and should be taken further.

260. In the period under review, the educational authorities became able to state more fully what the primary school should achieve: there was a general trend towards the adaptation of the content of schooling to territorial conditions and needs, or the development of fresh curricula to suit local conditions. Large-scale studies, experimentation within the Territories, conferences of educators and the development of higher education and research contributed to fundamental progress of this kind. Universities established in the Territories can clearly make a most valuable contribution to the development of curricula designed to achieve the aims of primary education in the Territories of their geographic area.

261. There was a gradual diminution of the practice—previously common where voluntary agencies operated most of the schools—of charging fees for tuition. Under most administrations, no fees were charged in public primary schools, but in several of the same Territories where missions and other voluntary agencies were still making a considerable contribution to the total school facilities, they were usually permitted to charge fees on an officially approved scale. Some Territories started granting aid to voluntary agency schools on the understanding that no fees would be levied.<sup>43</sup> The Committee considers that the provision of free primary education should receive high priority as one of the steps that must be taken to arrive at the establishment of systems of universal compulsory education in all the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

262. The Committee concludes that the measures taken during the period under consideration towards the establishment of universal primary education resulted in an important degree of quantitative and also qualitative improvement of the situation that prevailed in 1946. However, at the end of the period, the majority of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories did not have access to facilities for primary education.

As recently as its fourteenth session, the General Assembly, observing that the progress made in eradicating illiteracy had been very slow, recommended in resolution 1463 (XIV) that the Administering Members should take all necessary steps to develop primary education in the Territories to the end that it might be raised as soon as possible to the level enjoyed by the peoples of the advanced countries.

263. The Progress Report lists the major problems as: (a) the provision of adequate funds for capital development and for rising recurrent costs in the future; (b) the pressure of rising populations, bringing a steady annual increase in the number of school-age children; (c) the difficulty of maintaining adequate standards during a period of rapid expansion; (d) the need for large numbers of well-trained teachers; and (e) the uneven spread of educational development within single Territories, owing to geographical, economic and historical factors. The Committee continues to believe that phased programmes of development, necessarily closely related to economic and social planning in general, provide the best approach to the objectives universally desired. It again suggests that among the successive targets in such programmes, where they have not yet already been attained, are the compulsory regular attendance of children already enrolled in schools; the introduction in selected areas of free and compulsory primary education; and, finally, the establishment of universal, free and compulsory schooling.

264. The Committee reiterates the view that, while the development of free and compulsory education is primarily the responsibility of Members administering the Non-Self-Governing Territories, it also calls for co-operative international action, both financial and technical. The General Assembly has already recommended that the Administering Members, in order to achieve the objectives of education and to solve the educational problems of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, should seek the technical advice of the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration and make the greatest possible use of the facilities of the specialized agencies.

IV. SECONDARY, VOCATIONAL AND TECHNICAL EDUCATION AND TEACHER-TRAINING

265. The quickening of development in economic, social and political fields during the decade naturally increased the demand for qualified administrative and technical staff, for skilled and semi-skilled workers and for persons able to go on to higher education. In most Territories, therefore, the enlargement of facilities for secondary education, and to an even greater extent for vocational and technical education, became a matter of increasing urgency. At the same time, the need for teacher-training at this level—to provide staff for the expanding primary school systems and trainees for higher teaching posts—grew rapidly.

266. In all of these spheres of post-primary education, most of the Territories started the period with facilities inadequate to meet the mounting demands which were to be made upon them. At the end of the period, although much yet remained to be done in a large number of Territories, especially those situated in Africa and the Pacific area, the expansion of secondary, technical and vocational education in many Territories was substantial. Nevertheless, the need in public and private employment and in the higher institutions for young men and women who had completed post-primary training of various kinds exceeded the output in some Territories.

267. Secondary education has a dual function: first, to equip young persons to take an immediately productive or useful place in the community and, secondly, to produce the recruits for the leading professions, in the persons of students ready for higher education and advanced training. The success of a secondary school system may be judged by the extent to which it serves both purposes. In the case of most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, progress must be measured in terms of the evolution of this conception of the purpose of secondary education as well as in terms of the expansion of facilities and of their output. In a certain number of Territories, the decade opening in 1946 marked the very beginning of a secondary school system; in most of the others, it saw modifications in organization, curricula and examination requirements. At the end of the period, further adaptation, especially in the direction of more broadly based courses, appeared desirable and likely to take place.

268. The original purpose of secondary schools in most of the Territories which possessed them in 1946 was to prepare students—an extremely small fraction of the already small numbers who could complete a full primary course—for higher education or entrance to the professions. The level and nature of the secondary courses were therefore designed to produce qualifications which would be acceptable in metropolitan countries, and the requirements of these accordingly dominated the curricula. Considerable modification of this situation resulting in greater flexibility in the examination requirements and in the development of a more broadly based system, including "modern" schools, took place in almost all Territories. For example, territorial languages were accepted for secondary examination purposes; other changes included modifications of the metropolitan programmes of study in history, geography, and natural science. The broadening of the base of secondary education, undertaken in different ways under different administrations, essentially represented a lessening of emphasis on traditional academic education through the provision, separately or in combination, of general courses including practical subjects.

269. In almost all Territories, the rate of expansion of secondary enrolments was higher than that in primary education. However, nearly everywhere, secondary school enrolments, in comparison with the primary enrolments in 1956, which in themselves were usually below a satisfactory level, remained low. In United Kingdom Territories in Africa, for example, the ratio ranged most commonly from under 1 per cent to under 6 per cent; in the French Territories, the range was from 2.3 per cent to 7.1 per cent; in the Belgian Congo, the proportion was 3.1 per cent; and in Papua, it was 2.5 per cent.<sup>44</sup> Wastage was evident, moreover, at various stages of secondary courses.

270. The relative capacity of the secondary schools in most Territories was, in fact, so limited even at the end of the period reviewed that selective procedures of an often severe character were still widespread. UNESCO has stated that perhaps the most significant fact about the passage from primary to secondary schools was the small proportion of students who found secondary places. In Territories which evolved development plans, it was commonly assumed that about 20 per cent of those leaving the last primary or middle-school grade would enter the first secondary grade; and where the levels of schooling were less closely articulated, the selection was even more severe.

271. The necessarily rigorous process of selection was, and continues to be, carried out mainly by means of examinations. An economic selection also operates, for tuition fees are charged in a number of Territories, and boarding schools in most cases make charges. These costs are to some extent alleviated by systems of scholarships and free places but, as UNESCO has pointed out, the ability of families to support children at secondary schools or to sacrifice their potential earnings remains a factor in recruitment to these schools. The Committee has observed in the past that the obstacles to the fullest development of secondary education are considerably greater in those Territories where fees are charged than in the Territories where secondary education is free. At the same time, there were frequent reports during the period that secondary schools were not receiving recruits of high enough standard; this usually reflected uneven development at the primary level and also the differences that remained between the orientation of the primary and secondary curricula.

272. In spite of the expansion and improvement of the systems of secondary education, they remained far from adequately developed at the end of the period. In the Committee's view, measures are urgently necessary to ensure a substantial increase in the flow of children from primary to secondary schools through accelerated programmes of expansion, to which the most important obstacles appear to be the inadequacy of available public funds and the poverty of the people as a whole. The problems of finance arise from the cost, not only of buildings and the equipment of laboratories and libraries, but also of training the necessarily highly qualified teachers, who have been universally in short supply.

273. The Committee believes that there are certain principal needs on which attention must be concentrated in the future development of secondary education. First, in educational planning and the allocation of finance, the expansion of secondary education must be integrated with the raising of standards in primary schools, with the training of secondary school teachers and with the needs of institutions of higher education. Secondly, in the financing of secondary education, still wider provision of boarding facilities and of free places is needed, so that no child with ability need be debarred from schooling by geographic or economic circumstances. Thirdly, further adaptation of curricula to the social background of the students entails the recognition of the value of a more broadly based secondary course, embracing "practical" subjects and vocational studies as well as those preparatory to higher education.

274. As a result of economic development, stimulated by policies of raising productivity and standards of living and the promotion in some Territories of industrialization, attention was increasingly directed during the period under review to the need for developing technical and vocational education. Technical school systems existing in 1946 in Territories under French administration underwent considerable expansion and modification in the subsequent years. In Territories under United Kingdom administration, there was a steady expansion after 1946, when technical education was in its infancy in most Territories. In the Belgian Congo, a vocational school system of considerable dimensions was set up; in Netherlands New Guinea, a system of junior technical schools was established; and in United States Territories, opportunities for vocational education were expanded to reach a large proportion of secondary school enrolments. In Papua, facilities for technical training were being expanded and a broad apprenticeship scheme had been put into effect. A significant development of the period was the setting up of new centres for higher technical education in the form of colleges of technology and university faculties, some of which serve a number of Territories on a regional basis. In a few cases, the voluntary school system made a contribution; this was to some extent true also of private enterprise, although industry and commerce, on the whole, did not undertake much responsibility for training their workers.

275. Numerically, however, expansion in this field was much less marked than in some other branches of the educational system. Since at the present stage of development of many Territories a large number of technicians is urgently needed, and the situation is likely to grow more acute, training facilities are, on the whole, still inadequate and there is a pressing need for the establishment of more technical institutions at various levels offering courses most appropriate to local requirements.

276. Vocational programmes must obviously be related to future no less than to present requirements of the economy, and educational planning in this field calls for a rigorous inspection of the results of technical and vocational education, which in turn implies adequate surveys and projections of the manpower situation in the Territory concerned. UNESCO has remarked that, while some recent development plans are based on a broad classification of the wage earning population into agriculture, industry and public service, such classifications are too broad to permit the accurate forecast by group of occupations which is required. In this connexion, the International Standard Classification of Occupations published by the ILO in 1958 would be a useful guide to the territorial Governments. Technical and vocational training must also be closely linked to the rest of the school system and at the same time maintain contact with commerce and industry through such means as advisory bodies on which employers and trade unions should be represented.

277. No doubt because of the demands of other branches of schooling on available funds, and because of its relatively high per caput cost, technical and vocational education has not yet attained the position of importance which it should have in most Territories. Its development, and its claim on financial resources, suffer from the prejudice still existing in some areas against a form of education which has as its primary aim the production of manual workers, however highly trained; from the deeply rooted tendency of the general schools to prepare for clerical employment and therefore to divert the best pupils away from technical training; from shortage of qualified staff; and from wastage through premature employment. There remains a compelling need to enhance the prestige of skilled and semi-skilled trades as an investment for future economic development; to broaden the base of vocational training by providing general along with technical education; to provide effective vocational guidance services; and also to enlarge facilities for in-service training for persons already in employment. It is, of course, clear that a close link should exist between technical and vocational education in general and programmes of practical training in these fields. The continuing study by the ILO of problems of technical and vocational training in the light of technological developments and their repercussions on the manpower situation emphasizes the conclusion that the wider dissemination of productivity techniques, training of supervisors and instructors, training-within-industry schemes, apprenticeship and fellowship programmes are all vital elements in a co-ordinated effort to raise living standards and are particularly relevant to the situation in many Territories.

278. One of the most pressing problems of the period under review was to find adequate numbers of properly trained teachers for the primary schools and—hardly less difficult in spite of the smaller numbers involved—for secondary education. The expansion of the primary school systems was largely regulated by the rate at which the authorities could provide trained teachers to take charge of the new classes, to make good losses from retirement and to reduce the unduly large proportion of unqualified teachers who had been taken into the schools. The expansion of secondary education, however limited, was equally accompanied by a demand for secondary school teachers which most Territories found difficult to meet. From the beginning, for primary teachers at least, the only feasible source of recruits was the Territories themselves, and most Territories began the period inadequately equipped for training large numbers of new teachers.

279. The goal of policy in all Territories has been to reach a system under which primary teachers will have the equivalent of general secondary education followed by one or more years of professional training. In practice, however, transitional arrangements were commonly made to take students of varying levels of achievement, from completed primary education to lower secondary schooling, and give them courses of various lengths. The general trend was the establishment of full-time institutions. In a number of Territories under French and United Kingdom administration, the training centres developed progressively and reached the level of post-secondary education; and in all the Territories under United States administration, completion of secondary schooling was required before students started teacher-training courses. Other forms of training have been provided in many Territories through in-service training, which has proved to be of value in raising standards where training facilities are limited and there is a backlog of unqualified teachers, and through the pupil-teacher system.<sup>45</sup>

280. The degree of success in meeting the demand for qualified primary school teachers may be measured through the pupil-teacher ratio, the proportion of teachers in training to those in service, and the ratio of trained teachers in the total teaching body. By these standards, a fair measure of success was on the whole attained during the period. Of the main groups of Territories, those under United Kingdom administration usually avoided unduly large classes, the proportion of trained to untrained teachers rose in many cases to well over 50 per cent, and the ratio of trainees to serving teachers was often much higher than the desirable minimum, which, according to UNESCO, should be probably of the order of 15 per cent. In some of the French Territories, the sizes of classes, already high, tended to rise, but elsewhere remained at the satisfactory level of thirty to forty pupils per class. In the Belgian Congo, class size was held to a satisfactorily low point. These results must, of course, be considered in the context of a rate of expansion of the school systems as a whole which the Committee has felt to be lower than desirable.

281. It is the view of the Committee that the rapid extension of primary education towards the goal of free, compulsory education for all children calls for the maximum possible expansion of teacher-training facilities in the Territories and that provision for this expansion is a crucial factor in all educational planning. Continued efforts are needed to do away with any further recruitment of non-qualified teachers, and to raise still higher the standards of the training courses for primary teachers.

282. At the level of the secondary schools, where university qualifications for teaching are required, the territorial sources of teachers were small or non-existent at the beginning of the period. They were still inadequate at the end; recruitment abroad or the training abroad of students from the Territories remained the principal ways of securing such teachers. Recruitment abroad was encountering difficulties caused partly by the fact that the expansion of educational services within the Territories has created a need for supervisory and administrative staff who have also been sought abroad, and partly by the competing needs for teachers in the expanding secondary school systems of the metropolitan countries. Among programmes developed to meet the territorial shortages, mention has been made of a co-operative scheme between Fiji and New Zealand for the secondment of teachers by the latter country. Similarly, the training abroad of students from the Territories, while it has so far been an important source of supply, cannot provide the long-term solution, which is to be found primarily in the training of secondary teachers in territorial or regional universities. Such training became available at relatively early dates in the well-established universities in Alaska, Hawaii, Hong Kong and Puerto Rico, and has since been extended to the new universities elsewhere.

V. HIGHER EDUCATION AND SCIENTIFIC AND CULTURAL INSTITUTIONS

283. The period began with opportunities for higher education open only to a few even in most of the more populous Non-Self-Governing Territories. A certain number of universities and small specialized colleges for higher education existed before 1946: universities in Alaska, Hawaii, Hong Kong and Puerto Rico are examples of the former, and post-secondary courses in Surinam and Nigeria typify the latter. In these Territories and elsewhere there was also a trickle of students to institutions abroad; but for the Non-Self-Governing Territories as a whole, the annual total of indigenous students receiving higher education was extremely small. This situation reflected, above all, the low levels of educational growth and standards at the primary and secondary stages in most of the Territories.

284. By the end of the period, the picture was somewhat brighter. The existing territorial institutions had continued to develop through both increased enrolments and wider facilities; the flow of students overseas, with the assistance of public and private funds, had greatly increased; and new territorial and regional institutions had been established so that few Territories were without access, if in several cases to a limited extent, to such centres of higher learning. The decade after 1946 saw much effort devoted to buildings, equipment and staffing, the results of which, in terms of enrolment and status, were only beginning to show by 1956 but could be expected to improve progressively year by year.

285. In some cases, entirely new institutions were set up; in others, universities grew organically from older institutions and post-secondary courses. Such development took place, for example, in the West African Territories of Nigeria and Sierra Leone under United Kingdom administration. In French West Africa, a group of higher schools teaching law, preparatory medicine and pharmacy, science and arts, which came into existence only after 1946, was constituted in 1950 as an Institute of Higher Studies, and in 1957 became the University of Dakar. A similar development was under way in Madagascar. In the East African Territories under United Kingdom administration, a regional approach was taken in the development of the long-established Makerere College in Uganda, which in 1949 became the University College of East Africa. This was followed in 1956 by the opening of the Royal Technical College of East Africa, situated in Kenya but similarly intended to serve the needs of the region. The University College of the West Indies in Jamaica, founded in 1948, again exemplifies the regional approach. The Belgian Congo has two universities of more recent development, and the University College of Rhodesia and Nyasaland was set up in 1955. All of the territorial and regional institutions are open to students of all races; it is at this level that the separation of educational facilities referred to earlier in the Committee's report effectively disappears.<sup>46</sup>

286. The enrolment figures at the principal institutions serve to indicate the extent of higher education in the Territories concerned. At about the end of the period, and excluding pre-university courses, the State University of Leopoldville in the Belgian Congo had seventy-nine students and the private Lovanium University Centre 105, over one-half of the total being Europeans; the University College of Nigeria and the College of Arts, Science and Technology in the same Territory had over 1,000 enrolled; Fourah Bay College in Sierra Leone had 234; the University College of East Africa, 625 and the Royal Technical College, 210; the University College of the West Indies, 494; the University of Hong Kong, about 800 and technical and private institutions, several thousands; the University of Dakar, 489; the higher schools in Madagascar, 446; and the Territorial College in Guam, 236. Singapore was served principally by the University of Malaya, and Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia by the new college in Southern Rhodesia. In what were then other Non-Self-Governing Territories, the University of Alaska had 979 students and that of Hawaii, 5,340. The University of Puerto Rico had over 14,000 enrolments before the Territory became self-governing.<sup>47</sup>

287. The above figures suggest that, by 1956, many of the most heavily populated Non-Self-Governing Territories had far to go before their higher educational institutions could produce degree students in substantial numbers. Study abroad is known to have expanded steadily over the period, and where figures are available, they indicate that some Territories had more university students overseas than in their own institutions. The Committee's view in this matter has been that the Territories should not depend for higher education primarily on the facilities available in metropolitan universities; that eventually recourse to overseas education should be had only in those fields where specialization, interchange and final practical experience are required, in undergraduate courses that cannot reasonably be provided locally, and in post-graduate studies; and that the general aim of policy should be to develop the requisite facilities in the Territories themselves, an objective which does not preclude regional institutions from playing a useful part so long as they can meet the expanding needs of the individual Territories served by them.

288. At the end of the period under review, the impact of the newer institutions on the life of the Territories which they served was already appreciable. It may be noted that the value of extension work, which generally helps to ensure that the institution remains in touch with the people, was recognized from the outset in many cases, and departments of extra-mural studies have functioned effectively in these Territories.

289. The real achievement of the period under review in the sphere of higher education was the laying of institutional foundations in every region, if not in every Territory nor even in each of the larger Territories. In many Territories, with the continuing improvement in the lower levels of educational systems, the active demand for higher education is likely to continue to outstrip the facilities in the near future. Development at the university and technical college level is more costly and more difficult to staff than at any other, and, in laying the foundations, the Administering Members have met most of the initial expenditure, but the main burden of recurrent costs and expenditure for expansion has fallen on the territorial Governments. Further external assistance appears in most cases an essential need if higher education is to continue to develop.

290. The development of scientific and cultural institutions, apart from the facilities for higher education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, should be noted. A large number of scientific research institutions were established or further developed during the period under review, both at the territorial and regional levels; and considerable progress was made in scientific research of immediate and long-term value for the economic and social development of the Territories. Scientific research was stimulated by the activities of some of the specialized agencies of the United Nations and by such inter-governmental bodies as the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara (CCTA), the South Pacific Commission and the Caribbean Commission, each of which has its own research council. At the interterritorial level, the East African High Commission built up a number of important research establishments. Scientific research institutions, both territorial and regional in scope and character, were established in Territories under French administration. L'Institut pour la recherche scientifique en Afrique Centrale (IRSAC) in the Belgian Congo has become one of the most important research groups in Africa. Academic institutions and research foundations also became increasingly important centres of scientific research in fields of particular interest to the Territories and regions which they serve.

291. In this cultural sphere, the growing recognition of the value of library services to the community and their effectiveness as an integral part of the educational system was reflected in the creation of new libraries, increases in the acquisition of existing ones, and improvements in their services. Relatively little development took place in the establishment of museums.

VI. EDUCATION OF GIRLS AND WOMEN

292. The period under review saw virtually universal acceptance of the need, in societies undergoing rapid change, to give particular attention to the education of women in order that they may better fulfil their natural role in the family and the community and also contribute as individuals, equally with men, to economic, social and political advancement. Educational authorities have recognized that, since an educated mother is likely to pass on a foundation of education to the next generation, the education of women should have an effect of almost immediate value to the whole educational system.

293. The general experience throughout the period, however, was that in the under-developed school systems still prevailing in most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories the education of girls lagged behind that of boys. Although in most Territories in the Caribbean and in some of the Asian and Pacific Territories with fairly well developed school systems, a balance between the number of boys and girls, especially in primary schools, was established; in other Asian Territories and in almost all African Territories, where the vast majority of dependent peoples live, there was a persistent disparity between the education of boys and that of girls.<sup>48</sup> In a number of Territories, some steady, though slight, progress was made in bridging the gulf between the education of boys and that of girls in the primary field, but in a few others, despite an over-all increase in primary education, the gulf widened somewhat. According to UNESCO, an enrolment of girls of 40 per cent or more of the total enrolment might be regarded as satisfactory. The ratio in French and United Kingdom Territories in Africa, in 1946, was well below that mark, and in 1956 the enrolment of girls in these Territories, with some exceptions, did not exceed 30 per cent of the total primary enrolment. In a few Territories, such as French Equatorial Africa, Aden and British Somaliland, it was about 10 per cent, or less, of the total enrolment.

294. This disparity at the primary school level was even more unfavourable in the field of secondary education, where girls made up a smaller fraction of the enrolments. At the university level, the proportion of women students was in fairly direct relation to that of the girls attending secondary schools. In the field of vocational education, domestic science schools were developed in some Territories at the upper primary level; at the secondary level, home economics courses appear to have progressed slowly and greater advance was made in teacher training.

295. Social, economic and educational factors appeared to cause the lag in the education of girls. Among these were prejudices against the education of women, the burdens of domestic and field work placed on girls at an early age, the scarcity of opportunities for girls to find employment in an undiversified economy, and the shortage of women teachers. Educational authorities paid increasing attention to the problem of providing an integrated and suitable curriculum and to the development of secondary schools for girls, often established in conjunction with teacher training centres.

296. The problem of the education of girls and women requires, as the Committee has previously stated, constant re-examination to determine more precisely the practical and psychological obstacles that prevent its more rapid solution and the measures necessary to surmount it. The Committee considers that the following measures, recommended in previous reports, will help to improve the education of girls and women and should be vigorously pursued: (a) the increasing adoption of free education; (b) the inclusion of girls in any schemes of compulsory primary education; (c) the establishment of more primary schools for girls in Territories where co-education is not yet the practice; (d) the development of technical training in fields suited to women; (e) the encouragement of the recruiting of girls for teaching; (f) improvements in the status and remuneration of women teachers; and (g) the extension of education opportunities for adult women.

VII. ADULT EDUCATION AND ERADICATION OF ILLITERACY

297. Because education in its broadest sense is a necessary basis for progress in other fields, the inability of a substantial part of the population of many Non-Self-Governing Territories to read and write constitutes a deficiency preventing not only the individual but also the community from rising rapidly to higher standards of life.

298. The extension of formal schooling, and especially of free and compulsory primary education, is the surest way to the eradication of illiteracy among the population as a whole, and the progress made and shortcomings left in this respect have already been described. It was obvious at the beginning of the period, however, that even the most rapid extension of school enrolment to the whole child population could not solve the problem of illiteracy in Territories where a large part of the population had already passed beyond school age and had entered adult life unable to read and write. It was therefore important that programmes should be formulated for the eradication of illiteracy and the promotion of adult education, that these programmes should be co-ordinated with other essential plans for economic and social development, and that they should emphasize different features according to the requirements of the community and include measures designed to prevent those who had been taught from falling back into illiteracy.

299. No quantitative measure can be given of the progress achieved in reducing illiteracy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories as a whole, because definitions given to literacy have differed widely, both in terms of the skills involved and in terms of the age-range of the population for which a literacy rate is reported. UNESCO has made commendable efforts to secure greater uniformity in education and literacy statistics which may be expected to bear fruit during the next cycle of censuses. However, the compilation of comparable statistics may still meet difficulties, as statistical services in many Territories are not yet equipped to take over the additional work that the collection of the statistics desired by UNESCO would entail. The Committee has already recommended that the Administering Members should undertake, if necessary with the assistance of UNESCO, sample surveys to permit a better evaluation of the latest achievements in the field of adult education and the eradication of illiteracy.

300. Such statistics as are available for 1950 give an approximate indication of the scope of the problem of illiteracy in the Territories. While nearly all Territories in the Caribbean region and some in the Pacific had low illiteracy rates, other Territories in the Pacific and most African Territories had illiteracy rates ranging between 70 and 90 per cent of their adult population.<sup>49</sup>

301. Among the measures taken to improve this situation, the most common were the organization of literacy campaigns, the development of part-time courses for the purpose of either extending studies or of completing schooling which had been interrupted, and social education among adults as a part of a general effort to raise social and material standards of living in their communities.

302. Literacy campaigns of a systematic type were conducted in many Territories of Africa, the Caribbean and the South Pacific. Several measures were involved in the organization of these campaigns: the supply of books and other necessary materials, the organization of training courses for instructors, and the establishment of local committees to assist the campaigns in their own areas. Regional and territorial co-ordination also proved highly desirable in several cases.

303. Literacy teaching must enable the students to acquire skill beyond the bare minimum, so that they can and will continue reading on their own. An adequate supply of suitable reading material is essential if the work done during the literacy programme is to have any permanence. The Committee has noted with interest that new methods were being sought by educational authorities in solving the problems of publication and distribution of reading materials.

304. Provisions made for adults by regular education systems, and especially by the higher institutions, to pursue part-time study were a noteworthy characteristic of the period. These programmes have taken various forms with differing objectives: preparation for public examinations; tutorial classes lasting for at least one term; single lectures, short courses at universities during vacations, and credit courses which count towards degree requirements. A particularly active part in work of this type was taken by the departments of extra-mural studies of the University Colleges at Ibadan (Nigeria), Fourah Bay (Sierra Leone), Makerere (East Africa), and in the West Indies. Various forms of vocational and continuation courses for adults were also developed in several Territories in all the major geographical areas and led to the establishment of adult education councils, adult education divisions, evening institutes and vocational training centres for adults.

305. Another noteworthy development was the inception of workers' education programmes in some Territories, generally under the auspices of local and international trade union bodies supported by technical advice and material assistance from the ILO. The African Labour College of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) at Kampala and the ICFTU temporary institutions at Lomé and Brazzaville are examples of activities which might usefully be extended to other Territories, since these programmes are intended, not only to promote more effective participation in trade union activity and related matters, but also to foster improved labour-management relations and indeed to provide ultimate benefit to society as a whole in dealing with the economic and social issues that confront newly-developing countries.

306. Also of much importance in this field were the emergence and application of the concept of comprehensive social education, which found its expression particularly in "community development" programmes in United Kingdom Territories, in the "community schools" movements in United States Territories and in "fundamental education" programmes in Territories under French administration. These programmes were conceived as part of a general effort to raise social and material standards of living in the community concerned and were generally guided by the principle that community participation and community contribution should match official help.

Part Three

REPORT ON ECONOMIC CONDITIONS IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

I. Introduction<sup>1</sup>

1. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories consists of the seven Members of the United Nations which, being responsible for the administration of the Territories, transmit information to the Secretary-General under Article 73 e of the Charter, together with an equal number of non-administering Members of the United Nations elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly.

2. The Committee examines summaries and analyses of the information furnished by the Administering Members on economic, social and educational conditions in the Territories. It is invited to submit to the General Assembly reports containing such procedural recommendations as the Committee may deem fit and "such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories" (resolution 1332 (XIII) of 12 December 1958).

3. In 1951,<sup>2</sup> in 1954<sup>3</sup> and in 1957<sup>4</sup> the Committee prepared special reports on economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The General Assembly, by resolutions 564 (VI) of 18 January 1952, 846 (IX) of 22 November 1954 and 1152 (XII) of 26 November 1957 respectively, approved each of these reports as a brief but considered indication of economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and of the problems of economic development, and invited the Secretary-General to communicate the reports to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the regional economic commissions, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned.

<sup>1</sup> The draft of the present report was prepared by a sub-committee of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories composed of the representatives of Brazil, Ghana, India, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America.

The members of the delegations who served on the sub-committee were: Brazil: Mr. Julio Agostinho de Oliveira, Mr. Dário Castro Alves and Mr. Alvaro da Costa Franco; Ghana: Dr. Amon Nikoi; India: Mr. M. Rasgotra; Netherlands: Mr. L. J. Goedhart, Mr. B. M. Smulders and Dr. J. V. de Bruyn (expert); United Kingdom: Mr. G. K. Caston, Mr. R. A. Browning and Mr. T. B. Williamson (special adviser on economic affairs); and the United States: Mr. Francis L. Spalding, Mr. Merrill C. Gay (economic specialist adviser) and Mr. John W. Simms.

The Chairman of the sub-committee was Mr. M. Rasgotra (India).

The Rapporteur of the Committee and the representatives of the ILO and FAO also participated in the debates of the sub-committee.

4. In 1960, the Committee was again called upon to pay special attention to economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It undertook this task on the basis of the information transmitted by the Members responsible for the administration of the Territories and also in the light of the views expressed in its 1951, 1954 and 1957 reports. In addition to summaries of the information that had been transmitted by the Administering Members relating to economic conditions up to the end of 1958 or to mid-1959, the Committee had before it studies prepared by the Secretariat of the United Nations, FAO and the ILO. The present report should be read in conjunction with these studies, which are listed in the annex, together with the summary records of the Committee's discussions.

5. It will be recalled that by resolutions 933 (X) of 8 November 1955 and 1332 (XIII) of 12 December 1958, the General Assembly reiterated its invitation to Members to attach to their delegations persons specially qualified in the functional fields within the Committee's purview. In 1960, it had the advantage of the presence of economic advisers in the delegations of the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States. The Committee appreciates the contribution made by these advisers to its work. By the above two resolutions the General Assembly also repeated the invitation, contained in resolution 744 (VIII) of 27 November 1953, to the Administering Members to attach to their delegations indigenous persons specially qualified to speak on economic, social and educational policies in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. No such persons were included in any of the delegations to the Committee's session under report.

II. General developments

6. In its examination of the Report on Progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, on which the Committee is separately presenting its observations and conclusions,<sup>5</sup> the Committee covered a broader field of economic activity than that embraced by the present survey. The studies prepared for the triennial consideration of economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, while in effect serving to supplement the Progress Report, were designed primarily to deal with certain particular aspects in which the Committee had expressed an interest at its 1957 session, such as trade and banking, the shift towards a monetary economy, and other changes in the economy of the Territories, and their reflection, if any, in the living conditions of the indigenous population. The present report therefore deals principally with these matters. The Committee has also reviewed, to the extent that information was available, the major general trends of economic development in the Territories during the period 1955-1958, taking into account certain data more recent than those contained in the Progress Report.

7. The three years under review do not, in the Committee's view, constitute a special period with characteristics all its own from the point of view of economic development. In one year, 1958, conditions facing underdeveloped countries were, in general, unfavourable, and in another, 1957, many raw materials producers enjoyed comparatively favourable conditions. Nevertheless, the generally unfavourable conditions in most of the Territories, and, in particular, the sharp fluctuations which occurred in their terms of trade, as reflected in the deficits to be found in their balances of payments on current accounts, point up the continuing deficiencies in the structure of their economies.

8. In the Territories under United Kingdom administration, gross domestic product at current prices increased by nearly 20 per cent between 1955 and 1958. At constant prices, the annual rate of increase in gross domestic product of these Territories was from 5 to 6 per cent. Expenditure on gross fixed capital formation increased by 27.5 per cent between 1955 and 1958. Private investment slowed down from an estimated £100 million in 1957 to an estimated £80 million in 1958; this slowing down was connected with the fall in prices during 1958. The financing of economic development in the United Kingdom Territories during the period encountered greater difficulties owing to increases in the Territories' recurrent budgetary expenditures brought into being by earlier development expenditure and to limitations on the amounts of loans which could be floated on the London market. These difficulties were intended to be met by the Colonial Development and Welfare (Amendment) Act of 1959, which allocated an additional sum of £95 million for the period 1959-1964. Including unspent balances from previous allocations, £140 million will be made available for this period. Moreover, the Committee was informed that £100 million will be made available to the Governments of the Territories by loans from the United Kingdom Exchequer.

9. In Netherlands New Guinea, a predominantly agrarian country, the value of exports of products of indigenous agriculture increased from 4,710,000 guilders in 1955 to 7,692,000 guilders in 1958. Capital investments were made by the Government for the establishment of new industries, such as a modern ship-repair yard and a sawmill. In 1957 and 1958, total imports of investment goods amounted to 45,139,700 guilders and 30,505,700 guilders, respectively. The contributions of the Netherlands Government to the territorial budget increased from 67,941,223 guilders in 1955 to 71,950,000 guilders in 1959.

10. In Papua under Australian administration, there has been a steady rise in the volume and value of exports of agricultural products, including those of indigenous agriculture, such as copra, cocoa and rubber. The Territory's revenues continue to be supplemented by annual grants from the Government of Australia, which amounted in 1959 to £A4.7 million, while internal receipts of the Territory amounted to only £A2.05 million. Public investment financed by these grants is reported to have stimulated private investment.

III. Terms of trade

11. At its 1954 and 1957 sessions, the Committee had emphasized the considerable repercussions on the economy of the Territories of fluctuations in the prices of their export products. In a number of Territories on which relevant data were available, terms of trade have been subject to sharp fluctuations of considerable magnitude. Where these fluctuations have been due to a sudden downturn in the prices of exports, they have frequently had serious consequences for the economies of the Territories concerned. The timing of these fluctuations in the different Territories has not necessarily coincided, as they depended mainly on variations in the prices of the main export products, which differ in kind from one Territory to another.

12. In conditions where export earnings can vary by large amounts as a result of developments outside a Territory's control, economic planning becomes extremely difficult. In certain Territories, very considerable increases in output have not been matched by similar increases in export earnings, as a result of adverse movements in terms of trade. This situation again points to the need, in the Committee's view, for further studies on a commodity-by-commodity basis, with a view to the establishment of workable systems of commodity price stabilization, fair both to producers and consumers.

13. The effect of these fluctuations on the economy of the Territories in terms of trade is well illustrated by the two relatively large Territories of Kenya and the Belgian Congo, where particularly strong declines in terms of trade occurred between 1956 and 1958. This decline was from 157.9 to 125.2 for Kenya and from 161.6 to 114.5 for the Belgian Congo. In view of the importance of the export sector in the gross domestic product of the Territories, the impact of these declines on the domestic economy as a whole was serious. In other Territories relying on agricultural products which were not as seriously affected by price changes during the same period, such as Uganda, the fluctuations were favourable in the sense of a slight improvement in terms of trade. Nevertheless, over a longer period, many of the Territories have been subject to sudden and usually unpredictable price movements of considerable amplitude which, even when temporarily favourable, militate against the smooth development of their economies.

14. Moreover, despite the importance of terms of trade to their economy, the Territories, under existing conditions, have no real possibility of influencing these fluctuations to any significant extent. The trends of world market prices of the primary products exported by the Territories are frequently sharply affected by variations in demand for these products by the industrialized countries, which are the main consumers. None of the Non-Self-Governing Territories possesses for any major commodity a share of world production sufficiently high to enable it to exercise some control over the world market and to influence the level of the world prices.

15. As far as imports are concerned, the Non-Self-Governing Territories, mainly because of the limited purchasing power of their indigenous populations, absorb only a very small part of the world exports of industrial products in relation to the size of their populations. The bargaining power of the Territories, in relation to that of the industrialized countries which supply them with manufactured goods, is therefore far too limited to enable them to influence in their favour the prices of imports. The level of these prices is thus determined by market forces beyond their control. The practical importance of this situation to the Territories in recent years is that, owing largely to the inflationary pressures which were dominant in the main industrial exporting countries of Europe and North America during the period under review, the level of import prices has generally followed an upward trend.

16. Some members expressed concern at the lack of ability on the part of the Territories to influence their terms of trade in their own favour, and thought that greater attention should have been paid by the metropolitan countries to alleviating this situation by reducing the exclusive dependence of the Territories on prices of primary products, by the promotion of international stabilization of these prices and also by diversification of the Territories' economies. They also felt that these difficulties made the necessity of industrialization, as part of balanced growth, even more imperative. Concern was also expressed over the fact that the prices of export products of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were determined by the level of demand in the metropolitan and other industrialized countries. The view was expressed that this situation resulted in a subordination of the interests of the territorial populations to those of the metropolitan countries.

17. Other members of the Committee, while agreeing that a greater diversification was desirable, recalled the statement made by the Committee in its 1957 report<sup>6</sup> that diversification should not be increased at a cost which might appreciably reduce the Territory's income from crops which had already found an established place in overseas markets. It was suggested that international commodity agreements should not be considered as a universal remedy for difficulties arising from fluctuations of export prices; the experience of some Member States in the stabilization of prices of domestic primary products emphasized the difficulty of stabilization at an international level.

18. These members of the Committee felt that the interests of the exporting primary producers could be best served, inter alia, by the maintenance of a high and expanding level of economic activity in the importing industrialized countries. The policies of the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, and the United States have been designed to that end. A number of the Administering Members are also participating in various commodity agreements and commodity study groups. The United Kingdom Government, for example, which attaches importance to workable systems of price stabilization, participates in four of the five international commodity agreements: those for sugar, tin, wheat and olive oil. The United Kingdom Government and the Governments of the East African Territories under its administration are also co-operating in the International Coffee Study Group; they have, in addition, shown willingness to co-operate in a short-term international coffee agreement and to consider the possibility of a long-term coffee agreement. The Commonwealth Trade and Economic Conference, held in Montreal in September 1958, stated in its report that, in order to promote the economic development of countries primarily dependent on exports of raw materials, excessive fluctuations in commodity prices should be remedied by the maintenance of a high and expanding demand in industrialized countries consistent with the need to avoid inflation, as well as by concerted action to moderate excessive short-term fluctuations, so as to mitigate their effects on primary producers. The Commonwealth Sugar Agreement offers an example of such protection provided by the United Kingdom to the sugar-producing Territories under its administration: it has had a stabilizing influence on the economies of the Caribbean Territories, Mauritius, and Fiji. According to the Agreement, the Territories receive quotas for export, of which roughly two-thirds are bought by the United Kingdom at a price guaranteed to be reasonably remunerative to efficient producers. The remainder is sold at the free market price; any of the remainder shipped to the United Kingdom benefits by the United Kingdom preferential duty. In most cases, the guaranteed price was higher than the free market price in the period under review.

19. The Committee was interested to observe that, while the Non-Self-Governing Territories have little or no influence on the prices of the main products—except to the extent that they may be affected by existing commodity agreements—which they exchange with the rest of the world, most of the Territories affected by this problem have been able to improve their terms of trade by making substantial changes in the composition of their exports. There have been significant changes in the pattern of exports, not only of such products as minerals extracted by large mining companies under non-indigenous ownership and management, as in the Belgian Congo, and of the agricultural export products of mainly European farmers, as in Kenya, but also of the products of small-scale African farmers, as exemplified by Nigeria and even more by Uganda. In the latter Territory, during the period 1949-1958, there was a significant shift from cotton to coffee and tea. The average exports of cotton declined by 8 per cent, but those of coffee expanded by over 100 per cent and those of tea by 60 per cent. The shift was obviously caused by the difference in the price trends of these products. The price of cotton remained practically static, having increased from 1949 to 1958 by only 5.3 per cent, while the price of coffee rose by 119 per cent and the price of tea by 68 per cent. The African farmers' production of cash crops, such as coffee, has also made notable progress in Kenya under the Swynnerton Plan.

20. The Committee finds in such examples as these encouraging evidence that, even in Territories still largely dependent on the traditional subsistence economy, large numbers of indigenous farmers have been able, in their production of cash crops, to adjust themselves to a significant extent, often with governmental guidance, to the needs and opportunities presented by the world market. The phenomenon reflects a sound economic sense among the people in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, a factor which is of great importance for the present and even more so for the future economic development of the Territories. Nevertheless, these adjustments of export production patterns can seldom be undertaken quickly and without risk, and there is a pronounced need for protective measures such as price and market stabilization, where this is of advantage to the Territories, as well as for the greater diversion of productive effort into secondary industries. In these measures, and also in measures to help primary producers to adjust to new overseas market opportunities, government initiative is vital and international collaboration is hardly less important.

21. From the information available to it, the Committee observes that in many cases the flow of the trade of a Non-Self-Governing Territory is mainly between the Territory concerned and the metropolitan country responsible for its administration. This is perhaps owing, in some measure, to the fact that, in the Territories where the majority of the dependent peoples live, most of the import trade and a large part of the export trade, except where representative marketing boards handle the major export products, is in the hands of non-indigenous interests; and it is also partly owing to the traditional close commercial relations between the Territories and the metropolitan countries concerned. For instance, the origin and destination of over 60 per cent of the import and export trade of the Territories under French administration during the period under review was France. The Belgian Congo and the Territories administered by the United Kingdom have a greater diversity in the origins and the destinations of their imports and exports. The Committee considers that considerably greater diversification in the direction of trade of the Territories, resulting in some reduction in their dependence on metropolitan markets, may lead to improvement in their terms of trade. It considers that all Territories should be free to trade where they wish and to seek markets and sources of supply of the greatest advantage to them.

IV. The balance of payments with the metropolitan countries

22. The nature and extent of the commercial and financial relations of the Non-Self-Governing Territories with the countries of the respective Administering Members are of essential importance to the economic development of the Territories, and are closely linked with the subject of terms of trade, dealt with above.

23. During the period under review, the circumstances of individual Territories varied in this respect. In Papua, for example, trade was conducted largely with the metropolitan country, and its deficits were mainly covered as a result of grants from the Government of Australia. A similar situation existed in Netherlands New Guinea, where grants by the Netherlands Government increased from 67.9 million guilders in 1955 to 71.95 million guilders in 1959. By contrast, the Belgian Congo, a Territory whose considerable natural resources are already well developed in some sectors, did not receive any assistance by way of grants from the metropolitan country. Although its over-all balance of trade was favourable, it had deficits in its merchandise trade with Belgium; but those, together with substantial payments to the metropolitan country in the form of income from investments, services such as transport and insurance, and remittances of savings, were largely financed by surpluses from its trade with countries other than Belgium. Not only did the Territory thus provide the metropolitan country with a considerable income; furthermore, this income was transferred in foreign currencies and made a notable contribution to the balance of payments of Belgium itself. On the other hand, deficits in the balance of payments on current account of the Territory were covered to a large extent by capital imports from Belgium, mainly as loans raised for the financing of the Territory's development plan. The examples given indicate the range of differing circumstances to be found among the Territories. The situation of several of them cannot be so clearly illustrated.

24. Invisible transactions have frequently been an important element in the balances of payments of the Territories with the metropolitan countries, and have, accordingly, frequently contributed to deficits in those balances. These transactions, along with the visible merchandise trade, should also be taken into account in considering the financial assistance which the metropolitan countries have provided to the Territories. In addition to the cost of services such as freight and insurance, these invisible transactions include transfers of profits, dividends and interest which may be usefully compared with the total private and public investment capital received from the metropolitan countries. Transfers of these kinds to the United Kingdom from all of the Territories under its administration amounted to £40 million in 1957 and £30 million in 1958, while the Territories received from the United Kingdom £35 million and £30 million, respectively, for interest on their sterling assets in the United Kingdom; total public and private investments by the United Kingdom were estimated for each of these years at close to £100 million. A different picture emerges from the data available on the Belgian Congo: of a deficit in the total balance of payment on current account of 75,051 million Belgian Congo francs, for the period 1951-1958, the deficit on invisible transactions accounted for 65,527 million francs; of this amount, transfers of income from investment alone accounted for 18,949 million francs, whereas total Belgian private and public investments during the same period amounted to only 14,542 million francs.

25. There has been a general trend towards a gradual reduction of the usually large share of the metropolitan countries in the foreign trade and in the other external transactions of most Territories. A number of factors tend to retard the pace of change in this respect. For example, where preferential treatment has been accorded on the metropolitan markets to some of the Territories' main export products, such as sugar exported from certain Territories to the United Kingdom under the Commonwealth Sugar Agreement, the reduction in the proportion of their total exports taken by the metropolitan country has been inevitably limited in extent. Also, the maintenance of a high proportion of imports from the metropolitan countries has been favoured by traditionally close commercial relations between the metropolitan suppliers and the major private companies and public agencies responsible for most investments in the Territories, as well as—except in United Kingdom Territories, in particular—by preferential treatment accorded by means of import licence systems and foreign exchange regulations.

26. A wider distribution of markets for exports, as well as of sources of supply for imports, was, nevertheless, gradually being achieved in most of the Territories considered. Its result was to decrease slowly their economic dependence on trade with, and aid from, the metropolitan countries concerned, which was generally believed also to reflect progress in their economies in the form of greater diversification of production. A wider distribution of both export markets and sources of imports has been achieved, particularly in the United Kingdom Territories, which, subject to certain export restrictions, are generally free to trade with any country they wish. The previously existing provisions, designed to protect the balance of payments of the sterling area as a whole, which called for the Territories to maintain a degree of discrimination in their imports, were abolished in November 1959. Since then, the Territories have been free to remove any discrimination which they might still have practised against imports from the dollar area.

27. The Committee also notes that the balance of payments of a great number of Non-Self-Governing Territories has continued to be unfavourable. To the extent that these unfavourable balances reflect increases in equipment and other capital imports designed to accelerate the development of the Territories, they should be regarded as a natural phenomenon in Territories at early stages of development. However, in several Territories, capital imports would appear to account for comparatively small parts of negative balances, the fluctuating prices of their raw materials and agricultural products, and the rising prices of most consumer goods imported by them contributing to the rest. This situation emphasizes the need for stimulating the growth of processing and manufacturing industries in the Territories where this would be in their economic interest.

V. Currency and central banking

28. The Committee has previously expressed interest in the establishment, especially in the large Non-Self-Governing Territories, of central banks which could help to establish local markets and to increase the amounts of local funds available for development. The monetary system in nearly all the Non-Self-Governing Territories is closely related to the system existing in their metropolitan countries. The metropolitan currency, although not generally legal tender in the Territories, is still the main, if not the exclusive, basis of the local currency. Thus in the Territories under the administration of the United Kingdom, the currency issued by the currency boards used to be, and in some cases still is, backed to over 100 per cent of its value by sterling securities, issued or guaranteed by the Government of the United Kingdom, other Commonwealth countries or United Kingdom overseas Territories. Owing to this close relationship, the territorial currency benefits generally from the stability of the metropolitan currency; but there have been cases in which the territorial currency has been affected by the monetary difficulties of the metropolitan country, for example, in the case of the devaluation of the French franc in 1957.

29. An important potential consequence of this relationship is the inability of the Territories themselves to adapt the volume of their currency to the needs of their own economy. This rigidity may in some cases impede their development. Moreover, the lack of an autonomous monetary authority may in some cases prevent the application of a co-ordinated credit policy, so that the volume and the terms of credit cannot fit the needs of the Territories. The absence of a monetary and a capital market can place additional difficulties in the way of the mobilization of the Territories' savings for development purposes. In practice, the close association of the territorial currency system with the metropolitan currency is not likely to cause serious difficulties so long as the economy of the Territories is based exclusively on foreign trade; it helps to eliminate risks of a monetary nature and also facilitates external trade and the investment of private capital. As the economy of a Territory develops and becomes more diversified, the absence of a monetary system adjusted to the needs of the Territory and enabling it to mobilize all the local resources for development may become a serious impediment.

30. The Committee notes with interest that in Territories which have reached the stage of economic development contemplated above and which are large enough in size, the establishment of an autonomous monetary system based on a central bank is frequently envisaged. The establishment of a central bank, such as that recently created in Nigeria and the one expected to be established shortly in Jamaica, may thus be considered both as a demonstration of a substantial degree of economic progress and as a further important step in the acceleration of this progress and in the achievement of a greater monetary and financial independence. Some members of the Committee expressed the hope that similar developments would soon take place in the East African Territories.

31. In a number of United Kingdom Territories, the system of currency boards has been made more flexible by the investment of part of the currency backing in securities issued by the local Governments. The Committee feels that the development of local capital markets can play an important part in the mobilization of local savings for development purposes, and, in this connexion, notes that local capital markets are developing in several United Kingdom Territories. The Committee considers that, where feasible and appropriate, the establishment of central banks can further assist in this matter. In Netherlands New Guinea, as an example of a Territory where banking is still in the early stages of development, there is no central bank; to meet an increase in monetary requirements, the maximum amount of currency which could be issued was raised in 1955 from 25 to 50 million guilders.

VI. The transition from subsistence to market agriculture

32. The Committee has given attention to the transition from subsistence to market agriculture as one of the most important aspects of the impact on the living conditions of the indigenous population of the shift towards a monetary economy. The process of change to a market economy, through an increase in the proportion of the total resources of land and labour devoted to money-earning activities, is, perhaps, the most crucial aspect of economic development in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It is taking place both through increased sales of agricultural products and through increased wage employment, although generally one or the other of these forms of transition has predominated in an individual Territory: the former in the West African Territories and in Uganda, for example, and the latter in Kenya and Northern Rhodesia.

33. Although this process continued in the Territories during the period under review, its impact on the living conditions of the populations as a whole, particularly in the African Territories, has thus far not been very significant; nor has its speed been rapid enough to encourage early prospects of a marked improvement in those conditions. In many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories subsistence agriculture remains important and in several of them it is the basis of the economy as far as very large sections of the populations are concerned. Surpluses available for sale on internal and external markets appear to constitute a minor portion of the total production, which in itself cannot be regarded as high in relation to the size of the population concerned. This is particularly true of the African Territories as a whole, where the predominance of subsistence production largely isolates important numbers of people from the money economy and from access to higher standards of living and also, by limiting the range of foodstuffs consumed, contributes to serious problems of malnutrition. Moreover, these circumstances restrict the scope for specialization, entrepreneurial activity and savings. In order to accelerate the shift towards a monetary economy in these Territories, and thus to open wider economic opportunities and higher living standards to much larger numbers of people than at present, with a consequent improvement in the financial situation of the Territories, increased attention needs to be given to ways of accelerating the transformation of subsistence agriculture into cash-crop production.

34. The Committee recognizes that the transition from subsistence farming to cash-cropping must depend on the availability of markets, both internal and external. In the past, the initial impetus in most African Territories has come from the demands of external markets, whose prospects of further expansion appear uncertain, at least for the time being. These prospects depend on world conditions generally, including progress in economic growth in the less-developed independent countries, which, in turn, among other things, depends in many cases on external assistance. The effects on the production and the economies of these Territories of fluctuations in commodity prices in external markets have already been noted. While these adverse effects can, to some degree, be corrected through the diversification of production as well as the establishment of new markets, it appears to be necessary at the same time to place increasing emphasis on the development of domestic markets within the Territories. Some members shared FAO's view that the growth of domestic markets, in turn, depends largely on industrialization and on the growth of non-agricultural and, generally, urban communities which will create or enlarge the demand for domestic produce and thereby furnish an incentive for the rural populations to produce larger surpluses for sale. The extension of the monetary economy by this means should in turn expand the rural markets for consumer goods; and if these goods can be provided, not only by importers but also, to an increasing extent, by local industry, the chain reaction of supply and demand should be stimulated, expansion in one field causing expansion in the other. An important further effect of associating the development of local industry with that of local foodstuffs markets should be a more adequate participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the production as well as the distribution of goods. Another view expressed was that, while industrialization may be the only course open to over-populated countries, in Territories which are not at present over-populated and have not a wide range of local raw materials, concentration on industrial development as a means of pushing the Territory into a development spiral would not seem to be the wisest course. In such Territories, agriculture itself may be the sector in which the maximum returns to investment are most likely to be found.

35. The Committee endorses the views expressed by FAO in the report prepared by it for the Committee<sup>7</sup> that the transition from subsistence to market agriculture is a basic, and in many Territories the most important, aspect of economic development; that considerable governmental assistance is necessary in bringing a growing market into existence and in placing it in touch with the areas of supply through the development of transport and marketing facilities; and that policies need to be oriented towards the promotion of this transition. It notes with satisfaction the investigation which is to be undertaken jointly by FAO and the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa. The Committee also concurs in FAO's view that the most successful method of effecting the transition from subsistence to market agriculture and raising the productivity of indigenous farmers is to make a concerted attack on all institutional obstacles such as unsuitable land-tenure systems, lack of credit facilities, bad communications and inadequacy of education. The organization and extension of co-operatives, general extension work for the improvement of existing techniques and the introduction of new ones to raise yields, and the growth of non-agricultural activities, such as assistance and encouragement of merchandising activities in remote areas to stimulate demand, are also fields in which Governments can render valuable assistance in the initial stages. The Committee notes with satisfaction that this approach is being followed in some Territories—for example, in Kenya under the Swynnerton Plan for land consolidation and agricultural development, where outstanding success has been achieved. It expresses the hope that similar experiments will be undertaken with equal success in other Territories as well. The development of co-operatives, usually for marketing and credit purposes, has gained ground in most Territories; it has had striking success in Territories under United Kingdom administration, where paid-up membership in co-operatives rose to 1,158,000 in 1958, and the societies marketed produce to the value of £48.9 million in the same year.

VII. The productivity of labour

36. The rate at which improvement can be brought about in the productivity of labour is an important factor in promoting the economic development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Although the problem and its causes and remedies lie largely in the field of social development, the Committee considers it appropriate for discussion also in relation to economic conditions, especially as it bears directly on the expansion of production and, in turn, on the raising of the standards of living of the populations of the Territories.

37. It is important at the outset to place the problem in its proper perspective. The relative size of the labour force varies greatly from one Territory to another. The ratio of wage-earners to all occupations is high in Territories where industrialization has made progress or where other special circumstances prevail, as in the urban Territories of Hong Kong and the State of Singapore. The ratio diminishes more or less in proportion to the prevalence of subsistence economy; thus, in many African and some Asian Territories, the numbers of persons recorded as being engaged in wage employment are low in relation to the economically active populations in these Territories, since the majority of inhabitants are mainly engaged as family units in agriculture or stock-raising, whether for subsistence or market or, as frequently happens, for both. There are exceptions to this rule: the poverty and hazards of subsistence life in some areas are among the causes which lead young men to leave the tribal areas for varying periods and find wage employment, often migrating over long distances. At the same time, the official figures of wage employment usually understate the position in some Territories in which cash crop production by indigenous farmers is important, since indeterminate numbers of seasonal labourers assist in the harvesting and cultivation of these crops. In most Territories, employment figures cover only labour engaged in such undertakings as urban industries and services, mining, public works and other government services, and large-scale farming. There are other special features: much of the labour is seasonal and a good deal of it, as in mining and plantations, is migratory; and much of it, again, especially in the last-mentioned fields, is drawn temporarily from subsistence agriculture.

38. The information at present available on the productivity of labour is limited mainly to factory and other urban employment, and to mining and large-scale agriculture—for the most part under non-indigenous ownership and management—which, especially in African and some Asian and Pacific Territories, do not yet represent a large sector of the economy. Such studies as have been made with respect to these areas of employment usually suggest that, except where remedial measures have been taken, the productivity of labour is low, especially when measured, not always appropriately, against that of non-indigenous workers in comparable employment. This situation appears to be due to a number of factors, varying in effect according to the type and environment of employment. Indigenous labour remains, in the first place, mainly unskilled labour. The indigenous people largely lack training outside their traditional tribal occupations. They often start without the skills and experience required for work in modern industry, plantation agriculture and other branches of the monetary sector of the evolving economy. The high turnover and instability of the labour force implicit in the migratory labour system and in the reasons why it attracts manpower impede progress in this direction. Malnutrition and debilitating diseases, to which, in the economic and social conditions prevailing in these Territories, many indigenous populations are subject, tend to impair their capacity and staying power as workers.

39. In its study of productivity in the African Labour Survey, the ILO has stressed the psychological and human aspects of the problem as it affects Africa, while acknowledging that low productivity may also be due in part to such factors as the inadequate organization and equipment of enterprises, bad siting and lack of adequate communications. It has pointed out that, in existing circumstances, the reasons which lead the African to seek wage-paid employment, especially when it involves only a temporary departure from the tribal economy, heavily influence his attitude towards work and his response to incentives; his reactions differ widely from those of the European worker, whose background and aims are entirely different. There is clearly a need for further study of such factors, in which the ILO could provide assistance to the Governments of the Territories.

40. In Territories where stable, settled labour forces are developing, usually in an urban environment, several of the factors retarding productivity are of a more conventional nature and thus are more readily recognizable and susceptible to remedial action. These include deficiencies in health, diet, housing conditions and standards of living generally. They also include inadequacy in monetary incentives. All of these factors persist in varying degree in different Territories, but a gradual process of improvement is apparent in most. Substantial improvement and extension of monetary incentives should have a very considerable bearing in overcoming these deficiencies. In this connexion, the Committee recalls the observation made in its 1958 report<sup>8</sup> that minimum earnings, including allowances, should be sufficient to support stabilized family life without the need for assistance from outside sources. The Committee notes once again that the concept of a family wage has been recognized lately, not only in principle but also in fact, in a number of Territories. Even monetary incentives, however, may not succeed unless the indigenous worker is persuaded that he can, through wage-paid employment, move towards a life in which effort and competence are adequately rewarded and where his aspirations as a human being will not be frustrated by discriminatory treatment. In this light, disparities between the wages and opportunities offered to indigenous workers and those available to non-indigenous workers, which in some Territories have been diminished but not yet eliminated, may serve as a disincentive to higher productivity.

41. The existence of a healthy trade union movement is an important factor in the raising of productivity in the Territories. The trade unions can play a vital part, particularly in joint consultations on methods and conditions of work and in the removal of grievances. Moreover, experience has shown that, in practice, no attempt to increase productivity has any chance of lasting success unless those on whom it depends receive some tangible benefits from it within a reasonable period of time; and a sound trade union movement can materially assist in bringing this about.

42. It is to be noted that many of the factors which retard productivity in wage-earning employment may also apply to other occupations of similar character which in the present circumstances of many Territories are, in fact, a much more important element in the economies, namely, the widespread forms of subsistence agriculture to which the farmer and his family apply their own labour. They are burdened by the same difficulties of lack of skills, debilitation and malnutrition that affect the productivity of the wage-earner, and also, in a different way, by the inadequacy of incentives. The Committee has examined some aspects of this problem in the context of the need for increasing and diversifying the production of the Territories and for accelerating the transition to a monetary economy. The similarities of circumstances to which it has drawn attention serve to emphasize the broad nature of some of the causes of low productivity in wage-earning employment, and the need for an equally broad approach to the elimination of these causes.

43. The Committee feels that attainment of higher levels of productivity can be furthered in general ways by government policies fostering the mobilization of capital from domestic and external (including international) sources for investment and the expeditious implementation of development plans. Economic and social policies can help create an atmosphere conducive to productivity in more particular ways, for example, through fiscal policy, import, export and exchange controls and duties, anti-monopoly policy, control of industrial location and investment, and labour policies affecting dismissal, remuneration, freedom from discrimination in employment and other areas within the responsibility of employers which are closely linked to productivity. In addition, higher productivity can be promoted: by government measures in the fields of public health and medical care; by education and training, which are the most direct means of bridging the gap between non-indigenous and indigenous cultures, and which would include providing indigenous youth with general and specialized knowledge as well as technical skills; by full assimilation of detribalized and other indigenous workers into modern society; and by direct action to promote higher productivity through the establishment of national productivity and management development programmes. Action towards many of these ends has already been taken in some Territories.

44. The Committee is aware that the ILO has successfully undertaken, since 1952, a number of productivity projects under technical assistance programmes in several independent countries, and also in Hong Kong and the State of Singapore, and that it is in a position to lend the benefit of its experience to other Non-Self-Governing Territories as well. The Committee hopes that the Administering Members concerned will avail themselves of the experience and assistance of the ILO, not only in studying the problems relating to productivity, but also in helping to remove the causes of low productivity through the establishment of productivity centres, which have worked with considerable success in several independent countries, and through other means. It is recognized that, in many cases, useful efforts are already under way from metropolitan sources, but, even in such cases, the ILO may be able to make substantial complementary contributions of great value to the Territories.

VIII. Association of certain Non-Self-Governing Territories with the European Economic Community

45. By resolution 1470 (XIV) of 12 December 1959, the General Assembly requested the Committee to devote special attention at its 1960 session, when it would be dealing in particular with the economic development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the association of the Non-Self-Governing Territories with the European Economic Community, and to the possible effects which this association might have on the development of the Territories towards the objectives of Article 73 of the Charter.

46. In the preamble to its resolution, the General Assembly noted with concern that the Administering Members had not yet submitted sufficient information on the possible effects of the association of the Territories with the EEC. At its 1960 session, the Committee found itself in the same position because the Administering Members concerned, with the exception of the Netherlands Government, had not supplied the information requested by the General Assembly. The supplementary information supplied by the Netherlands delegation was of a provisional character. It was suggested that studies published for other United Nations organs showed that information on the matter could in fact be provided; of particular relevance in this connexion was a study which had recently been made by the Economic Commission for Africa.<sup>9</sup>

47. From such information as is available it would appear that the association has been effected without adequate consultation of indigenous opinion in the Territories concerned. So far as the Committee is aware, no provision has been made for the revision or termination of this association once the Territories concerned achieve their independence. Some members of the Committee consider that, in view of the advanced state of political evolution in at least some of the Territories associated with the European Economic Community, adequate prior consultation of public opinion in the Territories concerned on this matter would have been appropriate and justified.

48. The question was raised in the course of the Committee's discussion as to whether the association would not have the effect of establishing a collective form of exploitation of the resources of the Territories by all member countries of the EEC. The members who expressed these views felt that, while investments made in the Territories by the development fund established by the EEC might be useful, it was likely that the provision of preferential markets for the primary products of the Territories would result in development being concentrated on the production of raw materials. This would tend to increase the dependence of these Territories on the European Common Market for the sale of their primary products and might accordingly impede the diversification which in the Committee's view is essential to the balanced development of their economies.

49. In the view of many members of the Committee, the association is likely to have serious disruptive effects on the traditional trade relations of other Non-Self-Governing Territories which are not associated with the EEC. In the preliminary study prepared by the Economic Commission for Africa,<sup>10</sup> it is estimated that 20 per cent of the exports of the non-associated African Territories will be affected, and the possible loss is estimated at 5 per cent of their total exports. The incidence of the impact on particular Territories will be much more serious, since it will mainly affect a few Territories whose production competes directly with those of the associated Territories—in particular the East African Territories under United Kingdom administration, which derive one-third of their export earnings from coffee exports to the countries of the EEC, and Nigeria, which exported to the Common Market in 1958 produce amounting to £40.7 million, representing nearly 31 per cent of Nigeria's total exports in that year. These members are also of the view that even if it were possible that in the long run, the establishment of the European Economic Community would increase the total volume of international trade, its most probable short-run and possibly also long-run effect would be to divert, rather than to create, trade, and that this diversion would be mainly at the expense of the Territories not associated with the EEC. The Committee has emphasized the importance to the economies of the Territories of the freedom of choice in the direction of trade. It hardly needs to be pointed out that the association of the Territories with the European Economic Community, and the tariffs and other measures contemplated in the Rome Treaty,<sup>11</sup> will tend to concentrate the trade of the associated Territories in one particular direction. If this happens, the advantageous trade which some of these Territories have with the dollar area, as well as with other areas, may well diminish, as the trade of these Territories with those areas under the Common Market arrangements move increasingly through the countries of the EEC. Another consequence might be the eventual integration of the economies of these Territories with those of the members of the EEC.

50. A view was expressed to the effect that it was still too early to assess the impact of the provisions of the treaty establishing the EEC on the associated Territories. Recalling that the preamble to the Treaty expressly states that the association has as its primary goal the promotion of the well-being of the inhabitants of the Territories concerned, the representative of the Netherlands expressed the conviction that the association would further the economic development of the associated Territories. As an example, he mentioned that the development fund of the EEC had already made several allocations for development projects, in particular for the establishment of an agricultural experimental station in Netherlands New Guinea.

51. Although most of the Territories concerned are rapidly progressing towards independence, the problem, in the view of several members, still lies within the province of the Committee. These members considered it desirable that the General Assembly, at its fifteenth session, should establish a precise method of studying the problem in the light of Chapter XI of the Charter, and should authorize the preparation of studies for the purpose. While agreeing that the adverse effects on the trade of the non-associated Territories were likely to be serious and that it was essential to obtain mitigation of these adverse effects, other members considered that the best forum for the discussion of this matter was GATT.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES (TWELFTH SESSION, 1961)

I. Constitution of the Committee

1. By its resolution 1332 (XIII), adopted on 12 December 1958, the General Assembly decided to continue, for a further period of three years, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, on the same basis as was set forth in resolutions 332 (IV) of 2 December 1949, 646 (VII) of 10 December 1952 and 933 (X) of 8 November 1955.

2. The terms of reference of the Committee, as set forth in resolution 1332 (XIII), are as follows:

"5. . . . to examine, in the spirit of Article 1, paragraphs 3 and 4, and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

"6. . . . to submit to the General Assembly at its regular sessions reports containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories."

3. As regards the Committee's programme of work, the same resolution states that:

4. The Committee consists of sixteen members: eight Member States having responsibility for the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter, and an equal number of other Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly. At the end of 1960 there were two vacancies in the membership of the Committee due to: (1) the expiration of the term of office of Brazil; (2) the withdrawal of Belgium following the attainment of independence of the Congo (Leopoldville); and (3) the adoption by the General Assembly of resolution 1542 (XV) on 15 December 1960. Liberia and Mexico were elected to the Committee for three-year terms. The present membership of the Committee is as follows:

Administering Members

Australia	Spain
France	United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland
Netherlands
New Zealand
Portugal	United States of America

Members elected by the General Assembly      Date of expiration of term

Argentina	1962
Ceylon	1962
Dominican Republic	1961
Ghana	1961
India	1961
Iraq	1961
Liberia	1963
Mexico	1963

All members except Portugal were present.

5. The Committee held its twelfth session at the Headquarters of the United Nations in New York. The Committee held eighteen meetings between 24 April and 26 May 1961.

6. Representatives of the ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO also attended the meetings of the Committee and took part in its discussions.

II. Officers of the Committee

7. At its opening (225th meeting) on 24 April 1961 the Committee elected by acclamation the following officers:

Chairman: Mr. C. W. A. Schurmann (Netherlands);

Vice-Chairman: Miss Angie E. Brooks (Liberia);

Rapporteur: Miss Faiha Ibrahim Kamal (Iraq).

III. Agenda

8. At its 225th meeting, the Committee adopted the provisional agenda as submitted by the Secretariat. The agenda<sup>1</sup> is reproduced as annex I to this report.

IV. Sub-Committee

9. At the 231st meeting, the Committee appointed a sub-committee with wide terms of reference to prepare a special report on social advancement. Argentina, Ceylon, Liberia, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland were appointed members of the sub-committee, assisted by the Rapporteur and the representatives of specialized agencies. Mr. P. K. Edmonds (New Zealand) was elected Chairman. The sub-committee held seven meetings between 9 May and 16 May 1961.

V. Preliminary statements

10. At the 225th meeting of the Committee, the representatives of Argentina and the United Kingdom reserved the positions of their respective Governments with regard to sovereignty over the Falkland Islands (Islas Malvinas) and the Falkland Island dependencies.

11. At the same meeting the representatives of Iraq and the United Kingdom reserved the positions of their respective Governments regarding sovereignty over Aden.

12. The representatives of Ceylon, India and Iraq stated that their respective Governments regarded West Irian (Netherlands New Guinea) as an integral part of the sovereign and independent Republic of Indonesia, a Member of the United Nations, and that, in their view, the transmission of information on West Irian under Article 73 e was incorrect. Any views that they might subsequently express on the information thus transmitted would be subject to that reservation. The representative of the Netherlands reaffirmed the sovereignty of his Government over Netherlands New Guinea, in respect of which his Government had transmitted information in accordance with its obligations under the Charter. The representative of Australia stated that his Government's position was that Netherlands sovereignty over Netherlands New Guinea was beyond doubt.

VI. Social advancement in Non-Self-Governing Territories

13. At its twelfth session, the Committee gave special attention to questions of social advancement in Non-Self-Governing Territories, in accordance with the programme of work set out in General Assembly resolution 1332 (XIII). In response to that resolution, specialist advisers on social conditions were included in the delegations of Australia, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. In response to resolutions 1466 (XIV) of 12 December 1959 and 1539 (XV) of 15 December 1960, the United States included in its delegation an indigenous person from Guam specially qualified to speak on economic, social and educational matters.

14. The Committee had before it special studies prepared by the Secretariat and the specialized agencies. The list of studies on social advancement is given in the annex to part two of this report. The Committee also had before it the summaries prepared by the Secretary-General<sup>2</sup> of the information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter by Australia, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States on fifty-one Territories. The list of Territories on which information was transmitted for 1959, showing the dates of receipt of information, is given in annex II of this report.

15. The Committee discussed social advancement in Non-Self-Governing Territories (item 4 of the agenda) at its 226th to 233rd meetings. The discussion of this item provided the Committee with an opportunity for a general review of the basic social situation in the Territories and the policies and activities of the Administering Members. The representatives of Argentina, Australia, Ceylon, the Dominican Republic, Ghana, India, Iraq, Liberia, Mexico, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States took part in the discussions. The representative of the ILO introduced the reports prepared by his Organisation.<sup>3</sup> He also informed the Committee of the ILO programme for rural development which will be launched in 1962.

16. Some members welcomed the change in the wording of this item because it gave recognition to the advancement that had been achieved in the Territories. Other members considered that the words "social advancement in Non-Self-Governing Territories" reflected a change in attitude towards the problem rather than any actual progress. Other members pointed out that Chapter XI of the Charter provided for the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Furthermore, at its fifteenth session the General Assembly had adopted a Declaration calling for the independence of all colonial countries and peoples.<sup>4</sup> The Committee should therefore be guided by these principles in its examination of social advancement in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

17. The representatives of Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States also provided further details on more recent developments in the social field since the end of the period covered by the information they had transmitted to the Secretary-General. In several cases they pointed out that, because of the rapid changes taking place in the Territories, much of the information which they had transmitted to the Secretary-General, and on which the Secretariat had based its reports, was already out of date. The non-Administering Members of the Committee expressed disappointment that the supplementary data contained in the statements of the Administering Members had not been made known in time to be included in the documentation and to be taken into account in the examination of social advancement.

18. The Committee discussed in some detail the need for stabilizing urban populations through the provision of more and better housing and better wages; the role of the community development techniques as a means of raising the standards of living of the people; questions of rural development, including land problems, the expansion of agricultural services and the diversification of agricultural production; social welfare services, treatment of juvenile offenders and the need to abolish corporal punishment; nutrition and public health; and racial discrimination.

19. Several of the Administering Members informed the Committee of the extent to which they were currently contributing to the budgets of the Territories under their administration or providing financial and technical assistance for specific programmes in the social field. Some of these Members pointed out that in many areas of social development there was a limit to what Governments could and should do and also a limit to what they could afford. While welcoming the progress reported, other Members pointed out that the achievements fell far short of the needs of the people. It was therefore the responsibility of Governments to finance social programmes and to take the initiative in improving the living conditions in the Territories. There was a need for greater emphasis on planning for social development, and the expansion of preventive social welfare services. Much work was also still needed in the eradication of diseases, the improvement of general conditions of health and nutrition. They stressed that the participation of the inhabitants of the Territories in the formulation of policy and implementation of programmes was a prerequisite to the success of social development.

20. The representatives of Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States stated that it was the policy of their Governments to promote and encourage the widest possible participation of the inhabitants in the management of their own affairs. As examples of recent steps taken to widen such participation, the representatives of Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United States supplemented the political and constitutional information their Governments had transmitted to the Secretary-General with statements on more recent developments in these fields.

21. The representative of Australia informed the Committee that, since 1959, the Legislative Council had been reconstituted for the Territory of Papua and New Guinea.

22. The Committee was informed by the representative of the Netherlands that in Netherlands New Guinea an elected central representative body, the New Guinea Council, had been inaugurated in April 1961. This step marked the beginning of a stage of "assisted self-government". The Netherlands Government had asked the Council to express its views within the term of one year on the manner in which self-determination should be effected, and also on the desirability of fixing a date for it. An Executive Council was also being established to enable the indigenous people to play a greater part in the administration of the Territory.

23. The representative of New Zealand reaffirmed that his Government's policy in the Cook Islands, Niue and Tokelau was directed towards the achievement of the two objectives of improving the material standard of living and of fostering local political responsibility. Although New Zealand provided both financial and technical assistance to the Territories, both the Cook Islands and Niue had representative Assemblies with wide powers of legislation and control over local revenue. Through these representative bodies, the New Zealand Government shared with the people of its Territories the responsibility for the planning and implementation of all forms of development.

24. The representative of the United States stated that the people of Guam, American Samoa and the United States Virgin Islands enjoyed a full measure of participation in the formulation of policies and the planning of development programmes. In 1960, the first Constitution of American Samoa had been ratified and approved by the representatives of the people. The Constitution contained a bill of rights and granted formal authority to the legislature of American Samoa. It also contained provisions protecting the traditional Samoan way of life.

25. Following the procedures at previous sessions, the Committee established a sub-committee (see paragraph 9 above) to draw up a report on social advancement in the Non-Self-Governing Territories on the basis of the information before it and the discussions in the Committee. The statements made by Members in the full Committee appear in the summary records of the Committee.

26. At the 241st meeting, the Chairman of the sub-committee introduced the draft report on social advancement in Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>5</sup>

27. After adopting a number of amendments, the Committee considered a draft resolution contained in document A/AC.35/L.351. The representative of India suggested that the Committee should not submit to the General Assembly any draft resolution on the approval of the report on social advancement so as to leave the General Assembly free to formulate its own recommendations. The representatives of Australia, Iraq, Liberia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom expressed the view that the Committee should follow its previous practice and submit to the Assembly for its approval a draft resolution such as that contained in the document before the Committee.

28. The Committee decided, by 13 votes to 1, with 1 abstention, to follow its usual practice and submit a draft resolution to the General Assembly at its sixteenth session recommending the approval of the 1961 report on social advancement. The Committee then considered the draft resolution jointly sponsored by Iraq, Liberia, the Netherlands and New Zealand. Under the terms of this draft resolution, the General Assembly would approve the report on social advancement in Non-Self-Governing Territories; invite the Secretary-General to transmit it to the Administering Members, the Trusteeship Council, the Economic and Social Council, the regional economic commissions and the specialized agencies concerned; and express its confidence that the Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories would bring the report to the attention of the appropriate authorities.

29. The representative of the United Kingdom said that he was prepared to support the text of the report on social advancement as a whole, although it represented in some places a compromise between opposing views, and he did not therefore necessarily agree with every word and phrase in it.

30. At the same meeting, the Committee adopted the draft resolution by 13 votes to none, with 1 abstention, and will submit it to the General Assembly at its sixteenth session for approval. The text of the draft resolution is annexed to this report as annex III.

31. The Committee discussed racial discrimination as one of the problems affecting social advancement in the Territories, taking into consideration its mandate from the General Assembly as contained in resolution 1536 (XV) of 15 December 1960.

32. In the course of the discussions, references were also made to the Portuguese Territories in which there appeared to be both discriminatory legislation and discriminatory practices affecting the indigenous populations. It was pointed out that, according to the information available, only a very small percentage of the indigenous inhabitants of the Portuguese Territories had the status of citizens. In consequence of their special status, the majority of the indigenous inhabitants had no franchise, no political rights in respect of non-indigenous institutions, and could not own land outside restricted areas.

33. In view of the fact that there is a separate section in part two of the Committee's report reflecting the discussions on racial discrimination and summarizing the special information supplied by the Administering Members, the Committee, at its 241st meeting, decided to submit that section of the 1961 special report on social advancement to the General Assembly in fulfilment of the request contained in resolution 1536 (XV).

VII. Preparation and training of indigenous civil and technical cadres in Non-Self-Governing Territories

34. By resolution 1534 (XV) of 15 December 1960, the General Assembly had requested the Administering

Members to transmit special reports setting out all available information on the training facilities for, and current strength, composition, state of preparation, etc., of civil and technical services in the Territories under their administration. It had also requested that the special reports should be transmitted in time so as to enable the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories to examine such information and to report thereon to the General Assembly at its sixteenth session.

35. The Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories had before it a preliminary study prepared by the Secretariat<sup>6</sup> on the basis of information regularly transmitted to the Secretary-General under Article 73 e of the Charter, and the supplemental information supplied under General Assembly resolution 143 (III). This study set out, as a sample of the material available, information on the preparation and training of indigenous civil and technical cadres in Kenya, Fiji and the Bahamas under the administration of the United Kingdom. The Governments of Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States communicated reports to the Secretary-General<sup>7</sup> in accordance with the terms of resolution 1534 (XV), and these were supplemented by the information contained in the statements made by their representatives at the Committee's 226th, 227th, 233rd, 235th and 237th meetings. Statements were also made by the representatives of Ceylon, Ghana, India, Iraq and Liberia.

36. At the 235th meeting, in view of the late transmission of the information which prevented the Committee from considering this item in detail, the representative of India, supported by the representatives of Ceylon, Ghana, Iraq, Liberia and the Netherlands, proposed that: (1) the Committee should report to the General Assembly that because of the lack of information it had not been able to examine fully the question of the preparation and training of indigenous civil and technical cadres in the Non-Self-Governing Territories; (2) the Committee should annex to its report to the General Assembly the information transmitted by the Administering Members and the texts of the oral statements they had made before the Committee; and (3) an analysis, to be prepared by the Secretariat, of the information contained in these reports, including relevant observations and comments made by the non-Administering Members, should be submitted to the General Assembly separately. This proposal was accepted by the Committee at its 237th meeting.

37. The information transmitted by the Governments of Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States,<sup>7</sup> together with the texts of the oral statements, is annexed to this report as annex IV. The analysis to be prepared by the Secretariat, which will also reflect the views expressed by the non-Administering Members, will be submitted to the General Assembly directly.

VIII. Educational and economic advancement

38. In accordance with its regular programme of work, the Committee also considered educational and economic advancement in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It had before it for this item the summaries of information transmitted under Article 73 e for 1959,<sup>8</sup> together with the 1959 report on educational conditions<sup>9</sup> and the 1960 report on economic conditions.<sup>10</sup>

39. The Committee discussed this item at its 235th to 237th meetings. Statements were made by the representatives of Ghana, India, Iraq, Liberia, the United Kingdom and the United States.

(a) Economic advancement

40. As the Committee had given special attention to economic conditions at its last session, the subject was not fully discussed this year. Some representatives commented on the lack of information before the Committee. The summaries for some Territories had not yet been distributed or were not available, and the information before the Committee did not adequately show the extent of the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the general economic life of the Territory; for instance, their share in the production of cash crops.

41. As agriculture remained the basis of the economy in most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, it was urgently necessary to rehabilitate the rural economy; to diversify production and to accelerate the development of a market economy. Among other measures it was suggested that Governments should encourage the development of small industries so as to help create national savings and develop manufacturing industries utilizing local materials to make the Territories self-sufficient in consumer goods. Other areas requiring intensive development were power, mining and intra- and inter-territorial communications, including airlines, railways, mail routes and cultural exchange.

42. Several representatives also referred to the technical assistance programmes provided by the United Nations and specialized agencies. They expressed the hope that the Administering Members would make greater use of such assistance for the economic advancement of their Territories.

(b) New developments connected with the impact of the European Economic Community on Non-Self-Governing Territories

43. The representative of the Netherlands informed the Committee of the assistance received by Netherlands New Guinea from the Development Fund established by the European Economic Community for six projects. As specified in the provisions of that Fund, development projects had to form part of the general development of the Territory and had to be for the welfare of the inhabitants. He gave the Committee a description of these projects and assured the Committee that the association of Netherlands New Guinea in the European Economic Community had had no adverse consequences but would substantially benefit the inhabitants of that Territory.

44. The attention of the Committee was drawn to the report of the Economic Commission for Africa on the impact of Western European integration on African trade and development.<sup>11</sup> From that report it appeared that while there might be immediate and short-term benefits in the association of Non-Self-Governing Territories with economic groupings such as the European Economic Community, newly independent States should consider carefully the long-term implications of such associations.

(c) Educational advancement

45. The representative of UNESCO presented the report prepared by his organization on measures for the elimination of illiteracy.<sup>12</sup> He pointed out that it was becoming increasingly recognized that the pace of economic development was closely related to the educational advancement of the people. A recent survey made by UNESCO of twenty Territories over the past decade showed that in eight of these Territories the percentage of children of school age attending school was still below 50 per cent, while in fourteen, only 5 per cent of the children between the ages of fifteen and nineteen were enrolled in secondary schools. In only three Territories was the enrolment over 10 per cent. Although there had been a considerable number of literacy campaigns in the Territories, the effectiveness of such campaigns tended to be reduced unless they were broadly conceived, were related to the everyday needs of the adult illiterates, were conducted wherever possible in connexion with existing local organizations and clubs and used varied methods, techniques and activities in which the illiterates could participate.

46. In the course of the discussions on social advancement (item 4) and on the preparation and training of indigenous civil and technical cadres (item 5), information was also provided by the Administering Members on various aspects of education and on the facilities for training civil service personnel within the educational systems of the Territory, with particular emphasis on vocational and technical training (see section VII above). At the 235th meeting, the representative of the United States gave the Committee further information on recent developments in education in Guam, American Samoa and the United States Virgin Islands.

47. Many of the non-Administering Members stressed that educational advancement in the Non-Self-Governing Territories should take into account the passionate desire of the peoples of the Territories for education. The information contained in the summaries showed that the record of the progress made often fell short of the aims. In Kenya, for instance, the increase in expenditure on education had been largely offset by the increase in the school enrolment consequent on the growth of population. Secondary school enrolment was even less satisfactory, since only a small percentage of the primary students entered secondary schools. In some Territories, increases in enrolment had been accompanied by high rates of wastage. The enrolment of girls, especially at the secondary level, was much lower than that of boys.

48. Several members pointed out that in some of the Non-Self-Governing Territories there were still separate facilities for children of different racial groups with a disproportionate expenditure on non-indigenous education. Education at the primary level in Kenya was still divided along racial lines despite the declared policy of the Government to admit all races to all schools. The fact that such situations still existed was the subject of criticism on the part of some members.

49. In reply to this criticism, the representative of the United Kingdom recalled that in connexion with the discussion on racial discrimination, under item 4 of the Committee's agenda, he had informed the Committee of recent steps taken in Kenya to implement the declared policy.<sup>13</sup> Higher education in that Territory had always been on an interracial basis and progress was being made at the secondary level. At the lower level there was still separate facilities because of language difficulties. He agreed that much remained to be done as the full implementation of the declared policy would take time. He informed the Committee that its observations on this question would be communicated to the Minister of Education in Kenya.

50. As the Committee discussed the question of racial discrimination in education in detail in connexion with the item on social advancement (see section VI above), its views on this subject appear in part two of the present report (section VIII).

IX. International collaboration and technical assistance

51. The Committee had before it a report on international technical assistance to Non-Self-Governing Territories<sup>14</sup> and a report on international collaboration for economic, social and educational advancement<sup>15</sup> prepared by the Secretariat, under General Assembly resolution 220 (III) of 3 November 1948, on decisions taken by the Economic and Social Council and studies made under its auspices which were of particular interest to the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It also had before it a report on the activities of WHO and UNICEF<sup>16</sup> and a report by UNESCO on the elimination of illiteracy.<sup>17</sup>

52. The Secretariat report on international collaboration summarized decisions and studies made by the Economic and Social Council and its commissions on economic development, social conditions, human rights and the status of women, and discussed briefly regional co-operation in the interests of Non-Self-Governing Territories. Under the section on co-operation, information was included on a resolution adopted by the Economic Commission for Africa urging all Member States administering Non-Self-Governing Territories in Africa to propose during 1961 the participation of those Territories in the work of the Commission as associate members, and expressing the desire to see those Territories represented by Africans at its next session.

53. The Committee considered this item at its 237th, 239th and 240th meetings. Statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Liberia, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. The Administering Members informed the Committee of the technical assistance received by the Territories under their administration in response to General Assembly resolution 444 (V) of 12 December 1950, and expressed their appreciation for such assistance. Also, in respect to General Assembly resolution 1539 (XV) of 15 December 1960, they informed the Committee of the participation of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the specialized agencies and the regional economic commissions of the United Nations.

54. The representative of the Netherlands referred to the assistance provided to Netherlands New Guinea by WHO and UNICEF in campaigns against malaria, tuberculosis, yaws and leprosy. He also informed the Committee of the participation of Netherlands New Guinea in the South Pacific Commission and the co-operation between his Government and the Government of Australia in the administration of their two :igh-bouring Ter: tories.

55. The representative of Australia reaffirmed the policy of his Government to co-operate with international and regional bodies to help develop Papua as rapidly as was prudently possible.

56. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that it was the policy of his Government to associate the Territories under its administration with the work of the specialized agencies and regional economic commissions of the United Nations, to the extent provided by the constitutions of those bodies. It was, however, for each Territory to decide whether it wanted to participate in the work of these bodies. He enumerated the Non-Self-Governing Territories or groups of Territories, under United Kingdom administration, which participated in the work of UNESCO, IMCO, FAO, WHO, IPU, WMO and UPU as associate members; several Non-Self-Governing Territories had also been represented at the ILO general conferences as observer delegates. All United Kingdom Territories in Asia were associate members of ECAPF; all Territories in Africa participated in the work of ECA, individually or in a group, as associate members and Mauritius and Seychelles are being proposed for associate membership. The West Indies and British Guiana were associate members in ECLA, and recently British Honduras had also been admitted. With reference to international technical assistance, he pointed out that it was the policy of his Government to request such assistance to supplement its own efforts. He informed the Committee of the increased efforts of the United Kingdom to meet the growing needs of the Territories and of its participation in various programmes of international co-operation.

57. The information contained in the Secretariat report on international technical assistance showed that, under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, allocations recommended for Non-Self-Governing Territories would amount to some $2.5 million over the two-year period 1961-1962. The recommended projects would comprise 114 experts and thirty fellowships for twenty-five Territories. Almost half of the experts would be assigned to technical assistance in the field of health.

58. In addition to the assistance provided under the Expanded Programme, the ILO, FAO, WHO and UNESCO also provide assistance to the Non-Self-Governing Territories under their regular programmes of work. The report on the activities of WHO and UNICEF described their assistance to individual Territories and their inter-country (regional) programmes. The Committee also heard statements by the representatives of the ILO and UNESCO on their activities in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee was informed that UNESCO's programmes of work for 1961-1962 would provide increased assistance to the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Approval had already been given on the assignment of fifty-one experts to serve in eleven Territories and it was expected that these experts would be actually at work before the end of the year.

59. The representative of the ILO informed the Committee that for 1961-1962 his Organisation would provide assistance to six Non-Self-Governing Territories in various fields, including man-power organization, vocational training, co-operation and handicrafts, social security, labour conditions and administration, and productivity and management development.

60. In the discussions on economic, social and educational conditions, several non-Administering Members had emphasized the importance of international technical assistance to the Non-Self-Governing Territories. They pointed out various fields in which the specialized agencies had wide experience and special competence, and suggested to the Administering Members that wider use should be made of international programmes. In particular, it was suggested that the assistance of FAO should be sought in connexion with programmes for rural development, of the ILO for increasing labour productivity, of WHO for the eradication of diseases and the training of health and medical personnel and of UNESCO in connexion with the elimination of illiteracy and various other aspects of education.

X. Questions relating to summaries and analyses

61. The Committee discussed this item at its 237th to 240th meetings. Statements were made by the representatives of Argentina, Ceylon, Ghana, India, Iraq, Liberia, Mexico and Spain. The discussion covered: (a) the dates of the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter; (b) the question of the transmission of political information; (c) the preparation and distribution of documents by the Secretariat and (d) questions arising from General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV), 1541 (XV) and 1542 (XV).

(a) *Dates of transmission of information under Article 73 e

62. By resolution 218 (III) of 3 November 1948, Members transmitting information under Article 73 e were invited "to send to the Secretary-General the most recent information which is at their disposal, as early as possible and at the latest within a maximum period of six months following the expiration of the administrative year in the Non-Self-Governing Territories concerned".

63. The report of the Secretariat on the dates of receipt of information, which appears as annex II to the present report, showed that only in a few exceptional cases had the information been transmitted according to the schedule suggested by the General Assembly. In most cases there had been a delay of two months or more and in several cases six months or more. In connexion with the question of the distribution of documents for the Committee (see sub-section (c) below), several representatives drew the attention of the Committee to these delays. They expressed the hope that the Administering Members would co-operate more fully with the United Nations and send the information under Article 73 e on time.

(b) *Political information

64. Of the fifty-one Non-Self-Governing Territories on which information was transmitted in 1960, forty-one Territories are administered by the United Kingdom, three by New Zealand, three by the United States, two by Australia, one by the Netherlands, and one by France jointly with the United Kingdom.

65. Some members of the Committee pointed out that, although Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United States regularly transmitted political information, the United Kingdom had never done so. This meant that the Committee could not properly assess the advancement in most of the Territories because of the lack of political information. They recalled that at its fifteenth session the General Assembly had, by resolution 1535 (XV) of 15 December 1960, again urged all Administering Members who had not yet done so to extend their co-operation to the United Nations by transmitting political information.

66. At the 238th meeting, the representative of India appealed to the United Kingdom to transmit political information on the Territories under its administration. He suggested that if the Administering Members did not transmit political information it might be necessary for the General Assembly to request the Committee to examine political developments in the Territories on the basis of published official reports and other authoritative material. This suggestion was supported by some other non-Administering Members and was further discussed in connexion with the question of the renewal of the Committee.

(c) Distribution of documents of the Committee

67. In the course of the discussions on social, educational and economic advancement in the Non-Self-Governing Territories (items 4 and 6), a representative noted the delay in the distribution of the Spanish texts of the working documents and the summaries of information transmitted under Article 73 e.

68. Under the present item, it was again pointed out that the work of the Committee had been handicapped by these delays. Not only had the summaries been distributed so late that delegations had not had time to study them in detail, but some summaries had only become available after the Committee had completed its discussion of items 4, 5 and 6.

69. At the same meeting, the Under-Secretary explained that a number of factors had contributed to the delay, and some had been beyond the Secretariat's control; one of them was the delay in the transmission of information. A major reason for the delay, however, had been the heavy workload created by the resumed session of the General Assembly and by the documentation required in connexion with the situation in the Congo. Consequently, the Documents Services had not had enough time to complete the work on the documents for the various bodies meeting immediately after the close of the fifteenth session of the General Assembly. The delay in distribution of the summaries was also due, in part, to the way in which the summaries were grouped and printed. As the summaries were grouped in fascicles by geographical regions, when information on one Territory was delayed, the processing of the summaries of all Territories in that group was also delayed.

70. Several delegations stated that whatever the reasons for the delays, they felt that the Committee could not effectively discharge its functions as it did not have the summaries of information before it in respect of all the Territories. Subsequently, during the discussion on the future work of the Committee, several suggestions were made. An account of the discussion on these suggestions, one of which was the possibility of changing the date of the next session of the Committee, is contained in section XI of this report.

(d) Questions arising from General Assembly resolutions 1514 (XV), 1541 (XV) and 1542 (XV)

71. By resolution 1542 (XV), the General Assembly declared that an obligation existed on the part of the Government of Portugal to transmit information under Chapter XI of the Charter concerning the Territories under its administration and that this obligation should be discharged without further delay; and requested the Government of Portugal to transmit to the Secretary-General information in accordance with the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter on the conditions prevailing in the Territories under its administration, as enumerated in General Assembly resolution 1542 (XV). By the same resolution, the General Assembly requested the Secretary-General to take the necessary steps in pursuance of the declaration of the Government of Spain that it was ready to act in accordance with provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter, and invited the Governments of Portugal and Spain to participate in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories in accordance with the terms of paragraph 2 of General Assembly resolution 1332 (XIII).

72. The twelfth session of the Committee was attended by the representative of Spain. The Committee did not have before it any summaries of information transmitted by the Government of Spain, and in the studies submitted to it no reference had been made to Spanish Territories. The note on the dates of receipt of information showed that the Secretary-General had not received information from the Spanish Government under Article 73 e of the Charter.

73. At the 239th meeting, after the conclusion of the discussion on the substantive items, the representative of Spain made a statement in connexion with the obligation of his Government under Article 73 e. He provided the Committee with detailed information on political, economic, social and educational conditions in Fernando Póo, Río Muni and the Spanish Sahara. As decided by the Committee, the text of the statement of the representative of Spain is annexed to this report as annex V.

74. The representatives of Argentina, Ceylon, Ghana, India, Iraq and Liberia welcomed the statement by the representative of Spain. Some representatives expressed regret that the Committee had not had this information at the beginning of its session and hoped that in the future the Government of Spain would transmit information under Article 73 e in time for the Secretariat to summarize it in accordance with the usual practice.

75. The representative of Ghana asked whether the Spanish Government intended to include at a later date information on Ifni which had been omitted from the Spanish representative's statement. In reply, the representative of Spain stated, among other reasons, that because bilateral discussions had been held between Spain and Morocco, his Government had not considered it appropriate to include Ifni in the information provided to the Committee.

76. The representative of Ghana reserved his position with regard to Ifni, which, he stated, his Government regarded as part of Africa and not as an overseas province of Spain. The representative of Iraq reserved the position of her Government in respect of Ifni, Saguia-el-Hamra and Río de Oro.

77. At the 237th meeting, the representative of Mexico referred to General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV). He pointed out that this resolution provided the legal basis for concrete measures leading to the independence of all Non-Self-Governing Territories. In this connexion, he noted that the French Territories in South America had not yet achieved independence and their status was not clear. Although France had transmitted information on these Territories in 1946, it had ceased transmission the following year without any action by the General Assembly. The cessation of information on those Territories had not, however, been approved by the General Assembly. The General Assembly had, by resolution 1541 (XV), asserted its competence to decide whether or not an obligation exists to transmit information, and had adopted twelve principles to be used in this connexion. Accordingly, the status of the French Territories should be examined in the light of these principles. Among other principles, the General Assembly had declared that prima facie there is an obligation to transmit information in respect of a Territory which is geographically separate and is distinct ethnically and/or culturally from the country administering it. Since the French Territories came under this category, it was for the General Assembly to decide whether or not an obligation existed to transmit information. He hoped that the situation would be resolved in the near future with the co-operation of France.

78. The representative of France rejected the allegations of the representative of Mexico and stated that the only responsibility his Government had under Chapter XI was that for the New Hebrides which it administered jointly with the United Kingdom.

79. The representatives of Argentina, India and Liberia expressed their support for the position taken by the representative of Mexico.

80. At the 239th meeting, Ceylon, Ghana, India, Iraq, Liberia and Mexico submitted a draft resolution<sup>18</sup> in the name of the Committee. By this draft resolution, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories would note with regret the absence of the representative of Portugal from the Committee and the fact that Portugal had not yet transmitted information under Article 73 e. Further, under operative paragraph 3, the Committee would request the Secretary-General, "pending the receipt of information on conditions in the Territories under the administration of Portugal, to prepare, on the basis of such reliable and authoritative publications as may be available, for the next session of the General Assembly, background papers containing statistical and other information relating to economic, social and educational conditions prevailing in the Territories under the administration of Portugal".

81. At the 240th meeting, in introducing this draft resolution, the sponsors recalled that by resolution 1542 (XV) the General Assembly had called upon the Government of Portugal to transmit information under Article 73 e in respect of the Territories enumerated in that resolution. As the representative of Portugal had been absent and no information had been transmitted by his Government, the Committee had not been able to discharge its mandate to examine the conditions in Portuguese Territories. It was therefore the Committee's duty to provide the General Assembly with some information on which it could base its discussions. For these reasons, it was proposed to ask the Secretary-General to prepare some background documentation for the use of the General Assembly at the sixteenth session. In the course of one of his statements, the representative of India also suggested that in the absence of the transmission of information by Portugal concerning its Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee should be authorized, as a very exceptional case, to admit oral hearings from these Territories.

82. Some members expressed support for the general principles of this draft resolution. Some, however, opposed operative paragraph 3 because they considered that it went beyond the competence of the Committee. By its terms of reference, the Committee was invited "to examine in the spirit of Article 1, paragraphs 3 and 4, and of Article 55 of the Charter the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories". According to these representatives the Committee was thus not competent to examine information gathered by the Secretariat from other sources. It was further pointed out that the adoption of the draft resolution would place the Secretary-General in a difficult position. It placed a burden on the Secretary-General to decide which sources were authoritative. Furthermore, until the General Assembly had formally approved the report of the Committee, the Secretary-General would not, in actual fact, have any mandate to prepare the background report requested which therefore could not be placed before the sixteenth session.

83. Against these arguments procedures were cited showing that the Committee, in adopting operative paragraph 3, would not be exceeding its terms of reference; as in the past, it had, in its own name, taken decisions of a procedural nature, requesting the Secretary-General to prepare reports. The Committee also had taken decisions in connexion with the cessation of transmission of information.

84. At the same meeting, the Committee voted on the draft resolution. At the request of the representative of New Zealand, the Committee voted on operative paragraph 3 separately, which it rejected by a roll-call vote of 7 to 6, with 2 abstentions. The voting was as follows:

In favour: Ceylon, Ghana, India, Iraq, Liberia and Mexico.

Against: Australia, France, Netherlands, New Zealand, Spain, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstentions: Argentina, Dominican Republic.

The Committee adopted the draft resolution, as amended, by 9 votes to 2, with 4 abstentions.

85. The text of the resolution, as adopted by the Committee, is as follows:

"The Committee on information from Non-Self-Governing Territories,

"Recalling General Assembly resolution 1542 (XV) of 15 December 1960, whereby the Assembly declared that an obligation exists on the part of the Government of Portugal to transmit information under Chapter XI of the Charter concerning its Non-Self-Governing Territories enumerated in that resolution and that this obligation should be discharged without further delay,

"Noting that the General Assembly, by that same resolution, requested the Government of Portugal to transmit to the Secretary-General information in accordance with the provisions of Chapter XI of the Charter on the conditions prevailing in the Territories under its administration, and invited the Government of Portugal to participate in the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories in accordance with the terms of paragraph 2 of General Assembly resolution 1332 (XIII) of 12 December 1958,

"1. Notes with regret that the Government of Portugal has not yet transmitted the information as required under resolution 1542 (XV), nor has it indicated its intention to do so;

"2. Deeply regrets the absence of the representative of Portugal from the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories at its twelfth session."

XI. Question of the renewal of the Committee

86. Operative paragraph 8 of General Assembly resolution 1332 (XIII) provides that "at its sixteenth session, the General Assembly will reconsider the question of continuing the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, together with the questions of the composition and terms of reference of this or any such future committee".

87. The Committee discussed this question at its 240th meeting. Statements were made by the representatives of Argentina, Ceylon, Ghana, Iraq, Liberia and the United States.

88. The representative of the United States said that his delegation was prepared to give its full and unqualified support to renewing the Committee for another three-year period with its present terms of reference, if that was the wish of the Committee. On the other hand, if some members of the Committee wished to press for an extension of the terms of reference of the Committee, it was the view of his Government that this matter, which was a controversial one, should be simply referred to the Fourth Committee. In that case, it would also propose that no specific and formal recommendations should be made by the Committee concerning its future work, and that the views expressed on this question should be included in the Committee's report to the General Assembly.

89. Several non-Administering Members referred to General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. They expressed the view that the future work of the Committee should aim at the implementation of this resolution. Accordingly, the Committee should not be renewed for a fixed period of time but should be set up so that it would exist as long as there were any Non-Self-Governing Territories.

90. As for the terms of reference of the Committee, these delegations did not wish to submit any formal proposals but agreed that the matter should be left to the consideration and decision of the General Assembly at its sixteenth session; they felt it useful, however, to outline the areas in which changes in the Committee's terms of reference were desirable. Accordingly, several suggestions were made, one of which was that the Committee should be authorized to examine political and constitutional developments. It was further suggested that the Committee should be able to submit recommendations on individual Territories. The clause in resolution 1332 (XIII) providing for recommendations to be made generally, but not in respect of individual Territories, had become a serious handicap to the effectiveness of the Committee's work. Furthermore, because of the rapid changes taking place in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, information soon became out of date. These delegations thought that the Committee could no longer afford to examine the functional fields only once every three years, but should examine all aspects of economic, social, educational and political advancement in the Territories each year.

91. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his country had co-operated with the Committee in the past, in spite of its view that the Charter contained no provision for examination of the information transmitted under Article 73 e, subject to certain conditions which were embodied in General Assembly resolution 1332 (XIII). He would have been prepared to support a proposal to renew the Committee on the same basis, but since some members had proposed that the terms of reference be extended, he thought it wise that the Committee should not attempt to formulate a recommendation on this item, which would in any case be on the provisional agenda of the sixteenth session of the General Assembly.

92. The Committee decided to submit this account of the views of its members for the information of the General Assembly.

XII. Future work of the Committee

93. The Committee discussed this item at its 238th and 240th meetings. Although the Committee considered this question principally on the basis of a working paper prepared by the Secretariat,<sup>19</sup> it also took into consideration views expressed during the discussions on items 8 and 9. Equally, the Committee took into account the opinion expressed by some members that the future work of the Committee would have to be considered by the General Assembly at its sixteenth session in connexion with any decisions it might take on the question of the renewal of the Committee and its terms of reference.

94. The working paper of the Secretariat had pointed out that if the Committee were to meet in the spring of 1962, it would normally have before it at that time full summaries of information for the year 1960, with data covering the two preceding years. Since much of the 1960 information was likely to have become out of date by the time the Committee met in the spring of 1962, some members suggested that the date of the session of the Committee might be changed. As a possibility it was suggested that, for instance, the Committee could meet in August and, provided the Administering Members could make the effort to send the information transmitted under Article 73 e by June 1962, i.e., according to the dates given in General Assembly resolution 218 (III), the Secretariat would be in possession of information for 1961 in addition to that for 1960 and would have some two months in which to prepare and distribute the summaries of information.

95. Some other members pointed out that if the change in the date of the next session could not be easily made, the Administering Members might, in accordance with the provisions of section C of the preface to the Standard Form adopted by the General Assembly in resolution 551 (VI) of 7 December 1951, provide a survey of the principles and practical measures showing general trends in the Territories, and thus make available information on the latest developments in the most important areas to bring the information under Article 73 e more up to date. The representative of Liberia suggested that the specialized agencies should be asked by the General Assembly to assist the Committee by bringing this information up to date.

96. The Secretariat drew the Committee's attention to its statement on the distribution of documents and pointed out that if the Committee wished to change the date of its next session it would be necessary for the Committee to indicate its wish, so that other units responsible for servicing meetings could be consulted.

97. As a basis for discussion, the Secretariat paper had suggested four major studies on education for the special consideration of the Committee at its next session. The representative of India suggested three other studies to be prepared by the specialized agencies for the Committee, as follows: (1) education of women and girls, to be prepared by UNESCO; (2) vocational and technical training, but with special emphasis on education of the workers, to be prepared by the ILO; and (3) aspects of health education and facilities for training medical and health personnel, to be prepared by WHO. He further suggested that the studies prepared by the ILO and WHO should take into account the conditions in Portuguese Territories, because both these agencies had their own sources of information on conditions in these areas.

98. In connexion with the general survey of education suggested in the working paper prepared by the Secretariat,<sup>19</sup> the representative of UNESCO informed the Committee that his Organization would be ready to prepare a report of a general character on education in Non-Self-Governing Territories, which would take into account both the plan of work of the Committee and the UNESCO plan of work for 1962. UNESCO hoped, in particular, to have at its disposal information emanating from the African Non-Self-Governing Territories which had been invited to the education conference held at Addis Ababa. This should provide considerable material of interest to the Committee for inclusion in a report. The contents of the report and its extent would be the subject of discussion and agreement between the Secretariats of the United Nations and of UNESCO.

In practice the maximum period expires on 30 June in the case of Territories other than those under the administration of Australia, New Zealand and the United States of America. In the case of New Zealand the administrative year expires on 31 March and with respect to Australia and the United States Territories on 30 June.

Territories on which information was transmitted in 1958 or 1959, but was discontinued in 1960 owing to the achievement by these Territories of independence or other forms of full self-government, have not been listed in this note.

Statements on the preparation and training of indigenous civil and technical cadres presented by the Administering Members to the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories

At its twelfth session, the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories decided<sup>a</sup> (see part one, section VII, above) that oral statements made by the Administering Members on the preparation and training of indigenous civil and technical cadres in the Territories under their administration, as well as the information transmitted on this subject in response to General Assembly resolution 1534 (XV) of 15 December 1960, should be annexed to the Committee's report to the sixteenth session of the General Assembly.

Both oral and written statements were presented by the Governments of Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand,<sup>a</sup> the United Kingdom and the United States, and are accordingly reproduced below. Where the information contained in the oral and written statements of a single Government was almost identical, only the written statement has been reproduced.<sup>b</sup> Where the information given in the oral and written statements overlapped to some extent, the relevant data has been incorporated in a single text.<sup>c</sup> Where the oral statement contained extensive supplementary information, both the oral and written statements have been reproduced in full.<sup>d</sup>

A. SPECIAL REPORT BY AUSTRALIA ON THE PREPARATION AND TRAINING OF INDIGENOUS CIVIL AND TECHNICAL CADRES IN PAPUA<sup>e</sup>

1. It is the objective of the Australian Government to advance the people of the Territories under its administration to the ultimate goal of self-government (but in such a way as to enable them efficiently to undertake the tasks of government and command the confidence and respect of all peoples). This requires not only their training in political awareness to ensure that their rights and interests are maintained, but training and experience in all forms of administrative development. It is with this purpose in view that the Administration makes provision for a progressive intake of indigenous officers into the Public Service and ensures that their training is commensurate with the expanding needs of the service and their growing ability to cope with the higher levels of education.

2. Training is provided by the Administration to employees at the lowest levels of employment, enabling them if they so desire to advance progressively to responsible positions in the service, while the more advanced officers are given every encouragement and facility to qualify for any position within the scope of their ability.

3. Training is undertaken by the Department of Education, the Public Service Institute, and by all the technical and professional departments, most of whom provide special courses for each grade of officer.

4. Admission to the Territory's Public Service is by qualification, but indigenes who, while not qualified to enter the lowest of the four divisions, desire to obtain through training certain skills and qualifications and who wish to make a career with the Administration, may be employed as Administration Servants. Provision has been made for this class of employee to attend special classes to enable them to qualify for appointment to the Auxiliary Division. Such classes are mainly designed to advance the student to an educational standard comparable to Standard IX of the post-primary school syllabus.

5. The Auxiliary Division was created in the Public Service a few years ago, ostensibly as a training division, and qualification for entry varies according to the category of employment but ranges from Standard IV plus appropriate skill in the lower technical categories to examination at Standard IX in the clerical and sub-professional category. Training in the Auxiliary Division is partly by in-service and partly own time, and is undertaken by correspondence and class tuition, being generally aimed at advancing the students to the "junior" or "intermediate" certificate level of education to enable qualification for entry to the Third Division.

6. In order to provide for training of Papuans who become educationally qualified for entry into the Public Service at a higher level than the Auxiliary Division, a number of in-training positions have been created in the Third Division. Persons appointed to these positions receive practical "on-the-job" training, supplemented with formal class-room tuition, and are subject to Public Service conditions in regard to

<sup>e</sup> This information was transmitted to the Secretary-General on 10 May 1961 and was summarized in an oral statement before the Committee on Information at its 234th meeting; the full text was distributed as a document under the symbol A/4766.

salaries, leave, etc. On successful completion of the prescribed training course they are eligible for advancement to the following positions:

Assistant Co-operative Officer	Communications Officer
Assistant Field Officer	Drafting Assistant
Assistant Patrol Officer	Laboratory Assistant
Assistant Surveyor	Linesman
Assistant Valuer	Postal Assistant
Assistant Welfare Officer	Technical Assistant
Assistant Wharf Examining Officer	Technician

Distinct from this "on-the-job" training, full academic training is provided in special colleges for Papuans desiring appointment to professional type positions in the Third Division, such as Assistant Education Officer and Assistant Medical Practitioner.

7. Minimum qualification for entry to the Second Division of the Service is the Australian Leaving Certificate or equivalent, and beyond that training and study facilities are available and encouraged in all fields of higher education.

8. The Public Service Institute, which is the focus of training within the Territory for qualifications, promotions and specialized studies, continues to open new avenues for learning. While initially available only to members of the Public Service, the Institute facilities are now open to the general public. Advice and guidance in higher academic studies is available to all persons in the Territory and tutorial classes in university studies are now being extended to other centres besides that of Port Moresby. A further feature of the training facilities offered through the Public Service Institute in non-academic studies is the organization of adult leisure-time classes, while adult matriculation is now open to persons of any race in the Territory who are over the age of twenty-three years. The Institute has an important role to play in increasing indigenous participation in Public Service responsibilities. It plans during this year to include the provision of general orientation and special training courses for both non-indigenous and indigenous officers; expansion of its services in the teaching of matriculation subjects to enable officers of the Public Service and members of the general public in the Territory to qualify for university studies; and to increase also the range of studies for which tutorials are provided at university level. During the past year, 422 students availed themselves of the opportunity to study through the facilities offered by the Public Service Institute.

9. In addition to the training undertaken by the Public Service Institute, the Department of Education has established a special branch, known as the "Pre-entry and Auxiliary Training Branch" at which 920 students throughout the Territory were receiving either direct day and evening class tuition, or were studying by correspondence at 30 June last. Of these 141 were taking studies at a secondary level and the remainder at intermediate standard.

10. As an incentive to officers to study, a salary barrier has been introduced, advancement beyond which is by examination.

11. A further avenue of training associated with the Territory Public Service is the Australian School of Pacific Administration, the function of which is to provide courses for the education of officers and prospective officers of the Territory and also for certain other persons who, because of their association with the Territory, would benefit by their inclusion in the particular courses of study conducted by the school. Courses include general orientation courses for new entrants to the Territory Public Service, special courses for cadets of the Department of Native Affairs and Education, special courses for senior officers and the conducting of an annual seminar for selected officers on subjects related to the development of the Territory. Papuan officers are among those attending courses and seminars.

12. Additional forms of administrative training are undertaken by the Department of Native Affairs in the fields of local government and co-operatives.

Local Government Councils

13. Training in local Government Council matters is provided at two centres located in the Trust Territory of New Guinea, the Vunadadir Local Government Training Centre near Rabaul and at the Ambenob Council Headquarters near Madang. Special courses are conducted periodically for administration officers, while six-month training courses are held for local government assistants and Council Clerks who receive training in basic local government accounting procedures, book-keeping, and other subjects. Such courses are for young men who have reached Standard IX at school and who, after graduation, are posted to Councils for employment. Local government assistants receive additional training in local government legislation, meeting procedures and all clerical aspects of Council work. Practical training continues after their appointment to a particular Council and when fully trained, these assistants are able to advise and assist the Councils in most aspects of their activities.

14. This training has substantially contributed to the expansion of the local Government Council movement, from one Council in 1951 covering a population of approximately 2,500 to sixteen in 1960 for a population of nearly 100,000 people, by providing essential staff to enable them to function. All Councils are staffed by qualified indigenous personnel.

Co-operatives

15. The training of co-operative staff is undertaken at the Co-operative Education Centre at Port Moresby. The construction of this centre was financed by contributions from co-operative societies throughout Papua and New Guinea, assisted by a grant from the Commonwealth Bank of Australia. Training staff is provided by the Administration, which also meets the boarding expenses of students. Instruction covers courses for inspectors, secretaries and storemen, and includes elementary book-keeping and such business practices as preparation of trading accounts and balance sheets. The qualifying standard for inspector and secretary courses is Standard VIII and the duration of each is about five months. The course for storemen requires a lower entrance qualification and the duration is six weeks.

16. The Co-operative Education Centre, established in 1955, has provided training for more than 200 Papuans. Students from the Trust Territory of New Guinea and from the Solomon Islands also attend these courses, which last year catered for a total number of twenty-eight students in storemen training and thirty-three as inspectors and secretaries. Co-operative societies in Papua are staffed entirely by Papuans who have built up the movement since 1950 to a total of 122 societies under one Federation of Societies with a total turnover of almost half a million pounds during last year.

Education and teacher training

17. Training through education is undertaken at the post-primary and secondary levels both within the Territory and in Australia.

18. On completion of primary schooling at Standard VII, three streams develop, one in the purely indigenous secondary schools, leading to the Queensland University public examinations four years later; the second in the integrated high schools leading to the New South Wales public examination; and the third stream in intermediate schools leading to Standard IX, whence the students proceed to teacher training or other technical or specialized training.

19. Training of Papuan teachers is undertaken by both the Administration and the missions. The syllabus of teacher training provides four different courses, i.e., A, B, C and D. The entrance qualification for course "A", which is of one year's duration, is Standard VI for mission students and Standard VII for administration students. Course "B", also of one year, requires an entrance qualification of Standard IX for all applicants. Course "C", which is of two years' duration, makes the Queensland Junior Certificate the qualification for entrance, though provisions are made for the admission of certain students at a slightly lower level for the time being. Course "D", which was only commenced this year, is a special course taking selected Papuan students from Standard VI and combines normal instruction with teacher training through to Standard IX. During the fourth year of this course, teacher training is provided, bringing the student to the level of the "B" course certificate.

20. At 30 June last year sixty trainees, including four girls, were undertaking the "C" course at the Port Moresby Teachers' College, while there were forty "A" course trainees at the Iduhada Teacher Training Centre.

21. At the same date, 104 students (including thirteen girls) were in training at six mission teacher training centres in Papua.

22. The greatly increased emphasis on in-service training for both administration and mission teachers has resulted in the establishment of refresher courses throughout the Territory during the school vacations. During last year, one or two courses were run in each district and this has enabled the Department of Education to supervise more closely the work of indigenous teachers, especially those with inferior qualifications, and to raise the general level of efficiency in schools.

23. Correspondence courses are available for Papuan teachers, and the Department maintains a specialized library, under the control of a trained librarian, for the benefit of professional officers.

Scholarships

24. Since 1954, scholarships have been provided for selected Papuan children to complete their education in Australia, with the full cost of education and other expenses met by the Administration. Last year forty-three Papuan children received assistance for education in Australia.

TECHNICAL AND PROFESSIONAL TRAINING

Technical training

25. There are two administration and two mission technical training centres in Papua which admit students at the level of Standard VI to a four-year course of technical study. The first two years of the course have a specialized syllabus covering English, arithmetic, social studies, general science, technical drawing, wood-work and metal-work, while in the second two years the students specialize in one of the established trades.

Apprenticeship training

26. The technical training centres also provide regular part-time instruction for apprentices in training under the Native Apprenticeship Scheme. This scheme provides for training along the general lines of Australian Apprenticeship Schemes, and last year 104 Papuan trainees were under apprenticeship agreements in some twenty-one different trades.

27. Apprenticeships are also available to the more advanced trainees in Australia and a significant achievement by a seventeen-year old Papuan apprentice was the gaining of an honours pass in his first-year examinations last year. This apprentice is employed by the Shell Company and is taking his technical training in Brisbane.

Agricultural training

28. Training in the field of agriculture commences at the basic level and is carried out by both direct and indirect methods. At the village level, education is by contact with the farming community through patrolling, extension centres, rural organizations and assistance in the provision of marketing facilities. Administration work involves both activity in the field amongst farmers on their own land and on the government agricultural extension stations, while the direct training is divided into three levels: the training of professional and semi-professional agriculturists for the Territory's future needs, the training of indigenous intermediaries to assist in agricultural extension programmes and the training of farmers themselves to increase the numbers of expert farmers in rural communities.

29. Farmer training courses of from nine to twelve months' duration are held at agricultural extension stations. At the end of last year, 206 Papuans were receiving instructions in this type of training, while a further fifty-two selected trainees were appointed as field assistants to agricultural extension officers.

30. Sub-diploma courses will be provided for students with qualifications below the intermediate level who desire a specialized training in agriculture. It is planned to develop the Agricultural Extension Station at Popondetta for this purpose, but until this can be effected about twenty-five students a year are being trained at the Mageri Agricultural Training Centre near Port Moresby. Both theoretical and practical instruction are provided in agriculture, botany, plant health, agricultural economics and farming, and mathematics; supplementary instruction is given in English expression.

31. Further study facilities to full diploma level will shortly be available at the proposed Vudal Agricultural College in New Guinea to students who have successfully completed the intermediate school course.

32. Positions are available within the Department of Agriculture for successful graduates from all these levels of training to promote the rapid expansion of agricultural extension and to fill as many as possible of the positions available within the Department in the second, third and auxiliary divisions of the Territory's Public Service. Fourteen new appointments were made to the Auxiliary Division in the Department during last year.

33. In-service training is available at all levels of employment within the Department of Agriculture, while every year cadetships are available in agriculture and veterinary science. One Papuan student qualified for an academic scholarship last year and is now studying agricultural science at Sydney University. Two others are undertaking diploma studies at agricultural colleges in Australia.

Fisheries training

34. Training within the Fisheries Division covers a minimum period of three years' in-service training and involves a study of fish and shell species, together with the problems of river, estuary and reef fishing, the construction and repair of various types of fishing gear, seamanship and fishing operations.

35. Trainees successfully completing the course are given the opportunity to proceed to more complex training leading to qualifications which will enable them to give instruction in villages on fishing methods and the preparation of fish for market, to take charge of station and field work, to design and operate new gear and to manage fisheries vessels up to sixty feet in length.

36. Twenty-one fishery assistants are at present in training and five assistants, now classed as "Fishery Field Workers", have reached a sufficient standard of competence to give elementary training in a wide field of fishery work, boat and engine maintenance and minor repairs.

Forestry training

37. There is a big demand for the services of forest rangers in both Papua and New Guinea, and progressive in-service training from the basic level is provided by the Department of Forests. Special training courses are held in Port Moresby and other centres in New Guinea to enable Papuans to qualify for entry to the Auxiliary Division of the Public Service. Subsequent steps in training are a four-year, on-the-job course for assistant forest rangers to enable them to qualify for promotion to forest ranger.

38. Additionally, twelve posts for forestry cadets are available in which training involves two years of basic science at an Australian University, one year of practical field instruction in the Territory, followed by two years at the Australian Forestry School in Canberra.

39. All posts in the Forestry Department are open to Papuans subject only to qualification. A young seventeen-year old Papuan forestry field assistant was this year selected to attend the Fiji Forestry Training School for a special twelve-months' course. He is the first Papuan to study forestry overseas and on completion of the Fiji course will be appointed to the staff of the Administration Forestry School to assist further in the training of indigenes as forest ranger.

Nautical training

40. The marine section of the Department of Customs and Marine plans to train Papuans as masters, officers and engineers for service in coastal vessels and specifications are now being drawn up for a suitable training ship. On completion of this course, trainees will be eligible to qualify by examination for a coastal master's certificate and equivalent certificates in the other occupations. At a lower level of training, seamen and engine-room operators are trained at the National School in Hollandia, and those who show sufficient aptitude will be given opportunities for further advancement after serving a period at sea.

41. Twelve Papuans completed the course in Hollandia late last year and have since joined the crews of administration and privately owned vessels in the Territory. A second group of twelve trainees is at present undergoing the ten months' course, and it is proposed to send a similar number of selected trainees each year. Entrance qualifications for the school require that trainees shall be between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one years, have completed Standard VI at school and are able to pass an appropriate medical examination.

Postal and telegraphic training

42. The Department of Posts and Telegraphs provides comprehensive in-service training for staff in a variety of postal and telecommunications occupations at the residential Posts and Telegraphs Training College in Port Moresby. Students are trained to a level which qualifies them for entry to the Third Division of the Public Service.

43. The College provides several technical courses of instruction requiring various standards of entry. For the radio and telephone technicians course, the minimum educational qualification for admission is Standard IX and the course is of five years' duration, two years in full-time study at the College and the remainder in the field. Five Papuans were undertaking this course at the end of last year.

44. The course for telegraphists and teleprint operators also requires a Standard IX entry qualification and the length of the course is from three to four years. Five Papuans were undertaking this course also at the end of last year.

45. The Postal Trainees Course is also a Standard IX entry qualification and is of similar duration to that last mentioned. Three Papuans were undertaking this course last year.

46. The course for linesmen requires Standard VII qualification for entry and is also of from three to four years' duration. Three Papuans were attending the course last year.

47. At the end of last year, sixteen Papuans were resident students of the College and it is anticipated that the annual intake will progressively increase, as there is already a big demand for the services of qualified technicians in this Department of the Service.

Medical training

48. Training within the Department of Public Health is the responsibility of a Special Division and covers a wide field in health and medical education.

49. All media available for dissemination of information to the public are used in health education to improve the general health of the people at the village and town levels. To ensure the widest possible use of this type of training, a central Health Education Council, comprising permanent members from the Department of Health, Education, Native Affairs and Agriculture, ensures that health education is brought into the activities of all field departments. In furtherance of this policy health education is included in the course for officers of all Departments at the Australian School of Pacific Administration.

50. In the more specialized fields of training for employment and promotion within the Department of Public Health, a number of avenues of training are open and, as in all branches of the Public Service, special encouragement is extended to Papuans.

Assistant medical practitioners

51. The highest level of training within the Territory, is the Papuan Medical College, which is associated with the Port Moresby General Hospital, and provides training for assistant medical practitioners. The course consists of a preliminary year and five years of further study along the lines of medical courses at Australian universities but with passes at a lower standard. Last year, six male and two female students from Papua progressed to the first year of studies after completing the preliminary year and are now studying chemistry, zoology, botany, physics and sociology. A further eight Papuan students were taking the preliminary year in 1960.

Nursing

52. Nurses are also trained at the Port Moresby General Hospital where the course follows the Australian pattern. Successful female students are designated nurses or nursing assistants, depending on the standard attained, while successful male students are designated hospital assistants.

53. At the close of the last financial year, forty-seven males and forty-three females, including three females from the Solomon Islands were undertaking nursing courses in Port Moresby. The majority of the Papuans taking this course will continue their work in the Territory Public Service after successful completion of the course.

Aid post orderlies

54. The training of aid post orderlies—male Papuans who staff the medical service at the village level—is one of the most important parts of the over-all training programme. Training is carried out at the Aid Post Training School at Saiho in the Northern district, where students undergo a two-year course in the theory and practice of medicine and hygiene as it applies to their work at Aid Posts. The School is in the charge of full-time European medical instructors assisted by indigenous assistants who have been trained for this work. At the end of last year, thirty aid post orderlies were in training.

Hospital orderlies

55. Hospital orderlies carry out routine nursing duties and are trained in hospitals by medical assistants under the supervision and direction of the medical officer-in-charge. Last year, 185 male and thirty-five female Papuans were undergoing this form of training.

Dental, laboratory and X-ray assistants and orderlies

56. Students of educational Standard IX are accepted for training as dental and laboratory assistants while Standard VII is required for X-ray assistants. Duration of the course for these categories of training is three years and is carried out at the Port Moresby General Hospital. At the present there are three trainees undergoing training in each of the dental, X-ray and laboratory courses, while six are taking laboratory assistant courses.

Malaria control assistants

57. Malaria control assistants undergo a two months' course of training to fit them for the malaria control work and supervision in the field. Four were trained in this type of work last year.

Infant and maternal welfare

58. The Infant, Child and Maternal Health Division trains girls as midwifery orderlies, infant welfare orderlies, midwifery assistants and infant welfare assistants. There are two administration and five mission training centres from which ten infant welfare assistants, seventeen midwifery assistants, two infant welfare orderlies and two midwifery orderlies graduated last year. An additional thirty-one are in training at administration centres and fifty-six at mission centres. The course covers a two-year period at the end of which students are qualified as infant welfare assistants. A further year is required for midwifery assistants.

Pre-school assistants

59. Pre-school assistants are trained at a number of school centres by qualified pre-school teachers. The training course covers a two-year period and the qualification for entry is Standard VI. After graduation and an additional year of supervised work with village groups, pre-school assistants are qualified for the supervision of village playgrounds in urban and rural areas. Four students are at present in training and one graduate is stationed at Hanuabada near Port Moresby.

60. Additional to the various courses in medical and health training already mentioned, provision is made for students who have reached the required standard to attend the Central Medical, Dental and Nursing Schools in Fiji. Last year nineteen students were attending the following courses:

Assistant medical practitioner	10
Assistant dental officer	2
Nursing training	2
Radiography	2
Laboratory assistant	3

Police

61. Recruits to the Royal Papua and New Guinea Constabulary undergo an initial twelve months' training course and may subsequently avail themselves of the numerous part-time and in-service training courses available. Members are selected from time to time for special courses for specialists and for promotion to non-commissioned rank.

62. Land has recently been acquired for a Police Training College where it is proposed to train selected Papuan and New Guinean recruits to officer status during a four-year course. Upon completion of the course the successful graduates will be commissioned with the rank of Assistant Sub-Inspector with equal opportunity for promotion to any positions in the Force. As construction of the College will take time, a start has already been made with the training of ten recruits who will ultimately complete their training at the College. The College will have an initial recruitment potential of forty and a subsequent annual intake of twenty trainees.

63. Of the present strength of 3,070 officers, non-commissioned officers and constables in the Royal Papua and New Guinea Constabulary, 1,235 are serving in Papua of whom only thirty-five are non-indigenous.

64. It will be seen from this that the Australian Government is providing the means for training in all fields of administration with a view to the earliest practical admission of increasing numbers of Papuans into the structure of the Administration. With the expanding services in health, agriculture, education and the many other ancillary functions of administration an increasing emphasis is being placed on the training of Papuans to enable them to take their place in the ranks of an expanding Public Service. It is noteworthy that ninety-three indigenous officers were admitted to the Territory Public Service during 1959/1960, making a total of 355 at 30 June last, while a further fifty-two were appointed during the six months to 31 December 1960. Of the ninety-three new appointees last year, 39 were teachers, 3 health assistants, 20 technical assistants, 15 field assistants and 16 clerical assistants. Many of the clerical appointments were to specialized occupations in the co-operative and Native local government branches of the Department of Native Affairs.

B. SPECIAL REPORT BY THE NETHERLANDS ON THE PREPARATION AND TRAINING OF INDIGENOUS CIVIL AND TECHNICAL CADRES IN NETHERLANDS NEW GUINEA<sup>1</sup>

1. The Netherlands Government as the Administering Authority of Netherlands New Guinea attaches great importance to the training of indigenous civil and technical cadres to enable the Papuans to take an increasing share of responsibility in the conduct of the Territory's affairs.

2. At present most of the functions occupied by indigenous personnel are in the lower and intermediate ranks. If the programme of "autochthonization" is to be a success it will be necessary to fill a large part of higher posts in the Government by Papuans.

3. In 1960 a three-year development plan was drawn up to serve as the basis for a new ten-year plan for development of the Territory. This plan pays much attention to the "Papuanization" of the territorial Government and to the training of indigenous cadres in all fields with the object of forming an élite, e.g., a cadre of adequately educated Papuans, who can in ever-increasing numbers take the place of expatriate administrative personnel in the Territory.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The text of this statement was transmitted to the Secretary-General on 10 May 1961 and was distributed under the symbol A/4767. It was originally presented to the Committee on Information in the form of an oral statement at the 227th meeting.

4. The increasing Papuanization in the territorial Government will gradually limit the activities of the Netherlands officials to those of providing technical assistance. In future all Netherlands Government officials will be on loan from the metropolitan Government to the territorial Government. The temporary character of their assignment will thereby again be emphasized.

5. Educational and personal planning is obviously a long-term affair. The Territory's plan for the extension of education in general and the training of indigenous cadres therefore extends over a period of ten years. In 1960, of the 8,743 persons employed in government service 4,551 or 52 per cent were indigenous. In 1970, 93 per cent of the planned 12,500 government employees will be indigenous. In that same year, 90 per cent of the district officers will be Papuans. In order to achieve this target within a period of ten years, some 7,000 Papuans will have to receive special training for the various government functions. This means that they will have to follow up their general education basis with special studies or vocational training.

6. It is calculated that in ten years' time there will be a demand for 2,000 graduates from the Junior High School, 250 from the Senior High School, 3,500 village school-teachers, 200 primary school-teachers, 600 graduates from the lower technical schools, 300 from the extended Technical School and 50 from the junior technical schools, as well as some 40 university-trained Papuans. To achieve this objective in ten years' time, the present educational facilities in the Territory will have to be considerably expanded. The first steps to this effect have already been taken and it is expected that from 1965 on the Papuanization of the Government organs will take a rapid course.

7. One of the first tasks of the Administration is the expansion of the post-primary education which is the basis for cadre training. This entails establishing more junior high schools. These institutions have a four-year curriculum which complements the six or seven years of primary education. The junior high schools serve as the sub-structure for the senior high schools. The curriculum resembles the curriculum of the metropolitan junior high schools but is attuned to the specific needs of the Territory. For instance, only English is a compulsory subject as compared to English, French and German in the metropolitan junior high schools. In 1957, there was one junior high school in the Territory. In 1958, there were four; in 1960, seven; and in the period 1961-1963, three more will be added. In 1960, the junior high schools were attended by 430 pupils. The attendance is predominantly indigenous.

8. Apart from the junior high schools, there are two other types of post-primary general education, viz., the MULO type junior high school and senior high school, both types of institutions being attended by Papuans. The senior high schools have a full secondary school curriculum of five years which is identical to that of the metropolitan schools. Graduates of the senior high schools can enter the university. In 1960, two MULO type junior high schools were added to the three existing ones. There is one senior high school in the Territory. Graduates of the junior high schools and MULO type junior high schools can also matriculate in universities via the Senior High School. In 1960 the Senior High School was attended by 150 pupils, of which fifteen were Papuans. Five Papuans are at present studying at secondary schools in the Netherlands.

9. In 1961, a new type of senior high school (the so-called HBS-C School) will be opened in the Territory. This type of school has a full secondary school curriculum which is especially attuned to the requirements of the Territory.

10. Teacher training is naturally of great importance for the forming of indigenous cadres in the Territory. Without adequately trained teachers there can be no adequately trained élite.

11. At present there are six training schools for village teachers compared with one in 1952. Another five of these schools are planned for the period 1961-1963. The present of the representative of the Netherlands, but was not included in the written statement reproduced in A/4767.

three years' course will be converted to a four years' one. The fourth year is to be devoted especially to the instruction of agriculture, public health and leadership in social activities, as especially the rural communities will inevitably make heavy demands on the knowledge and qualities of leadership of the village teacher. In 1960, 115 men and thirteen women graduated from the village teachers training schools. The total number of pupils increased from 173 in 1952 to 453 in 1960, of whom 404 were indigenous. In 1952, 40 per cent of all the village teachers were Papuans; in 1960, this percentage rose to more than sixty-five.

12. In 1960, a more advanced type of teachers' training college was opened. To be admitted to this college pupils must have graduated from the Junior High School. Graduates from the village teachers training schools can also be admitted after one year's additional study. Graduates from the teachers' training college will replace the expatriate teaching personnel of the primary schools B and the continuation schools. The college is at present being attended by fifty-five pupils, of whom forty-three are Papuans.

13. In 1962 an extended technical school will be opened in the Territory.

14. One of the most important forms of cadre training is the school for the training of indigenous district officers. This school, which was established in 1945, has a two years' course for graduates from the junior high schools. At present it also admits graduates of the continuation schools and the primary schools B after a special extension course. The curriculum of this college comprises Dutch and English, arithmetic, geography, ethnography, administration subjects, book-keeping, first aid, hygiene and physical training. In 1960 the school was attended by twenty-eight pupils. From 1952 until 1960, a total of ninety-five pupils, of whom eighty-nine were Papuans, graduated from this school. Presently thirty-four of the seventy-four districts of the Territory are administered by Papuan district officers: before long they will be the great majority. This year five of the most experienced Papuan district officers have been selected to attend a special advanced training course which will enable them to take charge of governmental subdivisions, a function which until now was fulfilled by expatriate personnel. It goes without saying that the administrative powers of the Papuan district officers extend over all inhabitants of their district, irrespective of race or religion. The Papuanization of the government organs increased rapidly in the last years. In 1954 there were 890 indigenous officials in established functions; in 1960 the total was 2,192, comprising approximately 37 per cent of all government personnel in established posts.

15. The training of the police force is another matter to which much attention is being paid. A cadre training course for station commandants was instituted in 1958. Up to 1960 there were fifty-eight graduates from this course, of which thirty-five were Papuans. This year a new course for chief constables will be instituted. In the near future a four years' course will be established for the training of Papuans assistant inspectors of police. Pupils for this course must have graduated from the junior high schools.

16. The Department of Transport and Power has organized the Elementary School of Navigation with different courses for graduates of the village schools, continuation schools and the P.M.S. schools. There is a course for able seamen and leading seamen. Promising able seamen and leading seamen may attend a further ten months' course for mate local sailing. Men with the government certificate of mate may reach the top rank of master. These courses are not cadre training in the proper sense of the word but only a preparation for entrance into the cadre ranks.

17. In 1960 a new course was instituted for mate coasting navigation which will be attended by graduates of the P.M.S. schools. After three months of theoretical training, the candidate must serve nine months on board a ship in the rank of seaman. After this period he has to attend a year's course of theoretical training, followed by another two years' practical training course on board a ship in the grade of able seaman. After this practical training period of twenty-four months, the course will be completed with a final two years' period of theoretical instruction.

18. There are parallel lower courses of ten months for engine-room apprentices followed by a ten months' course for engine-room assistants. In 1960, the first cadre training course parallel to that of the mate (coastal navigation) was started. This was the engine-room (coastal navigation) course for graduates of the junior high schools.

19. The Department of Health has also several training courses for the lower ranks of the medical service such as nurses, midwives, malaria control assistants, laboratory assistants and junior pharmacist assistants.

20. In 1959, two junior high school graduates were sent to Suva, Fiji, to attend the three years' course for dental practitioner at the Central Medical School. Another seven junior high school graduates are now attending the Medical College at Port Moresby, Papua, to be trained as practitioner physicians. After this five years' medical course, graduates can extend their study to a full medical training with a curriculum equal to the medical standard of the Australian universities.

21. It is the intention of the administration to send a group of ten to fifteen junior high school graduates to the medical college in Port Moresby each year.

22. With financial assistance from the Development Fund of the European Economic Community, a medical centre of $1,290,000 is being established in Hollandia. This centre will serve, inter alia, as an institution for centralized medical training for personnel of lower and intermediate medical functions in the field of preventive and curative health care and environmental sanitation.

23. Courses are also provided by other branches of the territorial Government such as the Meteorological and Civil Aviation Bureau, the Department of Finance, the Postal Service and the Land Registry and Mapping Office. In this way the demand for qualified weather observers and reporters, for clerks and officers in the revenue and accountancy branch, for junior technical officers in the postal and telegraph service and for surveyors and chief surveyors can be met in the Territory itself.

24. In 1960, six junior high school graduates were sent to the technical training college of the Post and Telegraph Department at Port Moresby to be trained as radio technicians.

25. Four Papuans are at present attending the two years' boat building course of the South Pacific Commission in the Solomon Islands. This course was organized by the South Pacific Commission in co-operation with the Government of the Solomon Islands with financial help from the United Nations Technical Assistance Board. This course trains persons from the Pacific area in the building of small fishing craft and freighter and in the servicing of small marine diesel engines.

26. With funds made available by the Development Fund of the European Economic Community, an agricultural training centre is being established at Manokwari. This institute, to which a topographical section is attached, will serve as a training centre for junior agricultural and forestry officers, surveyors and chief surveyors.

27. In the Netherlands there are at the moment thirty-five Papuan male and female students at secondary schools and universities, as well as vocational training institutes. Three of these students are attending a five years' university course.

28. It is the intention of the Netherlands Government to send an increasing number of young Papuans to the Netherlands to study at universities, secondary and technical schools and attend special vocational training courses in the coming years.

C. SPECIAL REPORT BY NEW ZEALAND ON THE PREPARATION, AND TRAINING OF INDIGENOUS CIVIL AND TECHNICAL CADRES IN THE COOK, NIUE AND TOKELAU ISLANDS<sup>a</sup>

1. The Cook Islands consist of fifteen small islands widely scattered throughout 850,000 square miles of ocean. The total land area is ninety-three square miles, the population on 31 December 1959 was estimated at 18,041. The biggest island, Rarotonga, whose area makes up more than a quarter of that of the whole group, has a population of 7,827. The smallest island has an area of less than half a square mile and a population of ninety.

2. At present the Cook Islands Public Service is modelled very closely on the New Zealand Public Service, with all departments under the control of a central office which has the Resident Commissioner at its head. In most cases the heads of departments are European "imported" officers, with predominantly Cook Island staff.

3. It is the policy of the New Zealand Government to have Cook Islanders take an increasing share in the responsibility of the administration of the Group. To this end, islanders are being trained in all aspects of administration.

4. Tuition for the qualifying examination required to be passed by all entrants to the Public Service is given in schools. Internal or in-service schemes then instruct public servants further in Maori, English, arithmetic, social studies, government service knowledge, accounting and clerical practice. Senior public servants give tuition to junior officers to assist them to pass a "Junior Examination", for which an incentive is provided by a salary bar. In 1960, 136 out of 213 candidates passed this examination. A Senior Examination is being instituted this year.

5. Advance study is offered to Cook Islanders through the New Zealand Government scholarship scheme, and advantage is taken of fellowships and study awards offered by the United Nations international agencies, such as WHO and the ILO. The scholarship scheme is beginning to show results, and in 1960 three Cook Islanders gained degrees. One student was successful in the final examinations for his degree in medicine, one student gained the M.A. degree, and another the LL.B degree.

6. This scheme should in future provide many senior public servants. The following positions are already held by Cook Islanders trained outside the Territory:

Sixteen assistant medical officers, trained at the Central Medical School, Suva, Fiji, including the Officer-in-Charge of the Tuberculosis Sanatorium and the expert in treatment of leprosy.

Two assistant dental officers and one dental nurse,

Two agricultural field officers with diplomas in horticulture,

Six teachers with New Zealand certificates,

One policeman trained in New Zealand.

7. In addition, two Cook Islanders who recently obtained in New Zealand degrees in law and economics are about to take up senior positions, one as Registrar of the High Court and the other as Administrative Assistant in the Office of the Secretary to the Government. Other senior positions held by Cook Islanders include the Agricultural Field Supervisor in charge of the citrus scheme, the Resident Agent of Pukapuka and the Clerks-in-Charge of Mitiaro and Rakahanga. Cook Islanders also hold positions as senior co-operative staff, nurses, X-ray and dental technicians, foreman carpenters and public works overseers. All primary schools, save one "side" school, are fully staffed (and headed) by Cook Islanders.

8. At present a total of seventy-one Cook Islanders in New Zealand are studying under the scholarship scheme for both technical and academic qualifications. They are expected, on their return to the Cook Islands, to serve the Administration. In addition, nineteen students are attending the Avele Agricultural College in Western Samoa, five students are studying at the Central Medical School, Suva, and one student is studying dentistry in Australia. (Other Cook Islanders receive training locally at Tereora College and the Teachers' Training College.)

9. The following is a summary of the results of the scholarship scheme for the year 1960:

Six teachers gained teachers' "C" Certificates,

One dental nurse completed her training,

One student gained the M.A. degree and one other was successful in examinations towards the degree of B.A.,

One student gained the LL.B degree,

One student gained a diploma in horticulture,

Two students had success in shorthand/typing examinations,

One student passed units towards the B.E. degree,

One student completed the examinations for a degree in medicine, and one other had examination successes,

Three students passed the School Certificate examination,

Two students passed the University Entrance examination.

10. In addition, seventeen students were serving trades' apprenticeships or receiving on-the-job training in New Zealand. Other students were attending teachers' training colleges, were training as nurses, attending business colleges, etc. A Cook Island assistant medical officer is studying for a Public Health Diploma at the Central Medical School in Fiji and will, when fully qualified, replace the European Medical Officer of Health.

11. The following table shows the relative proportions of overseas and local appointees as at 31 March 1960, since which time certain changes have occurred.

NIUE ISLAND

12. Niue Island has an area of just over 100 square miles and a population, at 31 March 1960, of 4,781.

13. The Niue Island Administration has, as a general policy, the aim of training Niueans to take an increasing share in the administration of Niue. To this end, departmental training similar to that of the Cook Islands Public Service operates, and use is made of the New Zealand Government scholarship scheme, the Central Medical School in Suva, Avele Agricultural College, and WHO or other fellowships and awards. Teachers and other specialists are also brought to New Zealand for training.

14. At present, most senior officers of the Administration are European "imported" officers, but it is envisaged that the future administration of Niue will be in the hands of Niueans who have received advanced training and education in New Zealand and other countries. Details of this training and education are below.

15. In 1961 there were twenty-three Niueans in New Zealand under the scholarship scheme taking the following courses:

Accountancy .....	1
Teachers' Training College .....	3

Nursing .....	1
Apprentice (carpenter) .....	1
Business College .....	1
Post-primary schools .....	16

15. One fully qualified teacher returned to Niue last year, and one student returned last month requiring only two examinations to gain the diploma of horticulture. Another student had examination successes towards a degree in accountancy. Seven students are attending the Avele Agricultural College, and six nurses are receiving nursing training in Western Samoa. Post-graduate nursing training and training for assistant Medical Officers is given at the Central Medical School, Suva. Other Niueans are trained locally at a post-primary school (up to Form IV) and a Teachers' Training Centre.

17. The majority of positions in the Administration are held by Niueans, and it is the policy wherever possible to fill a vacancy by appointing a Niuean. Two Niueans trained overseas already hold the senior positions of Officer-in-Charge of Dental Services and Assistant Secretary (shortly to become Secretary) to the Resident Commissioner. Six Niuean teachers have obtained their certificates in New Zealand. Niueans also hold senior posts as Registrar of the Native Land Court, Postmaster, Public Works Overseer and Senior Clerk in Treasury.

18. At 31 December 1959, since when some changes have taken place, there were thirty-one Europeans on the regular staff, including four employed with the Health Department, nine with the Education Department, and ten with the Public Works Department. The total number of regular employees was 175 Niueans and thirty-one Europeans.

TOKELAU ISLANDS

19. The Tokelau Islands consist of three atolls, about fifty miles apart, with a total land area of four square miles and a population of about 1,800.

20. The High Commissioner of Western Samoa, which lies some 300 miles south of the group, is the Administrator of the Tokelau Islands and is assisted by a New Zealand Administrative Officer. Officers of the Government of Western Samoa visit the group regularly and their technical advice is freely available to the Administrator.

21. Local public services on each atoll are under the general supervision of an elected Faipule who is also a magistrate and who is assisted by local mayors and officials.

22. All seventeen of the trained teachers in the group are Tokelau Islanders. The three medical practitioners are Samoan but two Tokelau youths are attending, on scholarships, the Central Medical School in Suva. Seven other scholarship pupils are studying in Western Samoa; one of them at Samoa College, two at Avele Agricultural College and four at mission schools.

D. SPECIAL REPORT BY THE UNITED KINGDOM ON THE PREPARATION AND TRAINING OF INDIGENOUS CIVIL AND TECHNICAL CADRES IN THE TERRITORIES UNDER UNITED KINGDOM ADMINISTRATION<sup>1</sup>

1. General Assembly resolution 1534 (XV) deals with a very important and complex subject. It calls both for a special report to the twelfth session of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, and for information on this subject to be included in the regular transmission under Article 73 e of the Charter of the United Nations. Arrangements have been made for the material furnished annually under Article 73 e in respect of United Kingdom Territories to include information on this subject. The present report has necessarily had to be prepared from data readily available and is to be regarded as a first report on a very wide field—and, it is suggested, one in which comparison on a global basis has obvious limitations.

2. As is well known, the principle on which United Kingdom Territories are administered is that of maximum devolution of authority and functions to the territorial Government, with the minimum of detailed reporting to London. For this reason it has not been possible to ensure that the information contained in this report is in all cases up to date, especially where (as in a number of the larger Territories) the position is changing rapidly; nor that the statistics (especially those in appendix II) are in all cases strictly comparable with each other. Subject to these reservations, the United Kingdom provides this report as requested by the General Assembly on the basis of "all available information". The information to be furnished in future under Article 73 e will provide separate statements, in each case within the natural context of size and development of the Territory concerned.

3. The Non-Self-Governing Territories for which the United Kingdom is responsible vary greatly in size, in density of population, in wealth of natural resources, and in constitutional, educational and social development. The public services of these Territories likewise differ considerably from one another according to the jobs which have to be done and the people available to do them, but they have certain important features in common. Each territorial Government has its own budget and the salaries of its civil servants are paid from local revenues, whether or not those revenues may be supported from United Kingdom Government funds. The great majority of the civil servants in each Territory are locally domiciled, but to an extent which varies according to local conditions, the locally domiciled staff are supplemented, especially in the grades which require high professional or other qualifications, by officers who have been recruited from the United Kingdom or from other self-governing members of the Commonwealth or who have been transferred from the service of other Non-Self-Governing Territories. It is a basic principle of British policy that the public services of the Non-Self-Governing Territories should be well adapted to local conditions and staffed to the greatest possible extent by local people; and also that there should be no barrier of race, colour or creed to the appointment of a locally domiciled candidate or public servant to any post which he is qualified to fill. It must, however, be recognized that, despite great progress made in recent years, for some time to come certain Territories will be unable to find among their own people enough suitably qualified staff to fulfil all the complex requirements of modern administration.

4. Especially since 1945 it has been a prominent feature of policy for the overseas service that locally domiciled candidates should be given opportunities for obtaining qualifications to enter the higher grades of the service; and that selected candidates, from whatever source, should be given better and broader training than had been thought sufficient in the past. Fundamentally, this has meant the provision of educational facilities sufficient to create, among other things, a wide field of qualified candidates from whom the best could be appointed to the public service. Those facilities have been and are being provided in existing or projected institutions of higher education in the Territories and, to the extent that and for as long as those local facilities are not fully developed, in the United Kingdom or elsewhere abroad. Primary, secondary and technical education has made great progress: universities or university colleges have been founded in West Africa, East Africa, Central Africa, the Far East and The West Indies; and large and steadily increasing numbers of students from colonial territories go abroad to pursue university, technical and other post-secondary courses, chiefly in the United Kingdom. After the 1939/1945 war an allocation of £1 million was made by the United Kingdom Government under the Colonial Development and Welfare Act to provide scholarships to enable students in British Territories to study abroad. These developments have been stimulated by the natural thirst of indigenous peoples for education and advancement and have been made possible by the efforts of Her Majesty's Government and territorial Governments to provide the necessary facilities. The result has been to remove the distinction which existed twenty years ago in most Territories between the filling of the administrative and professional grades by overseas recruitment and the filling of the middle and subordinate grades by local recruitment. It has become the practice of territorial Government wherever possible to fill all posts in the basic grades at whatever level by local recruitment and only to ask Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom to recruit externally if there are no suitable candidates available locally. Today in all Territories, overseas and locally domiciled officers serve side by side in the senior grades of the public services, though the proportions vary a good deal from, for example, The West Indies, where nearly all the higher posts are filled by West Indians, to the East and Central African Territories, where the proportion of expatriate officers in the senior grades is still high.

5. Against this background a Conference, known as the Public Services Conference, was convened in London in March 1960, to exchange information on the measures taken or projected in building up local civil services in the African Territories. The report of the Conference was published in October 1960.<sup>1</sup>

6. As is stated above, the general policy is for overseas Governments to fill vacancies in their public service by the appointment of suitably qualified local candidates wherever possible. To enable the net to be cast widely, a number of Territories have arrangements whereby local men and women, who are studying in the United Kingdom for qualifications which would fit them for public service appointments, are considered at the same time as other local candidates. The number of students from Non-Self-Governing Territories in the United Kingdom has increased considerably and in 1960 there were about 17,000. But of course many of them do not seek government employment when they return, and not all are following courses which will qualify them for posts in the public service. It is inevitable, therefore, that there should remain many vacancies which cannot be filled from local sources, and recruitment of overseas officers continues to be necessary.

7. When local resources have been thoroughly examined and have been found to be incapable of producing candidates with the necessary qualifications and experience, the Secretary of State (or the Crown Agents for Overseas Governments and Administrations) is asked to fill the vacancy by the selection of an overseas candidate. The number of overseas appointments made by the Colonial Office ran at approximately 1,300 a year in the years of 1956-1958; since then the number has diminished to approximately 1,000 in 1959 and 800 in 1960. The recent decrease reflects the attainment of independence by Ghana, the Federation of Malaya, Cyprus, British Somaliland and Nigeria.

LOCAL TRAINING FACILITIES

8. The following summary of training programmes in East Africa illustrates the efforts being made to meet the urgent problem of producing more local candidates.

Kenya

9. For some years the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission has been ex-officio Chairman of the Advisory Committee on Training. This Committee impresses on departments the need to adopt training schemes, gives advice in their preparation and makes recommendations to the Government about the schemes which should be approved and qualify for funds. Systematized training as practised in government departments falls into three main categories:

(a) Departmental training schemes intended to provide opportunities through a training grade for training candidates for executive and administrative posts below the professional level.

(b) Training in residential schools where the student is not wholly engaged on productive work but receives tuition, board, lodging, etc., and a small monthly cash allowance increasing each year as he is employed to a greater degree in productive work.

(c) Training on the job where the trainee is recruited to the service on a recognized salary scale and arrangements are made to train him to undertake more skilled or responsible duties.

10. The following departmental training schemes have been adopted:

African Land Development .....	Surveyors
Department of Agriculture .....	Laboratory technicians (Coffee Research Station)

11. In the Ministry of Works a divisional engineer is employed full-time in charge of training.

Uganda

12. First appointments to the training grade were made in 1956. The purpose is to select, from within and outside the Service, promising people who seem likely to qualify for appointment to higher posts after a systematic and intensive course of training. Detailed training programmes are drawn up which are designed gradually to give the trainee experience of the responsibilities of the post for which he is being trained. The average length of training is two to three years. The following is a list of posts for which officers in the Training Grade have been or are being, trained:

Labour	Junior assistant secretary
District officer	Staff surveyor
Community development officer	Assistant
Estate manager	hospital superintendent
Accountant	Game ranger
Storekeeper	Security registry assistant
Establishment officer	African housing officer
Land registry assistant	Sports officer
Co-operative officer	Probation officer
Trade development officer	Assistant auditor

13. The Registrar Scheme at Mulago Hospital enables qualified doctors to pursue, in Uganda, the preparatory studies leading to higher qualifications in medicine and surgery, which they have hitherto had to pursue in the United Kingdom. Following a period of guided study at Mulago, registrars whose progress is satisfactory will be sent to the United Kingdom to complete their studies and sit for their examinations. The whole scheme is under the general control of a Council for Post-Graduate Medical Training; the selection of registrars and detailed supervision of their work and progress is under the control of a Board of Studies consisting of the professors of medicine, surgery and gynaecology at Makerere College (University College of East Africa), a representative of the Director of Medical Studies, the Medical Superintendent of Mulago Hospital, and a representative of the Public Services Commission. The first six registrars (studying in surgery, medicine, obstetrics/gynaecology and paediatrics), were appointed early in 1959; two more will shortly be appointed; two have gone to the United Kingdom for further study. It is planned to have twelve registrars (studying in Uganda or in the United Kingdom) at any one time.

14. A training course is being opened for potential assistant administrative officers. In addition there are many pre-appointment training courses run by departments and approximately 1,100 trainees are engaged on such courses.

East Africa Posts and Telecommunications Administration

15. The Administration has maintained a Combined Training School for many years and over 5,000 candidates have completed courses to fit them for service with the Administration. The school, which operates on an East African basis, caters for basic and advanced training in the various facets of the work undertaken by the Administration in provision of the public service. The school caters for services and engineering and as many as 900 trainees a year are undergoing courses of instruction.

16. Brief details of the type of training provided at the School are as follows.

17. Engineering. Tuition is given in all aspects of telecommunications engineering, from underground and overhead line construction to maintenance of automatic exchanges and Carrier VHF equipment, the educational standard of the trainee being taken into account by giving prominence at lower levels of education to the practical aspects of training. Elementary, basic and advanced courses are provided, the latter preparing an officer for the degree of skill required in the maintenance of the most complicated telecommunication apparatus.

18. Additional advanced courses on specialist subjects are given as necessary, and supervisory training is also being undertaken.

19. Services (postal and telecommunications). Tuition is being given in the various aspects of services work as follows.

20. New entrant courses covering training in postal and junior counter duties are followed by suitable periods of "on the job" training in the field. At a later stage officers are selected for a longer period of training at the school on senior counter duties and accounts work. This course completes the basic training of a postal officer who returns to the field for further "on the job" training under the active supervision of a senior officer.

21. Conversion courses covering postal junior counter, senior counter and accounts duties are held to train redundant telegraphist staff in postal working, so that they may be employed on postal work.

22. Teleprinter training courses enable satisfactory efficiency to be reached in twelve weeks.

23. Telephonist courses, which are of two months' duration, embrace the training of 70 to 100 operators each year.

East Africa Railways and Harbours Administration

24. The Administration possesses a residential training school, built at a cost of £400,000, which accommodates some 550 students of all races. Facilities are provided for the training of staff in a variety of different railway occupations—engineering and trade apprentices, permanent way staff, stationmasters, telegraphists, clerks, locomotive drivers, etc. Refresher courses are held throughout the year for clerks, stationmasters and other groups of staff. There are also special training schemes devised for the staff in the catering and inland marine services.

25. The Administration also provides an engineering and trade apprenticeship scheme which is the main source of supply of artisans and junior supervisors required for the mechanical workshop. The engineering apprentices are trained for five years and are then fitted for posts at the junior supervisory (charge-hand) level. The trade apprenticeship scheme is the main source of recruitment for artisans of whom there are nearly 3,000 employed in the Administration. Trade apprentices are recruited either direct from school or from serving staff in the subordinate grades. They serve either a three- or five-year apprenticeship. Annual intake is about ninety of whom about one-third complete the five-year apprenticeship.

OVERSEAS SERVICE TRAINING IN THE UNITED KINGDOM

26. The great majority of the recruits to public services in the overseas Territories are given their entire training, just after selection or later in their careers, in their own Territories, either on the job or in courses. For a small minority in any service, however, adequate training cannot be provided on the spot; and for those people the Colonial Office arranges suitable training in the United Kingdom. In 1960, for example, public service training in the United Kingdom was arranged by the Colonial Office for 1,455 officers from the Territories with which this report is concerned. A detailed break-down by Territories and by types of training is shown in appendix I. Similar training was arranged, in addition, for 646 officers from Trust Territories or independent countries. Furthermore, during 1960, 117 officers were in their second or third year of training in the United Kingdom. Individual courses last anything from a few weeks to more than two years. The training is done in many different institutions, including universities, technical colleges and offices. Different courses cater for officers at different stages of their careers, not merely at the beginning. Some courses are managed by the Colonial Office, but most are independent courses. The trainees come from all branches of the service; courses for professional and technical work are far more numerous than those for general administrative work.

27. All this training for public service officers is provided in addition to the facilities in the United Kingdom for ordinary students from the overseas Territories who may later enter public service.

COMPOSITION OF THE PUBLIC SERVICES

28. A statement of the composition of the various public services in the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which the United Kingdom is responsible appears in appendix II. The summary gives the numbers of pensionable and non-pensionable overseas offices and the number of local offices in posts comparable in status to those occupied by overseas officers. Finally, it gives the total strength of the public service, excluding daily paid staff.

SOME RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

29. Many developments are currently taking place in the localization of the public services of the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which the United Kingdom is responsible. The following recent developments in the East and Central African Territories are given as illustrative of the lines along which progress is being made.

Kenya

30. In 1955 Kenya Government set up a Civil Service Commission which was required to further the aim of building up a local civil service recruited from the people of the Territory. Teacher-training colleges already produce teachers for Asian and African primary and intermediate schools and the lower forms of secondary schools. Heavy subsidies are made to Makerere College (the University College of East Africa) and the Royal Technical College of East Africa, and a large number of bursaries are granted to Africans for diplomas and degree courses at those colleges. As a result of these bursaries the civil service recruits numbers of African medical officers, lawyers, graduate teachers, and veterinary, agricultural and teaching diplomatists, besides non-specialist graduates for executive and administrative posts. There are currently 355 Kenya students (mostly African) at Makerere and 176 at the Royal Technical College. In addition, large numbers of bursaries are granted for study in the United Kingdom. Some 350 Africans and 1,100 Asians from Kenya are at present studying overseas.

31. In 1957 a Training Committee was set up to encourage the training both of new recruits and also of serving officers who show potential, even though they may not possess the normal minimum educational qualification of School Certificate. This Committee has been strengthened recently and its scope widened to include advice on training in all branches of the service, including professional and administrative levels. At the same time a new post of senior assistant secretary (localization and training) has been created and filled. The officer appointed to this post is the executive officer from the Training Committee and responsible to the Director of Establishments for the implementation of the Government's policy on localization and training.

32. The appointment of this officer followed upon the recommendation of a Study Group set up after the Public Services Conference in March 1960 with the following terms of reference:

"In addition to terms and conditions of service of local members of the Service, the Group shall consider policy and progress in regard to 'localization' with particular reference to training and training programmes and also the position of the expatriate officer in the Service, and the question of reorientation of educational policies with a view to meeting the requirements presented by a determined effort to 'localize' the Civil Service."

33. The following recruitment statistics for the years 1955-1959 show the effects of the Kenya Government's policy:

(a) Number of vacancies reported to Commission	2,154	1,790	1,572	1,982	1,126
(b) Number of applications received in response to the Commission's advertisements	5,181	4,142	4,481	3,155	2,512
(c) Number of new appointments advised by the Commission	These figures comprise promotions and transfers of serving officers, and also appointments made from outside the service:
(i) As a result of advertisement	368	362	378	327	269
(ii) Otherwise	1,320	993	1,025	1,150	633
(d) Number of posts which the Commission advised should be filled by recruitment from outside East Africa	128	124	157	112	250

34. The following table relates to appointments held by local officers:

	Salary scale A (professional)	Salary scale B (semi-professional)	Salary scale C (technical and supervisory)
1958	28	94	386
1959	51	180	784
1960, 30 Sept.	81	261	1,067

35. In February 1961 a project for a new College of Administration in Kenya was announced. In March 1961 it was decided that all future recruitment of overseas staff should be on contract terms only and that no further initial appointments of overseas staff should be made on permanent and pensionable terms.

Uganda

36. It was decided in 1954 to create a single service with common basic rates of pay (with inducement additions for overseas staff) so that Africans and Asians could be appointed and promoted on equal terms with officers of other races. A Public Service Commission was established in 1955. At a slightly earlier stage, between 1952 and 1955, there had been a Standing Committee on the Recruitment, Training and Promotion of Africans for appointment to higher posts. This was accompanied by the systematic expansion and improvement of African education, particularly at secondary and post-secondary levels, the provision of funds for overseas scholarships and the development of training courses in Uganda. The next major step was a joint review undertaken by the Establishment Secretary and the Chairman of the Public Service Commission and the announcement in 1958 of a systematic programme of localization over a five-year period. Progress is reviewed each year. A Training Officer has been appointed and further reviews are being undertaken of the qualifications and training required for appointment of local officers and to ensure that the fullest use is being made of local officers who are already serving.

37. The following table of appointments of local officers shows the progress that has been made:

	Salary scale A (professional)	Salary scale B (semi-professional)	Salary scale C (technical and supervisory)
1958	37	41	438
1959	62	68	454
1960, 20 Aug.	71	79	491

38. In Sessional Paper No. 2 of 1961,<sup>k</sup> the Uganda Government announced proposals for the accelerated promotion of local officers coupled with a limited scheme for compensation for overseas officers. The aim is to give local officers experience in posts carrying heavier responsibilities.

39. In December 1960 all recruitment of overseas staff on permanent and pensionable terms ceased; instead, contract terms are being offered.

Zanzibar

40. A Public Service Commission has been established and its main task will be to advise on the localization of the public service. As in other Territories a non-racial structure has been adopted for the Civil Service. Non-racial teachers training colleges have been established for both men and women, and subsidies are made to the University College of East Africa and the Royal Technical College of East Africa. Two hundred and fifteen students from Zanzibar, including fifty-four holding government scholarships, were studying abroad in December 1959 and in that year thirty-six serving officers were on courses of instruction overseas. Estimated public expenditure on students and officials studying overseas in 1960 is £51,000, which is equal to about 2 per cent of the recurrent budget. Secondary school leavers have been increased over recent years as follows:

1949 .....	67	(38)
1954 .....	108	(60)
1959 .....	182	(123)

(Figures in parentheses show those successful in Cambridge Overseas School Certificate or GCE)

41. Higher School Certificate classes were started in 1959 and an examination equivalent to a University Entrance Examination will be taken for the first time this year. Results of the policy of localization are indicated by the following figures:

	Per cent
At 1 January 1949 local officers held 41 out of 244 Senior posts (Salary scale C and upwards) filled on that date .....	(16.6)
Corresponding figures for 1954...102 out of 335..	(30.45)
1959...214 out of 439..	(50.39)
1960...226 out of 427..	(52.93)

East Africa Railways and Harbours Administration and Posts and Telecommunications Administration

42. The policy of both Administrations is to recruit as many of their staff as possible from local sources and there has been a substantial reduction in the number of trained staff recruited from overseas. These Administrations have substantial training programmes already described in paragraphs 15-25 above. For the recruitment of professional staff the aim will be gradually to look to the Royal College, Nairobi (soon to become a University College) as the main source of supply.

43. A Commission has examined recently the arrangements for localization in the East Africa Posts and Telecommunications Administration and certain other East Africa High Commission services and has made recommendations for accelerating the process.

Northern Rhodesia

44. A local civil service on non-racial lines is being established. The Northern Rhodesia Government has approved in principle a large-scale training and scholarship scheme designed principally to encourage secondary school leavers in Northern Rhodesia and elsewhere in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, of whatever race, to look to the proposed local Civil Service for a career by assisting them to acquire the qualifications necessary for entry into the higher grades of the Service, and, secondly, to assist serving officers to obtain the qualifications necessary for advancement to the higher grades within the Service.

Nyasaland

45. At 1 January 1958, a locally based service was introduced with rates of pay and conditions of service related to the local employment market and to the circumstances of candidates whose homes were in Nyasaland or elsewhere in Africa. There are already African and European officers serving in the Territory on these terms. Proposals for a Public Service Commission, which will advise the Government on appointments to, and advancement in, the civil service, have been drawn up and it is expected to begin its work soon. A Committee has recently examined the whole question of the employment of local candidates in the local civil service. The Chairman of this Committee was Mr. A. L. Adu, Secretary to the Prime Minister of Ghana and Head of the Ghana Civil Service.

OVERSEAS SERVICE AID SCHEME

46. In addition to the assistance which it provides for the training of personnel, Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom has recently undertaken to provide aid to Non-Self-Governing Territories in staffing their public services in a new and direct way. In October 1960 proposals were laid before the United Kingdom Parliament, and later approved by it, whereby Her Majesty's Government offered to enter into agreements with territorial Governments for the sharing of the costs of employing overseas staff. The United Kingdom Government offers to pay the difference between the local salaries of such officers and the salaries which have to be paid in order to recruit them in the United Kingdom or elsewhere overseas and retain them in employment. It also offers to pay education and children's allowances for such officers, half the cost of their passages to and from the Territory, and, where appropriate, half the cost of schemes for providing compensation for loss of career. Agreements for aid of this sort are being worked out with thirty separate Governments and administrations and will be effective from 1 April 1961. They will have the ten-year period to 31 March 1971 in the first instance. The effect will be to relieve Territories of a significant part of the burden of employing suitably qualified staff to build up the administrative and social services of the country and develop its economy, and above all to train local people to take over these vital tasks from them. The cost to Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom will be about £150 million over the ten-year period, a large part of which will represent direct savings to the territorial Governments of expenditure which they are at present making on the allowances and passages to be covered in future by the aid scheme.

E. STATEMENT MADE BY THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE UNITED KINGDOM AT THE 233rd MEETING OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES ON 8 MAY 1961.<sup>1</sup>

1. My delegation gladly voted for resolution 1534 (XV) when it was debated in the Fourth Committee in October last year. Its provisions are entirely in line with our own policy. In debate in the Fourth Committee, as in the general debate which preceded it, we stressed our belief that, at such a momentous time in the history of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, when so many new countries were achieving independence, the importance of training of this nature could not be over-emphasized. Our own experience, and that of others, has brought it home to us, with great force, that one of the most priceless assets of a newly independent country is a Public Service which is adequate as to numbers, ability and integrity. We have had ample proof that if this asset is lacking, the consequences are very grave and indeed may not stop this side of catastrophe. We think it is not going too far to say that a well-trained Public Service is the foundation for the development and progress of any new country, and it is our continuing endeavour to do all we can to help the people of the Territory for which we are responsible to widen and improve their training facilities.

2. This is the policy which my Government has suggested to the Governments of all our Non-Self-Governing Territories. But I must emphasize that implementation of policy is entirely a matter for the Governments concerned. They are responsible for their own Civil Service; recruitment of some overseas officers is carried out by my Government at the request of the Non-Self-Governing Territories concerned, but the appointment, pay and conditions of all the civil servants in the Territories rests with the local Government. In fact, all the Governments referred to in this intervention have publicly accepted this policy, and it may interest the Committee if I take one example from many and quote the following extract from a recent sessional paper put out by the Government of Uganda. I quote:

"For some years it has been the declared policy of the Government to build up a Civil Service staffed by local people. The Government now reaffirms this policy. For convenience, it is described throughout this Paper as the policy of Africanization, because in a locally staffed Civil Service Africans will eventually fill the overwhelming majority of posts at all levels, but the Government wishes, once again, to make clear its view that as non-Africans have a part to play in the general life of the community, so also should they play a proportionate part in the Civil Service.

"Uganda is moving steadily and rapidly towards independence. If an independent country is to provide proper services for its people and to play its proper part in world affairs, it must have an efficient Civil Service. It is therefore of great importance that the development of a local Civil Service should keep pace, so far as possible, with political development so that, at the time of independence, Uganda will not be mainly dependent upon the employment of expatriate Civil Servants to provide the level of services to which the community has become accustomed and which it will expect in the future. The measures which it proposes to take in the future are designed to ensure, to the greatest extent practicable, that, at the time of independence, Uganda will have a Civil Service in which local officers are fitted to carry the main burden of administration even though it will still be necessary to employ some Civil Servants from outside Uganda for some time to come if all services are to be maintained at an acceptable level.

"If a country is to be well and justly administered, it is not enough for its Civil Servants to be efficient. They must also be of high moral character, able and ready to tender advice without fear or favour, and to deal fairly with members of the public with whom they come in contact. Civil Servants must also be insulated from political pressure and this means that there must be machinery whereby Civil Servants can be selected for appointment or promotion and disciplined on the advice of an impartial body which is not influenced by the exercise of patronage or by political pressure; this machinery already exists in Uganda, in the form of the Public and Police Service Commissions, and must be maintained."<sup>m</sup>

3. My delegation welcomes the international interest which has been taken in this matter, which is so closely bound up with social, economic and educational advancement in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. While my Government bears the chief responsibility, it is well aware of the value of international help that can be brought to bear in this particular field, whether from OPEX, the various specialized agencies or the regular and expanded technical assistance programmes.

4. I hope that the two Secretariat documents before us and whatever additional information I am able to provide in this intervention will demonstrate to the Committee that my Government's activities in promoting strong local Civil Services are being pressed forward on a broad front. As we have explained in the first two paragraphs of our Report, this is the first comprehensive Report we have transmitted on the subject and there has been insufficient time to make it as full as we would have wished in some respects. Much relevant information does of course appear piecemeal in regular transmissions under the various social, economic and educational heads, but we have not hitherto dealt with this information as a separate subject complete in itself. Members will recall that resolution 1534 (XV) was only passed at the end of 1960. The information which it asks Administering Members to transmit has had to come in from a large number of widely scattered Territories, which, in conformity with the principles under which they are administered, bear the responsibility for the detailed working of their own Civil Services. Thus, a complete check on all the information provided has been impossible in the limited time available; it must be added, too, so swift is the march of events in the larger Territories, that much of the information given is inevitably out of date. In future the information asked for in the resolution will form a regular part of the annual transmission from each Territory. But, for the purposes of this session, we hope that the Committee will receive our special report on the understanding that we have done the best we could in the time.

5. The documents before us (A/AC.35/L.340 and Corr.1 and A/4761) both deal with Territories under United Kingdom administration. I will not waste the Committee's time by giving a resumé of what I am confident members have already digested, but I should like to qualify and expand certain points and also furnish the Committee with some additional information which appears to my Government to be relevant but which was not available at the time we put in our Report.

6. I should like first to refer to paragraph 7 of document A/AC.35/L.340, where we read, and I quote from the third sentence of the paragraph, referring to posts to be filled by Africans: "In some cases the number of these posts and their ratio to an over-all establishment are not known, as the information transmitted does not contain breakdowns for races." This should be compared with the reference in paragraph 12 of the second document we are considering—A/4761. This is a long paragraph but I am referring to the creation of a new Civil Service section set up in Kenya to press on with the Government's policy of localization. I am sorry if we are imposing on the Committee and the English language a new and rather macabre-sounding piece of jargon. But, short of using a much longer phrase, we can think of no better way to describe what the Governments of Kenya and the other Territories to which I wish to refer are trying to do. The main point here is that since 1955 the Kenya Civil Service has been run and recruited on a non-racial basis, and the information transmitted by the Government of Kenya only distinguishes in the breakdown given in the first appendix of document A/4761 between staff of overseas origin and those recruited locally, be they of African, Asian or European origin. This is the same course as is being followed in Nyasaland, Uganda and Northern Rhodesia, to mention only three, and it is surely the right course to take. We recognize that the composition of a civil service in a healthy state should ideally reflect approximately the separate elements in the Community. The present racial breakdown of the Kenya Civil Service of roughly 59,000 souls is 6,000 Europeans, of whom 2,150 are locally recruited, 4,300 Asians who are virtually all locally recruited and 49,000 Africans. We recognize that the Africans in Kenya have hitherto not filled the number of higher posts which is commensurate with their position as overwhelmingly the biggest element in the population. At the end of 1960 they filled just over 10 per cent of what the Kenya Government calls Scale A posts, which for practical purposes we may describe as Third Secretary upwards. But measures now in hand will alter this picture out of recognition in a very short time, and the Coordinating Officer mentioned in paragraph 35 of document A/AC.35/L.340 will soon have no dearth of local candidates to draw from in his work on accelerating Civil Service localization.

7. In 1959 there were 354 students from Kenya, 321 of them African at the University College of East Africa; a further 1,731,346 of them African, were studying overseas, mostly in the United Kingdom. Naturally, not all of these will qualify at one time, nor will all wish to enter or in some cases, return to the service of the Government. But we feel that their numbers give an excellent augury for the future of Kenya's non-racial Public Service. In this connexion the figures showing the vacancies in the Public Service at the end of paragraph 12 of document A/4761 are of interest since they show that the local Government thought it necessary to fill only 6 per cent of all the vacancies existing in the Civil Service in 1959 by recruitment overseas. It should be added also that in the future all such overseas recruits will be employed on a contract basis, i.e., they will not have permanent pensionable status.

8. The next point to which I should like to refer is in the last sentence of paragraph 7 in document A/AC.35/L.340. The Government of Kenya has now announced plans for a new College of Administration, which will cost about £350,000. We are not yet able to give full details of the courses to be offered, but we think that this information helps to meet the criticism that I have mentioned in paragraph 7, which is also repeated in paragraph 29 of the same report.

9. I should like to shed a little more light on the statements on Fiji contained in paragraph 8 of document A/AC.35/L.340, and in this connexion I would refer members to the chart shown in appendix II of document A/4761. The figures for Fiji in this appendix suggest that there are no local officers of professional status comparable to that of the overseas officers shown in the first two columns of the chart. I am happy to inform the Committee that the blank shown in column 3 against Fiji is an error, and that 346 local officers are employed in posts of comparable level to those held by the 451 overseas officers listed. While on this point, there is a similar error in the case of Hong Kong and Uganda in this appendix.<sup>n</sup> In addition, the Government of Fiji is taking special measures to accelerate the localization of the civil service, and is particularly anxious to correct the unfavourable proportion of higher posts held by members of the Fijian community. I should now like to make a brief reference to paragraph 21 of document A/AC.35/L.340 where it is stated that, and I quote:

"Several years ago the system whereby the United Kingdom Government provided scholarships under the Colonial Development and Welfare schemes was replaced by Kenya Development Scholarships which are awarded to Kenya civil servants of all races for courses intended to increase their efficiency and to fit them for promotion. During 1959, five such scholarships were awarded to Kenya government servants (three Africans, one Goan and one European)."

My delegation feels the statement is perhaps a little misleading as it does not seem to recognize the way in which the United Kingdom Government has delegated control of Colonial and Development Welfare funds to the Governments of the Non-Self-Governing Territories. What has happened in this case is that development and welfare funds previously made available from the United Kingdom direct have been allotted to the Government of Kenya on a quinquennial basis. The five scholarships referred to were provided with this money. It is only fair to add that an additional eighteen scholarships were given to serving civil servants of the Kenya Government with funds from other sources. The United Kingdom Government continues in numerous ways to make other scholarships and training courses available and many of the Kenya students now doing higher education in the United Kingdom are assisted by one or other of these means.

10. In paragraphs 74-89 of document A/AC.35/L.340 it is said, in reference to the Bahamas, that no information is available on the proportion of different races holding higher government posts. We do not yet have the exact figures for this, but I should like to take this opportunity to say that the civil service of the Bahamas is non-racial and open to Bahamians at all levels. The majority of civil servants are racially speaking of African origin, including the Solicitor-General and the Chief Out-Island Commissioner.

11. I should like to add a little to the information that has been given about the Public Service in Northern Rhodesia. The Government of that Territory has, like its neighbours, in Nyasaland, Kenya and Uganda, dedicated itself to the creation of a local non-racial civil service. To this end, it has set in motion during the last year plans to expand its training programme to cover every aspect of training for service in local and central government. These include courses for executive and clerical staff of all races in central government departments; some of the former category whom it is hoped to promote to the administrative grade are already studying elsewhere in Africa or the United Kingdom. Courses are also being shaped for the training of field staff in the survey, veterinary, forestry, transport, works and agriculture departments. In addition, rural training centres have been set up throughout the Territory to provide a wide variety of training courses for the rural population. The role of these centres and of the Oppenheimer College of Social Services and of the College of Adult Education, both in Lusaka, has already been stressed in a previous intervention by my delegation. But it is worth mentioning that, in addition to what we have already said on the subject, the Oppenheimer College hopes to be able to develop a number of short courses for special needs, e.g., personnel management and social medicine. We think that these are of immense potential value in the field we are discussing.

12. In Nyasaland, the authorities are tackling the problem of localizing the civil service with vigour. The Government recently appointed a committee to examine the matter. The Chairman of this body was an eminent member of the civil service of Ghana, Mr. A. L. Adu. The Committee has now reported, recommending a considerable expansion of the training facilities provided by government departments and the establishment of a school of administration. The school will apparently have the same scope as that at Zaria in Northern Nigeria which has been functioning successfully for several years.

13. In all the Territories I have mentioned, the old distinction between the officer from overseas and the locally recruited man is disappearing—and disappearing fast. In all these Territories the Governments have declared in public their intention of creating localized civil services. But this does not mean that staff recruited overseas will disappear from civil service establishments overnight. Indeed, there is every reason why they should not, since they are usually on principle only recruited for posts which it is difficult to fill from local resources for the time being. The stage of development which most of the Territories we are discussing have reached is often marked by a considerable expansion of the public service, and the overseas specialist continues to be needed in large numbers despite the increases in local officers occupying senior posts. This step is explained by the needs of new training programmes, specialized jobs for which local men had not yet completed training and new social demands which local leaders, as they rapidly assumed more responsibility, could not afford to ignore.

14. At the beginning of this intervention I stressed the importance which my Government attaches to the creation of a strong local public service in the Territories which we are preparing for independence. It is a vital and urgent task and, behind all the musty jargon about cadres, localization and training, a most exciting one. We say that we are localizing as fast as we can, without sacrificing standards, but I should also like to refer briefly to the steps we are taking towards this end. Firstly—and this is the nub of the problem—there has had to be an educational revolution. This is not the place for a full survey of education in the Territories, but no account of what is being done to forge new civil services can omit some mention of the subject. Reduced to essentials, the difficulty has been everywhere lack of men of the right educational standards to staff the upper grades and this in turn only reflects a dire shortage of secondary school leavers. A tremendous amount has been done since the end of the war and I should like to take one example, which is not the best and not the worst, from educational achievements in Uganda. In 1951, the secondary schools run by governments did not turn out any grade I or grade II secondary school holders. In 1952, when the machine got into gear, ninety-five were turned out. In 1955, the figure rose to 213 and, in 1958, to 380. Over roughly the same period the number of local men occupying some of the 1,400 odd senior posts in Uganda Civil Service rose from a dozen to 130. It is now approaching 350. I think that these figures, as an illustration of what is happening, speak for themselves. In the field of higher education, the United Kingdom Government has, since the war, helped in the foundation of university colleges or universities in West Africa, East Africa, Central Africa, the Far East and The West Indies. I should like to take two examples and I will take them from The West Indies and from Uganda. At the University College of The West Indies the enrolment rose from 140 to over 600 in the eight years up to 1958. At Makerere College, which, as one of the three parts of the planned University of East Africa, serves all the East African Territories, the size of the student body rose from 222 to 823 during the decade 1949-1959. At the same time the number of students going abroad to study, chiefly to the United Kingdom, has mounted steeply. I have already quoted the figures for Kenya. Those for Uganda were 374 scholarship holders in 1960 as well as over 500 private students; for Zanzibar, which has, of course, a far smaller population, twenty-nine scholarship holders and 146 private students. As a comparison, Sierra Leone in its last year before independence, had 280 of its students in the United Kingdom on scholarships and 470 privately. At this point I should like to say that my Government entertains a lively appreciation of the complimentary assistance being given in this field by some other countries, particularly India, Pakistan, the United States of America, Canada and New Zealand.

15. Thirdly, many local officers already serving in their own civil service are assisted either by their own Government or by the United Kingdom to do further study in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, as a preliminary to entering higher grades on their own civil service. For example, in 1959 there were 1,245 students of this category attending courses in the United Kingdom. Numerous subjects were studied, but the majority devoted themselves to administration and local government (often with the co-operation of central and local government departments in the United Kingdom), agriculture, medicine, law and engineering.

16. Fourthly, through Colonial Development and Welfare funds and the new Overseas Aid Scheme, my Government is helping the Governments of the Non-Self-Governing Territories bear some of the cost of employing overseas staff. The role these men play is, as I explained above, of very great importance as the services of the Governments expand; payment of part or all of the salaries of some key offices is often of immense assistance to Governments which are stretching their financial resources to enlarge their own training programmes.

17. The account I have given the Committee may give the impression that civil services are being turned out as it were on an assembly line. But a civil service is not a sausage, or a motor car; it is a body of men and women and it will have ideals, a sense of loyalty in a devotion to its task so far as the men and women composing it possess these qualities. Over and above the vitally necessary educational equipment of degrees and diplomas it seems to my delegation that two agents must be at work if what I can only describe as an ideal of service is to be achieved. The first is the sympathy and devotion of those creating the new services on the ground towards those whom they are training to work with them and, eventually, to take their place. These qualities have, I think, usually been present in the men and women carrying out this task in the Non-Self-Governing Territories for which my Government is responsible. Secondly, the localized civil services which we see evolving need an ideal and a sense of identity towards which they can devote their loyalty. I venture to think that this is realized in our Territories as the prospect of independence brings the goal of nationhood nearer.

F. SPECIAL REPORT BY THE UNITED STATES ON THE PREPARATION AND TRAINING OF INDIGENOUS CIVIL AND TECHNICAL CADRES IN GUAM, AMERICAN SAMOA AND THE UNITED STATES VIRGIN ISLANDS.<sup>o</sup>

1. In the administration of its Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Government of the United States is guided by the principle of orderly and progressive development of the peoples of the Territories towards self-government. Accordingly it has been a cardinal policy of the United States Government to train or provide for the training of indigenous residents for positions of responsibility in their territorial Governments, and to use them in these capacities. Preference in appointment to public positions is extended to qualified indigenous personnel. The extent of the implementation of this policy is shown by the fact that in the territorial Government of Guam, 83 per cent of the total number of officials and employees are now Guamanians; in American Samoa, 96 per cent are Samoans; and in the Virgin Islands, 99 per cent are Virgin Islanders.

2. In order to carry out the policy of employing qualified indigenous civil and technical personnel in the three United States Territories, the Governments of Guam, American Samoa and the Virgin Islands have all made considerable progress in providing local educational facilities wherever feasible as well as professional and technical scholarships and grants for the training of indigenous residents for positions in the Territories. The Government of the United States has extended the National Defense Education Acts and other laws to its Territories for the benefit of their indigenous population.

GUAM

3. Section 9 (a) of the Organic Act of Guam provides that: "... in making appointments and promotions, preference shall be given to qualified persons of Guamanian ancestry. With a view to insuring the fullest participation by Guamanians in the government of Guam, opportunities for higher education and in-service training facilities shall be provided to qualified persons of Guamanian ancestry. The Legislature shall establish a merit system and, as far as practicable, appointments and promotions shall be made in accordance with such merit system."

4. The Merit System, established in 1951, is administered by the Department of Labor and Personnel, a department within the Executive Branch of the Government. Appointments to positions in the Executive Branch of the Government, except those appointments which require confirmation by the Legislature, are filled on a competitive basis. In every instance, vacancies are announced locally and applications are solicited <sup>o</sup> The text of this statement was transmitted to the Secretary-General on 5 May 1961 and was originally distributed under the symbol A/4765. from indigenous or other permanent residents of the Territory. Where no qualified Guamanian or resident apply, the Department of Labor and Personnel may recruit from sources outside of Guam. Recruitment from the mainland and Hawaii or from other sources outside of Guam is generally restricted to professional and technical personnel. As of 27 March 1961, there were, out of a total of 2,492 employees, only 235 professional and technical personnel recruited under a two-year contract from the mainland of the United States and from other places. Of this number, there were 132 teachers, 11 nurses, 9 medical and dental officers, and 9 internal revenue agents. There were also about 200 other Americans recruited locally for teaching (170), nursing (12) and clerical-secretarial positions for which there were no qualified Guamanians available.

Training facilities

5. In recognition of the need for a well-trained corps of local residents in the varied professional and technical fields, the Government of Guam makes every attempt to provide training facilities and opportunities for persons of Guamanian ancestry as well as for other residents of the Territory. It has established a system of public education patterned after and comparable in quality to mainland schools. Its high schools, accredited by a national accrediting agency, offer comprehensive programmes of studies leading towards college entrance as well as towards agricultural, commercial and business, trade and industrial employment. The Government operates a Trade and Technical School and an accredited two-year college which has just recently been authorized to progress to a four-year degree-granting institution.

6. The vocational education programme at the two high schools had a 1960 enrolment of 143 in agriculture, 247 in home economics, 79 in home nursing, and 13 in vocational auto shop. In 1960 a diversified occupation programme was inaugurated with 32 students. Ninety-two students were selected for the 1961 school year. This programme is a co-operative venture between governmental agencies and business and industrial firms on the one hand and the public schools on the other whereby students attend regular academic and vocational classes in high school and are provided work experience by the business and government agencies under a supervised programme of guidance and instruction by competent employee-supervisor and the high school diversified programme supervisor.

7. For several years now, the Adult and Vocational Education Division of the College of Guam has been offering non-college credit courses in commercial, trade and technical fields for adults. The programme is designed for those who seek to change employment and need basic instructions in the area of employment and for those who need assistance for advancement in the field. Over 500 certificates of completion in the automotive, electrical, radio, carpentry, commercial and other trades courses have been issued to Guamanians and other residents. The vocational education programme will be administered by the New Trade and Technical School.

8. The Trade and Technical School opened its doors for the first time in February 1960, with an enrolment of 180 students. Eight courses were offered: basic blueprint reading, electrical blueprint reading, automotive drawing interpretation, automotive mathematics, electrical mathematics, machine shop mathematics and fundamentals of electricity. Certificates of completion were issued to ninety-two members of the first class, of which eighty-six were issued to Guamanians and six to mainlanders.

9. As of 5 April 1961, there were 553 students enrolled in the Trade and Technical School. Guamanians comprised approximately 85 per cent of the total. Two hundred and ninety-six students are enrolled in electrical trades courses, 189 in automotive trades, and 68 are taking other courses. In support of the programme, $56,000 has been appropriated for the immediate purchase of equipment for new courses in the building trades and for the expansion of the automotive and electrical shop programmes. This amount is over and above the $91,000 which had been appropriated previously for the financial year 1961.

10. The Navy Apprentice School supplements the work of the public schools in the training of Guamanians in varied technical and trade areas (electrical, plumbing, carpentry, etc.). A four-year programme of academic and trade courses, it graduated in 1960 its first class of eighteen students and is expected to graduate twenty-five at the close of its school year 1961. There were 142 students enrolled at the beginning of 1961 and it is expected to expand to accommodate approximately 200 students. Upon completion of the programme, graduates may enter either private or government employment. As students they receive salaries amounting to about $100 a month.

11. A practical nurse training programme has been authorized by the Governor for 1962. It will be administered by the Guam Memorial Hospital under a grant from the Federal Government.

12. College of Guam. The most significant development in the training of Guamanians was the establishment in 1952 of the College of Guam. A two-year college at this point, it has been authorized to extend its programme into a four-year degree-granting institution. When in full operation, the College of Guam will provide in the island a programme of higher education which will enable students to obtain degrees in teacher education as well as provide them with basic liberal arts courses required for advanced degrees in such fields as law, medicine, governmental administration, and related fields. It is not expected to provide more than a two-year programme in science because of the prohibitive cost involved in such a programme.

13. The College's enrolment has increased steadily each year since it was first opened in the summer of 1952. The fall quarter enrolment for the past five years is shown in the following table:

Year	Daytime enrolment	Late afternoon and evening enrolment	Total
1956/1957	121	379	500
1957/1958	134	392	526
1958/1959	168	316	484
1959/1960	145	420	565
1960/1961	239	622	861

The fall 1960 enrolment by programme follows:

	Daytime enrolment	Late afternoon and evening enrolment	Total
Field: Agriculture	1		1
Business administration:
Accounting	31	126	157
Clerical	17	39	56
Secretarial	15	88	103
Education:
Administration	5	4	9
Elementary	50	131	181
Secondary	6	16	22
General education	111	217	328
Nursing	3	1	4
TOTAL	239	622	861

14. In-service training programmes for employees of the Government are being provided to government employees. They range from letter and report writing for clerical and stenographic employees to supervision and management for supervisory personnel.

Off-island training

15. In addition to local training facilities, the Government of Guam authorized in 1959 a total of 175 professional and technical scholarships to qualified Guamanian students for off-island college and university training. The scholarship includes the cost of transportation to and from Guam, tuition and other college fees, room and board. Recipients sign agreements to make themselves available for employment by the Government of Guam on the basis of one year of service for each year of scholarship.

16. Fifteen scholarships have been awarded since its inception in 1960. Of the total scholarships available, 10 are in medicine, 2 in pharmacy, 2 in veterinary medicine, 6 in engineering, 2 in entomology, 3 in agriculture, 10 in law, 100 in education and 40 in other unspecified fields.

17. In addition, the Government for the past several years has appropriated funds from which students may borrow to pursue college or technical education abroad. One hundred and forty-one students have taken advantage of the loan fund at a cost of approximately $200,000 as of February 1961.

18. Over the years, more than a hundred Guamanian students have been recipients of scholarships from private individuals, business firms, and colleges and universities.

19. The facilities for the training of indigenous civil and technical cadres on Guam is progressively meeting local needs. The Government has a mandate by law to provide higher education and in-service training facilities to qualified persons of Guamanian ancestry.

AMERICAN SAMOA

20. In accordance with the basic policy objectives of the United States Government, the Government of American Samoa employs non-Samoans in government positions only when there are no qualified Samoans available. Samoan industries likewise follow a similar policy.

21. The Government of American Samoa employed as of June 1960 a total of 1,265 persons, of whom only sixty were non-Samoans. The following key positions were held on that date by experienced local personnel: Governor, Director of Port Administration, Acting Director of Agriculture, Assistant Director of Budget and Finance, Assistant to Public Defender, Manager of the Experimental Farm, Chief of Adult Education and Public Information, Accounting and Disbursing Officer, Medical Supply Officer, Customs Officer, two X-ray technicians, Resident Chief of Tuberculosis and Leprosy, Resident Chief of Pediatrics, Resident Chief of Obstetrics, Resident Chief of Ophthalmology, Resident Chief of Surgery, Resident Chief Public Health Officer (Manu'a District), Chief Public Health Nurse, three high school teachers, Assistant Principal of the High School, Assistant Communications Officer, Radio Engineer, Chief Aircraft Communicator, Manager of the Rain-maker Hotel, Manager of the Print Shop, and many others in responsible administrative work, such as general foremen and administrative assistants.

22. A Merit System Law covers the employment of career government employees. Candidates for employment are interviewed, examined, classified, and placed on employment registers from which positions are filled. During the fiscal year 1960, 470 Samoans were promoted to a higher grade.

Training facilities

23. The training of indigenous civil and technical cadres in and for positions in the Government of American Samoa is provided locally in the High School of American Samoa, Vocational School, and the Teacher Training College, and off-island by means of scholarships for college and university education, and in-service training grants for the purpose of internship and observation.

24. The High School of American Samoa is patterned after American high schools. It prepares students for entrance into college and for immediate employment in the clerical and minor positions in the Government. The 1960 enrolment was 218 students in grades 10 through 12.

25. A vocational education programme has been in operation in Samoa for several years, first as part of the High School of American Samoa and now as a separate institution. It offers both academic and vocational courses designed to train Samoans in the crafts and the use of trade tools. Admitting thirty-five boys annually, the Vocational School has trained students to do cabinet-work, carpentry, machine work, electricity, boat repair, logging, sawmilling, and plumbing with the ultimate objective of preparing them to work in American Samoa.

26. The Feliti Memorial Teacher Training College was, until 1960, a one-year extension beyond the high school. It has since been extended into a two-year college designed primarily for the preparation of Samoan teachers for the elementary schools. Financed jointly by the Government of American Samoa and the Fredric Duclos Barstow Foundation for American Samoans of Honolulu, Hawaii, the school had a 1960 enrolment of ten students. In conjunction with the College, a Demonstration School is located in the vicinity where teacher-trainees are taken for observation and demonstration teaching.

27. A Teachers' Institute is conducted annually for five weeks by the Department of Education to keep Samoan educational personnel abreast of new techniques and methods. In addition to regular teachers, graduates of the High School and those having equivalent training may enrol to receive basic training in teaching so that they may serve as substitutes and fill vacancies during the school year. Of the latter group of students, 251 and 242 applied in 1959 and 1960, respectively.

28. For the first time since before the Second World War, four guest instructors from Hawaii and the mainland were brought to American Samoa for the 1959 and 1960 annual teacher-training institutes.

29. A nursing school is conducted by the Samoan Hospital and is now undergoing change from a two-year to a three-year school. It has been accepted by the National League for Nursing as an institution for the training of practical nurses. Academic courses are being taken at the High School of American Samoa and courses in nursing at the hospital compound. Nurse-trainees are provided room and board by the Government.

Off-island training

30. Off-island training programmes are maintained on a continuing basis as part of the Government's policy of furthering the education and training of Samoans so that they may assume greater responsibility in the operation of their Government. Several government employees were sent off-island for special training in such fields as X-ray, radio and meteorology, legislation, medicine, and education.

31. Additional opportunities for off-island studies were offered by colleges and universities and foundations for students interested in pursuing higher education. Seventeen such scholarships were awarded to Samoan students. The Government of American Samoa participates in these scholarships by awarding stipends and in almost all cases by providing air transportation for the recipients.

32. Encouragement has been given to inhabitants to apply for training under the United Nations Technical Assistance Programme. Two candidates have successfully completed their training in education through United Nations scholarships.

VIRGIN ISLANDS OF THE UNITED STATES

Training facilities

33. The preparation and training of indigenous civil and technical cadres in the Virgin Islands are carried out as a regular function of the Department of Education. The Government of the Virgin Islands maintains a system of free public elementary and secondary education patterned after mainland schools. Its high schools prepare students for entrance into American colleges and also provide a limited number of vocational and trade classes to prepare students for employment in the Virgin Islands. Because of the Islands' small population and limited resources, the Government has not attempted to support a local college. Opportunities for higher education are available through extension programmes from private colleges.

34. There are three public high schools in the Virgin Islands—one in each of the three major islands. Enrolment for 1960 numbered 2,198 students in grades seven through twelve, of whom 240 enrolled in vocational trades in industries.

35. Reports of the Governor show an improvement in the quality of the vocational education offered in the high schools.

Such vocational courses as electricity, carpentry, plumbing, and auto mechanics have been included in the programme. Commercial sewing was taught in Charlotte Amalie High School and vocational agriculture in the Christiansted High and Frederiksted Junior High Schools in 1959. In 1960 a course in practical nursing was added in St. Thomas, and masonry courses were added in both St. Thomas and St. Croix. To meet the needs of an increased tourist industry, training of hotel workers in St. Thomas and St. Croix high schools is currently under way.

36. In addition to regular daytime classes, evening extension courses are being conducted in St. Thomas. In 1960 a total of seventy-three students took courses in blueprint reading for the building trades, blueprint reading and plumbing code regulation, electrical theory (advanced science) and automotive mechanics.

37. During the school year 1959/1960, the first class in practical nursing was provided with thirteen female students.

38. Higher education. There has long been recognized a need for college and graduate school personnel trained to staff the departments of the Virgin Islands Government and to develop further the commercial, agriculture, and other business and productive resources of the islands. There are no local college facilities, but the Catholic University of Puerto Rico has provided extension programmes for teachers; and for five years (through 1959) the Hampton Institute in the State of Virginia provided a more comprehensive programme financed jointly by a foundation, the island Government, and by the students through tuition fees. During the five-year period, 212 persons earned 4,231 semester hours of college credits. Of the 212 persons, 137 were teachers, 7 were librarians, 6 were nurses, 11 were graduate students, and 51 were enrolled without any credit.

39. In 1958 the Governor engaged a consultant from the United States Office of Education to make a first-hand study of the post high school education needs of the Virgin Islands, and to recommend feasible steps to meet those needs. In the current year, the Legislature has established the Virgin Islands

College Commission to follow up the 1958 study and submit its findings and recommendations to the Legislature at its next session.

Off-island training

40. To provide incentive and assistance to qualified students, the Government of the Virgin Islands established in 1956 a Territorial Scholarship Fund. By 1960, well over 100 students had received loans and grants for college study outside the islands.

41. Several colleges and foundations have also provided scholarships and fellowships to Virgin Islands students.

42. A major development in the training and preparation of indigenous civil and technical cadres was the establishment of a programme financed by the Ford Foundation. Started in 1958 with a grant of $20,000, it had awarded six fellowships to key government employees in 1960. Under this programme, selected employees entered American University in Washington, D.C., for advanced courses in their fields and worked under an internship programme in the Office of Territories, United States Department of the Interior. The fellows who have completed their programme are now employed in key positions in the Government of the Virgin Islands.

SUMMARY

43. From the foregoing it will be apparent that Guam, the Virgin Islands and American Samoa are making steady progress in providing facilities and opportunities for the training of indigenous civil and technical cadres. There remains more to be done, to be sure, but the Territories themselves, with the assistance and arrangement of the United States Government, are making commendable efforts to provide their people with further education and training. The three United States Territories are well on their way towards developing an indigenous corps of well-trained and qualified technical and professional personnel which already enables them to participate to a high degree in the management of their own affairs, and which will do so increasingly in the future.

ANNEX V

Statement by the representative of Spain on conditions in the Territories of Fernando Póo, Río Muni and the Spanish Sahara

On 18 May 1961, at the 239th meeting of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, the representative of Spain made a statement describing conditions in the Territories of Fernando Póo, Río Muni and the Spanish Sahara. At the request of the Committee, the statement is reproduced below as an annex to the report of the Committee to the sixteenth session of the General Assembly (see also part one, paras. 72-76, above).

1. For the first time, the Spanish delegation is making a statement in the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. Up to the present we have confined ourselves to addressing a few courteous words to the officers of the Committee, to congratulating you, Mr. Chairman, Miss Brooks and Miss Kamal, and to expressing our thanks for the words of welcome from various members of this Committee; we have taken note of what has been said and considered the comments made, and we have studied the reports drawn up by the Secretariat.

2. We wish to say how favourably we have been impressed by the order, deliberation and calm generally prevailing in this Committee, which should be an example to all others in the Organization. We have studied the various items and listened to them being discussed. What is my delegation to say about the abundance of documents submitted to us? In all sincerity there is little that we could say because the work as presented to us has already been carefully prepared by the Secretariat and is in itself of the greatest interest.

3. We have noted that social progress, both urban and rural, questions of standards of living, labour problems, discrimination, juvenile delinquency and public health have occupied much of the Committee's attention. It is not surprising today that paramount importance should be attached to the social aspects of the evolution and development of peoples; to such an extent is this the case that we cannot conceive of a government in our day which is not genuinely concerned with social questions. Those questions are of special importance in our time when scientific progress and development is such that peoples justifiably wish for an improvement in their social welfare.

4. This Committee has also concerned itself with the preparation and training of the inhabitants of the Territories, a matter to which we attach particular importance. The development of public education (a term that we use to cover education in general) and international co-operation in the economic, social and educational fields have also engaged the attention of this Committee. My delegation has little to add to the statements made by the various representatives of the Administering Powers. We say this because we accept in good faith what the representative Governments tell us about the Territories they administer and because, moreover, we believe that no one can have a greater interest in the welfare of their inhabitants than those to whom the sacred mission of defending their welfare has been entrusted.

5. My presence here does not indicate the slightest addition or change in the attitude of Spain, which has been amply defined by our representatives in the Fourth Committee. The Spanish Government is true to its word and to its policy and that is why it is represented at these meetings.

6. We know that our presence in this Committee is purely optional, but we nevertheless consider that, since we have nothing to hide, since my Government wishes to collaborate with the other countries concerned and since we have already transmitted all kinds of publications to the Secretary-General, there can surely be no harm in the Committee learning about the situation in our African provinces. This aspect of the matter was regarded as being of the first importance by my delegation: that is why we are here—to establish contact with this Committee, so that we may be able to talk things over quietly, so that the whole world may know the facts about us, and how the inhabitants of our Territories live. For us, over and above any other consideration, they are our brothers. The concept of life held by the Spaniard could not lead him to any other conclusion. In the past, Spain has been a great discoverer; it populated lands where we became merged with the indigenous inhabitants, giving them our blood and receiving theirs. For that reason whenever in Spain we hear talk of colonial matters, in the prerogative sense of the word, we feel grieved and distressed, and we do not hold with the kind of discrimination which has unfortunately been frequent in the history of peoples.

7. For the same reason we believe that our presence in this Committee may be of use to the whole world. The great historical adventure which our American experience represents is clearly apparent to all. I will not weary you with disquisitions on what Spain has done or not done, on what principles it based its relations with peoples of different cultural levels with which it came into contact, or on the results of this magnificent chapter of history, because the phenomenon which at present confronts the world is one of decolonization, a consequence of the economic and political action of certain Powers in the 19th century, in which Spain had no part. Spain has never been a colonialist country; it has not engaged in economic exploitation, the commandeering of markets, the control of raw materials or the extermination of indigenous peoples.

8. If our lack of colonial interests and of concern for material gain, together with our tradition which, despite arguments to the contrary, we believe may certainly be described as positive, can help delegates to find ideas, opinions or principles of general interest, we are prepared to give our full co-operation where it may be of use to all.

9. A knowledge of these Spanish provinces of Africa may be acquired exactly as though they were any Spanish province in the Peninsula. There are no differences; the legislation is similar and the inhabitants of both enjoy the same privileges. Nevertheless I should like to point out certain aspects which may be of interest to the Committee.

RÍO MUNI

10. The province of Río Muni covers an area of 26,000 square kilometres, comprising a section along the western coast of Africa and the islands of Corisco and Elobeyes.

11. Mainland zone. This is bounded on the north by Cameroun, on the west by the Atlantic and on the south and east by Gabon. It consists in fact of a coastal plain extending from the river Muni to the river Campo and fifteen to twenty-five kilometres wide, and a number of peneplains extending at intervals into the interior. Its coastal area may be divided into three parts. One extends from the river Campo to the mouth of the river Benito, in the centre of which is situated the town of Bata; the second stretches from the river Benito to Cape San Juan and is the part which projects most into the sea; the third part extends from Cape San Juan to the estuary of the Muni and makes a wide curve towards the south-east. The total extent is some 150 kilometres.

12. Its geological formation is two-fifths granite (southern and eastern peneplains), two-fifths gneiss and quartzites (northern peneplains) and one-fifth sedimentary lands in the coastal plain.

13. Its mountain structure comprises various spurs of the ranges of the Cristal Mountains which consist of the following:

14. The central system, a divide between the river Benito and the Ogowe and the Muni valleys. The most important names are "La piedra de Nzás or the Pie de Dios Mountain;

the Chime Mountain (near Evinayong); Mount Eyamayong, in the centre of the Churu forest, and the Biyemeyeme or Mitra, the most impressive, within sight of Puerto Iradier. All these summits are nearly 1,200 metres high.

15. The Niefang-Micomeseng system, which extends from the northern frontier east of Micomeseng and southeast of Niefang to beyond the confluence of the rivers Benito and Nney. Its best known peaks are the Maya at one end and the "Chocolate" or Biboldindok, as the Pamue call it, and the Alén at the other; both within view of Niefang and forming a massive barrier which is crossed by the track leading from that place to Evinayong. Its highest summit is under 1,100 metres. Near the Ebebiyin track, close to Ayantang, it forms a narrow gorge, through which rushes the river Benito.

16. Towards the coast, forming the boundaries between the plain and the first peneplain, there are hills varying in height between 450 and 800 metres. The best known are Mount Raíces, up which the Ebebiyin track climbs, and the Mbomansok or Bombanyoko, 482 metres high, the most westerly peak.

17. The principal river is the Benito, known to the Pamue as Wolo, which drains almost three-fifths of the Territory. Its principal tributaries on the right are the Abia, the Binbili, the Momo and the Mongo or Mongolla and on the left another Abia, the Chiwo, the Nvuru, the Nney and the Mitong (mentum). The river Benito is navigable for medium-sized craft to a point some twenty kilometres from the sea, where the last of the Sene or Senye rapids are met with; its disadvantage, however, is that it has a very dangerous bar. It is also navigable for small craft for some 80 kilometres of its upper reaches, from the frontier (the port of Asoc) as far as the large bend it makes near Avinayong, where the great Masoc Rapids are situated. From that point as far as Sene it falls constantly from one level to another forming a number of rapids, cascades and cataracts, the largest of which is the Asoc-Bindeme cataract at some four or six hours' walk from Ayantang. On its tributary, the Nney, are the biggest falls in the province, which are situated almost at the confluence of the two rivers, and have a vertical drop of twenty to thirty metres.

18. The river Campo is only Spanish for the left half of the last part of its course. Its tributary, the Kié, forms a natural boundary with Gabon.

19. The Río Muni is an estuary into which flow a large number of less important rivers. They are all navigable where they cross the coastal plain and large-sized vessels can go up as far as Puerto Iradier and even beyond there into the interior. The most important rivers which flow into it are the Kaonwe, the Machani, the Etoki, the Tache, and the Mitemele or Utamboni.

20. Several rivers have their source in the southeast corner and flow into the Ogowe, an important river in Gabon.

21. The Biadive, Ubia, Utonde, Ukoko, Etembue and Ayé are lesser rivers but some stretches are navigable by small craft.

22. The different tribes in Río Muni are divided into two main groups: the Ndowe, including those inhabiting the coastal area (the Benga, the Bapuku, the Combe, etc.) and the Pamue. The latter include the inland tribes which in their turn are divided into two large and chiefly linguistic sub-groups, the Oac and the Ntum.

23. Until recently, nothing more useful in the way of minerals had been discovered than red haematite; rutile, in quantities too small to allow of its being worked; coal in very small quantities; and gold-bearing sand. A concession for this precious metal is worked in Kukumakok. Recently, there has been prospecting for titanium ores.

24. The zoological species found include some of the larger animals, such as elephant, crocodile, buffalo, hippopotamus, gorilla, chimpanzee and leopard. There are also numerous species of reptiles.

25. At approximately five kilometres from Bata is the international airport, which came into use in the year 1952. Its chief features are described elsewhere in this statement.

26. The capital of the province is the town of Bata; it has all the appearance of a modern town, with wide avenues and streets lined with well-designed buildings. Among the most important buildings in Bata are the Government offices, the town hall, the offices of the Provincial Administration, the parish church, the school of arts and crafts, the general hospital, the Chamber of Agriculture, the clock tower, the Marine Department, the Labour and Industry Inspectorates, the Post Office, the Santo Angel de la Guarda Orphanage and the head offices of various commercial firms.

27. The island of Corisco which, according to the explorer Iradier, looks like a hide nailed down at the four corners is geologically composed of a "series of layers of marls, limestone and tertiary sandstone, mainly horizontal but with a four-degree dip to the southwest, which are probably resting on cretaceous formations". It is entirely surrounded by shallow reefs, some of which are permanently above water, which make its coasts extremely dangerous for navigation. It has a circumference of 17,790 metres; the longest straight line from north to south measures 5,830 metres and from east to west, 3,140 metres.

28. The indigenous inhabitants of Corisco, who belong to the "Benga" tribe, used to call it "Mangi" a name derived from a tree which grew in abundance on the island; but when the island was discovered, the name was changed to the one by which it is now known and which means "flash of light" or "lightning".

29. The terrain consists of a plain some 20 metres above sea level, furrowed by "small waterways and marshy lowlands". The beaches are of very fine white sand.

30. The gathering of coconuts is the main source of income of the people of Corisco, but their agriculture is not very highly developed; it may be said that it consists merely of subsistence farms and a few small coffee plantations.

31. The villages of Corisco have a very pleasant aspect owing to the elegance of the buildings, some of which are of cement and others of well-wrought wood. The elementary school, the medical clinic and the Casa Mision were built recently. The church is being built on the same site as the one which was destroyed by fire in 1942.

32. The Elobeyes are two small islands, with sandy soil and lush vegetation, separated by a shallow channel. They are situated at the entrance to the estuary of the Muni and are virtually flat.

33. Until the year 1930, the Deputy Government of Río Muni was established in Elobey Chico, but all the buildings which then existed are now abandoned and in ruins and the island has not been inhabited since, except that from time to time a few people appear to have made their homes there. "Elobey" comes from the word "elobi" which is the name of a tree which grows in those parts.

34. The geographical situation of Spanish Equatorial Africa is such that it has what is called a tropical climate, with certain variations depending on the particular characteristics of the location: altitude, proximity of mountain ranges, degree of deforestation, etc. The characteristics of this type of climate are the steadiness of the barometer, the regularity of the winds, the tornadoes or windstorms, the persistent humidity and the heavy rainfall. During the low-water season when the harmattan blows, which is the most uncomfortable time of the year, visibility is poor owing to the heat haze and the dust in the air slowly falls to earth and leaves yellow deposits on furniture and polished surfaces.

35. As a general rule, the maximum temperature in Río Muni is lower than in the island of Fernando Póo, as a result of which the climate is more temperate in that part of the region. Extreme shade temperatures in the two-year period 1958-1959 range in Santa Isabel between 34.0 and 17.0 degrees, and in Bata, between 32.6 and 15.0 degrees. It should be noted that the temperature of 35.3 degrees which prevailed in Santa Isabel on 8 February 1957 is the highest recorded in the last decade. What is known as the rainy season is characterized by frequent storms, after which visibility is so good that it is sometimes possible to see the island of Fernando Póo from Bata.

36. As for the gales called tornadoes or turbonadas which occur during the transition period from the dry to the rainy season and vice versa, it should be noted that they are atmospheric disturbances of a local nature and variable direction. When they blow, they are generally accompanied by heavy showers, and while they prevail, the temperature and the atmospheric pressure fall.

37. The Government and administration of both Río Muni and Fernando Póo are similar to those of any other Spanish province, and although I shall be referring later in my statement to the province of Fernando Póo, everything which applies to Río Muni also applies to Fernando Póo. The Act of 30 July 1959 establishes the structure and the legal system of these equatorial provinces:

38. The provisions of Fernando Póo and Río Muni are divided into municipal districts administered by Ayuntamientos (town councils), to which the local Juntas (village councils) included in each municipal district are responsible. The Central Government has the authority to make any necessary changes in the administration of the provinces.

39. The two provinces are ruled by a Governor-General who represents the Central Government and is responsible to it.

40. He is assisted by a General Secretary, who deputizes for him in case of absence or illness and is the immediate head of all services in both provinces, with the exception of the judicial and military.

41. A civil Governor shall be appointed for each province and shall be responsible to the Governor-General and, for matters within his competence, to the General Secretary.

42. The functions of the Governor-General shall be exercised by the number of Government delegates deemed necessary.

43. The powers and responsibilities of these authorities delegated by the Central Government and their relative competence and fields of activity shall be in conformity with the usual functions and duties of Governors, subject only to the particular circumstances of each province.

44. The appointment and termination of appointment of the Governor-General, the General Secretary and the Civil Governors are effected by Decree.

45. Each province has a Diputación provincial whose powers are defined in the Local Government Act (Ley de Régimen Local). They also perform social welfare duties which used to be carried out by similar bodies.

46. The Diputación provincial is a representative body whose membership is determined in accordance with the regulations enacted for that purpose.

47. These principles have been embodied in a number of provisions, but I should like to draw attention to the municipal elections held in this equatorial region during the first half of June 1960. From the moment preparation of the electoral machinery was started, it became evident that there would be no lack of co-operation and support. In the gay and populous city of Santa Isabel, the prop and mainstay of Fernando Póo, as well as in the flourishing city of Bata, capital of Río Muni, there was a coming and going, a veritable flood, of candidates and electoral propaganda at every street corner and arcade, and in the attractive and breezy towns of both provinces, there was an atmosphere of enthusiasm and bustle like that of the capital cities which demonstrated the political maturity of the inhabitants. In Annobón, too, the day was characterized by lively interest in the elections and the percentages of votes cast.

48. I shall give a brief and concise account of the progress and results of those elections.

49. A total of 248 candidates stood for election to councils as family group representatives, which in itself indicated the interest aroused by the elections among all social classes: in the province of Fernando Póo, there were 25 candidates for councillor for Santa Isabel; 14 for San Carlos; 26 for San Fernando and 14 for Annobón. In the province of Río Muni, there were 9 candidates for Acureman; 23 for Bata; 15 for Ebebiyin; 15 for Ebinayong; 43 for Micomeseng; 10 for Mongomo; 9 for Nsore; 12 for Puerto Iradier; 11 for Río Benito; 12 for Sevilla de Niefang and 9 for Valladolid de los Bimbiles. The figures themselves are so eloquent as to require no further comment. Electioneering in the electoral districts was so intense and effective that the number of candidates who stood for election in all districts far exceeded the posts to be filled.

50. The elections took place on the first Sunday of June with a great rush of voters who besieged the 207 electoral colleges set up in the two provinces from the early hours, and it was obvious from the first ballots that there had been a large turnout. For example, in Santa Isabel, 88 per cent of those on the electoral roll voted; in San Carlos, 80 per cent, and in San Fernando and Annobón, over 60 per cent of the voters cast ballots. In the electoral districts of Río Muni, Sevilla de Niefang came out first, all the registered voters there having cast their ballots, followed by Acureman, with 98 per cent; Ebebiyin, with 97 per cent; Puerto Iradier, with 91 per cent; Valladolid de los Bimbiles and Mongomo, with 90 per cent; Bata, with 85 per cent; and Río Benito with 81 per cent.

51. At the close of the first election day, during which there had not been the slightest unpleasant incident, the polling officers reported the following results of the voting for members of the various town councils (Ayuntamientos):

52. In Santa Isabel, Mr. Wilwardo Jones Niger received 1,995 votes; Mr. Florentino Vivancos 1,966; Mr. Manuel Gallego 1,923; Mr. Gustavo Watson 1,883 and Mr. Fernando Asensio 1,538. In San Carlos, Mr. Amondo Ligere received 1,203 votes; Mr. Miguel Sendros 1,073; Mr. Evencio Alonso 937 and Mr. Jose Maria Elorriaga 858.

53. In the sister province of Río Muni, the following were elected as Councillors representing family groups: in Bata, Mr. Pedro Lumu, with 3,569 votes; Mr. Ricardo Granados, with 3,314; Mr. Faustino Epalepale, 3,195; Mr. Alfonso Mamendji, 2,959, and Mr. Alfonso Nguema, 2,673. In Río Benito, Mr. Martin Eguoro secured 1,623 votes; Mr. Apolinar Nsue 1,453; Mr. Jorge Bihitue 1,276 and Mr. Carlos Ndongo 1,053. In Puerto Iradier Mr. Pedro Jose Obiang, Mr. Damaso R. Sima, Mr. Fernando Ndongo and Mr. Francisco Beule were elected. In Sevilla de Niefang, Mr. Luis Ondo received 2,385 votes; Mr. Pascual Ondo 1,292; Mr. Sebastian Nsue 1,210 and Mr. Mariano Asumo 1,117. In Valladolid de los Bimbiles, Jose Mañana Ela secured 2,021 votes; Mr. Manuel Esono, 1,076; Mr. Rosendo Ela 1,351. In Ebebiyin, Mr. Antonia Ela obtained 3,508 votes; Mr. Cosme Nsue 1,959; Mr. Baldomero Martinez 1,724; Mr. Isidoro Abaga 1,538 and Mr. Jose Nsue 1,021. Lastly, in Micomeseng, Mr. Salvador Aloba was elected by 2,423 votes; Mr. Leoncio Nguema by 1,199 votes; Mr. Manuel Ecoro by 809; Mr. Gabriel Balinga by 760 and Mr. Juan Abeso by 558.

54. The following Sunday, the electoral delegates chosen for that purpose elected the councillors to represent professional, economic and cultural organizations. The undermentioned persons, elected by secret ballot, together with those representing family groups, will constitute the membership of the town councils (Ayuntamientos), in which full confidence for the administration of the region has been placed in advance.

55. In Santa Isabel: Mr. Alfonso de las Casas, Mr. Mauricio Bocari, Mr. Fermin Bohoco, Mr. Jose Estrada and Mr. Jaime Rofes. In San Fernando: Mr. Alberto Nbula, Mr. Pedro Meye and Mr. Alejandro Nbuña. In San Carlos: Mr. Aniceto Ariago, Mr. Pablo A. Governa, Mr. Mariano Ebriday, Mr. Antonio Nome; and in Bata, Mr. Rafael Blasco, Mr. Crisanto Garcia and Mr. Jose Millan Lopez.

56. In October 1960, elections were also held for representatives of the provinces to serve as deputies to the Spanish Parliament—three for Río Muni and three for Fernando Póo. In addition, the Mayors who preside over the town councils of Santa Isabel and Bata are deputies by virtue of their position on the City Council (Comistorio). I shall give a few biographical details concerning these deputies.

57. Mr. Felipe Esono Nsue has been the beloved and respected chief of the Oyec tribe for over twenty years. He is married and the father of four children, in the prime of life, about 44 years old, and he has the same affectionate regard for his family as for his friends and acquaintances; he has no enemies. He normally lives in the little town of Esong in the municipal district of Evinayong and was elected a member of its town council in the last elections. He was educated by the missionaries of San Jose de Evinayong and his election as a deputy has been a source of profound satisfaction to those who have only praise for the honesty and moral fibre of their elected representative.

58. Mr. Fernando Martorell is one of the best known people in the economic and social life of Río Muni. He is a farmer and the son of a farmer, having inherited from his father the coffee plantations which he has been tending since he was a youth. He has almost always held executive posts and was president of the Official Chamber of Agriculture and Forestry of Río Muni, and much of the urban development of Bata was carried out during the various periods when he was president of the Citizens Council, from which post he rose to the presidency of the Town Council when the former body was superseded by the latter; in the home, he is a good father.

59. Mr. Wilwardo Jones Niger is a member of one of the oldest established families of Fernando Póo. He has at various times been chosen as a director of the Official Chamber of Agriculture and Forestry and was an almost permanent member of the defunct Citizens Council, which he represented at the Hispano-American and Philippine Congress of Mayors held at Lisbon. He was elected councillor by the electorate of Santa Isabel and is mayor of that city. It is in that capacity that he will occupy a seat in the Spanish Parliament as a deputy.

60. According to the census of 31 December 1950—the operations of the 1960 census are not yet completed—the Province of Río Muni had a de facto population of 156,785, and a de jure population of 169,080. This means a population density of 5.6. I think it would be appropriate at this point for me to mention also the population of Fernando Póo, which on the above-mentioned date had a de facto population of 41,878 and a de jure population of 26,969, so that the total for the two provinces amounts to a de facto population of 198,663 and a de jure population of 196,049. I am mentioning the two provinces together at this stage because the population estimate for the period 1951-1959 was based on joint projections, which indicated a total figure of 216,677 at the end of 1959. According to the estimates of the National Statistical Institute, the total population of the Spanish Equatorial region, as on 31 December 1960, would be in excess of 218,000, in other words, it would show an increase of at least 10 per cent with respect to the 1950 figure.

61. The Statistical Institute will verify the accuracy of its projections in due course, once the census operations are completed. Only yesterday I received some information concerning the latest published statistical data: these show that the Province of Fernando Póo has a population of 60,000 and the Province of Río Muni 166,000. Both these figures are approximate. The natural movement of the population is arrived at from the entries in the civil registers and is most favourable.

62. The basic crops are coffee, cacao and palm oil. There are various experimental farms in Evinayong. In Río Muni, the main crops are tropical. In 1958-1959 the production of cacao in Río Muni was 711 tons; coffee production in 1959 amounted to 4,334 tons. The average commercial or dockside price of coffee in 1959 was 55 pesetas per kg. Under the Order of 2 February 1955, the price of coffee is not controlled. Yucca, too, is cultivated; the yucca grown for export, for industrial uses, is found in Río Muni, where it is a favourite crop of the Pamue.

63. All exploitation of forestry resources is subject to strict controls, with a view to the protection of the various species. It is practised in the regions of Bata, Cogo, Río Benito and Sevilla de Niefang. The number of timber-yielding species amounts to 122, of which thirty-six are very common, fifty-one moderately common and thirty-five fairly rare. In 1959 some 169,930 tons of timber were exported. The timber undertakings have their own railway systems; they also use river and maritime transport and of course all the necessary equipment such as tractors, lorries, etc.

64. Livestock production is not enough to meet the local demand and it is necessary to increase the supply by importing live and slaughtered animals.

65. The possession of cattle in the low-lying regions is prohibited by the health laws as the most effective way of preventing the spread of tripanosomiasis, or sleeping-sickness.

66. There is not much cattle-breeding but sheep-breeding is practised extensively: there are 20,980 head of sheep, 4,651 goats and 9,441 pigs. There are also large numbers of domestic fowl.

67. In Río Muni, there is a partial reserve in the forest of Monte Alén; in the forest of Monte Raíces hunting is absolutely prohibited.

68. In 1959 the fish production of Bata was 61,847 kg; of Río Benito, 2,564 kg; and of Puerto Iradier, 167,791 kg.

69. There are twenty-three post offices and seven radio-telegraph offices; there is a radio-telephone service between Fernando Póo and the continent, and a telephone service in Santa Isabel and San Carlos, in Fernando Póo, and in Bata, in the Continental District.

70. The system of health services may be said to be divided into four groups: the first consists of the technical secretariat, which is responsible for all administration and for the pharmaceutical laboratories; the second is the Institute of Hygiene, which has a large number of subsidiary services (laboratories, medical school, child health, maternity, statistics, etc.); the third consists of the health section responsible for the campaign against endemic diseases (anti-malaria, anti-tuberculosis, campaigns, etc.); and the last group consists of the hospitals, which also provide such specialized services as surgery, electrolology, radiology, etc.

71. All health centres are in direct and continual contact with the provincial Health Department, to which they report on the work they are doing and from which they receive instructions and directives.

72. In 1958 the medical staff consisted of a medical director, twenty-seven doctors (including four surgeons), five pharmacists, twenty-three interns, thirty-eight nursing nuns, 139 medical assistants and 179 male nurses.

73. The campaign against local endemic diseases has been outstanding; for example, leprosy is no longer a danger and there has been a considerable decrease in the incidence of malaria as a result of drainage work and the lavish distribution of anti-malaria preparations.

74. Mention must also be made of certain specialized health services, such as the official maternity services, which have brought about a significant decline in the number of still births. Special attention has also been given to child health: a number of dispensaries have been opened in recent years and an institution called "Gota de Leche" was established to provide milk products for any mothers who need them.

75. We must also mention the efforts made to improve surgical facilities. The hospitals of Santa Isabel and Bata already have the latest equipment, and an ambulance service is available for rapid transport to the hospitals from the farthest corners of the territories.

76. In 1959 the hospitals of the Province treated 22,720 patients; 1,182 operations were performed at the Bata hospital in 1958 and 1,117 in 1959. In 1959 2,792 women were treated in the maternity centres of the Province and 624 children were treated at the Bata children's dispensary alone, while 3,871 people received dental treatment at Bata.

77. The state schools are classified as elementary and primary schools.

78. The elementary schools are spread throughout the territory and are run by certificated teachers trained at the Santa Isabel College.

79. The primary schools are in charge of certificated teachers trained in the teacher-training schools of the Peninsula.

80. There is a five-hour school day, and the school year begins on 16 February and ends on 15 December.

81. Pupils attend elementary school up to the age of twelve years.

82. The number of schools is adequate and is proportionately much greater in the Spanish Provinces than in the neighbouring territories.

83. Finally, there are schools for adults and evening courses in domestic science.

84. Secondary education: The Patronato de Enseñanza Media provides courses for the Bachillerato, at the end of which a qualifying examination is given by a board of university professors.

85. The teaching staff is composed mainly of doctors or university graduates in the sciences, philosophy and letters.

86. The courses are given in a two-storey building, occupying an area of 1,400 square metres, set in spacious grounds and equipped with all the necessary teaching material.

87. Higher education: the Institute of Higher Education trains teachers and civil servants.

88. When an indigenous inhabitant passes the entrance examination for this institute the State defrays all his expenses (maintenance, clothing, books, etc.) and if he passes the qualifying examination after five years of study as a boarding student, he is automatically appointed to an appropriate official post.

89. Vocational and technical education: there is an agricultural training school headed by an agronomist, a medical school, and schools of arts and crafts.

90. Students who demonstrate the necessary ability receive grants to enable them to continue their studies and obtain the degree they desire at universities or institutes of higher education in the Peninsula.

91. In 1959 there was a total of eighty-four schools in Río Muni, comprising seventy-seven elementary schools and seven primary schools, staffed by 208 teachers and assistants.

92. In 1959, 7,588 pupils were enrolled; the total number of pupils was 15,049 in the elementary schools and 772 in the primary schools.

93. The Cardinal Cisneros Institute of Secondary Education had 239 pupils in 1959.

94. Mention must be made here of the School of Agriculture, opened on 17 October 1955, which had twenty pupils in 1959, and of the School of Arts and Crafts at Bata, with 150 pupils.

95. To these figures must be added those relating to private education, such as the schools of the missionary fathers, Hijos del Corazón de María, which had 1,577 pupils in 1959, and the mission schools operated by the nuns of the Immaculate Conception, which were attended by 1,375 girls in 1959.

96. The Santa Isabel broadcasting station is the official station and the oldest one in operation. It broadcasts three times a day, for a total of six hours, on working days, and twice a day, for a total of four and a half hours on holidays. In 1954 it broadcast for a total of 2,112 hours, the programmes including news bulletins, music, foreign-language broadcasts and so forth.

97. Radio Ecuatorial at Bata began operating in December 1953 and is heard mainly in continental Spanish Guinea. It broadcasts twice a day, for a total of six hours, seven days a week. In 1954 it broadcast for a total of 1,095 hours.

98. Radio Papaya is a small privately owned broadcasting station at Santa Isabel, which broadcasts at times when the official station is silent. Its range is local and its programmes mainly music.

99. The following publications exist: Ebano, daily paper published at Santa Isabel; Potopoto, a weekly published at Bata; Bantú, a magazine published at Santa Isabel; La Guinea Española, the organ of the Catholic Mission; Ager, the organ of the Department of Agriculture, which uses it to provide technical instruction in agriculture and to report the results of experiments; the Boletín de la Delegación de Trabajo, which gives information on all labour activity in the Province (the statistical section contains graphs and the more informative part is illustrated); and the Boletín Oficial de los Territorios, the fortnightly organ of the Governor-General's Office, in which all official notices appear.

100. Justice is administered by the Triunales de demarcación and the District Courts, by district judges and by the Indigenous High Court. The courts are completely independent of the government authorities and observe all legal guarantees in their proceedings. Corporal punishment has always been completely forbidden. There are penitentiary institutions, whose inmates serve their sentences under a system of moderate labour. There are also juvenile courts and correctional institutions.

101. Cases of cannibalism and poisoning have disappeared; there were formerly several such cases through the influx of the Ebu and Embueta tribes, who now have no settlements. There has been no appreciable drop in the number of offences against property and morals.

102. The Spanish Provinces in the Equatorial Region come under the ecclesiastical authority of the Apostolic Vicariate of Fernando Póo.

103. Missionary work in those Provinces is the responsibility of the Congregation of Missionary Fathers known as Hijos del Corazón de María, an order which was founded in the city of Vich, in Barcelona Province, by Sanit Antonio María Claret.

104. The number of indigenous inhabitants who profess the Roman Catholic religion is now estimated at about 181,000, which is clear evidence of the splendid work these missionary fathers have done in the Provinces of Fernando Póo and Río Muni in spite of the great obstacles they have had, and still have, to overcome and the discomforts of continual travel in the tropical climate.

105. Since 1885 the Nuns of the Immaculate Conception have also been established in these Provinces. They are in charge of various charitable, medical and educational institutions, in all of which they perform the most praiseworthy work.

106. In 1950 the Nuns of Jesús María founded a residence at Ebebiyín, in the Province of Río Muni, in order to devote themselves to education, and in particular to the organization known as "Sigsá". This is a school of preparation for marriage, where indigenous women are trained in household tasks and skills.

107. Recently the Hermanos de la Doctrina Cristiana arrived at Bata to take over the management of the School of Arts and Crafts, which is housed in a magnificent building that was constructed recently and solemnly dedicated on 15 February 1959.

108. Missionary work is performed also by the secular clergy, assisted by twelve indigenous priests who began their ecclesiastical training at the Seminary of Banapá (Fernando Póo).

109. The provincial budget approved for the financial year 1960 amounted to 310,271,000 pesetas. In 1959 it was 198,356,000 pesetas.

110. The major item of expenditure is that on public works, which account for 48 per cent, or 96,673,000 pesetas. The next largest item is the health service, with 24,910,000 pesetas.

111. The following are the 1959 external trade figures for the whole Province: imports, 818,944,000 pesetas; exports, 1,131,805,000 pesetas. The Fernando Póo imports amounted to 538,910,000 pesetas and its exports to 628,919,000 pesetas. The import and export figures for Río Muni were 280,034,000 pesetas and 502,886,000 pesetas respectively.

112. In 1959, 101,974 tons of goods were imported, 88,382 tons from the Peninsula and 13,592 from abroad. Exports amounted to 269,735 tons, 245,506 tons to the Peninsula and 24,229 to foreign countries. The main exports to the Peninsula were cacao, coffee, coconuts, timber, palm kernels and yucca; the goods exported abroad were fresh bananas, cacao and timber. The goods imported from the Peninsula were fuels, cement, chemicals, including insecticides, all kinds of metals and metal goods, bricks, glazed tiles and similar objects, wines and liquors, and such foodstuffs as rice, jam, wheat flour and dried fish. Imports from abroad were cement, cars and lorries, tractors and their parts, metals and chemicals.

FERNANDO PÓO

113. Fernando Póo is an island of 2,071 square kilometres situated in the Bight of Biafra, in the centre of the Gulf of Guinea, at a mean latitude of 3° 30' North and a mean longitude of 14° 54' East. It is in the form of an irregular parallelogram running from north to south. Its general topography is simple: there is a large volcanic cone 2,800 metres high, which is the summit of Santa Isabel, with small secondary volcanos and a great volcanic range to the south, the highest point of which is the summit of Moka, 1,870 metres high. The two massifs are separated by a depression at an altitude of 700 metres which traverses the narrow part of the island from the Bay of San Carlos to the Bay of Concepción. The coast is steep, with shallow inlets, and about 200 kilometres in length; it is difficult to land on the southern coast. On the north coast, however, which is of moderate height, there is the Bay of Santa Isabel, which has a magnificent harbour.

114. There are many rivers, but they are of small volume and short course because of the peculiar configuration of the land. Some rivers flow into craters, forming lakes, such as that at Moka, at 1,790 metres above sea level.

115. The island of Annobón, which is also part of the Province of Fernando Póo, was formed by the accumulation of volcanic material and is the only Spanish territory in the southern hemisphere, being situated at latitude 1° 25' South. It is 17 square kilometres in area. The ground is steep and rugged, which makes it very difficult to cultivate; nevertheless, the island exports coffee, cacao, palm kernels and other products, though in small quantities.

116. It is generally acknowledged that the island was populated after its discovery in 1471. The census of 31 December 1950 showed it to have 1,403 inhabitants, with a density of 83 inhabitants per square kilometre.

117. Although Annobón is very small, it has a number of relatively high points, such as the Pico del Fuego, 395 metres, the Quivoco, 600 metres, and the Santamina, 750 metres. The most important geographical feature of the island is the lagoon of Mazafim, which is 2,755 metres in circumference.

118. Apart from agriculture, the main activity of the inhabitants of Annobón is fishing. They have a remarkable way of catching the large cetaceans, which they fearlessly pursue in their small boats, whence they harpoon them.

119. The island of Fernando Póo and the island of Annobón together form the Province of Fernando Póo, with a total area of 2,034 square kilometres and a population of 41,878.

120. The original settlers on the island are the Bubi. Their origin is unknown. As Fernando Póo is a volcanic island of indeterminable age, it is certain that it must have been uninhabited for a long period.

121. Besides the Bubi, there is a foreign element in Fernando Póo, for the Bubi are too few to supply all the labour needed in the island, whose constant agricultural and industrial progress requires a greater labour force. Hence the Bubi account for only 30 per cent of the inhabitants of the island.

122. The capital of Fernando Póo is the city of Santa Isabel. It is built on a wide coastal plain which runs along the Bay of Santa Isabel and offers the population all the advantages that modern town-planning can provide. At the last census, Santa Isabel had a population of 11,098. The roadstead of Santa Isabel forms a sheltered natural harbour as one could hope to find on these coasts and it has been improved by man through the building of wharfs and breakwaters.

123. Other towns worth mentioning are San Carlos and Concepción, San Carlos, in the bay of that name, is a good port for agricultural exports. The other centres of population are small towns occupied by farmers and tradesmen.

124. The island's agriculture was originally confined to the growing of cacao. Later, at a time when the cacao plantations were passing through a severe crisis, they had to be planted with different crops, and coffee was introduced. Other crops are bananas, coconuts, cinnamon, vanilla, pepper, honey, palm kernels and cane alcohol. The island also produces rubber-bearing latex which comes from the hevea, a tropical plant found in large quantities in the enclosures on the cacao estates. Horticulture prospers, particularly in the highlands of Moka. The area of the island which can be cultivated for tropical plants amounts to about 90,000 hectares.

125. The main crop is cacao. In 1958-1959, 20,790 tons were produced.

126. Not only does the present production of cacao supply the needs of the national market, but it is possible to export part of the crop to foreign countries. These exports are, however, decreasing owing to the increase in domestic requirements.

127. Coffee, on the other hand, is passing through a period of stability for various reasons, one of which is the regeneration of several plantations in order to produce coffee of a higher commercial quality.

128. Although this crop is, of course, of much less value, exports of fresh bananas were started in 1953, with the result that this crop has acquired greater importance. The value of banana exports was 39.2 million pesetas in 1959 and the volume was 14,379.9 tons.

129. The work done in the highlands of Moka deserves mention, not for its value in pesetas, but because of what it means to the population. The Moka Valley Co-operative has been set up, its main crop being potatoes.

130. There are also two experimental farms, one in Santa Isabel and the other in Musola, for the cultivation of tropical crops.

131. We should also mention here that the Chamber of Agriculture of Fernando Póo, which is run on co-operative lines, distributes several thousand tons of fertilizers and insecticides every year. Without going into full details we may mention that in 1958 the Chamber of Agriculture distributed 3,443,740 kg of copper sulphate, 2,359,800 kg of lime, 1,176,500 kg of ammonium sulphate and similar amounts of other fertilizers.

132. Several thousand hectares of land are also being cultivated as collective property. This land was granted in accordance with the provisions of the Act of 4 May 1948, under which such land cannot be sold or seized and enjoys the same benefits as those granted to the Consejos de Vecinos. Such land belongs to the natives of the village.

133. The only place where stock-breeding is firmly established is in the highlands of Moka. An extensive clearing operation was carried out there and the original vegetation was replaced by grass, which affords abundant pasture. It is mainly bovine cattle that are bred there. The cattle live in the open air and have become perfectly acclimatized.

134. The largest establishment in this region is known as Potrero de Moka. According to the last census, taken in 1959, there were 3,015 head of cattle. They are bred for consumption in the island, but they are insufficient for the needs and zebu have to be imported from neighbouring colonies. As horses are needed for work, there is also some horse-breeding; in 1959 there were 121 horses. The cattle in the region do not seem to be subject to any particular disease. There are no cattle worth mentioning outside Moka. There is, however, much domestic poultry.

135. Fishing can hardly be said to be an industry or a section of the economy of any importance. At Santa Isabel, however, the catch of fish amounted to 155,055 kg in 1956, 203,583 kg in 1957, 362,179 kg in 1958 and 484,657 kg in 1959.

136. The latest information shows that the island has a favourable balance of external trade. Thus, according to the figures for the year 1959, the island exported merchandise to the value of 628,919,000 pesetas, while imports amounted to 538,910,000 pesetas. The principal exports were, of course, coffee, cacao and bananas. The number of products exported was fairly limited in contrast to the great variety of goods imported, which, to mention only the most important, included construction materials (iron, cement, bricks, tiles), canned goods, motor vehicles, agricultural machinery, fuels and tools.

137. The establishment in 1942 of an Inspectorate of Industries, with its headquarters in Santa Isabel and a staff including a chief industrial engineer, a number of expert industrial designers and some indigenous assistants, provided a stimulus for the industrialization of the island. In the five-year period from 1953 to 1957 thermal power stations, hydroelectric plants, factories for the production of soap and cocoa-butter and the extraction of palm oil, an oil refinery, a brick and tile works, various machine-driven sawmills and cold storage plants were built. The ownership of many of these industries was granted to the Consejo de Vecinos. Particular emphasis has been placed on electric power stations, four such stations having been constructed in recent years. In 1958 the town of Santa Isabel consumed 1,929,283 kilowatt hours. There are also small electric power stations serving villages and agricultural co-operatives.

138. We must also give some figures relating to the construction industry.

139. Statistics show that in the town of Santa Isabel, thirty-four dwellings were built in 1956 at a cost of 14,244,655 pesetas; in 1957, 119 dwellings, at a cost of 27,717,959 pesetas; and in 1958, 104 dwellings, at a cost of 30,741,961 pesetas. In the light of the fact that, as we have seen, this town has a population of 11,098, it will be appreciated that the rate of construction is very high.

140. All the present highways in the island start from Santa Isabel, with a series of branch roads and short side-roads branching off from the main highways. The most important highways are those between Santa Isabel and Concepción and between Santa Isabel and San Carlos.

141. In transport, shipping and air transport are the most important items. Shipping has increased considerably in recent years because, among other reasons, some transatlantic commercial shipping lines have made Santa Isabel a regular port of call. Consequently, care has been taken to maintain and improve the port. For example, a new dock, consisting of a wharf covering an area of 23,858.18 square metres, with a broad approach road, was put into service in 1956. In addition, new electric cranes have been acquired and new commercial warehouses constructed. In contrast to the situation of Santa Isabel, the Bays of San Carlos and Concepción are more open; hence many ships anchor in the roads, making use of lighters for their loading and unloading operations.

142. In 1956, there were 225 arrivals of ships and 223 departures; in 1957, 220 and 222; in 1958 the number of in-coming and out-going ships was the same i.e., 176; and again in 1959 there were the same number of arrivals as departures, i.e., 152.

143. Merchandise imported through the port of Santa Isabel in 1958 amounted to 75,000 tons and exports totalled 36,700 tons.

144. The volume of air traffic is constantly increasing and Santa Isabel has a modern airport. There is a small installation in Moka serving small aircraft flying between different parts of the Province.

145. In 1959, 2,130 passengers arrived and 1,892 departed.

146. Passenger airlines operate between Santa Isabel and Bata, where there is a connexion to Madrid; between Santa Isabel and São Tomé, and between Santa Isabel and Douala.

147. We shall now consider social, educational and health conditions in the island.

148. In order to bring about the gradual but steady advancement of the indigenous inhabitants it has been necessary to establish organizations which would protect their particular interests, raise their level of living and promote their smooth and gradual transition to a state of civilization. Moreover, it was also necessary to protect them from foreigners. It was with that end in view that the Patronato de Indígenas, which has now concluded its work, was set up on a temporary basis. The Patronato performed its task in the island with remarkable efficiency. It ran orphanages, promoted and encouraged house-building and the urbanization of new communities by establishing towns and removing the indigenous inhabitants from undesirable districts; it co-operated with the educational service in constructing schools and awarding grants, prizes and scholarships for higher education; it assisted the public health service by constructing several hospitals and an extensive network of dispensaries in the most isolated areas of the island; it encouraged the development of family life by granting loans for marriage and for housing etc. Through experts, which it provided free of charge, it conducted inspections, made reports and carried out work assigned to rationalize and improve agriculture; it promoted, organized and directed agricultural co-operatives which enabled farmers to obtain the resources they needed for cultivating their farms and improving and marketing their crops, thus sparing them the disadvantages inherent in weak economies and relieving them of the need to resort to borrowing and renting arrangements. It gave land to the inhabitants of the island free of charge—two concessions, each of 2,000 hectares, were granted recently—and brought about the formation of collective farms in anticipation of population increases. As a result of all these policies, the indigenous inhabitants of the Province have been freed from the need to work for others.

149. I wish to enlarge upon this part of my statement in order to clear up a misapprehension on the part of the Liberian representative with regard to the existence of discrimination and the distinction made between the emancipated and the non-emancipated inhabitants. The system to which I have just referred performed a historical function and was abolished. The judicial organization and system, both in Fernando Póo and Río Muni, are now governed by the Act of 30 July 1959, which embodies the legal principle of equality and states, in article 2, that the judicial system, both civil and criminal, in the two Provinces shall be consistent with the directives laid down in the Fundamental Laws and the ordinary legislation valid throughout the national territory.

150. The labour system is governed mainly by two Ordinances: that of 3 December 1947 and that of 9 November 1953. Not only do these ordinances provide for a working day of no more than six hours and an adequate wage, but they also require business concerns to provide their workers with adequate housing, recreational and cultural facilities, medical assistance and medicaments etc., all without cost to the worker. A broad compulsory insurance scheme against labour accidents has been established. As we said earlier, however, there are very few indigenous inhabitants who wish to work for wages, largely because of the agricultural policy which has been carried out.

151. I should like to point out that there are 3,800 rural holdings owned by indigenous inhabitants in Fernando Póo and 3,500 in Río Muni. Town properties owned by indigenous inhabitants amount to 5,000 in Fernando Póo and 40,000 in Río Muni.

152. There has also been intensive activity in the matter of education. Elementary, primary, intermediate and higher education are provided in the island. Elementary education is in the hands of certificated teachers trained at the Santa Isabel Institute of Higher Education. Primary education is given by certificated teachers trained at the teacher-training schools in the Peninsula. I shall not go into details of the organization of the educational system in the island since it is the same as the system in Río Muni, which I have already described. I shall merely give some figures relating specifically to Fernando Póo.

153. In 1959 there were twenty-six elementary schools and six primary schools in Fernando Póo, or a total of thirty-two scholastic institutions. In the same year, 2,458 pupils were enrolled in the elementary schools, to which figure must be added the 219 pupils enrolled in 1959 in the three elementary schools in the island of Annobón. The total school enrolment in Fernando Póo was 2,909. In 1959 there were 185 pupils enrolled in the primary schools, 496 having sat for the primary school certificate, of whom 187 passed and 309 failed.

154. In the year 1959, there were twenty-nine State schools in the island, comprising twenty-three elementary schools and six primary schools. In Santa Isabel there is also an institute of higher education for training the future teachers and Government officials of the Province.

155. I should also mention that at Banapá there is a seminary with some forty pupils.

156. All these institutions I have mentioned have been established for the indigenous inhabitants.

157. I must not fail to mention, within the general educational picture of the island, the Santa Isabel Public Library which is run by an official of the professional association of archivists, librarians and archaeologists with the assistance of a large staff, some from the Peninsula and some indigenous. The Library serves every corner of the island through small travelling branches and the direct loan of books by post to persons requesting them.

158. Seven periodicals are published at Santa Isabel, all of them, with the exception of the newspaper Ebano, being monthly or fortnightly publications. There is also a broadcasting station at Santa Isabel which operates on a frequency of 7,160 kilocycles and broadcasts for seven hours a day.

159. The island's health service is administered jointly with that of Río Muni and for that reason I shall not describe it in detail but shall merely give some figures relating to the island.

160. At Santa Isabel there is a first-class hospital with 250 beds and at San Carlos a second-class hospital with 105 beds. In the Santa Isabel hospital 11,761 patients were cared for in 1956, 14,974 in 1957 and 16,077 in 1958. During the same years 6,605, 8,148 and 10,622 patients respectively were treated in the San Carlos Hospital. The Santa Isabel hospital carried out 112,751 blood tests in 1956, 120,122 in 1957 and 134,767 in 1958. In the San Carlos hospital 24,703 surgical operations were performed in 1956, 29,544 in 1957 and 40,083 in 1959; the corresponding figures for the Santa Isabel hospital for the same years were 1,754, 1,388 and 1,527. At Santa Isabel 1,982 children were treated in child-welfare clinics in 1956, 2,772 in 1957 and 1,576 in 1958.

161. There were 8,743 patients treated in dental clinics at Santa Isabel in 1956, 7,542 in 1957 and 3,437 in 1959.

162. The administration of justice is similar to that in Río Muni. In the year 1956, 2,152 persons were taken into custody, the greatest number of convictions being for offences against law and order (547); in 1957, 2,169 people were arrested, 668 of them for offences against law and order. In 1956 proceedings were instituted in the case of four minor offences and fourteen major offences. There were 456 civil suits in 1956 and 398 in 1957. There were 308 inmates in the Santa Isabel prison in 1956 and 264 in 1957.

163. I should like to point out to the Committee that all the social, insurance and labour legislation and the aggregate of laws and decrees on that vast subject apply to the Provinces of Fernando Póo and Río Muni. Moreover, the Act of 30 July 1959, to which I have already referred, reaffirms the application to the Provinces of Fernando Póo and Río Muni, in both the civil and the criminal field, of the provisions laid down in the Fundamental Laws and the ordinary legislation governing the Peninsula. It is expressly stated in article 2 that the laws, decrees, orders and other provisions, whether of a general or a particular character, will be automatically applied to Fernando Póo and Río Muni within twenty days of their publication in the Official Bulletin of the State.

164. It is also stated that the organization of the various administrative services will follow the general pattern of the other Spanish Provinces. It is recognized, furthermore, that the Provinces of Fernando Póo and Río Muni have, as we have seen, the same rights of representation in the Spanish Parliament and in other organs as have the other Spanish Provinces.

165. Similarly, the organization of the judiciary will be in line with the usual Spanish system.

166. Article 6 specifies that the labour system in force in the two Provinces will make provision for social insurance, co-operation and mutual aid and will put into effect the other principles set forth in the labour legislation.

167. The local and municipal financial system, too, will be governed by the rules laid down in the Peninsula.

168. In view of the foregoing considerations, and bearing in mind that these Provinces have no individual and distinct legislation differing from that of the other Spanish Provinces of the Peninsula, we have not mentioned them in our statement but have merely quoted some statistics relating to various aspects of these matters, without going into the organization and legislative enactments governing them.

SPANISH SAHARA

169. The Spanish Sahara Province covers an area of 280,000 square kilometres. It is bounded on the north by Morocco, on the east and south by Mauritania, except for a few kilometres in the east where it is bounded by Algeria, and on the west where it is bounded by the Atlantic ocean.

170. It has only 30,000 inhabitants and is consequently a semi-inhabited country, with a population density of only .2, that is to say, of little more than one inhabitant per ten square kilometres.

171. The Sahara Province is not an immense level plain as is generally believed but is frequently broken by high ground although this seldom exceeds 500 metres.

172. To all intents and purposes Spanish Sahara has no system of waterways. What rivers there are are dry beds through which water very seldom runs; they flow torrentially only at the time of the rains. Among these dried-up rivers the largest is the Saguia-el-Hamra which gives its name to the northern zone.

173. The climate in the Sahara, as its name suggests, is that of an arid country, the chief features of which are the dryness of the atmosphere and the lack of rainfall: the latter is usually sporadic and in most cases torrential. Towards the coast and the adjacent plains, precipitation may at times take the form of a drizzle like thick damp fog, while in the interior the rains are almost always in the nature of storms and as already indicated are of irregular occurrence. The wind, which nearly always blows with great violence, is another of the characteristic features of the climate. There is little variety in temperature throughout the year. The daily temperature curve is fairly accentuated on account of the great contrast between day and night temperatures; the mean temperature varies from 15.6 degrees in January to 20.8 in August and September; the annual average is 17.9 degrees.

174. Unlike the plains which in some countries are called steppes, in others tundra or paramos, and where there is a modicum of production, our desert is almost completely arid and therefore infertile, since no account can be taken of its few small graras where the indigenous inhabitants venture to sow a little barley—which they do not always succeed in harvesting—in selected plots of ground where they think that the earth retains a little humidity and which they duly protect with a circular fence of shrubs and bushes to shelter them from the terrible sirocco that burns up and destroys everything. Apart from these insignificant forms of cultivation, only a few talhas (thorny acacias) and sparse palm trees in small oases break the monotony of these landscapes, the chief feature of which is their immensity; over their vast expanse sand dunes or ergs, and wadis, (dry rivers) alternate with high stony tablelands, hammadas, and the opposite geographical feature constituted by large depressions or troughs caused by subsidences (sechjas).

175. According to the latest figures, the area under cultivation was only 567 hectares in 1957 and 573 hectares in 1958, the sole agricultural product of importance being barley which amounted in 1957 to 12,240 quintals and in 1958 to 12,100. A certain amount of maize and taqlit is grown although to a much smaller extent. The total area under forest is, according to recent figures, some 2,879 hectares. There are three official agricultural institutes where, with the help of irrigation, maize, alfalfa, barley, garden produce and forage are grown.

176. There is a fair amount of livestock, in spite of the scarcity of pasture which is found only in a few areas of this infertile and extensive country. In 1957, according to the latest figures, there were 50,832 camels, 49,510 goats and 23,400 sheep. There are also much smaller numbers of donkeys, zebu and horses. The quantity of livestock, especially of camels, goats and sheep, has increased remarkably since the year 1956; in the years 1954, 1955 and 1956 inclusively, there were barely 1,000 of each species.

177. A more promising source of wealth is the fishing industry as will be seen from the figures for the years 1957 and 1958. In 1957, 1,034,618 kilogrammes of fish were landed in Spanish Sahara ports representing a value of 4,090,924 pesetas; in the following year the figure increased to 2,202,786 kilogrammes valued at 6,647,295 pesetas.

178. In 1957, the total number of fishing boats based on the ports of the territory was 189, representing a total tonnage of 1,656.45; in 1958 it was 541 representing a total tonnage of 15,756.86. In view of the fact that any possibility of progress in agriculture, forestry and stock-raising has to be discounted, persistent efforts have been made to exploit fully and to develop these fishery resources, as can be seen from these figures.

179. Another potential source of wealth which has been methodically and perseveringly investigated is the sub-soil. Persistent research work has been carried out on it for more than five years, in the form of prospecting for oil and minerals. Borings are being made at present in Azech after the necessary geophysical research. In Agracha too the Department of Mines is carrying out geological studies and is drilling and making analyses in order to investigate the possibility of mining iron and phosphates.

180. In El Asium, Ville Cisneros, Auserd and other places intensive water conservation projects are being carried out, water has been brought to the surface, wells have been improved and new ones built. In this connexion the supply of drinking water has been increased in the urban centres and pipelines, storage tanks, etc. have been constructed. In the interior of the country, wells have been deepened, enlarged and modernized. Thanks to such projects, El Asium has grown into a modern and beautiful township with some 3,000 inhabitants in little more than ten years.

181. There is practically no industry and the only work that perhaps deserves note is that of craftsmen. The "mahareros" work in metals, mainly silver, and some of the objects which they make are genuine works of art: chests, bracelets, pendants, trays, etc. There is also a small industry producing salt-cured foods, canned fish and fish products, which although new is growing; in 1957 equipment to the value of 30 million pesetas was required and in 1958 it was valued at 42 million pesetas. A few electric power stations with an output of 266,000 kilowatts have also been constructed.

182. Commerce is also on a very small scale and is confined to imports of essential goods to meet the needs of the Territory. Exports are mainly restricted to dried fish, and in recent years there has been a small export trade in turya, a textile fibre lodged by the wind in the rocky bends of the Saguia-el-Hamra. Some figures can however be given for this small-scale commerce. In 1957 the value of imports was 19,133,858 pesetas and of exports 60,000 pesetas. In 1958 the value of imports was 35,145,189 pesetas and of exports 6,889,239 pesetas. The highest import figures are for foodstuffs, and fuel for the fishing fleet of the territory. The export figures relate almost entirely to fish and fish products, the next item on the list is livestock and livestock products.

183. Like everything else in the Territory, communications and transport are also limited but they have considerably improved both within the Province and with the outside world by the clearer marking of runways and the opening up of new runways and by enlarging the airport installations at El Asium and Villa Cisneros. Means of transport by land have also been improved. Work is being carried out to enlarge and improve the port of La Aguera, beginning with the construction of a wharf. Recently, work on the port of Villa Cisneros has also been markedly speeded up and the construction of a harbour is planned at Cabo Bojador. The postal and telegraphic services are being improved by the erection of new buildings and the provision of new equipment, etc., and there has been a remarkable increase in correspondence, telegrams, parcels and money orders.

184. In 1957 the number of passengers transported by sea was 2,518; in 1958 it was 3,985. The total amount of cargo was 10,027.05 tons in 1957 and 705,832 in 1958.

185. One thousand, three hundred and thirteen passengers entered the Territory by air in 1957 and 1,337 left. In 1958 figures were 4,316 passengers entering and 2,777 leaving the Territory.

186. In 1957 there were sixteen highways and roads and in 1958 nineteen, with an approximate total length of 6,000 kilometres. In 1957 there were seventy-six vehicles and in 1958 128.

187. In 1957 the budget for the Province amounted to 86,762,294.71 pesetas and in 1958 to 49,116,173.48 pesetas, the largest allocations being for administration, public works and health.

188. I now come to the most important part of my statement: how do these men live and how did they live in the past? They call themselves by the poetic name of "sons of the clouds" because they are constantly seeking for places where it has rained and where they can use the pasture produced by the rain. Nomadism in its various forms is a somewhat pronounced feature of the life of certain tribes of the Spanish Sahara. There are however three distinct regions, each with different forms of economic life and, to some extent, even of social life. Firstly, in the north, there is a nucleus of mountain Berbers, who tend to lead a settled life. Then there is a group of tribes who own houses and engage largely in agriculture but who migrate southwards at certain times of the year; these tribes may be described as partial nomads. From Saguia-el-Hamra to the south of the largest and most important area, the desert, the people are mainly nomads; their way of life is fundamentally, although not exclusively, pastoral.

189. Property and wealth are thought of essentially in terms of animals: ownership of land hardly exists in the Sahara. Wealth in cattle varies greatly between tribes and between families within the tribe. The typical humble family will have about five camels. A family of average wealth, neither very rich nor very poor, will have fifteen or twenty. It is common for rich people to own seventy camels, and sometimes, although very rarely, there are instances of persons owning 100, 200 and even 300.

190. The most clearly defined and most noticeable social unit is what is known as the jaima, consisting of all the people living within one household, i.e. a family of four or five persons. Jaimas are sometimes isolated in the immensity of the desert, but more often they are to be found in groups of five, six, nine, or even fifteen. Groups of jaimas sometimes form a large family, made up of a patriarch with his wives, children and grandchildren. Yet a community is not always based on the male line, since the basis of many groups living together is the kinship through women.

191. The larger social unit is known in Spanish as a cabila or tribe. The cabila is a social unit of varying composition, but possessing certain characteristics which enable it to be clearly defined. In the first place, each tribe has a real or supposed common ancestor—a saint or some outstanding figure of the past—from whom it takes its name and from whom all, or at least the nucleus, of its members claim to descend: In general, Moslem law of the Malikite school prevails in all north and west Africa; but within this general system of law, which is, as it were, a foundation, each tribe has established its customs, its customary law and its own traditions.

192. Within the tribe there are divisions known in Arabic as fajhed, and even sub-divisions, which play a most important part in daily life. Thus in each tribe there are various kinds of divisions, of greater or lesser importance.

193. All this can be understood if it is remembered that, because of the absence of fixed settlements and of the division of labour existing in other social systems, certain types of solidarity found in civilizations elsewhere cannot exist in the Sahara. In the desert each man must jealously defend his own position, and must know his exact place within his tribe and within his division of it. This is a fundamental matter for the nomad.

194. There are also certain tribes which form groups based on a common ancestor. Some tribes, for instance, believe that their members are all descended from the Prophet. These are the Chorfa, the religious aristocracy of Islam, who claim descent from Fatima. They include the Ergueibat and the Taubalet.

195. Apart from the Chorfa, there are some peoples who call themselves the "Arabs" or "men of the gun". These peoples, as their name suggests, are composed of what were once warrior tribes. Among them are the Tecna, who live in the north, near Aiun and around latitude 27° 40', which is the frontier line with Morocco, and the Aulad Delim, who number about 650 families.

196. A third group are the Zuaia. Just as the last group call themselves "men of the gun", these call themselves "the people of the books". Most of them are teachers, expounders of the Koran, jurists and in general persons who concern themselves with books on religion and law. Most of the Zuaia are in Mauritania, since the Chorfa have a practical monopoly of legal and religious culture in the Spanish Sahara. However, a certain number of families in our territory belong to the Zuaia.

197. Lastly, there is a fourth group known as the Znaga. These are usually fishermen on the coast or herdsmen. They are subordinate to the "Arabs" or "men of the gun", either because they were once weak and small in numbers or because they were subdued in a series of battles.

198. We have tried to define the main features of the social structure of the Territory. This structure becomes rather more complex if we take into account various other factors, such as the large number of so-called disciples, or ahel, i.e. those who wish to join certain groups; but to do so would make this statement too long.

199. But make no mistake about it: despite all these distinctions, charity is very highly developed in the Sahara. One of the most interesting institutions there is the meniha under which a wealthy man allows a poor man the use of some of his cattle. They also observe the rules of hospitality more than any other people. In general, these inhabitants of our Sahara show signs of great intelligence.

200. Several attempts had been made to persuade the people to lead a settled life. One of the most recent was at Aiun, on the left bank of the Saguia-el-Hamra, twenty kilometres from its mouth. The authorities first built a large well with a good water supply. At the same time, underground sources of water were tapped on both banks of the Saguia-el-Hamra and farming was started, both by official agencies, for experimental and educational purposes, and by indigenous inhabitants with agricultural knowledge, to whom plots of land were distributed. As a result, gardens and farm-houses surrounded by fruit trees sprang up in the desert. Later came streets and squares and all the services needed in a new town—drainage, fountains, schools, a School of Arts and Crafts, comfortable housing, etc. Lastly, a motor road was built between Aiun and the beach, where an anchorage was established for the steamships which from time to time unload their cargoes. The fishing industry along that coast furnishes abundant supplies for this new centre of population.

201. In the north of the country, another attempt at settlement has been made and has been named Tantán after the well there.

202. It will be clear from this brief social and human survey of the Spanish Sahara that it is hard to describe by means of statistical diagrams and figures. It is difficult to hold a census of a nomadic population, such as the majority of the people in this territory. However, thanks to the tenacity and perseverance of the authorities and the growing efforts at settlement just described, we can give some figures for 1957 and 1958.

203. We said at the beginning of our statement that there were 30,000 inhabitants, although the de jure population amounts to 19,235, of whom 1,710 are of Peninsular origin and 17,525 are indigenous.

204. The chief concern of the authorities has been the health and cultural welfare of the people.

205. There are twelve health establishments; these comprise two hospitals—at Aiun and Villa Cisneros—and four urban and six rural medical centres and dispensaries. These health establishments treated 13,439 patients in 1957 and 12,708 in 1958. There were altogether 54,429 treatments and consultations in 1957 and 50,830 in 1958. In an anti-tuberculosis campaign, 149 people were X-rayed in 1957 and 2,853 in 1958. According to the figures for 1958, there were forty-seven doctors and medical auxiliaries working in the hospitals and dispensaries.

206. In the 1956-57 school year there were nine schools with eleven teachers, and in 1957-58 eight schools with ten teachers. In 1956-57 these schools were attended by 327 boys and girls, both from the Peninsula and indigenous, of whom the greater proportion were naturally indigenous. In 1957-58, 337 boys and girls attended school.

207. Efforts have also been made to intensify official primary education for adults; 108 men attended classes in the 1957-58 school year. Twenty-four of these came from the Peninsula and eighty-four were indigenous.

208. According to the 1958 census, there are two libraries, which supplied 1,236 books to the public, which in that year numbered 788 persons.

209. It will be understood that in an essentially nomadic country, with few urban centres, labour questions are not very important. In the general part of my statement, I referred to the existing legislation on the matter, which makes no distinction between persons of Peninsula and indigenous origin. Here I shall only try to give a few figures. In 1957, 1,114 labour contracts were signed; in 1958 the figure was 1,148. Most of these related to the fishing industry or to domestic service, since in 1957 there were only fifteen commercial contracts and forty office contracts, while the figures for 1958 were 20 and 50. Wages vary greatly, according to the various kinds of employment; the highest wages are paid in the fishing industry. In addition to their regular wages, the workers, like all Spanish workers, enjoy the advantages of the Family Aid system.

210. Because of certain unusual features of the Spanish Province of the Sahara, such as the high percentage of nomadic population, the climate, religion, etc., which impose a special way of living on this province and its inhabitants, its organization and legal system have certain special characteristics although they are based on the Fundamental Laws of the Spanish nation. The various administrative services are run in the same way as in other Spanish Provinces, with changes appropriate to their special character. Like all other Spanish Provinces, the Province has the right to be represented in the Spanish Parliament and in other public bodies; and it has a representative provincial council, with the jurisdiction and powers conferred upon diputaciones by the Ley de Régimen Local (Local Government Act), adapted to the special features of this Province.

211. The Province is governed by a Governor-General who is responsible to the Central Government, and all authorities and officials temporarily or permanently serving in the province are subordinate to him. He is assisted by a General Secretary, who replaces him in case of absence or sickness, and who is the head of all services in the province except the judicial and military services.

212. The province is divided into municipalities administered by town councils, smaller local units and nomadic sections. This last institution is peculiar to the province; it was created because of the inhabitants' way of life, and is based on the system established by the rules of customary law.

213. The judicial organization is in conformity with the general Spanish system, while maintaining the characteristics of the province and the traditional Koranic law. The organization and ownership of property take into account the traditional communal land rights of all Moslem inhabitants.

214. With regard to the labour code of the province, subject to the special characteristics prevailing there, Spanish legislation provides for social insurance, co-operation and mutual aid and for the application of all other provisions of the Fundamental Laws.

215. Generally speaking, taxes and revenues go to the Treasury of the Provincial Administration and are used exclusively to meet the Province's needs, to promote its advancement and prosperity and to raise the level of living of its inhabitants. For this purpose, they are supplemented whenever necessary by subsidies from the general budget of the State.

216. Lastly, it is explicitly laid down in Spanish legislation that, in accordance with the Fundamental Laws, all inhabitants of the Province, without any distinction, shall have access to all educational establishments of every type.

217. I now come to the end of my statement. I think the information I have given will satisfy representatives. At the beginning of my statement, I said that we have nothing to hide. We have come voluntarily to give the true facts about our Provinces. We wish to co-operate with all of you. We were asked to give information and we did so, perhaps in excessive detail, but I trust that the Committee will appreciate our efforts. In particular, I wish to thank members for listening with such patient attention to this statement. To excuse myself, I can only add that I had not the time to speak more briefly.

Part Two

REPORT ON SOCIAL ADVANCEMENT IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

I. Introduction<sup>1</sup>

1. In 1952,<sup>2</sup> in 1955<sup>3</sup> and in 1958<sup>4</sup> the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories prepared special reports on social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The General Assembly by resolutions 643 (VII) of 10 December 1952, 929 (X) of 8 November 1955 and 1326 (XIII) of 12 December 1958, approved each of these reports and invited the Secretary-General to communicate them to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned. In 1960,<sup>5</sup> the Committee also included a survey of social conditions in its observations and conclusions on the report on Progress of the Non-Self-Governing Territories under the Charter.

2. In 1961, the Committee was again called upon to pay special attention to social conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in accordance with resolutions 333 (IV) of 2 December 1949 and 1332 (XIII) of 12 December 1958. It undertook this task on the basis of the information transmitted by Members responsible for the administration of the Territories. In addition to summaries of the information that had been transmitted by Administering Members relating to social conditions up to the end of 1959, or, in some cases, until mid-1960, the Committee had before it studies prepared by the Secretariat of the United Nations, the ILO, WHO, UNESCO and UNICEF. The present report should be read in conjunction with these studies, which are listed in the annex, together with the summary records of the Committee's discussions.

3. The Committee took into account the information on more recent developments in specific social fields contained in the reports prepared by the Secretariat and the specialized agencies, as well as the supplementary information given in the statements made during the debate by the representatives of the Administering Members. This information was considered by the Committee in the light of Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations. In the examination of the information and in the debate, the Committee was guided by the views recorded in its 1952, 1955, 1958 and 1960 reports and, in particular, by the principal aims of social policy which were set out in its reports to the General Assembly in 1955<sup>6</sup> and 1958.<sup>7</sup>

4. In the preparation of the report, the Committee has kept in mind the principles set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960 entitled "Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples"; in particular, the principle that inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness of the people of the Territories should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence. The Committee has also been mindful of the paragraph in the aforementioned resolution stressing the principles of equal rights and self-determination of all peoples and of universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.

5. The Committee reaffirms its broad concept of social development adopted in 1955. As it has stated elsewhere, social development is nothing less than the whole process of economic, social and political change and cultural advancement in a Territory considered in terms of the progressive well-being of society and of the individual.<sup>8</sup> The Committee reiterates that social development should not be regarded merely as the sum of developmental activities carried out within these fields. The emphasis should be on a common approach to development as a whole and on the co-ordination of services for economic, social and educational development.

6. The Committee recalled the views expressed in its 1955 and 1958 reports that sustained progress can best be achieved through the attainment by the peoples of the Territories of a full share in the formulation of policies and in the planning and implementation of programmes of development. For this reason, it is essential to encourage leadership and to seek the collaboration of the leaders and the support of the people in the formulation of policies and the execution of programmes. The Committee notes that the trend towards this participation is noticeable in some Territories, that attention is generally being paid to the need for filling higher posts in the administration of social services with indigenous personnel, and that community development and similar

<sup>1</sup> The draft of the present report was prepared by a sub-committee of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories composed of the representatives of Argentina, Ceylon, Liberia, the Netherlands, New Zealand and the United Kingdom.

The members of the delegations who served on the sub-committee were Argentina: Dr. Enrique Jorge Kos; Ceylon: Mr. H. O. Wijegoonawardena; Liberia: Miss Angie Brooks; Netherlands: Mr. L. J. The Chairman of the sub-committee was Mr. P. K. Edmonds (New Zealand).

The Rapporteur of the Committee and the representatives of the ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO also participated in the debates of the sub-committee.

programmes provide opportunities for popular participation in social advancement.

7. Data contained in the documentation and the additional information supplied by the representatives of the Administering Members illustrated the developments which took place during the years under review in the social field. As in 1958, it was observed that although basic social conditions had not significantly changed, the expansion of various public services, and the increasing participation of inhabitants in the administration of these services and in the programmes and activities concerned with their welfare were indications of the advancement achieved by the Governments and peoples of the Territories. Information concerning changes in levels of living, which formed a separate sub-item on the agenda of the Committee, has been included in the relevant sections of this report and in the sections on economic and educational development.

8. It will be recalled that by resolutions 933 (X) of 8 November 1955 and 1332 (XIII) of 12 December 1958, the General Assembly reiterated its invitation to Members to attach to their delegations persons specially qualified in the functional fields within the Committee's purview. In 1961, it had the advantage of the presence of special advisers in the delegations of Australia, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. The Committee appreciates the contribution made by these advisers to its work. By these two resolutions and by resolution 1466 (XIV) of 12 December 1959, the General Assembly also repeated the invitation, contained in resolution 744 (VIII) of 27 November 1953, to the Administering Members to attach to their delegations indigenous persons specially qualified to speak on economic, social and educational policies in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Only the United States delegation included such a person in 1961, and it is hoped that other Administering Members will follow a similar course in the future.

II. Aspects of rural development

INTRODUCTION

9. Although there is need to encourage the indigenous population to participate more actively in the production of cash crops in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the transition from a subsistence to a modern cash economy in some cases has been rapid but, generally speaking, has not been accompanied by the growth of new social institutions at an equal pace. In other cases there has been economic stagnation due to the slowness of peasant groups to take advantage of the new economic system and to the resistance to change generated by their attachment to traditional values and institutions. Where levels of living are low, economic advancement is one of the first necessities of a successful social policy. However, the policies to be followed will have to strike a balance between social and economic development. Economic development should not be pursued as an end in itself but as an integral part of a broad action engaging all areas of advancement. Economic progress should be fostered through the fullest use of the traditional organization. The successful evolution of a society in transition depends not only on economic change but also on the guidance and leadership provided by Governments and representatives of the people. One of the immediate tasks of social policy, therefore, is the promotion and training of local leadership on as wide a scale as possible. Balanced economic and social growth must also be sought by fostering the rapid expansion of the co-operative movement, community development and adult education for both men and women.

10. The majority of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories are rural peoples many of whom are primarily dependent on subsistence agriculture. In many Territories, agricultural resources are limited and the traditional farming techniques primitive and wasteful with a consequent disproportion between efforts and result. Few farmers are able to save from their limited cash income. In some Territories, the problems of the rural inhabitants are made more acute by physical and environmental factors and by the pressure of increasing population on the available land. Fallow periods are reduced owing to population pressure and the soil is depleted by failure to introduce or adopt fertilization or manuring practices and the rotation of crops. Thus the low levels of living prevailing in many Territories have their roots in the low productivity of land and labour. Higher levels of individual productivity and better facilities for marketing must be attained, if the level of food consumption and the income available to the rural inhabitants are to be raised.

11. It is now widely recognized that rural stagnation will impede the social and economic advancement of the Territories and that co-ordinated economic, social and educational measures are required if farmers are to make a more substantial contribution to the growth of the economies and the development of the societies of the Territories. Rural development depends to a large extent on the improvement of existing farming methods and practices. This requires action by Governments to promote knowledge and skills among small farmers as well as the adoption of improved tools, better land utilization, the use of better quality seeds, greater use of fertilizers, prevention of soil erosion and improved water control. It has been pointed out by the ILO and other authorities that under proper guidance much of this can be done by the farmers themselves without much capital outlay. Some measure of adjustment in the agrarian structure may also be required through comprehensive programmes embracing some redistribution of ownership of land, consolidation of holdings and land settlement schemes.

12. An approach based solely on technical measures runs the risk of not gaining acceptance because of the difficult processes of social adjustment which accompany it. The main problem is to convince the people that beneficial changes are possible and to encourage their initiative and drive. The Committee, therefore, attaches great importance to the co-ordinated use of economic and social techniques in programmes of rural development. An example of such an approach is the Jamaica Farm Development Scheme which, by combining the efforts of several technical and social agencies, provides a balanced programme of rural betterment based on improved standards of production and family living and on detailed knowledge of the social and economic potential of the farmer and his family and of the land.

13. In the effort to spread knowledge of better agricultural methods leading to an improvement in the standard of living of the rural population and to improve social conditions, the role of education is of prime importance. For long-range results it is necessary gradually to increase educational facilities in the countryside, with a view eventually to placing all children in school. While progress has been achieved in this sector, it remains true that, with a few exceptions, the further one penetrates in rural districts the fewer are the facilities for education. Another measure might also be the introduction of some practical gardening or farming in the upper classes of the primary schools or in post-primary classes. For more immediate results for improving farming practices among the adult population, campaigns of fundamental education and the development of agricultural extension, which is a form of practical adult education in rural areas, are methods which have often proved successful. The value of such organizations as young farmers' clubs and 4-H clubs is also widely recognized.

14. In Nyasaland, Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland a large part of the active male population migrates to centres of employment outside the Territory, leaving women, children and older persons to carry out subsistence farming. In other Territories, a large part of the wage-earning population works in urban areas and on estates within the Territory for limited periods. While the earnings of migrants may, to some degree, increase rural incomes, there is very little possibility, under these conditions, of improving farming methods and of increasing incomes through the cultivation of cash crops. The movement of rural dwellers to centres of employment is the result of a combination of factors among which low levels of income in rural areas, overpopulation, the seasonal lag in subsistence farming and the attractiveness of wage-paid employment and urban life are perhaps the most significant. This is often a two-way movement because of the ultimate security of the rural social system and the lack of incentives for settlement in the town in wage-paid labour. With the improvement of conditions of life and work in rural areas, the movement of persons to the towns would be diminished and would therefore be more in conformity with actual employment opportunities and the existence of satisfactory urban living conditions. If rural development is accompanied by the expansion of industry and a balanced over-all growth is achieved, it will probably be sustained by the increased demand for agricultural products from the rural population itself and from an increased urban population enjoying a better standard of living.

15. The ILO has noted that handicrafts and small-scale industries are important potential sources of additional employment in rural areas and that, given proper guidance and assistance, they can make a significant contribution to economic development by producing employment supplementing agricultural income, utilizing such capital as is available, and providing experience in management and the acquisition of trade skills. The further development of fishing—in particular, the building and operation of fish ponds—is highly important both as a source of additional income and as a means of supplementing and improving diets. Such activities require co-ordinated support in the form of training, technical advice, marketing services and credit facilities.

LAND TENURE, LAND UTILIZATION AND RESETTLEMENT SCHEMES

16. Indigenous systems of land tenure, which had been designed to fulfil the needs of traditional life, are often becoming unsuitable for coping with the problems created by limited arable and pastoral land and growing populations. Although in many Territories family and group ownership of land remains prevalent and shows a high degree of flexibility and adaptability under varied conditions, nevertheless, cash crops, increasing populations and the impact of individualistic patterns of social and economic behaviour tend to hasten the replacement of the old system by individual titles to land. However, it cannot be assumed that, under pressure of modern economic forces, a satisfactory land tenure system will evolve by itself.

17. One of the drawbacks of systems of group ownership is that land is generally not negotiable and there is not much incentive for the individual to improve farming methods or to undertake capital development. Without legal security of tenure it is difficult to obtain loans for land improvement or the purchase of capital equipment. On the other hand, communal land tenure offers certain social advantages. It is a strong force knitting together a community, giving the individual farmer not only a personal and family stake in the land but also a recognized position in society. Therefore, it may be in the interest of a community to maintain the communal land tenure system purely for its social value, while at the same time developing appropriate forms of individual land utilization.

18. The Committee considers that where changed economic and social conditions justify such action and the community is receptive, steps should be taken to encourage individual land holding with security of tenure in order that the farmer may invest his labour and profits in the development of his farm and be able to offer it as security against the financial credits he may require for developing his land. The system of land tenure should be adjusted to provide sufficient land to give the farmer and his family a satisfactory level of living. The Committee notes that such policies have been put into effect in some Territories, through programmes of land consolidation and resettlement, and recommends that similar policies be followed in all Territories.

19. The Committee notes that in many areas of the African Territories undeveloped land is no longer available for the expansion of the indigenous system of farming and that, in consequence, the number of landless persons has increased and individual holdings have not infrequently been subdivided into sub-economic units. Where soils are poor, intensive cultivation has led to their rapid exhaustion and erosion. In some Territories, the problem of land scarcity has been aggravated by land alienation to Europeans which in most cases occurred during earlier periods of their history. Some members expressed the view that the problem of land scarcity had been further aggravated in certain Territories by the utilization of land for military bases. In some areas, drought and pests, such as the tse-tse fly, are factors which seriously limit the amount of land suitable for farming.

20. The solution of the problem of land scarcity has been sought, in part, through programmes for the more effective utilization of land and schemes for the resettlement of farmers living in overpopulated areas. The five-year land use and land management scheme introduced in Jamaica, where population density is high and soils are relatively poor, had as its objective the development by 1960 of over one-third of the Territory's farm land in strict accordance with correct land use as indicated by soil type, slope and liability of soil to erosion. In Northern Rhodesia, where the movement of indigenous persons into reserves in past years resulted in maldistribution and congestion, an extensive programme of resettlement on unalienated Crown land was initiated in 1942. Despite these efforts, it has not yet been possible to restore a complete population-land balance. In Kenya, resettlement schemes linked with efforts to recondition the land were initiated in 1946. Although unoccupied land naturally suited to settlement was scarce, several thousand families had been resettled by 1959. Substantial progress has been made in some parts of Kenya in effecting the consolidation of fragmented individual holdings which sometimes include as many as thirty different pieces of land scattered over an area of several square miles. In Nyasaland, where the average size of family holdings varies from as little as one or two acres to a maximum of fifteen acres, it is recognized that an extensive programme of land reorganization based on sound land use is urgently needed. A number of schemes have been undertaken in the heavily populated Central and Southern Provinces, and the Committee was informed that where there had been consolidation of holdings, adoption of crop rotation and proper land usage a marked increase in productivity had resulted. In connexion with the Shire Valley Scheme, a major irrigation project, steps are being taken to seek the most efficient use of agricultural land. In British Guiana, where there is much pressure on the land and many farms are too small to provide full employment and maximum productivity, land reclamation and resettlement have been undertaken in the coastal areas. It has, however, been difficult to establish settlements on a self-supporting basis owing to the high cost of long-term drainage and irrigation projects.

BETTER FARMING

21. As has been pointed out above, there is much room for the improvement of farming methods and practices, and the application of more suitable techniques, even on a modest scale, could bring about a substantial increase in farm production and labour productivity. Measures to improve soil fertility, to prevent damage caused to the land by certain natural forces, or by man, and improved tools and planting and cultivation methods are relatively simple and not costly means of raising farming standards, provided they are properly explained to the farmer. This process of education is sometimes lengthy and calls for a considerable measure of skill and patience. Extension services and community development can play an important role in accelerating the pace of rural development.

22. Steps have been taken in many Territories to raise standards of indigenous farming. The information before the Committee reveals that while all Governments are aware of the need for such development, the scope and intensity of programmes varies considerably among the Territories. In the East African Territories, the programmes of land consolidation and of development of indigenous agriculture have created a vast demand for farm planning and instructional services; hence a major part of the time of field staff is devoted to extension work directed towards the improvement of farming methods, the restoration of soil fertility, soil conservation and the increase of income from cash crops. In Kenya, extension staff number over 200 European officers and approximately 2,000 African instructors and other personnel. The need for more indigenous agricultural instructors has made it necessary to expand and improve training courses in Kenya and Uganda.

23. In Northern Rhodesia, extension programmes are mainly centred around the African Farming Improvement and Peasant Farming Schemes which are designed to encourage better farming methods and more stabilized forms of indigenous farming through loans, bonuses, soil conservation and water development. In Nyasaland, extension services have, in the past, tended to be thinly dispersed over the mass of the population in order to effect simple general improvements. More recently, the policy has been to concentrate on comparatively limited objectives with more responsive individuals and communities, where tangible results can be expected within a reasonable period of time. The Committee was informed that there had been steady progress in improving the general level of indigenous agriculture and the reorganization of village lands on a consolidated pattern to facilitate better land use.

24. In Basutoland, where there is pressure of population on the land, the small family farm holdings require more intensive cultivation if they are to produce an adequate income. A recent economic survey mission considered that yields well above present levels were attainable, and that a comprehensive programme of research and experiment and greatly expanded programmes of agricultural education and extension were required. The same mission stated that there was need to expand extension services among the pastoralists in Bechuanaland to cope with the problem of deteriorating assets in water, pasture and herds, and to stress livestock improvement. It noted that the sociological and economic aspects were particularly important, more so than the purely technical aspects, in the immediate future, and suggested that the District Administration be expanded to explain and execute government policy. It was also pointed out that, largely due to the limited staff, the number of farmers brought into the extension programme each year was fewer than 150.

25. The vital role of adequate extension services has been recognized in the Caribbean Territories. In Jamaica, under the Farm Development Scheme, many farmers follow plans drawn up by them with the technical assistance of government extension officers. Extension staff also check and direct the work done under the Scheme. In British Guiana, the extension system has been expanded in recent years and staff play an important role in all aspects of rural betterment. Extension services also function in the small Territories. In the Asian Territories, the demonstration of new techniques and the dissemination of agricultural information play an increasingly important part in schemes for agricultural development. In 1958, it was decided to establish an extension service in Sarawak and over forty posts were created for this purpose. In the Pacific Territories, training, guidance and encouragement are provided to indigenous farmers in the improvement of farming techniques and soil conservation. Services to farmers in Guam are extensive. In Papua, over 200 trained indigenous assistants are engaged in extension work and more than 3,000 farmers have passed through training courses at agricultural extension stations.

CO-OPERATIVES AND RURAL CREDIT

26. Co-operative and credit facilities are important elements in rural development and most Governments have sponsored and aided rural co-operative action. The information before the Committee shows that the development of co-operative societies has been rapid in some Territories, gradual in others, and is making a modest start in still others. In some Territories, the co-operative movement has developed spontaneously but government policy and leadership have usually been decisive factors. A sound legislative and administrative framework, together with adequate guidance and supervision, have, as a rule, been essential to the development and expansion of co-operatives.

27. Co-operative development in East Africa has been rapid since the Second World War, notably in the form of produce marketing societies. A significant percentage of the total population of Kenya and Uganda are members of co-operative societies and a sizable share of produce is marketed through producers' associations. With government assistance, co-operative societies have acquired or leased a number of cotton ginneries and coffee curing factories, thus participating in the processing of local produce which heretofore had been exclusively in the hands of non-indigenous persons. Most of the producers' co-operatives perform limited thrift and credit functions and this would appear to be one of the factors accounting for the absence of co-operative credit societies in East Africa. In Northern Rhodesia, marketing societies have become firmly established in recent years but facilities for agricultural credit to indigenous farmers are still in an early stage of development. The situation in Basutoland appears to be very similar; marketing societies have made good progress without a comparable development of agricultural credit facilities. In Nyasaland, the growth of the co-operative movement has been more gradual and indigenous farmers have had to rely mainly on loans made by the African Loans Board which in the first two years since operations commenced numbered only 268. There are no co-operatives in Bechuanaland and only two in Swaziland.

28. In the Caribbean Territories, notably Jamaica and British Guiana, the co-operative movement has made considerable headway. Societies have increased in number, membership and turnover and have been successfully established in such diverse fields as marketing, transport, tillage, cattle insurance, farming, land lease and purchases, irrigation and fisheries. The development of thrift and credit societies has been particularly rapid.

29. Among Asian Territories, there are no co-operatives in Brunei and only one in North Borneo. They have shown a sustained development in Sarawak, however, and in Hong Kong, although the dimensions of the rural co-operative movement are limited by the over-all economic structure, co-operative development has been rapid and the movement has spread into many agricultural production sectors, in addition to trade and marketing. In the Pacific Territories, co-operatives have increased appreciably in number, membership and commercial activities. Numerically predominant are dual-purpose societies which market the major cash crops and supply their members with consumer goods of all kinds. In some instances, they have been able to extend their activity into many sectors of economic life.

30. The Committee notes the existence of other forms of co-operation in rural areas, such as fishermen's societies and handicraft societies.

31. Secondary societies or co-operative unions exist in many of the Territories and there are a few co-operative banks. Most of the agricultural co-operative unions and federations concern themselves with such simple undertakings of common interest as the purchase of transportation facilities, production implements and machinery, and negotiations with government authorities. In a few cases, their activities have been further extended as, for example, in East Africa, where they have entered the early phases of industrial production by processing agricultural produce such as cotton and coffee.

32. Experience in the Territories has indicated that certain problems of an administrative and organizational nature may hinder the development or lessen the effectiveness of societies, if not jeopardize their existence. Lack of a complete mastery of business practices and co-operative principles has sometimes led to inappropriate investment. Unusually high prices for primary products have sometimes tended to generate over-optimism. Close supervision by co-operative officers is helpful in preventing such misadventures but experience has shown that this is not always effective. Some societies, in providing loans against inadequate security and by making sales on credit, have experienced serious difficulty. Bookkeeping and auditing are complex matters which staff have tried to master in a short period of time. While Governments have provided much assistance, it is essential that even greater efforts be made to train co-operative office-holders and to guide the further development of co-operatives in the light of local needs.

33. The Committee considers that in many Territories there are further possibilities for co-operative action in relation to activities such as irrigation and co-operative farming to the extent, at least, of organizing the central co-operative supply of agricultural machinery and services for the cultivation of individual holdings. The further strengthening of co-operative action among handicrafts and small industries is also required.

34. The Committee feels that further efforts are needed for initiating and fostering the growth of co-operative credit societies and of central co-operative banks in a number of Territories. The ILO has suggested that in African Territories the question of credit facilities should be further examined so as to create a rational system of co-operative credit based on adequate links between state sources of finance and credit and the co-operative movement. It has also suggested that not all the needs for agricultural credit can be met by co-operative credit and ordinary commercial banks and that specialized agricultural banks and agricultural development and finance corporations may be required.

ENVIRONMENTAL SANITATION AND SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

35. In virtually all Territories there is need for the improvement of rural housing, water supplies and sanitation. In general, rural housing has received little attention in many Territories. In the East African Territories, local authorities are taking increased responsibility for housing standards and some have already passed by-laws to control standards. In Northern Rhodesia the first step has been taken to assist Africans towards better housing standards with the establishment of a small revolving fund from which loans are made. The representative of Liberia expressed the hope that loans would be made available by Governments to construct substantial and sanitary housing.

36. In the Caribbean Territories, efforts have been made in recent years to improve rural housing. Jamaica is devoting a major part of its housing activities under the Development Plan to rural housing. In Trinidad, an aided-self-help housing scheme is being implemented both in rural and semi-urban areas. In Barbados, loans are made to encourage further settlement in the rural areas. The two principal sources of finance for rural housing in the United Kingdom Caribbean Territories are the Colonial Development and Welfare funds and the Sugar Industry Labour Welfare funds. Loans, subsidies and outright grants are provided from these funds and aided-self-help schemes are perhaps making more progress in the Caribbean Territories than elsewhere. The Committee, while recognizing the progress which has been made in a number of Territories in the improvement of rural housing, is of the opinion that the magnitude of the problem requires the implementation of territory-wide programmes which would make the fullest use of information, educational and technical resources.

37. Although rural water development has been intensified in recent years, the problem of adequate supplies remains acute in many Territories in terms both of availability and quality. In some African Territories very little has been accomplished by way of improving supplies, while in others substantial progress has been made in protecting springs and wells and constructing dams, storage tanks, shallow wells and boreholes. In the larger Caribbean Territories the Governments recognize the need to relieve the local authorities of heavy capital expenditures on the development and distribution of new water supplies, and provision is made for such schemes within development programmes. In many Territories where unprotected wells and springs and polluted rivers and streams are often the main sources of water, low standards of sanitation exact a high toll in intestinal diseases.

38. It is widely recognized that much can be done at the village level to improve housing, water supplies and sanitation. Health authorities should take the necessary initiative to make such improvement. Community development, combining self-help with technical and other services provided by public authorities, has much to contribute to the betterment of conditions and improvement of living standards. Women's organizations and other forms of adult education play an important part in stimulating community action and in raising standards in the home. The Committee was informed of schemes whereby communities were directing their efforts towards the improvement of housing and environmental hygiene in Kenya, Uganda, Jamaica, British Guiana, Trinidad and Tobago, and Singapore. The Committee considers that much more might be done along these lines and its views on this subject are set forth in greater detail in the section of this report dealing with community development.

III. Community development

39. At its 1955, 1958 and 1960 sessions, the Committee examined in detail the principles, methods and scope of community development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, emphasizing the important part it could play in economic, social and political advancement. In its report on progress in the Territories, adopted at its 1960 session, the Committee observed that the concept of community development had found wide international acceptance as the process by which the efforts of the people themselves, together with governmental assistance, may be directed towards the improvement of the economic, social and cultural conditions of the communities. It recognized the importance of measures to develop local initiative to build a self-reliant community. Community development also had an important part to play in counteracting the disintegration, often brought about by economic change, of traditional social organization and values and at the same time in helping frequently dissimilar groups to achieve a sense of community. It was not a substitute for the expansion of government services but depended on the co-ordination of both governmental and popular effort in a manner that helped to guide and give form to popular initiative.

40. The Committee had before it information on the programmes in operation in many Territories and on some of the problems which had been encountered in their execution.<sup>9</sup> While it cannot yet be said that, on the whole, programmes in the larger Territories are being carried out intensively on a country-wide basis, the Committee notes that in some Territories programmes have been intensified and expanded in recent years to the extent that, directly or indirectly, they are now benefiting a substantial part of the population. In Kenya, for example, fifty-six government and 500 local authority community development officers are serving 4.5 million of a total population of 5.5 million in the promotion of self-help schemes through voluntary group work and with informal education through rural betterment schemes, women's groups, youth clubs and recreational activities. In Jamaica, a co-ordinated programme of welfare, agricultural extension, and co-operation is reaching one third of the population. In other Territories, such as Nyasaland and most of the smaller Caribbean Territories, community development programmes are being carried out on a limited scale and are generally confined to activities centering around community centres, women's activities and youth clubs.

41. While centrally controlled country-wide programmes are not numerous, the Committee notes that there is a trend towards such development in some Territories where the co-ordination of planning on a country-wide basis is being introduced. The emphasis and scope of programmes vary. In Territories under United Kingdom administration the objective is a well-rounded programme for promoting local initiative in collaboration with village community councils, Native authorities and voluntary associations. In addition to self-help projects, there is emphasis on women's activities, youth clubs and community centres.

42. The lack of success of comprehensive pilot projects in Fiji, Papua and Netherlands New Guinea, which was noted by the Committee in 1960, is attributed to the complexity of the schemes which confronted small communities with a bewildering multitude of new elements and changes. This experience has led in Netherlands New Guinea to the placing of emphasis on the economic aspect, especially agriculture, as a basis for development in other fields. In one centre, selected families are given one-year residential courses in farming, animal husbandry, hygiene, nutrition and home economics. In Papua, the administrative and technical services seek to promote better standards of living by the introduction of new food crops and improvement in diet, the teaching of hygiene and sanitation and the prevention, treatment and control of disease. In the field of adult education, emphasis is placed on a programme to further the education and status of women.

43. In many Territories encouragement is given to women's activities. Women's committees and similar organizations can do much to inspire the traditional society with those social and psychological incentives which are often lacking. They can play a most important part in breaking down old barriers and can exercise a profound and far-reaching influence through their demands for better health, education and economic conditions both for the family and for the community. The Committee hopes that such activities will be intensified in those Territories where they are in an early stage of development.

44. Among the ingredients for community development, one of the most important is the vital role of the local leaders and the workers whose personality, training and qualities of leadership often determine the success of a project. Emphasis was placed during the period under review on the selection and training of community development staff at all levels and on the question of the inadequate financing of community development. Permanent training centres now exist in many Territories where programmes are being undertaken. The Committee notes that there is particular need for trained personnel responsible for planning programmes, formulating policy, and supervising and training in the field. Such training is now being offered at the University College of The West Indies and at the Oppenheimer College of Northern Rhodesia, as well as at institutions in the United Kingdom, but there is still great need for additional training facilities at all levels in the Territories. The shortage of funds for scholarships for this purpose, which would permit overseas training on a more advanced level, is also a factor which limits the expansion of community development programmes.

45. The Committee was informed that one of the obstacles to the more rapid spread of community development has been the lack of sufficient funds. Governments have to budget within their means and according to the order of priorities as between different services. In some Territories under United Kingdom administration, higher education and particularly secondary education are absorbing a large share of funds allocated to social services. In many Territories, expenditure of Governments on community development is inadequate. While it is recognized that central government expenditure is often augmented by local government funds, it seems to the Committee that expenditure, which in some cases is less than 1 per cent of territorial budgets, is too low. The Committee hopes that steps will be taken so that the programmes do not suffer unduly for lack of adequate financial support.

46. The Committee notes that increasing attention is being devoted by a number of United Nations organs and specialized agencies to the applicability of community development to urban areas. It is recognized that the collective effort and initiative of local people is important in helping to meet problems of urban development and that such local popular action should receive government support. The Committee hopes that the study of the applicability of community development techniques to urban areas, which has been initiated by ECA, will be extended to include some of the African Non-Self-Governing Territories. Also noteworthy is the growing interest in the economic aspects of community development programmes and the general recognition of the need for maintaining a balance between the economic and social aspects of community development.

47. At its 1960 session, the Committee observed that there was no statistical information or other material evidence in the Progress Report to show that extensive community development plans had been successfully implemented in the Territories and stated that it would be desirable to undertake, at an appropriate time, a project-by-project study of community development efforts in as many Territories as possible in order to evaluate properly the extent of physical achievements. Divergent views were expressed in the Committee at its 1961 session on the possibility of evaluating such programmes. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that experience in Territories under its administration had revealed that it was extremely difficult to evaluate community development. Its success could not be measured by adding up the material projects completed since, in addition to these, the objective was the creation of stable, self-reliant communities having an assured sense of social and political responsibilities. It was unlikely that community development could be initiated and make effective progress as a nation-wide movement. To be successful it should grow from the communities and people themselves. Thus, it might have to begin in areas where the people were able and willing to co-operate and then be allowed to spread and proliferate. It therefore could not be fitted neatly into a phased economic development plan. While every Government with any considerable community development programme had stated that it was quite impossible to evaluate community development in terms of the direct economic progress achieved, many were able to state, despite the lack of statistical data, that the general levels of living in those areas with community development programmes had been consistently raised and the degree of social and political responsibility strengthened. In the view of the United Kingdom delegation, the need at the present stage is for case studies of community development projects in order to determine the factors contributing to their success or failure.

48. The representative of India considered that while the object of community development was not limited to economic projects, there should be some tangible evidence by which to assess the success or failure of any movement. The Committee had stressed this point in 1960 and had stated, at its 1958 session, that the practice of community development required frequent re-appraisals in the light of the large body of experience that had been gained. The representative of India was convinced that the success of the movement depended considerably on the physical achievements which alone could give the necessary incentive and encouragement to the peoples and the communities to participate in this movement. Moreover, he was of the view that community development could be embodied within territorial development plans without imposing programmes on communities.

49. The Committee notes that, despite the difficulties inherent in any attempt to evaluate programmes of community development, there is a growing trend among authorities in this field to undertake objective evaluation of at least the more measurable aspects of national programmes. In Uganda, for example, a statistical return of activities has recently been required of each district at quarterly intervals and some analyses have been made of expenditure on village projects. The Committee notes also that in the study on community development in Uganda, prepared for ECA, it is suggested that the absence of records, surveys and assessments tends to weaken the position of community development. It is of interest to note, also, that UNESCO aims at assisting local-level workers to record and report their own effectiveness in helping villagers to change their attitudes and that the assistance of the United Nations has been sought by one Member State to evaluate the effectiveness of its national programmes and policies.

50. In view of a number of considerations, i.e., the relatively short period of time during which community development programmes have been operative, the varying content of these, the relatively high degree of autonomy of local projects and their differing rates of development, the multiplicity of public and voluntary agencies participating in country-wide programmes, and the lack of adequate statistical services, it is understandable that it has been difficult to undertake systematic evaluations of programmes in the Territories. The Committee believes, however, that with further integration and co-ordination of country-wide programmes and the development of more suitable methods of assessing a wide variety of projects, it should be possible in the very near future systematically to evaluate key aspects of national programmes. The Committee considers that the territorial Governments will soon find it necessary to do so in order to have more objective grounds for determining the share which community development is to receive within territorial budgets.

51. The Committee commends the Governments of the Territories for the steps taken to foster community development, in particular the effective measures taken for the training of qualified personnel. It considers, none the less, that the levels of living in many rural areas require the rapid expansion of programmes of environmental hygiene and self-help housing. The Committee believes that the acceleration of these programmes is now possible in view of the increased public interest and support which have been gained through the expanding adult education programmes in a number of Territories.

IV. Aspects of urban development

INTRODUCTION

52. The speed of urbanization in the Non-Self-Governing Territories can be illustrated by the fact that in the past fifty years the town population in Africa as a whole has increased over seven times, and it may be assumed that this figure is also indicative of the degree of urban expansion which has taken place in the Non-Self-Governing Territories of that continent. This is due mainly to the rapid development of commercial and industrial enterprise, largely initiated from outside the Territory, and the need to establish centres of administration. The populations of these towns grew rapidly and in recent years the almost universal change to a cash economy attracted many people to town life to earn money with which to supplement the often meagre returns from their land in the rural areas. The majority of workers in the towns are casual labourers with a limited but growing number of semi-skilled workers and trained artisans.

53. A distinctive feature of urbanization in the Eastern, Central and Southern African Territories is the flow of migrants as casual labourers to and from the towns. Urban and peri-urban areas thus include large floating populations with comparatively low and insecure incomes, special social and health problems, little technical skill and education and few prospects in an urban setting for material or social advancement. This situation, together with the absence, in many areas, of a tradition of urban life, of an adequately developed foundation for common services and of an effective administrative structure, has given rise to serious problems which require vigorous action if they are not to become even more acute.

54. An important problem associated with rapid urbanization is the lack of adequate community facilities and public and social services. Generally, the rapid growth of towns has outpaced orderly planning and, largely because of costs, no provision has been made, on the scale required, for preventive and curative medical and health services, roads and street lighting, water supplies, sewerage, transportation, adequate schools and libraries, welfare services and recreational facilities, all of which are essential to satisfactory standards of urban living.

55. Peri-urban areas are, in general, densely inhabited by persons dependent on the urban economy and present a special problem in terms of planning and the provision of services. Residents all too often live in insanitary and squalid conditions and, since these areas lie outside the town boundaries, even minimally adequate planning and services are often lacking. Thus, where these conditions exist, one of the main problems confronting authorities is the control of development on the periphery of towns and, in particular, the prevention of further ribbon development along the trunk roads. The Committee notes that in some instances a first step has been taken towards more effective planning either by extending town boundaries to include such areas or by constituting them as separate local authorities. It is recognized that the complexity of land tenure has, in some cases, hindered the solution of the problems presented by these areas.

56. Many of the towns in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, as elsewhere, have developed without town planning and consequently there are many difficulties which will have to be overcome. With the growth of commercial agriculture, industry and trade, towns will continue to expand and new urban centres will undoubtedly develop. The problem of town planning and urban redevelopment thus becomes a matter of extreme urgency. It is being increasingly realized that problems of urbanization, such as overcrowded central slums, traffic congestion, unemployment and sub-standard squatter settlements on the fringes of cities are generated more often than not outside the limits of the city and call for solutions based on regional considerations. All these problems point to the need for a more balanced urban-rural relationship, and regional planning affords the means to achieve this end. The Committee supports the proposal submitted to the Social Commission at its thirteenth session and approved by it in its resolution on urbanization,<sup>10</sup> that present planning machinery should be integrated with national or regional development planning or programming in the larger perspective of urban-rural relationships and that planning should be based on economic, social, administrative and physical considerations within a given region.

57. The problem of financing adequate urban development and providing the services and amenities referred to above cannot be dealt with by local authorities unaided. The central government has a responsibility towards assisting municipalities in the provision of these services. The Director General of the International Labour Office, in a report to the forty-third session of the International Labour Conference, stated that measures to encourage industrial decentralization and the growth of a large number of smaller towns may contribute to alleviating the social problems of the big cities. Such policies, sometimes associated with "regional planning", had been adopted in many countries. The idea of regional planning originated with some of the great river valley development schemes and was being applied in many different types of geographical setting and in countries with widely varying economic philosophies. Basically, it involves planning economic growth within a region of a country so as to take account of the human and social facts as well as of physical and economic advantages. He suggested that regional planning could provide the means of translating objectives of national economic development plans into local action, of promoting a regional balance in urban and rural development and of mobilizing local action through community development or other self-help methods.

58. It is essential to improve conditions of economic, social and cultural life in rural areas through rural development programmes in order to discourage disorganized and uneconomic movement to urban centres. Thus, the acceleration of co-ordinated territorial programmes of economic and social development is required as a means of achieving a substantial increase in productivity not only in industry, but more particularly in agriculture. The Committee is of the opinion that the fullest degree of participation in the work of planning agencies and of public authorities at all levels should be ensured to the indigenous inhabitants, since without their collaboration the attainment of a well-integrated and sound community structure would not be possible. The Committee considers that in some Territories indigenous persons need to be given wider opportunities for training and experience in the administration of urban communities.

HOUSING

59. The need for suitable low-cost urban housing is a matter of pressing urgency in many Territories. The problem of overcrowding and sub-standard housing in the towns is serious and is magnified by the influx of temporary migrant workers, by the growing number of persons who are required for work in the towns or who, for various other reasons, remain for long periods in the towns, and by the natural growth of population.

60. The dimensions of the housing problem are indicated by the figures for one of the new towns in Uganda, a Territory where the aided housing programme is regarded as being above average. In 1957, one in three persons occupied housing on the fringe of town not conforming to building rules and sited haphazardly. One in three was housed by employers, usually free of rent, in quarters varying greatly in quality. Only one in ten was housed in estates built and administered by the Government. A survey of the Kingston corporate area in Jamaica revealed that a sixfold increase in the volume of housing construction would be required to abolish overcrowding and keep abreast of the annual increase in population.

61. Only model or large employers are willing or able to provide satisfactory housing for many of their workers and, except for Hong Kong and Singapore, few Governments have felt able to afford the expenditure to subsidize housing for more than a minority of urban families. The majority of urban workers must, consequently, depend on their own initiative or that of private enterprise for housing and this often limits them to shack settlements or overcrowded quarters. In some Territories, many urban workers have great difficulty in finding houses within their means to rent or purchase.

62. It has been pointed out, in a report submitted to the First African Regional Conference of the ILO, that in Africa, with the decline of the recruiting system, responsibilities of employers for housing their workers are becoming less well-defined and, where they still exist, often do not meet the real needs of more than a small proportion of all workers since normally only bachelor accommodation is provided. In Northern Rhodesia, model housing is provided by some of the mining companies; other employers, however, have objected to the increased cost of building houses for Africans which, they felt, should be borne by the Government and local authorities. In the Caribbean Territories a certain amount of workers' housing is provided by employers, and substantial loans and grants have been made to workers from welfare funds set up by the sugar industry for the purpose of constructing or of purchasing housing, and for repairing, enlarging or paying off mortgages on housing.

63. In a number of Territories, Governments or large firms subsidize rents for certain types of workers. In other cases housing allowances are paid, but comparatively few workers qualify for them. In some Territories, even housing allowances are not a satisfactory solution where existing accommodation is dilapidated and unsuitable, where water supplies and other services are inadequate or wanting, and where, owing to a shortage of land and housing, the rapidity of urban growth and, in some cases, to official restrictions which have recently been lifted, workers must live in peri-urban areas requiring heavy expenditure on transport or, alternatively, long and tiring travel on foot or by bicycle every day. The Committee expresses the hope that the laws abolishing previous restrictions will be fully implemented and will help to remedy the situation.

64. The ILO report stresses the contribution which employers have made in providing workers' housing. In many instances these have been the main contribution to the solution of the problem, but it is stressed that where stabilization and urbanization is the aim, the responsibility of Governments for general planning and co-ordination of housing policy, for creating the necessary financial machinery and, if required, for finding the resources to make adequate housing available, is clear. The Committee notes, in this connexion, that in Territories administered by the United Kingdom, housing policy is in the hands of territorial Governments and help and advice are provided by a number of metropolitan agencies. Funds are made available in the form of Colonial Development and Welfare grants and loans from the Colonial Development Corporation. The Committee notes with satisfaction that it is the ultimate aim of government housing policies in United Kingdom Territories to enable workers to rent, or preferably to own, their own accommodation away from the premises of the employer.

65. Housing has been included in ministerial portfolios in many of the Territories administered by the United Kingdom to facilitate the co-ordination of government activity at policy level. Recognition of the need for co-ordinating the efforts of public authorities as well as of private individuals and organizations has also led to the establishment of central housing and planning authorities in Northern Rhodesia and Kenya, a number of Caribbean Territories and Singapore and Hong Kong. The Committee notes with satisfaction that such bodies have been set up and recommends that they be established in Territories where they are now lacking.

66. A long-range programme of concerted international action in the field of low-cost housing and related community facilities has been initiated by the United Nations with the collaboration of the specialized agencies. In its resolution 1508 (XV) of 12 December 1960, the General Assembly suggested a review by Member States of housing requirements, policies and programmes, the extent of investment in housing and the need for outside assistance. It also requested an investigation of the possibility of obtaining technical services, equipment and funds for pilot projects in the rapidly urbanizing areas of the developing countries, as well as a study of the possibilities for domestic and international financing of low-cost housing programmes in less developed countries. The Committee expresses the hope that the provisions of this resolution will receive full and early application in those Territories where urban housing is a serious problem.

67. The Committee considers that a combination of various approaches, preceded by town and regional planning, would yield the most effective results in reducing the dimensions of the problem of urban housing. Aided self-help schemes, under which Governments give special help by way of cheap or free materials to people willing themselves to construct their own houses and to finance their construction, play an important role in certain Territories in the Caribbean as well as in other areas. Aided self-help building has many advantages to rural communities, refugee families and the seasonally unemployed. However, for the town-dweller in more or less full employment it has certain limitations. For this group, the improvement of housing conditions through co-operative action or building societies should be encouraged. The construction of houses for sale or for rental should be undertaken on as wide a scale as possible by the municipalities and central Governments. Loans to municipalities, building societies, employers and workers are another method of encouraging investment in better housing. The provision by employers or suitable housing, as well as of subsidies, loans, assistance in the construction of housing and the provision of materials should be given maximum emphasis. The Committee believes that the recommendation made by the East Africa Royal Commission, 1953-1955, to grant paid leave to employees to build their own homes deserves serious consideration. In those Territories where employers are required to provide adequate housing for employees, legislation should be amended to provide in all cases housing for the employee, his wife and children.

68. The attainment of a higher standard of urban housing in some Territories is, in part, dependent upon the solution of the highly complex problem of land tenure, in particular, on the individual holder being able to achieve security of tenure. In many Territories it has been difficult for individuals to obtain leases, or leases of sufficient length to give security; in many peri-urban areas land is held under customary tenure and development is thus discouraged. The Committee endorses the recommendation of the Conference on Urban Problems in East and Central Africa, 1958, that the system of land tenure in urban and peri-urban areas should provide for certainty in plot identification, a reasonable form of security and facilities which will enable dealings to be effected quickly and cheaply.

ENVIRONMENTAL SANITATION

69. The difficulties of adaptation and transition to urban life of rural migrants are many. Reference has already been made to the problems of housing. No less important are those pertaining to standards of health, environmental sanitation, nutrition, family structure and stability, and social organization and forms of voluntary association.

70. At its eleventh session, the Committee noted that while environmental sanitation had received less attention than was due it in most Territories, the most important efforts to deal with such problems as defective water supply systems and insanitary sewerage disposal had been carried out in urban areas, often when conditions became so conspicuously bad that major improvements could no longer be delayed on the grounds of the high cost usually involved.

71. In Kenya and Uganda, such elementary services as safe water supplies and refuse collection are lacking in most of the peri-urban areas inhabited by a large proportion of the Africans who are dependent on the towns for their livelihood. The towns in East and Central Africa are, however, generally served with piped water supplies which are being improved in both quality and quantity. Water-borne reticulated sewerage systems exist in only a few major centres. In the Caribbean region serious and continuing efforts have been made in recent years to establish safe water supplies and modern sewerage disposal systems but much remains to be done. In Singapore and Hong Kong, the problem is complicated both by the shortage of fresh water and the very large urban population; in the case of Hong Kong the problem has been exacerbated by the influx of refugees. The Committee considers that special attention should be given to the increased provision of adequate drinking water and the satisfactory disposal of waste products and storm water in relation to all schemes of housing and urban development.

SITUATION OF URBAN WORKERS

72. Most indigenous urban wage earners are unskilled. In Africa and in some other Territories this is, in part, a consequence of the migratory character of a large part of the labour force. It is a fact that in most under-developed economies it has been the practice to employ a large number of unskilled, undifferentiated workers alongside highly skilled workers and technicians. In many Non-Self-Governing Territories, the latter are largely non-indigenous persons. With the growth of technical and vocational training programmes, in-service training schemes and policies for replacing expatriate workers by local staff, a small but increasing number of indigenous persons are moving into the skilled and technical occupations.

73. In many urban areas there is a substantial degree of under-employment and unemployment which may be either seasonal or chronic. Although some measure of security is provided by family ties, tribal associations and other forms of mutual support, this is disappearing in some areas.

74. In those Territories where labour migration is extensive there is a constant movement back and forth between the centres of employment and the villages. The basic cause is economic, although there are also social, psychological and personal reasons. The rural dweller frequently receives low returns from the land and there are usually few other means of supplementing income to satisfy his wants in terms of consumer goods, and money for the payment of taxes and school fees, except by migrating to the urban centres or to areas of commercial farming. As a general rule, once the individual's needs in cash are met he will return to his rural home, at least until a new need for cash arises; but basically the migrant must depend for his security on the land and in many instances he must leave his wife and children behind in order to maintain his rights to it and as a means of securing their subsistence.

75. However undesirable extensive labour migration may be, it can be viewed as an unavoidable stage in the economic development of these Territories. The inflow of cash may sometimes lead to a rise in levels of living in the subsistence sector of the economy. Moreover, the retention of rights in land also ensures a degree of security which the worker might otherwise not have under present circumstances if he were to remain permanently in the centres of employment. The disadvantages of excessive movement and instability are many. There is loss of time and energy, wage levels are low, possibilities for training are few and continuity in employment is lacking. The separation of the worker from his family leads to the perpetuation of low levels of rural productivity and sometimes to social disorganization.

76. In the past decade, government and other public authorities as well as some employers have strongly advocated the stabilization of urban workers as a necessary prerequisite of the development of an effective labour force. The Conference on Urban Problems in East and Central Africa, 1958, expressed the view that the gradual move towards a greater division of labour, and as part of that process the stabilization of increasing numbers of Africans in towns, was an essential condition of the advance of Africans and the growth of wealth. It considered that stabilization was a process which should be carefully encouraged and which would, in any event, take place. At the Second Session of the Inter-African Conference on Housing and Urbanization of the Commission on Technical Co-operation in Africa South of the Sahara, the view was put forward that migratory labour would probably have to end if the full economic potential and population resources in East and Central Africa was to be realized.

77. The implementation of a policy of stabilization in urban areas would require the training of workers in industrial skills thus enabling them to attain higher living standards. The advantage of industry would be the less wasteful use of manpower. It would require facilities for the general and vocational education of the children of workers. In many Territories it would also require higher wage levels and the granting of other benefits. The ILO has observed that while this might place a heavy burden on industry and on territorial finances, experience in some situations has shown that increases in wage rates were accompanied by significant increases of output. The level of wages might have to rise in order to provide the minimum conditions in which workers regard further effort and application as worthwhile. Once this point is reached, output may continue to respond favourably to monetary and other incentives.

78. The full support of employers for a policy of urban stabilization is required if it is to succeed. In African Territories, employers differ in their attitude towards the question of stabilizing and rationalizing urban labour. Some favour the creation of a stable labour force and full urbanization, while others feel that ties with the villages should remain strong and only temporary services and housing need be provided in the towns. Furthermore, in some African Territories non-Africans have been unwilling to share their skills with Africans and to accept the principle of equal pay for equal work. Aside from the social and political consequences such attitudes may have, production costs are increased owing to the unskilled status of African workers and the high cost of non-indigenous and overseas skilled labour. The Committee considers that the social and economic advancement of all Territories depends in large measure on the development of an adequately paid, integrated, stabilized and efficient labour force, and it requests the Administering Members concerned to secure, through a policy based on legislation, administrative action and persuasion, the collaboration of employers and of all sections of the population in the early attainment of this objective.

79. The Committee considers that wage levels are unduly low in some Territories. It welcomes the action of many Governments in introducing a wage system sufficient to meet the needs of at least a small family and urges the early adoption of similar policies in other Territories where the payment of a "bachelor" wage is still the practice. The Committee notes the very large disparity in wages between indigenous and European employees in most Territories. While accepting the need for the payment of reasonable allowances for overseas service, it feels that every effort should be made to eliminate any other wage differential not based on objectively defined factors of skill and productivity.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING AND TECHNICAL EDUCATION

80. In the light of the needs of the Territories for trained manpower for more efficient economic development, the number of persons receiving technical and vocational training is small both in absolute terms and as a percentage of total school enrolment. Facilities for the education and training of young people in schools as well as workers in actual employment should be further developed so as to contribute to a balanced growth of the urban and rural sectors. In particular, the problem of the special value attached to non-manual labour of the clerical and white collar type should receive consideration. In this respect the need for sound vocational guidance beginning at an early age is becoming more widely recognized. More attention needs also to be given to vocational and professional education and training for girls not only in domestic skills, in order that they may also have an equal opportunity in all sectors of economic activity as a means both of helping to change social attitudes towards work and of ensuring to women a full role in the social and economic advancement of the Territories.

81. It has been stressed by the ILO that no effective training policies can be developed for workers who are essentially migratory and who are, therefore, unable to acquire a significant degree of industrial experience and skill even through in-plant training. Instability is a major obstacle to the efficient functioning and steady growth of industry, and policies tending towards the stabilization of wage earners at or near their places of employment would permit the proper co-ordination and effective implementation of programmes of general education and vocational training. The Committee endorses this view and is further of the opinion that until stabilization has been achieved and fuller use made of adequate vocational and technical programmes, special measures will be required for the training of workers whose educational background may be insufficient for them to be able to benefit from the type of training normally provided within the school system.

82. In many Territories, the growth of towns and the processes accompanying this growth have resulted in a modification of the traditional structure of society and have had a weakening effect on communal customs, habits and culture. This is most obvious in the new towns which have sprung up rapidly in certain Territories. The population of these towns is still unstable and loyalties to the tribe and the tribal lands still exist, but, at the same time, the disciplines and customs regulating tribal life and conditioning its purpose tend to decline or disappear. The process of detribalization is seen in different stages in these new towns. One finds various groups of people: some have become urbanized; others have lost touch with their tribes but have not adjusted themselves to urban life; and still others retain links with the tribe or clan.

83. Urbanization has been accompanied by the growth of new forms of social organization. The rural or tribal migrant in the town lives in groupings and is subject to authorities different from those of the rural village and also earns his livelihood in a different way. This is less so in the Caribbean area where rural-urban social differences are not as marked as elsewhere and tribalism does not exist. But in Central Africa, for example, although they often retain tribal allegiances, African urban populations are increasingly moving towards new forms of social organization based on non-tribal principles. Tribalism continues to play a role in domestic life and as a means of grouping or classifying people; tribal loyalties remain, but are affected by the emergence of urban associations based on common interest. Urban studies emphasize that tribal associations do not dominate economic and political life in the towns. None the less, the townsman frequently remains linked to the tribal unit where he holds land in return for loyalty and support. Tribalism thus is strong in the rural areas because the tie to tribal land is of great importance to a man. In the towns, on the other hand, where tribalism is not such an organized system of political and social relations, urban-type groupings and industrial associations have developed. The new groupings which are formed in the towns represent an important step towards complete integration in which all residents will be united by new civic loyalties.

84. In most Territories the social system of the rural setting is modified in the towns and redefined in varying ways as new alignments develop on the basis of common interest and education. This process is accompanied by the growth of freedom and individualism, which in its more extreme form may lead to the breakdown of family life and, when linked with poverty, to increased crime. The economic basis of these problems has been touched on in the preceding paragraphs and their solution thus rests, in part, on the stabilization of labour and the attainment of more adequate levels of living. There is also great need for services to help individuals and families to adjust to urban conditions; this is a major aim of social policy in the towns and cities. The Committee examined the measures taken in the provision of family and child welfare services, public assistance, youth welfare, juvenile delinquency services, rehabilitation of the handicapped, community organization and informal adult education for both men and women. Welfare services exist in most Territories and are provided by the central and local governments, voluntary organizations and, in some instances, industrial concerns. Effective work is being carried out in the field of family and child welfare, youth welfare and juvenile delinquency, but the scope of programmes is restricted both by budgetary considerations and by the lack of trained personnel.

85. In view of these restrictions, as well as the poverty, unemployment and under-employment which are characteristic of urban centres, the Committee feels that a maximum effort should be directed towards the improvement of family levels of living within territorial schemes for economic and social development, and towards the expansion of preventive and constructive social services. The raising of levels of income and of living should also permit the development of social security schemes. In this connexion, the Committee suggests that studies should be carried out in all Territories where wage-earning employment has reached significant proportions in order to determine the possibility of introducing schemes of social security. This, the Committee feels, is essential if the stabilization of urban populations is to be achieved.

86. The Committee endorses the suggestion made at the forty-third session of the International Labour Conference that the existing mechanisms of social and labour policy should be re-examined in order to see to what extent they are capable of dealing with the problem of those living in substandard conditions, in particular the casual and self-employed workers. It is noted that protective labour legislation, social security, vocational training schemes and housing schemes tends to benefit only that part of the working population whose skills and employment status place them in a far better situation than the numerous urban poor. The Committee considers that these observations are applicable to many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and it supports the view that the particular needs of the urban poor require careful study to determine what innovations in labour and social policy may be required to deal more effectively with their problems.

87. The Committee notes that, despite the problems which often accompany urbanization, it is a part of change from which nations, families and individuals may benefit. Industrialization and urbanization provide an economic base for a more rapid passage to modern conditions, and this is not limited to the economic sphere. The growth of towns also makes possible a large accumulation of capital and personnel for social and cultural purposes. It permits a wider range of cultural freedom and the freer exchange of ideas. An urban environment creates a climate favouring innovations and stimulating a faster pace of cultural change. Even today, people in towns are exerting great influence on political life and therefore on patterns of development. This influence will undoubtedly increase. Thus towns have an importance out of proportion to the relative size of their population.

V. Aspects of labour problems

LABOUR MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

88. A number of general factors account for the slow growth of the trade union movement in most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in comparison with countries where modern industrial organization has become firmly established. Wage employment is seldom the norm of economic activity and even where wage employment has become more wide-spread, the extent of casual employment, under-employment and even structural unemployment creates a pattern different from that of the more industrialized countries of the world and has important implications for trade union development. Agricultural workers who represent either a majority or a substantial proportion of the wage-earning population in most Territories, as well as workers in domestic service, are generally difficult to organize for trade union purposes, especially when the workers are tied to their employer by basic amenities like housing.

89. In many areas, the indigenous population are by custom and institutional practice limited in the main to semi-skilled and unskilled occupations. This, coupled with other social factors, has occasionally contributed to the organization of trade unions on racial lines in some Territories. The prevalence of migratory labour among the wage-earning population accentuates the organizational problems of trade unions and makes difficult the building of a continuous and stable membership interested in negotiating long-term conditions of employment. Finally, unemployment and intermittent employment also militate against the development of stable and effective trade unions and reduce the possibilities of effective collective action by workers in favour of better wages and working conditions.

90. The need for legislation to encourage or protect the development of trade unions is now generally recognized and the relevant statutory provisions have been enacted in almost all Territories. In the United Kingdom Territories, trade union legislation reflects to a large extent the principles of United Kingdom law and practice. Freedom of association is generally assured to all persons irrespective of race in all United Kingdom Territories. The trade unions in United Kingdom Territories are required to register with a Registrar of Trade Unions appointed by the Government and registration may be refused or existing registration cancelled in certain circumstances. With two or three exceptions, the only statutory restrictions placed upon strikes in the United Kingdom Territories occur in essential services where a stoppage would have a serious and immediate effect upon the life and health of the community. In a few Territories there are legal restrictions on political and other activities of trade unions.

91. The situation concerning trade unions in the United States Territories is similar to that in the metropolitan areas. In Netherlands New Guinea there is no special trade union legislation. Under the general law, however, no prior permission of the Government is required for the formation of associations, but to be incorporated all associations require legal recognition. In New Zealand Territories, special laws provide for the formation and registration of trade unions.

92. Workers have taken advantage of existing legislation, in varying degrees, to organize themselves into trade unions; in most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the trend in both the numbers and membership of these organizations has decidedly been upwards. Although there is no statutory requirement to this effect, an important feature of trade union organization in the East and Central African Territories has been a tendency for workers to organize along racial lines. In Northern Rhodesia, for example, European, Asian and African workers are organized separately. The Committee notes that in recent years there has been a very considerable growth of employers' organizations in certain Territories.

93. Information from a number of Territories indicates that progress has also been made by trade unions in protecting and advancing the industrial and occupational interests of their members and in meeting other needs. Despite this progress a number of difficulties remain. Some Territories still lack trade union organizations, but this is the exception rather than the rule and seems to be largely explained, in the absence of any law forbidding trade union organization, by the relatively low level of industrial employment; however, even where trade unions exist, they still manifest characteristics which are not favourable to the effective pursuit of their main functions, especially collective bargaining. In many cases, partly because of the general difficulties of illiteracy, communications, etc., the trade union movement remains in many Territories a limited representation of the general body of workers. The number of unions also tends to be many more than the enrolled membership would normally warrant for effective functioning and most unions are accordingly very small in size.

94. In these circumstances the bargaining strength, for example, of many trade unions tends to be inadequate. Because of their size and the failure of many members to pay union dues regularly, these organizations are generally weak financially. They are, therefore, often unable to provide the social benefits or educational programmes required to sustain the continuous interest of the rank and file, and to stimulate further enrolment, or to recruit and retain the best type of local leader because of inability to offer good conditions of service. This latter fact is often reflected in the inadequate manner in which many trade unions are administered.

95. In some areas, the fact that unions are, as already indicated, sometimes organized on a racial basis seems to affect industrial relations adversely. It tends not only to undermine the solidarity of the workers and to prevent the development of a common approach, but it has often led to a duplication of the machinery of collective relations. Employers under these circumstances have sometimes found that terms and conditions of service which are agreed upon with a trade union of one race cause dissatisfaction among trade unions of another race. An unsympathetic attitude on the part of certain employers has also been a source of much difficulty to trade unions in some Territories, for example, in Africa, but the Committee is glad to note that this situation is improving. Some enlightened employers have, in recent years, demonstrated a sympathetic approach to trade union development and have proved in some instances to be an encouraging factor in the development of trade union organization in certain Territories.

96. In most Territories, much has been done by the public authorities, international organizations, the local trade union organizations and other institutions to tackle many of the existing trade union problems. In the United Kingdom Territories, the labour departments have as one of their major functions the education of workers in the principles and techniques of trade union organization. This work is supplemented by special training courses for trade union leaders organized by officials of the departments specially recruited for the purpose. There is also growing emphasis on the training of rank and file members, a work in which the extramural departments of the university colleges are playing a very important part. Important assistance is given by the British Trades Union Congress, and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions has established a labour college in Kampala, Uganda. Sometimes employers have contributed generously both in terms of finance and of the granting of special paid leave to workers to attend courses on industrial relations.

97. In spite of these efforts much remains to be done. In particular, there seems to be a special need to enact legislation, where it does not already exist, to enable workers and employers, without distinction, to organize and function satisfactorily and freely. In those Territories where legislation already exists much, no doubt, depends upon the manner in which the various legislative provisions are administered in practice. Nevertheless, in certain Territories there appears to be some margin for modification of existing legal requirements with regard to the points suggested by the ILO in its report to the Committee.<sup>11</sup>

98. In the circumstances prevailing in many Territories at the present time, there is definite need for the advisory services of the Governments. However, this service should not be of such a nature as to restrict the normal field of activity of the trade unions or to subject them to the danger of political domination or control. There are still some Territories where the law places restrictions on strikes and lockouts and where safeguards do not yet exist against unfair labour practices. The Committee welcomes the information that the application of the ILO conventions on these matters has been extended to the Territories under United Kingdom administration, and hopes that similar action will be taken by those Governments which have not yet done so. There is also a need to further the development of organizations of employers for the effective utilization of collective bargaining procedures with the trade unions. Such organizations facilitate the conclusion of industry-wide collective agreements, where appropriate, and may help to overcome the fear held by certain employers that to recognize trade unions or to conclude agreements with them may place the employers concerned in a less competitive position than that of other employers who are not so restricted.

SOCIAL SECURITY MEASURES

99. It is generally accepted that one way of stabilizing manpower is to give workers effective protection against occupational and other hazards, and that it is consequently desirable and appropriate in the present circumstances to broaden the scope of existing legislation and even to ensure coverage for other contingencies.

100. A few Territories have over-all social security schemes for wage earners that are comparable to those in certain highly industrialized countries. This is the case in the United States Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, Gibraltar and Malta.<sup>12</sup>

101. In nearly all the Territories there is legislation providing for workmen's compensation based on the employers' liability. In some, employers are liable to provide for maternity benefits and a few also provide sickness benefits. The legislation has been amended in the majority of cases during the last ten years, and in certain Territories proposals for new compensation systems are now under consideration. There is, however, no legislation on workmen's compensation in the Cocos (Keeling) Islands under Australian administration, in the Seychelles Islands under United Kingdom administration, or in New Hebrides, a condominium under joint United Kingdom and French administration. While there is no general legislation on workers' compensation in Territories under New Zealand administration, a Special Committee has been inquiring into conditions of labour and employment in the Cook group and has placed special emphasis in its recommendations on workers' compensation.

102. The scope of the orders and regulations varies considerably. In general, all persons, including apprentices who enter into or work under a contract of service, regardless of the form of such a contract, are protected. The persons protected generally include agricultural workers, except in Hong Kong. In Jamaica, Grenada and Trinidad and Tobago there is a limitation on the size of the agricultural establishment covered by the registration. All schemes provide compensation for personal injuries caused to a workman by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. In most of the Territories where occupational diseases are covered, the same compensation standards are applied to the two causes of incapacity, provided such a disease is listed in a special schedule. Occupational diseases are not covered or are insufficiently covered in Aden, Dominica, the Bahamas, Barbados, Grenada, Hong Kong, St. Helena, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, and in other Territories where there is no workmen's compensation.

103. In a large number of Territories, in the event of industrial accidents, medical, surgical and pharmaceutical treatment are the responsibility of the employer, the same being true of hospitalization. In exceptional cases, such as in Swaziland, injured persons receive free treatment in government hospitals in the absence of legal provisions establishing the employer's liability for medical care. In all United Kingdom Territories, the employer's obligations for medical treatment do not exceed a certain sum. In general, the various legislations make a distinction between the temporary or permanent nature of incapacity for work. It is generally recognized that the compensation is payable for the entire period of incapacity for work preceding complete cure, the consolidation of the injury or death. However, certain regulations impose time-limits on the benefit period; this time-limit may be set at five years (e.g. North Borneo, Sarawak, St. Helena), eighteen months (Northern Rhodesia), twelve months (United States Virgin Islands), etc.

104. Compensation granted to injured workmen in the event of permanent disability or death is made either in the form of a pension or, more often, in the form of a lump-sum payment payable either on one occasion or in several instalments.

105. Special assistance for sick workers is in most cases provided at the expense of the employers and generally consists of medical care, the supply of medicine and drugs and hospitalization in public health clinics, or hospitals or sometimes in medical and health centres set up by private undertakings; this medical care is seldom supplemented by the granting of sick benefits. Sick workers in the public service frequently receive cash benefits of varying amounts in addition to free medical care.

106. In most Territories, public health and social welfare services jointly cover the contingency of maternity for the general population. The provisions of the regulations for the protection of women workers, however, vary a great deal. Whereas entitlement to free medical care is generally granted, only a limited number of Territories set a term during which a pregnant woman may remain absent from work without notice.

107. Coverage afforded for the contingency of old age takes a variety of forms. In general, schemes financed exclusively by the Government and making regular grants of pensions, subject only to a means test and compliance with conditions of residence, operate only in certain Territories in the Caribbean and in the Far East. Such schemes exist for the whole of the population in Trinidad and Tobago, British Guiana, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, Barbados, Brunei and Mauritius, and only for non-indigenous persons in Northern Rhodesia. The pensions are not designed to correspond to minimum subsistence levels. In Africa there are no such general schemes granting old-age pensions to the whole population based on means tests. The Committee expresses the hope that similar old-age pension schemes will be introduced in other Territories.

108. In most Territories all permanent civil servants or, in some cases, civil servants above a certain grade now receive non-contributory pensions. In one or two African Territories such schemes have as yet been established mainly for non-African workers. With regard to the private sector, there are schemes applicable to particular industries or occupations as well as comprehensive schemes which fit into the general social security system. In most of the United Kingdom Territories, large private firms have voluntary and contributory pension or provident fund schemes mainly for their European workers.

109. In almost all the Non-Self-Governing Territories no provision has been made for widows' and orphans' pensions save as a consequence of employment injury, except for specific categories of workers, including public servants and European workers in a few Territories.

110. The Committee notes that plans for better coverage of a variety of contingencies are now under consideration in a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories. In Jamaica a pensions authority will formulate and administer old-age pension and other superannuation schemes for categories of employees or persons engaged in particular industries. In 1960, the ILO recommended the adoption of a compulsory social insurance system in a report to the Government of Trinidad and Tobago. In 1954, a report on possible social security measures which could be introduced in British Guinea was prepared by a United Kingdom expert. His main recommendation, the establishment of a contributory social insurance scheme, was accepted in principle by the Government, but has not yet been implemented. In Barbados, following an inquiry carried out in 1954, a social security expert recommended the establishment of an old-age and invalidity fund financed from equal employers' and workers' contributions.

111. In a number of United Kingdom Territories, including Kenya, Swaziland and Uganda, the extension of the legislation on compensation for occupational accidents to cover occupational diseases is contemplated. In Kenya, a committee representative of all races recommended in 1957 that a compulsory pension scheme should be established for all employees who were not yet covered by similar schemes such as that for permanent government employees. The committee's report is still under consideration. There is little information on the current plans concerning further development in the Asian, Pacific and Indian Ocean Territories, but the review of existing workmen's compensation legislation is a continuing process.

112. In section IV of this report, dealing with aspects of urban development, the Committee suggests that studies should be carried out in all Territories where wage-earning employment has reached significant proportions in order to determine social security needs. The Committee notes that recommendations have been made in a number of Territories for the introduction of compulsory social insurance schemes, but that as yet these have not been acted on by the Governments concerned. Such programmes will be required in all centres of employment where there is need to stabilize the population and, in African Territories, as an alternative to the movement of wage earners back and forth between employment and subsistence farming.

CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT FOR WOMEN

113. At its 1960 session, the Committee noted that the shift towards a money economy in many of the Territories gave many women the possibility of achieving a degree of economic independence as a result of wider opportunities to produce goods for the market, rather than for subsistence, and to enter paid employment. Information before the Committee<sup>13</sup> indicates, however, that in most Territories women are inhibited from playing a greater part in the money economy by the low level of education as well as by social tradition.

114. Progress is, however, taking place in these Territories. With urbanization there is a growing tendency for existing prejudices against the employment of women to disappear; furthermore, the cost of living in urban areas often makes it imperative to supplement the man's wages with the earnings of the wife or daughters. An increasing number of girls are benefiting from educational opportunities and the jobs open to women are likely to become more numerous. However, only by rapid economic development will the present situation be appreciably altered. This does not apply to the more highly skilled jobs, particularly where services are concerned, and there is already evidence of employment opportunities for women in several African Territories as office workers, nurses, teachers and shop assistants.

115. For traditional and material reasons, both general education and vocational training facilities for industrial, commercial and other employment for girls are still very limited. In order to enable women in Africa and elsewhere to play their rightful part in the development of their countries, particularly in certain key occupations where they are usually predominant (teachers, child-care workers, social workers, nurses, etc.), the general education and vocational training of girls will have to develop considerably. There is an immediate need to study ways of remedying the present shortages rapidly, by empirical methods if necessary, but the needs are not limited to this. Employment for women will probably tend to expand, although slowly, in a whole series of less skilled jobs, particularly in industry. As long as a large proportion of this labour force remains uneducated and without industrial experience and is only partly assimilated to the urban environment, women's adaptation to industrial life, and consequently their working efficiency, will largely depend on further industrial growth and on the efforts made to teach them their new tasks and to assist them in overcoming the psychological difficulties caused by the change in habits and surroundings. It is by raising the level of education, promoting the stabilization of the town population and, particularly, by taking steps to create decent living conditions in the urban environment for working women and their families, that women in the Non-Self-Governing Territories can be most directly encouraged to participate actively in the modern economy.

116. In view of the importance which the traditional economy will retain for a long time to come and the predominant part which women play in it, there is need for the further expansion of women's activities and adult education. Such efforts would lead to an improvement in rural living conditions.

117. The Committee notes that night work in industry and work in processes which require a particularly strenuous effort are forbidden to women by legislation in many Territories. However, these laws do not generally apply to agriculture.

118. The great majority of women in the Non-Self-Governing Territories are still engaged in agricultural work on farms of the family or tribal type, and receive no wages for their work. This type of work is still very wide-spread in most agricultural Territories. Where the agricultural unit is the family-type farm, the women's work is often extremely hard and wearisome. For example, in the African Territories, in addition to their household chores, the women are responsible for the greater part of all agricultural activities and even have to carry water, cut and carry firewood, and grind maize or other cereals. The situation is aggravated when the men go to work in the towns or in other Territories, as happens in Nyasaland where they go to work outside the Territory.

119. The women wage-earners engaged in agriculture in certain Territories are usually to be found in seasonal occupations and mostly in plantations. The number of women wage-earners in agriculture, though small compared with the number of women working in subsistence agriculture, has increased in recent years in many Territories. However, it is still in general far below the number of male workers.

120. The Committee notes that in many Territories women are paid less than men for work of equivalent value, and reiterates the view expressed at its eleventh session that there should be equal remuneration for men and women workers engaged in work of equal value.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING FACILITIES AND EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

121. The Committee had before it a report prepared by the ILO on vocational training facilities and employment opportunities for indigenous workers in Kenya, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland.<sup>14</sup> The subject of vocational and technical education has already been briefly touched on in the section of this report dealing with aspects of urban development.

122. In Kenya, new emphasis has been placed on vocational and technical training. The first step in the vocational training system is provided by five trade schools where, in 1960, 1,128 apprentices were being trained in ten artisan trades. The next step consists of technical training given in evening classes organized by the Nairobi Technical High School. Work on the first buildings for the Kenya Polytechnic in Nairobi has been completed and classes in commercial and craft subjects are being held. The Royal College in Nairobi provides higher technological, professional and vocational training leading to special certificates or diplomas and will soon offer training up to degree level. Of approximately 260 pupils enrolled in 1958/1959, some 110 were Africans. The facilities available for advanced training are not sufficient; hence in some cases it must be obtained overseas; students are assisted to go overseas either to the United Kingdom or to other countries. In-service training courses, normally lasting twelve months, are provided by the more important government departments and the East Africa Railways and Harbours Administration. Apprenticeship as a form of training is not widely developed in Kenya.

123. In Northern Rhodesia there is one technical college for Africans and the need for a second institution is recognized. The college provides four-year courses leading to the City and Guilds Institute Intermediate Certificate in such fields as carpentry and motor mechanics. There are twenty-one trade schools which provide three-year courses at the post-primary level. The Apprenticeship Ordinance was amended in 1958 to permit Africans to be employed as apprentices, but thus far none has taken advantage of this provision. There is some training by government departments. The four major copper mining companies conduct extensive schemes for training African employees, and opportunities for their advancement have been increased since 1955 by the opening to Africans of many new categories of work which had previously been reserved for Europeans.

124. In Nyasaland, there is an Artisan Training Centre which had an enrolment of 130 in 1958, but most African trade training is undertaken within industry or government departments. There is a severe shortage of artisans and craftsmen and an extension of facilities for technical education and training is being planned.

125. The Committee commends to the attention of the Administering Members two resolutions on vocational and technical training adopted by the Committee on Vocational Training of the First African Regional Conference of the ILO. The first resolution is concerned largely with the training of instructors for vocational training centres, foremen and supervisory staff for co-operatives. The second contains policy recommendations on a number of matters.<sup>15</sup>

126. With reference to employment opportunities, recent demographic and social trends (in particular, the increasing commitment of the indigenous population to a modern economy) have led to a situation where, by and large, the demand for wage-earning employment in the East and Central African Territories for the first time exceeds the wage-earning opportunities. This has led to keener competition for the available opportunities and to the emergence of a recognizable element of unemployment in urban centres. As in other parts of Africa, the extent of the problem appears to have developed more quickly than had been anticipated. The need is now being felt for improved manpower information services to keep track of changes in the labour situation as they take place, to assist Governments in looking ahead and to help them to plan their employment policy accordingly.

127. In some Territories, these problems are complicated by the presence of communities of different ethnic origin. Immigrants who came or were brought into these Territories to assist in the development of their economies, whether from African, Asian or European countries, have formed their own communities which have tended to concentrate on their own sectors of the employment market. Until recently there has been little social contact between the different communities and little attempt to encourage mutual understanding between them.

128. There is now a growing appreciation that the continued economic and social development of the Territories during the period of transfer of an increasing measure of political responsibility to the indigenous population can only flow from the full co-operation of members of all groups who are prepared to work together for the common good. The present need in the field of employment is for a steady increase in both employment and training opportunities open to all residents on an equal basis and this can only take place in an atmosphere of economic stability and interracial amity. The Committee believes that every effort should be made to achieve this objective.

SOCIAL WELFARE FACILITIES FOR WORKERS

129. The available information<sup>16</sup> shows that welfare facilities for workers such as housing accommodation, medical services, canteens, educational, transport and recreational facilities and community centres, are provided in varying degrees in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The provision of housing for workers by employers is often required by law, particularly for unskilled workers recruited under written contracts to work at places far from their homes, especially in mines, plantations or forestry employment. Employers may be required to provide free accommodation for other workers who work at a distance from their homes, or for workers whose income is below a prescribed sum. The housing accommodation provided by employers is generally free, although the workers may, in certain cases, have to pay a small rental. Where actual accommodation cannot be provided by employers a rent allowance has to be given to the workers.

130. Some outstanding housing projects for workers are found in the oil industry in Brunei and Sarawak, the mining industry in Northern Rhodesia and certain large manufacturing and public utility undertakings in Hong Kong. In Nyasaland, the model village constructed by the Imperial Tobacco Company near Limbe is regarded as one of the finest African housing schemes in Central Africa. In most of the Territories, however, the housing provided by employers is mainly of the temporary type and of low standard. In recent years, increasing efforts have been made by employers, sometimes with government encouragement, to improve the standards of workers' housing, it being recognized that modern and comfortable housing will attract a permanent work force. In Hong Kong, a number of new housing projects for workers have been constructed by employers since the war.

131. Progress has been made in constructing permanent housing for workers with basic conveniences for comfort and hygiene in such Territories as Jamaica, Mauritius, Nyasaland and Uganda. In the last few years, workers on the sugar estates of Antigua, British Virgin Islands, Jamaica, Mauritius, Montserrat, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla and Trinidad and Tobago have been given grants and long-term loans, from their respective sugar industry labour welfare funds on an interest-free basis, so that they can construct and own their homes, subject to certain minimum specifications. Loans are also given to enable the sugar workers to repair or enlarge their dwellings.

132. The larger plantations and mines in the Territories are usually legally bound to provide medical care for their workers. The mining industry in Northern Rhodesia, the oil industry in Brunei, North Borneo and Sarawak and the sugar industry in Mauritius have provided modern hospitals to take care of their employees. Other employers have provided first-aid facilities, dispensaries and clinics; in some cases arrangements are made with private doctors to take care of the workers at the employers' expense. Medical services for workers are generally provided free, and these services are often enjoyed by the workers' dependants. In providing medical services for their employees, some employers are faced with the problem of obtaining suitable medical workers.

133. Various types of feeding arrangements are provided by employers for their workers. Canteens exist in some industrial undertakings in Africa, for example in Kenya and Uganda, and in Hong Kong, Jamaica and Antigua. In some Territories it is a legal obligation for the employer to provide free food for his employees. Some employers also give rations.

134. Educational facilities in the Non-Self-Governing Territories are provided by some employers for their workers and the workers' children and supplement governmental schemes. For instance, adult education programmes are operated by three of the copper mining companies in Northern Rhodesia for their African workers. In other Territories, such as British Guiana, adult education is provided on the sugar estates; in Hong Kong adult education is also provided by employers in some cases; and in Jamaica adult education classes are run in the community centres financed by the Sugar Industry Labour Welfare Board.

135. In several Territories a wide range of recreational facilities, including indoor and outdoor games and sports and cultural activities, is provided by the employers for their workers, and an increasing number of community centres have been established in the last few years.

136. In recent years there has been a growing interest among employers in workers' welfare. For instance, in Africa, welfare officers have been appointed by the mining companies and the railways in Northern Rhodesia. Several undertakings in Hong Kong have similarly appointed welfare officers to work in their welfare departments. In the Caribbean area some welfare officers are working in the sugar industry in British Guiana and Jamaica, and three undertakings in Trinidad and Tobago have appointed welfare officers. In the sugar industry in British Guiana and in one mining company in Northern Rhodesia additional welfare officers are being trained.

137. The Committee considers that the provision of satisfactory housing, medical services, canteens, community centres and other welfare facilities by employers should be given maximum encouragement by the Governments of the Territories. Such measures, together with others suggested elsewhere in this report, should contribute to the improvement of levels of living and lead to the establishment and expansion of a stable and progressive work force.

VI. Treatment of juvenile offenders

138. In view of the comprehensive survey of juvenile delinquency which the Committee undertook in 1960 in connexion with the report on progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee has at its present session dealt solely with recent trends in the treatment of juvenile offenders. While the information before the Committee was based on an attempt to analyse statistically the disposition made by the courts of juveniles found guilty of offences subject to legal penalty, it must be recognized that deficiencies in the data available make it difficult to verify statistically territorial trends in the application of different measures of treatment by the various courts.

139. Some Administering Members, while agreeing that better and more reliable statistics were necessary, stressed the difficulties arising from the lack of internationally valid criteria on which to base these and the need for experienced staff capable of preparing and interpreting them. The Committee considers that steps towards the more detailed and exact reporting of the court disposition of juveniles might be taken if statistics on each Territory were prepared by one authority that would be responsible for their reporting and if the principal court dispositions relating to juveniles were reported separately from similar statistics concerning adult offenders in a table specifically formulated for this purpose.

140. The Committee notes that in the Non-Self-Governing Territories juvenile delinquency has not yet assumed serious proportions and that all Administering Members are taking steps to expand preventive services, particularly in those Territories where industrialization and organization are weakening the sanctions regulating conduct and behaviour in traditional societies and where the home and other environmental conditions may be conducive to antisocial behaviour. The United Kingdom Government is pressing territorial Governments to establish preventive services, and a comprehensive model ordinance is being prepared which will cover not only the treatment of offenders but services for the care and protection of children as well. In Papua, consideration is being given to the introduction of legislation dealing specially with child welfare matters, the constitution of children's courts with children's magistrates and the recognition of certain institutions as suitable for the care and education of delinquents.

141. Information before the Committee<sup>17</sup> indicates that in a number of African and non-African Territories the imprisonment of juveniles was not uncommon in 1958 or 1959. In some cases, it seemed to be on the increase even where new special institutions had been opened. The United Kingdom delegation informed the Committee that, more recently, young persons between the ages of fourteen and sixteen or seventeen in non-African Territories were seldom sent to prison on conviction. In African Territories, there has been a considerable reduction in the number sent to prisons and in some instances these are either reform schools of the Borstal type or entirely separate institutions which provide special training for young offenders of this age group.

142. Approved schools for young offenders exist in all of the larger United Kingdom Territories and in most of the smaller ones. The Committee notes, however, that there is a lack of such institutions for girls in most Territories. It was explained to the Committee that this was due to the very low incidence of delinquency among girls, although it might be necessary in the near future also to provide some special institutions for girls. In some Territories, alternative arrangements had been made with voluntary organizations to provide institutional treatment.

143. In a number of Territories increasing use is being made of institutions, not only for the treatment of juvenile delinquents, but also for juveniles in need of care and protection or in moral danger. Consequently, existing institutions are insufficient despite the post-war building programme. Wherever possible, more attention is being given to supervision outside closed institutions.

144. Juveniles guilty of minor infractions are still commonly awarded fines in some Territories although it is doubtful whether such penalties always serve a useful purpose in the case of juveniles. Significant progress has been made in the virtual abandonment of the penalties of expulsion and deportation. On the other hand, repatriation, although not prescribed as often as previously, is still occasionally used in a few African Territories as a convenient way of reducing the number of young people who drift into the towns and with whom the social services are not equipped to cope.

145. The Committee notes that while probation is well established and widely used in the courts in the Caribbean region and some other Territories, in other regions a much smaller proportion of the juveniles found guilty are awarded this form of treatment. This is due to the fact that only a few courts are as yet able to make use of the services of probation officers. The Committee was informed that in Territories under United Kingdom administration the probation system was being used to the limits of the capacity of the existing officers and that its extension depended on the training and appointment of additional welfare workers. The Committee notes that despite the great increase in probation staff in the last ten years, case-loads remain very heavy.

146. The Committee notes that corporal punishment of male juveniles has either been abolished or is seldom awarded by the courts in most United Kingdom Territories outside Africa. In Africa, corporal punishment continues to be used and is still sometimes the principal measure of treatment of juveniles guilty of offences which do not require institutionalization. This is true not only in Territories where few alternative methods of treatment are available, but also in Territories where social services are more developed. The Committee was informed by the United Kingdom delegation that corporal punishment, although still applied in Africa, tends to diminish gradually as a method of dealing with juvenile delinquents. In the United Kingdom Territories it has been declared an unsatisfactory method of treatment justified only in exceptional circumstances which should become increasingly rare. The Committee was informed that the complete abolition of corporal punishment in these Territories was dependent on the introduction of other sanctions as well as on the availability of trained personnel and appropriate institutions. The Committee notes that, while provision for corporal punishment under special safeguards and supervision still exists in Papua as an alternative to imprisonment, it is rarely used. It is forbidden by law in Netherlands New Guinea and in United States Territories. The Committee recommends that corporal punishment should be totally abolished in all Territories and that efforts should be intensified to provide preventive and other corrective methods aimed at the re-education of the juvenile offender and his reintegration in the community.

VII. Public health and nutrition

147. The importance of health in relation to social well-being and material progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories has been stressed by the Committee at its previous sessions. At its twelfth session, the Committee, considering that very full data had been embodied in its report on progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in 1960, decided to give particular attention to such aspects as trends in the indices of crude death-rates and infant mortality rates and the situation with regard to communicable diseases, environmental sanitation and nutrition.

148. If the levels of health in the Non-Self-Governing Territories are accurately reflected in the indices of crude death-rates and of infant mortality rates, these levels are definitely improving. In almost all Territories for which these indices are computed there is an unmistakable downward trend, which indicates that more human lives are now being saved from premature death than ever before. However, in comparison with modern standards, the levels at which these indices actually stand are still high; in many Territories, out of eight or ten infants born alive during the course of a calendar year, one dies before it reaches its first birthday.

149. Communicable diseases, poor environmental sanitation and an inadequate diet are among the principal direct causes of this state of affairs. Malaria, yaws, trypanosomiasis, bilharziasis, tuberculosis, leprosy and intestinal infestations are among the ailments which still prevail among vast numbers of inhabitants in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It is therefore natural that the major activity of health services in these areas is directed against these communicable diseases, some of which have by now shown signs of considerable abatement. Yaws is being brought into the final stage of complete eradication in almost all Territories where it is endemic, and successes in malaria eradication are also taking place. Campaigns to control the prevalence of these and other tropical diseases such as yellow fever, bilharziasis and leprosy are in progress in many other Territories. Projects undertaken by the local Governments with the co-operation of WHO and UNICEF are now in process with the aim of controlling malaria in sixteen Territories, aedes aegypti in thirteen Territories, yaws in nine Territories, tuberculosis in six Territories, leprosy in three Territories, bilharziasis in two and venereal diseases in one Territory.

150. The direct attack against the prevalence of existing endemic diseases represents but the initial phase in the process of raising the levels of health of the peoples in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. A permanent consolidation of these gains can only be achieved with the parallel development of adequate curative and public health services in each Territory, improvements in nutrition and environmental sanitation and the training of staff. In this respect the activities of WHO and UNICEF in 1960 included projects dealing with environmental sanitation in nine Territories, child feeding and improved nutrition of vulnerable segments of the population in fourteen Territories, development of basic health services in twelve Territories and promotion of training facilities, especially for nurses, in twelve Territories. Also of great importance are the various inter-county regional programmes carried out under the aegis of WHO.

151. Water supplies and sewage disposal systems seem to be inadequate in all Non-Self-Governing Territories.

For example, in the Caribbean area, where some of the more advanced Territories are located, it has been said that not one Territory has a water supply and distribution system adequate for the present needs of its people, and sewage disposal systems cannot be expanded in the absence of an adequate water supply. As a consequence, typhoid and paratyphoid fevers, dysenteries and intestinal infestation and other water-borne infections assume seasonally epidemic proportions. Environmental sanitation is one of the most difficult public health problems but more vigorous action in this area is required if basic health problems are to be solved.

152. The same holds true for the inadequacies observed in the status of nutrition and the dietary habits of the peoples in many Non-Self-Governing Territories. With regard to food consumption at the retail level, clinical observations and surveys on family budgets indicate the existence of extensive areas in which people are undernourished, especially during the "hungry" seasons. Symptoms of malnutrition in the form of kwashiorkor, pellagra, scurvy, night blindness, anaemia and retarded corporal growth among children are found frequently in certain Territories, and the average intake of food consumption among the total population seldom exceeds the lowest acceptable norm per person, per day.

153. Conversely, an analysis of family budgets with respect to the cost of food and its composition brings forth two major weaknesses: first, a seriously unbalanced diet, and second, an insufficient family income. The unbalanced diet is manifested in the low intake of nutritives of high biological value, such as protein of animal origin, vitamins and minerals and, also, oils and fats, and a high proportion of carbohydrates, which in terms of calories account for up to 80 per cent or more of the daily food consumption. This constitutes a poor diet, for it fails to meet the biological requirements of, at least, growing children, pregnant women and sick persons, among whom the need for high quality food exceeds that of the general population.

154. In most Territories, low family income seems to be one of the principal causes of this state of affairs. Because there is not enough money, some one-half to three-quarters of the total income is often spent on food, and the quality of the food purchases is often sacrificed to the quantity needed, to satisfy the needs of a large-size family. Other factors such as primitive methods of cultivation, unsuitable storage of crops and dietary taboos and customs also make the problem of improvement of nutritional levels extremely complicated. It is for this reason that concerted programmes of development in this field have a multi-faceted aspect; some are directed towards increasing food production, while others are directed towards promoting health education especially in matters of nutrition and, also, towards improving family income so that it conforms to the size and the composition of the household.

155. Another problem of considerable importance for the advancement of health levels in Non-Self-Governing Territories is the shortage of medical and auxiliary personnel which is inadequate to give a minimum standard of health coverage. Only a handful of medical schools and training centres for medical and public health staff now exist in the Territories, and the function of these institutions is often hampered, among other factors, by inadequate systems of basic education or by insufficient budgetary appropriations. The need for expansion of national institutions for the training of professional and auxiliary health personnel has become the keystone to further health progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. In this respect it is of interest to note the link which exists between health, education and national per capita income; in the limited studies available on the Non-Self-Governing Territories, it becomes evident that low mortality rates and a better nutritional level are usually associated with high literacy and a more or less adequate family or national income.

156. Progress in health and nutrition requires co-ordinated action in many different fields; until the peoples in the Non-Self-Governing Territories are able to cope more adequately than at present with their own requirements, international co-operation in the form of well-planned and efficiently executed programmes of action will be needed for a long time to come. In this connexion, the Committee commends WHO, UNICEF and the various regional organizations for the assistance rendered by granting fellowships, conducting surveys, assisting in the control of tuberculosis, malaria and other endemic diseases, and providing a number of other health and social services.

157. The Committee wishes to stress the important role community development and adult education play in the improvement of health by encouraging interest in sanitation, eradicating endemic diseases and sponsoring improvements in nutrition, clothing, child care and water supplies.

VIII. Racial discrimination

INTRODUCTION

158. By resolution 1536 (XV), of 15 December 1960, the General Assembly endorsed the view of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories that racial discrimination was a violation of human rights and constituted a deterrent to progress in all fields of development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>18</sup> The General Assembly also recommended that the Administering Members immediately rescind or revoke all laws and regulations which tended to encourage or sanction directly or indirectly discriminatory policies and practices based on racial considerations and that the Administering Members do their utmost to discourage such practices by all other means possible.

159. In the same resolution the General Assembly urged the Administering Members to give full and immediate effect to the recommendations of the Committee that measures to solve the problem of race relations should include the extension to all inhabitants of the full exercise of political rights, in particular the right to vote, and the establishment of equality among the members of all races inhabiting these Territories.

160. The General Assembly also requested the Administering Members to furnish the Committee with all relevant information pertaining to that resolution so as to enable the Committee to submit a report to the sixteenth session of the General Assembly.

161. The present section of the report of the Committee, while forming an integral part of the Committee's report on social advancement in Non-Self-Governing Territories, is also submitted to the General Assembly in compliance with the aforementioned resolution.

162. In the consideration of the question of racial discrimination in Non-Self-Governing Territories and in the preparation of the report, the Committee had before it a study prepared by the Secretariat on racial discrimination in the Territories<sup>19</sup> based on the information transmitted annually by the Administering Members under Article 73 e of the Charter. The Committee had also noted the statements orally presented by the delegations of Australia, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States concerning the situation in the Territories under their administration and containing more recent information which had not been available to the Secretariat when its study was being prepared. In addition, the Committee was informed that a special report on the question of racial discrimination in the Territory administered by the Netherlands<sup>20</sup> was being transmitted to the Secretariat in response to General Assembly resolution 1536 (XV).

163. The question of racial discrimination and race relations has been the subject of the Committee's consideration for many years. At its eleventh session, in 1960, the Committee recognized and welcomed the progress achieved during the period since 1946 in the abolition of a number of forms of racial discrimination and in the improvement in race relations in many Territories.<sup>21</sup> It found, however, that discrimination on grounds of race and colour continued to exist in some Territories, and that it was still to be found in its most acute form in the African Territories where immigrant communities were present. Although the European community was often an extremely small minority in these Territories, it exercised special political, social and economic privileges, which were denied to the indigenous population. Inferior treatment was accorded in varying degrees to indigenous inhabitants not only in the field of human rights and fundamental freedoms, but also in the economic and educational fields and in the exercise of political rights. The Committee then recommended that the problem of race relations should be attacked in all fields of activity in the Territories. Measures to solve it should include the extension to all inhabitants of the full exercise of basic political rights, such as the right to vote. It considered that the establishment of political equality among all members of plural communities would prove the quickest way to abolish discrimination and minority privileges and to create nations united by a common loyalty transcending race.

164. In the consideration of this subject at its present session the Committee has approached the question of racial discrimination in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the light of the principles embodied in resolution 1514 (XV) and with the intention of fulfilling the mandate contained in paragraph 4 of resolution 1536 (XV). Some delegations expressed the view that the information on this subject given in the statements made in the Committee by the Administering Members would have been more useful if it had been supplied in the form of Committee documents. They felt that the information before the Committee was incomplete and that there were difficulties in seeking to assess the situation in the various Territories for lack of full and up-to-date information.

EXERCISE OF POLITICAL RIGHTS AND THE RIGHT TO VOTE

165. Information on the basic political rights and, particularly, on the right to vote was included in the

statements made by the representative of Australia on Papua, the representative of New Zealand on the Cook, Niue and Tokelau Islands, the representative of the Netherlands on Netherlands New Guinea, the representative of the United States on American Samoa, Guam and the United States Virgin Islands.

166. The Committee was informed by the Australian delegation that a significant step on the road to equal political rights for the inhabitants of Papua had been taken with the recent reconstitution of the Legislative Council for the Territory of Papua and New Guinea in a manner more favourable to the indigenous people. The main feature of the legislation for the revision of the Council is the increase in the membership from twenty-nine to thirty-seven and in the number of elected members from three to twelve, six of whom are to be indigenous members. It also makes provision for the number of appointed non-official members to be raised from nine to ten, at least five of whom are to be indigenous members. At the first election for the newly constituted Council, held on 18 March 1961, nine expatriate candidates were nominated, three of whom were elected unopposed, while 108 indigenous candidates stood for election in the six electorates. Three hundred and sixty-four indigenous representatives voted on behalf of 493,000 people.

167. The Australian delegation stated that, whereas formerly the indigenous inhabitants were eligible to vote only for Native Local Government Councils, the new legislation provided for six elected and not less than five nominated indigenous members on the Legislative Council, and that, in fact, six of the ten nominated members were indigenous. Elected indigenous members of the Legislative Council were chosen by electoral conferences of delegates from local government councils and electoral groups in each of the electoral districts of the Territory. Separate polling and the use of this indirect system of election were only temporary and transitional measures adopted at the wish of the people themselves, and the objective was a common roll and single direct election. To this end, provision had been made in the Act itself for an ordinance. All indigenous inhabitants were therefore entitled to vote, with the exception of those living in isolated areas where the electoral system had not yet been introduced. The representatives of Ceylon, Ghana, India, Iraq and Liberia expressed the hope that all measures would be taken speedily to extend the electoral system in all Non-Self-Governing Territories.

168. With reference to Netherlands New Guinea, the Committee was informed of recent constitutional developments which had broadened the participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the political life of the Territory. An elected central representative body had been established in April 1961. It was described as the initiation of a phase of "assisted self-government", which was a transitional stage on the road to full self-government, and would be consulted in advance on all fundamental aspects of policy and be an equal partner with the Territory's Administration in discussions concerning the attainment of self-government and self-determination. The present Council, which would serve for a period of three years, consisted of twenty-eight members, of whom twenty-two were indigenous. Sixteen of the members represented some 250,000 inhabitants and were elected on the basis of a common role without distinction on grounds of race or ethnic group. Of the twelve appointed members, four represented about 75,000 inhabitants in the less advanced areas and had been appointed by recommendation of the inhabitants of those areas. Six other members, representing nearly 100,000 inhabitants of the most primitive areas, had been appointed directly by the Governor. Finally, two members represented important minority groups which had not obtained representation in the Council. Thus, over 75 per cent of the inhabitants had been able largely to determine the composition of the Council and to influence policy-making in the Territory. The rights of petition, initiative, interpellation and amendment had been vested in the Council, which was also jointly responsible for the Territory's budget. The supervision of revenue and expenditure in the Territory was one of the Council's most important tasks and would prepare its members for the assumption of the burdens of responsibility. A further revision of the New Guinea Act was in an advanced stage of preparation. It would provide for the institution of a limited Executive Council, most of whose members would be indigenous and which would have the task of assisting the territorial Government in the exercise of its functions and in the co-ordination of the public services concerned with general administration.

169. The Committee was informed that in the United States Territories the people exercised local franchise under legislation which specifically provides that no discrimination shall be imposed on any voter based upon race, colour, sex or religious belief, and that universal adult suffrage was in operation in the Territories administered by New Zealand.

170. Information transmitted by the Government of the United Kingdom for 1958 and 1959 included additional sections on human rights in which no reference was made to political rights or the right to vote but which contained, inter alia, the statement to the effect that those fundamental rights and freedoms which were part of the British tradition were established and protected by the laws of the Territories. It was further stated that these:

"include the right of the individual to life, liberty and security of person, to recognition as a person and equality before the law, to an effective remedy before the courts against violations of the rights granted to him by the law or constitution of his country, to a fair and public hearing before an impartial judiciary in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any charge against him, to be presumed innocent of a criminal offence until he is proved guilty, to be immune from retrospective penal offences or penalties, to freedom from arbitrary interference with his family, home or correspondence and to remedy against such interference or attacks on his good name, to liberty of movement, to a nationality, to ownership of property, and to freedom of thought, conscience, religion, opinion, expression, assembly and association."<sup>22</sup>

The representatives of Ghana, India, Iraq and Liberia pointed out that, contrary to the assertion made in the foregoing statement, in many United Kingdom Territories the right of suffrage was denied to indigenous inhabitants; they endorsed the demand for universal adult suffrage in all these Territories as a means of abolishing racial discrimination.

171. Some members considered that the situation with regard to the extension to all inhabitants of the full exercise of basic political rights, in particular the right to vote, was far from satisfactory in many of the Territories. In Northern Rhodesia, for example, the recent

Constitutional Conference had recommended the revision of franchise qualifications which up to now had not been implemented. While there had been some relaxation recommended in the qualifications for suffrage, these members considered that they were still discriminatory. They noted, moreover, that even these proposals were strongly opposed by the local authorities and the major European political parties, in particular, the Prime Minister of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, and considered that this resistance should not be allowed to hinder the implementation of this aspect of the General Assembly resolution. The Committee recognized that Administering Members should take steps to grant basic political rights to all sections of the population. The representative of the United Kingdom reserved the position of his Government with regard to the references to Northern Rhodesia in this paragraph, since they were based on information not before the Committee and, he believed, went beyond the Committee's terms of reference.

POLICIES AND PRACTICES BASED ON RACIAL CONSIDERATIONS

172. The representative of Australia stated that it was the declared policy to take all possible measures to discourage the practice of racial discrimination in Papua. In full accordance with resolution 1536 (XV), the legislation of Papua was being reviewed progressively with a view to the repeal, so far as it was practicable and desirable to do so, of provisions relating to segregation or discrimination on racial grounds. This examination of the legislation was continuing and had been carried out over the past two years by a group of qualified legal officers. The most significant legislative measures which had been taken thus far were described to the Committee.

173. The representative of Australia further stated that it should not be overlooked that not all legislation providing for differential treatment was undesirable and that during the transitional years of a people from a primitive state to that of a new nation it was necessary to provide certain legislation as a means of protection. It had also to be recognized that there were limits to which the Administration itself could provide all the solutions to the numerous problems of racial differentiation, and the most effective means was the use of all media at its disposal for the mass education of all sections of the community. There was no shortcut to this end and only by example and a constant use of measures to promote greater understanding, confidence and mutual respect between races could the problems be overcome. Race relations in Papua were good and the progressive integration of the people in the public service, community welfare, youth organizations, on the sporting field and in politics, should do much to foster the desire for development of the Territory in a spirit of partnership. The representatives of Ceylon, Ghana, India, Iraq and Liberia, while agreeing with the representative of Australia to the effect that mutual respect between the races and education would eliminate discrimination, nevertheless maintained that in accordance with the principle of equality of rights of all people, no discriminatory laws should exist in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

174. The Netherlands Government informed the Committee that equality of all races was a fundamental policy and that no form of racial discrimination existed in Netherlands New Guinea. Ethnocentrism arising from the great diversity of indigenous cultures and languages did, however, hamper the growth of normal social relations among the various groups and was essentially a form of racial discrimination. Good results had already been achieved in abolishing this form of discrimination. The Committee was also informed of legislative and other measures which had been taken to ensure respect for fundamental rights and freedoms to all persons.

175. The representative of New Zealand informed the Committee that in Territories under New Zealand administration there was no racial discrimination and no real barriers in law or in fact between the indigenous people and the few non-indigenous residents. The few minor instances of differentiation in the law operated solely for the protection of the interests of the indigenous inhabitants and were concerned mainly with preserving their land rights.

176. The representative of the United Kingdom informed the Committee that its policy was one of unequivocal rejection of racial discrimination in all forms and in all fields and that it was dedicated to the task of removing racial discrimination as quickly as possible and to achieving the objectives of resolution 1536 (XV). It considered that the essential task was not merely the eradication of particular forms of discrimination, but the building up of sensible working relations between people of various races. This was a field in which Governments could do much in giving a lead, in some cases by legislation. But there were limits to what Governments could do since a change in people's minds, attitudes and ways of life must take time. The approach of the Government of the United Kingdom was therefore positive and based on the increase of co-operation between people of all races. Until there were healthy day-to-day relations between races, based on mutual understanding and respect, the total elimination of discrimination was not possible. If at all possible, racial discrimination must be eradicated without arousing new passions in the process, without public disputes which inflame racial feelings and play on the fears of minorities. The constructive work of improving race relations was often done quietly but progress was being made. In the vast majority of Territories, race relations were excellent and there was no discrimination.

177. The Committee notes that no racial discrimination in the political and economic life and no colour bar are reported to exist in the United Kingdom Caribbean Territories, with the exception of Bermuda and the Bahamas. In respect of the Bahamas, the delegation of the United Kingdom informed the Committee that the Bahamas House of Assembly had recently appointed a select committee to consider the advisability of introducing legislation to prohibit discrimination and segregation of persons in public places on grounds of race.

178. In African Territories, the problem of race relations has been most acute in Kenya and Northern Rhodesia. In Kenya, where powers have existed to restrict the movements and residence of Africans in European centres and of non-Africans in African centres, a Council of State was set up in 1958 to scrutinize all new legislation to see whether it contained any discriminatory provisions. Thus, although under the Township Ordinance the Governor is empowered to make rules to prohibit the residence of Africans elsewhere than within locations and villages assigned to them, to regulate the issuance of passes to Africans within the townships, and to regulate the use of streets and other public places by Africans, the operation of the Council of State would effectively prevent any such enactment. Moreover, it was the intention to revoke the Township Ordinance and to enact a new local government ordinance covering all types of local authorities; this new legislation would be completely non-discriminatory. The Kenya Government had also recently decided to repeal the African Passes Ordinance and repealing legislation would be placed before the Legislative Council as soon as possible. All bye-laws in Kenya were now under review with a view to eradicating discriminatory legislation. The Nairobi City Council and the Councils of Mombasa and Kitale had, in the past three years, amended a number of bye-laws which were discriminatory.

179. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that important progress had been made in eliminating discrimination in land tenure. In 1959, the Government announced a policy of non-racial tenure in agricultural land so far as economic and agronomic factors would permit. This included an undertaking to prevent the imposition of restrictive covenants in the grants of leases of land, whether by the Government or by private persons. The Kenya (Highlands) Order in Council, 1939, was revoked and the Land Control Regulations, 1961, abolished the Land Control Ordinance and those portions of the Crown Land Ordinances reserving special rights to Europeans in the so-called White Highlands. As a practical consequence, all land available for sale would be placed on an open market. Since October 1959, it had been part of the law of Kenya that any new racial restrictive covenants or conditions in relation to land leases should be voided.

180. In Northern Rhodesia, discriminatory laws and practices have included matters such as restrictions on the use by Africans of cinemas, hotels, bars, restaurants, cafés, etc., and on their buying certain types of liquor. They have also included such vital matters as pass laws and freedom of movement, advancement in industry, opportunities in public services and opportunities in education.<sup>23</sup>

181. Steps taken to combat racial discrimination in this Territory were described to the Committee by the representative of the United Kingdom. With the enactment in 1957 of a Race Relations (Advisory and Conciliation) Ordinance, a Central Race Relations and Conciliation Committee and district committees were established to assist in improving relations among various races in the Territory, particularly in the use of public premises. In 1959, the Legislative Council appointed a select committee to discuss with the Central Race Relations Advisory and Conciliation Committee ways and means of overcoming the problem of racial discrimination against non-Europeans in restaurants, cinemas and the like. The report of this select committee led to the enactment of the Race Relations Ordinance under which it is unlawful to practise racial discrimination in tearooms, cafés, restaurants, hotels, dining-rooms and hotel lounges. Penalties are laid down for offences under the Ordinance. A new Race Relations Committee was also established with the function of advising the Government on action for the improvement of relations between the various races in the Territory and to recommend how complaints or grievances may be removed or remedied. Race relations boards are set up to hear complaints about race discrimination which may be passed to them by district race relations committees in cases where the latter have been unable to effect reconciliation between the parties concerned. These boards are empowered to investigate all such complaints and to impose sanctions where the provisions of the ordinance have been contravened. The Public Health Regulations have been amended by the deletion of the provision that separate latrines are required for persons of different races. Night passes have been completely abolished.

182. The information laid before the Committee indicated that an African entering European towns and industrial areas in Northern Rhodesia to live and work there must obtain a permit to look for work; that if he decides to take advantage of housing accommodation provided to him by the employer, he must reside in a Native township or compound where he is registered by the superintendent; and that after he has found employment, he must register his contract with the superintendent. In this connexion, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that Africans were entitled to provide their own accommodation in any area if they so wished. Through housing loans guaranteed by the Government the separation of so-called African and European housing areas was being broken down and a number of Africans did reside and own their own houses in areas popularly known as "European areas". Identification certificates carried by Africans were now used solely for purposes of identification, in particular to show the title of individuals to housing which their employers are required under law to provide. Proceedings were no longer being taken solely on the grounds of failure to carry an identification certificate, and the total number of convictions on other grounds under these two ordinances had fallen from the figure of 13,000 in 1956 to 5,000.

183. The representative of the United Kingdom further stated that racial integration in schools was an important aspect of the question and one of the most intractable. In the vast majority of British Territories, integration was the rule—throughout the whole of The West Indies, British Guiana, British Honduras, Hong Kong, the Solomon Islands, Borneo, the Gambia, Mauritius and others. In other cases progress was being made. In Fiji, there were still largely separate schools for the various races but integration was beginning. In Uganda, there had been mainly separate education in the past but integration had commenced and was proceeding. People of all races were admitting in all government schools and also in many other schools. Even where the situation was difficult, as in Kenya, real progress was being made as a result of government leadership. This was particularly true in the higher levels of school education where language problems did not predominate. The governing boards of all the European secondary schools receiving government grants had declared a policy of admitting and were in fact admitting, pupils of any race suitably qualified and able to pay the fees. The Advisory Council on Asian education had adopted a similar policy which was limited only by restricted accommodation. A new institution providing education for all races at post-school certificate level and a secondary school for all races would open in Nairobi in 1961. The Royal College at Nairobi was open to students of all races as also was the University College at Makerere, which was attended on a completely non-racial basis by students from Kenya, Tanganyika and Uganda.

184. The representative of the United Kingdom also informed the Committee that in all Territories admission to, and promotion in, the public services was solely on grounds of qualifications and ability, without regard to race. The only sense in which this statement required qualification was that in almost all Territories preference, both in appointments and in promotions, was given to local people and in most cases to indigenous persons as opposed to members of immigrant races.

185. Concerning the disparity between the wages of European and indigenous workers in the copper mines of Northern Rhodesia, it was stated that until 1955 the European Mine Workers' Union had followed a policy of racial discrimination intended to prevent Africans from occupying responsible posts. In 1955, the Union had concluded a new agreement with the mining companies, opening twenty-four new categories of work to Africans which had previously been reserved for Europeans. By the end of 1959, 830 Africans had obtained more important posts as a result of the agreement. In 1960, the agreement between the European Mine Workers' Union and the mining companies had been amended a second time so as to open thirty-eight new categories of work to Africans previously performed only by Europeans. Thus, as racial discrimination diminished, Africans would be able in the near future to occupy many intermediate posts and eventually they would obtain higher posts on an equal footing with Europeans.

186. The representative of the United States stated that there were no problems of racial discrimination in the Territories under United States administration. In all of them there was ample protection under the law against such discrimination, as well as a tradition of non-discrimination. Reference was made in the Committee to a news report of alleged cases of discrimination in the United States Virgin Islands which were said to be under investigation by a Committee of the Legislative Assembly.

187. The Committee considers that the statement made before it by the representative of the United Kingdom on racial discrimination is encouraging and it is confident that the United Kingdom Government will bring the situation in the Territories under its administration in conformity with its declared policy of unequivocal rejection of racial discrimination in all forms and fields. The statement of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, to which reference had been made in the Committee by the representative of the United Kingdom, gave reason to hope that this policy would be pursued vigorously and speedily.

188. The Committee also notes that in several Territories under United Kingdom administration and in Papua, a number of previously existing ordinances of a discriminatory nature have been revoked or amended suitably. While welcoming this development, the Committee would wish to recall that General Assembly resolution 1536 (XV) recommended that all such laws and regulations should be rescinded or revoked.

189. The Committee notes that although the present pattern of land holdings in Kenya reflects the previous policy of discrimination, the policy is now non-discriminatory. It notes that in a number of Territories the wide disparity in wages between indigenous persons and European workers has not been overcome, and much remains to be done in the field of education.

190. In 1959, the Committee expressed the view that on no grounds whatsoever could education on a racial basis be justified. It reiterates this view now and considers that this applies equally to all other aspects of life in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. Consequently, many representatives cannot view with approbation the attitude taken by some Administering Members in the Committee that not all legislation providing differential treatment is undesirable and that there are limits to what Governments can do in providing solutions to the problem of racial discrimination. Equally, they cannot accept the theory that some of these discriminatory provisions are necessary for discharging commitments under the Charter.

191. In conclusion, the Committee recommends that all steps should be taken to implement the recommendation of the General Assembly that all laws and regulations which tend to encourage or sanction discriminatory policies and practices based on racial considerations should immediately be rescinded or revoked and that every effort should be made to discourage such practices by all other means. Above all, a bold and realistic approach on the part of the Administering Members and territorial Governments is required if the problem is to be solved. The Committee draws the attention of the Administering Members to the recommendation and the Convention against discrimination in education which were adopted at the General Conference of UNESCO in December 1960. The Committee hopes that the Non-Self-Governing Territories will be able to accede to the Convention. The Committee also believes that since prejudice is one of the important factors contributing to racial discrimination, it is the duty of the Governments concerned to guide public opinion in the proper direction.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES (THIRTEENTH SESSION, 1962)

I. Constitution of the Committee

1. By its resolution 1700 (XVI), adopted on 19 December 1961, the General Assembly decided "to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis as hitherto until such time as the General Assembly has decided that the principles embodied in Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations and in the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples have been fully implemented". The basis of the Committee's work, referred to in this resolution, is contained in resolutions 332 (IV) of 2 December 1949, 646 (VII) of 10 December 1952, 933 (X) of 8 November 1955 and 1332 (XIII) of 12 December 1958.

2. The Committee's terms of reference, as set forth in resolution 1332 (XIII), are as follows:

"5. ... to examine, in the spirit of Article 1, paragraphs 3 and 4, and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies and any reports or information on measures taken in pursuance of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly concerning economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories;

"6. ... to submit to the General Assembly at its regular sessions reports containing such procedural recommendations as it may deem fit and such substantive recommendations as it may deem desirable relating to functional fields generally but not with respect to individual Territories;

"7. ... the Committee should, without prejudice to the annual consideration of all the functional fields enumerated in Article 73 e of the Charter, give special attention to educational, economic and social conditions in turn and should consider the information transmitted in respect of these questions in the light of the reports approved by the General Assembly on such conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories."

3. By resolution 1700 (XVI), the Committee was instructed:

"2. ... to examine the political and constitutional information transmitted by the Administering Members as well as information relating to functional fields, and submit its reports to the General Assembly with its observations and conclusions thereon;

"3. ... to undertake intensive studies of political, educational, economic and social conditions and problems of Territories located in the same area or region, except where circumstances require individual consideration."

4. In the same resolution the General Assembly instructed the Committee "to invite the co-operation of the Special Committee of seven members established by General Assembly resolution 1699 (XVI) of 19 December 1961" and requested the Committee to transmit its reports to the Special Committee on the application of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples and "to provide it with pertinent material available to the Committee on Information including such studies prepared for its consideration as may be required for the discharge of the Special Committee's functions".

5. The Committee consists of sixteen members, eight Member States having responsibility for the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter, and an equal number of other Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly. At the end of 1961 there were four vacancies in the membership of the Committee due to the expiration of the terms of office of the Dominican Republic, Ghana, India and Iraq. In 1961, Ecuador, Pakistan, the Philippines and Upper Volta were elected to the Committee for a period of three years. The present membership of the Committee is as follows:

Administering Members

Australia	Spain
France	United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland
Netherlands	Ireland
New Zealand
Portugal	United States of America

Members elected by the General Assembly

	Date of expiration of term
Argentina .....	31 December 1962

All members except Portugal were represented at the thirteenth session.

6. The Committee held its thirteenth session at United Nations Headquarters in New York. It held seventeen meetings between 23 April and 23 May 1962.

7. The Committee welcomed the presence of indigenous persons from the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the delegations of a number of Administering Members in accordance with the invitation contained in General Assembly resolutions 1332 (XIII), 1466 (XIV) of 12 December 1959 and 1539 (XV) of 15 December 1960.<sup>1</sup>

8. Representatives of the ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO also attended the meetings of the Committee and took part in its discussions.

II. Officers of the Committee

9. At its opening (243rd) meeting on 23 April 1962, the Committee elected the following officers by acclamation:

Chairman: Mr. G. P. Malalasekera (Ceylon);

Vice-Chairman: Mr. J. de Piniés (Spain);

Rapporteur: Mr. E. Ros (Argentina).

III. Agenda

10. At its 243rd meeting, the Committee adopted its provisional agenda. The agenda<sup>2</sup> is reproduced as annex I to this report.

IV. Drafting committee

11. At its 247th meeting, the Committee decided to appoint a committee to draft, on the basis of the various views expressed in the Committee, those chapters of the Committee's report to the General Assembly concerning political and constitutional information, educational advancement, economic advancement, social advancement, and the preparation and training of indigenous civil and technical cadres. At its 249th meeting, the Chairman appointed the representatives of Liberia, Pakistan, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America to serve on the drafting committee under the chairmanship of the Rapporteur. The drafting committee held fifteen meetings between 4 and 18 May 1962.

12. The drafting committee presented its report in two parts;<sup>3</sup> part I contained the draft of the chapter on educational advancement, while part II contained the draft chapters on political and constitutional information, economic advancement and social advancement. In part II of its report, the drafting committee informed the Committee that because of lack of time it had been unable to prepare the draft chapter on the preparation and training of indigenous civil and technical cadres and that it had agreed, subject to the approval of the Committee, to entrust the drafting of this chapter to the Rapporteur.

V. Preliminary statements

13. At the 243rd meeting, the representative of Argentina expressed the reservations of his Government with regard to the transmission of information by the Government of the United Kingdom on the Islas Malvinas (Falkland Islands), the South Georgia and South Sandwich Islands and stated that this action in no way affected the sovereignty of Argentina, whose rights in these areas were inalienable. He added that his reservations this year excluded the areas south of parallel 60° latitude south which were covered by the terms of article 4 of the Antarctic Treaty, which had been ratified by both Argentina and the United Kingdom and on which he noted no information had been transmitted this year by the Government of the United Kingdom. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government had no doubts as to its sovereignty in the Falkland Islands and its dependencies and reserved its rights on the question.

14. At the same meeting, the representative of Spain expressed the reservations of his Government with regard to the transmission of information by the Government of the United Kingdom on Gibraltar over which his Government held sovereignty. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government had no doubts as to its sovereignty in this area and reserved its rights on the question.

15. At subsequent meetings, the representatives of Ceylon, the Philippines and Pakistan reserved the position of their Governments concerning the transmission of information by the Government of the Netherlands on West Irian (Netherlands New Guinea), which the Governments regarded as an integral part of the Republic of Indonesia.<sup>4</sup> At the 245th meeting, the representative of the Netherlands stated that his Government had no doubt as to its sovereignty over Netherlands New Guinea and it reserved its rights on the question.

VI. Political and constitutional information

INTRODUCTION

16. The Committee had before it the summaries of information on the Non-Self-Governing Territories relating to the year 1960, transmitted by the Administering Members under Article 73 e of the Charter which contain a section on government.<sup>5</sup> Information transmitted under this section by the United Kingdom Government in accordance with its decision announced at the sixteenth session of the General Assembly was placed before the Committee in full.<sup>6</sup>

17. The Committee discussed this item from 249th to 254th meetings. It was assisted in its discussions by the indigenous advisers from the Territories who were attached to the delegations of a number of Administering Members.<sup>7</sup>

18. Additional information on recent and current political developments in the Territories was supplied to the Committee by the delegations of several Administering Members either in their opening statements during the discussion on the item, or in response to points and questions raised by delegations of non-Administering Members.<sup>8</sup>

CHARTER PROVISIONS AND GENERAL ASSEMBLY RESOLUTIONS

19. As this is the first session at which the Committee has examined the political and constitutional information transmitted by the Administering Members it may be helpful to recapitulate briefly the Charter provisions and General Assembly resolutions concerning the development of self-government in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

20. By Article 73 b of the Charter, one of the obligations accepted by Members of the United Nations having or assuming responsibilities for the administration of Territories whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government is to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions, according to the particular circumstances of each Territory and its peoples and their varying stages of advancement.

21. At its seventh session, the General Assembly, by its resolution 637 A (VII), of 16 December 1952, recommended that the States Members of the United Nations shall recognize and promote the realization of the right to self-determination of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories who are under their administration and shall facilitate the exercise of this right by the peoples of such Territories according to the principles and spirit of the Charter of the United Nations in regard to each Territory and to the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned, the wishes of the people being ascertained through plebiscites or other recognized democratic means, preferably under the auspices of the United Nations. The General Assembly further recommended that Members responsible for such Territories should take practical steps, pending the realization of the right to self-determination and in preparation thereof, to ensure the direct participation of the indigenous populations in the legislative and executive organs of government of those Territories, and to prepare them for complete self-government or independence.

22. At its eighth session the General Assembly, by resolution 742 (VIII) of 27 November 1953, approved a list of factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether or not a Territory has attained a full measure of self-government. In the same resolution, the General Assembly considered that the manner in which Territories could become fully self-governing was primarily through the attainment of independence, although it was recognized that self-government could also be achieved by association with another State or group of States if this was done freely and on the basis of absolute equality. It also considered that the validity of any form of association between a Non-Self-Governing Territory and a metropolitan or other country depended on the freely expressed will of the people at the time of the taking of the decision and reaffirmed that, for a Territory to be deemed self-governing in economic, social or educational affairs, it was essential that its people should have attained a full measure of self-government.

23. At its fifteenth session the General Assembly adopted the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples contained in resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960. In this resolution the General Assembly declared, among other things, that immediate steps should be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or all other Territories which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those Territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, without any distinction as to race, creed or colour, in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom. At the same session, by resolution 1541 (XV) of 15 December 1960, the General Assembly approved a set of principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit the information called for under Article 73 e of the Charter. Under these principles a Non-Self-Governing Territory can be said to have reached a full measure of self-government by: (a) emergence as a sovereign independent State; (b) free association with an independent State, which should be the result of a free and voluntary choice by the peoples of the Territory concerned expressed through informed and democratic processes; (c) integration with an independent State, which should be on the basis of complete equality between the peoples of the erstwhile Non-Self-Governing Territory and those of the independent country with which it is integrated and should be the result of the freely expressed wishes of the Territory's peoples acting with full knowledge of the change in their status, their wishes having been expressed through informed and democratic processes, impartially conducted and based on universal adult suffrage.

TRANSMISSION OF POLITICAL INFORMATION

24. Since the inception of the United Nations, voluntary transmission of information on the development of self-governing institutions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories has been encouraged by the Committee and the General Assembly. At its second session, the General Assembly, by resolution 144 (II) of 3 November 1947, having noted that some Members responsible for the administration of Non-Self-Governing Territories already had voluntarily transmitted information on the development of self-governing institutions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, considered that the voluntary transmission of such information and its summarizing by the Secretary-General were entirely in conformity with the spirit of Article 73 of the Charter, and should therefore be duly noted and encouraged. By resolution 327 (IV) of 2 December 1949, the General Assembly recalled the view expressed in resolution 144 (II) and expressed the hope that such of the Members as had not done so might voluntarily include details on the government of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the information transmitted by them under Article 73 e of the Charter. The General Assembly again took up this matter at its seventh session and, in resolution 637 B (VII) of 16 December 1952, it called on the Members responsible for the administration of the Non-Self-Governing Territories voluntarily to include in the information transmitted by them details regarding the extent to which the right of peoples and nations to self-determination is exercised by the peoples of those Territories, and in particular regarding their political progress and the measures taken to develop their capacity for self-determination, to satisfy their political aspirations and to promote the progressive development of their free political institutions.

25. Subsequently, in resolution 848 (IX) of 22 November 1954, the General Assembly reiterated the view that voluntary submission of information on the political development of peoples in Non-Self-Governing Territories was fully in accord with the spirit of Article 73 of the Charter, and invited the Administering Members concerned to give the United Nations their utmost co-operation in this regard. At its fourteenth session, the General Assembly, in resolution 1468 (XIV) of 12 December 1959, endorsed the observations of the Committee on Non-Self-Governing Territories that speedy advancement in the functional fields is usually obtained where there is the broadest participation of the inhabitants in political bodies empowered to establish policies and to vote budgets, and urged the Administering Members to extend their full co-operation in transmitting information on political and constitutional developments, including the establishment of intermediate time-tables leading to the attainment of self-government. Taking note of the progress achieved in the Non-

Self-Governing Territories, the General Assembly, in resolution 1535 (XV) of 15 December 1960, expressed the view that a full knowledge of the political and constitutional developments in Non-Self-Governing Territories was essential not only to a proper evaluation of the progress of the Territories towards independence but also to that of their economic, social and cultural advancement, and again urged the Administering Members concerned to extend their full co-operation to the General Assembly in the performance of its functions by transmitting information of a political and constitutional character on developments in the Territories under their respective administration. In this connexion the Committee notes, however, that at the same session the General Assembly, in the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples contained in resolution 1514 (XV), declared that inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence.

26. The Committee notes that information on government covering the status of the Territory, the nationality of its inhabitants, constitutional provisions and development, the structure and powers of the territorial Government, and the participation of the inhabitants in the Public Service has been regularly included in the transmission of information under Article 73 e on the Territories under the respective administration of Australia, New Zealand, the Netherlands, the United States and, commencing in 1960, Spain.

27. The Committee welcomes and notes the importance of the decision of the United Kingdom Government to transmit political information on the Non-Self-Governing Territories under its administration, announced to the General Assembly by the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on 27 September 1961.<sup>9</sup>

28. In addition to the general statement on the principles which underlie the constitutional development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories administered by the United Kingdom,<sup>10</sup> the Committee had before it altogether thirty-five documents with a total of over one hundred pages covering political conditions in forty-two United Kingdom Territories. Since much of the information normally supplied by the United Kingdom Government for the consideration of the Committee had already been issued in summaries prepared by the Secretariat, the political and constitutional information on each of these Territories was reproduced in full as soon as it was received. This information varies from one page for Pitcairn Island, to eleven pages in the case of Uganda. A general pattern is followed in supplying the information, whether for small or large Territories. Usually it contains seven or eight major headings: population; constitution or status or recent history; the structure of the government, including the Governor, the Executive Council and the Legislature; the electoral system; judiciary; and local government. For a number of the Territories a section on future developments is included, which gives the most recent information on further constitutional advance. In a number of cases the names of the members of the Executive Council are given and the distribution of the political parties in the Legislature is indicated, showing the participation of the local inhabitants in the administration. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that the information supplied did not in itself provide a complete explanation of the constitutional position in each of the Territories, but provided what he considered was the essential framework of the various constitutions.

29. Some representatives, however, felt that the information supplied did not give a full picture of the facts and that the statement<sup>11</sup> presented an idealized picture of political development in United Kingdom Territories which was not borne out by the facts. Speaking of the political and constitutional information submitted by the Administering Members in general, another Member hoped that next year more specific information would be supplied on the following problems: whether the constitutional régime in the Territories recognized the importance of human rights and, if so, whether provision was made for judicial machinery to guarantee them and to protect citizens from any arbitrary action or abuse of power on the part of the public authorities; whether the constitution included such "social guarantees" as the right of the workers to form unions and if necessary to strike; whether the constitution included provisions concerning the ownership of the basic resources of the Territories and, if so, what the nature of such provisions was, particularly with regard to ownership of such resources by foreign business concerns or individuals; whether provision was made for an equitable and economic distribution of land ownership; whether the citizens were guaranteed, in law and in fact, the free expression of political views through political parties; what were the qualifications for citizenship and what were the qualifications for voting and being elected to public office; what political parties there were, their principles and trends and number of members; and, lastly, whether the political parties were able to function freely.

30. The Committee wishes to record its appreciation of the transmission of these basic data on the political and constitutional conditions in the United Kingdom Territories, and hopes that in the future additional and more detailed information will be supplied, especially on the activities of the political parties and groups in the Territories. The Committee also hopes that it will receive information concerning any plans to group Territories into federations or regional associations as well as information showing the extent to which the political, administrative and judicial machinery in the Territories is in the hands of the indigenous people.

31. A list of Territories on which information was transmitted for the year 1960, showing area and population, is included in annex II of this report.

POLICY STATEMENTS OF THE ADMINISTERING MEMBERS

32. As the Committee begins its new task of examining political information, it may be helpful to reiterate the general policy statements of the Administering Members concerning the development of self-government in the Territories for which they are responsible.

33. In the information submitted on Netherlands New Guinea for 1960, the Netherlands Government states that, recognizing the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of this Territory are paramount, it has set itself the task of assisting the inhabitants of Netherlands New Guinea to pass as quickly as possible through the successive stages of development, which will culminate in their complete freedom of choice regarding their future place in the world. For this purpose the Netherlands Government has outlined a policy which will permit the most rapid possible completion of the process that is to lead to political maturity and to the exercise of the right to self-determination. The Netherlands Government has in this respect adopted the principle that this objective can be realized in the near future only by systematically making representatives of the population participate in it, arousing their political interest and making them aware of their responsibilities.

34. In the information submitted on Papua for 1960, the Australian Government states that its "policy in the field of political advancement is aimed at promoting and fostering among the indigenous population an understanding of and competence in the operation of democratically elected representative institutions and the administrative machinery of government to bring them as quickly as possible to the stage where they will be able to manage their own affairs and decide their political future as a people." The statement continues: "If political progress is to be stable and lasting, training in the arts and practices of government must be sound and political changes should be related at every stage to the developing needs of the people. It has therefore been the policy to introduce basic training in the operation of representative and responsible institutions at the familiar local level and to work upwards from the village to evolve a series of democratically constituted local government bodies handling their own affairs." Addressing the fifteenth session of the General Assembly on 5 October 1960, Mr. R. Menzies, the Prime Minister of Australia, said: "We regard ourselves as having a duty to produce as soon as it is practicable an opportunity for complete self-determination for the people of Papua and New Guinea."<sup>12</sup>

35. In his opening statement at the present session of the Committee, the representative of New Zealand informed the Committee that "the policy of New Zealand as an Administering Power was to develop the islands to the limit of their individual capacity. The work of development was a partnership combining New Zealand technical and financial assistance with the efforts of the islanders themselves, and it is increasingly being carried out under the latter's control and discretion. The progressive transfer of responsibility—now far advanced—from New Zealand officials to the indigenous inhabitants has as its immediate goal the achievement of full internal self-government." He also informed the Committee that, as from 1 April 1962, his Government had taken a further major step towards increasing local responsibility by empowering the Assemblies of the Cook group and Niue to take full responsibility for the appropriation of subsidies granted to them by the New Zealand Government as well as of revenue raised within the Territories. With regard to the Tokelau group, he informed the Committee that consideration was being given to its inclusion within some wider grouping; he added that the outcome would, of course, be guided by the preferences of the Tokelauans themselves.

36. No statement of general policy was made as to the political future of the Territories for which Spain is responsible, but in the information submitted by the Government of Spain, it was stated that legally the Territories are not different in status from any Spanish province in the Peninsula, and that the inhabitants of both enjoy the same privileges. Fernando Póo, Río Muni, Ifni and the Spanish Sahara have the same right possessed by all Spanish provinces to be represented in the Spanish Parliament and in other public bodies.

37. The policy of the United Kingdom Government was expressed by Mr. Ormsby-Gore at the fifteenth session of the General Assembly on 28 November 1960 when he stated:

"... we believe that the peoples of dependent territories should advance to self-government and independence as fast as is humanly possible. We believe that new nations should be strong and prosperous and at peace with themselves and their neighbours. We hold these beliefs because, to us, they are manifestly right, and because we know that the peoples of these countries ardently desire these things. But we also hold these beliefs because they are in our own interests, and indeed in the interests of every one of us represented in this Assembly. If the new nations are strong and peaceful, they have a great contribution to make to world peace, which is indivisible. If they are prosperous and dynamic in their progress, they have a great contribution to make to the raising of standards of living, to the development of world resources and to the progress and well-being of mankind as a whole. These are the deeply and sincerely held beliefs of the British people. For many years they have guided our actions toward the peoples of countries overseas. On them will continue to be founded our common efforts, until we have achieved the goals of our policy and they, the peoples of these countries, have realized their national aspirations."<sup>13</sup>

38. At this session the representative of the United Kingdom drew attention to the explanatory memorandum presented by his Government<sup>14</sup> which set out some of the general principles lying behind the constitutional methods used in the advance towards independence of Territories for which the United Kingdom has been responsible. He stated that it was fundamental to the British approach to the question of constitutional development that each case was dealt with on its own merits and not in accordance with any general theory or plan. The first consequence of this approach was that it was natural for his Government to conceive of the larger Territories as embryonic nations. The second was that, given the basic assumption of distinctness, it was natural for British Governments to devolve as much responsibility as possible upon the authorities in each Territory. From the earliest time, territorial legislatures were empowered to make laws for all aspects of the Territories' internal affairs. The process of advance towards self-government, therefore, consisted of the gradual development of the indigenous institutions in the Territory to take over powers from the Governor, of the steady increase in the participation of local people in the legislature and executive, of the extension of the franchise, and of the transformation of the Governor from the head of an administration into the equivalent, in many ways, of a constitutional monarch. At each stage of advance, the measures taken were the result of a dialogue between the British Government and the representatives of the peoples of the Territory; and in this dialogue the contribution made by the representatives of the people naturally grew from the early stages in which the guiding hand of the British Government played an important part until the final stage at which the shape of the constitution was almost exclusively a matter for the representatives of the Territory. He concluded that the change-over to independence comes, therefore, not as a sudden removal of an existing authority, but as the final fading-away of an authority which has for some time been moving more and more into the background.

39. The representative of the United States informed the Committee that the pattern of political development in United States Territories was quite dissimilar to that in United Kingdom Territories. These dissimilarities reflected the differences between parliamentary government under a constitutional monarchy and a system where the executive and legislative branches were separate and distinct. Another distinction arose from the federal system followed by the United States which created a pattern of divided federal and state powers which finds a counterpart in the relationship between the Federal Government and the territorial governments. Under the United States pattern of constitutional development, following the development of representative institutions in the Territories, they could be admitted into the Federal Union as in the case, recently, of Alaska and Hawaii, become independent as in the case of the Philippines, or follow a different course as in the case of Puerto Rico, which became a free commonwealth associated with the United States.

40. In the information submitted on the Territories under its administration, the United States Government has stated that the general policy is based on support for the aspirations of non-self-governing peoples to govern themselves, in the kind of self-government or independence which would be genuine and lasting, with solid educational, social, economic and political foundations. In his letter dated 6 April 1962 to the House and Senate on the draft legislation to grant the Virgin Islands a greater measure of self-government, President Kennedy declared, among other things: "This nation is committed to the principle of self-determination and will continue to support and encourage responsible self-rule throughout the world and particularly in those territories under the jurisdiction of the United States."

41. The Committee notes these policy statements and its comments on them are to be found in the following section.

IMPLEMENTATION OF POLICIES

42. Since 1946, twenty-five former Non-Self-Governing Territories (twenty in Africa, four in Asia and one Mediterranean island) have attained a full measure of self-government and become Members of the United Nations. During the period from 1953 to 1955 the General Assembly considered and approved the cessation of the transmission of information on four Territories (Puerto Rico, Greenland, the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam) which achieved self-government by other means than by becoming independent. Recently Alaska and Hawaii attained statehood in the United States.

43. At this session the Committee welcomed the information that Jamaica and Uganda would become independent on 6 August 1962 and 9 October 1962, respectively.

44. The representative of the United Kingdom informed the Committee that the constitutional conference on British Guiana which was to have been held in May 1962 had been postponed and that a commission, including distinguished representatives of Ghana and India, would soon begin an inquiry into the February disturbances. He also informed the Committee that his Government was holding discussions with the British Guiana Government to enable the conference to have before it a formulation of local ideas for an independence constitution, and that the two Governments were also undertaking a joint examination of financial matters. He added that, provided these preparatory steps were completed in time, the conference would be held in July. The Committee took note of this information and hoped that a date for the achievement of independence by British Guiana would soon be set.

45. The representative of the United Kingdom also informed the Committee that a constitutional conference on Trinidad and Tobago would be held in May 1962 to consider a date for independence, which the Government of that Territory had requested should be as early as practicable.

46. The representative of the United Kingdom further informed the Committee that a conference of the Premiers and Chief Ministers of the eight remaining Territories of the former federation of the West Indies was at present meeting in London to discuss the formation of a new federation comprising Barbados and the Windward and Leeward Islands.

47. With regard to Nyasaland, the representative of the United Kingdom informed the Committee of an important announcement which his Government had just made. The three main points were: first, his Government acknowledged that Nyasaland was not prepared to remain within the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland but that it considered that before any final conclusion was reached a full examination must be undertaken of the consequences both of withdrawal and of acceptable forms of alternative association with the other Territories; secondly, the Government would appoint advisers to examine those matters with the Nyasaland Government and would conduct complementary talks with the Governments of Northern and Southern Rhodesia to consider possible forms in which the three Territories might be associated in the future; and thirdly, any association proposed must be acceptable to the three Territories and based on the good will of their peoples.

48. The representative of the United States informed the Committee that, following a request by all the political parties of the Virgin Islands, legislation was now under consideration by the United States Congress under which the people would be authorized to elect their own Governor and the Government Secretary, while the Government Comptroller, now appointed and supervised by the United States Department of the Interior, would ultimately be replaced by an auditor appointed by the Governor with the advice and consent of the territorial Legislature. He also informed the Committee that in February 1962 the Guam Legislature had passed a resolution declaring that Guam was an integral part of the United States and that it had no desire other than for continued association with the United States. This resolution had also stated that Guam desired to elect its own Governor and to obtain representation in the United States Congress. He also informed the Committee that in the light of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) the United States had undertaken consultations with the Samoan legislature, at the conclusion of which the latter had adopted a resolution asserting that the Samoans did not regard nselfs as a people subject to alien domination or loitation but valued their American nationality and not desire to take any action that would weaken relationship of the Territory to the United States of erica.

9. The representative of Australia informed the mittee of the reconstitution of the Legislative Coun-in Papua which provided for an increase in the iber of indigenous members. He also referred to extension of the local government council system ch was the means whereby the indigenous inhabitants d acquire political awareness and responsibility.

0. The representative of the Netherlands informed Committee of the recent establishment of a Terri-al Council in Netherlands New Guinea consisting twenty-eight members, of which twenty-two were enous inhabitants. Out of a total population of roximately 700,000, some 450,000 were under ad-istrative control and 250,000 of these were repre-d in the Council by sixteen elected members. Six bers, appointed by the Governor, represented 95,000 another four, appointed by the Governor on the mmendation of the inhabitants, represented a fur- 75,000. Finally, two members represented impor-minority groups. He added that this Council was g consulted on all aspects of future policy pertaining he Territory.

1. The Committee believes that in the development olitical institutions in the Territories care should aken not to impose any particular political system attern of institutions but rather that power should iven to the people to fashion for themselves the itutions which they consider most appropriate to r circumstances.

2. The Committee noted that in some Territories 1 as Northern Rhodesia and Bechuanaland where e are settlers, the composition of the territorial lative organs does not reflect the fact that the ority of the population is indigenous and that in e Territories political power is in the hands of a ority group. The Committee believes that those ns should represent the whole population of a ritory and stresses the need for steps to be taken nsure proper representation for the indigenous peo-The Committee also feels that the system of com-al representation which is used in some territorial latures prevents the development of a national t. It believes that other ways of protecting the rests of minorities should be sought.

3. The Committee notes that in some Territories, as Bermuda, Northern Rhodesia and Zanzibar, ight to vote is restricted in various ways. The mittee affirms its belief in universal adult suffrage urges that, wherever they exist, restrictions to the t to vote based on race, sex, educational or property ifications should be removed without delay.

4. The Committee also wishes to draw attention he possibility of some of the smaller Territories ning independence through federations or unions eritories or States. The Committee notes that such ibilities are already being considered particularly outh-East Asia, the Caribbean and in Africa. How-, it wishes to emphasize that such unions or federa- should be carried out within the provisions of eral Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) and should he result of the freely expressed wishes of the le. In this connexion, the view was expressed by e members that the participation of Northern Rhodesia in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland was contrary to the wishes of the inhabitants of the Territory.

55. Guided by the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples contained in resolution 1514 (XV), the Committee, while noting that the political and constitutional information supplied to it by the Administering Members indicates that an institutional basis for the development of self-government exists in most Territories and that progress is being made towards this goal, nevertheless, feels it necessary to stress the urgent need to accelerate the pace of development. The Committee believes that, in addition to examining what is being done in the Territories, it must now focus its attention on the speed of development.

VII. Educational advancement

INTRODUCTION

56. The Committee had before it the studies on education specially prepared for this session of the Committee by the United Nations Secretariat, UNESCO, the ILO and WHO,<sup>15</sup> together with the summaries of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter for 1960.<sup>16</sup> The special studies on education should be read in conjunction with this chapter of the report and are listed in annex III.

57. The Committee discussed this item from its 244th to its 248th meetings during the course of which statements were also made by the representatives of UNESCO and the ILO.

58. In accordance with General Assembly resolution 1332 (XIII), the Committee had the assistance of specialist advisers who were included in the delegations of a number of Administering Members.<sup>17</sup>

59. The Committee also received additional information from a number of the Administering Members on educational conditions in the Territories for which they are responsible.<sup>18</sup> This information was additional to that contained in the summaries transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

GENERAL

60. The Committee makes its comments this year on the information concerning education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories against a background of the advance towards independence by the Territories with which it is concerned, and within the framework of the General Assembly's Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples contained in its resolution 1514 (XV). Noting the General Assembly's declaration contained in this resolution that inadequacy of preparedness in the various fields of development including education, should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence, the Committee firmly believes that rather than obscuring the importance of educational development the declaration of this principle calls for more vigorous efforts in the field of education.

<sup>17</sup> These advisers were Dr. Ralph Bedell (United States), Dr. J. V. de Bruyn (Netherlands) and Mr. H. Houghton (United Kingdom).

61. In considering the information before it the Committee notes that some progress has been achieved. It notes, however, that a vast amount of work still remains to be done and hopes that the increasing realization of the urgency of the problem apparent in the Territories will very soon be translated into effective achievement.

62. As the Committee has itself pointed out in the past, educational development cannot be viewed or planned in isolation or separately from progress in other fields. Real and lasting progress can be achieved only through integrated development in all fields, political, economic, social and educational. The Committee believes that economic and educational progress should go hand in hand so that talents and skills developed by education may be usefully employed. The Committee therefore emphasizes the need for the integration and co-ordination of educational development with developments in other fields. In this connexion the Committee commends to the Administering Members the necessity of associating indigenous inhabitants with the planning and execution of educational policy wherever this is not already done.

63. At its eleventh session when it considered the report on progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories,<sup>19</sup> the Committee paid particular attention to the obstacles in the way of educational advancement. These obstacles, notably those stemming from a lack of adequate funds, are still apparent today. The Committee's comments on this and other problems together with its views on overcoming them are contained in the subsequent sections of this chapter. Here, however, the Committee would like to raise the question of the desirability of the use of crash programmes in education. The Committee has heard contrary views on these programmes, some advocating their use and others sounding a note of caution because such programmes are likely to lower standards. Because of the importance of the question, the Committee believes that this might well be a subject to which the specialized agencies having experience in this matter should turn their attention, if necessary, by initiating special studies or discussions of the whole concept of speeding up the educational process.

64. The Committee notes that in some Territories a system of schools based on racial discrimination still exists, particularly at the primary level. It welcomes the efforts that are being made to eradicate racial discrimination but regrets that they are mainly confined to the secondary and higher levels. In this connexion the Committee recalls the view it expressed at its tenth session that on no ground whatsoever could education on a racial basis be justified, and hopes that efforts towards the abolition of racial discrimination in education will be pursued with the greatest possible vigour.

PRIMARY EDUCATION

65. The Committee has always stressed the desirability of achieving within the Non-Self-Governing Territories the goal of universal, free and compulsory education, at least in the elementary and fundamental stages. The Committee this year notes that effective measures to achieve this objective have not yet been initiated in most Territories. In some Territories primary education is universal but in others the majority of children still have no opportunity to acquire an education. Furthermore, the quality of education in schools where no fees are charged is frequently less satisfactory than in schools where payment is required, and this is often to the detriment of the indigenous inhabitants.

66. Lack of finance, the shortage of qualified teachers and, in some Territories, difficulties of communications, have been mentioned as obstacles to rapid progress in this field. The Committee, while taking note of these factors, considers that much more could be done to extend primary education and, in this connexion, it reiterates its belief that phased programmes of development, closely related to economic and social planning in general, provide the best approach to realization of the universally desired objective.

67. The Committee also notes that few children who have completed their primary education go on to the secondary level and feels that one of the reasons for this is the low standards in primary schools. The Committee therefore feels it necessary to draw attention to the need to establish and maintain adequate standards in the primary schools both for their own sake and as a prerequisite to any large expansion of the secondary system.

SECONDARY AND HIGHER EDUCATION

68. In view of the pressing shortage of qualified indigenous teachers, administrators and professional and technical personnel, the Committee wishes to emphasize the urgent need to expand facilities for secondary and higher education. In this connexion it draws the attention of Administering Members to the conclusions concerning post-primary education reached by UNESCO in its study on this subject specially prepared for this session.<sup>20</sup> In particular, the Committee agrees that where a single native language exists in a Territory it would be advisable, wherever this is desired by the inhabitants, to recommend to the competent authorities that the language should be developed with a view to being used as a medium of instruction for schooling. The Committee also commends the plans that were drawn up for Africa at the UNESCO/ECA Conference in Addis Ababa in 1961<sup>21</sup> to the attention of the Administering Members.

69. Although there has been an increase in general secondary school enrolments between 1958 and 1960 the expansion of opportunities for secondary education has not kept pace with the demands. The information before the Committee indicates that the number of pupils at the secondary level is much below that of those receiving primary education and that in a number of Territories the figure is less than 6 per cent. The two main obstacles to more rapid expansion in this field as in the field of education generally, appear to be connected with financing and with the scarcity of qualified teachers. In keeping with the urgency of increasing secondary education the Committee believes that priority should be given to providing the necessary funds and teachers for this sector of the educational system.

70. In their efforts to increase secondary school enrolments, the Committee feels that educational authorities should guard against any tendency to lower standards. The maintenance of standards at this level is not only essential to the proper fulfilment of the role of secondary education in the community generally but also as a prerequisite to higher education.

71. The Committee also notes that a considerable number of pupils in secondary schools fail to complete their studies and that often this is because of failures in examinations. It believes that such measures as the provision of better specialist staff, smaller classes, better equipment, and curricula more closely related to local conditions would do much to reduce this wastage and raise the standard of work.

72. The Committee notes with concern that despite the generally low output of the secondary schools it is not always easy to place those leaving school in suitable employment. This state of affairs brings out only too clearly the desirability of widening the curricula and improving the quality of secondary modern schools on the basis of the real needs of the community. The Committee feels that too often in the curricula of secondary schools undue emphasis is being placed on purely academic education, whereas the most pressing need appears to be for technical graduates; it is therefore desirable to seek the most beneficial balance between academic and vocational elements in secondary schools. The Committee further believes that at this stage, the trend towards a pattern of technical education, integrated with education at secondary and higher levels, is to be welcomed and should be strengthened so as to provide opportunities for pupils to progress through the system. The Committee also believes that, whenever possible, it would be advisable to organize educational guidance as has been done, for example, in Hong Kong and British Guiana, where advisory committees have been established to estimate the needs of industry, and the private sector in general, in order to train the necessary technical and professional manpower.

73. The relatively small number of girls enrolled in secondary schools continues to be a matter of concern. In some Territories where social conditions still hamper the movement for better education for girls, the Committee considers that further efforts should be made to overcome them. Indeed the Committee is of the opinion that the whole question of education for girls calls for intensified efforts based on special planning. Such plans should take into account the need for more primary schooling for girls and for better equipment in girls' schools and suitable incentives, such as scholarships, should also be introduced. Furthermore, it would be desirable to increase the facilities for the training of nurses since this is one of the most important branches of professional training for girls.

74. The prospect of more rapid political and economic development in the Non-Self-Governing Territories has focused attention on the need for an expansion of university facilities. The Committee notes that the number of graduates is altogether inadequate to meet the demand for fully qualified professional men and believes that steps should be taken to ensure that adequate facilities for higher education are made available.

75. Most Territories still depend to a considerable extent on overseas universities although there has been an increasing tendency in recent years, which this Committee has encouraged, to develop and expand university facilities within the Territories. The Committee continues to believe that the development of local and regional institutions can best provide the numbers of graduates that are needed and is therefore of the opinion that the establishment of new university institutions and the expansion of existing ones should be pursued with the utmost vigour.

76. The Committee also notes that evening courses have achieved good results in some Territories and therefore suggests that this system be extended to other areas.

77. The Committee believes that agricultural education should be given an important place on the secondary as well as the higher level of education and that rural schools should have an agricultural bias.

VOCATIONAL AND TECHNICAL EDUCATION

78. In its comments on secondary education the Committee has already expressed the view that more emphasis should be placed on technical subjects in order to meet the growing need for trained personnel in the economic field. In this connexion the Committee notes that in most Territories facilities for technical and vocational training are available, but it feels that generally they are inadequate in number and in scope, even for present needs, and should therefore be expanded.

79. In this field of education, perhaps more than in any other, it is vital that the authorities be fully aware of the needs of present and future social and economic development. Fluctuating enrolment figures in existing technical institutions reflect the uncertainty prevalent in most Territories as to the particular type of development necessary in technical education. It is therefore of the utmost importance that planning in this field is closely geared to the plans for economic development. In this connexion the Committee notes the conclusion reached at the UNESCO/ECA Conference, held in Addis Ababa in 1961, that education should be planned continuously in relation to economic development and that manpower needs arising out of the development plan should be surveyed and the skills of various kinds integrated with expected needs. The Committee also notes that in its special study prepared for this session,<sup>22</sup> the ILO has suggested certain guiding principles with a view to ensuring that Territories which must quicken the pace of their economic and social development possess adequate and effective educational establishments, curricula and methods of training. The Committee believes that these principles are of primary importance in planning vocational and technical education in the Territories and commends them to the attention of the Administering Members.

80. With regard to the training of qualified medical and health personnel in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, the Committee had before it a report prepared by WHO,<sup>23</sup> containing information on developments in this field. The Committee notes that there has been a modest increase in training facilities, but considers that, for the proper development of the health services of a great majority of these Territories, local or regional training facilities for all levels of health personnel should be further expanded.

TRAINING OF TEACHERS

81. Perhaps the most serious educational problem throughout the Non-Self-Governing Territories is the lack of a sufficient number of properly trained teachers. The shortage of teachers is apparent at all levels and the Committee notes that it is generally recognized in all Territories as constituting one of the principal obstacles to educational advancement. The Committee therefore cannot stress too greatly the urgent need for effective measures to overcome this problem.

<sup>22</sup> A/AC.35/L.355 and Corr.1, paras. 4-15.

82. The goal in all Territories is to reach a system by which all primary teachers will have the equivalent of a general secondary education followed by one or two years of professional training. However, because of the urgent demand for teachers, transitional arrangements have commonly been made whereby students with levels of achievement varying from completed primary to lower secondary education have been given training courses of varying length. While emergency measures will be required for some time, the Committee believes that educational authorities should progressively raise the standards of these courses, and in this connexion it notes that there is a trend towards raising entrance requirements and increasing the length of courses. It is apparent, however, that the solution of the problem of providing enough trained teachers will depend ultimately on the degree of expansion achieved in secondary education.

83. At the secondary level where teachers are required to have university qualifications, most Territories rely on teachers who have been recruited and trained overseas. The Committee recognizes that until facilities for training local teachers have been developed to the required degree, the recruitment of teachers from overseas will have to continue. In this connexion the Committee welcomes the important contribution to the expansion of secondary education in East Africa made through the special recruitment of 150 teachers from the United States and notes that these arrangements will be continued. It suggests that the possibility of extending arrangements of this kind to other Territories should be considered. The Committee hopes that countries providing expatriate teachers will endeavour to ensure that the future careers of these teachers will be safeguarded.

84. The Committee notes with concern the grave shortage of local teachers at this level and that the principal reason for this is that there is an insufficient number of local university graduates. It also notes that many of the local teachers are sent abroad for training. To overcome this problem the Committee suggests that priority should be given to measures for training teachers in territorial or regional institutions.

85. The Committee is concerned to note that difficulties are being experienced in some Territories not only in attracting teachers to the profession but also in retaining them. The Committee also notes that teachers tend to prefer work in the towns, thereby creating problems in staffing schools in the rural areas. The Committee therefore believes that every effort should be made to raise the status of teachers economically, socially and professionally, so that able people may be attracted to and retained in the profession.

THE FINANCING OF EDUCATION

86. The Committee continues to be concerned with the difficulties experienced in the Non-Self-Governing Territories in meeting the high cost of establishing and maintaining adequate systems of education. It notes that some Administering Members have referred to the difficulties they are experiencing in some of the Territories for which they are responsible, in maintaining the educational systems at the present levels, let alone pursuing vigorous policies of expansion. The kind of expansion that is contemplated, involving the provision of facilities for secondary, technical, teacher training and higher education, requires a much larger expenditure per pupil than at the primary level. The problem of finance is therefore likely to become even more acute as attempts are made to expand education.

87. It also appears that in most Non-Self-Governing Territories the capacity for financing any considerable expansion from internal resources is limited. The Committee observes that with accelerated economic development, the mobilization of internal resources and the establishment of priorities for education, the problem of financing education will be seen in a different light. In the meantime, however, these Territories will have to rely on external sources. Financial assistance is urgently needed and the Committee believes that the Administering Members who have a special responsibility in these Territories will have to bear the major part of this cost, although as the problem is of such magnitude it may also be advisable to seek international assistance. In this connexion a suggestion was made by a member of the Committee that if the great Powers would agree to allocate a small proportion of their military budgets to educational advancement in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, it would be easy for them to give the Territories the assistance they needed. He also suggested that the Administering Members might perhaps do more to enlist the assistance of the companies and private individuals engaged in working the natural resources of the Territories.

88. In making these comments on the financing of education the Committee wishes to emphasize that in its view money spent on education is an investment in human resources and in the future.

ADULT EDUCATION AND ERADICATION OF ILLITERACY

89. The Committee notes with concern that illiteracy is still widespread among the population in most of the Territories. While recognizing that the extension of formal schooling, and especially of universal free and compulsory primary education, is the surest way to eradicate illiteracy among the population as a whole, the Committee expresses the view that even the most rapid extension of primary education would not eradicate illiteracy in those Territories where much of the population has already passed beyond school age and entered adult life unable to read and write.

90. The Committee notes that among the measures taken in the Territories to improve this situation, the most common are the organization of literacy campaigns, the development of part-time courses for the purpose of either extending studies or of completing schooling which had been interrupted, and social education among adults as a part of a general effort to raise social and material standards of living. The Committee also notes the development of workers' educational programmes in some Territories, generally under the auspices of government labour departments and international trade union bodies supported by technical advice and other forms of assistance from the ILO.

91. The Committee observes that, in compliance with General Assembly resolution 1677 (XVI) of 18 December 1961, the General Conference of UNESCO, at its eleventh session, authorized the Director-General to conduct a study on the planning, organization and execution of programmes for the eradication of illiteracy. This study will be transmitted through the Economic and Social Council to the General Assembly and the Committee looks forward to it with great interest. The Committee also notes the importance given to adult education by the UNESCO/ECA Conference held in Addis Ababa in 1961 and agrees that adult education programmes are essential in promoting understanding of the great social and technical changes facing the world today.

92. Bearing in mind the universally recognized principle that the development of human resources is the indispensable basis for economic development, the Committee emphasizes the urgency of raising to the highest possible level the capacities of the adult population as well as the pursuance of long-range programmes for the education of children. It reiterates its opinion that the programmes which are needed for the eradication of illiteracy and the promotion of adult education, if they are to be fully effective and enlist the interest of the people, must be linked with purposeful programmes of community development, which in turn should be co-ordinated with, and form part of, other essential plans for economic and social development.

93. The Committee feels that, in a balanced programme of educational development, the elimination of illiteracy and the education of adults for the fullest participation in the life of the community must be recognized as one of the major objectives. It is essential that this objective be given effective recognition in the provisions for the financing of educational development from all sources, national as well as international. It therefore commends this vital matter to the attention of the authorities responsible for education in the Territories so that they may provide for it in their educational planning and in any requests for assistance which they may address to the United Nations and to UNESCO.

94. In the task of eradicating illiteracy, the Committee believes that literate people in the Territories have a special responsibility in assisting their less fortunate fellow citizens and it hopes that in their efforts to deal with this problem the responsible authorities will make the fullest use of this valuable form of assistance.

VIII. Economic advancement

95. The Committee had before it the summaries of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter for the year 1960,<sup>24</sup> and the special studies on education prepared for this session.<sup>25</sup>

96. The Committee considered this item at its 245th, 255th and 256th meetings.

97. The Committee received additional information on economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories from a number of Administering Members.<sup>26</sup> This information was additional to that contained in the summaries transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter.

98. In its examination of economic conditions the Committee recalls the objectives of economic policy it formulated in 1954 and restated in 1960. Briefly, these objectives are to develop the Territories in the interest of all sectors of the population, to raise the standard of living by increasing per capita real purchasing power and to increase the total wealth of each Territory in order to make possible the achievement of a higher standard of social services and administration.

99. In assessing progress towards these objectives, the Committee notes that plans designed to promote the economic and social development have been initiated in a number of Territories. New plans have been put into operation recently, in particular in Kenya (1960-1963) where the main emphasis is on development of agriculture, including the provision of loan capital to farmers, and of agricultural advisory and research services; in British Guiana (1960-1964) where the main objectives are greater production and diversification of primary commodities; in Sarawak (1960-1963) where the principal aims are the improvement of economic and social services; in Mauritius (1960-1965) where the plan is intended to repair devastation caused by cyclones and to diversify the economy by encouragement of secondary industries; in Zanzibar (1960-1964) where the programme concentrates on public works and communications; and in Singapore (1961-1964) where the plan is designed to develop industries through public investment in infrastructure, transport and communications as well as by the establishment of industrial estates.

100. The Committee notes once again the dominant role of agriculture in the economies of almost all of the Territories and the fundamental importance of the development of agriculture as an essential first step in the process of economic and social advancement. In most Territories, the expansion of this sector of the economy offers the best prospect of wide-spread and effective results, and the Committee therefore believes that Administering Members should continue to give it their closest attention. The Committee notes the continuing sensitivity of the economies of the Territories to the vagaries of markets, particularly in those Territories whose one-commodity economies make them dependent on the international market for a single product, and who suffer from the effects of the instability of primary commodity prices, which have been steadily declining in recent years.

101. In the Committee's view, greater diversity of agricultural production both for domestic consumption and for export, should be a major aim of agricultural policy in many Territories. Diversification of local food production is essential for the improvement of nutrition in almost all Territories, where diets are dominated by the starchy staple crops, poor in protein and other nutrients necessary for health. Diversification is also necessary in the export sector of the economy since, in many Territories, revenues depend heavily on the export earnings of one or two major crops. While noting the importance of not disrupting subsistence agriculture at this stage, the Committee hopes that plans to diversify the economies of the Non-Self-Governing Territories will be vigorously implemented.

102. The Committee notes the efforts that are being made in a number of Territories to reform land tenure systems. In Kenya, for example, a new policy was brought into effect under which the Highlands Board was replaced by a multi-racial Central Land Advisory Board and the creation of racial restrictions on the ownership or occupation of land was prohibited. The Committee hopes that measures will be undertaken to bring about a more equitable distribution of land ownership in practice. In other Territories, changes in land tenure or the introduction of new methods of farm organization were intended to raise both the production and income of the indigenous rural population. This was being attempted in Basutoland by expansion of the Progressive Farmers Movement; in Gambia, through substitution of an intensive farming system for that of shifting cultivation; in Mauritius, through the organization of food-producing small-holders' communities; in Nyasaland, by the encouragement of master farmers and small holders; in the Aden Protectorate where a co-operative development scheme for irrigated cotton cultivation was started; in Brunei where the inhabitants of river villages were resettled on a voluntary basis, encouraged by free grants of land and financial assistance; and in Papua where restrictions on the acquisition of non-Native land by Papuans were removed. The Committee feels that these efforts should be encouraged and hopes that similar schemes will be developed wherever desirable in other Territories.

103. In view of the difficulties of promoting agricultural development on the basis of traditional land systems, the Committee believes that steps should be taken to replace these systems by those based on individual proprietorship. The Committee reiterates its view that Administering Members could render valuable assistance in the development of agriculture through the improvement of transport and communications, the provision of credit facilities, the organization and extension of co-operatives, and through general extension work for the improvement of existing techniques and the introduction of new ones to raise yields. The Committee recognizes that one of the obstacles to economic development is the resistance to change apparent in many traditional social systems. It believes that further efforts should be made to overcome this resistance through intensive agricultural extension work, and, in this connexion, draws attention to its comments on rural development in the chapter on social advancement.

104. The Committee recognizes that industrialization plays a vital role in the economic development of a Territory and at the same time provides a stable market for local primary products. While the relative importance of industrial production in the economy of most Territories has not significantly increased, the Committee notes that in some Territories a beginning has been made.

105. It is the Committee's view that the goal of economic independence will never be achieved so long as the economy of the Territories is largely based on primary industries alone. It therefore emphasizes the urgency of encouraging and establishing secondary industries wherever conditions are favourable.

IX. Social advancement

INTRODUCTION

106. The Committee had before it the summaries of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter for the year 1960.<sup>27</sup>

<sup>27</sup> A/5078 and Add.1-3 and 5-6, A/5079 and Add.2, A/5080 and Add.1, 5, 7, 9, 18 and 19, A/5081 and Add.2.

107. The Committee considered this item at 245th, 255th and 256th meetings, during the course of which a statement was also made by the representative of WHO. At the 257th meeting, the Committee decided without objection, to circulate a prepared statement on social advancement in Papua submitted by the representative of Australia.<sup>28</sup>

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

108. The question of racial discrimination has occupied the Committee's attention for many years and in 1961 the Committee submitted to the sixteenth session of the General Assembly a report in compliance with General Assembly resolution 1536 (XV) of 15 December 1960. At its sixteenth session the General Assembly adopted by resolution 1698 (XVI) of 19 December 1961, with deep concern that racial discrimination still persisted and that its recommendations, contained in resolution 1536 (XV), had not yet been implemented by the Administering Members: (a) to take steps immediately to rescind or revoke all laws and regulations which to encourage or sanction, directly or indirectly, discriminatory policies and practices based on racial considerations; (b) to adopt legislative measures to prohibit racial discrimination and segregation punishable by law; and (c) to discourage such practices based on racial considerations by all other means possible, including administrative measures. It also urged the immediate extension to all inhabitants of the full exercise of political rights, in particular the right to vote, and the establishment of equality among the inhabitants of Self-Governing Territories.

109. Information on the electoral systems was included in the political information transmitted to the Committee as well as in statements made by the representatives of the Administering Members. The Committee's comments on racial discrimination in connection with political rights and education may be found in other chapters of this report.<sup>29</sup>

110. The Committee notes that, during 1960, European, Asian and African workers in Northern Rhodesia continued to be organized in separate trade unions. It recalls the observations made at its twelfth session in reference to the adverse effects this situation undoubtedly has on social and industrial relations.<sup>30</sup>

111. The Committee also notes the conclusion of a committee, set up in Northern Rhodesia in 1958, to survey technical education and training, that under conditions then prevailing the African youth find whatever his ability, there are no means whereby he can enter the skilled ranks of industry. Despite the decision in 1958 of the subsection of the Apprenticeship Ordinance excluding Africans from the application of the Ordinance, no African had, by 1960, been indentured as an apprentice in Northern Rhodesia, with the exception of one who had been engaged on trial as a probationary apprentice by the Ministry of Works. This exception had not yet been followed by private employers in

<sup>30</sup> At its final (259th) meeting, the representative of the United Kingdom informed the Committee that his Government had recently announced the appointment of a commission of inquiry which is empowered to inquire generally into conditions of employment in the industry and into the dispute between the African Mine Workers Union and the mining companies in the Northern Rhodesia Copper its of ve ed, on- and of the 35,000 employed in the mines not a single African was apprenticed. The Committee further observes that there were no facilities provided Africans either for training or for technical education during employment other than "on the job". Learners were usually employed on a narrow skill and it was not intended that they be trained as fully fledged craftsmen but to work under the control of a supervisor.

112. The Committee on Information notes that Africans in Northern Rhodesia have been denied the opportunity to obtain training at the level between wage-earning staff and the upper level of management and professional skill, and concurs in the view of the committee established to survey technical education and training that the solution of this urgent problem requires the establishment of new institutions giving industrial and commercial training to all Northern Rhodesians alike. The Committee welcomes the information that the recommendations of this committee have been accepted in principle by the Federal and Northern Rhodesian Governments and the Copper Belt Technical Foundation and that a joint working party was at present considering details for promoting this policy whereby colleges would be expanded and developed to admit Africans.<sup>81</sup>

RURAL DEVELOPMENT

113. At its twelfth session, the Committee, recognizing that the majority of the inhabitants of the Non-Self-Governing Territories live in rural areas, gave particular attention to the problem of rural development in the Territories. Among the aspects considered were: land tenure and utilization, resettlement schemes, the improvement of farming methods, co-operatives, rural credit, and environmental sanitation. Information before the Committee at its thirteenth session indicates that, while comprehensive schemes for the more effective utilization of land, the resettlement of farmers, and the raising of standards of indigenous farming have received continuing emphasis in some Territories, in others the scope of programmes seems unduly limited.

114. Information on the co-operative movement and rural credit facilities reveal, in many instances, a continued growth in the number of societies, membership and activities. Rural areas continue to show the need for improvement of communications, housing, water supplies and environmental sanitation.

115. In most Territories much remains to be done if the rural populations are to play an important part in social and economic development. At the present time they represent the social group most in need of economic and social aid. The Committee has been informed that financial limitations and shortage of personnel have generally restricted the scope of programmes for the advancement of rural dwellers in many of the Territories. It considers, however, that a much wider measure of participation of the rural population in the utilization of rural resources can be achieved without a heavy financial outlay provided co-ordinated economic, social and educational measures are carried out, utilizing locally trained indigenous personnel. The Committee notes with approval the views of the ILO that "what the peasant community may need most in order to raise its output and income is a share of the advantages of technological progress. Deliberate efforts are needed to help farmers and other rural workers to improve their work methods and receive appropriate vocational training."<sup>82</sup> The Committee emphasizes its belief that the stimulation of basic incentives to fuller utilization of available rural resources can be achieved through integrated rural development programmes undertaken with government as well as local initiative. This, in turn, is likely to bring about new investment in rural areas.

116. Bearing these considerations in mind, the Committee regrets that the scope of rural development programmes in many of the Non-Self-Governing Territories has been limited. Extension programmes are, in some Territories, restricted by the meagre output of agricultural assistants from local institutions, yet extension is one of the most effective means of bringing about that increased measure of agricultural production and labour productivity which will make possible higher levels of living.

117. The Committee considers that progress has been made in stimulating and directing self-help through community development and other schemes. It believes, however, that greater efforts are required in order that all Territories may plan and put into effect comprehensive regional and territorial programmes for the more effective utilization of rural resources, both human and physical. In this connexion, the Committee commends to the attention of the Administering Members and the Governments of the Territories the resources available in the United Nations and its specialized agencies for aid in the formulation and implementation of comprehensive schemes for rural development.

URBAN DEVELOPMENT

118. At its twelfth session, in 1961, the Committee considered aspects of the process of urbanization in Non-Self-Governing Territories. It observed that the growth of towns has been rapid due to the needs of commerce, industry and administration, and that the expansion of the cash economy has brought about the influx of many people to the towns in search of cash wages with which to supplement the usually meagre return from farming.

119. A distinctive feature in African Territories is the flow of migrants to and from the towns and to neighbouring States. While this is perhaps a necessary and unavoidable stage in the advancement of certain Territories, it is also a serious impediment to their economic and social advancement and there is now wide agreement that the stabilization of labour is essential for the attainment of a productive labour force and satisfactory levels of living. The Committee reiterates its view that a policy of stabilization will require, among other measures, permanent and satisfactory housing, training of workers, better facilities for the education of their children and higher wage levels and other benefits. The Committee believes that reforms in land tenure systems in the rural areas would also assist in stabilizing the labour force.

120. Included in the documentation before the Committee at its thirteenth session was information relating to labour migration, housing, environmental sanitation, the situation of urban workers, vocational training and technical education, and measures taken in relation to other aspects of social development in urban areas. The Committee notes the need for efforts to provide suitable low-cost urban housing and to expand manpower training programmes and welfare services; such efforts should include the fullest use of all available resources—public, private and international—in an effort to provide a more adequate economic base to support the rapidly increasing urban population. In this connexion the Committee recalls the conclusion contained in its 1961 report that it is essential to improve conditions of economic, social and cultural life in rural areas in order to discourage disorganized and uneconomic movement to urban centres. The Committee therefore believes that in addition to a substantial increase in productivity, measures are required to improve social and cultural conditions in rural areas through comprehensive programmes of community development.

PUBLIC HEALTH

121. The importance of health in relation to social well-being and material progress in the Non-Self-Governing Territories has been stressed by the Committee at its previous sessions. At its twelfth session, the Committee, considering that very full data had been embodied in its report on progress in the Territories, decided to give particular attention to such aspects as trends in the indices of crude death-rates and infant mortality rates and the situation with regard to communicable diseases, environmental sanitation and nutrition.

122. If the levels of health in the Territories are accurately reflected in the indices of crude death-rates and of infant mortality rates, the information before the Committee suggests that on the whole these levels are improving. This is indicated by the downward trend of these indices, pointing to the fact that more human lives are now being saved from premature death than before.

123. The Committee observes that the improvement in health conditions which has taken place is a result of a complex of efforts on the territorial, regional and international levels. These efforts were in the direction of improvements in public health services, increased budgetary appropriations, and campaigns designed and carried out for such specific purposes as the control of a widely prevalent disease or the promotion of maternal and child welfare, and a general if slow rise in the standards of living. In addition, the Committee notes that long-term health planning usually accompanies the formulation and implementation of development plans in a number of Territories. However, the Committee believes that, in comparison with modern standards, much remains to be done to raise the quality of health services in the Territories. For example, water supplies and sewerage disposal systems continue to be inadequate in almost all the Territories. While recognizing that environmental sanitation is one of the most difficult public health problems, the Committee stresses the need for more vigorous action in this area if basic health problems are to be solved.

124. The Committee welcomes the steady expansion in the amount of assistance, the types of activities, and the number of Territories that have received WHO services and technical assistance. During 1960, for example, about two-thirds of all the experts and fellowships provided to the Non-Self-Governing Territories under both the Expanded Programme and the regular budgets of the United Nations and the specialized agencies, were provided by WHO. During 1961, the trend has continued. Fifty-four fellowships were awarded by WHO to candidates in the Territories, while seventy-three projects were under way in thirty Territories, thirty-three of which represent the joint efforts of WHO and UNICEF, and fifteen are also assisted by the Pan American Health Organization. The Committee notes the decision of the Executive Board of WHO to continue to assist the development of the health services of the Non-Self-Governing Territories and to emphasize the importance which WHO places on education and training of local personnel in sufficient numbers to meet their present and future needs.

125. Progress in health requires co-ordinated action in many different fields; until the peoples in the Territories are able to cope more adequately than at present with their own requirements, international co-operation in the form of well-planned and efficiently executed programmes of action will be needed for a long time to come. In this connexion the Committee endorses the importance of the task of providing advice to Territories, at their request, in the development of national health plans, including surveys to determine their needs. This kind of assistance is available from WHO with respect to the Non-Self-Governing Territories, if it is requested by the responsible authorities. The Committee therefore commends this assistance to the Administering Members as well as the territorial Governments. In this connexion, the Committee commends WHO, UNICEF and the various regional organizations for the assistance rendered by granting fellowships, conducting surveys, assisting in the control of endemic diseases, and providing a number of other health and social services.

126. The Committee wishes to emphasize the important role community development and adult education can play in the improvement of health by encouraging interest in sanitation, eradicating endemic diseases and sponsoring improvements in nutrition, clothing, child care and water supplies.

X. Preparation and training of indigenous civil and technical cadres in the Non-Self-Governing Territories

127. By resolution 1697 (XVI) of 19 December 1961, the General Assembly requested the Administering Members to transmit complete and detailed information concerning the training facilities for and the current strength, composition and state of the preparation of civil and technical cadres in the Territories under the respective administrations, in time for its careful examination and study by the Committee on Information at its next session.

128. The Committee had before it the special information which was before the Committee at its twelfth session,<sup>33</sup> the analysis of the written and oral statements by Administering Members to the Committee at its twelfth session together with the comments of non-Administering Members thereon, prepared by the Secretariat,<sup>84</sup> the summaries of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter for 1960,<sup>85</sup> special information on the subject supplied by the Governments of New Zealand and Australia,<sup>86</sup> and the special studies on education prepared for this session.<sup>87</sup>

129. The Committee considered this item in conjunction with its consideration of the items concerning political and constitutional information and educational advancement from its 244th to its 254th meetings.

130. The Committee was given additional information concerning the preparation of indigenous civil and technical cadres in the statements by a number of Administering Members.<sup>88</sup>

131. The Committee notes the measures that are being taken by the Administering Members in order to train indigenous civil and technical cadres both within the educational system of the Territories and by means of special systems of training. However, in view of the urgent need for qualified indigenous personnel in civil and technical fields, the Committee urges the Administering Members to intensify their efforts.

132. The Committee believes that the solution of this problem depends to a very large extent on a rapid expansion of facilities for secondary and higher education and for technical and vocational training. As the Committee considered these questions in detail during its discussion of education, it therefore draws attention to its observations on these matters contained in the chapter on educational advancement in the present report.

XI. International collaboration and technical assistance for the advancement of Non-Self-Governing Territories

133. The Committee had before it a report on international collaboration for economic, social and educational advancement<sup>89</sup> prepared by the Secretariat under General Assembly resolution 220 (III) of 3 November 1948, on decisions taken by the Economic and Social Council and studies made under its auspices which were of particular interest to the Non-Self-Governing Territories. It also had before it separate reports prepared by UNESCO and WHO on their activities in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>40</sup>

134. The report by the Secretariat covered the pertinent activities of the Council and its subsidiary organs, the activities of the regional commissions, the international technical assistance activities rendered to Non-Self-Governing Territories and the current activities of the Special Fund and the IBRD.

135. The Committee considered this item at its 257th and 258th meetings during which statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Ceylon, Ecuador, Liberia, the Netherlands and Spain.

136. The representative of the Netherlands informed the Committee that assistance was being provided in Netherlands New Guinea by WHO and UNICEF in campaigns against malaria and tuberculosis, by TAB and WHO in an environmental sanitation project and by WHO through the provision of study fellowships for doctors and medical personnel. Assistance was also being provided through the European Economic Community which was financing a series of projects linked with the development of the Territory, including medical training and agricultural and geological research. He also informed the Committee that his Government continued to benefit from its association with the South Pacific Commission and that his Government and that of Australia were continuing their co-operation in the administration of their neighbouring Territories.

137. The representative of Australia informed the Committee that representatives of Papua had participated in meetings and seminars arranged or sponsored by WHO and FAO. He also informed the Committee that inter-territorial co-operation in the region was continuing through the South Pacific Commission and that his Government was also continuing its co-operation with the Government of the Netherlands particularly through the use of training facilities on a reciprocal basis. He expressed the appreciation of his Government for the many services and facilities offered by the United Nations and its specialized agencies, and for the many reports and publications prepared for the information and guidance of Administering Members.

138. The representatives of Ceylon and Liberia expressed their appreciation of the valuable work being done in the Non-Self-Governing Territories by the specialized agencies.

139. The representative of Ecuador believed that the general trend of international collaboration for technical assistance in Non-Self-Governing Territories was encouraging and he congratulated the specialized agencies for their co-operation in this vital task. Referring to the work of ECA, he noted its discussions of the urgent need to modernize agriculture and its consideration of a preliminary survey of the economic and social consequences of racial discrimination which included studies of the problem in Angola, the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Kenya, Mozambique and Uganda. He believed that these discussions would be useful to the Governments in the Non-Self-Governing Territories and to the Administering Members. He also hoped that Administering Members would do all in their power to implement the resolutions on educational development adopted at the ECA/UNESCO conference at Addis Ababa. In the Caribbean area, he was happy to see the formation of the Caribbean Organization, the aim of which was to promote economic, social and cultural development in the area, and he hoped that it would succeed. He was also pleased to note that TAB had established a regional office in Port-of-Spain. He remarked on the valuable work being done in the Asian-Pacific area by ECAFE and the South Pacific Commission. The offer by the latter body to assist Territories to convene sub-regional study groups of island peoples to consider some of the common problems which confront them was of particular importance, and he was pleased to note that the first such study group had met in 1961. He congratulated TAB which, under its regular and expanded programmes, had allocated nearly $3 million for 1961 and 1962 for twenty-five Non-Self-Governing Territories. He congratulated WHO, UNESCO, FAO, the ILO, UNICEF and the Special Fund on the work done in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, especially by WHO, which he noted had supplied two-thirds of the experts and scholarships provided to the Territories under the regular and expanded programmes of technical assistance.

140. The representative of Spain referred to paragraph 24 of the report by the Secretariat on international collaboration for economic, social and educational advancement where it was reported that ECA had deplored the fact that Portugal and Spain had not seen fit to reply to the communications sent by the Executive Secretary in application of its resolution 24 (III). This resolution concerned the participation of Non-Self-Governing Territories in the work of the Commission in 1961 and the desire of the Commission to see those Territories represented by Africans. He stated that this report did not take into account a memorandum by the Government of Spain, dated 17 April 1962, indicating that it would comply with General Assembly resolution 1466 (XIV) of 12 December 1959 and resolution 24 (III) of ECA, which had been distributed to the members of the Economic and Social Council.<sup>41</sup>

141. During the Committee's consideration of economic advancement, the representative of the United Kingdom informed the Committee that, in July 1961, his Government had established a new department, the Department of Technical Co-operation, of which Sir Andrew Cohen was Director-General. The functions of this Department were to co-ordinate, promote and carry out arrangements for furnishing overseas countries with technical assistance. It worked closely with other government departments which dealt with technical work, including that of the United Nations specialized agencies. It had three divisions, one of which dealt with regional programmes of technical aid, the second with assistance in education, natural resources and social development, and the third with recruitment questions and plans to train public servants. He added that, since this Department dealt with both dependent and independent countries, any scheme could be continued without a break.

XII. Questions relating to the summaries and analyses in addition to those treated under the previous items

142. The Committee discussed this item at its 247th and 248th meetings. Statements were made by the representatives of Ecuador, Liberia, Pakistan, Spain, the United Kingdom and Upper Volta. References to this question were also made by representatives during the discussion of other items.

143. The representative of Spain expressed his appreciation to the Secretariat for the manner in which the summaries of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter had been prepared.

144. The representative of Pakistan regretted that the Government of the United Kingdom had not transmitted information on Southern Rhodesia to which he believed the Committee was fully entitled. He hoped that information on this Territory would be made available to the Committee in the future. With regard to the political and constitutional information supplied by Administering Members, he believed that this should include full and precise details so as to enable the Committee to judge the pace of development. He also hoped that the information before the Committee at its next session would include an indication of the next constitutional steps that would be taken in the various Territories and the approximate dates on which independence would be granted.

145. The representative of Ecuador congratulated the Secretariat on its work in preparing the documentation for the Committee. He also drew attention to the need for Administering Members to submit the information on the Territories for which they are responsible as early as possible, because any delay was detrimental to the work of the Committee.

146. The representatives of Ceylon and Liberia supported the remarks of the representative of Pakistan in connexion with the transmission of information by the United Kingdom on Southern Rhodesia and the content of the political and constitutional information submitted by the Administering Members.

147. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government's position on the submission of information on Southern Rhodesia had been fully explained at the sixteenth session of the General Assembly when it was stated:

"...the United Kingdom Government could not and cannot give what it does not receive. Under the constitutional arrangements which have been in effect for a generation, the Southern Rhodesian Government has been under no obligation to report on economic, social and educational matters to the United Kingdom Government. It has not done so. Therefore the United Kingdom Government had no right to demand it. It is this plain fact which has precluded and still precludes the United Kingdom from submitting such information to the United Nations."<sup>42</sup>

148. During its discussions of political and constitutional information, the representatives of Argentina, Ceylon, Liberia and Pakistan expressed regret that the Government of Portugal had not submitted information on its Territories and hoped that it would do so in the future. With regard to the submission of political and constitutional information, the representatives of Ecuador, Mexico and the Philippines expressed the hope that those Administering Members who had not done so would supply this information in the near future. The representatives of Liberia and Upper Volta expressed the view that Administering Members should not regard the African Territories for which they were responsible as part of the metropolitan countries; their evolution in these Territories should be towards independence.

XIII. Co-operation with the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1654 (XVI) on the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples

149. By resolution 1700 (XVI) of 19 December 1961, the General Assembly requested the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories submit its reports to the Special Committee on the question of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples (Special Committee of Seventeen) and to provide it with pertinent material available to the Committee on Information, including such studies prepared for its consideration as may be required for the discharge of the Committee's functions.

The Chairman informed the Committee that he had been in communication with the Chairman of the Special Committee of Seventeen and that he had been informed that any decisions taken by the Special Committee would be communicated to the Committee on Information. He also stated that the responsibilities assigned to this Committee by General Assembly resolution 1700 (XVI) would be carried out and that the report of the Committee at this session would be communicated to the Special Committee of Seventeen.

Co-operation with the Special Committee established under General Assembly resolution 1699 (XVI) on Territories under Portuguese administration

The Committee took note of General Assembly resolution 1700 (XVI) of 19 December 1961 in which it was instructed to invite the co-operation of the Special Committee on Territories under Portuguese administration. The Committee also took note of a letter dated 19 June 1962<sup>43</sup> from the Acting Chairman of the Special Committee informing the Committee on Information that the Special Committee was proceeding to African Territories to collect and complete the data necessary for the formulation of its conclusions and observations for submission to the General Assembly, and that in the interim, the Special Committee would prepare its report and submit it to the Special Committee of Seventeen and the General Assembly.

XV. Future work of the Committee

The Committee discussed this item at its 257th and 258th meetings. It considered a working paper prepared by the Secretariat<sup>44</sup> on this question which drew attention to the provisions of General Assembly resolution 1700 (XVI) of 19 December 1961 in which the General Assembly decided that the Committee would continue the political and constitutional information furnished by the Administering Members as well as information relating to the functional fields, and invited it to undertake intensive studies of political, economic, social and cultural conditions and problems of Territories located in the same area or region, where circumstances required individual consideration. The working paper also included a number of suggested topics on which special studies might be undertaken for the Committee's next session.

The representatives of Argentina and Pakistan stressed that the examination of the political and constitutional information submitted by Administering Members constituted the most important aspect of the Committee's work and that the Committee should therefore concentrate its attention on this aspect of its work at each succeeding session. They felt there might be some merit in reverting to the previous practice of examining information on the functional fields on a rotational basis, because of the limited time available. They also felt that the Committee should undertake intensive studies of problems in individual Territories in accordance with its new terms of reference. The representative of Liberia supported this view.

154. In considering the special studies to be prepared for its next session, the Committee agreed that, subject to the limitations of existing staff and the availability of information, the Secretariat should prepare studies on the following topics, priority being given to the first two: (1) the establishment and growth of central legislative and executive institutions; (2) the progressive introduction of democratic elections, including freedom of speech and assembly for political parties; (3) the preservation of a free and impartial judiciary; (4) the establishment of local government institutions; and (5) the training of local inhabitants for positions of responsibility in the legislative and executive bodies as well as in the Public Service. The Committee also agreed that the Secretariat should prepare three papers on economic conditions: one on government economic policies, another on economic activities relating to agriculture, industry, mining, foreign trade, etc., and a third on the impact of these changes on the mass of consumers.

XVI. Control and limitation of documentation

155. The Committee took note of General Assembly resolution 1272 (XIII) of 14 November 1958, which drew the particular attention of all organs and subsidiary bodies to the recommendations contained in the report of the Committee on the Control and Limitation of Documentation.

XVII. Approval of the report

156. At its 259th meeting, the Committee considered its report. The representative of Australia expressed the reservations of his Government concerning paragraph 51 of chapter VI. The representative of the United Kingdom expressed the reservations of his Government concerning paragraphs 52-54 of the same chapter because of the references made therein to individual Territories. Following the acceptance, without objection, of a number of amendments, the Committee unanimously adopted the report.

157. Having unanimously adopted the report for 1962, the Committee submits it to the General Assembly for its consideration and approval and requests the Assembly to invite the Secretary-General to transmit the report to the Members of the United Nations responsible for the administration of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, to the Economic and Social Council, to the regional economic commissions, to the Trusteeship Council, to the Special Committee on the situation with regard to the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples and to the specialized agencies concerned, for their consideration.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON INFORMATION FROM NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES (FOURTEENTH SESSION, 1963)

Introduction

1. By resolution 1847 (XVII), adopted on 19 December 1962, the General Assembly decided "to continue the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories on the same basis" as that established by resolution 1700 (XVI) of 19 December 1961, particularly paragraphs 2 and 5 of that resolution. In addition to resolution 1700 (XVI), the basis of the Committee's work, referred to in this resolution, is contained in resolution 1332 (XIII) of 12 December 1958.

2. In accordance with operative paragraph 5 of resolution 1332 (XIII), the Committee is instructed:

"...to examine, in the spirit of Article 1, paragraphs 3 and 4, and of Article 55 of the Charter, the summaries and analyses of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter on economic, social and educational conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories, including any papers prepared by the specialized agencies";

3. Furthermore, by resolution 1700 (XVI), the Committee is instructed:

"2. ...to examine the political and constitutional information transmitted by the Administering Members as well as information relating to functional fields, and submit its reports to the General Assembly with its observations and conclusions thereon;

"3. ...to undertake intensive studies of political, educational, economic and social conditions and problems of Territories located in the same area or region, except where circumstances require individual consideration."

4. In the same resolution, the General Assembly requested the Committee to transmit its reports to the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples and "to provide it with pertinent material available to the Committee on Information, including such studies prepared for its consideration as may be required for the discharge of the Special Committee's functions".

5. The Committee consists of fourteen members, seven Member States having responsibility for the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter, and an equal number of other Members elected by the Fourth Committee on behalf of the General Assembly. At the end of 1962 there were two vacancies in the membership of the Committee owing to the expiration of the terms of office of Argentina and Ceylon. However, because of the agreement between the Governments of Indonesia and the Netherlands regarding West New Guinea (West Irian), the Netherlands withdrew from the Committee. Honduras was elected to fill the consequent single vacancy in the membership of the Committee. The present membership is as follows:

6. The Committee held its fourteenth session at United Nations Headquarters in New York. It held eighteen meetings between 15 April and 10 May 1963. All members except Portugal were represented.

7. The Committee welcomed the presence of indigenous persons from the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the delegation of Spain and the participation of specialist advisers on economic conditions attached to the delegations of Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States in response to the invitation contained in General Assembly resolution 1332 (XIII).<sup>2</sup>

8. Representatives of the ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO also attended the meetings of the Committee and took part in its discussions.

I. Officers of the Committee

9. At its opening (260th) meeting on 15 April 1963, the Committee elected the following officers by acclamation:

Chairman: Mr. D. J. de Piniés (Spain);

Vice-Chairman: Mr. V. A. Hamdani (Pakistan);

Rapporteur: Mr. M. Norrish (New Zealand).

II. Agenda

10. At its 260th meeting, the Committee adopted its provisional agenda. The agenda<sup>3</sup> is reproduced as annex I to this report.

<sup>1</sup> The term of office of the elected members is normally for three calendar years and expires on 31 December of the relevant year.

<sup>2</sup> The indigenous representatives from Río Muni and Fernando Pó were Mr. Felipe Esono Nsue and Mr. Augustín Ondo Nchama. The specialist advisers on economic conditions were Mr. José Gómez Durán from Spain, Mr. P. Selwyn from the United Kingdom and Mr. Gilbert White from the United States.

III. Sub-Committee on Economic Advancement

11. At its 264th meeting, the Committee decided to establish a sub-committee with wide terms of reference to prepare a special report on economic advancement in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. The sub-committee was to take into account discussions in the Committee and to draw up observations and conclusions on the basis of all available information.

12. At its 264th meeting, the Chairman appointed Ecuador, Liberia, the Philippines, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States of America as members of the sub-committee, and the Rapporteur of the Committee and the representatives of the specialized agencies were invited to participate in the work. The sub-committee nominated the Rapporteur as its Chairman. The sub-committee held fifteen meetings between 23 April and 3 May 1963.

IV. Preliminary statements

13. At the 260th meeting, the representative of Spain expressed the reservations of his Government with regard to the transmission of information by the Government of the United Kingdom on Gibraltar over which his Government held sovereignty. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government had no doubts as to its sovereignty over Gibraltar and reserved its rights on the question.

14. At the 261st meeting, the representative of the Philippines reserved the position of his Government with regard to the transmission of information by the United Kingdom on North Borneo over which his Government held sovereignty. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that his Government had no doubts as to its sovereignty over North Borneo and reserved its rights on the question.

15. Later, at the 269th meeting, the representative of the Philippines drew the Committee's attention to certain portions of the Secretariat's report on political and constitutional developments in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. He referred specifically to some passages of the report concerning North Borneo<sup>4</sup> and gave the Committee an account of his Government's position. He stated that North Borneo was the subject of a dispute between the Philippines and the United Kingdom, and reaffirmed his Government's sovereignty over that Territory.

16. In reply to this statement, the representative of the United Kingdom stated once again that his Government had no doubt as to its sovereignty over North Borneo and reserved his Government's position.

17. At the 266th meeting, the representative of Honduras stated that her delegation regretted that no reference had been made in the Committee to the Swan Islands, over which Honduras claimed sovereign rights for historical and juridical reasons.

V. Political and constitutional developments

18. The Committee had before it the summaries of information on the Non-Self-Governing Territories relating to the year 1961, transmitted by the Administering Members under Article 73 e of the Charter, which contain a section on government.<sup>5</sup> Political and constitutional information transmitted by the United Kingdom Government, in accordance with its decision, announced at the sixteenth session of the General Assembly, was placed before the Committee in full.<sup>6</sup> The Committee also had before it a report prepared by the Secretariat giving a review of the policies of the several Administering Members for the political advancement of the Territories under their administration and the manner in which their policies were being implemented.<sup>7</sup> Where available, information was also included on the extension of the franchise.

19. The Committee discussed this item from its 267th to 272nd meeting. The Committee's discussions related mainly to the fifty-three Non-Self-Governing Territories on which the Governments of Australia, New Zealand, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States had transmitted information. Many members regretted that no information on political and constitutional development had been transmitted by the Government of Portugal on Angola, Mozambique, Guinea, called Portuguese Guinea, Cape Verde, São Tomé and Príncipe, Macau and Timor. The Committee considers that the general observations it makes in this report apply equally to these Territories. The representatives of Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan and the Philippines regretted that no information had been transmitted by the United Kingdom on Southern Rhodesia; the representative of Liberia also noted that while France claimed that French Somaliland and the Comoro Archipelago had attained internal autonomy, the Territories were still Non-Self-Governing Territories and France had the obligation to continue to transmit information on them.

20. At the 265th meeting, the representative of the United Kingdom restated the position of his Government that Southern Rhodesia was a self-governing colony and as such it was under no obligation to report on economic, social and educational matters to the United Kingdom Government. Nor did the United Kingdom Government have the right to demand it. The United Kingdom Government therefore could not transmit information it did not possess. In reply to this statement, the representatives of Liberia and Pakistan recalled that the General Assembly had rejected this position and had maintained that the United Kingdom Government was under an obligation to report on Southern Rhodesia.

21. At the 266th meeting, the representative of France stated that French Somaliland and the Comoro Archipelago were considered by the French Government to be self-governing and had exercised their right to self-determination in a referendum based on universal suffrage in October 1958. The only Non-Self-Governing Territory still under French administration was the New Hebrides, which was a Franco-British condominium with respect to which the French Government continued to transmit information.

22. In the course of the discussion, additional information on recent and current political developments in the Territories was supplied to the Committee by the representatives of the Administering Members who commented also on the general policies pursued by their Governments. The representatives of Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom reaffirmed the principles followed by their Governments for the political development of the Territories under their administration towards the goal of Chapter XI of the Charter.

23. The representative of Australia informed the Committee of the steps taken by his Government in consultation with the people of Papua to prepare them for self-determination. He affirmed that the Australian Government had accepted the principles embodied in Article 73 b of the Charter and that the rate of progress in Papua towards the accepted aim was now being regulated by the desires of the people themselves.

24. In September 1962, the reconstituted Legislative Council of Papua had accepted a suggestion to appoint a Select Committee for the purpose of considering what the next step forward should be and how it might be implemented. The Select Committee, which consisted of three indigenous and two non-indigenous elected members of the Legislative Council, had sought the opinions of all sectors of the population through interviews before drawing up its recommendations. These recommendations had already been approved by the Legislative Council and were being submitted to the Australian Government. The main recommendations were to introduce adult suffrage with a common electoral roll and to change the Legislature into a House of Assembly in which indigenous members would have a two-thirds majority. If the recommendations were approved by the Australian Parliament, legislation would be introduced to bring the changes into effect in 1964.

25. The representative of New Zealand informed the Committee that his Government aimed at bringing the Cook, Niue and Tokelau Islands to full internal self-government within the next two or three years, and outlined the main steps planned to attain this goal. Owing to the smallness of these islands and to their geographical situation, it had been necessary to develop political institutions to meet their particular needs. Both the Cook Islands and Niue were already well advanced towards self-government. The Legislative Assembly of each of these Territories was elected by universal adult suffrage and had powers to enact laws and to control all public moneys. In July 1962 a tentative time-table had been approved by the two Legislative Assemblies for advancement towards the immediate goal of self-government. The first step was taken later that year with the establishment in each Territory of an Executive Committee elected from the Legislature. Legislation affecting the Cook and Niue Islands was now being reviewed in order to remove progressively the remaining reservations on the territorial powers of legislation. The Executive Committee would be constituted into full-fledged cabinets by 1964. In the Cook Islands this step would be accompanied by the withdrawal of all but one of the nominated members of its Legislative Assembly. According to the plan, final measures would then be taken to enable each Assembly to enjoy full legislative power over internal matters. At that stage it would be for the peoples themselves to decide, in accordance with the principles of the United Nations Charter, on their own constitutional future.

26. The representative of Spain stated that the constitutional and political development of the Territories under the administration of his Government was set out in the information it had transmitted.<sup>8</sup> Following enactment of the Act of 30 July 1959 (as well as the Decrees of 31 March, 1960, 7 April 1960 and the Act of 21 April 1961) the Spanish Territories in Africa now had exactly the same juridical status as the Peninsula Provinces, and all inhabitants, irrespective of race, enjoyed equal rights. In Fernando Póo and Río Muni, where there was the largest settled population, the inhabitants participated in local government through elected councils at the village, municipal and provincial level. Popular elections to municipal councils had been held in 1961 and again in 1962, when half the membership had been changed. In the elections for municipal and provincial councillors, heads of families and representatives of cultural and occupational groups took part. The fact that Fernando Póo and Río Muni (Spanish Equatorial Africa) had the status of provinces did not deprive their inhabitants of the right to self-determination. In this connexion, he recalled the statement of the Spanish representative at the 1177th meeting of the General Assembly that "Spaniards respect self-determination more than anyone, but that self-determination must be genuine", and that in reference to Spanish Equatorial Africa:

"...if because of the remoteness of the area in which the inhabitants live or because of their special human characteristics they should one day wish to change their present status and the majority decided in favour of such a course, Spain would place no obstacle in the way of working out the future of these provinces with them."

27. At the 271st meeting, the representative of Spain, replying to a question by the representative of Liberia, further clarified the position of his Government on the question of the self-determination of Fernando Póo and Río Muni. He considered that self-determination was genuine when it reflected the authentic expression of the will of those who were to exercise the right of self-determination, and the Spanish constitutional law made provisions for such an expression. In reply to a further question by the representative of Liberia as to whether the right of the people to self-determination also applied to the Spanish Sahara, the representative of Spain explained that as that Territory had a nomadic population which fluctuated between 4,000 and 24,000, it would be difficult to hold consultations with the inhabitants. He stated that he would draw his Government's attention to the request of the representative of Liberia for clarification.

28. The representative of the United Kingdom recalled that his Government regarded the main Territories as embryonic nations and that it was fundamental to the British approach that each Territory should advance towards self-government or independence along its own lines and not in accordance with any over-all, preconceived plan. As much responsibility as possible was devolved upon the territorial authorities: the executive was given a wide measure of autonomy and the territorial legislatures were given the right to make laws for internal affairs. The process of advance towards self-government consisted, therefore, of the increased participation of the local inhabitants in the legislative and executive bodies, coupled with the extension of the franchise towards the goal of universal adult suffrage. At each stage of this advance towards self-government, the measures taken were based on consultations between the United Kingdom Government and the representatives of the peoples of the Territory concerned; and the contribution made by the representatives of the people increased until the final stage, when the establishment of a constitution was almost exclusively for them to decide.

29. The representative of the United Kingdom cited examples of developments in the Territories during the past year which showed the progress made in their advance towards self-government and independence; he discussed in particular the increase of indigenous representation in the executive and the holding of elections on the basis of a broader franchise. Nyasaland as a result of a Constitutional Conference held in November 1962, now had a self-governing Constitution. The Prime Minister was Dr. Hastings Banda, who headed a cabinet of eight elected ministers and one ex officio minister. There had also been increased participation of elected indigenous representatives in the executive in Aden, Kenya and Northern Rhodesia. Both Aden and Kenya now had a council of ministers. General elections were to be held in Kenya in May 1963, after which Kenya would have a full-fledged cabinet and a prime minister.

30. In Gambia and Grenada, new elections had been held to the legislatures on the basis of universal adult franchise, and in the Bahamas on the basis of a universal adult franchise with a limited plural vote on a property basis. In Zanzibar, recent legislation had removed the previous literacy and property franchise qualifications and the next elections, which it was hoped would be held in July 1963, would be on the basis of universal adult franchise. In Fiji, property and income qualifications had been eliminated and the vote had been extended to women. In Bermuda, new elections were being held on the basis of universal suffrage for persons over twenty-five years of age and a limited second vote for landowners.

31. Consultations regarding the final stages of advance of a Territory generally took the form of a constitutional conference. The Swaziland Conference had opened in January 1963, and other conferences were scheduled to discuss in the near future the constitutional advance of the Bahamas, the formation of a new West Indies federation (comprising the seven Territories of Antigua, Barbados, Dominica, Montserrat, St. Kitts-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Lucia and St. Vincent), the advance of British Honduras to full internal self-government and the request of Malta for independence.

32. The representative of the United States of America stated that although American Samoa, Guam and the United States Virgin Islands were situated far from the North American continent, the inhabitants of these Territories wished to attain internal self-government under the United States Constitution and in full agreement with the United States. All these Territories already had legislatures which had been popularly elected on the basis of universal suffrage and which had full legislative powers in local matters, including budgetary questions. These legislatures also had the power to approve or reject cabinet members or departmental heads designated by the Governor, who was appointed by the United States Government. In both Guam and the Virgin Islands, political parties played a major role in the elections. In all these Territories the majority of the civil service was indigenous, and in both the Virgin Islands and Guam the Governors were also indigenous. New legislation was projected which would enable the people of each Territory to elect their own governor.

33. The Committee records its satisfaction that since its last session, Jamaica, Trinidad and Tobago and Uganda have become independent States and Members of the United Nations.

34. The information before the Committee at its current session showed that at the end of 1962 the fifty-two Territories on which information had been transmitted by the Administering Members were at various stages of political development. At one end of the scale were Territories in which representative institutions were developed and the inhabitants already had a substantial measure of internal self-government. These included the Territories of Guam, American Samoa and the Virgin Islands under United States administration; Papua under Australian administration; Cook and Niue Islands under New Zealand administration; Barbados, British Guiana, Malta, Mauritius and Singapore, and, by the end of 1962, Kenya and Nyasaland under United Kingdom administration. At the other end of the scale were Territories such as Hong Kong where both legislative and executive powers were still held by the Governor. In Swaziland the only representative institutions took the form of advisory bodies, constituted on an ethnic basis.

35. Most of the Territories were at some intermediate stage of development with varying degrees of indigenous representation in the legislative and executive bodies. In many Territories there was still an equal number of official and unofficial members in both the executive and legislative bodies; but as the unofficial members were not necessarily indigenous inhabitants, the latter often formed a minority. In some of these Territories the indigenous representatives were nominated; in others, they were elected indirectly through traditional institutions; and in still others they were elected on the basis of some form of qualified franchise.

36. The Territories administered by Spain, however, which were constitutionally overseas provinces of the metropolitan country, represented a separate line of political development. In these Territories it was the position of Spain that the increased participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the administration of their own affairs was to be related to their educational advancement.<sup>9</sup>

37. The Committee observes that the political and constitutional advance of the Non-Self-Governing Territories generally varies in accordance with the concept of the Administering Member concerned of the final objective to be attained within the context of Chapter XI of the Charter. The Committee reaffirms its view, expressed in 1962, that care should be taken not to impose any particular political system or pattern of institutions but rather that power should be given to the people to fashion for themselves the institutions which they consider most appropriate to their circumstances.<sup>10</sup>

38. The Committee therefore welcomes the acknowledgement by the Administering Members who took part in this session of the Committee of the applicability of the principle of self-determination to the peoples in the Territories under their administration. It notes that in a number of Territories further steps are being planned to bring the people to the final stages of self-government in accordance with the obligations of the Administering Members under Chapter XI of the Charter and in the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. The Committee endorses the principle that the advance of the Territories should be in accordance with the wishes of the people and that political institutions should be kept under review in order to ensure that they meet the needs of the Territories.

39. The representative of Liberia pointed out that in Territories where the indigenous inhabitants had limited participation in the representative institutions, it was incumbent on the Administering Member to adopt energetic measures providing for their increased participation and to ensure that any political and constitutional changes introduced were in keeping with the aspirations of the indigenous people.

40. The Committee welcomes the introduction of universal adult franchise in Territories where previously property, income and other qualifications restricted the vote. It urges that the remaining franchise restrictions which tend to operate in favour of minority groups should be speedily removed.

41. The Committee finds that while there has been increased participation of the indigenous inhabitants in the executive and legislative organs of a number of Territories, in many others, indigenous representation is not yet adequate, and in some, for instance Swaziland, a parity still exists between the representation of the minority European community and the indigenous population. Northern Rhodesia also reflects a situation where the representation of various races in the Territory is not proportional to their numbers. Several members of the Committee pointed out that this situation was unsatisfactory and expressed the view that properly balanced representation could be established only after universal adult suffrage had been introduced.

42. The representative of Mexico stated that his Government had always welcomed all efforts by the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories to attain independence and it considered that the political progress was real only when the inhabitants of a Territory had the right to vote and were eligible for all public offices, i.e., when universal adult suffrage existed without any restriction based on race, sex, religion, education or economic circumstances.

43. The representative of Ecuador considered that in granting people the right to self-determination it was also necessary to give them the assurance that their freely expressed wishes would be respected regarding both the form of the political institutions they chose and their right to enter into federations and other types of political unions.

44. The representative of Pakistan emphasized the need for accelerating the pace of political development of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, irrespective of the pattern of advance set by the Administering Member concerned.

45. In its 1962 report, the Committee drew attention to the possibility that some of the smaller Territories could attain independence through federations or unions of Territories or States. At this session, several members commented on the vulnerability of the economies of most of the small Territories and the prevailing political stagnation. They urged the Administering Members concerned to provide increased assistance to these Territories to make them economically viable and to enable them more rapidly to attain full self-government. It was also suggested that the Committee should give more attention to the conditions prevailing in these Territories. The Committee welcomes the information by the United Kingdom that a conference will be held later this year to reach decisions on the formation of a federation of the West Indies. The Committee considers also that the advance of the Cook and Niue Islands towards full self-government shows that small isolated islands can also achieve political progress with the assistance of the Administering Member.

46. In conclusion, the Committee wishes to record its view that while a number of Territories have moved closer to the goal of self-government and independence during the past year, much still needs to be done. It was pointed out in the Committee that delay in meeting the aspirations of the peoples for a greater degree of political power had sometimes led to violence. The Committee hopes that every effort will be made by the Administering Members to enable the remaining Territories under their administration to attain full self-government as soon as possible.

VI. Economic advancement

47. At its fourteenth session, the Committee once more gave special attention to questions of economic advancement in Non-Self-Governing Territories. In response to resolution 1332 (XIII) and other pertinent resolutions, economic advisers were included in the delegations of Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States of America.

48. In addition to the summaries of the information transmitted<sup>11</sup> the Committee had before it special studies prepared by the Secretariat on major economic trends,<sup>12</sup> development planning and land reform,<sup>13</sup> some economic activities in selected Non-Self-Governing Territories<sup>14</sup> and labour conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>15</sup> It also had before it a report on IBRD loans and IDA credits for projects in Non-Self-Governing Territories<sup>16</sup> and additional information provided by the United Kingdom on land tenure reform in the African lands of Kenya.<sup>17</sup>

49. The Committee discussed economic advancement in Non-Self-Governing Territories (item 5 of its agenda) from its 261st to its 270th meeting inclusive. As indicated in paragraphs 11 and 12 above, at its 264th meeting, it established a sub-committee to draw up a report on economic advancement in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

50. The representatives of the Administering Members opened the discussion in the Committee with a review of the economic policies and trends of development in the Territories under their administration and described measures taken to bring about and maintain a steady rate of economic growth. The representatives of Australia, New Zealand, Spain and the United States explained that the Territories under their administration had small populations and limited resources, and were therefore dependent to a considerable extent on financial subsidies from the Metropolitan Governments. The representative of the United Kingdom noted that his Government also provided financial assistance in respect of the recurrent expenditure of a number of Territories under its administration which were in a similar situation, particularly some of the smaller Territories in Southern Africa, the Caribbean area and the Pacific Ocean. All the Administering Members affirmed that it was the continuing policy of their Governments to foster the economic development of the Territories, particularly through the improvement of agriculture, the development of suitable industries, and the provision of financial and technical assistance to help the populations of the Territories to attain a higher standard of living.

51. Among the non-Administering Members, the representatives of Ecuador, Honduras, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan and the Philippines took part in the discussions. Several of the non-Administering Members recalled the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples and considered that the rapid evolution of dependent Territories towards self-government was a vital part of the campaign to overcome all forms of under-development.

52. The Committee's discussion this year centred mainly on the rate of progress in the Territories and the extent to which the economic position of the indigenous inhabitants had been improved. The Committee was concerned that the available information showed that since 1959 economic activities in the Non-Self-Governing Territories had in general continued to rise at a slower rate than in the earlier 1950's; that most of the Territories were particularly affected by fluctuations in world market prices because they were still dependent to a considerable degree on exports of a narrow range of primary products, and that in a few Territories the approach of independence had been accompanied by an economic setback due to the slowing down of the inflow of new investments, and in some cases by an outward transfer of capital.

53. Among other problems, the Committee was also concerned that the information showed that the majority of the indigenous inhabitants had not yet been drawn into the more advanced sectors of the economic life of many of the Territories. Moreover, in Territories where the population included a substantial number of non-indigenous inhabitants, a considerable disparity existed between the per capita income of the indigenous and non-indigenous groups, in spite of a generally rising trend in indigenous wages.

54. The report prepared by the Secretariat on development planning and land tenure gave an account of the situation in a number of selected Territories. The representatives of the ILO and WHO informed the Committee of the interest taken by their organizations, the activities provided to assist Member States in development planning and the provisions made for assistance to Member States in this field. The WHO considered that health planning should be regarded as an essential part of an integrated plan for general economic development.

55. The representative of the ILO emphasized the importance of taking into full account the "human resources"—through the level of productivity, vocational education and training, management development and related questions—in the planning of economic advancement.

56. These and other problems connected with the economic advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories were discussed in detail by the Sub-Committee which, on the basis of its broad terms of reference, drew up observations and conclusions for approval by the Committee. In this work, the Sub-Committee was assisted by the representatives of the specialized agencies.

57. At its 277th meeting on 10 May 1963, the Committee approved the report prepared by the Sub-Committee which forms part two of the present report.

58. At the same meeting the Committee considered a draft resolution jointly sponsored by Liberia, New Zealand, Pakistan and Spain.<sup>18</sup> Under the terms of this draft resolution, the General Assembly would approve the report on economic advancement in Non-Self-Governing Territories and invite the Secretary-General to communicate it to the Administering Members, to the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, to the Economic and Social Council, to the regional commissions, to the Trusteeship Council and to the specialized agencies concerned for their consideration. The General Assembly would further express its confidence that the Administering Members would bring the report to the attention of the authorities responsible for economic advancement in the Territories.

59. The Committee unanimously approved the draft resolution for transmission to the General Assembly. The text of the draft resolution is reproduced as annex II of part two of this report.

VII. Educational and social advancement

60. The Committee had before it two reports prepared by UNESCO, one containing observations on secondary education in Non-Self-Governing Territories<sup>19</sup> and the other report on the elimination of illiteracy.<sup>20</sup> It also had before it a report prepared by the Secretariat on labour conditions<sup>21</sup> and a background paper on health facilities in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>22</sup> In its discussions the Committee took into account the information contained in the summaries of information transmitted under Article 73 e of the Charter for 1961.

61. The Committee discussed this item from its 269th to its 273rd, and at its 275th meeting. Statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Ecuador, Honduras, Liberia, New Zealand, Mexico, the Philippines, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States of America.<sup>23</sup>

62. At the 269th meeting, the representative of UNESCO introduced the documents his Organization had submitted. He explained that the observations on secondary education in Non-Self-Governing Territories supplemented the report<sup>24</sup> UNESCO had submitted to the Committee at its previous session. These observations on secondary education were made with special reference to the preparation of middle and upper level personnel and, in particular, the training of teachers at the secondary and higher level. The UNESCO had analysed the value of secondary education in many Non-Self-Governing Territories and drawn a number of conclusions. The representative of UNESCO also informed the Committee that on the proposal of the Director-General of his Organization, the Economic and Social Council had decided to include in its agenda an item entitled "World Literacy Campaign"; the report of UNESCO on its activities to eliminate illiteracy in the Territories might therefore be of particular interest to the Committee.

63. The UNESCO information on secondary education showed that secondary enrolments expressed as a percentage of the population groups aged 15 to 19 years fell below 10 per cent level in the African Territories, the only exceptions being the islands of Mauritius, St. Helena and Seychelles. The Asian and Pacific Territories had secondary enrolments exceeding 10 per cent except for certain island Territories, including Papua, the New Hebrides and the Solomon Islands, where the ratio was about 2 per cent. In the Caribbean area, the secondary enrolment averaged about 20 per cent.

64. The ratio of secondary to primary enrolment showed substantially the same differences between regions. However, some exceptions to the general pattern emerged for Territories where there had been a lack of development at the primary level, as in Gambia, for instance, where the secondary enrolment ratio to the primary appeared unduly favourable. On the other hand, where some recent expansion in school facilities had occurred, mainly at the primary level (e.g., Fiji, Northern Rhodesia and the Windward Islands), the secondary enrolments averaged less than 10 per cent or even 5 per cent of the primary enrolment. Secondary enrolment expressed as a percentage of primary enrolment for the school year beginning 1961 was 2 per cent in Basutoland, 3 per cent in Kenya, one per cent in Nyasaland, and 3 per cent in the Spanish Equatorial region. In the Caribbean region, except for Antigua, Bermuda and Dominica, where it was higher, the secondary enrolment ranged from 4 to 9 per cent of that of the primary level. The UNESCO figures for higher education were available for only three Territories in Africa, two in Asia, one in the Pacific, and for Malta. In contrast to the situation in Hong Kong and Singapore where the number of students at the higher level numbered over 6,000, there were less than 200 in Basutoland, less than 500 in Kenya and less than 100 in Mauritius.

65. The representatives of Australia, New Zealand, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States reported on educational and social advancement in the Territories under their administration. The representatives of Australia, New Zealand, Spain and the United Kingdom emphasized the importance their Governments attached to the development of education as one of the most significant factors in the progress of the Territories towards full self-government. The representative of Spain stated that his Government was on record as to the great importance it attached to the diffusion of culture in the equatorial region which would enable the inhabitants to administer and direct their own affairs. The Committee wishes to reaffirm that, rather than obscuring the importance of educational development, the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples makes it even more necessary for more vigorous efforts to be taken by the Administering Members in this field.

66. The Committee, at its present session, discussed the importance of secondary education and its relationship to primary education as a means of accelerating the advance of the Territories towards the goal of self-government and independence. The Committee welcomes the information provided by the Administering Members on the progress attained in the expansion of school facilities and the increase in school enrolment. It notes that in the Cook Islands and Niue there is universal, compulsory and free education and that all children begin school at the age of six; that the Territory of Papua is approaching a break-through in education; that in all the Territories under United States administration education is provided through at least twelve years of schooling for those who qualify, and that illiteracy has largely been eliminated. It further notes that in several of the Territories under United Kingdom administration education is already the responsibility of elected ministers and that in most Territories considerable progress has been made in the expansion of primary school attendance which in Kenya, for instance, amounted to 90 per cent of the boys and some 50 per cent of the girls in 1961.

67. The representative of Spain informed the Committee that in its Territories in the equatorial region in the past ten years there had been an increase of 40 per cent in the number of schools, 58 per cent in the number of teachers, and 312 per cent in the number of pupils. In reply to a question from the representative of Liberia, the representative of Spain undertook to supply further information on these figures.

68. The representatives of Ecuador, Mexico and the Philippines considered that the Administering Members had a special responsibility under Chapter XI to develop education in the Non-Self-Governing Territories. These representatives pointed out that, in spite of the progress in raising school enrolment, in most Territories primary education was not yet universal, free and compulsory. Serious shortages continued to exist in school facilities and more particularly in teaching staff. These representatives and the representative of Honduras stressed that constitutional development and economic progress called for unceasing and vigorous action in the field of education.

69. The Committee wishes to emphasize once again the need for more rapid expansion of secondary education, teacher training, and for technical and administrative personnel. The Committee notes from the UNESCO report on secondary education that there is a wide range of patterns in technical and vocational training in the Territories, but that there is a trend towards providing more general education or, alternatively, towards treating technical education as one stream of general secondary education. The Committee endorses the view expressed by UNESCO that the vocational and technical training programmes must be drawn up in relation to the development of industry and an apprenticeship system. The Committee notes that in Northern Rhodesia, African and European students are not offered the same opportunities for training in industry and that a commission studying this problem has suggested that in the country's interest there should be identical educational objectives for both groups.

70. One of the problems with which the Committee has long been concerned is the question of discrimination in education. At this session the attention of the Committee was again drawn by the representatives of Ecuador, Liberia and the Philippines to the continued existence of various forms of discrimination in education in some of the Territories although the problem was less serious at the secondary level and above. The representative of the United Kingdom told the Committee that at these levels integration had made considerable progress in the United Kingdom Territories and every effort was being made to eliminate any considerations of ethnic origin in education. As an example, he described the steps taken in Kenya to implement this policy. Both the representative of Australia and of the United Kingdom stated, however, that because of language and cultural differences certain difficulties still remained in the integration at the primary school level.

71. The representative of Ecuador pointed out that, apart from separate school systems, other subtle forms of discrimination remained, for example, the language of instruction was often that of the Administering Member, the terminal examinations were not the same for European and indigenous children and different subsidies were paid to schools serving different ethnic groups. He recognized that, while in some cases, the multiplicity of indigenous languages, different religious practices and selfishness born of feelings of racial superiority constituted obstacles to integration, he expressed the hope that the Administering Members would intensify their efforts to bring an end to all forms of discrimination.

72. The representative of the Philippines recalled the Committee's conclusion at its tenth session in 1959 that on no grounds whatsoever could education on a racial basis be justified. The Committee had expressed the hope that efforts towards the abolition of racial discrimination in education would be pursued with the greatest possible vigour.

73. The Committee has for many years emphasized the importance of the establishment in the Territories of institutions of higher education wherever this was feasible. It welcomes the comprehensive survey being made by the Government of Australia of the future needs for tertiary education in the Territory under its administration and the means of meeting those needs.

74. The Committee endorses the ideas and principles put forward by UNESCO for the educational advancement of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, as set out below. It commends these to the attention of all the Administering Members:

"(a) Every country and territory needs a plan for development, within the framework of which education must be planned. The balance decided within the educational system will vary from territory to territory. This is influenced by expectations of political evolution as well as by forecasts of social and economic needs. The education plan of each territory would also have to be related to the emergent regional education plans. As a means of achieving the educational goals set, the school curricula have to be reconstructed.

"(b) In secondary education, reforms may be difficult but are all the more important. The secondary school does not have as its sole, or even its main, function the preparation of students for higher education. Agriculture, commerce, industry, as well as the administration, require recruits from the secondary school. The programmes of such subjects as the sciences, in particular, need to be closely related to local realities. Specific vocational education should be based upon as much general education as it is possible to provide. In this regard, the recommendation on technical and vocational education adopted by the General Conference of UNESCO at its twelfth session (1962) may be found a useful guide.

"(c) Measures to remove discrimination in education, whatever the grounds, should be encouraged and increased. It is only by making the best use of all available talents in the territory that secondary education can adequately contribute to progress.

"(d) Every effort should be made to raise the status of teachers economically, socially and professionally, in order that able people may be attracted to and retained in the profession."

75. The Committee also commends to the attention of the Administering Members concerned the targets adopted for secondary education by meetings of the Ministers of Education of African Countries (Addis Ababa, 1961, and Paris, 1962) at which a number of Non-Self-Governing Territories were represented. The goal set for attainment by 1980 is to ensure secondary schooling for 30 per cent of the pupils completing primary education; or to enrol in secondary schools some 23 per cent of the population between the ages of 15 and 19. The Committee hopes that efforts will be made by the Administering Members, wherever possible, to start the Territories on the road to attainment of this goal.

76. The Committee notes with concern that in most of the Non-Self-Governing Territories where illiteracy exists, programmes for its eradication are limited to a few small areas, largely because adult education has not yet been accepted as a responsibility of the Government. Furthermore, while the necessity for over-all government action is being recognized, illiteracy continues to be a major problem in the Territories because of inadequate resources to combat it. The Committee endorses and commends to the attention of the Administering Members the view expressed by UNESCO that literacy education, especially as part of a well-conceived programme of adult education, is an essential element in the national education system.

77. The Committee also draws the attention of the Administering Members to the suggestion made by UNESCO that the long-term planning for the United Nations Development Decade should include provisions for the elimination of mass illiteracy in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>25</sup>

78. The Committee wishes to reiterate the view that speedy educational advancement in the Territories is usually obtained only when there is the widest and fullest participation of indigenous inhabitants in the bodies entrusted with the establishment of educational policies and programmes and empowered to vote on educational budgets.

79. The Committee considers that another important aspect in promoting education in a Territory is the proper formulation of school curricula which should be adjusted to the needs of the people and not simply follow the curricula adopted in the metropolitan countries.

80. At the 270th meeting, the representative of WHO informed the Committee of the activities of his organization in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.<sup>26</sup> He recalled that at its fifteenth session the World Health Assembly had authorized the Director-General of WHO to implement an accelerated programme for assisting inter alia emerging States, concentrating on national health planning and related training, medical education and training of national staff, and, lastly, providing operational assistance. Two other resolutions were adopted which are relevant to the Committee's work. One concerned malaria eradication, and stressed the need for the development of a health infrastructure; the other concerned the World Food Programme and called attention to the role of endemic diseases in aggravating malnutrition, reiterating WHO's readiness to provide assistance in this field.

<sup>26</sup> See also paras. 54 and 90 in part one and paras. 64-66 in part two of the present report.

81. The representatives of Australia, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States gave the Committee a general review of the social situation in the Territories under their administration.

82. The representative of Australia described recent measures taken to improve the public health situation in Papua as a result of which infant mortality had been reduced and life expectancy increased. Plans had been drawn up for the next five years for an increase in public health facilities and staff and in maternity and child welfare centres.

83. New legislation had been introduced regulating industrial relations. Since 1962, further measures had been taken to repeal the remaining legislation of a discriminatory character. Legislation regulating the consumption of spirits and beer had recently been modified to bring about equality between indigenous and non-indigenous persons and there was now a uniform censorship for films shown to Australian and indigenous persons and all were able to use the same cinemas.

84. The representative of New Zealand summarized the general social situation in the islands under New Zealand administration where the traditional social organization remained largely intact with strong family ties and its own system of social security. Destitution was almost unknown and crime and delinquency rates were low. The social or community development services were mainly concerned with organizing adult education and with health and housing questions. As a result of progress made in the public health programme, it was now possible to foresee the time when a number of endemic diseases would be brought under complete control.

85. The representative of the United Kingdom stressed the interrelationship of education and social progress and the importance of the elimination of illiteracy in the implementation of plans of development. He pointed out that details of measures taken in the fields of labour, public health, housing and social welfare were included in the summaries of information transmitted by his Government. He drew attention to the additional provisions recently made for the training of workers in community development and social casework, and enumerated some examples of the courses provided.

86. The representative of the United States told the Committee that the Territories under the administration of his Government all had a highly homogeneous population as a result of which there were few racial and cultural problems. The social security laws of the United States were in force in each of the Territories, and local legislation had been enacted establishing minimum wages and hours, regulating child labour and providing for unemployment compensation. Both Guam and the United States Virgin Islands had modern and adequate hospital facilities which were being expanded to provide for the needs of the growing population. In American Samoa a survey of the Territory's existing facilities and future needs had recently been completed and would be used as the basis of reconstruction work in the near future. In each of the United States Territories fundamental human rights were protected not only by the Federal Constitution but also by local legislative and judicial guarantees.

87. The Secretariat had prepared for this session of the Committee a summary of labour conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories relating particularly to manpower and employment, employers' and workers' organizations, wages and conditions of work, and labour administration and labour inspection. The Committee notes from this summary that the main features common to the Non-Self-Governing Territories are the following: (a) although wage-earning employment has become wide-spread in a number of Territories, in many others, a large part of the population is engaged mainly in subsistence production or the production of cash crops as independent farmers, so that only a small proportion is solely dependent on wage earning; (b) indigenous workers are mostly employed in unskilled occupations and in a large number of Territories, the majority, or at least a substantial proportion, of the wage earners are engaged in agricultural work; and (c) in Territories where migration for employment and settlement has created plural societies, there are, in some cases, integrated trade unions, while in others trade unions have developed and continued on a racial basis. At the present stage of development, therefore, government policy and regulations are important in encouraging and protecting the organization of labour.

88. In its consideration of social questions the Committee bore in mind the close relationship which exists between social and political advancement. The Committee's views on the role of health, manpower and education in development planning appear in sections II and VI of its special report on economic advancement.<sup>27</sup>

VIII. International collaboration and programmes of technical co-operation

89. The Committee had before it a report prepared by the Secretariat on international collaboration for economic, social and educational advancement, including programmes of United Nations technical co-operation,<sup>28</sup> a report on IBRD loans and IDA credits for projects in Non-Self-Governing Territories, prepared by IBRD,<sup>29</sup> and a report on services to Non-Self-Governing Territories in 1962, prepared by UNESCO.<sup>30</sup> The Committee also had before it a document submitted by UNESCO<sup>31</sup> concerning the implementation of resolution 8.2, adopted by the General Conference at its eleventh session, "The role of UNESCO in contributing to the attainment of independence by colonial countries and peoples". The Secretariat report summarized some decisions and studies made by the Economic and Social Council and its commissions and gave an account of regional co-operation and international technical assistance to Non-Self-Governing Territories.

90. The Committee considered this item at its 269th, 270th and 272nd to 276th meetings. Statements were made by the representatives of Australia, Ecuador, the Philippines, the United Kingdom and the United States, and by representatives of the specialized agencies. The representative of the ILO, at the 269th meeting, and the representative of WHO, at the 270th meeting, reviewed the activities of their organizations and the assistance provided to the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

91. The Committee notes with particular interest the participation of many of the United Kingdom Territories as associate members of the regional economic commissions. It welcomes the recent admission to associate membership in ECA of Mauritius and of Fernando Póo and Río Muni. The Committee also welcomes the importance attached by the Administering Members to the participation of the Non-Self-Governing Territories in international bodies, in accordance with resolution 1466 (XIV) of 12 December 1959, and expresses the hope that they will extend the opportunity for such participation by the Territories, either individually or as a group.

92. The Committee considers that the African Institute for Economic Development, the African Development Bank, the proposed African Institute of Public Administration and the planned African Common Market are of particular importance to the Territories in Africa. The Committee hopes that all the Administering Members will provide for the full participation of all the Territories under their administration in these bodies, as well as similar bodies, as appropriate, in the regions of Asia, the Pacific Ocean and the Caribbean area.

93. The Committee notes from the report submitted by IBRD that over the years the Bank has made a number of loans for projects to Non-Self-Governing Territories, many of which have since become fully independent. Among the Territories or groups of Territories which are now receiving IBRD loans and IDA credits, are: Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia, the East Africa High Commission, Kenya, British Guiana, Swaziland and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. The loans to Kenya and British Guiana are for agricultural development and land settlement; most of the other loans are for railway, harbour and power development. The Committee welcomes the assistance provided through these loans to the Non-Self-Governing Territories, many of which, however, have a substantial European settlement, and urges the extension of financial assistance to a wider range of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The Committee's 1963 special report on economic advancement points out that in many Territories the rate of development expenditure in the public sector is mainly limited by the lack of financial resources and it discusses in some detail the role of external investment in their economic development.<sup>32</sup>

94. The Committee took note of the comprehensive and detailed information submitted on programmes of international technical assistance to Non-Self-Governing Territories. It notes that the programmes approved for these Territories by TAB under EPTA increased from $2.4 million for 1961-1962 to $3.6 million for 1963-1964, representing an increase of over 53 per cent. Furthermore, it notes that in contrast to the predominance of programmes for health services in previous years, there is a greater diversification of the type of assistance provided to Non-Self-Governing Territories with a notable increase in assistance to Governments on development planning. The Committee observes that this trend towards a wider range of assistance is closely in line with the economic growth of the Territories.

95. Although the number of experts assigned and fellowships awarded under EPTA to the Non-Self-Governing Territories represents a small fraction of the total global programme, the number of experts to these Territories increased from 75 in 1962 to 151 in 1963 and the fellowships awarded increased from 18 to 50. In addition, 30 experts and 17 fellowships were approved for 1963 under the United Nations regular programme of technical assistance.

96. The Committee wishes to record its appreciation of the assistance provided to the Non-Self-Governing Territories by the specialized agencies, and expresses the hope that this assistance will be continued and expanded. The Committee suggests that areas in which the assistance of the specialized agencies may be particularly valuable include assistance by UNESCO for the promotion of universal, free and compulsory primary education; the improvement of secondary education and professional and technical training, and especially the widening of campaigns for the elimination of illiteracy; assistance by WHO for the development and implementation of general health programmes, campaigns against endemic diseases and teaching about health; by UNICEF in all fields of child and maternal welfare; by FAO for the improvement of agricultural technology, better utilization of soil, agrarian reform, and in the world campaign against hunger; and by the ILO for the application in the Non-Self-Governing Territories of international labour standards and for the preparation of labour legislation.

97. The Committee welcomes the increased programmes of multilateral financial and/or technical assistance to Non-Self-Governing Territories, including, for instance, the South Pacific Commission, the Colombo Plan, the Foundation for Mutual Assistance (FAMA) of the Commission for Technical Co-operation in Africa (CCTA) and the Special Commonwealth African Assistance Plan initiated in 1960 by the Commonwealth Consultative Council. The beneficiaries of this last-mentioned plan include all the dependent Territories in Africa under United Kingdom administration. The representative of Pakistan suggested that in the interest of the Territories themselves financial and technical assistance should be increasingly channelled through international programmes.

98. The Committee was interested to hear that, the British National Committee for the Freedom from Hunger campaign, had so far approved nearly 130 projects costing approximately £4 million, many of which were located in Territories under United Kingdom administration. The projects include, for example, a scheme in Swaziland for an agricultural college and short-course centre which will be financed in part by contributions from two towns in the United Kingdom.

99. The Committee also welcomes the information from the representative of the United Kingdom that his Government is now encouraging the Non-Self-Governing Territories seeking international assistance to communicate directly with the field representatives of the United Nations, and that arrangements have recently been made with TAB to make a regular procedure of such contacts and to extend this procedure even to the smaller Territories. The Committee wishes to commend this practice to other Administering Members as it endorses the view that it is important for the Territories to acquire experience in dealing directly with international organizations.

IX. Questions relating to the transmission of information under Chapter XI of the Charter and the summaries and analyses prepared by the Secretariat

100. In the course of discussions at this session, references were made by several representatives to a number of points relating to the transmission of information under Chapter XI and the summaries and analyses prepared by the Secretariat. Statements on this item were made by the representatives of Australia, Ecuador, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, the Philippines, Spain and the United Kingdom, at the 273rd, 274th, 276th and 277th meetings.

Transmission of information on Territories under Portuguese administration

101. By resolution 1542 (XV), adopted on 15 December 1960, the General Assembly considered that the Territories under Portuguese administration were Non-Self-Governing Territories within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter, and requested the Government of Portugal to transmit to the Secretary-General information on conditions in these Territories. The Assembly also requested the Government of Portugal to participate in the work of the Committee.

102. Many members of the Committee expressed regret and concern that no information had been transmitted on the Territories under Portuguese administration and that Portugal was not represented at this session of the Committee. Several members suggested that the Committee, through its Chairman, might consider steps designed to enlist the co-operation of the Portuguese Government in the work of the Committee and they reiterated the hope, also expressed by many members, that Portugal would transmit information under Chapter XI in the future.

Transmission of information on Southern Rhodesia

103. By resolution 1747 (XVI), adopted on 28 June 1962, the General Assembly affirmed that Southern Rhodesia was a Non-Self-Governing Territory within the meaning of Chapter XI of the Charter of the United Nations. At the present session of the Committee several representatives noted that in view of the decision of the General Assembly that Southern Rhodesia was a Non-Self-Governing Territory, the United Kingdom Government had an obligation under the Charter to transmit information on that Territory. They noted with regret that information had in fact been transmitted. The statements made by these representatives on the question of the obligation of the United Kingdom to transmit information on Southern Rhodesia and the reply of the representative of the United Kingdom appear in paragraphs 19 and 20 above.

Transmission of information on French Somaliland and the Comoro Archipelago

104. The question of the obligation of France to transmit information on French Somaliland and the Comoro Archipelago was raised by the representative of Liberia at the 265th meeting and was the subject of a reply by the representative of France at the 266th meeting.<sup>33</sup> Subsequently, at the 276th meeting, the representative of Liberia again pointed out that as the people of French Somaliland and the Comoro Archipelago had not attained a full measure of self-government, as envisaged in Chapter XI of the Charter, and were still under the administration of France, the obligation on the part of the French Government to transmit information in connexion with these Territories still existed.

105. At the 277th meeting, when the Committee considered its draft report, the representative of France reaffirmed the position of his Government as he had stated it at the 266th meeting.

Transmission of information on other Territories

106. At the 263rd meeting, the representative of Mexico noted that "the reports on Non-Self-Governing Territories submitted to the Committee were incomplete as far as Latin America was concerned, and that they covered only the United Kingdom colonies".

107. At the 276th meeting, the representative of the Philippines noted that Christmas Island had originally formed part of Singapore and the information transmitted by the United Kingdom Government had included this island. He noted that no information had been transmitted on this island following its transfer to the administration of Australia in 1958. He requested a clarification of the position of the Australian Government.

108. At the 277th meeting, the representative of Australia informed the Committee that there were no indigenous inhabitants on Christmas Island, and therefore, taking into account the provisions of Chapter XI, his Government had not considered it necessary to transmit information on that Territory. The representative of the Philippines pointed out that Article 73 was not limited in its application to indigenous inhabitants. In response the representative of Australia stated that he would report this observation to his Government.

Form and content of information transmitted

109. Both in connexion with the discussion on political and constitutional developments (item 4) and in connexion with the present item, statements were made to the effect that information transmitted by the Administering Members did not adequately cover some aspects on which it was essential that the Committee should be informed. In particular, it was suggested that the commendable practice adopted in some cases of including a separate section on recent political developments might be followed in respect of each Territory. It was also suggested that with regard to the information on the franchise in the Territories, details should be given as to the number of people who qualified to vote, as well as the number or percentage of the electorate which took part in the most recent elections.

110. Reference was also made to General Assembly resolution 1541 (XV) which enumerates principles relating to the attainment of a full measure of self-government by Non-Self-Governing Territories, and sets out, in Principle VII, the conditions to be fulfilled by Territories in cases of integration or association with other States. In this connexion, it was pointed out that no information had been transmitted by the United Kingdom regarding the proposed formation of the

Federation of Malaysia and the referendum held in Singapore on the question of its future status.

111. Some members also observed that in a number of cases the information provided by the Administering Members omitted important details which made it difficult for the Committee to have a clear understanding of the situation in the Territories. Further clarification was requested from the Administering Members on some of these points, for instance on the position of Spain on the self-determination of the people of Spanish Sahara.<sup>34</sup> Requests were also addressed to the Administering Members for further clarification on the exact number of indigenous representatives in the executive and legislative bodies of the Territories under their administration.

112. With reference to the information transmitted by the Government of Spain, attention was drawn to resolution 218 (III), adopted on 3 November 1948, by which the General Assembly:

“ . . . recommends that the Members, in transmitting information on the basis of the Standard Form, should notify such changes in statistics and such other appreciable changes, including the progress achieved in accordance with development programmes, as have occurred in the previous year and as affect the matters covered by Article 73 e of the Charter, bearing in mind that information already furnished on a previous occasion need not be repeated but that reference may be made to the appropriate sources”.

It was pointed out that the information contained in the Secretariat's summary on the Territories under Spanish administration did not provide comparable statistics for previous years nor did it contain specific information on economic, social and educational conditions in each of the four Territories concerned. At the 276th meeting, the representative of Spain informed the Committee that his delegation had taken note of the suggestions made.

X. Co-operation with the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples

113. As noted in paragraph 4 above, by resolution 1700 (XVI), the General Assembly had requested the Committee on Information to co-operate with the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Furthermore, by resolution 1654 (XVI), the General Assembly had also requested the Committee on Information to assist the Special Committee in its work.

114. In the light of these requests by the General Assembly, the Committee considered in what way it could best assist the Special Committee in the discharge of its mandates. Statements on this item were made by the representatives of Australia, Ecuador, Mexico and Pakistan.

115. The consensus of the Committee was that the General Assembly had not intended that the Committee on Non-Self-Governing Territories should be in any way subordinate to the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. The Committee considers that its special function is to assist the General Assembly in the examination of the information transmitted under Chapter XI of the Charter, in the context of the advance of the Territories towards the goal of self-government or independence. In discharging this function, the Committee's work does not duplicate that performed by other organs or other Committees of the General Assembly.

116. At its 276th meeting, the Committee agreed that it would transmit to the Special Committee, through the normal channels, the Committee's report on its fourteenth session, its 1963 report on economic advancement and the documents prepared for the Committee by the Secretariat and the specialized agencies. The Committee wishes to assure the Special Committee of its full co-operation. The view was expressed that there should be closer consultation between the two bodies and that, in turn, the Special Committee on the Situation with regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples might transmit through the normal channels those of its own documents which might be useful for the work of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

XI. Future work of the Committee

117. In his opening statement on 15 April 1963, the Chairman drew the attention of the Committee to paragraph 2 of resolution 1847 (XVII) by which the General Assembly decided that “in the light of rapid progress required for the accession of Non-Self-Governing Territories to independence it would review the situation at its eighteenth session with a view to taking a decision on the further continuation of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories”. He pointed out that in this resolution and in resolution 1700 (XVI) the General Assembly had recognized the useful role of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories in the attainment of the objectives contained in Chapter XI of the Charter. He suggested that at a suitable time the Committee might consider whether it wished to submit to the General Assembly some observations on the question of its own continuation.

118. When the Committee took up the item on its future work, the representatives of Australia, Ecuador, Liberia, Mexico, Pakistan, the Philippines, Spain and the United Kingdom expressed their views on the question of the Committee's continuation.

119. The following paragraphs summarize in a composite form the views in support of the continuation of the Committee as they emerged from these statements. Some of the arguments adduced were not necessarily supported by all members who spoke. The individual views of each member appear in the summary records of the 272nd and the 274th to 276th meetings.

120. Under Chapter XI of the Charter, the United Nations had special responsibilities to the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and the Committee on Information had been appointed to assist the General Assembly in carrying out these functions. Since 1947, in addition to examining information transmitted by the Administering Members, the Committee had been called upon to study a number of special questions relating to their obligations under Chapter XI of the Charter. The Committee's work had led to the adoption by the General Assembly of resolution 742 (VIII) of 27 November 1953 on the factors which should be taken into account in deciding whether a Territory is or is not a Territory whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government, and resolution 1541 (XV) of 15 December 1960 on the principles which should guide Members in determining whether or not an obligation exists to transmit information under Article 73 e of the Charter.

121. The work of the Committee on Information had no doubt contributed to the accelerated advance of the peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories, and, indeed, to the adoption in December 1960 of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples. The General Assembly had adopted resolutions 1541 (XV) and 1542 (XV), relating to the transmission of information under Article 73 e of the Charter, following its approval of the Declaration. Similarly, in 1961, the General Assembly had adopted resolution 1700 (XVI) renewing the Committee on Information, after its adoption of resolution 1654 (XVI), establishing the Special Committee. It was evident that the General Assembly had not considered that its Charter responsibilities relating to Non-Self-Governing Territories had ceased and had not intended the implementation of the Declaration to supersede the work of the Committee on Information.

122. The Special Committee established under resolution 1654 (XVI) had inevitably been immediately concerned with Territories nearing independence and with those where special problems had arisen. Apart from such Territories, there were, as the Committee has observed in its present report,<sup>35</sup> still a large number of Territories, many of them very small, for which the attainment of the objectives of Chapter XI might take different forms. The fate of the small Territories, many of which had a population under 100,000,<sup>36</sup> was a problem to which the Committee's attention had been increasingly drawn as the larger Territories approached independence. Moreover, in Africa and the adjacent islands colonialism remained a major problem. Some members pointed out that on the continent of Africa there were still Basutoland, Bechuanaland, Gambia, Kenya, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, Southern Rhodesia, Swaziland and Zanzibar under United Kingdom administration; Fernando Pô, Ifni, Río Muni and Spanish Sahara under Spanish administration; and Angola, Mozambique and Portuguese Guinea under Portuguese administration. To this had to be added, among others, the islands of Mauritius, Seychelles, São Tomé and Príncipe and Cape Verde, bringing the total to some twenty-four Territories, with over 30 million people.

123. The United Nations had a continuing responsibility towards all peoples who had not yet attained a full measure of self-government, irrespective of the size of the Territory in which they lived. At the present session of the Committee a proposal had in fact been made that a study be undertaken on the problems of the small Territories and that if the Committee were to be continued it should examine this situation at its next session.

124. The Committee on Information, because of its balanced composition, had a special competence to evaluate the information transmitted and to study the problems of Non-Self-Governing Territories. Although its work could be considered to be of a more technical nature, this work had been of value in the past and would continue to be important so long as there were Non-Self-Governing Territories. For all these reasons the consensus was that the Committee should be continued.

125. The representative of the Philippines considered that at the appropriate time the functions of the Committee on Information should be taken over by the Special Committee established by resolution 1654 (XVI). He referred to the Secretary-General's introduction to his report on the work of the organization for the period from 16 June 1961 to 15 June 1962 in which such a reference had been made. The representative of the Philippines explained that, in his view, the Committee on Information had been restricted by its terms of reference and had not been able to make recommendations on individual Territories. However, as the Special Committee was seized with many urgent problems and emergency situations in various Territories, it did not seem likely that that body would be able to find time to examine the information transmitted under Chapter XI of the Charter. His delegation would therefore not oppose the continuation of the Committee on Information, pending the time when the Special Committee could take over the functions of examining the information transmitted.

126. The United Kingdom representative observed that while the reservations made by his Government in the past concerning the Committee still applied, he recognized that it had performed a useful task and he had noted the arguments adduced in favour of its continuation.

127. At the 272nd meeting, the representative of Ecuador suggested that without prejudice to the question of its continuation, the Committee might tentatively consider a programme of future work. Accordingly, he requested the Secretariat to submit an outline for the work to be undertaken in 1964 if the Committee were continued.

128. The programme of future work submitted by the Secretariat<sup>37</sup> suggested that in 1964, subject to the review to be undertaken by the General Assembly in accordance with operative paragraph 2 of resolution 1847 (XVII), the Committee might give more detailed attention to those aspects of educational advancement which could assist the Non-Self-Governing Territories in the attainment of a full measure of self-government. It was suggested that the documents to be submitted to the Committee might cover: (a) the training of teachers, the existing facilities in the Territories and the status of the teaching profession, taking into account the plans proposed by UNESCO; (b) the expansion of primary education through the introduction of short-term and long-term plans aimed at the establishment of universal primary education; and (c) educational planning for citizenship and leadership training.

129. The Secretariat paper noted that in the field of political and constitutional developments in the Territories, various topics, including the establishment of local institutions in the Territories, had been suggested for further study. In the light of the discussions at the present session of the Committee, where special emphasis had been given by many Members to developments in the small Territories, the Secretariat suggested that the paper to be submitted might also attempt to give special attention to such developments, taking into account the degree to which political and economic factors in these Territories may influence each other, and the extent to which, within this framework, the welfare and self-determination of the peoples of these Territories have been promoted.

130. Two other papers were suggested: one covering important aspects of health, and particularly the provision of rural health services; and another on labour conditions, including wage rates and the development of trade unions.

131. At the 275th meeting, the representative of the United Kingdom noted that in accordance with the triennial cycle of work previously established, the Committee would normally give particular attention to social advancement in 1964. He stated that his delegation would support the continuation of the established practice and suggested that the study on health matters might be given greater weight and discussed in the context of social development. He expressed the hope that WHO would be fully associated with the preparation of this study. He further suggested that a study should cover the development of local government.

132. The suggestions of the representative of the United Kingdom were supported by the representative of Australia. The representatives of Ecuador, Pakistan and the Philippines agreed with the preparation of the papers suggested, if it was understood that the Committee would not necessarily devote special attention solely to social advancement. They also supported the suggestion that a study should be made of the possibilities of political, constitutional or economic associations by smaller Territories so that they might attain more rapid progress.

133. At the 276th meeting, the Under-Secretary for the Department of Trusteeship and Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories stated that, subject to the availability of pertinent information and the limitation of staff, the Secretariat would prepare the studies as tentatively outlined in document A/AC.35/L.380, taking into account the views expressed by members of the Committee. These studies would be prepared in full collaboration with the specialized agencies concerned which the Committee invited to co-operate in its work.

134. In approving the tentative programme of work to be undertaken by the Secretariat, the Committee took into account General Assembly resolution 1272 (XIII) on the control and limitation of documentation on which an item had been included in its agenda (item 11), in accordance with the terms of that resolution.

XII. Adoption of the report

135. At its 277th meeting, after accepting a number of amendments, the Committee unanimously adopted its report, which is submitted to the General Assembly at its eighteenth session.

REPORT ON ECONOMIC ADVANCEMENT IN NON-SELF-GOVERNING TERRITORIES

Introduction<sup>1</sup>

1. In 1963 the Committee on Information made its fifth review of economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories since 1951. In accordance with its terms of reference, as set out in various General Assembly resolutions,<sup>2</sup> the Committee has regularly examined economic conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories at three-year intervals, in 1951, 1954, 1957 and 1960.<sup>3</sup> In 1960, the Committee also reviewed the progress achieved in the Non-Self-Governing Territories under the Charter on the basis of a special report<sup>4</sup> prepared for the General Assembly, and included a survey of economic conditions in its observations and conclusions.<sup>5</sup>

2. The Committee undertook its task in 1963 within the framework of its new terms of reference laid down by the General Assembly at its sixteenth session,<sup>6</sup> and bearing in mind the principles contained in the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples as contained in resolution 1514 (XV), adopted by the General Assembly on 14 December 1960.

3. The Committee had before it three economic studies prepared by the Secretariat of the United Nations, as well as summaries of the information transmitted by the Administering Members providing data on economic conditions in the Territories relating in general to the period 1959/1960 to 1961/1962. The studies are listed in annex I and, together with the summary records of the Committee's discussions, should be read in conjunction with the present report. It also had before it a report on Kenya prepared by IBRD.<sup>7</sup> In addition, a number of papers prepared for the Economic Commission for Africa on this subject were found to be of considerable interest.

4. This material was considered by the Committee in the light of the principles contained in Chapter XI of the Charter and the obligations undertaken by the Administering Members thereunder. In this connexion, several non-Administering Members emphasized the importance of the implementation of the Declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples and recalled the principle established by the General Assembly that inadequacy of political, economic, social or educational preparedness should never serve as a pretext for delaying independence.

5. Taking into account the assistance provided by the Administering Members to the Territories under their administration, the Committee considers that, within the spirit of the Declaration, it is the responsibility of the Administering Members to accelerate the economic development of these Territories, to make their economies ever more viable, and to ensure the continued economic growth of the Territories. The fundamental aim of economic policy, no less than in 1954 when the Committee first stated it, must still be "to develop these Territories in the interest of all sectors of the population, to raise the standard of living by increasing individual real purchasing power, and to increase the total wealth of each Territory in order to make possible a higher standard of social services and administration".<sup>8</sup>

I. General policies and trends

6. Most of the Territories, are economically underdeveloped and their economies are mainly based on the production of primary products for home consumption or export. There are also a few Territories which are dependent on other specialized forms of economic activity, such as entrepôt trade, tourism or manufacturing industry. A substantial portion of the proceeds from the exports of the Non-Self-Governing Territories continues to be devoted to imports of consumer as well as capital goods from countries enjoying a higher level of economic development.

7. At the present session of the Committee, some of the Administering Members made general policy statements concerning economic advancement in the Territories under their administration.

8. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that it was the policy of his Government to assist the Territories, through both technical and

<sup>1</sup> The draft of the present report was prepared by a sub-committee of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories composed of the representatives of Ecuador, Liberia, the Philippines, Spain, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United States of America.

The members of the delegations who served on the sub-committee were: Ecuador: Dr. Luis Valencia Rodríguez; Liberia: Mr. Nathaniel Eastman; Philippines: Mr. Hortencio J. Brillantes and Mr. Ernesto L. Calingasan; Spain: Mr. José Gómez Durán; United Kingdom: Mr. P. Selwyn; and United States: Mr. H. Gilbert White.

The Chairman of the sub-committee was Mr. M. Norrish (New Zealand), the Rapporteur of the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories.

Representatives of the ILO, FAO, UNESCO and WHO also participated in the debates of the sub-committee.

<sup>2</sup> Resolutions 332 (IV) of 2 December 1949, 646 (VII) of 10 December 1952, 933 (X) of 8 November 1955 and 1332 (XIII) of 12 December 1958.

financial aid, to achieve and maintain a high rate of economic growth, so as to raise the standard of living of their peoples. The policies being pursued were those of the Governments of the Territories concerned, but his Government gave assistance to the Territorial Governments, both in the working out of their economic policies and in providing the resources necessary to carry them out.

9. He further stated that the fruits of these policies could be seen in the progress which had been achieved in the Territories. There had been substantial increases in the national income of a number of Territories, including Barbados, British Guiana, Malta, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland. Production for export had risen to a marked extent in Hong Kong, North Borneo, Sarawak and Swaziland. There had been expansion in particular sectors, such as the tourist industry in the Caribbean area and the cattle industry in Bechuanaland. Progress had been less marked in certain Territories. In Kenya, for example, output had been affected by successive years of drought and flood, as well as through the falling off in capital investment resulting from the loss of confidence arising out of the political situation. In Mauritius, progress had been slowed down as a result of severe cyclones. In all, however, and in spite of a period of generally deteriorating terms of trade, progress had continued during the period under review.

10. The representative of Spain stated that Fernando Póo and Río Muni had been spared the instability characteristic of many under-developed countries, owing to a liberal economic and financial policy which fostered their development, a trade policy which protected their principal commodities from fluctuations in world demand, the absence of customs duties between them and the Peninsula and a generous supply of foreign exchange for use in importing the necessary machinery. The favourable return from exports from the Equatorial Region was due primarily to the fact that the entire agricultural production was absorbed by the Provinces of the Peninsula at much higher prices than could be obtained on the world market.

11. He further stated that under its Development Plan, the Spanish Government had set in motion a programme of diversification of crops, establishment of related industries, development of fishing, improvement of ports and communications, mineral research, expansion of trade and strengthening of medium and long-term credit. It had also undertaken a series of measures designed to raise the per capita income as rapidly as possible to the level prevailing in the Peninsula.

12. The representative of the United States of America stated that in the three Territories under United States administration, which had a stable and harmonious social and political foundation, the people were already beginning to share in a higher standard of living characteristic of a modern industrial society, and their expectations for an even larger income were rising. It was the policy of the United States and of the territorial Governments to foster the conditions and provide the assistance which would give substance to these expectations.

13. He emphasized that the economic policies of the three Territories were not under centralized control except in the most general sense. The Territories were closely linked to the economy of the United States, but at the same time each partook of the economic life peculiar to its own area.

14. The representative of Australia pointed out that because of the nature and distribution of the resources of Papua, primary production would continue, in the short term at least, to be the main source of locally generated funds. The advancement of Papuan agriculture to improve food supplies, to bring about a more efficient use of land and to increase the production of cash crops had therefore been given high priority by the Government of Australia.

15. He pointed out that in a traditional subsistence economy the economic situation was often one of stagnation rather than growth. The establishment of an advanced economy imposed an increasing need for capital for private and public investment, and in the early stages, at least, this need could not be met from local sources. In recent years, the Administration had provided many facilities necessary for the development of the private sector of the economy. Measures to increase revenue, stimulate savings and encourage investment from internal and external sources were under constant review. It was the policy of the Government of Australia to create fundamental but time-consuming changes among the people by provision of wide-spread education and health facilities. The Government was also pursuing the policy of encouraging any suitable industry in the Territory, provided there were reasonable market prospects and the industry was likely to operate on an economic basis.

16. The representative of New Zealand stated that in respect of the Territories under his Government's administration, which consisted of nineteen Polynesian islands, each small in area and in population, the economic policy being followed was to develop each island to the limit of its individual capacity. On the basis of present knowledge, full self-sufficiency probably could not be attained by economic units of such small size. Nevertheless, this policy had in the last two years shown some striking results. Much of this was the product of long research and planning, particularly in agriculture, going back approximately ten years. He drew attention to the stimulus given to the process when the local legislative assemblies assumed full control of development funds, which were provided, to a large extent, by New Zealand.

17. In assessing progress towards the fundamental aims of economic policy as defined in the introduction to this report, the Committee has taken into consideration the fact that economic development in the Territories should also be evaluated in the perspective of general trends prevailing in the world economy as a whole.

18. Since most of the Territories are primary producers heavily dependent upon exports and with little domestic capital of their own, they are particularly affected by fluctuations in world market prices of primary products. This lack of domestic capital and of flexibility of their economies makes it difficult for such Territories rapidly to adapt their pattern of production to changing world market conditions. Prices of primary products improved in 1959 and then fell sharply in the latter half of 1960. There was some recovery in the early part of 1961 but thereafter the trend was generally downwards, until prices began to rise again at the end of the year. With some exceptions, the prices of the commodities produced by the Territories followed a similar pattern; various local factors, including the weather, exerted an influence on the receipts from some commodities important in world trade.

19. In the Report on the State of Food and Agriculture, 1962, published by FAO,<sup>9</sup> it is stated that, apart from the continuing decline of agricultural prices on world markets, the key problems of food and agriculture in the less developed regions of the world are under-production, hunger and malnutrition. The most disquieting trend is that per capita food production in these regions, which increased appreciably during the 1950's tended to fall in the last few years as production lagged behind the growth of the population.

20. During the period under review, the post-war trend towards rising economic activities continued generally at a slower rate. Nearly all of the Territories were adversely affected by changes in their terms of trade and there were variations in the degree to which this was overcome by an increased volume of production. There were also indications in some Territories of failure to expand food supplies to meet domestic demand as well as to increase earning capacities for foreign exchange under the impact of falling world prices of primary commodities.

21. For instance, the volume of exports of primary products from the Territories under the United Kingdom administration rose by some 3 per cent in 1961, compared with 4 per cent in 1960 and 12 per cent in 1959. The rise was mainly due to increased exports of petroleum products, sugar and timber, although exports of some other commodities (tea, bananas, cocoa, bauxite, manganese and diamonds) also rose. Among the commodities which showed a decline in the volume of exports were cloves, coffee, cotton and copper.<sup>10</sup> The rate of increase in 1961 was, however, similar to that during the period 1956-1958.

22. The output of goods and services of these Territories (including the former Trust Territory of Tanganyika, but excluding Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland and the three High Commission Territories) rose moderately in 1961. Gross domestic product at market prices was estimated provisionally at about £2,190 million in 1961, compared with £2,080 million in 1960. Since 1956 the annual rate of increase at constant prices (excluding Singapore and Hong Kong) has been about 5 per cent. Provisional estimates show that the level of long-term capital inflow was lower in 1961 than in 1959 and 1960, and that gross fixed capital formation was approximately £390 million, about the same as in 1960, but about 15 per cent higher than in 1959.<sup>11</sup>

23. Data on national accounts for Northern Rhodesia indicate that the Territory's gross domestic product at factor cost rose from £200.2 million to £215.5 million between 1959 and 1960, but fell to £207.1 million in 1961. In 1956 it was £194.3 million and it had fallen by 1958 to £146 million.<sup>12</sup> Similar data for Nyasaland indicate that the pace of development of the Territory's economy was not maintained during 1961 at the same level as in previous years; its gross domestic product at factor cost in 1961 was £58.4 million, representing an increase of 3 per cent, a figure well under the 7.6 per cent increase registered in the previous year.<sup>13</sup>

24. Detailed statistics on the per capita gross domestic product are available for both of these Territories. In 1961, the total African contribution per head to the gross domestic product of Northern Rhodesia, including subsistence activities, was valued at £29.0, against £28.9 in 1960 and £28.6 in 1959. For Nyasaland, the figures were £15.8, against £15.6 in 1960 and £15.0 in 1959. The total non-African contribution per head in Northern Rhodesia was £1,507.8, against £1,664.2 in 1960 and £1,591.2 in 1959; for Nyasaland, the figures were £593.1, against £599.7 in 1960 and £596.5 in 1959. The productivity of the African population in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland in terms of the money value of their activities continued to be very low in relation to non-African productivity; a high proportion of the resources of the African population was still devoted to subsistence activities; and the gross domestic product, or the total geographical income, was not yet widely distributed among the members of the community.

25. The Committee recalls that in 1957 the per capita personal income of the indigenous population of certain African Territories was among the lowest in the world. There was a striking disparity between the levels of per capita personal income of Africans and non-Africans in these Territories. This disparity was primarily due to the fact that most Africans were engaged mainly in subsistence agriculture with low productivity and that even in urban areas they were mainly unskilled labourers. The Committee also recalls the assurances previously made by the Administering Members that it was one of the objectives of their policies to reduce and eventually to eliminate this disparity.<sup>14</sup>

26. The Committee notes that although there has been progress in some Territories, in others, the rate of increase in the gross national product has been slow. The Committee is of the opinion that the economic position of the indigenous peoples of some Territories thus far has shown no significant improvement, not only because the inequality of per capita personal income of indigenous and non-indigenous inhabitants has persisted, but also because this disparity has continued to be very great; certain members of the Committee considered that failure to achieve the objective of reducing and eventually eliminating this disparity appeared to indicate that existing economic policies and programmes would require certain modifications if they were to meet the needs and interests of the indigenous peoples. The Administering Members concerned informed the Committee, however, that they were making constant efforts to eliminate these disparities and that they were continuing to carry out intensive programmes for this purpose.

27. The Committee therefore considers that economic development can only be considered as satisfactory if a significant improvement in the standards of living and economic well-being of these peoples is brought about through the early introduction of effective measures to reduce the disparities in income between indigenous and non-indigenous groups, and if the gap between the standards of living in the Territories and those in the highly developed countries is quickly remedied.

28. The Committee notes that in many Territories the participation of indigenous persons in modern economic enterprises, which are largely owned by nationals of the administering countries concerned and other non-resident capital, is primarily through the supply of unskilled and semi-skilled labour. Some members pointed out the importance of foreign investments in stimulating the economic development of the Territories by way of building up various sectors of the economy and providing training for the indigenous population. At the same time, the Committee notes that in certain cases the indigenous workers are excluded from many skilled jobs owing to the lack of sufficient training and that racially discriminatory practices still exist which are manifested by unequal pay for equal work, in spite of the persistent efforts which the Administering Members stated were being made to suppress them. Therefore, the Committee again emphasizes that all possible measures are need to ensure full and equal opportunities and conditions of employment to indigenous workers.<sup>15</sup>

29. As stated previously, in most of the United Kingdom Territories, gross fixed capital formation continued to expand during the period under review, but the level of long-term capital inflow was lower in 1961 than in 1960.

30. However, the pattern of capital formation varied according to the Territory. On the basis of available information, the total private investment in Northern Rhodesia between 1960 and 1961 (excluding that by African rural households in capital goods, on which data are not available) increased from £29.6 million to £31.4 million, while the total public investment decreased from £19.2 million to £18.4 million. This fall was more than accounted for by a decline in investments by public corporations; government investment continued to increase during this period. In the case of Nyasaland, the total public investment rose from £3.9 million to £6.1 million during the same years, and the total private investment (excluding that by African rural households in capital goods on which data are not available) from £2.0 million to £2.3 million. As regards Kenya, there was a further small rise in investment in fixed assets by the public sector, from £14.4 million to £15.2 million in these two years, while the total for the private sector fell by £7.7 million to £19.3 million.<sup>16</sup>

31. Since the expansion of gross capital formation is essential for an increase in employment opportunities, an advance in gross product and the general economic betterment of the population, the Committee urges the Administering Members to take appropriate measures to attract as much new capital as possible to the Territories under their administration, and supports the efforts being made in this direction by the Governments of the Territories.

32. The Committee notes with concern that in several Territories under United Kingdom administration, for example, Kenya, the economic setback has been due to uncertainty regarding their political future. In these Territories, economic growth has slowed down and there has been an outward transfer of capital. The Committee considers that the present state of uncertainty tends to increase fear, strengthen resistance to change and lead to a deterioration in the confidence of private investors. In the Committee's view, as soon as constitutional guarantees can be worked out to safeguard the interests of and ensure equal rights to all sectors of the population, the transfer of power to the inhabitants of the Territories should not be further delayed.

33. Inevitably, political change in a Territory may bring with it a need for reassessment of the economic future. In some Territories this has already been done. Experience has shown that the transfer of political power need not result in an abrupt change in the economic growth of the Territory. In fact, long-term success can best be assured in the political and economic fields when the changes are brought about in an atmosphere of good will and confidence of all sectors of the population. In the period of transition the Administering Member has a special responsibility to make it possible for all the inhabitants of a Territory to work towards a common future.

34. The Committee notes with concern that the economic position of some small Territories has become weaker during the period under review and presents special difficulties, mainly because of the small size of the local markets, the high degree of instability resulting from specialization in the production of only one or two export-earning primary commodities and the heavy dependence on imported goods for the satisfaction of local requirements.

35. The Committee considers that in certain instances there may be advantages for small Territories in establishing areas of closer economic co-operation with neighbouring Territories or countries on a voluntary basis, for example, through the establishment of unitary states, federations, customs unions or free trade areas. In this connexion, the Committee notes that negotiations are being conducted by Barbados and the Leeward and Windward Islands with the view of establishing a federation, and expresses the hope that any unit thus created will become economically viable. Such groupings are desirable or justifiable economically only when satisfactory arrangements can be made with the full support of the people concerned for a fair distribution of the benefits accruing from these groupings among the various participants. In any such association the representatives of the peoples concerned should participate directly in the formulation, implementation and periodic reviews of common economic policies and programmes, which should take into account the needs and changing aspirations of the peoples and resolve any possible differences.

36. The Committee believes that even with arrangements such as those described above, internal economic forces should remain one of the dynamic elements in economic growth. It realizes that the problems of economic advancement in the small Territories are both difficult and urgent, a proper solution of which should be worked out now, and calls upon the Administering Members concerned to take early action to assist these Territories in developing their full potentialities by encouraging more effective utilization of human and natural resources.

II. Development planning

37. Development planning in the Non-Self-Governing Territories varies widely in scope and approach.

38. Planning for the development of the United States Territories is done locally. The territorial budgets are prepared annually by the territorial Governments, but they are largely based on long-range programmes for each activity. Although the budgets are primarily for the public sector, more and more emphasis is being placed on providing the necessary infrastructure, loans and technical assistance for private industries. Another type of planning is done by economic development boards or commissions composed of representatives of the territorial Government and of the various private interests in the local community. The development programmes prepared by these boards are based on a variety of economic surveys and studies made of the resources and potentialities of the Territories. The programmes are advisory in nature, but they are already beginning to find expression in territorial legislation and in the plans of private enterprise. Each Territory also has a planning board or commission responsible for land-use planning and zoning.

39. Although there are no formal development plans for the Territories administered by Australia and New Zealand, the techniques of development planning and programming employed in these Territories are broadly similar to those described in regard to the United States Territories. At the request of the Government of Australia, the IBRD will shortly make a survey of Papua and submit for the Government's consideration a formal plan for economic development.

40. In most of the Territories under United Kingdom administration, new or revised development plans for the early 1960's have recently been produced. They range from a list of specific development projects (Zanzibar) to comprehensive development programmes prepared for the whole economy (Brunei, Nyasaland and Singapore).

41. With the exception of Nyasaland, the existing development plans for the United Kingdom Territories are primarily plans for expenditure in the public sector of the economy. Many of the Governments have, however, made special efforts to encourage growth in the rate of private investment, and all the plans are designed to have an impact on the private sector, e.g., through the provision of extension services for agriculture or infrastructure for industries.

42. In these development plans generally, the description of the economy and its broad trends in the period immediately preceding is usually followed by a description of the general aims and objectives of the plan. For instance, in some plans special emphasis is placed on the need to change the social and economic structures as a precondition for accelerating economic growth. Traditional land tenure systems, customs and traditional attitudes, a high percentage of subsistence activities, a very limited scope of monetary transactions and extremely broad differences between the standards of living in urban and rural areas are features common to most African Territories. These conditions are aggravated by the dependence of several African Territories on the export of one or two primary products whose prices undergo frequent fluctuations. The removal of these impediments to economic development constitutes the most important aim in some development plans.

43. In the more advanced development plans, a qualitative description of aims and objectives is usually followed by a quantitative one. The targets are formulated by sectors (agriculture, transport and communications, etc.), but the break-down of the sector targets into sub-sectors and branches differs from Territory to Territory in its degree of detail.

44. In those Territories where development plans are mainly public expenditure programmes, the break-down of capital expenditure is usually based on the institutional structure of governmental departments and on the economic classification of investment which sometimes bears a close relationship to the sub-sector break-down in the more advanced development plans.

45. An adequate organizational solution has not yet been found for regional planning within Territories, but some regional targets are included in a number of development plans, even in those covering only public expenditure (e.g., in Kenya). Many of the United Kingdom Territories, however, are too small to permit a regional approach to planning.

46. In general, territorial development plans suffer from two other major weaknesses in their organizational framework; the lack of adequate statistics for most of the Territories and the general absence of planning units within the ministries concerned with economic affairs, a reflection of the difficulties in recruiting the necessary technical personnel. There has, however, been a substantial improvement in statistical coverage over the past few years and this had led to a growth in the degree of comprehensiveness of development plans.

47. In addition to the assistance provided by the United Kingdom Government in this field, an increasing number of the Territories have recently sought advice from outside experts (including, in some cases, those from IBRD) in formulating their development policies and programmes. The reports of these experts have often covered fresh ground and have gone a long way towards providing as complete a picture as possible of the economies they have described. One of the most interesting aspects of this work has been the services rendered by the experts to planners, who have found the data provided by the economic surveys very useful.

48. According to the information supplied by the United Kingdom Government on the financing of development plans for the Territories under its administration, about £23 million was spent on Colonial Development and Welfare schemes and on research in 1961-1962 (compared with £25 million in 1960-1961). The value of schemes approved during the year amounted to £21 million (£34.5 million in the previous year). Political factors continued to have an adverse effect on the market for local loans in East Africa, but several United Kingdom Territories, notably in the Pacific and the Caribbean area, were able to float successful local issues during the year. For the first time no loans were raised by territorial Governments on the London market during the year. Exchange loans of nearly £16 million, compared with about £24 million in the previous year, were approved during the year under the Colonial Development and Welfare Act of 1959. Issues during the year against these loans and others approved earlier amounted to nearly £19 million; they amounted to £22 million in the previous year. New capital expenditure provided by the Colonial Development Corporation during the year amounted to nearly £19 million; in the previous year it amounted to £9.1 million. Whereas a decade ago the principal factors limiting the rate of development expenditure in the public sector in many Territories were stated to be physical and administrative, they are now considered to be mainly financial; the primary limitation is the lack of local financial resources.<sup>17</sup>

49. Only a few Territories have been able to obtain financial assistance through international channels. The two major sources are IBRD and the United Nations Special Fund.

50. In 1961-1962 IBRD made loans of £11.85 million towards projects in several Territories, including British Guiana and Kenya. By the end of the year the total amount of loans made to United Kingdom Territories stood at nearly £88 million.<sup>18</sup>

51. In 1961, the Governing Council of the United Nations Special Fund approved grants totalling £3.5 million for projects in British Guiana, Northern Rhodesia and Uganda.<sup>19</sup>

52. The Committee sees no reason to differ from its opinion, expressed in 1957, that the objective of development policy is not so much to make a financial contribution to desirable projects as to set in motion a process of balanced development based on scientific research and supplied by material and technical assistance.<sup>20</sup> It notes that in most Territories this objective has not yet been achieved; that in too many Territories the project type of development investment is still predominant and that the great majority of development plans do not as yet define the general scope and targets anticipated from the private sector.

53. The Committee notes with interest that the Governments of Brunei, Singapore and Nyasaland have adopted the comprehensive approach to planning, and expresses the hope that this approach will obtain more acceptance, since it deals with the whole economy as one unit and takes account, as far as is practicable, of inter-actions between changes in the different sectors of the economy. However, it recognizes that even without this comprehensive approach, planning can have substantial regard to the present and future scope and pattern of the private sector.

54. The Committee is aware that there are objections to the application of the comprehensive approach, the most important of which is the lack of data to carry out the sometimes complicated calculations and, in particular, the lack of reliable information on capital-output ratios and future movements in the terms of trade. However, the Committee believes that estimates of the size and importance of the various sectors of the territorial economies can be of help in establishing an analytical framework which can be used as a starting point for a comprehensive plan. It recognizes the value of the work which has been done in a number of Territories to provide information on these lines and expresses the hope that this work will be expanded in scope and depth. In this connexion, the Committee wishes to stress the need to strengthen the organizational framework adapted to local conditions, which is essential to the successful formulation and implementation of development plans. It recognizes the difficulties confronting the smaller Territories in particular in recruiting the necessary technical staff or in meeting the costs of an elaborate planning unit. It welcomes the decision taken in 1963 by the Economic Commission for Africa and the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East on the establishment of institutes concerned with economic development in the areas of their activities.<sup>21</sup>

55. The Committee notes with approval the practice of seeking expert advice from outside the Territory concerned. It commends IBRD for its efforts to assist a number of Territories in developing appropriate policies and programmes designed to ensure a rapid and balanced growth.

56. The Committee also notes with satisfaction that the programme approved by the Technical Assistance Committee for the Territories showed a substantial increase between 1961-1962 and 1963-1964 (from $2,381,000 to $3,626,000) and that, in general, the emphasis in the programming of international technical assistance has gradually shifted to general economic advancement covering a wider range of development activities.

57. The Committee recalls that General Assembly resolution 1817 (XVII) of 18 December 1962 considered the economic and social situation in Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland to be alarming. The Committee notes that an economic survey mission to Basutoland, Bechuanaland and Swaziland, appointed in consultation with IBRD, made a number of recommendations on the economic development of these Territories. The Committee hopes that these recommendations will soon be implemented. It is aware that a number of development schemes have been carried out with financial assistance from the United Kingdom Government, but that the economic survey mission had suggested that the capital expenditure required to implement its recommendations was nearly all supplementary to that provided for in the development plans for these Territories, and should be met by free capital grants from the United Kingdom.<sup>22</sup> The United Kingdom representative informed the Committee that development plans were being drawn up by the Governments of these Territories for the period 1963-1966 and that these would provide the basis for an accelerated rate of growth.

58. The Committee recognizes that the financing of capital formation is a very important problem—and in some cases may become a critical one for the Territories. If this was a less pressing problem than some others during the ten years or so immediately following the Second World War, it was largely because, during that period, export income and financial aid from the administering countries were maintained at a satisfactory level, and at the same time, the rate of development expenditure was slowed down, in many instances for other than financial reasons.

59. The Committee notes that the decline in export prices during the period under review has seriously reduced available investment funds. The dependence of most Territories on a very few export products makes them specially vulnerable to price fluctuations, and a consequent reduction in export earnings might at any time put development programmes in jeopardy, the more so as the foreign exchange content of investment for economic and social development is high for those Territories with little or no manufacturing industry.

60. The information indicates that the development funds made available by the United Kingdom to the Territories under its administration, though substantial, have recently declined because the number of Territories under United Kingdom administration has also diminished. The representative of the United Kingdom stated that aid to the remaining Territories has tended in many cases to rise. In many Territories the planned public investment represents only a small share of the gross domestic product, ranging from £63 per head per annum in Singapore to just over £5 per head per annum in Kenya.

61. In view of the rapid increase in population in most Territories and the urgency of the problem of combating poverty, illiteracy and chronic ill health in the Territories, the Committee emphasizes that development efforts must gather momentum quickly, and believes that the rate of capital formation should therefore be accelerated.

62. Since domestic savings will not be adequate for the investment requirements of most Territories, the Committee is of the opinion that problems relating to obtaining investment funds from external sources, whether from the administering countries, foreign Governments and private institutions, or international organizations, are of great importance. These are problems of both a political and a technical nature and therefore present several facets for consideration, involving as they do the factors creating conditions favourable for such investment. The Committee notes with interest that the Economic Commission for Africa and the Caribbean Organization have given consideration to proposals for the establishment of development banks in the areas of their activities, and that the techniques and institutions for the mobilization of domestic savings for economic development formed a subject of discussion at the fourteenth meeting of the Consultative Committee of the Colombo Plan for Co-operative Economic Development in South and South-East Asia, held in November 1962.<sup>23</sup>

63. The Committee shares the view of the ILO that investment in the fuller realization of human potentialities can create a particularly valuable stock of "capital" for development. Manpower surveying and assessment, measures for raising the level of productive employment, vocational education and training, management development and related questions should be recognized as closely intertwined parts of a broader human resource programme. The latter, in turn, should be integrated with the programmes and policies for over-all planned development.

64. The Committee notes with satisfaction that WHO is taking a keen interest in development planning in the emerging Territories. It endorses the view that the protection and promotion of the health of the population must underlie any programme to raise the standard of living and that the early association of health planning in an integrated scheme for over-all development can be expected to result in the progressive control of communicable diseases, the reduction of mortality and morbidity and the consequent building up of human manpower resources available for agricultural and industrial purposes.

65. The Committee shares the concern of WHO that there is a tendency to give insufficient importance to health planning in the complex operation of economic and social development in some Territories. This is shown either by a reluctance to bring the health planners into the early phases of the larger and more comprehensive undertaking, or by assigning to the development of health programmes a relatively small share of the available resources in finance and personnel.

66. The Committee welcomes the decision taken by the World Health Assembly in May 1962 to authorize the Director-General to implement an accelerated programme for assisting newly independent States in developing national health plans as a top priority, and the other activities of WHO designed to improve the planning of public health services.

67. Finally, the Committee supports and appreciates the opinion expressed by a number of representatives that formulation of the objectives in development planning must reflect the aims and aspirations of the indigenous inhabitants of the Territories. Consequently, the Committee takes the position that the indigenous peoples should be given adequate representation in territorial Governments. The Committee expresses the view that political self-government is the only prerequisite of economic planning commensurate with the people's needs, wishes and aspirations. In this connexion, the Committee wishes again to refer to operative paragraph 2 of resolution 1514 (XV).

III. Agriculture

68. The Committee takes into account the fact that agriculture plays a dominant role in the economies of many Territories and that the greater part of the indigenous population depends for its livelihood on subsistence farming. It believes that agricultural development should continue at an accelerated pace, especially as the rate of development of many Territories and the improvement in the standards of living of their peoples will for some time continue to depend largely on the agricultural sector of the economy. In over-all programmes of development, high priority should therefore normally be given to agriculture in the allocation of resources, both financial and technical, and special attention should be directed towards the modernization of traditional farming methods, particularly in the African Territories. Encouragement should be given to expansion of the production of both export-earning and import-saving primary industries—principally agriculture, forestry and live-stock.

69. The inadequacy of available statistical data does not permit a full analysis of the progress of the agricultural industry. But it appears that in some Territories there has been little increase in agricultural production. The FAO estimates that in Africa as a whole, per caput agricultural production in 1961/1962 remained at the same level as in 1948/1949—1952/1953, while per caput food production declined slightly in 1961/1962. In recent years, per caput food production in other parts of the world also tended to fall as production lagged behind the growth of population.<sup>24</sup>

70. While the general level of agricultural prices on world markets has continued to decline, changes in the volume of exports of individual crops produced by the Territories have shown diverse patterns. For example, exports of certain crops, such as bananas, cocoa, sugar and tea from the United Kingdom Territories, rose at different rates in 1961, while those of several others, for instance, cloves, coffee and cotton, diminished.

71. In a number of African Territories, including Kenya, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland, subsistence production showed no significant expansion and the contribution of African commercialized farming to total production, though increasing, remained small during the period under review.

72. In connexion with the position of the products of forest industries in the economy of the Territories, the Committee takes note of the following observations made by FAO:

(a) Forest products accounts for a substantial share of the world's industrial production and industrial employment. However, consumption per head in the less developed areas is extremely low: one seventeenth of that in the developed areas for sawn wood; one twenty-third for paper and board. The share of less developed areas in total production is even lower than their share in total consumption, so that their productive capacity is not up to their modest requirements. As a consequence, these areas are heavy importers of manufactured forest products, although net exporters of raw material (sawlogs and veneer logs).

(b) The net trade situation for forest products in terms of value in most areas is even more unfavourable. Transportation costs are very high for the exported raw material and are fairly high for the imported forest products, but transportation profits seldom accrue to the less developed areas, which do not have important merchant fleets. On the other hand, the f.o.b. price of imported forest products is much higher than that of exported raw material, since the former embodies all the value added in manufacturing.

(c) In so far as forest products are concerned, future prospects for the less developed areas are no brighter as far as their net trade position is concerned. Even if the rate of expansion of productive capacity were to continue at the rate of recent years, the net deficit would increase substantially by 1970, with a considerable addition to the already heavy burden in terms of foreign exchange.<sup>25</sup>

73. The importance of expanding the live-stock industry in most Territories has been recognized by the Governments concerned and this is evidenced by the development of veterinary research and field services, live-stock improvement centres and slaughtering and marketing facilities. The level of the output of live-stock products has generally remained low.

74. The Committee commends the attention of the Administering Members concerned to the following observations of FAO on animal production and health in Africa. While these observations relate to Africa as a whole, the Committee believes that they can serve as useful guides, wherever applicable, in dealing with problems in the Non-Self-Governing Territories.

(a) The hazards of live-stock farming in Africa are perhaps greater than in any other region of the world. This is due in many cases to the tsetse fly which effectively inhibits the successful raising of cattle and other live-stock.

(b) The problems of disease control are extremely complicated, and are rendered even more difficult by many factors, among which are the huge distances, lack of communications, droughts, floods, areas of poor land and illiteracy. Nevertheless, much work is being done to control the major epizootics of the regions concerned, and significant advances are being made in the control of contagious bovine pleuropneumonia, tick-borne diseases and parasitism.

(c) Although the milk potential is not great and there are handicaps to the development of dairy farming, there is a growing interest in meat production. The sheep raising industry particularly in the tropical regions, is generally primitive, and feed supplies are deficient. Any programme that would tend to improve these conditions must be planned both on a broad scale and on long-term basis.

(d) Poultry can make a substantial contribution to the relief of protein insufficiency. Success in poultry production depends on the control of disease and the provision of feed from local sources. The average production per hen per year in many villages is at present about forty undersized eggs, compared with 280 to 300 good quality eggs in the top-producing flocks of developed countries.<sup>26</sup>

75. The Committee notes that traditional farming is almost entirely dependent on family labour and primitive technology and that production is predominantly on a small scale with low average yields.

76. Earlier reports of the Committee have included comments on some aspects of the land problem in the Territories. In the belief that an adequate solution to this problem should be found, with the view of improving indigenous agriculture, the Committee wishes to emphasize again the need for the development of a satisfactory land tenure system and for more effective utilization and conservation of land and other natural resources, particularly in the African Territories. It is also of the opinion that the low level of output by indigenous farmers is partly attributable to the small scale of farming operations, and suggests that encouragement should be given to farm consolidation and enclosure. The Committee is aware that efforts in these fields have been made in certain Territories, notably Kenya, and hopes that such efforts will be continued and intensified and that similar steps will be taken in other Territories. It also hopes that the territorial Governments concerned will explain their land policies and programmes to the people with a view to securing their full co-operation in expediting land reforms.

77. In this connexion, the Committee wishes to reiterate its observation made in 1960<sup>27</sup> that the trend towards individual ownership of land opens up the possibility, among other things, of a more rapid expansion of agricultural credit facilities which can serve as an aid to increased production.

78. The Committee realizes that the lack of technological improvements still constitutes a major obstacle to the development of indigenous agriculture, and urges the Administering Members to continue and expand their work in assisting the indigenous farmers in the adoption of modern scientific farming methods. This involves the introduction of higher-yielding varieties and new crops, better and more timely soil preparation, application of fertilizers, insecticides and pesticides, row planting, regular and careful weeding, use of rotation systems, operation and maintenance of mechanical equipment, dry-farming practices to reduce the hazards of rain-fed cropping, and the use of water supplies for supplementary irrigation to compensate for erratic and deficient rainfall during the crucial ploughing, planting and growing seasons. The introduction of such techniques should be preceded by a careful investigation of the agronomic and economic factors and by such action as may be necessary to ensure that the farmers concerned are capable of utilizing these techniques wisely and profitably.

79. The Committee is consequently of the opinion that there is need for several measures to improve the situation described. Among these, in the Territories in which they may be applicable, are: comprehensive plans for the development of new and additional products; the adoption and strengthening of measures to protect the important developing agricultural industries against the dumping which sometimes takes place in the case of competitive and subsidized primary products; the establishment and expansion of efficient marketing arrangements for key commodities; the promotion of co-operative development by encouraging small organizations handling the same product to amalgamate into larger, more effective unions; comprehensive programmes of research, agricultural education and extension; financial assistance for promising cultivators; and the creation of conditions to encourage increased investment in the agricultural industry. The Committee notes the programme of action being taken on these lines by a number of territorial Governments in the provision of extension services to farmers, the expansion of rural credit and the improvement of agricultural marketing systems. It considers that advance is needed in all these activities if agricultural progress is to be assured.

80. The Committee notes with satisfaction that growing recognition has generally been given in the development plans of many Territories to the importance of agricultural development. Noting that lack of funds often results in a lowering of the targets originally proposed by survey missions or expert groups and sometimes even jeopardizes the implementation of such plans, the Committee suggests that the Administering Members intensify their efforts to seek the necessary financing for agricultural development plans for the Territories under their administration.

81. In this connexion, the Committee draws attention to the following comments contained in the FAO report mentioned earlier,<sup>28</sup> which, the Committee believes, apply to the situation in this respect prevailing in most Territories:

"On the most basic problem of all, that of hunger, two developments may be mentioned. In the less-developed countries themselves there was a considerable extension of planning for agricultural development, and particularly of plans closely integrated into those for general economic development. While it would be too optimistic to suppose that all these plans will be fully realized, they at least indicate a greater awareness of the issues and give promise of more rapid development during the forthcoming United Nations Development Decade than in the past. Similarly, in the more developed countries, under the impact of the world-wide Freedom from Hunger Campaign and related programmes, there were increased efforts among Governments and the general public to step up the flow of material aid from surplus food-stuffs. Here a notable new development is the experimental World Food Programme, jointly sponsored by the United Nations and FAO, and expected to come into operation late in 1962. The programme is designed to explore methods of using the surplus food production of the more developed countries to aid economic development in less developed countries, and to combat hunger and malnutrition. Though small in relation to some bilateral programmes, it is potentially of great significance...

"Although the basic problems of agriculture are likely to remain substantially the same for some years or even decades, it is encouraging to note that the world food and agricultural situation is no longer essentially static... An analysis of probable trends to 1970 of demand, production and trade in agricultural products has recently been published by FAO. The study is disquieting in that it brings out the danger that, unless drastic action is taken to increase production in the less developed countries, the food supply may fall increasingly behind domestic demand. At the same time, surplus production of export commodities may become even more widespread, while the demand for farm products in world trade may grow only slowly or in some cases even decline. Nevertheless, with rising populations and incomes, a rapid increase may be expected in the demand for some commodities, notably forest products and (especially in less developed countries) live-stock products."
